Could I, with truth and propriety, pledge myself to the hostile tribes, that this measure would be adopted, and that they would, with certainty, be supplied in this way, in the course of the ensuing spring, as well as in future, I am confident we should draw them over to our interest, notwithstanding every effort of the British to prevent it; because the inclemency of the winter season, the sterility of soil, and the scarcity of game, within the British territory, are all opposed to their removing to the north side of the lakes; and certain I am, that, had not Governor Simcoe held up to the Indians, at the late council, the fond, but, I trust, idle hope, of compelling the Americans to abandon and relinquish to them, all the posts and lands on the west side of the Ohio, the principal part of the hostile tribes would either have accepted of the invitation to treat, or have passed to the Spanish side of the Mississippi, in the course of the fall and winter. Possibly they may yet do the one or the other, as I am informed that their present dependent situation is far from pleasant; nor have we much cause to envy the British the pleasure and expense of supporting and clothing this numerous horde of savages, thrown upon them by their own insidious conduct, and the fortuitous events of war.

A short sketch of the proceedings of the Council at the Big Rock.

A sketch of a speech from the Wyandot chiefs, in the behalf of all their confederates, some time ago; about the 10th October, 1794.

FATHER:

We request of you to give your sentiments candidly; we have been for this many years in wars and troubles; you have, from time to time, promised us your assistance. When is your promise to be fulfilled?

Their father's answer.

CHILDREN:

Your question is very difficult to be answered. I will relate an ancient history, perhaps before any of you here were born. When I first came into this country, I found it in the possession of your fathers the French; we soon became enemies with each other; in time, the Great Spirit above gave the conquest in my favor. In those days the United States were my subjects; we lived in this state for many years after; at last the Americans began to act impudently, which caused a rupture between us; however, the contest lasted for a while; at last we made peace; from that period, they have been encroaching upon your lands. I looked on as a spectator; never would say a word; they have even named the rivers that empty themselves into the Ohio.

CHILDREN: I am still of opinion, that the Ohio is your right and title. I have given orders to the commandant of fort Miami to fire on the Americans, whenever they make their appearance again. I will go down to Quebec, and lay your grievances before the great man; from thence, it will be forwarded to the King, your father. Next spring you will know the result of every thing, what you and I will do.

———, of the Wyandots of Sandusky, sent the following verbal information, by ———, a confidential warrior, and which he did not think prudent to commit to writing, for fear of accident; and desires it may be considered as supplementary and explanatory, to the sketch of the proceedings of the council at the Big Rock, on or about the 10th of October, 1794, viz:

Governor Simcoe insisted, that the Indians should not listen to any terms of peace from the Americans, but to propose a truce, or suspension of hostilities, until the spring, when a grand council and assemblage of all the warriors and tribes of Indians should take place, for the purpose of compelling the Americans to cross to the east side of the Ohio; and in the interim, advised every nation to sign a deed or conveyance of all their lands, on the west side of the Ohio, to the King, in trust for the Indians, so as to give the British a pretext or color for assisting them, in case the Americans refused to abandon all their posts and possessions on the west side of that river; and which the Indians should warn them to do, immediately after they, the Indians, were assembled in force in the spring, and to call upon the British to guaranty the lands thus ceded in trust, and to make a general attack upon the frontiers at the same time: That the British would be prepared to attack the Americans, also, in every quarter, and would compel them to cross the Ohio, and to give up the lands to the Indians.

Captain Brandt also told them, to keep a good heart, and be strong; to do as their father advised; that he would return home, for the present, with his warriors, and come again early in the spring, with an additional number, so as to have the whole summer before them, to fight, kill, and pursue the Americans, who could not possibly stand against the force and numbers that would be opposed to them; that he had been always successful, and would ensure them victory. But that he would not attack the Americans at this time, as it would only put them upon their guard, and bring them upon the Indians in this quarter, during the winter; therefore he advised them to amuse the Americans with a prospect of peace, until they should collect in force to fall upon them early in the spring, and when least expected.

That, agreeably to this plan or advice, the real hostile tribes will be sending flags frequently during the winter, with propositions of peace, but this is all fraud and art, to put the Americans off their guard.

The British made large presents to the Indians at the late council, and continue to furnish them with provision from Colonel McKee's new stores, near the mouth of the Miamies of lake Erie, where all the Indians are hutted or in tents, whose towns and property were destroyed last summer, and who will sign away their lands, and do exactly what the British request them; this was the general prevailing opinion at the breaking up of the council; since which period, the message and propositions of the 5th November, addressed to the different tribes of Indians proposing the treaty of the 9th January, 1789, held at the mouth of Muskingum, as a preliminary upon which a permanent peace should be established, has been communicated to them; upon which, a considerable number of the chiefs of several of the tribes assembled again, and were determined to come forward to treat, say about the first of this moon. But Colonel McKee was informed of it, and advised them against the measure, and to be faithful to their father, as they had promised. He then made them additional presents, far beyond any thing that they had ever heretofore received, which inclined a majority to adhere to Governor Simcoe's propositions, and they returned home accordingly.

That, notwithstanding this, the chiefs and nations are much divided, some for peace, and some for war; the Wyandots of Sandusky are for peace; those near Detroit for war; the Delawares are equally divided, so are the Miamies, but are dependent upon the British for provisions; the Shawanese and Tawas are for war; the Pattawatamies and Chippewas are gone home, sore from the late action.

That such of the chiefs and warriors as are inclined for peace, will call a council, and endeavor to bring it about, upon the terms proposed, as they wish to hold their lands under the Americans, and not under the British, whose title they do not like.

That Colonel McKee has spies upon all his (the informer's) movements, and that the Indians of Sandusky are in a very disagreeable situation, and are apprehensive that they will be compelled to remove, under the protection of the Americans, or to take a part with the bad Indians, unless they can obtain a majority for peace during the winter, which they do not despair of; in that case, the signal will be a ———; when that comes, rest assured it is peace; but don't believe the other flags.

HEAD QUARTERS, GREENVILLE, 5th November, 1794.

Your several letters of the 27th of September, and an extract of a speech which the chiefs and warriors were to have sent from Sandusky, if the evil advice had not been adhered to, were delivered to me at the Miami village, by ———, some days since; he now remains at this place to take care of ———, who has been very unwell, but now on the recovery; every attention shall be paid to him until he is perfectly restored to health.

The part you have taken to bring about a peace between the United States and the hostile tribes of Indians is highly pleasing to me. Continue to exert your influence to accomplish that good work, and you shall be liberally rewarded for your fidelity and trouble.

You will observe, by the speech of the 4th instant, that I have proposed the treaty made at Muskingum, on the 9th of January, 1789, as a preliminary or foundation of a permanent and lasting peace. A duplicate of this treaty was delivered to the Wyandots, and is probably now in your possession; from part of it being recognised and quoted in the extract of the speech of the 26th September, 1794, and as you attended that treaty in person, you must be well acquainted with the principles upon which it was founded.

I have cause to believe that my speech to the hostile tribes of Indians, of the 12th September last, was in great part suppressed by some of your bad white people at the foot of the Rapids.

I, therefore, send a copy of it, as well as my speech of the 13th of August, by this opportunity, which you will please fully and clearly to explain to your people; perhaps you may find it convenient to come to this place immediately after the receipt of this, when matters can be better and more fully understood, and I hereby pledge my sacred honor for the safe return of yourself and all such chiefs and warriors as may accompany you.

Wishing that the Great Spirit may incline all your hearts and minds to peace, and that we may soon have a happy interview,

I am your friend and brother,

ANTHONY WAYNE.

Copy of a letter from ——— to Major General Wayne, dated

SANDUSKY, 4th December, 1794.

BROTHERS:

When I received your speeches I made no delay in despatching the messenger back to you, that you might be informed how matters go on; but unluckily there fell a great quantity of rain, which caused the rivers to overflow. I now make a second trial, which I hope will not fail.

I have now the honor to communicate to your Excellency that ———, the chief of this place, is returned; he did not go as far as the Big Rock. I have delivered him the speech, and explained the others to him at the same time; he was much pleased to hear your good will towards us. He now sends for answer to yours, as follows:

BROTHERS: I am highly pleased to hear your voice, which you have communicated to me. I hope that the Great Spirit above will incline our hearts to that way of thinking. The chiefs would have been there long before now, to speak with you, but the evil spirit deprived us of it; but still you must not be out of hopes. Next spring you may depend upon us; we shall settle all matters to the satisfaction of all parties.

Our father will, or has, promised to settle this for us. You must not think that this will be managed as it was with the last council at the Miami river; that time, when you sent your commissioners, it was our father that disappointed us both; that time we are not to be blamed for it.

BROTHERS: I must inform you that I will tell all my warriors to lay down their hatchets, and not strike any more upon you, and I hope you will do the same with yours; there may be some foolish young men, such as those that have no home, do mischief to you; for those I cannot answer.

My greatest thanks to you for your good will towards us, which I hope the Great Spirit above will incline our hearts to keep this law.

I am, brothers, your friend.

SANDUSKY, 18th November, 1794.

BROTHERS—the United States:

I received yours of the 4th and 5th ultimo, and have the honor to inform your Excellency that all came safe to hand. Never was I more transported with joy at the receipt of them, and that mine had got safe to you.

You have explained yourself so liberal, just, and with equity, to them, on the 13th August and 12th September, 1794, it cannot bear the least doubt of your sincerity and good will towards us brown skin people. You have certainly taken the greatest pains to bring us to a right understanding with the Fifteen Fires. But, alas! as the evil minded people would have it, all would not confide. Whereas, the truth was obscured, and no attention paid at all to it. This has been the case always, particularly since the treaty at Muskingum. To this period have I waited with patience to see if they would find out their error. I saw no probability of its ever being discovered, (perhaps not till it was too late.) I then put upon foot, and insisted strongly, that we should make a trial for that desirable object of peace with the United States, which they complied with frankness. You will see, by the extract of a speech I delivered on the 25th September, 1794, to the chiefs and warriors of this place.

Your speech I have despatched from this on the 13th instant, to the Wyandot chiefs at the Big Rock, near Detroit, as ——— was not here. He left this a few days past for the aforesaid place. Very fortunately, the day before, one of the chiefs of this place returned from hunting, who is my right hand man, and one that was here before; the only two joined me.

I was very sorry that you did not send a few strings of white wampum. However, as my confidence is now on you, it was not long without one. I gave four strings, one hundred grains and two feet each string, with a light blue (Indian) ribbon tied to one end, that you might know it again.

You may rest assured that I did not spare wisdom and integrity, so as nothing should be deficient. You will see also by a letter I wrote to ———, who is a good advocate for war and mischief.

I have instructed the chief I send in with all the contents of it, and desired him to explain it to the chiefs, if in case the other did not.

Your Excellency has honored me with an invitation, if I would find it convenient. You will be pleased to admit my apology; circumstances will not allow me at present. Perhaps I or some other will be sent with their deputations, whenever the council is finished.

My reasons for sending you an answer so soon, that you might be informed of the delays incident to this affair; as, also, his time was expiring fast, and to prevent your uneasiness of mind.

I have sent you a sketch of what was done at the Big Rock lately. It does not seem to be any ways satisfactory to us. Be you assured, brothers, that every word I have advanced you is with honor and truth. I will, to the utmost of my power, use my influence to accomplish the good work we are upon. If it should eventually prove ineffectual, that shall not prevent me from holding fast the chain of friendship with the United States; and allow me the honor to return you my grateful gratifications for the good reception my people has had from you.

I am, brother, your friend.

Extract of a speech to the chiefs and warriors of Sandusky, the 25th September, 1794.

Listen, chiefs and warriors of Sandusky! I told you, when I returned from Detroit, and found you all in such distress, that I had something to say to you all of importance. I am now come forward to speak. Listen chiefs and warriors.

I will now make known to you all my sentiments from my heart, respecting our present situation. I do acknowledge that to be our case; the most alarming circumstance that has ever happened to us and our country.

It appears to me as if we were going to be extirpated from our native soil. You all seem to be entirely lost; and that you are not able to speak for yourselves any more; that you are not able to plan our affairs for our future advantage.

For this reason I now come forward to speak a few words, how we ought to act for our safety, in order that we may enjoy a while longer our lands. You know my right and duty, and the trust you have reposed in me by the first chiefs of the Wyandots.

We are now arrived at a period which demands justice, and tells us to look around and see the most distressing appearance. What an object it is for us to contemplate on. How unhappy I am to see you all in this state; to think that we are so near abandoning our lands. What will become of us? Surely, we will be in the greatest distress imaginable. The only plan I can see for our future happiness, is to demand a hearing from the United States once more. I think they would certainly hear our voice, for they are a humane people. I am now, from this day forward, resolved to send, in a few days, some of our warriors to demand proposals from the United States, concerning our lands. Be expeditious, and let me know your sentiments upon this head, that I may communicate it to them. All that I have to request of you in particular, is, you must not advise your father any more, for he has deceived us too often. Is it not a great shame that you will not believe your own flesh and blood? You ought certainly to know that your ill conduct would be equally hurtful to me, as it would be to yourselves.

I have now reminded you of the trust and confidence you have placed in me; that I was to see justice done you, and prohibit wrong. I am now determined, as I said before, to execute my office by some means or other. Here is four thousand of white wampum, which I deliver you, chiefs and warriors, as a token of my resolution to bring you all to your senses, that you may be enabled to see what right is, when I bring it forward to you.

Extract of a letter from Captain Thomas Pasteur to Major General Wayne, dated

Fort Knox, November 3d, 1794.

I am informed from Kaskaskias, that the hostile Indians are crossing the Mississippi every day; they say there is no withstanding the Americans, and they will go away. Several of the chiefs of the Wabash have been to see me; they say the Indians above are crying, and they believe what I had told them before was very true, for the British would soon cry as well as the bad Indians; but they hoped their father would have a little pity for their bad brothers.

On the above passage, General Wayne remarks, that it corroborates information heretofore received, of the intention of those Indians to cross the Mississippi; "add to this, (says he) that there are no late appearances of an enemy in the vicinity of any of our advanced posts, except from a number of printed hand bills, such as the enclosed, that are occasionally dropped near fort Defiance, evidently calculated to promote desertion, which has had some effect."

The hand bill referred to, is as follows:

To all Loyal and Gallant Subjects—Recruits!

Wanted; for his Majesty's 1st American regiment, or Queen's rangers, of which his Excellency Lieutenant Governor Simcoe is colonel commandant, fifty active young men.

Gentlemen-volunteers shall receive ten guineas bounty money each, on their approval, at the head quarters of the regiment, enter into free quarters, be clothed, accoutred, victualled, and paid agreeably to his Majesty's regulations. None need apply to ———, but such as are perfectly fit for the most active service, at least five feet four and a-half inches high, healthy and stout.

No. 62.

[2d SESSION.

THE CHEROKEES AND CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 17TH OF FEBRUARY, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senateand of the House of Representatives:

I have received copies of two acts of the Legislature of Georgia, one passed on the twenty-eighth day of December, and the other on the seventh day of January last, for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within the territorial limits claimed by that State. These copies, though not officially certified, have been transmitted to me in such a manner as to leave no room to doubt their authenticity. These acts embrace an object of such magnitude and in their consequences may so deeply affect the peace and welfare of the United States, that I have thought it necessary now to lay them before Congress.

In confidence, I also forward copies of several documents and papers received from the Governor of the South-western territory. By these, it seems, that hostilities with the Cherokees have ceased, and that there is a pleasing prospect of a permanent peace with that nation. But, from all the communications of the Governor, it appears that the Creeks, in small parties, continue their depredations; and it is uncertain to what they may finally lead.

The several papers now communicated, deserve the immediate attention of Congress, who will consider how far the subjects of them may require their co-operation.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 17th, 1795.

An Act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State for payment of the late State troops, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia in General Assembly met and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That, on the expiration of two months after the Indian claim shall be extinguished to the territory hereinafter described, it shall be lawful for any person or persons to obtain a warrant of survey from his Excellency the Governor, for the time being, under the regulations and restrictions hereinafter mentioned, that is to say: There shall be a commissioner of locations, appointed by the Legislature, in each county within this State, whose duty it shall be to keep a fair book of entries, in the form to be prescribed by the Secretary of the State and the Surveyor General, and to receive applications for warrants in terms of this act; but, previously to making any entry therein, such commissioner of locations shall require a certificate of two or more freeholders, together with the oath or affirmation of the person applying, taken before him in writing, setting forth the number and description of his family entitled to head rights, and that they do intend to settle the lands applied for, agreeably to the tenor of this act, which oath, or affirmation, the said commissioners are severally authorized and required to administer, a copy of which entry, together with the certificate and affidavit aforesaid, shall be transmitted, under the hand and seal of such commissioner, to his Excellency the Governor, who shall thereupon issue his warrant to the person making the entry, as aforesaid, or to his, her, or their legal representatives, under a proper check, directed to all and singular the surveyors to be appointed under this act. And the said commissioners of location shall be, and they are hereby, entitled to demand and receive of the persons applying for and obtaining entries, as aforesaid, the sum of half a dollar for every entry so made by him. And such commissioners, of locations shall, before they enter upon the duties of their office, be respectively sworn, before one or more of the justices of the inferior court of the county in which they shall reside, and enter into bond, with sufficient security, in the sum of one thousand pounds, each, payable to his Excellency the Governor, and his successor, for the due and faithful performance of the duties required of them by this act, which bonds shall be taken by the clerks of the inferior courts of the several counties, and be by them transmitted to the Executive. And his Excellency the Governor shall be entitled to receive, on every warrant issued by him, the sum of half a dollar, and his secretaries half a dollar, and all grants issued in pursuance of this act shall be free from State fees.

And be it further enacted, That all such warrants may be located to any part or parcel of land south of the Oconee, and within the boundary line described in and by an act, passed and dated at Augusta, on the thirty-first of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, entitled "An act for suppressing the violences of the Indians." And, after such warrant is obtained, it shall be the duty of either of the surveyors of the districts, hereinafter mentioned, or their deputies, to survey the same, in the order in which such warrants may be delivered to them, and in the manner following, viz: The said surveyors shall make two fair plats of all surveys made by them, the scale whereof to be inserted in such plats, and shall plainly and distinctly designate thereon the beginning, angles, distances, marks, and water courses, and other remarkable places crossed or touched, or near to the lines of such lands, and also the quantity of acres, and shall transmit such plats to the surveyor general's office, together with the warrant or order of survey, one of which, with the warrant, shall be filed by the surveyor general, and the other annexed to the grant. And no survey shall be made without chain carriers, who shall actually measure the land surveyed, and shall be paid by the party, for whom the survey shall be made; and such chain carriers shall be first sworn to measure justly and truly, and to deliver a true account thereof to the surveyor, which oath every surveyor is hereby empowered and required to administer. And every survey shall be bounded by natural boundaries, or right lines, and shall be an exact square, unless where such lines interfere with lands already granted or surveyed, or unless where the survey shall be made on any river, or water course, above the width of fifty feet; in which last case the water shall form one side of the survey, and the breadth on such water shall not be more than one-half of the distance back from the water; and the lines of every survey shall be distinctly and plainly marked, leaving no part thereof open, and there shall be one or more station trees plainly marked with a blaze and three chops, in every line, except where it is rendered impracticable by swamps or water courses: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to prevent any person from obtaining a survey of any island or islands in the navigable waters, the quantity of which shall not exceed what is allowed by this act to be contained in one survey: Provided, also, That no person or persons shall be allowed to obtain a warrant for more than three hundred acres for his, her, or their head right, and fifty acres for his wife, and fifty acres for every free-born child he or they may have, under the age of sixteen years; and all unmarried persons, from that age and upwards, shall be entitled to a warrant of three hundred acres: And provided, also, Any person or persons obtaining such warrant, and making such survey, the surveyor making the same, shall, within two months thereafter, advertise the same, in two or more public places adjoining such district, as also in one of the gazettes, in the town of Augusta, at least three months before the same shall be sent to the surveyor general's office, in order to obtain a grant.

And be it further enacted, That the officers and soldiers of the late State troops, and their representatives, shall be, and they are hereby, entitled to receive a warrant from his Excellency the Governor, in like manner with the citizens aforesaid, on producing the genuine original bounty warrant, issued under, and by virtue of, the aforesaid act, for such quantity as is therein expressed; and the said surveyors, to be appointed as aforesaid, shall not locate or survey any lands in the said districts, under any other warrant or warrants whatever, than those issued agreeably to the directions of this act.

And be it further enacted, That every person or persons making such survey or surveys, shall, within twelve months, settle in said district, and cultivate at least one acre for every hundred acres he may so locate, and that no one person shall obtain a warrant, in his own name, for any larger quantity than is herein before specified.

And be it further enacted, That, for the encouragement of persons desirous of settling on the said lands, and to extend the limits and increase the population of this State, the said district or country shall be exempt from taxes, for the space of four years, from and after this act shall take effect; and no person or persons shall be bound to pay for such land, more than the usual and customary office fees.

And be it further enacted, That the surveyors to be appointed by this act, for the faithful performance of their duty, shall, each and every of them, give bond and sufficient security to his Excellency the Governor, for the time being, in the sum of three thousand pounds, and shall take and subscribe the oath usually administered to surveyors. Any person or persons, or surveyor, who shall presume to survey land in the said district, not duly authorized, each and every such person or persons shall, for every survey made, forfeit and pay the sum of ten shillings for every acre so surveyed, one-half to the informer, and the other half to and for the use and benefit of this State, which sum shall be prosecuted for by the department of the Attorney General, on the information of any person, and all such surveys shall be, and they are hereby declared to be, null and void.

And whereas many persons have surveyed lands contrary to the laws and welfare of this State, Be it enacted, That all such survey, or surveys, and the grants founded thereon, be, and the same, and each and every of them, are hereby declared to be, null and void.

And be it further enacted, That the sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims to such territory (should any there be) and the Senators and Representatives of this State, in the Congress of the United States, are required to apply, without loss of time, for a treaty to be held with such tribes or nations of Indians who may claim the right of soil to such lands, and this law shall begin to operate within two months after the extinguishment of such claim or claims.

And be it further enacted, That three commissioners be appointed to attend any treaty to be held under the authority of the United States, for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims to the territory aforesaid, who shall be entitled to receive six dollars per day each, as a compensation for their services, and they shall be allowed a secretary, who shall receive three dollars per day for his services.

And whereas the Indian claims to that tract of country called and known by Tallassee, lying between the rivers Altamaha and St. Mary's, were extinguished by commissioners appointed by the Legislature of this State, in October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, by treaty: Be it therefore enacted, That all that tract of country known by the name of Tallassee, be, and the same is hereby, annexed and set apart, for location, in the same manner, and under the same rules and regulations, as lands described in this act, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no location on the lands herein described shall take place until the assent of the General Government shall be first obtained.

And be it further enacted, That the territory lying between the rivers Oconee, the branch thereof called the Apalachy, and the Oakmulgee, shall be laid off into five districts, in the following manner, viz: All that part from the confluence of the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, up to a line to be run directly from Carr's bluff, on the Oconee, to the place where the Cussetah path crosses the Oakmulgee river, shall form the first district: All that part lying between the said line, and a parallel line to be run directly from the mouth of Shoulderbone to the Oakmulgee river, shall form the second district: All that part lying between the said last mentioned line, and a parallel line to be run from the mouth of Jack's creek, on the Apalachy river, to where the same shall intersect the northernmost, or the main, branch of the Oakmulgee river, shall form the third district: All that part lying between the north and south branches of the Oakmulgee river, that is to say, from the fork thereof, up the said northern or main branch of the said Oakmulgee, to the place where the Bloody-trail crosses the same, thence a due west course to the Chatahouchee river, thence down the said river to a point on the same, from which a due east line shall strike the head or source of the main southernmost branch of the said Oakmulgee, thence down the same to the place of beginning, shall form the fourth district: And all the remaining part of the said territory shall form the fifth district.

And be it further enacted, That all the district of territory called Tallassee, shall form one other district; and that a surveyor shall be appointed by the Legislature for each and every of the districts abovementioned, who shall give bond and approved security to his Excellency the Governor, in the sum of three thousand pounds each, for the faithful and impartial performance of their duty, agreeably to the principles of this act; and no surveyor shall be at liberty to employ any person as a deputy, in either of the said districts, until he shall have passed the examination of the surveyor general, and be approved by the Governor; nor shall any surveyor retain in his service more than two deputies, and each surveyor shall be responsible for the conduct of his deputies.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyors, to be appointed under this act, to ascertain the quantity of land contained in their respective districts, as nearly as may be; to make a fair plan or plat thereof, marking the several water courses and remarkable places contained therein, and to return the same to the surveyor general's office, which shall be there entered of record, before any survey shall be made for any person or persons whatever.

And be it further enacted, That his Excellency the Governor shall, previously to his issuing any warrant of survey to the citizens of this State, or any other person whatsoever, cause three thousand acres of land to be laid off on the south side of the Altamaha river, on the bluff lying nearest to the confluence of the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers; two thousand acres on the south side of the Oconee river, on the most advantageous bluff, near the Rock Landing; together with one thousand acres, in addition to the foregoing, in each of the districts contemplated by this act, in the most advantageous parts of the said districts, for public uses; and the plats of such surveys shall be recorded in the surveyor general's office, and from thence forward shall be completely held and vested in his Excellency the Governor, for the time being, in trust to and for the use of the public.

THOMAS NAPIER, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Concurred: December 28th, 1794.

An Act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State, for the payment of the late State troops, and for other purposes therein mentioned," declaring the right of this State to the unappropriated territory thereof, for the protection and support of the frontiers of this State, and for other purposes.

Whereas, in and by the articles of confederation, entered into and finally ratified, on the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one, by the then thirteen United States of America, the territory within the limits of each of the said States is, to each of them, respectively, confirmed and guaranteed, first, by the second article, to wit: "Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not, by the confederation, expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled;" and, secondly, by the last clause, in the second section, of the ninth article: "No State shall be deprived of territory, for the benefit of the United States."

And whereas, in and by the Definitive Treaty of Peace, signed at Paris, on the third day of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, the boundaries of the United States are established, and those boundaries which limit the westwardly and southwestwardly parts of this State, are, therein, thus defined: "Along the middle of the river Mississippi, until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude; south, by a line drawn due east, from the termination of the line last mentioned, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the equator, to the middle of the river Apalachicola, or Chatahouchee; thence, along the middle thereof, to its junction with the Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river; and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river, to the Atlantic ocean;" which boundaries coincide with the southwardly and westwardly boundaries recited in the land act now in force, passed at Savannah, on the seventeenth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three: And by the convention held at Beaufort, on the twenty-eighth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, between this State and the State of South Carolina, the northern boundary of the State is established, "from the mouth of the river Savannah, up the said river, to the confluence of the river Keowee; thence up the river, and from the source thereof, a due west line to the Mississippi, including islands:" And whereas, in and by the first clause of the sixth article of the federal constitution of the United States of America, all engagements entered into before the adoption of the said constitution, shall be as valid against the United States, under the said constitution, as under the confederation; by the third clause of the ninth section of the first article of the said constitution, "no ex post facto law shall be passed;" and, by the second clause of the third section of the fourth article, "the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States, and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State:"

And whereas the cession made by the State of North Carolina, to the United States, by them accepted on the second day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, is a full acknowledgment and recognizance, on their part, that the several States not only have the right of pre-emption, but are in the full exercise of all territorial right within their respective limits: And whereas, notwithstanding the United States did, on the twenty-second day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, by an act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, enact and declare, "That no sale of lands made by Indians, or any tribe or nation of Indians, within the United States, shall be valid to any person or persons, or to any State, whether having the right of pre-emption to such lands or not, unless the same shall be made and duly executed at some public treaty, held under the authority of the United States;" and did, on the seventh day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, by a treaty held at New York, with certain Creek Indians, stipulate, by the fourth article of the said treaty, that the boundary between the citizens of the United States and the Creek nation is, and shall be, "from where the old line strikes the Savannah; thence, up the said river, to a place on the most northern branch of the same, commonly called the Keowee, where a northeast line, to be drawn from the top of the Ocumma mountain, shall intersect; thence along the said line in a southwest direction, to the Tugelo river; thence to the top of the Currahee mountain; thence to the head or source of the main south branch of Oconee river, called the Apalachy river; thence down the middle of the main south branch and river Oconee, to its confluence with the Oakmulgee, which form the river Altamaha; and thence down the middle of the said Altamaha, to the old line on the said river; and thence along the said line to the river St. Mary's;" and, by the fifth article, "That the United States solemnly guaranty to the Creek nation, all their lands within the limits of the United States, to the westward and southward of the boundary described in the preceding article:"

And, finally, whereas the State of Georgia aforesaid, hath, by no act, or in any manner whatever, transferred, alienated, or conveyed, her right of soil or pre-emption, in any part of the vacant territory within the limits of the said State, to the United States, the cession dated the first day of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, offered by the State of Georgia to the United States, having been, by the said United States in Congress assembled, on the fifteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, rejected, in which rejection territorial rights are declared to rest on the spirit and meaning of the confederation: And whereas the said proposed cession became void, and, on the part of this State, is hereby declared to be null and void to all intents, purposes, and constructions:

Sec. 1. Be it therefore enacted by the Senate and Representatives of the Freemen of the State of Georgia in General Assembly met and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That the State of Georgia aforesaid, is in full possession, and in the full exercise of the jurisdiction and territorial right, and the fee simple thereof; and, that the right of pre-emption to vacant and unappropriated lands lying westwardly and southwestwardly of the present Indian temporary line, and within the limits of the said State, and the fee simple thereof, together with the right of disposing thereof, is, and are hereby declared to be, in the State of Georgia only.

Sec. 2. And for the purpose of raising a fund for carrying this act fully into effect: Be it enacted, That all that tract or parcel of land, including islands, situate, lying, and being, within the following boundaries, that is to say: Beginning on the Mobile bay, where the latitude thirty-one degrees north of the equator intersects the same, running thence, up the said bay, to the mouth of lake Tensaw; thence, up the said lake Tensaw, to the Alabama river, including Currey's and all other islands therein; thence, up the said river Alabama, to the junction of the Coosa and Oakfuskee rivers; thence up the Coosa river, above the Big Shoals, to where it intersects the latitude of thirty-four degrees north of the equator; thence, a due west course to the Mississippi river; thence, down the middle of the said river, to the latitude of thirty-two degrees, forty minutes; thence, a due east course to the Don or Tombigby river; thence, down the middle of the said river, to its junction with the Alabama river; thence, down the middle of the said river, to the Mobile bay; thence, down the said Mobile bay, to the place of beginning, shall be sold unto James Gunn, Matthew M'Allister, and George Walker, and their associates, called the Georgia Company, and their heirs and assigns, forever, in fee simple, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, for the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be paid in specie, bank bills of the United States, and warrants for the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, drawn by the Governor, the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the following manner, that is to say: fifty thousand dollars to be deposited in the treasury previous to the passing of this act, and the remaining two hundred thousand dollars to be paid on or before the first day of November next.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the said James Gunn, Matthew M'Allister, and George Walker, and their associates, or their agent or agents, shall produce to his Excellency the Governor, a receipt signed by the treasurer, that they have deposited the aforesaid sum of fifty thousand dollars, according to the tenor and effect of this act, it shall then be the duty of his Excellency the Governor, and he is hereby required, to issue and sign to the said James Gunn, Matthew M'Allister, and George Walker, and their associates, their heirs, and assigns, in fee simple, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, a grant for the aforesaid tract of country, they securing the last payment of two hundred thousand dollars to the State, by a mortgage to his Excellency the Governor, and his successors in office, on the whole of the land so granted, which mortgage shall be immediately foreclosed in case default shall be made in the payment of the said sum of two hundred thousand dollars, on or before the first day of November next, as aforesaid, in the superior court of any county within the State of Georgia, at the discretion of his Excellency the Governor, any law or usage regulating the mode of foreclosing mortgages, to the contrary notwithstanding, and the whole sum of fifty thousand dollars deposited, shall become forfeited to and for the use of the State; and the grant to be given to the said James Gunn, Matthew M'Allister, and George Walker, and their associates, to be, and the same, in that case, is hereby declared to be, null and void.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said Georgia Company shall reserve for, and to the use of, the citizens of Georgia, exclusively, the quantity of one million of acres of their purchase, in the following manner, to wit: at the expiration of three months, from and after the passing of this act, a subscription book shall be opened at the treasury office of this State, and be kept open for the term of four months thereafter, for the purpose of receiving subscriptions of the citizens for the said reserved lands: Provided, That no person, who shall otherwise become a member, or interested in either of the companies herein contemplated, shall be allowed to subscribe for any part of the said reserved land, and no person shall be permitted to subscribe for more than five thousand acres in his own name, or in the name of any other citizen, unless duly authorized and appointed by him for that purpose, under a warrant of attorney, executed in the presence of two or more witnesses, one of whom, at least, shall be a justice, appointed for holding the inferior court of the county, where the subscriber resides, which said power of attorney shall be lodged with the treasurer, as his voucher for entering such subscription: And provided also, That the citizens of the respective counties shall not, at any time within three months, from and after the opening of the book of subscriptions, as aforesaid, be allowed to subscribe for more, or a greater quantity, of the said reserved lands, than the proportion hereinafter particularly described and limited, to wit: Chatham, one hundred and seventy thousand acres; Effingham, sixty-two thousand acres; Burke, one hundred and fifty-five thousand acres; Richmond, one hundred and fifty-five thousand acres; Columbia, one hundred and fifty-five thousand acres; Wilkes, two hundred and seventy-two thousand acres; Washington, one hundred and thirty-one thousand acres; Elbert, one hundred and thirty-one thousand acres; Greene, one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres; Franklin, seventy-eight thousand acres; Liberty, sixty-nine thousand acres; Glynn, thirty-two thousand acres; Camden, thirty-two thousand acres; M'Intosh, thirty-five thousand acres; Bryan, thirty-two thousand acres; Warren, ninety-three thousand acres; Oglethorpe, one hundred and sixteen thousand acres; Montgomery, twenty-three thousand acres; Scriven, thirty-eight thousand acres; and Hancock, ninety-six thousand acres. And it shall be the duty of the justice, or justices, of the inferior courts, before whom warrants of attorney, authorizing subscriptions, shall be executed, to require a like affidavit on the back of such warrant of attorney, before attesting the same; and the land, so subscribed and paid for, shall be held by such subscribers in fee simple, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, on the same terms, and upon the same principles, with the original purchasers of the company in which they shall subscribe; and shall be entitled to fair and equal representation in such company, in proportion to the quantity of land so by them subscribed and paid for.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, upon entering any subscription as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the treasurer, and he is hereby required to receive of the subscribers the purchase money, being the proportion of one-fifth part of such subscription, in terms of this act; the remaining four-fifths, or balance of the purchase money, shall, within four months from and after the opening the said book of subscriptions, be paid unto the treasurer, in like manner, as aforesaid; and, in case such balance shall not be paid, on or before the expiration of the said seven months from the passing of this act, that then, and in that case, the subscriber, or subscribers, so failing, shall be at liberty to withdraw their said subscriptions, together with the money so paid by them, and the lands, so subscribed for by them, shall revert to, and be vested in, the company in which such subscription shall have been made or entered.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the sum of ten thousand dollars, part of the first payment to be made by the companies aforesaid, shall be, and the same is hereby declared to be, appropriated, and set apart, for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claim, in addition to the twenty thousand dollars appropriated by the act, entitled "An act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State, for the payment of the late State troops, and for other purposes therein mentioned."

GEORGE MATHEWS, Governor.

Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, January 9th, 1795.

SIR:

I embrace the opportunity, by Mr. Postlewait, who leaves this place in the morning for Philadelphia, to inform you that, on the third instant, the conference or meeting between the Cherokee and myself, respecting the exchange of prisoners, terminated with the pleasing prospects of peace with that nation. I am not prepared to forward to you, by this conveyance, a copy of the journal, but I shall forward a copy by Colonel Hays, of Mero district, who will leave this in three days, at most, for Philadelphia. Notwithstanding the pleasing prospects of peace with the Cherokees, I find myself under the necessity of reporting to you that, on the 20th December, Col. Hugh Tenan, John Brown, and William Greemes, were killed and scalped by Indians, I believe Creeks, on the southern frontiers of Davidson county, about fifteen miles from Nashville.

Judging from the very exposed situation of the Cumberland settlers, and their long and unprovoked sufferings at the hands of the Creeks, there is too little reason to hope that blood-thirsty nation will ever cease to murder and rob those citizens, until it is severely chastised, or an armed force is so posted as to afford those citizens effectual protection.

It cannot but be evident to the United States, that the Creeks, except the superannuated chiefs, who have satiated themselves with blood, pay no regard to the treaty formed between them, so far as it respects the Cumberland citizens.

Extract of a letter from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, January 10, 1795.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you the journal of the proceedings between the Cherokee chiefs and myself, which terminated on the 3d instant, with the pleasing prospects of peace between that nation and the United States. It will be observed, that the leading object of what I said to the chiefs, was to induce the Cherokees to take such steps as would ultimately destroy the friendship that has too long, for the peace of the United States, subsisted between that nation and the Creeks, believing that, in so doing, I was consulting the true interest of the United States. But, had they have agreed to my propositions, of permitting a company of their young warriors to range on the frontiers of Mero district, for its protection against the Creeks, I should not have called for them until I had received your approbation or order, authorizing me so to do. I say, had they have agreed; because you will see that Watts and the Bloody Fellow publicly refused; but it is necessary to inform you that afterwards they both, in a private conversation, told me they had their reasons for denying publicly, namely, that the Creeks would know it before they were ready, and would injure them; but, if I would delay to call for such a party of their young men, for a short time, they would be ready, and have no objection to their ranging, for the protection of the frontiers. And I assure you, that if Watts, the Bloody Fellow, and all the chiefs of the Lower towns, were opposed to such a measure, that I could readily draw forth, for such a purpose, at a month's notice at most, from sixty to two hundred of the young warriors of the Upper towns, provided a few white men, in whom they had confidence, were appointed to lead them. It is with you to instruct me whether their services are necessary or not. I have told you the prospects of peace with the Cherokees are very pleasing, and in great truth I have so informed you; but it is equally true that, unless effectual measures are taken to stay the murdering hand of the Creeks, that peace is not to be expected by the frontier citizens of this territory or Kentucky.

KNOXVILLE, January 20th, 1795.

SIR:

I have judged the information contained in the enclosed copy of a letter from General Robertson, written on the 13th instant, and received last night express, of such importance, and involving such consequences, as to render it my duty to forward it to you express. I also enclose a copy of my answer, of this date, to General Robertson, the two embracing the subjects so fully on which they are written, that I consider any thing further unnecessary.

Copy of a letter from General Robertson to Governor Blount, dated

NASHVILLE, MERO DISTRICT, January 13th, 1795.

SIR:

I intended sending off Shute on the 10th instant, but at night, on the 9th, five Chickasaws came to my house, as runners from William Colbert and three other chiefs, Captain James Underwood, Captain Mucklishapoy, the elder, and the Old Counsellor, informing that I was to expect them in two or three days, with about seventy warriors, and some women and children, and five Creek scalps, which they had taken near Duck river, on their way to war against this district, which was evidenced by a war club, and other tokens of the kind, as well as halters, bridles, and spurs, and pack-saddles which they were making. The leader of the Creeks was known by several of the Chickasaws; his name was Shotlatoke, as was his brother, and have been, as the Chickasaws say, for four or five years past, known to hunt no more than to get support to enable them to pass and repass in killing and stealing from this district. Their camp was discovered on the evening of the 2d instant; surrounded about day break, and fired upon about sunrise; and the whole party, consisting of five warriors, was killed. One Chickasaw was wounded in the groin, but is like to recover. The Indians came in yesterday in great pomp. I have had a long conference with them, and they all desired me to send their talks to your Excellency. Colbert they consider as their head, and all agree to stand by him. They desire me to let you know, that, though they have not seen your Excellency as late as some of their nation, your talks are as fresh in their minds as when spoken; that they have been waiting since the conference at this place, to see you retaliate on the Creeks for the many injuries done your people; that it is, as they believe, your good disposition which has prevented it; but that they cannot doubt you have found them fully out by this time, and will no longer believe their lies. They suppose the Creeks have yet some person to write lies for them, as McGillivray used to do, to the President, but wonder he does not believe you in preference. Much more to the same purpose they have said on the subject, and I have endeavored to explain the difficulties under which you labor, but they cannot believe it is right to suffer injuries without retaliation. Colbert has not been at home since early in the fall. He informs, that the Creeks have been very insolent in his nation this fall; they have killed one white man, named Sexton, and a number of cattle, mostly belonging to Tom Brown, whose nephew is here with Colbert, and was at the killing of the Creeks. They have come on, resolutely determined to join us, and go and build block houses on the Tennessee river, and assist in supporting them. The place they point out as best, and nearest the Creek nation, is where the road strikes the river on which the prisoners taken out, when Thompson's family was murdered, crossing the Tennessee at what is called the Creek crossing-place. I suggested the mouth of Elk as more proper, but two Chickasaws, that are well acquainted, say it is much farther from the Creeks, and a worse road from the place they propose; and add, that it is on their land, but not far from the line between them and the Cherokees, in proof of which they appeal to the journal of the conference held with them by your Excellency, at this place, and to the certificate of the bounds of their lands signed by the President, last summer, and delivered to Opoa Mingo. It was no small difficulty for me to convince them I had no power to send men with them to drive off the Creeks on this side of the Tennessee river, and build block houses, and send to your Excellency to support them with provisions, ammunition, and artillery; and, after all the arguments I could make use of, I could not satisfy them otherwise than by sending to you, giving you notice of their request: for, they say, they are now the people of the United States, and are commissioned by the President, himself, which is the cause they have retaliated on his enemies, for injuries done his people; and that they expect a large campaign this spring against the Creeks, and that they are determined to assist the President of the United States in protecting such posts as he shall establish for that purpose.

I need say no more, only that they give every assurance of exerting themselves in behalf of the United States, and often hint that they hope the United States will not leave them to suffer by their friendship, manifested in killing their enemies. But, sir, I am in pain, supposing you will not be able to establish the post they expect; and am certain the Creeks will be revenged before relief can be given them. But, could the post be established as they request, they are of opinion they could keep the Creeks from embodying against their nation, by scouting parties, till an army would be ready to invade their country. I confess, I wished the Chickasaws to kill Creeks, but lament their beginning so early. My fears are, that, should they suffer much by the Creeks, and it not be in the power of the United States to relieve them, we will lose their confidence and friendship, and they may eventually become our enemies. In all my conferences with the Chickasaws, I have only told them I expected an army would go from the United States, the ensuing summer, against the Creek nation; giving them to understand, that this expectation was founded only in the high opinion I entertained of the wisdom of the counsels of the United States, and not in any order I had received from Government. Colbert has got his Creek wife, and all his children, along, and six negroes, which he intends to put in, with some person, for a crop. I wish Shute's return as soon as possible, to save expense: for there are upwards of a hundred Chickasaws now with me, and Colbert says, he turned a number back, but expects some will yet come on.

There is an entertainment provided for Colbert and his party, at this place, to-morrow, by subscription: they will be as well received as they could expect. Colonel Roberts has ordered a general muster, and the company of cavalry, in uniform, will escort them from my house. They intend having a war dance at night.

Please direct me, as fully as in your power, how I shall proceed.

I am, yours, &c.

Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to General Robertson, dated

KNOXVILLE, January 20th, 1795.

SIR:

Your letters of the 9th and 13th instant, were last night delivered to me by Mr. Shute, express; and I assure you no person could be more pleased with the killing of the five Creeks by the Chickasaws than I am, so far as it respects the killing of the Creeks, but, as it respects the Chickasaws and the United States, in its consequences, I have my doubts whether it will prove beneficial or not. It is certain, from the speech of the President to Congress, that he did not, at the time he opened it, contemplate a war with the Creeks, as the only notice he takes of that nation is, that they have been protected from encroachment; but, since that time, the accounts of the many murders and thefts, by them recently committed, in Mero district, have been faithfully reported to him, which may effect an alteration of opinion respecting them. It is equally certain, that the Chickasaws, by the killing these five Creeks, will involve these two nations in a war with each other, and thereby, it is highly probable, the Southwestern frontiers will, for a time, be relieved from the tomahawk and scalping knife of the latter; but, with you, I fear, if the former are not supported by the United States, in whose behalf they have unadvisedly stepped forward, that it must end in the loss of their friendship for the United States.

I shall, without delay, forward by an express, copies of your letters of the 9th and 13th instant, and also a copy of this letter to the Secretary of War, whose answer and instructions may be expected at this place in from forty to fifty days. This length of time will have elapsed before the warm weather, the season for Indian warfare, will commence: besides, it is highly probable, as the party were all killed, that the nation will not be immediately informed of the act of hostility committed against it by the Chickasaws; and it is well known, that all Indian nations are slow in their deliberation, and operations for war—I mean, in large bodies. Hence, it may be fairly presumed, that the Chickasaws have not to expect any large body of Creeks to invade their nation, before I have the honor of receiving the instructions of the President as to the part the United States mean to act on the occasion; and, as to small marauding parties of Creeks, the Chickasaws, without the aid of the United States, are able to oppose them, or retaliate their injuries. Colbert and his party, on your receiving this letter, will expect my answer to their propositions respecting the establishment of a block house, &c. It will be best to tell them that I have despatched a hasty runner to the President of the United States, in whom all power is vested, and not in me, to give orders on such important occasions; that his answer may be expected within the time before mentioned, and that no delay should attend the execution of such orders as I shall receive respecting the Chickasaws. Point out to him, and his party, the reasons as before stated, with such others as shall occur to you, why the Chickasaws are not to fear a national attack from the Creeks, before I shall be fully informed and instructed, as to the part the United States determine to act on the occasion.

A question here presents itself, namely; what are you to do with Colbert and his party, already upwards of one hundred in number, and more expected? who, it seems from your letter, have, from a mistaken opinion, or want of information, as to the true objects of the President of the United States, in giving them commissions, come to defend the frontiers of Mero district against the Creeks, viewing them as the enemies of the United States. This being the case, and Colbert and his party having already, by killing the five Creeks, involved their nation in a war with the Creeks, if you find it absolutely necessary to the preservation of their friendship with the United States to indulge them in the performance of that duty, which they have come with a determination to perform, I would advise you to employ them accordingly, till the pleasure of the President is known on that head. They (Colbert and his party) will afford more certain security to the frontier inhabitants than an equal number of the militia, consequently you will lessen the number of the militia on duty, meaning such as are authorized by the order of the Secretary of War, of the fourteenth day of April last, so as, by keeping Colbert and his party on duty, you will not increase the expense of the defence of the district.

Herewith you will receive a copy of the journal of the proceedings at Tellico block house, by which you will be informed what passed, between the Cherokees and myself, respecting the Chickasaws, and you are to consider it your duty to use your best efforts to heal the difference, and restore peace between those two nations, as, in so doing, you will promote the interest of the United States.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

INDIAN LANDS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 23, 1795.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message from the President of the United States, of the seventeenth instant, as relates to the disposition of Indian lands, by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, made the following report:

That, it appears to your committee, that the Legislature of the State of Georgia, by an act of the 7th day of January last, have contracted and provided for an absolute conveyance of certain portions of lands held by the Creek and other Indian tribes, within the limits claimed by that State, under the sanction of treaties made with the United States, amounting to three-fourths of the lands so held by the said Indians.

That your committee cannot but foresee great danger to the peace of the United States, in vesting interests in individuals, the enjoyment of which is to depend on the extinguishment of the Indian titles, from the constant excitement which they produce, to embroil the Government with the neighboring Indians, in hope of their extinction or banishment.

That rights, so dangerous to the general happiness, should reside only in the bodies constituted for the guardianship of the general good of society, as being alone capable of comparing the various interests, alone disposed to promote a happy result to the community.

That your committee are of opinion, that it is highly incumbent on the United States to secure, to the neighboring Indians, the rights acquired by treaty, not only for obtaining their confidence in our Government, but, for preserving an inviolate respect in the citizens of the United States, to its constitutional acts.

Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the President of the United States, to use all constitutional and legal means, to prevent the infraction of the treaties made with the Indian tribes by the citizens of the United States, with an assurance, that Congress will co-operate in such other acts, as will be proper for the same end.

Resolved, That it be further recommended to the President of the United States, not to permit treaties for the extinguishment of the Indian title to any lands, to be holden at the instance of individuals or of States, where it shall appear that the property of such lands, when the Indian title shall be extinguished, will be in particular persons: And that, wherever treaties are held for the benefit of the United States, individuals claiming rights of pre-emption, shall be prevented from treating with Indians, concerning the same; and that, generally, such private claims be postponed to those of the several States, wherever the same may be consistent with the welfare and defence of the United States.

Resolved, That the President of the United States, be authorized, whenever claims under prior contracts may cease to exist, to obtain a cession of the State of Georgia, of their claim to the whole or any part of the land within the present Indian boundaries, and that _____ dollars ought to be appropriated to enable him to effect the same.

Resolved, That all persons who shall be assembled or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the territory south of the river Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations upon any Indian town, property, or persons, shall thereby become liable and subject to the rules and articles of war, which are or shall be established for the government of the troops of the United States.

Resolved, That all persons who, unauthorized by law, may be found in arms on any lands westward of the lines established by treaties with the Indian tribes, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit a sum, not exceeding _____ dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding _____ months.

Resolved, That it shall be lawful for the military force of the United States to apprehend every person or persons found in arms, as aforesaid, and him or them to convey to the civil authority of the United States, within some one of the States, who shall, by such authority, be secured to be tried, in manner hereafter expressed.

NORTH WESTERN TRIBES AND THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 2, 1795.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 2, 1795.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to communicate to the Senate and House of Representatives, the enclosed extracts of letters and documents, received from Major General Wayne, and from James Seagrove, agent for Indian affairs for the Creek nation.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

Extracts from a letter to the Secretary of War from James Seagrove, agent for Indian affairs, dated at SAVANNAH, January 13th, 1795.

Some chiefs of the Creeks were on a visit to the Governor of Georgia, about six weeks past. I am sorry to find that the proceeding of the Legislature of Georgia, relative to them, was not such as they had reason to expect: it having been debated in Senate, for some days, whether or not they should be detained as prisoners, until the treaty of New York should be complied with. The Indians knew it, and I believe returned much displeased.

I find they (the Creek chiefs) are determined to try their strength in the nation, to crush the plunderers and murderers, and to return the property taken from this country: but I much doubt the ability of the well disposed to effect this; as the vicious and ill inclined are forbid, by the Spanish agents, to deliver up any property or prisoners to the Americans, or to give any kind of satisfaction whatever.

I also find that a principal part of the chiefs' business down, was to endeavor to have a trade established for them, as they wished to break off all connexion with the Spaniards, in the way of trade; but until they can get supplies from the United States, they must continue dependent on the Spaniards, who, they publicly say, advise them to every thing injurious to the United States, and keep their young people in an ungovernable situation. These are matters which I know to be strictly just.

Extract of a letter from Timothy Barnard, deputy agent of Indian affairs, to James Seagrove, Esq. dated

FLINT RIVER, 18th December, 1794.

I expect, before this, you have been informed of the Mad Dog's route to Augusta; I wrote you a few lines by Mr. Cornell, but not very fully on the business, as I considered Mr. Cornell had it in his power to give you a full detail of every matter; all that I can say at present, is, that the Mad Dog seems very intent on performing his promises to the Governor; but, on his arrival in the Lower Creeks, found all the towns entirely empty, as it is the season of the year for them to be all in the woods; even those that promised to wait for his return, as the Mad Dog was detained so long in Augusta, were all gone to the woods; the Mad Dog has, however, sent runners into the woods, to have all the head-men that can be, collected into the towns by the middle of next month, for the purpose of collecting the prisoners and property, horses, negroes, &c.; and says, that he is determined, if those Chehaw rascals will not give up the property by fair means, they shall by foul. There was a large body of the Cussetahs collected to go and take the negroes by force, as the Mad Dog come down, and it would have been done, but the Mad Dog stopped it himself, till he returned from Georgia, to see, as he said, if they could have a peace and trade from that quarter, or not. I have every reason to believe that the heads of the nation will, and are determined to do something more than has ever been done yet, to try to save their land. This trip of the Mad Dog's to Augusta has opened their eyes, and, I believe, convinced them that they are at the brink of ruin. Nothing I think will stop a good deal of the property's being given up, except some mischief should be done on this side the Oconee by the whites, as I think there is every probability of, as, up about Shoulderbone, the white people have got their stock over on this side, and are daily over a hunting fifteen and twenty miles round. I have written the Governor very fully about it. The Mad Dog, in his letter to the Governor, has likewise requested of his Excellency to keep his people from coming over, lest it may cause some trouble, which it may put out of his power to perform his promise to his Excellency, respecting the property and prisoners. I think, if you were to write his Excellency on the business, he might, perhaps, give out orders to have the stock recrossed, as I expect daily to hear of something happening in consequence of it, and in such case, the whites ought to blame themselves for what may happen.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated HEAD QUARTERS, GREENVILLE, 24th January, 1795.

It is with infinite pleasure that I now announce to you, the strong and pleasing prospects of a general peace, between the United States and all the late hostile tribes of Indians northwest of the Ohio.

The two following preliminary articles were entered into by General Wayne, on the part of the United States, and the sachems and war chiefs of the Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Sacs, and Miami's, on the other part:

ARTICLE 1. It is agreed, that, until articles for a permanent peace shall be adjusted, agreed to, and signed, all hostilities shall cease, and the aforesaid sachems, and war chiefs, for and in behalf of the nations which they represent, do agree to meet the above named plenipotentiary of the United States, at Greenville, on or about the 15th day of June next, with all the sachems and war chiefs of their nations, then and there to consult and conclude upon such terms of amity and peace as shall be for the interest and to the satisfaction of both parties.

ART. 2. Should any of the nations or tribes of Indians, now at war with the United States, or any other nation or tribe, meditate or attempt any hostile measure against any post or settlement, in the occupancy of the troops or citizens of the United States, or against the lives or property of any individual or individuals of the same, and it shall come to the knowledge of the before mentioned nations, or either of them, they do hereby engage to give immediate notice thereof, to the commander-in-chief, or to the officer commanding the troops of the United States, at the nearest post; and should any nation, with hostile intentions against any part of the troops or citizens of the said United States, attempt to pass through their country, they will endeavor to prevent the same, and, in like manner, give information of such attempt, to the said commander-in-chief, or to the officer commanding the troops of the United States, at the nearest post, as soon as possible, that all causes of mistrust and suspicion may be avoided between them and the United States. In like manner, the commander-in-chief, and all officers acting under his orders, shall give notice to the said Indian nations of any harm that may be meditated against them, or either of them, that shall come to their knowledge, and do all in their power to hinder and prevent the same, that the friendship between them may be uninterrupted.

In a message from General Wayne, dated January 1, 1795, to the sachems and war chiefs of Sandusky, is the following passage:

I have received information from Colonel Hamtramck, one of my principal warriors, commanding at the Miami villages, that the chiefs of the Chippewas, Ottawas, Sacs, Pattawatamies, and Miamies, arrived at that place three days since, and may be hourly expected at Greenville; the Miamies say that the chiefs of the remaining hostile tribes had acceded to the prevailing opinion, and wish for peace, and that those chiefs are now on their way to this place, and may be expected in the course of a few days after the arrival of the chiefs of the five nations, before mentioned.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 25, 1795.

Just at the close of the last session of Congress, I received from one of the Senators and one of the Representatives of the State of Georgia, an application for a treaty to be held with the tribes or nations of Indians claiming the right of soil to certain lands lying beyond the present temporary boundary line of that State, and which were described in an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the 28th of December last, which has already been laid before the Senate. This application, and the subsequent correspondence with the Governor of Georgia, are herewith transmitted. The subject being very important, I thought proper to postpone a decision upon that application. The views I have since taken of the matter, with the information received, of a more pacific disposition on the part of the Creeks, have induced me, now, to accede to the request, but with this explicit declaration: That neither my assent, nor the treaty which may be made, shall be considered as affecting any question which may arise, upon the supplementary act, passed by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, on the 7th of January last, upon which inquiries have been instituted, in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives; and that any cession or relinquishment of the Indian claims, shall be made in the general terms of the treaty of New York, which are contemplated as the form proper to be generally used on such occasions; and on the condition that one half of the expense of the supplies or provisions for the Indians assembled at the treaty be borne by the State of Georgia.

Having concluded to hold the treaty requested by that State, I was willing to embrace the opportunity it would present, of inquiring into the causes of the dissatisfaction of the Creeks, which has been manifested since the treaty of New York, by their numerous and distressing depredations on our Southwestern frontiers. Their depredations on the Cumberland have been so frequent, and so peculiarly destructive, as to lead me to think they must originate in some claim to the lands upon that river. But, whatever may have been the cause, it is important to trace it to its source: for, independent of the destruction of lives and property, it occasions a very serious annual expense to the United States. The commissioners for holding the proposed treaty will, therefore, be instructed to inquire into the causes of the hostilities to which I have referred, and to enter into such reasonable stipulations as will remove them, and give permanent peace to those parts of the United States.

I now nominate Benjamin Hawkins, of North Carolina, George Clymer, of Pennsylvania, and Andrew Pickens, of South Carolina, to be commissioners to hold a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians; for the purposes hereinbefore expressed.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, June 25, 1795.

Copy of a letter from James Gunn and Thomas P. Carnes, Esqrs. to the President of the United States.

STR:

In obedience to the will of the General Assembly of the State we have the honor to represent, we beg leave to lay before the President of the United States, an act passed by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, on the 28th day of December last. By a reference to the seventh section of the aforementioned act, it will be perceived, that it is the duty of the Senators and Representatives of that State, in the Congress of the United States, to apply, without loss of time, for a treaty to be held with the tribes or nations of Indians claiming the right of soil to certain lands, as described in the said act, lying beyond the temporary boundary line. The General Assembly, at the time they passed this law, appear to have had in view, the operation of an act of the General Government, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," and, in conformity thereto, they have appointed three respectable citizens, to attend, as agents, on the part of the State, and appropriated the sum of thirty thousand dollars, for the purpose of defraying the expense of a treaty, and extinguishing the claims of Indians, if any there be, to lands lying within the boundaries described in the said act. And, to the end that the said treaty may be held, conducted, and concluded, in a fair, open, and honorable manner, and agreeable to the principles contained in the eighth section of the above recited act of the United States; we have to request, on the part of the State of Georgia, that a commissioner or commissioners be immediately appointed, and the time and place fixed on, for holding a treaty with the aforesaid Indian tribes.

It cannot have escaped the observation of the Executive, that a number of the frontier citizens of the State of Georgia have, for several years past, remained captives to a cruel and barbarous enemy, and that many of those who have been so fortunate as to avoid captivity, and preserve their lives, are reduced to extreme indigence, from the continued predatory war carried on against them by Indian tribes.

We anticipate, with confidence, that an early period will be fixed on, for holding a treaty, and hope that it may eventuate in the restoration of all the unfortunate sufferers to their distressed families, and effectually secure the peace and happiness of those, whose lot it is to reside on a frontier.

*Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia.*DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 20, 1795.

SIR:

I am instructed by the President of the United States to inform your Excellency, that, on the 2d instant, he received from James Gunn, Esq. one of the Senators, and from Thomas P. Carnes, Esq. one of the Representatives in Congress from the State of Georgia, a letter (of which the enclosed is a copy) requesting that a treaty might be held with the Indians claiming the right of soil to certain lands, lying beyond the present temporary boundary of Georgia, for the purpose of extinguishing their claim to them.

This request demanded, and has received, much consideration. The crisis at which it has been made, has occasioned no small embarrassment to the Executive of the United States. The Creeks have been, with difficulty, restrained from open war; any movement which may hazard that event, must be cautiously made; and it is well known, that no measures excite so much jealousy among them, as those which affect their lands, unless they are previously disposed to grant them. How far this may be the case, is unknown; and, as Congress, although duly informed of the situation of the Southern and Southwestern frontiers, have provided, in the act of appropriation, merely for their defensive protection, it behooves the Executive to observe great delicacy in the management of Indian affairs; many inquiries and arrangements must precede the treaty requested, and, as time is requisite for these, no definitive answer can at present be given.

The two acts of the Legislature of Georgia, one passed on the 28th December, and the other on the 7th of January last, for appropriating and selling Indian lands, were laid before Congress. The deliberations of the two Houses issued in a concurrent resolution for directing the attorney general to investigate the title of the State of Georgia to the lands sold to the several companies, by the act of the 7th of January. A copy of this resolution I have now the honor to enclose.

The request beforementioned, embraces an important object. The facts here detailed, show some of the difficulties in which it is involved; among these, the connexion between the two acts is not the least. The President, therefore, while he is solicitous to gratify the wishes of the people of Georgia, so far as may consist with his public duty, thinks it necessary to avoid a hasty decision on the subject, with which so many weighty circumstances are combined. A postponement is the more necessary, because it is deemed proper that the commissioners for holding such a treaty as that which is requested, should be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate; and, under the pressure of the Legislative business, accumulated at the close of the session, it was not practicable to attend to this matter before the adjournment of Congress. The Senate will assemble on the 8th of June next, on Executive business. In the interim, the President will be able further to examine the question of the treaty, in all its relations.

*Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia.*WAR OFFICE, 20th August, 1790.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to transmit to your honor a copy of the treaty of peace and friendship, which has been concluded between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, together with his proclamation for a due observance thereof.

It may be justly expected, that the faithful execution of this treaty by both parties, will be productive of the most salutary consequences to the State of Georgia, by ensuring peace and tranquillity to its frontier settlements, and a regular cession of the disputed lands on the Oconee, which have hitherto caused the expense of so much blood and treasure to the State.

It would have been a desirable circumstance to have obtained an entire confirmation of all the territory claimed by Georgia, and every argument was used to effect this object. But the chiefs who were present decidedly refused, at the hazard of all events, any confirmation of the land lying to the eastward of the temporary line, mentioned in the treaty of Galphinton, to be drawn from the forks of the Oconee and Oakmulgee to the St. Mary's, and between the said temporary line and the old line from the Altamaha to the St. Mary's.

This land has been represented to be generally barren, sunken, and unfit for cultivation, except in some instances on the margin of its rivers, and that its chief value depends on its lumber. While it is thus circumstanced on the one hand, it has been represented by the Creeks, on the other, to be of the highest importance to them, as constituting some of their most valuable winter hunting grounds.

In estimating the value of this land, it was not considered of such importance, or under such circumstances as to be a sufficient cause for breaking off a treaty by which the valuable Oconee lands are effectually ceded and secured, peace established, and the Creek nation attached to the interests of the United States.

The President of the United States, therefore, persuades himself that these considerations will have their proper operation on the minds of the good people of Georgia, and induce them to a zealous concurrence in the execution of the treaty.

The chiefs of the Creeks who made the treaty sailed from this port yesterday, for the river St. Mary's, and they propose to return by that river to their own country.

H. KNOX.

*Extract of a letter from the Governor of Georgia to the Secretary of War.*STATE HOUSE, Augusta, April 16th, 1795.

SIR:

I received with pleasure your communication of the 20th March, and am much obliged to the President for the information respecting the Indian treaty.

I am at a loss to discover the intimate connexion between the two acts referred to. The one contemplates a treaty for extinguishing the Indian claims to the lands between the Oconee and the Oakmulgee, an object which nineteen out of twenty of the citizens of this State have the most anxious wish to see accomplished, and I feel persuaded that the present is as good a time as any that may offer to obtain it, provided the General Government would aid the endeavors of this State. I need not remind you that the Creek Indians have complied with no part of the treaty entered into at New York, and their inability to comply with it is evident, as the greater part of the property stipulated to have been returned, is so dispersed, that it is not in their power to restore it. I cannot indulge the most distant thought that the treaty, on the part of the United States, ought to be fully complied with, and the Indians released from that part which secures to the citizens of Georgia the return of prisoners and property. The Indians, latterly, show more disposition for peace than they have for many years past, and, from the information I have received, are disposed to make satisfaction for the property they cannot return; and the only thing whereby compensation can be made, is their lands. The sum they will receive from the State for those lands contemplated to be purchased, will procure them a handsome supply of goods, which that nation is in much want of.

The act for selling the lands on the Mississippi, &c. has not met with the approbation of the majority of the citizens, but it is not so generally reprobated, as has been represented to the General Government; and every attempt of that Government, tending to dispute the right, will add support to the law.

The sale of the lands was never pleasing to me, but the cause arises from a full conviction that large monopolies are against the interests of the citizens in general, and not from any doubts I entertained of the right of this State to the lands in question.

When I reflect on, and know, the very great wish the people of Georgia have to procure the lands between the Oconee and Oakmulgee, I flatter myself the President will give permission for a treaty to be held, as I am persuaded a refusal will give great uneasiness, and, in fact, disgust.

TREATY OF GREENVILLE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 9, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you, for your consideration, a treaty of peace which has been negotiated by General Wayne, on behalf of the United States, with all the late hostile tribes of Indians, northwest of the river Ohio; together with the instructions* which were given to General Wayne, and the proceedings at the place of treaty.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 9, 1795.

A treaty of peace between the United States of America and the tribes of Indians called the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Miamies, Eel Rivers, Weas, Kickapoos, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias.

To put an end to a destructive war, to settle all controversies, and to restore harmony and friendly intercourse between the said United States and Indian tribes, Anthony Wayne, Major General, commanding the army of the United States, and sole commissioner for the good purposes abovementioned; and the said tribes of Indians, by their sachems, chiefs, and warriors, met together at Greenville, the head quarters of the said army, have agreed on the following articles, which, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, shall be binding on them and the said Indian tribes:

ARTICLE 1. Henceforth, all hostilities shall cease; peace is hereby established, and shall be perpetual; and a friendly intercourse shall take place between the said United States and Indian tribes.

ART. 2. All prisoners shall, on both sides, be restored. The Indians, prisoners to the United States, shall be immediately set at liberty. The people of the United States, still remaining prisoners among the Indians, shall be delivered up in ninety days from the date hereof, to the General or commanding officer at Greenville, fort Wayne, or fort Defiance; and ten chiefs of the said tribes shall remain at Greenville as hostages, until the delivery of the prisoners shall be effected.

ART. 3. The general boundary line, between the lands of the United States and the lands of the said Indian tribes, shall begin at the mouth of Cuyahoga river, and run thence, up the same, to the portage between that and the Tuscarawas branch of the Muskingum; thence, down that branch to the crossing place, above fort Lawrence; thence westerly, to a fork of that branch of the great Miami river running into the Ohio, at or near which fork stood Loromie's store, and where commences the portage between the Miami of the Ohio and St. Mary's river, which is a branch of the Miami, which runs into lake Erie; thence, a westerly course to fort Recovery, which stands on a branch of the Wabash; thence, southwesterly in a direct line to the Ohio, so as to intersect that river opposite the mouth of Kentucky or Cuttawa river. And, in consideration of the peace now established, of the goods formerly received from the United States, of those now to be delivered, and of the yearly delivery of goods now stipulated to be made hereafter, and to indemnify the United States for the injuries and expenses they have sustained during the war, the said Indian tribes do hereby cede and relinquish, forever, all their claims to the lands lying eastwardly and southwardly of the general boundary line, now described, and these lands, or any part of them, shall never hereafter be made a cause or pretence, on the part of the said tribes, or any of them, of war or injury to the United States, or any of the people thereof.

And for the same considerations, and as an evidence of the returning friendship of the said Indian tribes, of their confidence in the United States, and desire to provide for their accommodation, and for that convenient intercourse which will be beneficial to both parties, the said Indian tribes do also cede to the United States, the following pieces of land, to wit: 1. One piece of land, six miles square, at or near Loromie's store, before mentioned. 2. One piece two miles square, at the head of the navigable water or landing, on the St. Mary's river, near Girty's town. 3. One piece six miles square, at the head of the navigable water of the Auglaize river. 4. One piece six miles square, at the confluence of the Auglaize and Miami rivers, where fort Defiance now stands. 5. One piece six miles square, at or near the confluence of the rivers St. Mary's and St. Joseph's, where fort Wayne now stands, or near it. 6. One piece two miles square, on the Wabash river, at the end of the portage from the Miami of the lake, and about eight miles westward from fort Wayne. 7. One piece six miles square, at the Ouatanon, or old Wea towns, on the Wabash river. 8. One piece twelve miles square, at the British fort, on the Miami of the lake, at the foot of the Rapids. 9. One piece six miles square, at the mouth of the said river, where it empties into the lake. 10. One piece six miles square, upon Sandusky lake, where a fort formerly stood. 11. One piece two miles square, at the lower rapids of Sandusky river. 12. The post of Detroit, and all the lands to the north, the west, and the south of it, of which the Indian title has been extinguished by gifts or grants to the French or English governments: and so much more land, to be annexed to the district of Detroit, as shall be comprehended between the river Rosine, on the south, lake St. Clair, on the north, and a line, the general course whereof shall be six miles distant from the west end of lake Erie and Detroit river. 13. The post of Michilimackinac, and all the land on which that post stands, and the main land adjacent, of which the Indian title has been extinguished by gifts or grants to the French or English governments; and a piece of land on the main, to the north of the island, to measure six miles on lake Huron, or the strait between lakes Huron and Michigan, and to extend three miles back from the water of the lake or strait; and, also, the island De Bois Blanc, being an extra and voluntary gift of the Chippewa nation. 14. One piece of land six miles square, at the mouth of Chicago river, emptying into the southwest end of lake Michigan, where a fort formerly stood. 15. One piece twelve miles square, at or near the mouth of the Illinois river, emptying into the Mississippi. 16. One piece six miles square, at the old Peorias fort and village, near the south end of the Illinois lake, on said Illinois river. And whenever the United States shall think proper to survey and mark the boundaries of the lands hereby ceded to them, they shall give timely notice thereof to the said tribes of Indians, that they may appoint some of their wise chiefs, to attend and see that the lines are run according to the terms of this treaty.

And the said Indian tribes will allow to the people of the United States, a free passage by land and by water, as one and the other shall be found convenient, through their country, along the chain of posts hereinbefore mentioned; that is to say, from the commencement of the portage aforesaid, at or near Loromie's store, thence, along said portage to the St. Mary's, and down the same to fort Wayne, and then down the Miami to lake Erie; again, from the commencement of the portage at or near Loromie's store, along the portage; from thence to the river Auglaize, and down the same to its junction with the Miami, at fort Defiance; again, from the commencement of the portage aforesaid, to Sandusky river, and down the same to Sandusky bay and lake Erie, and from Sandusky to the post which shall be taken at or near the foot of the rapids of the Miami of the lake; and from thence to Detroit. Again, from the mouth of Chicago, to the commencement of the portage, between that river and the Illinois, and down the Illinois river to the Mississippi; also, from fort Wayne, along the portage aforesaid, which leads to the Wabash, and then down the Wabash to the Ohio. And the said Indian tribes will, also, allow to the people of the United States, the free use of the harbors and mouths of rivers along the lakes adjoining the Indian lands, for sheltering vessels and boats, and liberty to land their cargoes where necessary for their safety.

ART. 4. In consideration of the peace, now established, and of the cessions and relinquishments of lands made in the preceding article by the said tribes of Indians, and to manifest the liberality of the United States, as the great means of rendering this peace strong and perpetual, the United States relinquish their claims to all other Indian lands, northward of the river Ohio, eastward of the Mississippi, and westward and southward of the Great Lakes, and the waters uniting them, according to the boundary line agreed on by the United States and the King of Great Britain, in the treaty of peace, made between them in the year 1783. But, from this relinquishment by the United States, the following tracts of land are explicitly excepted. 1st. The tract of one hundred and fifty thousand acres, near the rapids of the river Ohio, which has been assigned to General Clark, for the use of himself and his warriors. 2d. The post of St. Vincennes, on the river Wabash, and the lands adjacent, of which the Indian title has been extinguished. 3d. The lands at all other places in possession of the French people, and other white settlers among them, of which the Indian title has been extinguished, as mentioned in the 3d article; and 4th. The post of fort Massac, towards the mouth of the Ohio. To which several parcels of lands, so excepted, the said tribes relinquish all the title and claim which they or any of them may have.

And for the same considerations, and with the same views as above mentioned, the United States now deliver to the said Indian tribes, a quantity of goods, to the value of twenty thousand dollars, the receipt whereof they do hereby acknowledge; and henceforward, every year, forever, the United States will deliver, at some convenient place northward of the river Ohio, like useful goods, suited to the circumstances of the Indians, of the value of nine thousand five hundred dollars; reckoning that value at the first cost of the goods in the city or place, in the United States, where they shall be procured. The tribes to which those goods are to be annually delivered, and the proportions in which they are to be delivered, are the following:

1st. To the Wyandots, the amount of one thousand dollars. 2d. To the Delawares, the amount of one thousand dollars. 3d. To the Shawanese, the amount of one thousand dollars. 4th. To the Miamies, the amount of one thousand dollars. 5th. To the Ottawas, the amount of one thousand dollars. 6th. To the Chippewas, the amount of one thousand dollars. 7th. To the Pattawatamies, the amount of one thousand dollars. 8th. And to the Kickapoo, Wea, Eel River, Piankeshaw, and Kaskaskia tribes, the amount of five hundred dollars, each.

Provided, that if either of the said tribes shall, hereafter, at an annual delivery of their share of the goods aforesaid, desire that a part of their annuity should be furnished in domestic animals, implements of husbandry, and other utensils convenient for them, and in compensation to useful artificers, who may reside with, or near them, and be employed for their benefit, the same shall, at the subsequent annual deliveries, be furnished accordingly.

ART. 5. To prevent any misunderstanding about the Indian lands relinquished by the United States in the fourth article, it is now explicitly declared, that the meaning of that relinquishment, is this: the Indian tribes who have a right to those lands, are quietly to enjoy them, hunting, planting, and dwelling thereon, so long as they please, without any molestation from the United States; but when those tribes, or any of them, shall be disposed to sell their lands, or any part of them, they are to be sold only to the United States; and until such sale, the United States will protect all the said Indian tribes in the quiet enjoyment of their lands, against all citizens of the United States, and against all other white persons who intrude upon the same. And the said Indian tribes again acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the said United States, and no other Power whatever.

ART. 6. If any citizen of the United States, or any other white person or persons, shall presume to settle upon the lands, now relinquished by the United States, such citizen or other person shall be out of the protection of the United States; and the Indian tribe, on whose land the settlement shall be made, may drive off the settler, or punish him in such manner as they shall think fit; and because such settlements, made without the consent of the United States, will be injurious to them, as well as to the Indians, the United States shall be at liberty to break them up, and remove and punish the settlers as they shall think proper, and so effect that protection of the Indian lands herein before stipulated.

ART. 7. The said tribes of Indians, parties to this treaty, shall be at liberty to hunt within the territory and lands which they have now ceded to the United States, without hindrance or molestation, so long as they demean themselves peaceably, and offer no injury to the people of the United States.

ART. 8. Trade shall be opened with the said Indian tribes; and they do hereby respectively engage, to afford protection to such persons, with their property, as shall be duly licensed to reside among them, for the purpose of trade, and to their agents and servants; but no person shall be permitted to reside at any of their towns or hunting camps, as a trader, who is not furnished with a licence for that purpose, under the hand and seal of the superintendent of the department northwest of the Ohio, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize to grant such licences, to the end, that the said Indians may not be imposed on in their trade. And, if any licensed trader shall abuse his privilege by unfair dealing, upon complaint and proof thereof, his licence shall be taken from him, and he shall be further punished according to the laws of the United States. And if any person shall intrude himself as a trader, without such licence, the said Indians shall take and bring him before the superintendent, or his deputy, to be dealt with according to law. And, to prevent impositions by forged licences, the said Indians shall, at least once a year, give information to the superintendent, or his deputies, of the names of the traders residing among them.

ART. 9. Lest the firm peace and friendship now established should be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, the United States and the said Indian tribes agree, that, for injuries done by individuals, on either side, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaint shall be made by the party injured, to the other: by the said Indian tribes, or any of them, to the President of the United States, or the superintendent by him appointed; and by the superintendent, or other person appointed by the President, to the principal chiefs of the said Indian tribes, or of the tribe to which the offender belongs; and such prudent measures shall then be pursued, as shall be necessary to preserve the said peace and friendship unbroken, until the Legislature (or great council) of the United States shall make other equitable provision in the case, to the satisfaction of both parties. Should any Indian tribes meditate a war against the United States, or either of them, and the same shall come to the knowledge of the beforementioned tribes, or either of them, they do hereby engage to give immediate notice thereof to the general, or officer commanding the troops of the United States, at the nearest post. And should any tribe, with hostile intentions against the United States, or either of them, attempt to pass through their country, they will endeavor to prevent the same, and in like manner give information of such attempt, to the general, or officer commanding, as soon as possible, that all causes of mistrust and suspicion may be avoided between them and the United States. In like manner, the United States shall give notice to the said Indian tribes of any harm that may be meditated against them, or either of them, that shall come to their knowledge, and do all in their power to hinder and prevent the same, that the friendship between them may be uninterrupted.

ART. 10. All other treaties heretofore made between the United States and the said Indian tribes, or any of them, since the treaty of 1783, between the United States and Great Britain, that come within the purview of this treaty, shall henceforth cease, and become void.

In testimony whereof, the said Anthony Wayne, and the sachems and war chiefs of the beforementioned nations and tribes of Indians, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

Done at Greenville, in the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, on the third day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

ANTHONY WAYNE.

[Signed by certain chiefs and warriors of the tribes enumerated in the title.]

Extract of a letter from Major General Anthony Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated Head Quarters, Greenville, 9th August, 1795.

It is with infinite pleasure I now inform you, that a treaty of peace between the United States of America and all the late hostile tribes of Indians northwest of the Ohio, was unanimously and voluntarily agreed to, and cheerfully signed, by all the sachems and war chiefs of the respective nations, on the 3d, and exchanged on the 7th instant.

Minutes of a Treaty with the tribes of Indians called the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Miamies, Eel River, Kickapoos, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias, begun at Greenville, on the 16th day of June, and ended on the 10th day of August, 1795.

A considerable number of Delawares, Ottawas, Pattawatamies, and Eel River Indians, having arrived at Greenville since the beginning of June, General Wayne caused them to be assembled together on Tuesday, the 16th, and, for the first time, met them in general council. They were presented with and smoked the calumet of peace; after which the General arose, and addressed them as follows:

I take you all by the hand as brothers, assembled for the good work of peace. I thank the Great Spirit for this glorious sun, (who appears to rejoice at our meeting) and for permitting so many of us to assemble here this day, the first of that moon appointed for holding the intended treaty. The Great Spirit has favored us with a clear sky and a refreshing breeze for the happy occasion.

I have cleared this ground of all brush and rubbish, and opened roads to the east, to the west, to the north, and to the south, that all nations may come in safety and ease to meet me. The ground on which this council house stands is unstained with blood, and is as pure as the heart of General Washington, the great chief of America, and of his great council—as pure as my heart—which now wishes for nothing so much as peace and brotherly love.

I have this day kindled the council fire of the United States: we will now cover it up, and keep it alive, until the remainder of the different tribes assemble, and form a full meeting and representation.

I now deliver to each tribe present a string of white wampum, to serve as records of the friendship that is this day commenced between us. [Wampum delivered.]

The heavens are bright, the roads are open; we will rest in peace and love, and wait the arrival of our brothers. In the interim, we will have a little drink, to wash the dust out of our throats. We will, on this happy occasion, be merry, without, however, passing the bounds of temperance and sobriety.

Te-ta-boksh-ke, King of the Delawares, rose, and spoke as follows:

Our meeting this day affords me infinite pleasure. I thank the Great Spirit, and I thank you, for bestowing on us so great a happiness. All my people shall be informed of, and will rejoice in, the commencement of our friendship, which, I hope, will never end. [A white string of wampum.]

The fire was raked up, and the council adjourned.

June 17.

Forty Pattawatamies arrived, and had audience.

The New Corn, one of their chiefs, addressing the General, said:

I have come here on the good work of peace; no other motive could have induced me to undertake so long a journey as I have now performed, in my advanced age and infirm state of health. I come from lake Michigan. I hope, after our treaty, you will exchange our old medals, and supply us with General Washington's. My young men will no longer listen to the former; they wish for the latter. They have thrown off the British, and henceforth will view the Americans as their only true friends. We come with a good heart, and hope you will supply us with provision.

The General replied:

I give you all a hearty welcome. I am particularly pleased with the presence of so venerable a man as New Corn. You, young warriors, will, I am persuaded, pay the highest respect to the counsels of this aged chief. Your friend, the Sun, (a Pattawatamy chief) will tell you, that yesterday we kindled the council fire; that the roads are all clear, and that we only wait the arrival of the other expected chiefs, to begin the good work. You must be fatigued. I will not detain you at present. You will be supplied with provision, and some drink to refresh you, and to make your hearts glad.

June 21.

Buck-on-ge-he-las, with a party of Delawares, and Asi-me-the, with a party of Pattawatamies, arrived, and was received in the council-house.

Te-ta-boksh-ke, the Delaware king, for the former party, addressed the General as follows:

БРОТЕР, ЛИСТЕН! We are here met, by permission of the Great Spirit. Our forefathers used soft cloths to dry up their tears: we use this, (wampum) and hope by its influence to do away all past misfortunes. We have now opened our eyes and ears, and hope to settle all differences. [A white string.]

A-si-me-the, a Pattawatamy chief, spoke as follows:

I have nothing to observe; our grandfathers, the Delawares, have said what is necessary. Excuse my not presenting you with wampums. Why should we, elder brother, be of a different opinion with our grandfathers, the Delawares? The Great Spirit has been equally kind to us in this meeting. You see us all here. You sent for us. The remainder of us are dead, or incapable of coming to see you. In compliance with your requisition for the surrender of prisoners, and as a proof of our sincere wishes for peace, I now present you two—all in our possession.

The General arose, and spoke thus:

BROTHERS: I take you all by the hand, and welcome you to Greenville. The great council fire has already been kindled, and the calumet of peace has been smoked by the different nations already here. This old chief (Te-ta-boksh-ke) has been witness to and joined in this solemn act, in the presence of the Great Spirit. We have raked up the fire until the chiefs generally assemble. Last night I had accounts from the Wyandots of Sandusky and Detroit, and all the Indians in that quarter. This day they rise upon their feet, to come and join in council with us; the roads being all clear, they will arrive, without difficulty, in ten days. We will then add fresh wood to our fire, whose pure flame shall be seen from the rising to the setting sun. We will postpone entering on business until that period. In the mean time, I will give you, my brothers, what will make your hearts glad. I have already given wampum to all the tribes present: I now present you with a little more, to evince that my mind and heart are always the same. [Wampum.]

June 23.

Le Gris, the Little Turtle, and seventeen Miamies, arrived, and were presented.

Le Gris merely observed, that he was very happy to see the General; that he had nothing particular to say at this time; he wished to encamp, and prepare for bad weather; and added, that the Miamies were united with him in friendly sentiments and wishes for peace.

The General spoke thus to them:

I feel much satisfaction in taking you all by the hand; my pleasure is equally great with yours in this interview. The council fire was kindled in this house on the first day of this moon; we covered it up, and have preserved it clear, waiting for your arrival and the appearance of our brothers the Wyandots, Shawanese, and a part of the Five

Nations, among us; they are now three days on their way hither. I will not now detain you; you must require rest, and I will order you to be provided with proper refreshments. This belt testifies the sincerity of the welcome with which I receive you. [A belt.]

June 25.

The Indian chiefs present were assembled. The General thus addressed them:

BROTHERS: I take you all by the hand. I have invited you to this meeting to inform you of some measures I have taken for your convenience. I now give you up my exterior redoubts, to accommodate the different nations with council houses; my people are called in from them, and you will allot them amongst you, as you may think proper. I take this opportunity to make you acquainted with some customs which we observe: Upon firing our evening gun, all our men repair to their quarters; I wish your people to act in the same manner; I am persuaded you will perceive the propriety of this measure. If you find any of my foolish young men troubling your camps after that signal, I would thank you to tie them, and send them to me. I wish to preserve good order and harmony.

I will now explain, what yesterday might have had a strange appearance.

It is a standing rule, in all our armies, upon any alarm or accident whatever, for our warriors to repair instantly to their posts. I mention this to you, to prevent, for the future, any misapprehensions. It is by my invitation you are here, and I stand pledged for your safety and security. It is also our practice to parade our men, morning and evening, and call every man by his name. An accident occurred yesterday, in the explosion of some of our fire-works; it will have no other effect than to delay, for a few days, the exhibition intended for the 4th of July, the anniversary of the independence of America. I have nothing further to mention to you at this time; I called you together, merely to acquaint you with these things, to repeat my sentiments of care and regard for you, and to assure you again, that you may rest as easy, and are as safe here, as if you were in your own villages.

The council fire remains covered, until the arrival of the rest of our brothers. General Washington and his great council have sent you large presents, whose arrival I expect about the same time. Your friends (Onas) the Quakers, have also sent you a message, and some small presents, as a token of their regard for you.

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish (or Bad-bird) a Chipewa chief, arose and said—

ELDER BROTHER:

I thank you, in the name of all the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, for what you have this day told us; it is all very right and good.

The Delawares signified their concurrence in opinion with their grand children, the Chippewas, &c.

The General rose and said—

I have never yet, in a public capacity, told a lie. You will not be deceived, by placing the utmost confidence in what I shall tell you. I again repeat, that your own towns and villages could not afford you greater liberty, safety, and security, than you will enjoy, whilst you choose to remain with me.

Meeting adjourned.

June 26.—Thirty-four Chippewas and Pattawatamies arrived.

Michi-mang, a Pattawatamy, briefly observed—

That, as soon as they heard his (the General's) words, they rose to come and see him; that they had no old chiefs, or they would have come forward on this great occasion—they were all dead; that they came in expectation of being supplied with provisions, to refresh them after their fatigues.

June 30.—The chiefs were assembled, at their own request.

Le Gris, chief of the Miamies, addressed the General as follows:

BROTHER:

I have only come this day to see you; the other chiefs present have no other object than that pleasure. I hope every thing, hitherto, appears well to you; I now express our perfect satisfaction. Our young warriors are glad to meet and see yours, and I hope no suspicions have existence with either. You have told us, we should share your provisions whilst we stayed with you, and in consequence, depend upon receiving it; as you have promised, and do give us these things, we now visit you with real pleasure. The chiefs present are happy in the belief of their perfect safety; and I am persuaded, the other chiefs, when they arrive, will be equally satisfied of their situation. When brothers meet, they always experience pleasure. As it is a cool day, we would hope you would give us a little drink; you promised to treat us well, and we expect to be treated as warriors; we wish you to give your brothers a glass of wine. I hope you are pleased with this visit of your brothers. You have some things of which we have not yet had any; we would like some mutton and pork, occasionally:

The New Corn, a Pattawatamy chief, rose and said—

I agree perfectly in sentiment with my brother, Le Gris. I hope you will comply with his request; our hearts are sorry and afflicted, at seeing the graves of our brothers, who died here last winter.

The Sun, a Pattawatimy chief, rose and said—

When I came to your house, you told me I should have what I wanted. We get but a small allowance; we eat it in the morning, and are hungry at night. The days are long; we have nothing to do; we become weary, and wish for home.

The General answered thus:

I am pleased to see you all here, and happy to find you think yourselves secure in this camp; I wish you to think yourselves perfectly at home. The chiefs on their way, I am persuaded, will also think themselves safe when they arrive; they are now ten days on their journey towards us, and we may with certainty expect them. I have received a speech from their nations to this effect. Blue Jacket comes by the Miami villages; the others may, perhaps, arrive by a different route. You say, that when you came forward, I promised you plenty; it is my wish and intention you should have sufficient. The Sun, alone, complains of scarcity. I wish you to consult generally, and let me know if you really do not receive enough. Pork, we have none; the few sheep we have, are for the comfort of our sick, and occasionally for our officers; your sick shall, most cheerfully, share with mine; and I will, with pleasure, participate with your chiefs. The New Corn has observed, that your hearts were troubled for the loss of your brothers, who died here last winter; grief is unavailing, and ought not to be indulged. I will give the chiefs, of each nation present, a sheep for their use, and some drink for them and their people, this afternoon, to make their hearts glad, and to dry up their tears; at present, we will have a glass of wine together. I wish to see you all happy and contented.

Council adjourned.

July 3.—The chiefs of the different nations present were assembled.

The General addressed them as follows:

BROTHERS:

I take you all by the hand, with that strong hold with which brothers ought to salute each other. To-morrow will be the anniversary of the day which gave peace, happiness, and independence, to America; to-morrow, all the people of the Fifteen Fires, with shouts of joy, and peals of artillery, will celebrate the period which gave them freedom. Nineteen times have the United States, already, hailed the return of that auspicious morn; to-morrow, we shall, for the twentieth time, salute the annual return of this happy day, rendered still more dear by the brotherly union of the American and red people; to-morrow, all the people within these lines will rejoice; you, my brothers, shall also rejoice, in your respective encampments. I called you together to explain these matters to you; do not, therefore, be alarmed at the report of our big guns; they will do no harm; they will be the harbingers of peace and gladness, and their roar will ascend into the heavens. The flag of the United States, and the colors of this legion, shall be given to the wind, to be fanned by its gentlest breeze, in honor of the birth-day of American freedom. I will now shew you our colors, that you may know them to-morrow; formerly, they were displayed as ensigns of war and battle; now, they will be exhibited as emblems of peace and happiness. This Eagle, which you now see, holds close his bunch of arrows, whilst he seems to stretch forth, as a more valuable offering, the inestimable branch of peace; the Great Spirit seems disposed to incline us all, to repose, for the future, under its grateful shade, and wisely enjoy the blessings which attend it.

Mash-i-pi-nach-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, arose, and spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER:

I have heard your words, and have received great pleasure from them. I never make long speeches; what I have to say, I say in a few words. Look at your warriors around you, and view ours. Does it not give you pleasure to see us all met together in brotherly love?

ELDER BROTHER: You may believe what I say, and what I am going to say. As we are here on good business, our hearts must dictate what our tongues express. The Great Spirit knows when we speak truth, and punishes falsehood. As you have told us we are to rejoice, I have a favor to ask of you, compliance with which will prepare our hearts for the occasion. We would wish to rescue from death two of your young warriors, whom we brought in to you, and whom we hear are to die. I entreat you, in the name of all present, to spare their lives, and pray you to indulge us in this request. [A white and blue string.]

Te-ta-boksh-ke, king of the Delawares, thus spoke:

ELDER BROTHER:

I thank you for having kindly explained to us what will take place to-morrow. Our young men shall all be informed of it. We thank you for your attention to us. We will sincerely rejoice on the happy occasion.

The General replied—

BROTHERS:

I have heard your words, and will answer you presently. As I never speak without deliberation, you may depend on what I say.

BROTHERS: I have considered your request respecting the two warriors condemned to die. I will now answer you. The two men condemned to death are not those whom you brought to me, but two very bad men, from another quarter. I desired this good man (Doctor Jones) to prepare the minds of these men for the awful change they are about to experience. We put no men to death without giving them time to repent, and to whiten their hearts. The lives of the two men whom you brought in, (although very culpable) are now granted to your humane entreaties. That you may all remember that, to-morrow, and every anniversary of it, the Americans rejoice, I now present each nation with a white string of wampum. We will now retire, and hope that to-morrow's dawn may be propitious to the happy occasion. [Wampum.]

July 4.—A-goosh-a-way, and twenty-three Ottawas, from the vicinity of Detroit, arrived, and had audience.

The General addressed them:

BROTHERS:

I take you all by the hand. I am happy to see you. You must be hungry and dry. I will order you refreshments to make your hearts glad. The hearts of your brothers are also made glad this day. I will no longer detain you from taking that repose of which you seem to stand in so much need. I deliver this string as a proof of my happiness in seeing you. [A white string.]

A-goosh-a-way spoke as follows:

BROTHER:

Those nations who are now represented at this meeting, are probably all you may reasonably expect; as for the Shawanese and Wyandots of Detroit, I do not believe they will come. I frequently told them they ought to advance without hesitation, but they still continue irresolute, and hover round their enemies, the British. I cannot discover the motives which actuate the Wyandots. The Six Nations sent two letters, prevailing on me to wait their junction; but finding they delayed, and suspecting their sincerity, I came away without waiting long for them.

July 9.—In Council: Present the chiefs of the Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Miami, and Wabash tribes.

The General arose and addressed them as follows:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

I take you all by the hand, and welcome you to this council fire. Viewing the number of nations who, last winter, signed the preliminary articles, I perceive all are present except the Wyandots of Sandusky and Shawanese. It is now twenty-five days since the council fire was kindled at this place; it has continued to burn bright, and it has happily dissipated the clouds which have hung over the people of Sandusky. They now see that the sky is clear and serene, that the roads are open, and free of thorns. Four runners arrived from them last evening, to announce to me the near approach of all the chiefs of the Wyandots and others of Sandusky. The intelligence which these messengers have brought me, is this: that the dark cloud which enveloped the Shawanese in the neighborhood of the British post, (for that, my brothers, is a very cloudy place) has also been dispelled; that they have at length awoke from their intoxicated slumber, and are now on their feet, coming to this place. They and the Wyandots, &c. of Sandusky, may be expected to arrive here in the course of three days.

The question then is, shall we now name the day upon which to begin the great and good work, or, shall we wait the arrival of those chiefs, and have their united voice on the subject?

This is all I shall propose at present, until I hear your respective opinions.

The Little Turtle made some remarks on the General's speech, to the other chiefs, and gave them some reasons why the fixing of the day should be postponed, when

A-goosh-a-way, an Ottawa chief, arose and said,

ELDER BROTHER:

I am much obliged to you for requiring our opinions on this matter. 'Tis true, as the Little Turtle has observed to us, that we have been here a long time waiting, but it will be best to remain contented a few days longer, that we may begin the good work all together. I now present you our pipe, and hope that you and your warriors will smoke it.

ELDER BROTHER: You see that all your chiefs, as well as ours, have smoked out of this calumet of peace, and the Great Spirit is well pleased to see it. The calumet does not now speak; it remains silent until the arrival of our brothers, who are on their way.

The General arose and said:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

Twenty-five days ago the calumet of peace of the Fifteen Fires of the United States was smoked in this house; it did not then speak; and it yet remains silent. I am pleased to hear you all concur in opinion with the Little Turtle, that we should wait the arrival of our brothers, the Wyandots and Shawanese. I therefore propose that we shall meet again at this place on Monday next. [A white string to each nation present.]

Council adjourned to Monday the 13th.

MONDAY, July 13.

At the request of the Wyandot chiefs (who arrived on the 12th) and others, the meeting proposed for this day is postponed until Wednesday, the 15th; some necessary regulations among them not having been decided upon.

WEDNESDAY, July 15.

In Council, agreeable to adjournment: Present the chiefs of the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Miamies, and Wabash tribes.

The Council opened with swearing in the interpreters; after which, the General addressed the Indians thus:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

These interpreters whom you have now seen sworn, have called the Great Spirit to witness, that they will faithfully interpret all the speeches made by me to you, and by you to me; and the Great Spirit will punish them severely hereafter, if they do not religiously fulfil their sacred promise.

This is the calumet of peace of the Fifteen Fires of the United States of America: I shall first present it to the soldier (Wabash tribe) who first took us by the hand, as I do not yet know which nation among you is in future to have the precedence; the next were the Wyandots, who came forward last fall early; the next were the Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies and Sauckeys; and the next were the Delawares.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: All the chiefs and warriors of the different nations present, I now take you all by the hand. It was my wish to have waited for the arrival of the Shawanese, Wyandots of Detroit, and some Chippewas, who I learn are on their way; but as it is the desire of the chiefs present to commence the business generally, I will now shew them by what authority I hold this treaty.

Treaties made by all nations on this earth ought to be held sacred and binding between the contracting parties; hence it is the practice to commission certain persons with powers to make and conclude stipulated articles of treaties accordingly. These books contain treaties which have been held with all the Indian nations in North America, and shew what has been said and done at each, without the smallest alteration. In the first place, this is a commission appointing me Commander-in-chief of the American legion, presented to me by General Washington, and the Fifteen Fires, three years since. On the 4th day of April, 1794, I received a commission from the same authority, for settling a peace with all the tribes of Indians, northwest of the Ohio. I will now read another commission, given me on the 15th day of April last. [Here the General read the renewal of his powers as commissioner to treat with the Indians.]

Having thus produced my authority, given me by General Washington, and the Fifteen Fires, I will now proceed to review the preliminary articles which we mutually entered into and exchanged during the past winter.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: Open your ears, and listen to the question asked me by the Wyandots of Sandusky, on the 26th September last: This was the voice of the Wyandots and other tribes of Sandusky:

“BROTHER: Bring forth from the bottom of your heart your sentiments, respecting making a definitive treaty of peace, and upon what terms. We shall deliver our prayers daily to the Great Spirit above, our maker, that he will open your heart and sentiments to us.” This was a strong and serious question, upon which the happiness of the United States and the Indian nations mutually depended. The answer made to that question required some explanations, which are tedious, and do not seem at present necessary to repeat; but I will read that part which explains the principles upon which a peace could take place.

“BROTHER: You desired me to bring forth, from the bottom of my heart, my sentiments respecting a peace, and upon what terms it could be obtained.

“BROTHER: I now call upon you to exert your utmost powers of attention, and listen to what I shall say to you. It is now near six years since the chiefs of the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, and Sac nations concluded a treaty at the mouth of the Muskingum, with Governor St. Clair, for removing all causes of controversy, and settling the boundaries between them and the United States. That treaty appeared to be founded upon principles of equity and justice, and to be perfectly satisfactory to all parties at that time: I therefore propose that treaty, as a foundation for a lasting treaty of peace between the United States and all your nations of Indians. Should you have any well grounded objections to these principles and to this proposition, come forward and speak your minds freely, and rest assured of a sincere welcome and safe conduct in coming hither, and in returning to your homes, from your friend and brother, Anthony Wayne,” &c.

This was my answer to the Wyandots; they are here present, and can testify the truth of it. In consequence of this answer, the Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Sauckeys, Miamies, Delawares, and Shawanese, came forward and signed these preliminary articles, of which you have all, respectively, copies. Having now shown you, that I stand here in the place of General Washington, and represent the Fifteen Fires of America; and having shown you the manner in which this happy meeting came about, by an application, first from the Wyandots, whose good example was followed by the other nations, I shall forbear to say any more, as the day is far spent, but to request you to consider what I have said.

BROTHERS: I wish you all clearly to understand that we have progressed so far in the good work, as to explain those preliminary steps. I would advise you to appropriate two or three days to revolve, coolly and attentively, these matters, and those which will naturally follow them. I take you all by the hand. We will now rake up the fire; and, as we have talked a long time, we must be dry, and have a little drink.

Council adjourned, to meet on the 18th.

SATURDAY, July 18.

In Council: Present as before.

The Little Turtle, a Miami chief, addressed the General as follows:

BROTHER: We have heard and considered what you have said to us. You have shown, and we have seen, your powers to treat with us. I came here for the purpose of hearing you. I suppose it to be your wish that peace should take place, throughout the world. When we hear you say so, we will be prepared to answer you. You have told me that the present treaty should be founded upon that of Muskingum. I beg leave to observe to you, that that treaty was effected altogether by the Six Nations, who seduced some of our young men to attend it, together with a few of the Chippewas, Wyandots, Ottawas, Delawares, and Pattawatamies. I beg leave to tell you, that I am entirely ignorant of what was done at that treaty. I hope those who held it may give you their opinion, whether or not it was agreeable to them.

The Sun, a Pattawatamy chief, arose and said:

BROTHER: The Master of Life had pity on me, when he permitted me to come and take you first by the hand. With the same hand and heart I then possessed, I now salute you. When I gave you my hand, you said, “I thank you, and am glad to take your hand, Pattawatamy;” and you thanked the other Indians also, and told them you had opened a road for them to come and see you. When I got this belt from the Americans, they told me the roads were open and clear, and that no obstruction should prevent our coming to see you. I was happy when you gave me the road, [a belt] and so are we all: for we have all travelled it. I hope it will remain free of bushes and thorns as long as Americans and Indians live. You, yourself, have told me it should be so; and that this, (meaning the olive branch, held by the eagle) was a leaf of that great tree, under whose shade we, and all our posterity, should repose in safety and happiness.

ELDER BROTHER: We have followed the road you gave us in safety. I now present it to your view as your gift. [Presenting a road belt, with the eagle of the United States attached.]

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, a chief of the Chippewas, arose and said:

Brothers of the different nations present, listen to what our elder brother tells us, with attention; I am satisfied it is the truth: listen to me also.

ELDER BROTHER: Last winter, I heard your word, when you stretched your hands to us, and asked us to come and see you. I never heard before, what the Sun has been observing; when I heard what you said last winter, I took you by the hand; and now, when I returned, I found your gates open to receive me, and that you told me truth. I was deputed by the chiefs of my nation to hear your words, and am happy that they now are convinced of the truth of them. You now also find the truth of my words: that I then came only to carry back your words; and the other chiefs would come to see you. You now see them present, the representatives of their nations: here are the chiefs of the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies. We three are faithful allies, and one of us speaks for the whole, when in council. The words you spoke last winter are fresh on my memory. I know nothing of the treaty in question, which took place at Muskingum: the people who made it are present, and will be able to speak to it. My remote situation on Lake Michigan prevented me from being acquainted with it.

Tarke (or Crane) chief of the Wyandots, arose and said:

Brothers of all nations present, listen!

ELDER BROTHER: I don't think it proper to select any particular nation to speak for the whole. You have kindled the council fire. I wish you to determine what nation shall speak, and appoint a day when we shall all be collected, and when those who are on their way shall have joined us.

The General rose, and said:

BROTHERS: I have paid very great attention to what has been observed by the Miamies, Pattawatamies, Chippewas, and Wyandots; and the day after to-morrow, I will endeavor to fully explain the treaty of Muskingum, of which so many plead ignorance. I will bring to the recollection of the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, and Sac nations, what they did at that treaty, and show them and you, their names who witness it. There are some Chippewas approaching, who, perhaps, were at that treaty, and when I look around me, I imagine I see some faces who were present at it. This road (alluding to the Sun's road belt) is the true road. I have a branch similar to this, at my breast. I know them to be of the same tree, and of equal value. This is all I shall say at present. I thank the Great Spirit for assembling so many of us together on this good work, and I hope we will have all things perfectly understood and explained, to our mutual satisfaction, before we part.

Council adjourned, to meet on the 20th.

In the evening of this day, (18th) Blue Jacket, and thirteen Shawanese, and Masass with twenty Chippewas, arrived, and were received in the council house.

Masass spoke as follows: I am very happy to be here this day; I was at the treaty of Muskingum, and have it now in my hand to show it you. Nothing but my having it in my possession could have brought me here at this time; for I came voluntarily and unasked. We should have come in greater numbers, but for Brandt's endeavors to prevent us. The Wyandots and Six Nations are counselling. I do not know what may be the result of their conference. I am happy to find so many of my brothers with you. I hope, for the future, they will walk in the right way, and be sincere in their engagements. I again repeat my knowledge of the treaty of Muskingum; as far as I understand it, I have been faithful to it. I have brought these Frenchmen with me, that I may be well acquainted with every thing that shall take place. This is all I have to say at present, having travelled far. I am fatigued, require refreshment.—[A white string.]

BROTHER: When I came here last winter, I did not mean to deceive you; what I promised you, I did intend to perform. My wish to conclude a firm peace with you, being sincere, my uneasiness has been great, that my people have not come forward so soon as you would wish, or might expect; but you must not be discouraged by these unfavorable appearances. Some of our chiefs and warriors are here; more will arrive in a few days. You must not, however, expect to see a great number; yet, notwithstanding, our nation will be well represented. Our hearts are open, and void of deceit.

The General spoke as follows:

BROTHER THE CHIPPEWA: I am happy to see you and your people. The open and generous manner in which you have acknowledged being present at, and acquainted with, the treaty at Muskingum, displays an honest, open, and manly heart. I therefore take you by the hand, with the warmth and friendship of a brother. I know you have come a great way; provision shall be furnished you and your people, to appease your hunger; and you shall have some liquor, also, to quench your thirst, and to enable you to rejoice with your friends and brothers present.

BROTHER THE SHAWANEE: I am well convinced of the integrity of your heart, and that your exertions have not been wanting to bring hither a full representation of your nation, at an earlier hour. I therefore bid you, and my friends with you, a sincere welcome.

19th July.—Blue Jacket, a Shawanee chief, in private conference with the General, spoke as follows:

BROTHER AND ALLY: It is a long time since I left you. I believe it is about five months; many things have occurred since that time, which, if you please, I will inform you of, as, perhaps, you may be unacquainted with them. I visited the British, and was kindly received at their garrison, on the Miami. I was asked for news; I had none for them, except that of my kind reception from you. A Mr. Magdalen wrote from thence to Detroit, that he had taken off my blue coat, which I had received from the Americans, and broke my gun, which he also falsely said was presented to me by General Wayne. I did not rest until I exposed this man, and refuted his assertions. I informed all the Indians of my full persuasion of the truth of the kind and benevolent intentions you expressed to me, and that they, in due time, would be convinced of the goodness of your motives. Mr. McKee invited me to his house, and told me he was very sorry to find I had acted with such little regard for my people; that he ascribed my strange conduct to the instigations of some evil spirit, who had led me astray from the plain good road, and put me in the path which led towards the Americans. "The commission you received from Johnston," said he, "was not given you to carry to the Americans. I am grieved to find that you have taken it to them. It was with much regret I learned that you had deserted your friends, who always caressed you, and treated you as a great man. You have deranged, by your imprudent conduct, all our plans for protecting the Indians, and keeping them with us. They have always looked up to you for advice and direction in war, and you have now broke the strong ties which held them all together, under your and our direction. You must now be viewed as the enemy of your people, and the other Indians whom you are seducing into the snares the Americans have formed for their ruin; and the massacre and destruction of these people by the Americans must be laid to your charge."

BROTHER: I am very happy, that, notwithstanding all the difficulties and obstructions I had to encounter from my relations and others at Detroit, I have succeeded so far, in bringing my people to you at this time. I expect intelligence this day of the approach of more of them. I have briefly acquainted you with these things. I repeat my assurances of the sincerity of my sentiments and resolution, to be, for the future, a steady friend to the United States.

MONDAY, July 20.

In Council: Present as before, with the addition of the Shawanese and Chippewas, who arrived on the evening of the 18th.

The General arose, and spoke as follows:

BROTHERS: all the nations present: I take you by the hand; when we were last in council, two days since, the Little Turtle observed, "We came with an intention to hear you; we expect your wish is for peace with all the world; we would be glad to hear your sentiments upon the subject." I did hope and expect, that every man among you would be perfectly acquainted with my sentiments on this subject, as I have, for a long time past, taken pains to diffuse them throughout your nations. I will read you a message which I sent amongst you by Mr. Miller, now present, on the 13th of August last, and which, I am persuaded, from the best authority, had been fully explained to, and perfectly understood by, your chiefs and warriors.

I likewise told you that the ears and heart of the President, General Washington, were ever open to the voice of peace; and that he had instructed me, his principal warrior, to listen to that welcome voice, from whatever quarter it might come, provided it came from proper authority, and from the heart.

Six moons since, the Crane, (Wyandots) and a number of Chippewas, Ottawas, and Sacs, came here, in consequence of this invitation. They were also accompanied by the Miamies. I received them with great pleasure, and informed them that I thanked the Great Spirit for opening their eyes to see, and their ears to hear, the happy dawn of peace. I told them that peace was like that glorious sun which diffused joy, health, and happiness, to all the nations of this earth, who had wisdom to embrace it, and that I, therefore, in behalf and in the name of the President of the United States of America, took them all by the hand, with that strong hold of friendship, which time could never break.

These have been the sentiments of my heart with regard to peace, and I think may be considered as a full answer to the wishes expressed by the Little Turtle. To prove that my sentiments are still the same, I present to Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, and to the Little Turtle, these strings of wampum, which are not purer or whiter than the heart that gives them. These will be considered as presented to the whole, for the same purpose. [White wampum to the Chippewas and Miamies.]

The Little Turtle, observes: "You have informed us that the treaty of Muskingum shall be the foundation upon which the present treaty shall be founded. That treaty was held by the Six Nations, and by a few young men of the Chippewas, Ottawas, and Pattawatamies. We Miamies and Wabash tribes are totally unacquainted with it." And Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish has also remarked, that the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, know nothing of that treaty; it had never reached as far as Michilimackinac.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: In order to refresh your memories, and to bring every article of that treaty fully to your recollection, I will now read and explain it to you. These are the articles of that treaty, made more than six years ago, between the United States of America and the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, and Sauckeys. [Here was read and explained the treaty of fort Harmar, held in 1789.]

YOUNGER BROTHERS: You have now heard the treaty of Muskingum read and explained to you. It has been for more than six years well understood by many of the chiefs, now present, of those nations who concluded it. And I am persuaded that those who were present, and those who signed it, will have candor sufficient, when they hear their names called over, to acknowledge it as their act and deed, as Masass has freely and sincerely done, the day before yesterday, by which he proved himself to be possessed of a manly, undisguised heart.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: I have now fully explained to you the treaty of fort McIntosh, which was concluded ten years ago; and the treaty of Muskingum, which took place six years since; the boundaries agreed on by the former, are the same that are stipulated by the latter. I have also pointed out a number of chiefs, in this house, who were present at, and signed, those treaties. As I have refreshed their memories in this manner, and read them a few passages of their own speeches and proceedings on those occasions, it is probable they will be able to inform you of every thing relating thereto, and give you full satisfaction on the subject.

I have no more to say at present. I wish you to consider well what I have said to you, that we may be enabled to form a treaty that shall continue unbroken as long as the woods grow and waters run. Think seriously on the great business before you. Consult among yourselves; and, when we meet again, speak your thoughts freely. I am persuaded we shall agree in opinion; and, when we return home, all nations will have cause to rejoice in the good work we have been doing.

Pe-ke-te-le-mund, a Delaware chief, arose, and said:

ELDER BROTHER: We are very happy to meet you here this day. The Great Spirit is kind, in permitting us to meet as brothers. We are pleased with what you have this day said to us. Five days ago you told us what you said last winter to our uncles the Wyandots. 'Tis true, brother, they were the first who then came in to you. We were happy to hear their words when they returned. We sent forward immediately a deputation to you, with our grand children the Shawanese, and with them two prisoners. Brother, when our king returned, and proclaimed the happy news from you, we rejoiced to hear it, and prepared to come in and fulfil what he had promised. We brought in all our prisoners, agreeable to your desire, and in conformity to our chief's engagements.

BROTHER: So far we have evinced our disposition; when we meet again, we shall have more to say upon the good work before us.

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, a Chippewa chief, arose, and said:

ELDER BROTHER: I am very glad you have pointed out those of my nation who were at, and signed, the treaty of Muskingum. I did not know them before. That treaty did not reach us who live in Michigan. I am happy in having it now explained. I thank you for expediting our good work. We wish much to return to our families, many of whom have died since we left home.

Council adjourned.

TUESDAY, 21st July.

In Council: Present as before.

Masass, a Chippewa chief, arose, and spoke as follows, in behalf of the three fires, Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies:

ELDER BROTHER: I have heard what you said yesterday, and know it to be the same that was said at the treaty of Muskingum. I remember it perfectly well, and thought, whilst I heard you speak it, that it was again renewed. My eyes were opened, and I listened with attention.

ELDER BROTHER: I now address myself to you. You see the fire kindled at Muskingum. I now tell you that some words of that treaty we did not perfectly understand at the time we made it. The Wyandots were foremost at that treaty; we, the three fires, followed them. You there told us that it was not in your name that you treated, but in behalf of the Thirteen Fires which lie along the great water. You told us you would throw the tomahawk into the river; but you know the waters in our woods are not deep, and some foolish young men have had arms long enough to reach to the bottom, and again take it out. This day we will try to wipe away their bad actions, and to open their hearts to the voice of peace.

ELDER BROTHER: I live at the gate leading to all those nations, and to the Pattawatamies and those living in the prairies, and we, the three fires, will do our utmost to bury the hatchet so deep that it can never be found: for it is this hatchet which has reduced us to misery and wretchedness. I tell you this as the true sentiments of the three nations for whom I speak. I cannot answer for the others.

ELDER BROTHER: You see the wampum I hold is small; our three fires, it would appear, are small also. As the other nations have often told you, they have also told you, that they were masters of the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, and of their territory. Notwithstanding I am so small a man, I do now, in the name of the three nations, throw the hatchet into the middle of the great lake, where it will be so covered with sand, as never to be again found as long as white people and Indians live.

ELDER BROTHER: This is all these three fires, and the tribe of the Little Turtle, who unites with us in sentiment, have at present to say. The hatchet is now buried forever, and we now expect your assistance. Your officers and our warriors are now around us; let us join sincerely in making a solid and lasting peace. Peace with our three fires is now established. [A string of blue and white wampum.]

ELDER BROTHER: You do not forget any of your words, and I show you this belt, which you gave a great many years ago to Wassung, one of our nation. You told him, at that time, that upon this road he should always come and see you; that he would always find it free from thorns. [Presented a road belt.]

ELDER BROTHER: When you yesterday read to us the treaty of Muskingum, I understood you clearly: at that treaty we had not good interpreters, and we were left partly unacquainted with many particulars of it. I was surprised when I heard your voice, through a good interpreter, say that we had received presents and compensation for those lands which were thereby ceded. I tell you, now, that we, the three fires, never were informed of it; if our uncles, the Wyandots, and grandfathers, the Delawares, have received such presents, they have kept them to themselves. I always thought that we, the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, were the true owners of those lands, but now I find that new masters have undertaken to dispose of them; so that, at this day, we do not know to whom they, of right, belong; we never received any compensation for them. I don't know how it is, but ever since that treaty, we have become objects of pity; and our fires have been retiring from this country. Now, elder brother, you see we are objects of compassion; and have pity on our weakness and misfortunes; and, since you have purchased these lands, we cede them to you; they are yours. Perhaps, at a future day, your younger brothers may be made happy, by becoming your children, should you extend to us your paternal protection. This is all your younger brothers, the three fires, have to say to you, our elder brother. Now the great men will address you.

Tarke, chief of the Wyandots, arose and said:

Brothers of the Fifteen Fires, listen! and you, my nephews, the Delawares and Six Nations, younger brothers, Shawanese and Miamis, and elder brothers, Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies; we are here assembled, this day, in the presence of God above.

BROTHERS AMERICANS: Our brothers, the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, have related to you a little of what happened at the treaty of Muskingum; and observe, that we had sold the lands to you without their consent or knowledge: however, elder brother, I hope you will explain to them how the country was first disposed of into your hands. These people now claim the land, and must establish their right with you. We had, yesterday, some council, among ourselves, on this subject. We feel much alarmed at these words of our brothers, claiming, in this manner, these lands. This is all I have, at present, to say, brothers.

Tarke rose again, and continued thus:

Elder brothers and all nations, we have all assembled to effect a good work. My nephews and I have been talking together, concerning the speech of Masass. We were a little confused by it; and now leave it to our brothers, the Fifteen Fires, to day, whether we shall now speak in answer to it, or consider of it until to-morrow.

The General replied:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

As I am called upon by the Wyandots to give my opinion, whether they shall, this day, answer the speech of Masass, or consider of it till to-morrow, I will give it freely. I do think it will be better to postpone until to-morrow, because, after reflecting coolly, and sleeping, the answer may be more dispassionate, and pleasing to all. I am convinced Masass had no intention to hurt the feelings of his uncle and grand father; he only meant to inform me that he had not received any goods or compensation for the lands ceded by the treaty of Muskingum. When we come into articles presently, for a permanent peace, all those nations, who have any right to the lands in question, shall receive yet further compensation, I hope, to the satisfaction of all parties.

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, thus spoke:

ELDER BROTHER:

I take you by the hand; I now tell you I am not come here to take umbrage at trifles, but to accomplish the great and serious work in which we are engaged. My heart is good, and I will not be interrupted by little things. I now wish to know, in the name of our three fires, how long we may have to remain here on this business. When I first entered this house, my mind was prepared and made up. We live at a great distance from hence, and feel anxious to return.

The General thus replied:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

It is rather difficult for me to say how many days it may require, to finally settle this good work. I will, to-morrow, listen to what our brothers, the Wyandots and others, have to say upon the speech of Masass, and then I shall be perfectly ready to enter upon the main object of this meeting, and lay before you the articles of a treaty, which may establish the happiness and peace of the Fifteen Fires, and of the Indian nations now assembled.

Masass arose and said:

I have heard the words of my elder brother: he has heard mine: I have reflected coolly: I approve of them; and, what I have said, I will never retract.]

Little Turtle, a Miami chief, arose and spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER:

I wish to ask of you, and my brothers present, one question. I would be glad to know what lands have been ceded to you, as I am uninformed in this particular. I expect that the lands on the Wabash, and in this country, belong to me and my people. I now take the opportunity to inform my brothers of the United States, and others present, that there are men of sense and understanding among my people, as well as among theirs, and that these lands were disposed of without our knowledge or consent. I was yesterday surprised, when I heard from our grandfathers, the Delawares, that these lands had been ceded by the British to the Americans, when the former were beaten by, and made peace with, the latter; because you had before told us that it was the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, and Sauckeys, who had made this cession.

Council adjourned, to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, 22d July.

In Council: Present as before.

The Little Turtle, a Miami chief, arose and spoke as follows:

General WAYNE: I hope you will pay attention to what I now say to you. I wish to inform you where your younger brothers, the Miamies, live, and, also, the Pattawatamies of St. Joseph's, together with the Wabash Indians. You have pointed out to us the boundary line between the Indians and the United States, but I now take the liberty to inform you, that that line cuts off from the Indians a large portion of country, which has been enjoyed by my forefathers time immemorial, without molestation or dispute. The print of my ancestors' houses are every where to be seen in this portion. I was a little astonished at hearing you, and my brothers who are now present, telling each other what business you had transacted together heretofore at Muskingum, concerning this country. It is well known by all my brothers present, that my forefather kindled the first fire at Detroit: from thence, he extended his lines to the head waters of Scioto; from thence, to its mouth; from thence, down the Ohio, to the mouth of the Wabash, and from thence to Chicago, on lake Michigan; at this place I first saw my elder brothers, the Shawanese. I have now informed you of the boundaries of the Miami nation, where the Great Spirit placed my forefather a long time ago, and charged him not to sell or part with his lands, but to preserve them for his posterity. This charge has been handed down to me. I was much surprised to find that my other brothers differed so much from me on this subject: for their conduct would lead one to suppose, that the Great Spirit, and their forefathers, had not given them the same charge that was given to me, but, on the contrary, had directed them to sell their lands to any white man who wore a hat, as soon as he should ask it of them. Now, elder brother, your younger brothers, the Miamies, have pointed out to you their country, and also to our brothers present. When I hear your remarks and proposals on this subject, I will be ready to give you an answer; I came with an expectation of hearing you say good things, but I have not yet heard what I have expected.

BROTHERS: (the Indians.) I expected in this council that our minds would have been made up, and that we should speak with one voice; I am sorry to observe that you are rather unsettled and hasty in your conduct.

Tarke, chief of the Wyandots, arose, and thus spoke:

ELDER BROTHER: Now listen to us! The Great Spirit above has appointed this day for us to meet together. I shall now deliver my sentiments to you, the Fifteen Fires. I view you lying in a gore of blood; it is me, an Indian, who has caused it. Our tomahawk yet remains in your head; the English gave it to me to place there.

ELDER BROTHER: I now take the tomahawk out of your head; but, with so much care, that you shall not feel pain or injury. I will now tear a big tree up by the roots, and throw the hatchet into the cavity which they occupied, where the waters will wash it away where it can never be found. Now I have buried the hatchet, and I expect that none of my color will ever again find it out. I now tell you, that no one in particular can justly claim this ground; it belongs, in common, to us all; no earthly being has an exclusive right to it; the Great Spirit above is the true and only owner of this soil, and he has given us all an equal right to it.—[Spoken on a blue belt.]

BROTHERS, The Fifteen Fires, listen! You now see that we have buried the hatchet; we still see blood around you, and, in order to clear away all grief, we now wipe away the blood from around you, which, together with the dirt that comes away with it, we bury with the hatchet, in the hole we have made for them, and replace the great tree as it stood before, so that our children, nor our children's children, can ever again discover it.—[Spoken on a blue string attached, and both delivered.]

BROTHERS: Listen! I now wipe your body clean from all blood with this white soft linen, (white wampum) and I do it with as much tenderness as I am capable of. You have appointed this house for the chiefs of the different tribes to sit in with you, and none but good words ought to be spoken in it. I have swept it clean; nothing impure remains in it.

BROTHERS: Listen! We are both placed on this ground. I now wipe the tears from your eyes, and open your ears. I see your throat is so stopped that you are nearly suffocated. I now open your throat, and make it quite clean, that whatever the Great Spirit may think proper for you to swallow, may go down without any obstruction. I see, also, that your heart is not in its true situation; I now place it in its proper position, that any thing you may hear from us, your brothers, may descend directly to it, and what you shall say may come with truth and ease from it.

BROTHER: I clear away yon hovering clouds, that we may enjoy a clear bright day, and easily see the sun, which the Great Spirit has bestowed on us, rise and set continually.—[A white string.]

BROTHER: Listen to us, all Indians, who now speak to you! The bones which lie scattered of your ancient warriors, who fell in defence of the present cause, we gather all together, and bury them now; and place this white board over them, that they may never again be seen by our posterity.—[A white and blue belt and string.]

BROTHER WARRIOR: Listen to us! the great chiefs are now about to speak to you. You, chiefs and warriors present, listen also!

BROTHER: We speak not from our lips, but from our hearts, when we are resolved upon good works. I always told you that I never intended to deceive you, when we entered upon this business; it was never the intention of us Indians to do so. I speak from my heart what I now say to you. The Great Spirit is now viewing us, and did he discover any baseness or treachery, it would excite his just anger against us.

BROTHER: Listen to me! We are all of one mind who are here assembled; this is a business not to be trifled with; it is a matter of the utmost concern to us. We happily so far agree in handling our ancestors' records, who always worked for peace.

BROTHER: You have proposed to us to build our good work on the treaty of Muskingum; that treaty I have always considered as formed upon the fairest principles. You took pity on us Indians; you did not do as our fathers the British agreed you should. You might, by that agreement, have taken all our lands; but you pitied us, and let us hold part. I always looked upon that treaty to be binding upon the United States and us Indians.

BROTHER: Listen to us Indians; I told you just now, that we were upon business of the greatest moment; I now conclude the great good works we have been employed in, and with this I cover the whole earth, that it may appear white, and shine all over the world. I hope the Great Spirit will have pity on us, and make this work lasting.—[Four large mixed belts presented.]

BROTHER: I am going to relate to you the treaty made at Muskingum, in a few words. I have not forgot that treaty, neither have you; at that time we settled a peace between the Delawares, Six Nations, Ottawas, Chippewas, Patawatamies, and us Wyandots. It is very true there were not so many different nations then assembled as are now present. We now establish a general, permanent, and lasting peace, for ever.

BROTHERS: We are all sensible, that when you struck the boundary at that time, it run from Tuscarawas to a little below Loromies, where the fort stood which was destroyed in 1752. I understand the line has since been moved a little towards us. Be strong, brothers, and fulfil your engagements.

BROTHERS: Listen! I have told you that I speak from my heart; you see the speeches I have delivered; peruse them, and see whether or not I have spoken with sincerity; this is all your brothers, of the different nations present, have this day to say to you.—[A large belt.]

The General arose and spoke as follows:

YOUNGER BROTHERS: I have listened, with great attention, to every thing you have said this day. I find the hatchet has been buried by all the nations present. I shall peruse these belts, speeches, and boundaries, now laid before me, with great attention, and I am convinced they will agree with the records in my possession. The day is far spent, and we will now separate, to meet again to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, and proceed in this good work.

Council adjourned.

In Council: Present as before.

Blue Jacket, a Shawanese chief, arose, and addressed the Indians as follows:

BROTHERS:

I hope you will not take amiss my changing my seat in this council. You all know the Wyandots are our uncles, and the Delawares our grandfathers; and that the Shawanese are the elder brothers of the other nations present: it is therefore proper that I should sit next my grandfathers and uncles. I hope, younger brothers, you are all satisfied with what our uncles said yesterday, and that I have done every thing in my power, at all times, to advise and support you.

Au-goosh-a-way, an Ottawa chief, spoke as follows:

BROTHERS, THE INDIANS:

When I last had my calumet of peace, our elder brothers, the Shawanese, were not present; I now offer it to them, that the sentiments of their hearts may be similar to ours: all you nations present, you know this to be the calumet of the three fires. It is six years since it was sent from the North to Michilimackinac, to the three fires, who live at the Gate, to be presented by them to the Wyandots, Delawares, and Shawanese, with an injunction always to hide it when any thing bad was in motion, but to display it when any thing good was contemplated. You all know the importance of this sacred token of peace among us Indians.

BROTHER: I do not consider you as a brother; I view you as a friend. I present you this calumet, that came far from the North, and has gone round all the lakes. When it was sent to us, the stem pointed toward you (the East.) Now, my friend, you may do with this pipe what you please; if you think proper, you may point it toward the Fifteen Fires, and afterwards turn it toward us. It is entirely at your disposal: I am ordered to deliver it into your hands. [Delivers the pipe.]

FRIEND: I now present you with a belt, which has been given us by the Hurons, who received it from our brothers, the Americans, as a seat upon which we all should sit and rest. Our father, at Detroit, has always endeavored to lead us off from this seat, but we never listened to him; we considered it as a carpet spread for our use, and we now show it you, that you may recognise it. [A large belt, with men and a house designated upon it.]

Masass, a Chippewa chief, arose and spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER:

This great calumet comes not from the little lake near us, but from the great lake Superior, to the North, from whence our great chiefs and warriors come.

ELDER BROTHER: When I returned from the treaty of Muskingum, I repeated the substance of its proceedings to my nation. You, therefore, see that your words have gone a great way, even to lake Superior. Brother, I live at a great distance from you, but, when you call a council, I hear your voice immediately, and I come without delay. You now see all your brothers around you. We are well acquainted with what we are now doing, and what we have done heretofore. The white beads on this belt denote the number of large villages from the North, who have heard your word. [A belt with nine white squares.]

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER, and all you present, listen to me with attention!

When the Great Spirit made the world, he put me at Michilimackinac, where I first drew my breath. At first I was entirely naked and destitute; and, as if he had compassion on me, he pointed out to me the way to the white people. I followed his path, and found them below Quebec, at the falls of Montmorency. I was satisfied the Great Spirit pitied us, for you whites had all pity on us; and, hence, we always loved you. The Great Spirit has blessed you with greater knowledge than we are possessed of; you are, therefore, entitled to great respect. When we first found the French whites, we took them to our fires, and they have lived among us ever since. [A white string.]

ELDER BROTHER: You see all your brothers assembled here, in consequence of your messages last winter; at that time the Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, some who call themselves Sauckeys, and the Miamies, heard your words. You remember, brother, I then told you, that I would withdraw the dark cloud from your eyes, that you might know us again. You see I have done so, for you now behold us all clearly. At the same time, I told you I would open both your ears, and my own, that we might hear each other clearly. Our ears are opened accordingly, and we hear and understand accurately. I now speak to you with a pure heart. This white wampum testifies our sincerity and unanimity in sentiment. I now put your heart in its right place, as you did mine, that you may make known to the Fifteen Fires what I now tell you. [A blue and white string.]

ELDER BROTHER: When I view my situation, I consider myself as an object of compassion.

ELDER BROTHER: Listen to me; as I told you last winter, if we Indians have acted wrong, we are not entirely to blame. It was our father, the British, who urged us to bad deeds, and reduced us to our present state of misery. He persuaded us to shed all the blood we have spilled. You this day see me fulfil my promise. With this belt I cover all the slain, together with our evil actions. [A white belt.]

ELDER BROTHER: Listen to me with attention. I speak in the name of all present. You see that I am worthy of your compassion. When I look upward, I see the sky serene and happy; and when I look on the earth, I see all my children wandering in the utmost misery and distress. I tell you this to inform you I have never moved my fire; that I still live where the Great Spirit first placed me. [A belt.]

ELDER BROTHER: Listen! The Great Spirit above hears us, and I trust we shall not endeavor to deceive each other. I expect that we are about to do shall never be forgotten as long as we exist. When I show you this belt, I point out to you your children at one end of it, and mine at the other; and I would solicit the Fifteen Fires, and their women and children, to have pity on my helpless offspring. I now tell you that we will assist you to the utmost of our power to do what is right. Remember, we have taken the Great Spirit to witness our present actions; we will make a new world, and leave nothing on it to incommode our children. [A white belt.]

ELDER BROTHER: I now use this white wampum, that the words I utter may descend to the bottom of your heart, and that of the Fifteen Fires.

ELDER BROTHER: I was not disposed to take up the hatchet against you; it was forced into my hand by the white people. I now throw it into the middle of the deepest lake, from whence no mortal can bring it back.

BROTHER: I have thrown my hatchet into a bottomless lake, from whence it never will return; I hope you will also throw yours so far that it may never again be found. [A string, blue and white.]

BROTHER: After hearing all your words, my heart feels easy, and in its proper place. I do not speak to you about lands, for why should I? You have told us we might hunt upon your lands; you need not apprehend any injury from us; we will, for the future, live and hunt in peace and happiness.

ELDER BROTHER: You see before you all my war chiefs; they never go ahead of their commander; they ever obey obey and follow his orders; when I was here last winter, you expressed a desire to see them; you told me you would treat them well; but they say they have not seen this treatment; and inquire the cause of this alteration. [A blue string.]

The New Corn, a Pattawatimy chief, arose, and spoke thus:

ELDER BROTHER: Had you seen me in former days, you would have beheld a great and brave chief; but now I am old, and burthened with the weight of years.

ELDER BROTHER: I take you and the Fifteen Fires, by the hand with the lively feelings of a brother. I am old, but my age does not prevent me from assisting in good works. I am happy, and satisfied with the words you have spoken, and those delivered by my brother Indians. Our satisfaction is general; when a chief rises to speak, I wish him to speak nothing but truth; because I feel for my young men, women, and children, whose happiness I have deep at heart. I must observe, that I never received any part of the compensation given at the treaty of Muskingum. Our chiefs are all well disposed, and I hope every thing that passes between you and them may be marked with sincerity and truth. My nation consists of one thousand men, who live at, and between Detroit and Lake Michigan. We have the Miamies for our allies, and we mutually assist each other. I am by birth a Sac, I married a Pattawatimy, and have resided amongst them. Twenty-three chiefs of that nation are inferior to me in command. [A belt.]

The General spoke as follows:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

I have heard, with due attention, all that you this day have said; to-morrow I will reply fully to you. My plate, and my table, are not very large; they could not entertain all present at one time; but I hope to see all your chiefs in person, and in due rotation, before we part. In the mean time, you must acknowledge, that I have helped your plates pretty well, and kept them full all around me. I will send you a little liquor this evening; but I hope you will keep your heads clear, to attend to what I shall say to you to-morrow.

Council adjourned.

In Council: Present as before.

FRIDAY, 24th July.

Blue Jacket, a Shawanee chief, arose, and spoke as follows:

BROTHERS:

You know that we, the seven nations, have always been of one opinion. You know, also, that our uncles have always taken care of the great fire; they being the oldest nation. Our elder brother will, therefore, address his words to our uncle the Wyandot, who will hand them round through the different nations.

The General arose, and spoke as follows:

BROTHERS, the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, open your ears, and be attentive:

I have heard with very great pleasure, the sentiments delivered by Masass, as the unanimous voice of your three nations. When Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, your uncle, came to me last winter, I took him to my bosom, and delivered him the key of all my forts and garrisons; and my heart rejoices when I look around me, and see so many of your chiefs and warriors assembled here, in consequence of that happy meeting. It will give infinite pleasure to General Washington, the Great Chief of the Fifteen Fires, when I inform him you have thrown the hatchet with so strong an arm, that it has reached the middle, and sunk to the bottom of the great lake, and that it is now so covered with sand, that it can never again be found. The belt which was given to Wassung, many years since, establishing a road between you and the Fifteen Fires, I now return, renewed, and cleared of all the brush and brambles with which time had scattered it.

BROTHERS of the three great fires: You say you thought you were the proper owners of the land that was sold to the Fifteen Fires, at the treaty of Muskingum; but, you say, also, that you never received any compensation for those lands. It was always the wish and intention of the Fifteen Fires that the true owners of those lands should receive a full compensation for them; if you did not receive a due proportion of the goods, as original proprietors, it was not the fault of the United States; on the contrary, the United States have twice paid for those lands, first, at the treaty of McIntosh, ten years ago, and next, at that of Muskingum, six years since.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: Notwithstanding that these lands have been twice paid for, by the Fifteen Fires, at the places I have mentioned, yet, such is the justice and liberality of the United States, that they will now, a third time, make compensation for them. [A large string to the three fires.]

BROTHERS, the Miamies: I have paid attention to what the Little Turtle said two days since, concerning the lands which he claims. He said his fathers first kindled the fire at Detroit, and stretched his line from thence, to the head waters of Scioto, thence, down the same, to the Ohio; thence, down that river, to the mouth of the Wabash, and from thence to Chicago, on the southwest end of Lake Michigan, and observed that his forefathers had enjoyed that country undisturbed, from time immemorial.

BROTHERS: These boundaries enclose a very large space of country indeed; they embrace, if I mistake not, all the lands on which all the nations now present live, as well as those which have been ceded to the United States. The lands which have been ceded have, within these three days, been acknowledged by the Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Wyandots, Delawares, and Shawanese. The Little Turtle says, the prints of his forefathers' houses are every where to be seen within these boundaries. Younger brother, it is true, these prints are to be observed; but, at the same time, we discover the marks of French possessions throughout this country, which were established long before we were born. These have since been in the occupancy of the British, who must, in their turn, relinquish them to the United States, when they, the French and Indians, will be all as one people.—[A white string.]

I will point out to you a few places where I discover strong traces of these establishments; and first of all, I find at Detroit a very strong print, where the fire was first kindled by your forefathers; next, at Vincennes, on the Wabash; again at Musquiton, on the same river; a little higher up that stream, they are to be seen at Ouitanon; I discover another strong trace at Chicago, another on the St. Joseph's of Lake Michigan; I have seen distinctly the prints of a French and a British post at the Miami villages, and of a British post at the foot of the rapids, now in their possession; prints, very conspicuous, are on the great Miami, which were possessed by the French, forty five years ago; and another trace is very distinctly to be seen at Sandusky.

It appears to me, that, if the Great Spirit, as you say, charged your forefathers to preserve their lands entire for their posterity, they have paid very little regard to the sacred injunction: for I see they have parted with those lands to your fathers the French, and the English are now, or have been, in possession of them all: therefore, I think the charge urged against the Ottawas, Chippewas, and the other Indians, comes with a bad grace indeed, from the very people who perhaps set them the example. The English and French both wore hats; and yet your forefathers sold them, at various times, portions of your lands; however, as I have already observed, you shall now receive from the United States further valuable compensation, for the lands you have ceded to them by former treaties.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: I will now inform you who it was who gave us these lands, in the first instance; it was your fathers the British, who did not discover that care for your interest which you ought to have experienced. This is the Treaty of Peace, made between the United States of America and Great Britain, twelve years ago, at the end of a long and bloody war, when the French and Americans proved too powerful for the British; on these terms they obtained peace. [Here part of the treaty of 1783 was read.]

Here you perceive that all the country, south of the great lakes, has been given up to America; but the United States never intended to take that advantage of you, which the British placed in their hands; they wish you to enjoy your just rights, without interruption, and to promote your happiness. The British stipulated to surrender to us all the posts on their side of the boundary agreed on. I told you some days ago, that treaties should ever be sacredly fulfilled by those who make them; but the British, on their part, did not find it convenient to relinquish those posts as soon as they should have done; however, they now find it so, and a precise period is accordingly fixed for their delivery. I have now in my hand the copy of a treaty, made eight months since, between them and us, of which I will read you a little. [First and second article of Mr. Jay's treaty, read.]

By this solemn agreement, they promise to retire from Michilimackinac, fort St. Clair, Detroit, Niagara, and all other places on this side of the lakes, in ten moons from this period, and leave the same to the full and quiet possession of the United States.

BROTHERS: All nations present, now listen to me!

Having now explained those matters to you, and informed you of all things I judged necessary for your information, we have nothing to do but to bury the hatchet, and draw a veil over past misfortunes. As you have buried our dead with the concern of brothers, so I now collect the bones of your slain warriors, put them into a deep pit, which I have dug, and cover them carefully over with this large belt, there to remain undisturbed. I also dry the tears from your eyes, and wipe the blood from your bodies, with this soft, white linen: no bloody traces will ever lead to the graves of your departed heroes; with this, I wipe all such entirely away. I deliver it to your uncle the Wyandot, who will send it round amongst you. [A large belt, with a white string attached.]

I now take the hatchet out of your heads, and with a strong arm throw it into the centre of the great ocean, where no mortal can ever find it; and I now deliver to you the wide and straight path to the Fifteen Fires, to be used by you and your posterity for ever. So long as you continue to follow this road, so long will you continue to be a happy people: you see it is straight and wide, and they will be blind indeed, who deviate from it. I place it also in your uncle's hands, that he may preserve it for you. [A large road belt.]

I will, the day after to-morrow, shew you the cessions you have made to the United States, and point out to you the lines which may, for the future, divide your lands from theirs; and, as you will have to-morrow to rest, I will order you a double allowance of drink; because we have now buried the hatchet, and performed every necessary ceremony, to render propitious our renovated friendship.

Tarke, chief of the Wyandots, arose, and spoke as follows:

BROTHERS: the Fifteen Fires, listen! and all you chiefs and warriors present.

This is a day appointed by the Great Spirit above, for us; he has taken pity on us all, and disposed us to perfect this good work. You have all heard what our elder brother has said, on these two belts; we will all now return thanks to this great chief, and to the Great Chief of the Fifteen Fires, for their goodness towards us; and we will, at the same time, offer our acknowledgments to the Great Spirit; for it is him alone who has brought us together, and caused us to agree in the good works which have been done. My thanks are also due to you chiefs and warriors present.

Council adjourned, to meet on the 27th.

MONDAY, 27th July.

In Council: Present as before.

The General arose, and addressed the Indians as follows:

YOUNGER BROTHERS: When we were last in council, I informed you that I would, on this day, describe the general boundary line that shall be proposed to divide the lands of the United States, or Fifteen great Fires of America, from those belonging to the Indian nations, which I will now proceed to do, in such manner as to prevent mistakes or disputes, in future, respecting that boundary. I will therefore read and explain to you the several articles of a treaty, upon which a permanent peace shall be established, between the United States of America and all the Indian tribes northwest of the Ohio.

You will, therefore, younger Brothers, open your ears to hear, and your hearts to understand, all and every of the articles of agreement which I now hold in my hand.

[Here the General read the proposed articles of treaty, and, in explanation of the 3d, made the following observations:]

YOUNGER BROTHERS: I wish you clearly to understand the object of these reservations; they are not intended to annoy, or impose the smallest degree of restraint on you, in the quiet enjoyment and full possession of your lands; but to connect the settlements of the people of the United States, by rendering a passage from one to the other more practicable and convenient, and to supply the necessary wants of those who shall reside at them: they are intended, at the same time, to prove convenient and advantageous to the different tribes of Indians residing and hunting in their vicinity, as trading posts will be established at them, to the end that you may be furnished with goods in exchange for your skins and furs, at a reasonable rate. You will consider that the principal part of the now proposed reservations were made and ceded by the Indians, at an early period, to the French; the French, by the treaty of peace of 1763, ceded them to the British; who, by the treaty of 1783, ceded all the posts and possessions they then held, or to which they had any claim, south of the great lakes, to the United States of America. The treaty of Muskingum embraced almost all these reservations, and has been recognised by the representatives of all the nations now present, during the course of last winter, as the basis upon which this treaty should be founded.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: I have now proposed to you, articles of a treaty calculated to ensure our future friendship and happiness, and which may continue till time shall be no more. I present this belt, emblematic of the ten articles which compose it, to your uncles the Wyandots. [A belt.]

Tarke, chief of the Wyandots, arose and said:

BROTHERS: the Fifteen United States, listen! and you, my nephews, the Delawares, brothers Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Shawanese, and Miamies. This is the day the Great Spirit has appointed for us, wherein we have completed the good work of peace; we have opened our ears and we all understand well what has just now been said; we have paid the utmost attention to all your words in describing the boundary between the United States and us Indians, and the roads that you have made, which shall lead through our country, to the different posts and reservations you have mentioned. We thank you for your information; and we are persuaded you have acted with great equity and moderation, in dividing the country as you have done; we are highly pleased with your humanity towards us. Listen you, chiefs and warriors present; our Elder Brother has made proposals to us, which require the greatest deliberation among us all. I do now request of you to consult upon this business without delay, that we may be enabled to return an answer to our brother to-morrow. Make no delay in deciding. This is all I have to say.

The Little Turtle, a Miami chief, arose and said:

Listen you, chiefs and warriors, to what I am about to say to you; to you I am speaking. We have heard what our elder brother has said to us this day. I expected to have heard those words ever since we have been here, for which reason I observed that you were precipitate on your part. This is a business of the greatest consequence to us all: it is an affair to which no one among us can give an answer. Therefore, I hope we will take time to consider the subject, that we will unite in opinion, and express it unanimously. Perhaps our brothers the Shawanese from Detroit, may arrive in time to give us their assistance. You, chiefs present, are men of sense and understanding; this occasion calls for your serious deliberation, and you, my uncles the Wyandots, and grandfathers the Delawares, view our situation in its true point of consideration.

TUESDAY, 28th July.

In Council: Present as before.

Tarke, chief of the Wyandots, arose and said:

ELDER BROTHER:

You told us yesterday to deliberate, seriously, on the subject of your communications to us. We, the Wyandots, Delawares, and Shawanese, have not yet formed our opinions; more time is required to consider of so important a matter: to-morrow morning we will be prepared to answer you; our minds will, by that time, be made up.

The Sun, a Pattawatamy chief, spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER:

If my old chiefs were living, I should not presume to speak in this assembly; but, as they are dead, I now address you in the name of the Pattawatamies, as Masass has spoken in the name of the three fires, of which we are one: I have to express my concurrence in sentiment with him. It is two years since I assisted at the treaty of Vincennes. My voice, there, represented the three fires. I then said it would require three years to accomplish a general peace; I am now of a different opinion, for I am confident it will be completed at this meeting.

ELDER BROTHER: I now bury the hatchet for ever; and tell you that all the bad and imprudent actions, which have been committed, were not done by me, the Indian.

ELDER BROTHER: You now see why I have done wrong. This war-belt caused us to spill so much blood through this country. The Great Spirit has, at length, put a period to the influence of this pernicious belt. You must know that it was presented to us by the British, and has involved us, for four years past, in misery and misfortunes. I am rejoiced to think it can never lead us again astray, even if a fresh war should break out with redoubled fury. We have already the loss of too many chiefs and warriors to lament, who fell a sacrifice in this destructive contest.

ELDER BROTHER: You have been told that the Pattawatamies are always foremost in mischief. I now tell you that was not a true representation. The Pattawatamy sits in the centre; nothing takes its beginning from thence. It is the three people who lived at the Miami villages, who assumed to themselves the privilege of going before; but this cannot be unknown to you.

ELDER BROTHER: I shall now dispose of this belt. I live too far from the lakes, and my arm is not long enough to throw it into the centre of any of them; neither have I strength sufficient to tear up a big tree and bury it beneath its root; but I will put it from me as effectually, by surrendering it into your hands, as by doing with it any thing else.

You may burn it if you please, or transform it into a necklace for some handsome squaw; and, thus, change its original design and appearance, and prevent, for ever, its future recognition. It has caused us much misery, and I am happy in parting with it. [A war belt.]

ELDER BROTHER: I have now made you acquainted with the determined resolution of the three fires; and if any other nation should pretend to tell you that their strength and influence can hereafter stir us up to war, do not believe them: for I now tell you that we, the three fires, are not only immovable in our determination, but, being the most powerful people, have nothing to dread from their compulsion.

The New Corn, a Pattawatamy chief, arose and said:

All you nations present, I must tell you that I am much surprised, that you cannot agree, in opinion, on the good work now before you. You do not act well. You undo to-day, what you did yesterday. It would appear as if you were ashamed to come forward with one voice: why do you hesitate? You know good works are always better, when executed with decision. I now entreat you all to join hand and heart, and finish this good work with our elder brother.

The Little Turtle, a Miami chief, spoke as follows:

All you present must know that every kind of business, especially such as we are at present engaged in, exhibits difficulties, which require patience to remove, and consideration to adjust. Your younger brothers, the Miamies, again light the calumet of peace, and present it to the Shawanese, who have not yet smoked out of it.

ELDER BROTHER: Your younger brothers, the Miamies, now thank you for the sentiments you have expressed, and for burying the hatchet; they offer, at the same time, their acknowledgments to their elder brother, of the Fifteen Fires, for throwing his tomahawk, with so strong an arm, into the great ocean. We are convinced of the sincerity with which these actions were performed. I do not believe the hatchet was ever before buried so deep. I fancy it has always, heretofore, been cast into shallow running water, which has washed it up on dry land, where some of our foolish young men have always found it, and used it to involve their people in trouble.

ELDER BROTHERS: I wish we could all unite and give our elder brother, at once, a final answer to his propositions; I am surprised at you, my uncles, the Wyandots, and you, my grandfathers, the Delawares, and you, Shawanese, should say you were not ready. Your younger brother expects that you will call them all together, and make them acquainted with your sentiments first, as elder brothers ought to do, and afterwards to listen to the opinion of your younger brothers.

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, arose and said:

ELDER BROTHER, listen to me:

My mind has long been made up; it is not necessary for me to consider upon what I am already resolved upon; we have been a long time here, and ought, without further delay, to finish this good work. We, the three nations, are long united in opinion; we fully agree to your propositions; we want no further private council; we should lay aside trifling; our tardy brothers have got their wives with them; they are content and easy; ours are at home, and we are anxious to be with them.

Council adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, 29th July.

Council present as before.

Tarke, chief of the Wyandots, spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER of the Fifteen Fires, listen to us, all you that are assembled here! Brother Indians listen also!

We are now come forward to give you an answer to what you proposed to us the other day, as my nephews, the Delawares, and my younger brothers, the Shawanese, have agreed upon what they will say to you. We request you, brother, to relate this answer to our brother Indians, after I have delivered it to you.

The following written address was then presented:

GREENVILLE, HEAD QUARTERS, 29th July, 1795.

BROTHERS of the Fifteen United Fires, listen to the voice of the Wyandots and their confederates of Sandusky!

We take the Delawares, our nephews, and our younger brothers, the Shawanese, by the hand, as their sentiments agree with ours, and have one heart and voice to speak. I now speak, brothers, in the name of the before mentioned tribes, in answer to your proposals made to us two days ago—as we have said before, that you had done the greatest justice to us, which we do now again acknowledge a second time.

BROTHERS, listen well! We have only the following objections to make; you mentioned in one of the articles, that you would not protect us from the mischief that might take place amongst ourselves. Remember well, brothers, the speech you sent us, dated the 1st January, 1795. We shall only give part of the contents, and these are the words:

“Your father, General Washington, the President of the Fifteen great Fires of America, will take you under his protection, and has ordered me to defend his dutiful children from any injury that may be attempted against them, on account of their peaceable disposition towards the United States, and for which purpose, he will order a fort or fortification to be built at the foot of the rapids of Sandusky, on the reserved lands, as soon as the season and circumstances will permit.”

BROTHERS: We never expected you would change your sentiments regarding our safety, on which depends our future happiness.

BROTHERS: Reconsider this beneficial part of the articles—don't change your sentiments; hold fast to General Washington's orders, as we do; we shall never be happy or contented, if you do not take us under your powerful wings; we are sensible, that no one dare pluck a feather from your body; if they do, the fifteen speared arrows in your claws, will display in every direction.

BROTHERS, listen! You have requested of us all, to give you an account of the nation or nations, the true owner of the soil northwest of the Ohio, of the boundaries you have laid off two days ago. We will ask you a few questions. Did you not, in the last war between you and the British, divide the country? He gave one part to you, and the other part he reserved for himself; we are well acquainted that you are master of the lands, and you have now thought proper to return a large tract of the country to us again.

BROTHERS: We leave the disposal of the country wholly in your breast; make out the boundaries that shall divide the lands between our nations, as we, the Wyandots, Delawares, and Shawanese, wish to know if we are entitled to any part of it. We wish to inform you of the impropriety of not fixing the bounds of every nation's rights: for, the manner it now lies in, would bring on disputes forever, between the different tribes of Indians; and we wish to be by ourselves, that we may be acquainted how far we might extend our claims, that no one may intrude on us, nor we upon them.

BROTHERS: This speech we deliver you, is the unanimous opinion of the chiefs, the Wyandots, Ottawas, Delawares, and Six Nations of Sandusky, and the Delawares and Shawanese, from the waters of the Miami river.

My nephews, the Delawares, and my younger brothers, the Shawanese, have further added to this speech; it is their wishes, from their hearts, that the present proposed plan; ought to be left to your consideration, as you had pity on us in settling the present business in such a manner as you thought proper. You may rest assured, brothers, that this is our sentiments.

J. WILLIAMS,

Agent, and commissioner for the chiefs and warriors of Sandusky.

The Little Turtle, a Miami chief, arose and spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER, and all you present:

I am going to say a few words, in the name of the Pattawatamies, Weas, and Kickapoos. It is well known to you all, that people are appointed on those occasions, to speak the sentiments of others; therefore am I appointed for those three nations.

ELDER BROTHER: You told your younger brothers, when we first assembled, that peace was your object; you swore your interpreters before us, to the faithful discharge of their duty, and told them the Great Spirit would punish them, did they not perform it. You told us, that it was not you, but the President of the Fifteen Fires of the United States, who spoke to us; that, whatever he should say, should be firm and lasting; that it was impossible he should say what was not true. Rest assured, that your younger brothers, the Miamies, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, Shawanese, Weas, Kickapoos, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias, are well pleased with your words, and are persuaded of their sincerity. You have told us to consider of the boundaries you shewed us; your younger brothers have done so, and now proceed to give you their answer.—[A white string.]

ELDER BROTHER: Your younger brothers do not wish to hide their sentiments from you. I wish them to be the same with those of the Wyandots and Delawares; you have told us, that most of the reservations you proposed to us, belonged to our fathers, the French and the British. Permit your younger brothers to make a few observations on this subject.

ELDER BROTHER: We wish you to listen with attention, to our words; you have told your younger brothers, that the British imposed falsehoods on us, when they said, the United States wished to take our lands from us, and, that the United States had no such design; you pointed out to us the boundary line, which crossed a little below Loromie's store, and struck fort Recovery, and run from thence to the Ohio, opposite the mouth of Kentucky river.

ELDER BROTHER: You have told us to speak our minds freely, and we now do it. This line takes in the greater and best part of your brothers' hunting ground, therefore, your younger brothers are of opinion, you take too much of their lands away, and confine the hunting of our young men within limits too contracted. Your brothers, the Miamies, the proprietors of those lands, and all your younger brothers present, wish you to run the line as you mentioned, to fort Recovery, and to continue it along the road; from thence to fort Hamilton, on the great Miami river. This is what your brothers request you to do, and you may rest assured of the free navigation of that river, from thence to its mouth, forever.

BROTHER: Here is the road we wish to be the boundary between us. What lies to the east, we wish to be yours; that to the west, we would desire to be ours. [Presenting a road belt.]

ELDER BROTHER: In speaking of the reservations, you say they are designed for the same purpose as those for which our fathers, the French and English, occupied them. Your younger brothers now wish to make some observations on them.

ELDER BROTHER: Listen to me with attention. You told us you discovered on the Great Miami, traces of an old fort. It was not a French fort, brother; it was a fort built by me. You perceived another at Loromies: 'tis true, a Frenchman once lived there for a year or two. The Miami villages were occupied as you remarked; but it was unknown to your younger brothers, until you told them, that we had sold land there to the French or English. I was much surprised to hear you say that it was my forefathers had set the example to the other Indians, in selling their lands. I will inform you in what manner the French and English occupied those places.

ELDER BROTHER: These people were seen by our forefathers first at Detroit; afterwards we saw them at the Miami village—that glorious gate, which your younger brothers had the happiness to own, and through which all the good words of our chiefs had to pass, from the north to the south, and from the east to the west. Brothers, these people never told us they wished to purchase our lands from us.

ELDER BROTHER: I now give you the true sentiments of your younger brothers the Miamies, with respect to the reservation at the Miami villages. We thank you for kindly contracting the limits you at first proposed. We wish you to take this six miles square on the side of the river where your fort now stands, as your younger brothers wish to inhabit that beloved spot again. You shall cut hay for your cattle wherever you please, and you shall never require in vain the assistance of your younger brothers at that place.

ELDER BROTHER: The next place you pointed to, was the Little river, and said you wanted two miles square at that place. This is a request that our fathers, the French or British, never made us; it was always ours. This carrying place has heretofore proved, in a great degree, the subsistence of your younger brothers. That place has brought to us, in the course of one day, the amount of one hundred dollars. Let us both own this place, and enjoy in common the advantages it afford. You told us, at Chicago the French possessed a fort; we have never heard of it. We thank you for the trade you promised to open in our country; and permit us to remark, that we wish our former traders may be continued, and mixed with yours. [A belt.]

ELDER BROTHER: On the subject of hostages, I have only to observe, that I trust all my brothers present are of my opinion with regard to peace and our future happiness. I expect to be with you every day when you settle on your reservations; and it will be impossible for me or my people to withhold from you a single prisoner, therefore, we don't know why any of us should remain here. These are the sentiments of your younger brothers present, on these particulars. [A white string.]

Au-si-me-the, a Pattawatamy chief, arose and spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER: You have heard the voice of your younger brothers present. I have nothing to add to what has been said; where could I find a contrary opinion? I have only to hope that we all may experience the truth of what you have told us in the name of General Washington, who sent you. All our treaties, hitherto, have failed; this, I am confident, will be lasting. These words come from the three fires, and we hope the Great Spirit may witness our sincerity.—[A white string.]

Council adjourned.

THURSDAY, 30th July.

In Council: Present as before.

Au-si-me-the thus resumed his address:

ELDER BROTHER: What I am about to say, is the voice of all present. You know the Great Spirit witnesses our words; I am afraid to tell an untruth. I have nothing to add to what has been said; it meets the full approbation of all your younger brothers. You know we have all buried the hatchet, together with our bad actions. Why, therefore, do you wish to detain hostages from among us? You may depend on our sincerity. We cannot but be sincere, as your forts will be planted thick among us. Although an Indian, I respect the words of a good man; and when I pledge my faith, I do not deviate from my engagements. Your people with us will, undoubtedly, be restored as soon as possible; I cannot fix any precise period for their delivery: for, perhaps, I could not exactly fulfil my promises, and I should be sorry to give you cause to doubt my veracity.

The Shawanese, Miamies, and Delawares, who lived at the gate, and who caused all our misfortunes, have wisely buried the hatchet forever; they wish to return to their former situation, and enjoy again their favorite abode.

ELDER BROTHER: Do not view my freedom with displeasure.—[A white string.]

Kee-a-hah, a Kickapoo chief, arose and said:

I am sent by my nation to hear what the assembled nations should say at this treaty, together with the words of our elder brother. I shall now speak a few words through the Little Turtle.—[Presents a pipe to smoke.]

The Little Turtle:

ELDER BROTHERS, the United States, and you, elder brothers, present, look at this calumet—you see it is white. It is an instrument given to us Indians by the Great Spirit, to assist in communicating our sentiments to each other.

ELDER BROTHER: I return you thanks for the good words you sent among us; in consequence of which we are here this day. We, the Kickapoos and Kaskaskias, are happy in perceiving your humanity towards us; we see, with great pleasure, all our elder brothers now take you by the hand, and we sincerely hope your words to each other may never be violated. We present this calumet as a token of our lasting friendship towards you, and of our anxious desire that this good work may last forever.—[A pipe delivered.]

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, arose and spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER: Listen to what I now say; your younger brothers, that is, the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, have told you, that they were but one people, and had but one voice; they have said the truth, and what I now say, is in the name of the three fires; you have asked of us the island of Michilimackinac, and its dependencies, on the main, where the fort formerly stood; they are ceded to you, forever, with the utmost cheerfulness; you have also asked a piece of ground, at the entrance of the straits, to cut your wood on, and for other necessary purposes; this is also granted to you; and I further add to it, the Isle de Bois Blanc, as an instance of our sincere disposition to serve and accommodate you. You know, brother, when the French formerly possessed this country, we were but one people, and had but one fire between us; and we now entertain the hope of enjoying the same happy relation with you, the United States. Your brothers present, of the three fires, are gratified in seeing and hearing you; those who are at home will not experience that pleasure, until you come and live among us; you will then learn our title to that land; you will then be convinced of my sincerity, and of the friendship and strength of our nations.

This, elder brother, is all I have to say at present. We all know that the good work of peace is accomplished. I only address these few words to you, that all nations present may again hear the sentiments of the three fires, and understand them perfectly.—[A blue and white string.]

The Little Beaver, a Wea chief, arose and said:

ELDER BROTHER: You already know what I am about to say. I have got a cold; I cannot speak well at present; my brother, the Little Turtle, will speak for me.

The Little Turtle:

ELDER BROTHER: Here are papers which have been given to me by General Washington, the great chief of the United States. He told me they should protect us in the possession of our lands, and that no white person should interrupt us in the enjoyment of our hunting grounds, or be permitted to purchase any of our towns or lands from us; that he would place traders among us, who would deal fairly. I wish you to examine these papers.

ELDER BROTHER: You have asked for a reservation at the Ouataton; I hope you will put a trader there, on the spot formerly occupied by one. We would wish Captain Prior to be our trader. I can't give you any lands there, brother; I will lend you some as long as you want it.

ELDER BROTHER: You have told us of a place possessed by the French, called Musquion. We have lived at our village a long time; it is very surprising that we should never know any thing about it. The French lived at Vincennes, where they were permitted to settle by my forefathers, who told them they should have a small quantity of land for the cattle, &c. on the east, but none on the west side of the Wabash.—[A white string.]

Massas, a Chippewa chief, rose and said:

All you, my brothers, present, when the chiefs of my village sent me hither to hear your proceedings in council, they told me I could not see the extent of the American fires; that they believed their elder brother had called them together, in pity to them, their women, and children; and they enjoined the three fires to speak with one voice, and do their utmost to forward the good work; saying, that they had seen several treaties heretofore made with the United States, which the Indians had always violated by taking up the hatchet.

ELDER BROTHER: I have listened to all your words, and to those of my brothers. It would be very wrong in me to raise objections to what has been done, as you have explained to us your treaty with Britain.

ELDER BROTHER: You say at the fort of Detroit you intend to take a piece of land six miles deep, from the river Rosine to lake St. Clair. I now ask you, what is to become of our brothers, the French, who live on this land? We look on them as our brothers and friends, who treated us well, when abused by the British. We wish to know your sentiments on this subject. We think, brother, you could find land enough between the rivers Raisin and Rouge; we have no objection to your reservation at the foot of the Rapids. We have no objection to any other proposition you have made, and we sincerely wish we could now take you among us; because the British, on our return, will renew their old songs.

ELDER BROTHER: My children must have suffered, since I left home; perhaps I, myself, may be made unhappy on my return to them: for the British may probably say, why don't you seek relief from your new friends? This makes me uneasy, and urges me to entreat you to come immediately, and live nearer to us; you might then assist us; and it would be more convenient for the surrender of our prisoners. I hope you will pity my situation; when I returned from the treaty of Muskingum, McKee threatened to kill me; I have not now less cause to fear him, as he endeavored to prevent my coming hither.

ELDER BROTHER: You asked who were the true owners of the lands now ceded to the United States. In answer, I tell you, if any nations should call themselves the owners of it, they would be guilty of a falsehood; our claim to it is equal; our elder brother has conquered it.

BROTHERS, have done trifling. Let us conclude this great work; let us sign our names to the treaty now proposed, and finish our business.

ELDER BROTHER: If I can escape the snares of McKee and his bad birds, I shall ascend as high as the falls of St. Mary's, and proclaim the good tidings to all your distant brothers in that quarter. [A belt.]

The General spoke as follows:

YOUNGER BROTHERS, all of you, listen with attention! I shall now reply to what was said yesterday by the Wyandots; I will then answer the observations of the Little Turtle, made in behalf of the Miamies and Wabash tribes.

YOUNGER BROTHERS, the Wyandots, Delawares, and Shawanese. I am pleased to hear you say, with one voice, for the second time, that I have done the greatest justice to you in dividing the lands of the United States from those of the Indian nations, by the boundary line which I have proposed. You request me to fix the boundaries that shall divide the lands between the respective tribes of Indians now present.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: A moment's reflection will show you the impropriety, as well as impossibility, of my acting in this business. You, Indians, best know your respective boundaries.

I particularly recommend to all you nations, present, to continue friendly and just to each other; let no nation, or nations, invade, molest, or disturb, any other nation, or nations, in the hunting grounds they have heretofore been accustomed to live and hunt upon, within the boundary which shall now be agreed on; and, above all, I enjoin that no injury be offered to any nation, or nations, in consequence of the part any, or either of them, may have pursued, to establish a permanent and happy peace with the United States of America.

YOUNGER BROTHERS, the Wyandots, and other Indians, of Sandusky, make your hearts and minds easy. Be assured that, as soon as circumstances will permit, a fort shall be established on the reserved lands, near the entrance of Sandusky Lake, which will always afford you protection against the common enemy, should any such presume to disturb our peace and mutual friendship.

YOUNGER BROTHERS, the Miamies: I have listened to you with attention; and have heard your observations upon the general boundary line proposed by me, as well as upon the proposed reservations. If my ears did not deceive me, I have heard all the other nations give their assent to the general boundary line, and to the reservations, generally; I, therefore, address you, the Miamies:

You say that the general boundary line, as proposed by me, will take away some of your best hunting grounds; and propose to alter it, and run it from fort Recovery, through the centre of this place, and along the road to the Miami river, opposite fort Hamilton.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: This would be a very crooked, as well as a very difficult line to follow; because, there are several roads between this and fort Hamilton, some of them several miles apart, which might certainly be productive of unpleasant mistakes and differences; that which I propose will be free from all difficulty and uncertainty. You all know fort Recovery as well as the mouth of Kentucky river; a straight line, drawn from one to the other, will never vary; they are two points which will ever be remembered, not only by all present, but by our children's children, to the end of time; nor will this line prevent your hunters, or young men, in the smallest degree, from pursuing all the advantages which the chase affords; because, by the 7th article, the United States of America grant liberty to all the Indian tribes to hunt within the territory ceded to the United States, without hindrance or molestation, so long as they demean themselves peaceably, and offer no injury to the people of the United States.

I find there is some objection to the reservation at fort Wayne. The Little Turtle observes, he never heard of any cessions made at that place to the French. I have traced the lines of two forts at that point; one stood near the junction of the St. Josephs with the St. Mary's, and the other not far removed on the St. Mary's; and it is ever an established rule, among Europeans, to reserve as much ground around their forts, as their cannon can command; this is a rule as well known as any other fact.

Objection has also been made respecting the portage between fort Wayne and the Little river; and the reasons produced, are, that that road has been to the Miamies a source of wealth; that it has, heretofore, produced them one hundred dollars per day. It may be so; but let us inquire who, in fact, paid this heavy contribution. It is true the traders bore it in the first instance; but they laid it on their goods, and the Indians, of the Wabash, really and finally paid it; therefore, it is the Little Beaver, the Soldier, the Sun, and their tribes, who have actually been so highly taxed. The United States will always be their own carriers, to, and from, their different posts. Why should the United States pay the large sum of eight thousand dollars, annually, if they were not to enjoy the privilege of open roads to, and from, their reservations? And this sum of money the United States agree to pay for this and other considerations. And the share, which the Miamies will receive, of this annuity, shall be one thousand dollars.

I will then inquire, of all the nations present, whether the United States are not acting the part of a tender father, to them and their children, in thus providing for them, not only at present, but for ever?

The Miamies shall be at liberty, as usual, to employ themselves for private traders, whenever their assistance may be required; and those people, who have lived at that glorious gate, (the Miami villages,) may now rekindle their fires at that favorite spot; and, henceforth, as in their happiest days, be at full liberty to receive from, and send to, all quarters, the speeches of their chiefs as usual; and here is the road the Miamies will remember. [A road belt.]

Now, all ye chiefs and warriors, of every nation present, open your ears that you may clearly hear the articles of treaty, now in my hand, again read, and, a second time, explained to you, that we may proceed to have them engrossed on parchment, which may preserve them for ever.

[The articles of treaty were here a second time read, and explained by the General, who observed upon]

The article respecting hostages;—

I did not expect any objections to this particular, for I see no reason why you should hesitate at leaving ten of your people with me, until the return of our people from among you; the promise of a mutual exchange of prisoners, made last winter, when we met at this place, you have not performed on your part; I have kept none of your flesh and blood; nor would General Washington, the Great Chief of the United States, suffer me so to do; the period will be short, and those who remain shall be kindly treated.

On the Ouia-tonon reservation;—

The Little Beaver has asked for Captain Prior to reside, as a trader, at Ouia-tonon; he shall reside at that place; but Captain Prior is a warrior, not a trader. He shall have a few warriors with him, to protect the trade and the Indians in that quarter.

On the reservation at Detroit;—

Masass has asked, what will become of the French? The United States consider the French and themselves as one people; and it is partly for them and their accommodation, this reservation is made, whenever they become citizens thereof, as well as for the people of the Fifteen Fires.

On the gift of the Isle de Bois Blanc;—

In addition to the cessions which the three fires have made with such cheerfulness, of the reservations in their country, Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish has, in their name, made a voluntary gift to the United States of the Isle de Bois Blanc, in lake Michigan. The Fifteen Fires accept of this unasked for grant from the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, according to their intentions; and will always view it as an unequivocal mark of their sincere friendship.

And on trade;—

The Little Turtle yesterday expressed a wish, that some of their former traders might be continued among them as a part of the number to be licensed by the United States. This is very fair and reasonable, and a certain number will be licensed accordingly, when properly recommended as good and honest men.

BROTHERS: All you nations now present, listen!

You now have had, a second time, the proposed articles of treaty read and explained to you. It is now time for the negotiation to draw to a conclusion.

I shall, therefore, ask each nation individually, if they approve of, and are prepared to sign, those articles, in their present form, that they may be immediately engrossed for that purpose. I shall begin with the Chippewas, who, with the others who approbate the measure, will signify their assent.

You, Chippewas, do you approve of these articles of treaty, and are you prepared to sign them? [A unanimous answer.] Yes.

You, Ottawas, do you agree? [A unanimous answer.] Yes.

You, Pattawatamies? [ditto.] Yes.

You, Wyandots, do you agree? [ditto.] Yes.

You, Delawares? [ditto.] Yes.

You, Shawanese? [ditto.] Yes.

You, Miamies, do you agree? [ditto.] Yes.

You, Weas? [ditto.] Yes.

And you, Kickapoos, do you agree? [ditto.] Yes.

The treaty shall be engrossed; and as it will require two or three days to do it properly, on parchment, we will now part, to meet on the 2d of August; in the interim, we will eat, drink, and rejoice, and thank the Great Spirit for the happy stage this good work has arrived at.

Council adjourned.

July 31.—The Red Pole, with eighty-eight Shawanese, and Tey-yagh-taw, with seven Wyandots, nine of the Six Nations, and ten Delawares, arrived, from the vicinity of Detroit, and were received.

August 2.—In Council: Present as before, with the addition of the Shawanese, Wyandots, &c. who arrived on the 31st ultimo.

The Red Pole, a Shawanee chief, arose and spoke as follows:

I am very happy to see, you all, my brothers, here assembled. I am come late, but I come with a good heart. I am well pleased to hear of the good work you have agreed upon, with our elder brother, the Fifteen Fires; and thank you for the pity you have shewn for our helpless women and children, whom we have left behind.

The General arose and spoke as follows:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

I have received a letter from your ancient friends and brothers, the people called Quakers, with a message to all the nations here assembled. The Quakers are a people whom I much love and esteem, for their goodness of heart, and sincere love of peace with all nations; listen then to their voice, and let it sink deep into your hearts.

[Here the General read the address of the people called Quakers, and the invoice of their present.]

Their present, you perceive, is small, but being designed with the benevolent view of promoting the peace and happiness of mankind, it becomes of important value. They wish it to be considered merely as a token of their regard for you, and a testimony of their brotherly affection and kind remembrance of you.

YOUNGER BROTHERS: The articles of treaty are not yet completely engrossed; they will be ready by 8 o'clock to-morrow, when we will again meet here, read the treaty once more, and proceed to the act of mutually signing and exchanging it.

The Shawanese and Wyandots, who arrived the day before yesterday, will then hear what we have all agreed upon, and be equally convinced, with all the others, of the liberality of the articles.

Blue Jacket, a Shawanee chief, arose and spoke as follows:

ELDER BROTHER, and you my brothers present:

You see me now present myself as a war chief, to lay down that commission, and place myself in the rear of my village chiefs, who, for the future, will command me. Remember, brothers, you have all buried your war hatchets; your brothers the Shawanese, now do the same good act. We must think of war no more.

ELDER BROTHER: You now see that all the chiefs and warriors around you have joined in the good work of peace, which is now accomplished. We now request you to inform our elder brother, General Washington, of it; and of the cheerful unanimity which has marked their determinations. We wish you to inquire of him, if it would be agreeable that two chiefs, from each nation, should pay him a visit, and take him by the hand: for your younger brothers have a strong desire to see that great man, and to enjoy the pleasure of conversing with him.—[A blue string.]

The General thus replied:

BROTHERS THE SHAWANESE, and all you other nations:

I am confident the heart of the Great Chief, General Washington, will be rejoiced when he hears that you have unanimously joined in the good work of peace; and the instrument we will sign to-morrow, shall be an everlasting record of the good action; one part of which, I will immediately transmit to him. I will, with pleasure, make the inquiries you desire, and communicate the answer to you whenever I receive it.

Council adjourned.

August 3.—In Council: Present as before.

The General rose, and spoke as follows:

YOUNGER BROTHERS:

When this council fire was first kindled, my commissions and authority for holding this treaty were read and explained to all then present; but, as several chiefs had not at that time arrived, I shall now read them a second time, for the perfect satisfaction of all.

[The General here again exhibited and explained his powers.]

That I have strictly performed my duty in fulfilling those instructions, and that they were manifestly calculated to establish the peace and happiness of all the Indian nations now present, will appear by the engrossed articles of treaty, unanimously agreed to, and now before us. They shall now be read a third time, that all may be perfectly acquainted with them; therefore listen.

[The engrossed articles were here read; the signing commenced and finished; and the General thus proceeded:]

YOUNGER BROTHERS: Having completed the signing of this treaty, one part of it shall be delivered to the Wyandots, who will preserve it as a sacred pledge of the establishment of our future friendship; the other, or counterpart, I will send to the Great Chief, General Washington. In addition, one copy, on paper, shall be delivered to each nation, for their frequent and particular information. We will now proceed to apportion the goods designed to be given to you, and I hope to be prepared for their delivery in a day or two. Some assistance must be afforded to the Chippewas, and other remote tribes, to facilitate the transportation of their proportions. We will, for the present, retire, and we will have a little drink this evening.

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, arose, and said:

ELDER BROTHER: I now see that all is settled. It affords us a great deal of pleasure. I hope you feel equally gratified. I repeat our entire satisfaction, that all present may know it. We, the three fires, have never done you any harm. With the same good heart I met you here, I will depart, and return home. You will find the truth of these words when you come and live among us. You must not believe ill of me.

ELDER BROTHER: I hope you will listen with attention to my words, and have pity on me. I have a request to make of you. You know I have come a great distance to assist in this good work, and, as it is now happily completed, I hope you will deliver to us our friend, whom you sent from hence into confinement. We would be grieved to leave him in durance behind us, for he has been friendly to us. This is the request of your brothers, the three fires.

Council adjourned.

August 7. In Council: Present as before.

The General arose, and spoke as follows:

BROTHERS, all nations now present: You have all smoked out of this calumet, when we first opened council at this place, except the Shawanese. I will, therefore, smoke with the Shawanese, and with some of the Wyandots who arrived late.

Listen, all you sachems, chiefs, and warriors! Lift up your eyes, and behold these instruments of writing, to which the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Ottawas, Chippewas, Patawatamies, Miamies, Eel Rivers, Weas, Kickapoos, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias, have set their hands and seals, that they may be handed down to your children's children, as a memorial of the happy peace thereby established. When your posterity shall hereafter view these records, they will be informed that you were the great people who accomplished this blessed work, to ensure to them peace and happiness forever. One of these I shall transmit to General Washington, the other I will deposit, agreeable to your own desires, with your uncles the Wyandots. A true copy, on paper, shall now be given to each nation. This large belt, and this seal, will accompany the original instrument, and will declare its sacred and important value.

The next business will be the distribution of the goods and presents promised by treaty. To-morrow the Wyandots shall receive their proportion: the other nations will be sent for, in order as they signed, as soon as we are ready to deliver them. It will make no difference to any, who is first served, or who last; all shall have their due proportion. I have only to recommend a just and equal distribution among your respective nations.

Independent of this general delivery, and as a reward for the good disposition to peace of some chiefs and nations, early evinced, I shall make some further presents, which must be considered as private property to those who shall receive them, and as testimonies of particular regard. And, in return for the generous and unasked for present of the Chippewas, of the Isle de Bois Blanc, the Fifteen Fires will make them an acknowledgment, to shew that they will never be outdone in kindness.

I have to exhort you to take every measure to restrain your young men from the bad practice of stealing horses from those who are their friends. Some Frenchmen who accompanied you to this place, have complained to me of having had their horses stolen since their arrival. This is ungrateful and disgraceful.

Be all now attentive! This letter in my hand informs me, that some very bad Indians, indeed, regardless of the good work we have been engaged in, have barbarously surprised and murdered an innocent family, who thought themselves secure from harm whilst negotiations for peace engaged your attention. This grieves me very much. By an article of the agreement entered into last winter, we were mutually to inform each other of any harm intended, which should come to our knowledge, and do our utmost to prevent it. And it is expressly stipulated in this treaty, that similar conduct shall be pursued by both parties. That for injuries done, no private or personal retaliation shall take place, but complaint shall be made by the party injured to the other, &c.

I do, accordingly, at this time, complain to you of the bad conduct of those bad people, and desire you who live nearest to them, to exert your powers to restrain their practices and correct their lives. I fear, if they are permitted to continue uncontrolled, much mischief will ensue. They are a small, lawless banditti, who insult your authority at the same time they injure the United States, by their savage and inhuman practices. Our people, roused and provoked by their depredations and cruelties, will follow them into their country, to punish them as they merit; and should they, in the pursuit, fall in with any of you or your people, who are our sincere friends, they might not be able to distinguish one from the other, and would probably wreak their vengeance on their innocent brothers, and hurt them, when they meant to chastise those guilty aggressors only.

Tarke, chief of the Wyandots, arose, and spoke as follows:

BROTHERS, listen! and you also, brothers of the different nations present. The Great Spirit above has appointed this day for us to complete all the good work in which we have been engaged. You remember that, some time ago, our brother, the American, rose up and thanked the Great Spirit above for conducting the good work so far as it then was; and he desired of us to know whether we would acknowledge him, the fifteen United States, to be our father; but we have not yet returned him an answer. Now, this day, the good work is completed. I inform you all, brother Indians, that we do now, and will henceforth, acknowledge the fifteen United States of America to be our father, and you will all, for the future, look upon them as such: you must call them brothers no more. The Great Spirit has crowned them with success in all their undertakings.

FATHER: You see we all now acknowledge you to be our father. I take you by the hand, which I offer as a pledge of our sincerity, and of our happiness in becoming your children.

FATHER: Listen to your children, here assembled; be strong, now, and take care of all your little ones. See what a number you have suddenly acquired. Be careful of them, and do not suffer them to be imposed upon. Don't shew favor to one, to the injury of any. An impartial father equally regards all his children, as well those who are ordinary, as those who may be more handsome; therefore, should any of your children come to you crying, and in distress, have pity on them, and relieve their wants.

Now, all my brothers present, you see that we have acknowledged and called on the United States as our father. Be strong, brothers, and obedient to our father; ever listen to him when he speaks to you, and follow his advice. I now deliver this wampum, in presence of you all, as a token of our being now the children of the Fifteen Fires. [A large string, blue and white.]

The General rose and said:

Listen! all you nations, to what your uncle, the Wyandot, has said. [Tarke's speech was here interpreted to each nation.]

Listen! all you nations present. I have hitherto addressed you as brothers. I now adopt you all, in the name of the President and Fifteen great Fires of America, as their children, and you are so accordingly. The medals which I shall have the honor to deliver you, you will consider as presented by the hands of your father, the Fifteen Fires of America. These you will hand down to your children's children, in commemoration of this day—a day in which the United States of America gives peace to you and all your nations, and receives you and them under the protecting wings of her eagle. [Council adjourned.]

August 8th.—In council: Present as before.

The Sun, a Pattawatamy chief, arose, and said:

FATHER: I now speak to acquaint you and all present that I am perfectly satisfied with all that has been done in this council. You have told us to bring in our prisoners without delay. I have not one in my village. I never took any. You further told us, if any of your people injured us, you would punish them, and enjoined on us a similar conduct as it respected our offenders. Father, I have not the same authority over my people that you exercise over yours. They live dispersed, and it is difficult to reach them on all occasions. As you have now become our father, we are no longer objects of pity; as your children, we shall be happy whilst you continue to protect us. When the British adopted us as children, they made false promises, and left us to the mercy of the traders, who took advantage of, and much abused, our ignorance and weakness. You have promised to send traders among us, by whom we will not be abused, and we have promised to protect their lives and property. We are happy, father, and thank you for your kindness to your children. I now ask of you to send a trader to my village, which is a day's walk below the Wea towns on the Wabash. You said you would send one of your officers to command at those towns. We would wish you to send Captain Ouitanon, (Prior) and should any meditated mischief come to my knowledge, I will immediately acquaint him of it, agreeable to our compact. All your children present have the articles of the treaty fully and indelibly impressed on their hearts, and should bad birds attempt to misconstrue or prevent them, we promise, sincerely, not to listen to their designing, artful songs.

FATHER: We, the Pattawatamies present, are in three classes. One from the river Huron, one from St. Joseph's, and that to which I belong from the Wabash; and, as you intend to give the goods designed for us in bulk to that nation, I am afraid the division amongst ourselves will be attended with difficulty and discontent. I pray you, father, to make the division among us, and thus preserve proportion and harmony. [A belt.]

The New Corn, a Pattawatamy chief, spoke as follows:

My friend, when I first came here, I took you by the hand. You welcomed me, and asked me for my great war chief. I told you they were killed, and that none remained but me, who have the vanity to think myself a brave man, and a great warrior. The Great Spirit has made me a great chief, and endowed me with great powers. The heavens and earth are my heart, the rising sun my mouth, and thus favored, I propagate my own species! [This is the Nestor of the wilderness, possessed by all the garrulity of age.] I know the people who have made and violated former treaties. I am too honorable and too brave a man to be guilty of such unworthy conduct. I love and fear the Great Spirit. He now hears what I say. I dare not tell a lie.

Now, my friend, the Great Wind, do not deceive us in the manner that the French, the British, and Spaniards, have heretofore done. The English have abused us much; they have made us promises which they never fulfilled; they have proved to us how little they have ever had our happiness at heart; and we have severely suffered for placing our dependence on so faithless a people. Be you strong, and preserve your word inviolate; and reward those Frenchmen who have come so great a distance to assist us.

My friend, I am old, but I shall never die. I shall always live in my children, and children's children. [A string.]

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, thus spoke:

FATHER: The good work being now completed, we are left without a subject to employ our conversation. You see your children the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, around you. Those at home will be rejoiced when we inform them that, for the future, they will enjoy the protection of a new father. Our happiness is great in being permitted to address you by that endearing appellation. Father, since we have been here, some mischief has been done. We are entirely ignorant of the perpetrators. It grieves us much, and excites our anger and indignation. Time will discover to you and us those wicked disturbers, who richly merit punishment. I have to request you to license a trader to reside with your children at Ki-ka-na-ma-sung, where we shall pass the ensuing winter. I have never been guilty of stealing horses, nor shall I now commence the practice. But as I am an old man, I would ask you for one to carry me home.

Welle-baw-kee-lund, a Delaware chief, spoke as follows:

FATHER: Listen a few words from the Delawares. This is the speech you gave us when you first came into this country, and when we first met together in council. In this you told us we should live in peace and friendship with each other, and join our hands firmly together. It seems they were badly bound, for the ties were soon broken. We know not exactly how or when they were destroyed. We will now renew them in so strong a manner that they will last forever, and bury in oblivion all past misfortunes. Be strong in this good work, and it will never fail. This belt was presented to us from brothers, and our king now shows it to you, that you may recognise it.

Oki, a Pattawatamy chief, arose and spoke as follows:

FATHER: I come from the river Huron, near Detroit. My fathers have long possessed that country. The other Pattawatamies present live on the St. Joseph's, and in that direction. All my old chiefs are dead; you therefore see young chiefs only from my towns, who are unaccustomed to speak in council. You told us you would deliver the presents in bulk to the Pattawatamy nation. In this case, I am afraid my people will not get a due proportion, and I am too proud to complain to you, should they be unfairly distributed; therefore, as I live detached from the others, and intend to return home with the Chippewas, by the way of fort Defiance, I beg my father would let me have my proportion separately, for we have many young women and children at home, to whom I shall be very happy to deliver the presents of their father. I wish much to carry with me a copy of the treaty, to show my people. Living so far from the rest of my name, I can derive no advantage from the one you have given to our nation generally, and I should be ashamed and mortified to return without one. I would request a trader for my village, and would wish for Mr. La Chambre, with whom we are long acquainted. [A belt.]

Te-ta-boksh-ke, King of the Delawares, spoke as follows:

FATHER: You have in your prison a man (Newman) who came in to us about a year ago, and proved the preservation of many of our women and children, by the information he gave us: for this we cannot help feeling grateful. Now, your children, the Delawares, all beg of you to spare the life of this man, as he has been instrumental in saving many of us from destruction. We hope, father, you will grant this first request of your children, the Delawares. [A string.]

The General arose, and spoke as follows:

MY CHILDREN, THE PATTAWATAMIES: I wish you to endeavor to make among yourselves an amicable and fair division of the goods intended for you. It would be a very difficult task for me to perform with justice. You are acquainted with your own people and numbers. I am not well enough informed on this head, to make a true appointment. I wish all the other nations to act in a similar manner, and make a distribution to the satisfaction of their respective people. I wish each nation to appoint two confidential people from among themselves, to receive the goods, and to give receipts to the storekeeper, who will thereby convince me of his having justly delivered them. Council adjourned.

8th August, afternoon.—The medals and silver ornaments, &c. were delivered. No material, or other than complimentary conversation took place.

August 10th. In Council: Present as before.

The Red Pole, a Shawanese chief, spoke as follows:

You, my uncles, the Wyandots, my grandfathers, the Delawares, and all you nations present, you see we are now here from all parts of this great island, and you happily accomplished the good work before we, the Shawanese, arrived. I thank you all for it. I now present to your view, the wampum given to me by our elder brother, now become our father. He gave it to us from his heart; and I hope you will, for the future, view him as our true father. We must, for the future, live in harmony with him, and one another. The Great Spirit gave us this land in common. He has not given the right to any one nation, to say to another, this land is not yours, it belongs to me.

FATHER: I have heard every thing which has been here transacted. Peace is firmly established. It affords me satisfaction and happiness the hatchet is cast away for ever. I have reason to believe that the mischief which has been lately done, has been committed by a small party of Shawanese, who have been in the woods a long time hunting. It grieves us much, that, while we are here accomplishing the good work of peace, some of our own people are yet deaf to our advice. And, to convince you that we will never permit such practices, I now offer to leave with you my aged father, as a hostage, and proceed immediately, myself, to call home those people, and take measures to prevent their future misconduct. I have just returned from an absence of two years to the Southward; and in that period, my young men, uncontrolled by their other chiefs, have fallen into bad practices; but they shall have an immediate end.

All my brothers present, as the peace is now entirely completed, and as our Father of the Fifteen Fires has adopted us as his children, and called us by that name, I now tell him, in presence of you all, that we, the Shawanese, do acknowledge the Fifteen Fires as our father, and that, henceforth, we will always regard him as such.—[A white string.]

You, my uncles and grandfather, have settled with our father the boundary line, in a manner which meets my entire approbation. I am perfectly satisfied with it, and it appears you had our common interest in view.

FATHER: As all the nations are now present, they can never hereafter deny their own work, nor say that other people acted for them, without authority. I, therefore, recommend to them, to fulfil strictly their agreements, and adhere religiously to their engagements.—[A belt.]

The General arose and spoke as follows:

CHILDREN:

All you nations listen. By the seventh article of this treaty, all the lands now ceded to the United States, are free for all the tribes now present to hunt upon, so long as they continue to be peaceable, and do no injury to the people thereof. It is, therefore, the common interest of you all, to prevent any mischief being done upon those hunting grounds. Those people who have committed the late outrage on our peaceable inhabitants, had been hunting on those grounds, and after finishing their hunt, proceeded to the commission of the bad actions of which I have complained. These practices, for the reasons I have already given you, must have an immediate end.

The Red Pole has behaved like a candid, honest man, in acknowledging the errors of his people, and in promising to restrain them immediately. He has done more; he has offered to leave his own father as a hostage, until he can inform me of his having called them home; but, I will not separate him from his old father; I will depend upon his honor for the performance of his promise.—[A white string to the Red Pole.]

All you, my children, listen to me. The great business of peace, so long and ardently wished for, by your great and good father, General Washington, and the Fifteen Fires, and, I am sure, by every good man among you, being now accomplished, nothing remains but to give you a few words of advice from a father, anxious for the peace and happiness of his children. Let me earnestly exhort you to restrain your young people from injuring, in any degree, the people of the United States. Impress upon their minds the spirit and meaning of the treaty now before us. Convince them how much their future welfare will depend upon their faithful and strict observance of it. Restore to me, as soon as possible, all my flesh and blood which may be among you, without distinction or exception, and receive now from my hands the ten hostages stipulated by the second article, to be left with me as a security for their delivery. This unequivocal proof of the confidence that I place in your honor, and in the solemn promises you have made me, must satisfy you of my full persuasion of your sincerity. Send those ten young men to collect your prisoners; let them bring them to me, and they shall be well rewarded for their trouble. I have here a particular account of the number remaining among you, and shall know when they are all restored.

I now fervently pray to the Great Spirit, that the peace now established may be permanent, and that it may hold us together in the bonds of friendship, until time shall be no more. I also pray that the Great Spirit above may enlighten your minds, and open your eyes to your true happiness, that your children may learn to cultivate the earth, and enjoy the fruits of peace and industry.—[A white string.]

As it is probable, my children, that we shall not soon meet again in public council, I take this opportunity of bidding you all an affectionate farewell, and of wishing you a safe and happy return to your respective homes and families.—[A string.]

Bu-kon-ge-he-las, a Delaware Chief, spoke as follows:

FATHER:

Your children all well understand the sense of the treaty which is now concluded. We experience daily proofs of your increasing kindness. I hope we may all have sense enough to enjoy our dawning happiness. Many of your people are yet among us. I trust they will be immediately restored. Last winter, our king came forward to you with two, and when he returned with your speech to us, we immediately prepared to come forward with the remainder, which we delivered at fort Defiance. All who know me, know me to be a man and a warrior, and I now declare, that I will, for the future, be as true and steady a friend to the United States as I have heretofore been an active enemy. We have one bad young man among us; who, a few days ago, stole three of your horses: two of them shall this day be returned to you, and I hope I shall be able to prevent that young man from doing any more mischief to our Father the Fifteen Fires.

Mash-i-pi-nash-i-wish, chief of the Chippewas, spoke as follows:

FATHER:

I have heard, and understand, all that you have said. I am perfectly satisfied with every part of it; my heart will never change. No prisoners remain in our hands in the neighborhood of Michilimackinac. Those two Frenchmen present (Messieurs Sans Crainte and Pepin) can witness to the truth of this assertion.

Masass, a Chippewa chief, arose and spoke as follows:

I have heard all the proceedings relating to this treaty. I express my perfect satisfaction at its happy conclusion. When I relate at home the important event, my people will stretch out their arms towards you; and when I have informed them that you have promised to cherish them as your children, they will rejoice in having acquired a new, and so good, a father.

Council adjourned.

I certify the foregoing to be a true register of the minutes and proceedings of the treaty of Greenville.

SUPPLEMENT.

To the Cherokees, now settled on the head waters of Scioto.

Whereas, I, Anthony Wayne, Major General, commanding the army of the United States, and sole commissioner for settling a permanent peace with all the Indian tribes northwest of the river Ohio, having accomplished that great and good work, and having this day signed and exchanged articles of a permanent peace with the Chippewas, Ottawas, Pattawatamies, Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Miamies, Eel river, Weas, and Kickapoos, nations of Indians:

Do, hereby, once more invite you, the said Cherokees, residing on the waters of the Scioto, to come forward immediately to this place, and enter into similar articles of peace: for which purpose, I now send Captain Longhair, a principal Cherokee chief, to conduct you to head quarters, where you shall be received in friendship, and treated with kindness and hospitality. Captain Longhair will give you the particulars respecting this treaty; as also those of a treaty of peace lately made between the United States and the Cherokee nation; so that you now stand alone and unprotected, unless you comply with this last invitation.

Given at Head quarters, Greenville, 3d August, 1795.

ANTHONY WAYNE.

In consequence of the above message, some of this party of Cherokees returned to Greenville with Captain Longhair, and have since accompanied him home to their nation; the remainder promised to hunt peaceably on Scioto, until their corn was fit to gather; when they would quit this side of the Ohio forever, and return to their own country.

At a private conference, on the 12th August, with the Miamies, Eel river, and Kickapoo Indians:

The Little Turtle, in the name of the others, observed, that, as they intended soon to depart, and return to their respective homes, he took this opportunity of repeating to the General, that he, himself, and the Indians with him, were perfectly acquainted with every article of the treaty; that no part of it had escaped their serious and anxious deliberation; that, in the early stage of the negotiation, he had not comprehended the moderation and liberality with which he is now convinced it is dictated; that, to this cause, and to a duty which he conceives he owes his country, must be attributed the opposition he exhibited on sundry occasions; that he was persuaded, his Father would not think unkindly of him for it; for he had heard him, with much pleasure, approve of the freedom with which he delivered his sentiments; that he was a man who spokè as he thought, and a man of sincerity; and that he embraced this last occasion to declare, that, as he was fully convinced that the treaty was wisely and benevolently calculated to promote the mutual interest, and insure the permanent happiness of the Indians, and their Father, the Americans; so it was his determined resolution to adhere religiously to its stipulations. He asked for traders to reside at their different villages, and mentioned the names of some, who, for the confidence they had in their integrity, they wished might be licensed, and continued by the United States, as traders among them; he hoped (the Weas particularly) that a fort would be immediately established at Ouiatanon; and promised every assistance which they could afford to the establishment; that he, himself, would reside near fort Wayne, where daily experience should convince his Father of his sincere friendship; and that, as he intended to rekindle the grand council fire at that place, by means of which the different nations might communicate with each other as usual, he requested his Father to give orders to the commandant of fort Wayne, to inform him, from time to time, of any measures which the great council of the Fifteen Fires might adopt, in which the interest of their children should be concerned; and that Mr. Wells might be placed there as a resident interpreter, as he possessed their confidence as fully as he did that of their Father.

On the 9th September, a party of Shawanese, consisting of between sixty and seventy warriors, who had hitherto proved refractory and hostile, arrived at Greenville, with four prisoners, three of whom they captured on the 13th of last July, in Randolph county, Virginia.

On the 11th, the General gave them audience, when Puck-se-kaw, (or Jumper) one of their chiefs, spoke as follows:

MY FATHER: I have been in the woods a long time: I was not acquainted with the good works which were transacting at this place, by you, and all our great chiefs.

Last spring, when we were hunting peaceably, our camp on Scioto was robbed: we are very poor, and the mischief that has since been done, was in retaliation for the injuries we then sustained.

As soon as I received this belt, which you sent me by Blue Jacket, one of our great chiefs, and as soon as I was informed by him, that the good work of peace was finished, I rose to come and see you, and brought with me these four prisoners. I now surrender them up to you, my father, and promise sincerely that we will do no more mischief.

I hope that, for the future, we shall be permitted to live and hunt in peace and quietness. We were poor, ignorant children, astray in the woods, who knew not that our nation, and all the other tribes of Indians, had come in, and made peace with you. I thank the Great Spirit for at length opening our eyes.

FATHER: We beg you will forgive, and receive your repentant children: these people whom I now deliver to you, must plead our forgiveness, and vouch our sincere intention to alter our conduct for the future.—[A white string.]

The foregoing is the supplement to the treaty of Greenville.

INDIAN TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 15, 1795.

WAR OFFICE, December 12, 1795.

SIR:

By direction of the President of the United States, I have the honor to present herewith, "a report of the measures taken for opening trade with the Indians;"

And am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Report of the Secretary of War of the measures taken for opening a trade with the Indians.

The situation of the Six Nations, surrounded either wholly by the settlements of citizens of the United States; or, on one side by them, and on the other, by the British of Upper Canada; and by both in near neighborhoods; seemed to exclude them from the experiment proposed to be made, of commencing a trade on the principle of furnishing cheap supplies to the Indians: for the familiar intercourse between them and the whites, would have subjected the public to continual impositions, against which no checks were provided.

Peace with the tribes northwest of the river Ohio, was only in a train of negotiation; these, of course, were not in a condition to participate in the projected trade.

It remained then to make the experiment with the Southern tribes. And because the small appropriation for this object seemed intended merely as an experiment, it was desirable to make it with as little expense as possible. For this, among other reasons, the sum appropriated was divided unequally, and more than two-thirds destined for opening a trade with the Creeks, to whom the goods could be conveyed by sea. The remainder was designed for the trade with the Cherokees and Chickasaws. The remote situation of the Choctaws could render either of the two trading posts but of small and only contingent use to them.

To accommodate the Creeks, Colerain, on the river St. Mary's, was chosen, on the best information to be obtained, as the most eligible situation for a trading post; because it was easy of access to us, there being depth of water for sea vessels to go to the spot, and sufficiently so to the Creeks, especially of the Lower towns.

For the purpose of supplying the Cherokees and Chickasaws, it was supposed that Tellico Block-house, within the country of the Cherokees, would be a convenient station. It is already a military post; with a small garrison of regular troops, as such it will be secure; as advanced of the settlements of the white people, it will be convenient; and the Indians are already accustomed to resort thither for friendly conferences and negotiations. Notwithstanding, lest there should be any solid objection to that station, the final choice of the trading post in that quarter is referred to Governor Blount, with a reliance on his knowledge and judgment, to fix it in the place most suitable for effecting the true objects of the establishment.

It is obvious that neither the Chickasaws nor Choctaws, especially the latter, can be much benefitted by these arrangements: nor can they be well accommodated, until at least one trading post for each be established on the Mississippi. But, besides that, circumstances did not admit of taking such posts; the whole quantity of goods appropriated to this trade, would not allow of any farther division than that above mentioned.

It has been unfortunate that this trade could not have been earlier commenced: but, after procuring the goods necessary for General Wayne's treaty, and the annuity due to the Chickasaws, with some supplies accidentally demanded for the Choctaws and Chickasaws, by deputations from those tribes, the merchant stores were so drained, that the requisite assortments, especially of the articles most important for the Indian trade, could not be obtained, either at Philadelphia, New York, or Baltimore; and the purveyor was obliged to wait the arrival of the fall ships. Then, as soon as the purchases could be made, and the very trusty persons, necessary as factors, could be procured, the goods were sent off, under their care, to their respective destinations: they are now on their way.

The Secretary of War begs leave to remark, that the annuities stipulated to be paid to the several tribes of Indians, on the borders of the United States, are the following:

To the Six Nations, and associates, to the value of	-	-	-	$ 4,500 00
To the Chickasaws,	-	-	-	3,000 00
To the Cherokees,	-	-	-	5,000 00
To the Creeks,	-	-	-	1,500 00
To the Wyandots, Delawares, and several other tribes, northwest of } the Ohio, agreeably to General Wayne's late treaty, -	-	-	-	9,500 00
Whole amount,	-	-	-	$ 23,500 00
To which may be added, for contingent demands,	-	-	-	6,500 00
				$ 30,000 00

Making a total of thirty thousand dollars.

Goods to this amount, to be regularly supplied, should be imported by the Government: they will cost less; they will be of the precise kind and proportions demanded; and always in season. If the wisdom of Congress should decide on a continuance and extension of the Indian trade, on the principle heretofore contemplated, and of which the experiment is now in train, the importance of importing on public account, will be vastly increased.

All which is respectfully submitted to the Senate of the United States.

CHEROKEE LANDS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 2, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate

and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit, herewith, the copy of a letter, dated the 19th of December last, from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, stating the avowed and daring designs of certain persons, to take possession of lands belonging to the Cherokees, and which the United States have, by treaty, solemnly guaranteed to that nation. The injustice of such intrusions, and the mischievous consequences which must necessarily result therefrom, demand that effectual provision be made to prevent them.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 2, 1796.

Copy of a letter from Governor William Blount to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, December 19, 1795.

SIR:

Believing it not only my duty to prevent infractions of treaties, if in my power, and to report such as have happened, but to give you information of such sources, as from which, infractions may probably flow, I shall now state to you one that will give Government much trouble. Recourse being had to the following acts of the Legislature of North Carolina, namely, "An act for opening the Land Office for the redemption of the specie and other certificates, and discharging the arrears due the army;" (page 446, Iredell's revision) to "An act for the relief of the officers and soldiers in the continental line, and for other purposes therein mentioned;" (page 421, Iredell's revision) and to "An act to amend an act, entitled An act for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the continental line, and for other purposes;" (page 449, Iredell's revision) it will appear, that North Carolina opened offices for disposing of all her unappropriated lands, except a part, which is, by the fifth section of the first recited act, reserved for the Cherokees. The grantees under these acts contend, that they have a legal right to the lands granted, and that to that right is attached the right immediately to possess them, notwithstanding the lands granted may be guaranteed to Indians by treaty; and many of them declare, they will take the possession, be the consequences what they may, unless prevented by superior force.

People, in general, are ever partial to their own claims, and some of these grantees, who have taken the counsel of persons reputed learned in the law, are the more confirmed as to their right immediately to possess the lands granted, any treaty to the contrary notwithstanding. Government appears to have the alternative, either to extinguish the claims of the grantees, or Indians, to the lands in question, or to take effectual measures to prevent the grantees from taking possession, or again be involved in an Indian war by their so doing. Few of these grantees originally resided in this territory, but many of them have arrived in the course of the last fall, and others are daily arriving.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. BLOUNT.

THE SEVEN NATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 3, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Sometime last year, Jeremiah Wadsworth was authorized to hold a treaty with the Cohnawaga Indians, styling themselves the Seven Nations of Canada, to enable the State of New York to extinguish, by purchase, a claim which the said Indians had set up to a parcel of land lying within that State. This negotiation having issued without effecting its object, and the State of New York having requested a renewal of the negotiation, and the Indians having come forward with an application on the same subject, I now nominate Jeremiah Wadsworth, to be a commissioner to hold a treaty with the Cohnawaga Indians, styling themselves the Seven Nations of Canada, for the purpose of enabling the State of New York to extinguish the aforesaid claim.

THE CHEROKEES AND CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 26, 1796.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred a petition of Hugh Lawson White, respectfully reports:

That the claim set forth in the said petition is intended to establish a principle, that will apply to the whole of the militia which were called out under Brigadier General Sevier, in 1793, to act offensively against certain Indians southwest of the Ohio.

That the expedition against these Indians, as appears from the muster rolls, comprehended a period of above five months, or from the 22d July to the 31st of December, 1793.

That it was undertaken without authority derived from the President, under the laws of the United States, and for the avowed purpose of carrying the war into the Cherokee country.

That the tenor of the instructions from the Department of War, to the Governor of the Southwestern territory, particularly the annexed letter, dated the 14th day of May, 1793, forbade offensive operations.

That these considerations have heretofore opposed the settlement of the claim, and occasioned the reference for legislative interference.

Having given these facts, it may be proper to add, that it appears, by a recurrence to official papers, that the Indians had greatly perplexed and harassed, by thefts and murders, the frontier inhabitants of Tennessee; and previous to the service for which compensation is demanded, had shown themselves in considerable force, and killed at two stations (one of them within seven miles of Knoxville) fifteen persons, including women and children, as stated in the annexed letter; that it must rest with Congress to judge how far these aggressions of Indians, and such other circumstances as can be adduced by the parties, constituted a case of imminent danger, or the expedition a just and necessary measure.

All which is respectfully submitted to the House of Representatives.

JAMES M'HENRY.

WAR OFFICE, December 24, 1796.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to William Blount, Esq. Governor of the territory of the United States Southwest of the river Ohio, dated .

WAR DEPARTMENT, 14th May, 1793.

You have been fully informed of the difficulties which have existed to prevent the President of the United States from giving orders, in consequence of your representations for the most vigorous offensive operations against the hostile Indians.

If those difficulties existed while the Congress were in session, and which it was conceived they alone were competent to remove, they recur in the present case with still greater force: for all the information received at the time Congress were in session, was laid before both Houses, but no order was taken thereon, nor any authority given to the President of the United States; of consequence, his authority remains in the same situation it did on the commencement of the last session.

It is, indeed, a serious question to plunge the nation into a war with the Southern tribes of Indians, supported as it is said they would be.

But if that war actually exists, if depredations are repeated and continued upon the frontier inhabitants, the measure of protection is indispensable; but that protection can only be of the defensive sort. If other or more extensive measures shall be necessary, they must probably result from the authority expressly given for that purpose by Congress.

Hence, if it shall be your judgment, that the Cumberland settlements require the assistance of the militia of the other parts of your Government, you will impart it to them for such time, and in such a degree, as shall be commensurate with the occasion, always taking care to report the number actually called into service, and the time for which they shall be engaged, and that they be dismissed as soon as the danger shall cease.

Copy of a letter from Daniel Smith to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, 1st October, 1795.

SIR:

By advertising to the correspondence of Governor Blount, in the year 1793, (previous to his going to Philadelphia) with Mr. Secretary Knox, it will appear that very frequent acts of hostility were perpetrated on the citizens of this territory, by the Cherokee and Creek Indians. Their repeated murders, which his vigilance could not prevent, I cannot say were, in all cases, borne with as much patience as they ought to have been, considering the hopes that were held out to them, that the General Government would, in due time, interpose with efficacy.

Shortly after the Governor's departure for Philadelphia, the enormities committed by these Indians, far from abating, grew more flagrant. A Captain John Beard (availing himself of the general temper of the frontier citizens, heated by repeated murders being committed on them) being ordered on duty by Governor Blount, about two days before his departure, to pursue and punish the murderers of one Gilham and son, but restricted in his order from crossing the Tennessee, violated these orders, crossed the Tennessee, and killed several Indians at the Hanging Maw's. Beard said, on his return, he had pursued the trace of the murderers. I own I did not believe him. But the fact now stands so well attested by the testimony of several men of credibility, even of some connected with Indians, who, if they had any bias, it might be presumed would lean in favor of Indians, that I cannot refrain from believing he did follow the trace of the murderers across the Tennessee.

A while after this, a party of about two hundred Indians made an attack on Henry's station. They killed Lieutenant Tedford and a private, but failed of taking the garrison. On that quarter being so vigorously invaded, I ordered General Sevier to march to the defence of the frontiers, with one-third of the militia who had been ordered, previous to the Governor's departure, to hold themselves in readiness for such a service. But the General, under this order, had not collected more than about three hundred infantry, and two troops of horse, when a large body of Creeks and Cherokees attacked and carried Cavet's station, seven miles below this place, and killed every man, woman, and child, belonging to it, being thirteen in number.

From the information I then received, I was convinced there could not be less than twelve hundred Indians in arms against us, and later information proves that number stated too low.

My situation was distressing. I could look on this act of the Creeks and Cherokees in no other light than as positive a declaration of war as ever was or can be denounced by one nation against another, because it was the act of so great a proportion of these tribes, not the act of what the chiefs are apt to call a few bad young men, but headed also by the most distinguished of their warriors. Should I forbear to yield protection to the inhabitants, such conduct would be charged both with want of duty and humanity, and criminal in a great degree. Notwithstanding Beard's act cannot be justified, it may be palliated in a great degree, from his having actually followed the trace of Gilham's murderers, as now appears; and had it not this palliation, could I look on and see the whole of the inhabitants sacrificed! innocent men, women, and children? Ought I not to have made use of the power understood to be lodged with me by the constitution, in the latter part of 10th section, 1st article, where each individual State is restricted from engaging in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay?

I hesitated not, but ordered General Sevier, with what troops could be hastily assembled, to repel and pursue these invaders; and in so doing, I then believed I consulted the true interest of the United States. The consequences have confirmed the fact that my opinion was well founded.

The service which those troops performed was of that importance that it laid the ground work of our present tranquillity, which otherwise could not have been effected.

Yet, I learn the General and his men have not been paid. This, to my mind, carries a tacit censure of my conduct.

If no act of Congress exists, embracing the case, permit me to suggest the propriety of laying the matter before that body, to obtain their sense thereof.

I am, Sir, &c.

THE CREEKS AND SEVEN NATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 4, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you, for your consideration, a treaty which has been negotiated and concluded on, the twenty-ninth day of June last, by Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, and George Clymer, commissioners on behalf of the United States, with the Creek Indians, together with the instructions* which were given to the said commissioners, and the proceedings at the place of treaty.

I submit, also, the proceedings and result of the treaty held at the city of New York, on behalf of the State of New York, with certain nations or tribes of Indians, denominating themselves the Seven Nations of Canada.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 4th, 1797.

A treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded between the President of the United States of America, on the one part, and behalf of the said States, and the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, of the Creek nation of Indians, on the part of the said nation.

The parties being desirous of establishing permanent peace and friendship between the United States and the said Creek nation, and the citizens and members thereof, and to remove the causes of war, by ascertaining their limits, and making other necessary, just, and friendly arrangements, the President of the United States, by Benjamin Hawkins, George Clymer, and Andrew Pickens, commissioners, whom he hath constituted with powers for these purposes, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the Creek nation of Indians, by the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, representing the whole Creek nation, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The treaty entered into at New York, between the parties, on the 7th day of August, 1790, is, and shall remain, obligatory on the contracting parties, according to the terms of it, except as herein provided for.

ARTICLE 2. The boundary line from the Currahee mountain to the head or source of the main south branch of the Oconee river, called by the white people Apalachy, and by the Indians, Tulapocka, and down the middle of the same, shall be clearly ascertained and marked, at such time, and in such manner, as the President shall direct. And the Indians will, on being informed of the determination of the President, send as many of their old chiefs as he may require, to see the line ascertained and marked.

ARTICLE 3. The President of the United States of America shall have full powers, whenever he may deem it advisable, to establish a trading or military post on the south side of the Altamaha, on the bluff about one mile above Beard's bluff, or any where from thence, down the said river, on the lands of the Indians, to garrison the same with any part of the military force of the United States, to protect the post, and to prevent the violation of any of the provisions or regulations subsisting between the parties. And the Indians do hereby annex to the post aforesaid, a tract of land of five miles square, bordering, one side on the river, which post, and the lands annexed thereto, are hereby ceded to, and shall be to the use, and under the government of, the United States of America.

ARTICLE 4. As soon as the President of the United States has determined on the time and manner of running the line from the Currahee mountain to the head or source of the main south branch of the Oconee, and notified the chiefs of the Creek land of the same, a suitable number of persons, on their part, shall attend to see the same completed. And if the President should deem it proper, then to fix on any place or places adjoining the river, and on the Indian lands, for military or trading posts, the Creeks who attend there will concur in fixing the same, according to the wishes of the President. And to each post, the Indians shall annex a tract of land, of five miles square, bordering, one side on the river. And the said lands shall be to the use, and under the government, of the United States of America. Provided, always, That, whenever any of the trading or military posts mentioned in this treaty, shall, in the opinion of the President of the United States of America, be no longer necessary, for the purposes intended by this cession, the same shall revert to, and become a part of, the Indian lands.

ARTICLE 5. Whenever the President of the United States of America and the King of Spain may deem it advisable to mark the boundaries which separate their territories, the President shall give notice thereof to the Creek chiefs, who will furnish two principal chiefs and twenty hunters, to accompany the persons employed in this business, as hunters and guides, from the Choctaw country to the head of St. Mary's. The chiefs shall receive, each, half a dollar per day, and the hunters one quarter of a dollar each, per day, and ammunition, and a reasonable value for the meat delivered by them for the use of the persons on this service.

ARTICLE 6. The treaties of Hopewell, between the United States and the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and at Holston, between the Cherokees and the United States, mark the boundaries of those tribes of Indians. And the Creek nation do hereby relinquish all claims to any part of the territory inhabited or claimed by the citizens of the United States, in conformity with the said treaties.

ARTICLE 7. The Creek nation shall deliver, as soon as practicable, to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, at such place as he may direct, all citizens of the United States, white inhabitants and negroes, who are now prisoners in any part of the said nation, agreeable to the treaty at New York; and also, all citizens, white inhabitants, negroes, and property, taken since the signing of that treaty. And if any such prisoners, negroes, or property, should not be delivered on or before the first day of January next, the Governor of Georgia may empower three persons to repair to the said nation, in order to claim and receive such prisoners, negroes, and property, under the direction of the President of the United States.

ARTICLE 8. In consideration of the friendly disposition of the Creek nation towards the Government of the United States, evidenced in the stipulations in the present treaty, and particularly the leaving it in the discretion of the President to establish trading or military posts on their lands: the commissioners of the United States, on behalf of the said States, give to the said nation, goods, to the value of six thousand dollars, and stipulate to send to the Indian nation, two blacksmiths, with strikers, to be employed for the Upper and Lower Creeks, with the necessary tools.

ARTICLE 9. All animosities, for past grievances, shall henceforth cease, and the contracting parties will carry the foregoing treaty into full execution, with all good faith and sincerity: Provided, nevertheless, That persons now under arrest in the State of Georgia, for a violation of the treaty at New York, are not to be included in this amnesty, but are to abide the decision of law.

ARTICLE 10. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Done at Coleraine, the twenty-ninth of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six.

GEORGE CLYMER,
ANDREW PICKENS.
TUSTINCKE HAJO,
And by a number of others.

Witness,

J. SEAGROVE, Superintendent Indian Affairs, C. N. et al.

COLERAINE, 12th May, 1776.

Benjamin Hawkins, one of the commissioners for holding a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, arrived; he came by land from Savannah.

13th. Captain Eaton, the Captain commanding, being unable to give the requisite information relative to the supplies and preparations for the intended treaty; the assistants to the contractor, and the superintendent, being equally misinformed, a letter was written and sent to Mr. Seagrove, at the town of St. Mary's, to inform him of the arrival of one of the commissioners.

COLERAINE, 13th May, 1796.

SIR:

I arrived here last evening from Savannah. I left that place on Monday. I had heard of the arrival of Mr. Clymer, at Charleston, but had not heard any thing of General Pickens. The commissioners of Georgia expected to set out from Savannah to-morrow, and to be here by the 20th. They will come by water. I wish you would furnish me with a copy of the law for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, the treaty of New York with the Creeks, and your subsequent agreement with them. I hope for the pleasure of seeing you shortly.

B. HAWKINS.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

Mr. Price, the factor, informed the commissioners, that the sloop William, Captain Simkins, had arrived at St. Mary's, from Philadelphia, with stores for the commissioners of the United States; that Mr. Clymer had sailed in the vessel, and put into Charleston; that he had determined to come from thence by land; that the vessel or stores was addressed to the commissioners; in their absence, to him; and that she might be expected to arrive at this port in a day or two. Mr. Price was requested to take charge of the stores, to receipt for them, and to hold them till the further order of the commissioners.

14th. Received information, the first since the departure of the superintendent's messenger, that some Indians were on the way from the nation, and may be expected to arrive in a day or two. I accompanied the officers to view the state of the garrison; every one industriously employed. Finding that the accommodations for the commissioners were not in train of execution, owing to the want of some person whose immediate duty it was to superintend them, I requested Captain Eaton to use his endeavors to aid in the preparations, which he obligingly promised to do. The officers of the garrison all immediately offered their aid, also, and very politely made a tender of their furniture, apartments, &c.

15th. Mr. Seagrove and Colonel Gaither arrived from St. Mary's. The Colonel visited me, gave assurances of his disposition to do every thing in his power to have the necessary accommodations prepared for the commissioners and Indians, and his readiness to execute any regulations that might be deemed advisable on the occasion. Mr. Seagrove informed me, that his messenger had not returned from the nation, but that he momentarily expected him. That he received the letters from the War Office, to invite the Indians, only on the 6th of April; and that it was probable the Indians, if they came at all, would not be here till the 1st or 10th of June. Upon inquiry he further informed, that he had despatched a single messenger, only, to the nation, and that he had not, as yet, any accounts of his arrival. That, on the 9th of April, he sent the letters he received from the War Office, to the Governor of the State, to notify him of the intended treaty.

16th. The Indians which I had heard of being on their way, arrived, and informed us, that the messenger had arrived in their nation, with the invitation from the War Office, to attend the proposed treaty, and that it was probable the Indians would be down by the 1st of June. There were about twenty, mostly connected with traders, and they brought with them seventy or eighty cattle, for sale. I inquired, particularly, of them, how their nation received the invitation, and what, for a representation, we might expect would attend; they gave but an imperfect account; they said there were bad talks in the nation circulated, mostly by agents of Spain, sent from Panton. The purport of them were, that they would meet the Georgians here, in arms, who wanted their lands, and would find means to get them by fair or foul means.

They appear, upon the whole, to be much in want of information. I recommended to Mr. Seagrove to send another messenger, to meet those who might be on the path, to inform them of my being here; and also, to direct that people might be sent back to the nation, with the requisite information.

There being no prospect of seeing any Indians in the course of five or six days, and having paid all the attention I could, to the several objects that required it of me here, I determined to go down the river to St. Mary's, with Mr. Seagrove. I leave this at five o'clock in the afternoon, with Mr. Seagrove and Captain Atkinson, a gentleman in the service of Spain, and now a resident near Amelia Island; he came to St. Mary's, and being informed of my being here, an old acquaintance of his, he came to visit me. He informed me that the Governor of East Florida, Colonel White, was daily expected to arrive; that they had not as yet received any information from their court, relative to the treaty with the United States; that the copy sent to them by Mr. Seagrove, had been forwarded to the Havana; that the merchants there were much dissatisfied with the privileges allowed, in the navigation of the Mississippi, to the citizens of the United States; that the establishment at New Orleans, or even the equivalent, would deprive them of an enormously valuable trade, which they had calculated upon engrossing.

TOWN OF ST. MARY'S, 17th.

Arrived this morning, at ten o'clock, at the town of St. Mary's, being sixty miles by water, and only thirty by land. The river St. Mary's is narrow, rarely more than eighty yards wide, very crooked, but deep, generally twenty-five feet water the whole course from Coleraine; the bottom a limestone rock, the sides perpendicular, to which vessels can any where lie close to the banks; the flat swamp has every where a natural or artificial mound or dyke, to hinder the tide from inundating it; the river is very little increased by any rain, even in what is called the rainy season, and never so as to overflow its banks. The river being so crooked and narrow, vessels must tide it up and down, their sails being seldom of any use.

18th and 19th. Amused myself these days in visiting the garrison at this place, under the command of Lieutenant Cobb, and the fort at Point Peter. The post arriving with the northern mail, I availed myself of this conveyance to write to the Secretary of War.

TOWN OF ST. MARY'S, 19th May, 1796.

SIR:

I acknowledged the receipt of your favor of the 14th ultimo, from Savannah, on the 10th of this month. I would, by this conveyance, send a duplicate, but I left my servant there with my baggage, to be sent round by water, and he has not yet arrived. I left Savannah on the 10th, and travelled through the country to Coleraine, where I arrived on the 12th.

Mr. Seagrove, has not as yet had any return from the Creeks, in answer to the invitation sent to them. There arrived at Coleraine on the 16th, twenty or thirty Indians, with some cattle; they informed us of the arrival of his messenger in the nation, and that it was probable the Indians would be down by the first of June.

The officers have made great exertions to erect the necessary fortifications and houses for barracks, and the other accommodations, at Coleraine; a regular return of which, I presume, you will receive from Colonel Gaither.

I have not heard any thing from Mr. Clymer, General Pickens, or the Georgia commissioners. I came to this place on the 17th, and shall return to-morrow. Mr. Seagrove is here; and the contractor, Mr. Johnson, is at Savannah; he is daily expected. I shall, immediately on his return, make such arrangements as the existing state of things may require. If there should be a necessity for it, before the arrival of the other commissioners, I shall look for, and appoint, the most suitable person I can find, to receive the provisions from the contractor, and issue them to the Indians; and I shall furnish him with the forms you have enclosed, for his government, and enjoin a compliance therewith.

The vessel sent round with necessaries for the commissioners, is, by this, arrived at her destined port. The distance of this, by land, is estimated at thirty, and by water at sixty miles; the river narrow and crooked, very little wind, and that unfavorable, so that she has been only able to tide it up. Mr. Price had received his orders relative to her, before I left there.

I request the favor of you to assure the President of my sincere wishes for his happiness, and to believe me, with sincere regard.

Your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

The Honorable JAMES McHENRY, Secretary of War.

I was this day informed that Mr. Clymer was at Savannah lately, and might be daily expected to arrive here.

21st. Mr. Moore, the messenger, sent with the invitation to the Creeks to attend the proposed treaty at Coleraine, arrived. He speaks rather doubtfully of the coming of the Creeks; yet seems to insinuate only, in my estimation, that we shall have a full meeting by the 10th of June. I asked him several questions; he answered readily, the result of which was, that sufficient pains had not been taken to induce the Indians to attend the invitation from the War Office. A solitary messenger, sent with the invitation to the agents in the nation, not pressed to promulgate it, were the means used to ensure a full representation. I requested Mr. Seagrove to give the earliest notice to the Governor, of the determination of some, or all, of the chiefs, to attend the invitation. He immediately ordered the messenger to return to Coleraine, with a request to Colonel Gaither to despatch a messenger to the Governor, with the letter he wrote for the occasion.

22d. I had intended; this day, to return to Coleraine, but being informed, on the 20th, that Mr. Clymer might be momentarily expected, I determined to wait for him. He arrived last evening, and being much fatigued, I determined to wait for him a day or so, as the object of our mission could not receive any injury by the delay.

The mail from this to Savannah being carried but once a fortnight, I, for various considerations, yesterday determined, and so wrote, to the contractor, requesting him, if he could conveniently, and at a reasonable price, cause the mail to be carried from Coleraine to Savannah once a week, that I, though not expressly authorized, would give him a draught on the proper office. The mail coming from Savannah passes within three miles of Coleraine, and it would be quite as convenient to the rider to pass within one mile.

An opportunity offering, I wrote this day to the Secretary of War:

TOWN OF ST. MARY'S, 22d May, 1796.

SIR:

Being informed, on the 20th, that Mr. Clymer might be expected to arrive in a day or two, at furthest, from Savannah, I determined to wait for him, and the Georgia commissioners. He arrived late last evening. He saw two of the commissioners, but does not know when we may expect them to arrive at Coleraine. Mr. Seagrove has informed you of the return of his messenger from the Creeks: by him I find, that it is at least probable that we shall not have a full meeting of the Creeks till the tenth of June.

The mail being carried from this to Savannah once a fortnight, and as it may be important that you should be advised weekly of the transactions of the commissioners, during our negotiations with the Indians, and necessary that a correspondence should be kept up with the Governor of this State, as well as with some of the officers of Government at Savannah, I have taken upon myself to write to the contractor for carrying the mail, to cause it to be carried once a week, during the continuance of the negotiation only, if he could conveniently do it, and at a reasonable price. If he cannot, we shall avail ourselves of another resource, as often as a fit occasion shall offer. We shall set out for Coleraine to-morrow.

I am, with sincere regard and esteem, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

JAMES MCHENRY, Esq. Secretary of War.

Mr. Clymer being much fatigued with his inland passage, and there being no immediate call for us at Coleraine, we determined on going for that place on the 24th.

COLERAINE, 25th May.

We, yesterday, set out from the town of St. Mary's, and arrived here this morning. We, this day, informed Col. Gaither, that, being empowered to appoint a suitable person to receive from the contractor the provisions, and to issue them to the Indians, they would, in conformity with an intimation from the Secretary of War, give a preference to an officer under his command, recommended by him. The Colonel recommended Ensign Samuel Allinson, who was appointed accordingly. Mr. Allinson attended on the commissioners, and was informed, that a commission would be made out for him in a day or two; in the mean time he would examine the forms which were sent for his government.

26th. The commissioners, after mature consideration, deemed it advisable to make the following regulations:

COLERAINE, ON ST. MARY'S, 26th May, 1796.

The commissioners for holding a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, in order to prevent quarrels, improper behavior, or mal-practices, during the negotiation, have judged proper, in virtue of the powers and authorities vested in them, to make the following regulations:

1. The Indians are to encamp on the river bank, above the garrison, convenient to the spring and the river.
2. The superintendent is to fix his residence within the Indian encampment.
3. No citizen of the United States is to be permitted to encamp with, or near to, the Indians, except such as are under the direction of the superintendent.
4. No citizen is to be permitted to enter the Indian camp in arms.
5. No citizen is to visit the Indians, or hold conversation with them, except with a permit from the commissioners of the United States, or either of them.
6. No citizen is to be in arms in the garrison, or neighborhood of it; and, on the arrival of any visitors, who may travel with arms, they are to be informed of this order, and required to conform thereto.
7. No citizen is to be permitted to furnish, by sale or gift, any spirituous liquors to the Indians, or to have any commercial traffic with them.
8. These regulations are to be posted up at the two gates of the garrison, and at the residence of the superintendent.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
GEORGE CLYMER.

The foregoing regulations were sent to Colonel Gaither with this note:

COLERAINE, ST. MARY'S, 26th May, 1796.

SIR:

I enclose to you the regulations, which the commissioners for holding a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians have judged proper to make, in virtue of the powers and authorities vested in them, in order to prevent quarrels, improper behavior, or mal-practices, during the negotiation. The commissioners request that you will take the necessary measures to cause the same to be observed.

I am, with sincere regard, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

FORT PICKERING, 26th May, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

I have, with pleasure, received your regulations for my government, and that of the citizens who may think proper to attend the intended treaty at this place. Believe me, gentlemen, the line you have drawn, I will, as far as in my power, have strictly observed by all ranks of citizens, and the soldiers under my command; and shall be happy in receiving any other regulations that respect the business you have embarked in, should it be found necessary to offer them.

The Hon. Commissioners of the United States.

The commissioners finding that, from the manner of appointing a contractor for supplying the Indians, or some other cause, the superintendent of Indian affairs did not deem it his duty, expressly, to provide accommodations for them, and that it would be several days before those intended by the commandant, would be in readiness, they requested Colonel Gaither to have the tents, sent round from the War Office, pitched; and they requested the superintendent to give the necessary directions to an assistant of the contractor's, to furnish such articles and supplies, as were necessary for their use.

FRIDAY, 27th May.

A commission was made out, and delivered, with the papers referred to therein, to the agent for receiving and issuing the supplies, and it was directed that it should bear date with the appointment. It is as follows:

FORT PICKERING, 25th May, 1796.

SIR:

The Secretary of the Treasury having directed a contract to be made for supplying the Indians, at the intended treaty, with provisions, the undersigned commissioners for holding a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians do hereby, in virtue of the powers vested in them, for that purpose appoint you agent for receiving and issuing articles and supplies to Indians, under the direction of James Seagrove, superintendent. You are to give receipts to the contractor for all the articles you receive from him, to serve as vouchers in the settlement of his accounts, and you are enjoined to comply with the forms herewith delivered you, in order that your accounts may exhibit a perfect view of the supplies received and issued by you.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
GEORGE CLYMER.

Lieut. SAMUEL ALLINSON.

The agent informed the commissioners, that he had reflected on the appointment offered him; that he accepted the trust, expecting it to be difficult, and that it would afford him much employment and active exertions, which he did not dislike. But, as it was new to him, he should rely on them and the superintendent for their advice; and that, in case it should be found necessary to have one or more assistants, he expected the commissioners would permit him to appoint one or more, as they might judge proper. To this they assented, and directed that he should be supplied with stationary from their stores.

SATURDAY, 28th May.

The schooner William, which brought round the stores for the commissioners, &c., fell down with the tide this day, to sail for Philadelphia.

We received information that the Big Warrior and Mr. Cornell, with about two hundred Indians, would be within eight or ten miles of us this evening, there to remain for a day or two, to rest themselves. Provisions and necessaries were sent out for their support.

MONDAY, 30th May.

General Pickens and the commissioners of Georgia, arrived. We wrote to the Secretary of War, and sent our letter to the town of St. Mary's, to be delivered to Captain Simkins.

COLERAIN, the 30th of May, 1796.

SIR:

General Pickens and the commissioners of Georgia arrived here this morning, from Savannah, by water. The General did not receive the communications from the War Office till the 2d of May. We expect the arrival of a considerable number of the Indians in the course of this week. There are about two hundred in our neighborhood, who are now fed from the stores provided for the treaty at this place. We have appointed, under the recommendation of Colonel Gaither, Ensign Samuel Allinson, agent for receiving and issuing the supplies to the Indians. We have given him the forms sent on for his government, and enjoined his compliance therewith. We did, on the 26th, establish regulations for the preservation of order during the negotiation. There is not at present any thing to be apprehended, in this quarter, as likely to disturb the desired harmony at the treaty.

Some of the Spanish agents, as we are informed, have prevailed on some influential chiefs to go to Pensacola, and not to attend the invitation sent them to attend here. This, in the present state of things, was to be expected. We do not yet know how far this influence will extend, but we hope not so far as materially to affect the negotiation. We shall explain the treaty with Spain to the Indians, as soon as it shall have been ratified on their part, and the Governors enjoined to observe it. The like, in future, will be prevented.

We have the honor to be, with sincere regard, sir, your obedient servants,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
GEORGE CLYMER,
ANDREW PICKENS.

The Hon. JAMES McHENRY, Secretary of War.

The commissioners of Georgia visited us; we requested them to dine in our hut; informed them of the accommodations in our power to offer them; and requested that they would accept of one-half of the tents pitched for the commissioners. They made no reply, but asked for pen, ink, and paper, and at our table wrote this note, which they delivered themselves:

COLERAIN, May 30th, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

Being on the ground appointed for the expected treaty, we have to request that your opinion be given on the following points:

We have brought with us a guard for the articles thought necessary on the part of the State. We also expect several of our fellow-citizens, who have claims, from various parts of the State. Are we to be considered as having the power of drawing rations for them, daily, as well those now here, as those who may hereafter arrive, we ourselves signing the returns? Or, what mode will be necessary for their supply?

We are, gentlemen, your most obedient servants,

JAMES HENDRICKS,

Chairman of the Board of Commissioners on the part of the State of Georgia.

Honorable Commissioners of the United States.

The commissioners of the United States were surprised to have an application of this nature made to them, as the gentlemen from Georgia must have been informed of their regulations, as well as of the letters to their Governor from the War Office, of the last and present year. One of us had been informed, on the 4th of May, that an attempt would be made, under some pretext, to introduce some militia in arms. But it was not supposed, after their regulations were published, that any attempt would be made, or, if made, persisted in. They, after consultation, returned this answer:

COLERAIN, 30th May, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

We have to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of this day. The Secretary of War, in his letter of the — of February, informed the Governor of the State of Georgia, that the troops at this place are in sufficient number to protect and give respectability to the negotiation; and Colonel Gaither received orders to make, from time to time, such disposition of them as may tend to preserve order and tranquillity. We are in opinion with the war officer, as to the competency of the protection; and we doubt not, on viewing the state of things here, but that it will be yours, and that it will be a satisfaction to you to find that the gentlemen of the guard may be dismissed with safety to the object of their coming. In the meantime, Colonel Gaither will give directions for their accommodation. As to the other citizens of the description in your letter, it will be our care to provide for, without making any special arrangement for it. We have had sent round to us, from the War Office, some tents, for the accommodation of the commissioners. We requested Colonel Gaither to have them raised, and to set apart the half of them for you.

We are, with much esteem, &c.

B. HAWKINS,
G. CLYMER,
A. PICKENS.

The honorable Commissioners of Georgia.

Colonel Gaither, just after we had written this letter, delivered us one he had received from General Jackson. He requested our opinion on it. We referred him to the regulations of the 26th, as his guide. But, that he might be in possession of more light than he could, at first view, gather from the regulations, we shewed him the correspondence between the commissioners and us; and we assured him that the instructions to us were the result of much deliberation; that our regulations were strictly in conformity, and we could not consent to any deviation from them; that they were general, and intended to apply to every visiter, whatever his rank might be. We asked leave of the colonel to take a copy of the letter, which he granted, and it is as follows:

COLERAIN, May 30, 1796.

Sir:

In consequence of an order from the Governor of this State, I have furnished the State commissioners, appointed to attend the treaty, with a militia guard, barely sufficient to answer the purpose of protecting the articles belonging to the State from robbery. They are orderly men, and form a respectable corps. I have no wish to interfere, or to permit the men to interfere, with the discipline of your garrison. The commissioners, I am certain, are of my opinion.

We wish to learn where we shall least incommode you, so as to be near our vessel, which we are compelled to make a store house of.

I have taken the liberty to trouble you, because I have been informed that a disagreeable and untrue report has been spread, respecting the occasion of the guard's being brought here; and the few men we have are anxious, having been so long cooped up in a small vessel, to get on shore.

I am, sir, with respect, your obedient servant,

JAMES JACKSON.

Lieutenant Colonel GAITHER.

Mr. Seagrove was pointing out a small spot above your garrison. The State commissioners have seen this, and approve it. They request me to add, that, not thinking themselves authorized to call on you for a guard, and finding the goods at their risk, they were constrained to apply to the Governor for one.

31st May. This day, in the afternoon, we received the following letter from the commissioners of Georgia:

COLERAIN, May 31st, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

We have been favored with your letter of yesterday, respecting the guard we have for the protection of the articles thought necessary to be procured for the treaty, and respecting the citizens of the State who may have claims for property taken by the Indians, and attend here for the purpose of making them.

As to the former, we are highly obliged to Colonel Gaither, for his offered protection of the State goods, by the Federal troops, but having to wait the event of the treaty, for the disposal of them, and needing assistance on our return, should the desired object fail, we cannot dismiss them. Colonel Gaither, in case that should happen, would not feel himself warranted in furnishing us with a guard, to accompany us from this place; and we should not feel ourselves discharged from responsibility for the goods, until they were deposited in Savannah, under the order of the Executive of the State, by whose command the guard was furnished for their protection. The commissioners had not, nor had the State, a right, to call on Colonel Gaither for a guard; and, if so, the state of his garrison could not have been known; incidents might arise to prevent one from being furnished; sickness, for instance, as we are informed was lately the case. To give respectability to the negotiation, as you suppose, from the observation in your letter, was not the object our few men were brought for. If the State had ordered four or five hundred men to attend the treaty, jealousies might justly have arisen; but surely fifteen or twenty men ought not to create difficulty, either with respect to numbers, or supplies. In some cases, and on some occasions, however, militia corps have been called on, as this very company (part of which we have with us,) was called on last year, with the only volunteer Corps of Savannah, to attend the meeting of the superintendent and Indians, at Baird's bluff, and Savannah. We have every wish to accommodate and harmonize; but a discharge of the guard, under the circumstances we have pointed out, we cannot submit to. We do not wish them to interfere with Colonel Gaither's garrison, nor do we consider them within the purview of his command, or needing his supply; but under the rule of citizens, attending us, as commissioners, for the protection of public property, belonging to the State of Georgia, thought necessary to accomplish the wishes of the State, at the intended treaty. We do not know what private arrangements you may have made, or what private instructions you may have received, respecting the provisions for the treaty, and the accommodation of citizens attending it; but the President's message to the Senate of the United States, and his letter to the Governor of Georgia respecting it, both declare that one half the expense shall be borne by the State of Georgia. If this be the case, assuredly the commissioners of the State ought to have equal latitude, as to drawing for any citizens attending with their claims, and so we construe the President's letter of the 20th February, that the number of citizens attending shall be regulated by the commissioners. We are commissioners, and the commissioners to whom those claims ought to be rendered, and whose province it is, we conceive, to require a discharge of them. We cannot forbear adverting to the orders, signed by Messrs. Hawkins and Clymer, and stuck at the gates of the garrison yesterday, which we conceive exceptionable in many respects, and highly derogatory to the dignity of the State we represent. We, who came here to treat with the Creek nation of Indians, for a cession of land, are not to be permitted to speak with an Indian, without the ticket or permit of one of the commissioners of the United States, or to enter the Indian camp, although the ground they encamp on, and the ground the treaty is to be held on, is within the limits, and under the actual jurisdiction of the State of Georgia. Our fellow-citizens from the westward are not to come into the vicinity of the garrison with arms, although their arms are necessary to protect them hither, to lay in their claims; and how far this neighborhood extends, is undefined. We know of no power on earth, competent to hinder a citizen of Georgia, observing the laws of his country, from exercising the locomotive faculty, within the limits of the State, in the most liberal extent. By the same rule, our citizens can be deprived from using this most valuable privilege in the neighborhood of Coleraine; or from using or keeping arms, they may be debarred these privileges, acknowledged by the constitution, within the limits of a county, and how far it might be carried, we leave to yourselves to determine.

We even consider ourselves to have been in a degree insulted, and consequently the State which we belong to. A sentinel has been placed on the bank of the river, and his orders we are not unacquainted with; they are not to prevent armed men from any vessel, but armed men from our schooner, naming the Fair Play, from landing in the garrison; whilst we have observed persons, who we suppose not in the army, within the limits of the garrison, with fire arms in their hands. We learned at St. Mary's, that we were to meet this treatment, but we could not believe it. We again assure you that we wish to accommodate and harmonize, all that lays in our power, without committing the dignity of the State. The object we have in view, is a great one; but, great as it is, we conceive it to be as much the interest of the United States to accomplish it, as it is the interest of the people and State of Georgia.

We are, gentlemen, your most obedient servants,

JAMES HENDRICKS,

Chairman of the Board of Commissioners, appointed by the State of Georgia, for attending a treaty with the Creek Indians.

The honorable the commissioners of the United States, Coleraine.

Notwithstanding the extravagant and absurd contents of this letter, and the little regard paid therein to truth, we determined to give it a decent reply.

The sentinel, on the banks of the river, had been placed there as early as the establishing the post, and not as intimated in their letter; and no such orders as those mentioned, had been given him; the orders were general. The guard was really intended by one of the commissioners, at least, for show, and to put them, in some sort, as they have been known to express themselves, on a footing with the commissioners of the United States, to prop the vanity and consequence of self-created pride, at the expense of insulting the authority of the United States.

COLERAINE, 1st June, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

Your favor, of yesterday, was put into our hands in time to be answered on that day, but we have to regret that our constant interruptions have not permitted us to give it a due consideration until this morning; but we now hope to obviate the objections you have made to some of our proceedings, in the commission, since we came to this post.

They respect the regulations we have thought it our duty to establish, in reference to the expected negotiations with the Indians, which, it seems, disagreeably affects you in two points: the guard brought round from Savannah with the stores for the treaty, and the citizens of Georgia who may attend it. But we would previously remark, that these were made on the 26th of May, and before your arrival; that they were then committed to the commanding officer, to be by him carried into execution, and not thrown into your face for the first time, by us, but two days ago.

The guard is authorized by the Governor of Georgia; but, however competent his authority to order them here, it must be superseded on this ground: militia, when put into service, are subject to the articles of war; and in the presence of the commander of a military post, liable to his orders exclusively. If circumstances have made it necessary to deny admittance to this body, it is fortunate that it is not necessary to retain them: Colonel Gaither feeling himself warranted to supply a guard to the stores, under the care of the militia, not only here, but even back to Savannah, if, by any failure in your negotiation with the Indians, it should be necessary to return them. Equal protection will, in either case, be afforded to the property, and your responsibility not the greater by the change.

The smallness of number seeming to strike you as a circumstance favorable, in this case, to a dispensation from the rule, it is sufficient for us, that, the rule being made in exact conformity to instruction, we cannot think ourselves, from any such consideration, at liberty to dispense with it. It is not our part to defend the instruction, but we can conceive it has been suggested by the experience of the past. It conforms, also, to our own sense of right, and though, in this instance, it has not an extensive operation, it is not the less useful as a principle, and as a precedent.

You will permit us, indeed, to express our surprise, that you should not, yourselves, have discovered a special interest in the observance of some such rule, considering its tendency to obviate some of the difficulties lying in the way of your own object. You are aware of the jealousies of the Creeks in all things relating to your State. Alarms have gone forth that they were to encounter the Georgia militia at the intended treaty, and with some effect, too, in lessening the otherwise very numerous representation that might have been expected at it.

Finding this, and in order to quiet all apprehension on that score, we have communicated the regulations to some of the chiefs assembled, and from the satisfaction it has apparently given, we have reason to hope good effects from it.

In this view of the matter, we cannot admit that the honor of the State has been in any wise derogated from, in our rule; but, if it must be so, in the eyes of the State, it is doubtless owing to the circumstances which it has itself produced. Neither is it wounded through the persons of its citizens individually, who may come armed to attend the treaty: for no compliance of the rule can be demanded of them, but at the moment when their arms shall have become unnecessary to them for their protection. Some citizens you have perceived with arms, within the area of the fort. We know of none; if it is so, our regulation has not been sufficiently regarded.

With regard to subsistence for attending citizens of the State, you seem to think it should be under your orders; we do not well perceive how this can be. On recurring to your own papers, you will find that it is only a portion of the expense your State is to bear, of supplying the Indians, and consequently not any part of those of the household, as it may be termed, of the commissioners of the United States; in which, that for the entertaining of those gentlemen, we conceive, is included. This results also from another consideration, that your powers are pointed at, and limited to a single article, whilst ours are various as the objects of the treaty, and equal to all the circumstances arising out of it. And we wish you to recur to the several communications made, in the last and present year, to your State. These contain the essential part of your instructions, and will shew the relative situations of the two commissioners. These communications, from the absolute conditions of your appointment and mission, we doubt not, but that you are possessed of them. To have put them into your hands, must have been a virtual acquiescence on the part of your government, in the terms they prescribe; unless you have been instructed to neglect them, in which case you must allow us to question the foundation on which your commission stands.

We must request you will excuse the freedom observable in some parts of our reply, but, above all, that, if we have differed from you in some circumstances, it is with you only as commissioners; retaining for you all possible personal respect.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.
GEORGE CLYMER.
AND W PICKENS.

The Hon. Commissioners of Georgia.

June 2.—We hoped that our reply would have induced the gentlemen to acquiesce, and that an end would be put to the controversy; but we soon discovered that two of the gentlemen determined to evade the regulations, if possible, and, by some means or other, to land the militia. Colonel James Hendricks informed us, he was well satisfied with the answer we had given, and had so said to his colleagues; but that they were determined to send us another letter. He expressed himself well satisfied with the whole conduct of the commissioners of the United States, and, particularly, when they assured him that they had the means, were well disposed, and instructed to further the accomplishment of their mission.

We received from them this letter:

COLERAINE, June 2d, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

Your favor of yesterday has been attended to by us, with that respect that is due to the commissioners of the United States, and, although we differ from you essentially in some respects, which we shall notice. A desire of harmony between the delegations, in order to obtain, if possible, the grand object we have in view, will induce us to accommodate our personal feelings to existing circumstances, where the dignity of the State will permit it. For this purpose, we shall have no objection, if agreeable to you, to a conference on the subjects of our disagreements.

We must, however, observe, on the two principal points; and first, as to the militia guard ordered by our Executive for the protection of our stores, that, admitting all that has been said, yet, a deficiency of protection for our goods must have taken place; Colonel Gaither had no guard for them at Savannah, to have conducted them hither, and it was thought necessary to protect them from the wharf they were taken from. This guard was placed in our hands for that purpose, and our responsibility is become the greater in consequence thereof. To part with this guard, and receive another, would not lessen our responsibility, and would add to our risk, and make us censurable in the eyes of our country. We know the men we have with us, and, however strict the discipline of the garrison, we could not know the disposition or honesty of the guard we might receive, or their inducement for desertion, in case of inclination to behave dishonestly. It would be no excuse for us to say, should a loss happen, that we had changed our guard, even for the better. We should be answered, that the change was a work of our own, and that the loss, consequently, lay with us. One question will place this business in its proper light. Will the commissioners of the United States, or the commanding officer of the garrison, become responsible for the value of the articles with us? We presume not. We have already said, that we do not consider the few men with us, as called into the service of the United States, and coming under the purview of Colonel Gaither's command, and, consequently, liable to the articles of war; but as citizens of the militia of Georgia, ordered by the Executive to protect certain articles, the property of the State, thought necessary for the accomplishment of the cession of land, desired by her from the Creek nation of Indians, avoiding the question of right, within the territory of the State, in time of peace. We have also informed you, that we do not wish them to enter the garrison in arms.

We here feel ourselves obliged to notice an allusion in your letter, which, we conceive, reflects on the character of the State we have the honor to belong to, and to represent, on the present occasion.

The substance of your observation is, that, if the honor of Georgia has been, in anywise, derogated from by your rule, in the eyes of the State itself, it is owing to the circumstances it has itself produced. This is what we cannot admit: for, whatever individual citizens, or officers, without authority, may have done, is not properly chargeable to the State of Georgia. Harrison's murders have not been sanctioned by the State of Georgia. General Clarke was removed from the Oconee by Georgians, and no excursions from the temporary boundary into the Indian hunting grounds, have been ordered since the federal constitution, by the authority of the State, except the unfortunate attempt of General Twiggs, unless in cases of actual pursuit of murderers or robbers. The case of General Twiggs was after repeated depredations, in different parts of the State. We are led to believe the conduct of the State to be as unexceptionable as that of any State, circumstanced as she has been. We, at the same time, do not pretend to say that irregularities have not been committed.

By whom, or in what manner, the report was carried into the Creek nation, that they were to encounter the Georgia militia at this place, although we are at liberty to guess, we cannot assert. It is sufficient that you must be convinced, and the Creeks ought to be so, that the report is altogether unfounded; although you say, and we can conceive it has been, injurious to the object of our mission, and which we are pleased to view as our mutual wish to accomplish. The few men brought here could not have been the groundwork of a report of that nature in the nation; and the situation of Coleraine, the season of the year, the scarcity of provisions, and the want of accommodation on the roads, would equally operate to prevent the State, if she was so inclined, from ordering, and the militia from effecting a rendezvous at this place; the authors of it can be no friends to the United States or the State of Georgia, and prove the occasion of much trouble and expense to both, should it excite disgust in the Indians to our proposals, and defeat the negotiation.

The manner in which you construe the contingent expense of the treaty, or, what you deem the household of the United States' commissioners, in some measure obviates our exception to the manner of supplying the attending citizens who have claims. We had construed the provisions necessary for the Indians, to have included all contingent expenses; we are more satisfied, therefore, on this point, although we still think that the citizens attending with claims, ought to be considered within our peculiar province, and that we should have the power of providing for them; indeed, it would be no more than just, on your own grounds. You observe that our mission is only as to one point, but, that yours extends to every point, various as all the objects of the treaty, and equal to all the circumstances which can arise out of it. Of course, all but one point must concern the United States only, and not Georgia; and yet Georgia is to stipulate for half the expense. The Cumberland negotiation does not even affect Georgia. The citizens who may attend with their claims, and which is comprehended in our mission, will not balance the expense of the Indians by any distant calculation, the provision for our small citizen guard also included.

Even as to the Indians, we cannot conceive but that the distance we are kept at, from them, by your regulations, is prejudicial to our object. It must be admitted by you, that fixed liberty, to conciliate their affections, is necessary for the completion of our mission; and, surely so much confidence may be placed in the Commissioners of the State, as to suppose that no improper conduct could take place. Whether we are, or are not included in the general regulation, it is so understood, and it is without exception.

We have written thus fully, that a free and liberal understanding may take place. We have every proper respect for the mission you bear, and for yourselves, personally, and we assure you that we have no instructions to neglect any proper conditions or communications.

We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants.

By order of the Commissioners of Georgia:

JAMES HENDRICKS, Chairman.

June 3d, 1796.

We were pleased to find, that the manner we had deemed the most eligible, in a controversy of this sort, had lessened the warmth manifested in their first reply. We determined to reply in the same strain.

COLERAINE, June 3d, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

We have your favor of this day, respecting those articles of our regulations you before excepted to. Having already explained ourselves, we might reply, in short, that, to recede from them, would be inconsistent with our best judgment, nay, that it would not be within our power, considering ourselves but as the medium through which the sense of the United States is transmitted.

We shall, however, touch upon some of your points, which we think not conclusive in argument against us, or wherein it appears you have mistaken us.

You were to judge of the utility of a guard for the Indian stores hither; we therefore have not controverted it; our objection lies only to its existence within the garrison, or its neighborhood. You say it ought to remain, on account of your responsibility for the articles, and ask us whether, in case the guard is changed, the commissioners of the United States, or the commanding officer, here, will assume your responsibility. They will, we presume, in the sense in which responsibility is properly to be understood. That is, an accountability for the fidelity and care with which the trust is to be discharged, not involving the consequence of making good the amount of eventual loss. Your responsibility, we should suppose, to be of this kind, and no other.

Give us leave, gentlemen, to give the true construction of that passage in our last note to you, wherein you conceive an unlicensed reflection has been cast on the government of Georgia by the words, "the circumstances it has itself produced;" nothing was meant, but what was in relation to the guard in question. To have referred to the events you have disclosed, would have been unwarrantable, from the want of sufficient lights, with respect to the conduct of the State, as well as a breach of that decorum we ought constantly to maintain.

Our regulations concerning the manner of your intercourse with the Indians, you feel as not admitting of the freedom necessary to your negotiation with them. We can see no consequent inconvenience or injury. Be this as it may, this act of ours is in literal conformity to order.

It is deemed essential, in the words of our instructions, that, while every opportunity is offered the commissioners to obtain the land by fair negotiation, no conversation is to be permitted with the chiefs, save in your presence.

This is in agreement, too, with the invitation given to the Indians. "The talk (concerning the land) is to be open, fair, and honorable, and in the presence of the beloved men, whom the President will appoint to hold the treaty, and without whose approbation nothing is to be done."

And both these in pursuance of the directions of an act of Congress to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes.

"Sec. 8. Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be lawful for the agent, or agents, of any State, who shall be present at any treaty held with Indians, under the authority of the United States, in the presence, and with the approbation, of the commissioner or commissioners of the United States, appointed to hold the same, to propose to, and adjust with, the Indians, the compensation to be made for their claims to lands within such State, which shall be extinguished by the treaty."

But, you see it is enjoined upon us, within this limitation, to afford you every means for obtaining your end; and, accordingly, you will find us ever ready to attend your calls to the conferences; and, having informed ourselves of the time proper for beginning them, we shall then make immediate communication of it to you.

A conference with us seeming to be desired by you, you will perceive the justness of the distinction we are going to make. Upon points of disagreement, when the parties would wish to preserve the evidences of the principles they have proceeded on, a conference seems the least expedient mode of interchanging sentiments and opinions. Its greatest use is, where measures are to be concerted. In any such case, we shall, with great satisfaction and cheerfulness, attend you.

Colonel Hendricks assured us that he had reluctantly signed the last note to us; that he was well satisfied with the line of conduct we were pursuing, as much good might be expected from it. The Indians would see, that any engagements entered into, under the approbation of the commissioners of the United States, would be safe for them, and would impress a confidence in the conferences which might be necessary to obtain their desired object. He had assured his colleagues that he had signed the letter as chairman only, disapproving of the contents; and that, if they were determined to persist in measures that had an inevitable tendency to thwart the objects of their mission, he gave them notice that he would not sign any such letter, and the last, from the commissioners of the United States, should close the correspondence.

4th. We visited the Indian camp, had several little conferences with them, desired they would give us such information as they could obtain, of the chiefs expected; congratulated them on their arrival, and invited the principal chiefs to dine with us to-morrow. We wrote a letter to the Secretary of War, and sent it to St. Mary's, to Captain Simkins.

5th. This being the day we could open a table for company, we requested the commissioners of Georgia to dine with us. They accepted the invitation, and sent us, with it, the following note:

SCHOONER FAIR PLAY, June 5th, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

Yours of the 3d, was handed to us yesterday; we are sorry that you should have reason to conclude, that we had either mistaken or misconstrued your communications. If this has happened, it has not proceeded from intention or inclination.

Whilst we are made happy at the explanation of that part of your former letter, which we supposed reflected on the State, we cannot admit that the small guard brought with us, could have produced the jealousies of the Creeks, or the alarms which have gone forth in that nation, that they were to encounter the Georgia militia at this place. The order for this guard was not known to the men composing it, until the middle of May, the time appointed by the President, for the meeting of the Indians; and the intelligence of such a guard could barely have reached the Creek nation at this period. We cannot, therefore, conceive that any of the evils pointed out could properly be imputed to this step. You have admitted us, in your last, to be the proper judges of the utility of a guard hither.

We by no means blame you for executing positive instructions, however sensibly we may feel their operation. We shall conclude with a wish that they had been more delicate to the State of Georgia.

Situate as we are, we shall wait the information from you, of the proper time to commence the conference.

We are, with respect, your obedient servants,

JAMES JACKSON,
JAMES SIMMS.

The letter wrote yesterday, to the Secretary of War, is as follows:

COLERAIN, 4th June, 1796.

SIR:

We wrote to you the 30th ultimo, by Captain Simkins; he left this port on the 28th, and we sent our letter to meet him at St. Mary's, expecting that he would sail immediately for Philadelphia. We are just informed that he is still at St. Mary's, to sail to-morrow; we shall avail ourselves of an opportunity to that place, to make such further communications as have occurred, and the shortness of the time to convey them to the captain will permit.

The papers, numbered from 1 to —, inclusive, will shew the present state of the correspondence between us, and the commissioners on the part of Georgia, on an extravagant idea entertained by them. It had been intimated to one of us, early in May, that an attempt would be made to have some militia here in arms, under some colourable pretext; a like report had been circulated in the Indian nation, with views hostile to the treaty, and with effect in lessening the representation.

The representation will, we expect, be pretty numerous, and from the most influential towns; and we have reason to believe, that they come with unbounded confidence in the justice of the Federal Government, which it will be our care to preserve.

The negotiation may be expected to open publicly about the 10th.

Honorable JAMES McHENRY, Secretary of War.

June 6th. We asked Colonel Hendricks, whether the commissioners had come to any opinion on the manner they would wish to live here; why it was not agreeable to them to be at the same table with us, as our accommodations were the best adapted to a liberal intercourse with the chiefs. He said he had refused, as we must have seen, to subscribe their letter as chairman, it being, with the whole of their correspondence, disagreeable to him; in his opinion, not strictly defensible, and likely to produce the reverse of what they aimed at. He said that he had freely spoken with his colleagues, and he had left them, against their wish, on board the schooner; it was uncertain whether they would come on shore at all, but he had, and should remain during the negotiation. We told him, we hoped he saw in us a disposition to accommodate him and his colleagues in every thing they could, consistently with the duty they owed the federal commission, ask of us. He said he was satisfied, and would harmonize with us in every thing. We visited the Indians, and had some conversation with them on the objects of our mission; requested them to inform us, as soon as it could be known, what was the state of their representation. They told us that, in three or four days, they could inform us, and that then they would give us a masquerade dance, and afterwards prepare to meet us with the ceremonies usual among them.

7th and 8th. Nothing material occurred; some Indians arrived each day, and arranged their encampments.

9th. Mr. Clymer, with the superintendent, went to the town of St. Mary's, to return on the 11th. We invited several of the chiefs to dine with us, who came, and brought with them in all about fifty; they apologized for the number, by saying, they were anxious to see and be with the commissioners, who came from their great and beloved friend and father, General Washington. They on this, as on every other occasion, behaved decently. They informed us, that they expected some chiefs to arrive on the 11th, and among others, Chinabee, the great Natchez warrior. That they would on that day have a meeting of all the chiefs, and determine when they would meet the commissioners.

In the evening, some of the chiefs informed us, that there were some mischievous stories in camp, circulated by bad white men, and expressed a desire that such characters should be removed. They were told of the regulations; and if they were evaded, or not sufficient to guard against improper conduct, that others should be added, and measures taken for the certain execution of them. The Big Warrior requested that he might, on the next morning, have a private conversation with the commissioners, which should be put on their journal, and sent to the President of the United States. He was requested to breakfast with us, and bring his interpreter.

10th. Several chiefs of the Cowetas' attended, and requested a conference; they said that John Galphin had arrived at their camp, and they were desirous he should remain there for a few days, under the protection of the commissioners. That he was a very bad, unprincipled man, had often misbehaved, and been several times pardoned; that they believed him incorrigible. That he had been informed the superintendent forbid his coming, and that he must go away, in which case, he should take some young men with him. They said, John had requested them to make this application, and they hoped we would grant him our protection, as the young men who would go with him, were mischievously inclined, and had some of their friends killed by Harrison, on the frontiers of Georgia; and while they were here, they could have an eye over them. The commissioners replied, that, as the chiefs had requested it, and for the reasons suggested by them, they consented, on the condition expressly, that he should remain at their camp, where he now was, until further orders, and not come near the garrison. That they should examine into his character, with the chiefs of their land, on a fit opportunity. That, whatever might be their final decision, he should be safe here, and return safe with them. They expressed themselves well pleased. The interpreter, Timothy Barnard, was ordered to go immediately to camp, and inform John Galphin of this permission, and the conditions of it. The Big Warrior attended breakfast with us, and afterwards entered on his business; he said his business was to complain of an act injurious and insulting to him, and also to the United States, and was simply this: About three years past, the President sent a message to their land; that the chiefs met, and answered it, and sent his brother and some young lads, with the answer, accompanied by a white man, and with a white flag. That, within a few miles of this post, a party of men met them, and killed his brother, and one or two others; the white man had previously left them, and gone into the fort; he said this act was not like that of the wild and disorderly men on the frontiers, who were always ungovernable; but the deliberate act of soldiers, under the direction of an officer of the Government, upon a flag in their own land, having a letter to the garrison for the President of the United States. That, upon hearing of this, his sensations were such as he could not describe, but with difficulty he restrained his temper, and took the manly way of demanding satisfaction. He had sent three letters to the President; he had applied to his agent here, at his own house, and at Beard's Bluff; that he received some small talk from the superintendent, with assurance that his letters were sent to the President, and that the bones of his brother were buried. A few days past he discovered the falsity of the latter; the bones were now unburied, and he supposed the President had not yet seen his letters; he had, for some time, in consequence of this, been almost frantic; he could not speak to the commissioners without tears, and therefore, chose to be silent; he could not dine with them, and partake of their friendly attentions; he had yesterday taken his resolution to open his mind to them; he understood they were now the supreme authority here. He must demand satisfaction, and could wait no longer. He expected they would satisfy him in one point, by applying to the superintendent, to know what he had done, make him write it down, and have it translated to him. He hoped this matter would be left with the commissioners and himself for the present, and that the whole would be sent to the President. We told him to open his mind freely on all points relative to himself personally, or his nation, and give us a little time to make up our minds on them; that we came, as he knew, to settle all past differences, and to guard against a repetition in future, and we expected he and the other chiefs would aid us. We would have the bones of his brother buried with the honors of war, if he would consent; he was silent, took us by the hand, and went out; then said his heart was too full to speak.

In the course of the evening, three chiefs sent to the commissioners, that John Galphin had violated his permit, had been in the encampment in the store, with the factor, dined on board the vessel with one of the Georgia commissioners, was to dine there again the next day, was then drunk, had behaved ill, and was a very unfit character to be suffered to enter the garrison. We examined into this statement, found it to be true, and replied, that measures would be taken the next day, to compel him to respect their decisions.

11th. Several chiefs, who arrived yesterday, dined with the commissioners, among them, Chinabee, the great Natchez warrior. We entered into conversation with them, on the objects of our mission, found them disposed to be very friendly, and that they had unbounded confidence in the justice of the Government of the United States. They promised us to have a general meeting on the next day, and determine on the ceremonies to be used, and the state of their representation, and inform us of it in the course of that, or the succeeding day. Mr. Clymer, and the superintendent, returned in the evening.

The Indians held a council this day. The commissioners finding that some improper characters had been in camp, intermeddling in the affairs of the Indians, they requested the superintendent to check it in future. We have observed that the Indians are equally dissatisfied with persons who mention any thing for, or against, the sale of their lands, and say it is an improper and rude interference; they know our disposition on this head, and are well pleased with it.

MONDAY, 13th.

The commissioners being informed that there was some public plank in the possession of the contractor, and that the carpenters were in want of four thousand feet to finish the block house, where they now reside, directed the contractor to furnish that quantity.

We sent the following note to the Superintendent:

The Commissioners of the United States request the Superintendent to inform them—

1st. How many Indians there are encamped. 2d. How many chiefs; their rank, and the towns they represent; their names. 3d. How many white men are here from the nation; their names, and places of abode; their occupation in the nation, and characters, as far as he has been able to form his opinion of them. 4th. How many interpreters are present; their names and characters. They wish that Mr. Burges be directed to attend them daily as an interpreter, and, if it would be an accommodation to him, that he would accept of one of their tents, now pitched in the garrison, which shall be moved near their residence; he will, of course, breakfast and dine with them.

We are desirous, as soon as the number of chiefs can be ascertained, to make an arrangement for entertaining a given number of them every day.

The notice of an intended answer.

GENTLEMEN:

I am this moment favored with your note, the contents of which shall have my immediate attention, and, by to-morrow morning, shall have all matters stated as you require.

With due respect, I am, your devoted humble servant,

JAMES SEAGROVE, Superintendent Indian Affairs.

Commissioners of the United States, Coleraine.

14th. Received from the Superintendent the answer promised to our note of yesterday, as follows:

INDIAN CAMP, NEAR COLERAINE, 14th June, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

I find that, notwithstanding the very pointed orders you have issued, and my utmost endeavors to prevent, yet the Indians are frequently drunk. Not a drop of liquor is given in camp, but under my immediate inspection. The quantity so given being very small, I must conclude they are furnished in the garrison, or from the vessels in the river, perhaps from the contractor for furnishing the troops, or Mr. Hampton, the sutler, through the medium of the soldiers, who, I believe, are not restricted getting liquor with money. And, as the Indians have dollars among them, this appears the most likely source of the evil. Upwards of twenty Indians were drunk in camp last evening, all of whom came from the garrison in that state.

I hope you will adopt some mode of putting a total stop to the Indians getting liquor in or near the garrison of fort Pickering, during the treaty. The Indians having turned three men, of the name of Innes, out of their camps, as improper persons, I am of opinion they ought not to be allowed to remain in or near this garrison. Also, a certain Mr. McMurphey, who has been talking very improperly of Indian matters. I believe him to be sent as a spy, to do mischief. There are others in the garrison, who I shall point out to you as dangerous persons.

Both the Galphins are forbid by the Indians to leave their camp on any account. Should they dare to act contrary to this order, I hope they will be prevented entering there, or from going on board any of the vessels opposite the fort. I herewith enclose a return of the Indians now in camp with me, as also a list of traders, interpreters, and clerks.

With due respect, I remain, your devoted servant,

JS. SEAGROVE.

Honorable Commissioners of the United States.

COLERAINE, 15th June, 1796.

SIR:

We send you an extract from a letter we yesterday received from the superintendent of Indian affairs, by which you will see that the 7th article of our regulations has not been duly observed.

"I find that, notwithstanding the very pointed orders you have issued, and my utmost endeavors to prevent, yet the Indians are frequently drunk. Not a drop of liquor is given in camp, but under my immediate inspection. The quantity so given being very small, I must conclude that they are furnished in the garrison, or from the vessels in the river, perhaps from the contractor for furnishing the troops, or Mr. Hampton, the sutler, through the medium of the soldiers, who, I believe, are not restricted getting liquor with money. And, as the Indians have dollars among them, this appears the most likely source of the evil. Upwards of twenty Indians were drunk in camp last evening, all of whom came from the garrison in that state."

We deem it necessary to make this communication to you, to the end that you may take the necessary measures to put a stop to the evil complained of, and to cause our regulations to be duly observed.

We are, with due respect, sir, your obedient servants, &c.

HENRY GAITHER, Lieut. Col. Commandant.

COLERAINE, 15th June, 1796.

SIR:

We have had your communication of yesterday under consideration, and wrote to Colonel Gaither on the inexecution of the 7th article of our regulations, requiring that he would take the necessary measures to cause them to be duly observed. The other objects mentioned by you, are under consideration.

As the complaints of the Big Warrior, for a murder committed in this neighborhood, on his brother, have not been satisfied, and we may be called on by him, or some of the relatives, to account for the same, in the course of the pending negotiation, we wish you would give us a narrative of the whole transaction, as far as you have been able to comprehend it, stating the murder, the complaint, and the measures taken by the Government in consequence.

We are, with due respect, your obedient servants.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Superintendent.

The commissioners directed the superintendent to make the necessary arrangements for the reception of the Indians; and that he inform them the commissioners will be ready to receive them to-morrow in the forenoon, on the old parade; that, after the ceremonies on their part are over, the commissioners will welcome them in a short speech, introductory to their business, and end it with a salute from their cannon, a smoke of the pipe of friendship, and a glass of wine.

16th. Half after ten, all the kings, head-men, warriors, and others, to the number of near four hundred, marching under the flag of the United States, came to the commissioners, who were seated, attended by the officers of the garrison. They danced the eagle tail dance from their camp, and the four dancers at the head of the chiefs waved six times the eagle tail over the heads of the commissioners. The six of the principal kings and head-men came up and took the commissioners by the hand. They then handed their pipes to the commissioners, and held them and the fire which they brought in their hands from the camps. The commissioners lit them and smoked. There was a short interval between each dance, and wave of the eagle tail, beginning always with the commissioners first named, the same interval in the shake of hands, and the lighting of the pipe.

The commissioners then addressed them:

Beloved men, chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation:

BROTHERS: We are the beloved men chosen by the President of the United States, and his old counsellors, and sent to meet you here; to take you by the hand; to hear all your complaints; to settle all differences; to renew and firmly establish peace and friendship between your nation and the United States; and to form a plan of trade with you. We are glad to see you.

These three gentlemen are the beloved men of Georgia. They are sent by the good people of Georgia to take you by the hand. You have been told, in the talk sent you by order of the President, of the business they meet you on.

To-morrow we will meet you in the square appointed for the purpose, and have the President's talk interpreted to you, and the next day the beloved men of Georgia will open their minds to you.

You will now all take a drink with us, and smoke a pipe of friendship. Our warriors will now welcome you here in their way.

A signal, at the end of this, being given, the salute of sixteen guns were discharged.

The commissioners then conducted the six chiefs to their apartments, smoked a pipe of friendship with them, and entertained them and their followers with wine and spirits. The followers then returned to their encampment, and the chiefs dined with the commissioners. The chiefs were informed that, prior to the commencement of business to-morrow, the commissioners would expect to be informed of the state of the representation. The chiefs said that they had, agreeable to our former request, had a council on this subject, and would be ready to answer us. That the nation was well represented.

If being certified, to the satisfaction of the commissioners, that some improper characters were in or about the garrison, they deemed it advisable to make a regulation which would effectually check any attempts of them to meddle in the affairs under negotiation.

The commissioners for holding a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians have judged proper, in virtue of the powers and authorities vested in them, to make the following regulation, in addition to those of the 26th ultimo, for the prevention of quarrels, improper behavior, or mal-practices, during the negotiation:

If any citizen of the United States shall visit the camp of the Indians, or come into the garrison, or neighborhood thereof, being a suspicious character, or capable of improper behavior, or mal-practices, he is to be reported to the commissioners of the United States. And the commandant, upon receiving notice thereof, will take necessary measures to notify every such citizen of his being suspected, and require of him to leave the garrison in twelve hours, and not to return within the patrols of the camp, or the Indian encampment, during the negotiation.

Wrote the following letter to the Secretary of War, and forwarded it by the mail:

COLERAIN, 16th June, 1796.

Sir:

We wrote you on the 4th instant, enclosing our correspondence with the commissioners of Georgia up to that date. The next day we received the letter now sent, which closed our correspondence. The gentlemen then dined with us, and have since shown a disposition to harmonize with us.

Our negotiations with the Indians commenced this day. There were twenty-two kings, seventy-five principal chiefs, and one hundred and fifty-two warriors present. The whole number who are down, attending on the invitation sent to the nation, are four hundred and thirty-five.

In conversation with the chiefs, they have informed us that their nation is fully represented. We have, notwithstanding, required of them to hold a council expressly to determine the question of representation, and to answer us to-morrow at a public conference. The chiefs appear to be well disposed, and to have a well grounded confidence in the justice of our Government.

We have the honor to be, with sincere regard, sir, your obedient servants.

JAMES MCHENRY, Esq. Secretary of War.

17th June.—The commissioners of the United States, agreeably with their notification of yesterday, met the representatives of the whole Creek nation, in the square appointed for the place of negotiation. Present, the three commissioners of Georgia, James Hendricks, James Jackson, and James Simms, twenty-two kings, seventy-five principal chiefs, and one hundred and fifty-two warriors, the superintendent, Colonel Gaither, and the officers of the garrison.

The commissioners appointed Captain William Eaton secretary to the commission, for the purpose of taking down minute details of their proceedings.

Timothy Barnard, Alexander Cornell, James Burges, and Langley Bryant, were appointed interpreters during the negotiation, and were sworn faithfully to perform the duties of their appointment, according to their best skill and ability.

The commissioners explained the ceremony of swearing the interpreters to the Indians.

Mr. Hawkins then explained the return which had been made by the superintendent, stating the number of towns, of kings, of principal chiefs, and warriors, and told them the commissioners must put a question to them, respecting their representation, which they were apprised of, some days past, and requested to hold a council on. This question was then put by the commissioners:

Question 1st. Have you a full representation from your nation present?

Answer, by Fusatchee Mico, White-bird king. Yes, we are.

This chief was then appointed, in full council, to be the chief speaker.

Question 2d. If we proceed to negotiate a treaty with you, will it be good and binding upon your whole nation?

Answer, by the same. Yes. The talks of our father, General Washington, were sent into our nation; these talks are known, and we have a full representation of our nation now here, who are ready to enter upon the negotiation, which, if concluded, shall be binding on our nation.

Commissioners. We will then commence the business, and, that you may have a clear insight into it, we will have the talks of the President translated to you.

The interpreters were then ordered to attend particularly, and aid the one who spoke, and interpret the talk as delivered to him, sentence by sentence.

This being finished, the supplementary instruction from the War Office, relative to the mode of educating the youths of the nation, was addressed to, and interpreted to, the Indians, and the object of it explained.

The commissioners then informed the Indians, that they had finished what they had intended to say to them this day; that the three commissioners of Georgia would speak to them to-morrow; that their talk would be a long one, and it was hoped and expected, that the representatives of the Creek land would give it a patient hearing, and deliberate upon it well, before they came to a decision.

Fusatchee Mico. We have heard what the beloved men from General Washington have said to us, and to-morrow we will hear what the commissioners of Georgia shall have to say. After we have heard the talks of the beloved men of both parties, we will consider well on it, and give our answer.

The commissioners requested the Indians to remain in their seats, till they could give them each a glass of toddy.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

SATURDAY, 18th June.

The commissioners of Georgia having requested of us to give them our opinion of the representation on the part of the Creeks, we wrote them this note:

18th June, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

In answer to your request, to be informed of the state of the representation on the part of the Creeks, we have to inform you, we deem it competent to all the objects under negotiation.

We think it our duty, gentlemen, to inform you, that the letter to the Governor of Georgia, and the talk addressed to the beloved men, chiefs, and warriors, of the Creek nation, contain the objects and principles on which the negotiation is to be conducted, and are considered by us as essential parts of our instructions, and directing us to the execution of our trust.

We have the honor to be, with due regard, gentlemen, your obedient servants,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
GEORGE CLYMER,
ANDREW PICKENS.

Honorable Commissioners of Georgia.

The commissioners of Georgia called on us, just as we were about to proceed to the square of negotiation, and submitted to our inspection the speech they had prepared to address to the Indians. We entered into conversation with them, on some points which were objectionable, to which they replied, that we might see they had referred the Indians to us, and they supposed we would do what we deemed right and proper. The gentlemen were requested to retire for a few moments, and we would give them our determination. We had told the gentlemen, that one statement of theirs was inadmissible, as not being a fact. They said, "Georgia was not present at New York, when the treaty was made." The contrary was manifest; they were always represented in the Senate, where there were a competent number for business, but, on the present occasion, their two senators were present, and voted against the ratification. We, after consideration, agreed to return this answer:

GENTLEMEN:

As you have deemed this address proper, we are unanimously of opinion you should, without exceptions, be left to deliver it. We had expressed ourselves frequently, as being desirous that the gentlemen of Georgia would enter upon the purchase of the lands, and leave the disagreeable task of demanding satisfaction for the losses sustained, on us. We were desirous of smoothing the way for this negotiation, but they were of a different opinion, and, although we could have controlled them, we deemed it advisable to let them commence in their own way. Colonel Hendricks informed us, he was sensible of our disposition to do every thing we could for them, and requested that we would not take exceptions at their folly, which he lamented exceedingly.

The commissioners and Indians met in the square of negotiation, according to adjournment. Philip Scott was sworn as an interpreter, at the request of the commissioners of Georgia.

Mr. Hawkins addressed the Creeks:

Kings, Chiefs, and Warriors, of the Creek nation:

BROTHERS:

The three beloved men of Georgia are present, and are now about to address their talk to you. I request you will hear them patiently; their talks will be long; they will state all their complaints, grievances, and their claims, to you, which you will deliberate on, with coolness, as becomes old men and chiefs. And, if any difficulties arise in your minds, you will inform us, the beloved men of your great father, of them, who are sent here to assist our brethren of Georgia, and our brethren the red People, in obtaining their mutual rights.

The interpreters being ordered to attend General Jackson, he delivered the speech he had shown to the commissioners, and dwelt with peculiar emphasis on the treaties of Augusta, of Galphinton, and Shoulderbone, heretofore concluded between the Creeks and Georgia, the violation of these treaties, the claims arising out of them, on the part of Georgia, and concluded with observing, that those claims, which respected certain tracts of land, and restoration of stolen property, were still valid, and ought to be observed, notwithstanding the outrage of bad men on both sides, which he sincerely regretted. The General exhibited two schedules of the property to be restored or accounted for, amounting to 110,000 dollars, and hoped that the negotiation would terminate in mutual advantages and satisfaction of both the parties; expressed his confidence, that the beloved men, sent by our beloved great chief, the President, would use their endeavors to accomplish the desirable object.

Mr. Hawkins:

BROTHERS:

You have this day heard the talk of our brethren, the beloved men of Georgia. It is a long one, and contains many things; we request you will allow yourselves sufficient time to consider upon it; that you will think on the subject, with as much coolness and deliberation as if you were within your own square, at your own councils, in your nation; you are in perfect safety at this place; you may choose your ground for deliberation, and shall there be secured from all interruption; and, as I have before observed, whatever you may find in the talks delivered you this day, which requires explanation, or is dissatisfactory, we request you will refer your difficulties to us, the beloved men from the President, whose duty, and whose desire it is, arbitrating between the parties, to establish your rights.

The chiefs were then requested to keep their seats, and they should be furnished with a glass of toddy.

After consultation, they applied to Mr. Hawkins, and requested that he would have them furnished with a copy of the talk delivered them by the commissioners of Georgia, and all the papers referred to in it. They wished to have them in their own council, that they might understand every part, before they made up their minds to reply.

Mr. Hawkins promised to apply for the papers, and to send them a copy; and he immediately did so, to Mr. Simms and Colonel Hendricks, who promised them in half an hour.

The Indian representation have observed great decency and decorum, for the two days past; they are remarkably attentive to every thing said to them. During the whole time the commissioners of the United States were talking to them, they showed a degree of confidence in, and an approbation of, all that was said to them. They gave an assent to every paragraph. While the commissioners of Georgia were talking, they rarely assented; remained generally silent; when the treaty of Galphinton was mentioned, they asked who signed it. The number of signers, on their part, were named. When the commissioners exhibited the long roll of claims against them, and the particulars were enumerated, they listened till the article hogs were numbered, when they all laughed.

After they had separated, several principal chiefs dined with the commissioners, and talked to each other on parts of the speech, many of which, they said, they did not remember to have heard of before. The Big Warrior requested to know, if the commissioners could not furnish a roll of paper, somewhat longer than that exhibited by Georgia, as he could easily fill it up. Another of them asked, how their brethren of Georgia could distinguish between the loss occasioned among their hogs, whether it was by the bears or Indians. He said the Creeks had lost many hogs, and their brethren of Georgia had done them much evil; but that he had never charged them with the taking of hogs.

SUNDAY, 19th June.

This day the Indians applied for the papers promised them yesterday, and we wrote the following note:

COLERAINE, 19th June, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

The Indians have requested us to furnish them with a copy of the talk you addressed to them yesterday, that they may be able to examine it leisurely in their councils. We have promised it to them; and we have to request of you to furnish us with an attested copy of the speech, together with the papers referred to therein, which were shown and explained to the Indians.

We are, with due respect, your obedient servants.

Honorable Commissioners of Georgia.

Mr. Robinson, the secretary to the commissioners, called on us and delivered the talk, certified to be a true copy, and extracts from some of the papers alluded to. He said the paper containing the claims against the Indians, was an original; that it would take three days to copy it; that the commissioners did not like to trust it in the camp; but they would show it to us, if we were desirous of perusing it. We requested we might have the examination of it at our lodgings.

We sent this note to the superintendent:

COLERAINE, 19th June.

SIR:

The commissioners of the United States enclose you a certified copy of the talk delivered yesterday, by the commissioners of Georgia to the Creeks, with extracts from the papers alluded to therein; you will deliver these to the Indians. We have applied for the amount of losses, as shown by the commissioners to the Indians, and are promised the perusal of it, there being but one original, and the clerk of the commissioners supposes it will take three days to copy it. As soon as we have examined it, we shall determine what is proper to be done relative to it.

The superintendent returned for answer:

INDIAN CAMP, NEAR COLERAINE, 19th June, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

I am honored with your note, enclosing the speech of the commissioners of Georgia, which I shall have explained to the Creek chiefs, this afternoon. I herewith send for your opinion, a copy of a letter which I have received from the Governor of Georgia. I wish you to inform me, whether you think it sufficient for the purpose intended.

With respect, I remain, &c.

The letter being an assumption, on the part of Georgia, to pay half of the expense for the supply of provisions to the Indians, during the negotiation.

20th.—The Indians spent this day in council, in a square which they prepared for that purpose, in their own encampment. They requested that three of the interpreters should attend them, and named Timothy Barnard, Alexander Cornell, and James Burges; they were ordered accordingly.

The commissioners finding that there had been great inattention, in the person appointed to cater for them, or neglect on the part of the contractor; that their table was badly provided; at the same time, that the garrison abounded in good things, and other tables were supplied with them at the public expense, they determined to check this abuse, and to reprimand those who should appear to be the authors. They wrote to the contractor:

MR. JOHNSTON:

The man you appointed to cater for the commissioners, is either above his business, or unacquainted with his duty. Their table has been the worst provided for, of any in the garrison; the meats are generally bad, for some days past; and the vegetables, not one third enough for the number entertained by them. You are required to make the necessary regulations, not only to prevent a continuance of their treatment, but to provide every thing suitable for their table.

Mr. Johnston attended, apologised for the past, and promised amendment in future.

In the evening the commissioners received a paper from the Indians, which, they were informed, contained the answer they intended for the commissioners of Georgia. They, at the same time, received an invitation to visit the Indians the next morning at the square of negotiation, in the Indian camp.

21st.—We this morning, early, attended the Indians; they were in the square with the three interpreters. We understood they wished us to visit them, and hear them, unattended by any person, and we conformed to their desire.

Fusatchee Mico, or Bird king, informed us he was to reply to us, on the part of the Creek nation, and he began:

FATHERS, BROTHERS, AND BELOVED MEN:

I am going to speak my mind to-day, and hope you will attend to me. I am glad I have the opportunity of seeing you, the three beloved men from our Great Father, General Washington. We have another placed here by him, Mr. Seagrove; we hope you will attend.

I got a talk sent up to us in our land, sent from the President of the United States, to invite me here; here we are, a representation of the whole nation.

I say, I understood that General Washington sent three of his beloved men to see us; we came to see them; had we been invited to meet the Georgians only, there would not have been one attending.

It is very true, and we all know it, people who regard each other, will go great lengths at the call of each other; we were invited, and went a great way to see General Washington; and now, when I saw his talk in our land, we determined to come, although it is a great way, and we have had to encounter difficulties of hunger and fatigue; but we have come, and are pleased to see, as we were told we should, his beloved men. It is true, General Washington sent for us; we went to see him; when we arrived, he told us he was glad to see us face to face, he wanted this, and sent for us. You have come to the head, the main branch, and I hope our talks will be straight before you leave us. G. W. told us, it is very good for you that I sent for you; I am the head of thirteen States. G. W. told us, I sent for you, and you are come; I will have the talks such, and put them on such a foundation, as that there will be a great many breaths preserved by it. It is true, we were there; G. W. told us we were glad to see us. The man we carried as our head man, was a half-breed. He had more conversation with General Washington, and his great men, than we; but I heard, I will tell.

We were told, it was well we were there, and he would, when we went into our own land, provide for us; and have people whose business it should be, to provide for us there.

General Washington told us, he hoped, after our return, there would be a peace for everlasting, between the white people and us, notwithstanding he and we might die. He told us, at the same time, when you go back into your land, and give my talks in to your people, I will, by that time, have an eye out and obtain a man, and send him to look after you, to see your affairs righted. G. W. told us, a father will speak to his children; it is natural he should; that they should take care, and not imbrue their hands with blood, but keep peace and quietness in their land. He further said, if there should happen to be a cloudy day over us, we must look about, and see how to dispel it, that we may have a clear day to live in. It is not me who speaks; 'tis General Washington; he said, I have seen many a cloudy day in my time, but now here I am, and you see me. General Washington told me, at the same time, you see, and I see, the rivers; when they run dry, and the mountains disappear, we shall cease to talk of peace and quietness, and there will be an end of all things. He told me the lands on this side of the mountain, which are the back-bone of our country, we are now on, I mean nothing but peace and quietness as long as they shall last; but, if nature should destroy us, we must submit; he should support peace, and expected they would have no other enemy to put them to death, than the decay of nature. General Washington told us, you will mind, you will come to me as I told you; I am the chief; you must come to me; I am told you have men who pretend to be great men, in your neighborhood, and who pretend to great things; you must not listen to them, but to me; I only have the right to speak to you as the chief of their land. General Washington told us, those were those great people who would come to us after our lands, or something else, some of the Governor's perhaps, but you must not listen to any of them, but to me. This we have observed and followed; we have not listened to any. I will let you know what G. W. told me, as well as my memory serves me, and I think I do not tell an untruth. General Washington told us at that very time, I have talked to you, and told you, face to face, I look upon myself as your father, and I wish, if it were possible, that, when you go to your own land, there was a chain riveted in my and your hearts, of friendship, so strong as never to be broken. General Washington told us, you are going to your own land; any thing that disturbs you, or my people, I will interpose to remedy; and will see, if any people trespass on your rights, and take possession of your lands, that they shall be removed quite away from you, even to the sea shore. At that very time, it was told us, as M<sup>r</sup> Gillivray said, it was hard that that land on the Oconee should be taken from us; but as the people were settled on it, the river should be the boundary line. That is, that Oconee running up the same, and the north fork, being called the Little Oconee, to the source, and that the upper part should be marked six strides wide.

General Washington said, after the boundary was run and finished, if we ever saw a white man hunting with a gun, or a beaver trap, over the line, we might take the gun, strip him, and turn him over to his own side; but not to kill or hurt him.

After our return home into our own land, we expected nothing further than to carry the treaty into effect, and to prepare to come down and mark the boundary agreed upon at New York. Two days before we were to set out, one Bowles came into the nation, with a heap of lies. He told us the British king sent him; he came to bring trade to us, and to take care of our land. This brought confusion among us, and distraction in our lands; we were perplexed, and did not know what to do. However, we, the chiefs, often think of doing what we had promised, and, as soon as General Washington invited us, you may see how readily we come. These obstructions prevented the running of the line, and it remains unexecuted to this day; but we know where the line should be run, and we see people come over on our land, and build a fort, and trespass on our rights, at the fork of Tulapocka, near the high falls, and another up at the mountains. I stand to what General Washington told us, and I expect to abide by what he and Congress did at New York with us. And I hope, in running the line, if any of the white people should be on our side, that you will have them removed. We are willing to agree with you three beloved men, to have the treaty of New York carried completely into effect, that is, every thing we promised there. This I am now telling to you, was the result of a deliberation in our land, before we left thence, and our wish is to settle every thing, and preserve peace.

I am now going to let you know my mind about the Georgians. I hope you saw what we did yesterday; it was intended for you.

When I was a child, and long before, the old people met and did their business in a few words, but now things are changed, and it takes a great many words. I have said a good deal of what my white father, General Washington, told us, face to face. I look on it I am still speaking to him, when I address myself to you. I expect your advice and assistance, as I should expect his, if he were present.

I cannot think of any thing more at present. I have put every thing before you, with the paper we sent you yesterday in answer to the Georgians. I shall wait until you can see into it, and give your advice. Our people are uneasy about the losses of horses, and bills, and property. We rely on the commissioners to despatch us as soon as they can.

The commissioners told the chiefs that they would examine the contents of the answer sent for the three beloved men of Georgia, and meet them again to-morrow.

June 22.—The commissioners of the United States being informed that the Indians were disturbed at some attempts made in their camps to obtain some land from them, by two or three white persons; and the superintendent informing them that Colonel John Jones, of Burk county, had written one or more deeds in the camp, and was in company with Philip Scott, Robert Tool, and John Galphin; that some of them were endeavoring to prevail on the Indians to sign the deed, in favor of Robert Tool; the deed intended for Tool was handed to the commissioners; it was for six miles square, and in the hand writing of John Jones.

The misdemeanor was so flagrant that they ordered immediate inquiry, and directed that the persons concerned should be brought before them in council with the Indians, to be examined.

We issued the following direction:

COLERAINE, June 22, 1796.

SIR: The commissioners of the United States have had information lodged with them against John Jones, Philip Scott, and Robert Tool, as being engaged in mal-practices, within the Indian encampment. They request that you will have the said persons brought before them, to be examined, touching the premises.

B. H.
G. C.
A. P.

Captain EATON.

The persons being arrested, and return made thereof, the commissioners repaired to the square of negotiation, in the Indian encampment, and informed the Indians of what they had learned, and the steps taken by them to sift the matter in their presence. They showed the deed, and requested that the chief who sent it, should inform them how he came by it, and what he knew relative to it.

Coweta Leader replied: I heard something of the talk yesterday, which gave some uneasiness in the camp, and I applied to Mr. Tool, who said there was nothing in it. Upon this, I went to my camp, where I was again informed of it, and the paper shown by you, being the deed for Tool, was put into my hand. I was informed that Philip Scott and John Jones went out on one side and wrote it; though John Galphin gave the paper to me, in my camp, and I directly carried it to the superintendent. The same day Mr. Jones and Philip Scott came to my camp, and applied to Abacoo Tustamitca, of the Broken-arrow old field. He will tell what he knows.

Abacoo Tustamitca.—Philip Scott asked me for some lands for his Indian children. I replied, he had gone now to live among the white people, and we could not give him any lands on our side of the line. If his children wanted land, let them come and live in the nation, and they shall have some. Philip Scott came this morning and applied again by himself, Mr. Jones being in sight, but at some distance from him. I answered him, you have a great number of children, and chose to stay where you are; we will not, as you have thus determined, give you any thing. If your daughters, or children, want land, send them into the nation to us: they are our blood, and we will provide for them. I then ordered Scott to be silent, to say no more about it, and go his way. Scott said he would; that it was the women, my relations, that sent the application to me; that he did not make it of himself.

Question to the chiefs, by the commissioners.—Did any of the chiefs make a promise of the lands, as expressed in the deed? This question must be answered, and it can do no injury to them, as it is not binding.

Answer from the chiefs.—No; there are no chiefs who ever did promise any. What they heard yesterday, and the uneasiness occasioned from it, determined them to send the deed to the superintendent, for the commissioners.

The 8th section of the act for regulating trade was then explained to the Indians; and the commissioners sent for Robert Tool, who, upon being examined, said, that John Jones and John Galphin came to the camp where he was; that John Galphin observed, there was land given to pay him and the traders, for many thousand pounds of leather, but that they never got any of it. The Georgians sold it; that he would get all the chiefs to sign a deed for him. Mr. Jones said he would buy the land from him, if he could get it from the Indians, or if it was his. He replied, it was not his land, and he could not get it. John Galphin said, he could get it for him, and all the chiefs should sign the deed.

The old man being of feeble mind, always intoxicated with strong drink, when he could get it; his narrative apparently candid, and corroborated by several of the chiefs, in conversation on the subject, he was acquitted. The commissioners being informed that the Indians would hold him guilty, unless they acquitted him, and that, at some future time, they would punish him, they told the chiefs that Tool was innocent of any fraud intended against them, and had been imposed on; that they acquitted him, and the chiefs must look on him as innocent. The chiefs replied, they were satisfied the old man had been made a tool of, and that he was innocent.

Colonel John Jones was then ordered to attend. The commissioners informed the colonel, that they had a very important trust delegated to them; that they were determined to execute it. That he saw the delicate situation they were placed in, by having a gentleman, who had been for some time as one of their family, and permitted to visit their camp daily, under the sanction of their name, brought before them, to answer for a misdemeanor, involving in it a breach of trust. That, for various reasons, they had determined to submit it to him to make his own statement, on which they would rely, and form their decision.

The colonel bursted into tears, and replied, he was sensible of what we had stated, and it affected him exceedingly. That he had committed a breach of trust, and a misdemeanor of the nature mentioned in the act stated to him; but declared on his honor it was without any knowledge of its being so at the time; that he was led to write the deed from a desire to be serviceable to some people who had been kind to him, without any recollection at the time, of there being the least impropriety in the act. He said he must inform the commissioners, that he had written one other deed, in favor of John Galphin, and that he had promised a like favor to Philip Scott. He was sorry it had caused uneasiness among the Indians, and been productive of any disagreeable sensation in the commissioners, to whose politeness he was much indebted since his arrival.

The commissioners told Mr. Jones that they would take his statement, as he had made it, with his apology, and that he was at liberty to depart.

Philip Scott was next called in, examined, and discharged.

The commissioners then explained to the Indians the nature of the examination, who were greatly pleased, and expressed it, with particular allusion to the effect it had on those who were examined.

This business occupying the day, in the evening we gave the gentlemen, commissioners of Georgia, the talk delivered to us for them, and showed them, at the same time, our notes of yesterday's proceeding, which we permitted them to copy, except a part of the two last paragraphs.

Upon calling in the evening on the gentlemen, we found two of them greatly enraged, at what they termed a violation of the rights of the citizens of Georgia, and an insult to the dignity of the State, by our proceedings of this day. They said much of the civil magistrate, and civil authority; to which it was replied, that the authority here was civil, and competent to all the purposes entrusted to it, without the intervention of any other aid, than what they had already under their direction. That the regulations made by them to prevent improper behavior, or mal-practices, during the negotiation, were such as they deemed proper; that they were the sole judges, and that the regulations should be enforced, without respect of persons.

In full council of all the chiefs, this application was made to the commissioners.

Sohonoketchee of the Cowetas.—I have a cousin here, one John Galphin; there is the Cussetah king, and several of his relations here. We want to speak a few words relative to him.

When we first arrived, John came, but he kept out till we talked to the beloved men. John understood the beloved men wanted them to keep him out, till they would have a talk with the chiefs. He wants to come in, and be about, as another Indian. We, the chiefs, solicit, that he may be permitted to come in. If you see proper, I wish you would look upon him as another Indian. I will make it my duty, and I promise it here, before all the chiefs, to look after him in future, and see that he conduct himself properly; and I will be answerable for him.

There is another talk we have to give, relative to George Galphin; we gave a large tract of land to the brothers; George sent to John to meet him here about their lands; they intended to apply to the commissioners to see justice done them, if it can be. They did not come to disturb the harmony of the meeting.

To the first point, the commissioners answer, that the President invited all the Creeks to attend this treaty; and they will not judge of improper characters among them; that the chiefs of the land, in council, must be the judges. That, although John has been represented to them as a very bad man, if the chiefs will introduce him to them, they will take him by the hand, especially, as the chiefs solicit it, and the one speaking has promised for himself, and all the others, that, in future, they will attend to his conduct.

If he behaves bad in future, they must remember they solicited us to restore him to favor.

June 23.—The commissioners of the United States called this morning on the commissioners of Georgia, agreeably to a notification to them, to take them to the Indian square of negotiation; but they seemed undetermined what to do. They were asked whether they preferred going this morning, and having a conversation with the chiefs, or to-morrow; after some hesitation, General Jackson left us, with observing, that he could not be ready till to-morrow. We replied, we would inform the Indians of it. Colonel Hendricks informed us he would attend this morning, and perhaps Mr. Simms with him.

The council met at Muscogee hall, in the Indian encampment. The two gentlemen above named, from Georgia, attended.

The commissioners of the United States then addressed the Indians.

Kings, Chiefs, and Warriors, of the whole Creek nation:

BROTHERS: As we have had your talk to us in answer to the beloved men of Georgia, under consideration, and have delivered it to them, we expect you will hear from them again; therefore, we shall speak nothing to you on the objects between you and them, to-day. We shall speak on the points more immediately relating to our mission.

1st. We shall speak of trade. This subject has already, in conversation, been mentioned to you; we shall now go fully into it. This trade is to be conducted according to the views of General Washington, in a mode different from that heretofore in practice in your country, on a plan entirely new; heretofore, it has been carried on by individuals, solely for their own profit; these frequently abused and defrauded the Indians. It will now be carried on by the United States, under the direction of your great and beloved father, the President of the United States. And he is desirous it should be conducted in a manner perfectly conformable to your wants and wishes, and with as little expense to you as possible. Many of you know General Washington; you have seen him face to face; and he has evidenced to you his intention to know all your wants, to hover over you as his children, and to watch over your rights.

The goods necessary to supply your wants come a great way, and must be brought in ships, and to save expense to you, must be suffered to be carried as far as possible into your country in boats. Long land carriage will be tedious and expensive. This, we have well explained to you before. We are directed by General Washington to talk freely to you, on this subject. We have thought much on it, and suppose it will be difficult at once to fix on the place or places best suited to the establishment of trading posts. But we have come to an opinion, and will give it to you. It is this: It would be best to submit to our father, General Washington, to fix on the places. He will do nothing but for your good. If one place is sufficient to supply your whole nation conveniently, he will choose but one; if you find two necessary, he will fix on two. We think the stores and post of protection should be over the line, and these are our reasons: You and your families will be on your own ground, your persons and your property will be safe. There will always be a garrison of federal troops stationed there, to preserve order and good government; they will of course protect you, as you see they do here. The officers of the United States will always command there, and your men and warriors, and hunters, may always safely come to them. The place or places need be but small, sufficient to raise bread for the traders, the garrison, and their red friends, who may visit them. They will want beef, bread, and milk, as your people will, who visit them. They will, of course, want ground for stock and for corn. But we do not wish the land should become ours. Whenever the trade shall be removed, and it shall be no longer necessary for a trading, or military post, it shall return to the Indian people, and be as one of their old towns.

The commissioners then explained the boundary lines of the United States, and of the Indians; explained the nature of the guarantee in the New York treaty; introduced arguments to show the watchfulness of the Government of the United States, to protect the red people in their rights; adverted again to trade. That, in the regulation of it, the President would direct, that every article of goods should have a stipulated value. The advance permitted to the traders, if such should be suffered in the nation, on articles purchased at the trading house, to be fixed; weights and measures might be introduced in every town; the young warriors and hunters, can then bring their leather, throw it into the scales, and at once know its value, and the value of the goods they are to receive for it; every trader will sell at the same price when they are permitted, and the distance is the same from the trading post.

The commissioners then observed: We hear that the nation has been badly supplied with goods, and those have not been well assorted. When we agree on the place, and shall have had time to make the necessary arrangements, there will always be a full and well assorted store, and at a reasonable price. The United States are determined to make no profit to themselves; they intend the trade to be carried on solely for the benefit of their red brethren. The President will appoint persons to procure of the manufacturers at the cheapest rate. The goods will be brought to the trading house, with the addition only of cost and charges, annexing thereto only so much, as that the trade will support itself. The Indians who apply at the store, will purchase at the first cost, covered as aforesaid, and as cheap as the traders. The traders must have a small profit, where they are permitted, and in proportion to the distance from the trading house. This advance will be stipulated, sufficient only to indemnify them for their trouble; and the prices at which they must sell, shall be posted up in every town.

We have spoken much on this subject, but we shall still have more to say. If we can agree on a proper place to carry on the business, we will do it; but we wish that our agreement may be temporary only, as, if it should be found to be improper by the President of the United States, he will alter it for the best. They then adverted to the high prices of many articles, particularly that of powder; explained fully the causes. They then adverted to the establishment of schools, which had been mentioned on a former occasion. They explained fully the advantages; among others, that the sons of those present, when they became old men, and chiefs, and warriors, they could transact the affairs of the nation like the white people, without being subject to imposition from designing characters, or interpreters; that they might keep a record of their transactions in their own tongue, or in English.

CUSSETAH MICO replied: That the Indians, when educated, turned out very worthless; became mischievous and troublesome, and involve the red and white people in difficulties. That they had many melancholy examples of this sort, without an exception.

The commissioners replied: The President has heard that your young men educated in our towns turned out so; and the reason might be, that they associated too much with our bad people. They were furnished with money, out of the sight and correction of their parents, associated with the wicked who were intruders, and neglected the advice of sober good people. They associated with vicious young men, and from bad examples acquired bad habits; bad examples produce bad morals. So frequent do we experience this, that our laws are severe to correct it, and executed sometimes with rigor, even to the putting men to death for stealing their neighbors' property. But your youths, educated in their towns, would be under the eye, and receive the directions of their fathers and mothers. This subject was further enlarged upon, but received with such dislike by the Indians, that it was postponed.

The commissioners then, adverting to the boundary line, said—

BROTHERS OF THE CREEK LAND:

We have examined the talk which you have given to us, and believe your statement true, except in one point. It is the boundary line. This line was established at New York in the treaty there. It is the main south fork of the Oconee, called Apalachy. It was hoped that the treaty at New York would accommodate all differences; but you, it seems, were dissatisfied, as well as your brothers of Georgia, and mutual complaints have been made to the President. Georgia had given you something, and the United States gave you some valuable goods, and are to pay you fifteen hundred dollars a year. You have complained to us of two forks; we have examined and find them to be on the right side of the line. If you had come and run the line according to treaty, no difficulty or difference would have happened. The embarrassment occasioned by Bowles, we have heard of; but McGillivray carried some copies of the treaty with him to the nation, and he is to blame if he did not make you acquainted with their contents. The people of Georgia, who took possession of the lands, thought them theirs; and the President, on examining the treaty, and hearing their complaints, must have thought so too. The Georgians, who own this land, have paid taxes for it; and perhaps some of the very money raised by them, is now expended in providing necessaries which support us here. Copies of the treaty were sent into the Creek land, and some to Georgia; then, if they had not believed that the land was theirs, they would never have attempted to settle it. This subject was much dwelt on and explained, that the Georgians should be blameless. The commissioners then proceeded:

The President being surprised that this part of the treaty should be misunderstood, determined to put all his future talks on paper, and send them into the nation previously to calling them together, that the Creeks might think of them beforehand, and know the business on which they were to meet. We also were ordered to see that every thing was interpreted in a manner to answer its being understood.

You see we have five sworn interpreters. We have taken all the pains we can to ensure fairness in the negotiation; and we intend, when we have agreed on the outlines, to put it on paper, and explain the whole again.

The treaty of New York was sent to your nation in tin boxes, to ensure your getting it safe, and McGillivray was directed to promulgate it throughout all your land.

CUSSETAH MICO answered: McGillivray never collected the nation, or shewed the treaty at all; nor did the nation ever hear of this part of it till lately.

The Superintendent said he was satisfied it was within three years, that the Indians were informed of this part of the treaty, and that he communicated it then to them; that the Hallowing king shed tears on hearing it.

The commissioners then explained the boundary between Spain and the United States; took a comprehensive view of the late Indian war; its issue, and the present boundary of the United States with foreign Powers, and the boundary with the Indian tribes; pointed out the object of the United States in running their southern boundary, and called on the Indians to aid them with guides and hunters.

The commissioners then informed the Indians, that, on the next day, they would see their brothers of Georgia.

Copy of a note sent this morning to the Commissioners of Georgia.

Mr. Hawkins requests the commissioners of Georgia to return his notes as soon as they conveniently can, as he has not as yet had time to copy them. The commissioners of the United States expect to see the Indians this morning, at the square in the Indian encampment, at the request of the Indians, and they will call on the commissioners of Georgia to accompany them.

June 23.—The notes here mentioned, were those of the talk received from the Indians on the twenty-second.

COLERAINE, June 23, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

The last correspondence we had the honor of receiving from you, on the disagreements on our first arrival between us, told us that you would inform us of the proper time to commence the conferences between the Indians and ourselves, and that you would attend our calls.

We gave our talk the next day after yours, and now call on you, agreeably to your promise, for a conference with the Creek nation, at which we may receive an answer to that talk.

We are, respectfully, your most obedient servants,

JAS. JACKSON,
JAS. SIMMS.

By order of the Board of Commissioners:

THOS. ROBERTSON, Secretary.

Honorable Commissioners United States.

Received on the 24th, and answered.

COLERAINE, 24th June, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

We did, on the day we addressed the Indians in public council, inform you, that, in our opinion, you should commence your conference on the next day. The want of a copy of your communication, caused a short delay, among the Indians, in making their reply for you, which they sent to us.

We attended them at their request, and received the reply to our address, both of which we communicated to you. Yesterday was the first day since we could meet them on business, and we called on you, in the morning, to know whether you would, on that day, meet the Indians, and being told that you would not be ready till this morning, we did, in the presence of the commissioners, who attended our conferences with the Indians, inform them that you would meet them, this morning, on the object of your mission. The Indians have a square of negotiation in their encampment, to which they are attached, and, at their request, we shall meet them there. We have only to add that no time should now be lost in negotiating with them; that we shall meet them, every day, in council, and that your business shall be a primary object.

Honorable Commissioners of Georgia.

This morning the commissioners of the United States went to the Indian square of negotiation. One of the gentlemen requested Captain Eaton to call on the commissioners of Georgia, and conduct them to the conference; this he attempted to do, and waited some time for them; but left them and came on. After waiting two hours, or more, the commissioners received this letter:

COLERAINE, June 24, 1796.

GENTLEMEN: Among a variety of circumstances, which have happened since our arrival, highly grating to our feelings, one has just happened which we are sorry for, as Captain Tinsley has been so polite as to wait on us, to assure us it was contrary to orders, and we were on the way to meet you at the conference.

We have been stopped by the picket, which refused the passage of our secretary; he had our papers, and we were compelled to return.

Although we are of opinion with Captain Tinsley, and thank him for his attention, we cannot forbear to express how much we feel, that we should be at all liable to such interruptions, in the exercise of our duty to our country.

We are, gentlemen, with great respect, your obedient servants,

JAS. JACKSON,
JAS. SIMMS.

Honorable Commissioners of the United States.

We immediately returned this answer, and requested Captain Eaton to deliver it to the gentlemen:

MUSCOGEE, 24th June, 1796.

GENTLEMEN:

We have to lament that any incident should have happened, during your being here, grating to your feelings. We have never intended any thing that should be capable of that construction.

The apology of Captain Tinsley was proper. We, ourselves, called on you, yesterday, to conduct you here, and, this day, Captain Eaton did the same. We have felt, on all occasions, a disposition to accommodate you, in obtaining the objects of your mission; and, it is to be regretted, that difficulties should obtrude themselves unnecessarily.

The Indians are now in council, waiting your arrival; we have apprized them of your intention of seeing them. They appear well disposed; we have postponed entering on the business, more immediately connected with our mission, to give place to yours, as a primary object; and we shall wait one hour longer for you.

We have the honor to be, with due respect, gentlemen, your obedient servants,

Honorable Commissioners of Georgia.

The commissioners of Georgia attended, and the council opened.

The commissioners of the United States, by Mr. Hawkins:

REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CREEK LAND:

This paper, which I now show you, is the paper you sent us in answer to the beloved men of Georgia. We have showed it to them; you are now together, face to face. I shall read it to you, that you may know, and say, whether it is your talk, and your determination. The talk being read, paragraph by paragraph, and interpreted, is as follows:

The chiefs, here present, wish to inform the three gentlemen, commissioners, sent by the President of the United States, of what they have to say, respecting what they had told them, by the three gentlemen, commissioners from Georgia.

The chiefs, here assembled, say, that the three treaties, mentioned by the commissioners of Georgia, at Augusta, at Galphinton, and at Shoulderbone, that there was not a full representation of the nation at any of those treaties above mentioned. Therefore, the nation, in general, never looked upon any of them as binding. The chiefs, here present, say, that, at Shoulderbone treaty, there was a number of men present under arms, which frightened the Fat king of the Cussetahs, and the Tallasse king, into what was done respecting the relinquishment of any lands. That the other two treaties, at Augusta and Galphinton, were both carried on in like manner, and without a full representation of the nation. The chiefs, here assembled, say, that, in consequence of such management, they look upon no treaty binding on their nation, but the treaty held at New York; as those men that went on there, before the President of the United States, were invested with full power to make every thing that was done there binding on the whole Creek nation.

The chiefs say, that they were told, by their beloved man, McGillivray, after they got into their own land, from Congress, that no property was demanded of them, but what was taken after the peace was concluded between Great Britain and the United States. Such property that has been taken since, we, the chiefs, have done our endeavors to return. Some negroes we have returned. The white persons we have given all up. Some horses we have returned; and have returned more horses, but, the great sickness that raged among the horses in our nation, put it out of our power.

The negroes cause great disputes among us, in our land, with respect to returning them, as some are sold, and bartered, from one to another, and the property paid for them consumed, by those who got it, which makes it a difficult matter for us to obtain negroes under those circumstances; however, there is some still in our land that can be come at; and we, the chiefs, will do every thing we can to return them. The chiefs, here present, say, that, with respect to the line agreed upon, while they were at Congress, was as follows: That the line was, as they understood it while at Congress, to begin at the head of the most northward branch of the Oconee river, known to the Indians by the name of little Oconee, which heads up near Tugelo, and to come down the said stream, till it intercepts the old line run by the British, and there to cross the Altamaha, according to the old British line, and, on said line, to St. Mary's river. This is the line, the chiefs say, that was to begin high upon the Oconee; men, according to their agreement at Congress, were appointed, and prepared to run it. But, the day before they were to start, one Bowles came into their land with a deal of talks. They were convinced, since, they were all lies. Nevertheless, his talks made a great deal of confusion in their land, and was a great obstruction to their performing their promise to the President of the United States.

We, the chiefs, were told, at a general meeting of our whole nation, by our beloved man, Mr. McGillivray, that, as soon as this line, before mentioned, was run, and completed, that he was assured, by the President of the United States, and his Congress, that no more demand should be made for any Indian lands; and that he, the President, would suffer no future encroachments to be made on the Indians' hunting ground. They say they were, likewise, told by Mr. McGillivray, that it was, likewise, agreed on, at Congress, that after those lines were run, that if they found any stock of any kind, whatsoever, on their grounds, that they were at liberty to make them their own, or, if they even met any white man hunting on their hunting grounds, that they were at liberty to strip them of all they have, but spare their lives. The chiefs say, that the burning of houses, destroying hogs and cattle, are mentioned to them; such things are done on both sides; what was done, not long ago, at the Little Oakfuskees, and many other things of the like nature, we do not mention; which we could do, with propriety, if we were to look back.

The chiefs answer, to this demand, respecting negroes, horses, hogs, cows, and other property, that the great body of land on the Altamaha, from that up the Oconee, and across over to Ogechee, all which is now settled, or at least claimed by the citizens of Georgia; that this boundary includes a great body of land relinquished by the Indians; on the land, they say, there is a great deal of timber, pine and oak, which are of great use to the white people, which, they say, they send to foreign countries, and brings them a great deal of money: on this land, they say, there is a great deal of good grass for cattle and horses, and a great deal of good feed for hogs; on this land, they say, there is a great deal of tobacco made, which, likewise, brings a great deal of goods into Georgia; all these things, they say, is productive of great advantages to their friends, the white people. This land, the chiefs of the Creek nation say, they have had no consideration for, any ways adequate to the value of it. The chiefs mention, that even the very streams of water are found valuable for mills to grind the wheat and corn that is made on those very lands; the pine trees, that are dead, are valuable for tar; all these things, they say, are lasting profits; if they have had a little goods, in one or two seasons, they are rotten, and gone to nothing.

The chiefs say, they mention the profits that arise from those lands to the citizens of the United States; they do not mention it that they wish to be paid more for it; they are, they say, poor people, and can remain so.

The chiefs say that, notwithstanding all they have been told from the President of the United States and his officers, that no encroachments should be made on their hunting grounds, that, on the west side of the Oconee, high up, that is, from fort Fidius upward, that the woods is full of cattle, hogs, and horses, some of which range near the Oakmulgees. Besides that, those woods are constantly full of white men, hunters, even going about in the night, hunting deer with fire light. They say their hunters, in consequence of such proceedings, are frightened, and drove in from their hunting grounds; every cane swamp, where they go to look for a bear, which is part of their support, is near eat out with the stocks put over by the citizens of Georgia; none of those stocks they have as yet molested. The chiefs say, they are now asked for their land, as far as the Oakmulgee river, and across, from the fork of the Oconee, and Oakmulgee rivers, to the head of St. Mary's. We are told that those lands are of no service to us, but still, we consider that, if we can hold our lands, there will always be a turkey or a deer, or, in the streams of water, a fish to be found, for our young generation, that will come after us. We are afraid that, if we part with any more of our lands, that at last the white people will not suffer us to keep as much as will be sufficient to bury our dead. The chiefs say that the white people, their friends, must, and do know, themselves, that, if they part with any more of their lands, that they will bring ruin on their children; that they are increasing in numbers, as well as the whites, and that, before long, every fork of a creek, where there is a little good land, will be of use to them, and every stream of water, where there is a fish to be found.

The chiefs say, that though there is Flint river, and the Oakmulgee river, and also that Oconee, that ought to be between the Indians' territory and the whites; yet, just before they left their towns, to come down here, there was a party of their hunters frightened, and run into their towns, from over below the Oakmulgee and Oconee, by the white horsemen from the State of Georgia, near opposite Shoulderbone. They say, how much worse would this be, if the whites had the land to the Oakmulgee bank; the stock then would be put over that river, and of course range to Flint river, which is to the borders of their nation.

The chiefs say they are told by the commissioners of Georgia, that they have a large quantity of goods, aboard of a ship, to give to the Indians, for the land they want of them. These goods, they say, are theirs; the land belongs to the Indians, and they wish to keep it, and hope the white people from these circumstances mentioned, will think they are right; and keep their goods for other purposes.

The whole being interpreted, the commissioners enjoined it on all the interpreters to be particular, as they were on oath; and put a question to the chiefs:

Is this the talk which you made in council, and sent to the beloved men, commissioners of Georgia?

Answer.—Yes, it was the very words we spoke.

Question, by the Commissioners of Georgia. Why did not you say this face to face to us, in the square, where we spoke to you?

The representatives of the nation directed that Alexander Cornell should be the principal speaker, to answer all questions which shall be made to them.

Cornell.—The chiefs could give no other reason, than that they choose first to sit together in council, with their interpreter, and reduce their talks to writing. But that they were ready to give it verbally, when digested, at any time, and in the square, face to face, if the commissioners choose they should do so.

Question, by the commissioners of Georgia.—Is this your usual custom, to carry in talks in writing, or do you always give them from the voice, in the public square?

Answer.—There is no rule reduced to system. When they talk among themselves, it is usual to talk face to face, and to send beads to assist the memory. But, as we had, in this instance, a talk to deliver to white people, and having our linguists all present, we chose to send our answer in writing.

Question by Georgia commissioners.—Have the Indians any method, in their nation, of making tar out of dead pine trees?

Answer.—The Indians all know these things well, and have seen it done. That, when the trees are dead, and nearly rotten, the white people take the light wood, cover it with dirt, burn it, and the tar runs out, which they spread over the ships.

Question by commissioners United States.—Have you any other talk, or any thing more to say, on these subjects, to the beloved men of Georgia?

Cornell said, he would explain himself to his friends, his father, and brothers.

The talk he had given was the general voice of the whole nation, and spoken by him at their request; he does not wish to trouble or tire the commissioners with a long talk; he had a little to say, and begged he might be heard.

The talk you have got, is the talk of the whole nation; and, if they were all here, they would all say the same. As for talking any more about the land, it is needless to talk any more. If you are determined to take the land, to drive us off, and make us poor, it must be so. If the sharp weapons of defence are to be taken from us, and as our dependence is on the white people, we must be driven from our lands, and made poor. We must, we suppose, submit.

We have been a great while sitting on public talks; we have become impatient, and want to go home. We are used to hunger, and want rest, in our own country. But we are tired, and want to go home, and wish the talks may be closed this day.

Commissioners United States, by Mr. Hopkins:

BROTHERS OF THE CREEK LAND: In one of the answers which your speaker has given, it is insinuated that the people of Georgia are capable of taking your lands. The people of Georgia cannot take your lands from you. They are guaranteed to you by the treaty of New York. Your brothers of Georgia came here to buy the land, and to offer you a valuable consideration for it; so that, if you are willing to sell, they will bargain with you for it. If you do not choose to take what they have offered, or may offer, you can say what you would take.

Cornell.—I have a little more to say. There was a good deal of talk at New York, and disputing; but I found the right of it out yesterday. After the treaty at New York, and all the people got home, Mr. McGillivray called the nation together, shewed them the line which Congress had described, and the whole nation agreed that it should bet he line, and that they know nothing of any other agreement, and, if there were, it was not the act of the nation.

On hearing of this line, they sent word to General Washington that it should be so, but they knew nothing of any other line, but found out yesterday that McGillivray had made a secret contract, and had kept it hidden from them.

Upon a conference between Mr. Jackson and Cornell, on the subject of certain treaties, the commissioners remarked that the Government of the United States did not acknowledge the validity of the treaties in question. The treaty of New York was valid. That Georgia, upon the Declaration of Independence, and until the ratification of the Confederation, possessed competent authority to make treaties. But then, that authority was vested in Congress; of course, any act, purporting to be a treaty, while the authority was vested in the confederation of Congress, the commissioners could not acknowledge to be valid.

The commissioners told the chiefs they were done for this day, but that they should meet them again to-morrow, early.

In the evening we received despatches from the War Office, covering some copies of "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace upon the frontiers." This is very important information for us; it will enable us to do away a number of difficulties, suggested by the Indians, in their private conferences with us; as well as furnish arguments, to impress that confidence of which we have given them repeated assurances, in the uprightness of federal measures.

June 25th.—The Indians attended early this morning, and the conference opened with a description of the act received last evening. The Indians were informed that this was a law of the land, and calculated to carry into effect some of the promises made at New York. That the treaty, there made, was the basis of the promises on the part of the President, and that this act is made, and contains the provision necessary, to carry those promises into effect.

The commissioners explained the boundary line in the first section, stated its extent, and that the act was a remedy, through the whole extent of it, for the abuses committed by the whites and Indians.

They then explained the whole act, and promised, at the request of the Indians, to give them two copies for their nation. In the course of the explanation, it was deemed necessary to give a narrative of some difficulties, which existed between the United States and their neighbors; and the delay, in consequence, in making effectual arrangements to carry all the stipulations of the Government into effect.

They then said, you see that the white people have had their difficulties, and that it required time to set matters to rights. They have now adopted measures which are likely to put all their affairs to rights, and carry all their promises into effect. You now see, our great council have done much to bring about a happy conciliation. We now must also do something. It now remains but to come to a good understanding with your brethren of Georgia, and to adjust some other matters with us for your benefit. The Georgians have claims for negroes and property taken, which they call upon you to restore to them. General Washington has sent this law to us, which we have explained; it shows that he means to take care of your rights, and those of his white children. He will place his warriors on your lands, near the line, if you consent thereto, to take care of you. He will cause justice to be done to you, and he expects you will do justice to the white people. As soon as you and the Georgians have settled your differences, we will say to the citizens of Georgia, you shall do justice to your red brothers. The President is like a father; he knows that his white and red children of Georgia and the Creeks have had a quarrel; he looks over them as his children, and will decide between them. Your complaints on both sides have been carried to him.

The commissioners then explained the misunderstanding arising from the settlements of the lands over the Little Oconee; they stated that the treaty had been sent to the white people, who saw that the Apalachy was the line; they settled accordingly; you said the Oconee was the line, and thus arose a misunderstanding; and perhaps this very misunderstanding is the cause of ill blood between you, and the murders committed in some part of that neighborhood. The people of Georgia sent complaints to the President that you were dissatisfied with the lines, and did not keep the treaty; that you withhold the negroes and property from them, taken since the treaty, and that you were taking more from them. Your father the President, when he had heard these complaints on both sides, said to us, go to Coleraine, there meet my red and white children, hear the complaints on both sides, and settle the difficulties between them. Go, said he; I will invite all my red children to meet you there, and will direct them of the beloved men of Georgia to meet you also; let them both state their complaints to you, do you hear them, and settle every thing between them, and cause the hatchet to be buried for ever. And, while you are doing this, I and my old council will be making a regulation, which shall make good what you do. Your young people are some of them mad, some of the young people of Georgia are mad also. But we are not; we are old men, sent here from all parties to reconcile differences, and what we do, must be good. War is a miserable curse; it gratifies the foolish pride and ambition of the young and thoughtless, but entails wretchedness on all who feel its influence.

Peace is a blessing; peace must be re-established, and the depredations of war forgotten; wisdom must interfere. The young and ambitious must be taught to respect the decisions of their wise and old chiefs; they must be taught to be content with their lot of peace; they must be taught to respect the law, to acquiesce in its decisions, and not to attempt to be judges in their own case. If they will not be taught this, they may be assured, red and white, that their father will extend his arm, and correct.

The commissioners then took a retrospective view of what had been said, recapitulated the most material parts, and concluded: We hope you will think seriously on these things; we have come a great way to settle your difficulties; and "we wish you would, to-morrow, come and sit down in temper, and talk over your affairs with the beloved men of Georgia; we will hear you, and arbitrate between you. Your Great Father has sent us here for that purpose." [A request from Colonel Hendricks, present.]

Fusatchee Mico replied:

We do not know what more can be said to the commissioners of Georgia. We have given a decided answer to the requisition for land. If Georgia has any other business to introduce, let them mention it, that we may know what business will come before us. If we were to talk again, it would only be the same thing over again. The talk already given is the determined voice of the whole representation, and not one of them can be dissuaded from his determination. Any proposition on the subject of land, will meet the same answer; therefore, this subject is done with; and I cannot see the propriety of further conference. I have already told you that our bounds were so contracted that we have hardly ground to hunt upon, and that the nation would not agree, at all, to part with any more land.

Mr. Simms, one of the commissioners of Georgia, replied:

The commissioners of Georgia understood the chiefs yesterday. But, as the beloved men of Washington thought it would be proper to talk again, they came here to day to hear; and, being more fully convinced of your determination not to sell your lands, we have nothing further to say on the subject. That they were under the direction of the beloved men, commissioners of the United States; if they thought proper that further talks should be made, the commissioners of Georgia are disposed to do so.

Mr. Clymer observed:

The commissioners of the United States have no individual wish, nor interest, any farther than equal justice to the parties induce it, in conformity to instructions.

Mr. Hawkins:

CHIEFS OF THE CREEKS LAND: You know, some time ago that this business, respecting your land, rested entirely with yourselves. The President sent his talk to you, and told you, if you were willing to sell your lands, say so; if not, say so. There was no compulsion.

Fusatchee Mico, replied:

We have now spoken to the commissioners on both sides; we wish to retire and consult together, and will call on you and talk again; we will retire, and return immediately.

Mr. Hawkins. Very well, take your own time; we will wait and attend on you, whenever it is convenient for you.

The chiefs returned in about half an hour, and made a short speech. They recapitulated what was done at New York; their understanding of the treaty, and that of the boundary, was the Little Oconee. They declared this to be the understanding of those who went to New York, and that they had communicated it to the nation, the spring after their return; and that the whole nation expected this to be the line, and no other.

The commissioners informed the Indians they would attend again to-morrow.

The commissioners and chiefs met.

June 26th, 1796.

Alexander Cornell.—The Indians wished to know the opinion of the commissioners, relative to the boundary debated on yesterday, and to receive their advice.

The commissioners explained the line, according to the treaty of New York; and they advised that the Indians should concur in it. The Indians enumerated many difficulties attending it, and proposed to run the line from the Currahee to a fort near the falls of the Apalachy, two days' walk below the source of the river. The commissioners said, no; they must abide by the line of New York; and if there were any settlers over that line, they should be removed back; we are not now bargaining with you; if we were, we might accommodate you. But the land now belongs to the people of Georgia; they are uneasy about it, and we must hold the line good as understood by the President.

Chiefs.—The claim is new to us; we heard it three years ago for the first time, and some of our chiefs shed tears, but we did not believe what was then said to us, it being directly contradictory to what all of us, who went to New York, said was the truth. We now suppose what you say must be the understanding of the President. But it is new to us, and, having never met the approbation of the chiefs, makes it hard on our parts to concede to it.

Commissioners.—We must abide by the instructions of the President in this affair; he understood the line as mentioned in the treaty, or he would never have had it signed, or now insist upon it.

Chiefs.—It has been understood by us, that the Little Oconee was the line; but we see that we have been imposed on, perhaps by our beloved man (McGillivray.)

Commissioners.—We expect you have been, some how, imposed upon by your chiefs; but we cannot help it; we cannot depart from the line marked out by the treaty, as understood by the President. The people of Georgia are, as well as you, dissatisfied with this treaty; they say, this is their line, and also, they ought to have the line from the Oconee and Oakmulgee, to the head of St. Mary's. The people who own these lands in the fork of the Apalachy, are dissatisfied at your claims; they hold to the treaty of New York. They have paid taxes for their property, and, perhaps, some of their money goes to pay for the beef and rice we now eat at this treaty.

Indians.—Our objections go to the right of the thing; we do not know we ever consented to part with them, and, believing this, we think we have a right to complain that we are not fairly dealt with. This line comes to the neighborhood of Chatahochee; these rivers have their source in the same grounds.

Commissioners.—We supposed the lines had been fully explained between McGillivray and Knox; and the same must be run by good men of the two parties. You will view the map, and you will see where it must be.

Indians.—We see and know. It is but half a day's walk from these sources to the Apalachicola; it borders too near upon our country.

Commissioners.—We know the distance you mention, but the treaty was not made here; it was made at New York, and ratified by the President and his old council. One of us was one of the Senate at the time. If it has not been explained, the fault was not the President's, and we cannot allow it in favor of either of the parties.

Indians.—We are sorry for it, and think it hard.

Commissioners.—We have come, to see justice done to both parties. The treaty is our guide; it is expected on one side, it must be adhered to on the other. This line is ratified by treaty, and must be considered valid, and carried into effect. You know, in all our proceedings, we have been candid; we have explained the treaty, we have explained the claims of Georgia, and we have explained the guarantee to you; this shows you the uprightness of the disposition of the Government. And we must repeat, we have no power to make any alterations of this treaty, to the injury of the people of Georgia. You and they must abide by this line, unless you and they bargain to alter it, and we approve of it.

Indians.—If we agree to that line, the cattle-hunters will be running into our country, and ours into yours, and peace will never be certain.

Commissioners.—We will again explain some parts of this law, and we can only add, that it will be carried into effect, and that no infractions of it should be committed with impunity.

Indians.—These lands are in the heart of our hunting grounds, which makes us strenuous to retain it. We have had, on former occasions, assurances, such as you now make. We once caught a man hunting on our grounds; we took him to the nation, and took his beaver trap from him; but a demand came for the trap, and we were obliged to give it up.

Commissioners.—The Indians might have given permission to the man to hunt. Of course, he ought to have had his trap returned. Under the law we have explained, you see the case would be different now.

Indians.—We are not satisfied; we must, and do, insist on the line as we understand it.

Commissioners.—We have answered you already. If we were now making the treaty, we could talk about that line; but, as the treaty is made, we cannot alter it. You see, in the first section of the law, the line that is drawn between the red and the white people. It is according to the treaty, in its whole length, and this law will have effect as extensive.

Indians.—That land which McGillivray defrauded us out of, we know not if he had money for it; we never received a farthing for it—we mean that in the fork; but if you will keep it, we must lose it: we cannot help it.

Commissioners.—You see the stipulations in the treaty for the cession of claims; if the annuity is not paid, it is still due, and will be paid, according to agreement.

Indians.—We do not know that any goods have been received on this account. Chenah said yes, there was some sent up by one Higgins, from the Rock Landing.

Commissioners.—Exclusive of the goods, fifteen hundred dollars are to be paid, which, it appears, have not been paid; but when the treaty of New York is fully complied with, the annuity will be punctually paid. And we can assure you, that the President will not suffer any fraud to be practised against you; that the treaty would be faithfully observed by, and on the part of, the United States.

Indians.—If the line was so high up the river as to keep cattle from crossing the river, it would be better; but to extend it to the sources and small streams of the river's head, would render it impossible to prevent cattle, hogs, &c. crossing, which would be a source of eternal bickering and disagreement; nor would it be possible for all the soldiers in the world, to prevent it, or even to remedy it. If the line could be drawn to some high bluff, where the river is not fordable, we would not object, however high it should be up the river. We wish you would let us take your map home into our nation, lay it before the whole nation, and if they agree, it shall be good.

Commissioners.—The objection to running the line on the small streams, applies equally to the line run across the country. The line described by treaty cannot be altered.

Indians.—We think you should accommodate us, by coming somewhat lower than you mention; the line will be very near the Apalachicola, and some of it will cross the waters making into that river.

Commissioners.—We have said all on the subject which can be said on our part. The line must remain, and every part of this treaty must be binding, until altered by another.

A Coweta Chief Warrior, then addressed the chiefs with great energy, violent emotions, and apparent decision. The purport was, that it was time to have a consultation among themselves, to determine for the general good, and to speak decidedly and positively to the beloved men sent by their father.

After a consultation of one or two hours, the chiefs returned, and Alexander-Cornell, their speaker, said, in English, that all had concluded, at last, that the line should be run according to the treaty at New York, and the explanation given by the commissioners; and that, whenever persons should, on the part of the President, be appointed to run the line, the chiefs would appoint one also.

The commissioners then directed him to give the reply, and conclusion of the representation, in the Indian language, which he did.

Question by the commissioners.—Is this the assent of the nation?

Cornell.—Yes. I am directed to speak the sense of the representation, and it is this: The matter in question has been laid before them, since they have been here. It was a strange and a hard matter; a thing which they had not explained to them at New York, and could not explain to the nation. It was with the utmost reluctance that they consented to give the land away; it was like pulling out their hearts, and throwing them away. But, after all, while they can say they find it must be so, that there is no other way to save the rest of the lands, their wives, and their children, and induced by considerations of safety, the representatives of the nation, present, had concurred that the line should be run, as before expressed.

We hope the white people will not be in a hurry to settle the land, till the line is run; that, if there is any stock of the white people's on the land, it must be removed; and that there shall be no further encroachments beyond the present settlement of the white people, till the line is run. That, from the fork of the Oconee and Oakmulgee, up to the mouth of Apalachy, and all up the west side of that river, there have been seen, hogs, horses, and cattle, ranging as far back as the waters of Oakmulgee, all the winter past. As that land is the property of the Indians, these must be immediately removed to the east side of the Oconee. And that will be a convincing proof to us, that the new act regulating intercourse, and to prevent encroachments, will be carried into effect.

The white people come over hunting; they hunt by night, with fire; they go even to the creeks of Oakmulgee, they encamp, and tarry days and nights on the heads of those waters; they carry off fish by loads, and when the Indian hunters come into these lands, they find the whites there, taking their deer and other game; and this they do constantly. This is a complaint, which the whole representation of the nation now present, old and young, make to you. And we require that an immediate stop should be put to this trespass on our rights. The young men, particularly, who are most interested and most injured by it, request this.

I have stated many complaints of the nation, and I am desirous to state the wishes of the Indians. It is, that it be expounded as the understanding of the nation present, that, from the middle of the Oconee, on the east side, belongs to the whites, that there they may do as they please; but that all the west side of this centre line which divides the Oconee, including creeks, and all waters, belongs to the Indians, and that the whites have no right to go there. That, if any cattle, or other property of the whites, be found on the west side of the line, the Indians will deem it a right to consider it theirs.

I am now to address to you a talk from our young men who are present:

The young people have seen, with anxiety, the situation in which the old people have been placed, for several days past: that it was impossible for them to settle the matter in question, without some sacrifice of this sort. They have therefore consented to it, and, at the same time, deeming it immensely valuable to them as hunting ground, being among the best which they possess, they, notwithstanding, make the same reserve respecting the creeks, the ground bordering on them, and that the line shall be down the middle of the Oconee and Talapocka, as the old men had made.

Here you are, the three beloved men, from our friend and father, General Washington, come to talk to the Indians. There are present, also, beloved men from all the Indian tribes; some young men, and some not yet grown up. They have all heard this agreement, and we mean to abide by it; and we all hope the white people will do so likewise. That it shall be perpetual; even when we, who are present, shall be dead and gone, it shall be a standing law to the generations who shall succeed us, on both sides.

This is all which we have to say to-day. We hope you will make a finishing business to-morrow. The people have been here a long while, and are becoming impatient to go home. That, after the talks of to-morrow shall be concluded, we expect the next thing will be preparing to go home.

The commissioners, by Mr. Hawkins, explained the treaty of New York, relative to the boundary; informed the Indians that the line was to be drawn along the centre of the river, and, that their request, relative to this point, was already provided for. As to trespasses on their rights, the law, lately explained, put this on the proper footing for the present, and its operations would most likely produce all they wished.

I must now mention two other things, the one of the utmost importance to you; it is the fixing proper sites for trading posts, and posts of protection; the other, the subject of retaliation. The first, we think, you should leave to the President's discretion, to be exercised for your benefit. I will show you this to-morrow, in the sketch of a treaty we mean to be the subject of that day's conversation.

As to the subject of retaliation, we have already spoken our minds freely to the friends and chiefs of the towns more immediately interested; we shall, notwithstanding, give, at the usual place, our lodgings, some further explanations. We have nothing further to say this day, but we are well pleased with the good sense of our red brethren, and their solicitude to provide for the means of perpetual peace and friendship with their white brethren.

MONDAY, 27th June.

This morning the friends and chiefs of the towns who had lost the Indians, lately murdered on the frontiers of Georgia, paid us a visit. They informed us of every thing appertaining to this transaction, within their reach; their having suspended, on the letter of Mr. Seagrove, the mode usual among them on such occasions, and that now they chose to come privately to talk with us, to know whether they might expect that the murderers would be punished. They understood that the purport of Mr. Seagrove's letter to them was, an assurance that they might here see one of the culprits executed, and that, for this purpose, many of the relations of the deceased came expressly to see this execution.

The commissioners replied, they were pleased with the mode proposed to treat this subject, by the Indians, in private. They then entered fully into the subject; stated the length of the line on the frontiers, as detailed in the first section of the act explained to the Indians. That blood had been spilt by bad people on both sides, the whole length of it. That, if the account was fairly settled for the last three years, the Indians had certainly killed two for one; that, even here, in this neighborhood, the murders at Trader's Hill, and near the Burnt Fort, were not yet accounted for, and they were unprovoked.

That they saw in the invitation, sent by the President, how he, and all the good people, were grieved at the late murders in Georgia; that he called on the Governor of Georgia to cause the laws to be put in execution against the murderers. They were then shewn the steps taken by the Governor and the Legislature of Georgia.

The commissioners then stated, in as striking a point of view as they could, the injustice of the Indian mode of retaliation. That, on the whole line of frontier, there were some people friendly to the Indians; that these people gave notice to the officers of Government of all those who violated Indian rights; that it would be unfortunate, indeed, that any of those friendly to them, should suffer, under their idea of retaliation. They then stated that the business must stop somewhere. If they shed innocent blood, the friends of such would demand satisfaction. The rule among us, explained, in similar cases, our abhorrence of the punishment of the innocent.

They seemed somewhat to give in to our idea: some of them reprobated, in strong terms, a contrary doctrine, and urged that the wicked only should suffer. We subscribed to this doctrine. Whereupon, they urged that these people under arrest should not be included in our terms of expressing the article of amnesty in the proposed treaty. They then left us, with a declaration, that they should see us again on this subject; that they were not yet satisfied; but they must try to reconcile the difference between us on this point, as well as they could.

The commissioners then met the Indians in their own encampment, at the place of negotiation. They explained the draught proposed for the treaty between the parties, and, after having had it read, paragraph by paragraph, and translated. the Indians shewed some uneasiness at the wording of the articles relative to trading or military posts; thought that the whole savoured of an encroachment on their lands. They named Wallars, an unfit place, twelve miles below Beard's bluff, on the south of the Altamaha. They seemed unwilling to be suspected of wanting confidence in the Government of the United States, yet could not bring themselves to cede any fit place for an establishment. Upon this, we left them to their own reflections, and returned to our place of residence. After we had left them, they said they were apprehensive they had done wrong, and that we were angry with them, but they could not help it, and they would consult, and see if they could do better to-morrow.

TUESDAY, 28th June.

This morning spent in conversation with several influential chiefs, on the subject of retaliation, and restitution of property. The chiefs promised to fulfil these two articles, as explained, as far as was in their power. They said they had already delivered much property, and would still persevere; but there were many difficulties. That there was not much in the nation, nor ever had been, nearly to the amount contemplated by the pretended claims of the commissioners of Georgia. They said, after they should have carried their present stipulations as completely into effect as they could, they did not expect there would be four thousand dollars behind hand, perhaps not the half of that. That, on the subject of retaliation, they could not clearly understand us, and of course were fearful some embarrassments would result from it. That their long established habits could not easily be done away, although the contrary doctrine, urged by us, was, to some of them, highly acceptable. They said, they would stipulate for the present, and until they heard from the President, about running the line; at that time, they hoped to receive his advice; in the mean time, they would follow ours; and they requested that some man might be sent into their nation to explain fully these points, in their towns. That such a man, coming from the President, should be treated as if he were the President himself.

The commissioners then went to the square of negotiation, and the Indians all assembled immediately.

Fusatche Mico addressed the Indians:

The Big king of the Cussetahs reverted to the unfinished business of yesterday; hoped it would be settled to-day. He reverted to the place by them proposed yesterday, as that was not satisfactory to the white people. They had examined fully among themselves, and would now, without reserve, go the utmost extent of their powers. They had concluded on a place about one or two miles above Beard's bluff; it was the first bluff on the south side of the river, above that station. This, or any place below, you may take, and we will freely give it up, on the terms you propose. As soon as our talks go up to the President, we will mutually agree on some other place.

We present, know, General Washington, and his beloved men present, and Major Seagrove, mean nothing but to do rightly by the Indians. But this is not known to all the Indians; they cannot conceive it so, and have some fears and jealousies. We have fixed on the place we mention. But, still, we will leave it to General Washington, and the people whom he appoints, when the talks of the President come into our land.

The upper line on the Apalachy is fixed on: when the President sends word to run that, proper people, on our part, will be present, to assist in doing it. And if it should be deemed proper, by the President, to fix a post for his warriors on our side of the line, up any where there, it shall be then fixed on; that this was the wish and sentiment of all present. That, at the time aforesaid, it should be in the discretion of the President to choose the necessary post for his warriors, to be fixed on; and the people attending from their nation should concur in it.

Fusatche Mico said: I have taken the necessary time to investigate the matter clearly, and make it understood by all; and I have now come to a conclusion. As soon as I saw the establishment of forts made by Clarke, broken up by Washington's warriors, it was a satisfactory demonstration, that General Washington meant nothing but their good; and consequently, we have all determined to confide in him. He then mentioned the pains taken by him and others, upon hearing of Major Seagrove's intended visit to the nation, to meet and conduct him safe, and his constant advice to his people, to listen to the talks of the agent, as they were the words of Washington himself. The young men following this advice, restored peace in their land. We have now done; you have your choice, on the terms mentioned, of such posts as Washington wants; we will now go upon trade, and other points, settle the whole, as we are impatient to be going home.

Mr. Hawkins expressed the satisfaction of the commissioners at their decision, and assured them it should be adhered to; and as they relied on the President for their protection, and for the protection of their lands; as they had confidence in him, and were willing he should judge of the places suitable for the protection of their rights; and as, to use an expression of theirs, they deposited their safety, and the tenure of their lands, in the hands of General Washington, the commissioners pledged the faith of the Government, that both should be secured.

The line of boundary, between us and Spain, was then explained; the extension of the guarantee as stipulated in the treaty of New York. The chiefs were then required, that when this line was to be run, that they would furnish two chiefs, and twenty hunters, to act as guides and hunters. After considerable pains in explaining this, the chiefs agreed.

The article for the restoration of property, according to the New York treaty, was then introduced and explained, and its extension, according to the new article. These points were urged as indispensable, and that they must be attended to, and carried into effect.

The article of amnesty was then introduced, conformable with the stipulations concerted with the chiefs.

The commissioners then, in token of the friendship of the United States, and in testimony of their approbation of the conduct of the Indians, during the negotiation, and for the considerations mentioned in the treaty, gave the Indians goods, to the value of six thousand dollars; and promised, moreover, two blacksmiths, one for the Upper, and one for the Lower Creeks.

Mr. Hawkins, then told the Indians, the commissioners would recapitulate what was agreed on; and the next day they would introduce the whole in form of a treaty, have the same explained, and if approved, it should then be signed; one copy given to them, and one sent to the President; that if he and his old counsellors said it was good, it should be binding on all parties:

1st. The treaty of New York, to be carried into effect, with the exceptions in this treaty.

2d. The line to be run from the Currahee, to the source of the main south branch of the Oconee, called Apalachy, at the discretion of the President.

3d. Trading posts, at the discretion of the President, any where on the Oconee, or Altamaha, as soon as he deems it advisable to run the upper line; in the mean time, and as long as there may be occasion for the same, the place above Beard's Bluff, is given.

4th. The line between Spain and the United States, to be run as mentioned. Hopewell and Holston treaties, valid.

5th. Restoration of property, under the treaty of New York, and since taken, to be faithfully made.

6th. The United States, as by the New York treaty, guaranty to the Indians, all their lands, within the boundaries of the said States.

7th. General oblivion of the past, and amnesty extended to every person, except those under arrest, now in the State of Georgia.

8th. The present of goods, to the value of six thousand dollars, to be now given.

9th and last. The two smiths to be sent to the nation.

These points being all recapitulated, Mr. Hawkins added: The commissioners now hope, as there appears a fair prospect of accommodation, that the old men on both sides would observe moderation; that they would adhere strictly to the stipulations, and teach their children to keep this treaty forever.

CUSSETAH MICO.—I have a short request. I wish to know whether the stipulation respecting the annuity, be still valid?

Answer.—Yes, as soon as the treaty is carried into complete effect.

I must also add, we are much in want of hoes, saws, drawing-knives, and such things.

Answer by the commissioners.—You can have your annuity laid out in these articles.

The commissioners then informed the Indians, that they should prepare two originals of the treaty on parchment, and attend here to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, to have them signed.

We received a paper, signed by the commissioners of Georgia, dated this day, purporting to be a protest against certain proceedings, affecting the object of the State of Georgia.

After the draught of the treaty was read, explained, and amended, and approved by the Indians and commissioners, Mr. Seagrove requested of the commissioners, to take such measures as they deemed advisable, on the subject of his request of the 26th, marked A. They, in conformity therewith, determined, that the examination should be in full council of all the chiefs, and that it should be now had.

The message from the superintendent, dated St. Mary's, in Georgia, 6th April, 1796, marked B, addressed to the chiefs, was then read by Mr. Hawkins, by paragraphs, and interpreted to the Indians. After this was finished, the commissioners put the following questions, and received the answers as recorded.

1st. CHIEFS OF THE CREEK LAND: Is this the talk interpreted to you by Mr. Seagrove, agent in your land?

Answer by the chiefs.—Yes, it is the same, word for word.

2d. By the commissioners.—Was there any other talk sent you, before or since this talk was interpreted to you, relative to the objects of it?

Answer.—No.

3d. By the commissioners.—Has Mr. Seagrove, or any of his agents, at any time, advised you against selling your lands to the people of Georgia?

Answer.—No. No white man, or any other man, employed by Mr. Seagrove, ever advised any such thing; we advised among ourselves, and determined not to sell them any lands.

The commissioners then requested Mr. Thomas King, to administer an oath to the agents and interpreters, to answer such questions as should be asked of them, which he did.

The persons sworn and interrogated, were Timothy Barnard, James Burges, and Alexander Cornell, Richard Bailey, and Richard Thomas.

Question by the commissioners.—You have heard the message read. Is this the message received from Mr. Seagrove, sent to the Creek nation?

Answer.—Yes.

2d. Question by the commissioners.—Have you, or any of you, any knowledge of any talks from Mr. Seagrove, not to part with their land?

Answer.—No: we have not heard of any such.

29th June.—The commissioners this day met the Indians, in the square of negotiation, at 12 o'clock. Present James Seagrove, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, C. N. Henry Gaither, Lieutenant Colonel Commandant; Constant Freeman, A. W. D. Major of artilleryists and engineers, Samuel Tinsley, Captain 3d sub legion; Samuel Allinson, Ensign 2d sub legion; John W. Thompson, Ensign 1st U. S. sub legion; George Gillaspie, Surgeon L. U. S. Timothy Barnard, D. A. and sworn Interpreter; James Burges, D. A. and sworn interpreter; James Jourdan, Richard Thomas, Alexander Cornell, sworn interpreters; William Eaton, Captain 4th U. S. sub legion, commandant at Coleraine.

The commissioners then exhibited the two draughts of the Treaty, had them interpreted, article by article, as follows:

A treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded between the President of the United States of America, on the one part, and on behalf of the said States, and the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, of the Creek nation of Indians, on the part of the said nation.

The parties being desirous of establishing permanent peace and friendship between the United States and the said Creek nation, and the citizens and members thereof, the President of the United States, by Benjamin Hawkins, George Clymer, and Andrew Pickens, commissioners, whom he hath constituted with powers for those purposes, by, and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the Creek nation of Indians, by the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, representing the whole Creek nation, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The treaty entered into at New York between the parties, on the 7th day of August, 1790, is, and shall remain, obligatory on the contracting parties, according to the terms of it, except as herein provided for.

ART. 2. The boundary line from the Currahee mountain to the head or source of the main south branch of the Oconee river, called by the white people Apalachy, and by the Indians Tulapocka, and down the middle of the same, shall be clearly ascertained and marked, at such time, and in such manner, as the President shall direct; and the Indians will, on being informed of the determination of the President, send as many of their old chiefs as he may require, to see the line ascertained and marked.

ART. 3. The President of the United States of America shall have full powers, whenever he may deem it advisable, to establish a trading or military post on the south side of the Altamaha, on the bluff about one mile above Beard's bluff, or any where from thence, down the river, on the lands of the Indians; to garrison the same with any part of the military force of the United States, to protect the post, and to prevent the violations of any of the provisions or regulations subsisting between the parties; and the Indians do hereby annex to the post aforesaid, a tract of land, of five miles square, bordering one side on the river; which post, and the lands annexed thereto, are hereby ceded to, and shall be to the use and under the Government of, the United States of America.

ART. 4. As soon as the President of the United States has determined on the time and manner of running the line from the Currahee mountain to the head or source of the main south branch of the Oconee, and notified the chiefs of the Creek land of the same, a suitable number of persons, on their part, shall attend, to see the same completed; and if the President should deem it proper then to fix on any place or places adjoining the river, and on the Indian lands, for military or trading posts, the Creeks who attend there will concur in fixing the same, according to the wishes of the President; and to each post the Indians shall annex a tract of land, of five miles square, bordering one side on the river, and the said lands shall be to the use and under the Government of America: Provided, always, That, whenever any of the trading or military posts mentioned in this treaty shall, in the opinion of the President of the United States of America, be no longer necessary for the purposes intended by this cession, the same shall revert to, and become a part of, the Indian lands.

ART. 5. Whenever the President of the United States, and the King of Spain, may deem it advisable to mark the boundaries which separate their territories, the President shall give notice thereof to the Creek chiefs, who will furnish two principal chiefs, and twenty hunters, to accompany the persons employed on this business, as hunters and guides from the Choctaw country to the head of St. Mary's. The chiefs shall receive, each, half a dollar per day, and the hunters one quarter of a dollar, each, per day, and ammunition, and a reasonable value, for the meat delivered by them for the use of the persons on this service.

ART. 6. The treaties of Hopewell, between the United States and the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and at Holston, between the Cherokees and the United States, mark the boundary of those tribes of Indians; and the Creek nation do hereby relinquish all claims to any part of the territory inhabited, or claimed, by the citizens of the United States, in conformity with the said treaties.

ART. 7. The Creek nation shall deliver, as soon as practicable, to the superintendent of Indian affairs, at such place as he may direct, all citizens of the United States, white inhabitants and negroes, who are now prisoners in any part of said nation, agreeable to the treaty of New York; and, also, all citizens, white inhabitants, negroes, and property, taken since the signing of the treaty; and if any such prisoners, negroes, or property, should not be delivered on or before the first day of January next, the Governor of Georgia may empower three persons to repair to the said nation, in order to claim and receive such prisoners, negroes, and property, under the direction of the President of the United States.

ART. 8. In consideration of the friendly disposition of the Creek nation towards the Government of the United States, evidenced by the stipulations in the present treaty, and particularly the leaving it in the discretion of the President, to establish trading or military posts on their lands, the commissioners of the United States, on behalf of the said States, give to the said nation, goods to the value of six thousand dollars, and stipulate to send to the Indian nation two blacksmiths, and strikers, to be employed for the Upper and Lower Creeks, with the necessary tools.

ART. 9. All animosities, for past grievances, shall henceforth cease, and the contracting parties will carry the foregoing treaty into full execution, with all good faith and sincerity: Provided, nevertheless, That persons now under arrest in the State of Georgia, for a violation of the treaty at New York, are not to be included in this amnesty, but are to abide the decision of law.

ART. 10. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States, by, and with, the advice and consent of the Senate.

Done at Coleraine, the 29th June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six.

The commissioners then addressed the chiefs:

You have assented to this treaty, article by article; we shall now sign it with our hands, and you will do the same.

They replied they would do so.

The remainder of the day was then spent in signing the treaty.

June 30th.—The principal chiefs called, and had a long conversation with the commissioners relative to the stipulations in the treaty. They dwelt much on the article relative to the amnesty; they said they were not quite satisfied of the justice of the act. That the murderers in Georgia would never be punished there, and they had no other reliance than on the justice of the President. We replied, this part of the treaty was well explained, and if they were yet dissatisfied, we could not help it; we had said every thing on the subject that was necessary; that this murdering business must stop somewhere, and we had agreed it should be now. The Government of the United States were at the expense of protecting their rights, and they must be contented and grateful. They said they would do what they could, and they would stipulate solemnly not to do any thing improper till they heard from the President; they hoped this would be in the fourth moon; their young men should remain quiet till then; and afterwards, they should rely on what the President should say to them. In the meantime, they hoped, as soon as the President saw what we had now done, that he would send a man from himself into their towns, to speak one voice through the whole land, and explain every thing exactly as it is now settled.

They said they had had some conversation in council since they settled the article about the posts, and the more they reflected on this, the better they liked what they had agreed to. The hunters said there were some very good places, which they would point out to us before we left them.

The chiefs said, as General Washington would have the choice of the places bordering on the river, for the trade and his warriors, the Indians had one idea on this part of the treaty, which they would now express. They wished General Washington to know, that the eyes of the whole nation were upon him; that they did not want their land marked, but he might mark the cattle, horses, and hogs, belonging to the garrisons, inform the Indians of his marks, and they would be sure to respect them; and if they strayed off at any time, the Indians would be sure to bring them back, if they saw them.

They then concluded, by saying, we have done much to settle the affairs of the nation exactly as the commissioners wished them, relative to the line with Spain, the claims covered by the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokee treaties, the line from the Currahee to the main south fork of the Oconee, and permitting General Washington to fix the posts for trade and his warriors. They should now go home, and do what they could to explain the same to their town's people, before a talk should be sent from the President, that when this went through the land all would be straight.

That, if a man came directly from the President, they would meet him, and go through the whole nation with him, and treat him as if he was the President himself.

The commissioners requested the superintendent to deliver the goods, as soon as possible, to the Indians, and despatch them home.

The Indian chiefs again visited the commissioners, to deliver a message from the children and near relations of the persons murdered on the Oconee, &c. They mentioned the distressed situation of six young children, and some others, whose dependence for support were on those who were killed; that, beside this loss, that some property was taken at the time, to which they had a just claim; that they now applied for that property, the whole of which was not much, but, little as it was, it was of value to the relatives. If the murderers could be punished, this loss would be deemed of still less value, and they should never have mentioned it. But they hoped, as the commissioners came to see justice done, they would order this payment, and order the chiefs to carry it, and deliver it, in their name, to the relatives. The commissioners replied: We told you, some time past, in a private conference, we would do this for those who waited, and relied on the President to see justice done to them; but those who took satisfaction according to the Indian mode, should not be included in our promise.

The commissioners ordered that the superintendent should take order to pay for the property taken at the time the murders were committed, in agreement with their promise.

COLERAINE, 1st July, 1796.

Sir:

We enclose to you, a copy of the treaty, which we entered into the 29th of June, with the Creeks. They came here with the determination, not to part with any of their lands, and this determination was the result of a deliberation of the whole nation, before the representatives left it. We were not apprized of this, till some time after their answer was given to the commissioners of Georgia. The conduct of this State, is viewed by the Indians, as inimical to them; they complain of unfairness in all their intercourse with them; of the recent murders and promise to punish the murderers, as being of a piece with former conduct. They have no reliance on the promises of the Governor, to do them justice, and expect it only from the interposition of the Government of the United States, or the bravery of their young warriors.

Finding that the expectations of the commissioners of Georgia were at an end, we entered on the other objects of our mission, and have assiduously employed ourselves in their attainment.

We have taken unusual pains to explain every thing, and we believe nothing is done, but what was well understood by all the chiefs.

We find, in the present temper of the citizens of this country, that it is indispensably necessary, that the posts and garrisons should be out of the jurisdiction of the State, and solely under that of the United States. Without obtaining this, we saw no prospect of peace on the frontiers; and the jealousy of the Creeks, is all alive on the least mention of an acquisition of land from them. We have freely conversed with the chiefs on the subject, who agree they understand thoroughly the object of the President, and they are pleased with it; that their whole nation will be pleased also, as soon as they shall have time to explain the subject to them. This article is strictly in conformity with what their powers enable them to stipulate from their own statement. Since the signing of the treaty, several of the chiefs have urged that the President should cause the line to be run, as soon as possible, and make choice of the places for the posts. They request, that the lands around the posts may not be marked; and that a mark be put on the stock; which, when they know, they will respect, if any of them should stray off from the garrison.

We have promised them, they should hear from the President in four months.

They have had repeated conversations with us, on the murder of their people by Harrison and others. The friends of the deceased came here, expecting that they should see some of the murderers executed; and they were not a little vexed at the disappointment. The principal chiefs consulted with us privately, that they might know what to do and to say to the relations of the murdered. They told us yesterday, that they should expect the advice of the President on this subject, when he sent a man to run the line; and they would in the mean time follow our advice, and then they would follow his. They urge, that they may not be deceived, and that the guilty may be punished agreeable to what they understand the promise to be of the Governor of Georgia, to the President. They solicit us to pay for the property lost at the time, and direct them to take charge of it, and deliver it to the friends of the deceased. We have promised it.

The line with Spain, we explained fully, and they acquiesced; yet some further explanations will be necessary, to remove the jealousy attached to every act, relative to their boundary. They have asked that this explanation may be sent from the President, with the plan of trade; and that, after he has seen what is done here, that he will have the whole explained in their land.

We have preferred, instead of an increase of the annuity, as contemplated in our instructions, to give the sum mentioned in the treaty. The situation of the chiefs required some attention in this way; yet they were desirous, that we, during the negotiation, should keep every thing of this sort out of view, until they had fully comprehended us, and were ready, having agreed upon the principal points under negotiation, to put them on paper.

We examined into the state of the goods, how appropriated for presents, under the direction of the superintendent, and directed some to be purchased, which were here for sale, at a reasonable price, and suited to the market.

When we mentioned the sum, the chiefs expressed themselves satisfied. We had another motive in this business for satisfying the Indians with the small sum contemplated in the treaty. We were not certain that the chiefs can restore all the property taken from the citizens, according to the stipulations in the treaty, and eventually it may be deemed advisable, in the General Government, to pay up the deficiency, rather than incur the resentment of the Creeks, which they would do, by insisting on a cession of lands.

We send, herewith, a paper, purporting to be a protest on the part of the commissioners of Georgia. It is perfectly in style with all their proceedings here. We shall have occasion to comment on some parts of it, in a letter we shall write to the Governor, to inform him of the pacific disposition of the Indians.

The Honorable JAMES McHENRY, Secretary of War.

Not having leisure to attend immediately to the protest from the commissioners of Georgia, we determined to send a letter to the Governor, and afterwards to send a comment, as soon as we could attend to it.

COLERAINE, 1st July, 1796.

SIR:

Having terminated our mission here, by concluding a treaty of peace and friendship with the Creek nation, we feel it a duty we owe to your Excellency, to make this communication to you, to inform you of the pacific disposition of the Creeks. They have, among other things, stipulated with us, to carry the treaty of New York completely into effect, and to aid in running the line from the source of the main south fork of the Oconee, to the Currahee mountain, at such time and in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct.

The expectations formed by your State, relative to the purchase of certain lands guarantied to the Indians, are frustrated. The representation of the Creek nation came instructed by the whole nation not to part with the lands. We were not apprized of this till our negotiation had been extended to all the objects connected immediately with our mission. We, on being informed of it, thought it our duty to examine whether any improper interference had been used to produce this determination of the nation; and we are of opinion, after the necessary inquiry, that there was not any such interference on the part of any of the citizens of the United States.

From the long, repeated, and friendly conversation we have had with the chiefs, we have been able to draw from them some information, which we owe to our situation to give freely to you. It is, that it will require some time, and a considerable degree of prudence, to impress on the Indians, a confidence in the uprightness of the views of your Government, and in the friendly and peaceable intentions of its citizens, who inhabit the frontiers. And until such confidence is established, we are of opinion that all attempts to acquire land from them, by fair and open purchase, will be ineffectual.

With our best wishes for the prosperity of the State of Georgia, we have the honor to be, sir, your obed<sup>t</sup> serv<sup>ts</sup>.

July 2nd.—Requested the superintendent to send off the Indians, as soon as possible, and to cause a return to be made, immediately, of the stores remaining unexpended. That measures might be taken, as circumstances might require, sent him this note:

COLERAINE, 2nd July, 1796.

SIR:

The commissioners of the United States have passed an order that you should pay to the heirs of the son of Mrs. Cornell, who was killed in the neighborhood of this garrison, with a flag bringing despatches for the garrison, and the superintendent, and some others lately on the Oconee, by persons excepted out of the general amnesty, the value of the articles lost at the time those Indians were killed. But, that this order is not to be extended to any persons, for whom satisfaction, according to the mode of the Indians, has been obtained.

July 3rd.—The Indians were this day receiving their presents. Mr. Hawkins, with some of the gentlemen, visited Trader's Hill, and the lands still higher up, as far as the Corn-house, and the neighborhood of it. They discovered, on the Indian lands, some provisions carefully packed with skins; at first it was judged to be venison, but, from the quantity, probably one thousand pounds, it was supposed to be beef. After return, on inquiry, it was discovered that it was beef the Indians had, notwithstanding the precautions to prevent their being alarmed, deemed it necessary to prepare against the possibility of such a contingency. They, early after their arrival, drew beef, prepared it in their way, by drying it near a fire, and deposited it in places where they could have recourse to it, in case of necessity. On mentioning this to them, one of the chiefs said, the nation had occasion, in times past, to suspect every thing for the worst in any transactions with their neighbors, and, in consequence, their apprehensions were always on the watch. Those who had visited General Washington, and talked with him, face to face, would rely on him, and any promise he made; but, as there were but a few of them, the others still had doubts. That the manner this treaty had been conducted had impressed all who came, with a degree of confidence, unknown among them, in the justice of the Government.

4th July.—The Cowetas and Cussetahs visited us, to take leave.

They requested that the President would cause the troops, at fort Fidius, to be removed as soon as possible. That, after gaining the best information they could, from the hunters, who were present, they now came to recommend one place.

There is a high bluff, a little below fort Fidius, perhaps about one mile below, on their lands. Two miles below this bluff, there is a creek, called Itchee-wam-otchee, and, about three miles above the bluff, there is another creek, called Thlock-laoso, or fishing creek, very valuable, always, for fish, particularly for shad, in the spring. The lands between the creeks is high and good, and, bordering on the creeks, covered with cane, and fine for stock. This is the fittest place for a military post, according to the information which they have obtained.

The chiefs request, that, if this spot is selected by the President, the troops of the garrison, and those connected therewith, only, should be permitted to take fish out of the waters belonging to the Indians.

There is another bluff, about one day's ride, or twenty-five miles, still higher up the river, and the same distance below the mouth of the Apalachy, or Tulapocka, where the old Oakfuskee path crosses the Oconee. They mention this, but cannot recommend it; it is not so high as the other, nor the lands so valuable; however, it is the best they now have any information of, and they thought they would inform us of it.

5th July.—We directed that the remains of the stores, sent round from the War Office, for the use of the commissioners, and their furniture, should be returned to Mr. Price, and held subject to the order of the Secretary of War. The officers having been very attentive to us, during the negotiation, and having had their little stores exhausted by the unusual number of visitors, the climate being unfavorable to health, and the autumn commencing, we requested them to accept the small remains of our port wine.

We requested Mr. Seagrove to have a return of all the stores in the department of the contractor, inventoried, the corn measured, and hold the same in security till further orders, which he would probably receive from Mr. Habersham.

6th July.—Bid adieu to Coleraine, at five o'clock in the morning; came 33 miles to breakfast; where we saw, on the Spanish side of the St. Mary's, at a place called Marbery's, a bed of strawberries, in bloom, and full bearing, many of them quite ripe. Arrived at St. Mary's at 7 in the morning; we came in a boat and oars. We left our boat there to accommodate Mr. Clymer, and came round to Savannah, on the 10th.

11th July.—Saw Mr. John Habersham, gave him a statement of our recommendation, relative to the stores; and, after consultation, it was deemed advisable to send immediately for the corn, and other articles, to this place, and to convert the whole into cash, as this State is amenable for half the expense. The corn, particularly, requiring to be immediately carried to market, as the weasels were likely to injure it much.

COLERAINE, 1st July, 1796.

SIR:

The day before the commissioners, on the part of the State of Georgia, left us, they sent in a paper, purporting to be a protest against certain proceedings had in relation to the wishes of the State of Georgia, to acquire certain lands from the Creeks, at the treaty concluded the 29th ultimo, at this place.

We read it with that attention due to men in their situation; and, we can attest, extravagant as the protest is, that it is of a piece with their whole conduct, during their residence at this place. The best answer to it, probably, would be drawn from the paper itself, by every reflecting mind, after a candid perusal of its contents. We feel, notwithstanding, a desire to remove some impressions, which are intended to be produced by it, and this is the object we have, in giving your Excellency the trouble of reading our comment. It would be sufficient for us to refer you to our letter of this date, the facts therein being incontrovertible; all the expressions in the protest would, of course, have their just weight and no more, but we must enter somewhat into detail.

Your commissioners, frequently speaking of our ruling and arbitrary conduct, forgot that it is only applicable to themselves. It may be necessary to observe, that they have altogether mistaken the nature of their authority, and have assumed a high diplomatic character. This we must suppose, or, otherwise, that they had willingly slighted the terms and conditions of their appointment. Such high self-created pretensions not being yielded to, on our part, is, no doubt, the real ground of the discontent apparent throughout the whole of their performance.

The regulations, mentioned under the first head, are literally in conformity to instructions suggested, we can conceive, by the experience of the past, and they conform exactly to our sense of right. We were surprised that the commissioners of Georgia did not, themselves, discover a special interest, in the observance of some such regulations, considering their tendency to obviate some of the difficulties lying in the way of their own object, had it been attainable in this treaty, as they are now aware of the jealousies of the Creeks in all things relating to this State.

The comment on these regulations in the protest, we do not pretend to understand.

2d. In answer to this, which we hope (though against appearances) not to be designedly misrepresented, we have to state, that the commissioners of the United States did, on the 17th of June, and the commissioners of Georgia, on the 18th, address the chiefs, at the square of negotiation, in the garrison; that, after the latter, the commissioners of the United States said to the Indians: "You have this day heard the talk of our brethren, the beloved men of Georgia; it is a long one, and contains many things. We request you will allow yourselves sufficient time to consider upon it; that you will consider upon the subject with as much coolness and deliberation as if you were within your own square, at your own councils, in your nation. You are in perfect safety at this place; you may choose your ground for deliberation, and shall there be secure from all interruption."

"The chiefs, after consultation applied to Mr. Hawkins, and requested that he would have them furnished with a copy of the talk delivered them by the commissioners of Georgia, and all the papers referred to therein; they wished to have them in their own councils, that they might understand every part, before they made up their minds to reply. Mr. Hawkins applied to Mr. Simms, and Colonel Hendricks, who promised them in half an hour."

"19th June.—This day the Indians applied for the papers promised them yesterday, and we wrote to the commissioners of Georgia: 'The Indians have requested us to furnish them with a copy of the talk you addressed to them yesterday, that they may be able to examine it leisurely in their councils; we have promised it, and we have to request of you to furnish us an authentic copy of the speech, together with the papers referred to therein, which were shewn and explained to the Indians.'

"Mr. Robertson, the Secretary to the commissioners, called on us and delivered the talk, certified to be a true copy, and extracts from some of the papers alluded to. He said the paper containing the claims against the Indians, was an original, that it would take three days to copy it, that the commissioners did not like to trust it in the camp, but they would show it to us, if we were desirous of perusing it. We requested we might have the examination of it at our lodgings.

"20th June.—The Indians spent this day in council, in a square which they prepared for that purpose, in their own encampment. They requested that three of the interpreters should attend them, and named Timothy Barnard, Alexander Cornell, and James Burges; they were ordered accordingly.

"The result of this consultation being delivered to us, we gave it to the commissioners of Georgia.

"23d June.—Extract from a note to the commissioners of Georgia: 'The commissioners of the United States expect to see the Indians this morning at their square in the Indian encampment, at the request of the Indians, and they will call on the commissioners of Georgia to accompany them.'

"24th June.—One of the commissioners of the United States requested Captain Eaton to wait on the commissioners of Georgia, and conduct them to the Indian square of negotiation.

"Extract from a letter from the commissioners of Georgia, relative to the stoppage of their Secretary: 'A circumstance, grating to our feelings, &c. which we are sorry for, as Captain Tinsley has been so polite as to wait on us, to assure us it was contrary to orders. Although we are of opinion with Captain Tinsley, and thank him for his attention, we cannot forbear to express, &c.'

"The commissioners of Georgia attended, and the council opened.

"The commissioners of the United States, by Mr. Hawkins:

"Representatives of the Creek Land:

"This paper, which I now shew you, is the paper you sent us, in answer to the beloved men of Georgia; we have shewn it to them; you are now together face to face; I shall read it to you, that you may know whether it is your talk, and your determination. The talk being read, paragraph by paragraph, and interpreted, the commissioners enjoined it on all the interpreters to be particular, as they were on oath; and they put a question to the chiefs:

"Question. Is this the talk which you made in council, and sent to the beloved men, commissioners of Georgia?

"Answer. Yes; it is the very words we spoke.

“ Question by the commissioners of Georgia. Why did not you say this, face to face, to us, in the square, when we spoke to you?”

“ Answer. The chiefs could give no other reason than that they chose first to sit down together in council, with their interpreters, and reduce this talk to writing; but that they were ready to give it verbally, when digested, at any time, and in the square, face to face, if the commissioners chose they should do so.

“ Question by the commissioners of Georgia. Is this your usual custom, to carry on talks in writing; or do you always give them from the voice, in the public square?”

“ Answer. There are no rules reduced to system; when they talk among themselves, it is usual to talk face to face, and to send beads to assist the memory; but, as we had, in this instance, a talk to deliver to white people, and having our linguisters all present, we chose to send our answer in writing.”

As to the charge of evasive conduct, we might rely on the conclusion of the charge for an acquittal, although, perhaps, it was not intended. We did offer our services, and continued them. But we had no wish that the Creeks should part with their lands, without their own consent. By the manner of stating this charge, one would suppose that the gentlemen of Georgia had such a wish. We told the commissioners of Georgia we were instructed, had the means, and were well disposed to further the objects of their mission. We did, at one time, expect they would come forward and make a serious offer, and that we, with the funds at our discretion, should be able to obtain the object they had in view, by demonstrating to the Creeks that the sum was an equivalent for the lands; and, as this accommodation might have a tendency to remove all misunderstanding between the parties, that it would be for their interest to part with them.

3d and 4th. We refer to the superintendent to answer for himself.

5th. Needs no comment.

6th. This, unintelligible to us. The commissioners of the United States are of opinion, that, under the old Confederation, the authority to make treaties was vested in Congress; and, as to the construction relative to the treaty of New York, we gave the words of the treaty, and the same are again inserted in the treaty we have recently concluded.

7th. The gentlemen commissioners set out with an assumption of powers unwarranted, and close their mission in like form. Being unwilling to pay a debt contracted at the request of the State, they protest against the “ payment, or liability of payment, of the State of Georgia.” They charge, that “ the answer of the Indians, one party thereto, if so it can be called, has been dictated to them in secret council, by undue influence.” This, the gentlemen, in the same sentence, deny themselves. They say: “ The plea of the chiefs, openly declared by Alexander Cornell and the Bird-tail king, their speakers, now being that they refused to giving up the land, was fully determined on in the nation, and that the chiefs came instructed to abide by that determination.”

To this declaration we may add, from our diary of the 25th, the following:

“ The commissioners then took a retrospective view of what had been said, recapitulated the most material parts, and concluded: we hope you will think seriously on these things; we have come a long way to settle your difficulties, and we wish you would, to-morrow, come and sit down in temper, and talk over your affairs with the beloved men of Georgia; we will hear you, and arbitrate between you; your Great Father has sent us here for that purpose.

“ Fusatchee Mico replied: We do not know what more can be said to the commissioners of Georgia. We have given a decided answer to the requisitions for land. If Georgia has any other business to introduce, let them mention it, that we may know what business will come before us. If we were to talk again, it would be the same thing over again. The talk already given is the determined voice of the whole representation, and not one of them can be dissuaded from his determination; any proposition on the subject of land will meet the same answer, therefore this subject is done with, and I cannot see the propriety of further conference. I have already told you that our lands were so contracted, that we have hardly ground to hunt upon, and the nation would not agree at all to part with any more land.”

We deem it unnecessary to say any more on this subject, but, to conclude, that it is remarkable, throughout the protest, that every sentence is at war with some other, and, that the conclusions drawn, always destroy the premises.

With our best wishes for the prosperity of the State of Georgia,

We have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient servants,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.
GEO. CLYMER.
AND W. PICKENS.

THE PROTEST.

COLERAINE, 28th June, 1796.

We, the undersigned commissioners of the State of Georgia, appointed, on the part of the State, to attend a treaty with the Creek Indians, now held at this place, under the authority of the United States, in pursuance of the trust reposed in us, think it our indispensable duty, which we owe to our country, to protest, and we do hereby protest, against the commissioners of the United States, and their Superintendent of Indian Affairs, for certain proceedings affecting the object of the State of Georgia, the relinquishment of the Indian claims to certain lands contemplated in an act of this State, entitled An act for appropriating part of the unlocated territory of this State, for payment of the late State troops, and for other purposes therein mentioned, passed the 28th December, 1794, as the causes of the failure thereof, as follows:

First. We protest against certain regulations of the commissioners of the United States, signed Benjamin Hawkins and George Clymer, posted up at the gates of the garrison of Coleraine, and dated the 26th day of May last; and which regulations are in the words following, to wit:

“ The commissioners for holding a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, in order to prevent quarrels, improper behavior, or mal-practices, during the negotiation, have judged it proper, in virtue of the powers and authorities vested in them, to make the following regulations:

1st. The Indians are to be encamped on the river bank, above the garrison, convenient to the spring and river.

2d. The superintendent is to fix his residence within the Indian encampment.

3d. No citizen of the United States is to be permitted to encamp with, or near, the Indians, except such as are under the direction of the superintendent.

4th. No citizen is to be permitted to enter the Indian camp in arms.

5th. No citizen is to visit the Indians, or hold any conversation with them, except with a permit from the commissioners of the United States, or either of them.

6th. No citizen is to be in arms in the garrison, or neighborhood of it; and on the arrival of any visitors, who may travel with arms, they are to be informed of this order, and requested to conform thereto.

7th. No citizen is to be permitted to sell, or furnish by gift, spirituous liquors to the Indians, or to have any commercial traffic with them.

8th. These regulations are to be posted up at the two gates of the garrison, and at the residence of the superintendent.”

By which regulations the commissioners of the State have been debarred from conciliating the affections of the Indians, and, consequently, effecting the object of their mission. The civil and actual jurisdictional rights of the State have been infringed, and her consequence, in the eyes of the Indians, much lessened; who will be taught, by the conduct which we have experienced, being liable to stoppage by the sentinels, without passports from the Federal commissioners, on our ground, and within the actual limits of the sovereignty of Georgia, from entering their encampment, that the citizens of the State, however high their commission, are inferior in consequence and rights to themselves, and may be insulted with impunity.

Secondly. We protest against the manner of conducting the said treaty, the same being ordered by the President to be at Coleraine, and to be conducted in a fair, open, and honorable manner; and so the talk, or invitation of the President, and the talk of Georgia, were given in a square, or bower, erected in the garrison for that purpose. Since which, without any known reason to the commissioners of the State, the place has been altered to Muscogee, the residence of the superintendent, where the talk of the Indians, in answer to the talk delivered by us, was manufactured, and where the commissioners of Georgia, owing to the regulations before protested against, had no access. The said pretended answer, or talk of the Indians, not being delivered in the usual open manner, in the square, face to face, before the commissioners of Georgia and the United States, but penned in their camp, by certain agents, or interpreters, under the command of the superintendent; and transmitted, not directly, but through the channel of the commissioners of the United States, to us, without being certified by them, or by any attesting witnesses, chief agent, or interpreter. And for this, also; that, in attempting to attend one of the conferences, to which the commissioners of the United States had invited the commissioners of Georgia, we were insulted, by the stoppage of our secretary by the sentinel of the garrison picket. And he having our papers, we were compelled to return, in obedience to the regulations aforementioned.

We further protest against the commissioners for not permitting us to propose questions, or deliver sentiments, during the negotiation, on the subject of our particular mission, without being under their control, and over-ruling arbitrary interference. We further protest against the said commissioners, for evasive conduct towards the State, and her commissioners, in offering their services to procure the land, at one period, and openly declaring, at another, in open council, that it was not the wish of the commissioners of the United States, that the Creeks should part with their lands without their own desire.

Thirdly. We protest against the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, for not counteracting certain reports introduced into the Creek nation, that the Georgia militia were to encounter the Indians at this place, and certain talks sent there, persuading the Indians not to relinquish their claims to the lands contemplated to be purchased by the State, in the invitation of the President, and the act aforementioned.

Fourthly. We protest against the time and place appointed for holding the treaty, both of which we understand were recommended by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, on account of the scarcity of provisions at such a season, and the poverty of the surrounding country; the supplies of the former swelling the expense to an enormous amount, and the latter being, although the property of the Superintendent, inconveniently situated, in every respect, but more particularly for our fellow-citizens to attend, who have suffered from Indian depredations.

Fifthly. We protest against any cession of land within the territorial limits of the State of Georgia, by the Creek Indians, to the United States, whether for the purposes of posts, trading houses, or otherwise, without the consent of the State of Georgia, as contrary to the eighth section of the first article of the United States' constitution, which declares, "The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." Such cessions, for trading houses and garrisons, being now applied for by the commissioners of the United States, with land adjacent, for stock, and to raise corn, within the territorial limits of the State of Georgia, and which, at a future day, may militate with the rights of the State, and be pronounced binding on her, being now to be concluded on at a public treaty, and perhaps may be ratified by the treaty-making power of the United States.

Sixthly. We protest against the decision of the commissioners of the United States, given in open council, to the chiefs of the Creek nation, that the treaties of Augusta, Galphinton, and Shoulderbone, held in the years 1783, 1785, and 1786, whilst Georgia was a free, sovereign, and independent State, unconnected with the treaty-making power of the United States, under the present constitution, were invalid; of course, that cession of the Tallassee country was void.

There was no Federal compact against such cession by treaty, between individual States and Indian tribes, at the time it was made; and if the United States have the right to take a retrospective view, and lop off cessions of part of a State, made before their authority existed, the United States may make different cessions, until they lop off a whole State; and, if one State, they may sever several States—the whole having been formed by cessions at different periods. A melancholy prospect, and more melancholy tie to the Union, for the frontier State of Georgia.

We further protest against the construction of the said commissioners, as to the property the Indians are made liable for, under the said treaty of New York; which construction confines the demand for property plundered from our citizens, to a very humble limit, even as respects negroes, the only article, agreeably to their construction, contemplated thereby.

Seventhly and lastly. We, therefore, protest against the payment, or liability of payment, of any share of the enormous and unnecessary expense attending the present treaty, by the State of Georgia; which, so far from being conducted in a fair, open, and honorable manner, the answer of the Indians, one party thereunto, if so it can be called, has been dictated to them in secret council, by undue influence, and cannot be considered their answer; and for that the State of Georgia has not had a fair and open opportunity to contract for the lands. The plea of the chiefs, openly declared by Alexander Cornell, and the Bird-tail king, their speakers, now being, that the refusal to giving up the land was fully determined on in the nation, and that the chiefs came instructed to abide by that determination; which, if true, is a fraud on the State, and a trick, unworthy the dignity and honor of the United States, transacted through their Superintendent, to fling one-half of the expense of a treaty, to serve their own purposes, on an individual State, which would possibly reap no benefit thereby; and we do, in consequence, protest against any payment, or liability of payment, by the State of Georgia, as aforesaid, for, or on account of, the same, unless it may be such necessities as the commissioners of Georgia, or their guard, or household, may have drawn, and for which only the State ought to be accountable.

JAMES HENDRICKS.
JAMES JACKSON.
JAMES SIMMS.

By order of the Board of Commissioners:

THOMAS ROBERTSON, Secretary.

The talk of the Commissioners of Georgia to the Kings, Head-men, and Warriors, of the Creek nation.

BROTHERS:

The hatchet has been frequently lifted, as well by your mad people, as by the mad people of Georgia. We are now met, under the eye of the great beloved man, General Washington, who has sent his beloved men, the commissioners of the United States, here, to settle all disputes between us and you.

It is true, that many of our people have been killed by your mad people, and it is also true, that many of your people have been killed by our mad people. We are sorry for it, because we were all formed by the same Great Spirit, and ought to live as brethren of the same great family. Yet, when we recollect that we have mad people on each side, we should make allowances for each other; and when we are assured that the conduct of those mad men has not been countenanced by the beloved men, we ought to forget and forgive the blood which has been spilled.

As to the murders on the Oconee, committed by Harrison, and Vessels, and others, the good citizens of Georgia were as much displeas'd at them as you were. It gave the beloved men of Georgia, when they met in council, much pain, and they told the great beloved man, General Washington, so.* They had Harrison, Vessels, and others, taken and bound over to take their trials. Vessels is dead, the breath of life is gone from him; but Harrison and the others are yet to be tried, and, if found guilty, must die the same death as if they had killed white men; so that you see it was not the fault, or the wish of Georgia, that Harrison should spill your blood. We were in hopes to have satisfied you by this, and that, as you promised General Washington you would not retaliate, until you heard from him; but, to our sorrow, some of your people came down, and killed and wounded several innocent persons, who were as angry at what Harrison had done as you were.

BROTHERS: You heard yesterday what the great beloved man General Washington told you, in the talk the commissioners delivered; that you had not complied with the stipulations you had entered into at New York, in all parts; that the prisoners, and property, such as negroes, horses, cattle, &c. were not restored; many of the chiefs now here, were at New York, and promised to do this. You promised to return this property at three different treaties before you went to New York. 1st. At Augusta. 2d. At Galphinton. And 3d, at the treaty of Shoulderbone, where many of your principal chiefs who now hear us, also were. You there promised not only to return all negroes and other property, but to pay all debts due to traders. Very few of the negroes, however, and little of other property, has been returned, notwithstanding those repeated promises, and particularly that you made the President. Many of the owners of the negroes, horses, and other property, are now here, waiting to see if you have them ready. To give them all up, agreeable to your contract with the great beloved man, is necessary and just, or to pay us for them. If Georgia is to be bound by the treaty you made at New York, you ought to be so too; you made it, and you ought to see it fully performed. We white men have no right to take your skins, and give you nothing for them; and you red men have no right to take our negroes and horses, and not pay us for them. We are here, ready to receive the negroes and horses, with the other property you have taken from us; or, if you have not got them to deliver, we are ready to receive payment for them. We call upon the beloved men sent here by the great beloved man, General Washington, to see this done. He sent them here to settle all disputes between us. They are sent here to do justice to you, and they are also sent to do justice to us. Here is a list of property taken by you from us, previous to the treaty you entered into at New York, and we have other demands since that time for property taken, which we will speak of by-and-bye. This list proves that you took, before that time, eighty-nine negroes from us, eight hundred and twenty-five horses, eleven hundred and fifty-nine head of cattle, four hundred and ninety-five hogs, besides other property, and that you burnt one hundred and fifteen houses. The value of this property, if you are prepared to pay for it, is upwards of seventy thousand dollars. Very little of all this property has been returned. We hope now it will be settled, as we are come together under the eye of the great beloved man, to put an end to all disputes.

BROTHERS: We have something further, of great importance to you and to us, and which the great beloved man has told you was one principal reason for calling you here. Our beloved men, and particularly our beloved man Governor Irwin, whom many of you know to be a good man, and no enemy to the red men, sent us here to talk with you, and to tell you truths. Listen, and we will tell them to you.

Although General Clarke, and the people with him, were removed from the Oconee fork by our people, under General Irwin, because they went there without your consent, or the orders of the beloved men, yet they bid us to tell you that they want this land; that they wish to deal fairly with you, and to pay you for it; and they think you ought to part with it on that consideration. The people of this State are very thick settled, and, on the Oconee, they are in such numbers, that they have not land enough to maintain their families. They are like a river, so very full that its banks cannot contain it, so that it overflows the neighboring grounds. They must go somewhere to settle. They cannot return back from whence their fathers came, because the people are full there, and there is no land to be had; if they were to return, their families must starve. They have looked over the Oconee, and find that, between that river and the Oakmulgee, there is a slip of land up to the heads of those rivers, which affords you but little game, and which they, therefore, think, without hurting yourselves much, you may part with to them, at a fair price. We wish to pay you for it, and are desirous of obtaining it, because it will heal all old differences, and rivet the chain of friendship between us so firmly, that it will last for ages, and prevent the spilling of our and your blood, and the blood of our and your children after us. We think, if you deliberate and consider of this matter properly, and how your fathers got possession of the ground you now live and hunt on, you ought to agree with our proposals, and let us have the little slip of land we ask for. We are told that your fathers came from a great distance where the sun sets, a great while ago, because they wanted land, and that they settled the lands you now claim, although other nations then lived and hunted there, who had lands to spare. Now, if we consider this point, we must say it was right to do so: for the earth is a great nursing mother, and supplies food for all mankind. Now, when one nation has fewer people and more land than another nation, which has a great many people, and not land enough for them to live on, the earth being the nursing mother for all, white men or red men, the nation which has fewest people, and most land, ought to part with a little of it to the other nation, at a reasonable price. Now, this is our case. We have not land enough to raise corn for all our people. No red man would refuse a white man something to eat, if he came hungry to his cabin; and yet a refusal of this land will be like a denial of bread to many hungry families, who want to raise corn on it to feed themselves. Your hunts, we are told, are not very profitable on this land, and that it is fit for the purpose we want it, to raise corn for our hungry people.

BROTHERS: We have brought you a large parcel of goods, in the vessel which lays yonder, of great value, which we will deliver the commissioners for you, if we can agree about the land. They will comfort your wives and children, and will be of more value to you than the profits of many years' hunt on the lands we wish to get from you.

BROTHERS: The beloved men here present, know more of the will of the big beloved man, General Washington, than we do; but we believe he would not have sent them here, or for you to come down, if he had not thought that your relinquishing your claims to this land, to the State of Georgia, is necessary and proper to promote peace, and prevent the spilling of blood. We advise you to consult the beloved men on this subject.

As we have come here under the eye of the great beloved man, to settle all disputes, as we before mentioned, we now inform you, that we have a large claim against you for negroes, horses, and the other property taken, and mischiefs committed by you since the treaty you made at New York. Here is a list of what has been taken, and here are vouchers, proofs, to the amount of near forty thousand dollars. As we are now to settle every thing, by desire of the great man, we also call on his commissioners to see the property returned, or compensation made us for it, and also to see that the debts due our citizens in the nation are secured.

BROTHERS: The beloved man, General Washington, has mentioned to you, that the boundary line settled at New York, did not please the State of Georgia; it is true, it did not please us. You recollect, that, by the treaty of Galphinton, the kings, chiefs, and warriors, of your nation, then present, and some of you were there, made a relinquishment of all that tract of country, beginning at the forks of the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, thence, in a southwest direction, until it should intersect the most southern part of the stream called St. Mary's river, including all the islands and water courses of the said stream; thence down the said river to the old line. This relinquishment of claims was confirmed by the treaty held at Shoulderbone, where many more kings and chiefs of your nation attended, and several of them we now see present; those treaties we have here. † Some of your nation, however, complained of grievances, and the great beloved man, General Washington, sent three of his principal beloved men to this State, General Lincoln, Colonel Humphreys, and Mr. Cyrus Griffin, who came here to the Rock Landing, and examined into those treaties; and when they returned, they told General Washington that the treaties and relinquishment of the land were fair. We have their talk to him here, ‡ and they say that it was done with good faith between the people of Georgia and the Creek nation. Some of your people being still displeas'd, you, many of you, went to New York, and there a treaty was held between the great beloved man and you; but no commissioners of Georgia were present, and this land was left out of the boundary line, without the consent of the State. We submitted to it, because the big beloved man had done it, and we were loath to shed blood; but we have not parted with our claim; we always thought we had a good claim, and we think so still. It was at that treaty, and many of you now here were there, that you promised to restore all our negroes and property, with the prisoners you had taken, belonging to our people; you have not returned them, as the President has told you. Now, even on your own ground, until you comply with this treaty, this land must be considered as ours. You cannot expect us to be bound by the treaty of New York, which you made, when you do not comply with it yourselves. But we claim this land under the respective former treaties which you made with us.

! BRETHREN: We long to have the path open, and the chain bright between us; to obtain this, it is necessary that you should give our talks due consideration, and not rashly determine. We have mad men as well as you, and we wish to settle all things amicably, that our mad men, on both sides, may be restrained from doing mischief. We fear this may be the case, if matters are not now settled. We wish you to consult the beloved men, sent here by Gen. Washington, on all the points we have talked on. We look to them to see justice done between us, as the representatives of the President, who is the chief father of us and you.

I do certify, that the foregoing and annexed sheets, are a true copy of the talk delivered by the commissioners of Georgia to the Creek Indians, at Coleraine, the 18th June, 1796.

I do hereby certify, that the foregoing extracts are true copies from the certified copies from the Executive.

Proceedings at the Treaty with the Seven Nations.

At a Treaty held at the city of New York, with the nations or tribes of Indians, denominating themselves the Seven Nations of Canada:

Abraham Ogden, commissioner appointed under the authority of the United States to hold the treaty; Ohnawio, alias Good Stream, Tehologwanegen, alias Thomas Williams, two chiefs of the Caghawagas, Oteatohatongwan, alias Colonel Lewis Cooke, a chief of the St. Regis Indians, and William Gray, deputies, authorized to represent these Seven nations or tribes of Indians at the treaty, and Mr. Gray, serving also as interpreter; Egbert Benson, Richard Varick, and James Watson, agents for the State of New York; William Constable and Daniel McCormick, purchasers under Alexander Macomb.

The agents for the State having, in the presence, and with the approbation of the commissioner, proposed to the deputies of the Indians, the compensation hereinafter mentioned, for the extinguishment of their claim to all lands within the State, and the said deputies being willing to accept the same, it is thereupon granted, agreed, and concluded, between the said deputies and the said agents, as follows:

The said deputies do, for and in the name of the said Seven nations, or tribes of Indians, cede, release, and quit claim, to the people of the State of New York, forever, all the claim, right, or title, of them, the said Seven Nations or tribes of Indians, to lands within the said State: Provided, nevertheless, That the tract equal to six miles square, reserved in the sale made by the commissioners of the Land Office of the said State, to Alexander Macomb, to be applied to the use of the Indians of the village of St. Regis, shall still remain so reserved. The said agents do, for and in the name of the people of the State of New York, grant to the said Seven nations or tribes of Indians, that the people of the State of New York shall pay to them, at the mouth of the river Chazy, on Lake Champlain, on the third Monday in August next, the sum of one thousand two hundred and thirty-three pounds six shillings and eight pence, and the further sum of two hundred and thirteen pounds six shillings and eight pence, lawful money of the said State; and on the third Monday in August, yearly, forever, thereafter, the like sum of two hundred and thirteen pounds six shillings and eight pence: Provided, nevertheless, That the people of the State of New York shall not be held to pay the said sums, unless in respect to the two sums to be paid on the third Monday in August next, at least twenty, and in respect to the said yearly sum to be paid thereafter, at least five of the principal men of the said Seven Nations or tribes of Indians shall attend as deputies to receive and to give receipts for the same. The said deputies having suggested that the Indians of the village of St. Regis have built a mill on Salmon river, and another on Grass river, and the meadows on Grass river are necessary to them for hay: In order, therefore, to secure to the Indians of the said village the use of the said mills and meadows, in case they should hereafter appear not to be included within the above tract, so to remain reserved: It is, therefore, also agreed and concluded between the said deputies, the said agents, and the said William Constable and Daniel McCormick, for themselves and their associates, purchasers under the said Alexander Macomb, of the adjacent lands, that there shall be reserved, to be applied to the use of the Indians of the said village of St. Regis, in like manner as the said tract is to remain reserved, a tract of one mile square at each of the said mills, and the meadows on both sides of the said Grass river, from the said mill thereon, to its confluence with the river St. Lawrence.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioner, the said deputies, the said agents, and the said William Constable and Daniel McCormick, have hereunto, and to two other acts of the same tenor and date, one to remain with the United States, another to remain with the State of New York, and another to remain with the said Seven nations or tribes of Indians, set their hands and seals, in the city of New York, the thirty-first day of May, in the twentieth year of the independence of the United States, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six.

At a Treaty held at the city of New York, by the United States, with the nations or tribes of Indians denominating themselves the Seven Nations of Canada:

Abraham Ogden, commissioner for the United States, appointed to hold the treaty;
 Ohnawio, alias Good Stream, a chief of the Caghnawagas;
 Oteatohatongwan, alias Colonel Lewis Cook, a chief of the St. Regis Indians; Teholagwanegen, alias Thomas Williams, a chief of the Caghnawagas; and William Gray, deputies authorized to represent these nations or tribes at the treaty; and Mr. Gray also serving as interpreter:
 Egbert Benson,
 Richard Varick, and } Agents for the State of New York.
 James Watson,

23d May, 1796.

The deputy, Thomas Williams, being confined to his lodging in this city, by sickness, was unable to be present. The other three deputies proposed, nevertheless, to proceed to the business of the treaty. The commissioner thereupon informed them, generally, that he was appointed to hold the treaty; that the sole object of it was to enable the State of New York to extinguish, by purchase, the claim or right of these nations or tribes of Indians to lands within the limits of the State, and that, agreeably to his instructions from the President, he would take care that the negotiation for that purpose, between the agents for the State, and the deputies for the Indians, should be conducted with candor and fairness.

Mr. Gray then read and delivered the following speech, as from the deputies, written in English:

A talk from the Seven Nations of Indians, residing in the State of New York, and Upper and Lower Canada, to the commissioners of the United States and State of New York, concerning a claim of lands in the State of New York:

BROTHERS: We are sent from our nations to you, and fully empowered by them to treat with you, concerning our lands, or any other occasion that might be attended with good meaning, or cause to brighten and strengthen the chain of friendship betwixt you and us. This power was given us now present, Colonel Lewis Cook, Ohnawio, Good Stream, Teholawanegen, Thomas Williams, and William Gray, our interpreter, at Caghnawaga, the place where our great council fire is held, and where our nations were all assembled, and in full council, and there, to convince you, brothers, and in order that our business might be attended to with care and speed, they gave us their full power to act in behalf of our nations, and that, whatsoever should be agreed upon betwixt you and us, the same should ever hereafter be indisputable, and stand for just to us or any of us. This power was given to us on paper, and signed by all our principal chiefs, and the same paper lodged in the hands of our great brother George Washington, the President, one we had too much confidence in to believe that he would have misplaced a paper of that consequence; however, it does not alter our power; as we have before mentioned, we are sent to you for the purpose of having a final settlement with you, before we return to them: and, brothers, our chiefs' last charges, when we parted with them, at the great council at Caghnawaga, was, to reason the case with our brothers, and to act with judgment: for that, whatsoever was agreed on at this meeting, through us, should stand for just to the whole of our nations.

BROTHERS: At our meeting last fall, at fort George, you, after some conversation, desired us to point out the land we claimed in this State, and accordingly we did.

BROTHERS: You then brought in several objections against our claim, but we could not find either of them to be reasonable, or in any measure sufficiently weighty. If we had ever sold any of our lands, either to the King of France or Britain, or either of the United States, we should of course have signed our names to the agreements, which, if that were the case, we are sensible that such papers would be brought forward against us; and that, too, with great justice; but, so far from any thing of this kind, that we bid defiance to the world to produce any deed, or sale, or gift, or lease, of any of the lands in question, or any part of them, from us, to either the King of France or Britain, or to either of the United States, or to any individual excepting those we have adopted into our nation, and who reside with us.

BROTHERS: You produced to us a copy of a deed from several Mohawks, for eight hundred thousand acres of land, which those Mohawks had as good a right to sell as they have to come and dispose of the city of New York; notwithstanding this, you, at the treaty of last fall, pointed those people out to us to be too just a people, you thought, to do a thing of the kind; but what makes them just in your eyes, we expect, is, because they stole from us, and sold to you. This is what makes them a just people.

BROTHERS: Had we, several years ago, done as those have, whom you call a just people, that is, had we sold off all our lands, then underhandedly sold our brother's, then fled our country, took up arms, and come and killed men, women, and children, indiscriminately; burnt houses, and committed every other act of devastation; and, in short, done every thing we could against our once nearest friends, then, according to what you say of those Mohawks, you would have esteemed us a just people, and therefore would not have disputed our claim.

BROTHERS: From what we have seen within these few years, we have reason to believe that such a people as those are most esteemed in your eyes: we need not mention to you the conduct of the Western Indians, nor of their friends; you can judge who we mean; but it seems those who injure you the most, you are the readiest to serve.

BROTHERS: It seems that, before a nation can get justice of another, they must first go to war, and spill one another's blood; but, brothers, we do not like this mode of settling differences; we wish justice to be done without; and it is so far from the conduct of a Christian People, that we are fully determined we never will resort to such means, unless driven to it by necessity.

BROTHERS: It is our earnest wish to live in friendship and unity with you; and we have always endeavored to persuade our brother Indians to take pattern by us, and live peaceably with you, and to think that our brothers of the United States were a just people, and never would wrong them of any of their lands, that justly belonged to them.

BROTHERS: This we did on the strength of your former promises to us, which we think you remember too well to need them to be repeated. You, who depend on ink and paper, which ought never to fade, must recollect better than we, who cannot write, and who only depend on memory; yet your promises are fresh in our minds.

BROTHERS: We ask for nothing but what is our just due, and that we ever shall expect to get, until such time as you deny your own words; but we could wish that never to be the case: for, if it was to be, it would not only be breaking your promises, but making false speakers of us in all that ever we said to our brother Indians, in your behalf, and encouraging those who always have been endeavoring to injure both you and us, all that ever lay in their power.

BROTHERS: We intreat you only to look back, and consider the privileges your brother Indians formerly enjoyed, before we were interrupted by other nations of white people, who feign themselves to us as brothers, and let justice take place betwixt you and us, in place of arbitrary power: for that, brothers, you very well know, is a thing that never gave contentment to any people or nation whatsoever.

BROTHERS: Formerly we enjoyed the privilege we expect is now called freedom and liberty; but, since the acquaintance with our brother white people, that which we call freedom and liberty, becomes an entire stranger to us; and, in place of that, comes in flattery and deceit, to deprive poor ignorant people of their properties, and bring them to poverty, and, at last, to become beggars and laughing stocks to the world.

BROTHERS: This is what we have already seen; but, however, we wish never to reflect on what is past, but trust in the Great Spirit, that made us all, to so order it that justice may take place, and that better is to come.

BROTHERS: We pray you to take this matter into good consideration, and do by us as you would wish to be done by. Brothers, this is what we wish for: that every brother might have their rights, throughout this continent, and all to be of one mind, and to live together in peace and love, as becometh brothers; and to have a chain of friendship made between you and us, too strong ever to be broke, and polished and brightened so pure as never to rust. This is our sincere wishes.

BROTHERS: We wish, likewise, to enjoy our own laws, and you yours, so far that, if any of our people, Indians, should commit a crime, to any of their brothers, the white people of the United States, that he may be punished, by his own nations, and his chiefs to make good all damages; and likewise, on the other part, if any white person should commit a crime to any Indian, that we, the Indians, are not to take revenge on the person, but to resign him up to justice, and there let him be punished, according to the laws of his nation.

BROTHERS: This we think will be one great step towards strengthening the chain of friendship, and to prevent all differences and disputes hereafter, and that is what we could wish; that after this settlement with you, Brothers, that there never may, hereafter, arise any differences or disputes betwixt you and us, but rather, if any nation, people, or individual, should attempt to cause any difference, or dispute, betwixt you and us, or to intrude, or wish to injure either of us, that we may be all as one, agreed to drive such ill minded people from off our continent, that does not wish to live amongst us in peace.

BROTHERS: These are our sincere wishes, and we hope that you will consider this matter well, and let us make a good path for your children and ours, to walk in after us; this, Brothers, is our greatest desire, to live in peace and love with you.

BROTHERS: As to our lands, we wish our children after us to share their part of the lands, as well as us that are now living; and we are sensible, Brothers, that, if you do by us as you would wish to be done by, were it your case, as it is ours, and let justice speak, and make us an offer for our lands, yearly, exclusive of a small piece we wish to reserve for our own use, we are satisfied, that, as you know the value of the lands so much better than we do, that your offer will prevent any further contention on the business.

BROTHERS: We, with patience, wait your answer.

24th May, 1796.

Speech by the Agents for the State to the Deputies for the Indians.

BROTHERS:

We have considered your speech to us of yesterday, and we find the question, respecting your claim, remains as it was when the conferences between you and us, at the treaty held at Lake George, last fall, were closed. Without some further evidence, it appears to be scarcely reasonable in you to expect we should admit your claim; and the only inducement with us to have it released, or extinguished, is, as we before stated to you, because we desire to live in peace and good neighborhood with you, and to avoid all controversy in future; and, consequently, not any supposed merit or justice in the claim itself, but merely contentment and satisfaction to you, are the considerations in determining as to the amount of the compensation to be allowed to you. We have, heretofore, offered you three thousand dollars, which you declined accepting, without any offer or proposal in return from you; and although it was then intended as a definitive offer from us, we are still willing to add to it, or to vary it to an annuity, in order to which, however, you must now inform us what your wishes or expectations are. This will be necessary, otherwise the negotiations will not be conducted on terms duly fair and equal between us.

25th May, 1796.

Mr. Gray read and delivered to the Agents, the following speech, as from the deputies, written in English:

A speech of the Seven Nations of Canada, and State of New York to their Brothers of the State of New York.

BROTHERS:

We have considered your answer of yesterday, to our speech to you on the day before, wherein you say you find the question respecting our claim remaining as it was when we parted last fall, from the treaty at fort George. Very true, so it does: for, if we remember right, you told us you would give us three thousand dollars for a release, or quit claim, for all the lands in our claim, exclusive of six miles square, to be reserved for the use of the village of St. Regis, and that was all that you could offer, as you was sent there by them that was greater than you. We told you that we was not able to comply with your offer, as we did not wish to bring our children to poverty by an action of that kind, neither did you ask us what we did expect to have for our lands; if you had, we should immediately have told you.

BROTHERS: Now you say, without some further evidence, you still cannot see fit to admit our claim. We pray you, Brothers, to tell us what further proof you wish us to shew, than what we already have shewn. We have told you, time past, and we tell you now, that our claim is just; and as to finding any other nation, or people, that can say our claim is not just, or that there is a better title can be produced than ours, as we told you before, we are sensible that cannot be done in justice; however, for your satisfaction, Brothers, as we mentioned several times before, that if you was not convinced that our claim was just, to be at the expense of calling the different nations, whose boundaries join our claim, and let them be evidences for and against us. We likewise tell you, that if we ever have sold any part of the lands we now claim, to bring forward the papers, signed by our chiefs, and they will end the business between you and us, and for any farther evidence, Brothers, we think it unnecessary.

BROTHERS: We will now tell you what we expect to have, and do justice to you and ourselves; that is, to reserve for our own use in land, to begin at the village of St. Regis, and to run east ten miles, on the line of the latitude of forty-five; then up the river St. Lawrence, from the village of St. Regis, to a place called the Presqu' Isle, which we think is about thirty-five or forty miles from the village; and that distance to continue twenty miles in breadth; this piece we wish to reserve for our own use, which is but a very small piece; and the principal we do offer for your settlements, or any other use you may see fit to put it to. We should think it no ways out of reason or justice, to allow us the sum of three thousand dollars, yearly, which will come to a trifle over one dollar for each person that is now living, and has a right in this claim, which is but a small sum towards clothing a person yearly, when, before your clearing up our hunting grounds, we supported ourselves, both in victuals and clothing, from what nature provided for us, from off those lands.

BROTHERS: Your compliance to these terms will give contentment to the minds of your Brothers, the Indians of the Seven Nations.

26th May, 1796.

Speech from the Agents to the Deputies.

BROTHERS:

We had intended to have avoided all further examination of the merits of your claim, and that the conferences between you and us should have been confined only to adjust the compensation to be allowed to you for the extinguishment of it; but there are some parts of your speech of yesterday, which we suppose ought not to remain wholly unnoticed by us.

BROTHERS: You say there is no other people can be found, who can say your claim is not just; and if we are not convinced your claim is just, that we should be at the expense of calling the different nations, whose boundaries join your claim, to be evidences for or against your claim.

BROTHERS: It would be sufficient for us merely to say, that, considering the objections we have made to your claim, and the very unsatisfactory manner in which you have endeavored to answer them, that it is not reasonable in you to propose, that we should be at the expense of procuring the attendance of the Indians, to whom you refer as witnesses; we will, however, state to you a fact, to convince you that, if they did attend, such is the probability that their testimony would be against your claim, as to render it unadvised even for you to call them.

BROTHERS: The Six Nations of Indians, by a deed, dated the 30th day of November, 1787, and in consideration of an annuity of two thousand dollars, sold to John Livingston, and his associates, for the term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, lands described in the deed, as follows: "All that certain tract or parcel of land, commonly called and known by the name of the lands of the Six Nations of Indians, situate, lying, and being in the State of New York, and now in the actual possession of the said chiefs or sachems of the Six Nations; beginning at a place commonly called and known by the name of Canada creek, about seven miles west of fort Stanwix, now fort Schuyler; thence northeasterly to the line of the province of Quebec; thence along the said line to the Pennsylvania line; thence east on the said line, or Pennsylvania line, to the line of property so called by the State of New York; thence along the said line of property to Canada creek aforesaid." These boundaries you perceive include nearly, if not all the lands you claim, within this State, and the deed is signed by forty-five Indian chiefs, and among the witnesses to it, is Colonel Lewis, the deputy here present. This deed was confirmed by another, dated the 9th day of July, 1788, signed by sixty-six chiefs, and among the witnesses to it, are Colonel John Butler, and Captain Joseph Brandt. These deeds having been given up to the State by the persons to whom they were made, have been lodged in the Secretary's office, and they are now produced to you, in order that you may see them. This purchase by Mr. Livingston, and his associates, having been made without the consent of the Legislature, was contrary to the constitution of the State, and therefore, void; it is, notwithstanding, sufficient to the purpose for which we principally mention it, as it is not to be presumed that these Indians would ever declare, that lands which they intended to sell and be paid for as belonging to themselves, did belong to others; not only so, but if the persons who have subscribed the deeds as witnesses, and having a knowledge of Indian affairs, and some of whom, even Colonel Lewis himself, if we are not much misinformed, assisted Mr. Livingston, and his associates, in making the purchase, were called on as witnesses between you and us, they must declare that they never had heard or believed, that any part of the lands described in these deeds, belonged to any other Indians than the Six Nations; otherwise, they must declare that they were witnesses to a transaction which they knew to be intended fraudulent and injurious to you; so that it must evidently be fruitless in you to depend on the testimony of the neighboring nations to establish your claim.

BROTHERS: When we first came together at the treaty held last fall, and before any formal speeches had passed between you and us, you mentioned that you claimed the lands, also, on the east side of the line between this State and the State of Vermont; but the intent of that treaty being only for the extinguishment of your claim to lands within this State, the lands in Vermont were, therefore, omitted out of the boundaries of your claim, as you afterwards described it to us. This you again affirmed to us verbally, yesterday; and you described the lands claimed by you within the limits of Vermont, as running from Ticonderoga to the Great Falls on Otter creek, thence, easterly, to the heights of land dividing the waters which run eastwardly from the waters which run into Lake Champlain; then along these heights, and the heads of the waters running into Lake Champlain, to the forty-fifth degree of latitude; and we take it for granted, you mean your claim is the same, as well with respect to the lands in Vermont as to the lands in this State. The King of Great Britain, however, when that territory was under the jurisdiction of this State, as the colony of New York, made grants of lands within the boundaries of your claim, as extending into Vermont, without requiring a previous purchase from you, or any other nation or tribe of Indians; which is a farther proof against the existence of any title in you to the lands you claim.

BROTHERS: In 1788 and 1789, we purchased from the Oneidas, Cayugas, and Onondagoes, the whole of their lands, except some tracts which were reserved for their own use; and the lands which we purchased from each of these nations, and exclusive of the reservations, are certainly not less in value than the lands you claim as comprehended within this State. Their title was not disputed: your title is not only disputed, but utterly denied, by us. We are still willing, however, but from motives of prudence and good will only, to place you, in respect to the amount of compensation, on an equal footing with them, and, therefore, will allow you the average of what was then allowed to them, which will be an immediate payment of one thousand two hundred and thirty-three pounds six shillings and eight pence, and an annuity of two hundred and thirteen pounds six shillings and eight pence. The tract, equal to six miles square, near the village of St. Regis, still to be applied to your use, as reserved in the sale to Alexander Macomb. If this offer is accepted by you, it will then remain to be adjusted between you and us, as to the time, place, and manner, in which the payments are to be made.

BROTHERS: We shall now wait for your answer.

28th May, 1796.

Speech from the Deputies to the Agents.

BROTHERS: We have considered your offers to our last speech, and we think that we understand the greater part of them; and we are happy to think, that, after so long a time, you have thought fit to take some part of our speeches into good consideration.

BROTHERS: We did say, there was no people could, with justice, say our claim is not just; and we still repeat to you, brothers, that those deeds you have shown to us, are unjust; that is, we mean, according to all information we can get from Colonel Lewis, who was present when such purchase should have been made, and according to all the conversation we have had with the different nations that should have sold this tract of land belonging to us, and we never understood by these nations, that they had disposed of any lands within our boundaries; and we have, likewise, strictly examined Colonel Lewis, that was present when these purchases were made of those nations, and he solemnly declares, that he did not know of their selling any part of our lands, or any other, only the lands that belonged to them; and, indeed, we take him to be a man of better principles than to be witness to so great a piece of misconduct against his own tribe, and then not inform us of it before this time. We, therefore, must needs tell you, that we think there is a great deception in these deeds, as there has been in many other former purchases from our brother Indians; and to convince you, brothers, that we do not make any unjust demand, was it not for our poverty, we should not have requested you to have been at the expense of calling the different nations for witnesses between you and us, as we wish to convince you that we are a people that always have acted on honest principles, and mean to continue in doing the same. However, it seems you are indifferent about having these nations to come forward; and, for our parts, brothers, we think it to be a great honor to settle matters that concern you and us, amongst ourselves, and not to trouble other nations with our business; we, therefore, are willing to comply with any thing in reason or justice, rather than it should be said by those ill-minded people, that are always trying to invent mischief between us, that we could not agree. But, there is one question we wish to ask you, brothers: had you not known us to be the right owners of these lands, why did you direct your good advice to us at the beginning of the troubles between you and the King of England? We are sensible that a nation or people, without lands, are, like rogues, without friends; of neither is notice taken, or any confidence put in either of them. But we received your council, heard your advice, and your promises to us, and took them to be sincere; and we ever since have endeavored to live up to them with you, as near as possible was in our power. And we believe, we can with safety say, that, since we have been neighbors, that we never have injured you or your properties, even to the value of a fowl; neither have we ever made any demands from you while we could support ourselves by hunting, and always thought it to be a favor to our brothers in the new settlements, rather than to think, or have the least mistrust, that it would be a detriment to your justifying our claim, when made. No, brothers, we put too much confidence in your good and fair promises, to have the least mistrust of any thing of the kind.

BROTHERS: Respecting our lands in Vermont, our claim in that State is the same as in this State, which is just; and, as to the King of Great Britain giving grants for settlements, without requiring a purchase from us, that was not much for him to do at that time; if that had been the only misstep he had taken towards the welfare of his children, we dare say you would not have rebelled against the government and laws of Great Britain, for the sake of obtaining liberty; so we think that but a very small reason why we should be deprived of our rights. And, as we have mentioned to you in a speech, at the treaty of last fall, at fort George, that he did request us to sell these lands to him, and our answer was, to him, that we could not sell our lands, and that we had reserved them for the maintenance of our children after us. And that has always been the advice of our forefathers, never to sell any part of our lands, but to lease them for an annuity, if it was ever so small; and we shall never forget their advice to us. And on those principles our lands were settled: that was, when we could not support ourselves by hunting, that those who resided on our lands must expect to give us some assistance for the use of our lands.

BROTHERS: And, in respect of your last offer to us for our lands in this State, we must beg you to have a little patience, and consider this matter once more; and we will now make you an offer, that we are sure you will not think unreasonable: that is, brothers, we are not able to bring the reserve into so small a compass as six miles square, but, for the anxiety we have for settling this matter to your satisfaction, as well as for our own, we will bring our reserve into as small a compass as possible, without interfering with our plantations: which will be resigning up to you about two-thirds of the reserve, which we never did intend to dispose of on any consideration whatsoever. Still, as we have beforementioned, that we are willing to comply, on any terms, in reason, for the sake of good neighborhood and friendship with you, you will allow us to reserve to our use, as follows: beginning at the head of the second island above Long Saut, on the river St. Lawrence, and run down the stream of said river ten miles below the village of St. Regis; then back into the woods, twenty-one miles; then westwardly, in rear the same distance as in front; and from thence, to the river, opposite said island, to the place of beginning. This reserve, brothers, we will not be able to make any less, without interfering with the plantations of our people, which is out of our power so to do, and an annuity of four hundred and eighty pounds, with all expenses free, to the place where we may agree for the delivery of said payments; if so be you may see fit to agree to this offer, which we are sure you cannot think unreasonable, for we are sensible it will not be more than half a cent per acre, yearly; and the immediate payment to be, as you propose.

BROTHERS: We hope you will not request us to vary from this offer, which we beg you rightly to consider, and let your brothers live as well as yourselves. We will wait your answer.

28th May, 1796.

Speech from the Agents to the Deputies.

BROTHERS:

The offer which we made to you the day before yesterday, was on mature consideration, and appeared to us to be as liberal as you possibly could expect; and it is now to be considered as definitive between you and us, so that it only remains for you to give us your final answer, whether you are willing to accept it or not, in order that the negotiations at the present treaty may be brought to a close. We would, however, explain to you, that a reasonable allowance to you, as deputies, for your services and expenses, in attending this treaty, and such presents as are usual on those occasions, will be made to you, exclusive of the compensations which we have proposed should be for the nations or tribes whom you represent.

30th May, 1796.

Speech from the Agents to the Deputies.

BROTHERS:

After we had made our speech to you the day before yesterday, you verbally suggested to us, that the Indians of St. Regis had built a mill on a river which you call Salmon river, and another, on a river which you call Grass river, and that they had always supplied themselves with hay, from the meadows on Grass river. You describe those rivers, generally, only as emptying into the river St. Lawrence, and being in the vicinity of St. Regis, and it is uncertain whether they, and especially the places on them where the mills are built, will be included in the tract, equal to six miles square, reserved in the sale to Mr. Macomb.

If you had seasonably informed the State of your claim, they might then have reserved lands for your use, to any extent which might have been judged proper; but they have now sold all the lands in that quarter, to Mr. Macomb, and as reservations cannot be made without the consent of the persons who have purchased from him, we have spoken to them on the subject, and they have consented we should further offer to you, that a convenient tract, at each place where the mills are built, and the meadows on both sides of the Grass river, although they may hereafter be discovered not to be within the above tract, equal to six miles square, shall be reserved to the use of the St. Regis Indians.

31st May, 1796.

The deputies having declared their acceptance of the compensation as proposed to them by the agents, three acts, of the same tenor and date, one to remain with the United States, another to remain with the said Seven Nations or tribes, and another to remain with the State, were, thereupon, this day executed by the commissioner for the United States, the deputies for the Indians, the agents for the State, and Daniel McCormick and William Constable, for themselves and their associates, purchasers under Alexander Macomb, containing a cession, release, and quit claim, from the said Seven Nations or tribes of Indians, of all lands within the State; and a covenant from the State for the payment of the said compensation, and, also, certain reservations of land, to be applied to the use of the Indians of the village of St. Regis, as by the said acts, reference being had to either of them, will more fully appear.

The act referred to above, and to remain with the United States, accompanies this report.

THE WIDOW OF A CHEROKEE CHIEF.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 17, 1797.

Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the widow of the late Scolacutaw, or Hanging Maw, one of the chiefs of the Cherokee Indians, reported:

That she complains against the conduct of one John Beard, and a number of armed men, who, she states, in the year 1793, contrary to law and the good faith of Government, attacked the dwelling house of the petitioner and her husband; killed and wounded a number of well disposed Indians; burnt and destroyed and carried away their property, and wounded the petitioner. She now prays, that some provision may be made for her.

After examining the statement made by the petitioner, and the facts upon which she rests her present application, the committee have found some difficulty in deciding what measures would be most advisable for the House to adopt.

Previous to the attack on the Hanging Maw, the frontier settlers of Tennessee, and the Indians in that quarter, had been guilty of mutual acts of aggression and hostility. A party of the Indians had killed some settlers; their trail was discovered, conducting across the Tennessee; this circumstance induced a belief in their pursuers, that the Hanging Maw had been concerned in that business, and occasioned his being wounded, and the misfortunes complained of by his widow. The general opinion, however, represents the Hanging Maw as having been uniformly friendly to the settlers, as vigilant to apprise them of the approach of banditti, and constant in his exertions, on all occasions, to compose differences between them and his nation, and, withal, as possessing considerable influence over the Indians. The same disposition is also attributed to his widow, the present petitioner, who, instead of exciting her people to acts of retaliation, has abated nothing in her friendship to the white people.

All these circumstances seem to countenance, if not to require for her, a pension from the Government, or some other relief from the Legislature. Such a provision might also be considered as extending its influence beyond the particular object, or, as an inciting cause to other Indians, to pursue a similar line of conduct, under circumstances alike cruel and distressing, should they happen.

But, on the other hand, it is to be considered, there are citizens on the frontiers, who have suffered injuries as cruel, and deprivations as severe, by the Indians, and who have been thereby left in situations of distress, that would equally call for assistance from the Legislature. Questions arise, whether both descriptions of sufferers ought to be provided for? Whether the abilities of Government would be competent to meet all possible claims of this nature? And, whether help can be extended, by law, to the one, and consistently refused to the other?

It may be said, that those who settle upon the frontiers, voluntary assume all the risks and dangers attached to that position, and, therefore, can have no just claim upon Government, for consequences resulting from their choice; whilst, on the contrary, policy requires that the minds of Indians, who may be roused to hostility by acts of the settlers, should be quieted by small pecuniary interpositions.

Under these views of the subject, the committee have hesitated what report to make; but, upon the whole, as the authority vested in the Executive Department is competent to meet this claim, and should the petitioner, from her sufferings and her attachment to the United States, appear to the Executive to be entitled to any annual relief, as it may be afforded out of the appropriations for contingent expenses in the Indian Department, without an interference of the Legislature, and, as this mode will probably involve the fewest difficulties, the committee think she should apply to that department; and that the prayer of her petition ought not to be granted.

THE CHEROKEES AND CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 17, 1797.

Mr. ANDREW JACKSON, from the committee to whom were re-committed the petition of Hugh Lawson White, and the report of the Secretary of War thereon, reported:

That it appears by Governor Blount's letters to the Secretary of War, prior to the 7th day of June, 1793, (the day he set out from Knoxville to Philadelphia) the Cherokee and Upper Creek Indians had killed many men, women, and children, upon different parts of the frontiers of the territory south of Ohio, and, that such was the state of hostility, at that time, that he, previous to his departure from Knoxville, issued an order to Brigadier General Sevier, to hold one third part of his brigade in readiness, to march at the shortest notice, to the frontiers, for the protection thereof. Upon Governor Blount's leaving the territory, the government thereof devolved upon Secretary Smith, who, in his letter to the Secretary of War, of the 17th of June, uses these words: "I can see no person who does not appear convinced, that a general war from the Cherokee nation will ensue. Such are the opinions of Major King and Mr. Ore, whose names are mentioned, because they ought to have weight." In his letter of the 22d of June, to the Secretary, he gives information, that the Indians had committed depredations in Wear's Cove, on the 19th. In his letter of the 19th of July, he informs the Secretary, "that, on the 29th of June, a small party of Indians came to one Lloyd's house, more than sixty miles above Knoxville, and about eleven from Greene court house, upon the south side of Nollichucky river, and killed his wife and two children, and badly wounded a third, and plundered the house of every thing of value; that, on the 2d instant, they fired at a man on Pistol creek, burnt the house of Mr. Hog, on Nine-mile creek, with his crop of flax, and cut up part of his crop of corn, and shortly after, they stole seven horses from Bird's station, twelve miles below Knoxville, and the clothes of four families which were in the wash."

The following is an extract of a letter from Secretary Smith to the Secretary of War, dated at Knoxville, August 31st, 1793:

"The expectations that the Indians would invade this district, in great force, seem as though they would be verified. At the appearance of day light, on the 29th instant, a numerous party of Indians made an attack on Henry's station. Their real number cannot be known, and opinions differ on that head, from one hundred to three hundred. Lieutenant Tedford, and another man, had gone out to a corn field, when the firing commenced, at which they attempted to run to the station, but got among the Indians, unexpectedly; the lieutenant was took prisoner, carried about one hundred and fifty yards and put to death, his body mangled in a most inhuman manner. The other man fortunately made his escape, and ran to a neighboring station, from whence all the adjacent frontiers were alarmed; no other man, who happened to be out, was all they killed, besides the lieutenant.

"The upper county militia have not yet come down, but are to be expected in a few days. Had they been on the frontier, I think these Indians might have been intercepted. I have proposed to General Sevier to come down and take the command; his name carries terror to the Indians. Although the number of men on duty here may not be such as would demand an officer of his rank, I have thought it would be most expedient to call for him.

"I have heard nothing of Major Beard since he left Southwest Point; but, ere this, he must have arrived at Nashville.

"Enclosed are extracts of two letters from General Robertson, and an account of Indian depredations, since my former account.

"Tis expected that General Sevier, with the third of the militia of the three upper counties, will be on his way to the frontiers, in a few days. His force, except a few to protect exposed places, I mean to continue in a body, that they may be in readiness to intercept or repel any numerous party of Indians that may invade the country."

Secretary Smith, again, in his letter of the 27th of September, dated at Knoxville, to the Secretary of War, expresses himself as follows:

"I have to inform you, that, besides other previous depredations of the Cherokees, of a less nature, they made an invasion into this district, on Wednesday, the 25th instant, in force, as is generally believed, not less than one thousand. In many places they marched in twenty-eight files abreast, each of which, as supposed, was composed of forty men. Besides, they appeared to have about one hundred horse. They crossed the Tennessee, below the mouth of Holston, on Thursday evening, marched all night towards this place, (Knoxville) and about sunrise, or a little after, attacked and carried the house of Alexander Caveat, about seven miles from this place. His whole family, thirteen in number, fell a sacrifice. As a man of common delicacy would want language to convey to another the horrid manner in which the poor women and children were treated, so do I, to make you sensible of the sufferings of the frontier inhabitants, pent up in their small huts. General Sevier lay, at that time, upon the lower frontier, upon the south bank of Holston, about eight miles from the Tennessee, at one Ish's, with about four hundred men. I speak in round numbers: for I have received no return. He had encamped at Ish's but a few days before. I am now endeavoring to augment his numbers, to enable him to pursue the enemy. The Indians crossed Clinch the same day they killed Caveat's family. Lieutenant McClellan is now out with a party of horse, reconnoitring their movements. General Sevier told me that every night of his stay at Ish's, the Indians were reconnoitring his camp, till his sentinels one night killed one of them; since which, they have been more cautious. This large party of Indians passed up on the north side of Holston, within three miles of the General's camp; and, I suppose, would have marched to this place, but for fear of his intercepting them, as they did not know his numbers. The frontiers are infested with these Indians, from opposite Greene court house, round by Ish's, and up Clinch, upon the Northwestern frontier, a distance of at least two hundred miles. You can better conceive, than I describe, the many sufferings of the frontier inhabitants."

Here follows a copy of a letter from Secretary Smith, to General Sevier, dated

"KNOXVILLE, September 30th, 1793.

"In answer to yours of the 27th instant, which I acknowledge to have received, I hold it would be proper to follow the trail of that large party of Indians who massacred Caveat's family, on the 25th instant; and, if possible, inflict due punishment on them. The country is to be defended in the best manner we can, comporting with my general instructions to you, of the 17th instant."

The committee remark, that Secretary Smith's general instructions, alluded to in the above order, are not to be found in the War Office; but they consider that his letter to the Secretary of War, of the 1st of October, 1795, which has been printed for the use of the members, with the report of the Secretary of War, fully shews that there was nothing in that instruction which Secretary Smith himself understood as opposed to Sevier's pursuing the Indians into their nation; but, on the contrary, in that letter, he informs the Secretary, that he did give the order to General Sevier to pursue the Indians into their nation.

The committee think it proper to add the report of General Sevier to Governor Blount, of the 25th of October, 1793, from his camp at Ish's mill.

"In obedience to an order from Secretary Smith, I marched in pursuit of the large body of Indians, who, on the 25th of last month, did the mischief in Knox county, near the Grassy Valley. For the safety and security of our army, I crossed at one of the upper fords on the Tennessee river, below the mountains. We then bent our course for Hiwasee, with expectations of striking the trail; and, before we reached that river, we discovered four large ones, making directly into the mountains. We proceeded across the Hiwasee, and directed our march for Estanaula, on the Coosa river, at which place we arrived on the 14th instant, discovering, on our way, several other trails leading to the aforesaid place. We there made some Cherokee prisoners, who informed us that John Watts headed the army lately out on our frontiers; that the same was composed of Indians, more or less from every town in the Cherokee nation; that, from the Turkey's town, Sallyquoah, Coosawaytah, and several other principal ones, almost to a man was out, joined by a large number of the Upper Creeks, who had passed that place, on their return, only a few days since, and had made for a town at the mouth of Hightower river. We, after refreshing the troops, marched for that place, taking the path that leads to that town, along which the Creeks had marched, in five large trails. On the 17th instant, in the afternoon, we arrived at the forks of Coosa and Hightower rivers. Colonel Kelly was ordered, with a part of the Knox regiment, to endeavor to cross the Hightower. The Creeks, and a number of Cherokees, had entrenched themselves to obstruct the passage. Colonel Kelly and his party passed down the river, half a mile below the ford—began to cross at a private place, where there was no ford. Himself and a few others swam over the river. The Indians, discovering his movements, immediately left their entrenchments, and ran down the river to oppose their passage, expecting, as I suppose, the whole intended crossing at the lower place. Captain Evans immediately, with his company of mounted infantry, strained their horses back to the upper ford, and began to cross the river. Very few had got to the south bank before the Indians, who had discovered their mistake, returned, and received them furiously at the rising of the bank. An engagement instantly took place, and became very warm; and, notwithstanding the enemy were at least four to one in number, besides the advantage of situation, Captain Evans, with his heroic company, put them, in a short time, entirely to flight. They left several dead on the ground, and were seen to carry others off, both on foot and horseback; and trails of blood, from the wounded, were to be seen in every quarter. Their encampment fell into our hands, with a number of their guns, many of which were of the Spanish sort, with their budgets, blankets, and matchcoats, together with some horses. We lost three men in this engagement, which is all that have fell during the time of our route, although this last attack was the fourth the enemy had made upon us; but, in the others, repulsed without loss. After the last engagement, we crossed the main Coosa, where they had thrown up some works, and evacuated. They suffered us to pass unmolested. We then proceeded on our way down the main river, near the Turnip mountain, destroying in our way several Creek and Cherokee towns, which they had settled together, on each side of the river, and from which they have all fled, with apparent precipitation, leaving almost every thing behind them. Neither did they, after the last engagement, attempt to annoy or interrupt us on our march, in any manner whatever. I have great reason to believe their ardor and spirits were well checked. The party flogged at Hightower were those who had been out with Watts: There are three of our men wounded, and two or three horses killed; but the Indians did not, as I have heard of, get a single horse from us the time we were out. We took and destroyed near three hundred beeves, many of which were of the best and largest kind. Of course, their losing so much provision must distress them very much. Many women and children might have been taken; but, from motives of humanity,

I did not encourage it to be done; and several taken were suffered to make their escape. Your Excellency knows the disposition of many that were out on the expedition, and can readily account for this conduct."

By a recurrence to the laws of the United States for the protection of the frontiers, a new view of this subject will be presented. The fifth section of an act, passed September 29th, 1789, entitled "An act to recognise and adapt to the constitution of the United States, the establishment of the troops, raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, and for other purposes therein mentioned," provides, "that, for the purpose of protecting the inhabitants of the United States, from the hostile incursions of the Indians, the President is hereby authorized to call into service, from time to time, such part of the militia of the States, respectively, as he may judge necessary for the purpose aforesaid." On the 30th of April, 1790, an act was passed "for regulating the military establishment of the United States," by the fifteenth section of which, it is provided, "that, for the purpose of aiding the troops now in service, or to be raised by this act, in protecting the inhabitants of the frontiers of the United States, the President is hereby authorized to call into service, from time to time, such part of the militia of the States, respectively, as he may judge necessary for that purpose." And by the thirteenth section of the act "for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers," passed March 5th, 1792, it is enacted, "that the President be authorized, from time to time, to call into service, and for such periods as he may deem requisite, such number of cavalry as he may judge necessary for the protection of the frontiers."

These are all the acts of Congress on this subject. It seems worthy of remark, that they give the President power, and furnish him with force, to protect the frontiers, generally, without declaring of what nature that protection shall be. Hence may result, for the consideration of the House, a question, whether those laws do not invest the President with authority to act offensively against the Indians, in case he should judge it the most effectual, or the only effectual method of protecting the frontiers?

The committee, indeed, find, that, on the 8th of December, 1792, the House of Representatives having before them sundry documents respecting Indian depredations, rejected a motion for authorizing the President to carry on offensive operations against some of the Southern tribes. This, however, was long before the expedition in question, and at a time when the incursions of the Indians were far less violent and destructive. The rejection of this motion may also have been occasioned by an opinion, that the existing laws already gave sufficient definition on that head.

The next point, for the consideration of the House, relates to the instructions from the War Department to the Governor of the Southwestern territory. Admitting the President to have possessed the power of ordering such an expedition, had he given this power to the government of that territory? For an answer to this question, the committee refer the House to the instructions themselves, as contained in the printed report from the War Department. They will add, however, one clause of the original instructions, which is omitted in that report. It is contained in the letter of May 14th, 1793, from the War Department, and is in these words: "Dr. Williamson has repeatedly spoken of the danger of the communication between Washington and Mero districts, and that it would be obviated, in a degree, by a small post at the crossing of Cumberland river. This, however, and all other points of defence, must be referred to your judgment."

The committee, also, deem it worthy of the consideration of the House, how far the government of the Southwestern territory, independently of instructions or authority from the General Government, was justified in this measure, by the principles of general defence, as recognised by the constitution. In the tenth section of the first article, it is provided, "that no State shall engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." How far is the present case to be considered as a case of invasion or imminent danger? These are questions, which it is not the province of the committee to discuss, but they have thought them important enough to be presented to the view of the House.

There is, moreover, another view of the subject, which the committee think ought not to be omitted. It is clear, that the Governor of the Southwestern territory was invested with the command of the militia, and with power to call them into service, as well as to direct their operations, while in the field. As to the mode of exercising these powers, he had particular instructions; but, could the militia look farther than to him? Could they refuse to obey an order from him, under the pretence of its being contrary to his instructions? Will not the government, in fine, having authorized him to act in this matter, be bound by his acts, however improper and unjustifiable? If so, it will result that, although the Secretary, in this instance, may have acted improperly, without necessity, or contrary to instructions, the militia who performed service, in obedience to his orders, ought to be paid.

The committee find, by an estimate of the expense, from the office of the accountant of the War Department, that the whole amount of the pay of General Sevier's brigade, in service on this occasion, is $29,426 34, of which $6,609 39, including the pay of that part which did not cross the line, has been already paid; the sum, therefore, remaining due, is $22,816 95, which will be affected by the decision in this case. The whole amount for forage, provisions, &c. has already been paid.

The committee would not consider themselves as having fully discharged their duty, did they not remark, what they have found supported by undeniable testimony, that, since the date of this expedition, no hostile incursions have been made on that part of the frontier; and, that there is much reason to believe, that the peace, since established, has been a fruit of the measure. To this point, the following letter from Governor Blount, dated Knoxville, November 21st, 1793, is important; it is to the Secretary of War, in these words: "We still continue to enjoy an unexpected cessation of hostilities; the Indians, as yet, not having committed a single murder since the visit General Sevier paid the nation, by order of Secretary Smith. I am unable to offer any probable reason for this cessation, as all friendly communication between the Indians and the citizens of the United States, is cut off; but, my opinion is, that it is fear of a second visit, that, for the moment, restrains them." The committee find reason to believe, that this opinion was well founded, and to attribute the subsequent quiet of that quarter, and the final peace, in a great degree, to this measure.

Upon the whole of the subject, the committee beg leave to recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision, by law, ought to be made for the payment of the balance due to General Sevier, and the troops under his command, in the expedition undertaken in the summer and fall of 1793, by orders from the Secretary of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio.

INDIAN LANDS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 1, 1797.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, from the committee to whom was referred the letter and enclosures from the Governor of North Carolina, relative to the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands granted to T. Glasgow and Co. by the State of North Carolina; the address of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, on the same subject; and also the petition of J. Glasgow and others, relative to lands entered in the office of John Armstrong, Esq. and since ceded to the United States, reported:

That the State of North Carolina did, by a law passed on the 2d day of May, 1778, declare the Western boundary, or line of said State, comprehending all the lands then claimed to have been ceded by the Indians, or conquered from them; which line did not extend so far westwardly, or into the Indian country, as the present boundary line between the United States and the Indian tribes; declaring all past entries or surveys to be void, and prohibiting all future entries or surveys over and beyond said line, which was, also, recognised by a law passed the 13th of September, 1780. On the 17th of May, 1783, said State passed a law declaring it expedient to extend the Western boundary of said State, and that the same was, in and by said law, extended to the Mississippi, including the lands in question, and opening a land office for entering and surveying the same, for the discharge of certain debts of said State, contracted during the late war; excepting from such entry and survey, certain tracts described in said act, and declared to be reserved for the Indians and other special purposes. The entries and surveys, which have been made by the claimants on the lands in question, were under said act and an act of the 2d of June, 1784, but it does not appear that the Indian title to said lands has ever been extinguished. The treaty of Hopewell, between the United States and the Cherokee tribe of Indians, made on the 28th of November, 1785, established a line between the United States and said tribe, excluded a large portion of the lands, which are claimed to have been entered and surveyed under said acts; at which treaty the agent of North Carolina attended, and entered his protest against it, as intruding upon the rights of that State: this treaty was, however, agreed to, and ratified by the United States and said tribe, on the 21st of November, 1789. North Carolina acceded to the present constitution of the United States, and, on the 22d of December following, passed an act ceding to the United States all her claim to territory lying west of a certain line, and including all the said lands; in which cession it is, among other things, made a condition, "That all entries made by, or grants made to, all and every person or persons whatsoever, agreeable to law, and within the limits thereby intended to be ceded to the United States, should have the same force and effect as if such cession had not been made; and that all and every right of occupancy and pre-emption, and every other right reserved by any act or acts, to persons settled on, and occupying, lands, within the limits of the lands hereby intended to be ceded as aforesaid, shall continue to be in full force, in the same manner as if the cession had not been made, and as conditions upon which the said lands are ceded to the United States; which cession was, by an act of Congress, of the 2d of April, 1790, accepted. On the 2d of July, 1791, the treaty of Holston was made with the said Cherokee tribe of Indians; in which the present boundary line between the United States and the said Indian tribe, was established, and all the lands lying beyond the said line secured thereby to the said tribe. It appears to the committee that, whatever right the claimants have, can be no other than a pre-emptive right to said land, and only such of them as, by conforming to the laws of the State of North Carolina, so as to have secured to themselves a title under such laws; and cannot claim of the United States any thing more than a confirmation of that title; and, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That, as soon as the Indian title to the said lands shall be extinguished, under the authority of the United States, by purchase or otherwise, provision ought, by law, to be made, to secure to such of the said claimants, as, by conforming to the laws of North Carolina, have secured to themselves a title to the right of pre-emption, under such laws, the occupancy and possession of such lands.

GENTLEMEN:

RALEIGH, December 31, 1796.

This moment the clerk of the Commons House of Assembly delivered me the enclosed petition and resolve, to be transmitted to you to act upon. I forward it in the same instant.

I am, gentlemen, respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL ASHE.

To the Honorable the Senators of the State of North Carolina.

To the Honorable the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina.

The petition of owners of lands, entered in the office of John Armstrong, Esq. and since ceded to the Indians by the United States, humbly sheweth:

That, in the year 1783, the Legislature of this State opened an office for the sale of vacant lands, within the chartered limits of the State, in order to sink part of the certificate debt: That your petitioners, with many other citizens of the State, holding certificates for services performed, or supplies furnished, during the late war, when they saw no prospect of being paid any other way, as the whole revenue of the State would not, at that time, pay the interest of her certificate debt, made entries of land on the Western waters, clear of the lands reserved by said act, for the hunting ground of the Cherokee Indians; and, in some instances, proceeded to survey and get grants for the same, and, in others, held the warrants, with an expectation that the time would soon arrive, when they might more peaceably survey them. However, in the year 1786, commissioners, appointed by Congress, undertook to relinquish, and cede to the Indians, a very large proportion of the lands, sold by the State, to your petitioners, against which the General Assembly did protest; and, at their session of 1788, promised, and resolved, that they would give to the present owners of land, under the act of 1783, aforesaid, quiet possession of the same; but, on the following year, they ceded to the United States, all their right and title to the soil and jurisdiction of that country, stipulating that Congress should make good to the several persons, legally claiming lands in that country, all the engagements of the State. Your petitioners have several times since applied to the Legislature of the State; and been as often referred to Congress, but no redress has been obtained. If this State has sold, as lands to which she has no title, we contend that our certificates should be refunded us with interest; but, as we hold the lands, being the choice of an extensive and fertile country of more value than the price they cost us, we humbly hope that your honorable body, in your wisdom, will point out some mode whereby we may have peaceable possession of them, by procuring the extinguishment of the Indian claim; and we, in duty bound, will ever pray.

J. GLASGOW,
J. G. BLOUNT,
M. MATTHEWS,

For, and by direction of, a large number of the owners of lands, entered in the office of John Armstrong, Esq.

NORTH CAROLINA:

The committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry persons, owners of lands, entered in John Armstrong's office, and since ceded to the Indians by the United States, report:

That, having taken said petition under consideration, and finding the facts therein set forth to be generally true, and it being entirely out of the power of this Legislature to give the petitioners that relief in the premises which they ask, and, of justice, ought to have, recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States are bound, by every principle of justice and equity, to grant complete and ample redress to the petitioners: And, as the honor and interest of this State are deeply concerned in procuring redress to the petitioners,

Resolved, That the Senators of this State, in the Congress of the United States, be, and they are hereby, requested to use their utmost endeavors to obtain complete and ample justice for the said petitioners; which is respectfully submitted.

W. R. DAVIE, Clerk.

IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, 15th December, 1796.

Resolved, That the House do concur with this report.

J. LEIGH, Speaker House of Commons.

By order: J. HUNT, Clerk H. of C.

IN SENATE, 22<sup>d</sup> December, 1796.

Read and concurred with.

By order: S. HAYWOOD, Clerk.

BENJ. SMITH, Speaker of the Senate.

To the Honorable the Congress of the United States:

The memorial and petition of the owners of land in the State of Tennessee, that was purchased from the State of North Carolina, and has since been yielded to the Indians for hunting ground, sheweth:

That your memorialists obtained certificates to a considerable amount, from the State of North Carolina, for services and supplies they had rendered during the war; that the debt of the State being greater, as they conceive, at the end of the war, than the debt of any other State in the Union, considering the number of its inhabitants; and the citizens nearly ruined towards the end of the war, by the general depredations of foreign and domestic enemies; the Legislature, unable to discharge the interest of the debt, opened an office for the sale of land, and offered a large tract to the public creditors, reserving other lands as hunting grounds for the Indians. At a time when the whole taxes in the State, the civil list being deducted, were not equal to one quarter of the interest of its debt, your memorialists may say, with confidence, that no alternative presented itself but to take the lands offered them, or lose the debt. To many citizens it appeared necessary to take lands, for they had nothing left them except certificates; and they had not the fortitude to abide what seemed to them inevitable destruction. After our locations had been made, and our lands surveyed, a treaty was made with the Indians, by the commissioners of the United States, by which our lands were surrendered to the Indians for hunting grounds. It might have been expected, that the Legislature, at their next meeting, would have restored our certificates in case they had improperly sold those lands; but they conceived, as we suppose, that their right, as explained by their constitution, was indubitable, and they solemnly resolved to guaranty our titles, and to give us possession of the lands. We are confident that no deception was intended; but laws and resolves of the State have brought us no relief. The General Assembly, at their session, in 1789, yielded the sole jurisdiction of the western country to the United States, with an express reservation in favor of your memorialists, of all their rights and claims under the State. From year to year, we have patiently expected relief. In the year 1793, we addressed the General Assembly, entreating that such justice might be done us as had been done to other citizens. The assembly referred us to the Congress, and session after session has passed away, but Congress has done nothing in our favor. We have again claimed justice from the State, and we are again referred to the Congress. We hope and confide that the honest claims of citizens will not be eluded by two legislative bodies, upon whom no law can operate, but the clear law of justice. During the late war, we did not shrink from any danger or calamity to which we might be exposed for the public safety, but we cannot discover any reason why we should be marked for destruction in the times of peace, nor why one million of dollars should be taken from certain individuals in North Carolina, in order to make a saving to the nation. Provision has been made for every other citizen; their claims have been funded at 20s. in the pound. We are the only persons to whom justice is refused; we receive nothing but unavailing promises.

While we are seeking for justice, we do not take the liberty to prescribe the manner in which it is to be done. We have no direct claim to any thing, except the lands that are surveyed and granted to our use; nor are we desirous to exchange those lands for other lands, nor for the price at which they were sold us. It was originally considered that we might take up choice tracts in a large country, which contained some of the best lands in America. We made our selection at a considerable expense; and although those lands should be delivered to us free from other charges, we are willing to contribute our proportion of one million of dollars, counting the remaining vacant lands, in order to extinguish the Indian claim, provided immediate possession can be obtained. But, in case our interest should seem to be opposed to the general weal, and the extinction of the Indian claim should be delayed, we pray and confide that justice, in some form, may be rendered us.

J. GLASGOW,
M. MATHEWS,
J. G. BLOUNT,

For, and by request of a large number of the holders of lands, entered in the office of John Armstrong, Esquire, late entry taker of Western lands, and since ceded to the United States, by the State of North Carolina.

RALEIGH, 23<sup>d</sup> December, 1796.To the Honorable the Congress of the United States of America.

The address and remonstrance of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, on behalf of the citizens thereof, setteth forth:

1. It appears, by an act of Congress, ratified in June, 1796, that the State of Tennessee is admitted into the Federal Union on an equal footing with any of the original States, in all respects whatever.

2. At the beginning of the late American Revolution, the United States guaranteed to each State its sovereignty, according to the chartered limits thereof; and, by the treaty of Paris, done in the year 1783, the King of Great Britain acknowledged the United States to be free, sovereign, and independent; and, for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquished all claims to the government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof. It is believed, that this relinquishment operated to each State respectively, according to the chartered limits thereof, as to right of soil and sovereignty; and, in the said treaty, no provision for, or reservation of, any Indian claims, is made.

3. In one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, North Carolina made a bill of rights, in the last section of which is contained a declaration of the sovereignty, right, and property, of territory, as limited and described in the charter of King Charles, with a provision for any nation or nations of Indians, at the discretion of the Legislature.

4. Acting on the principles contained in the first and third sections of this address, confirmed by those in the second section thereof, North Carolina, in the year 1777, opened a land office for the sale of lands, within the limits thereof, as appears from the preamble of the said act, to operate as extensively as the said limits, as is also set forth in the third section thereof; entries of land being to be made with the entry taker of any county within the State, for claims for any lands lying in said county, except as therein excepted. In the year 1777, by an act of the Legislature, the county of Washington was erected, and the limits thereof described, containing all the lands within the chartered limits of the State, lying between the Apalachian mountain and the river Mississippi (which is now the State of Tennessee.) Under this act, the land office for sale of land first began its operations, in the said described county.

5. In the year 1778, an act was passed by the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, in the fifth section whereof, a line is mentioned and described. It is believed, that, by this act and line, as described in the said section, no relinquishment of right of territory is made; but that the said line was declared for certain political reasons of the said State.

6. In the year 1783, passed another act for the sale of lands. This act revives and continues the first act, except what is thereby repealed; and, in its object, embraces the limits described in the act, erecting the county of Washington, before alluded to.

7. In consequence of this and other laws respecting sales of land, by entries made in land offices, and warrants issued thereon, grants have been issued in part, and warrants yet to lie, for lands lying within the original limits of the county of Washington.

8. In the year 1789, North Carolina made a cession of Western lands to Congress, for the use of the United States, under certain express conditions, and subject thereto, ascertained in the act of cession for that purpose; and the contract was solemnly executed by deed, on the part of North Carolina, and accepted on the part of Congress, in behalf of the United States. Part of the conditions of said contract are reported by a committee at the last session of Congress, and the said act provides, that the Governor, for the time being, shall be and is required to perfect such titles, in such manner as if the act had never been passed.

9th. The constitution of the United States confirms all engagements and contracts, entered into by the United States, before the adoption thereof, under existing laws: the enterers and grantees of land, lying within the said original limits of Washington County, expected they were secure, as to the right in fee, and right of possessing the lands by them purchased, and honestly paid for.

10. In the year 1785, the treaty of Hopewell was made with the Cherokee Indians, by the United States; but the agent of North Carolina protested against the same: in the year of 1791, the treaty of Holston was made between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, describing a line as therein mentioned; and, by an act of Congress, passed at the last session, fines, forfeitures, and imprisonment, are enacted against claimants and grantees of land, lying beyond said line, for doing things in said act mentioned.

11. This General Assembly believe, that the enterers and grantees of lands, lying over the said line, are much injured by the operation of the said last mentioned treaty; and are, in possibility, liable to be much more oppressed by the operation of the said last mentioned act of Congress; being thereby altogether prohibited from doing any act of ownership on lands, by them, long time past, bona fide contracted for and paid, for which, in part, grants have issued under the faith of North Carolina and the United States.

12. It is believed that the Indians have no fee simple in the lands alluded to; otherwise the very deeds, made by North Carolina to the United States, would be void. If the Indians have any kind of claim to the land in question, it is believed to be of the lowest kind of tenancy, namely, that of tenants at will.

13. This Legislature, ever willing to support the constitution, and laws of the United States made pursuant thereto, being impressed with a sense of the injury and grievances sustained by the citizens, in consequence of the line of the said treaty of Holston, and the act before mentioned, do earnestly request that the prohibitions, preventing them to possess the lands before alluded to, may be removed; that provision, by law, be made for extinguishing the Indian claim to said lands; that the owners and grantees of said lands may enter upon, occupy, and possess, the same, in a full and ample manner, and have every right, privilege, and advantage, which they are entitled to by constitutional laws; which justice being done to the citizens of this State, the officers of Government will be enabled to execute the constitutional laws of the United States with ease and convenience.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Application having been made to me, to permit a treaty to be held with the Seneca nation of Indians, to effect the purchase of a parcel of their land, under a pre-emption right, derived from the State of Massachusetts, and situated within the State of New York, and it appearing to me reasonable that such opportunity should be afforded, provided the negotiation shall be conducted at the expense of the applicant, and at the desire and with the consent of the Indians, always considering these as pre-requisites, I now nominate Isaac Smith to be a commissioner, to hold a treaty with the Seneca nation, for the aforesaid purpose.

THE SENECA NATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 6, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Isaac Smith, Esq. who was appointed, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to hold a treaty with the Seneca nation of Indians, to superintend the purchase of a parcel of their land, under a right of pre-emption, derived from the State of Massachusetts, and situated within the State of New York, having declined that service, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Esq. was appointed, during your recess, to hold a treaty, which has terminated in a deed of bargain and sale, herewith submitted to your consideration.

It being represented to me that the immediate investment, in bank stock, of the moneys which are to be the consideration of this deed, might be attended with considerable loss to the Indians, by raising the market price of that article, it is suggested whether it would not be expedient that the ratification should be made conclusive and binding on the parties, only after the President shall be satisfied that the investment of the moneys has been made conformably to the intention of the treaty.

UNITED STATES, December 6, 1797.

JOHN ADAMS.

NEW HAVEN, October 28, 1797.

SIR:

It was my intention to deliver the Indian deed into your hands, myself; but, finding it impossible, I sent it by the post, with my journal, by which you will see the Indians expected me to hold the deed until the money was paid. In your hands it will remain, for that purpose. My ill health put it out of my power to, keep a very correct journal, but nothing important is omitted. The speeches of the Indians are correct, and may, perhaps, require your early notice.

I am, sir, your humble servant.

Contract entered into, under the sanction of the United States of America, between Robert Morris and the Seneca nation of Indians.

This indenture, made the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, between the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Seneca nation of Indians, of the first part, and Robert Morris, of the city of Philadelphia, Esquire, of the second part:

Whereas the Commonwealth of Massachusetts have granted, bargained, and sold, unto the said Robert Morris, his heirs and assigns, for ever, the pre-emptive right, and all other the right, title, and interest, which the said Commonwealth had to all that tract of land hereinafter particularly mentioned, being part of a tract of land lying within the State of New York, the right of pre-emption of the soil whereof, from the native Indians, was ceded and granted by the said State of New York, to the said Commonwealth; and whereas, at a treaty, held under the authority of the United States, with the said Seneca nation of Indians, at Genesee, in the county of Ontario, and State of New York, on the day of the date of these presents, and on sundry days immediately prior thereto, by the Honorable Jeremiah Wadsworth, Esquire, a commissioner appointed by the President of the United States to hold the same, in pursuance of the constitution, and of the act of the Congress of the United States, in such case made and provided, it was agreed, in the presence and with the approbation of the said commissioner, by the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the said nation of Indians, for themselves, and, in behalf of their nation, to sell to the said Robert Morris, and to his heirs and assigns, for ever, all their right to all that tract of land above recited, and hereinafter particularly specified, for the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be by the said Robert Morris vested in the stock of the bank of the United States, and held in the name of the President of the United States, for the use and behoof of the said nation of Indians, the said agreement and sale being also made in the presence, and with the approbation of the Honorable William Shepard, Esquire, the superintendent appointed for such purpose, in pursuance of a resolve of the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, passed the eleventh day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one:

Now this indenture witnesseth, That the said parties, of the first part, for and in consideration of the premises above recited, and for divers other good and valuable considerations them thereunto moving, have granted, bargained, sold, aliened, released, enfeoffed, and confirmed; and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, alien, release, enfeoff, and confirm, unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, for ever, all that certain tract of land, except as is hereinafter excepted, lying within the county of Ontario, and State of New York, being part of a tract of land, the right of pre-emption whereof was ceded by the State of New York to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by deed of cession, executed at Hartford, on the sixteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, being all such part thereof as is not included in the Indian purchase made by Oliver Phelps and Nathaniel Gorham, and bounded as follows, to wit: easterly, by the land confirmed to Oliver Phelps and Nathaniel Gorham, by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by an act passed the twenty-first day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight; southerly, by the north boundary line of the State of Pennsylvania; westerly, partly by a tract of land, part of the land ceded by the State of Massachusetts to the United States, and by them sold to Pennsylvania, being a right angled triangle, whose hypothenuse is in or along the shore of lake Erie; partly by lake Erie, from the northern point of that triangle to the southern bounds of a tract of land one mile in width, lying on and along the east side of the strait of Niagara, and partly by the said tract to lake Ontario; and on the north by the boundary line between the United States and the King of Great Britain: excepting, nevertheless, and always reserving out of this grant and conveyance, all such pieces or parcels of the aforesaid tract, and such privileges thereunto belonging, as are next hereinafter particularly mentioned; which said pieces or parcels of land, so excepted, are, by the parties to these presents, clearly and fully understood to remain the property of the said parties of the first part, in as full and ample manner as if these presents had not been executed, that is to say: excepting and reserving to them, the said parties of the first part, and their nation, one piece or parcel of the aforesaid tract, at Canawagus, of two square miles, to be laid out in such manner as to include the village, extending in breadth one mile, along the river; one other piece or parcel at Big Tree, of two square miles, to be laid out in such manner as to include the village, extending in breadth along the river one mile; one other piece or parcel of two square miles at Little Beard's town, extending one mile along the river, to be laid off in such manner as to include the village; one other tract, of two square miles, at Squawky Hill, to be laid off as follows, to wit: one square mile to be laid off along the river, in such manner as to include the village, the other directly west thereof, and contiguous thereto; one other piece or parcel at Gardeau, beginning at the mouth of Steep Hill creek, thence due east, until it strikes the old path, thence south, until a due west line will intersect with certain steep rocks on the west side of Genesee river, then extending due west, due north, and due east, until it strikes the first mentioned bound, enclosing as much land on the west side as on the east side of the river. One other piece or parcel at Kaounadeau, extending in length eight miles along the river, and two miles in breadth. Also, one other piece at Cataraugus, beginning at the shore of lake Erie, on the south side of Cataraugus creek, at the distance of one mile from the mouth thereof, thence running one mile from the lake, thence on a line parallel thereto to a point within one mile from the Conondauweya creek, thence up the said creek one mile, on a line parallel thereto, thence on a direct line to the said creek, thence down the same to lake Erie, thence along the lake to the place of beginning. Also, one other piece or parcel of forty-two square miles, at or near the Alleghany river. Also, two hundred square miles, to be laid off partly at the Buffalo and partly at the Tannawanta creeks. Also, excepting and reserving to them, the said parties of the first part and their heirs, the privilege of fishing and hunting on the said tract of land hereby intended to be conveyed. And it is hereby understood by and between the parties to these presents, that all such pieces or parcels of land as are hereby reserved, and are not particularly described as to the manner in which the same are to be laid off, shall be laid off in such manner as shall be determined by the sachems and chiefs residing at or near the respective villages where such reservations are made, a particular note whereof to be endorsed on the back of this deed, and recorded therewith, together with all and singular the rights, privileges, hereditaments, and appurtenances, thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining. And all the estate, right, title, and interest, whatsoever, of them the said parties of the first part, and their nation, of, in, and to, the said tract of land above described, except as is above excepted, to have and to hold all and singular the said granted premises, with the appurtenances, to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, to his and their proper use, benefit, and behoof, for ever.

In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

ROBERT MORRIS, by his attorney, Thomas Morris.

[Signed, also, by fifty-two sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Seneca nation of Indians.]

Done at a full and general treaty of the Seneca nation of Indians, held at Genesee, in the county of Ontario, and State of New York, on the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, under the authority of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the day and year aforesaid.

JERE. WADSWORTH.

Pursuant to a resolution of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, passed the eleventh day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, I have attended a full and general treaty of the Seneca nation of Indians, at Genesee, in the county of Ontario, when the within instrument was duly executed in my presence, by the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the said nation, being fairly and properly understood and transacted by all the parties of Indians concerned, and declared to be done to their universal satisfaction: I do, therefore, certify and approve of the same.

INDIAN LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 20, 1797.

MR. PINCKNEY, from the committee to whom was referred the remonstrance and petition of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, reported:

That, on investigating the causes of complaint, therein contained, it appears that, according to the boundary line between the Cherokee tribe of Indians and the inhabitants of the said State, which was extended by the commissioners of the United States, pursuant to the treaty of Holston, in the course of the last summer, the settlements and habitations of a considerable number of the citizens of the said State, which, theretofore, were supposed to be on lands to which the Indian claim was, by that treaty, extinguished, appear to be within the Indian territory; that these inhabitants had been induced to believe that the lands which they occupied were not within the Indian boundary, in consequence of the late Governor of the Southwestern territory having, in pursuance of directions from the Executive of the United States, caused a temporary line to be extended, by commissioners appointed for that purpose, by which line the settlements, above mentioned, were included within the lands assigned to the territory Southwest of the Ohio, (now the State of Tennessee.)

The committee, likewise, find, that there are divers other citizens of the said State who occupy lands, unquestionably within the Indian territory, as designated by the said treaty, which lands they possess by virtue of titles derived from the State of North Carolina, previous to the cession of that territory, by the said State, to the General Government; one condition of which cession was, that "all entries made by, or grants to, all and every person or persons whatsoever, agreeable to law, and within the limits thereby intended to be ceded to the United States, should have the same force and effect as if such cession had not been made; and that all and every right of occupancy and pre-emption, and every other right reserved by any act or acts, to persons settled on and occupying lands within the limits of the lands thereby intended to be ceded, as aforesaid, should continue to be in full force, in the same manner as if the cession had not been made, and as conditions upon which the said lands are ceded to the United States."

The committee, also, are informed, that, by the operation of the law, passed on the 19th day of May, 1796, for regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes, which law has been carried into execution since the extension of the last line, these citizens, of the State of Tennessee, have been compelled to abandon their habitations; and, with their wives and their children, were, by the latest accounts from that country, encamped in the woods, within the Tennessee line.

The committee, therefore, in consideration of the premises, recommend, for the adoption of the House, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of ——— dollars be appropriated for the relief of such citizens, of the State of Tennessee, as have rights to lands, within the said State, by virtue of the cession, out of the State of North Carolina, and have made actual settlements thereon, and who have been deprived of the possession of the said lands by the operation of the act for regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes. The said sum to be subject to the order of the President of the United States, to be expended under his direction, either in extinguishing the Indian claim to the above described lands, in case he shall deem it expedient to hold a treaty for that purpose, or to be disposed of, in such other manner as he shall deem best calculated to afford the persons, herein described, a temporary relief.

THE CHEROKEE BOUNDARY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 5, 1798.

In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, dated the 28th of December, 1797, directing the Secretary of War to lay before them such information as he may be possessed of relative to the running of a line of experiment, from Clinch river to Chilhowee mountain, by order of the Governor of the territory of the United States, south of the Ohio, the Secretary reports:

1. That William Blount, Governor of the territory of the United States south of the Ohio, in a letter to the Secretary of War, dated July 2d, 1791, informs that he had, with much difficulty, concluded a treaty, on the part of the United States, with the Cherokee Indians, which he should forward, in a few days, by express; that he had not been able to obtain a cession of as much land as his instructions allowed; but, that it included all the settlers, except those south of the ridge dividing the waters of Little river from those of Tennessee.

2. That Governor Blount, in a letter to the Secretary of War, dated July 15, 1791, writes as follows: "In forming the treaty, the greatest difficulty was the agreeing on the boundary, and the one agreed to, I am sensible, will appear singularly described. This is owing to the Indians insisting on beginning on the part where they were most tenacious of the land, in preference of the mouth of Duck river, where the Hopewell line began. The more ready way to understand it will be to reverse it. I have said the land, lying to the right of the line, should belong to the United States, because there was no given point of the compass would clearly describe it. According to my instructions, I proposed that the ridge, dividing the waters of Tennessee from those of Little river, should form a part of the boundary; and the Indians would not agree to it, but insisted on a straight line, which should cross the Holston where that ridge should strike it; and were so firmly fixed on their determination that I could not prevail on them to agree to any other. This line is not so limited, as to the point at which it shall leave the north line, or at which it shall strike the Clinch, but that it may be so run as either to include or leave out the settlers south of the ridge; the only stipulations respecting it are, that it shall cross Holston at the ridge, and shall be run by commissioners appointed by the respective parties.

"The Indians have named their's, as will appear by the minutes, and the sooner it is run, after the treaty is ratified, the better: for many whites are now settled near it, and others are making ready to move down, this autumn.

"The Indians expect it will be run in November or December. The boundary is not extended as far as I wished and hoped it would be, but it includes all the settlers on the North Carolina grants; and since I am certain more land could not be obtained, I am very happy so much is obtained."

3. That the Secretary of War, in a letter to Governor Blount, of the 19th November, 1791, writes as follows: "The treaty with the Cherokees has been ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and you will receive, herewith, by Judge Campbell, fifty printed copies of the same, together with the proclamation of the President of the United States, enjoining an observance thereof. You will, undoubtedly, cause these papers to be duly circulated and published.

"The time of running the lines, mentioned in the treaty, and the parts of the lines to be first run and marked, the President of the United States confides to your judgment. He is of opinion, from information, that the following gentlemen would be proper characters as commissioners on our part, and, if you know of no solid objection, he desires you to appoint them accordingly, to wit: Judge Campbell, Daniel Smith, secretary of the territory, and Colonel Landon Carter.

"The President of the United States would not, perhaps, have pointed out any characters to you for this business, but to save you the trouble of solicitations; and he is highly desirous that the lines should be run by gentlemen who can have no inducement to infringe, in any degree, upon the boundary truly meant and intended. As soon as you shall notify me of the time the line is to be run, the President of the United States will appoint a surveyor to attend that duty."

4. That Governor Blount replied, in a letter dated the 26th of December, 1791, that "the first of May is the time that, I think, will be the most convenient to commence the running the lines between the United States and the Cherokees; that the persons named by the Secretary as commissioners were capable, and well qualified in every respect; but, as one of them would be engaged in judicial duties, on the first Monday in May, he recommended another person, which he names, to be appointed in his stead."

5. That it would seem probable that Andrew Ellicot, who was appointed July, 1791, surveyor to run the boundary lines described in the Creek treaty, concluded at New York, the 7th of August, 1790, might have been the person intended to survey the Cherokee line, but of this intention the Secretary has not found any record.

6. That the Secretary of War, in his letter to Governor Blount, dated the 31st January, 1792, in which the receipt of the foregoing letter is acknowledged, writes as follows: "It is important that the line should be run, but perhaps, as there may be some misconceptions on that head, although I know of none, yet, as we may want the assistance of the Cherokees, in our military operations, perhaps, there may be a greater degree of delicacy in having the lines ascertained previously, than subsequent to the campaign.

"I am impressed with the importance of having some of all the Southern tribes with our troops, in the field, because I am apprehensive that their passion for war will constrain them to join the other side, if they do not our's. However, both the point of time, and the characters you propose for running the line, will be left to your discretion.

"We have been surprised with a visit of the following Cherokees: Nenetooyah, or Bloody Fellow; Chutloh, or King Fisher; Nontuaka, or the Northward; Teestecke, or the Disturber; Kuthagusta, or the Prince; Schucwegee, or George Miller; the squaw, Jean Dougherty; and James Carey, the interpreter. They have stated the following objects as their business, the most material of which will be complied with, especially the additional annuity.

"First. To obtain a higher compensation for the lands they relinquished by the treaty with Governor Blount, on the 2d July, 1791.

"Second. That the white people, who are settled southward of the ridge which divides the waters of the Tennessee from those of Little river, should be removed, and that the said ridge should be the barrier."

7. That Governor Blount, in a letter to the Secretary of War, dated March 2, 1792, writes as follows: "You could hardly have been more surprised with the arrival of the Cherokees than I was when I heard of it, which was several days after Mr. Allison's departure for Philadelphia. If I had been in this country, they would not have visited you: for, by letters since received, I find they wrote to me, and informed me, in case I had any objections, they would not go.

"With respect to the second object, which they assign for coming, namely: 'that the white people, who are settled to the southward of the ridge which divides the waters of Tennessee from those of Little river, should be removed, and that the said ridge should be the line,' I can't help remarking, that I proposed, at the treaty, that that ridge should be the line. You will recollect I was so instructed, and the chiefs were, unanimously, opposed to it, saying it should be a straight line, and that it was an evidence that my heart was not straight, that I wanted a crooked line. The difficulty in running the line will be, to ascertain where the ridge, that divides the waters of Little river and Tennessee, will strike the Holston: for, it seems, the white people can't agree on it, a circumstance unknown to me at the time the Indians proposed it; but, from the best information I can obtain, I am induced to believe it will prove to be lower down than they expected; and, in that case, it is my opinion, that the words of the treaty ought not to be so strictly adhered to as to give them any great degree of dissatisfaction. I have hopes, and scarcely doubt, but, by taking the chiefs when in a good humor, I can have it extended to the satisfaction of both parties, and it is a business, the completion of which, I have much at heart."

8. That the Secretary of War, in his answer to the foregoing letter, dated April 22, 1792, writes, "I am commanded by the President of the United States, to whom your letters are constantly submitted, to say, with respect to your remarks upon the line at Little river, that you will be pleased to make a liberal construction of that article, so as to render it entirely satisfactory to the Indians, and, at the same time, as consistently as may be with the treaty; and to observe, that he is satisfied with your sentiments on that subject."

9. That it appears, numerous hostile aggressions and acts of the Cherokee Indians, and a desire, to soothe them into peace, and engage them as auxiliaries against the Northern Indians, rendered it proper to postpone the running of the line.

10. That, in a letter from Governor Blount to the Little Turkey, dated Knoxville, February 12, 1792, inviting him and the principal chiefs to meet him at Major Craig's, on Nine-mile, on the first day of May then next, there is nothing said respecting the running of the line.

11. That, at a conference, at Coyatee, with the chiefs and warriors, in May, 1792; at which were present about two thousand Cherokees, Governor Blount, in his speech, said to them, speaking of frontiers: "It may occur to you, that it is proper I should say something on the subject of extending and marking the line agreeably to the treaty. I shall write you on that head, so that you shall have my letter before you in council, at Estanaula."

12. Hanging Maw gave notice that this council was to meet at Estanaula, the 23d of June, and for all the chiefs to attend there, and not to be absent on any pretence whatever.

13. That the letter from Governor Blount to the Little Turkey, and other chiefs of the Cherokees, at Estanaula, dated June 4, 1792, is as follows:

"BROTHERS: The running of the line is a thing I know you want done, and so do I; but I can't attend to it before I have finished my business with the Chickasaws and Choctaws at Nashville, and rested myself a little after my return home, which will not be before some time in August. I propose to you that the commissioners to run the line, shall meet at Major Craig's, on Nine-mile, the second Monday in October. The commissioners, on the part of the United States, are people of high characters and distinction, namely, Brigadier General Smith, Colonel Landon Carter, and Judge Campbell; and I beg you that three of your principal chiefs may be appointed on your part. The running a line between two nations is a great business, and none but head-men are proper to do it. James Carey being appointed interpreter, it will be his duty to attend, and interpret what shall be said on both sides. I keep in remembrance, that no persons are to be with the commissioners when they run the line, except a few people to mark it; but, if a few of your principal chiefs, besides those three appointed to run the line, should wish to attend, I shall be glad to see them: for head-men to see and know each other, ever contributes to the happiness of both parties."

14. That the Little Turkey, as appears from the journal of the Cherokee council at Estanaula, convened on the 26th of June, 1792, expressed himself highly dissatisfied with the treaty lines, and that James Carey reminded the council to consider the request made to them, to name the commissioners to run the line, and the time and place of their meeting.

15. That the Broom, the Standing Turkey, Half Breed, and Dreadful Water, in a letter dated Estanaula, November 15, 1792, addressed to Governor Blount, inform him, that, "as they were using their best endeavors for the benefit of both parties, they hoped he would stop his hand with regard to building a fort on their land, and that they further hoped, that, by the spring of the year, every thing will be settled according to the treaty, to each other's satisfaction, and the line shall be run."

16. That it appears the frontiers, at this time, were threatened with Indian invasion. That the 27th of September, 1792, Governor Blount informed the Secretary of War, "he had determined to call into the field, for the protection and defence of the territory, as quick as possible, in addition to the militia then in service, fourteen companies of infantry, and the Greene troop of cavalry, to be commanded by Brigadier General Sevier."

17. That Governor Blount addressed a letter of instructions, and an extract of a letter from the Secretary of War, of the 23d of April, 1792, to David Campbell, Charles McClung, and John McKee, in the following words:

"KNOXVILLE, October 7, 1792.

"By the enclosed extract from my letter of the 4th of June last, to the Little Turkey, and other chiefs of the Cherokees, you will be informed that to-morrow is the day I proposed to them, to meet the commissioners on the part of the United States, at Major Craig's, on Nine-mile, in order to extend the line between the said nation and the United States, as stipulated by the treaty, made and concluded between the said nation and the United States, on the 2d of July, 1791, a copy of which you have herewith. You have also enclosed an extract of a letter of the Secretary of War to me, of the 22d of April last, to which you will please attend, as your instructions, in case commissioners, on the part of the Indians, should appear, and proceed to running the line; but, in case none do appear, you will please examine where the ridge, which divides the waters running into Little river, from those running into the Tennessee, strikes the Holston, and extend the line from thence to Clinch, and again from that ridge to the Chilhowee mountain, paying strict regard to the treaty, and report your proceedings to me. I am aware that the five Lower towns of the Cherokees have declared war against the United States, and that war dissolves all treaties; nevertheless, I think it essential that so much of the line should be examined and reported upon, that it may appear whether there are any citizens of the United States residing on the Indian lands or not.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

"DAVID CAMPBELL,
"CHARLES McCLUNG,
"JOHN MCKEE,

"Commissioners for extending the line between the United States and the Cherokee nation, according to the treaty of Holston."

18. That David Campbell, Charles McClung, and John McKee, reported to Governor Blount as follows:

"KNOXVILLE, 30th November, 1792.

"SIR:

"In pursuance of your instructions, we attended at Major Craig's, on Nine-mile, on the second Monday in October, and waited until Tuesday for commissioners on the part of the Cherokees; but none arrived. We then proceeded to examine, with great attention, for the ridge which divides the waters of the Tennessee from those of Little river, and, tracing it, found it a plain leading ridge, and that it struck the Holston at the mouth; but, having heard it suggested, that the Indians had in contemplation, at the time the treaty was made, a ridge, which they supposed would strike the Holston higher up, we did not content ourselves, but re-traced the ridge, and examined well the south bank of the Holston, and the result was, that we were perfectly convinced that the ridge, which divides the waters of Tennessee and Little river, strikes the Holston at the mouth, and at no other part. We then proceeded to run, but not mark, a line of experiment, from the point of the ridge, in a south-east direction to Chilhowee mountain, distance seventeen and one half miles, and again from thence to the Clinch, in a northwest direction, distance nine miles, and found that line, continued to the southeast, would intersect the Tennessee, shortly after it crossed the Chilhowee mountain, consequently take away all the Indian towns lying along the south side of Tennessee. This shewed the necessity of turning the direction more to the east and west, and, it is our opinion, that a line extended from the point of the ridge aforesaid, south, sixty degrees, east to Chilhowee mountain, again from the point, north, sixty degrees west, will form the true line from Chilhowee mountain to Clinch, between the United States and the Cherokees, according to the treaty of Holston. The more fully to elucidate this report, we present you with a map, which we believe is nearly correct, on which both the lines are laid down.

"Supposing we are right in the direction of the true line as aforesaid, it will be found that the following settlements were on the Cherokee lands, namely: Matthew Wallace, Samuel Henry, ——— Martin, ——— Sloane, ——— Wilson, and a few others, whose names are unknown to us, all of whom, except Samuel Henry, have lately removed from their plantations.

"We have the honor to be, &c.

DAVID CAMPBELL,
CHARLES McCLUNG,
JOHN MCKEE.

"WILLIAM BLOUNT, Esq. Governor of the Southwestern Territory."

19. That Governor Blount transmitted this report to the Secretary of War, with the following letter:

"KNOXVILLE, December 16, 1792.

"SIR:

"I have the honor to enclose you the report of Judge Campbell, Charles McClung, and John McKee, the gentlemen I appointed commissioners, on the part of the United States, to meet the commissioners on the part of the Cherokees, at Major Craig's, on Nine-mile, on the second Monday in October, to run the line between the United States and that nation, agreeably to the treaty of Holston, and a map which they presented me therewith, together with a copy of my instructions, and of their commissions of appointment. McKee and McClung were appointed in the places, and instead of General Smith and Colonel Carter, who did not attend. McKee is a young man, who does not claim a foot of land in this territory. McClung possesses land; but, I believe, none that the extending the line could affect him in: both of fair characters, and well qualified for the business. The part of the country through which they have extended (not marked) the line, and reported its course and operation on the settlements on Nine-mile, is the only part of which I ever heard any complaints on the part of the Indians, (except that contained in the speech of the Little Turkey, in council, at Estanaula, in June last, which, to me, appears too utterly void of foundation to deserve any notice;) hence, I have conceived that it will be satisfactory and acceptable to Government to be made fully acquainted of the geography of it from actual measurement, and of the operation of the line on the Nine-mile settlers, and especially so, as a part of the nation had declared war against the United States, to the end that a better judgment might be formed as to the propriety or impropriety of their conduct. It is to be observed, that the Lower towns, where the heads and leaders, and the greater part of the war party reside, are least affected with this line, run as it will, as they live most distant from it; and that these Nine-mile settlers have received no injuries, (except a few horses stolen) neither before the treaty of Holston, for several years, nor since, from Indians of any part. As the geography of the country, generally, cannot be well known to you, there being no correct map of it, I think it necessary to inform you, that the country to the east, or rather to the southeast of Chilhowee mountain, through which the line reported upon, if continued beyond it, will pass, for fifty or sixty miles, is an entire bed, or ledge after ledge, of mountains, that is, until it intersects the line which is to be extended south from the north boundary of North Carolina, near which no settlements can be formed; hence, I conclude, it will not shortly be essential to extend it. Believing observations respecting the other parts of the line will be proper and acceptable, I shall make them. That which the line reported on will intersect, if continued, meaning that which runs south from the north boundary of North Carolina, I caused to be run and marked about sixty miles from the mouth of McNamee's Creek to Rutherford's War-trace, by Mr. Joseph Hardin, in the course of last winter. I was induced to this from an instruction that I should take care that no encroachments were made on the Indian lands, and I had been taught to believe that the settlements at Swannano were very near, if not on them, and about to be extended. The result was, that it was found these settlements were not within less than twelve miles of the Indian lands. It will be observed, that this north line is the same that run south for the same distance, according to the treaty of Hopewell, which was never ascertained, and being also through a bed of mountains for a great part, conjectures as to its course and operation were very different. Hardin did not run north, as required by the treaty of Holston, but south, according to the treaty of Hopewell. The reason for this was, he could not find the beginning of it at the north boundary of North Carolina, without first running the line through South Carolina; and the beginning in a north direction was easily found by beginning at the mouth of McNamee's Creek on Nolachucky. That which passes through South Carolina, I am informed, has been partly run—I believe, prior to the treaty of Hopewell; perhaps, immediately after that of Duet's Corner, made by commissioners from South Carolina and Georgia; but General Pickens has informed me, that he has reasons to suspect encroachments are making on the part which has not been run; hence, it would seem essential, that it should shortly be run; but no complaints have been made by the Indians respecting them, unless they should be included in the general charge of the Bloody Fellow, in his letter of the 10th September. That which passes from the mouth of Duck, through the Cumberland country, I should suppose, need not be run for years: for the Cumberland settlers are now so distant from where it will pass, and the danger in that quarter is so great, that encroachments on it are not to be feared. For information respecting these settlers, I enclose you a map of the Cumberland country, by which you will see that there are but very few south of that river, none more than five miles, and all of them near Nashville. The reason I have considered the claim of the Little Turkey as too ill founded to deserve notice, is, that he requires the line to be extended so far north as to include, not only all the settled part of Cumberland, but the county of Shelby, in Kentucky, both of which had been fairly ceded to the United States, by the treaties of Hopewell and Holston.

"I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servant.

"WM. BLOUNT.

"HENRY KNOX, Esq. Secretary of War."

20. That the Secretary of War acknowledged the receipt of this letter on the 25th of January, 1793, in which he observed,

"Yesterday I received your two favors, dated the 16th and 28th ultimo. The first, being relatively to the boundary, will be duly considered, and you informed of the result."

21. That the Secretary of War does not find any further communications to Governor Blount on this subject.

All which is respectfully submitted to the House of Representatives.

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 8, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The situation of affairs between some of the citizens of the United States and the Cherokee Indians, has evinced the propriety of holding a treaty with that nation, to extinguish, by purchase, their right to certain parcels of land; and to adjust and settle other points relative to the safety and conveniency of our citizens. With this view, I nominate Fisher Ames, of Dedham, in the State of Massachusetts; Bushrod Washington, of Richmond, in the State of Virginia; and Alfred Moore, of North Carolina; to be commissioners of the United States; with full powers to hold conferences, and conclude a treaty, with the Cherokee nation of Indians, for the purposes before mentioned.

STEPHEN CANTRILL.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 5, 1798.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the petition of Stephen Cantrill, respectfully reports:

That the services for which the petitioner prays compensation to himself, and a company which he commanded, were performed in the month of September, 1794, on an expedition conducted by Major James Ore, into the Lower Cherokee country, which issued in the destruction of two considerable Indian towns, the Running Water and Nickajack, the killing of a number of Indians, and the taking about twenty prisoners.

That the report of Major Ore to Governor Blount, dated at Knoxville, the 24th September, 1794, shews that this expedition marched on the seventh of the same month, and was ordered by General Robertson, of Mero district.

That the orders of General Robertson, for this purpose, were afterwards communicated by himself to Governor Blount, in a letter dated the eighth October, 1794, detailing his reasons for the order.

That letters from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, dated the twenty-second of September, and second of October, 1794, as well as a copy of an order, which he states to have been the last given by him to General Robertson, previous to this expedition, evince, that the Governor did not sanction the measure.

That the Secretary of War, previous to Major Ore's expedition, in a letter to Governor Blount, dated the 26th July, 1794, strongly discouraged the idea of destroying the Lower towns of the Cherokees, in the following words, viz: "With respect to destroying the lower towns, however rigorous such a measure might be, or whatever good consequences might result from it, I am instructed, specially, by the President, to say, that he does not conceive himself authorized to direct any such measure, more especially as the whole subject was before the last session of Congress, who did not think proper to authorize or direct offensive operations." And that, as soon as the destruction of the Running Water and Nickajack was communicated to him, the Secretary strongly disavowed any participation in the business, by his letter to Governor Blount, dated the 29th December, 1794, in these words, viz: "The destruction of the Lower Cherokee towns stands upon its own footing; that it was not authorized is certain."

That the President, at all times, as well before as after this expedition, endeavored to confine the protection of the frontiers of the southwestern territory to defensive operations, and to restrain from those which were offensive.

That, on the whole, it appears, the services for which compensation is prayed by the petition of Stephen Cantrill, were performed on an expedition, offensive, unauthorized, and in direct violation of the orders from the President to Governor Blount, by whom, also, they were not sanctioned.

The documents referred to, and others connected with the subject, are herewith presented, numbered from No. 1 to 9, inclusive.

All which is respectfully submitted to the House of Representatives.

JAMES M'HENRY.

WAR OFFICE, April, 1798.

No. 1.

KNOXVILLE, September 24th, 1794.

SIR:

On the seventh instant, by order of General Robertson, of Mero district, I marched from Nashville, with five hundred and fifty mounted infantry under my command, and pursued the trace of the Indians who had committed the latest murders in the district of Mero, and of the party that captured Peter Turney's negro woman, to the Tennessee. I crossed it on the night of the twelfth, about four miles below Nickajack, and, in the morning of the thirteenth, destroyed Nickajack and the Running Water, towns of the Cherokees. The first being entirely surrounded, and attacked by surprise, the slaughter was great, but cannot be accurately reported, as many were killed in the Tennessee. Nineteen women and children were made prisoners at this town. The Running Water town being only four miles above Nickajack, the attack upon the latter reached the former before the troops under my command, and resistance was made to save it at a place called the Narrows; but, after the exchange of a few rounds, the Indians posted at that place gave way, and the town was burnt without further opposition, with all the effects found therein, and the troops under my command recrossed the Tennessee the same day. From the best judgment that could be formed, the number of Indians killed at the two towns must have been upwards of fifty, and the loss sustained by the troops under my command, was one lieutenant and two privates wounded.

The Running Water was counted the largest, and among the most hostile towns of the Cherokees. Nickajack was not less hostile, but inferior in point of numbers. At Nickajack was found two fresh scalps, which had lately been taken at Cumberland, and several that were old were hanging in the houses of the warriors, as trophies of war; a quantity of ammunition, powder, and lead, lately arrived there from the Spanish Government, and a commission for the Breath, the head-man of the town, who was killed, and sundry horses, and other articles of property, were found, both at Nickajack and the Running Water, which were known by one or other of the militia to have belonged to different people, killed by Indians, in the course of the last twelve months.

The prisoners taken, among whom was the wife and child of Richard Finnelson, my pilot, informed me, that, on the fourth instant, sixty Creeks and Lower Cherokees passed the Tennessee, for war against the frontiers. They also informed, that two nights before the destruction of Running Water, a scalp dance had been held in it, over the scalps lately taken from Cumberland, at which were present, John Watts, the Bloody Fellow, and the other chiefs of the Lower towns, and at which they determined to continue the war, in conjunction with the Creeks, with more activity than heretofore, against the frontiers of the United States, and to erect block houses at each of the Lower towns, for their defence, as advised by the Spanish Government.

The prisoners also informed, that a scalp dance was to be held in two nights, at Red-headed Will's town, a new town, about thirty miles lower down the Tennessee.

The troops under my command generally behaved well.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,

JAMES ORE.

GOVERNOR BLOUNT.

No. 2.

NASHVILLE, September 6th, 1794.

MAJOR ORE:

The object of your command is to defend the district of Mero against the large party of Creeks and Cherokees of the Lower towns, which I have received information is about to invade it, as also to punish, in an exemplary manner, such Indians as have committed recent depredations in the said district.

For these objects, you will march, with the men under your command, from Brown's block house, on the eighth instant, and proceed along Taylor's race, towards the Tennessee, on which, from the information I have received, you are momentarily to expect to meet a large party of Creeks and Cherokees, advancing to invade this district; and if you do not meet this party before you arrive at the Tennessee, you will pass it, and destroy the Lower Cherokee towns, which must serve as a check to the expected invaders; taking care to spare women and children, and to treat all prisoners who may fall into your hands with humanity, and thereby teach those savages to spare the citizens of the United States, under similar circumstances.

Should you in your march discover the trails of Indians returning from the commission of recent depredations on the frontiers, which can generally be distinguished by the horses stolen being shod, you are to give pursuit to such parties, even to the towns from whence they come, and punish them for their aggressions in an exemplary manner, to the terror of others from the commission of similar offences, provided this can be consistent with the main object of your command, as above expressed, the defence of the district of Mero against the expected party of Creeks and Cherokees.

I have the utmost confidence in your patriotism and bravery, and with my warmest wishes for your success, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES ROBERTSON, B. G.

No. 3.

NASHVILLE, October 8th, 1794.

Sir:

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter of the second instant. Enclosed you have a copy of my order to Major Ore, of the sixth of September; my reasons for giving it, were, that I had received two expresses from the Chickasaws, one by Thomas Brown, a man of as much veracity as any in the nation, the other by a common runner, giving information, that a large body of Creeks, with the Cherokees of the Lower towns, were embodying, with a determination to invade the district of Mero; and not doubting my information, I conceived, if Major Ore did not meet this invading army of Creeks and Cherokees, as I expected, that it could not be considered otherwise than defensive to strike the first blow on the Lower towns, and thereby check them in their advance; nor could I suppose that the pursuing of parties of Indians, who had recently committed murders and thefts, to the towns from whence they came, and there striking them, could be considered as an offensive measure, unauthorized by the usage of nations in such cases. It cannot be necessary to add as a justification, the long repeated, and, I might say, almost daily sufferings of the people of the district of Mero, by the hands of the Creeks and Cherokees of the Lower towns. The destruction of the towns by Major Ore was on the thirteenth of September. On the twelfth, in Tennessee county, Miss Roberts was killed on Red river, forty miles below Nashville, and on the fourteenth, Thomas Reasons and wife were killed, and their house plundered, near the same place, by Indians. On the sixteenth, in Davidson county, twelve miles above Nashville, another party killed — Chambers, wounded John Bosley and Joseph Davis, burned John Donnelson's station, and carried off sundry horses; and in Sumner county, on the same day, a third party of Indians killed a woman on Red river, near Major Sharp's, about forty miles north-east of Nashville, and carried off several horses. This proves that three separate and distinct parties of Indians were out for war against the district of Mero, before the march of Major Ore from Nashville.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter from Doctor R. I. Waters, a citizen of the United States, resident at New Madrid, to John Easten, his factor, in Tennessee county, strongly supporting the information the Chickasaws had given of the intended invasion of the Creeks; and is not the Old Maw's information to yourself, in the latter part of August, to the same purport? And to him, and his friendly party, are the people of this country indebted for their not invading us as they intended. If I have erred, I shall ever regret it; to be a good citizen, obedient to the law, is my greatest pride; and to execute the duties of the commission with which the President has been pleased to honor me, in such manner as to meet his approbation, and that of my superiors in rank, has ever been my most fervent wish. Previous to the march of Maj. Ore, from Nashville, Col. Whitley, with about one hundred men, arrived there, from Kentucky, saying they had followed a party of Indians who had committed depredations on the southern frontier of that country; that, in the pursuit, they had had a man killed by the Indians, and several horses taken, and that they were determined to pursue to the Lower towns. They were attached to Major Ore's command, which augmented the number to upwards of five hundred and fifty men. I should be happy, if my apprehensions of a Creek invasion were removed, but they are not: for Billy Colbert, and other Chickasaws, inform me, that they yet threaten Mero district, not in so large numbers, but in small detached parties, which are equally dangerous, as there is no possibility of guarding against a number of small parties invading the frontiers at different places, at the same time. Enclosed is a copy of a letter to John Watts; and, from my experience in Indian affairs, I have my hopes, that, from the scourging Major Ore has given the Lower Cherokees, we shall receive less injury from them than heretofore. I also enclose you Major Doyle's letter, from Fort Massac, to me, in consequence of which, I ordered to his relief an ensign, sergeant, corporal, and eighteen privates, mounted infantry. I have engaged Mr. Shute fifty dollars, for going to you express.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

JAMES ROBERTSON.

His Excellency Governor BLOUNT.

KNOXVILLE, September 22d, 1794.

Sir:

I am informed, by such authority as may be depended upon, but not officially, that a detachment of the militia of Mero district, by order of General Robertson, lately pursued the trail of a party of Indians to the Tennessee, near Nickajack, and crossed over and destroyed the towns of Nickajack and Running Water, killed upwards of fifty Indians, and carried twenty prisoners to Nashville. I expect an official account in a few days, which I shall embrace the earliest opportunity to forward to you. In the mean time, I assure you, that, if General Robertson has given an order for the destruction of these towns, he is not warranted in so doing by any order from me.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

General Knox, Secretary of War.

No. 5.

KNOXVILLE, October 2d, 1794.

Sir:

Enclosed is the copy of a report of Major Ore, of the destruction of the Running Water and Nickajack, two of the most hostile of the Lower Cherokee towns; a copy of my letter to General Robertson, respecting his order for that purpose to Major Ore, and of my order to General Robertson of the fourteenth June. It will be observed, by my letter of yesterday's date, to General Robertson, that he has not yet informed me, that he did give the order for the destruction of these two towns, but I have no doubt but he did; and I am informed by other people, that his reasons for so doing was, that he had received information from the Chickasaws, that a large party of Creeks and Cherokees were, at the time he gave the order, daily expected to invade the district of Mero. My order of the fourteenth June, the last I had given him as to the protection of Mero district, is enclosed, to shew that no order of mine sanctioned the measure. While Major Ore was out against the Lower towns, the Indians continued their depredations against the district of Mero. On the night of the fourteenth September, the Indians pulled up a part of the stockading of Morgan's station, and took out a valuable gelding tied to his dwelling house. The sixteenth of the same month, a woman on Red river, near Major Sharp's, was killed by the Indians. The same day a party of Indians fired upon five men near Mr. Andrew Jackson's, on the south side of Cumberland river, killed one man, and wounded two; among the latter is Mr. John Bosley. The same party burned the houses of John Donnelson and the widow Hayes. From the nearness of the time, and the distance of situation, within which the above injuries were committed, there must have been three parties of Indians.

The Hanging Maw, and his party on the Tennessee, discover no displeasure at the destruction of the Lower towns, but, on the contrary, the Maw declares publicly, that the enemies of the United States are his enemies, and that he shall view the Lower towns as other enemies of the United States, if they are so, and it would appear as if the Lower towns did not consider him as their friend: for they have given him no information of the destruction of the Running Water and Nickajack.

A few days past, arrived here, a Miss Alice Thompson, and Mrs. Caffray, of the vicinity of Nashville, from a captivity of upwards of two years, with the Creeks. The former, shortly after her arrival, was purchased from her captors by a white trader, of the name of Riley, for eight hundred weight of dressed deer leather, equal to two hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six and two-thirds cents, and well treated. The latter remained in the hands of her captors as a slave, hoeing corn and beating meal, and was repeatedly scratched with gar-teeth, as a punishment for what they called offences, the marks of which remain upon her back and other parts of her body, and when she was released, was under the painful necessity of leaving her child, which was captured with her, in the hands of the Creeks. These women report to me, that, notwithstanding the repeated assurances Mr. Seagrove has given, of the peaceful disposition of the Creeks, and, notwithstanding his actual presence, for many months, in the nation, that he was able to obtain but a few of the prisoners. They particularly mention, besides Mrs. Caffray's child, several other persons taken from this country, and not delivered up, but yet remain in a state of captivity and slavery, namely, Miss Wilson, taken from Zeigler's station, in the summer of 1792, when near thirty persons were killed or taken by the Indians, as heretofore reported to you, and young Mayfield and young Brown, whose mothers live near Nashville, and were captured prior to the treaty of New York. These they mention as having seen and conversed with, and sundry others whom they did not see, taken from this country, and other parts of the frontiers. Miss Thompson also reports, that young Alexander Cavet, who was captured from within eight miles of this place, in September, 1793, at the time his father, and every other of the family were massacred, was killed by a Creek warrior, by the stroke of a tomahawk, three days after his arrival in the nation. Upon questioning this lady as to the number of scalps brought into the Creek nation during her captivity, she answered she could not give the numbers accurately, but that she well recollected that the warriors returning from Cumberland, once reported nine, and that war dances were held generally in consequence thereof, through the Upper Creeks, and that she frequently saw or heard of a less number, as from one to three, brought in at a time. Only two wagon loads of the Chickasaw goods are yet arrived, but the rest shortly expected.

Doctor James White, of Mero district, the member of Congress from this territory, will deliver to you this letter. He has it in command from his constituents to state to you, and Congress, their many sufferings by the hands of the Creeks and Lower Cherokees.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

KNOXVILLE, June 14th, 1794.

SIR:

Enclosed is a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, of the fourteenth day of April last, by which you will be informed of the degree of protection the President has ordered me to extend to the district of Mero.

My order of the 29th May, to the commanding officers of the counties composing the district of Mero, will inform you in what manner I have ordered the infantry to be raised and disposed of. If you judge any alteration necessary for the greater security of the inhabitants, you will make it, except that part which is given in express conformity to the orders of the Secretary of War to me. Lieutenant Mitchel, who marches with you from this place, subject to your order, commands the cavalry, as allowed by that order. Lieutenant Mitchel, after his arrival in Mero district, is to continue subject to your orders for the time on which he is ordered on duty. You will observe, as the order of the Secretary of War, of fourteenth day of April, limits the degree of protection that is to be extended to Mero district, that you are not to order on duty, of the militia, any greater number than is by that order permitted, except in case of an invasion by a superior force of hostile Indians, and, in that case, you will repel such invaders, with such part of your brigade as shall be necessary for such repulsion.

On the 24th August, a part of the Knox mounted infantry will rendezvous at this place, to march to Mero district, to supply the place of Lieutenant Mitchel, and to continue on duty for the protection of Mero district, until the first day of December.

You will receive the six howitzers and the ammunition, and make such disposition thereof as shall, in your judgment, best ensure the protection of the district, that being the object of Government in ordering them to you.

I am, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 26th, 1794.

SIR:

Your favor of the 30th of June, and its enclosures, have been received, and submitted to the President of the United States.

It is a most mortifying circumstance, that events are perpetually occurring, tending to mar the humane disposition of the Executive of the United States towards the Indian tribes, and to prevent that pacific system being established, which ought to be the object of both parties.

Notwithstanding, however, the ideas which prevail on your frontiers to the contrary, I should hope that the recent visit of the Cherokee Indians to this city will have a good effect to tranquillize them, and inspire them with confidence in our future transactions, provided such sentiments should not be counteracted by some such violent outrage as was committed by Mr. Beard the last year. If the Indians are guilty, we have not been innocent at all times.

I do not mean this as a justification of them in the least degree, but, as a reason why we should endeavor to take new ground, and labor again to accomplish the objects of peace. With respect to destroying the Lower towns, however rigorous such a measure might be, or whatever good consequences might result from it, I am instructed, specially, by the President, to say, that he does not conceive himself authorized to direct any such measure, more especially, as the whole subject was before the last session of Congress, who did not think proper to authorize or direct offensive operations.

After all that passed at this place with the Cherokees, respecting Cumberland, it is not expected they will have the impudence to bring forward again, that claim.

I would it were possible to strike, with the highest severity, any of the parties of the Creeks who should go to Cumberland to commit depredations. It would seem that an intelligent and active partizan might find some such opportunity.

No. 8.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Dec. 29th, 1794.

SIR:

Your several favors, of October 24th, and the 3d, 10th, 16th, 18th, 22d, and 28th November, have been received, and submitted to the President of the United States, and such of them as were deemed necessary, were before Congress.

The Secretary of the Treasury, during my absence, acknowledged the receipt of your preceding letters.

The destruction of the Lower Cherokee towns stands upon its own footing; that it was not authorized, is certain, and from information from the frontiers of South Carolina, it would appear, that the greatest portion of the victims were women and children; your information is requested upon this point.

The subject of the Southwestern frontiers is before Congress. Whatever they direct, will be executed by the Executive.

The principle adopted by the President, not to authorize or direct offensive expeditions, has been so frequently brought to your view, that nothing further can be said on that subject. But as the district of Mero appears to be in a suffering condition, and as the proceedings of Congress upon that point may not be speedily determined, and as it is the desire of the President of the United States to afford protection, to the utmost of his power, you are hereby authorized to afford the said district, and to the other parts of your government, at the expense of the United States, all reasonable defensive protection, in such a manner as to your judgment shall appear best, to blend efficiency and economy together.

Ideas have been held up by you of offensive operations against the Creeks. Information is requested upon the manner and details of such an expedition, its object, distance, and an estimate of the expense.

It has been conceived, that all attempts to preserve peace, short of the following arrangement, will be abortive; and I have, accordingly, submitted my opinion thereon to the President of the United States, viz.

First. That a line of military posts, at such distances as shall be directed, be established upon the frontiers, within the Indian boundary, and out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, provided consent can be obtained for the purpose from the Indian tribes; that these posts be garrisoned with regular troops, under the direction of the President of the United States.

Secondly. That if any murder or theft be committed upon any of the white inhabitants, by an Indian, known to belong to any Indian nation or tribe, such nation or tribe shall be bound to deliver him or them up to the nearest military post, in order to be tried and punished by a court-martial, or, in failure thereof, the United States to take satisfaction upon the nearest Indian town, belonging to such nation or tribe.

Thirdly. "That all persons who shall be assembled or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the territory south of the Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations upon any Indian town, or persons, or property, shall thereby become liable, and subject, to the rules and articles of war, which are, or shall be, established for the Government of the United States." This was a section of a bill which the Senate passed the last session, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontiers;" but it was disagreed to by the House.

That if, to this arrangement, the expense should be objected, it was to be remembered, that the President of the United States, in pursuance of law, has authorized both the Governor of Georgia and yourself, to establish a defensive protection, which amounted to a large sum annually. The posts, therefore, requiring garrisons amounting to one thousand five hundred, non-commissioned and privates, for the whole Southwestern frontier, from the St. Mary's to the Ohio, would, probably, be adequate to this object.

That, if the posts belonging to the United States, and now occupied by the British, north of the Ohio, are soon delivered up, they, with a post at the Miami villages, and posts of communication down the Wabash, on the south, and the Miami river and lake Erie on the north, together with a post at Presqu' Isle, would be a pretty adequate protection to the frontiers north of the Ohio, and a curb to any Indian tribes discontented, without just cause, which, it was presumed, would never be afforded by the Government of the United States.

That if, to those vigorous measures, should be combined the arrangement of trade recommended to Congress, and the establishment of agents to reside in the principal Indian towns, with adequate compensations, it would seem that the Government would then have made the fairest experiments of a system of justice and humanity, which, it was presumed, could not possibly fail of being blessed with its proper effects—an honorable tranquillity of the frontiers.

The communications contained in your letters of the third and tenth of November, respecting the prospects of returning tranquillity, were, indeed, highly satisfactory.

Your ideas of Mr. Dinsmoor's residence appear to be just; and you will, in case circumstances admit of the measure, direct him accordingly. If an authorized establishment, defined by law, could be obtained, the agents you mention might be appointed; but at present, the measure must be suspended.

The establishment of the posts mentioned in your letter of the tenth November, and the consequences arising therefrom, are concurred in, were the regular troops to be obtained at the present, but they are not. But, if you could obtain some militia for six or nine months, upon whom you could depend, the measure might, if you should judge it expedient, be adopted as part of the system of defence; but every thing adopted you will please to communicate, for the information of the President of the United States.

It was conceived, from the absence of Mr. Allison from the territory, that he had relinquished, or intended to relinquish, the business of paymaster; and, therefore, Mr. Henley was authorized to appoint a regular officer.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 14th, 1794.

SIR:

In pursuance of representations made upon the subject of the danger to which Mero district is exposed, the President of the United States authorizes you to make the arrangement herein directed, for the protection of the said district, provided you judge the measure necessary, until the first day of December next, or longer, if the danger shall render the said defence indispensable.

A post and garrison to be established at the ford at the crossing of Cumberland river, of one subaltern, two sergeants, two corporals, and twenty-six privates.

For the protection of Tennessee county, and the inhabitants of Red river, running into Cumberland, one subaltern, two sergeants, two corporals, and twenty-one privates.

Davidson county, one subaltern, two sergeants, two corporals, and twenty-six privates; the chief post to be in front of Nashville.

Sumner county, one subaltern, one sergeant, two corporals, and seventeen privates.

That, besides these, two subalterns, and thirty mounted militia, be allowed the district.

Had there been any regular troops who could have been spared for this service, they would have been ordered to have performed it; but this not being the case, recourse must be had to the militia. You will, however, judge which part of the militia shall be of Mero, and which of Washington district.

Independent of the aid of the militia, the following stores are ordered from this city, via Pittsburgh, to Nashville, addressed to General Robertson, viz:

Six three and a half inch iron howitzers, with ammunition for one hundred rounds, complete, for each piece, including twenty-five grape, or case shot.

Your letter of the tenth of March has been received, and submitted to the President of the United States.

THE ONEIDAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 3, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

His Excellency John Jay, Esq. Governor of New York, has informed me, that the Oneida tribe of Indians have proposed to sell a part of their land to the said State, and that the Legislature, at their late session, authorized the purchase; and to accomplish this object, the Governor has desired that a commissioner may be appointed to hold a treaty with the Oneida tribe of Indians, at which the agents of the State of New York may agree with them on the terms of the purchase.

I, therefore, nominate Joseph Hopkinson, Esq. of Pennsylvania, to be the commissioner to hold a treaty with the said Oneida tribe of Indians, for the purpose above mentioned.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 3, 1798.

MR. PINCKNEY, from the committee to whom was referred the representation and remonstrance of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, reported:

That a certain tract of country, within the limits of the State of Georgia, bounded by a line beginning at the fork of the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, and thence running in a southwest direction, until it intersects the most southern part of St. Mary's river, thence, down the said river, to the old line, was ceded, by the Creek nation of Indians, to the said State, by a treaty held between the commissioners of said State, and of the Creek Indians, at Galphinton, on the 12th of November, 1785, which tract of country was, by the Legislature of the said State, formed into a county, by the name of Tallassee county; and the cession thereof was afterwards confirmed, at a treaty held between the same parties, at Shoulderbone, on the 3d day of November, 1786.

Your committee further report, that, by the treaty made at New York, between the United States and the Creek Indians, bearing date on the 7th day of August, 1790, a boundary line was established between the said nation of Indians and the United States, whereby the above described tract of country, named Tallassee country, was declared to be within the Indian territory.

The committee have not been able to discover upon what principle this relinquishment of the territory of the State of Georgia was assented to on the part of the United States; it is therefore to be presumed, that it was done upon principles of general policy, with the intention of establishing a permanent peace between the United States and the said nation. They are, therefore, of opinion, that compensation ought to be made to the State of Georgia for the loss of this territory, and recommend to the House to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the United States will make compensation to the State of Georgia, for the loss and damage sustained by that State, in consequence of the cession of the county of Tallassee, made to the Creek nation, by the treaty of New York, unless it shall be deemed expedient to extinguish the Indian title to the said land.

Your committee have paid particular attention to that part of the memorial which relates to the operation of the intercourse laws, and are of opinion, that part of that law requires revision and explanation; but, on account of the advanced period of the session, and the variety of important business now before the House, they recommend that such revision be postponed until the next meeting of the Legislature.

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 15, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I transmit to you the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, signed near Tellico, on the second day of October, 1798, for your consideration. I have directed the Secretary of War to lay before you the journal of the commissioners, and a copy of their instructions.

JOHN ADAMS.

January 15th, 1799.

Articles of a Treaty between the United States of America and the Cherokee Indians.

Whereas the treaty made and concluded on Holston river, on the second day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, between the United States of America, and the Cherokee nation of Indians, had not been carried into execution, for some time thereafter, by reason of some misunderstanding which had arisen: And whereas, in order to remove such misunderstandings, and to provide for carrying the said treaty into effect, and for re-establishing more fully the peace and friendship between the parties, another treaty was held, made, and concluded, by and between them, at Philadelphia, the twenty-sixth day of June, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; in which, among other things, it was stipulated that the boundaries mentioned in the fourth article of the said treaty of Holston should be actually ascertained and marked, in the manner prescribed by the said article, whenever the Cherokee nation should have ninety days' notice of the time and place at which the commissioners of the United States intended to commence their operation: And whereas further delays in carrying the said fourth article into complete effect did take place, so that the boundaries mentioned and described therein were not regularly ascertained and marked, until the latter part of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven; before which time, and for want of knowing the direct course of the said boundary, divers settlements were made, by divers citizens of the United States, upon the Indian lands, over and beyond the boundaries so mentioned and described in the said article, and contrary to the intention of the said treaties; but which settlers were removed from the said Indian lands, by authority of the United States, as soon after the boundaries had been so lawfully ascertained and marked as the nature of the case had admitted: And whereas, for the purpose of doing justice to the Cherokee nation of Indians, and remedying inconveniences arising to citizens of the United States from the adjustment of the boundary line between the lands of the Cherokees and those of the United States, or the citizens thereof, or from any other cause, in relation to the Cherokees; and in order to promote the interests and safety of the said States, and the citizens thereof, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, hath appointed George Walton, of Georgia, and the President of the United States hath also appointed Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Butler, commanding the troops of the United States in the State of Tennessee, to be commissioners for the purpose aforesaid; and who, on the part of the United States, and the Cherokee nation, by the undersigned chiefs and warriors, representing the said nation, have agreed to the following articles, namely:

ARTICLE 1. The peace and friendship subsisting between the United States and the Cherokee people are hereby renewed, continued, and declared perpetual.

ART. 2. The treaties subsisting between the present contracting parties are acknowledged to be of full and operating force; together with the construction and usage under their respective articles, and so to continue.

ART. 3. The limits and boundaries of the Cherokee nation, as stipulated and marked by the existing treaties between the parties, shall be and remain the same, where not altered by the present treaty.

ART. 4. In acknowledgment for the protection of the United States, and for the considerations herein after expressed and contained, the Cherokee nation agree, and do hereby relinquish and cede to the United States, all the lands within the following points and lines, viz: from a point on the Tennessee river, below Tellico block house, called the Wildcat rock, in a direct line to the Militia spring, near the Maryville road leading from Tellico. From the said spring to the Chilhowee mountain, by a line so to be run, as will leave all the farms on Nine-mile creek to the northward and eastward of it; and to be continued along Chilhowee mountain, until it strikes Hawkins' line. Thence, along the said line, to the great Iron mountain; and from the top of which a line to be continued in a south-easterly course to where the most southwardly branch of Little river crosses the divisional line to Tugelo river: from the place of beginning, the Wildcat Rock, down the northeast margin of the Tennessee river, (not including islands) to a point or place one mile above the junction of that river with the Clinch, and from thence by a line to be drawn in a right angle, until it intersects Hawkins' line, leading from Clinch. Thence, down the said line, to the river Clinch; thence, up the said river, to its junction with Emmerly's river; and thence, up Emmerly's river, to the foot of Cumberland mountain. From thence a line to be drawn, northeastwardly, along the foot of the mountain, until it intersects with Campbell's line.

ART. 5. To prevent all future misunderstanding about the line described in the foregoing article, two commissioners shall be appointed to superintend the running and marking the same, where not ascertained by the rivers, immediately after signing this treaty; one to be appointed by the commissioners of the United States, and the other by the Cherokee nation; and who shall cause three maps or charts thereof to be made out; one whereof shall be transmitted and deposited in the war office of the United States; another with the Executive of the State of Tennessee; and the third with the Cherokee nation; which said line shall form a part of the boundary between the United States and the Cherokee nation.

ART. 6. In consideration of the relinquishment and cession hereby made, the United States, upon signing the present treaty, shall cause to be delivered to the Cherokees, goods, wares, and merchandise, to the amount of five thousand dollars; and shall cause to be delivered, annually, other goods, to the amount of one thousand dollars, in addition to the annuity already provided for; and will continue the guarantee of the remainder of their country, forever, as made and contained in former treaties.

ART. 7. The Cherokee nation agree, that the Kentucky road, running between the Cumberland mountain and the Cumberland river, where the same shall pass through the Indian land, shall be an open and free road for the use of the citizens of the United States, in the like manner as the road from Southwest point to Cumberland river. In consideration of which, it is hereby agreed, on the part of the United States, that, until settlements shall make it improper, the Cherokee hunters shall be at liberty to hunt and take game upon the lands relinquished and ceded by this treaty.

ART. 8. Due notice shall be given to the principal towns of the Cherokees, of the time proposed for delivering the annual stipends; and sufficient supplies of provisions shall be furnished by, and at the expense of, the United States, to subsist such reasonable number that may be sent, or shall attend to receive them, during a reasonable time.

ART. 9. It is mutually agreed between the parties, that horses stolen, and not returned within ninety days, shall be paid for at the rate of sixty dollars each; if stolen by a white man, citizen of the United States, the Indian proprietor shall be paid in cash; and if stolen by an Indian from a citizen, to be deducted as expressed in the fourth article of the treaty of Philadelphia. This article shall have retrospect to the commencement of the first conferences at this place in the present year, and no further. And all amosities, aggressions, thefts, and plunderings, prior to that day, shall cease, and be no longer remembered or demanded on either side.

ART. 10. The Cherokee nation agree, that the agent, who shall be appointed to reside among them, from time to time, shall have a sufficient piece of ground allotted for his temporary use.

And, lastly, this treaty, and the several articles it contains, shall be considered as additional to, and forming a part of, treaties already subsisting between the United States and the Cherokee nation, and shall be carried into effect on both sides, with all good faith, as soon as the same shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States, and the Senate thereof.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined between the United States of America and the whole Cherokee nation, the parties hereunto set their hands and seals, in the council house, near Tellico, on Cherokee ground, and within the United States, this second day of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and in the twenty-third year of the independence and sovereignty of the United States.

THOMAS BUTLER,
GEORGE WALTON.

[3d SESSION.]

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 17, 1799.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 16, 1799.

SIR:

Conformably to orders from the President of the United States, I have the honor to lay before the Senate the following papers, viz.

1st. Copy of the instructions to Alfred Moore, George Walton, and John Steele, Esquires, commissioners for negotiating and concluding a treaty with the Cherokee nation, dated the 30th March, 1798.

2nd. A copy of additional instructions to George Walton, Esquire, and Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Butler, commissioners for the aforesaid purpose, dated the 27th August, 1798.

3rd. A talk of the President of the United States to the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokee nation, dated the 27th August, 1798.

4th. The original journal* of the proceedings of the commissioners appointed to hold a treaty with the Cherokee Indians, under the authority of the United States.

It is requested that the journal, being a document necessary to the War Department, may be returned.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MCHENRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

* The journal was returned to the War Department.

To Alfred Moore, George Walton, and John Steel.

With the following instructions from the President, you will receive a commission, under the seal of the United States, constituting you commissioners to hold and conclude a treaty with the Cherokee nation of Indians. You are, therefore, with all due speed, to repair to Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, and from thence, to the place that may be determined on for holding the same. You will understand your commission to vest you, jointly and severally, with full powers to negotiate and conclude a treaty with the Cherokee nation, conformably to these instructions.

To prevent any unnecessary delay, the temporary agent to the Cherokee Indians, Mr. Silas Dinsmoor, has been instructed to request the Indians to be in readiness to convene at the shortest notice, at such place as he may think the most convenient for them to assemble; and which, at the same time, will most facilitate the obtaining the necessary supplies of provisions. The commandant of the troops of the United States, in Tennessee, has, likewise, been directed to hold in readiness a detachment to cover and protect the parties. The presents for the Indians, and stores for the commissioners, have also been forwarded from this place on the 12th of March, 1798.

It is expected, from these previous arrangements, that you will be in a situation, immediately after your arrival at Knoxville, to have announced by Mr. Dinsmoor, to the Indians, the day on which you will be ready to meet them.

A primary consideration will be, to dispose the minds of the Cherokees to make a sale of such part of their land as will give a more convenient form to the State of Tennessee, and conduce to the protection of its citizens. In particular, it is the desire of the President, that you should use your earliest endeavors to obtain from them, as a first stipulation, their consent to the immediate return of such settlers as had intruded on their lands, and have been removed, on the ground of such consent, being a decisive proof of their willingness to treat for the sale thereof, or any other parcel of their land; assuring them, at the same time, that no advantage whatever will be taken of the circumstance in settling the compensation.

This provisional stipulation obtained, the citizens who have been removed may be forthwith informed, in such manner as you may judge proper, that they may return to the farms which they had before occupied; warning and forbidding, at the same time, any other than former actual settlers, who have been removed, from crossing, for the purpose of settlement, the boundary lines established by the treaty of Holston, as run and marked by the commissioners lawfully appointed for that purpose.

The Governor of the territory of the United States, south of the river Ohio, who concluded with the Cherokee Indians the treaty of Holston, was instructed to endeavor to obtain, that the southern boundary should begin at the mouth of Duck river, and run up the middle of the same to its main source, and thence, by a line drawn to the mouth of the Clinch river. It appears that the Indians could not be prevailed on to consent to this line, but, inasmuch as it forms a good natural boundary, it will be proper to renew the same subject in the mode most likely to succeed in obtaining it.

You will propose, therefore, the following boundaries for the new treaty:

1st. Red dotted line.—A line from a point on the ridge dividing the waters of Cumberland from Tennessee river, in a southwest direction, until it strikes the mouth of Duck river; thence, down the middle of Duck river from its mouth to its main source; thence, by a line over the highest ridges of the Cumberland mountains to the mouth of Clinch, thence, down the middle of the Tennessee river, till it strikes the divisional line lately marked by the commissioners of the United States; thence, along the said line, to where it crosses Cunchee creek, running into Puckasege, the eastern branch of the Tennessee; thence, to the Great Iron mountain; thence, a southeasterly course, to where the most southerly branch of Little river crosses the divisional line leading to Tugelo river.

If this cannot be obtained, then

2nd. A double red line.—A line beginning at the point forty miles above Nashville, as ascertained by the commissioners, and laid down in the annexed map, thence due east, till it strikes the dotted line on Cumberland mountains; thence, along the said dotted line or mountains, to the junction of Clinch river with the Tennessee; and thence, down the middle of the Tennessee river, to the extent of the boundary, as described in the first proposition.

If this cannot be obtained, then

3rd. A blue dotted line.—A line beginning at a point fifty six miles from the point forty miles above Nashville, on the northeast divisional line, being one and a half miles south of the road called Walton's, or Cany fork road; thence, on a course at the same distance from the said road to where it crosses Clinch river, thence, resuming the remaining boundary, as described in the first proposition.

If this cannot be obtained, then

4th. A double blue line. Beginning at a point one mile south of the junction of the Clinch with the Tennessee river; thence, westerly, along the course of the road, one and a half mile south thereof, till it enters into Cumberland mountains; thence, a northeasterly course, along the ridges of the said mountains, on the west of Powel's valley and Powel's river, to the source of the river next above Clear fork, and thence, down the middle of the same, to the northeast divisional line. The Tennessee river, and the further line thence, as described in the first proposition, to be the remaining boundary.

Should the Indians agree to cede the land within the first described lines, or any greater quantity, you may stipulate a solemn guarantee to the Indians for the remainder of their country, and that the United States will cause to be paid four thousand dollars annually to the nation, in goods, implements of husbandry, machines for manufacturing, and the pay of fit persons to assist in instructing them in their use, and making and repairing the same; or otherwise, that the United States will deliver them, on signing the treaty, goods to the amount of five thousand dollars, and the further sum of twenty thousand dollars, at four equal annual instalments.

For the land within the second described lines, or any greater quantity, the same guarantee, and three thousand dollars annually, to be applied as aforesaid; or otherwise, five thousand dollars in goods, and fifteen thousand dollars in three equal annual instalments.

For the land within the third described lines, or any greater quantity, the same guarantee, and two thousand dollars annually, to be applied as aforesaid, or, otherwise, that the United States will deliver them, on signing the treaty, goods to the amount of five thousand dollars, and ten thousand dollars, in goods in two equal annual instalments.

For the land within the fourth described lines, or any greater quantity, the same guarantee, and one thousand dollars annually, to be applied, as aforesaid, or, otherwise, five thousand dollars in goods, on signing the treaty, and five thousand dollars, in goods, in the year 1799.

Should the annuity be preferred, and the five thousand dollars, in goods on hand, also insisted on, as a further consideration, you will not lose the purchase of either of the parcels by refusing it to them.

The arts and practices to obtain Indian land, in defiance of treaties and the laws, and at the risk of involving the whole country in war, have become so daring, and received such countenance, from persons of prominent influence, as to render it necessary that the means to countervail them should be augmented. To this end, as well as more effectually to secure to the United States the advantages of the land which may be obtained by this treaty, you will negotiate and conclude stipulations, to the following import:

1st. That the new lines shall be run, and marked by two commissioners; one of whom to be appointed by you, and the other by the Indians, who shall proceed immediately, and without delay, after the treaty shall be signed, to run and mark the same, where it is not defined by rivers. Three maps of the lines, thus run and marked, to be made out, one whereof, the commissioners on the part of the United States shall transmit to the Secretary for the Department of War; another to the Executive of the State of Tennessee; and the third to the Indian nation, by their commissioner.

2nd. That the nation shall, at all times, permit the President of the United States to employ military force within their boundaries, for the purpose of arresting and conveying to some one of the three next adjoining States or districts, to be proceeded against in due course of law, any person whatever, found within the same, who shall deliver to, or hold talks with them, calculated to engage the nation, or any part thereof, to act hostilely against the United States, or any foreign nation, without the consent of the United States, or against Indians residing within the territory of any foreign nation or against any Indian nation or tribe within the limits, and under the protection of the United States.

3d. That the President of the United States may cause to be arrested, and conveyed, as aforesaid, any person not employed and acting under the authority of the United States, who shall treat with the Cherokees, or any of them, for any sale, lease, or grant, of any part or parcel of their land, or for permission to settle on any part of the same.

4th. That the President may cause to be expelled from their nation any person, a citizen of the United States, or foreigner, not authorized by treaty, who shall attempt to reside or sojourn in their nation, without a permission in writing for so doing, specifying the object of such residence or sojourn, signed by the President, or such person as he may authorize to grant the same.

5th. That this treaty shall not be construed, either to affect the right or title of any person who has been removed from the Indian land, which he had thereto, at the time of his removal, nor, in any manner, to enlarge the right or claim thereto that he then possessed; and that all Indian land, purchased by this treaty, and which has not been actually occupied as aforesaid, shall remain and be subject to the operation of all the provisions of this and any former treaty, and the laws of the United States, relative to Indian country, in the same manner as if this treaty had not been made, until such time as the same land shall be sold by, and under the authority of, the United States. This provision is meant to prevent any further intrusions on any part or parcel of the land, ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States; as also upon the land relinquished to the Cherokee Indians by the State of North Carolina, by an act of the said State, passed the 17th May, 1783, and described in the said act as follows, viz: "Beginning on the Tennessee, where the southern boundary of this State intersects the same, nearest to the Chickamauga towns; thence, up the middle of the Tennessee and Holston, to the middle of French Broad; thence, up the middle of French Broad river, (which lines are not to include any island or islands in the said river) to the mouth of Big Pigeon river; thence, up the same; to the head thereof; thence, along the dividing ridge, between the waters of Pigeon river and Puckasege river, to the southern boundary of this State: Provided, that any person or persons, who, under the laws of North Carolina, and in conformity to the regulations and provisions thereof, have entered, surveyed, located, or obtained grants of any land, (other than the land relinquished to the Cherokees as aforesaid) ceded by the said State to the United States, previous to the acceptance thereof by the United States, which said grants would have vested a good title in them, under the laws of the said State of North Carolina, if such cession had not been made to the United States, may enter upon, occupy, and possess the same, if lying within the limits of this purchase.

6th. That such military sites may be chosen, from time to time, and garrisons established, of the regular troops of the United States, within the Indian boundary, as may be thought necessary to protect their land, and carry into effect the stipulations of treaties and laws of the United States.

Should it be found impracticable to obtain Duck river for a southern boundary, or a line which will include in it the road leading from Southwest point through the Cumberland mountains, to Nashville, it will be proper to stipulate for certain parcels of land, lying on the said road, and at due distances from each other, wherein houses of entertainment may be erected for the convenience of travellers.

It will also be proper, in case the line obtained should not include in it the land on both sides of the ferry, over Clinch river, to stipulate for such an arrangement as will secure a free passage to the citizens of the United States, and prevent any higher toll being requirable by the occupant, than will afford him a reasonable compensation for keeping the same.

You will keep a journal of your proceedings, to be transmitted with the treaty.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in Philadelphia, this thirtieth day of March, A. D. 1798, and in the twenty-second year of the independence of said States.

JAMES McHENRY, Secretary of War.

To George Walton, Esquire, and Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Butler.

The negotiation with the Cherokee nation of Indians, in order to a treaty to effect certain purchases of land, under instructions from the President of the United States, dated the 30th March last, being suspended until the 3d September next, and John Steele, one of the commissioners, having declined, and Alfred Moore, another of the commissioners, having returned home, so that neither of the former commissioners, except George Walton, Esquire, can be expected to be present at the renewal of the negotiations, the President has thought proper to add, in a new commission, which will be herewith received, Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Butler, to the said George Walton, Esquire, and to authorize the said commissioners jointly and severally, to renew the negotiations, and conclude a treaty with the said Cherokee nation, if practicable.

The instructions heretofore furnished to the original commissioners, and which will now be submitted to the perusal and consideration of Colonel Butler, by his associate commissioner, are understood and intended to form the basis of the principles, upon which the renewed negotiations are to be conducted.

But, if it shall be found impracticable to induce the Indians to accede to either of the first three propositions, an abandonment of them must take place, and resort had to the fourth proposition. It will, however, be very desirable, that sufficient proof should be placed in the hands of the Executive, that these propositions were only yielded to necessity; and to shew further that the fourth proposition was, if it too is to fail, urged with all possible ardor and good faith. It is not, however, believed that the latter proposition will fail. If it succeeds (with the proofs mentioned) it will establish the sincerity of the intentions of Government, and perhaps annihilate the suspicions excited by bad men, in the breasts of the Indians, as well as the frontier inhabitants.

The stipulations intended to be introduced into the treaty, to secure to the United States the full advantages of the land which may be obtained by the treaty, detailed in the former instructions, to which you will always refer, from first to sixth inclusive, are deemed important, and should be obtained, if possible. A discretion is, however, given, respecting the ferry and houses of entertainment, on the Cumberland road; the remonstrance against the latter, as becoming probably the lurking places of the most disorderly and bad intentioned whites, appears plausible.

It is not now intended to restrict you to the letter of the fourth proposition. Should the Indians not incline to sell the whole quantity of land therein specified, you will endeavor to obtain as much of it as you possibly can.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in Philadelphia, this twenty-seventh day of August, A. D. 1798, and in the twenty-third year of the independence of the said States.

JAMES McHENRY, Secretary of War.

Talk of the President of the United States to his beloved chiefs, warriors, and children, of the Cherokee nation.

BELoved CHEROKEES: I some time since appointed and commissioned three of my beloved men, viz. Alfred Moore, George Walton, and John Steele, to negotiate with you, for the attainment of certain objects by treaty, which I considered indispensable to the preservation of the happiness and welfare of my white and red children, and which, without injury to either, promised to perpetuate between them a lasting harmony.

You cannot be ignorant how earnestly I have desired to secure peace to your frontier, nor, of my unwearied endeavors and the great expense incurred by the United States, to prevent a certain Zachariah Cox, and others, from carrying an armed force into your country, to take possession of a part of it. You also know, that a store has been erected at Tellico, to supply you with the articles you stand most in need of, at a cheap rate, and that this establishment is entirely for your accommodation, the United States disclaiming all profit upon the business. You must, moreover, be convinced, that the United States can have your good only in view, in keeping my beloved Mr. Dinsmoor in your nation, at a considerable expense, who is charged to instruct you in the raising of stock, the cultivation of land, and the arts which procure for the whites so many comforts and conveniences. I hope you place a just value upon what has been done, as calculated to defend your country from invasion, and make you a happier people; and that you are therefore convinced of the sincere friendship of the United States to the Cherokee nation.

I think it now proper to observe, that, as I have looked upon it as a part of my duty to attend to your interests, I am also under the strongest obligations to hear the complaints, and relieve, as far as is in my power, the distresses of my white children, citizens of the United States.

It was expected that the line established by the treaty of Holston, would have left a great proportion of the frontier white settlers within the tract of country purchased, and this was much desired, as many of these settlers were deserving people, and had made valuable improvements. It proved otherwise when the line was run; and the United States, ever disposed to observe treaties, and keep faith with the Indians, were, under the engagements of that treaty, obliged to remove a number of worthy and well-intentioned settlers from those farms you had long permitted them to occupy, because falling within the Indian line. This occasioned distress to the settlers removed, and the representation of their sufferings induced the Senate of the United States to advise a new purchase of land, to include the deserving settlers, and the Congress to grant a sum of money to pay the expenses of the treaty.

Such are the circumstances that have led to the negotiation, which has been suspended, and which I have directed to be renewed, not doubting but that my Cherokee children, when they come to consider the whole subject, will agree with me in opinion, that a sale of such lands as they can spare, without injury, and for which I have ordered a full equivalent to be paid, either at once, or annually, will be a proper and wise measure upon their part. I recommend it therefore to them to consent to the sale, and flatter myself they will not turn a deaf ear to my recommendation.

Mr. John Steele having gone to the Natchez, and it not being convenient for my beloved man, Mr. Alfred Moore, to attend the negotiation, I have entrusted the whole business of the purchase and treaty to my beloved George Walton, and my highly esteemed warrior, Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Butler.

You will listen to these beloved men, and rely upon my confirming every engagement they may enter into, whether it respects land, or the maintenance of tranquillity and peace to the Cherokee nation.

Beloved chiefs, warriors, and children, of the Cherokee nation: I send you my best wishes, and pray the Great Spirit to preserve you long in peace, and to inspire your hearts with true wisdom.

Given at the city of Philadelphia, the twenty-seventh day of August, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and in the twenty-third year of the independence of the United States of America.

[3d SESSION.]

THE ONEIDAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 31, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I send you, for your consideration, a treaty with the Oneida nation of Indians, made on the first day of June, 1798, at their village.

JOHN ADAMS.

January 30, 1799.

At a Treaty held with the Oneida nation or tribe of Indians, at their village, in the State of New York, on the first day of June, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight: Present, Joseph Hopkinson, commissioner, appointed under the authority of the United States to hold the treaty; Egbert Benson, Ezra L'Hommedieu, and John Taylor, agents for the State of New York.

The said Indians having, in the month of March last, proposed to the Governor of the said State, to cede the lands hereinafter described, for the compensation hereinafter mentioned; and the said Governor having acceded to the said proposal, and advanced to the said Indians, at their desire, in part payment of the said compensation, three hundred dollars, to answer their then immediate occasions, the said cession is, thereupon, in the presence, and with the approbation of the said commissioner, carried into effect at this treaty; which hath, on the request of the said Governor, been appointed to be held for the purpose, as follows, that is to say: The said Indians do cede, release, and quit claim to the people of the State of New York, forever, all the lands within their reservation, to the westward and southwestward of a line from the northeastern corner of the lot No. 54, in the last purchase from them, running northerly to a button wood tree, marked on the east side "Oneida R. 1798," on the west side, "H. P. S. 1798," and on the south side, with three notches and a blaze, standing on the bank of the Oneida lake, in the southern part of a bay called Newageghkoo; also, a mile on each side of the main Genesee road, for the distance of one mile and a half, westward, to commence at the eastern boundary of their said reservation; and, also, the same breadth for the distance of three miles, on the south side, and of one mile on the north side of the said road, eastward, to commence at the eastern boundary of the said lot No. 54: Provided and excepted, nevertheless, That the following Indian families, viz: Sarah Docksteder, Cornelius Docksteder, Jacob Docksteder, Lewis Denny, John Denny, Jan Joost, and Nicholas, shall be suffered to possess, of the tract first abovementioned, to grounds cultivated by them, respectively, and their improvements, not exceeding fifty acres, to each family, so long as they shall reside there; and in consideration of this proviso and exception, the said Indians do further cede that a tract of twelve hundred and eighty acres, as follows, that is to say: Beginning in the southeast corner of lot No. 59, in the said last purchase, and running thence, east one mile; thence, north two miles; thence, west one mile; and thence, south two miles, shall be considered as set apart by the said nation or tribe, for the use of the said families, whenever they shall remove from where they now reside. The said agents do, for the people of the said State, pay to the said Indians, in addition to the said sum of three hundred dollars, already advanced to them, as abovementioned, the further sum of two hundred dollars, and do grant to the said Indians, that the people of the said State shall pay to the said Indians, at their said village, on the first day of June next, and on the first day of June, yearly, thereafter, the annual sum of seven hundred dollars.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioner, the said agents, and the said Indians, have hereunto and to other acts of the same tenor and date, the one to remain with the United States, another to remain with the State of New York, and another to remain with the said Indians, set their hands and seals, at the village aforesaid, the day and year first above written.

ALBANY, 23d April, 1798.

SIR:

During the late session of the Legislature, the chiefs of the Oneida tribe of Indians came to this city, and signified to me, that the object of their visit was to propose a sale of a part of their lands. This being communicated to the Legislature, I was authorized to appoint agents to confer with them on the subject. I herewith enclose a copy of the instrument by which they were appointed, (No. 1) and also a copy of their report to me, (No. 2.) This report was adopted and confirmed by the Legislature, and provision has been made for perfecting, in the usual forms, the agreement stated in it.

When the chiefs were about to take leave, I made to them, and gave them a copy of the speech which you will find in the enclosed paper, No. 3; and the money therein mentioned was paid to them in my presence by our agents.

We find it most convenient, that the proposed treaty should be held with them on the first day of June next, and we wish it may be held at Oneida, that all the chiefs may attend it, and because it may there be held at less expense than at any other place.

Be so obliging, sir, as to lay these representations before the President, with my request that he will be pleased to appoint a commissioner to hold the said treaty, at the time and place before mentioned.

The moment I receive information from you that the appointment is made, I shall advise the Oneidas of it, and immediately take the other measures which will be proper and necessary on the part of this State.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JOHN JAY.

The Hon. TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

No. 1.

The Governor of the State of New York to the Honorable Egbert Benson, Esquire, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the said State, Simeon De Witt, Esquire, Surveyor General of the said State, and John Taylor, Esquire, first Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, in and for the county of Albany, greeting:

Whereas the chiefs of the Oneida tribe of Indians, (having come to this city for the purpose) have signified their desire to sell their claim to certain parts of the land reserved to their use: Now, therefore, in pursuance of the authority vested in me by an act of the Legislature for that purpose, made and passed the 26th of February instant, I have appointed, and hereby do appoint, you, the said Egbert Benson, Simeon De Witt, and John Taylor, and any two of you, commissioners, on the part of this State, to confer with the said chiefs, and, with precision, to ascertain and report to me, what part or parcels of the said lands they wish to dispose of, and on what terms.

JOHN JAY.

No. 2.

In consequence of your Excellency's appointment, we have met and conferred with the Oneida Indians now in this city, and respectfully report, that the intent of their visit is to make a further sale of lands, and they have offered and proposed to sell all the lands within their reservation, to the westward and southwestward of a line from the northeastern corner of lot No. 54, in the last purchase from them, running northerly to the extremity of the northeastern point of a bay on the south side of the Oneida lake, called Newageghkoo, and also a mile on each side of the main Genesee road, for the distance of one mile and a half westward, to commence at the eastern boundary of their reservation; and also the same breadth for the distance of three miles, on the south side, and for one mile on the north side of the said road; eastward, to commence at the eastern boundary of the said lot No. 54. The consideration they propose to ask, is a payment of five hundred dollars on the completion of the sale, and a perpetual annuity of seven hundred dollars; and as some time may elapse before the authority to hold a treaty, and the appointment of commissioners can be obtained from the General Government, they are very desirous to have three hundred dollars, of the five hundred dollars, advanced to them at this time, to answer their immediate occasion. They, however, still stipulate, that the State shall suffer the following Indian families, Sarah Docksteder, Cornelius Docksteder, Jacob Docksteder, Lewis Denny, John Denny, Jan Joost, and Nicholas, to possess the grounds cultivated by them, respectively, and their improvements, (not exceeding fifty acres to each family) as long as they shall reside there. And they will agree that a tract of twelve hundred and eighty acres, as follows: Beginning in the southeast corner of lot No. 59, of the said last purchase, and running thence east one mile, thence north two miles, thence west one mile, and thence south two miles, shall be considered as set apart by the nation for the use of these families, whenever they shall remove from where they now reside. It is only requisite for us further to state, that they appear determined not to part with any lands adjoining on the road, unless the State will also, at the same time, purchase from them other lands as we have described them.

No. 3.

ALBANY, 5th March, 1798.

BROTHERS OF THE ONEIDA NATION:

The agents whom I appointed for that purpose, have reported to me that they have met and conferred with you; that the intent of your visit is to make a farther sale of lands, and that you have offered and proposed to sell all the lands within your reservation, to the westward and southwestward of a line running northerly from the northeastwardly corner of lot No. 54, in the last purchase from you, to the extremity of a northeastern point of a certain bay, on the south side of the Oneida lake, called Newageghkoo; and also a mile on each side of the main Genesee road, for the distance of one mile and a half westward, commencing at the eastern boundary of your reservation, and also the same breadth for the distance of three miles on the south side, and one mile on the north side of the said road, to commence at the eastern boundary of the said lot No. 54, for the consideration of five hundred dollars on the completion of the sale, and a perpetual annuity of seven hundred dollars; but that, as some time may elapse before an authority to hold a treaty with you, and the appointment of commissioners can be obtained from the General Government, you are therefore very desirous to have three hundred dollars, of the five hundred advanced, at this time, to you, to answer your immediate occasions; that you, however, still stipulate, that the State shall suffer the following Indian families, Sarah Docksteder, Cornelius Docksteder, Jacob Docksteder, Lewis Denny, John Denny, Jan Joost, and Nicholas, to possess the grounds cultivated by them, respectively, and their improvements, (not exceeding fifty acres to each family) as long as they shall reside there; and you will agree, that a tract of twelve hundred and eighty acres, as follows: Beginning in the southeast corner of lot No. 59, of the said last purchase, and running thence, east one mile; thence, north two miles; thence, west one mile; and thence, south two miles; shall be considered as set apart by the nation for the use of these families, whenever they shall remove from where they now reside.

BROTHERS: I accept your offer and proposals, and I shall immediately apply to the President to have a treaty held, under the authority of the United States, for the purpose of perfecting and effecting the business; and I shall give you reasonable notice of the time and place of holding the treaty. In the mean time, agreeable to your desire, I shall direct the three hundred dollars to be advanced to you, for the use of your nation, and the accounts of you, expenses to be paid; and, in addition thereto, the sum of one hundred and ten dollars to be furnished to you, o your expenses home.

JOHN JAY.

The principal men of the Oneidas, whose names are hereunto subscribed, reported to the commissioner of the United States, appointed to hold the treaty with them, and to the agents of the State of New York, from a council of the nation, held after the execution of the act of cession of this date, that it was their intent that Lewis Denny and John Denny were not to have any part of the twelve hundred and eighty acres, but that the same should be divided into five lots, as nearly equal in quantity and quality as may be, and be granted by the State to Sarah Docksteder, Jacob Docksteder, Cornelius Docksteder, Jan Joost, and Nicholas, each a lot, and that they shall, severally, remove from off the ceded lands, and reside on their respective lots, as soon as conveniently may be; and that they may then sell and dispose of the same as the white people do, in fee simple.

JUNE 26th, 1798.

SIR: •
 In consequence of the appointment of the President of the United States, I have attended, as the commissioner on the part of the United States, at a treaty lately held between the State of New York, and the Oneida tribe or nation of Indians, at their village, and have superintended, in the manner prescribed by the act of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," the execution of an act, dated the first instant, ceding to the State of New York the lands, and for the compensation therein specified. This act, together with a subsequent declaration from them, reduced to writing, and subscribed by four of their principal men, more fully explanatory of the intention of the nation, in respect to the disposition of the tract of twelve hundred and eighty acres, set apart for certain individual Indian families, accompany this report. In the course of the conferences which took place during the treaty, the Indians declared it was their will to give to Mr. Chapin, the superintendent of Indian affairs, two hundred and forty acres of the tract of one mile square, lying eastward from New Stockbridge, and reserved out of their cession in 1795, and the remaining four hundred acres to the Northern Missionary Society, in the State of New York, for the use of a minister to reside among them; and requested me to report it to the President of the United States, in order that Mr. Chapin and the Society might be enabled to take and hold the lands accordingly.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 22, 1800.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee appointed to "inquire into the operation of the acts making provision for the establishment of trading houses with the Indian tribes, and into the expediency of reviving and continuing the said acts in force," reported:

That the authority to maintain trading houses with the Indians expired with the last session of Congress; that, to judge of the propriety of extending this trade, the committee have asked for information from the Secretaries of War and of the Treasury, and have received the communications herewith reported:

That, under these acts, two trading houses have been established, one on the frontiers of Georgia, the other on the frontiers of Tennessee; that they have no information of the usefulness of these establishments, but what is contained in a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying this report; that, from the irregularity of the factors in accounting (for it seems that so much of the law, which required that the agent employed at each trading post, shall make up his accounts half yearly, and transmit them to the Secretary of the Treasury, has not been attended to) the committee find it impossible to determine, with certainty, how far the scheme is practicable, without a diminution of capital, and what the ratio of diminution will be; but that the paper marked F, and herewith reported, being a summary statement of the Indian trade, from the establishment, to the ninth of January, one thousand eight hundred, will shew the amount of money advanced, and the remittances received; and also, the probability that the capital in trade will be greatly diminished, if not entirely sunk, in a very short time.

The committee, however, deem it expedient, that power should be given to employ the capital already embarked, for a limited time; but that it should not be enlarged by further draughts from the Treasury, until the establishment is better understood in its several relations; and therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes," ought to be revived, and continued in force for one year, and from thence, to the end of the next session of Congress, so as to authorize the further employment of the capital heretofore employed under the direction of that act.

ESTIMATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 5, 1800.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred the estimates for the public service of the present year, having observed certain items in those estimates, under the head of "The Indian Department," which seemed to demand particular examination, reserved them for the subject of a separate report; which they now beg leave to present for the consideration of the House:

The items alluded to, occur in the following order:

1. "For defraying the cost of transportation, and other contingent charges, which may arise from the payment of the annuities to Indian tribes." For this object, the sum of 10,000 dollars is estimated.

As the whole amount of the annuities themselves, as settled by treaty, is only 15,000 dollars, the committee were at a loss to conceive, how the transportation and delivery of them could cost so great a sum as 10,000 dollars. They thought it proper, therefore, to make some inquiry on this head, at the Department of War, which was done by a letter to the Secretary, of the 7th ultimo, whereof a copy (No. 1.) is subjoined to this report.

The Secretary, in answer, enclosed to them a letter from the accountant of that department to him, the following extract from which, contains all the information that has been received by the committee:

"As relates to the expense of transporting goods to pay Indian annuities, no settlements have ever been made at this office under that head. The expense has been generally paid by the quartermaster general, or his agent; and, in some cases, by the agents of the War Department; and these accounts, previous to the 16th July, 1798, (the date of the act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments) have been settled at the treasury; and since that period, the quartermaster's accounts are not in a situation to afford the necessary information."

It appearing from hence, that the expenses in question have been defrayed by the quartermaster general, and are included in his accounts, it is presumed that they have been paid out of the general appropriation for that department, which, probably, is sufficient for that purpose. The committee are therefore of opinion, that no separate appropriation is necessary. If there should, hereafter, be found a deficiency arising from this cause, it will be easy to make it up, when a further inquiry shall have given the House more complete information on the subject than is at present attainable. In the mean time, as the appropriations for the quartermaster's department have been liberal, there is, in the opinion of the committee, no danger of injury to the public service, from withholding the supply at this time.

2. "For contingent expenses, for presents to Indians on their visits to the seat of government, expenses attending their journeys, and during their stay at the seat of government." The estimated supply for this object is $13,000.

This item appearing to the committee to be liable to some doubt, they included it in the above mentioned letter to the Secretary of War, and requested a particular account of the former expenses under that head. They received in answer, a statement from the accountant, transmitted through the Secretary, which, though not detailed as they had requested and did expect, is sufficient to prove that their doubts were well founded; since it appears, by that statement, that the expenses incurred for the purpose in question, during two years, 1798 and 1799, amounted to no more than 15,178 dollars and eight cents. They perceive no reason for supposing that greater expenses will be necessary in this year than in the two former, and are therefore of opinion, that an appropriation of 7,000 dollars will be sufficient.

3. "For rations to Indians at the different military posts, and within their respective nations." The sum of 22,500 dollars is estimated under this head.

The committee observing that this item had increased very much within a few years, and might still further increase to a very inconvenient extent, included it also in their letter to the Secretary of War, whom they requested to furnish them with particular information respecting it.

The information wherewith they have thus been furnished, is contained in a letter from the Secretary of War, which, together with extracts of letters from him to sundry persons, on the subject, is hereto annexed, (No. 2.) This information, extending only to the necessity of issuing rations to Indians, and to the manner in which it is done, but not to the amount of expense thereby incurred, is less satisfactory than could have been wished. Perhaps, however, it could not be rendered more so, from the manner in which the business is conducted; for it appears that the rations to Indians are, and must be, issued from the usual supply of army provisions, which are furnished by contract at the different posts, and it does not appear that a separate account is kept of those rations. This the committee conceive might and ought to be done, since it will, otherwise, never be possible to know how much money is expended in this manner.

In the mean time, as the issues to Indians are made from the army provisions, which are included in the general estimate for the subsistence of the army; and as that estimate is generally formed upon a larger number of troops than are actually in service, so as to be more than sufficient for the usual supply of the troops, the committee can see no good reason for making a separate appropriation for Indian rations, which, they suppose, may always be supplied out of the surplus of subsistence money arising from the deficiencies which always exist, in a greater or less degree, in the number of the troops in actual service.

But they are of opinion, that a direct authority ought to be given by law, for issuing those rations, and that a separate account of them ought to be required.

4. "Two thousand dollars for presents to the Choctaw nation of Indians, and their chiefs."

This expense is not authorized by law, nor stipulated by any treaty; but the Secretary of War thinks it necessary, for reasons which are touched on in the estimates themselves, and more fully detailed in some correspondences with the Indian agent in that quarter, which have been submitted to the committee. They are of opinion that the measure ought to be adopted, and beg leave to recommend it to the House.

This provision, with such others on the foregoing subjects as they think it proper to adopt, are contained in the bill herewith presented to the House.

In recommending it to the House to limit or vary the appropriations in question, the committee do not wish to be understood as implying an opinion, that more money has actually been expended under those heads than was necessary, or that any neglect or improper conduct has taken place in the management of the business, but merely that it will be better to accommodate the appropriations, both in manner and extent, to the actual expenditure.

No. 1.

COMMITTEE ROOM, April 7th, 1800.

I am directed, sir, by the Committee of Ways and Means, to request that you will be so good as to furnish me, as soon as convenient, for their use, with,

First: An account, as particular as can now be rendered, of the expenditure, in each separate year, of moneys heretofore granted by Congress, for the expense of transporting goods to pay Indian annuities; and for contingent expenses for presents to Indians on their visits to the seat of government, and expenses attending their journeys, during their stay, and on their return home; and for rations to Indians at the different military posts within their respective nations.

And secondly: Information of the manner in which those expenditures, and each of them, are made, regulated, and controlled: And of the manner in which the accounts for the said expenditures, and each of them, are kept, rendered, checked, and settled.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient very humble servant.

The honorable the Secretary of War.

No. 2.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 16, 1800.

Sir:

I have the honor to enclose, in pursuance of the request contained in your letter, dated the seventh instant, a letter from the accountant of the War Department, of April 9th, and another from the same, of April 14th, with his statement of moneys expended in the Indian department, for presents to Indians on their visits to the seat of Government; expenses attending their journeys, and during their stay at the seat of Government, during the years 1798 and 1799.

It may be proper to observe, generally, relative to expenditures in the Indian department, that it has been an object with the Secretary, to render less frequent the visits of Indians to the seat of Government, and to extend the influence of the United States within their nations, by the instrumentality of resident agents, and internal arrangements and measures, calculated to produce these ends. This system, which begins to operate sensibly and satisfactorily, while it aims at bettering their moral and physical condition, has a direct tendency to bring them into a narrower compass, and place them more perfectly under the management and control of the United States.

The agents employed in this work (the Governors of the Northwestern and Mississippi territories excepted) are obliged to reside constantly within the Indian nations. They have fixed allowances, and receive their instructions from the Secretary of War.

The agents, annually, or oftener, return estimates of the articles wanted in their superintendence; which, if approved of, are either purchased at the seat of Government, or elsewhere, and transmitted for distribution.

When Indians arrive at the seat of Government, a confidential person is appointed to procure lodgings for them; to superintend and inspect their conduct; to accompany them to places of entertainment; to procure for them the presents in clothing, &c. which may be ordered; and to pay all accounts arising under his superintendence. Money is advanced to him, by warrant, for these purposes, and he settles his accounts in the usual way, by producing vouchers and receipts for the expenditures. Indians, also, occasionally, receive actual money. This is paid to them by a warrant, drawn in their favor, expressive of its object, and for particular services, which require a different course.

The enclosed extracts of letters to Governor St. Clair, Major General Hamilton, and Winthrop Sargeant, Esq. Governor of the Mississippi territory, will show the existing restrictions upon the issue of rations to Indians. The Secretary would presume that the issues, for the present, ought not to be estimated higher than for the preceding year.

There is an item of two thousand dollars, for the Choctaws, under the head "Indian Department," in the estimate of appropriations, to which I request your attention. The reasons inducing to this item are explained in the estimate. The enclosed original letters, dated June 14th, August 10th, September 18th, 1799, and January 16th, 1800, from John McKee, will further elucidate the grounds of the requisition, as well as some other subjects, which are slightly noticed, relative to the Indians. They are submitted, confidentially, to the committee, and, it is requested, may be returned.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant.

JAMES M'HENRY.

ROBERT G. HARPER, Esq. Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Governor St. Clair, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 30, 1799.

"Enclosed is copy of a letter to Major General Hamilton, directing him to cause you to be respected by the military, in character of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and to enable you to give orders upon the posts for provisions to such Indians as you may think it advisable they should be issued.

I leave open a letter to the Turtle, enclosing the invoices of the stipendiary goods, for the Miami, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Eel river, Wea, Piankeshaw, Kickapoo, and Kaskaskia Indians. You will have it forwarded to the Little Turtle, and fix, with him, the time for the distribution of the goods, and, I hope, will find it convenient to attend at their delivery.

The goods for the Wyandots, Chippewas, Ottawas, and Delawares, will be forwarded to Detroit, to be distributed to the said Indians, conformably to such directions as you may think proper to give.

It is to be understood, that certificates of the delivery of the stipends, are to be transmitted to this office, signed by the person appointed to attend to the delivery, and by one or more officers of the garrison at which the delivery is made, or by yourself, whenever you shall be present.

Should it at any time be proper to give an order to any of the Indians who may be on a visit to you, to draw provisions at any garrison, upon their route home, it will be necessary to specify in the order the number of rations, or kind and quantity of provisions required, and to observe the same rule in all other cases. I need not remark to you, that the circumstances inducing to such requisitions, ought always to be of a nature fully to justify such an application of the army provisions."

Extract from the same, to Major General Hamilton, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 30, 1799.

"The Governor of the North Western territory, Arthur St. Clair, Esq. being, ex officio, superintendent of Indian affairs, within the said territory, he is to be respected as such, by all military officers within the sphere of [his jurisdiction; you will be pleased, therefore, to direct the said military officers to respect him as such, and to cause to be issued, at their respective posts, such provisions, to the Indians, as he may think it advisable should be issued to them, from time to time, and, to be executed, his instructions relative to the safe keeping and delivery of the annual stipends promised to the Indians by the treaty of Greenville."

Extract from the same to the same, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 21, 1799.

"It has been too much a practice with the commandants of garrisons on the frontiers, to hold talks with Indian tribes, and play parts which belong exclusively to the civil officers employed to superintend the Indian affairs. This has, consequently, attracted to the garrisons numbers of Indians, and occasioned great and unnecessary expenditures of the public provisions. You will be pleased to issue such instructions on the subject, as will prevent, as much as possible, the continuance of such practices, and oblige the military officers to refer the Indians, in all matters relating to their national affairs, or grievances, to the Governor of the Northwestern territory, and Governor of the Mississippi territory, or the temporary Indian agent, nearest to their post, as the case may require. It will also be proper, that you instruct the commandants of posts in the Mississippi territory, to furnish, on the order of Governor Sargeant, when the same can be spared, such rations for the Indians who may visit the said posts, as he may from time to time direct."

Extract from the same to Winthrop Sargeant, Esq. Governor of the Mississippi Territory, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, 20th May, 1799.

"As it will happen, however, that the Indians, especially those nearest the settlement, will, from time to time, visit you to require advice relative to their affairs and grievances, it is proper that the expense you may incur, by furnishing them with provisions, and the pay of an interpreter, during such visits, should be re-imbursed; and should it be indispensable to make some trifling presents to any of them, on particular and urgent occasions, that the amount of such presents be also re-imbursed: you will, therefore, keep a regular account of all such expenditures, and transmit, annually, to the accountant of the Department of War, all bills, receipts, and vouchers, necessary to substantiate the same.

Should it, at any time, be proper to give an order to any of the Indians who may be on a visit to you, to draw a few days provisions at any garrison upon the route home, it will be necessary to specify in the order, the number of rations, or kind and quantity of provisions required.

I need not remark, that the circumstances inducing to such requisitions, ought always to be of a nature fully to justify such an application of army provisions, and that the order should always express, 'provided the commandant can spare them, without risk to his garrison.' I shall write to Major General Hamilton, to instruct the commandants on the Mississippi accordingly."

INDIAN TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEB. 5, 1801.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of carrying on any further trade with the Indians, on a capital furnished by the United States, reported:

That, in pursuance of the laws heretofore passed by Congress, on that subject, two trading houses or factories have been established; one in the State of Tennessee and another in the State of Georgia; and, of the sums appropriated by Congress, the sum of ninety thousand one hundred and fifteen dollars ninety cents, has been drawn from the treasury, for the purpose of forming those establishments, and purchasing and conveying goods, suitable for trade with the Indians of the Cherokee and Creek nations: That the laws aforesaid expired on ———, and no law was passed at the last session of Congress to continue the establishment and trade aforesaid; although the committee, to whom the subject was then referred, reported, that it was expedient to continue the trade.

The committee further report:

That, from the accounts in the Treasury Department, rendered by the persons who superintend those establishments or factories, the present state of this trade cannot be ascertained; and, although this trade may have produced some advantages, in attaching the Indians to the Government of the United States, by affording them necessities, and avoiding the animosities which might be produced by the abuses of private traders; yet, those have not been of such magnitude as to justify, in the opinion of the committee, any extension or increase of the capital stock, however proper it may be to continue the trade, on the stock now vested, for some time longer.

The committee, unwilling to abandon institutions of public utility, and convinced that the establishment of Indian houses, with proper management, would contribute to the attainment of important advantages; and not having ascertained, with any precision, how far the present establishment may be maintained without loss to the United States, therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for the continuance of the trade and trading houses, heretofore, by law established, on the capital already drawn from the treasury, for one year, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress; and that provision should be made in such law, for the better regulation of said trading houses, and prescribing the duties of the agents employed therein.

GENERAL VIEW.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 8, 1801,

By message from the President of the United States, of which the following is an extract:

"Among our Indian neighbors, also, a spirit of peace and friendship generally prevails, and I am happy to inform you, that the continued efforts to introduce among them the implements and the practice of husbandry, and the household arts, have not been without success; that they are become more and more sensible of the superiority of this dependence, for clothing and subsistence, over the precarious resources of hunting and fishing; and, already, we are able to announce, that, instead of that constant diminution of numbers, produced by their wars and their wants, some of them begin to experience an increase of population."

A sketch of the present state of the objects under the charge of the principal agent for Indian affairs South of the Ohio.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL.—The Indians of the Creek agency have been prevailed on, by the agent, to conform, in a considerable degree, to his ideas on this subject. Once a year, and generally in the month of May, the towns are invited by the agent to send a deputation, to meet on a given day, to compose a national council. To this council the agent makes a report of the state of the nation, suggests his ideas of what is proper for them to do, and applies for compensation and satisfaction for offences committed in violation of their treaty stipulations with us.

The number of deputies who attend cannot hitherto be restrained to a given number, but they seldom exceed five or six from a town. At first, it required a continued attention to the chiefs, to make them comprehend the utility of such a plan, and the necessity of carrying its decisions into effect. Heretofore, every town, tribe, or family, provided its own regulations, and those of a general tendency were left to the government of public agents, who used temporary expedients only; among the most powerful and persuasive of which were the pressure of fear from without and presents.

The council appoint a speaker, who remains in office without limitation as to time. All propositions are debated until they are agreed to or postponed; the agreement is called the will of the nation, and is expressed by the speaker, publicly, to all the chiefs, and to the agent for Indian affairs, who records such parts as interest any of their neighbors, red or white.

The council, when convened, sit night and day; the public buildings is their place of lodging as well as business, and they debate as much in the night as in the day. They lie down, when they are sleepy; when hungry they eat; and when any thing important is under debate they attend to it.

The agent furnishes beef, corn, beans, and salt, and the town where the council meet, furnishes butchers, cooks, and waiters. The expense of a meeting is something less than four hundred dollars. I doubt not, in a few years, it will be a useful instrument to approximate them to a more civilized state, and give the United States a more commanding influence over them. One of the interpreters and assistants to the agent, a half breed and chief of the land, remains constantly in the council during their sitting, and the agent has a right to enter and speak when he pleases.

Raising of stock.—This is more relished by the Creeks than any part of the plan devised for their civilization. They are now eagerly acquiring cattle, by every means in their power. The country is a fine range for them, summer and winter; every town has some acquired, mostly during the Revolutionary war between the United States and Great Britain, by the traders, Tories, (here a banditti of plunderers) or by the war parties of Indians. Cattle, till lately, were not held in much estimation; but since the failure of supplies from hunting, they are resorted to, as the substitute, and bear a pretty good price. Cows and calves are rated at ten dollars, and steers for beef, by age, at two dollars and fifty cents per year. The country is fine for hogs, but the want of fences, scarcity of corn, from the present state of agriculture, and inattention of the Indians, both of which is necessary to keep them from running wild, and being too much infested with wolves, tigers, and wild cats, is for the present a bar to their increase. Horses are in general use, but small; liable, within a few years, to a distemper, called here the yellow water. The agent has, the last winter, introduced some sheep; they are in the care of an assistant and interpreter, a half breed, and promise to do well. There is another flock, the property of Mr. Barnard, an assistant and interpreter, among the Lower Creeks, of several years standing, which increase fast, and have fine wool. He has goats, also, which do well. Stock of all kinds require salt, except where they have moss or cypress ponds, or are within sixty miles of the sea coast.

Agriculture.—The improvements in this are slowly progressive. The agent has prevailed on several of the towns, who had exhausted the lands in their neighborhood by culture, to settle out in villages; this practice is increasing, and all of them fence their fields. There has been a demand this season for plows, and seventy have been issued out of those sent by the Secretary of War, and fifty of them are in use by Indians. There is a nursery of peach trees in the Lower Creeks, and one has been lately established among the Upper Creeks: and the Indians begin to accept of, and to plant them: nearly five thousand have been raised and distributed since the arrival of the agent. The nurseries are increased, and will be kept up to the demand; they are hitherto raised by the agent and his assistants, without any expense to the agency. Cotton is raised in several places, but in small quantities, by Indians; it does well throughout the agency. The green seed is in general use, and well suited to the northern half of the agency; and the sea island cotton, from two successive experiments, promises to do well on the southern half. Some cotton has been sent to market. Flax does well, and the next season will be cultivated in several places. There is much rich swamp land, fine for it, and sufficiently dry in the season, for its growth. Wheat, barley, rye, and oats, have been introduced, and fairly tried. The three first do well; but the springs being generally dry, oats have failed. The early white and brown wheat is ripe by the middle of May. Apple trees, grape vines, raspberries, and the roots, herbs, and vegetables, usually cultivated in good gardens, have lately been introduced, and they all thrive well.

Manufactures.—The present spring, the agent has delivered to Indian women, one hundred pair cotton cards, and eighty spinning wheels. There are eight looms in the nation, four of them wrought by Indian or half breed women, and the remainder by white women. There is a woman employed as an assistant, to teach the Indian women to spin and weave, and the agent has appointed, as a temporary assistant, a young Englishman, from a manufactory in Stockport, in England, who can make looms and spinning wheels, and every thing appertaining to them, and he understands weaving. He will in a few days have a ninth loom set up, at the residence of the agent. The women have this spring adopted this part of the plan with spirit, and have promised to follow the directions of the agent with exactitude. Three Indian women of one family, who have been spinning for two years only, have clothed themselves well, and acquired some hogs and cattle; are proud of the exertions they have made, and are, by their conduct, a stimulus to their country women. One of the looms, and two of the spinning wheels, in use, were made by an Indian chief, for his own family.

The chiefs, who were apprehensive, at first, that, if their women could clothe and feed themselves by their own exertions they would become independent of the degraded state of connexion between them, have had proofs that the link is more firm in proportion, as the women are more useful, and occupied in domestic concerns.

Oil, of hickory nut and acorns, was in use in small quantities among the Indians, as an article of food. In the year 1797, the agent, finding that the hickory trees were mixed through the waving land, and abounded on the flats, made an effort to encourage this manufacture; he offered three fourths of a dollar a quart for the oil that should be made that year, of hickory nuts, and could procure a few bottles only. In 1798 he received eight gallons. In 1799 he purchased thirty gallons, and the last winter he fixed the price at one dollar a gallon, and the manufacture has increased to three hundred gallons, actually delivered for market. Some has been sent to Mobile, and sold at two dollars, and a trader is now descending the Alabama, on his way to New Orleans, with a pass from the agent, with two hundred and forty gallons of the oil.

The process of making this oil is simple, and susceptible of improvement. The nuts are dried and pounded up, then put into boiling water, stirred up for a while, set by, from the fire; the oil rises to the top, is brushed off with feathers, and then boiled. The black jack acorn is the best of the acorn oil, and in more estimation, among the Indians, than the hickory nut oil. Coarse earthen pots and pans, garters, ornamented with beads, basket sifters, and fans, ingeniously made, of split cane, and moccasins, close the list of their manufactures.

In the fall season, every hunting party, in going out, report themselves to the head-men of the town, and one of them is appointed the chief, to be answerable for the conduct of his companions. In all practicable cases, the chief applies to the agent, states the intention of his party, and receives a certificate of the fact, recommending him to the friendly attention of such white people as he may meet; and, on the return of the party in the spring, a report is made to the agent, by all these chiefs, in person, by some of their companions, or by some of their towns people, stating where they have been; what they have seen, and what they have done. This is a very important regulation; it gives the agent a correct view of occurrences throughout the extended range of the hunters, and enables him, with inconceivable speed, to prevent or correct crimes or abuses. In further aid, the sale of horses has an additional corrective to "the special licence" to buy. All Indians having horses to sell are now bound to report them to the agent, and receive from him a certificate, describing the horse, naming the owner, and that the property is good. So far, this regulation seems infallible on the Indian side, and would be so, but, on the white side, the practice does not correspond with the law. The people on the frontiers purchase horses from the Indians without special license, and without asking any thing about the true owner. Horses found on the Indian lands, near the plantations of their owners, are frequently taken up by the Indians, carried across the river, and sold for a small part of their value only, and the Indians frequently report those sales to the agent, describing the horse, where taken up, and where sold, and this has, in several instances, enabled the agent to give information which has directed the true owner to the discovery of his horse. As no aid has hitherto been furnished by my fellow-citizens on the northeastern frontier, to correct this abuse, no prosecutions have taken place, for the want of that proof which they could give.

Trade.—Since the death of Mr. Price, pro-agent of war, there has been no licence renewed, as, from my instructions, the agent of war in Georgia was to grant them. All the licences granted by Mr. Price have long since expired, and this has been thrice repeated by me, to the Secretary of War, without receiving any directions. As soon as the licences expired, the agent passed a general regulation for the traders to continue their trade, notwithstanding, until further advised by him.

As the factor for the United States at fort Wilkinson, was not authorized to trade in cattle and hogs, the agent has given permits to people, recommended to him to be of good character, to trade for cattle and hogs only, and these permits are limited to the annual season for beef and pork. This regulation was deemed indispensable, as the want of dealers in cattle and hogs, and of course a market for them, deranged our plan of civilization in one of the most important parts of it.

Public Establishments.—There are two: one among the Lower, and the other among the Upper Creeks. The two blacksmiths, promised under the 8th article of the treaty of Coleraine, reside at them. The smiths are instructed to mend only, and not make any thing but by order of the agent. In the spring they are restricted to implements of husbandry, and at other seasons they attend equally to any work brought them. White people pay for their work, and this constitutes a small fund for coal, wood, and small articles wanted in the shops, and is reserved for that purpose. The smiths receive each twenty six dollars per month and the value of one ration per day, at the contract price on the frontiers; and the strikers ten dollars per month, and the value of a ration a day, paid quarterly.

The manner of administering justice.—When the national council are convened, all the white people are ordered to attend on a given day. Three of the most respectable are appointed by the agent to hear and decide on all cases between white people, with the right of appeal to him. In all cases between a white man and an Indian, the agent hears and decides himself. The judgments have hitherto been carried into effect, without doing more than giving them to the parties, and without costs. But, to render this mode complete, there must be an officer appointed to carry the judgments into effect, and provision must be made to punish thefts, &c. all of which should proceed from the legislative provision of our Government.

Expenditures in the Creek Agency. The pay of the agent is fixed by the Secretary of War; and a sum limited for the assistants, which is assigned to them by the agent. The limitation has in no instance been exceeded. Quarterly, an estimate is made, specifying the precise objects of expenditure; the contingencies certified by a gentleman who pays them, on the order of the agent, and duplicates of the whole signed by the agent; one of which is sent on to the Secretary of War, on whom a bill is drawn, as heretofore advised, at ten days' sight, in favor of the United States' factor, for the amount. In some cases, and not unfrequently, the principal part of contingencies is paid by the agent, out of the stipend allowed by the United States to the Creeks—such as the keeping of warriors among the Seminoles to watch their movements, the apprehending and punishing horse thieves, and in some instances, the premium of two dollars and fifty cents allowed for all horses delivered to the agent, where it is ascertained that they were stolen by Indians, (except the thief informs against himself) twelve dollars and fifty cents allowed for the delivery of runaway negroes, where it has been ascertained that they have been induced to do so by Indians, and the sending runners to the neighboring Indians, on affairs relative solely to Indians.

CHEROKEES, CHICKASAWS, CHOCTAWS, AND CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 23, 1801.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The States of Georgia and Tennessee being peculiarly interested in our carrying into execution the two acts passed by Congress on the 19th of February, 1799, and 13th May, 1800, commissioners were appointed early in summer, and other measures taken for the purpose. The objects of these laws requiring meetings with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Creeks, the enclosed instructions were prepared for the proceedings with the three first nations. Our applications to the Cherokees failed altogether. Those to the Chickasaws produced the treaty now laid before you for your advice and consent, whereby we obtained permission to open a road of communication with the Mississippi territory: the commissioners are, probably, at this time, in conference with the Choctaws. Further information having been wanting, when these instructions were formed, to enable us to prepare those respecting the Creeks, the commissioners were directed to proceed with the others. We have now reason to believe the conferences with the Creeks cannot take place till the spring.

The journals and letters of the commissioners, relating to the subject of the treaty now enclosed, accompany it.

TH: JEFFERSON.

December 22, 1801.

A treaty of reciprocal advantages and mutual convenience, between the United States of America and the Chickasaws.

The President of the United States of America, by James Wilkinson, Brigadier General in the service of the United States, Benjamin Hawkins, of North Carolina, and Andrew Pickens, of South Carolina, commissioners of the United States, who are vested with full powers, and the Mingo, principal men, and warriors, of the Chickasaw nation, representing the said nation, have agreed to the following articles:

ART. 1. The Mingo, principal men, and warriors, of the Chickasaw nation of Indians, give leave and permission to the President of the United States of America, to lay out, open, and make, a convenient wagon road through their land, between the settlements of Mero district, in the State of Tennessee, and those of Natchez, in the Mississippi territory, in such way and manner as he may deem proper; and the same shall be a highway for the citizens of the United States, and the Chickasaws. The Chickasaws shall appoint two discreet men to serve as assistants, guides, or pilots, during the time of laying out and opening the road, under the direction of the officer charged with that duty, who shall have a reasonable compensation for their service: Provided, always, that the necessary ferries over the water courses, crossed by the said roads, shall be held and deemed to be the property of the Chickasaw nation.

Highway
Removal

ART. 2. The commissioners of the United States give to the Mingo of the Chickasaws, and the deputation of that nation, goods to the value of seven hundred dollars, to compensate him and them, and their attendants, for the expense and inconvenience they may have sustained, by their respectful and friendly attention to the President of the United States of America, and to the request made to them in his name, to permit the opening of the road. And as the persons, towns, villages, lands, hunting grounds, and other rights and property of the Chickasaws, as set forth in the treaties or stipulations heretofore entered into between the contracting parties, more especially in and by a certificate of the President of the United States of America, under their seal of the first of July, 1794, are in the peace, and under the protection of the United States, the commissioners of the United States do hereby further agree, that the President of the United States of America shall take such measures, from time to time, as he may deem proper, to assist the Chickasaws to preserve, entire, all their rights against the encroachments of unjust neighbors, of which he shall be the judge; and also to preserve and perpetuate friendship and brotherhood between the white people and the Chickasaws.

ART. 3. The commissioners of the United States may, if they deem it advisable, proceed immediately to carry the first article into operation: and the treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries, have hereunto subscribed our names and affixed our seals, at Chickasaw Bluffs, the twenty-fourth of October, 1801.

JAMES WILKINSON, Brigadier General. [L. s.]
 BENJAMIN HAWKINS, [L. s.]
 ANDREW PICKENS. [L. s.]

[Signed by the Mingo and sixteen of the principal men and warriors of the Chickasaw nation.]

Instructions to William R. Davie, James Wilkinson, and Benjamin Hawkins, Esquires, Commissioners of the United States, to hold conferences, and sign a treaty, or treaties, with the several nations of Indians, herein mentioned.

GENTLEMEN:

The President of the United States having appointed you commissioners, on the part of the United States, to hold conferences with several of the Indian nations, on the east side of the Mississippi river, south of the Ohio, and within the territory of the United States, and, as it is desirable that the negotiations on the several points to be treated of, should be commenced without unnecessary delay, it is the wish of the President, that you should assemble at the military post, at Southwest Point, in the State of Tennessee, on the first day of August next, then and there to confer, conformably with the following instructions, with such of the principal men of the Cherokee nation, as may meet you on the part of the said nation.

The objects of your negotiations, at that post, will be, to endeavor to obtain the consent of the Cherokees to the following proposals, viz:

First. That they cede to the United States all that part of the land now remaining to them, agreeably to the several treaties, made between them and the United States, which lies to the northward of a direct line, to be run from a point or place mentioned in the treaty of Tellico, of the 2d of October, 1798, on the Tennessee river, one mile above its junction with the Clinch, to the point at or near the head of the west fork of Stone's river, on the ridge which divides the waters of Cumberland from those of Duck river, which is struck by a southwest line from the point below where the Kentucky road crosses the Cumberland river, as described in the treaty of Holston.

Second. That the Tennessee river shall be the boundary from its mouth to the mouth of Duck river; that Duck river shall be the boundary, thence, to the mouth of Rock creek; and that a direct line shall be run, for a continuation of the boundary, from the mouth of Rock creek to the point on the ridge that divides the waters of the Cumberland from those of Duck river, as above described.

Third. That a road be opened, of which the citizens of the United States shall have a free and unmolested use, from the boundary line to a tract or parcel of land of five miles diameter, on the Tennessee river, below the Muscle shoals, at the mouth of Ocochappo, or Bear creek, reserved to the United States by the treaty, made at Hopewell, with the Chickasaws, and thence, towards Natchez, (with permission to establish two or three white families on said road) to the commencement of the Choctaws' claim.

Fourth. Should the Indians refuse to cede to the United States any of the lands above designated, you will endeavor to prevail upon them to cede all the land that lies northward of the road, from the Knoxville to the Nashville settlements, run conformably to the treaty of 1791, or, if they should be unwilling to grant this, a strip of land, from one to five miles in width, to include the said road, in its whole extent, across their lands.

Should you not succeed in attaining the first object of your mission, you will endeavor to procure the consent of the Indians to our establishing three or four white families at such points on the road, across their lands, from the Knoxville to the Nashville settlements, which they granted to the use of the United States, by the treaty of 1791, as the United States may designate.

Should you succeed or fail in attaining the first and second objects, you will, nevertheless, endeavor to procure the consent of the Indians to the third, viz: for opening a road from the boundary to the Tennessee, and thence onward, as above mentioned.

On obtaining the consent of the Indians to the three first above stated proposals, or the alternatives marked "fourth," you are authorized to engage, that the United States shall pay to them, annually, in goods suitable for their use, the sum of one thousand dollars, in addition to the annuities now paid them, and a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, immediately, in cash, or such goods as they may designate.

For their consent to the two above stated less important objects, viz: the establishing three or four white families on the road across their lands, and the opening the road from the boundary line to the Tennessee, and thence to the commencement of the Choctaws' claim, (to the latter of which, the consent of the Chickasaws may also be necessary, as hereinafter mentioned) you are authorized to engage, on behalf of the United States, that the United States shall pay the Indians such moderate sum as you may judge expedient.

It is to be observed, that, by the treaty above quoted, made at Hopewell, on the Keowee, 10th of January, 1786, with the Chickasaws, the United States have a reservation of a tract or parcel of land for the establishment of a trading post on (though not mentioned in the treaty doubtless) the Tennessee river, at the mouth of Ocochappo, or Bear creek, to be laid out in a circle, the diameter of which shall be five miles on the said river. It is presumed that it must have been understood, that the United States should be entitled to a road to and from the said post, as, without such right, the reservation would be of no use.

It is stated, that both the Cherokee and Chickasaw nations claim the land on both sides of the Tennessee river, for a considerable distance; if this be correct, the consent of the Chickasaws to the opening the said road must be obtained, as well as that of the Cherokees.

When you shall have terminated your discussions with the Cherokees, you will please to proceed, in such way as you shall deem most advisable, to the Chickasaw bluffs, to endeavor to obtain from the principal men of the Chickasaw nation, who may meet you there, the consent of the nation to opening the above described road, and to establishing two or more white families on it.

After completing your negotiation with the Chickasaws, you will proceed to Natchez, to hold a treaty with the Choctaws. The Choctaws may be considered one of the most powerful nations of Indians within the limits of the United States; and a pacific and friendly disposition in and towards them should be cultivated, as well from principles of policy as of humanity.

All fair and proper means should be exerted to evince to them a really friendly disposition on the part of the Government of the United States, and to fortify their minds against the artful and mischievous insinuations and practices of adventurers, who, too frequently, obtrude themselves into their and other nations. It is of importance that the Indian nations generally within the United States should be convinced of the certainty in which they may, at all times, rely upon the friendship of the United States, and that the President will never abandon them, or their children, whilst their conduct towards the citizens of the United States and their Indian neighbors shall be peaceable, honest, and fair.

It must be observed, that the Choctaws received, in the course of the last year, from the Government of the United States, presents to the amount of two thousand dollars, and that an appropriation of the like sum has been made for the same purpose for the present year, although that nation have no claim to such a grant, founded on any treaty or authorized agreement. It was understood that they had taken some expression of Mr. Ellicot's for a promise to this effect, and it may be proper and politic to continue making them an annual grant, perhaps of the same sum; but it must be impressed on their minds, that they have given not only no equivalent, but actually nothing at all for it; that they are indebted for what they have received to the generosity of the United States, and not to their justice; that the grants must be viewed as presents, and not as compensation; that they may be continued or discontinued at the pleasure of the United States, without giving the Choctaws a right to claim the one, or complain of the other; and that it might be proper for them to grant a something, though an equivalent be not asked in return.

It is stated that the citizens of the Mississippi territory have been subjected to some vexations by the great number of Indians encamped among them at the distribution of those presents. You will inquire into the propriety of having all future distributions made within the Indian boundary.

In addition to the explanation and enforcement of the conciliatory disposition and friendly intentions of the United States, you will endeavor to obtain the consent of the Choctaws with reference to the above mentioned views of the presents which they have received, to our opening a road from the point, where the road from the reserved circle shall strike their land through their country to the Natchez, and permission for three or four white families to settle on the said road within their country, for the accommodation of travellers and our post riders, on such reasonable conditions as you may deem proper.

On Dunbar's map, a line is run northward from the 31st degree of north latitude, near the 91st degree of west longitude from Greenwich, the lands between which and the Mississippi, were, heretofore, ceded to the British Government. Although no doubt exists of this fact, it may be impolitic to require from the Choctaws a direct acknowledgment of it; you will, however, consider, and speak of it as indubitable; and endeavor, indirectly, to draw from them an acknowledgment of its authenticity. This they will not refuse, unless they should believe a doubt to exist of it in our minds.

To confirm a pacific and friendly disposition in the Indian tribes, generally, towards the United States, should, at all times, be considered an important object, and is recommended as such to your best exertions; and the result of inquiries into the present state of society among them, made with the advantages which you will possess whilst in their countries, with a view of ascertaining the effects of the measures pursued by our Government towards them, will be highly useful.

In all your negotiations under these instructions, you will pay the strictest attention to the disposition manifested by the Indians, on the several points to which you are to draw their assent. The ill humor which propositions for further cessions sometimes awaken in them, may be, in a greater or lesser degree, excited by those which you are herein charged with making.

It will, therefore, be incumbent on you to introduce the desires of the Government, in such a manner as will permit you to drop them, as you may find them illy received, without giving the Indians an opportunity to reply with a decided negative, or raising in them unfriendly and inimical dispositions.

You will state none of them in the tone of demands; but, in the first instance, merely mention them as propositions which you are authorized to make, and their assent to which, the Government would consider as new testimonials of their friendship. From the manner in which they shall receive your first overtures, you will be enabled to judge with what prospect of success you may press the respective points committed to you.

Measures have been taken for furnishing, at the several times and places at which conferences are to be held, provisions for yourselves and your attendants, as well as the necessary quantities of goods for the Indians, with whom the several above mentioned negotiations are to be entered into, and for supplying with rations such of them as may attend; the distribution of all these will be made under your directions, and additional quantities of goods, in the event of your success, may be had from the factory at Tellico; the contractor for those districts, Alexander D. Orr, Esquire, is directed to furnish you, on your requisitions, with such other articles as you may need for yourselves and attendants, or additional quantities of rations for the Indians.

Your compensation will be eight dollars per day, from the date of your leaving your respective homes until your return, and all your necessary expenses will be reimbursed by the Government.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the War Office of the United States, at Washington, this twenty-fourth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one.

HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 3, 1801.

GENTLEMEN:

Having been mistaken as to some part of the line between the Cherokees and the white people, the President, on further reflection, has thought proper to direct, that the second object of your conference with the Cherokees, viz: the alteration of the boundary line from the Ohio, between the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, should be suspended, and you will consider that part of your instructions suspended accordingly, as well in its relation to the Cherokees as the Chickasaws; and, as by information lately received, it is evident that the Cherokees have testified much dissatisfaction, on hearing that the Government were about to request them to cede more land, it is the wish of the President that you should treat the subject with great tenderness, and that you should not press them on any other subjects than those which relate to roads, and settlers thereon. You will impress upon them the belief, that the United States have no desire to purchase any of their land, unless they are quite willing to sell; that we are not in want of lands, but only wish to be accommodated with such roads as are necessary to keep up a communication with all parts of the United States, without trespassing on the lands of the red people.

It is suggested, that the Indians will oppose our request for opening roads, for the two following reasons: that their cattle and horses will travel too far from home in such roads, and be driven away, and stolen by the white people, who may travel on said roads.

To obviate these objections, it may be proper to agree, on the part of the United States, that no white people shall be allowed to travel on the road to Natchez, except such as shall have procured passes from our agents at Tennessee and at Natchez, which passes shall be countersigned by the men who may be stationed at the several houses to be established on the roads, and that gates shall be erected at some of the bridges on that road, and maintained by the United States, to prevent the horses and cattle of the Indians from straying far from home.

I am, gentlemen, &c.

HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
JAMES WILKINSON, and BENJAMIN HAWKINS, Esqrs.

P. S. Please to correct an error in the first section of your instructions, by inserting the word "below," between the words, "from the point," and "where the Kentucky road," &c.

NOTE.—William R. Davie, Esq. named in the preceding instructions, having declined accepting the appointment, Andrew Pickens was appointed to fill the vacancy.

To James Wilkinson, Benjamin Hawkins, and Andrew Pickens, Esquires.

Removed

GENTLEMEN:

Your negotiations at fort Wilkinson, in Georgia, with the Creek nation of Indians, will be directed to the subjects, and agreeably to the instructions following, viz:

1st. You will endeavor to obtain from the Creeks a cession to the United States of the district of territory in Georgia, known by the name of Tallassee county; this will be your primary object; and as it is considered of great importance, you are authorized to engage that the United States will pay them, for their consent to such a cession, a sum not exceeding twelve thousand dollars, and an annuity, in addition to that at present paid them, in cash, or such goods suitable for their use, as they may designate, to the amount of, not exceeding two thousand dollars.

It is left to your discretion to increase or decrease the immediate payment, or the annuity, in proportion to these sums, as will be most agreeable to the Indians.

2d. You will ascertain whether the consent of the Creeks can be obtained, to cede to the United States the tract of land, lying between the Oakmulgee and Oconee rivers, and commonly called the Oakmulgee fork; and if attainable, on what terms. You will make report of the result of your inquiries on this subject, but decline entering into any engagement, until you shall receive further instructions.

3d. By the treaty of August 7th, 1790, a mode was agreed upon between the Creeks and the United States, by which the head or source of the main south branch of the Oconee river should be ascertained, and a decision has been had accordingly, whether correctly or incorrectly, is a matter of doubt. But certain persons, among whom is a Colonel Wofford, had previously settled near the Currahee mountain, on lands which, they state, they have great reason to believe, would have fallen within the United States' line, if it had been run to the true head, or source of the main south branch of the Oconee aforesaid. By the decision, their settlements are at the mercy of the Indians, and it is desirable that you should use your endeavors to prevail upon the Indians so far to change the present line as to include the settlements of Colonel Wofford, and those in his immediate vicinity, within the United States, for such reasonable sum as you may think proper.

It may be worthy of observation, that the deputation from the Cherokee nation, lately at the seat of Government, stated that the Cherokees had claims to the last mentioned lands. In cases of controversies between the Indians, respecting the divisional lines of their countries, it must always be difficult for us to ascertain the validity of their respective claims, and inadvisable for us to interfere, except in cases like the present.

You will be pleased, if by you considered of sufficient consequence, to investigate the subject, by making such inquiries, among the Cherokees as well as the Creeks, as will lead to a true knowledge of their respective rights to the lands in question.

The Creeks being a powerful and proud nation, and great jealousies having at different times arisen between them and the frontier inhabitants, all prudent means in your power should be exerted to reconcile them, and to remove every obstacle to their mutual friendship; and every assurance of the protection and friendship of the President, which you were authorized to make to the other Indian nations, should be tendered to the Creeks also. The information which you may obtain relative to the conduct and views of Bowles, may enable you to fortify the minds of the Creeks against his mischievous prospects, if he should continue at-large in their vicinity.

A quantity of goods for the Indians, and articles for your own use, will be forwarded to Mr. Joseph Clay, at Savannah, from whence they may be easily conveyed to fort Wilkinson; in the event of your success, additional quantities of goods will be transmitted immediately, to fulfil your engagements.

[L. s.] Given under my hand, and the seal of the War Office, at Washington, the 17th day of July, A. D. 1801.

H. DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

CHICKASAW BLUFFS, October 25th, 1801.

SIR:

We arrived here on the 18th instant, and on the 21st we commenced our conference, with a full and respectable deputation from the Chickasaw nation, headed by their Mingo or king.

We found this people, like all others of their kind, under similar circumstances—jealous of our views, and alarmed for their rights of territory; but their confidence in Government had not been shaken, and we experienced little difficulty in accomplishing the treaty which we have the honor to transmit you, under cover, for the consideration of the President and the Senate.

Perceiving the deputation to be strongly opposed to the proposition to introduce licensed establishments on the road, for the accommodation of travellers, we waived that point, without hesitation, because we are persuaded such accommodations will be provided by the natives themselves, or by the whites who have been admitted among them, as soon as the highway is completed.

We enclose you the minutes of our conference, for the satisfaction of the Executive, and, also, an inventory of the goods delivered on the occasion, taken from an invoice of articles, amounting to two thousand six hundred and ninety-six dollars, which, with two hundred gallons of whiskey, and one thousand pounds of tobacco, comprehends all the goods and merchandise we have yet received for the purposes of the commission.

To aid and inform the officers who may superintend the construction of the proposed road, and to prevent misunderstandings, we have advised that two Indians, recommended by the deputation, should be employed to attend those officers until the guide line is established, and that the resident agent of the nation should accompany them. We are also of opinion, that interpreters may be necessary with the working parties, until a clear understanding of our engagements with the nation may be generally diffused. It is easier to prevent difficulties with people jealous, tenacious, and ignorant, than to remove them after their occurrence.

It seems fortunate the Cherokees did not consent to open a road from Nashville to the Tennessee, because we find the proposed route embraced by the limits of the Chickasaws, which have been clearly defined in that quarter, and explicitly recognised in a declaration of President Washington, bearing date the 1st July, 1794, now in possession of the nation, and corresponding with the authentic copy under cover, which has been furnished us by the Mingo. The whole deputation manifested great anxiety on this subject, and expressed a strong desire that we should acknowledge this declaration, and renew the assurances attached to it; and it was on this ground, to prevent distrust, and to evince the integrity of Government, that we entered into the stipulation contained in the second article, viewing it, in effect, as the mere repetition of an obligation which existed in full force.

We with pleasure bear testimony to the amicable and orderly disposition of this nation, whose greatest boast is, "that they have never spilt the blood of a white man;" but, with these dispositions, they are not so far advanced in the habits of civilization as their neighbors, the Cherokees, though they discover a taste for individual property, have made considerable progress in agriculture, and in stocking their farms, and are desirous to increase their domestic manufactures.

The enclosed schedule of their wants, which the deputation have requested us to submit to the Executive, strongly marks their views and their providence. "We are about to raise cotton," said a chief; "we shall want canoes to carry it to market, and adzes are necessary to build them." We, with great deference, submit these claims of the Chickasaws to the consideration of Government, and, were it not presumptuous, we would earnestly recommend to the councils of our country, a steady perseverance in that humane and beneficent system, which has for its object the civilization, and consequent salvation, of a devoted race of human beings. The prospects of success become daily more flattering, but, to ensure it, an extension of the means, and a reform in the application, may become necessary.

It occurs to us, that it may be salutary to compel all white persons who traverse the Chickasaw country, to confine themselves to the highway proposed to be opened, for which end, the authority of the National Legislature may be found expedient.

We have taken measures to convene the Choctaws at Loftus' Heights, on the grounds of convenience and economy to the public, and of accommodation to the inhabitants, and we expect to meet them in council about the 20th proximo.

With perfect respect, we are, sir, your obedient, humble servants,

J. A. WILKINSON.
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.
ANDREW PICKENS.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

Minutes of a conference, held at the Chickasaw Bluffs, by General James Wilkinson, Benjamin Hawkins, and Andrew Pickens, Esquires, Commissioners of the United States; with the king, chiefs, and principal men, of the Chickasaw nation, on the 21st, and concluding on the 24th of October, eighteen hundred and one.

The parties being assembled, the following address was delivered by General Wilkinson, on the part of the commissioners:

King, Chiefs, and Principal Men, of the Chickasaw nation:

You are now addressed by commissioners from the United States, who have been appointed by your father, the President, to meet you in council, and to confer with you on subjects interesting to your own welfare, and to that of the citizens of the United States.

BROTHERS: Your father, the President, takes you by the hand, and invites you to look up to him as your friend and father; to rely in full confidence on his unvarying disposition to lead and protect you in the paths of peace and prosperity, and to preserve concord between you and your white brethren, within the United States.

BROTHERS: We invite you to state to us freely, the situation of your nation, and what you wish on the part of your father, the President, to better your condition, in trade, in agriculture, and in manufactures, that we may state the same for the consideration of Government. We invite you to open your minds freely to us, and to set forth your wishes and all your wants. When we hear from you the true state of your affairs, we shall be able to assist you with our advice, our attention, and our friendship.

BROTHERS: On the part of your white brethren, we have to represent to you, that the path from the settlements of Natchez (through your nation) to those of Cumberland, is an uncomfortable one, and very inconvenient to them in its present unimproved condition; and we are directed to stipulate with you, to make it suitable to the accommodation of those who may use it, and at the same time beneficial to yourselves.

We are your friends, and the representatives of your father, the President.

After some explanations as to the accommodation to be established on the road, Major Colbert, a chief, observed, that no answer could be given to day; that they would have to consult with each other, and when they had made up their minds, they would speak to the commissioners.

October 22.—The council being convened, Major Colbert requested the commissioners to explain fully the views of the President, with respect to the road, which was accordingly done. The Indians then went into a discussion of the subject among themselves. The commissioners being about to withdraw, Major Colbert observed, the Indians wished to settle the business as soon as possible. After some time spent in deliberation, in their own language, the king spoke as follows:

I am very glad to hear the commissioners hold such language, that does not require the cession of land, or any thing of that kind. I consider the propositions to be made for the benefit of my women and children.

Major Colbert, being fully empowered by the council, gave its determination in the following words:

The nation agrees, that a wagon road may be cut through its land, but does not consent to the erection of houses for the accommodation of travellers. We leave that subject to future consideration, in order that time may enable our people to ascertain the advantages to be derived from it. In the mean time, travellers will always find provisions in the nation, sufficient to carry them through.

The council then adjourned.

October 24.—The council met, and the treaty being deliberately read and interpreted, by sentences and paragraphs, was signed by the contracting parties.

JAMES WILKINSON,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS.

MISSISSIPPI, CHICKASAW BLUFFS, October 27, 1801.

SIR:

The Chickasaws having agreed we should open the proposed road, I have issued the necessary orders to Colonel Butler, and have ordered eight companies of the 2d regiment of infantry, to ascend the Tennessee, as soon as water craft can be provided. I expect four companies will be in motion soon after my orders reach the cantonment, as I have directed the corps to proceed in two divisions, for the sake of despatch.

I find, on inquiry, and from observation, that the route by Bear creek is an improper one, as the bottoms, on both sides the Tennessee, are inundated for a considerable distance during the floods, and the ground over which it passes, is hilly and much broken. I am, at the same time, informed by Major Colbert, that a good way, and a good crossing, may be found a little further to the eastward, which will shorten the distance.

I have, for these reasons, and to secure a correspondence in the operations of the several cutting parties, with the advice of the commissioners, employed the agent of the Chickasaw nation, Mr. Samuel Mitchell, with two confidential Indians, to commence at the Indian boundary, north of the Tennessee river, and to mark a guide line through the Chickasaw country, by which, the superintending officers are to be governed in their course; this will involve some expense, but it is certainly necessary, and, in my opinion, it will be profitable, as it will secure a uniform course over the best ground, and will obviate the effects of dissension, caprice, or incapacity, among the officers in command, at the several points of operation. But, you may rest assured, that neither this, nor any other expense, shall be extended a dollar beyond the limits of utility and propriety.

We leave this place to-morrow, and expect to be in conference with the Choctaws about the 20th proximo, at Loftus' Heights, our barrier post on this river; and should they accede to the proposition for opening the road, of which I have no doubt, six companies will be put to work at the skirts of the settlements of Natchez, under the command of Colonel Gaither.

I am perplexed by Colonel Hawkins' idea, of the impracticability of assembling the Creeks before the spring; but, should this be the case, I will endeavor to avail myself of the interval, personally to inspect the beginnings of the several working parties, and to examine the route which may be surveyed and marked by Mr. Mitchell.

The garrison of one company at this place is remarkably healthy. I have heard, casually, of the death of Captain Smith, of the 3d regiment, at the barrier post, but have understood that the troops enjoyed health.

With perfect respect and regard, I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

JAS. WILKINSON.

TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 28, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senateand of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the accounts of our Indian trading houses, as rendered up to the 1st day of January, 1801, with a report of the Secretary of War thereon, explaining the effects and the situation of that commerce, and the reasons in favor of its further extension; but it is believed, that the act authorizing this trade expired so long ago as the 3d of March, 1799; its revival, therefore, as well as its extension, is submitted to the consideration of the Legislature.

The act regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, will also expire on the 3d day of March next. While on the subject of its continuance, it will be worthy the consideration of the Legislature, whether the provisions of the law inflicting on Indians, in certain cases, the punishment of death by hanging, might not permit its commutation into death by military execution; the form of punishment, in the former way, being peculiarly repugnant to their ideas, and increasing the obstacles to the surrender of the criminal.

These people are becoming very sensible of the baneful effects produced on their morals, their health, and existence, by the abuse of ardent spirits: and some of them earnestly desire a prohibition of that article from being carried among them. The Legislature will consider whether the effectuating that desire would not be in the spirit of benevolence and liberality, which they have hitherto practised towards these, our neighbors, and which has had so happy an effect towards conciliating their friendship. It has been found, too, in experience, that the same abuse gives frequent rise to incidents tending much to commit our peace with the Indians.

It is now become necessary to run and mark the boundaries between them and us in various parts. The law last mentioned has authorized this to be done; but no existing appropriation meets the expense.

Certain papers explanatory of the grounds of this communication are herewith enclosed.

TH: JEFFERSON.

January 27, 1802.

AGENT FOR INDIAN FACTORIES' OFFICE,
United States' Arsenal, on Schuylkill, November 11th, 1801. }

SIR:

I herewith enclose you a statement of the Indian factories' accounts up to the 1st of January, 1801, agreeably to returns received from the factories to that period. In June last, there was forwarded to the Georgia factory, an invoice of merchandise, amounting to five thousand five hundred and twelve dollars and seventy-six cents; at the same time, one to the Tellico factory, amounting to five thousand two hundred and ninety-seven dollars and thirty-three cents; also, the articles in the care of Colonel Meigs, which I have directed the factor to receive, agreeably to your orders, amounting to two thousand six hundred and fifty dollars and thirty-one cents. This is the season for their making the remittances of peltry, &c.

Mr. Wright informs, that the trade at fort Wilkinson is in a flourishing state, and that he has a much greater quantity of peltry to remit this winter, than he has ever had before at any one time. Accounts from Mr. Hooker, the factor at Tellico, are not so favorable; he observes, in his last letters, "business has been dull for some time past."

Agreeably to the within statements, there is an increase of capital, (including one-third advance on the original cost of the merchandise remaining at the factories) viz: of the Georgia factory's, fifteen thousand seven hundred and forty dollars and eighty-three cents; of Tellico factory's, three hundred and nine dollars and fifty-three cents; which increase, on account of both factories, would have been much greater, had the peltry been disposed of to advantage in Philadelphia. Instead of its having been sold as soon as received, while it was in good order, it has been deposited in Mr. Tybout's cellar, (the person to whom the sales were entrusted to be made) where a considerable part of it has been suffered to remain, until worm-eaten and rotten, and then sold for one half its original cost; and some, rendered entirely unfit for sale, has been thrown upon the common.

The great disproportion of gain between the two factories is owing to the mode of transportation to either place, as all the merchandise forwarded to Tellico, as well as the peltry received from there, are transported the whole of the way by land, at a high carriage; whereas, the remittances, to and from the Georgia factory, are shipped to Savannah, and from thence, forwarded to the factory by wagons, which route reduces the freight and land carriage of articles, to and from the latter place, to less than one-third of the cost of transportation, on account of the Tellico factory.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1801.

The Secretary of War has the honor of submitting, for the consideration of the President of the United States, the following statement and observations on the subject of the establishment of trading-houses with the Indians, from a careful examination of which, it appears—

That Congress, in March, 1795, appropriated $50,000, and in April, 1796, the additional sum of $150,000, to be applied, under the direction of the President of the United States, to the purpose of carrying on trade with the Indian nations; and that, in consequence, one trading-house was opened on the frontiers of Georgia, and another on the boundary between the State of Tennessee and the Cherokee nation; that, for these objects, the sum of $90,000 only, has yet been drawn from the treasury; and that the business of these two houses has been so managed, as, from the best information to be obtained, not only to save the original stock from diminution, but even to increase it about three or four per cent.

As far as the system has been carried into operation, it appears to have had a very salutary effect on the minds of the Indians, and there can be but little doubt remaining, but that a much more extensive distribution of the fund, among the several Indian nations, would be attended with all the good effects that were originally contemplated by the Government, and might be made without any diminution of the fund.

The several nations of Indians appear extremely desirous of participating in the advantages, which result from their being enabled to procure supplies, made under the immediate direction of the Government, from a confidence that they will be fairly and honestly dealt with, and that they will not so frequently be subjected to the inconveniences of travelling a great distance to an uncertain market, and of being imposed on in their dealings.

The intercourse which grows out of such establishments, has a powerful tendency towards strengthening and confirming the friendship of the Indians to the people and Government of the United States, and towards detaching them more and more from the influence of neighboring Governments.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. DEARBORN.

Extract of a letter from J. Edgar Esqr. relative to the execution of a Delaware Indian, dated at KASKASKIAS, November 20th, 1802.

"The information I allude to above, is, that about fifty Indians of the Delaware nation are assembled on the river Mississippi, and have declared that, if the prisoner should be hanged, they would kill every white man they met with. They appear to be dissatisfied chiefly with the mode of execution; our own Indians are also dissatisfied, and have uttered some murmurs; under those circumstances, I am of opinion, that the most prudent step we can take is to prepare ourselves for any thing that may happen."

Extract from a talk delivered by the Little Turtle to the President of the United States, January 4th, 1802.

"FATHER: Should this request be granted, nothing shall be wanting, on the part of your children, the chiefs, to introduce husbandry among their children, if the United States will furnish them with the proper utensils. But, father, nothing can be done to advantage unless the great council of the Sixteen Fires, now assembled, will prohibit any person from selling any spirituous liquors among their red brothers.

"FATHER: The introduction of this poison has been prohibited in our camps, but not in our towns, where many of our hunters, for this poison, dispose of, not only their furs, &c. but frequently of their guns and blankets, and return to their families destitute.

"FATHER: Your children are not wanting in industry; but it is the introduction of this fatal poison which keeps them poor. Your children have not that command over themselves, which you have, therefore, before any thing can be done to advantage, this evil must be remedied.

"FATHER: When our white brothers came to this land, our forefathers were numerous and happy; but, since their intercourse with the white people, and owing to the introduction of this fatal poison, we have become less numerous and happy."

ST. REGIS AND SENEÇAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 2, 1802,

By message from the President of the United States, making sundry nominations, of which the following is an extract:

"John Taylor, of New York, to be commissioner to hold a treaty between the State of New York, as explained in a letter from the Governor of New York, an abstract of which is enclosed; also, to be commissioner to hold a convention between the Seneca Indians and the agent of the Holland Land Company, for the purpose of reconveying to the Senecas, certain parcels of their former lands, as explained in a letter from the said agent, a copy of which is enclosed."

[EXTRACT, FROM THE WAR OFFICE.]

"His Excellency Governor Clinton, in his letter of the 26th of November last, addressed to the Secretary of War, states that the St. Regis tribe of Indians had proposed ceding a tract of land, one mile square, including a ferry, to the State of New York; to sanction which cession, he requests that a commissioner may be appointed, on the part of the United States, to attend at Albany, where the business would be closed the present winter."

PHILADELPHIA, 27th December, 1801.

SIR:

At a treaty held in the county of Ontario, and State of New York, under the authority of the United States, the 15th of September, 1797, by Jeremiah Wadsworth, Esq. a commissioner appointed by the President of the United States, the Seneca nation of Indians released their native rights in a tract of country, situate in the county of Ontario, and State of New York, to Robert Morris, Esq. of the city of Philadelphia, a large proportion of which is now vested in a certain association, or company, called the Holland Land Company, for whom I am the agent or attorney.

At this treaty, the Indians reserved the native right to certain tracts of country on which they now reside, the bounds of which are particularly defined in their deed of cession. Since the treaty, their reservations have been surveyed, and it is now alleged by them, that the lands intended to be reserved by them, are not wholly included within those bounds.

To promote the harmony which has hitherto subsisted between the Indians and the settlers on the adjoining lands, on a representation of the facts, I did not hesitate promising, that, if the Government assented to the exchange, I would execute a deed, confirming the bounds of their reservation, conformably to their wishes. This has tended to increase their anxiety, and they have actually executed a deed, and sent it to me, to be executed on the part of the Holland Land Company.

By referring to the act of Congress, of 3d of March, 1799, section 12, I find this conveyance would be of no validity, and that I should be transgressing the laws of the United States to execute the same, and, of course, incurring the penalties of that law. A letter written by me, directed to the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the nation, explaining my motives for delaying the execution of this deed, would probably not prove very satisfactory to them; and I am advised that the President of the United States, should it even meet his approbation, cannot, without a treaty being first held, give this conveyance effect. The only mode that I can then pursue, will be, to delay the delivery of this conveyance till a treaty is held. To satisfy the Indians in the interim, it would be useful to show that I had applied to Government to confirm this conveyance, but that the delivery of the same, until a treaty was held, would be incompatible with the laws of the United States.

If, on reflection, this course should appear proper to you, may I solicit you, in your official capacity, to communicate the same to me? Your letter I will immediately forward to the Indians, and I trust, it will be satisfactory to them.

With much consideration, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

PAUL BUSTI.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State, Federal City.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 9th February, 1802.

SIR:

The Secretary of State has just put into my hand, your note of yesterday, in answer to which, I can only say, that the treaties alluded to are to be holden at the expense of the parties applying for them, and that I have no other information, respecting the wishes of the Indians, than that which is contained in the documents transmitted with the message.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

CHEROKEES, CHICKASAWS, CHOCTAWS, AND CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 9, 1802.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with your resolution of the 2d instant, I have to inform you that, early in the preceding summer, I took measures for carrying into effect the act passed on the 19th of February, 1799, and that of the 13th of May, 1800, mentioned in your resolution. The objects of these acts were understood to be, to purchase from the Indians, south of the Ohio, some portions of land peculiarly interesting to the Union, or to particular States, and the establishment of certain roads to facilitate communication with our distant settlements: commissioners were accordingly appointed to treat with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Creeks. As these nations are known to be very jealous on the subject of their lands, the commissioners were instructed, as will be seen by the enclosed extract, to enlarge, restrain, or even to suppress propositions, as appearances should indicate to be expedient. Their first meeting was with the Cherokees. The extract from the speech of our commissioners, and the answers of the Cherokee chiefs, will show the caution of the former, and the temper of the latter; and that, though our overtures to them were moderate, and respectful of their rights, their determination was, to yield no accommodation.

The commissioners proceeded then to the Chickasaws, who discovered, at first, considerable alarm and anxiety, lest land should be asked of them; a just regard for this very friendly nation, whose attachment to us has been inviolable, forbade the pressure of any thing disagreeable on them; and they yielded with alacrity, the road through their country, which was asked, and was essential to our communication with the Mississippi territory.

The conferences with the Choctaws are probably ended, but, as yet, we are not informed of their result; those with the Creeks are not expected to be held till the ensuing spring.

TH. JEFFERSON.

February 8, 1802.

Extract from instructions given to William R. Davie, James Wilkinson, and Benjamin Hawkins, commissioners on the part of the United States, for holding conferences and signing a treaty or treaties with several Indian nations inhabiting the country east of the river Mississippi, and south of the river Ohio, within the territory of the United States.

"In all your negotiations, under these instructions, you will pay the strictest attention to the disposition manifested by the Indians on the several points to which you are to draw their assent. The ill humor which propositions for further cessions sometimes awaken in them, may be, in a greater or lesser degree, excited by those which you are herein charged with making.

"It will, therefore, be incumbent on you to introduce the desires of the Government in such a manner as will permit you to drop them, as you may find them illy received, without giving the Indians an opportunity to reply with a decided negative, or raising in them unfriendly and inimical dispositions.

"You will state none of them in the tone of demands, but, in the first instance, merely mention them as propositions, which you are authorized to make, and their assent to which, the Government would consider as new testimonials of their friendship. From the manner in which they shall receive your first overtures, you will be enabled to judge with what prospect of success you may press the respective points committed to you."

Extract from the speech of the commissioners of the United States to the chiefs of the Cherokees, assembled at Southwest Point, September 4th, 1801.

BROTHERS:

Your white brethren, who live at the Natchez, at Nashville, and in South Carolina, are very far removed from each other, and have complained to your father, the President, that the roads by which they travel are narrow, and obstructed by fallen timber, with rivers and creeks, which prevent them from pursuing their lawful business, with his red children and with each other.

BROTHERS: To remove these difficulties, and to accommodate his red children, your father is desirous to open wide these roads; but, as they pass over the lands of his red children, he first asks their consent to the measure, and is willing to pay them an equivalent for the indulgence to his white children.

BROTHERS: Your white brethren have also complained to your father, that, on these long roads, they have no place for rest or accommodation, which exposes them and their horses to much inconvenience and suffering. To remove this complaint, your father is desirous that his red children would consent to establish houses of entertainment and ferries, on these roads, to be kept by persons appointed by himself, who shall give security for their good behavior, and pay such annual rent to his red children, as may be agreed upon.

Roads

BROTHERS: This is a small request, made by your father; it is intended not to extinguish your rights, but to give value to your land, and make it immediately productive to you, in the manner of your ferry over Clinch river.

BROTHERS: You have been alarmed by songs of lying birds, and the talks of forked tongues. You have heard that your father would press you for further concessions of land, and, it has been said by some, even as far as the Big river. You will know, hereafter, how to listen to such thieves, liars, and mischief-makers, and will treat them as they deserve.

BROTHERS: Listen to us, and hear the truth. We stand up in this place between you and our white brethren, and we are ready to speak from the one to the other. Your white brethren want land, and are willing to pay for it. If you have any to sell, they will buy it from you, and if you can agree on the terms. But if you are not disposed to sell any land, not one word more shall be said on the subject.

Doublehead's reply: The chiefs now have heard the talk of a father; and the sun is now lowering, and at the same hour to-morrow, we will deliver an answer; and the answer we shall give will be short, and we hope there will be no more of it: and we hope the commissioners will not insist on making a reply.

Commissioners.—When we have heard what you have to say, we shall know whether to reply or not.

The council adjourned, to meet again the next day, at one o'clock, P. M.

5th.—The commissioners met the chiefs, agreeably to adjournment, at one o'clock, P. M. when

Double head rose, and spoke as follows:

We shall commence to-day, notwithstanding the indisposition of one of the commissioners of the United States, and some of our own.

I am now going to speak. It is but yesterday that we heard the talk of our father, the President, and, to-day, you will hear ours. You are appointed by the United States to tell us the means devised for our interest; this was planned eight years past, for the welfare of our nation, big and small, done by our father, the President, who is now no more. It seems, it is by this plan, that means have been provided, to take care of the red people; and the present President, it seems, cherishes the same good wish towards us, which is pleasing to us, and we hold to it. I think that the new President ought to listen to our talks, and not throw them aside. We hope his good disposition towards us, will continue, that our children may live in peace; and you, who are authorized by the President, have said, we ought not to listen to the crooked talks of those that are about us. In behalf of my nation, I am authorized to speak to you. There are a number of land speculators among you, who say we want to sell lands; we hope you will not pay regard to them, as they give them out for the sake of getting property. We hope you will not listen to these talks. The chiefs, the head-men of these frontiers, are, themselves, interested in these speculations, and they will give you fine talks, which are meant to deceive, as they are for their own interest. We think it a shame, that the land sellers should impose on the Government, and say, that we want to dispose of our lands, when we do not. When you first made these settlements, there were paths which answered for them; the roads you propose, we do not wish to have made through our country. Our objections to these roads, are these: a great many people, of all descriptions, would pass them, and that would happen which has recently happened, and you would labor under the same difficulties you do now. We mean to hold fast the peace which is subsisting between you and us; to preserve this, we hope you will not make roads through our country, but use those which you have made yourselves: I mean within your own limits. There is a road we have consented to be made from Clinch to Cumberland, and another, the Kentucky trace. I expect you will think we have a right to say yes or no, as answers, and we hope you will say no more on this subject; if you do, it would seem as if we had no right to refuse. You, who are picked out by the Government, from among the first and best men of the United States, we hope you will take our talks, and assist us. Likewise, you, who are placed on our borders, to see our rights maintained, that we may not be plagued by those people who want land. We consider General Wilkinson the general of the army of the United States, and we hope he will not insist on any thing here, as we look to him as children do to their father; we remember the former talks: we were told the general was to preserve our lands, and not to let us be imposed upon. I am now done speaking for this day, and hope you will not say any thing more about lands or about the roads.

The Commissioners' reply.—What has passed between us shall be faithfully reported to the President, who knows best how to estimate it.

The commissioners, having business with other nations, will leave this as soon as the boats are prepared to take them down the river.

Chulcoah, addressing himself to Colonel Hawkins, spoke thus:

I will now address myself to the man (meaning Colonel Hawkins,) who was appointed by our former father, the President, who was to use every exertion for our benefit. I have been to the seat of Government, where you come from, and I hope you will have those people removed, to where they formerly lived, (meaning those on the Currahee mountain.) Those people who live on our lands deceive the Government, therefore, to ascertain our claims, we wish to remove those people, (meaning Wofford,) and that those lines were run by order of Government.

You, yourself, run these lines, and we hope this inconvenience will be removed, as the General of the army is present. There are now upwards of fifty families settled over the lines, which you did run. These things we have mentioned, and we know he has deceived the Government; he attended at the councils, at Will's town, and there received orders to remove in three months; he afterwards attended the council at Oosetenauleh, and received a like order. This is all I have to say to the commissioners, and I hope things will be done as we have requested.

Chuilatague (Double Head:) I am going to speak again, and hope these gentlemen of Tennessee will listen well; there is no doubt you remember the talks of Tellico, which we remember; we shall not forget the talks of the United States; but I suppose they are forgotten by the State of Tennessee, as I have mentioned, we recollect the talks of Government, that the parties have distressed each other, and kept their prisoners. The State of Tennessee has some, and have not kept to the talks of the Government; they have some of our prisoners who are not returned, whereas, on our part, we have delivered all within our bounds. As I have mentioned already this object, which we have given proof of, as to any thing our people have done, the debt has not remained long, and in these, we give our proofs of friendship. As I have said, we don't forget these debts; there are two which the whites owe us, killed in Cumberland; and these debts seem to increase, as blood has been spilt lately near to where we have met the commissioners; we wish the State of Tennessee would exert herself, night and day, and pay that blood which they owe us. We shall therefore wait for these payments, which we will never forget, and shall think of these debts night and day. There are a great number of warriors, (meaning of the whites) who can soon have one person taken and executed. As we know the dispositions of those chiefs, (meaning of the State of Tennessee) we do not suppose they mean to be out-done by one individual. Exert yourselves, and follow our advice, when our people do wrong, that peace may be preserved. That is all I have to say to my friends and brothers.

THE CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 10, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I now submit, for the ratification of the Senate, a treaty entered into by the commissioners of the United States, with the Choctaw nation of Indians; and I transmit therewith, so much of the instructions to the commissioners as related to the Choctaws; with the minutes of their proceedings, and the letter accompanying them.

TH: JEFFERSON.

March 10, 1802.

A Treaty of friendship, limits, and accommodation, between the United States of America and the Choctaw nation of Indians.

Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, by James Wilkinson, of the State of Maryland, Brigadier General in the army of the United States, Benjamin Hawkins, of North Carolina, and Andrew Pickens, of South Carolina, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States on the one part, and the Mingoës, principal men, and warriors, of the Choctaw nation, representing the said nation in council assembled, on the other part, have entered into the following articles and conditions, viz:

ARTICLE 1. Whereas the United States in Congress assembled, did, by their commissioners plenipotentiary, Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, and Joseph Martin, at a treaty held with the chiefs and head men of the Choctaw nation, at Hopewell, on the Keowee, the third day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, give peace to the said nation, and receive it into the favor and protection of the United States of America; it is agreed by the parties to these presents, respectively, that the Choctaw nation, or such part of it as may reside within the limits of the United States, shall be and continue under the care and protection of the said States; and that the mutual confidence and friendship which are hereby acknowledged: to subsist between the contracting parties, shall be maintained and perpetuated.

ART. 2. The Mingoës, principal men, and warriors, of the Choctaw nation of Indians, do hereby give their free consent, that a convenient and durable wagon way may be explored, marked, opened, and made, under the orders and instructions of the President of the United States, through their lands; to commence at the northern extremity of the settlements of the Mississippi territory, and to be extended from thence, by such route as may be selected and surveyed, under the authority of the President of the United States, until it shall strike the lands claimed by the Chickasaw nation; and the same shall be and continue, for ever, a highway for the citizens of the United States and the Choctaws; and the said Choctaws shall nominate two discreet men from their nation, who may be employed as assistants, guides, or pilots, during the time of laying out and opening the said highway, or so long as may be deemed expedient, under the direction of the officer charged with this duty, who shall receive a reasonable compensation for their services.

ART. 3. The two contracting parties covenant and agree, that the old line of demarcation, heretofore established by and between the officers of his Britannic Majesty and the Choctaw nation, which runs in a parallel direction with the Mississippi river, and eastward thereof, shall be retraced and plainly marked, in such way and manner as the President may direct, in the presence of two persons to be appointed by the said nation; and that the said line shall be the boundary between the settlements of the Mississippi territory and the Choctaw nation. And the said nation does, by these presents, relinquish to the United States, and quit claim forever, all their right, title, and pretensions, to the land lying between the said line and the Mississippi river, bounded south by the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and north by the Yazoo river, where the said line shall strike the same; and on the part of the commissioners it is agreed, that all persons who may be settled beyond this line shall be removed within it, on the side towards the Mississippi, together with their slaves, household furniture, tools, materials, and stock, and that the cabins or houses erected by such persons shall be demolished.

ART. 4. The President of the United States may, at his discretion, proceed to execute the second article of this treaty; and the third article shall be carried into effect as soon as may be convenient to the Government of the United States, and without unnecessary delay on the one part or the other, of which the President shall be the judge; the Choctaws to be seasonably advised, by order of the President of the United States, of the time when, and the place where, the re-survey and re-marking of the old line, referred to in the preceding article, will be commenced.

ART. 5. The commissioners of the United States, for and in consideration of the foregoing concessions on the part of the Choctaw nation, and in full satisfaction for the same, do give and deliver to the Mingoës, chiefs, and warriors, of the said nation, at the signing of these presents, the value of two thousand dollars in goods and merchandise, nett cost of Philadelphia, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and they further engage to give three sets of blacksmith's tools to the said nation.

ART. 6. This treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties, so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States, and the Mingoës, principal men, and warriors, of the Choctaw nation, have hereto subscribed their names and affixed their seals, at fort Adams, on the Mississippi, this seventeenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-sixth.

JAMES WILKINSON,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS.

[Signed by the Mingoës, principal men, and warriors, of the Choctaw nation of Indians.]

LOFTUS' HEIGHTS, FORT ADAMS, on the Mississippi, December 18th, 1801.

SIR:

After some unexpected delay on the part of the Choctaws, we opened our conference with a respectable representation from the Upper and Lower towns, which comprehend the mass of the nation, and a partial deputation from the six towns, which continue their attachment to Spain, and are now at New Orleans, on the invitation of the Governor, as we are informed.

This humble, friendly, tranquil, pacific people, opposed but few obstacles to our views, and we yesterday concluded a treaty with them, which we now transmit you for the consideration of the President and the Senate.

Our minutes, which we herewith forward to you, will explain, in detail; the course of the conference held on this occasion, and may, we hope, give satisfaction. We forbore to press for the establishment of houses of entertainment on the road, from respect to the objections of the chiefs, and from the conviction (founded on minute inquiry) that it would be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to give protection to such solitary, sequestered settlements, (when made by citizens of the United States) against the rapacity and abuse of vicious, mischievous individuals, to be found in every community, civil and savage.

The obvious expediency of the thing suggested to us the proposition for opening a road to the settlements of the Tombigby and Mobile, and we have no doubt we should have succeeded, if the six towns, through which the present trace passes, had been fully represented. Having received no instructions on this subject, we did not consider ourselves authorized to reply to the objections of the council, but connected with it. We will beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Executive the policy and propriety, not to say necessity, of devising some plan by which the extinguished claims of the natives on the Mobile, Tombigby, and Alabama rivers, may be ascertained and fixed. Uninclosed settlements have been made on those waters; they have been formed into a county by the late Governor of the Mississippi territory, and are progressing; they are now thinly scattered, along the western banks of the Mobile and Tombigby, for more than seventy miles, and extend nearly twenty-five miles upon the eastern borders of the Mobile and Alabama. The whole population may be estimated at five hundred whites, and two hundred and fifty blacks, of all ages and sexes. The land east of the Mobile and Alabama rivers is claimed by the Creeks; that which lies west of those rivers, by the Choctaws. These nations view with jealousy and inquietude the progression of the above settlements; individuals among them acknowledge that concessions of soil were made to the British Government long since, and the whole appear anxious to have the lines fairly defined, and their limits established. We believe this to be reasonable, and we are persuaded it is necessary to avert mischief.

The recognition of the old line to bound our right of settlement on the east in this quarter, and the stipulations which have been founded thereon, we consider of some moment, because it appears to be a questionable point whether that line was ever extended further south than the Homochitto river, which would leave a considerable portion of the population of the territory on the lands of the Indians; and, therefore, to obviate eventual difficulties, we embraced the occasion to obtain from the nation a formal relinquishment of their claims, under specific limits. The equivalent we have given, to legitimate the contract into which we have entered, has been taken from the residue of the invoice for two thousand six hundred and ninety-six dollars' worth of goods, out of which we paid the Chickasaws seven hundred dollars, and we trust this allowance may not be deemed profuse.

The Choctaw nation, in point of physical powers, is at least on a level with its neighbors, and its dispositions, in relation to the whites, are more tractable, and less sanguinary, than those of its kind; yet, it has been long buried in sloth and ignorance. But the destruction of game has diminished the resorts of their ancestors, and the chase has become a precarious resource for the support of life. Goaded by penury, and pressed by the keenest wants to which animal nature is exposed, their sufferings seem to have roused their dormant faculties, and the rising generation, urged by these powerful motives, and encouraged by the examples of the Creeks on one side, and the Chickasaws on the other, have rent the shackles of prejudice, and, in spite of the repugnance of their old chiefs, are now casting their eyes to the earth for sustenance and for comforts. A very few families have commenced the culture of cotton, and it is not manufactured by more than twelve in the whole nation, whose population exceeds fifteen thousand.

At this conference, for the first time, the bounty of the United States has been implored, and we were supplicated for materials, tools, implements, and instructors, to aid their exertions, and to direct their labors. These circumstances induce us to cherish the hope, that, by the liberal and well directed attention of Government, these people may be made happy and useful; and that the United States may be saved the pain and expense of expelling or destroying them. It is a singular fact, perhaps it is without example, and therefore it is worthy of record, that this council should not only reject a quantity of whiskey intended as a present to them, but should have requested that none might be issued before, during, or after, the conference.

We have deemed it expedient to recommend, that an interpreter should attend the two deputies of the nation who are to accompany the troops to be engaged on the road, and we beg leave to offer the suggestion, that travellers who pass through the Indian country should be confined to this route, so soon as it is opened.

With great consideration and respect, we are, sir, your most obedient servants,

JAMES WILKINSON.
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.
ANDREW PICKENS.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

Extracts from instructions given to James Wilkinson, Benjamin Hawkins, and Andrew Pickens, Esquires, who were appointed commissioners, on the part of the United States, to hold a treaty or treaties with the several nations of Indians, on the east side of the river Mississippi, south of the Ohio, and within the territory of the United States, dated June 24, 1801.

"After completing your negotiation with the Chickasaws, you will proceed to Natchez, to hold a treaty with the Choctaws. The Choctaws may be considered one of the most powerful nations of Indians within the limits of the United States; and a pacific and friendly disposition in, and towards them, should be cultivated, as well from principles of policy as of humanity.

"All fair and proper means should be exerted to evince to them a really friendly disposition on the part of the Government of the United States, and to fortify their minds against the artful and mischievous insinuations and practices of adventurers, who, too frequently, obtrude themselves into their and other nations.

"It is of importance that the Indian nations, generally, within the United States, should be convinced of the certainty in which they may, at all times, rely upon the friendship of the United States; and that the President will never abandon them, or their children, whilst their conduct, towards the citizens of the United States, and their Indian neighbors, shall be peaceably honest and fair.

"It must be observed, that the Choctaws received, in the course of the last year, from the Government of the United States, presents to the amount of two thousand dollars, and, that an appropriation of the like sum has been made, for the same purpose, for the present year; although that nation have no claim to such a grant, founded on any treaty or authorized agreement. It was understood that they had taken some expression of Mr. Ellicot's for a promise to this effect; and it may be proper and politic to continue making them an annual grant, perhaps of the same sum; but, it must be impressed on their minds, that they have given not only no equivalent, but, actually, nothing at all for it; that they are indebted for what they have received to the generosity of the United States, and not to their justice; that the grants must be viewed as presents, and not as compensation; that they may be continued or discontinued, at the pleasure of the United States, without giving the Choctaws a right to claim the one, or complain of the other; and that it might be proper for them to grant a something, though an equivalent be not asked in return.

"It is stated, that the citizens of the Mississippi territory have been subjected to some vexations by the great number of Indians encamped among them, at the distributions of these presents. You will inquire into the propriety of having all future distributions made within the Indian boundary.

"In addition to the explanation and enforcement of the conciliatory disposition and friendly intentions of the United States, you will endeavor to obtain the consent of the Choctaws, with reference to the above mentioned views of the presents, which they have received, to our opening a road from the point, where the road, from the reserved circle, shall strike their land, through their country, to the Natchez, and permission for three or four white families to settle on the said road, within their country, for the accommodation of travellers and our post riders, on such reasonable conditions as you may deem proper.

"On Dunbar's map, a line is run northward from the 31st degree of north latitude, near the 91st degree of west longitude from Greenwich, the lands between which and Mississippi were, heretofore, ceded to the British Government; although no doubt exists of this fact, it may be impolitic to require from the Choctaws a direct acknowledgment of it; you will, however, consider and speak of it as indubitable, and endeavor, indirectly, to draw from them an acknowledgment of its authenticity. This they will not refuse, unless they believe a doubt of it to exist in our minds.

“To confirm a pacific and friendly disposition in the Indian tribes, generally, towards the United States, should, at all times, be considered an important object; and is recommended as such to your best exertions; and the result of the inquiries into the present state of society among them, made with the advantages which you will possess whilst in their countries, with a view of ascertaining the effects of the measures pursued by our Government towards them, will be highly useful.

“In all your negotiations, under these instructions, you will pay the strictest attention to the disposition manifested by the Indians on the several points to which you are to draw their assent. The ill humor, which propositions for further cessions sometimes awaken in them, may be, in a greater or lesser degree, excited by those, which you are herein charged with making. It will, therefore, be incumbent on you, to introduce the desires of the Government, in such a manner, as will permit you to drop them, as you may find them illy received, without giving the Indians an opportunity to reply with a decided negative, or raising in them unfriendly and inimical dispositions. You will state none of them in the tone of demands, but, in the first instance, merely mention them, as propositions which you are authorized to make, and their assent to which the Government would consider as new testimonials of their friendship. From the manner in which they shall receive your first overtures, you will be enabled to judge with what prospect of success you may press the respective points committed to you.

Minutes of a conference between Brigadier General James Wilkinson, Benjamin Hawkins, and Andrew Pickens, Esquires, commissioners of the United States, and the principal chiefs of the Choctaw nation of Indians, held at Fort Adams, on the Mississippi, the 12th day of December, 1801.

The conference commenced.—The interpreters being called forth, and warned to correct each other, and after having gone through the ceremonies of the pipe, General Wilkinson addressed them, in the name of the commissioners, as follows:

Mingoes, Chiefs, and Principal Men, of the Choctaw nation:

You have all heard of the death of your father, the great Washington, and you have, no doubt, wept for the loss. Since we experienced that heavy misfortune, the people of the Sixteen Fires, assembled in their great national council house, have thought proper to select our beloved chief, Thomas Jefferson, to be President of the United States.

BROTHERS: Open your ears, and listen well. Your new father, Jefferson, who is the friend of all the red people, and of humanity, finding himself at the head of the white people of the Sixteen Fires, immediately turned his thoughts to the condition of his red children, who stand most in need of his care, and whom he regards with the affection of a good father.

BROTHERS: Your father the President of the United States, being far removed from you, by the intervention of deep rivers, high mountains, and wide forests, finds it impossible to look upon you with his own eyes, or to speak to you from his own lips. He has, therefore, appointed two of his beloved men, Colonel Hawkins, and General Pickens, with myself, to meet you in council, and to confer with you on several subjects interesting to yourselves, and to your white brethren of the Sixteen Fires. We are happy to see you. We, on his behalf, and in his name, take you by the hand, and we congratulate you on your safe arrival here.

BROTHERS: The President of the United States invites you to look up to him as your friend and father, to rely in full confidence on his unvarying disposition to lead and protect you in the paths of peace and prosperity, and to preserve concord between you and your neighbors. In his name, we promise you, that you may at all times rely upon the friendship of the United States, and that he will never abandon you or your children, while your conduct towards the citizens of the United States, and your Indian neighbors, shall be peaceable, honest, and fair.

BROTHERS: We invite you to state to us freely, the situation of your nation, and what you wish, on the part of your father the President, to better your condition in trade, in hunting, agriculture, manufactures, and stock-raising; that we may represent the same for his consideration. We wish you to open your minds freely to us, and to set forth all your wishes and all your wants, that we may learn the true state of your condition, and be able to assist you with our advice, our attentions, and our friendship.

BROTHERS: On the part of your white brethren, we have to state to you, that the path from the settlement of Natchez through your nation, towards Cumberland, is an uncomfortable one, and very inconvenient to them, in its present unimproved condition; and we are directed to stipulate with you, to make it suitable to the accommodation of those who may use it, and at the same time, beneficial to yourselves. Your brethren, the Chickasaws, have heard our request on this subject, and they have consented that we should open a road through their lands to those of your nation; and we now ask your consent, that we may continue the same road through your lands, to the settlements of this territory. We propose, for the accommodation of travellers, and for your own interests, that houses of entertainment and ferries, should be established on the road, and that they may be rented by you to such persons as your father the President may appoint to keep them. The ground, the houses, and the money, arising from the rents, to be for the use of your nation, and subject to its disposal; and that not more than one family be suffered to live at the same place.

BROTHERS: Since the King of Spain has given up this district to the United States, a necessity has arisen for frequent communications between your white brethren, who live in the neighborhood of the Mississippi, and those who have settled on the Tombigby; and it follows, that people are constantly travelling across your country, from one place to the other. Under such circumstances, to prevent disagreement and mischief, we recommend to your consideration the expediency of having but one road of communication between these settlements, to be opened and improved after the same manner, and on the same terms, as that proposed from the settlements of this territory to the Chickasaw nation.

BROTHERS: We come not to ask lands from you, nor shall we even ask for any, unless you are disposed to sell; and your father will assist and protect you in the enjoyment of those you claim; but, to prevent future misunderstandings, and to confine the settlers of this territory within the line long since run between you and them, we recommend it should be traced up, and marked anew, while men can be found, who were present at the survey, and assisted in making it: for, if all those witnesses should die before this is done, then disputes may arise between you and your white brethren, respecting this boundary, and mischiefs may ensue.

BROTHERS: For several years past, your father, the President of the United States, has sent you a present of goods, as a token of his friendship, which will be continued the present year. But you must recollect that you have never given any equivalent for this strong evidence of his paternal regard; and you must bear in mind, that you are indebted for it to his generosity more than to his justice. Should this bounty be continued to you in future, you ought to be grateful for it; and should it be discontinued, you will have no cause to complain, as you have never given any thing to the United States in return.

BROTHERS: We wish you to let this talk sink deep into your hearts; we wish you to take time, and reflect seriously on it; and when you have made up your minds, we shall listen to you with pleasure, in the hope that you may enable us to make an agreeable report to our common father, the President of the United States, and in the mean time, we shall be happy to contribute to your accommodation, and the good of your nation.

December 13.

TUSKONAHOPHA, a chief of the Lower towns, informed the commissioners that there were seven chiefs from different towns, and requested, in their behalf, that they might be heard separately, that each might speak for his own town; and that, after they had spoken, the young warriors might be heard, and the same attention paid to their talks that would be to those of the old chiefs.

TUSKONAHOPHA then spoke: To-day I meet the commissioners here, who have delivered to us the talks from the President, and I am well pleased with his talks, that I have received from my beloved brothers the commissioners, for the welfare of my nation. I take you three beloved men by the hand, and hold you fast. You three commissioners, who have visited the Cherokees and Chickasaws, one request which you ask of my nation, the cutting of a road, I grant. I grant it as a white road, as a path of peace, and not as a path of war; one which is never to be stained. I understood yesterday, that my father the President allowed me an annual present, and it never should be taken from me. It must have been a mistake of his officers, as I never have received any annual allowance. He must have given it to some other of my red brethren. I deny having received any annual gift. It has been told to the chiefs of the nation, through the interpreters, that their father allowed them an annual present for their nation.

I forgot something when I spoke of presents, which I will now mention. We have received presents from our father the President; part at the Walnut Hills, and part at Natchez. I, myself, and a few other chiefs, and a few warriors, went to the Walnut Hills, and the presents were but very small. I do not know whether these presents were concealed from us or not; but I know we got but few, not worth going after. A company of the war chiefs and warriors received, the last spring past, a few presents at the Bluffs; that is all; if there have been any other given, it must have been to idle Indians, who are straggling about, and do not attend to the talks of the chiefs of the nation.

There is an old boundary line between the white people and my nation, which was run before I was a chief of the nation. This line was run by the permission of the chiefs of the nation, who were chiefs at that time; they understood, when that line was run, that they were to receive pay for those lands; but they never have received pay for those lands. These chiefs, here present, acknowledge the lands to be the white people's land; they hold no claim on it, although they never received any pay for it; they wish the lands to be marked anew, and that it be done by some of both parties, as both should be present; (meaning red and white people.)

TOO-YE-HOO-MUH, from the same district, then spoke. I thank the President, my father, for sending you three beloved men here, to speak to me. I take you by the hand, hold you fast, and am going to speak to you. I grant this road to be cut, which the chief who spoke before me granted. I grant the road only; you may make it as firm, as good, and as strong, as you will; there are no big water courses on it, and there is no occasion for canoes or ferries. I speak now concerning an old line, which was run when I was a boy; I wish for this line to be traced and marked anew; I do not know where the line is; I have been informed, by some of the young men of my nation, that there are white people and stock over it. We, chiefs of the nation, wish, if any are over our lines, that they may be moved back again by our brothers, the officers of the United States, and that they would move them back, with their stock.

MINGO-POOS-EOOS, of Chickasaw half town. I am an old acquaintance here; I came here with other chiefs of the nation, not to differ with them, but to join them in whatever they do. I understand this business plainly; you three, sitting here, were sent by our father, the President, to speak to our nation. My talks are not long. I am here, before you three beloved men. I am a man of but few words in my town; it is the lowest but one in my nation. My talks are not long; I hope this will be considered as if I had said a great deal. The first time I ever saw my friend, the General, (Wilkinson) he appeared as if he wished to say a great deal; I objected, I was but one; I am a well wisher; the day will come when we head men will see each other. The road through our land to Tombeckbe, it is not in my power to grant; there are other chiefs who hold claims on those lands; my claim is but short. The white people travel the line of limits; they are free to use that, and any of the small paths.

OKAR-CHUMBE, of the Upper town, spoke thus: I see you to day, in the shade of your own house. I am a poor distressed red man; I know not how to make any thing; I am in the place here from the Upper towns; my uncle was the great chief of the nation; he kept all paths clean and swept out; long poles of peace, a number of officers and chiefs in his arms; he is gone, he is dead, he has left us behind. You three beloved men in my presence, I am glad to see you; you may be my father for what I know; the Great Spirit above is over us all. I hold my five fingers, and, with them, I hold yours; mine are black, but I whiten them for the occasion. I understood your great father, Washington, was dead, and that the great council got together and appointed another in his stead, who has not forgot us, and who loves us as our father Washington did; and I am glad to hear our father, the President, wishes that the sun may shine bright over his red children. The Chickasaws are my old brothers; you visited them, and talked to them, before I saw you here. I understood you asked them for a big path to be cut, a white path, a path of peace, and that they granted it to you, as far as their claims extend. I grant it likewise. There are no big water-courses, there are no big rivers, nor creeks, and, therefore, no occasion for canoes, nor is there any occasion for horse boats. It is not our wish that there should be any houses built; the reason I give is, that there is a number of warriors who might spoil something belonging to the occupiers of those houses, and the complaints would become troublesome to me, and to the chiefs of my nation. I speak next of the old line; I wish it to be traced up, and marked over again; I claim part in it; those people who are over it, I wish back again, for fear they may destroy the line, and it be lost. I have done.

PUCK-SHUM-UBBEE, from the Upper towns, then spoke: The old line that the other chiefs repeated, as far as I understood from my forefathers, I will name its course, and the water-courses it crosses, beginning at the Homochitto, running thence nearly a northwest course, until it strikes the Standing-pines creek; thence, crosses the Bayou Pierre, high up, and Big Black; from thence, strikes the Mississippi at the mouth of Tallahatche, (Yav-zoo.) That line I wish may be renewed, that both parties may know their own. There are people over, or on the line; it is my wish they may be removed immediately. Where the line runs, along the Bayou Pierre, some whites are settled on this line, and some over it; those over, I wish may be removed; if there are none over, there is nothing spoiled. From the information I have received from my forefathers, this Natchez country belonged to red people; the whole of it, which is now settled by white people. But you Americans were not the first people who got this country from the red people. We sold our lands, but never got any value for it; this I speak from the information of old men. We did not sell them to you, and, as we never received any thing for it, I wish you, our friends, to think of it, and make us some compensation for it. We are red people, and you are white people; we did not come here to beg; we brought no property with us to purchase any thing; we came to do the business of our nation and return.

The other chiefs have granted you this road. We do not wish the white people to go alone to make the road; we wish a few of the red people, and an interpreter, to go with them. We, of the Upper towns district, a large district, I speak for them now: there is but one interpreter in our nation; he is a long distance from us; when we have business to do, we wish to have our interpreter near. It is the wish to have, for the Upper towns, an interpreter from among the white people who live with us, that we may do our business with more satisfaction with the chiefs of the district. I have another request to ask of you, for the distresses of our nation; a blacksmith, who can do our work well, for the Upper towns district. Another thing I have to request, for our young women, and half breeds; we want spinning wheels, and somebody to be sent among them to teach them to spin. I have nothing more to say; I have complied with the request of the commissioners; I have done. Further I have to ask, concerning the blacksmith and tools; if the man leaves us, let him leave his tools, and that they may remain with us, as the property of the Upper towns district.

E-LAU-TAU-LAU-HOO-MUH spoke thus: I am a stranger; this is the first time I ever saw the Americans. I came here, I am sorry that it appeared cloudy, but it has cleared off, (alluding to the cloudy weather, which cleared off just as he began to speak.) I understood, by what I have heard, that you are authorized by our father to come and talk to us. I am glad to take you by the hand, which I do, kindly, and am glad our father, the President, thinks of his red children. It is my wish, with the rest of the old chiefs, that the line may be marked anew. There is a number of water courses in our land, and I wish the white people to keep no stock on them, or to build houses. I am done; my talk is short, and I will shake hands with you.

The interpreter then stated, that the chiefs directed him to inform the commissioners, the young warriors wished to be indulged with making their talks on paper, at their encampment, if that would do, and to be supplied, for that purpose, with paper. It was ordered accordingly, and the commissioners adjourned.

The communications made from the deputation from the Choctaws, in their camp, to the commissioners of the United States, through their agent, Colonel John M. Kee, on the 15th December, 1801.

BUC-SHUN-ABBE. I am a factor, and have been so for a long time; my merchant is in Mobile; I have traded for him till I am become old. I am a man of one heart, and of one mind. White people make a number of fine things; my mind is not to be changed for these fine things; and, if the people at Mobile are not able to supply us, I do not wish to look to other people to supply us. We are old; we cannot take all the supplies that may be offered to us; the trade of the Choctaw nation is my object; I do not look for any trade from this quarter. We wish that no people may, from this quarter, cross the road we have granted, with trade to us; we receive our supplies from another quarter, and must make our remittances there. There are a number of people wanting to trade, from this quarter. We do not wish the people of Bayou Pierre, and Big Black, and Walnut hills, to purchase skins from the red people. We do not apply for that trade; 'tis a trade interfering with ours, and stealing our property, who trade from other places. These people may introduce a trade of liquor amongst us, that may cause the death of red people, which has happened lately, at Natchez, for which we are sorry. I want our father to send us iron wedges, and hand-saws, and augers.

MINGO HOM-MASSA-TUBBLEY. I understand our great father, General Washington, is dead, and that there is another beloved man appointed in his place, and that he is a well wisher and lover of us four standing nations of red people. Our old brothers, the Chickasaws, have granted a road from Cumberland, as far south as their boundary; I grant a continuance of that road, which may be straightened; but the old path is not to be thrown away entirely, and a new one made. We have been informed, by the three beloved men, that our father, the President, has sent us on a yearly present, we know nothing of. There are three other nations; perhaps some of them have received it. Another thing our father, the President, has promised us, without being asked, that he would send people among us, to learn our women to spin and weave; he has made us these promises; I will not ask for men, I ask for women, to learn our women. These women may first go amongst our half breeds, and learn them, and the thing will then extend itself; one will learn another, and the white women may return to their own people again. I want people qualified well to teach our women, not people that know nothing. I understand that such things are to be furnished us; I wish, therefore, as we have half breeds, and others accustomed to work, that ploughs may be sent us, weeding hoes, grubbing hoes, axes, hand-saws, augers, iron wedges, and a man to make wheels, and a small set of blacksmith's tools, for a red man. Father (the President of the United States:) We have a number of warriors who use their guns for a living; I understand your goods are cheap; I wish you to send us on a supply trade; I do not want this trade here; this is a strange land; I want the store at fort Stoddart, or fort St. Stephens. Father: I hold your talks strong, I hope you will hold ours fast, also; (i. e. grant what we ask.) I wish the old marks of the line of separation between us and the whites, to be marked over; and as our father has said he will send us on something every year, I hope it will be continued, although we have never received it. I hope our father will comply with my request, as we have been informed by his beloved men, that he is disposed to afford us aid.

We came here sober, to do business, and wish to return so, and request, therefore, that the liquor which we are informed our friends had provided for us, may be retained in store, as it might be productive of evil.

HOEHE HOMO. This is the talks of the chiefs and warriors; I am one of the children of the President, who have seen him in his own house; I saw my father in the great beloved council house in Philadelphia; he is now dead, and I am informed there is another father to the red people appointed, to keep up the great council house. I have taken by the hand, these three beloved men, sent by my father, the President, to meet the Choctaws; I have received his talk by them, and put it in my heart, and send this mine in return. With the other chiefs, I have granted permission to the commissioners to open the white road of peace asked for. Father, when you receive this, I hope you will hold it fast; the chain of friendship, like an iron chain, should never be broken. I have but a short talk, and hope it will be remembered.

SHAPPA HOMO. I was present when my father, the President, talked with the Choctaws, Creeks, Cherokees, and Chickasaws, and four Northern nations, and heard his good advice to his children. When I was in the beloved house, all talks and all paths were whitened with every nation; I am well pleased that they are kept white yet; I am glad there are some people alive yet, who, belonging to that white house, wish to take care of the red people. We give up this road; it is not to be settled by white people.

EDMOND FULSOME. Mingo Hom-Massa-tubba's talk is mine, except, that he has forgot to ask for cotton cards; my people already make cloth; I know the advantage of it, and request that good cotton cards may be sent us.

ROBERT McCLOURE. A gin is a thing I asked for long ago; it was once offered to my nation, and refused by our chiefs; I asked for it last July, but have received no answer; I now ask for it again; if this will be granted, I wish to know, soon. I am glad to hear it is the wish of our father, the President, to teach us to do such things as the whites can do. The sooner those things are supplied, the better, for, by long delay, they may grow out of our young people's minds. We, half-breeds and young men, wish to go to work, and the sooner we receive those things, the sooner we will begin to learn. I want a blacksmith sent to the Lower town district, with a good set of tools, which may not be at the disposal of the smith, but remain with us, should he go away. Some of our young people may learn to use these tools, and we wish them to remain for the use of the district. My reason for asking this, is, that our interpreter may die, and our agent be recalled by his superior, and another sent us, who may not live at the same place, and may wish to remove the tools; we wish them to remain to us and our children. We red people do not know how to make iron and steel; we wish our father to send us these, with the smith, &c. And when presents are sent on, we wish a true inventory of all the presents, that we may know when we are cheated, and that the invoice may be lodged with one of our chiefs.

17th December. The chiefs met the commissioners of the United States in the council chamber, and were addressed by the latter.

MINGOES, CHIEFS, AND PRINCIPAL MEN of the Choctaw nation:

We have heard the talks you delivered to us the 13th, and we have since received your written address of the 15th. Those talks and this address have sunk deep into our hearts; they give us great pleasure, and must prove highly satisfactory to your father, the President of the United States, to whom we shall faithfully transmit them, because he will perceive therefrom, that his red children of the Choctaw nation are wise, just, dutiful, and affectionate.

BROTHERS: We are sorry to be informed, that the goods heretofore forwarded to you by your father, the President of the United States, have been delivered to improper characters, and have not reached your hands. We will take care that those which his bounty may hereafter dispense to you, shall be faithfully delivered. But, to prevent misunderstandings, we think proper to repeat to you, that, although this bounty will be extended to you this present year, and may be hereafter continued at the discretion of your father, the President, yet, you must not look upon it as a right, or to claim it as a debt; because you have never given any thing for it.

BROTHERS: We shall faithfully report to your father, the President, your wants and your wishes, as set forth in your written address to us, and we have no doubt, he will give attention to them, and will endeavor to ameliorate your condition. On our own parts, we promise you every attention to your true interests, and that we will use our best exertions to promote all your laudable pursuits, and to advance your solid happiness.

BROTHERS: Your father, the President, knows as well how to reward his good children, as he does to punish the bad. He has, therefore, authorized us to give to you, at this time, some arms and ammunition for your hunters, and some goods for your old men and women, as a proof of his friendship, and as an equivalent for your dutiful attentions to his request, respecting the roads and the old line of demarcation.

BROTHERS: To avoid future misunderstandings, we, the commissioners of the United States, have deemed it expedient to commit to record, the agreement entered into with you, the mingoes, chiefs, and warriors, of the Choctaw nation, at this time. By this measure, we propose to prevent wicked men from encroaching upon the rights of either party, to inform those who may come after us, and to keep a line forever, of the good work of this council. We will now read and interpret this record to you, and we shall be ready to explain any doubts or difficulties which may arise, and a fair copy shall be lodged with your nation, to be appealed to, should occasion ever render it necessary.

The treaty being then deliberately read by General Wilkinson, and interpreted, paragraph by paragraph, was signed and sealed, and a duplicate delivered to the head chief of the Choctaw nation.

The treaty is in the following words: [Vide the original.]

18th December. In conformity with the directions of the commissioners, the whole deputation of the Choctaw nation attended at the council chamber, and received from the commissioners, the goods promised, being the value of $2,038, exclusive of tobacco, with which the Indians appeared to be well pleased, and they parted with the commissioners with apparent good humor. In addition to the provisions they had received, the commissioners ordered them to be furnished with twelve rations each, for the path home.

I certify this to be a true copy from the original.

THE SIX NATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 10, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The Governor of New York has desired that, in addition to the negotiations with certain Indians, already authorized, under the superintendance of John Tayler, further negotiations should be held with the Oneidas, and other members of the confederacy of the Six Nations, for the purchase of lands in, and for, the State of New York, which they are willing to sell, as explained in the letter from the Secretary of War, herewith sent. I have, therefore, thought it better to name a commissioner to superintend the negotiations specified, with the Six Nations, generally, or with any of them.

I do, accordingly, nominate John Tayler, of New York, to be commissioner for the United States, to hold a convention or conventions between the State of New York and the confederacy of the Six Nations of Indians, or any of the nations composing it.

This nomination, if advised and consented to by the Senate, will comprehend and supersede that of February 1st, of the same John Tayler, so far as it respected the Seneca Indians.

TH. JEFFERSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 5th March, 1802.

SIR:

Governor Clinton, by his letter of the 20th ultimo, requests that a commissioner, on the part of the United States, might be appointed to attend a treaty with the Oneida Indians, for the purchase of about ten thousand acres of land, which that nation is desirous of selling, and which has, heretofore, been leased out to white people.

The Six Nations have also expressed a wish to dispose of a narrow strip of land, which they consider as useless to them, bordering on Niagara river, and a small tract near the former Cayuga settlement.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high respect and consideration.

H. DEARBORN.

THE ONEIDAS AND SENEICAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 28, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you, a treaty which has been concluded between the State of New York and the Oneida Indians, for the purchase of lands within that State:

One other, between the same State and the Seneca Indians, for the purchase of other lands within the same State:

One other, between certain individuals, styled the Holland Company, with the Senecas, for the exchange of certain lands in the same State:

And one other, between Oliver Phelps, a citizen of the United States, and the Senecas, for the exchange of lands in the same State, with sundry explanatory papers; all of them conducted under the superintendance of a commissioner, on the part of the United States, who reports that they have been adjusted with the fair and free consent and understanding of the parties. It is, therefore, submitted to your determination, whether you will advise and consent to their respective ratifications.

TH. JEFFERSON.

December 27, 1802.

At a Treaty held with the Oneida nation or tribe of Indians, at their village in the State of New York, on the fourth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and two.

Present, John Tayler, Esq. agent appointed under the authority of the United States, to hold the treaty, and Ezra L'Hommedieu and Simeon De Witt, agents for the State of New York. The said Indians having, by their sachems, chiefs, and warriors, in the month of March last, proposed to the Governor of the said State, to cede the lands hereinafter described, for the compensation hereinafter mentioned; and the said Governor, together with the surveyor-general of the said State, and Ezra L'Hommedieu, Esq. an agent appointed by the said Governor, pursuant to concurrent resolutions of the Senate and Assembly of the said State, bearing date the 23d and 24th days of February last, having acceded to the proposal of the said sachems, chiefs, and warriors, and on the 5th day of the said month of March, executed a provisional agreement with them, for the cession and purchase of the same, and advanced to them, at their desire, in part payment of the said compensation, three hundred dollars, to answer the immediate occasions of the said Indians; the said cession is, thereupon, in the presence, and with the approbation of the said commissioner, carried into effect at this treaty, which hath, on the request of the said Governor, been appointed to be held for the purpose, as follows, that is to say:

The said Indians do cede, release, and quit claim to the people of the State of New York, forever, the several tracts or parcels of land hereinafter described, being parts of the lands heretofore reserved to the said Oneida nation of Indians, to wit: All that certain tract of land, beginning at the southwest corner of the land lying along the Genesee road, and which was ceded in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, by the said Oneida Indians, to the people of the State of New York, and running thence along the last mentioned tract easterly, to the southeast corner thereof; thence southerly, in the direction of the continuation of the east bounds of said last mentioned tract, to other lands heretofore ceded by the said Oneida nation of Indians, to the People of the State of New York; then along the same, westerly, to a part of said last mentioned land, called the "Two mile strip;" and thence along the same, northerly, to the place of beginning. Also, another tract of land, bounded on the south by the Genesee road, on the north, by a line drawn parallel to said road, and at the distance, on an average, of half a mile to the northward thereof, and extending from the west bounds of a tract of one hundred acres, now ceded, and including Myndert Van Eps Wemple's house; westerly to the lands heretofore ceded as aforesaid: Provided, That the north bounds of the last described tract, shall be run with such right angular offsets, as to leave the Indian houses, near the northwesterly corner of said tract, twenty chains distant from the same. Also, one hundred acres, to be laid out in a square, and to extend, each way, from the house of said Myndert Van Eps Wemple, along the said Genesee road, fifteen chains, and northerly from said road, fourteen chains, and southerly from said road, twenty chains. Also, all that part of the land heretofore reserved by the said Oneida nation of Indians, along the Fish creek, which lies to the northward of the bridge over said creek, commonly called and known by the name of Bloomfield's bridge.

The said agents do, for the People of the State of New York, in conformity to the said provisional agreement, pay to the said Indians, in addition to the said sum of three hundred dollars, already advanced to them as above mentioned, the further sum of six hundred dollars, and do grant to the said Indians, that the People of the said State shall, annually, forever hereafter, on such day and place, as are, or shall be appointed for the payment of other annuities to the said Indians, pay to the said Indians the sum of three hundred dollars. And the said agents do further grant to the said Indians, that the People of the State of New York, out of the lands above described, and hereby ceded to them, shall grant to Sarah Dockstader, one hundred acres, to be laid out in a square, adjoining the "Two mile tract," on the road commonly called Klock's road, as the said one hundred acres shall be laid out by order of the surveyor-general, with the approbation of the said Sarah, to be held to her during her natural life, and thereafter to her heirs in fee; and also, to Michael Kern, one hundred and fifty acres, so as to include the house in which he now resides, with the other improvements made by him around the same.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioner, the said agents, and the said Indians, have hereunto, and to other acts of the same tenor and date, the one to remain with the United States, another to remain with the State of New York, and another to remain with the said Indians, set their hands and seals, at the village aforesaid, the day and year first above written.

JOHN TAYLER,
EZRA L'HOMMEDIEU, &c.

At a Treaty held at the city of Albany, in the State of New York, on the twentieth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and two, with the Seneca nation of Indians, by their sachems, chiefs, and warriors, whose names are hereunto subscribed, and seals affixed, duly deputed, authorized, and empowered, by the said Seneca nation of Indians, for the purpose:

Present: John Tayler, Esquire, commissioner appointed under the authority of the United States, to hold the treaty, and his Excellency George Clinton, Esquire, Governor of the said State of New York.

The said Seneca nation of Indians, by their said sachems, chiefs, and warriors, agreeably to the authority, in them vested by the said nation, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, do sell, cede, release, and quit claim, to the People of the said State of New York, all that tract of land, of one mile wide, on Niagara river, extending from Buffalo creek to Stedman's farm, including Black Rock, and bounded to the westward by the shore or waters of said river. The said Seneca nation of Indians reserving to themselves, nevertheless, the right and privilege of encamping their fishing parties on the beach of said river, for the purpose of fishing, which is the common right of both parties, and to be enjoyed without hindrance or interruption from either; and while there encamped, to use the drift-wood for fuel, but not to trespass on, or injure, the proprietor or proprietors of the adjacent lands. The said Seneca nation of Indians reserving also, to themselves, the right (which they now enjoy) of passing the ferry across the said Niagara river, at or near Black Rock, or at such other place in the vicinity, where such ferry may hereafter be established and kept, free of ferrage or toll, at all seasonable times, when the boats are crossing with other passengers or freight. And the said George Clinton, Governor aforesaid, doth, for the people of the said State of New York, pay to the said Seneca nation of Indians, the sum of two hundred dollars; and doth grant to the said Indians, that the People of the said State of New York shall pay to them, or their order, at the city of Albany, the further sum of five thousand three hundred dollars; and also, to the value of five hundred dollars, in chintz, calico, and other goods, suitable for their women, on the fifteenth day of February, now next ensuing, in full of the purchase money for said tract of land. And the said Governor doth further grant to the said Indians, that the people of the said State of New York, out of the lands above described, and hereby ceded to them, shall grant to Jasper Parrish, and to his heirs and assigns, forever, one mile square, to begin at the mouth of a creek, known by the name of Scoy-gu-quoides creek, nearly opposite the head of the Grand Isle, on the easterly side of the waters of the outlet of lake Erie, and to run from thence, up the said creek, as it winds easterly, to the line of the Massachusetts pre-emption; thence along the same, northerly one mile, thence westerly to the waters of the said outlet, and thence along the same to the place of beginning; and also, to Horatio Jones, and to his heirs and assigns, forever, one mile square, to begin at the most easterly corner of the above described lot, in the line of the Massachusetts pre-emption, and to run from thence along the same northerly one mile, then westerly to the waters of the outlet of lake Erie, thence along the same to the northerly corner of the aforesaid lot, and thence along the northerly bounds thereof to the place of beginning. And the said Governor, at the request of said Indians, expressed by their chiefs and warriors, and from a desire of accommodating them, doth engage, that it shall be recommended to the Legislature, to provide, by law, for the passing of the said Seneca and other Indians of the said Six Nations, on their own proper business, on and along any turnpike-road, which may be hereafter established from the town of Canadarque to Buffalo creek, or its vicinity, or over any bridge that may be erected between those places, toll free.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioner, the said Governor, and the said chiefs and warriors of the Seneca nation of Indians, have hereunto, and to other acts of the same tenor and date, the one to remain with the United States, another to remain with the State of New York, and another to remain with the said Indians, set their hands and seals, at the city of Albany aforesaid, the day and year first above written.

JOHN TAYLER.

ALBANY, 19th July, 1802.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit you, for the approbation of the President, the result of a treaty held with the Oneida nation of Indians, at the request of the Governor of the State of New York, for the purchase of a part of their reserved lands. Also of two other treaties, held with the Seneca nation of Indians; the first, at the request of the Holland Land Company, the other, at the request of Oliver Phelps, Esquire, both for the exchange of lands, the pre-emption right of which had been ceded by the State of New York to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The application of the Holland Company, you will recollect, was mentioned in your letter to me, enclosing the commission for holding of treaties with those Indians. I have, therefore, signed the duplicates, and delivered them to the parties; but, as the latter was not noticed in that letter, or in any other official communication to me, I have signed the copy herewith transmitted only, and shall retain the duplicates, until I am directed by you to deliver them to the parties; indeed, I should have wholly declined holding the latter treaty, had not Mr. Phelps assured me that he had corresponded with you on the subject, and that you considered the holding of it by me as fully authorized by my commission.

Agreeable to your instructions, I communicated the purport of both the above applications to Governor Clinton, to which he had no objections.

The Governor will, I presume, inform you of the failure of the negotiations of his agents, for the purchase of the land of Black Rock; and I cannot help declaring, that the conduct of the Indians on that occasion, appeared to me to be very uncandid and exceptionable, and which, from the observations I was enabled to make, I am induced to ascribe to some improper influence.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN TAYLER.

The Hon. H. DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

ALBANY, 23d August, 1802.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit to you, enclosed, a treaty held by me, at the request of his Excellency Governor Clinton, with the Seneca nation of Indians, for the extinguishment of their claim to the lands on Niagara river, including Black Rock, for the approbation of the President; and to assure you, that the business was conducted with the greatest fairness and cordiality.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

JOHN TAYLER.

The Honorable HENRY DEARBORN.

ALBANY, July 24th, 1802.

SIR:

I take the liberty to represent to you, that, in the centre of a tract of land, which I own, on the west side of the Genesee river, the Seneca nation of Indians had a small reservation of two square miles, called Little Beard's reservation; that the settlers on my land, and the Indians, from their different practices respecting their cattle, and various other matters, were mutually troublesome; and that, in consequence of this, the Indians were desirous of making an exchange of land with me, and taking an equal quantity adjoining some of their larger reservations; that, at the time it was expected that, at the request of the State of New York, a commissioner, on the part of the United States, would be appointed to attend the late treaty with the Seneca nation, I wrote to the Hon. De Witt Clinton, and to the present Postmaster General, requesting them to represent these facts to the Secretary of War, with a view to have it a part of the commission of the gentlemen who should be appointed, to attend the treaty which should be holden between the Indians and myself, respecting this reservation; that Mr. Clinton informed me, by letter, that the matter had been stated agreeable to my request; and that the commissioner would be authorized accordingly; and that, depending on this, I supposed it was intended to have been included in the commission, although, on examining it, there appears to be nothing explicit on the subject. That, situated as this business was, Judge Tayler attended a treaty which I held for the purpose of making the exchange mentioned; that we easily came to an agreement, as our interests and views coincided; and that the commissioner on the part of the United States, signed the papers which were intended to carry our bargain into effect, in the manner he has represented, or will represent to you.

I hope this transaction may meet with your approbation, and, in order to accommodate the parties, without the delay and expense of another treaty, be carried into full effect, by obtaining the sanction of the President.

I am, with respect, your humble servant,

OLIVER PHELPS.

HENRY DEARBORN, Esq.

PHILADELPHIA, 9th August, 1802.

Sir:

At the treaty held under the authority of the United States, on the Genesee river, in the year 1797, the right of the native Indians to a large tract of country, situate within the State of New York, and owned principally by a company of gentlemen in Holland, usually called the Holland Land Company, was extinguished by purchase, the Indians reserving, nevertheless, to their own use, certain tracts within the ceded country, described by specific boundaries.

Among the lands thus reserved, a tract, usually called the Cattaraugus reservation, was afterwards found to be located in a manner inconvenient to the Indians, which has occasioned, from them, frequent application to the agents of the company for an exchange of it for other lands belonging to the company, the native right to which was ceded by the same treaty. From a desire to secure the friendship, and conciliate the good will of the Indians, these applications have been favorably regarded; but the difficulty and expense of holding a treaty, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the United States, and of the States of New York and Massachusetts, have hitherto rendered it impracticable to carry into effect the friendly and accommodating disposition of the company on this subject.

At the treaty lately held, for another purpose, at Buffalo creek, the importunities of the Indians to effect this exchange were renewed, and Joseph Ellicott, Esq. the agent of the company in that country, actuated by a desire to remove this constant source of complaint and dissatisfaction, (having no opportunity, previously, to consult with me on the subject) without my privity, availed himself of the presence of the commissioner of the United States, to enter into the agreement, of which I have the honor to enclose you a copy, and which, I presume, has been, before this, submitted to the President.

As, by the deed of cession between New York and Massachusetts, any grantee under the latter State is restricted from making any purchase of the native Indians, unless in the presence, and with the approbation of, a superintendent, to be appointed of that State; and as, by an act of the Legislature of the State of New York, any contract for the sale, or other disposition of any lands within that State, without the authority and consent of the Legislature, is declared void, and the party making it, subject to punishment, it would seem, that the agreement thus made by Mr. Ellicott, although with the approbation of the commissioner of the United States, is of no binding force, unless it shall be sanctioned by some future act of the Legislatures of Massachusetts and New York.

As this would be an object of essential importance, not only to the Holland Company, by saving to them the expense of another treaty, for the same object, but also to every other person who may be interested in the success of future negotiations with these Indians, by preventing that loss of confidence which would necessarily ensue, from what might appear to them a want of good faith, should the terms of an agreement, thus solemnly made under the authority of the General Government, not be adhered to, I take the liberty to suggest, for your consideration, the propriety of submitting this instrument to the respective Legislatures of New York and Massachusetts, for their approbation.

If such a measure, on the part of the Government, should not appear improper, I flatter myself with the hope, that it will receive their attention. The Holland Company, whom I represent, have a strong interest, in common with all other landholders in this remote frontier country, to secure the confidence, and conciliate the good will of the savages; but, beyond this, they can derive no advantage from the success of the application which I have now the honor to make.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient humble servant,

PAUL BUSTI, General Agent of the Holland Land Comp'y.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Esq. Secretary of War.

ALBANY, 21st August, 1802.

Sir:

I have the pleasure to inform you, that I yesterday effected the purchase of the lands on the Niagara river, including Black Rock, from the Seneca nation of Indians, and now stand ready to make a cession of such part of it to the United States, as may be necessary for the establishment of a military post there, on the terms and conditions prescribed in the act of our Legislature, authorizing such cession, a copy whereof is herewith transmitted.

The Indians, as you will perceive by the copy of the treaty, committed the management of it to a number of their principal and most influential chiefs; and as I transacted the business on the part of the State, personally, it afforded me a favorable opportunity of removing from their minds the unjust prejudices which had been excited against the erection of a fortress in that quarter, and which was the cause of their inconsistent and reprehensible conduct at their late meeting with my agents at Buffalo creek; and I flatter myself this opportunity has been improved to advantage, as they now appear to be reconciled to the measure, and to see it in its true points of view, as calculated for our mutual protection and defence, and I am persuaded they will return to their nation impressed with this favorable sentiment.

A recent unfortunate event, which has taken place at New Amsterdam, (a settlement near Buffalo creek) the murder of a white man by one of those Indians, (of which, I find by the communications made to me, the President is apprised) has occasioned a degree of alarm and apprehension among the inhabitants of that and the adjacent frontier settlements, and much anxiety among the Indians for the fate of the murderer, who stands committed in the county gaol at Canadarque, on warrant from a magistrate, to answer for the offence. This unhappy affair took place when the chiefs were at Canadarque, on their way hither. The inhabitants of that place treated them with hospitality and kindness, and the sheriff suffered the culprit to quit his prison, and mix with his friends, during the few days they tarried there. And, on their departure, they, very honorably, complied with their engagements, by delivering him up to the custody of the sheriff. The chiefs offered several reasons to me why the prisoner ought to be liberated. They alleged, that, by our treaty with them, the crime was not cognizable in our courts, but punishable by their laws and customs; that five different murders had been committed, in cold blood, by our people, on theirs; that all these had been commuted for, and settled by presents from the President to the relations of the persons murdered, with which their nation was satisfied; and that this was the first murder committed by any of their people on ours, and this was perpetrated by a man intoxicated with strong liquor, in passion, for threats uttered against him; and concluded by requesting that, if he could not be pardoned, that he might be liberated from prison on bail. I endeavored to convince them, and I have reason to believe, not without effect, that their construction of the treaty was not the true one; that the settlements by presents, or commutation, for the murders committed on their people, was inapplicable to the present case, as they were sanctioned by the consent of their nation, and were conformable to their own laws and customs, but repugnant to ours; that the Governors had not the power of pardoning a murderer, and that the crime was not even bailable by our law. But I promised them, at the same time, that the confinement of the prisoner should be as humane and liberal as his safe-keeping would admit; that his friends should have liberty to visit him; and that I would faithfully communicate all they had mentioned to me, in extenuation of his crime, to our Legislature, who alone had power to pardon the offender, and that, if convicted in their recess, I would suspend his execution until they met, to give them an opportunity to take his case under their consideration. I also gave them assurances, that I would take every measure in my power to prevent private revenge, or retaliation, for this offence, of which they appeared to be fearful. In coming to this explanation with them, I mentioned the propriety of its preceding the completion of the treaty for the purchase of the lands, lest their deliberations might be influenced by expectations that I could not realize. By this arrangement of the business, I was enabled to form a better judgment of the impressions my conduct had made upon them. With respect to the alarm which the murder has occasioned among the inhabitants of our frontiers, I presume it will cease the moment preparations commence for the military establishment at Black Rock; and which, as well from its great importance to the Union, as for the safety of the inhabitants in that quarter, I conclude, will meet with no delay. The actual execution of the deed of cession, I presume, need not retard the commencement of the business, as no obstacle can occur to prevent its completion.

The enclosed letter from Mr. Ellicott, and petition from the inhabitants, will give you a full and circumstantial account of the murder, and of the turbulent conduct of the Indians, both previous and subsequent to that unhappy event. You will pardon the trouble I give you by this lengthy detail, as it may serve, in some measure, to relieve the President from the anxiety which the unfortunate event to which it relates must have produced; and believe me to be, very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

GEORGE CLINTON.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN.

An Act for holding a treaty with the Seneca nation of Indians, establishing a military post near lake Erie, and for other purposes Passed March 19th, 1802.

Whereas it is necessary that a treaty be held with the Seneca nation of Indians, to extinguish their claims to lands east of Lake Erie, to enable this State to cede their jurisdiction, or sell to the United States a sufficient quantity of the said land, at the eastern extremity of Lake Erie, at a place called the Black Rock, as may be sufficient for the establishment of a military post: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, That it shall and may be lawful for the person administering the Government of this State, or his agent or agents, to hold a treaty (on the part of the People of this State) with the Seneca nation of Indians, to extinguish their claim to the whole, or such part of their lands, at the east end of lake Erie, of one mile wide on Niagara river, from Buffalo creek to Stedman's farm, including Black Rock, with so much land adjoining as shall be sufficient for establishing a military post, on such payments and annuities as he or they shall judge most conducive to the interest of this State.

And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the person administering the Government of this State, for and on behalf of this State, to convey to the United States, after the extinguishment of the claim of the said Indians as aforesaid, in fee simple, such part of the said land, at the eastern extremity of lake Erie, at a place called Black Rock, as may be sufficient for the establishment of a military post; the United States paying therefor the expense of holding the said treaty, or such part thereof as the person administering the Government of this State shall judge reasonable: Provided always, that nothing in the foregoing grant to the United States shall be construed, so as to prejudice the right of portage of the People of this State, along the said river, through the tract of land which may be so conveyed, and the privilege of a road along the shore of lake Erie; and of a ferry across the Niagara river, at Black Rock. And provided further, that such conveyance shall in no wise prevent the execution of any process, civil or criminal, issuing under the authority of this State, within the bounds of the land so to be conveyed; and such conveyance shall expressly contain such condition.

And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the person administering the Government of this State, or his agent or agents, at the said treaty, to purchase from the Cayuga and Onondaga nations of Indians, all, or such part of their lands, called their reservation lands, on such terms as he or they may deem expedient.

And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the person administering the Government of this State to draw from the treasury, a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, for defraying the expense of the said treaty, and for paying such part of the purchase money for the said lands as may be necessary.

And be it further enacted, That, in holding the said treaty, it shall and may be lawful for the person administering the Government of this State, or his agent or agents, to stipulate with the said Seneca nation for the granting to Jasper Parrish and Horatio Jones, such quantity of land, not exceeding one mile square to each of them, separately, and to their respective heirs and assigns, forever, at such place or places, within the tract of one mile wide, on Niagara river, as aforesaid, as shall at such treaty be agreed on.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, of the State of New York, August 21st, 1802.

I certify the preceding to be a true copy of the original act, now on file in this office.

BENJAMIN FORD, Deputy Secretary.

ALBANY, 26th January, 1803.

GENTLEMEN:

I had the honor of receiving, this morning, your letter of the 17th instant, enclosing a copy of the treaty made on the 30th of June, 1802, between the Seneca nation of Indians, and Oliver Phelps, and others. I do not find any thing exceptionable in this treaty; it is probable the irregularity in the application to the commissioners of the United States, may have arisen from the circumstance of the land purchased at this treaty, being part of a tract, the pre-emption of which was ceded by this State to Massachusetts. In these cases, as there is no particular law of the State authorizing such treaties, the application for the appointment of a commissioner on the part of the United States is not made as usual, by the Governor, nor has he any agency in the business, further than to see that nothing is done to interrupt the public peace.

I am, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE CLINTON.

The Honorable GOUVERNEUR MORRIS and DE WITT CLINTON, Esquires.

No. 99.

[2d SESSION.]

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 28, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you a treaty which has been agreed to by commissioners, duly authorized on the part of the United States, and the Creek nation of Indians, for the extinguishment of the native title to lands in the Tallassee county, and others, between the forks of Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, in Georgia, in pursuance of the convention with that State, together with the documents explanatory thereof; and it is submitted to your determination whether you will advise and consent to the ratification thereof.

December 27, 1802.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, by James Wilkinson, of the State of Maryland, brigadier-general in the army of the United States, Benjamin Hawkins, of North Carolina, and Andrew Pickens, of South Carolina, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States, on the one part, and the kings, chiefs, head-men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, in council assembled, on the other part, have entered into the following articles and conditions, viz:

ARTICLE 1. The kings, chiefs, head-men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, in behalf of the said nation, do, by these presents, cede to the United States of America, all that tract and tracts of land, situate, lying, and being within and between the following bounds and the lines and limits of the extinguished claims of the said nation, heretofore ascertained and established by treaty, that is to say; beginning at the upper extremity of the high shoals of the Apalachy river, the same being a branch of the Oconee river, and on the southern bank of the same; running thence a direct course to a noted ford of the south branch of Little river, called by the Indians Chat-to-chuc-cohat-chee; thence a direct line to the main branch of Commissioner's creek, where the same is intersected by the path leading from the Rock Landing to the Oakmulgee old towns; thence, a direct line to Palmetto creek, where the same is intersected by the Uchee path, leading from the Oconee to the Oakmulgee river; thence, down the middle waters of the said creek to Oconee river, and with the western bank of the same to its junction with the Oakmulgee river; thence, across the Oakmulgee river, to the south bank of the Altamaha river, and down the same at low-water mark, to the lower bank of Goose creek; and from thence by a direct line to the Mounts, on the margin of the O-ke-fin-ocau swamp, raised and established by the commissioners of the United States and Spain, at the head of the St. Mary's river; thence, down the middle waters of the said river, to the point where the old line of demarcation strikes the same; thence, with the said old line, to the Altamaha river, and up the same to Goose creek: And the said kings, chiefs, head-men, and warriors, do relinquish and quit claim to the United States, all their right, title, interests, and pretensions, in and to the tract and tracts of land within and between the bounds and limits aforesaid forever.

ARTICLE 2. The commissioners of the United States, for and in consideration of the foregoing concession on the part of the Creek nation, and in full satisfaction for the same, do hereby covenant and agree with the said nation, in behalf of the United States, that the said States shall pay to the said nation, annually, and every year, the sum of three thousand dollars, and one thousand dollars for the term of ten years, to the chiefs who administer the Government, agreeably to a certificate under the hands and seals of the commissioners of the United States, of this date, and also twenty-five thousand dollars in the manner and form following, viz: ten thousand dollars in goods and merchandise, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged; ten thousand dollars to satisfy certain debts due from Indians and white persons of the Creek country to the factory of the United States; the said debts, after the payment aforesaid, to become the right and property of the Creek nation, and to be recovered for their use in such way and manner as the President of the United States may think proper to direct. Five thousand dollars to satisfy claims for property taken by individuals of the said nation from the citizens of the United States, subsequent to the treaty of Coleraine, which has been, or may be, claimed and established agreeably to the provisions of the act for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and, to preserve peace on the frontiers: And it is further agreed, that the United States shall furnish to the said nation two sets of blacksmiths' tools, and men to work them, for the term of three years.

ARTICLE 3. It is agreed by the contracting parties, that the garrison or garrisons which may be found necessary for the protection of the frontiers, shall be established upon the land of the Indians, at such place or places as the President of the United States may think proper to direct, in the manner and on the terms established by the treaty of Coleraine.

ARTICLE 4. The contracting parties to these presents do agree that this treaty shall become obligatory, and of full effect, so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by, and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States, and the kings, chiefs, head-men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, have hereunto subscribed their names, and affixed their seals, at the camp of the commissioners of the United States, near fort Wilkinson, on the Oconee river, this sixteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and two, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-sixth.

JAMES WILKINSON.
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.
ANDREW PICKENS, &c.

It having been stipulated, among other things, by and between the commissioners of the United States and the kings, chiefs, head-men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, in council assembled, in the treaty this day concluded, that the United States shall pay, annually, for the term of ten years, one thousand dollars to the chiefs who administer the Government of the Creek nation, agreeably to a certificate under the hands and seals of the commissioners of the United States,

We have agreed that the said sum shall be paid to ten chiefs of the Upper, and ten of the Lower Towns, the speaker in the national council, which has been established as a part of the plan of civilization, agreeably to the orders of Government, to receive one hundred and fifty dollars; the three first chiefs seventy dollars, and the remainder to be equally divided among the remaining sixteen chiefs, to be paid at the same time, and in the same way and manner, as shall be provided for the payment of the annuity of three thousand dollars to the Creek nation.

In testimony whereof, we have hereunto subscribed our names, and affixed our seals, at our camp, near fort Wilkinson, on the Oconee river, this sixteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and two.

JAMES WILKINSON.
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.
ANDREW PICKENS, &c.

ALEXANDER MACOMB, Jun. Secretary to the Commission.

COMMISSIONERS' CAMP, NEAR FORT WILKINSON, July 15th, 1802.

SIR:

We have the honor to enclose you a duplicate of our letter, of the 17th ultimo, the day after which, General Pickens returned to his family, submitting to us the fulfilment of that stipulation of the treaty, which required prompt execution on our part.

A fair, equitable, and satisfactory distribution of the goods, was as necessary as it was difficult, amidst the distinct claims and pretensions of twenty-seven towns and eight villages; and this toilsome task devolved on the Superintendent for Indian Affairs. We were detained until the 1st of the month, for the goods purchased in Augusta, amounting to about four thousand dollars, which, added to those sent to Mr. Clay last autumn, with sundry articles drawn from the factory, and about one thousand dollars' worth of axes, hoes, and salt, enabled us to complete the payment of the ten thousand dollars, conditioned for in the treaty; and the rear of the Indians took leave of us the 5th instant, with much apparent satisfaction.

Anterior to, and pending this interval, several circumstances occurred, which appear worthy of special remark, but have heretofore escaped notice; we, therefore, think it proper to present them to the consideration of Government, at this time.

After our preliminary address to the Indians, on the 29th of May, such difficulties and divisions ensued in their councils, as prevented their coming to any conclusion; during this period, several private conferences were held by the old chiefs, with the superintendent and the commissioners, in which they explained those difficulties, asked advice, and assured us that the land below the Rock Landing and south of the Altamaha, belonged to certain disaffected tribes, who reside low down on Flint river and the Chattahoochee, and had declined attending the conference. They expressed their apprehensions, that, should they sell this land, or any part of it, the chiefs and warriors of those tribes might be incensed, and, out of revenge, would attack our frontier, and spill blood, in order to involve the nation in misfortunes, and, therefore, they intreated of us not to press them on this point, and we felt little difficulty in acquiescing, from respect to the force of their reasons, and because we had discovered that the citizens of the State held those tracts in light estimation, when compared to the lands above the Rock Landing.

We think another particular well worthy regard, which was frequently noticed by the Indians, in their private conferences and their public talks; it is their reliance on the military for protection, and their desire to have them posted on their lands, in front of our settlements. We consider this proposition liberal and judicious, in its relation to the Government as well as the Indians: for, by abstracting the troops from the frontier settlers, the principles of subordination and discipline may be more effectually enforced, and those animosities, broils, and debaucheries, which are inseparable from a connexion between them, may be prevented; besides, it will have a natural tendency to familiarize the Indians to the idea of a concession of the lands, in rear of the establishment, and will restrain the dangerous and destructive intercourses of the Indians, with our disorderly citizens, from whom they derive naught but their vices and bad habits. The removal of the garrison from fort Wilkinson, may be done at little expense, and appears indispensable to the restoration of temperance, regularity, and order, and to dissolve the sinister intrigues and connexions of a licentious soldiery, and a neighborhood, formed principally by army followers. A suitable spot for a position has been examined on Commissioner's creek, about sixteen miles in advance of the present occupancy, and in front of the boundary proposed by the late treaty; but Colonel Hawkins indulges expectations, he may be able, at the ensuing national council, which you will observe we have been invited to attend, to prevail with the Indians to suffer the establishment to be made south of the Oakmulgee river, on boatable water, where it is his desire to condense the trade of the Indians on this frontier, as well as with private adventurers as with the factory.

In the course of our negotiations, a deputation from the Cherokees presented themselves to Colonel Hawkins and General Pickins, on the subject of the encroachment of the whites, between the Tugelo, and the Apalachy rivers; but they professed that their main business was to adjust their southern boundary with the Creeks, which was accordingly done, in presence of the commissioners, and in the manner and form exhibited in the agreement under cover, which we consider a desirable event, as it clearly defines their respective claims, the uncertainty of which has heretofore perplexed the measures of Government.

We desire to call the attention of the Executive to another subject of our conference, which is of importance, as it relates to the concord and tranquility of the Creeks and our settlements, on the Tombeckby and the Mobile rivers; you will perceive that the trespasses of the whites in that quarter, are complained of by Efauf Haujo, (the Mad Dog) in his talk the 9th ultimo, and that Hopoi Micco, on the same day, delivered the following declaration on the same subject, viz:

"It is not stock, only, we complain of; we find that houses are built on our lands, and fields are cleared and cultivated; we shall wait a reasonable time, to give an opportunity to the officers of Government, whose business it is to attend to such things, to move these people off, under the expectation that they will do it; and if they do not move off, we shall consider these things as our property, and act accordingly." Since the treaty, Efauf Haujo, who was the speaker and first chief of the nation, has abdicated his station to this Hopoi Micco, and transferred the seat of the national councils from Tuckaubatchee to Acheaubofau, the town in which his successor resides. The conduct of this chief at the late conference, and the superintendent's intimate knowledge of his character, warrant us in pronouncing him the most sagacious and the most influential chief of his nation: intent on the plan of civilization, desirous to introduce a regular and efficient government among his people, decisive in all his purposes, and a stranger to the ordinary habits and propensities of his kind. The superintendent has cause to believe that these complaints are well founded, and, to prevent the consequences menaced by the speaker for the nation, we earnestly recommend that inquiry may be made, and redress granted, as soon as may comport with the convenience of the Executive. While on this subject, we will beg leave to suggest the policy and expediency of ascertaining, without delay, the limits of the concessions heretofore made to the British, in that quarter, by the natives. The old settlers contend, and the Indians do not deny, that concessions were made, but the precise bounds have not yet been discovered, though we are persuaded they may be, by due inquiry.

We believe that the result of our negotiations gives general satisfaction and we have to regret two circumstances only, which occurred while they were depending: the theft of several Indian horses by the whites, and the stabbing of a white man by a young warrior. In the first case, we discovered a correspondence between the citizens and two soldiers; the facts have been ascertained, and the two last are in confinement; we have taken measures to secure the two first, and we hope the property may be recovered. In the last case, an Indian ignorantly or wantonly fell out with a negro, a scuffle ensued, the master came to the assistance of the negro, and the Indian, being hard pressed, drew his knife and stabbed his antagonist through the tendinous expansion of the muscles above the knee; after which, he fled, and has not since been heard of. The wounded man was quartered in the garrison, where every attention was paid to him, and he is now in a fair way of recovering the use of his limb.

From whatever we have seen or heard, we believe a solid foundation has been laid for a salutary reform in the habits and manners of this people; and we have no doubt, that, by due perseverance in the systems which have prevailed, the great work of their civilization may be accomplished. The philanthropist and the friend of humanity will rejoice to hear, that the Creek nation, which, six years since, (excepting a morsel of corn and a few vegetables, raised by their women) lived entirely by the chase, and dissipated their hard earned skins for rum and gewgaws, have recently appropriated one thousand dollars for axes, hoes, and salt; the last article, principally, to cure their domestic meats in their proper season, and to nourish their stock.

The factor, who has supplied provisions and other articles for the treaty, is making up his accounts for examination, and we expect they will be ready in a few days; after which, we shall despatch Lieutenant McComb to the seat of Government, for the settlement of his accounts, and shall leave this place, in pursuit of our respective duties.

We are, with perfect respect, &c.

JAMES WILKINSON,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

The Honorable HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

Journal of the commissioners of the United States, for holding conferences with the Indian nations, south of the Ohio.

May 8th, 1802.—The commissioners having assembled, and after examining their instructions, wrote the following letter of acknowledgment to the Secretary of War:

FORT WILKINSON, May 10, 1802.

SIR:

We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch of the 12th ultimo, covering instructions for our Government, pending our conference with the Creek nation, to which we shall pay strict regard, and you may rest assured no exertion, on our part, shall be omitted, to accommodate the views of the Executive, and to make the desired impressions on the public mind of the State of Georgia.

The importance of the objects for which we are to treat, suggests difficulties to us, but we will struggle to surmount them, and, in the mean time, we take the liberty to recall your attention to the third article of our instructions, which directs us to obtain the consent of the Creeks, if practicable, to the extension of the present boundary, between Tugelo and Apalachy rivers; should we succeed in the pending negotiation, to obtain this concession from the Creeks, it will be considered by the Cherokees as a trespass on their territory, and will actually include a considerable tract, claimed by them, and heretofore disclaimed by the Creeks, particularly to Colonel Hawkins, the commissioner of the United States, and the commissioners of Georgia for running the line before mentioned. These commissioners, beginning at the Apalachy, and proceeding northward towards the Tugelo, found the attending chiefs of the Creeks averse to accompanying them further than the Middle fork of the Oconee river; but, at the pressing instance of Colonel Hawkins, they proceeded as far as the Currahee mountain, beyond which, they positively refused to march a step, into a country, which, to use their own language, they "neither knew nor claimed." For confirmation of these facts, we refer to the treaty of Hopewell, and to the personal knowledge of Colonel Hawkins and General Pickens, and we beg leave to add, that the settlement of Colonel Wofford, which consists at present of about sixty families, is included by the claims of the Cherokees, and not by the claims of the Creeks.

We are induced to believe, cash will be most acceptable to the Indians, for any concession they may make, and we are persuaded it may be rendered most useful to them.

The suspension of the negotiation for a short period, will not be difficult, or unfavorable to the views of Government.

With high consideration and respect, we have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servants,

JAMES WILKINSON,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS.

To the Honorable HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

FORT WILKINSON, May 10, 1802.

SIR:

In obedience to the instructions of the President of the United States, and with the most cordial disposition, we have the honor to assure your Excellency, that we shall procrastinate the pending treaty with the Creek nation, at this place, to accommodate the views of the Government over which you preside; and that we shall take great pleasure in co-operating with your Excellency, to the extent of our authority, for the promotion of the interests of the good people of the State.

With high consideration, and perfect respect, we have the honor to be, your Excellency's ob't serv'ts,

JAMES WILKINSON,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS.

To His Excellency JOSIAH TATTNALL,
Governor of Georgia, Louisville.

FORT WILKINSON, 17th May, 1802.

SIR:

The commissioners of the United States addressed a letter to your Excellency, the 10th of this month; since then the Creek representation has arrived, more full and respectable than we have ever known one to be.

As we are sensible of the real and sincere disposition of the General Government to make every exertion in its power for the accommodation of the Government and citizens of Georgia, in whatever may depend on the conference proposed to be held at this place, with the Creek Indians, we have judged it advisable for General Wilkinson to wait on your Excellency, to have a personal conference with you, to obtain such advice, aid, or agency, as may be considered useful and proper by your Government. We wish we could ourselves accompany him; but it is necessary we should remain with the Indians at this crisis, to use our best exertions to promote the views of Government, and we wish it may be convenient for you, and that you would do us the favor, to visit and aid us yourself, during the negotiation; let it eventuate as it may, we trust such a measure would be beneficial to the State of Georgia.

We have the honor to be, &c. &c.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS.

To the Governor of Georgia.

To which the Governor made the following reply, dated

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, LOUISVILLE, 21st May, 1802.

GENTLEMEN:

Your esteemed favors of the 10th and 17th inst. I had the honor of receiving by Brigadier General Wilkinson, to whose goodness I cannot feel myself too much indebted for his visit to this place. A personal interview with the General, and exchange of ideas, in relation to the pending treaty, has enabled us to form an infinitely more correct view of the principles which are necessary to direct our operations and united exertions towards accomplishing the desirable objects contemplated.

I beg leave gentlemen, to tender you my most cordial acknowledgments, for the sincere disposition you have evinced of co-operation with the government of this State, in the promotion of the interests of the citizens thereof, which doubtless will be greatly advanced by the completion of the views for which the treaty is to be held; and I much regret that the necessity for your remaining with the Indians has prevented my having the pleasure of your company at Louisville.

I must beg leave, gentlemen, to refer you to General Wilkinson for particulars, respecting the call of the Legislature of this State, and the communications from the Representatives in the Congress of the United States, relative to the articles of agreement and cession, lately entered into between the commissioners on the part of the United States and those of Georgia.

In three or four days, an agent, in behalf of this State, will be directed to repair to the treaty, to collect such information as may be necessary to lay before the Legislature, immediately on their being convened, that delay may be as much as possible avoided.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, with great respect and esteem, your obedient humble servant,

JOSIAH TATTNALL, Jun.

General ANDREW PICKENS, and
Colonel BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

May 20th.—General Wilkinson returned from Louisville, and informed the commissioners that, on his arrival at that place, he found Governor Tattnall had issued his proclamation for the convening of the Legislature of the State; which precluded the necessity of his holding any conference with the Governor on the subject, and he afterwards addressed the following letter to the Secretary of War:

LOUISVILLE, May 19, 1802.

SIR:

I had the honor to write you from the Oconee, the 16th inst. and arrived here yesterday, to explain to the Governor the views and disposition of the General Government, and of their commissioners, for holding the pending conference with the Creeks; and, at the same time, to learn from him, how soon the State would be prepared to co-operate with those commissioners in the proposed negotiation.

I find the Governor has issued his proclamation, to convene the Legislature, on the 10th of the next month, which may, I fear, involve delays hazardous to our views, as the Indians have not planted their fall crops. I shall return to-morrow, and you may rest assured that the utmost address of the commissioners will be zealously exerted to fulfil their instructions, and to accomplish the objects for which they are to negotiate. It is apparent that Governor Tattnall did not lose a moment, after being advised, to convene the Legislature, and therefore the delay, though unexpected and embarrassing, seems to have been unavoidable.

With perfect respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

To the Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

May 23.—The chiefs sent to inform the commissioners that, on the next day, they wished to receive them, according to the ancient customs of their country, at the public square; and they requested the commissioners to be ready to move from their encampment early in the morning, and as soon as the runners arrived, to inform them that every thing was ready for their reception.

May 24.—The commissioners went to the square, and were seated, with all their attendants. The chiefs of the Upper and Lower towns having met at some distance from them, moved on in a body; two men in front, dancing the eagle tail dance, to music, accompanied by the voices of all the men and women. As soon as they arrived at the square, the commissioners moved to a place prepared for them, when they were touched by the wings in the hands of the dancers; behind General Wilkinson was a small pit, and a white staff standing by it; they brought a bow and arrows, painted red, showed them to the commissioners, then broke them, put them into the pit, covered them with earth, and with a white deer skin; three great chiefs, representing the Upper and Lower towns, wiped the faces of the commissioners with white deer skin, spread the skins on a log, and they sat them down. General Wilkinson was directed to put his foot on the skin covering the pit. With three other skins they covered the commissioners, and after the embrace of friendship, addressed them as follows:

EFAU HAUJO for the Upper Creeks.—We, this day, a fine one for the occasion, a clear sun and sky, meet our friends, brothers, and fathers to take them by the hand, according to the customs of our forefathers, as old as time itself. We have, at the foot of the General, buried the sharp weapons of war, which were in use in old times, and such as we have; our white deer skins we place on the seat of our friends, and cover them with the same: we add one other emblem, a pipe.

COWETA MICOO, for the Lower Creeks.—I am going to talk to our friends, brothers, and fathers. The day is clear and bright, emblematical of our intentions. Our friends will look upon us, as we are a poor people, and we receive them with such things, and in such ways, as come to us from our forefathers. We are old, but what we do will serve as a lesson to our children, who may, both red and white, follow our example, and grow up in peace and friendship. We shall take our friends by the hand, sit down with them, and close our ceremonies with the last in use among us, (meaning the asee, a decoction of the cassine yupon.)

The speaker for the nation, (Eufau Haujo) then addressed the commissioners in behalf of the whole nation:

I am going to speak to my white friends, brothers, and fathers. This day we have met: the sharp weapons of war, in use among us old people, we have broken and buried in the ground. The advice of our father, Washington, we have taken; we remember it, and this day we renew it. I am happy we meet in our own land, under the shades of our own trees, fanned with our own air, with straight hearts. Some time since, our father Washington left us, and is buried. The advice he gave was good for us; we see it, and know it: his successor followed his example, and the now great man comes with like assurances; they are brought us by their great General and beloved men. Oconee's waters are divided; one half was given to the whites; thence, from its source, over the Currahee mountain, to the other nation's lines. When the old President Washington sent commissioners to the chiefs of the Creeks, he said, when that line was run it should be fixed and permanent. His successor following him, gave us the same assurances, and we shall take the advice.

I am speaking for my young kings, warriors, and my nation, to the commissioners, that all may know we wish them well. I have a white staff now in my hand, for the new great General, which I will plant; it will grow and have a shade, fanned with cool breezes. When this tree is put there to grow, it will have a shade for our friends quite round to the Mississippi. I have but a short talk to-day, and I deliver with it the tree to the commissioners. You commissioners called the nation of Creeks to meet you here. We have treated you with our ceremonies and a short talk, and hope you will begin to-morrow, and let us progress until we have finished.

General WILKINSON replied, in behalf of the commissioners, as follows:

Chiefs, head-men, and brothers, of the Creek nation: I have received from your chief speaker this white staff; it is an emblem of peace; I shall lean upon it, and I trust no event will wrest it from my hand.

The commissioners of the United States, appointed by your father, the President, have this day witnessed the ceremonies of your forefathers; they have received this ceremony of respect, and they acknowledge themselves obliged. We have been appointed to brighten the chain of friendship between the red and white people of this country. We shall endeavor to take care of the interests of the white people, while we shall not forget those of the red. We have been pleased to see the bloody arrow and tomahawk buried in the earth, and we hope no occasion will ever offer to lift them again. We view with you the blueness of the sky, the brightness of the sun, and serenity of the day, as emblems favorable to a happy issue of our negotiations; whatever may be the result, we will endeavor to acquit ourselves to red man and white man. After being received in form, and hearing what has passed, we shall be prepared to commence the great business of our mission, with the shortest delay. Your father, the President, has the same good will towards you as Washington had, and he will never ask any thing from you; nor recommend any thing to you, but for your good.

The council adjourned.

May 25.—The commissioners met the chiefs and head-men in their square, and, by General Wilkinson, addressed them as follows:

Chiefs and head-men of the Creek nation: We yesterday took you by the hand; we heard your voices, and we were happy.

We this day meet you, not to commence the great business of our appointment, but to open our hearts to you, and account for the delay.

When honest men meet on business, no concealments are necessary, nor are they practised; for our parts, our hearts are pure, and our intentions good; we are here to remove the grievances of the red people, and their white brethren. We feel the trust a solemn one; and, standing, as we do, in the face of Heaven, before white man and red man, we shall endeavor to promote the interests of both, without fear, favor, or affection.

With such principles and such motives for our guidance, we can have no hesitation to say to you, that, having waited for the ceremonials of your ancestors, which you yesterday exhibited to us, and having been received in form by the nation, we are ready to proceed to the important business confided to us by your father, the President of the United States; but, as your white brethren, beyond the Oconee, may feel themselves interested in what we have to say, we are desirous the Governor of the State, or some agent from it, may be present to hear us.

Under this impression, we will submit to you to determine, whether we shall commence the business of our commission to-morrow, or whether we shall wait for the arrival of the Governor or an agent, who is expected here to-morrow evening or the next day morning.

We are your friends as well as the friends of your white brethren, and you must not listen to bad talks, or suffer evil thoughts to affect your minds.

The chiefs received this address in good part, and agreed to suspend further communications, from the commissioners, until the 29th instant, at noon, and the council adjourned.

May 29th.—The commissioners met the Creek nation in their square, and General Wilkinson, in the name of the commissioners, addressed them as follows:

Chiefs, Head-men, and Brothers, of the Creek nation:

We have been appointed, by your father the President of the United States, to confer with you on all subjects interesting to your present condition and your future welfare; we therefore invite you to open your minds freely to us, and to put trust in us as your friends, who will find pleasure in advancing your solid interests, and your substantial happiness, by every fair and proper means in our power; and we desire to call your most serious attention, and the united wisdom of your nation, to the consideration of the following important subjects, in the order in which we shall present them to you.

1st. What are the difficulties which prevent the fulfilment of the treaty stipulations, into which your chiefs and your nation entered with the United States, at the treaties of New York and Coleraine?

2d. Have you not power to punish the bad men of your nation, who will spill innocent blood, and murder the citizens of the United States?

3d. Cannot you compel your own people to respect the rights and interests of their neighbors?

4th. Is it not in your power to prevent the disorderly young men, and the foolish chiefs of your land, from combining with the Seminoles, in their predatory warfare against the subjects of Spain?

Speak out, and let us know what you require, from your father the President of the United States, to remedy these evils, to help you, and to save you from the difficulties, the perplexities, and the dangers, which they must produce, if not seasonably corrected.

Brothers and Friends: We see that hunting, to which you and your ancestors have heretofore resorted for support, is failing you year after year. We know that this precarious resource will soon be entirely destroyed, and that you can no longer rely on it for the maintenance of your old men, your wives, and your children; and we believe that, thus circumstanced, you should look around you and endeavor to provide, from the means you possess, some more permanent and more certain dependence, to protect you against the poverty and wretchedness which may otherwise be your portion.

We address you in plain language, but with sincere hearts, when we say, that, of the much you possess, we think a little may suffice, to attain for you this great and desirable end. We ask you, whether you do not think it might be advisable for you to sell some of your lands, the most distant from your towns and villages, to provide for the old, the poor, and the helpless, among your people, and to establish a broad foundation of peace and comfort, for those who may rise up after you are laid in your graves. This has ever been the policy of your white brethren, in every age and every country, and will it not be for your interests to follow their example?

We know a market can be found for some of your lands, at a price which may relieve the present wants of your whole nation, and with care and attention on your part, provide for the wants of your posterity. You can receive a payment in hand, and payments year after year, in money or goods, at your option; not such as you have heretofore received for the lands you have sold, but such as honest men may offer, and freemen may accept.

We consider this a proposition of great importance to the Creek nation, and we recommend it to your closest consideration, as the opportunity which now offers is favorable to you, and we hope you may profit by it, because we are desirous to enable you to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to silence the complaints of the aged, and to shame the mischief makers, who lead your young men astray, with the hopes of making a living by lying and stealing.

We beg of you to examine these important points seriously, as coming from your friends; take them into your council, and let them sink deep into your hearts; and should you require it, we are ready to go into any explanations for your information and your satisfaction.

The council adjourned.

FORT WILKINSON, 30th May, 1802.

SIR:

We have the honor to inform you, that, after exhausting every plausible pretext for delay, we found ourselves compelled to commence our negotiations with the Creeks yesterday, having had no communication with the State of Georgia, except what will be found in the enclosed copy of our correspondence with Governor Tattnall.

The address under cover, will exhibit to you, the great caution with which we have been obliged to open our business, to prevent irritation and alarm, and the effects of a sudden impulse. The points prefaced to our main subject, though in some degree irrelative to the objects of the commission, were introduced to excite a strong sense of humiliation and dependence: for these points have proved a fruitful source of discussion to the superintendent, and are well understood by the Indians, who attach due importance to them.

We have not yet been able to penetrate the dispositions of the Indians relative to the immediate views of Government; but it is not improbable, should they be prevailed on to sell at all, that they may incline to favor a general contract of larger compass than is proposed, say to the Oakmulgee river, in its whole extent, and to include five millions of acres in the Fork, because they prefer strong natural boundaries, and in the progress of the plan of civilization, have acquired correct ideas of the value of property, and the importance of some permanent annual revenue, to aid their domestic manufactures and agricultural pursuits, and to supply the defects of former resources.

Should they come forward with propositions of this cast, an extension of our powers will be necessary, to authorize us to meet them, and, as time and circumstances may render this impracticable, during the pending conference, we shall not venture on a scale of such magnitude, to enter into any but eventual engagements, subject to the future discussion of the Government. But, in prosecuting the immediate objects of our instructions, it seems necessary you should authorize the Branch Bank of Charleston, and the officers of the revenue, in that city and Savannah, to negotiate our bills, as it is difficult to raise money on them in the market.

We shall, however, to enable the factor here, who has not a dollar to discharge his past engagements, and to meet future ones, and for contingent purposes, draw on you, the first of the ensuing month, for six thousand dollars, and shall send the bills to Charleston and Savannah, to be negotiated if practicable.

We are, with great respect, sir, your obedient servants,

J. A. WILKINSON,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
AND W. PICKENS.

The Honorable HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

June 8th.—The commissioners met the chiefs and principal men of the Creeks in their council square, and addressed them as follows:

Chiefs and Head-men of the Creek nation:

It is now ten days since we opened our minds to you on several subjects of importance to your own immediate welfare, and the happiness of your posterity.

We have waited patiently for your answer, and we did expect you would have spoken freely to us before this day, but we have been disappointed, and we are sorry for it; because we understand well the dangers and difficulties which surround you, and are desirous you should embrace the opportunity which now offers, to make provision for the many debts you owe the white people, and for your own wants, and those to which your children will be exposed.

Chiefs and Head-men, open your ears, and listen well to our voice: When we last spoke to you, we recommended to you the sale of some of your lands, which are of little use to your nation, and are much wanted by your white brethren, and we then informed you we knew of a market, in which you might receive a liberal price for that which is worth nothing to your nation. We begged you to take this proposition into your serious consideration, and to give us your opinion of it, so soon as you had made up your minds, but you are silent.

We, therefore, find it our duty to come forward and inform you, that we have been ordered by your father, the President of the United States, to say to you, that he is desirous to purchase from your nation, the land west of the Altamaha, and below the Oakmulgee rivers, as far as the St. Mary's river, and also the land between the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, for which he is willing to pay you a large sum in hand, and to make you such annual payments, in money or goods, as may feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and provide for the aged and helpless of your whole nation, and to enable you to fulfil your treaty stipulations with your neighbors, which may, and will save the remainder of your land from ruin.

In making this proposition to you, your father, the President, is actuated by a sincere desire to silence the complaints, and provide for the wants of his white children; and, at the same time, to secure to his red children a permanent income, more valuable to them than hunting and trapping, which will last as long as the grass grows, and assist them to increase their stock; to promote their domestic manufactures, and extend their agricultural pursuits, as well as to ensure the remainder of their wide extended nation for ever. In short, to make them useful to themselves and to mankind; happy in their condition, and independent of the world.

We are your friends; we have told you so before, and you must believe us. We have given our attention to these propositions; we have considered them well, and we recommend to you to indulge the desires of your father, the President, who has your good, and the good of your whole nation, at heart.

We have nothing further to say at present. We desire you to take this talk into your serious deliberation, and to consider it well before you give us an answer. In the mean time, we shall be ready to counsel and to advise you, should you request it.

The council adjourned.

June 9.—The commissioners met the chiefs, and Efau Haujo, the speaker for the nation, addressed them thus: FRIENDS, FATHERS, AND BROTHERS:

I am going to speak to you. You three gentlemen saw me when I was in my own land. You saw me here; you told me that the great man to the Northward gave you great talks, and you have given them to us. I mentioned when I saw you, that I was old, but nevertheless, we would talk over old things together. I was told by your beloved men, that the talk you have given us was straight, and that, before we parted, every thing would be straight on both sides. According to what has passed between us about the business, we have come forward, and to day I am going to talk about the same. I was told, that when all things were made straight, it would be to the happiness and tend to prolong the safety of the red people. I wish to give a talk, that will be the means of putting it in my power of being friends with all my red people, and the white people. The intention of the talk I will give you is this, that I hope what I now say, will be beneficial to all, old and young, when I am dead and gone; this is my intention, and this will be the drift of my speech.

I address myself to the gentlemen appointed to speak to us, to let them know our poverty and distress; and I hope they will think what I do will be right and acceptable. I have been talked to a great deal before I could lift up my head, but now I can lift up my head and look up. The thing that was asked us to part with, was like asking us to cut ourselves in two, and take one half one way, and the other half the other way. I was told by the great men, who were appointed to bring us the talk of the great man, that they hoped we would not throw his talk away; and I hope they will consider that we have not thrown his talk away. You see my situation; I am poor, and I consider that I have made myself very poor in complying; yet I have considered it, and I have done it. I saw the great complaints which hang over our land; they have been laid before us; we have considered them as they are. Upon the talk you gave us, we have considered much; it was some time before I could make up my mind upon it, but I have weighed it well, and am now going to give my mind upon it. When a man has a child, he considers him, and is not willing to distress him and make him poor. I mentioned this before, and I mention it again. I hope what we do, though it is not as much as was required and expected, yet it will be thought sufficient. I hope it will be considered as it is; and that, although it is not what was asked, yet it will suffice for the present demands. We now give on paper (delivering the map) what we mean and intend; it is a map of the country we cede.

I have now some few things more to say. I have considered things in this light. The Oconee is a large river, half was ours; it was a stopping place; but we see cattle is over, and will be over; and if they were on Oakmulgee, the cattle would be over, and being near to the Indians, there would be no chance of preserving peace between them and their friends. I hope it will be considered it is not right to make us too poor, and that it will not be thought hard that we parted with no more; we can lie down and enjoy what we have; although it is but little, we may rest on it. I have been told our people are very mad; it is so, they are so; but we are not the only mad people; the white people, they come over, hunt on our lands, some with fire and with fire arms; and the cattle they are over, and have eaten all the food of our black game (the bear.) We were told that people were set to prevent it, and to protect our rights, but they cannot prevent these things; they are over, and we see they cannot be prevented. The President of the United States, who sent these talks, we hope and expect, gave you full powers, and that you will, as formerly, endeavor to put things in force, to prevent these things, before there is an end of our business. What I speak in time for, is, I see when there was a river, people could not be restrained; and now, when there is no water boundary, they will perhaps act as they have done; they have stopped our creeks with fish traps, and also our part of the river; they cut cedar on the Oakmulgee, and at other places. The fish at Oakmulgee, and terrapins, are ours, and we wish they may remain to our use. Why I say so much on this subject is, that I know the past, and I wish to begin in time, to prevent the consequences which I apprehend. I speak, that the whites and Indians may equally take pains, in a gentle manner, and by gentle means, in time, to preserve good neighborhood, and that they will exert themselves to that end. I consider it in this light, that the heads of the white people, who can govern their people, should take the necessary precautions on their part, to keep their young people in bounds, and we will do the same on our part, as well as we can. When Oconee was made the line, the river was the bounds for stock; we were told, in Mr. Seagrove's time, if hunters came over, we might take their guns; if trapper's came, we might take their traps; and if cattle came over, we might drive them off. We have not done these things; we wished to be in peace and friendship with our neighbors, and therefore we have not done these things; and we have submitted to the loss of our grass and game, to be in peace with our friends. This is not all. It is not here only, but on Cumberland; they have large dogs and horses, and they come out there, and hunt for, or drive off the bear, before our hunters get there. Our faults were mentioned; we must mention our complaints against our neighbors.

I have talked of these things to Colonel Hawkins, and I am sure he has sent them on, and I now address them to General Wilkinson, who is a great man, and commands many; I hope he will assist us, and help us to get redress. I give this warning before hand, because I know cattle and horses know not lines, and will go after grass. When a man goes after his horse or cow, let him take a bridle and go after him, if it is on our land, but he must go without a gun; I hear that here, where the lines are known, the people come over a day's walk from the line to good food, and there give salt to their stock; they also take out their hogs with corn, and leave them in every part on our borders. By carrying their stock out so far, they accustom them to going still farther, and they get lost, and when they are lost, the Indians are blamed for it; some times they have seen horses out for ten months as strays, and the Indians are accused, and charged with stealing them. I wish that the white people would keep their stock as much as possible on their own side, and endeavor to induce them to stay on their own side. If cattle go over the line, we wish that they may be returned in peace; horses, hogs, and every thing, may be returned in like manner. There must be many white people unknown to us, who have stock among us; when they come after it we wish to assist them in getting it back, and will direct them by signs and other ways to get their property, if they cannot talk our language.

After a conference with the chiefs, Efau Haujo speaks again:

This day is appointed to consider our distressed situation, and to remove all difficulties; this day the land under us we have given up, the trees around us, the water, fine for mills, and good land, and a great deal of it. The good that will arise from the land will have no end; in the summer there will be the grass for stock, and other things in the winter; I consider these things, and I have given them up. The way of the red is this; they are a poor people; if there be any oak trees, they get acorns from them, and from hickory trees they get hickory nuts, and the blackberries in their season. I address myself to Colonel Hawkins, and I find the white people do the same; they suppose you favor the red people, but we believe you hide nothing from either side, and you are the friend of both. When people buy or sell, or bargain for any thing, they take care to understand each other rightly, before they put a price on it; I think that a hundred measures of land (acres) should be two hundred dollars; there are a great many charges against us by the white people; they do not spare in their charges for things that are not lasting, and therefore we ask a price for that which is lasting. You will consider the debts we owe, and fix them, and first pay them; then what remains, to be paid us, as our annuity. It may be thought that I ask a great price for land, but I know that hogs, cattle, and horses, know not bounds, and they will eat our grass to Oakmulgee, and we must set this value on our lands: I mention this business now, that you may hear it. It was the talk of the old President, that the military should be put down to protect them; they are now left behind, and we wish they may be brought forward, and posted at the corner where the line turns from the Indian country road out side. There is a greater opportunity now than formerly, for wild people to transgress, and of course a greater necessity for the aid of the military. We have agreed that where the Apalachy path crosses the line, old Mr. Philips, his sons and families, shall have lands; it is to be out side of the line now ceded, and Coweta and Cussetah will fix the place for them, and will point it out, and these people are to keep a store there for the red people. Perhaps you may want to run your line, now offered, immediately; if so, we will appoint four men from each town to run it with you; we mention this as perhaps you may think that man (meaning Bowles) may do something to prevent it. Here you may see the inconvenience from drinking, and we wish our young people may have no temptation to go among the white people for drink, but be confined to these trading places. We wish our stipend may be paid us in hard dollars; when we take it, we can divide it, and lay it out as we please.

I turn to another subject; I am now going to speak about the lines of Tombigby; I want to know who the people are who live there, that I may know who to address myself to for redress of the complaints there. The reason I ask is, I want to know who owns the land where the old British line is, that when I turn them over the line, I may know whether I can apply to the fort there for assistance; the people of Tombigby have put over their cattle in the fork on the Alabama hunting grounds, and they have gone a great way on our lands; I want them to be put back; the Indians begin to complain, and will soon begin to do mischief. We all know the owners of these cattle are Americans, on this side of the line of limits, and here it is that we mention it to the commissioners.

HOPOTE MICCO. It is not stock only we complain of; we find that houses are built on our lands, and fields are cleared and cultivated. We shall wait a reasonable time to give an opportunity to the officers of Government, whose business it is to attend to such things, to move those people off; under the expectation that they will do it; and if they do not move off, we shall consider these things as our property, and act accordingly.

EFAU HAUJO. At the time of old Washington, in Seagrove's time, we had a talk from Washington, and a messenger was sent off to Coleraine, with the talks of the nation in answer; he was not a horse thief, but a man with a white flag, and his blood was spilt near Coleraine. Two of the commissioners present had it before them at Coleraine, and we have not had an answer since. I lay this before you for your serious consideration; I have the burthen of these things; they are laid before me, and I feel for them in the same manner that you will, when they are laid before you. After you have considered on it, we wish a reply from you for our Big Warrior.

TUS-KE-NE-HAU CHARCO, of CUSSETAH. Our town is charged with a negro killed; the fact is, that we lost a man by the Americans, in our hunting ground, and this negro was taken for it, and we would wish to know if this debt is paid. The debt, if not paid, and it is to be paid, I shall think, when I pay, that Georgia owes us a man.

CUSSETAH MICCO. I lost two men, and at Coleraine asked for, and think I was promised, satisfaction; I have not got it; and as old things are mentioned, I name it. I have another against the State of Georgia, or a negro of the State of Georgia, for an Indian murdered by a negro.

EFAU HAUJO. I have something further to say, but I will postpone it to another day; it is now late, and you, as well as we, want refreshment. The council adjourned.

June 11th.—The commissioners and chiefs assembled.

EFAU HAUJO addressed the commissioners as follows:

MY FATHERS AND BROTHERS:

You are all before me; this is the last talk I will give you. I speak to you in friendship, and in earnest, and my talk is a serious one; my talk is in this line: I am a sufferer, and I expect it will be considered that I am one. I hope you will consider me so, and that you will not turn my talks aside, or consider them as trifling. My people are a poor people; and the reason I speak so much upon the subject, is, because I wish you to consider us so. You have seen me, my country, and my people; and I hope the President may see my talks as they are delivered, that, in future, we may not be pressed upon. It must be considered in this way, that we have spared that which is necessary to us, and we have not enough for our own use. As we are the aboriginals in this land, we hope it will be considered that the land is ours; and this is the talk of all the chiefs present. The President, as you have told us, sent his talk, and it must be so; we receive it as such; we have gone as far as we well can; it is like splitting us in two, and giving away half of us; we do this, and we are in hopes, in future, we shall be safe. Now I lay down this line plain, that you may see, you who are a great people; if any should come over and encroach upon our lands, they will trespass upon our rights, and violate our peace, and we are poor and unable to help ourselves; and we hope great people in authority will prevent these things, and save our lands. Here are the masters of the land; we are all together; we have done this; and from this day forward, if any men should come among us after land, we shall look upon him as not coming from the President. I have now talked to the men from the President; and if, in future, a man should come among us after land, we now declare we shall look upon him as not coming from the President; and I shall direct all my men to take notice of this accordingly. My request is to the commissioners now, that, as the garrison has been useful heretofore, in stopping mischief makers, as was promised us, we wish they may be continued, and put down on our frontiers; and that there may be horsemen as well as foot, to repress the evil doings, as well of my own people, as the white people; to preserve peace when I am at home, and that in force, sufficient to keep the mischief makers within bounds.

We have considered it so, that Phillips and his friends must be put down, not on the land we have sold, but outside; it is a plan that we have got, that he and his friends may guard that quarter; he has been a great friend to our nation, and in consideration thereof, we have done this. Another thing I mention to you in this light, is, that there are people travelling with families, with negroes, and property of value; and I caution you, that my young men, when they see this, are tempted to injure them, and I am not able to prevent it; if so many go through as they do, scattering through all parts of the country, I am apprised that bad consequences will follow from it; let a path be found for them down the Tennessee. It is known that there is a path for people towards Natchez; all who go with families, should be directed to that path, to prevent a breach of the peace, and to preserve it; I this day have the commissioners before me; I address myself to them on this subject. There is one way for travellers I have mentioned; there is another, round our country, by water, which is safe. I speak in this light; I do not love my land from people who are coming after cattle, horses, or hogs, or to trade with us, or single persons coming with papers on business; I confine myself to families, and the crowds with their property; these I object to. I now take upon myself to speak to the Quakers; I have found that the tools they have sent us, as a token of their friendship, have been useful to us, and we are better able to judge now, than when we first received them, as we have tried them, and found them useful to us; and we hope they will send some more of them to us; they know what is useful, and we will be grateful for them. Micco Thlucco, of Cussetah, says he has tried them, and found them useful; his plough is worn out, and he is much in need of another; he understood that, after experiment, if they were really found to be good, they might expect more; he has tried them, found them to be good, reports it as such, and asks for more.

We considered to have Mr. Hill near us, for our accommodation, to attend our talks; and we know he must have cattle for his own use, and that of Colonel Hawkins, when he comes our way, or while he directs our talks. It has been judged proper to have him near the Tussekiak Micco, who can co-operate with him, in suppressing disorders. I hope you will consider that the blacksmith is not to leave Mr. Hill, but to be put near him. One blacksmith is not sufficient; we want another for the Lower towns, and Tuskenehau Chapco, of Coweta, is pointed out to place and to protect him.

Hoppie Micco wants another smith fixed in the fork of Alabama. I consider I have one, and therefore I do not speak for myself; I hope he will remain where he is.

Coweta Tuskenehau Chapco requests that a woman weaver may be placed with the smith, to teach their young women to weave, as they have already spun a good deal of cotton.

Tussekiak Micco requests that a woman may be placed with Mr. Hill and the smith, to weave for his village; they are desirous of instruction, and there are many women in his village.

EFAU HAUJO to Colonel Hawkins.—As for cropping, it was advised to pay attention to, and make it the fashion, to plant; as yet, we have a little hunting; it was what we have been brought up to; it is an old custom, we cannot lay it aside, and we must attend to that too. Whenever our young people find a skin, if it be but one, we wish a place where we may carry it, and get something for it. The hunters they have liberty to work or hunt. This day, we tell you, we do not throw away cropping, stock, or weaving; we will attend to them all, and will attend, also, to hunting; if we get a little by the latter, it will be something to add to our chance in the former; if it be but a little, it is something. The first day the Indians found a white man, they found a friend; and, although they had no interpreters, they found a way to trade, and to be useful to each other, and we wish to preserve trade. There is another thing, the Cherokees have found a good price for racoons, foxes, and wild cats; for large ones, they have a chalk, (quarter of a dollar) and when they are small, they put two on each other. We find it not so among us, and we wish one price for these things could be found at the factories. Another thing they mention, is, what I have seen myself, since I came here: the goods have risen in price; can it be that they are small things growing out of the ground, and as such, we purchased them when we came, and they have now grown larger, and a price accordingly appear on the same things?

I am now going to speak on another subject: the last treaty at Coleraine, some articles of which are not fulfilled. I am now going to make an effort to progress; I have not the power to lift up an arm against our neighboring towns; we consider that, after this treaty, when we go home, we shall try to put in force our warriors; there are a good many towns here present, who speak upon it; there is no other way to fulfil the promise of the old treaty. There are but two keys: the United States have one, and a store, and Spain has the other now in Pensacola; these two keys must lock the doors, and be put in the pocket. I do not say in how many months, or how many years, it can be done, and then for the door to be opened. It is to be left to me to order the door to be opened, as soon as we have done our business, by carrying the treaty into effect. If a white man, as factor or trader, should take any goods from the United States or Spain, to the nation, there must be a rule by which they are to be punished; and the regulation must be in force, till the nation give satisfaction, in the cases complained of. We blame not the white people, we blame ourselves; and this is to remain a law, until the nation complies with her treaty stipulations. When we have done this, the doors must be opened, and let trade take its course. This is a law we have now made, and it must be sent to the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, that they may know it. And it is our law that these nations shall not supply any goods to a Creek. Now, Cherokees, our brothers; some of our people are running to you for trade; you must put a stop to it, as well as the United States and Spain; the same we address to the Chickasaws and Choctaws.

TUSTONNUGGE THLUCCO.—This law is for the people on this side of the line of limits; as for those of Spain, they are for themselves; if they can make a war, let them see to it.

EFAU HAUJO.—There is this proviso in our law: people in debt may go pay their debts, and if they have a balance due them, let them take money or due bills, and keep them till a regular trade is restored. This law is passed by our own chiefs; if injury is done any one, we are to feel the misery of it ourselves, from a want of trade. I think my talks have been extended as far as in my power, to preserve peace. I hope that you, Colonel Hawkins, will first put it in force, by sending it to the agents of the other three nations, and assist us in carrying it into effect, and see to the execution of it, till our object is effected. As this is the finishing of the talk, I have to regret that our women, with the hoes, are behind us; that they and their children are likely to have poverty and hunger for their lot. I consider all this, and it is my care; it presses heavily on my mind. I think I have done all in my power to save my land. I want, in three days, at farthest, to try to set out, that we may not entirely lose our crops, and all suffer with hunger. This is the end of my talk, and I hope it will be for the benefit of all, when we are dead and gone.

The commissioners informed the chiefs that they would meet them to-morrow, after breakfast, and proceed on with their negotiations, with all possible despatch.

The council adjourned.

June 12.—The council being assembled in the square,

Colonel Hawkins, as Agent for Indian Affairs, addressed the Indians, as follows:

It being the desire of the commissioners to settle all things between the red and white people, and to make arrangements to prevent any misunderstandings in future, it is agreed that I shall give a detail of past transactions, on both sides.

To understand these things clearly, I must go back to the treaty of Coleraine. Before that time, the misunderstandings between the Indians and white people had proceeded to such heights, that the President of the United States thought proper to appoint commissioners to meet at Coleraine, to settle their differences.

The people of Georgia attended, by their commissioners, and the Creeks, by a numerous deputation, and they told their differences face to face, before the commissioners of the United States.

At that treaty, no land was asked, and you were told to explain yourselves freely, on all points, that the commissioners, after a full knowledge of your true situation, might form a treaty, which was to be the basis of the future happiness of the Creek nation, as well as to secure the interests of their neighbors.

Every talk made by the red people, and every talk made by the white people, and the treaty, were sent to the President.

Every thing was balanced, then, according to the terms of the treaty, except the blood which I shall mention.

One was the case of the man bearing the flag, who was murdered near Coleraine, and the case of Harrison, which was left to the laws of Georgia.

The President, after he examined the treaty, to ensure its faithful execution, sent me into the Creek nation, to fulfil every thing done at the treaty.

Upon my arrival in the nation, the first violation which happened was the murder of Fielder's black woman, by the Cowetas, said to be in retaliation for a man killed before the treaty.

The second was a man killed in Cumberland, of the name of Genty, by a man of the Upper towns, without any provocation.

The third was a chief wounded in Little river, by some persons of Georgia.

The fourth was Brown, killed by an Uchee.

The fifth was, some people of Hancock county fired on the commissioners, killed one, and wounded two. The Coweta people turned out and took satisfaction, by killing Nicholas Vines.

The sixth was Allen, killed by an Uchee.

The seventh was a Mrs. Smith, scalped and shot through near Tombigby—not killed. The man who did that abominable act has been killed, by an order of the chiefs, upon my demand, and the transaction reported by me.

The eighth case is Mooreland, killed by a Cussetah, without any provocation.

It appears, by this statement, that there are five debts due to the white people, since the treaty of Coleraine.

The complaints of the violation of the treaty of New York, are, that you have not delivered up all the negroes or prisoners agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty. On your part, you charge Georgia with not fulfilling the treaty, in omitting to send persons to claim, and you have pledged fulfilment on your part, which I have stated to their Governor. I believe that all the prisoners have been returned except Miss Williams and Mrs. Perrimond. Mayfield was a prisoner three years in your land, and Stevenson's family four years in your land; after my arrival among you, Mayfield was purchased by his friends, although I was informed he was free.

The murdering of people, the keeping of negroes and prisoners, after the peace, was and is a great source of uneasiness, to the white people, and to the President of the United States, and gives just cause for complaint against you. The case relative to Cornell, the chief with the flag, who was murdered, was sent, by me, to the President, from Coleraine, and I stated the case to the President myself. After the treaty of Coleraine, there came a complaint of a man killed; supposed by Cornells, in the Chickasaws, and of a boat load of people killed near Kaskaskias, by the Creeks, found to be of his town. The friends of the people murdered in the boat have complained to the President, and the war officer, repeatedly, about it; but as the affair, although not known at the time, was before the treaty of Coleraine, we were bound to finish the business of blood by that treaty, and I was directed to say, to the Creeks, "you say nothing about the blood you have lost before the treaty of Coleraine, and I shall say nothing about the blood of people murdered before the same treaty." The people who have lost their blood since, and who could not get their negroes or prisoners, have complained to the President, and he has sent to me to get satisfaction. I, from year to year, have laid it before the chiefs, demanding satisfaction, and, to this day, it is not given. The next complaint against you is horse stealing and the taking of property. It began on Cumberland, and property, to a large amount, was taken by the Cousadees; and satisfaction has been given, except for seven hundred dollars. The people, on the frontiers of Cumberland, complain, every year, of horses being taken from them; they say they have got some back, but much damaged; some are dead, and some not returned. They complain, particularly, of horses taken by James Fife, and sold to David Tate, to the value of three hundred dollars; this debt has been proved, and the value ascertained. I have stated to the President that, this season, I have taken four, and sent them back, and that I have heard of no other complaints from thence. The Indians complain that they come over from Cumberland, and hunt on their lands. The next point of complaint is from the people of Georgia; they complain that their horses are stolen every year, some sent back much damaged, some dead, some retained. The complaints, on this quarter, on the part of the Creeks, are, that the Georgians have stock on their lands, and that they come over and hunt on their lands, with fire in the night, and with fire guns; that they stop their rivers and creeks with fish traps. I have not heard of any property stolen from the Indians, by the people of Georgia, but what I have paid for when reported regularly. There are some very good horses stolen from Captain Spann; they have been much damaged, and two of them died in bringing them home. The Governor of Georgia lays a complaint against you for some negroes that have been stolen; five taken, and two not returned, the property of Mrs. McIntosh.

The next complaint is a small one; it is two public horses stolen by the Cussetah people, which went there with the blacksmith's tools; these horses went to their town, and the complaint is made by me, as the fact is within my own knowledge.

The next point of complaint is on the part of Spain; the first is, that the Indians have killed some of their people at the lime kilns

The second, that the chiefs have taken a white man, of the name of Bowles, an American, made him a chief, and are, in his name, carrying on a war against Spain.

The third, that, on our side of the line, people from Coweta, Tallahassee, Apalachicola, Hitcheta, Uchee, Oseooche, Oconee, Eufaula, and Oketyocenne, have all joined this man in war against Spain. In this state of things, the Creek nation may be compared to a piece of spunk; that fire is struck in it, on the side of the Seminoles, and it is likely to burn up the whole nation, if not timely extinguished. I have stated to the President, to the Governor General at New Orleans, for the King of Spain, that the Chiefs, about me, have done much, and are trying to do all they can, to be good neighbors; they have killed one, and whipped twenty-five, since the experiment to establish a national government and law. I have reported to the President, and to the Governor General of his Catholic Majesty, all your acts worthy of praise; and I have concealed from the red or white people none of their crimes. I have given promises to the white people, every year, by your order, from your national council, that they should have justice done; but, because it is not done, the white people believe I am more your friend than theirs. The President, Mr. Adams, who was the predecessor of the present President, he, although a great and good man, began to believe that the experiment for your civilization could not be carried into effect; that the plan itself was ideal. He began to give it up, by withdrawing his confidence from those entrusted with its execution. Your enemies, by misrepresentation, induced him to turn out Mr. Dinsmoor, one of the best men in the Indian department; sober, prudent, and very attentive to the duties of his appointment; and to replace him by quite another sort of a man—one, as the Cherokees informed you and me, more attentive to his bottle and woman, than to their interest. And serious attempts were made to lessen my standing with him, to destroy my character as a public man, and to render me odious to my fellow citizens, because I was an enemy to those speculative views of your enemies.

In this state of things, Mr. Jefferson came into office, and found me in the department. He has kept me in; he has re-animated the plan for bettering your condition; he placed Colonel Meigs, an honest and estimable man, among the Cherokees; he has sought for and sent Mr. Dinsmoor to the Choctaws; and wishing to have a correct view of Indian affairs, and to make such amicable arrangements as might lead to their prosperity, has sent General Wilkinson, General Pickens, and myself, to see all the red people, to examine into their wants, and report to him their true state, that he might extend to them the benevolent care of the Government. You have heard the speech of the President, as we delivered it to you; but, I will give it to you in two or three sentences. In the first place, we are to examine into all the complaints of both the white and the red people, and to see what can be done to promote peace between them, and to take measures accordingly; and secondly, your father, the President, saw that, in the settlement of your debts, it was not improbable but that you might be involved in serious difficulties; this, together with an anxious concern for your future well-doing, induced him to advise that the red people should sell some of these lands to pay their debts, and provide for their future wants, that there may be no fears in future, when you have funds at command, to apprehend any thing from horse stealing.

Having said what I have, in my station as agent for Indian affairs; and I have done it, that you and my colleagues may understand clearly the differences between the red and white people. In future, you will be addressed by the commissioners.

The commissioners then observed to the chiefs, that, having listened patiently two days, and heard their talks, they would take the same into consideration, and give an answer without unnecessary delay.

The Big Warrior of Tuckaubatchee, urged for an immediate answer, and manifested some impatience.

Colonel Hawkins then informed the chiefs, that the commissioners would speak to them the next day. But this did not satisfy the Big Warrior, who became petulant.

General Wilkinson then observed, that this was a new thing to him; that he had conferred with many Indian nations, but never before heard the child attempt to dictate to the father; that it seemed extraordinary, after the council had taken ten or twelve days for deliberation, and had now spoken for two days successively, they should desire to hurry the commissioners into an immediate reply; that he was as much the friend of the red people as any man; and that he felt even more for them, than for the white people, because the latter was able to protect themselves; that if the council did not wish to hear the voice of the President, they should say so at once, and he would not speak one word more to them. But that the commissioners of the United States must be treated with respect, and when they do speak, shall be heard and attended to. The General rose, and walked out of the square, but was soon invited back by the council, and Efau Haujo made an apology for the conduct of the Big Warrior, and the council adjourned in friendship and good humor, to meet the next morning.

June 13th.—The council assembled in the square. General Wilkinson, on behalf of the commissioners, addressed the Indians:

CHIEFS, HEAD-MEN, AND BROTHERS:

Yesterday your friend Colonel Hawkins spoke to you; his talk was a plain one, and you understand it. This day I am to speak to you; my talk will also be a plain one; and if it should be strong, you must not be displeased, because it is intended for your good. You are free men, and are to judge of it, and will give it such weight as you may think it merits.

We opened our ears, and listened to your voice when you last spoke to us. We have taken your words into our hearts. We have considered them in every part, and we now meet you, to give you the answer of your Father, the President of the United States: for we speak to you in his name, and with his voice.

When your Father, Washington, sent his beloved man, Hawkins, to you, it was to assist you, to serve you, and to do you good. Yet you received him with distrust, and you doubted his intentions. The lies which you had heard from your former agents, were fresh upon your minds; your eyes were still turned towards a people beyond the great water, and you had no faith in the Government of the United States. Not that they had injured or deceived you, you had injured them; they saw you were misled in doing so, and had the magnanimity to forgive you. But a little time convinced you that Washington was your true Father, and that his beloved man was your true friend; and the falsehoods which were circulated within your nation, and the hopes which you had cherished of support from a distant country, slipped away from you like a cloud from the side of a mountain.

Jefferson, your present Father, has succeeded your father Washington, in due course, and, happy for your whole nation, he fosters the same regard for you, and possesses the same power to promote your interests. This we have told you before; and although I am a stranger to you, and you may doubt my sincerity, you are well acquainted with my associates, Colonel Hawkins and General Pickens, and cannot doubt their friendship for you.

When your Father, Jefferson, sent us to meet you, it was his wish, his hope, and his expectation, that you would listen to his voice, and put it in his power to provide for your welfare, and that of his white children.

For this purpose he ordered us to ask from you some land, which your white brethren had requested him to procure for them, which is of little value to yourselves, and for which he is willing to pay you more than you can make from it.

We have advised you to grant his request, but you shut your ears against us, and offer him a small part of what he requires from you, which will neither accommodate his white children, nor enable him to serve you in the degree he desires.

Should we accept this offer from you, before we have made a further explanation of your Father's intentions towards you, and of what is necessary to your interests, we should not act like faithful friends to you, or like faithful commissioners to him; and we should shut our ears, and our eyes, against the feelings and the interests of your white brethren.

When we recommended to you to sell the land, which your Father asked from you, beyond the Altamaha, and between the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, we hoped you would adopt our advice, and enable us to pay all your debts of property and of blood, to provide for your immediate wants, and to secure to your nation forever, yearly payments in cash, of more worth to you, than all the deer, bear, beaver, racoons, foxes, or other animals, which can be found on those lands. But you have put our talks aside, and you offer to your Father a small strip, which will hardly enable us to pay your debts of property, and will not put it in our power to provide for your immediate wants. You tell us you are poor and ignorant, and that you look up to your Father for help and for advice. Open your ears and your hearts then; put confidence in his regard for you; believe in his power and disposition to serve and protect you; and we pledge our lives to you, that he will never forsake or deceive you. But, when the child turns a deaf ear to the voice of his father, and throws away his advice, what can such child expect, or what can he promise himself? Make the application to your own hearts, you who are fathers, and must rule your nation, and there you will find an answer.

You have told us you cannot sell the land below and beyond the Altamaha, because the people who claim it, are not here. Who are these people? If they be of your nation, they have heard the voice of your Father, inviting them to this meeting. They have turned a deaf ear to his voice. They have taken the talk of an impostor, a pirate, and a common liar; and have violated the treaty of the United States with Spain. We call on you, chiefs, head-men, and warriors, to say, whether your Father should look with kindness on such bad children. Whether he should protect their rights, or regard their property. And we call on you to declare to us, you who are the masters of your land, whether it be wise or good, that you should suffer a few mischief-making towns, to prevent you from doing a thing, which would oblige an indulgent Father, and provide for the wants of your whole nation?

Should you be afraid to exercise your own judgment, because of the fools and mischief-makers, who run after the lying vagabond Bowles, who has himself run away from the State in which he was born, or, because boys and mad young men, may differ from you in opinion, we recommend to you to call for the arm of your Father to assist and support you. His arm is as strong as a whirlwind, and, if it is raised, will level to the earth all your enemies, and all those who may oppose your will.

Kings, chiefs, head-men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, now assembled before us: We, the commissioners of the United States, speaking with the voice of your Father Jefferson, do advise you to assert your rightful powers over the lands of your forefathers, and over all mischief-makers to be found in those lands. We know you cannot exist much longer without government. We know you are sensible of this important truth; we, therefore, advise you to stand up like men, to speak like the rulers of your own land, and we will assist you to put down those who may oppose your authority.

You are afraid the stock of your white brethren will over-run your land, eat out your range, and destroy your hunting grounds. Yet you agree to admit them to cross the Oconee, to a line of marked trees. And what will be the consequence? You all know it: for cattle, and hogs, and horses, do not understand talks, or know how to obey orders, and they cannot distinguish marks; they will search for food where it can be found, and will lay bare your lands to the Oakmulgee, before you have received a farthing for them. But if you make that river the line, it shall be guarded by troops from one end to the other; the fords shall be fenced, and stock, sent into your land, shall be killed.

You cannot suspect the sincerity of our dispositions to provide for your wants, present, and to come. You cannot deny our superior knowledge of the manner and means by which this provision may be attained: for you all know it is not long since your whole nation spurned the idea of fencing fields, or employing the plough, the wheel, and the loom. You all know that the tools, which the Quakers sent you, were suffered to lay useless by you for more than twenty moons; and that it is not long since you destroyed a blacksmith's shop, which had been erected, for your accommodation, by your father.

But you have opened your eyes, and have listened to the words of your beloved man, Hawkins; and, in the course of three years, we behold a happy change in your condition. We see fields fenced, corn ploughed, and cotton planted; you understand the value of hogs, cattle, and horses, weights, measures, and money. We hear wheels and looms at work in several of your villages; and your wise men ask us for tools, for blacksmiths, and for women to teach their wives and their daughters how to spin and how to weave.

Your Father, the President, will hear these things with pleasure; but he will hang his head when we tell him you have refused his request for a small part of your land, necessary to his white children, of little value to yourselves, and for which it is his intention to pay you more than you can make from it.

Remember that Washington rescued you from ruin, and you know that Jefferson is disposed to make you independent and happy. But can you expect he will continue to help you, and to instruct you, while you reject his admonition, and refuse to help yourselves? This would be unreasonable, and you must not expect it: for he is under no obligation to extend his cares to a people, who withhold from others what they cannot themselves enjoy, and refuse to employ the means they possess, to promote their own happiness.

If you are poor, a small piece of your land, sold at this time, will make you rich. If you are ignorant, follow the advice of your friends, and you will become wise and happy.

We have now opened our minds to you, and this is the last talk you will hear from us at this time; but, before we shut our mouths, we shall tell you what will enable us to pay all your debts, to provide for your present wants, and leave a little for the future.

We asked you to sell the county of Tallassee, and the land in this fork, and you have told us the people, who owned the land below us, are not here, and you cannot sell it, without bringing trouble on your nation. We are sorry you cannot oblige your Father in this instance; but, as your reasons are strong against his wishes, he will say no more on that subject.

You admit that the masters of the land, on which we stand, are here, and you offer to sell a part of it. But this part is too small to pay all your debts, and leave any thing for your present or your future wants.

We, therefore, recommend to your serious consideration, the following propositions; we shall wait patiently for your answer, and, when we receive it, our business will be finished.

Water lines being more plain, and more lasting, than marked trees, we advise you to make the Oakmulgee your boundary, between lines to be run from the Rock Landing, and the High shoals of Apalachy, for which we will agree to pay you six thousand dollars, in cash, every year, will give you ten thousand dollars in hand, and will pay all your lawful debts. We advise you to accept this proposition, because it is a good one for you, and may not, hereafter, be offered to you.

If you find you cannot comply with this request, we then propose to you, to buy the land within the following limits: beginning at the mouth of Commissioner's creek, and running up to its source; from thence, following the dividing ridge, between the Oconee and Oakmulgee, as high up as the High shoals of Apalachy, and from thence, by a right line, to strike the head or upper end of the said shoals: for this tract, we will give you two thousand dollars a year; will furnish you two blacksmiths and tools; will pay a part of your debts, and give you ten thousand dollars.

We submit these propositions to you. We hope you may think proper to embrace the first; because it will pay all your present debts, and will provide for those which may be made hereafter. We hope the Great Spirit may direct your determination for the best: for we are your friends.

The council adjourned.

The chiefs of the Coweta and Cussetah towns, called the same evening, and informed Colonel Hawkins that they had changed their minds, and were now determined to sell more land than they at first proposed; their first proposition was to begin at Rock Landing, run with the road to the crossing of Commissioner's creek, to a large reedy branch, two or three miles short of the creek; and from thence, a direct line to the High shoals of the Apalachy; now, they propose to begin at the High shoals of the Apalachy, run to a noted ford on the south branch of the Little river; from thence, to Commissioner's creek, where the road from the Rock Landing crosses it; from thence, to Palmetto creek, down the same to the Oconee; thence, to the confluence of that river and the Oakmulgee, to cross the last river, and proceed down the Altamaha, on the south bank, to Goose creek; thence, to the head of the St. Mary's river, down the same to the old line, with the said line to the Altamaha river, and up the same to Goose creek.

14th and 15th.—The council met at the commissioner's camp, and the precise limits of the concession, after every necessary explanation, were agreed upon, and the treaty drawn.

The council adjourned to meet the next morning.

16th.—The Indians having convened at the commissioners' camp, to sign the treaty,

EFAU HAUJO addressed them as follows:

I am going to give a short talk, which will be the last I shall give. The talks which I formerly received from my father, Washington, I have been exerting myself to fulfil, and I am now going to finish them. I consider that you three, the men who have been appointed to do business here, are good men, and who mean to do good for the red and white people; that is our object, and we mean, to-day, to finish our business for the good of both. The people appointed to give talks to the red people of the four nations, the Chickasaws, Cherokees, Choctaws, and Creeks, have given our talk a straight one, for their good; and, this day, we finish our part of it. Our old friend, General Washington, who gave us the good talks for our land, is gone; and I hope that the man, who is now in his place, will follow his example, assist us to take care of our rights, and help us, as we are a poor, and distressed people. I send on all my talks, that the President may see them; and I hope he will give every attention to them that is necessary, and hold me and my red people fast by the hand, as I, and my nation, wish to hold him. I desire the President to leave to Colonel Hawkins to point out proper places to put down the military for the protection of our frontiers; and I request that Colonel Hawkins will look for such places as he thinks proper, and best calculated for the preservation of a lasting peace between the red and white people. The people, who are around us, will notice the time of day I am speaking, and will remember, from this time of day forward, if any man come to us after land, we shall say he has not authority for what he says; and we, also, put an end to all claims for property against my nation. Every thing done by the red people against the white people, is noted, and mentioned to us; and, on our part, I have to mention an affair; I am an old man, and ought to have mentioned it before, as I promised to do, but I had forgot it. Taskenehau, of Tuckaubatchee, he was in company with Archee Coodee, coming from the Chickasaws to the white settlements, and a party of white people fired on them, killed one Chickasaw, and took three horses from him. The affair happened in the settlements of the white people, and Colonel McKee was near the place; this affair happened a good while past.

After a conference and explanation, relative to Indian property left and lost by the Indians who went with McGillivray to New York, and Mooklausau Hopoie stating that he knew it was paid for by the United States, and that Jack Thompson, of the Cherokees, brought the money:

EFAU HAUJO continued his talk: I look upon it now that every thing is fixed for the good of our nation. There is but one thing now I have to add; I leave it now to Colonel Hawkins; he is placed to see justice done us, and we rely on him to see justice done us; and, that he will liquidate all claims against our nation, allow such as he may think just, and reject such as he thinks otherwise.

[A conference and explanation about a prisoner, for information, and not to be recorded.]

The treaty was then deliberately read by General Wilkinson, on the part of the commissioners, and interpreted, paragraph by paragraph, and the General asked them if they understood it, and were ready to sign; they, after some remarks to each other, answered, yes.

Colonel Hawkins said to the commissioners and Indians, he had a short talk for information, as well to the Indians, as others concerned, and it must be clearly understood before the signature.

By the last talk of Efaul Haujo, it would appear, that he thinks the signing of this instrument puts an end to all claims for property against his nation. But, the fact is otherwise, and the parties must understand each other before they sign. The negroes taken must be restored, agreeably to the treaties of New York and Colerain, the prisoners to be restored as soon as they can, and the people who have shed innocent blood, shall be made to pay the debt when they can be found; but, that no innocent person should suffer.

Full explanation being given by the superintendent for Indian affairs, on these three points, the chiefs agreed that the negroes should be restored, agreeably to treaty, and that these three points should be adjusted by him. They added, they were ready to sign; and the instrument was signed accordingly.

COMMISSIONER'S CAMP, west of the Oconee, June 17, 1802.

SIR:

We have the honor to inform you, that we have closed our conference with the Indians, which, in the last stage of the negotiation, took a turn altogether unexpected and extraordinary.

Having employed, with zeal, but without effect, every fair means in our power to accomplish the specific objects of our instructions, we turned our attention from those objects, to one of more importance, in point of intrinsic value, and accommodation to the citizens of the United States, viz: The extinction of the Indian claims within the Oakmulgee fork, from the Rock Landing, up to the High shoals of the Apalachy river.

With this view we submitted our final propositions to the council of the nation, on the 13th instant, and the chiefs of the Coweta and Cussetah towns, waited on us the same evening, from the nation, with the propositions on which we have grounded our contract, and yesterday, the treaty, of which you have a copy, under cover, was executed in due form.

We shall transmit the original instrument, with the detail of our proceedings, by the secretary to the commission, who will proceed to the seat of Government, for the settlement of his accounts, so soon as payment has been made to the Indians, agreeably to stipulation.

It may appear, on a cursory view, that we have exceeded our instructions, in the sum allowed for this concession; but, we believe, a close examination of its comparative value, to that of the tracts specifically designated to us for purchase, and a correct understanding of the circumstances which have occurred, and the motives by which we have been governed, will suffice to justify our proceedings.

The great difficulty to be surmounted was, the passage of the Oconee; and the extension of our front, in contact with the unextinguished claims of the Indians, above the confluence of the Oconee and Oakmulgee, appeared to be the next most desirable object. In prosecuting these views, we had to combat, not only the jealousies, distrusts, and fears, natural to the Indians, but, also, an apprehension, serious and alarming to the old chiefs, that, if they ceded any part of their country, their young warriors might resist it, and, joining the partizans of Bowles, divide the nation, wrest the government from those who at present administer it, and, by some hasty and imprudent act, involve their country in ruin.

We beg leave to refer to our journal, and to future communications, for details, and will barely add, that, if our success has not equalled our wishes, or corresponded with our inclinations, we flatter ourselves substantial advantages have been obtained, and that the result will pave the way to a future concession, at no distant period.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servants,

J. WILKINSON.
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.
AND W. PICKENS.

To the Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

June 29th.—The chiefs sent to request that the commissioners of the United States would attend them in the public square to-morrow, on some affairs relative to the Indians and their friends.

Colonel Hawkins informed them that he and General Wilkinson would attend them, as requested.

CREEK SQUARE, June 30th.

EFAUL HAUJO, to the commissioners. We have promised to aid each other. We, on our parts, have been embarrassed with our affairs towards the Seminoles; we are now going to send them a talk, and, if you approve of it, we wish you to write it for us, and send off to Burges, that nothing of it may be lost. If you approve of this mode of doing business, you will assist us.

Colonel HAWKINS: I will write, or do any thing I can for you.

Efaul Haujo to the Seminoles.

I wish to inform you, Seminoles, that we have not thrown you away; in our councils we have thought of you, and have not thrown you away. I wish to mention to you, that our views in relation to you, have been to your welfare; we have sought it for you, and we inform Caupicchau Micco, that we think we have discovered something hanging over the heads of the Seminoles, which induces us to write this to them. You must no longer persist in the conduct you have hitherto pursued; you must drop it; stop where you are, and adopt another course of conduct; you must listen to the voice of the chiefs of the nation. This talk is from the Aubocoos, the two Upper and the Lower rivers; there are thirty-two towns now with me, while I am speaking, from the whole Creek nation; and it is they who talk to you. You must consider that you have been accustomed to talks, which have misled you, and we now inform you, if you throw this aside, it will be to your injury. You must look upon this as a talk sent to you for your good; if you throw it away, you must yourselves look to the consequences which, in future, may result from such conduct. You must send us an answer; send us the pure sentiments of your hearts; let us know the truth, and what you mean to be at. I send you this to prepare you for another talk; as soon as we get your talk, we shall know what you mean, and we shall then, after a general meeting of the whole nation, send you their talk.

It is not only the chiefs of the Creeks who have heard what is going on with you, but some of the Cherokees and Chickasaws, they join in this caution we send you.

Mr. Burges, our old friend and interpreter, I look on you as my friend; you are a liver in our land, and have been long with us; you have strayed a little of late, but you must get straight; interpret this for the old chiefs, interpret favorable for their wishes; alter your conduct, and in future take part with the old chiefs. After you have interpreted this, you must send the answer of the Seminoles to us in writing. You must send us plainly your own sentiments, your own heart, as well as that of the Seminoles; let us know the truth, and what you and they mean to be at.

We send this by Nehethluck Emautlau, of Oketeyocenen.

MOOKLAUSAU HOPOIE to Colonel Hawkins:

I have something to say on the message to be sent to the Seminoles; it is not necessary to put it on paper for them. Efaul Haujo has appointed a young man to go with the talks of the nation, to the Seminoles. The trust is an important one, and should not depend so much on chance; he may be sick, he may die, or he may not recollect all we mean by our statement; the interpreter we address is at best a doubtful character; I will therefore add two men, accustomed to business, one of whom has travelled much, seen much, and been employed in business; those I send shall attend the Seminoles, deliver our talks, and when the Seminoles answer us, shall watch their eyes, their tongues, and lips, and every feature of the countenance, whilst they are speaking, and report to me in the square of the nation, what they have seen, what they have heard, and what they have done. After they have heard the Seminoles, my messengers are to go to St. Mark's, and report faithfully to the officer of Spain there, what we have done here, what they have seen and done with the Seminoles, according to the promise of Hopoie Yauholo, of Tuskegee, to the Governor General at New Orleans. I appoint Hopoie Yauholo, of Tuskegee, and Yaufkee Emautlau Haujo, of Auttosee.

EFAU HAUJO, to Colonel Hawkins:

You must pay ten dollars to George Cornells (Talesee Haujo) for a prisoner girl, paid by order of the chiefs. Tuskeenehau, of Tuckaubatchee, claims his horses taken at Chota, opposite Tellico; he lost them at the house of Chota Micco. We were all drinking rum, men, women, and children, and the white people came on us at day break, killed three men and one woman, and wounded several, and an old white man of the Cherokees was killed.

EFAU HAUJO, to General Wilkinson and Colonel Hawkins: I speak to you both, our white friends.

BROTHERS AND FATHERS: I now speak to you, and you will remember it. Our red brothers, sons, and friends, there are four nations of us, if we should fall out, quarrel, and dispute about any thing, you must look upon them as two children quarrelling and fighting. I am a little dubious of the Chickasaws and Choctaws; young Brown, himself, the Chickasaw messenger, he spoke what I did not like, in my presence. It may be some years before any disturbances and quarrelling may take place, or it may be more. If we should quarrel, you, our white friends and brothers, are to be neutral, and not to interfere on either side. There is, among us four nations, old customs, one of which is war. The young have grown up to manhood; if they want to practice the ways of the old people, let them try themselves at war, and when they are tired, let the Miccoes, as they all have such, interpose and stop it; we want you to let us alone. I am led to mention this to you, as Brown, when here, boasted of the power of the Chickasaws.

EFAU HAUJO to Col. Hawkins.—Mr. Barnard is our old interpreter, and we want one of his sons and his brother to settle out on this side, on the Altamaha; he, on Goose creek, near the new line. We wish the Cussetah kings and the Mad Dog to sign, and your commissioners to sign, our permission to the son of Mr. Barnard and his brother, to reside where we have named; and Mr. Barnard is to put on paper, that he will allow those who owned those lands, fifty bushels of salt, and six loads of ammunition, to be paid to the chiefs of the lower part of the nation. If you, Colonel Hawkins, wish to move out yourself, to a new place in the Upper towns, it is agreed you shall settle on your own choice. You see it yourself, that I am getting in age, and cannot do as I used to do. Now, I give it to you before all the chiefs, that my speech is, that Acheaubofau, the town where Foosahatche Micco lives, is the town for the meeting of the national council in future. I give this, that all the chiefs of the Upper and Lower towns may know where business is to be done, that they may attend to it. Now that I have spoken to you, and to the General, you are public and beloved people. When we get back, we shall have a meeting of all our chiefs. We tell you our course of business, and we shall expect you both at the national council, when you will hear from us how we are to fulfil our stipulations with you. I will let you commissioners know when we are going home; some of us are sickly, and are out some distance, and they cannot come and take you by the hand. You must not mind that; I shall take you by the hand for them.

MOOKLESAW HOPOIE to Col. Hawkins.—This Hopoie Yauholo has been at New Orleans, and the Governor General there, told him to come with the chiefs to this treaty, and carry with him the talks of this meeting to Saint Mark's.

I certify this to be a true copy from the original.

THE CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 7, 1803.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I submit, for your approbation and consent, a convention, entered into with the Choctaw nation of Indians, for ascertaining and marking the limits of the territory ceded to our nation, while under its former government, and lying between the Tombigby and Mobile rivers, on the east, and the Chickasawhay river on the west.

We are now engaged in ascertaining and marking, in like manner, the limits of the former cessions of the Choctaws, from the river Yazoo to our southern boundary, which will be the subject of another convention; and we expect to obtain, from the same nation, a new cession of lands, of considerable extent, between the Tombigby and Alabama rivers.

These several tracts of country will compose that portion of the Mississippi territory, which, so soon as certain individual claims are arranged, the United States will be free to sell and settle immediately.

January 7, 1803.

TH: JEFFERSON.

A Provisional Convention, entered into, and made, by Brigadier General James Wilkinson, of the State of Maryland, commissioner for holding conferences with the Indians, south of the Ohio river, in behalf of the United States, on the one part; and the whole Choctaw nation, by their chiefs, head-men, and principal warriors, on the other part.

For the mutual accommodation of the parties, and to perpetuate that concord and friendship which so happily subsists between them, they do hereby, freely, voluntarily, and without constraint, covenant and agree:

ARTICLE 1. That the President of the United States, may, at his discretion, by a commissioner or commissioners, to be appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, retrace, connect, and plainly re-mark the old line of limits, established by and between his Britannic Majesty and the said Choctaw nation, which begins on the left bank of the Chickasawhay river, and runs thence, in an easterly direction, to the right bank of the Tombigby river, terminating on the same at a bluff, well known by the name of Hach-a-Tig-geby; but it is to be clearly understood, that two commissioners, to be appointed by the said nation, from their own body, are to attend the commissioner or commissioners of the United States, who may be appointed to perform this service, for which purpose the said Choctaw nation shall be seasonably advised by the President of the United States, of the particular period at which the operation may be commenced; and the said Choctaw commissioners shall be subsisted by the United States, so long as they may be engaged on this business, and paid for their services, during the said term, at the rate of one dollar per day.

ARTICLE 2. The said line, when thus re-marked and re-established, shall form the boundary between the United States and the said Choctaw nation, in that quarter; and the said Choctaw nation, for, and in consideration of, one dollar, to them in hand paid, by the said United States, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby release to the said United States, and quit claim forever, to all that tract of land which is included by the before named line on the north, by the Chickasawhay river, on the west, by the Tombigby and the Mobile rivers, on the east, and by the boundary of the United States, on the south.

ARTICLE 3. The chiefs, head-men, and warriors, of the said Choctaw nation, do hereby constitute, authorize, and appoint, the chiefs and head-men of the Upper towns of the said nation, to make such alteration in the old boundary line, near the mouth of the Yazoo river, as may be found convenient, and may be done without injury to the said nation.

ARTICLE 4. This convention shall take effect and become obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall have ratified the same.

In testimony whereof, the parties have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals, at fort Confederation, on the Tombigby, in the Choctaw country, this seventeenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and two, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-seventh.

JAMES WILKINSON.

FORT CONFEDERATION,
On the Tombigby river, October 17th, 1802. }

SIR:

I have this day accomplished a provisional convention with the Choctaw nation, which I have the honor to transmit you, under cover, and I will express the hope, that it may meet the Presidential approbation. I experienced little difficulty in removing all obstacles to the re-establishment of the old boundary on the side of Natchez; and, to remedy a defect which I have discovered in Purcell's line, I prevailed on the nation to authorize the chiefs of the Upper towns, to make such alterations in it as may be found convenient and necessary. The Indian commissioners, who are to attend the re-survey, are appointed from those towns, and will, I expect, be deputed to act for them. Believing the concession between the Chickasawhay, the Tombigby, and the Mobile rivers, which includes one and a half million of acres, might prove interesting to Government at an early period (it is certainly so at this moment to our citizens, settled on that tract) I exerted my feeble faculties, and with much difficulty effected it. I perceived, at an early day, that it was essential to the successful issue of my views, to distribute, at this conference, the annuities which I brought with me from fort Stoddart to this place, and I instructed Mr. Dinsmoor, the agent, accordingly; to whose co-operation I am much indebted, as I have no assistant with me, and have been afflicted since the 24th ultimo, by a fever, which has several times changed its character, which remains unsubdued, and has greatly reduced my strength. This circumstance will, I hope, excuse me for omitting ordinary details at this time, and also for any informality which may appear on the face of the contract.

The assembly of Indians on this occasion greatly exceeds any previous conference; they number more than eighteen hundred, yet their subsistence will not amount to three hundred dollars.

The day after to-morrow, I shall mount my horse, thought illy able to keep the seat, and shall proceed for the mouth of the Yazoo. I send this letter by express to the post-office; in the Chickasaw nation, to go to you by mail from thence.

And am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JAS. WILKINSON.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

Copy of a letter to General Wilkinson, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 7, 1802.

SIR:

Your several letters, including those of the 9th and 18th ultimo, have been duly received, and yesterday, Lieutenant Macomb arrived with the treaty, &c. The information obtained from Mr. Perrell, appears to be important, and I conceive, will have a happy effect in determining the lines between the Indian nations and the United States. It is the opinion of the President, that whatever relates to the boundaries between the United States, and the Choctaws and Creeks, should be left at your discretion, with such aid as you may obtain from Colonel Hawkins; but that no sum, over and above the usual presents, be stipulated definitively, as a compensation to the Indians, as an inducement to their consenting to the lines being established, conformably to the information received from Mr. Perrell; but if any considerable sum, in addition to the usual presents, should be found absolutely necessary, you will please to ascertain their lowest terms, and let them know that the decision of Congress, and the President of the United States, will be necessary to give a full sanction to the business; but if the sum should be small, there will be but very little doubt of its being sanctioned, and that, therefore, they may consent to the lines being run and marked. It has been determined to establish a trading house in the Choctaw country, but we have been at a loss to determine on a site, that would, under all circumstances, be most useful and convenient. Will you be so obliging as to take the subject into consideration, and give me your opinion thereon. On the Tombigby, not far from the junction of the Tombigby and Alabama rivers, has been considered as a convenient place, if we could, without difficulty, navigate the river through the Spanish territory. The goods have been sent by water to New Orleans, and the factor has gone down the Ohio and Mississippi. Another trading house will be established at Chickasaw bluffs; the goods and agent are on their way; and also one at Fort Wayne and Detroit, are to be established.

I fear that the business of opening the road from Tennessee to Natchez, is progressing but slowly; you will be pleased to pay some attention to that business, if in your power.

I am, sir, respectfully, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

Copy of a letter to General James Wilkinson, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 14, 1802.

SIR:

Believing it will be found expedient to establish the trading house for the Choctaws on the Tombigby, and having written to Governor Claiborne on the subject, submitting the subject to his and your consideration, I suggested to him the probable necessity of a military guard at the store, presuming that the Indians would have no objection; but I wish your opinion on the propriety of the establishing a guard, and whether the post, on the Mobile, could, with propriety, be removed up the river, to a place suitable for a site for the store. In deciding on the most eligible place for the store, it may be proper to take into consideration a site for a military post, so as to combine both objects, in doing which, a number of circumstances will present themselves, worthy of consideration, which you will be able to examine, and give their due weight. The influence most to be apprehended, as unfavorable to our views, will probably be that of the house of Panton, and others; but, if they should take any measure hostile to the benevolent intentions of the Government, we shall have in our power to confine their trade within the Spanish boundaries, and to prohibit their going within the limits of the United States.

When you go to New Orleans, it may not be improper to mention our intentions of establishing a trading house on the Tombigby, with a view of sounding the present feelings of the government, on the subject of our navigating the Mobile. It should be taken for granted, that those rivers which empty themselves out of the United States into the ocean, through a small part of the Spanish territory, are common highways, but to be used in such a manner as not to injure our neighbors. If you discover it to be a delicate subject, you will waive it, and only intimate, that we expect not to be interrupted in supplying our posts, trading house, &c. until some arrangement shall be made between the governments on the subject; all that is wished at present is, that the disposition of the Spanish officers may be so far known, as to prevent any difficulties, until the ultimate arrangement of the governments shall be concluded.

By information received from New Orleans, it appears that the Chickasaw chief, who has been closely attached to the Spanish interest, and not very friendly to the United States, has, on a late visit to the Governor, been highly offended, and has, in his passion, relinquished a pension of five hundred dollars, which he has heretofore received annually from that Government. It may be proper to take advantage of his present disposition, and endeavor, by presents, or other means, to attach him to our interest; he is called Ugukucayabe.

Lieutenant Macomb is here, and proposes being transferred to the corps of engineers. Colonel Cushing is established at Fredericktown; Colonel Burbeck and Major Swan are on a tour to the Northward.

I am, sir, &c.

[2d SESSION.

TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 18, 1803.

and of the House of Representatives:

I enclose a report of the Secretary of War, stating the trading-houses established in the Indian territories, the progress which has been made in the course of the last year, in settling and marking boundaries with the different tribes, the purchases of lands recently made from them, and the prospect of further progress in marking boundaries, and in new extinguishments of title in the year to come; for which, some appropriations of money will be wanting.

To this I have to add, that when the Indians ceded to us the salt springs on the Wabash, they expressed a hope that we would so employ them, as to enable them to procure there the necessary supplies of salt; indeed, it would be the most proper and acceptable form in which the annuity could be paid, which we propose to give them for the cession. These springs might, at the same time, be rendered eminently serviceable to our western inhabitants, by using them as the means of counteracting the monopolies of the supplies of salt, and of reducing the price in that country to a just level. For these purposes a small appropriation would be necessary to meet the first expenses; after which, they should support themselves, and repay those advances. These springs are said to possess the advantage of being accompanied with a bed of coal.

TH: JEFFERSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 17th, 1803.

SIR:

By treaties held with the Creek and Choctaw nations of Indians, in the course of the last year, considerable tracts of land have been obtained, and there is reason to believe, that additional cessions, may be obtained on reasonable terms, from the aforementioned and other Indians, in the course of the present year.

The boundary line between the State of North Carolina and the Cherokees, has been completed, and the line between the Natchez territory and the Choctaws, is probably, by this time, established and marked in a manner, which it is presumed will be satisfactory to the United States and to the Choctaw nation.

A boundary line has also been agreed on to the tract of land on the Wabash river, including Vincennes, which will soon be run and marked; and, likewise, the lines around the two tracts on the Portage, between the head waters of the Wabash and the Miami of the lake, including fort Wayne. Some measures have been taken for ascertaining the boundaries between the Indians and the white people, on the Mississippi, commonly called the Kaskaskia settlements, below the mouth of the Illinois river, but for want of authentic documents, it will probably be necessary to resort to a new convention with the Indian nations, for establishing said boundaries, and for procuring some additional cessions, for the purpose of affording means for increasing and strengthening that distant and exposed frontier.

In addition to the two factories, or Indian trading-houses, heretofore established, it has been considered advisable to establish four others, viz: one at Detroit, one at fort Wayne, one at Chickasaw Bluffs, and one with the Choctaws. The surplus of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, appropriated by an act of Congress, of the 16th of April, 1796, and which had not been applied to the two factories, heretofore established, on the frontiers of Georgia and Tennessee, has been applied to the four other establishments recently made. From an investigation of the accounts made and reported to Congress at its last session, it was satisfactorily evident, that the funds employed prior to that period, had not been diminished, and it is confidently believed, that the sum appropriated to that object, may be employed not only without diminution, but with great advantage to the public, not in point of commercial profits, but by attaching and securing the friendship and confidence of the natives, which cannot be sufficiently relied on, while their towns and hunting camps are constantly the resort of unprincipled foreign traders, who make every exertion in their power to withdraw the confidence of the natives from the United States, and to inspire them with jealousies and unfriendly dispositions towards our frontier settlers, our public agents, and the Government. The greatest caution has been observed in selecting the agent for managing the several factories; and, in the course of another year, it is presumed that a satisfactory statement may be made of the state of the funds, and of the effects of their application.

An appropriation of ten thousand dollars,* to enable the Executive to embrace any favorable opportunity for obtaining any further cession of land from the natives, and a renewal of the act authorizing the establishment of trading-houses with the Indians, with a renewal of the appropriation for that object, is submitted to the consideration of Congress.

With respectful consideration, I am, sir, your humble servant,

H. DEARBORN.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

* This sum is in addition to the sum in the general estimate.

An extract of a letter from Matthew Ernest, Esq. collector of the district of Detroit, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated November 1st, 1802.

SIR:

I have made very strict inquiry with regard to the information you had received respecting the conduct of certain British merchants, and have had a consultation with Colonel Hamtramck on that subject, but cannot find that the report has any foundation of truth; any insinuations from them, which has come to my knowledge, was to this amount: That the United States, by establishing trading-houses in this country, and disposing of their goods to the Indians, at a reduced price, must effectually ruin them, as well as the American traders; and that they intended to close their business in the Indian country, by the first of June next, and would not, hereafter, enter any goods at the custom-house for that purpose; and as to the prohibition of vending spirituous liquors to the Indians, they one and all highly approve of the law, as the only plan which could be adopted to civilize them, and render their situations more comfortable.

[2d SESSION.]

TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 18, 1803.

and of the House of Representatives:

As the continuance of the act, for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, will be under the consideration of the Legislature, at its present session, I think it my duty to communicate the views which have guided me in the execution of that act; in order that you may decide on the policy of continuing it, in the present or any other form, or discontinue it altogether, if that shall, on the whole, seem most for the public good.

The Indian tribes, residing within the limits of the United States, have, for a considerable time, been growing more and more uneasy, at the constant diminution of the territory they occupy, although effected by their own voluntary sales; and the policy has long been gaining strength with them, of refusing, absolutely, all further sale, on any conditions; insomuch that, at this time, it hazards their friendship, and excites dangerous jealousies and perturbations in their minds, to make any overture for the purchase of the smallest portions of their land. A very few tribes, only, are not yet obstinately in these dispositions. In order, peaceably, to counteract this policy of theirs, and to provide an extension of territory, which the rapid increase of our numbers will call for, two measures are deemed expedient: First, to encourage them to abandon hunting, to apply to the raising of stock, to agriculture and domestic manufacture, and thereby prove to themselves that less land and labor will maintain them in this, better than in their former mode of living. The extensive forests, necessary in the hunting life, will then become useless, and they will see advantage in exchanging them for the means of improving their farms, and of increasing their domestic comforts. Secondly, to multiply trading houses among them, and place within their reach those things which will contribute more to their domestic comfort than the possession of extensive, but uncultivated wilds. Experience and reflection will develop to them the wisdom of exchanging what they can spare and we want, for what we can spare and they want. In leading them thus to agriculture, to manufactures, and civilization; in bringing together their and our settlements; and in preparing them ultimately to participate in the benefits of our Government; I trust, and believe, we are acting for their greatest good. At these trading houses we have pursued the principles of the act of Congress, which directs that the commerce shall be carried on liberally, and requires only that the capital stock shall not be diminished. We, consequently, undersell private traders, foreign and domestic, drive them from the competition, and thus, with the good will of the Indians, rid ourselves of a description of men who are constantly endeavoring to excite, in the Indian mind, suspicions, fears, and irritations, towards us. A letter, now enclosed, shows the effect of our competition, on the operations of the traders, while the Indians, perceiving the advantage of purchasing from us, are soliciting, generally, our establishment of trading houses among them. In one quarter this is particularly interesting. The Legislature, reflecting on the late occurrences on the Mississippi, must be sensible how desirable it is to possess a respectable breadth of country on that river, from our Southern limit to the Illinois at least; so that we may present as firm a front on that, as on our Eastern border. We possess what is below the Yazoo, and can probably acquire a certain breadth from the Illinois and Wabash to the Ohio; but, between the Ohio and Yazoo, the country all belongs to the Chickasaws, the most friendly tribe within our limits, but the most decided against the alienation of lands. The portion of their country, most important for us, is exactly that which they do not inhabit. Their settlements are not on the Mississippi, but in the interior country. They have lately shown a desire to become agricultural, and this leads to the desire of buying implements and comforts. In the strengthening and gratifying of these wants, I see the only prospect of planting on the Mississippi itself the means of its own safety. Duty has required me to submit these views to the judgment of the Legislature; but, as their disclosure might embarrass and defeat their effect, they are committed to the special confidence of the two Houses.

While the extension of the public commerce, among the Indian tribes, may deprive of that source of profit such of our citizens as are engaged in it, it might be worthy the attention of Congress, in their care of individual, as well as of the general interest, to point, in another direction, the enterprise of those citizens, as profitably for themselves, and more usefully for the public. The river Missouri, and the Indians inhabiting it, are not as well known as is rendered desirable, by their connexion with the Mississippi, and consequently with us. It is, however, understood, that the country on that river is inhabited by numerous tribes, who furnish great supplies of furs and peltry to the trade of another nation, carried on in a high latitude, through an infinite number of portages and lakes, shut up by ice through a long season. The commerce, on that line, could bear no competition with that of the Missouri, traversing a moderate climate, offering, according to the best accounts, a continued navigation from its source, and possibly, with a single portage from the Western ocean, and finding, to the Atlantic, a choice of channels through the Illinois or Wabash, the lakes and Hudson, through the Ohio and Susquehannah, or Potomac, or James rivers, and through the Tennessee and Savannah rivers. An intelligent officer, with ten or twelve chosen men, fit for the enterprise, and willing to undertake it, taken from our posts, where they may be spared without inconvenience, might explore the whole line, even to the Western ocean; have conferences with the natives, on the subject of commercial intercourse; get admission among them for our traders, as others are admitted; agree on convenient depositories, for an interchange of articles, and return, with the information acquired, in the course of two summers. Their arms and accoutrements, some instruments of observation, and light and cheap presents for the Indians, would be all the apparatus they could carry; and, with an expectation of a soldier's portion of land on their return, would constitute the whole expense. Their pay would be going on, whether here or there. While other civilized nations have encountered great expense to enlarge the boundaries of knowledge, by undertaking voyages of discovery, and for other literary purposes, in various parts and directions; our nation seems to owe to the same object, as well as to its own interest, to explore this, the only line of easy communication across the continent, and so directly traversing our own part of it. The interests of commerce place the principal object within the constitutional powers and care of Congress; and that it should, incidentally, advance the geographical knowledge of our own continent, cannot but be an additional gratification. The nation claiming the territory, regarding this as a literary pursuit, which it is in the habit of permitting within its dominions, would not be disposed to view it with jealousy, even if the expiring state of its interests there, did not render it a matter of indifference. The appropriation of two thousand five hundred dollars, "for the purpose of extending the external commerce of the United States," while understood and considered, by the Executive, as giving the legislative sanction, would cover the undertaking from notice, and prevent the obstructions which interested individuals might otherwise, previously, prepare on its way.

THE TUSCARORAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 21, 1803.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The Tuscarora Indians, having an interest in some lands within the State of North Carolina, asked the superintendance of the Government of the United States over a treaty to be held between them and the State of North Carolina, respecting these lands. William Richardson Davie was appointed a commissioner for this purpose, and a treaty was concluded under his superintendance. This, with his letter on the subject, is now laid before the Senate for their advice and consent, whether it shall be ratified.

February 21, 1803.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Articles of a Treaty between the United States of America and the Tuscarora Nation of Indians.

Whereas a large part of the Tuscarora nation of Indians reside at so remote a distance from the state of North Carolina that they are unable to derive any benefit from the lands, the use of which had been granted to the nation by the Legislature of that State, so long as they should occupy and live upon the same:

And whereas the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, in directing the use of the said lands, had heretofore permitted certain leases to be made of part thereof, and difficulties have arisen in the payment and receipt of the rents becoming due thereon:

And whereas, for the purpose of preventing any disputes that might arise respecting the future occupancy of said lands, or the direction of the use thereof, and to remove the difficulties aforesaid, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, hath appointed William Richardson Davie, of North Carolina, commissioner on the part of the United States, for the purposes aforesaid; and the said William Richardson Davie, on the part of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs, in their own names, and in behalf of the whole Tuscarora nation, have agreed to the following articles, namely:

ARTICLE 1. In consideration of the agreement, on the part of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, that they will, by certain acts of the General Assembly of said State, facilitate the collection of the rents due, or to become due, on the leases of said lands heretofore made: And on the condition that an act or acts of the General Assembly of the said State shall be passed, authorizing the said Tuscarora nation, or the chiefs thereof, in behalf of said nation, to lease, on such terms as they may deem proper, the undemised part of the lands allotted to them in the county of Bertie, in the said State, as well as other parts thereof, now under a lease, or leases, for years, so that the term or terms of the leases made of the whole, or any part thereof, may extend to the 12th day of July, which shall be in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and sixteen:

And upon condition, also, that the Legislature of the said State shall, by an act or acts, for that purpose, remove, as far as the same can be done by legislative interposition, any difficulties or disputes that might arise respecting the future occupancy of said lands, either by the Indians of the said tribe or nation of Tuscaroras, or their lessees and assigns, until the said twelfth day of July, which shall be in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and sixteen; and also declare and enact, that the occupancy and possession of the tenants, under the said leases, heretofore confirmed by act or acts of the General Assembly, and such leases as may be made under the act or acts made in pursuance of this treaty, shall be held and deemed, in all cases whatsoever, the occupancy and possession of the said Tuscarora nation, to all intents and purposes, as if they, the said nation, or the Indians thereof, or any of them, actually resided on said lands:

The undersigned chiefs, in their own names, and in behalf of the whole of the Tuscarora nation, hereby stipulate and agree, that, from and after the said twelfth day of July, which shall be in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and sixteen, all the right, interest, and claim, of the said nation, or any of the Indians thereof, by act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, or otherwise, to the use, possession, or occupancy, of a certain tract of land, allotted to them by the Legislature of the said State, situated in the county of Bertie, in the State aforesaid, bounded and described as follows, viz: Beginning at the mouth of Quitsnoy swamp, running up the said swamp four hundred and thirty poles, to a scrubby oak, near the head of said swamp, by a great spring; then north ten degrees, east eight hundred and fifty poles, to a persimmon tree, in Roquis swamp, and along the swamp and pocoson, main course north fifty-seven degrees west, two thousand six hundred and forty poles, to a hickory on the east side of the Falling run for Deep creek, and down the various courses of the said run, to Moratlock, or Roanoke river; then down the river to the first station; shall cease and determine, and shall be held and deemed extinguished for ever.

ART. 2. This treaty shall be considered as a final and permanent adjustment and settlement of all differences, disputes, and claims, between the State of North Carolina and the said Tuscarora nation of Indians, as soon as the conditions stipulated in the foregoing article shall be fulfilled on the part of the State of North Carolina, and the treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In witness of all and every thing herein contained, the said William Richardson Davie, and the undersigned chiefs, in behalf of themselves and the Tuscarora nation, have hereunto set their hands and seals.

Done at the city of Raleigh, in the State of North Carolina, on the fourth day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two.

W. R. DAVIE, [L. s.]
And a number of Indians.

HALIFAX, February 3, 1803.

SIR:

The severity of the season, and the badness of the roads, prevented my return from South Carolina to this place, before the 21st of January; and I have delayed forwarding the treaty made with the chiefs of the Tuscarora nation of Indians, until I should receive the act passed by the Legislature of North Carolina, to carry the treaty into effect. They are both herewith enclosed, and the commissioners have been appointed by the Governor, agreeably to the provisions of the said act of Assembly.

The agents of the State chose the form of the first article, as you will find it in the treaty, stipulating for the final extinguishment of the Indian claim, in preference to a cession of the lands, on the ground that the Indians had only a kind of usufructuary possession granted to them, so long as they should live upon the same; and that the legal title was, and had always been, in the State; they were substantially the same in effect, and it seems a matter of no moment to the Government of the United States, which mode was preferred.

By your letter of the 23th of December, 1801, I was informed that the President approved of the arrangement I had made in the business of the Tuscarora lands. I am happy that the benevolent views of the Government, with respect to this nation of Indians, are now completely effected; they will dispose of their lands at their real value, and a little time will also operate an extinguishment of their claim, without any expense to the State or the United States.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

W. R. DAVIE.

An act for the relief of the Tuscarora nation of Indians.

Whereas the Indians composing the Tuscarora nation, have, by their chief, Sacarusa, and others, regularly deputed and authorized, requested the concurrence of the General Assembly of the State, to enable them to lease or demise, for a number of years, the residue of their lands, situate in the county of Bertie, in such manner that the whole of the leases on said land shall terminate at the same period:

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That the said chief, Sacarusa, Longboard, and Samuel Smith, or a majority of them, be, and they are hereby, authorized to lease and to farm let the undemised residue of the lands allotted to the Tuscarora nation, in Bertie county, for a term of years, that shall expire and end when the lease made by the Tuscarora nation to Robert Jones and others, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, shall end and expire; and, also, to extend the term or terms of the leases already made or granted for a shorter term, to a term or terms which shall expire at the same time with the said lease, made in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, in such parcels, and on such rents and conditions, as may be approved by the commissioners appointed in pursuance of this act, and which may best promote the interest and convenience of the said Indian nation.

And whereas some difficulties have arisen, respecting the receipt and payment of the rents, on some of the present leases,

Be it further enacted, That the said chiefs, or a majority of them, be, and they are hereby, authorized to make such alterations, by covenant and agreement, respecting the payment and receipt of any of the rents due, or that may become due, on any of the existing leases, as the commissioners appointed in pursuance of this act, or a majority of them, shall approve.

Whereas the said Indian chiefs are ignorant of the usual forms of business, and may want advice and assistance, in transacting the business respecting their lands: For remedy whereof, and to prevent their being injured,

Be it further enacted, That the Governor shall appoint three commissioners, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect; and no lease, grant, demise, covenant, or agreement, made by said Indian chiefs, as aforesaid, respecting said lands, or the rents thereof, shall be good or valid in law, unless the same shall be approved by said commissioners, or a majority of them; and such approbation shall be expressed in writing, and annexed or endorsed on such lease, covenant, or agreement, and registered in the Register's office of the county of Bertie, together with said lease or agreement; and the said commissioners shall receive the sum of twenty-five shillings per day, for their compensation and expenses, to be paid out of the moneys received by the said chiefs, on leasing said lands.

And be it further enacted, That the occupancy and possession of the tenants, under the said leases, heretofore confirmed by act or acts of the General Assembly, and such leases as may be made under this act, shall be held and deemed, in all cases whatsoever, the occupancy and possession of the said Tuscarora nation, to all intents and purposes, as if the said nation, or the Indians thereof, or any of them, actually resided on said lands.

Whereas the said chiefs, Sacarusa, Longboard, and Samuel Smith, being duly and fully authorized and empowered by the said Tuscarora nation, have consented that the Indian claim, to the use, possession, and occupancy of said land, shall cease and be extinguished, when the said lease, made in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, to Robert Jones and others, shall expire,

Be it enacted, That, from and after the twelfth day of July, which shall be in the year one thousand nine hundred and sixteen, the whole of the lands allotted to the said Tuscarora Indians, by an act of the General Assembly, passed at Newbern, on the fifteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and forty-eight, shall revert to, and become the property of, the State, and the Indian claim thereto shall, from that time, be held and deemed forever extinguished.

And be it further enacted, That, after the said lands shall revert to the State, if the same, or any part thereof, shall be vacant, the same shall not be liable to the entry or entries of any person or persons, without an express act of the Legislature to that effect: Provided, always, That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to make any entry or entries on the said lands, after the passing of this act: Provided, always, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed so as to affect the title of any individual: Provided, nevertheless, That no lot or parcel of lands, laid off under the direction of said commissioners, shall exceed two hundred acres. And provided further, That no lease shall be made, but by public auction, of which due notice shall be given in the Halifax and Edenton newspapers.

Read three times, and ratified in General Assembly, the sixteenth day of December, Anno Domini 1802.

THE KASKASKIA AND OTHER TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, OCTOBER, 31, 1803.

To the Senate of the United States of America:

I now lay before you the treaty, mentioned in my general message at the opening of the session, as having been concluded with the Kaskaskia Indians, for the transfer of their country to us, under certain reservations and conditions.

Progress having been made in the demarcation of Indian boundaries, I am now able to communicate to you, a treaty with the Delawares, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Miamies, Eel Rivers, Weas, Kickapoos, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias, establishing the boundaries of the territory around St. Vincennes.

Also, a supplementary treaty with the Eel rivers, Wyandots, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias, and Kickapoos, in confirmation of the fourth article of the preceding treaty.

Also, a treaty with the Choctaws, describing and establishing our demarcation of boundaries with them.

Which several treaties are accompanied by the papers relating to them, and are now submitted to the Senate for consideration whether they will advise and consent to their ratification.

TH: JEFFERSON.

October 31, 1803.

Articles of a Treaty made at Vincennes, in the Indiana territory, between William Henry Harrison, Governor of the said territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States for concluding any treaty or treaties which may be found necessary, with any of the Indian tribes northwest of the river Ohio, of the one part; and the head chiefs and warriors of the Kaskaskia tribe of Indians, so called, (but which tribe is the remains and rightfully represent all the tribes of the Illinois Indians, originally called the Kaskaskia, Mitchigamia, Cahokia, and Tamoria,) of the other part.

ARTICLE. 1. Whereas, from a variety of unfortunate circumstances, the several tribes of Illinois Indians are reduced to a very small number, the remains of which have been long consolidated and known by the name of the Kaskaskia tribe, and finding themselves unable to occupy the extensive tract of country, which of right belongs to them, and which was possessed by their ancestors for many generations: the chiefs and warriors of the said tribe being also desirous of procuring the means of improvement in the arts of civilized life, and a more certain and effectual support for their women and children, have, for the considerations hereinafter mentioned, relinquished, and, by these presents, do relinquish, and cede to the United States, all the lands in the Illinois country, which the said tribe has heretofore possessed, or which they may rightfully claim; reserving to themselves, however, the tract of about three hundred and fifty acres, near the town of Kaskaskia, which they have always held, and which was secured to them by the act of Congress of the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety one; and also the right of locating one other tract of twelve hundred and eighty acres, within the bounds of that now ceded; which two tracts of land shall remain to them for ever.

ART. 2. The United States will take the Kaskaskia tribe under their immediate care and patronage, and will afford them a protection as effectual, against the other Indian tribes, and against all other persons whatever, as is enjoyed by their own citizens. And the said Kaskaskia tribe do hereby engage to refrain from making war, or giving any insult or offence, to any other Indian tribe, or to any foreign nation, without having first obtained the approbation and consent of the United States.

ART. 3. The annuity heretofore given by the United States to the said tribe, shall be increased to one thousand dollars, which is to be paid to them, either in money, merchandise, provisions, or domestic animals, at the option of the said tribe; and when the said annuity, or any part thereof, is paid in merchandise, it is to be delivered to them either at Vincennes, Fort Massac, or Kaskaskia, and the first cost of the goods in the sea port where they may be procured, is alone to be charged to the said tribe, free from the cost of transportation, or any other contingent expense. Whenever the said tribe may choose to receive money, provisions, or domestic animals, for the whole or in part of the said annuity, the same shall be delivered at the town of Kaskaskia. The United States will also cause to be built, a house suitable for the accommodation of the chief of the said tribe, and will enclose for their use a field, not exceeding one hundred acres, with a good and sufficient fence. And whereas the greater part of the said tribe have been baptised and received into the Catholic church, to which they are much attached, the United States will give, annually, for seven years, one hundred dollars towards the support of a priest of that religion, who will engage to perform for said tribe the duties of his office, and also to instruct as many of their children as possible, in the rudiments of literature. And the United States will further give the sum of three hundred dollars, to assist the said tribe in the erection of a church. The stipulations made in this and the preceding article, together with the sum of five hundred and eighty dollars, which is now paid, or assured to be paid, for the said tribe, for the purpose of procuring some necessary articles, and to relieve them from debts which they have heretofore contracted, is considered as a full and ample compensation for the relinquishment made to the United States, in the first article.

ART. 4. The United States reserve to themselves the right, at any future period, of dividing the annuity now promised to the said tribe, amongst the several families thereof, reserving always a suitable sum for the great chief and his family.

ART. 5. And to the end that the United States may be enabled to fix, with the other Indian tribes, a boundary between their respective claims, the chiefs and head warriors of the said Kaskaskia tribe do hereby declare that their rightful claim is as follows, viz: Beginning at the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi; thence up the Ohio to the mouth of the Saline creek, about twelve miles below the mouth of the Wabash; thence along the dividing ridge, between the said creek and the Wabash, until it comes to the general dividing ridge, between the waters which fall into the Wabash, and those which fall into the Kaskaskia river; and thence along the said ridge until it reaches the waters which fall into the Illinois river; thence in a direct course to the mouth of the Illinois river; and thence down the Mississippi to the beginning.

ART. 6. As long as the lands which have been ceded by this treaty shall continue to be the property of the United States, the said tribe shall have the privilege of living and hunting upon them, in the same manner that they have hitherto done.

ART. 7. This treaty is to be in force, and binding upon the said parties, so soon as it shall be ratified by the President and Senate of the United States.

In witness whereof, the said commissioner plenipotentiary, and the head chiefs and warriors of the said Kaskaskia tribe of Indians, have hereunto set their hands, and affixed their seals, the thirteenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and three, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

WM. HENRY HARRISON.

[Signed, also, by certain chiefs and warriors.]

Articles of a Treaty made at fort Wayne, on the Miami of the lake, between William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and Commissioner Plenipotentiary of the United States, for concluding any treaty or treaties, which may be found necessary, with any of the Indian tribes, northwest of the Ohio, of the one part; and the tribes of Indians, called the Delawares, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Miamies, and Kickapoos, by their chiefs and head warriors, and those of the Eel river, Weas, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias, by their agents and representatives, Tuthinipee Winnemac, Richerville, and Little Turtle, who are properly authorized by the said tribes, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. Whereas it is declared, by the 4th article of the treaty of Greenville, that the United States reserve for their use the post of St. Vincennes, and all the lands adjacent, to which the Indian titles had been extinguished: And whereas it has been found difficult to determine the precise limits of the said tract, as held by the French and British Governments, it is hereby agreed, that the boundaries of the said tract shall be as follow: Beginning at Point Coupee, on the Wabash, and running thence, by a line north, seventy-eight degrees west, twelve miles; thence by a line, parallel to the general course of the Wabash, until it shall be intersected by a line at right angles to the same, passing through the mouth of White river; thence by the last mentioned line, across the Wabash, and towards the Ohio, seventy-two miles; thence by a line north, twelve degrees, west until it shall be intersected by a line at right angles to the same, passing through Point Coupee, and by the last mentioned line, to the place of beginning.

ART. 2. The United States hereby relinquish all claim which they may have had to any land adjoining to, or in the neighborhood of, the tract above described.

ART. 3. As a mark of their regard and attachment to the United States, whom they acknowledge for their only friends and protectors, and for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, the said tribes do hereby relinquish and cede to the United States the great salt spring, upon the Saline creek, which falls into the Ohio, below the mouth of the Wabash, with a quantity of land surrounding it, not exceeding four miles square, and which may be laid off in a square or oblong, as the one or the other may be found most convenient to the United States. And the said United States, being desirous that the Indian tribes should participate in the benefits to be derived from the said spring, hereby engage to deliver yearly, and every year, for the use of the said Indians, a quantity of salt, not exceeding one hundred and fifty bushels, and which shall be divided among the several tribes, in such manner as the general council of the chiefs may determine.

ART. 4. For the considerations before mentioned, and for the convenience which the said tribes will themselves derive from such establishments, it is hereby agreed, that, as soon as the tribes called the Kickapoos, Eel river, Weas, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias, shall give their consent to the measure, the United States shall have the right of locating three tracts of land, of such size as may be agreed upon with the last mentioned tribes, on the main road, between Vincennes and Kaskaskias, and one other between Vincennes and Clarksville, for the purpose of erecting houses of entertainment for the accommodation of travellers. But it is expressly understood, that, if the said locations are made on any of the rivers which cross the said road, and ferries should be established on the same, that, in times of high water, any Indian or Indians belonging to either of the tribes who are parties to this treaty, shall have the privilege of crossing such ferry toll free.

ART. 5. Whereas there is reason to believe, that, if the boundary lines of the tract, described in the first article, should be run in the manner therein directed, that some of the settlements and locations of land, made by the citizens of the United States, will fall in the Indian country, it is hereby agreed that such alterations shall be made in the direction of these lines as will include them; and a quantity of land, equal in quantity to what may be thus taken, shall be given to the said tribes, either at the east or the west end of the tract.

In testimony whereof, the commissioner of the United States, and the chiefs and warriors of the Delawares, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Miamies, and Kickapoos, and those of the Eel river, Weas, Piankeshaws, and Kaskaskias, by their agents and representatives, Tuthinipee, Winnemac, Richerville, and the Little Turtle, who are properly authorized by the said tribes, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals, at fort Wayne, this seventh day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and three, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-seventh.

WM. HENRY HARRISON.

[Signed, also, by certain chiefs and warriors of the nations enumerated in the title.]

A Treaty between the United States of America and the Indian nations called Eel River, Wyandot, Piankeshaw, and Kaskaskia, and the tribe of the Kickapoos, by their representatives, the chiefs of the Eel River nation, made and concluded at Vincennes.

At a council holden at Vincennes, on the seventh day of August, one thousand eight hundred and three, under the direction of William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States, for concluding any treaty, or treaties, which may be found necessary, with any of the Indian nations, northwest of the river Ohio; at which were present, the chiefs and warriors of the Eel River, Wyandot, Piankeshaw, and Kaskaskia nations, and also the tribe of the Kickapoos, by their representatives, the chiefs of the Eel River nation:

The fourth article of the treaty, holden and concluded at fort Wayne, on the seventh day of June, one thousand eight hundred and three, being considered, the chiefs and warriors of the said nations give their free and full consent to the same, and they do, hereby, relinquish and confirm to the United States, the privilege and right of locating three several tracts of land, of one mile square each, on the road leading from Vincennes to Kaskaskia; and, also, one other tract of land, of one mile square, on the road leading from Vincennes to Clarksville; which locations shall be made in such places, on the aforesaid roads, as shall best comport with the convenience and interests of the United States, in the establishment of houses of entertainment, for the accommodation of travellers.

In witness whereof, the said William Henry Harrison, and the said chiefs and warriors of the before mentioned nations and tribes of Indians, have hereunto set their hands, and affixed their seals, the day and year first above written.

[Signed also by certain chiefs and warriors of the nations enumerated in the title.]

A treaty of demarcation and cession, between the United States of America and the Choctaw tribe of Indians, concluded conformably to the convention of fort Confederation, by the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States, and the agents and representatives of the said Indian tribe, at Hoe-buck-in-too-pa.

To whom these presents shall come: Know ye, that the undersigned, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, of the one part, and of the whole Choctaw nation, of the other part, being duly authorized by the President of the United States, and by chiefs and head-men of the said nation, do hereby establish, in conformity to the convention of fort Confederation, for the line of demarcation recognised in the said convention, the following metes and bounds, viz: Beginning in the channel of the Hatchee-Come-sa, or Wax river, at the point where the line of limits between the United States and Spain crosseth the same; thence, up the channel of said river, to the confluence of the Chickasawhay, and Buck-ha-tanee rivers; thence, up the channel of the Buck-ha-tanee, to Bogue-hooma, or Red creek; thence, up the said creek to a pine tree, standing on the left bank of the same, and blazed on two of its sides, about twelve links southwest of an old trading path, leading from the town of Mobile to the Hewhannee towns, much worn, but not in use at the present time. From this tree, we find the following bearings and distances, viz: South fifty-four degrees thirty minutes, west one chain one link, a black gum; north thirty-nine degrees, east one chain seventy-five links, a water oak; thence, with the old British line of partition, in its various inflections, to a mulberry post, planted on the right bank of the main branch of Sintee Bouge, or Snake creek, where it makes a sharp turn to the southeast, a large broken-top cypress tree standing near the opposite bank of the creek, which is about three poles wide; thence, down the said creek to the Tombigby river; thence, down the Tombigby and Mobile rivers, to the abovementioned line of limits, between the United States and Spain, and, with the same, to the point of beginning. And we, the said commissioners plenipotentiary, do ratify and confirm the said line of demarcation, and do recognise and acknowledge the same to be the boundary which shall separate and distinguish the land ceded to the United States, between the Tombigby, Mobile, and Pascagoula rivers, from that which has not been ceded by the said Choctaw nation.

In testimony whereof, we hereunto affix our hands and seals, this 31st day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and three, to triplicates of this tenor and date.

Done at Hoe-buck-in-too-pa, the day and year above written, and in the twenty-seventh year of the independence of the United States.

We, the commissioners of the Choctaw nation, duly appointed, and the chiefs of the said nation who reside on the Tombigby river, next to Sintee Bogue, do acknowledge to have received from the United States of America, by the hands of Brigadier General James Wilkinson, as a consideration in full for the confirmation of the above concession, the following articles, viz: Fifteen pieces of strouds, three rifles, one hundred and fifty blankets, two hundred and fifty pounds of powder, two hundred and fifty pounds of lead, one bridle, one man's saddle, and one black silk handkerchief.

THE DELAWARES AND PIANKESHAW.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 19, 1804.

To the Senate of the United States:

I now lay before you a treaty entered into on the 18th day of August of the present year, between the United States on the one part, and the Delaware Indians on the other, for the extinguishment of their title to a tract of country between the Ohio and the Wabash rivers; and another, of the 27th day of the same month, between the United States and the Piankeshaws, for a confirmation of the same by the latter, together with a letter from Governor Harrison, on the same subject; which treaties are submitted for your advice and consent.

TH. JEFFERSON.

November 15, 1804.

A Treaty between the United States of America and the Delaware tribe of Indians, concluded at Vincennes, the 18th day of August, 1804.

The Delaware tribe of Indians, finding that the annuity which they receive from the United States is not sufficient to supply them with the articles which are necessary for their comfort and convenience, and afford the means of introducing amongst them the arts of civilized life; and being convinced that the extensiveness of the country they possess, by giving an opportunity to their hunting parties to ramble to a great distance from their towns, is the principal means of retarding this desirable event: and the United States being desirous to connect their settlements on the Wabash with the State of Kentucky:

Therefore, the United States, by William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and their Commissioner Plenipotentiary for treating with the Indian tribes northwest of the Ohio river; and the said tribe of Indians, by their sachems, chiefs, and head-warriors, have agreed to the following articles, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be binding on the said parties.

ARTICLE 1. The said Delaware tribe, for the considerations hereinafter mentioned, relinquishes to the United States, forever, all their right and title to the tract of country, which lies between the Ohio and Wabash rivers, and below the tract ceded by the treaty of fort Wayne, and the road leading from Vincennes to the falls of Ohio.

ARTICLE 2. The said tribe shall receive from the United States, for ten years, an additional annuity of three hundred dollars, which is to be exclusively appropriated to the purpose of ameliorating their condition, and promoting their civilization. Suitable persons shall be employed, at the expense of the United States, to teach them to make fences, cultivate the earth, and such of the domestic arts as are adapted to their situation; and a further sum of three hundred dollars shall be appropriated, annually, for five years, to this object. The United States will cause to be delivered to them, in the course of the next spring, horses fit for draught, cattle, hogs, and implements of husbandry, to the amount of four hundred dollars. The preceding stipulations, together with goods to the amount of eight hundred dollars, which is now delivered to the said tribe, (a part of which is to be appropriated to the satisfying certain individuals of the said tribe, whose horses have been taken by white people) is to be considered as full compensation for the relinquishment made in the first article.

ARTICLE 3. As there is great reason to believe that there are now in the possession of the said tribe, several horses, which have been stolen from citizens of the United States, the chiefs who represent the said tribe are to use their utmost endeavors to have the said horses forthwith delivered to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, or such persons as he may appoint to receive them. And, as the United States can place the utmost reliance on the honor and integrity of those chiefs who have manifested a punctilious regard to the engagements, entered into at the treaty of Greenville, it is agreed that, in relation to such of the horses stolen as aforesaid, but which have died or been removed beyond the reach of the chiefs, the United States will compensate the owners for the loss of them, without deducting from the annuity of the said tribe the amount of what may be paid in this way. But it is expressly understood, that this provision is not to extend to any horses which have been stolen within the course of twelve months preceding the date hereof.

ARTICLE 4. The said tribe having exhibited to the above named commissioner of the United States, sufficient proof of their right to all the country which lies between the Ohio and White river; and the Miami tribe, who were the original proprietors of the upper part of that country, having explicitly acknowledged the title of the Delawares, at the general council held at fort Wayne, in the month of June, one thousand eight hundred and three, the said United States will, in future, consider the Delawares as the rightful owners of all the country which is bounded by the White river, on the north, the Ohio on the south, the general boundary line running from the mouth of the Kentucky river, on the east, and the tract ceded by this treaty, and that ceded by the treaty of fort Wayne, on the west and southwest.

ARTICLE 5. As the Piankeshaw tribe have hitherto obstinately persisted in refusing to recognise the title of the Delawares to the tract of country ceded by this treaty, the United States will negotiate with them, and will endeavor to settle the matter in an amicable way; but, should they reject the propositions that may be made to them on this subject, and should the United States not think proper to take possession of the said country, without their consent, the stipulations and promises herein made, on behalf of the United States, shall be null and void.

ARTICLE 6. As the road from Vincennes to Clark's grant will form a very inconvenient boundary, and as it is the intention of the parties to these presents, that the whole of the said road shall be within the tract ceded to the United States, it is agreed, that the boundary in that quarter, shall be a straight line, to be drawn parallel to the course of the said road, from the eastern boundary of the tract ceded by the treaty of fort Wayne, to Clark's grant, but the said line is not to pass at a greater distance than half a mile from the most northerly bend of said road.

In witness whereof, the commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States, and the chiefs and head-men of the said tribe, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

Done at Vincennes, the eighteenth day of August, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-ninth.

A Treaty between the United States of America and the Piankeshaw tribe of Indians, concluded at Vincennes, on the twenty-seventh day of August, 1804.

The President of the United States, by William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana territory, superintendent of Indian affairs, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States for concluding any treaty or treaties, which may be found necessary with any of the Indian tribes, northwest of the river Ohio; and the chiefs and head-men of the Piankeshaw tribe, have agreed to the following articles; which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be binding upon the said parties.

ARTICLE 1. The Piankeshaw tribe relinquishes and cedes to the United States forever, all that tract of country which lies between the Ohio and the Wabash rivers, and below Clark's grant and the tract called the Vincennes tract, which was ceded by the treaty of fort Wayne, and a line connecting the said tract and grant, to be drawn parallel to the general course of the road leading from Vincennes to the falls of the Ohio, so as not to pass more than half a mile to the northward of the most northerly bend of the said road.

ART. 2. The Piankeshaw tribe acknowledges explicitly the right of the Kaskaskia tribe to sell the country which they have lately ceded to the United States, and which is separated from the lands of the Piankeshaws by the ridge or highland which divides the waters of the Wabash from the waters of the Saline creek; and by that which divides the waters of the said Wabash from those which flow into the Au-Vase and other branches of the Mississippi.

ART. 3. An additional annuity, of two hundred dollars, shall be paid by the United States to the said tribe, for ten years, in money, merchandise, provisions, or domestic animals, and implements of husbandry, at the option of the said tribe; and this annuity, together with goods to the value of seven hundred dollars, which are now delivered to them by the commissioner of the United States, is considered as a full compensation for the above mentioned relinquishment.

ART. 4. The United States reserve to themselves the right of dividing the whole annuity, which they pay to the said tribe, amongst the families which compose the same; allowing, always, a due proportion for the chiefs. And the said chiefs, whenever the President of the United States may require it, shall, upon proper notice being given, assemble their tribe for the purpose of effecting this arrangement.

In witness whereof, the commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States, and the chiefs and head-men of the said tribe, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

Done at Vincennes, in the Indiana territory, the twenty-seventh day of August, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-ninth.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 14, 1804.

To the Senate of the United States:

I present, for your advice, a treaty entered into, on behalf of the United States, with the Creek Indians, for the extinguishment of their right in certain lands in the forks of Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, within the State of Georgia. For the purpose of enabling you to form a satisfactory judgment on the subject, it is accompanied with the instructions of one thousand eight hundred and two, April 13th, to James Wilkinson, Benjamin Hawkins, and Andrew Pickens, commissioners; those of one thousand eight hundred and three, May 5th, to James Wilkinson, Benjamin Hawkins, and Robert Anderson, commissioners; and those of one thousand eight hundred and four, April 2d, to Benjamin Hawkins, sole commissioner. The negotiations for obtaining the whole of the lands, between the Oconee and Oakmulgee, have now been continued through three successive seasons, under the original instructions, and others supplementary to them, given from time to time, as circumstances required; and the unity of the negotiation has been preserved, not only by the subject, but by continuing Colonel Hawkins always one of the commissioners, and, latterly, the sole one. The extent of the cession to be obtained being uncertain, the limitation of price was what should be thought reasonable, according to the usual rate of compensation. The commissioner has been induced to go beyond this limit, probably by the just attention due to the strong interest which the State of Georgia feels in making this particular acquisition, and by a despair of procuring it on more reasonable terms, from a tribe which is one of the most fixed in the policy of holding fast their lands. To this may be added, that, if, by an alteration in the first article, instead of giving them stock, which may be passed into other hands, and render them the prey of speculators, an annuity shall be paid them in this case, as has hitherto been practised in all similar cases, the price of these lands will become a pledge and guarantee for our future peace with this important tribe, and, eventually, an indemnity for the breach of it. On the whole, I rest with entire satisfaction on the wisdom and counsel of those whose sanctions the constitution has rendered necessary to the final validity of this act.

TH. JEFFERSON.

December 13th, 1804.

A Treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Creek nation of Indians.

The parties being desirous of establishing some friendly arrangements, in addition to the treaties subsisting between them, the undersigned, Benjamin Hawkins, being authorized thereto, by the President of the United State, and Hopoie Micco, the speaker, and select men of the Creek nation, being authorized thereto by the said nation, have agreed to the following:

ARTICLE 1. The Creek nation, for the consideration hereinafter expressed, have, and by these presents do, sell and deliver to the United States, all that tract of land lying and being within the following bounds: Beginning at the High shoals of Apalachy, and running thence, in a direct line, to the mouth of Ulcofauhatchee, (the first fork of Oakmulgee, above the seven islands); thence down the middle of Oakmulgee, to the Oconee, and up the same, and the line of the treaty of fort Wilkinson, to the beginning, saving and reserving all the islands in the Oakmulgee, and a tract of land four miles in length, and two in width, bordering on the river, to include the Oakmulgee old fields, bounded as follows: To begin on the river, two miles above the mouth of Ookchoncoolgau, in a straight line; thence running at right angles with the same, two miles; thence, at right angles, down the river, four miles; thence at right angles to the river, and up the same, to the beginning. In full consideration for the lands aforesaid, the United States shall furnish, for the use of the Creek nation, two sets of blacksmith's tools, and smiths, and strikers, for ten years; shall extend the time of those promised at fort Wilkinson, from three to ten years; and pay to the said nation two hundred thousand dollars in stock, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable half yearly, at the factory of the United States, on the frontiers of the State of Georgia. The stock created, pursuant to this agreement, shall be to the Secretary of War, for the time being, in trust for the Creek nation.

ART. 2. The land reserved in the first article, including the Oakmulgee old fields, is hereby set apart for the purpose of a trading establishment, so long as the President of the United States may deem such an one necessary, to be laid off by, and to be under the direction of, the agent for Indian affairs, in the Creek department, until the President take order in the premises, which he is hereby authorized to do.

ART. 3. The President may cause the line to be run from the High shoals of Apalachy, to the mouth of Ulcofauhatchee, at such time and manner as he may deem proper; and this treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice of their Senate.

Done at the agency, near Flint river, this third of November, 1804.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

[Signed by Hopoie Micco, and other Indians.]

Hopoie Micco to Benjamin Hawkins.

You are the agent for the President; you have been long in our land doing good for us; you are an old chief among us; we appoint you our agent, to see justice done us in our affairs, as well as the white people. The tract of land at the Oakmulgee old field is ours; we have reserved it for a place to meet and trade with our white friends; and we want you to see justice done to our merchants and traders, and ourselves, as well at that place, as in the nation, and to take the direction of every thing then, for the benefit of both parties, in such way as you may think best; and I wish you to put this in the treaty this day concluded, that the President may see it.

FLINT RIVER, in the Creek Agency, 3d November, 1804.

In the communication made to you, through General Meriwether, you will see Hopoie Micco's talk to me, and my reply. He came to me here on foot, being unable, from sores, to ride, and the most distinguished chiefs of the opposition met him. He stated to me, "that, from his indisposition, and the sickness or death of some of those appointed to go on with him to the President, he was under the necessity of postponing the fulfilment of the promise made by the nation to General Meriwether and me, on this head, till some time next year. He thought then, notwithstanding the continued hostility towards our views, if the United States could allow them the value for the lands beyond Oakmulgee, he would make the greatest part of that river the boundary: that he understood from some of his people, who had been to the Northwest, the United States sold their land at two dollars per acre; and if they would buy his, and give him enough to pay all the debts of the nation, and something for every town, for ever, he would then bring the chiefs to accommodate the views of the President, on this point. He understood well what was said to them in the name of the President, at Tuckaubatchee, and was very desirous of doing what might be agreeable to him; but his nation were yet in the dark, and foolish; and that, of all things, this of land selling was the most disagreeable to an Indian."

I replied, I saw his situation as well as he did himself, and no one regretted more than I did, the divisions among them, and the necessity he was under of postponing his visit to the President till the next year: but as the opposition chiefs were present, and several of those appointed to go on from the Lower towns to the President, and I had authority, I would begin with him, and them, and see if we could agree on Oakmulgee as the boundary, and adjust every thing submitted to them at Tuckaubatchee. He acquiesced in the experiment, but doubted of success in the face of the opposition. In the evening I commenced the conference in like manner as at Tuckaubatchee, recapitulated every thing said there, and enforced it with such observations as occurred, and were suitable to the occasion. The opposition commenced, and continued to oppose, with all the arguments as well as rudeness in their power. After several days spent in this way, the speaker asked me if I could pay their debts, and allow them about five hundred dollars per annum, for each of the towns in the nation; that, if I could, he would mention it, and begin a speech in favor of it, as the opposition had now tired themselves. I replied, the sum was greatly beyond what he had a right to expect, the debts being one hundred thousand dollars at least, and the annuity eighteen thousand five hundred dollars. That the annuity was much more than I contemplated offering, and that we must take in view, whenever we talk on this subject, the expense the United States were under in assisting and protecting us, and the real value to us in the use we made of these lands. He replied, "some of them know the value of lands, as well as the obligation they were under to the United States; and, under this impression, they had given the lands at fort Wilkinson. All the Indians had an equal right; and in future, whenever land was sold, all would expect to receive something: that the opposition had been in conference with the clerks of Mr. Forbes, on a like subject, and he believed they had bargained for the lands below Flint river, as far as they could, without his aid; that he should oppose this; but, if they succeeded, our debts would be less here." I told him, to make an end of this land selling, if he would bring his mind to make Oakmulgee in its whole extent the boundary, and a new one from that river to Ocafincou, I would then offer them the value, and to let the chiefs in the conference know my intention on this subject.

After a day or two he told me, I might get Oakmulgee in part for its value as he stated, but they were determined not to go to its source, as it would give bad neighbors to their friends the Cherokees. I asked him if he preferred a sum in hand to an annuity. He said the annuity was what he wanted. If he chose, he could pay his debts with it, or keep it, and pay them in some other way. But if I got this land, I must put off the road, and every thing else, to the next meeting of the nation, and he would do what he could then; and if he got his affairs right, he would visit the President; but, I must bring my mind to be satisfied with the lands from the High shoals to Oakmulgee, and down that river, as no more could now be obtained. The opposition would join, and sign with us, if I would give for it what he asked. I told him what he asked was too much; that I would give him six thousand dollars per annum, for all Oakmulgee, and the line I had mentioned below, and to name this in the conference. The day after, he stated to me, I could get no more than he had marked out, at any price; and the price for this was five hundred dollars, to each town, forever, and the payment of the debts due after the discharge of such in contemplation at the sale to Mr. Forbes: that I knew the country and its value, and if I would take it at their offer, it was well; if not, they would see me again in the summer; that they should adjourn to-morrow, and some of them were going this evening; I replied that they must come down to a reasonable price, and I would close with them, but what they asked was out of all bounds: they persisted to the moment of departure, when I offered the sum mentioned in the treaty, and told them expressly, that it was not unlikely it would not be ratified, and we should have the whole subject before us again; upon this we agreed, and I drew the treaty.

I attempted the placing of the factory on this side of Oakmulgee, but they opposed, as they did the water line dividing the islands, and they urged to the last, that I should insert an article to have the trading district under the government of the agent, as it was Indian lands. I told them I could not, but the agent should govern it until the President took order. The speaker said he would agree to this, if I would put his talk on the back of the treaty, that the President might see it. This I agreed to, and we signed.

I believe several of the gentlemen with you from Georgia, were acquainted with these lands. We have acquired somewhat more than two millions of acres, half of which is unquestionably the best land in this country. I have done the best I could in this transaction, and I believe a delay to another year would not have benefitted us, and it would have greatly inconvenienced the views of Georgia, who have an undoubted right to these lands, whenever they can be obtained at a reasonable price, and the one given, in my opinion, is far from being unreasonable.

The speaker told me that, as soon as the treaty was ratified, and he informed of it, I must allow him ninety days to see what he could do to collect and restore the negroes in the agency, belonging to Georgia, and that, within this time, he would do all he could on this head.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJA. HAWKINS.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 5th, 1803.

GENTLEMEN:

You having been appointed by the President of the United States, as commissioners, to treat jointly, or any two of you, with such chiefs or head-men of the Creek nation as may be deputed by that nation for the purpose, you will please take the necessary measures, as early as practicable, for obtaining a meeting of the chiefs and head-men of said nation with yourselves, at some suitable place within their settlements, as early in July next as circumstances will permit.

The object of the proposed treaty is to procure from the Creek nation a cession of such part of the land lying between the rivers Oconee and Oakmulgee, as they can be prevailed on to relinquish their title to. But your more particular attention will be pointed to the tract, which lies between the Oakmulgee and the westerly boundary of the cession made by the Creeks, in the treaty held in July, one thousand eight hundred and two, at fort Wilkinson.

The importance of establishing a strong natural boundary, between the white people and the Creeks, and affording to the United States a convenient site for a military post and factory, with the advantage of transportation by a navigable river, are too obvious to require enforcing by additional remarks. You will therefore perceive the propriety and necessity of every possible exertion on your part, to convince the chiefs and head-men of the propriety and use, as well to themselves as to the United States, of making the cession, on such fair and reasonable terms as shall be mutually agreed on.

The sum to be given must, from the nature of the business, principally depend on your judgment and discretion. Twelve thousand dollars will be lodged in the Bank of Georgia, and two thousand dollars in the hands of Mr. Halstead, agent of the United States at fort Wilkinson, who will likewise be directed to furnish you with goods from the factory, to the amount of three thousand dollars, if found necessary; which sums will be at your disposal, for paying the Creeks for such cessions as you may obtain, and for the expenses attending the treaty. You will determine whether specie, in silver or goods, will be the most pleasing to the Indians, and make any payment stipulated by treaty accordingly.

It may not be improper to observe, that thirty thousand dollars is the amount of the appropriations for meeting the demands, arising from treaties with the several Indian nations; and as some part thereof may be necessary for objects other than what may relate to cessions made by the Creeks. You will perceive the necessity of confining your positive stipulations within such reasonable limits as will not exceed the appropriations, after deducting a reasonable proportion of the fund for other objects; but, if the Creeks should discover a disposition to make so extensive a cession as would, at the usual rate of compensation, require a sum beyond the foregoing limits, it will be necessary to stipulate conditionally for the payment of such extra sum, as it must depend on the will of Congress.

An annual stipend, as part compensation for any cession you may obtain, would be preferable to payment of the whole sum at one time.

I am, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

Gen. JAMES WILKINSON,
Col. BENJ. HAWKINS, and
ROBERT ANDERSON, Esquire.

The Secretary of War to General Wilkinson, Benjamin Hawkins, and Andrew Pickens, Commissioners, &c.

GENTLEMEN: A successful issue to your negotiations with the Creek nation, is so highly interesting to the United States, and the State of Georgia, that you will pardon me for exhorting you to an ardent application of those talents, you so eminently possess, in calling into your service all the fair means in your power, for rendering the most favorable result.

The first object of your negotiation is, the obtaining from the Creeks a cession of the tract of country called Tallassee county, bounded as follows, viz: Beginning at the junction of the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers; thence, running in such a southerly direction as will intersect the extreme source of St. Mary's river; thence, down the said river to the old line; thence, by the said old line to the river Altamaha; thence, up the said river, to the first mentioned bounds. For this tract, it is presumed that the Creeks will not expect a large compensation, they having once sold it to the State of Georgia, and received payment in full for it. Ten thousand dollars, with an annuity of one thousand five hundred dollars, will probably be sufficient.

The second object is, the purchase of the Indian title to that tract of land, situate between the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, called the Oakmulgee fork, bounded as follows, viz: beginning at the junction of the Oakmulgee with the Oconee, and extending northward, including the whole of the lands between the two rivers, to fort Wilkinson, on the Oconee, or as far as the Creeks will consent to cede; if facility can be given to the obtaining of this highly important object, by relinquishing that part of Tallassee county, to the westward of a line to be drawn from the mouth of Kettle creek, near the mouth of the Oakmulgee, to the St. Mary's river, at the southern extremity of the great Akinfonoka swamp, you will consider yourselves authorized to make such a compromise, but no part of the Tallassee tract is to be relinquished, if the other object can otherwise be obtained on reasonable terms. The northern boundaries of the Oakmulgee tract must be governed by circumstances and your own discretion. If the purchase can be extended to fort Wilkinson, or the Indian path which crosses the Oconee, a little below the fort, making the path leading from thence to the Buzzard roost the northern boundary line between the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, it may not be prudent to urge a further extension at present. For which tract, bounded as above, you will be authorized to engage the payment of twenty-five thousand dollars, and an annuity of two thousand; but, if this tract can only be obtained by relinquishing a large part of the Tallassee tract, you will make such deductions from the sums, collectively, as may, in your judgment, be proper.

Mr. Jonathan Halstead, agent at the factory, will furnish the necessary provisions and other accommodations for yourselves, and for the Indians who may attend the treaty. The furnishing of any spirits, or not, to the Indians, will be left to your discretion and directions.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this 12th April, 1804.

To Brig. Gen. JAMES WILKINSON, &c.

Commissioners for treating with certain nations of Indians south of the Ohio.

H. DEARBORN.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 2d, 1804.

SIR:

The Governor of Georgia having requested that an effort should be made with the Creeks, at their council, proposed to be held in May next, to obtain a further cession of land between the Oconee and Oakmulgee, or in Tallassee county, the President of the United States has thought proper to direct, that you, with the aid of General David Meriwether, (who is directed to meet you at said council) should make every reasonable and prudent exertion, in your power, to obtain from the Creeks such further cession of lands, for the accommodation of the State of Georgia, as the Creeks can be induced to give up, on such terms as may be considered reasonable.

To enable you to meet any expense, or to make such payments as may be stipulated, I have written to the cashier of the Bank of Savannah, (Georgia) to answer your drafts for a sum not exceeding, in the whole, twelve thousand dollars. If you shall be so fortunate as to obtain such cession as shall ultimately require a larger sum, exclusive of an annual stipend, it will remain with Congress to provide the fund therefor. In the mean time, four or five thousand dollars may be stipulated to be paid in October or November next, in such articles as may be deemed most useful for them. General Meriwether not having an appointment as commissioner should not prevent his opinion having as full weight, in any transaction at the proposed conference, as it would have if he had received an appointment as a commissioner. You will, nevertheless, consider yourself responsible for whatever you agree to. It is desirable the most perfect harmony should prevail between General Meriwether and yourself.

If you should think it expedient to have one or two thousand dollars' worth of goods at the council, and they can be furnished at the factory, you are hereby authorized to draw on Mr. Halstead for the same, and you will make such arrangements, with respect to provisions, as you may judge expedient. You will let the chiefs know that General Meriwether has been particularly requested, by the President of the United States, to attend with you for the purpose aforesaid.

I am, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

THE SACS AND FOXES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 31, 1804.

To the Senate of the United States:

Most of the Indians residing within our Northern boundary, on this side the Mississippi, receiving from us annual aids in money and necessities, it was a subject of complaint with the Sacs, that they received nothing, and were connected with us by no treaty. As they own the country in the neighborhood of our settlements of Kaskaskia and St. Louis, it was thought expedient to engage their friendship; and Governor Harrison was accordingly instructed, in June last, to propose to them an annuity of five or six hundred dollars, stipulating, in return, an adequate cession of territory, and an exact definition of boundaries. The Sacs and Foxes, acting generally as one nation, and coming forward together, he found it necessary to add an annuity for the latter tribe also, enlarging proportionably the cession of territory; which was accordingly done by the treaty, now communicated, of November the 3d, with those two tribes.

This cession giving us a perfect title to such a breadth of country on the eastern side of the Mississippi, with a command of the Ouisconsin, strengthens our means of retaining exclusive commerce with the Indians, on the western side of the Mississippi: a right indispensable to the policy of governing those Indians by commerce rather than by arms.

The treaty is now submitted to the Senate for their advice and consent.

TH: JEFFERSON.

December 31, 1804.

Articles of a Treaty, made at Saint Louis, in the district of Louisiana, between William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana territory and of the district of Louisiana, Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the said territory and district, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States, for concluding any treaty, or treaties, which may be found necessary with any of the Northwestern tribes of Indians, of the one part; and the chiefs and head men of the united Sac and Fox tribes, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. The United States receive the united Sac and Fox tribes into their friendship and protection; and the said tribes agree to consider themselves under the protection of the United States, and of no other Power whatsoever.

ART. 2. The general boundary line, between the lands of the United States and of the said Indian tribes, shall be as follows, viz: Beginning at a point on the Missouri river, opposite to the mouth of the Gasconade river; thence, in a direct course, so as to strike the river Jeffreon, at the distance of thirty miles from its mouth, and down the said Jeffreon to the Mississippi; thence, up the Mississippi, to the mouth of the Ouisconsin river, and up the same to a point, which shall be thirty-six miles in a direct line from the mouth of the said river; thence, by a direct line, to the point where the Fox river (a branch of the Illinois) leaves the small lake called Sakaegan; thence, down the Fox river, to the Illinois river, and down the same to the Mississippi. And the said tribes, for, and in consideration of the friendship and protection of the United States, which is now extended to them, of the goods (to the value of two thousand two hundred and thirty-four dollars and fifty cents) which are now delivered, and of the annuity hereinafter stipulated to be paid, do hereby cede, and relinquish forever, to the United States, all the lands included within the above described boundary.

ART. 3. In consideration of the cession and relinquishment of land, made in the preceding article, the United States will deliver to the said tribes, at the town of St. Louis, or some other convenient place on the Mississippi, yearly and every year, goods suited to the circumstances of the Indians, of the value of one thousand dollars, (six hundred of which are intended for the Sacs, and four hundred for the Foxes,) reckoning that value at the first cost of the goods in the city or place in the United States, where they shall be procured. And if the said tribes shall hereafter, at an annual delivery of the goods aforesaid, desire that a part of their annuity should be furnished in domestic animals, implements of husbandry, and other utensils, convenient for them, or in compensation to useful artificers, who may reside with, or near them, and be employed for their benefit, the same shall, at the subsequent annual delivery, be furnished accordingly.

ART. 4. The United States will never interrupt the said tribes, in the possession of the lands which they rightfully claim; but will, on the contrary, protect them in the quiet enjoyment of the same, against their own citizens, and against all other white persons, who may intrude upon them. And the said tribes do hereby engage, that they will never sell their lands, or any part thereof, to any sovereign Power but the United States; nor to the citizens or subjects of any other sovereign Power, nor to the citizens of the United States.

ART. 5. Lest the friendship which is now established between the United States and the said Indian tribes, should be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, it is hereby agreed, that, for injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaint shall be made by the party injured to the other; by the said tribes, or either of them, to the superintendent of Indian affairs, or one of his deputies; and by the superintendent, or other person appointed by the President, to the chiefs of the said tribes. And it shall be the duty of the said chiefs, upon complaint being made, as aforesaid, to deliver up the person, or persons, against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he, or they, may be punished agreeably to the laws of the State or territory where the offence may have been committed. And, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder, shall be committed on any Indian, or Indians, belonging to the said tribes, or either of them, the person or persons so offending, shall be tried, and if found guilty, punished, in the like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is further agreed, that the chiefs of the said tribes shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses, or other property which may be stolen from any citizen or citizens of the United States, by any individual, or individuals of their tribes. And the property so recovered, shall be forthwith delivered to the superintendent, or other person authorized to receive it, that it may be restored to the proper owner. And in cases where the exertions of the chiefs shall be ineffectual in recovering the property stolen, as aforesaid, if sufficient proof can be obtained, that such property was actually stolen by any Indian, or Indians, belonging to the said tribes or either of them, the United States may deduct from the annuity of the said tribes, a sum equal to the value of the property which has been stolen. And the United States hereby guaranty to any Indian or Indians, of the said tribes, a full indemnification for any horses, or other property, which may be stolen from them, by any of their citizens: Provided, That the property so stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen of the United States.

ART. 6. If any citizen of the United States, or other white person, should form a settlement, upon lands which are the property of the Sac and Fox tribes, upon complaint being made thereof, to the superintendent, or other person having charge of the affairs of the Indians, such intruder shall forthwith be removed.

ART. 7. As long as the lands which are now ceded to the United States remain their property, the Indians belonging to the said tribes shall enjoy the privilege of living and hunting upon them.

ART. 8. As the laws of the United States, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, are already extended to the country inhabited by the Sacs, and Foxes, and as it is provided by those laws, that no person shall reside, as a trader, in the Indian country, without a licence under the hand and seal of the superintendent of Indian affairs, or other person appointed for the purpose by the President, the said tribes do promise and agree, that they will not suffer any trader to reside among them, without such licence, and that they will, from time to time, give notice to the superintendent, or to the agent for their tribes, of all the traders that may be in their country.

ART. 9. In order to put a stop to the abuses and impositions which are practised upon the said tribes, by the private traders, the United States will, at a convenient time, establish a trading house, or factory, where the individuals of the said tribes can be supplied with goods at a more reasonable rate than they have been accustomed to procure them.

ART. 10. In order to evince the sincerity of their friendship and affection for the United States, and a respectful deference for their advice, by an act which will not only be acceptable to them, but to the Common Father of all the nations of the earth, the said tribes do, hereby, solemnly promise and agree, that they will put an end to the bloody war which has heretofore raged between their tribes and those of the Great and Little Osages. And for the purpose of burying the tomahawk, and renewing the friendly intercourse between themselves and the Osages, a meeting of their respective chiefs shall take place, at which, under the direction of the above named commissioner, or the agent of Indian affairs residing at St. Louis, an adjustment of all their differences shall be made, and peace established, upon a firm and lasting basis.

ART. 11. As it is probable that the Government of the United States will establish a military post at, or near, the mouth of the Ouisconsin river, and as the land on the lower side of the river may not be suitable for that purpose, the said tribes hereby agree, that a fort may be built, either on the upper side of the Ouisconsin, or on the right bank of the Mississippi, as the one or the other may be found most convenient; and a tract of land, not exceeding two miles square, shall be given for that purpose; and the said tribes do further agree, that they will, at all times, allow to traders, and other persons, travelling through their country, under the authority of the United States, a free and safe passage for themselves, and their property, of every description; and that, for such passage, they shall at no time, and on no account whatever, be subject to any toll or exaction.

ART. 12. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said William Henry Harrison, and the chiefs and head-men of the said Sac and Fox tribes, have hereunto set their hands, and affixed their seals.

Done at St. Louis, in the district of Louisiana, on the third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and four, and of the independence of the United States the twenty ninth.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLE.

It is agreed that nothing in this treaty contained shall affect the claim of any individual, or individuals, who may have obtained grants of land from the Spanish Government, and which are not included within the general boundary line laid down in this treaty: Provided, That such grant have at any time been made known to the said tribes, and recognised by them.

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 27, 1804.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter, of the 24th ultimo, has been duly received and considered. It is the opinion of the President of the United States, that every reasonable accommodation ought to be afforded the old Kaskaskias' chief. You will, therefore, please to satisfy every reasonable request he may make on the score of living; he certainly is entitled to attention, and ought to be enabled to live decently, and in a due degree of independence. You will please to draw on this Department, for such sums as may be necessary for furnishing him with suitable supplies for his family use, from time to time. Directions will be given, for having the boundary line ascertained, run, and marked, as soon as possible. All adjustments with these nations, whose claims may interfere with the Kaskaskias' boundary, as per treaty, will rest with your Excellency. You will take such measures, and make such pecuniary advances to individual chiefs or others, as their respective cases require. It may not be improper to procure from the Sacs, such cessions on both sides of the Illinois, as may entitle them to an annual compensation of five or six hundred dollars; they ought to relinquish all pretensions to any land on the southern side of the Illinois, and a considerable tract on the other side; and, if any of the principal chiefs of the other nations shall discover an indication to follow the example of the old Kaskaskias' chief, they ought to be encouraged, more especially the Piankeshaws, whose lands divide the Vincennes territory, on the Wabash, from the cessions of the Kaskaskias. It would also be desirable to obtain the tract between the Southern line of the Vincennes territory and the Ohio. You will, of course, embrace every favorable opportunity for obtaining cessions of such parts of the above mentioned tract as may occur by a fair and satisfactory bargain. It is suggested by the President of the United States, for your consideration and opinion, whether it would not be expedient to give certain annuities, to each actual family, during the existence of said family, even if the aggregate to a nation, should be increased 15 or 20 per cent. For instance, we give the Piankeshaws five hundred dollars per annum; suppose they have fifty families, we agree to give the nation twelve dollars for each family annually, and when a family becomes extinct, the annuity to cease, or if, when its members decrease, the annuity to decrease in proportion.

I am, &amp;c.

Gov. W. M. H. HARRISON.

No. 103.

[1st Session.]

WYANDOTS AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 11, 1805.

To the Senate of the United States:

I now lay before the Senate, the several treaties and conventions following, which have been entered into, on the part of the United States, since their last session:

A treaty between the United States and the Wyandot, Ottawa, Chippewa, Munsee and Delaware, [Shawanee, and Pattawatamy nations of Indians.

A treaty between the United States and the agents of the Connecticut land companies on one part, and the Wyandot, Ottawa, Chippewa, Munsee and Delaware, Shawanee, and Pattawatamy nations of Indians.

A treaty between the United States and the Delawares, Pattawatamies, Miamies, Eel rivers, and Weas.

A treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw nation of Indians.

A treaty between the United States of America and the Cherokee Indians.

A convention between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, with the several documents necessary for their explanation.

The Senate having dissented to the ratification of the treaty with the Creeks, submitted to them at their last session, which gave a sum of two hundred thousand dollars for the country thereby conveyed, it is proper now to observe, that, instead of that sum, which was equivalent to a perpetual annuity of twelve thousand dollars, the present purchase gives them an annuity of twelve thousand dollars for eight years only, and of eleven thousand dollars for ten years more, the payments of which would be effected by a present sum of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, placed at an annual interest of six per cent. If, from this sum, we deduct the reasonable value of the road ceded through the whole length of their country from Oakmulgee, towards New Orleans, a road of indispensable necessity to us, the present convention will be found to give little more than the half of the sum which was formerly proposed to be given; this difference is thought sufficient to justify the presenting this subject a second time to the Senate.

On these several treaties, I have to request that the Senate will advise whether I shall ratify them or not.

TH. JEFFERSON.

December 11, 1805.

A Treaty between the United States of America and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Wyandot, Ottawa, Chippewa, Munsee and Delaware Shawanee, and Pattawatamy nations, holden at Fort Industry, on the Miami of the lake, on the 4th day of July, Anno Domini 1805.

ARTICLE 1. The said Indian nations do again acknowledge themselves, and all their tribes, to be in friendship with, and under the protection of, the United States.

ART. 2. The boundary line between the United States and the nations aforesaid shall, in future, be a meridian line drawn north and south, through a boundary to be erected on the south shore of lake Erie, one hundred and twenty miles due west of the west boundary line of the State of Pennsylvania, extending north until it intersects the boundary line of the United States, and extending south until it intersects a line heretofore established by the treaty of Greenville.

ART. 3. The Indian nations aforesaid, for the consideration of friendship to the United States, and the sums of money hereinafter mentioned, to be paid annually to the Wyandot, Shawanee, Munsee, and Delaware nations, have ceded, and do hereby cede and relinquish, to said United States, forever, all the lands belonging to said United States, lying east of the aforesaid line, bounded southerly and easterly by the line established by said treaty of Greenville, and northerly by the northernmost part of the forty-first degree of north latitude.

ART. 4. The United States, to preserve harmony, manifest their liberality, and in consideration of the cession made in the preceding article, will, every year, forever, hereafter, at Detroit, or some other convenient place, pay and deliver to the Wyandot, Munsee, and Delaware nations, and those of the Shawanee and Seneca nations, who reside with the Wyandots, the sum of eight hundred and twenty-five dollars, current money of the United States, and the further sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars; making, in the whole, an annuity of one thousand dollars; which last sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars has been secured to the President, in trust for said nations, by the Connecticut land company, and by the company incorporated by the name of "the proprietors of the half million acres of land, lying south of lake Erie, called Sufferers' land," payable annually as aforesaid, and to be divided between said nations, from time to time, in such proportions as said nations, with the approbation of the President, shall agree.

ART. 5. To prevent all misunderstanding hereafter, it is to be expressly remembered, that the Ottawa and Chippewa nations, and such of the Pattawatamy nation as reside on the river Huron of lake Erie, and in the neighborhood thereof, have received from the Connecticut land company, and the company incorporated by the name of "the proprietors of the half million acres of land, lying south of lake Erie, called Sufferers' land," the sum of four thousand dollars in hand, and have secured to the President of the United States, in trust for them, the further sum of twelve thousand dollars, payable in six annual instalments, of two thousand dollars each; which several sums is the full amount of their proportion of the purchases effected by this treaty, and also, by a treaty with said companies, bearing even date herewith, which proportions were agreed on and concluded by the whole of said nations, in their general council; which several sums, together with two thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars and sixty-seven cents, secured to the President, to raise said sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars annuity, as aforesaid, is the amount of the consideration paid by the agents of the Connecticut reserve, for the cession of their lands.

ART. 6. The said Indian nations, parties to this treaty, shall be at liberty to fish and hunt within the territory and lands which they have now ceded to the United States, so long as they shall demean themselves peaceably.

In witness whereof, Charles Jouett, Esquire, a commissioner on the part of the United States, and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Indian nations aforesaid, have hereto set their hands and seals.

CHARLES JOUETT, [L. S.]

[Signed, also, by sundry sachems, chiefs, and warriors.]

A Treaty between the United States of America and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Wyandot, Ottawa, Chippewa, Munsee, and Delaware, Shawanee, and Pattawatamy nations, holden at fort Industry, on the Miami of the lake, on the 4th day of July, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and five.

Whereas Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, did appoint Charles Jouett, Esquire, a commissioner to hold a treaty with said Indian nations, for the purpose of enabling the agents of the Connecticut reserve to negotiate and conclude a cession of their lands: And whereas the company incorporated by the name of "the proprietors of the half million acres of land, lying south of lake Erie, called Sufferers' land," are the owners and proprietors of one half million acres of land, part of said Connecticut reserve, lying on the west end thereof, and south of the shore of lake Erie: And whereas the Connecticut land company, so called, are the owners and proprietors of the remaining part of said reserve, lying west of the river Cayahoga: And whereas Henry Champion, Esquire, agent of the said Connecticut land company, and Isaac Mills, Esquire, agent of the directors of the company incorporated by the name of "the proprietors of the half million acres of land lying south of lake Erie, called Sufferers' land," were both duly authorized and empowered, by their respective companies, and the directors thereof, to treat for the cession and purchase of said Connecticut reserve:

Now, know all men by these presents, That we, the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the nations aforesaid, for the consideration of eighteen thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars and sixty-seven cents, received of the companies aforesaid, by the hands of their respective agents, to our full satisfaction, have ceded, remised, released, and quit claimed, and by these presents do cede, remise, release, and forever quit claim, to the companies aforesaid, and the individuals composing the same, and their heirs and assigns, forever, all the interest, right, title, and claim of title, of said Indian nations, respectively, of, in, and to, all the lands of said companies, lying west of the river Cayahoga, and the portage between that and the Tuscarava branch of Muskingum, north of the northernmost part of the 41st degree of north latitude, east of a line agreed and designated in a treaty between the United States and said Indian nations, bearing even date herewith, being a line north and south one hundred and twenty miles due west of the west line of the State of Pennsylvania, and south of the northernmost part of the forty-second degree and two minutes north latitude, for them, the said companies, respectively, to have, hold, occupy, peaceably possess, and enjoy, the granted and quit claimed premises, forever, free and clear of all let, hindrance, or molestation, whatsoever; so that said nations, and neither of them, the sachems, chiefs, and warriors thereof, and neither of them, or any of the posterity of said nations, respectively, shall ever hereafter make any claim to the quit claimed premises, or any part thereof; but therefrom, said nations, the sachems, chiefs, and warriors thereof, and the posterity of said nations, shall be forever barred.

In witness whereof, the commissioner of the United States, the agents of the companies aforesaid, and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the respective Indian nations aforesaid, have hereunto, interchangeably, fixed their seals and set their names.

J. MILLS, [L. S.]

[Sealed also by a number of Indian chiefs.]

A Treaty between the United States of America and the tribes of Indians called the Delawares, Pattawatamies, Miamies, Eel River, and Weas.

Articles of a treaty made and entered into, at Grouseland, near Vincennes, in the Indiana territory, by and between William Henry Harrison, Governor of said territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States, for treating with the Northwestern tribes of Indians, of the one part; and the tribes of Indians called the Delawares, Pattawatamies, Miamies, Eel River, and Weas, jointly and severally, by their chiefs and head-men, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. Whereas, by the fourth article of a treaty made between the United States and the Delaware tribe, on the eighteenth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and four, the said United States engaged to consider the said Delawares as the proprietors of all that tract of country which is bounded by the White river on the north, the Ohio and Clark's grant on the south, the general boundary line running from the mouth of Kentucky river, on the east, and the tract ceded by the treaty of fort Wayne, and the road leading to Clark's grant, on the west and southwest:

And whereas the Miami tribe, from whom the Delawares derived their claim, contend, that, in their cession of said tract to the Delawares, it was never their intention to convey to them the right of the soil, but to suffer them to occupy it as long as they thought proper; the said Delawares have, for the sake of peace and good neighborhood, determined to relinquish their claim to the said tract, and do, by these presents, release the United States from the guarantee made in the before mentioned article of the treaty of August, eighteen hundred and four.

ART. 2. The said Miami, Eel River, and Wea tribes, cede and relinquish to the United States, forever, all that tract of country which lies to the south of a line to be drawn from the northeast corner of the tract ceded by the treaty of fort Wayne, so as to strike the general boundary line, running from a point opposite to the mouth of the Kentucky river, to fort Recovery, at the distance of fifty miles from its commencement on the Ohio river.

ART. 3. In consideration of the cession made in the preceding article, the United States will give an additional permanent annuity to said Miamies, Eel River, and Wea tribes, in the following proportions, viz. to the Miamies, six hundred dollars; to the Eel river tribe, two hundred and fifty dollars; to the Weas, two hundred and fifty dollars; and also to the Pattawatamies, an additional annuity of five hundred dollars, for ten years and no longer; which, together with the sum of four thousand dollars, which is now delivered, the receipt whereof they do hereby acknowledge, is to be considered as a full compensation for the land now ceded.

ART. 4. As the tribes which are now called the Miamies, Eel River, and Weas, were, formerly, and still consider themselves, as one nation, and as they have determined that neither of those tribes shall dispose of any part of the country, which they hold in common; in order to quiet their minds on that head, the United States do hereby engage to consider them as joint owners of all the country on the Wabash, and its waters, above the Vincennes tract, and which has not been ceded to the United States, by this or any former treaty; and they do further engage, that they will not purchase any part of the said country, without the consent of each of the said tribes: Provided always, that nothing in this section contained shall, in any manner, weaken or destroy any claim which the Kickapoos, who are not represented at this treaty, may have to the country they now occupy, on the Vermillion river.

ART. 5. The Pattawatamies, Miami, Eel River, and Wea tribes, explicitly acknowledge the right of the Delawares, to sell the tract of land conveyed to the United States by the treaty of the eighteenth day of August, eighteen hundred and four, which tract was given by the Piankeshaws to the Delawares, about thirty-seven years ago.

ART. 6. The annuity herein stipulated to be paid by the United States, shall be delivered in the same manner, and under the same conditions, as those which the said tribes have heretofore received.

ART. 7. This treaty shall be in force, and obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States, and the sachems, chiefs, and head men, of the said tribes, have hereunto set their hands, and affixed their seals.

Done at Grouseland, near Vincennes, on the twenty-first day of August, in the year eighteen hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States the thirtieth.

W. H. HARRISON, [L. s.]
And a number of Indians.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLE.

It is the intention of the contracting parties, that the boundary line herein directed to be run from the northeast corner of the Vincennes tract, to the boundary line running from the mouth of the Kentucky river, shall not cross the Embarrass or Drift-wood fork of White river; but, if it should strike the said fork, such an alteration in the direction of the said line is to be made, as will leave the whole of the said fork in the Indian territory.

Articles of Arrangement, made and concluded in the Chickasaw country, between James Robertson and Silas Dinsmoor, commissioners of the United States, of the one part; and the Mingo, chiefs, and warriors, of the Chickasaw nation of Indians, of the other part.

ART. 1. Whereas the Chickasaw nation of Indians have been for some time embarrassed by heavy debts due to their merchants and traders, and being destitute of funds to effect important improvements in their country; they have agreed, and do hereby agree, to cede to the United States, and forever quit claim to the tract of country included within the following bounds, to wit: Beginning on the left bank of Ohio, at the point where the present Indian boundary adjoins the same; thence, down the left bank of Ohio to the Tennessee river; thence, up the main channel of the Tennessee river to the mouth of Duck river; thence, up the left bank of Duck river to the Columbian highway, or road, leading from Nashville to Natchez; thence, along the said road to the ridge dividing the waters running into Duck river from those running into Buffalo river; thence, eastwardly along the said ridge to the great ridge dividing the waters running into the main Tennessee river from those running into Buffalo river, near the main source of Buffalo river; thence, in a direct line to the great Tennessee river, near the Chickasaw old fields, or eastern point of the Chickasaw claim in that river; thence, northwardly to the great ridge dividing the waters running into the Tennessee from those running into Cumberland river, so as to include all the waters running into Elk river; thence, along the top of the said great ridge to the place of beginning; reserving a tract of one mile square, adjoining to, and below the mouth of Duck river, on the Tennessee, for the use of the chief O'Koy, or Tishsumas-tubbe.

ART. 2. The United States, on their part, and in consideration of the above cession, agree to make the following payments, to wit: Twenty thousand dollars for the use of the nation at large, and for the payment of the debts due to their merchants and traders; and to George Colbert and O'Koy, two thousand dollars, that is, to each, one thousand dollars; this sum is granted to them at the request of the national council, for services rendered their nation, and is to be subject to their individual order, witnessed by the resident agent; also, to Chinnubbee Mingo, the king of the nation, an annuity of one hundred dollars, during his natural life, granted as a testimony of his personal worth and friendly disposition. All the above payments are to be made in specie.

ART. 3. In order to preclude forever all disputes relative to the boundary mentioned in the first section, it is hereby stipulated that the same shall be ascertained and marked by a commissioner or commissioners, on the part of the United States, accompanied by such person as the Chickasaws may choose, so soon as the Chickasaws shall have thirty days notice of the time and place at which the operation is to commence; and the United States will pay the person appointed on the part of the Chickasaws two dollars per day, during his actual attendance on that service.

ART. 4. It is hereby agreed, on the part of the United States, that, from and after the ratification of these articles, no settlement shall be made by any citizen, or permitted by the Government of the United States, on that part of the present cession included between the present Indian boundary and the Tennessee, and between the Ohio and a line drawn due north from the mouth of Buffalo to the ridge dividing the waters of Cumberland from those of the Tennessee river, to the term of three years.

ART. 5. The articles now stipulated will be considered as permanent additions to the treaties now in force between the contracting parties, as soon as they shall have been ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said United States.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined, the parties have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals, in the Chickasaw country, this twenty-third day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States of America the thirtieth.

[Signed, also, by the Mingo, and two other chiefs.]

Articles of a Treaty agreed upon between the United States of America, by their commissioners Return J. Meigs and Daniel Smith, appointed to hold conferences with the Cherokee Indians, for the purpose of arranging certain interesting matters with the said Cherokees, of the one part; and the undersigned chiefs and head men of the said nation, of the other part.

ART. 1. All former treaties, which provide for the maintenance of peace, and preventing of crimes, are, on this occasion, recognised and continued in force.

ART. 2. The Cherokees quit claim, and cede to the United States, all the land which they have heretofore claimed, lying to the north of the following boundary line: Beginning at the mouth of Duck river, running thence up the main stream of the same to the junction of the fork, at the head of which fort Nash stood, with the main south fork; thence, a direct course to a point on the Tennessee river bank, opposite the mouth of Hiwassee river. If the line from Hiwassee should leave out Field's settlement, it is to be marked round his improvement, and then continued the straight course; thence, up the middle of the Tennessee river, (but leaving all the islands to the Cherokees) to the mouth of Clinch river; thence, up the Clinch river, to the former boundary line, agreed upon with the said Cherokees, reserving, at the same time, to the use of the Cherokees, a small tract, lying at and below the mouth of Clinch river; from the mouth extending thence, down the Tennessee river, from the mouth of Clinch to a notable rock on the north bank of the Tennessee, in view from Southwest Point; thence, a course at right angles with the river to the Cumberland road; thence, eastward along the same, to the bank of Clinch river, (so as to secure the ferry landing to the Cherokees up to the first hill) and down the same, to the mouth thereof; together with two other sections, of one square mile each, one of which is at the foot of Cumberland mountain, at and near the place where the turnpike gate now stands; the other on the north bank of the Tennessee river, where the Cherokee Talotiske now lives. And whereas, from the present cession made by the Cherokees, and other circumstances, the site of the garrisons at Southwest Point and Tellico are become not the most convenient and suitable places for the accommodation of the said Indians, it may become expedient to remove the said garrisons and factory to some more suitable place, three other square miles are reserved for the particular disposal of the United States, on the north bank of the Tennessee, opposite to, and below, the mouth of Hiwassee.

ART. 3. In consideration of the above cession and relinquishment, the United States agree to pay, immediately, 3,000 dollars in valuable merchandise, and 11,000 dollars within ninety days after the ratification of this treaty, and, also, an annuity of 3,000 dollars, the commencement of which is this day. But so much of the said 11,000 dollars as the said Cherokees may agree to accept in useful articles of, and machines for, agriculture and manufactures, shall be paid in those articles, at their option.

ART. 4. The citizens of the United States shall have the free and unmolested use and enjoyment of the two following described roads, in addition to those which are at present established through their country; one to proceed from some convenient place near the head of Stone's river, and fall into the Georgia road at a suitable place towards the Southern frontier of the Cherokees. The other to proceed from the neighborhood of Franklin, on Big Harpeth, and crossing the Tennessee at or near the Muscle shoals, to pursue the nearest and best way to the settlements on the Tombigby. These roads shall be viewed and marked out by men appointed on each side for that purpose, in order that they may be directed the nearest and best ways, and of the time of doing the business the Cherokees shall be duly notified.

ART. 5. This treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as it is ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the same.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, and the undersigned chiefs and head-men of the Cherokees, have hereto set their hands and seals. Done at Tellico, the twenty-fifth day of October, 1805.

DANIEL SMITH,
And a number of Indian chiefs.

Articles of a Treaty between the United States of America, by their commissioners, Return J. Meigs and Daniel Smith, who are appointed to hold conferences with the Cherokees, for the purpose of arranging certain interesting matters with the said Indians, of the one part; and the undersigned chiefs and head-men of the Cherokees, of the other part.

ART. 1. Whereas it has been represented by the one party to the other, that the section of land on which the garrison of Southwest Point stands, and which extends to Kingston, is likely to be a desirable place for the assembly of the State of Tennessee to convene at, (a committee from that body, now in session, having viewed the situation) now the Cherokees, being possessed of a spirit of conciliation, and seeing that this tract is desired for public purposes, and not for individual advantages, reserving the ferries to themselves, quit claim and cede to the United States the said section of land, understanding, at the same time, that the buildings erected by the public are to belong to the public, as well as the occupation of the same, during the pleasure of the Government; we also cede the United States the first island in the Tennessee, above the mouth of Clinch.

ART. 2. And whereas the mail of the United States is ordered to be carried from Knoxville to New Orleans, through the Cherokee, Creek, and Choctaw countries, the Cherokees agree that the citizens of the United States shall have, so far as it goes through their country, the free and unmolested use of a road leading from Tellico to Tombigby, to be laid out by viewers appointed on both sides, who shall direct it at the nearest and best way; and the time of doing the business the Cherokees shall be notified of.

ART. 3. In consideration of the above cession and relinquishment, the United States agree to pay the said Cherokee Indians, sixteen hundred dollars in money, or useful merchandise, at their option, within ninety days after the ratification of this treaty.

ART. 4. This treaty shall be obligatory between the contracting parties as soon as it is ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, and the undersigned chiefs and head-men of the Cherokees, have hereto set their hands and seals. Done at Tellico, this twenty-seventh day of October, A. D. eighteen hundred and five.

DANIEL SMITH,
And a number of Indians.

Articles of a Convention made between Henry Dearborn, Secretary of War, specially authorized therefor, by the President of the United States, and Oche Haujo, William M'Intosh, Tuskenehau Chappo, Tuskenehau, Enehau Thlucco, and Checpeheke Emautlau, chiefs and head-men of the Creek nation of Indians, duly authorized and empowered by said nation.

ARTICLE 1. The aforesaid chiefs and head-men do hereby agree, in consideration of certain sums of money and goods, to be paid to the said Creek nation by the Government of the United States, as hereafter stipulated, to cede, and forever quit claim, and do, in behalf of their nation, hereby cede, relinquish, and forever quit claim, unto the United States, all right, title, and interest, which the said nation have, or claim, in or unto a certain tract of land, situate between the rivers Oconee and Oakmulgee, (except as hereinafter excepted) and bounded as follows, viz: Beginning at the high shoals of Apalachy, where the line of the treaty of fort Wilkinson touches the same; thence, running in a straight line, to the mouth of Ulcofauhatche, it being the first large branch or fork of the Oakmulgee, above the Seven islands: Provided, however, That, if the said line should strike the Ulcofauhatche at any place above its mouth, that it shall continue round with that stream, so as to leave the whole of it on the Indian side; then the boundary to continue from the mouth of the Ulcofauhatche, by the water's edge of the Oakmulgee river, down to its junction with the Oconee; thence, up the Oconee, to the present boundary at Tauloohatchee creek; thence, up said creek, and following the present boundary line to the first mentioned bounds, at the High shoals of Apalachy, excepting and reserving to the Creek nation, the title and possession of a tract of land, five miles in length and three in breadth, and bounded as follows, viz: Beginning on the eastern shore of the Oakmulgee river, at a point three miles on a straight line above the mouth of a creek called Ookchoncoolgau, which empties into the Oakmulgee, near the lower part of what is called the old Oakmulgee fields; thence, running three miles eastwardly on a course at right angles with the general course of the river, for five miles below the point of beginning; thence, from the end of the three miles, to run five miles parallel with the said course of the river; thence, eastwardly at right angles with the last mentioned line to the river; thence, by the river, to the first mentioned bounds.

And it is hereby agreed, that the President of the United States, for the time being, shall have a right to establish and continue a military post, and a factory, or trading-house, on said reserved tract; and to make such other use of the said tract, as may be found convenient for the United States, as long as the Government thereof shall think proper to continue the said military post, or trading-house. And it is also agreed, on the part of the Creek nation, that the navigation and fishery of the Oakmulgee, from its junction with the Oconee to the Ulcofauhatche, shall be free to the white people; provided they use no traps for taking fish; but nets and seines may be used, which shall be drawn to the eastern shore only.

ART. 2. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, on the part of the Creek nation, that the Government of the United States shall, forever, hereafter, have a right to a horse path, through the Creek country, from the Oakmulgee to the Mobile, in such direction as shall, by the President of the United States, be considered most convenient, and to clear out the same, and lay logs over the creeks: And the citizens of said States shall, at all times, have a right to pass peaceably on said path, under such regulations and restrictions as the Government of the United States shall from time to time direct; and the Creek chiefs will have boats kept at the several rivers for the conveyance of men and horses; and houses of entertainment established, at suitable places on said path, for the accommodation of travellers; and the respective ferriages and prices of entertainment, for men and horses, shall be regulated by the present agent, Colonel Hawkins, or by his successor in office, or as is usual among white people.

ART. 3. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, on the part of the United States, as a full consideration of the land ceded by the Creek nation in the first article, as well as by permission granted for a horse path through their country, and the occupancy of the reserved tract, at the old Oakmulgee fields, that there shall be paid, annually, to the Creek nation, by the United States, for the term of eight years, twelve thousand dollars in money or goods, and implements of husbandry, at the option of the Creek nation, seasonably signified from time to time, through the agent of the United States, residing with said nation, to the Department of War; and eleven thousand dollars shall be paid in like manner, annually, for the term of the ten succeeding years, making in the whole, eighteen payments in the course of eighteen years, without interest: The first payment is to be made as soon as practicable, after the ratification of this convention, by the Government of the United States; and each payment shall be made at the reserved tract, on the old Oakmulgee fields.

ART. 4. And it is hereby further agreed, on the part of the United States, that, in lieu of all former stipulations relating to blacksmiths, they will furnish the Creek nation, for eight years, with two blacksmiths and two strikers.

ART. 5. The President of the United States may cause the line to be run from the High shoals of Apalachy, to the mouth of Ulcofauhatche, at such time, and in such manner, as he may deem proper. And this convention shall be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the Government of the United States.

Done at the place, and on the day and year, above written.

[1st SESSION.]

CHEROKEES AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 23, 1805.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 21, 1805.

SIR:

In compliance with your note of the 19th instant, you will herewith receive copies of such instructions as have been given from this Department to the different commissioners for treating with the Cherokees, the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and the several tribes of Northern Indians; of which you will please to make such disposition as may be deemed expedient.

I have the honor to be, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

Honorable A. BALDWIN, Senator U. S.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 4, 1804.

GENTLEMEN:

The President of the United States having appointed you joint commissioners for holding a treaty or conference with such chief men of the Cherokee nation of Indians as may be designated by the nation for that purpose, you will please to take such measures for opening said conference, and such time and place, as you shall judge expedient; and when a meeting of the parties shall have been effected, you will pursue such measures as, in your opinion, are best calculated to obtain such cessions of lands, claimed by said nation, within the limits of the State of Tennessee, Kentucky, or Georgia, as can be done on reasonable terms; more especially, the land situated between East and West Tennessee, and the land near Currahee mountain, including the settlement of Colonel Woodford, and the other white inhabitants within his immediate neighborhood.

You are authorized to stipulate to pay the said nation, in money or goods, for such lands, within the limits aforesaid, as the Cherokees shall agree to cede, such a sum or sums as you may think reasonable, not exceeding fourteen thousand dollars for any cession which may be obtained within the limits of the State of Tennessee and Kentucky, together with a reasonable annual stipend, not exceeding three thousand dollars. And, for such cession as you may obtain from said nation, within the limits of Georgia, in the vicinity of Currahee mountain, including Colonel Woodford's settlement, and the other white inhabitants in his neighborhood, any sum you may think reasonable, not exceeding five thousand dollars, with an annual stipend not exceeding one thousand dollars. If one or two thousand dollars' worth of goods will, in your opinion, be useful to be had at the place of holding the treaty, you are hereby authorized to call on Mr. Hooker, at Tellico factory, therefor.

The sums stipulated to be paid as a consideration for cessions obtained, will be forwarded in money or goods, at the time you shall agree on. For expenses in procuring provisions, &c. you will draw on this Department. Your compensation will be six dollars per day, while actually employed in the conference or treaty, and in travelling to and from the place of holding the same, together with your reasonable and necessary expenses.

H. DEARBORN.

R. J. MEIGS and DANIEL SMITH.

SOUTH WEST POINT, November 2d, 1805.

SIR:

The conference at Tellico has ended. The result is, two treaties, which are herewith enclosed. It has cost much labor and attention to effect them. But we hope they will be approved by the Government.

We are, sir, with great respect, &c.

DANIEL SMITH,
RETURN J. MEIGS.

HENRY DEARBORN, Esquire, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 20, 1805.

GENTLEMEN:

The object of the proposed treaties with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, being highly interesting, not only to the United States, but to the State of Tennessee and the Mississippi territory, it is confidently expected that no exertions, on your part, will be wanting, in conducting the business confided to your direction, in such manner as will be best calculated for securing, by all the fair and honorable means in your power, the object in view.

You will find, herewith enclosed, a petition from the principal chiefs of the Choctaw nation, requesting the President of the United States to purchase so much of their lands, between the mouth of the Yazoo river and the Chickasaw nation, as will satisfy a demand, which the house of Panton, Leslie, & Co. have against them. The lands to be ceded are to extend from the Mississippi, at the mouth of the Yazoo, along the present boundary, to the Big Black river, and then, carrying the whole width of the said tract, between those two rivers, viz: the Mississippi and the Big Black, so far as to contain a sufficient quantity for the payment of the debt abovementioned, amounting, as stated in the enclosed account from said house of Panton, Leslie, & Co. to the sum of \$46,091  $\frac{100}{100}$ . But, should a cession be obtained, amounting in value to this sum, and, on investigation, it be found that the Choctaws, themselves, do not, in fact, owe the whole, then, whatever balance may be left, after the payment of the debts, actually and justly due from them to the said house, shall be paid to the Choctaw nation. You will endeavor to extend the cession, from the main source of the Big Black, say north or north northeast, and up the Mississippi, to the Chickasaw boundary; and if the whole tract shall exceed what would be reasonable to demand, for the sum abovementioned, and the expense of the treaty, you will stipulate for the payment of such annuity to the Choctaws, in goods or money, as may be reasonable, but which shall not exceed the interest of such a capital, as, together with the debt aforesaid, and the expense of the treaty, will make the average price of the cession proposed, more than at the rate of two cents per acre.

It may not be improper, when estimating the value of the lands with the Indians, to have particular reference to the probable annual profit, which they actually derive from them, in peltries and furs, as a data, by which you may enable the Indians to understand their present value, but which is constantly diminishing from the decrease of the game.

The average price paid for the Indian lands, within the last four years, does not amount to one cent per acre. It is not, however, the wish of the Government to insist on such average price with the Choctaws or Chickasaws.

The whole amount of the tract, claimed by the Choctaws, and bounded as above, may probably amount to from three and a half to four and a half millions of acres, allowing their boundary on the Mississippi to be, as stated by their chiefs, when at this place, in the winter of 1804, viz: above the mouth of the river St. Francis, running from thence, southeastwardly, so as to strike a certain branch of the Tombigby, near their Upper towns or settlements. It is presumed that a considerable proportion of the proposed cession is overflowed every year, and of course, of but very little value, except for hunting; and, until it shall be inhabited, which will probably never be the case, the Indians will be allowed to hunt on it as heretofore, as long as they continue friendly to the United States.

Two thousand dollars, by way of annuity, which will be equal to thirty-two thousand dollars prompt pay, is considered the highest sum which ought to be given as an annuity, in addition to the debt abovementioned, together with the expense of treating for the whole tract, as before described.

The treaty will be held at such time and place as Mr. Dinsmoor shall have decided on, which, it is hoped, will not, in point of time, exceed the first of next June.

The object of the proposed treaty with the Chickasaws, is to obtain a cession of all the land claimed by that nation, north of the Tennessee river, or so much thereof as they consent to cede; and, if practicable, all their lands to the north of a line to be drawn from the mouth of Duck river, due west, to the Mississippi. But, if the last mentioned cession cannot be obtained, then you will endeavor to obtain, in addition to their lands north of the Tennessee river, their lands north of the south line of Kentucky, between the Tennessee, the Mississippi, and Ohio rivers.

The whole of the lands claimed by the Chickasaws, north of the Tennessee, will probably amount to from three and a half to four and a half millions of acres. But it must be observed that a very large proportion of this land is also claimed by the Cherokees; and that their respective titles are so vague and undefined, as to render it extremely difficult to determine, with any certainty, whose title is best. It is highly probable that we shall find it expedient to allow each nation some compensation; and, of course, the Chickasaws ought not to demand, or receive, the same price for the lands, as they would be entitled to, were their claims undisputed.

The price of such lands as the Chickasaws have an uncontested title to, may be estimated on the same principles, and calculated at the same rate, as is proposed in negotiating with the Choctaws. The disputed title extends to all the lands between Duck river and the Tennessee, to some distance above the Muscle Shoals, and, consequently, embraces a very large proportion of the whole north of the Tennessee. The price of the Chickasaw title to these lands ought not to be more than from two-thirds to three-fourths of what would be proper to give if their title were clear and undisputable.

If the whole of the lands north of the Tennessee, claimed by the Chickasaws, be estimated at about four millions of acres, and there should be three-fourths of a million, to which their title is undisputed, you will be authorized to agree to pay them, not exceeding twelve thousand dollars, in money, to enable them to pay their debts, and ten thousand dollars in goods, for their own use, as soon as the treaty shall be duly ratified, and appropriations made to carry it into effect; and an annuity of two thousand dollars, to be delivered annually, either at Chickasaw bluffs, or at their principal town.

In addition to the general stipulation for pay, you may make a separate article, with the king of the nation, to pay him one hundred dollars, annually, during his life; and with George Colbert, a principal chief, to pay him a sum not exceeding two thousand dollars, for relinquishing the privilege of keeping the ferries over Tennessee and Duck rivers, and an annual present for his life, of a sum not exceeding sixty dollars, or the sum of one thousand dollars, in money or goods, and an annual present, in money, for his life time, of one hundred and twenty dollars.

It may not be improper to let the king and Colbert know, in the early part of the negotiation, that you contemplate making them separate allowances for their friendly disposition, and for Colbert's right to the ferries. But, if Colbert should oppose the cession of the ferries, it may not be improper to endeavor to induce the king and other chiefs to assert their, or the nation's, right to the ferries, in opposition to Colbert's exclusive claim.

If a cession can be obtained, of a larger or smaller quantity of land, between the Tennessee and the Mississippi, you will be authorized in agreeing to similar terms, in point of price, as for the other land, where the title is undisputed.

If a line be drawn from the mouth of Duck river to the Mississippi, the lands, north of that line, including what is in Kentucky, as well as in Tennessee, will probably amount to near two millions of acres.

The lands north of the south line of Kentucky, between the Tennessee, the Mississippi, and the Ohio, will probably amount to three-fourths of a million of acres. The price, for the former tract, should not exceed twelve thousand dollars in goods or money, and an annuity of one thousand six hundred dollars; and, for the latter tract alone, in like proportion.

The Chickasaw treaty should be holden at the principal Chickasaw town, and as soon as practicable after the conclusion of the treaty with the Choctaws.

For any necessary expenses for yourselves, and for provisions for the Indians who attend the treaties, and for interpreters, your bills on this Department will be paid on sight.

Your compensation will be six dollars per day, while actually employed, and while travelling to and from the respective treaties; and all your necessary expenses will be paid, on the receipt of regular accounts, stated and certified by each of you; which accounts should include, not only your own time and expenses, but, also, all other expenses incurred under your direction.

H. DEARBORN.

General JAMES ROBERTSON AND SILAS DINSMOOR, Esq.

Extracts of letters from the Secretary of War to Governor Harrison.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 21st February, 1803.

With this, you will receive a commission, authorizing you to act as a commissioner, on the part of the United States, for holding such treaties, with the Indian nations, as the President may direct.

You will take the earliest opportunity for conferring with the chiefs of the nation or nations, who claim the lands in the vicinity of the Kaskaskias, and a tract bordering on the Mississippi and Ohio, from their junction, up each river, a considerable distance, for a cession of those lands. When you shall have satisfied yourself of the practicability of obtaining those lands, or any given quantity thereof, and the probable sum for which any such cession may be obtained, you will communicate the same to this Department, and the necessary measures will be taken for enabling you to complete such arrangements as may be found practicable, on reasonable terms. Conditional stipulations may be made, (if the terms appear reasonable and moderate) to be referred to the President for his approbation.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 27, 1804.

It may not be improper to procure from the Sacs, such cessions, on both sides of the Illinois, as may entitle them to an annual compensation of five or six hundred dollars; they ought to relinquish all pretensions to any land on the southern side of the Illinois, and a considerable tract on the other side. And if any of the principal chiefs of the other nations shall discover an inclination to follow the example of the old Kaskaskia chief, they ought to be encouraged, more especially the Piankeshaws, whose lands divide the Vincennes territory, on the Wabash, from the cessions of the Kaskaskias. It would, also, be desirable to obtain the tract between the southern line of the Vincennes territory and the Ohio. You will, of course, embrace every favorable opportunity for obtaining cessions of such parts of the above mentioned tract as may occur, by a fair and satisfactory bargain.

It is suggested, by the President of the United States, for your consideration, whether it would not be expedient to give certain annuities to each actual family, during the existence of said family, even if the aggregate to a nation should be increased fifteen or twenty per cent. For instance, we give the Piankeshaws five hundred dollars per annum; suppose they have fifty families, we agree to give the nation twelve dollars for each family, annually, and when a family becomes extinct, the annuity to cease, or if, when its members decrease, the annuity to decrease in proportion.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 24, 1805.

It is the opinion of the President of the United States, that you ought, with as little delay as possible, to cause a meeting of the Delaware chiefs, and some of the principal chiefs of the Miamies and Pattawatamies, for the purpose of such an explanation of the doings, so much complained of, as will satisfy the chiefs, generally, that the transaction was not only open and fair, but such as they have no right to object to.

Such of the Delaware chiefs as were present at the treaty, and who have made false or improper representations of your conduct, in negotiating the treaty, ought to be severely reprimanded, and made to acknowledge, in the presence of the other chiefs, the impropriety of their conduct; and they ought to be told, that, in future, no chiefs, who so far degrade themselves as to deny their own doings, will be considered as deserving any of the confidence of their father, the President of the United States, or admitted to any conference with him, or any of his principal officers or agents.

VINCENNES, 26th August, 1805.

Sir:

The distance between us is so great, and the communication so irregular, as to render it impossible to recur to you for advice and instructions, in many cases of importance, where I feel myself much at a loss to know how to act without them. Thus it has been in the late conference with the Indians, which resulted in the treaty that I have now the honor to enclose.

The first object that engaged my attention, at the opening of the council, was, to satisfy the Indians of our right to make the treaty with the Delawares, that has been so much complained of; and I found little difficulty to getting them to recognise every part of that treaty, excepting the article which guaranties to the Delawares the country between the White river and the Ohio. As the information upon which that article was founded was derived from the Delawares themselves, a good opportunity was offered to ascertain the truth of the cession said to have been made by the Miamies, at fort Wayne, in the year 1803. The latter strenuously contended, that the declaration which they made, on that occasion, meant nothing more than an assurance to the Delawares, that they should occupy the country as long as they pleased, but that they had no intention to convey an exclusive right. During the whole contest between these tribes, which lasted several days, I observed the most exact neutrality. I made the Delawares perfectly comprehend, that the guarantee of the United States depended upon their being able to make the Miamies acknowledge the cession of fort Wayne. This acknowledgment, however, the Miamies would not make, and the Delawares finally gave up the contest, although it was evident to me, that the declaration made by the Owl, on behalf of the Miamies, at fort Wayne, was fully as strong as the Delaware chiefs had reported it to be. At the commencement of the council, the Miami and Pattawatamy chiefs had hinted at the necessity of increasing their annuities, so as to put them on a footing with the Delawares. But I soon put an end to their hopes, by assuring them, in the most positive terms, that, as the United States had made a fair bargain with the Delawares and Piankeshaws, who were the owners of the land that had been ceded, not a sixpence would be given to any other tribe, in consideration of that purchase; but, that they might obtain a further annuity, by a further cession of land; and this brought on the negotiation for the tract ceded by the enclosed treaty. The consideration is greater than I could have wished, but it was not possible to reduce it one single cent; indeed, they insisted, for several days, on having their former annuity doubled for a much smaller tract than that which was finally given up. A knowledge of the value of land is fast gaining ground amongst the Indians, and, in the course of the negotiation, one of the chiefs observed, that he knew that a great part of the land was worth six dollars per acre. The admission of the Pattawatamies, as a party to the treaty, could not well be avoided, under the circumstances which gave rise to the conference, and I am confident that it will, eventually, be highly advantageous to us. They have given up all right to interfere in any future sales of lands by the Miamies, on the Wabash and its waters. The guarantee of those lands to the three tribes, who call themselves Miamies, could not be avoided, as they insisted upon it with the most persevering obstinacy. But, I conceive that it will be no difficult matter to get them, in the course of a few years, to make a division of the land that they now hold in common. At any rate, a point of much consequence has been gained, by getting the other tribes to acknowledge their exclusive title to the country on the Wabash, above the Vincennes tract. The Miami chiefs were extremely desirous to have the Piankeshaws included in the treaty, but this I would on no account suffer, reserving to the United States the right of purchasing the remaining Piankeshaws' lands, at any time that they could agree for them with that tribe. This affair is now in a prosperous train, and can be completed, on the most advantageous terms, whenever the President shall think proper to direct it. I think, upon the whole, that it would be as well to postpone the purchase a short time, perhaps until next spring; but, if it should be determined otherwise, I can venture to promise that all the lands which lie between the Wabash and the lands ceded by the Kaskaskias treaty, and below a continuation of the line running through Point Coupée, will be the property of the United States in ten days after I shall receive your instructions for that purpose, and for a consideration, too, which will compensate for any excess in that given by the present treaty. From the best calculation that I have been able to make, the tract which has now been ceded contains at least two millions of acres, and embraces some of the finest land in the Western country. I shall do myself the honor to write to you by the next mail, and give a particular account of the bills I have drawn for the purposes of the treaty.

In pursuance of the President's directions, I have promised the Turtle fifty dollars, per annum, in addition to his pension; and I have, also, directed Captain Wells to purchase a negro man for him, in Kentucky, and draw on you for the amount.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your humble servant,

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

No. 110.

[1st SESSION.

WYANDOTS AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 16, 1806.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 16th, 1806.

SIR:

I have the honor of informing the committee who have under consideration the treaty with the Wyandots, and other Indian nations, made on the 4th of July last, that the Connecticut land companies, interested in said treaty, have deposited with this Department, specie and public stock, sufficient, as collateral security, for the fulfilment of the several stipulations in said treaty, on the part of said companies.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

The Honorable Mr. BALDWIN, Chairman of said Committee.

To the President of the United States.

RIDGEFIELD, (CON.) 1st October, 1804.

SIR:

The directors of the company, incorporated by the State of Ohio, by the name of "The proprietors of the half million acres of land, lying south of lake Erie, called Sufferers' land," by their vote, have requested me to make application of the President, requesting that a commissioner be appointed, to hold a treaty with the Indians, for the purpose of enabling the directors to extinguish the Indian title to said lands.

From the information which the directors have been able to obtain, relative to the Indian title, they have reason to believe, that it may now be obtained. Such is the situation of the proprietors, that it has become extremely interesting to them that the same should now be effected. It will be unnecessary for me to detail the considerations which now influence them to this measure, relying, with confidence, that the goodness of the President, and his knowledge of the unfortunate circumstances which led to the original grant of these lands, will be a sufficient inducement, with him, to take all proper measures to make the property valuable to the sufferers.

Therefore, permit me, in their behalf, to request the President that a commissioner may be appointed for this purpose.

If this measure should meet the approbation of the President, we hope to be able to effect the treaty early in the coming spring.

I am, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

PHILIP P. BRADLEY, Chairman of said Directors.

To Thomas Jefferson, Esq. President of the United States.

HARTFORD, February 28th, 1805.

The undersigned, directors of the Connecticut land company, in behalf of themselves, and proprietors of said company, respectfully request of the President liberty to hold a treaty with the Indian tribes, claiming a native title to that part of the Connecticut reservation, lying between the Cayahoga, and the Sufferers' land, (so called) containing about one million of acres, and that power and authority may be granted them to extinguish the native claim and title to said tract of land, and that a commission may be, by the President of the United States, appointed to hold a treaty with said Indian tribes, claiming the native right to those lands, and vested with power to accomplish the object prayed for. Various are the reasons that may be urged, in favor of this application, which the President will perceive without mention; amongst which, not the smallest is, that when the sufferers quiet the Indian claims to their lands on the Sandusky lake, the chain of settlement, from the Pennsylvania line, to the Sufferers' lands, and those of the United States, will be interrupted, and the tract of country which the Indians have, heretofore, occupied, solely as hunting ground, will be rendered useless to them for that purpose, and will be a secure and safe asylum for rogues and fugitives from justice, and secure from the arm of justice, and will become the pests of society, and the constant disturbers of the peace of the frontier settlers.

The President will be pleased to receive this application and request, transmitted through the proper organ, accompanied with other necessary documents and information. All which are respectfully submitted to the wise consideration of the President, by his most obedient and very humble servants,

HENRY CHAMPION,
MOSES CLEVELAND,
ROGER NEWBERRY,
SAMUEL MATHER, JR.
Directors.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 2, 1805.

SIR:

The President of the United States has appointed you a commissioner to hold a treaty with the Wyandot, Ottawa, and Chippewa Indians, or such of them, and such other Indians, as may claim a right to the lands, bordering on the southerly part of lake Erie, between the Cayahoga river and the Miami of the lakes, and extending southerly to the present Indian boundary line, as established by the treaty of Greenville.

The object of the proposed treaty being principally that of affording the Connecticut land companies, (who hold the pre-emptive right, under the State of Connecticut, to a certain part of the land above described) an opportunity to purchase the Indian title to the lands claimed by the said companies, your duties will chiefly consist, in notifying the chiefs of the several nations, who are interested, of the time and place of holding said treaty; and in presiding thereat, for the purpose of seeing that any bargain, which the agents of the said companies may enter into with the proper representatives of the Indian nations, shall be fair and just, and well understood by the parties.

You will use your influence to induce the Indians to make a cession of the lands claimed by the Connecticut companies, on reasonable terms, such as they, and their respective nations, will, or ought to be satisfied with.

The agents of those companies will produce their authorities for entering into, and complying with, any stipulations that shall be agreed upon, with your consent, as commissioner on the part of the United States. The said agents will provide the necessary accommodations and provisions, for those who attend the treaty, as well on their own part as that of the Indians, or the United States.

The price usually given for Indian cessions, in different parts of the United States, has not exceeded one cent per acre. And the Government of the United States is, in no case, except for some particular favorite tracts, inclined to give, at most, more than at the rate of two cents per acre. But, if the agents on the part of the aforesaid companies should be disposed to agree to a higher price, there should be no such objection, on your part, as to prevent the bargain; although it would be the most advisable, that the price should not exceed what the United States usually pay or would agree to pay for lands similarly situated, and of equal quality. From one to two cents per acre would, probably, be a reasonable price for the lands in question.

A deputation from the Six Nations will, probably, attend the treaty, and claim a right to a considerable part of the land to be treated for. If so, they ought to be heard on the subject; and, should their claim appear to be just, or such as the other nations will consent to recognise, stipulations ought, in the first instance, to be entered into between them, designating what proportion of the purchase money each nation shall receive.

If the Indian chiefs shall appear disposed to cede, not only the lands claimed by the Connecticut companies, but any part, or the whole of their lands, lying between the lands, claimed by the said companies, and the present boundary, as established at the treaty of Greenville, and since run and marked by the United States, you are authorized to negotiate with them for so much of the same as they will consent to cede, on terms not exceeding two cents per acre.

You may agree to pay, in money or goods, a reasonable proportion, say one-half of the whole purchase money which shall be stipulated to be paid, on account of lands purchased for the United States, as soon as the treaty shall be duly ratified; and, for the remainder of the purchase money, you may agree to pay yearly, an annuity, which shall be equal to the annual interest of said remainder.

The tract of land, claimed by the Connecticut companies, is situated between the forty-first and forty-second degrees of north latitude, and bounded easterly by the Cayahoga, and westerly by a meridional line, to be drawn one hundred and twenty miles due west from the west line of Pennsylvania, and contains about one million five hundred thousand acres. Although the western boundary has not been fully ascertained, it will, probably, be near the mouth of Sandusky bay.

And the tract which you will more especially endeavor to obtain the cession of, from the Indians, on account of the United States, is situated between the southern boundary of the above described tract, and the present boundary between the United States and the Indians, established by the treaty of Greenville, and extending westerly to the head-waters of the Scioto and the Sandusky rivers, and contains, probably, one million or one million and one quarter of acres.

If the Indian chiefs shall be disposed to cede a tract, between Sandusky and the Miami of the lakes, on terms such as are above mentioned, you will stipulate with them accordingly.

Your commission accompanies these instructions.

I am, sir, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

CHARLES JOUETT, ESQUIRE.

FORT INDUSTRY, 4th July, 1805.

SIR:

I have the honor to lay before you a treaty, this day concluded with the Wyandot, Ottawa, Chippewa, Munsee, Delaware, Shawanee, and part of the Pattawatamy nation of Indians; wherein, they convey to the United States all that tract of country lying south of the Connecticut reserve, and north of the boundary line established by the treaty of Greenville, and west of the Pennsylvania line, one hundred and twenty miles; the cession containing, by estimation, twelve hundred thousand acres. The treaty requires not a dollar of the United States in advance, but simply an annuity of eight hundred and twenty-five dollars, the legal interest on thirteen thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars; bringing the purchase to rather more than one cent per acre. The Connecticut companies have also obtained a cession of their lands, for eighteen thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars and sixty-seven cents; four thousand dollars they paid the Indians in cash, twelve to be paid in six equal annual instalments, and two thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars and sixty-seven cents into the hands of the President, in six per cent stock, and such other security as he may require, for producing an annuity of one hundred and seventy-five dollars, creating an annual sum to be paid to the Indians, at one thousand dollars per year; the several sums are to be secured to the President of the United States, in such manner as he may think proper to direct. You will see by those treaties, that an annuity is to be paid, of one thousand dollars, to the Wyandot, Delaware, and such of the Seneca and Shawanese nations that reside with the Wyandots; and an instalment of two thousand dollars per year, for six years, to the Ottawa, Chippewa, and such of the Pattawatamies, as reside on the river Huron of lake Erie; which several sums constitute the full amount of all the moneys given for the several tracts of land purchased.

I am, your obedient servant,

C. JOUETT.

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 24, 1806.

To the Senate of the United States:

A convention has been entered into, between the United States and the Cherokee nation, for the extinguishment of the rights of the latter, and of some unsettled claims in the country north of the river Tennessee, therein described. This convention is now laid before the Senate for their advice and consent as to its ratification.

January 24, 1806.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Articles of a Convention made between Henry Dearborn, Secretary of War, being specially authorized thereto by the President of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and head-men of the Cherokee nation of Indians, duly authorized and empowered by said nation.

ARTICLE 1. The undersigned chiefs and head-men of the Cherokee nation of Indians, for themselves, and in behalf of their nation, relinquish to the United States, all right, title, interest, and claim, which they or their nation have or ever had to all that tract of country which lies to the northward of the river Tennessee, and westward of a line to be run from the upper part of the Chickasaw old fields, at the upper point of an island, called Chickasaw island, on said river, to the most easterly head waters of that branch of said Tennessee river, called Duck river, excepting the two following described tracts, viz: One tract bounded southerly on the said Tennessee river, at a place called the Muscle Shoals; westerly by a creek called Tekeetaneoh, or Cyprus creek, and easterly by Chuwalee, or Elk river, or creek; and northerly by a line to be drawn from a point on said Elk river, ten miles on a direct line from its mouth, or junction with Tennessee river, to a point on the said Cyprus creek, ten miles on a direct line from its junction with the Tennessee river.

The other tract is to be two miles in width, on the north side of Tennessee river, and to extend northerly from that river three miles, and bounded as follows, viz: Beginning at the mouth of Spring creek, and running up said creek three miles on a straight line; thence westerly two miles, at right angles with the general course of said creek; thence southerly, on a line parallel with the general course of said creek, to the Tennessee river; thence up said river by its waters, to the beginning: which first reserved tract is to be considered the common property of the Cherokees, who now live on the same, including John D. Chesholm, Autowwe, and Chechout; and the other reserved tract, on which Moses Melton now lives, is to be considered the property of said Melton and Charles Hicks, in equal shares.

And the said chiefs and head-men, also, agree to relinquish to the United States, all right, or claim, which they or their nation have to what is called the Long island, in Holston river.

ART. 2. The said Henry Dearborn, on the part of the United States, hereby stipulates and agrees, that, in consideration of the relinquishment of title by the Cherokees, as stated in the preceding article, the United States will pay to the Cherokee nation, two thousand dollars in money, as soon as this convention shall be duly ratified by the Government of the United States; and two thousand dollars in each of the four succeeding years, amounting in the whole to ten thousand dollars; and that a grist mill shall, within one year from the date hereof, be built in the Cherokee country, for the use of the nation, at such place as shall be considered most convenient; that the said Cherokees shall be furnished with a machine for cleaning cotton; and also, that the old Cherokee chief, called the Black Fox, shall be paid annually one hundred dollars by the United States, during his life.

ART. 3. It is also agreed, on the part of the United States, that the Government thereof will use its influence and best endeavors to prevail on the Chickasaw nation of Indians to agree to the following boundary between that nation and the Cherokees, to the southward of the Tennessee river, viz: beginning at the mouth of Cany Creek, near the lower part of the Muscle Shoals, and to run up the said creek to its head, and, in a direct line, from thence, to the Flat Stone or Rock, the old corner boundary.

But, it is understood by the contracting parties, that the United States do not engage to have the aforesaid line or boundary established, but only to endeavor to prevail on the Chickasaw nation to consent to such a line, as the boundary between the two nations.

ART. 4. It is further agreed, on the part of the United States, that the claims which the Chickasaws may have to the two tracts reserved by the first article of this convention, on the north side of the Tennessee river, shall be settled by the United States, in such manner as will be equitable, and will secure to the Cherokees the title to the said reservations.

Done at the place, and on the day and year, first above written.

HENRY DEARBORN.

THE PIANKESHAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 7, 1806.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit, for the consideration of the Senate, a treaty entered into, on behalf of the United States, with the Piankeshaw Indians, whereby our possessions on the north bank of the Ohio are entirely consolidated; and I ask the advice and consent of the Senate as to its ratification.

TH. JEFFERSON.

February 7, 1806.

Articles of a Treaty made at Vincennes, in the Indiana territory, between William Henry Harrison, Governor of said territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and Commissioner Plenipotentiary of the United States for concluding any treaty or treaties, which may be found necessary, with any of the Indian tribes northwest of the Ohio, of the one part; and the chiefs and head men of the Piankeshaw tribe, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. The Piankeshaw tribe cedes and relinquishes to the United States, forever, all that tract of country, (with the exception of the reservation hereinafter made) which lies between the Wabash and the tract ceded by the Kaskaskia tribe, in the year 1803, and south of a line to be drawn from the northwest course of the Vincennes tract, north 78° west until it intersects the boundary line which has heretofore separated the lands of the Piankeshaws from the said tract, ceded by the Kaskaskia tribe.

ART. 2. The United States take the Piankeshaw tribe under their immediate care and patronage, and will extend to them a protection as effectual as that which is enjoyed by the Kaskaskia tribe. And the said Piankeshaw tribe will never commit any depredations, or make war upon any of the other tribes, without the consent of the United States.

ART. 3. The said United States will cause to be delivered to the Piankeshaws, yearly, and every year, an additional annuity of three hundred dollars, which is to be paid in the same manner, and under the same conditions as that to which they are entitled by the treaty of Greenville: Provided always, That the United States may, at any time they shall think proper, divide the said annuity amongst the individuals of the said tribe.

ART. 4. The stipulations made in the preceding articles, together with the sum of one thousand one hundred dollars, which is now delivered, the receipt whereof the said chiefs do hereby acknowledge, is considered a full compensation for the cession and relinquishment above mentioned.

ART. 5. As long as the lands, now ceded, remain the property of the United States, the said tribe shall have the privilege of living and hunting upon them, in the same manner that they have heretofore done; and they reserve to themselves the right of locating a tract of two square miles, or twelve hundred and eighty acres, the fee of which is to remain with them forever.

ART. 6. This treaty shall be in force as soon as it shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

In testimony whereof, the said William H. Harrison, and the chiefs and head-men representing the said Piankeshaw tribe, have hereunto set their hands, and affixed their seals.

Done at Vincennes, on the thirtieth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States the thirtieth.

WM. H. HARRISON,
GROS BLEU,
And others.

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 11, 1805.

SIR:

Your letter, accompanying the treaty with the Miamies, &c. has been duly received. Its contents are highly satisfactory and pleasing. The amicable adjustment of all differences and uneasiness in relation to the cession made by the Delawares and Piankeshaws is a desirable event, especially when connected with the subsequent cession, which gives us the whole margin of the Ohio above the Wabash, and connects the State of Ohio with the Indiana territory, for fifty miles in extent, free from Indian claims.

I am directed by the President of the United States to request you to close a bargain, as soon as it can be effected, with the Piankeshaws, for their claim to the lands between the Wabash and the Eastern boundary of the Kaskaskia cession, as proposed in your letter of August 26th, on such reasonable terms as have been usual in that quarter. For any sums which may be necessary for prompt payment, you will please to draw on this Department.

I hope we shall soon hear of a favorable result from the conference at St. Louis.

Your explanation with Wells, resulting in a confident hope of future good conduct on his part, and mutual harmony hereafter, is not uninteresting. That he had been playing a foolish, and, what he thought, a cunning game, I have no doubt.

With sentiments of the highest esteem, I am, your Excellency's, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

WM. H. HARRISON.

VINCENNES, 1st January, 1806.

SIR:

I have the honor to forward the treaty concluded with the Piankeshaws, on the 30th ultimo. It will, I hope, be found such as I promised it should be, i. e. highly advantageous to the United States; nor is it by any means a bad bargain for the Indians themselves. The annuity which is now promised, together with that which they formerly received, will be a certain resource to them, when they shall be no longer able to procure subsistence from the chase. In the course of the negotiation, I had promised that the United States would, for five years, bear the expense of repairing their guns, but I forgot to insert it in the treaty. It would, perhaps, be found more economical to send an armorer to this place, to work altogether for the Indians, than to employ the artisans on the spot, whose prices are most enormously extravagant, as you will observe by examining their accounts, heretofore forwarded. The neighboring tribes will be highly pleased with such an indulgence, for which they have made frequent applications.

It is, in my opinion, essentially necessary that the law regulating the trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, should be so altered at the present session of Congress, as to prohibit any person from trading with the Indians, any where upon the lands of the United States, without a license. The title to so large a portion of the Indian country has been extinguished, from which a great number of them still draw their support, that it is much to be feared they will fall a sacrifice to the merciless rapacity of the traders, unless they are restrained by the same penalties to which those are subjected who reside at the Indian towns.

Notwithstanding the recent murder of two white men on the Missouri, by three Indians (as it is supposed) from this territory, viz: a Miami, Pattawatamy, and a Kickapoo, I can with confidence repeat to you the assurances lately given, of the pacific disposition of the tribes under my superintendance. The three murderers certainly belong to the banditti of the Illinois river, of which the noted Turkey-foot was the chief. Governor Wilkinson, hearing that two of them were at no great distance from him, has very properly demanded them of the Kickapoo chief, who had them in his custody. I shall endeavor to secure the other as soon as possible.

I have the honor to be, with the most perfect respect, sir, your humble servant,

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

P. S. The tract now ceded is about eighty or ninety miles wide, from the northwest corner of the Vincennes tract to the Kaskaskia cession, and about the same distance from that line to the Ohio.

LEWIS AND CLARKE'S EXPEDITION.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 19, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In pursuance of a measure proposed to Congress, by a message of January 18, 1803, and sanctioned by their appropriation for carrying it into execution, Captain Meriwether Lewis, of the 1st regiment of infantry, was appointed, with a party of men, to explore the river Missouri, from its mouth to its source, and, crossing the highlands by the shortest portage, to seek the best water communication thence to the Pacific ocean; and Lieutenant Clarke was appointed second in command. They were to enter into conference with the Indian nations on their route, with a view to the establishment of commerce with them. They entered the Missouri, May 14, 1804, and, on the 1st of November, took up their winter quarters near the Mandan towns, 1,609 miles above the mouth of the river, in lat. 47° 21' 47" north, and long. 99° 24' 45" west from Greenwich. On the 8th of April, 1805, they proceeded up the river, in pursuance of the objects prescribed to them. A letter of the preceding day, April 7, from Captain Lewis, is herewith communicated. During his stay among the Mandans, he had been able to lay down the Missouri, according to courses and distances taken on his passage up it, corrected by frequent observations of longitude and latitude; and, to add to the actual survey of this portion of the river, a general map of the country between the Mississippi and Pacific, from the 34th to the 54th degrees of latitude. These additions are from information collected from Indians, with whom he had opportunities of communicating, during his journey and residence with them. Copies of this map are now presented to both Houses of Congress. With these, I communicate also, a statistical view, procured and forwarded by him, of the Indian nations inhabiting the territory of Louisiana, and the countries adjacent to its northern and western borders, of their commerce, and of other interesting circumstances respecting them.

In order to render the statement as complete as may be, of the Indians inhabiting the country west of the Missouri, I add Doctor Sibley's account of those residing in, and adjacent to, the territory of Orleans.

I communicate, also, from the same person, an account of the Red river, according to the best information he had been able to collect.

Having been disappointed, after considerable preparation, in the purpose of sending an exploring party up that river, in the summer of 1804, it was thought best to employ the autumn of that year in procuring a knowledge of an interesting branch of the river called the Washita. This was undertaken under the direction of Mr. Dunbar, of Natchez, a citizen of distinguished science, who had aided, and continues to aid us, with his disinterested and valuable services, in the prosecution of these enterprises. He ascended the river to the remarkable hot springs, near it, in lat. 34° 31' 4.16" long. 92° 50' 45" west from Greenwich, taking its courses and distances, and correcting them by frequent celestial observations. Extracts from his observations, and copies of his map of the river, from its mouth to the hot springs, make part of the present communications. The examination of the Red river itself, is but now commencing.

TH: JEFFERSON.

February 19, 1806.

Extract of a letter from Meriwether Lewis to the President of the United States, dated

FORT MANDAN, April 7, 1805.

DEAR SIR:

Herewith enclosed you will receive an invoice of certain articles, which I have forwarded to you from this place. Among the articles, you will observe, by reference to the invoice, sixty-seven specimens of earths, salts, and minerals, and sixty specimens of plants. These are accompanied by their respective labels, expressing the days on which obtained, places where found, and also, their virtues and properties, when known. By means of the labels, reference may be made to the chart forwarded to the Secretary of War, on which the encampment of each day has been carefully marked; thus, the places at which these specimens have been obtained, may be easily pointed out, or found, should any of them prove valuable to the community, on further investigation.

You will also receive, herewith enclosed, a part of Captain Clarke's private journal: the other part you will find enclosed in a separate tin box. This journal will serve to give you the daily details of our progress and transactions.

I shall despatch a canoe with three, perhaps four, persons, from the extreme navigable point of the Missouri, or the portage between this river and the Columbia river, as either may first happen. By the return of this canoe, I shall send you my journal, and some one or two of the best kept by my men. I have sent a journal, kept by one of the sergeants, to Captain Stoddard, my agent at St. Louis, in order, as much as possible, to multiply the chances of saving something. We have encouraged our men to keep journals, and seven of them do so: to whom, in this respect, we give every assistance in our power.

I have transmitted to the Secretary of War, every information relative to the geography of the country which we possess, together with a view of the Indian nations, containing information relative to them, on those points with which I conceived it important that the Government should be informed.

By reference to the muster-rolls forwarded to the War Department, you will see the state of the party. In addition to which, we have two interpreters, one negro man, servant to Captain Clarke, one Indian woman, wife to one of the interpreters, and a Mandan man, whom we take with a view to restore peace between the Snake Indians and those in this neighborhood, amounting, in total, with ourselves, to thirty-three persons. By means of the interpreters and Indians, we shall be enabled to converse with all the Indians that we shall probably meet with on the Missouri.

I have forwarded to the Secretary of War my public accounts, rendered up to the present day. They have been much longer delayed than I had any idea that they would have been, when we departed from the Illinois; but this delay, under the circumstances which I was compelled to act, has been unavoidable. The provision pirogue, and her crew, could not have been dismissed in time to have returned to St. Louis last fall, without evidently, in my opinion, hazarding the fate of the enterprise in which I am engaged, and I therefore did not hesitate to prefer the censure that I may have incurred by the detention of these papers, to that of risking, in any degree, the success of the expedition. To me, the detention of these papers have formed a serious source of disquiet and anxiety; and the recollection of your particular charge to me, on this subject, has made it still more poignant. I am fully aware of the inconvenience which must have arisen to the War Department, from the want of these vouchers, previous to the last session of Congress, but, how to avert it, was out of my power to devise.

From this place, we shall send the barge and crew early to-morrow morning, with orders to proceed, as expeditiously as possible, to St. Louis; by her we send our despatches, which, I trust, will get safe to hand. Her crew consists of ten able bodied men, well armed, and provided with a sufficient stock of provision to last them to St. Louis. I have little doubt but they will be fired on by the Siouxs; but they have pledged themselves to us that they will not yield while there is a man of them living.

Our baggage is all embarked on board six small canoes and two pirogues; we shall set out at the same moment that we despatch the barge. One, or perhaps both, of these pirogues, we shall leave at the falls of the Missouri: from whence we intend continuing our voyage in the canoes and a pirogue, of skins, the frame of which was prepared at Harper's ferry. This pirogue is now in a situation which will enable us to prepare it in the course of a few hours. As our vessels are now small, and the current of the river much more moderate, we calculate on travelling at the rate of twenty or twenty-five miles per day, as far as the falls of Missouri. Beyond this point, or the first range of Rocky mountain, situated about one hundred miles further, any calculation with respect to our daily progress, can be but little more than bare conjecture.

The circumstance of the Snake Indians possessing large quantities of horses, is much in our favor, as, by means of horses, the transportation of our baggage will be rendered easy and expeditious over land, from the Missouri to the Cumberland river. Should this river not prove navigable where we first meet with it, our present intention is to continue our march by land down the river until it becomes so, or to the Pacific ocean.

The map which has been forwarded to the Secretary of War, will give you the idea we entertain of the connexion of these rivers, which has been formed from the corresponding testimony of a number of Indians, who have visited that country, and who have been separately and carefully examined on that subject, and we therefore think it entitled to some degree of confidence. Since our arrival at this place, we have subsisted principally on meat, with which our guns have supplied us amply, and have thus been enabled to reserve the parched meal, portable soup, and a considerable portion of pork and flour, which we had intended for the more difficult parts of our voyage. If Indian information can be credited, the vast quantity of game with which the country abounds, through which we are to pass, leaves us but little to apprehend from the want of food.

We do not calculate on completing our voyage within the present year, but expect to reach the Pacific ocean, and return as far as the head of the Missouri, or perhaps to this place, before winter. You may, therefore, expect to meet me at Monticello, in September, 1806.

On our return, we shall probably pass down the Yellow Stone river, which, from Indian information, waters one of the fairest portions of this continent.

I can foresee no natural or probable obstruction to our progress, and entertain, therefore, the most sanguine hopes of complete success. As to myself, individually, I never enjoyed a more perfect state of good health than I have since we commenced our voyage. My inestimable friend and companion, Captain Clarke, has also enjoyed good health generally. At this moment, every individual of the party are in good health, and excellent spirits, zealously attached to the enterprise, and anxious to proceed. Not a whisper of discontent or murmur is to be heard amongst them, but, all in unison, act with the most perfect harmony. With such men, I have every thing to hope, and but little to fear.

Be so good as to present my most affectionate regard to all my friends, and be assured of the sincere and unalterable attachment of

Your most obedient servant,

MERIWETHER LEWIS,

THE INDIAN TRADE.

The sums stated under and opposite "L," are the amounts of merchandise annually furnished the several nations of Indians, including all incidental expenses of transportation, &c. incurred by the merchants, which generally averages about one-third of the whole amount. The merchandise is estimated at an advance of 125 per cent. on the sterling cost. It appears to me, that the amount of merchandise which the Indians have been in the habit of receiving, annually, is the best standard by which to regulate the quantities necessary for them. In the first instance, they will always consume as much merchandise as they can pay for; and those to whom a regular trade has been carried on, have generally received that quantity.

The amount of their returns, stated under and opposite "M," are estimated by the peltry standard of St. Louis, which is 40 cents per pound, for deer skins, i. e. all furs and peltries are first reduced, by their comparative value, to lbs. of merchantable deer skins, which are then estimated at 40 cents per lb.

Claim the country within the following limits, viz: Commencing at the mouth of a south branch of the Osage river, called Neangua, and with the same to its source; thence southwardly, to intersect the Arkansas, about one hundred miles below the three forks of that river; thence up the principal branch of the same, to the confluence of a large northwardly branch of the same, lying a considerable distance west of the Great Saline, and with that stream, nearly to its source; thence northwardly, towards the Kansas river, embracing the waters of the upper portion of the Osage river; and thence obliquely approaching the same, to the beginning. The climate is delightful, and the soil fertile, in the extreme. The face of the country is generally level, and well watered. The eastern part of the country is covered with a variety of timber, of an excellent quality; the western and middle country, high prairies. It embraces within its limits four salines, which are, in point of magnitude and excellence, unequalled by any known in North America. There are also many others of less note. The principal part of the Great Osage have always resided at their villages, on the Osage river, since they have been known to the inhabitants of Louisiana. About three years since, nearly one-half of this nation, headed by their chief, Big Track, emigrated to the three forks of the Arkansas, near which, and on its north side, they established a village, where they now reside. The Little Osage formerly resided on the southwest side of the Missouri, near the mouth of Grand river; but, being reduced by continual warfare with their neighbors, were compelled to seek the protection of the Great Osage, near whom they now reside. There is no doubt but their trade will increase. They could furnish a much larger quantity of beaver than they do. I think two villages, on the Osage river, might be prevailed on to remove to the Arkansas, and the Kansas higher up the Missouri, and thus leave a sufficient scope of country for the Shawanese, Delawares, Miamies, and Kickapoos. The Osages cultivate corn, beans, &c.

They hunt on the Saline and Nimmehaw rivers, and west of them in the plains. The country in which they hunt lies well; it is extremely fertile and well watered; that part of it which borders on the Nimmehaw and Missouri, possesses a good portion of timber. Population rather increasing. They have always resided near the place their village is situated, and are the descendants of the Missouries.

Their ancient, and principal village, was situated in an extensive and fertile plain, on the north bank of the Missouri, just below the entrance of the Grand river. Repeated attacks of the small pox, together with their war with the Saukees and Renars, have reduced them to their present state of dependence on the Ottoes, with whom they reside, as well in their village as on their hunting excursions. The Ottoes view them as their inferiors, and sometimes treat them amiss. These people are the real proprietors of an extensive and fertile country, lying on the Missouri, above their ancient village, for a considerable distance, and as low as the mouth of the Osage river, and thence to the Mississippi.

A great proportion of this country is open plains, interspersed, however, with groves of timber, which are most generally found in the vicinity of water courses; it is generally fertile and well watered; lies level, and free of stone. They have resided in the country which they now inhabit, since they were known to the whites. Their trade is a valuable one, from the large proportion of beaver and otter which they furnish; and it may be expected yet to increase, as those animals are still abundant in their country. The periods of their residence at their village, and hunting, are similar to the Kansas and Osages. Their population is increasing. They are friendly and hospitable to all white persons, pay great respect and deference to their traders, with whom they are punctual in the payment of their debts. They are, in all respects, a friendly, well-disposed people. They cultivate corn, beans, mellons, &c.

This country is very similar to that of the Pánias proper; though there is an extensive body of fertile well-timbered land, between the Wolf river below their village and the river Corne du Cerf or Elkhorn river. They cultivate corn, beans, &c. The particulars related of the other Pánias, are also applicable to them. About ten years since, they boasted 700 warriors; they have lived in a village on the west bank of the Missouri, 236 miles above the mouth of the river Platte, where they cultivated corn, beans and melons; they were warlike, and the terror of their neighbors. In the summer and autumn of 1802, they were visited by the small pox, which reduced their number to something less than 300; they burnt their village, and have become a wandering nation, deserted by the traders; and the consequent deficiency of arms and ammunition has invited frequent aggressions from their neighbors, which has tended to reduce them still further. They rove principally on the waters of the river Quicurre or Rapid river. The country is generally level, high, open plains; it is fertile, and tolerably well watered; they might easily be induced to become stationary; they are well-disposed towards the whites, and are good hunters; their country abounds in beaver and otter, and their trade will increase and become valuable, provided they become stationary and are at peace.  S. The remains of ten large tribes of Parias, who have been reduced, by the small-pox and the Sioux, to their present number; they live in fortified villages, and hunt immediately in their neighborhood; the country around them, in every direction, for several hundred miles, is bare of timber, except on the water-courses, and steep declivities of hills, where it is sheltered from the ravages of fire; the land is tolerably well watered, and lies well for cultivation. The remains of the villages of these people are to be seen on many parts of the Missouri, from the mouth of Teton river, to the Mandans; they claim no land, except that on which their villages stand, and the fields which they cultivate. The Tetons claim the country around them, though they are the oldest inhabitants; they may properly be considered the farmers or tenants at will of that lawless, savage, and rapacious race, the Sioux Teton, who rob them of their horses, plunder their gardens and fields, and sometimes murder them without opposition. If these people were freed from the oppression of the Tetons, their trade would increase rapidly, and might be extended to a considerable amount; they maintain a partial trade with their oppressors the Tetons, to whom they barter horses, mules, corn, beans, and a species of tobacco, which they cultivate; and receive in return, guns, ammunition, kettles, axes, and other articles, which the Tetons obtain from the Yanktons of the north, and Sissatones, who trade with Mr. Cameron, on the river St. Peters. Their horses and mules the Ricaras obtain from their western neighbors, who visit them frequently, for the purpose of trafficking.

 S. These are the most friendly, well disposed Indians, inhabiting the Missouri; they are brave, humane, and hospitable. About 25 years since, they lived in six villages, about 40 miles below their present villages, on both sides of the Missouri. Repeated visitations of the small-pox, aided by frequent attacks of the Sioux, has reduced them to their present number. They claim no particular tract of country; they live in fortified villages, hunt immediately in their neighborhood, and cultivate corn, beans, squashes, and tobacco, which form articles of traffic with their neighbors, the Assinniboins; they also barter horses with the Assinniboins, for arms, ammunition, axes, kettles, and other articles of European manufacture, which these last obtain from the British establishments on the Assinniboin river. The articles which they thus obtain from the Assinniboins, and the British traders who visit them, they again exchange for horses and leather tents, with the Crow Indians, Chyennes, Wetepahatoes, Kiawas, Kanenavish, Staitan, and Cataka, who visit them occasionally, for the purpose of traffic; their trade may be much increased; their country is similar to that of the Ricaras; population increasing.

 S. They claim no particular country, nor do they assign themselves any limits; their tradition relates, that they have always resided at their present villages; in their customs, manners, and disposition, they are similar to the Mandans and Ahwâhhâways. The scarcity of fuel induces them to reside, during the cold season, in large bands, in camps, on different parts of the Missouri, as high up that river as the mouth of the river Yellow Stone, and west of their villages about the Turtle mountain. I believe that these people, as well as the Mandans and Ahwahhaws, might be prevailed on to remove to the mouth of Yellow Stone river, provided an establishment is made at that place. They have, as yet, furnished scarcely any beaver, although the country they hunt abounds with them; the lodges of these animals are to be seen within a mile of the villages; these people have also suffered considerably by the small-pox, but have successfully resisted the attacks of the Sioux. The Northwest company intend to form an establishment, in the course of the next summer and autumn, on the Missouri, near these people, which, if effected, will most probably prevent their removal to any point which our Government may hereafter wish them to reside at.

 S. Saukees and Renars, or Foxes. These nations are so perfectly consolidated, that they may in fact be considered as one nation only; they speak the same language; they formerly resided on the east side of the Mississippi, and still claim the land on that side of the river, from the mouth of the Ouisconsin to the Illinois river, and eastward towards lake Michigan, but to what particular boundary I am not informed; they also claim, by conquest, the whole of the country belonging to the ancient Missouries, which forms one of the most valuable portions of Louisiana; but what proportion of this territory they are willing to assign to the Ayouwais, who also claim a part of it, I do not know. As they are at war with the Sioux, who live N. and N.W. of them, except the Yankton Ahnah, their boundaries in that quarter are also undefined; their trade would become much more valuable if peace was established between them and the nations west of the Missouri, with whom they are at war; their population has remained nearly the same for many years; they raise an abundance of corn, beans, and melons; they sometimes hunt in the country west of them towards the Missouri, but their principal hunting is on both sides of the Mississippi, from the mouth of the Ouisconsin to the mouth of the Illinois river. These people are extremely friendly to the whites, and seldom injure their traders; but they are the most implacable enemies to the Indian nations with whom they are at war; to them is justly attributable the almost entire destruction of the Missouries, the Illinois, Cahokias, Kaskaskias, and Peorias.

- S. Wahpatone. Claim the country in which they rove on the N. W. side of the river St. Peters, from their village to the mouth of the Chippewa river, and thence northeastwardly towards the head of the Mississippi, including the Crow-wing river. Their lands are fertile, and generally well timbered. They are only stationary while the traders are with them, which is from the beginning of October, to the last of March. Their trade is supposed to be at its greatest extent; they treat their traders with respect, and seldom attempt to rob them. This, as well as the other Sioux bands, act, in all respects, as independently of each other as if they were a distinct nation.
- S. Mindawarcarton. 'Tis the only band of Sioux that cultivate corn, beans, &c. and these even cannot properly be termed a stationary people. They live in tents of dressed leather, which they transport by means of horses and dogs, and ramble from place to place during the greater part of the year. They are friendly to their own traders, but the inveterate enemies to such as supply their enemies, the Chippewas, with merchandise. They also claim the country in which they hunt, commencing at the entrance of the river St. Peters, and extending upwards, on both sides of the Mississippi river, to the mouth of the Crow-wing river. The land is fertile, and well watered; lies level, and sufficiently timbered. Their trade cannot be expected to increase much.
- S. Wahpacoota. They rove in the country southwest of the river St. Peters, from a place called the Hardwood, to the mouth of the Yellow Medicine river: never stationary but when their traders are with them, and this does not happen at any regular and fixed point; at present they treat traders tolerably well; their trade cannot be expected to increase much. A great proportion of their country is open plains, lies level, and is tolerably fertile; they maintain a partial traffic with the Yanktons and Tetons, to the west of them; to these they barter the articles which they obtain from the traders on the river St. Peters, and receive, in return, horses, some robes, and leather lodges.
- S. Sissatone.—They claim the country in which they rove, embracing the upper portions of the red river of lake Winnipie, and St. Peters. It is a level country, intersected with many small lakes; the land is fertile and free of stone; the majority of it open plains. This country abounds more in the valuable fur animals, the beaver, otter, and martin, than any portion of Louisiana yet known. This circumstance furnishes the Sissatones with means of purchasing more merchandise, in proportion to their number, than any nation in this quarter. A great proportion of this merchandise is reserved by them for their trade with the Tetons, whom they annually meet, at some point previously agreed on, upon the waters of James river, in the month of May. This Indian fair is frequently attended by the Yanktons of the north and Ahnah. The Sissatones and Yanktons of the north, here supply the others with considerable quantities of arms, ammunition, axes, knives, kettles, cloth, and a variety of other articles; and receive, in return, principally, horses, which the others have stolen, or purchased from the nations on the Missouri and west of it. They are devoted to the interest of their traders.
- S. Yanktons of the North.—This band, although they purchase a much smaller quantity of merchandise than the Sissatones, still appropriate a considerable portion of what they do obtain, in a similar manner with that mentioned of the Sissatones. This trade, as small as it may appear, has been sufficient to render the Tetons independent of the trade of the Missouri, in a great measure, and has furnished them with the means, not only of distressing and plundering the traders of the Missouri, but also, of plundering and massacring the defenceless savages of the Missouri, from the mouth of the river Platte to the Minetares, and west of the Rocky mountains. The country that these people inhabit, is almost one entire plain, uncovered with timber; it is extremely level, the soil fertile, and generally well watered.
- S. Yanktons Ahnah.—These are the best disposed Sioux who rove on the banks of the Missouri, and these even will not suffer any trader to ascend the river, if they can possibly avoid it. They have heretofore, invariably arrested the progress of all those they have met with, and generally compelled them to trade at the prices, nearly, which they themselves think proper to fix on their merchandise. They seldom commit any further acts of violence on the whites; they sometimes visit the river Demoin, where a partial trade has been carried on with them, for a few years past, by a Mr. Crawford; their trade, if well regulated, might be rendered extremely valuable. Their country is a very fertile one; it consists of a mixture of wood lands and prairies; the land bordering on the Missouri, is principally plains, with but little timber.
- Tetons Bois rûlé. Tetons-Okandandas. Tetons-Minakineazzo. Tetons Sahone*.—These are the vilest miscreants of the savage race, and must ever remain the pirates of the Missouri, until such measures are pursued by our Government, as will make them feel a dependence on its will for their supply of merchandise. Unless these people are reduced to order, by coercive measures, I am ready to pronounce, that the citizens of the United States can never enjoy, but partially, the advantages which the Missouri presents. Relying on a regular supply of merchandise through the channel of the river St. Peters, they view with contempt the merchants of the Missouri, whom they never fail to plunder when in their power; persuasion or advice, with them, is viewed as supplication, and only tends to inspire them with contempt for those who offer either. The tameness with which the traders of the Missouri have heretofore submitted to their rapacity, has tended not a little to inspire them with contempt for the white persons who visit them through that channel. A prevalent idea among them, and one which they make the rule of their conduct, is, that the more illy they treat the traders, the greater quantity of merchandise they will bring them; and that they will thus obtain the articles they wish, on better terms. They have endeavored to inspire the Ricaras with similar sentiments, but happily without any considerable effect. The country in which these four bands rove, is one continual plain, with scarcely a tree to be seen, except on the water courses, or the steep declivities of hills, which last are but rare; the land is fertile, and lies extremely well for cultivation; many parts of it are but badly watered. It is from this country that the Missouri derives most of its coloring matter; the earth is strongly impregnated with glauber salts, alum, copperas, and sulphur, and when saturated with water, immense bodies of the hills precipitate themselves into the Missouri, and mingle with its waters. The waters of this river have a purgative effect on those unaccustomed to use it. I doubt whether these people can ever be induced to become stationary; their trade might be made valuable if they were reduced to order. They claim jointly, with the other bands of Sioux, all the country lying within the following limits, viz: beginning at the confluence of the river Demoin and Mississippi; thence, up the west side of the Mississippi, to the mouth of the St. Peters river; thence, on both sides of the Mississippi, to the mouth of Crow-wing river, and upwards with that stream, including the waters of the upper part of the same; thence, to include the waters of the upper portion of Red river of lake Winnipie, and down the same nearly to Pembear river; thence, a southwesterly course to intersect the Missouri at or near the Mandans, and with that stream downward to the entrance of the Wanecunne creek; thence, passing the Missouri, it goes to include the lower portion of the river Chycone, all the waters of White river, and river Teton, includes the lower portion of the river Guicurre, and returns to the Missouri, and, with that stream downward, to the mouth of Waddepon river; and thence, eastwardly to intersect the Mississippi at the beginning.

Being oppressed by the Sioux, they removed to the west side of the Missouri, about 15 miles below the mouth of Warricunne creek, where they built and fortified a village; but, being pursued by their ancient enemies, the Sioux, they fled to the Black hills, about the head of the Chyenne river, where they wander in quest of the buffalo, having no fixed residence. They do not cultivate. They are well disposed towards the whites, and might be easily induced to settle on the Missouri, if they could be assured of being protected from the Sioux. Their number annually diminishes. Their trade may be made valuable.

They annually visit the Mandans, Minetares, and Ah-wahhaways, to whom they barter horses, mules, leather lodges, and many articles of Indian apparel, for which they receive, in return, guns, ammunition, axes, kettles, awls, and other European manufactures. When they return to their country, they are, in turn, visited by the Paunch and Snake Indians, to whom they barter most of the articles they have obtained from the nations on the Missouri, for horses and mules, of which those nations have a greater abundance than themselves. They also obtain from the Snake Indians, bridle-bits, blankets, and some other articles, which those Indians purchase from the Spaniards. The bridle-bits and blankets I have seen in the pos-

S. Manetopa. Oseegeh. Mahtopanato. Are the descendants of the Sioux, and partake of their turbulent and faithless disposition. They frequently plunder, and sometimes murder their own traders. The name by which this nation is generally known, was borrowed from the Chippewas, who call them Assiniboan, which, literally translated, is Stone Sioux, hence the name of Stone Indians, by which they are sometimes called. The country in which they rove is almost entirely uncovered with timber; lies extremely level, and is but badly watered in many parts; the land, however, is tolerably fertile, and unincumbered with stone. They might be induced to trade at the river Yellow Stone, but I do not think that their trade promises much. Their numbers continue about the same. These bands, like the Sioux, act entirely independent of each other, though they claim a national affinity, and never make war on each other. The country inhabited by the Mahtopanato possesses rather more timber than the other parts of the country. They do not cultivate.

S. CHIPPEWAS, OF LEACH LAKE. Claim the country on both sides of the Mississippi, from the mouth of the Crow-wing river to its source; and extending west of the Mississippi to the lands claimed by the Sioux, with whom they still contend for dominion. They claim, also, east of the Mississippi, the country extending as far as lake Superior, including the waters of the river St. Louis. This country is thickly covered with timber generally; lies level, and generally fertile, though a considerable proportion of it is intersected and broken up by small lakes, morasses, and swamps, particularly about the heads of the Mississippi, and river St. Louis. They do not cultivate, but live principally on the wild rice, which they procure in great abundance on the borders of Leach lake, and the banks of the Mississippi. Their number has been considerably reduced by wars and the small pox. Their trade is at its greatest extent.

OF RED LAKE. Claim the country about Red lake, and Red lake river, as far as the Red river of Lake Winnie, beyond which last river they contend with the Sioux for territory. This is a low level country, and generally thickly covered with timber; interrupted with many swamps and morasses. This, as well as the other bands of Chippewas, are esteemed the best hunters in the N. W. country; but, from the long residence of this band in the country they now inhabit, game is becoming scarce; therefore, their trade is supposed to be at its greatest extent. The Chippewas are a well disposed people, but excessively fond of spirituous liquor.

OF RIVER PEMBENA. These people formerly resided on the east side of the Mississippi, at Sand lake, but were induced by the N. W. company, to remove about two years since, to the river Pembena. They do not claim the lands on which they hunt. The country is level, and the soil good. The west side of the river is principally prairies, or open plains; on the east side there is a greater proportion of timber. Their trade at present is a very valuable one, and will probably increase for some years. They do not cultivate, but live by hunting; they are well disposed towards the whites.

S.—ALGONQUINS, of Rainy Lake, &c. With the precise limits of the country they claim, I am not acquainted; they live very much detached in small parties; the country they inhabit is but an indifferent one: it has been much hunted, and the game, of course, nearly exhausted; they are well disposed towards the whites; their number is said to decrease; they are extremely addicted to spirituous liquors, of which large quantities are annually furnished them, by the Northwestern traders, in return for their bark canoes; they live wretchedly poor.

ALGONQUINS, of Portage de Prairie. These people inhabit a low flat marshy country, mostly covered with timber, and well stocked with game; they are emigrants from the Lake of the Woods, and the country east of it, who were introduced some years since by the Northwestern traders, in order to hunt the country, on the lower parts of Red river, which then abounded in a variety of animals of the fur kind. They are an orderly well disposed people; but, like their relations on Rainy Lake, extremely addicted to spirituous liquors. Their trade is at its greatest extent.

about the head of the Assiniboin river, it is marshy, and tolerably well furnished with timber, as are also the Fort Dauphin mountains, to which they sometimes resort. From the quantity of beaver in their country, they ought to furnish more of that article than they do at present; they are not esteemed good beaver hunters. They might probably be induced to visit an establishment on the Missouri at the Yellow Stone river. Their number has been reduced by the small pox since they were first known to the Canadians.

 S. The information I possess with respect to these people has been received from the Minetares, who have extended their war excursions as far westerly as that nation, of whom they have made several prisoners and brought them with them to their villages on the Missouri.
- These prisoners have been seen by the Frenchmen residing in this neighborhood. The Minatares state that this nation reside in one village, on the west side of a large and rapid river, which runs from south to N. along the foot of the Rocky Mountains on their west side, and that this river passes at a small distance from the three forks of the Missouri; that the country between the mountains and the river is broken, but on the opposite side of the river it is an extensive, open plain, with a number of barren, sandy hills, irregularly distributed over its surface, as far as the eye can reach. They are a timid, inoffensive, and defenceless people. They are said to possess an abundance of horses.

S.—ALIIATANS.—Snake Indians. These are a very numerous and well disposed people, inhabiting a woody and mountainous country. They are divided into three large tribes, who wander at a considerable distance from each other, and are called by themselves So-so-na, So-so-ba-bâr, and I-a-kar; these are again sub-divided into smaller, though independent bands, the names of which I have not yet learnt. They raise a number of horses and mules, which they trade with the Crow Indians, or are stolen by the Indians on the east of them. They maintain a partial trade with the Spaniards, from whom they obtain many articles of clothing and ironmongery, but no warlike implements.

Of the West. These people also inhabit a mountainous country, and sometimes venture in the plains east of the Rocky mountains, about the head of the Arkansas river; they have more intercourse with the Spaniards of New Mexico than the Snake Indians; they are said to be very numerous and warlike, but are badly armed. The Spaniards fear these people, and therefore take the precaution not to furnish them with any warlike implements. In their present unarmed state, they frequently commit hostilities on the Spaniards. They raise a great many horses.

La Playes. These principally inhabit the rich plains from the head of the Arkansas, embracing the heads of Red river, and extending with the mountains and high lands, eastwardly, as far as it is known, towards the Gulf of Mexico. They possess no fire arms, but are warlike and brave. They are, as well as the other Aliatans, a wandering people. Their country abounds in wild horses, besides great numbers which they raise themselves. These people and the West Aliatans might be induced to trade with us on the upper part of the Arkansas river. I do not believe that any of the Aliatans claim a country within any particular limits.

They are said to be a well disposed people, and inhabit a very fertile country: certain it is, that they enjoy a delightful climate.

S. This once powerful nation has entirely disappeared, (apparently.) Every inquiry I have made after them has proved ineffectual. In the year 1724 they resided in several villages on the heads of the Kansas river, and could, at that time, bring upwards of two thousand men into the field, (see Mons. Dupratz' History of Louisiana, page 71, and the map attached to that work.) The information that I have received is, that, being oppressed by the nations residing on the Missouri, they removed to the upper part of the river Platte, where they afterwards had but little intercourse with the whites. They seem to have given name to the northern branch of that river, which is still called the Paducas fork. The most probable conjecture is, that, being still further reduced, they have divided into small wandering bands, which assumed the names of the sub-divisions of the Paducas nation, and are known to us at present under the appellation of Wetepahatoes, Kiawas, Kanenavish, Katteka, Dotame, &c. who still inhabit the country to which the Paducas are said to have removed. The majority of my information led me to believe that these people spoke different languages, but other and subsequent information has induced me to doubt the fact.

Historical Sketches of the several Indian tribes in Louisiana, south of the Arkansas river, and between the Mississippi and river Grande.

CADDOQUES.—Live about thirty-five miles west of the main branch of Red river, on a bayou or creek, called, by them, Sodo, which is navigable for pirogues only, within about six miles of their village, and that only in the rainy season. They are distant from Natchitoches about 120 miles, the nearest route by land, and in nearly a northwest direction. They have lived where they now do, only five years. The first year they moved there, the small pox got amongst them, and destroyed nearly one half of them; it was in the winter season, and they practised plunging into the creek, on the first appearance of the irruption, and died in a few hours. Two years ago they had the measles, of which several more of them died. They formerly lived on the south bank of the river, by the course of the river 375 miles higher up, at a beautiful prairie, which has a clear lake of good water in the middle of it, surrounded by a pleasant and fertile country, which had been the residence of their ancestors from time immemorial. They have a traditionary tale, which not only the Caddoes, but half a dozen other smaller nations believe in, who claim the honor of being descendants of the same family; they say, when all the world was drowning by a flood, that inundated the whole country, the Great Spirit placed on an eminence, near this lake, one family of Caddoes, who alone were saved; from that family all the Indians originated.

The French, for many years before Louisiana was transferred to Spain, had, at this place, a fort and some soldiers; several French families were likewise settled in the vicinity, where they had erected a good flour mill, with burr stones brought from France. These French families continued there till about twenty-five years ago, when they moved down and settled at Compti, on the Red river, about twenty miles above Natchitoches, where they now live; and the Indians left it about fourteen years ago, on account of a dreadful sickness that visited them. They settled on the river nearly opposite where they now live, on a low place, but were drove from there on account of its overflowing, occasioned by a jam of timber choking the river at a point below them.

The whole number of what they call warriors of the ancient Caddo nation, is now reduced to about one hundred, who are looked upon somewhat like Knights of Malta, or some distinguished military order. They are brave, despise danger or death, and boast that they have never shed white men's blood. Besides these, there are of old men, and strangers who live amongst them, nearly the same number; but there are forty or fifty more women than men. This nation has great influence over the Yattassees, Nandakoes, Nabadaches, Inies or Tackies, Nacogdoches, Keychies, Adaize, and Natchitoches, who all speak the Caddo language, look up to them as their fathers, visit and intermarry among them, and join them in all their wars.

The Caddoes complain of the Choctaws encroaching upon their country; call them lazy, thievish, &c. There has been a misunderstanding between them for several years, and small hunting parties kill one another when they meet.

The Caddoes raise corn, beans, pumpkins, &c. but the land on which they now live is prairie, of a white clay soil, very flat; their crops are subject to injury, either by too wet or too dry a season. They have horses, but few of any other domestic animal, except dogs; most of them have guns, and some of them have rifles. They, and all other Indians that we have any knowledge of, are at war with the Osages. The country, generally, round the Caddoes, is hilly, not very rich; growth, a mixture of oak, hickory, and pine, interspersed with prairies, which are very rich, generally, and fit for cultivation. There are creeks and springs of good water frequent.

YATTASSEES.—Live on Bayou river. (or Stony creek) which falls into Red river, western division, about fifty miles above Natchitoches. Their village is in a large prairie, about half way between the Caddoes and Natchitoches, surrounded by a settlement of French families. The Spanish Government, at present, exercise jurisdiction over this settlement, where they keep a guard of a non-commissioned officer and eight soldiers. A few months ago, the Caddo chief, with a few of his young men, were coming to this place to trade, and came that way, which is the usual road; the Spanish officer of the guard threatened to stop them from trading with the Americans, and told the chief, if he returned that way with goods, he should take them from him. The chief and his party were very angry, and threatened to kill the whole guard; and told them, that that road had been always theirs, and that, if the Spaniards attempted to prevent their using it, as their ancestors had always done, he would soon make it a bloody road. He came here, purchased the goods he wanted, and might have returned another way, and avoided the Spanish guard, and was advised to do so, but he said he would pass by them, and let them attempt to stop him if they dare. The guard said nothing to him as he returned. This settlement, till some few years ago, used to belong to the district of Natchitoches, and the rights to their lands given by the Government of Louisiana, before it was ceded to Spain. Its now being under the Government of Texas, was only by an agreement between the commandant of Natchitoches and the commandant of Nacogdoches. The French formerly held a station and factory there, and another on the Scbine river, nearly a hundred miles northwest from the Bayou Pierre settlement. The Yattassees now say the French used to be their people, and now the Americans; but of the ancient Yattassees there are but eight men remaining, and twenty-five women, besides children; but a number of men of other nations have intermarried with them, and live together. I paid a visit at their village the last summer; there were about forty men of them altogether. Their original language differs from any other; but now, all speak Caddo. They live on rich land, raise plenty of corn, beans, pumpkins, tobacco, &c. have horses, cattle, hogs, and poultry.

NANAKOES.—Live on the Sabine river, sixty or seventy miles to the westward of the Yattassees, near where the French formerly had a station and factory. Their language is Caddo; about forty men of them only remaining. A few years ago they suffered very much by the small pox. They consider themselves the same as Caddoes, with whom they intermarry, and are occasionally visiting one another in the greatest harmony; have the same manners, customs, and attachments.

ADAIZE.—Live about forty miles from Natchitoches, below the Yattassees, on a lake called Lac Macdon, which communicates with that division of Red river that passes by Bayou Pierre; they live at, or near, where their ancestors have lived from time immemorial. They being the nearest nation to the old Spanish fort, or mission of Adaize, that place was named after them, being about twenty miles from them, to the south. There are now but twenty men of them remaining, but more women. Their language differs from all other, and is so difficult to speak, or understand, that no other nation can speak ten words of it; but they all speak Caddo, and most of them French, to whom they were always attached, and joined them against the Natchez Indians. After the massacre of Natchez, in 1798, while the Spaniards occupied the post of Adaize, their priests took much pains to proselyte these Indians to the Roman Catholic religion, but, I am informed, were totally unsuccessful.

ALICHE, (commonly pronounced Eyeish.)—Live near Nacogdoches, but are almost extinct as a nation, not being more than twenty-five souls of them remaining; four years ago the small pox destroyed the most of them. They were some years ago a considerable nation, and lived on a bayou which bears their name, which the road from Natchitoches to Nacogdoches crosses about twelve miles west of Sabine river, on which a few French and American families are settled. Their native language is spoken by no other nation; but they speak and understand Caddo, with whom they are in amity, often visiting one another.

KEYES, or KEYCHES.—Live on the east bank of Trinity river, a small distance above where the road from Natchitoches to St. Antoine crosses it. There are of them sixty men; have their peculiar native language, but mostly now speak Caddo, intermarry with them, and live together in much harmony, formerly having lived near them on the head waters of the Sabine. They plant corn, and some other vegetables.

INIES, or TACHIES, (called indifferently by both names.) From the latter name, the name of the province of Tachus or Texas is derived. The Inies live about twenty-five miles west of Natchitoches, on a small river, a branch of the Sabine, called the Natchez; they are like all their neighbors, diminishing; but have now eighty men. Their ancestors, for a long time, lived where they now do. Their language the same as that of the Caddoes, with whom they are in great amity. These Indians have a good character, live on excellent land, and raise corn to sell.

NABEDACHES.—Live on the west side of the same river, about fifteen miles above them; have about the same number of men; speak the same language; live on the best of land; raise corn in plenty; have the same manners, customs, and attachments.

BEDIES.—Are on the Trinity river, about sixty miles to the southward of Nacogdoches; have one hundred men; are good hunters for deer, which are very large and plenty about them; plant, and make good crops of corn; language differs from all other, but speak Caddo; are a peaceable quiet people, and have an excellent character for their honesty and punctuality.

ACOKESAWS.—Their ancient town, and principal place of residence, is on the west side of the Colorado, or Rio Rouge, about two hundred miles southwest of Nacogdoches, but often change their place of residence for a season; being near the bay, make great use of fish, oysters, &c. kill a great many deer, which are the largest and fattest in the province; and their country is universally said to be inferior to no part of the province, in soil, growth of timber, goodness of water, and beauty of surface; have a language peculiar to themselves, but have a mode of communication by dumb signs, which they all understand. Number, about eighty men. Thirty or forty years ago, the Spaniards had a mission there, but broke it up, and moved it to Nacogdoches; they talk of resettling it, and speak in the highest terms of the country.

MAYES.—Live on a large creek, called St. Gabriel, on the bay of St. Bernard, near the mouth of Gaudaloupe river; are estimated at two hundred men; never at peace with the Spaniards, towards whom they are said to possess a fixed hatred; but profess great friendship for the French, to whom they have been strongly attached since Monsieur de Salle landed in their neighborhood. The place where there is a talk of the Spaniards opening a new port, and making a settlement, is near them, where the party, with the Governor of St. Antoine, who were there last fall to examine it, say they found the remains of a French block-house. Some of the cannon now at Labahie are said to have been brought from that place, and known by the engravings now to be seen on them. The French speak highly of these Indians, for their extreme kindness and hospitality to all Frenchmen who have been amongst them. Have a language of their own, but speak Attakapas, which is the language of their neighbors the Carankouas; they have likewise a way of conversing by signs.

CARANKOUAS.—Live on an island, or peninsula, in the bay of St. Bernard, in length about ten miles, and five in breadth; the soil extremely rich and pleasant, on one side of which there is a high bluff or mountain of coal, which has been on fire for many years, affording always a light at night, and a strong thick smoke by day, by which vessels are sometimes deceived, and left on the shoaly coast, which shoals are said to extend nearly out sight of land. From this burning coal there is emitted a gummy substance, the Spaniards call Cheta, which is thrown on the shore by the surf, and collected by them in considerable quantities, which they are fond of chewing; it has the appearance and consistence of pitch, of a strong aromatic, and not disagreeable smell. These Indians are irreconcilable enemies to the Spaniards, always at war with them, and kill them whenever they can. The Spaniards call them cannibals, but the French give them a different character, who have always been treated kindly by them, since Monsieur de Salle, and his party, were in their neighborhood. They are said to be five hundred men strong; but I have not been able to estimate their numbers from any very accurate information; in a short time, expect to be well informed. They speak the Attakapas language, are friendly and kind to all other Indians, and, I presume, are much like all others, notwithstanding what the Spaniards say of them, for nature is every where the same.

Last summer an old Spaniard came to me from Labahie, a journey of about 500 miles, to have a barked arrow taken out of his shoulder, that one of these Indians had shot in it. I found it under his shoulder blade, near nine inches, and had to cut a new place to get at the point of it, in order to get it out the contrary way from that in which it had entered. It was made of a piece of an iron hoop, with wings like a fluke and an inch.

CANCES, are a very numerous nation, consisting of a great many different tribes, occupying different parts of the country, from the bay of St. Bernard, across river Grande, towards La Vera Cruz. They are not friendly to the Spaniards, and generally kill them when they have an opportunity. They are attached to the French; are good hunters, principally using the bow. They are very particular in their dress, which is made of neatly dressed leather; the women wear a long loose robe, resembling that of a Franciscan friar; nothing but their heads and feet are to be seen. The dress of the men is straight leather leggings, resembling pantaloons, and a leather hunting shirt or frock. No estimate can be made of their number.

Thirty or forty years ago, the Spaniards used to make slaves of them when they could take them; a considerable number of them were brought to Natchitoches, and sold amongst the French inhabitants, at forty or fifty dollars a head, and a number of them are still living here, but are now free. About twenty years ago, an order came from the King of Spain that no more Indians should be made slaves, and those that were enslaved should be emancipated; after which, some of the women, who had been servants in good families, and taught spinning, sewing, &c. as well as managing household affairs, married natives of the country, and became respectable, well behaved women; and have now, grown up, decent families of children, have a language peculiar to themselves, and are understood by signs by all others. They are in amity with all other Indians except the Hietans.

TANKAWAYS, or TANKS, as the French call them, have no land, nor claim the exclusive right to any, nor have any particular place of abode, but are always moving, alternately occupying the country watered by the Trinity, Braees, and Colorado, towards Santa Fé. Resemble in their dress the Cances and Hietans; but all in one horde or tribe. Their number of men is estimated at about two hundred; are good hunters; kill buffalo and deer with the bow; have the best breed of horses; are alternately friends and enemies of the Spaniards. An old trader lately informed me, that he had received five thousand deer skins from them in one year, exclusive of tallow, rugs, and tongues. They plant nothing, but live upon wild fruits and flesh. Are strong athletic people, and excellent horsemen.

TAWAKENOS, or THREE CANES. They are called by both names indifferently, live on the west side of the Braees, but are often, for months at a time, lower down than their usual place of residence, in the great plain on the Tortuga, or Turtle, called so, from its being a hill in the prairie, which, at a distance, appears in the form of a Turtle, upon which there is some remarkable springs of water. Their usual residence is about two hundred miles to the westward of Nacogdoches, towards Santa Fé. They are estimated at two hundred men; are good hunters; have guns, but hunt principally with the bow; are supplied with goods from Nacogdoches, and pay for them in rugs, tongues, tallow, and skins.

They speak the same language of the Panis, or Towiaches, and pretend to have descended from the same ancestors.

PANIS, or TOWIACHES. The French call them, Panis, and the Spaniards Towiaches; the latter is the proper Indian name. They live on the south bank of the Red river, by the course of the river upwards of eight hundred miles above Natchitoches, and by land, by the nearest path, is estimated at about three hundred and forty. They have two towns near together; the lower town, where the chief lives, is called Witcheta, and the other is called Towaahack. They call their present chief the Great Bear; they are at war with the Spaniards, but friendly to those French and American hunters who have lately been among them; they are, likewise, at war with the Osages, as are every other nation. For many hundreds of miles around them, the country is rich prairie, covered with luxuriant grass, which is green, summer and winter, with skirts of wood on the river bank, by the springs and creeks.

They have many horses and mules; they raise more corn, pumpkins, beans, and tobacco, than they want for their own consumption; the surpluse they exchange with the Hietans, for buffalo rugs, horses, and mules; the pumpkins they cut round in their shreds, and when it is in a state of dryness, that it is so tough it will not break, but bend, they put and work it into large mats, in which state they sell it to the Hietans, who, as they travel, cut off, and eat it, as they want it. Their tobacco they manufacture and cut as fine as tea, which is put into leather bags of a certain size, and is, likewise, an article of trade. They have but few guns, and very little ammunition; what they have they keep for war, and hunt with the bow; their meat is principally buffalo; seldom kill a deer, though they are so plenty they come into their villages, and about their houses, like a domestic animal. Elk, bear, wolves, antelope, and wild hogs, are likewise plenty within their country, and white rabbits or hares, as well as the common rabbit; white bears sometimes come down among them, and wolves of all colors. The men go entirely naked, and the women nearly so, only wearing a small flap, of a piece of skin. They have a number of Spaniards amongst them, of a fair complexion, taken from the settlement of Santa Fé when they were children, who live as they do, and have no knowledge of where they came from. Their language differs from that of any other nation, the Tawakenoes excepted. Their present number of men is estimated at about four hundred. A great number of them, four years ago, were swept off by the small pox.

HIEANS or COMANCHES, who are likewise called by both names, have no fixed place of residence; have neither towns nor villages—divided into so many different hordes or tribes, that they have scarcely knowledge of one another. No estimate of their numbers can well be made; they never remain in the same place more than a few days, but follow the buffalo, the flesh of which is their principal food; some of them occasionally purchase of the Panis, corn, beans, and pumpkins, but they are so numerous, any quantity of these articles the Panis are able to supply them with, must make but a small proportion of their food. They have tents made of neatly dressed skins, fashioned in form of a cone, sufficiently roomy for a family of ten or twelve persons; those of the chiefs will contain, occasionally, fifty or sixty persons. When they stop, their tents are pitched in very exact order, so as to form regular streets and squares, which, in a few minutes, has the appearance of a town, raised, as it were, by enchantment. And they are equally dexterous in striking their tents and preparing for a march, when the signal is given; to every tent, two horses or mules are allotted, one to carry the tent and the other the poles or sticks, which are neatly made of red cedar; they all travel on horseback; their horses they never turn loose to graze, but always keep them tied with a long cabras or halter, and every two or three days, they are obliged to move, on account of all the grass near them being eaten up, they have such numbers of horses. They are good horsemen, and have good horses, most of which are bred by themselves, and being accustomed, when very young, to be handled, they are remarkably docile and gentle. They sometimes catch wild horses, which are every where amongst them, in immense droves; they hunt down the buffalo on horseback, and kill them, either with the bow or a sharp stick like a spear, which they carry in their hands. They are generally at war with the Spaniards, after committing depredations upon the inhabitants of Santa Fé and St. Antoine, but have always been friendly and civil to any French or Americans who have been amongst them.

They are strong and athletic, and the elderly men as fat as though they had lived upon English beef and porter. It is said, the man who kills a buffalo catches the blood and drinks it while warm; they likewise eat the liver raw, before it is cold, and use the gall by way of sauce. They are, for savages, uncommonly cleanly in their persons; the dress of the women is a long loose robe, that reaches from their chin to the ground, tied round with a fancy sash or girdle, all made of neatly dressed leather, on which they paint figures of different colors and significations. The dress of the men is close leather pantaloons and hunting shirt or frock of the same. They never remain long enough in the same place to plant any thing; the small Cayenne pepper grows spontaneously in the country, with which, and some wild herbs and fruits, particularly a bean that grows in great plenty on a small tree resembling a willow, called Musheto, the women cook their buffalo beef, in a manner that would be grateful to an English squire. They alternately occupy the immense space of country, from the Trinity and Braees, crossing the Red river, to the heads of Arkansas and Missouri, to river Grande, and beyond it, about Santa Fé, and over the dividing ridge on the waters of the Western ocean, where, they say, they have seen large pirogues, with masts to them, in describing which, they make a drawing of a ship, with all its sails and rigging; and they describe a place where they have seen vessels ascending a river, over which was a draw bridge, that opened to give them a passage. Their native language of sounds differs from the language of any other nation, and none can either speak or understand it; but they have a language by signs, that all Indians understand, and by which, they converse much among themselves. They have a number of Spanish men and women among them, who are slaves, and who, they made prisoners when young. An elderly gentleman, now living at Natchitoches, who, some years ago, carried on a trade with the Hietans, a few days ago related to me the following story:

About twenty years ago, a party of these Indians passed over river Grande to Chawawa, the residence of the Governor General of what is called the Five Internal Provinces, lay in ambush for an opportunity, and made prisoner the Governor's daughter, a young lady going in her coach to mass, and brought her off. The Governor sent a message to him, (my informant) with a thousand dollars, for the purpose of recovering his daughter. He immediately despatched a confidential trader, then in his employ, with the one thousand dollars in merchandise, who repaired to the nation, found her, and purchased her ransom, but, to his great surprise, she refused to return with him to her father, and sent by him, the following message: That the Indians had disfigured her face, by tattooing it according to their fancy and ideas of beauty, and a young man of them had taken her for his wife, by whom she believed herself pregnant; that she had become reconciled to their mode of life, and was well treated by her husband; and, that she should be more unhappy by returning to her father, under these circumstances, than by remaining where she was. Which message was conveyed to her father, who rewarded the trader by a present of three hundred dollars more, for his trouble and fidelity, and his daughter is now living with her Indian husband in the nation, by whom she has three children.

NATCHITOCHEES, formerly lived where the town of Natchitoches is now situated, which took its name from them. An elderly French gentleman lately informed me, he remembered when they were six hundred men strong. I believe it is now ninety-eight years since the French first established themselves at Natchitoches; ever since, these Indians have been their steady and faithful friends. After the massacre of the French inhabitants of Natchez, by the Natchez Indians, in 1728, those Indians fled from the French, after being reinforced, and came up Red river, and camped about six miles below the town of Natchitoches, near the river, by the side of a small lake of clear water, and erected a mound of considerable size, where it now remains. Monsieur St. Dennie, a French Canadian, was then commandant at Natchitoches; the Indians called him the Big-foot; were fond of him, for he was a brave man. St. Dennie, with a few French soldiers and what militia he could muster, joined by the Natchitoches Indians, attacked the Natchez in their camp, early in the morning; they defended themselves desperately for six hours, but were at length totally defeated by St. Dennie, and what of them that were not killed in battle, were drove into the lake, where the last of them perished, and the Natchez, as a nation, became extinct. The lake is now called by no other name than the Natchez lake.

There are now remaining of the Natchitoches, but twelve men and nineteen women, who live in a village, about twenty-five miles, by land, above the town which bears their name, near a lake called by the French, Lac de Mûre. Their original language is the same as the Yattasse, but speak Caddo, and most of them French.

The French inhabitants have great respect for this nation, and a number of very decent families have a mixture of their blood in them. They claim but a small tract of land, on which they live, and, I am informed, have the same rights to it from Government, that other inhabitants, in the neighborhood, have. They are gradually wasting away; the small pox has been their great destroyer; they still preserve their Indian dress and habits; raise corn, and those vegetables common in their neighborhood.

BOLUSCAS, are emigrants from near Pensacola; they came to Red river, about forty-two years ago, with some French families, who left that country about the time Pensacola was taken possession of by the English. They were then a considerably numerous tribe, and have generally embraced the Roman Catholic religion, and were very highly esteemed by the French. They settled first at Avoyelles; then moved higher up to Rapide Bayou, about forty miles from Natchitoches, where they now live, and are reduced to about thirty in number. Their native language is peculiar to themselves, but speak Mobilian, which is spoken by all the Indians, from the east side of the Mississippi. They are honest, harmless, and friendly people.

APALACHIES, are likewise emigrants from West Florida, from off the river whose name they bear; came over to Red river, about the same time the Boluscas did, and have since lived on the river, above Bayou Rapide. No nation has been more highly esteemed by the French inhabitants; no complaints against them are ever heard; there are only fourteen men remaining; have their own language, but speak French and Mobilian.

ALABAMAS, are likewise from West Florida, off the Alabama river, and came to Red river about the same time of the Boluscas and Apalachies. Part of them have lived on Red river, about sixteen miles above the Bayou Rapide, till last year, when most of this party, of about thirty men, went up Red river, and have settled themselves near the Caddoquies, where, I am informed, they last year made a good crop of corn. The Caddoes are friendly to them, and have no objection to their settling there; they speak the Creek and Choctaw languages, and Mobilian; most of them French, and some of them English. There is another party of them, whose village is on a small creek in Opelousas district, about thirty miles northwest from the church of Opelousas; they consist of about forty men; they have lived at the same place ever since they came from Florida; are said to be increasing a little in numbers for a few years past; they raise corn, have horses, hogs, and cattle, and are harmless, quiet people.

CONCHATTAS, are almost the same people as the Alabamas, but came over only ten years ago; first lived on Bayou Chico, in Opelousas district, but, four years ago, moved to the river Sabine, settled themselves on the east bank, where they now live, in nearly a south direction from Natchitoches, and distant about eighty miles. They call their number of men one hundred and sixty; but say, if they were all together, they would amount to two hundred; several families of them live in detached settlements; they are good hunters, and game is plenty about where they are.

A few years ago, a small party of them were here, consisting of fifteen persons, men, women, and children, who were on their return from a bear hunt up Sabine; they told me, they had killed one hundred and eighteen, but this year, an uncommon number of bears have come down; one man alone, on Sabine, during the summer and fall hunting, killed four hundred deer; sold his skins at forty dollars a hundred. The bears, this year, are not so fat as common; they usually yield from eight to twelve gallons of oil, which never sells for less than a dollar a gallon, and the skin a dollar more; no great quantity of the meat is saved; what the hunters don't use when out, they generally give to their dogs. The Conchattas are friendly with all other Indians, and speak well of their neighbors, the Carankouas, who, they say, live about eighty miles south of them, on the bay, which, I believe, is the nearest point to the sea, from Natchitoches. A few families of the Choctaws have lately settled near them, from Bayou Boeuf. The Conchattas speak Creek, which is their native language, and Choctaw; and several of them, English, and one or two of them can read it a little.

PACANAS, are a small tribe of about thirty men, who live on Quelqueshoe river, which falls into the bay, between Attakapas and Sabine, which heads in a prairie called Cooko prairie, about forty miles southwest of Natchitoches. These people are likewise emigrants from West Florida, about forty years ago; their village is about fifty miles southeast of the Conchattas; are said to be increasing a little in number; quiet, peaceable, and friendly people; their own language differs from any other, but speak Mobilian.

ATTAKAPAS.—This word, I am informed, when translated into English, means man-eater, but it is no more applicable to them than any other Indians. The district they live in, is called after them; their village is about 20 miles to the westward of the Attakapas church, towards Quelqueshoe; their number of men is about fifty; but some Runicas and Humas, who have married in their nation, and live with them, make them altogether about eighty; they are peaceable and friendly to every body; labor occasionally for the white inhabitants; raise their own corn; have cattle and hogs; their language, and the Carankouas, is the same; they were at, or near, where they now live, when that part of the country was first discovered by the French.

OPELOUSAS.—It is said the word Appalouas, in the Indian language, means black-head, or black-skull. They are aborigines of the district called by their name; their village is about fifteen miles west from the Opelousas church; have about forty men; their native language differs from all others; understand Attakapas, and speak French; plant corn; have cattle and hogs.

TUNICAS.—These People formerly lived on the Bayou Tunica, above point Coupée, on the Mississippi, East side; live now at Avoyelles; do not, at present, exceed twenty-five men. Their native language is peculiar to themselves, but speak Mobilian; are employed occasionally by the inhabitants as boatmen, &c.; in amity with all other People, and gradually diminishing in numbers.

PASCAGOULAS.—Live in a small village on Red river, about sixty miles below Natchitoches; are emigrants from Pascagoula river, in West Florida; twenty-five men only of them remaining; speak Mobilian, but have a language peculiar to themselves; most of them speak and understand French; they raise good crops of corn, and garden vegetables; have cattle, horses, and poultry plenty; their horses are much like the poorer kind of French inhabitants on the river, and appear to live about as well.

TENSAWS.—are likewise emigrants from the Tensaw river, that falls into the bay of Mobile; have been on Red river about forty years; are reduced to about twenty-five men. Their village is within one mile of the Pascagoulas, on the opposite side; but have lately sold their lands, and have, or are about moving, to Bayou Bœuf, about twenty-five miles south from where they lately lived. All speak French and Mobilian; and live much like their neighbors, the Pascagoulas.

CHACTOOS.—Live on Bayou Bœuf, about ten miles to the southward of Bayou Rapide, on Red river, towards Opelousas; a small, honest People; are aborigines of the country where they live; of men about thirty, diminishing; have their own peculiar tongue; speak Mobilian. The lands they claim on Bayou Bœuf, are inferior to no part of Louisiana, in depth and richness of soil, growth of timber, pleasantness of surface, and goodness of water. The Bayou Bœuf falls into the Chaffali, and discharges through Opelousas and Attakapas, into Vermillion bay.

WASHAS.—When the French first came into the Mississippi, this nation lived on an island, to the southwest of New Orleans, called Barataria, and were the first tribe of Indians they became acquainted with, and were always friends; they afterwards lived on Bayou La Fourche; and from being a considerable nation, are now reduced to five persons only, two men and three women, who are scattered in French families; have been many years extinct as a nation, and their language lost.

CHOCTAWS.—There are a considerable number of this nation on the West side of the Mississippi, who have not been home for several years; about twelve miles above the post on Ouachita, on that river, there is a small village of them, of about thirty men, who have lived there for several years, and made corn; and likewise on Bayou Chico, in the northern part of the district of Opelousas; there is another village of them, of about fifty men, who have been there for about nine years, and say they have the Governor of Louisiana's permission to settle there. Besides these, there are rambling hunting parties of them, to be met with all over lower Louisiana. They are at war with the Caddoquies, and liked by neither red nor white People.

ARKANSAS.—Live on the Arkansas river, south side, in three villages, about twelve miles above the post or station. The name of the first village is Tawanima, second Ousolu, and the third Ocapa; in all, it is believed, they do not at present exceed one hundred men, and diminishing. They are at war with the Osages, but friends with all other People, white and red; are the original proprietors of the country on that river, to all which they claim, for about 300 miles above them, to the junction of the river Cadron with Arkansas; above this fork the Osages claim; their language is Osage. They generally raise corn to sell; are called honest and friendly people.

The forementioned, are all the Indian tribes that I have any knowledge of, or can obtain an account of, in Louisiana, south of the river Arkansas, between the Mississippi and the river Grand; at Avoyelles, there did live a considerable tribe of that name, but, as far as I can learn, have been extinct for many years, two or three women excepted, who did lately live among the French inhabitants at Washita. There are a few of the Humas still living on the east side of the Mississippi, in Insussee parish, below Manchac, but scarcely exist as a nation.

That there are errors in these sketches, is not to be doubted; but in all cases out of my own personal knowledge, I have endeavored to procure the best information, which I have faithfully related; and I am confident, any errors that do exist, are too unimportant to affect the object for which they are intended.

I am, sir, &c. &c.

JOHN SIBLEY.

Natchitoches, April 5, 1805.

General H. DEARBORN.

NATCHITOCHEs, 10th April, 1805.

SIR:

You request me to give you some account of Red river, and the country adjacent; I will endeavor to comply with your request, to the best of my knowledge and capacity; my personal knowledge of it, is only from its mouth to about seventy or eighty miles above Natchitoches, being by the course of the river near four hundred miles. After that, what I can say of it is derived from information from others, on whose veracity I have great reliance, principally from Mr. Francis Grappe, who is my assistant, and interpreter of Indian languages; whose father was a French officer, and superintendent of Indian affairs, at a post or station occupied by France, where they kept some soldiers, and had a factory, previous to the cession of Louisiana to Spain; situated nearly five hundred miles, by the course of the river, above Natchitoches, where he, my informant, was born, and lived upwards of thirty years; his time, during which, being occupied alternately as an assistant to his father, an Indian trader and hunter; with the advantage of some learning, and a very retentive memory, acquired an accurate knowledge of the river, as well as the languages of all the different Indian tribes in Louisiana; which, with having been Indian interpreter, for the Spanish Government, for many years past, and (I believe) deservedly esteemed by the Indians, and all others, a man of strict integrity, has, for many years, and does now, possess their entire confidence, and a very extensive influence over them. And I have invariably found, that whatever information I have received from him, has been confirmed by every other intelligent person having a knowledge of the same, with whom I have conversed.

NOTE.—Contrary to geographical rules, as I ascended the river, I called the right bank the northern one, and the left the southern.

The confluence of Red river with the Mississippi is, by the course of the latter, estimated about two hundred and twenty miles from New Orleans. Descending the Mississippi, after passing the Spanish line at the thirty-first degree of north latitude, it makes a remarkable turn to the westward, or nearly northwest, for some distance before you arrive at the mouth of Red river, as though, notwithstanding the immense quantity of its waters, already, from its almost numberless tributary streams, it was still desirous of a farther augmentation, by hastening its union with Red river, (which perhaps is second only in dignity to it) that they might from thence flow on, and join the ocean together, which for many leagues is forced to give place to its mighty current. But there are reasons for believing the Red river did not always unite with the Mississippi, as it does at present; and that no very great length of time has elapsed, since the Mississippi left its ancient bed, some miles to the eastward, and took its course westwardly, for the purpose of intermarrying with Red river. The mouth of the Chaffali, which is now, properly speaking, one of the outlets of the river Mississippi to the ocean, is just below, in sight of the junction of Red river with the Mississippi, and, from its resemblance to Red river, in size, growth on its banks, appearance and texture of soil, and differing from that of the Mississippi, induces strongly the belief, that the Chaffali was once but the continuation of Red river to the ocean; and that it had in its bed no connexion with the Mississippi. There is no doubt but the Mississippi has alternately occupied different places in the low ground, through which it meanders almost from the high lands of one side, to those of the other, for the average space of nearly thirty miles. These two great rivers, happening to flow from a distance through the same mass of swamp, that annually is almost all inundated, it is not extraordinary that their channels should find their way together; the remarkable bend of the Mississippi at this place, to the westward, seems to have been for the express purpose of forming this union; after which, it returns to its former course.

In the month of March, 1803, I ascended Red river from its mouth to Natchitoches, in an open boat, unless, when I chose to land, and walk across a point, or by the beauty of the river bank, the pleasantness of its groves, or the variety of its shrubs and flowers, I was invited ashore to gratify or please my curiosity. On entering the mouth of the river, found its waters turgid, of a red color, and of a brackish taste; and as the Mississippi was then falling, and Red river rising, found a current from its mouth upwards, varying considerably in places, but averaging about two miles an hour, for the first hundred miles, which at that time I found to be about the same in the Mississippi; but when that river is high, and Red river low, there is very little current in the latter, for sixty or seventy miles. The river for that distance is very crooked, increasing the distance by it, from a straight line, more than two-thirds, the general course of it nearly west: that I was able to ascertain, from hearing the morning gun at fort Adams, for three or four mornings after entering the river, which was not at the greatest height by about fourteen feet, and all the low grounds, for nearly seventy miles, entirely overflowed, like those of the Mississippi, which in fact is but a continuation of the same. Some places appeared, by the high water mark on the trees, to overflow not more than two or three feet, particularly the right bank, below the mouth of Black river, and the left bank above it; the growth, on the lowest places, willow and cotton wood, but on the highest, handsome oaks, swamp hickory, ash, grape-vines, &c. I made my calculation of our rate of ascent, and distances up the river, by my watch, noting carefully with my pencil the minute of our stops and settings off, the inlets and outlets, remarkable bends in the river, and whatever I observed any way remarkable. About six miles from the mouth of the river, left side, there is a bayou, as it is called, comes in, that communicates with a lake called lake Long, which by another bayou communicates again with the river, through which, when there is a swell in the river, boats can pass, and cut off about thirty miles, being only fourteen or fifteen through it, and about forty-five by the course of the river; and through the lake there is very little or no current, but the passage is intricate and difficult to find; a stranger should not attempt it without a pilot; people have been lost in it for several days; but not difficult for one acquainted; we, having no pilot on board to be depended on, kept the river. From the mouth of Red river, to the mouth of Black river, I made it thirty-one miles; the water of Black river is clear, and when contrasted with the water of Red river, has a black appearance. From the mouth of Black river, Red river makes a regular twining to the left, for about eighteen miles, called the Grand Bend, forming a segment of nearly three-fourths of a circle, when you arrive at the bayou, that leads into lake Long, which perhaps is in a right line, not exceeding fifteen miles from the mouth of the river. From bayou lake Long to Avoyelles landing, called Baker's landing, I made thirty-three miles, and the river is remarkably crooked. At this place the guns at fort Adams are distinctly heard, and the sound appears to be but little south of east; we came through a bayou called Silver bayou, that cut off, we understand, six miles; 'twas through the bayou about four miles. Until we arrived at Baker's landing, saw no spot of ground that did not overflow the high water marks, generally from three to fifteen feet above its banks. After passing Black river, the edge of the banks near the river are highest; the land falls from the river back. At Baker's landing I went ashore. I understood, from Baker's landing across the point, to La Glass' landing, was only three or four miles, and by water fifteen; but I found it six at least, and met with some difficulty in getting from where I landed to the high land, at Baker's house, for water; though at low water, it is a dry cart road, and less than a mile. I found Baker and his family very hospitable and kind; Mr. Baker told me he was a native of Virginia, and had lived there upwards of thirty years. He was living on a tolerable good high piece of land, not prairie, but joining it; after leaving Baker's house, was soon in sight of the prairie, which I understood is about forty miles in circumference, longer than it is wide, very level, only a few clumps of trees to be seen, all covered with good grass. The inhabitants are settled all around the out edge of it, by the woods, their houses facing inwards, and cultivate the prairie land; though the soil, when turned up with the plough, has a good appearance, what I could discover by the old corn and cotton stalks, they made but indifferent crops; the timbered land that I saw cleared and planted, produced the best; the prairie is better for grass than for planting. The inhabitants have considerable stocks of cattle, which appear to be their principal dependence, and I was informed their beef is of a superior quality; they have likewise good pork; hogs live very well; the timbered country all round the prairie is principally oak, that produces good mast for hogs; corn is generally scarce; they raise no wheat, for they have no mills. I was informed that the lower end of the prairie, that I did not see, was much the richest land, and the inhabitants lived better, and were more wealthy: they are a mixture of French, Irish, and Americans, generally poor and ignorant. Avoyelles, at high water, is an island, elevated thirty or forty feet above high water mark; the quantity of timbered land exceeds that of the prairie, which is likewise pretty level, but scarcely a second quality of soil. La Glass' landing, as it is called, I found about a mile and a half from the upper end of the prairie; the high lands bluff to the river. After leaving this place, found the banks rise higher and higher on each side, and fit for settlements; on the right side, pine woods sometimes in sight; I left the boat again, about eight miles from La Glass' landing, right side, walked two and an half miles across a point, to Mr. Hoome's; round the point is called sixteen miles. I found the lands through which I passed, high, moderately hilly; the soil a good second quality, clay, timber, large oak, hickory, some short leaved pine, and several small streams of clear running water. This description of lands extended back five or six miles, and bounded by open pine woods, which continue for thirty miles to Ocatahola. I found Mr. Hoome's house on a high bluff, very near the river; his plantation the same description of lands through which I had passed, producing good corn, cotton, and tobacco, and he told me he had tried it in wheat, which succeeded well, but having no mills to manufacture it, had only made the experiment; Mr. Hoomes told me all the lands round his, for many miles, were vacant. On the south side there is a large body of rich, low grounds, extending to the borders on Opelousas, watered and drained by Bayou Robert and Bayou Bœuf, two handsome streams of clear water, that rise in the high lands, between Red river and Sabine, and, after meandering through this immense mass of low grounds, of thirty or forty miles square, fall into the Chaffeli, to the southward of Avoyelles: I believe, in point of soil, growth of timber, goodness of water, and conveniency to navigation, there is not a more valuable body of land in this part of Louisiana. From Mr. Hoome's to the mouth of Rapide Bayou, is by the river thirty-five miles; a few scattering settlements on the right side, but none on the left; the right is preferred to settle on, on account of their stocks being convenient to the high lands; but the settlers on the right side own the lands on the left side too. The lands on the Bayou Rapide are the same quality as those on Bayou Robert and Bœuf, and in fact are a continuation of the same body of lands. Bayou Rapide is somewhat in the form of a half moon, the two points or horns meeting the river about twenty miles from each other; the length of the Bayou is about thirty miles; on the back of it there is a large Bayou falls in, on which there is a saw-mill, very advantageously situated in respect to a never failing supply of water, plenty of timber, and the plank can be taken from the mill tail by water. This Bayou is excellent water; rises in the pine woods, and discharges itself each way into the river by both ends of Bayou Rapide. Boats cannot pass through the Bayou from the river, to the river again, on account of rafts of timber choking the upper end of it; but can enter the lower end, and ascend it more than half through it. On the lower end of the Bayou, on each side, is the principal Rapide settlement, as it is called. No country whatever can exhibit handsomer plantations or better lands.

The Rapide is a fall or shoal, occasioned by a soft rock in the bed of the river, that extends from side to side; over which, for about five months in the year, viz: from July to December, there is not sufficient water for boats to pass without lightening; but at all other seasons it is the same as any other part of the river. This rock, or hard clay, for it resembles the latter almost as much as the former, is so soft it may be cut away with a penknife, or any sharp instrument, and scarcely turn the edge, and extends up and down the river but a few yards; and I have heard several intelligent persons give it as their opinion, that the extraordinary expense and trouble the inhabitants were at, in one year, in getting loaded boats over this shoal, would be more than sufficient to cut a passage through it: but it happens at a season of the year when the able planters are occupied at home, and would make no use of the river, were there no obstructions in it; but, at any rate, the navigation of the river is clear a longer proportion of the year than the rivers in the northern countries are clear of ice. But this obstruction is certainly removable at a very trifling expense, in comparison to the importance of having it done; and nothing but the nature of the Government we have lately emerged from, can be assigned as a reason for its not having been effected long ago.

After passing the rapids, there are very few settlements to be seen, on the main river, for about twenty miles, though both sides appeared, to me, to be capable of making as valuable settlements as any on the river; we arrive, then, at the Indian villages, on both sides situated exceedingly pleasant, and on the best lands. After passing which, you arrive at a large, beautiful plantation, of Mr. Gillard; the house is on a point of a high pine woods bluff, close to the river, sixty or seventy feet above the common surface of the country, overlooking, on the east, or opposite side, very extensive fields, of low grounds, in high cultivation, and a long reach of the river up and down; and there is an excellent spring of water issues from the bluff, on which the house is situated, from an aperture in the rock, that seems to have been cloven on purpose for it to flow; and, a small distance, back of the house, there is a lake of clear water, abounding with fish in summer, and fowl in winter. I have seen, in all my life, very few more beautiful or advantageously situated places.

Six miles above Mr. Gillard's, you arrive at the small village of Bolusca Indians, where the river is divided into two channels, forming an island of about fifty miles in length, and three or four in breadth; the right hand division is called the Rigula de Bondieu, on which are no settlements; but, I am informed, will admit of being well settled; the left hand division is the boat channel, at present, to Natchitoches; the other is, likewise, boatable. Ascending the left hand branch, for about twenty-four miles, we pass a thick settlement, and a number of wealthy inhabitants; this is called the River-cane settlement, called so, I believe, from the banks, some years ago, being a remarkably thick cane brake.

After passing this settlement, of about forty families, the river divides again, forming another island, of about thirty miles in length, and from two to four in breadth, called the Ile Brevel, after a reputable old man, now living in it, who first settled it. This island is sub-divided by a bayou, that communicates from one river to the other, called also Bayou Brevel. The middle division of the river is called Little river, and is thickly settled, and the best channel; the westward division of the river is called False river; is navigable, but not settled; the banks are too low; it passes through a lake called Lac Accassa. When you arrive at Natchitoches, you find it a small, irregular, and meanly built village, half a dozen houses excepted; on the west side of that division of the river it is on, the high pine and oak woods approach within two or three hundred yards of the river. In the village are about forty families; twelve or fifteen are merchants, or traders, nearly all French. The fort built by our troops, since their arrival, called fort Claiborne, is situated on a small hill, one street from the river, and about thirty feet higher than the river banks; all the hill is occupied by the fort and barracks, and does not exceed two acres of ground. The southern and eastern prospects from it are very beautiful; one has an extensive view of the fields and habitations down the river, and the other a similar view over the river, and of the whole village. This town, thirty or forty years ago, was much larger than at present, and situated on a hill about half a mile from its present site; then, most of the families of the district lived in the town; but finding it inconvenient, on account of the stocks and farms, they filed off, one after another, and settled up and down the river; the merchants and trading people, finding being on the bank of the river more convenient for loading and unloading their boats, left the hill on that account; and others, finding the river ground much superior for gardens, to which they are in the habit of paying great attention, followed the merchants; after them, the priests and commandant; then, the church and jail, (or Callaboose) and now nothing of the old town is left, but the form of their gardens and some ornamental trees. It is now a very extensive common of several hundred acres, entirely tufted with clover, and covered with sheep and cattle. The hill is a stiff clay, and used to make miry streets; the river soil, though much richer, is of a sandy loose texture; the streets are neither miry, nor very dirty. Our wells do not afford us good water, and the river water, in summer, is too brackish to drink, and never clear; our springs are about half a mile back from the river; but the inhabitants, many of them, have large cisterns, and use, principally, rain water, which is preferred to the spring water; the planters, along on the river, generally, use rain water; though, when the river is high, and the water taken up and settled, in large earthen jars, (which the Indian women make, of good quality, and at a moderate price) it can be drank tolerably well, but makes bad tea.

Near Natchitoches, there are two large lakes, one within a mile, the other six miles, to the nearest parts; one of them is fifty or sixty miles in circumference, the other upwards of thirty; these lakes rise and fall with the river. When the river is rising, the bayous that connect with the lakes run into the lakes, like a mill tail, till the lakes are filled; and when the river is falling, it is the same the contrary way, just like the tide, but only annual. On these creeks good mills might be erected; but the present inhabitants know nothing of mills by water, yet have excellent cotton gins, worked by horses. I do not know a single mechanic, in the district, who is a native of it, one tailor excepted; every thing of the kind is done by strangers, and mostly Americans. Though Natchitoches has been settled almost one hundred years, it is not more than twelve or fifteen years since they ever had a plough, or a flat to cross the river with; both which were introduced by an Irish Pennsylvanian, under a similar opposition to the Copernican system. 'Tis almost incredible the quantity of fish and fowl these lakes supply; it is not uncommon, in winter, for a single man to kill from two to four hundred fowl in one evening; they fly between sun-down and dark; the air is filled with them; they load and fire, as fast as they can, without taking any particular aim, continuing at the same stand, till they think they have killed enough, and then pick up what they have killed; they consist of several kinds of duck, geese, brant, and swan. In summer, the quantities of fish are nearly in proportion; one Indian will, with a bow and arrow, sometimes, kill them faster, than another, with two horses, can bring them in; they weigh, some of them, thirty or forty pounds. The lakes, likewise, afford plenty of shells for lime, and, at low water, the greater of them is a most luxuriant meadow, where the inhabitants fatten their horses. All around these, above high water mark, there is a body of rich land, generally wide enough for a field; on the bank of one of them there is plenty of stone coal and several quarries of tolerable good building stone; at high water, boats can go out of the river into them. Similar lakes are found, all along Red river, for five or six hundred miles; which, besides the uses already mentioned, nature seems to have provided as reservoirs for the immense quantity of water beyond what the banks of the river will contain; otherwise, no part of them could be inhabited; the low grounds, from hill to hill, would be inundated.

About twelve miles north of Natchitoches, on the north east side of the river, there is a large lake, called Lac Moir; the bayou of it communicates to the Rigula de Bondieu, opposite Natchitoches, which is boatable the greater part of the year. Near this lake are the salt works, from which all the salt, that is used in the district, is made; and which is made with so much ease that two old men, both of them cripples, with ten or twelve old pots and kettles, have, for several years past, made an abundant supply of salt for the whole district; they inform me that they make six bushels per day; I have not been at the place, but have a bottle of the water, brought to me, which I found nearly saturated; the salt is good; I never had better bacon than I make with it. I am informed there are twelve saline springs now open; and by digging for them, for aught any one knows, twelve hundred might be opened. A few months ago, Captain Burnet, of the Mississippi territory, coming to this place by Washington, came by the salt works, and purchased the right of one of the old men he found there, and has, lately, sent up a boat, with some large kettles and some negroes, under the direction of his son; and expects, when they get all in order, to be able to make thirty or forty bushels a day. Captain Burnet is of opinion that he shall be able to supply the Mississippi territory, and the settlements on Mississippi, from Point Coupée, upwards, lower than they can get it in New Orleans and bring it up. Cathartic salts and magnesia might, likewise, be made, in large quantities, if they understood it. The country all round the Saline and Black lake is vacant; and from thence to Washita, a distance of 120 miles, which, I am informed, affords considerable quantities of well timbered good uplands, and well watered. There is a small stream, we cross, on the Washita road, the English call Little river, the French Dogûmona, affording a wide rich bottom; this stream falls into the Acatahola lake; from thence to Washita, it is called Acatahola river; its course is eastwardly, and falls into Washita, near the mouth of Tensaw, where the road, from Natchitoches to Natchez, crosses it; from the confluence of these three rivers, downwards, it is called Black river, which falls into Red river, sixty miles below. There is a good salt spring near the Acatahola lake.

Ascending Red river, above Natchitoches, in about three miles, arrive at the upper mouth of the Rigula de Bondieu; there are settlements all along, plantations adjoining. From the upper mouth of the Rigula de Bondieu, the river is in one channel through the settlement of Grand Ecore, of about six miles; it is called Grand Ecore,

(or, in English, the Great Bluff) being such an one on the left hand side, near one hundred feet high. The face, next the river, almost perpendicular, of a soft, white rock; the top, a grand loam, of considerable extent, on which grow large oaks, hickory, black cherry, and grape vines. At the bottom of one of these bluffs, for there are two near each other, is a large quantity of stone-coal, and, near them, several springs of the best water in this part of the country; and a lake of clear water within two hundred yards, bounded by a gravelly margin. I pretend to have no knowledge of military tactics, but think, from the river in this place being all in one channel, the goodness of the water, a high, healthy country, and well timbered all round it, no height, near it, so high, its commanding the river, and a very public ferry just under it, and at a small expense, would be capable of great defence with a small force. The road from it to the westward, better than from Natchitoches, and, by land, only about five miles above it, and, near it, plenty of good building stone. These advantages it possesses beyond any other place, within my knowledge, on the river, for a strong fort, and safe place of deposit. Just above the bluff, the river makes a large bend to the right, and a long reach nearly due east and west by it; the bluff overlooks, on the opposite side, several handsome plantations. I have been induced, from the advantages this place appeared to me to possess, to purchase it, with four or five small settlements adjoining it, including both bluffs, the ferry, springs, and lake, the stone quarries, and coal; and a field of about five hundred acres of the best low grounds, on the opposite side. After leaving Grand Ecore, about a mile, on the east side, comes in a large bayou, from the Spanish lake, as it is called, boatable the greater part of the year. This lake is said to be about fifty miles in circumference, and rises and falls with the river, into which, from the river, the largest boats may ascend, and from it, up the mouths of several large bayous that fall into it, for some distance; one, in particular; called bayou Dupong, up which boats may ascend within one and a half mile of old fort Adaize. Leaving this bayou about two miles, arrive at a fork or division of the river; the left hand branch bears westwardly for sixty or 80 miles; the eastwardly meeting the branch it left, after forming an island of about one hundred miles long, and, in some places, nearly thirty miles wide. Six or seven years ago, boats used to pass this way into the main river again, its communication with which being above the great raft or obstruction; but it is now choked, and requires a portage of three miles; but, at any season, boats can go from Natchitoches, about eighty miles, to the place called the point, where the French had a factory, and a small station of soldiers, to guard the Indian trade, and is now, undoubtedly, a very eligible situation for a similar establishment. The country bounded to the east and north, by this branch or division of the river, is called the bayou Pierre settlement, which was begun, and some of the lands granted, before Louisiana was ceded to Spain by France, and continued under the jurisdiction of the commandant of Natchitoches until about twenty years ago, when, by an agreement between a Mr. Vogene, the commandant of this place, and a Mr. Eliberbe, commandant at Natchitoches, the settlement called bayou Pierre was placed under the jurisdiction of the latter, and has so continued ever since. The settlement, I believe, contains about forty families, and, generally, they have large stocks of cattle; they supply us with our cheese entirely, and of a tolerable quality, and we get from them some excellent bacon hams.

The country is interspersed with prairies, resembling, as to richness, the river bottoms, and in size from five to five thousand acres. The hills are a good grey soil, and produce very well, and afford beautiful situations. The creek called Bayou Pierre (Stony creek) passes through the settlement, and affords a number of good mill seats, and its bed and banks lined with a good kind of building stone; but no mills are erected on it. Some of the inhabitants have tried the uplands in wheat, which succeeded well; they are high, gently rolling, and rich enough; produce good corn, cotton, and tobacco. I was through the settlement in July last, and found good water, either from a spring or well, at every house. The inhabitants are all French, one family excepted. A few miles to the westward, towards Sabine, there is a saline where the inhabitants go and make their salt. On the whole, for health, good water, good living, plenty of food, and every kind of animal, general conveniency, and handsome surface, I have seen few parts of the world more inviting to settlers.

Returning back again to the fork of the main river we left, for the purpose of exploring the Bayou Pierre branch, we find irregular settlements, including Compti, where a few families are settled together on a hill near the river, northeast side. For about twenty miles, the river land is much the same every where; but the Compti settlement is more broken with bayous and lagoons than any place I am acquainted with on the river; and for want of about a dozen bridges, is inconvenient to get to, or travel through. The upper end of this settlement is the last on the main branch of Red river, which, straight by land, does not exceed twenty-five miles above Natchitoches. At the Upper House, the great raft or jam of timber begins; this raft chokes the main channel for upwards of one hundred miles by the course of the river; not one entire jam from the beginning to the end of it, but only at the point, with places of several leagues that are clear. The river is very crooked, and the low grounds are wide and rich; and I am informed no part of Red river will afford better plantations than along its banks by this raft, which is represented as being so important as to render the country above it of little value for settlements. This opinion is founded entirely upon incorrect information. The first or lowest part of the raft is at a point or bend in the river, just below the upper plantation; at which, on the right side, a large bayou, or division of the river, called Bayou Channo, comes in, which is free of any obstructions; and, the greater part of the year, boats of any size may ascend it into lake Bistino, through which, to its communication with the lake, is only about three miles; the lake is about sixty miles long, and lies nearly parallel with the river; from the upper end of which it communicates again with the river, by a bayou called Daichet, about forty miles above the upper end of the raft; from the lake to the river, through bayou Daichet, is called nine miles; there is always in this bayou sufficient water for any boat to pass; from thence, upwards, Red river is free of all obstructions to the mountains. By lake Bistino and these two bayous an island is formed, about seventy miles long, and three or four wide, capable of affording settlements inferior to none on the river. From the above account you will perceive, that the only difficulty in opening a boat passage by this raft, through the lake, which is much shorter than by the course of the river, and avoid the current, and, indeed, was the river unobstructed, would always be preferred, is this small jam of timber at the point, just below the bayou Channo, as it is called. After the receipt of your letter, I had an opportunity of seeing some of the inhabitants who live near this place, who informed me that that small raft was easily broken, and that they had lately been talking of doing it. I persuaded them to make the attempt, and they accordingly appointed the Friday following, and all the neighbors were to be invited to attend, and assist. They met accordingly, and effected a passage next to one bank of the river, so that boats could pass; but did not entirely break it; they intend to take another spell at it, when the water falls a little, and speak confidently of succeeding.

The country about the head of lake Bistino is highly spoken of, as well the high lands as the river bottom. There are falling into the river, and lake in the vicinity, some handsome streams, of clear wholesome water, from towards Washita, one in particular, called bayou Badkah by the Indians, which is boatable at some seasons; this bayou passes through a long, narrow, and rich prairie, on which, my informant says, five hundred families might be desirably settled. And from thence up to where the Caddoes lately lived, the river banks are high, bottoms wide and rich as any other part of the river; from thence, it is much the same to the mouth of the Little river at the left. This river is generally from fifty to a hundred yards wide, heads in the great prairies south of Red river, and interlocks with the head branches of the Sabine and Trinity rivers, and in times of high water is boatable forty or fifty leagues, affording a large body of excellent, well timbered, and rich land; the low grounds from three to six miles wide. But the quality of the water, though clear, is very inferior to that of the streams that fall into Red river on the north side. The general course of Red river from this upwards is nearly from west to east, till we arrive at the Panis towns, when it turns northwardly. After leaving the mouth of the little river of the left, both banks are covered with strong thick cane, for about twenty miles; the low grounds very wide, rich, and do not overflow; the river widening in proportion as the banks are less liable to overflow; you arrive at a handsome rich prairie, twenty-five miles long, on the right side, and four or five miles wide, bounded by handsome oak and hickory woods, mixed with some short leaved pine, interspersed with pleasant streams and fountains of water. The opposite, or left side, is a continuation of thick cane; the river, or low lands, ten or twelve miles wide. After leaving the prairie, the cane continues for about forty miles; you then arrive at another prairie, called Little Prairie, left side, about five miles in length, and from two to three in breadth; opposite side continues cane as before; low grounds wide, well timbered, very rich, and overflow but little; the river still widening. Back of the low grounds is a well timbered, rich, upland country, gently rolling, and well watered. From the little prairie, both banks cane for ten or twelve miles, when the oak and pine woods come bluff to the river for about five miles; left hand side, cane as before, then the same on both sides, from ten to twenty miles wide, for about fifteen miles, when the cedar begins on both sides, and is the principal growth on the wide, rich river bottom, for forty miles. In all the world there is scarcely to be found a more beautiful growth of cedar timber; they, like the cedars of Libanus, are large, lofty, and straight.

You now arrive at the mouth of the little river of the right. This river is about one hundred and fifty yards wide; the water clear as chrystal; the bottom of the river stony, and is boatable, at high water, up to the great prairies, near two hundred miles by the course of the river; the low grounds generally from ten to fifteen miles wide, abounding with the most luxuriant growth of rich timber, but subject to partial inundation at particular rainy seasons. After leaving this river, both banks of Red river are cane, as before, for about twenty miles, when you come to the round prairie, right side, about five miles in circumference. At this place, Red river is fordable at low water; a hard stony bottom, and is the first place from its mouth where it can be forded. This round prairie is high and pleasant, surrounded by handsome oak and hickory uplands; left side, cane as before, and then the same both sides for twenty miles, to the long prairie, left side, forty miles long; opposite, cane as before. Near the middle of this prairie, there is a lake of about five miles in circumference, in an oval form, neither tree or shrub near it, nor stream of water running either in or out of it; it is very deep, and the water so limpid that a fish may be seen fifteen feet from the surface. By the side of this lake the Caddoques have lived from time immemorial. About one mile from the lake is the hill on which, they say, the Great Spirit placed one Caddo family, who were saved when, by a general deluge, all the world were drowned; from which family all the Indians have originated. To this little, natural eminence, all the Indian tribes, as well as the Caddoques, for a great distance, pay a devout and sacred homage. Here the French, for many years before Louisiana was ceded to Spain, had erected a small fort, kept some soldiers to guard a factory they had here established for the Indian trade, and several French families were settled in the vicinity, built a flour mill, and cultivated wheat successfully for several years; and it is only a few years ago that the mill irons and mill stones were brought down. It is about twenty-five years since those French families moved down, and fourteen years since the Caddoques left it. Here is another fording place when the river is low. On the opposite side, a point of high oak, hickory, and pine land comes bluff to the river for about a mile; after which, thick cane to the upper end of the prairie; then the same on both sides for about twelve miles; then prairie on the left side for twenty miles; opposite side cane; then the same for thirty miles; then an oak high bluff three miles; cane again for about the same distance on both sides; then, for about one league, left side, is a beautiful grove of pecans, intermixed with no other growth; after which cane both sides for forty miles; then prairie, left side, for twenty miles, and from one to two miles only in breadth; about the middle of which comes in a bayou of clear running water about fifty feet wide; then cane again both sides of the river for about forty miles; then, on the right side, a point of high pine woods, bluff to the river for about half a mile; cane again fifteen or sixteen miles; then a bluff of large white rocks for about half a mile, near a hundred feet high; cane again about forty-five miles, to a prairie on the right side, of about thirty miles long, and twelve or fifteen miles wide; there is a thin skirt of wood along the bank of the river, that, when the leaves are on the trees, the prairie is, from the river, scarcely to be seen. From the upper end of this prairie, it is thick cane for about six miles, when we arrive at the mouth of Bayou Galle, which is on the right side, about thirty yards wide, a beautiful, clear, running stream of wholesome well-tasted water; after passing which, it is thick cane again for twenty-five miles, when we arrive at a river that falls in on the right side, which is called by the Indians Kiomitchie, and by the French La Riviere la Mine, or Mine river, which is about one hundred and fifty yards wide, the water clear and good, and is boatable about sixty miles to the silver mine, which is on the bank of the river, and the ore appears in large quantities, but the richness of it is not known. The Indians inform of their discovering another, about a year ago, on a creek that empties into the Kiomitchie, about three miles from its mouth, the ore of which, they say, resembles the other. The bottom land of this river is not wide, but rich; the adjoining high lands are rich, well timbered, well watered and situated. About the mine the current of the river is too strong for boats to ascend it, the country being hilly. After passing the Kiomitchie, both banks of the river are covered with thick cane for twenty-five miles, then, left side, a high pine bluff appears again to the river for about half a mile; after which nothing but cane again on each side for about forty miles, which brings you to the mouth of a handsome bayou, left side, called by the Indians Nahaucha, which, in English, means the Kick; the French call it Bois d'Arc, or Bow-wood creek, from the large quantity of that wood that grows upon it. On this bayou, trappers have been more successful in catching beaver than on any other water of Red river; it communicates with a lake, three or four miles from its mouth, called Swan lake, from the great number of swans that frequent it. It is believed that this bayou is boatable, at high water, for twenty or thirty leagues, from what I have been informed by some hunters with whom I have conversed, who have been upon it. The low grounds are from three to six miles wide, very rich; the principal growth on it is the bois d'arc. The great prairies approach pretty near the low grounds on each side of this creek; leaving which it is cane both sides for about eight miles, when we arrive at the mouth of the Vazzures, or Boggy river, which is about two hundred yards wide, soft miry bottom, the water whitish, but well tasted. Attempts have been made to ascend it in pirogues, but it was found to be obstructed by a raft of logs, about twenty miles up it. The current was found to be gentle, and depth of water sufficient; was the channel not obstructed, might be ascended far up it. The low grounds on this river are not as wide as on most of the rivers that fall into Red river, but very rich; the high lands are a strong clay soil; the principal growth oak. After leaving this river the banks of Red river are alternately cane and prairie; timber is very small and scattered along only in places; it is now only to be seen along the water courses. From the Boggy river to the Blue river is about fifty miles, which comes in on the right side. The water of this river is called blue, from its extreme transparency; it is said to be well tasted, and admired, for its quality, to drink. The bed of this river is lined generally with black and greyish flint stones; it is about fifty yards wide, and represented as a beautiful stream; pirogues ascend it about sixty or seventy miles. The low grounds of Blue river are a good width for plantations, very rich; the growth pecan, and every species of walnut. The whole country here, except on the margin of the water courses, is one immense prairie. After passing this river, copses of wood only are to be seen here and there along the river bank for about twenty-five miles, to a small turbid river, called by the Indians Bahachaha, and by the French Fauxacheta; some call it the Missouri branch of Red river; it emits a considerable quantity of water; runs from north to south, and falls into Red river, nearly at right angles, and heads near the head of the Arkansas, and is so brackish it cannot be drank. On this river, and on a branch of the Arkansas, not far from it, the Indians find the salt rock; pieces of it have often been brought to Natchitoches by hunters, who procured it from the Indians.

From the mouth of this river, through the prairie, to the main branch of the Arkansas, is three days journey, perhaps sixty or seventy miles in a straight line; from this to the Panis or Towiache towns, by land, is about thirty miles, and by water, double the distance; the river is near a mile wide. The country on each side, for many hundreds of miles, is all prairie, except a skirt of wood along the river bank, and on the small streams; what trees there are, are small; the grass is green, summer and winter. In between thirty-three and thirty-four degrees of north latitude, the soil is very rich, producing luxuriantly every thing that is planted in it. The river from this upwards, for one hundred and fifty miles, continues at least a mile wide, and may be ascended in pirogues.

Mr. Grappe, to whom I am indebted for the foregoing accurate description of Red river, informed me, that his personal knowledge of it did not extend but little above the Panis towns; but Mr. Brevel, of the Isle Brevel, who was born at the Caddo old towns, where he was, had been further up it; and that whatever account he gave me, might be relied on.

I therefore sought an opportunity, a few days after, to obtain from Mr. Brevel the following narrative, which I wrote down from his own mouth as he related it:

"About forty years ago, I sat off on foot, from the Panis nation (who then lived about fifty leagues above where they now live) in company with a party of young Indian men, with whom I had been partly raised, on a hunting voyage, and to procure horses. We kept up on the south side of Red river, as near it as we could conveniently cross the small streams that fell in, sometimes at some distance, and at others very near it, in sight of it. We found the country all prairie, except small copses of wood, cedar, cotton or musketo, amongst which, a stick six inches in diameter, could not be found; the surface becoming more and more light, sandy, and hilly, with ledges of cliffs of a greyish sandy rock, but every where covered with herbage. We found many small streams falling into the river, but none of any considerable size, or that discharged much water in dry seasons, but many deep gulleys formed by the rain water. After travelling for several days over a country of this description, the country became more broken, the hills rising into mountains, amongst which, we saw a great deal of rock salt, and an ore, the Indians said was my (meaning the white people's) treasure; which I afterwards learnt was silver; and that amongst these mountains of mines, we often heard a noise like the explosion of cannon, or distant thunder, which the Indians said was the spirit of the white people, working in their treasure; which I afterwards was informed, was the blowing of the mines, as it is called, which is common in all parts of Spanish America where mines exist. The main branch of the river becoming smaller, till it divided into large innumerable streams, that issued out of the valleys amongst these mountains; the soil very light and sandy, of a reddish grey color. We travelled on from the top of one mountain to the top of another, in hopes the one we were ascending was always the last, till the small streams we met with ran the contrary way, towards the setting sun, and the lands declined that way. We continued on till the streams enlarged into a river of considerable size, and the country became level, well timbered, the soil rich black loam; the waters were all clear and well tasted. Here we found a great many different tribes of the Hietan, Apaches, and Concee Indians; we likewise fell in with them frequently, from the time we had been a few days out from the Panis towns, and were always treated kindly by them.

"I believe the distance from the Panis towns to where we saw the last of Red river, is at least a hundred leagues; and that in crossing over the ridge, we saw no animals that were not common in all the interior of Louisiana, except the spotted tiger, and a few white bears. After spending some days on the Western waters, we set off for the settlements of Santa Fé; steering nearly a southeast course, and in a few days, were out of the timbered country into prairie; the country became broken and hilly; the waters all running westwardly; the country clothed with a very luxuriant herbage, and frequently passing mines of silver ore. We arrived, at length, at a small meanly built town, in the Santa Fé settlement, containing about one hundred houses, round which were some small cultivated fields, fenced round with small cedars, and musketo brush wattled in stakes; this little town was on a small stream of water that ran westwardly, that in a dry season did scarcely run at all; and that the inhabitants were obliged to water their cattle from wells; and I understand, that the Bayou upon which this town is situated, was no part of Rio Grande, but fell into the Western ocean; but of that I might have been mistaken. I understood that similar small towns or missions were within certain distances of each other, for a great extent southwardly, towards Mexico, and that the inhabitants were mostly christianised Indians and Maitiffs; that the mines in that settlement afforded very rich ore, which was taken away in large quantities, packed on mules, and had the same appearance of what we met with, about the head branches of Red river. After furnishing ourselves with horses at this place, we sat off again for the Panis towns, from whence we started; steering at first southwardly, in order to avoid a high mountainous country that is difficult to cross, that lies between Santa Fé and Red river; after travelling some distance south, we turned our course again northeastwardly, and arrived at the Panis towns in eighteen days from the day we left Santa Fé settlements, and in three months and twenty days from the time we started."

He is of the opinion that, from the Panis towns to Santa Fé, in a right line, is nearly three hundred miles; and all the country prairie, a few scattering cedar knobs excepted. After he had finished his narrative, I asked him how far Red river was boatable. He said, not much above the Panis old towns; not that he knew of any particular falls or obstructions, but that the head branches of the river came from steep mountains, on which the rain often poured down in torrents, and runs into the river with such velocity, sweeping along with it large quantities of loose earth, of which these hills and mountains are composed, that it rolls like a swell in the sea, and would either sink or carry along with it, any boat that it might meet in the river. But, he observed at the same time, that his opinion was founded on no experiment that he had ever known made. I asked him, if the Indians had no pirogues high up in the river. He told me, that the Indians there knew nothing of the use of them; for instead of their being, for hundreds of miles, a tree large enough for a canoe, one could scarcely be found large enough to make a fowl trough. I asked him what animals were found in the great prairies. He told me, that from Blue river, upwards, on both sides of Red river, there were innumerable quantities of wild horses, buffalo, bears, wolves, elk, deer, foxes, sangers or wild hogs, antelope, white hares, rabbits, &c. and on the mountains, the spotted tiger, panther, and wild cat. He farther told me, that, about twenty-three years ago, he was employed by the Governor of St. Antoine, to go from that place into some of the Indian nations who lived towards Santa Fé, who were at war with the Spaniards, to try to make a peace with them, and bring in some of the chiefs to St. Antoine. He sat off from that place with a party of soldiers, and was to have gone to Santa Fé; they passed on a northwardly course for about two hundred miles, but after getting into the great prairie, being a dry season, they were forced to turn back, for want of water for themselves and horses, and that he does not know how near he went to Santa Fé, but believes he might have been half way.

The accounts given by Mr. Brevel, Mr. Grappe, and all other hunters with whom I have conversed, of the immense droves of animals that, at the beginning of winter, descend from the mountains down southwardly, into the timbered country, is almost incredible. They say the buffalo and bear particularly, are in droves of many thousands together, that blacken the whole surface of the earth, and continue passing, without intermission, for weeks together, so that the whole surface of the country is, for many miles in breadth, trodden like a large road.

I am, sir, &c.

JOHN SIBLEY.

A description of the Washita river, in Louisiana, and the country bordering thereon.—Compiled from the Journals of William Dunbar, Esq. and Dr. Hunter.

Observations made in a voyage, commencing at St. Catherine's landing, on the east bank of the Mississippi, proceeding downwards to the mouth of the Red river; and from thence, ascending that river, the Black river, and the Washita river, as high as the Hot Springs, in the proximity of the last mentioned river. Extracted from the journals of William Dunbar, Esquire, and Doctor Hunter.

Mr. Dunbar, Dr. Hunter, and the party employed by the United States, to make a survey of, and explore, the country traversed by the Washita river, left St. Catherine's Landing, on the Mississippi, in latitude  $31^{\circ} 26' 30''$ , north, and longitude  $6h. 5' 56''$ , west, from the meridian of Greenwich, on Tuesday, the 16th of October, 1804. A little distance below St. Catherine's creek, and five leagues from Natchez, they passed the White cliffs, composed chiefly of white sand, surmounted by pine, and from one hundred to two hundred feet high. When the waters of the Mississippi are low, the base of the cliff is uncovered; which consists of different colored clays, and some beds of ochre, over which there lies, in places, a thin lamina of iron ore. Small springs, possessing a petrifying quality, flow over the clay and ochre; and numerous logs and pieces of timber, converted into stone, are strewed about the beach. Fine pure argil, of various colors, chiefly white and red, is found here.

On the 17th, they arrived at the mouth of Red river, the confluence of which, with the Mississippi, agreeably to the observations made by M. de Ferrer, lies in latitude  $31^{\circ} 1' 15''$ , north, and longitude  $6h. 7' 11''$ , west of Greenwich. Red river is here about five hundred yards wide, and without any sensible current. The banks of the river are clothed with willow; the land low, and subject to inundation, to the height of thirty feet, or more, above the level of the water at this time. The mouth of the Red river is accounted to be seventy five leagues from New Orleans, and three miles higher up than the Chafalayas or Opelousas river, which was probably a continuation of the Red river when its waters did not unite with those of the Mississippi but during the inundation.

On the 18th, the survey of the Red river was commenced, and, on the evening of the 19th, the party arrived at the mouth of the Black river, in latitude  $31^{\circ} 15' 48''$ , north, and about twenty-six miles from the Mississippi. The Red river derives its name from the rich fat earth, or marl of that color, borne down by the floods; the last of which appeared to have deposited on the high bank a stratum, upwards of half an inch in thickness. The vegetation on its banks is surprisingly luxuriant, no doubt owing to the deposition of marl, during its annual floods. The willows grow to a good size; but other forest trees are much smaller than those seen on the banks of the Mississippi. As you advance up the river, it gradually narrows; in latitude  $31^{\circ} 8'$ , north, it is about two hundred yards wide, which width is continued to the mouth of Black river; where, each of them appears one hundred and fifty yards across. The banks of the river are covered with pea vine, and several sorts of grass bearing seed, which geese and ducks eat very greedily; and there are generally seen willows growing on one side, and, on the other, a small growth of black oak, packawn, hickory, elm, &c. The current in the Red river is so moderate, as scarcely to afford an impediment to its ascent.

On sounding the Black river, a little above its mouth, there was found twenty feet of water, with a bottom of black sand. The water of Black river is rather clearer than that of the Ohio, and of a warm temperature, which it may receive from the water flowing into it from the valley of the Mississippi, particularly by the Catahoola. At noon, on the 23d, by a good meridian observation, they ascertained their latitude to be  $30^{\circ} 36' 29''$ , north, and were then a little below the mouths of the Catahoola, Washita, and Bayou Tensa, the united waters of which form the Black river. The current is very gentle the whole length of the Black river, which, in many places, does not exceed eighty yards in width. The banks on the lower part of the river present a great luxuriance of vegetation and rank grass, with red and black oak, ash, packawn, hickory, and some elms.\* The soil is black marl, mixed with a moderate proportion of sand, resembling much the soil on the Mississippi banks; yet, the forest trees are not lofty, like to those on the margin of the Great river, but resembling the growth on the Red river. In latitude  $31^{\circ} 22' 46''$ , north, they observed that canes grew on several parts of the right bank; a proof that the land is not deeply overflowed; perhaps from one to three feet. The banks have the appearance of stability, very little willow, or other productions of a newly formed soil, being seen on either side. On advancing up the river, the timber becomes larger, some places rising to the height of forty feet; yet, the land is liable to be inundated, not from the waters of this small river, but from the intrusion of its more powerful neighbor, the Mississippi. The lands decline rapidly, as in all alluvial countries, from the margin to the Cypress swamps, where more or less water stagnates all the year round.

On the 21st, they passed a small, but elevated island, said to be the only one on this river, for more than one hundred leagues ascending. On the left bank, near this island, a small settlement, of a couple of acres, has been begun by a man and his wife. The banks are not less than forty feet above the present level of the water in the river, and are but rarely overflowed: on both sides they are clothed with rich cane-brake, pierced by creeks, fit to carry boats during the inundation.

* Among the plants growing on the margin of the river, is the China root, used in medicine, and the cantac, occasionally used by the hunters for food; the last has a bulbous root, ten times the size of a man's fist. In preparing it, they first wash it clean from earth, then pound it well, and add water to the mass, and stir it up; after a moment's settlement, the water and fecula is poured off. This operation is repeated till it yields no more fecula, the fibrous part only being left, which is thrown away as useless. The water is then poured from the sediment, which is dried in the sun, and will keep a long time. It is reduced into powder, and mixed with Indian meal or flour, and makes wholesome and agreeable food. The labor is performed by the women whilst they are keeping the camp, and their husbands are in the woods hunting.

They saw many cormorants, and the hooping crane; geese and ducks are not yet abundant, but are said to arrive in myriads with the rains, and winter's cold. They shot a fowl of the duck kind, whose web-foot was partially divided, and the body covered with a bluish or leadcolored plumage. On the morning of the 22d, they observed green matter floating on the river, supposed to come from the Catahoola, and other lakes and bayous of stagnant water, which, when raised a little by rain, flow into the Black river; and, also, many patches of an aquatic plant, resembling small islands; some floating on the surface, and others adhering to, or resting on, the shore and logs. On examining this plant, it was found to have a hollow jointed stem, with roots of the same form, extremely light, with very narrow willow-shaped leaves projecting from the joint, embracing, however, the whole of the tube, and extending to the next inferior joint or knot: the extremity of each branch is terminated by a spike of very slender narrow seminal leaves, from one to two inches in length, and one-tenth, or less, in breadth, producing its seed on the underside of the leaf, in a double row, almost in contact; the grains alternately placed in perfect regularity. Not being able to find the flower, its class and order could not be determined, although it is not probably new. Towards the upper part of the Black river, the shore abounded with muscles and periwinkles. The muscles were of the kind called pearl muscles: the men dressed and ate a quantity of them, considering them as an agreeable food; but Mr. D. found them tough and unpalatable.

On arriving at the mouth of the Catahoola, they landed to procure information from a Frenchman settled there. Having a grant from the Spanish Government, he has made a small settlement, and keeps a ferry-boat, for carrying over men and horses, travelling to or from Natchez, and the settlements on Red river, and on the Washita river. The country here, is all alluvial. In process of time, the rivers shutting up ancient passages, and elevating the banks over which their waters pass, no longer communicate with the same facility as formerly; the consequence is, that many large tracts, formerly subject to inundation, are now entirely exempt from that inconvenience. Such is the situation of a most valuable tract upon which this Frenchman is settled; his house stands on an Indian mount, with several others in view; there is, also, a species of rampart, surrounding this place, and one very elevated mount, a view and description of which is postponed till the return, their present situation not allowing of the requisite delay. The soil is equal to the best Mississippi bottoms; there is an embankment running from the Catahoola to Black river, (enclosing about 200 acres of rich land) at present about 10 feet high, and 50 feet broad; this surrounds four large mounds of earth, at the distance of a bow shot from each other; each of which may be 20 feet high, 100 feet broad, and 300 feet long on the top; besides a stupendous turret, situate on the back part of the whole, or farthest from the water, whose base covers about an acre of ground, rising by two steps or stories tapering in the descent; the whole surmounted by a great cane, with its top cut off. This tower of earth, on a measurement, was found to be 80 feet perpendicular.

They obtained from the French settler, the following list of distances between the mouth of Red river and the post on the Washita, called fort Miro:

From this place, they proceeded to the mouth of the Washita, in latitude 35° 37' 7" N. and encamped on the evening of the 23d.

This river derives its appellation from the name of an Indian tribe, formerly resident on its banks; the remnant of which, it is said, went into the great plains to the Westward, and either compose a small tribe themselves, or are incorporated into another nation. The Black river loses its name at the junction of the Washita, Catahoola, and Tensa, although our maps represent it as taking place of the Washita. The Tensa and Catahoola are also named from Indian tribes, now extinct; the latter is a creek twelve leagues long, which is the issue of a lake of the same name, eight leagues in length, and about two leagues in breadth. It lies West, from the mouth of the Catahoola, and communicates with the Red river during the great annual inundation. At the west or northwest angle of the lake, a creek called Little river enters, which preserves a channel with running water at all seasons, meandering along the bed of the lake; but in all other parts, its superficialities, during the dry season, from July to November, and often later, is completely drained, and becomes covered with the most luxuriant herbage; the bed of the lake then becomes the residence of immense herds of deer, of turkeys, geese, crane, &c. which feed upon the grass and grain. Bayou Tensa serves only to drain off a part of the waters of the inundation from the low lands of the Mississippi, which here communicate with the Black river during the season of high water.

Between the mouth of the Washita, and Villemont's prairie on the right, the current of the river is gentle, and the banks favorable for towing. The lands, on both sides, have the appearance of being above the inundation; the timber generally such as high lands produce, being chiefly red, white, and black oaks, interspersed with a variety of other trees. The magnolia grandiflora, that infallible sign of the land not being subject to inundation, is not however among them. Along the banks, a stratum of solid clay, or marl, is observable, apparently of an ancient deposition; it lies in oblique positions, making an angle of nearly thirty degrees with the horizon, and generally inclined with the descent of the river, although, in a few cases, the position was contrary; timber is seen projecting from under the solid bank, which seems indurated, and unquestionably very ancient, presenting a very different appearance from recently formed soil. The river is about eighty yards wide. A league above the mouth of the Washita, the Bayou Ha-ha, comes in unexpectedly from the right, and is one of the many passages through which the waters of the great inundation penetrate, and pervade all the low countries, annihilating, for a time, the currents of the lesser rivers in the neighborhood of the Mississippi. The vegetation is remarkably vigorous along the alluvial banks, which are covered with a thick shrubbery, and innumerable plants, in full blossom at this late season.

Villemont's prairie is so named, in consequence of its being included within a grant under the French Government, to a gentleman of that name. Many other parts on the Washita are named after their early proprietors. The French people projected and began extensive settlements on this river; but the general massacre planned, and in part executed, by the Indians, against them, and the consequent destruction of the Natchez tribe by the French, broke up all these undertakings, and they were not re-commenced under that Government. Those prairies are plains or savannas, without timber, generally very fertile, and producing an exuberance of strong, thick, and coarse herbage. When a piece of ground has once got into this state, in an Indian country, it can have no opportunity of re-producing timber; it being an invariable practice to set fire to the dry grass in the fall or winter, to obtain the advantage of attracting game, when the young tender grass begins to spring; this destroys the young timber, and the prairie annually gains upon the woodland. It is probable that the immense plains, known to exist in America, may owe their origin to this custom. The plains of the Washita lie chiefly on the east side; and being generally formed like the Mississippi lands, sloping from the bank of the river to the great river, they are more or less subject to inundation in the rear, and in certain great floods, the water has advanced so far, as to be ready to pour over the margin into the Washita; this has now become a very rare thing, and it may be estimated that, from a quarter of a mile, to a mile in depth, will remain free from inundation during high floods. This is pretty much the case with those lands, nearly as high as the post of the Washita, with the exception of certain ridges of primitive high land; the rest being evidently alluvial, although not now subject to be inundated by the Washita river, in consequence of the great depth which the bed of the river has acquired by abrasion. On approaching towards the bayou Louis, which empties its waters into the Washita on the right, a little below the rapids, there is a great deal of high land on both sides, which produces pine and other timber, not the growth of inundated lands. At the foot of the rapids, the navigation of the river is impeded by beds of gravel formed in it. The first rapids lie in latitude  $31^{\circ} 48' 57.5''$  North, a little above which, there is a high ridge of primitive earth, studded with abundance of fragments of rock or stone, which appears to have been thrown up to the surface in a very irregular manner. The stone is of a friable nature, some of it having the appearance of indurated clay; the outside is blackish from exposure to the air; within, it is of a greyish white. It is said, that, in the hill, the strata are regular, and that good grindstones may be here obtained. The last of the rapids, which is formed by a ledge of rocks crossing the entire bed of the river, was passed in the evening of the 27th; above it, the water became again like a mill-pond, and about one hundred yards wide. The whole of these first shoals or rapids embraced an extent of a mile and a half; the obstruction was not continual, but felt at short intervals in this distance. On the right, about four leagues from the rapids, they passed the 'bayou aux Bœufs,' a little above a rocky hill; high land and savanna is seen on the right. On sounding the river, they found three fathoms water on a bottom of mud and sand. The banks of the river, above the bayou, seem to retain very little alluvial soil; the high land earth, which is a sandy loam of a light grey color, with streaks of red sand and clay, is seen on the left bank; the soil not rich, bearing pines, interspersed with red oak, hickory, and dogwood. The river is from sixty to one hundred yards wide here, but decreases as you advance. The next rapid is made by a ledge of rocks traversing the river, and narrowing the water channel to about thirty yards. The width between the high banks cannot be less than one hundred yards, and the banks from thirty to forty feet high. In latitude  $32^{\circ} 10' 13''$  rapids and shoals again occurred, and the channel was very narrow; the sand bars at every point extended so far into the bend, as to leave little more than the breadth of the boat of water sufficiently deep for her passage; although it spreads over a width of seventy or eighty yards upon the shoal.

In the afternoon of the 31st, they passed a little plantation, or settlement, on the right, and at night arrived at three others, adjoining each other. These settlements are on a plain, or prairie, the soil of which, we may be assured, is alluvial, from the regular slope which the land has from the river. The bed of the river is now sufficiently deep to free them from the inconvenience of its inundation; yet, in the rear, the waters of the Mississippi approach, and sometimes leave dry, but a narrow strip along the bank of the river. It is, however, now more common, that the extent of the fields cultivated (from a quarter to half a mile) remains dry during the season of the inundation. The soil is here very good, but not equal to the Mississippi bottoms; it may be esteemed second rate. At a small distance to the east are extensive cypress swamps, over which the waters of the inundation always stand, to the depth of from fifteen to twenty-five feet. On the west side, after passing over the valley of the river, whose breadth varies from a quarter of a mile to two miles, or more, the land assumes a considerable elevation, from one hundred to three hundred feet, and extends all along to the settlements of the Red river. These high lands are reported to be poor, and badly watered, being chiefly what is termed pine barren. There is here a ferry and road of communication between the post of the Washita and the Natchez; and a fork of this road passes on to the settlement called the Rapids, on Red river, distant from this place, by computation, one hundred and fifty miles.

On this part of the river lies a considerable tract of land, granted by the Spanish Government to the Marquis of Maison Rouge, a French emigrant, who bequeathed it, with all his property, to Mr. Bouigny, son of the late Colonel of the Louisiana regiment, and by him sold to Daniel Clarke. It is said to extend from the post of the Washita, with a breadth of two leagues, including the river, down to the Bayou Calumet; the computed distance of which, along the river, is called thirty leagues, but supposed not more than twelve, in a direct line.

On the 6th of November, in the afternoon, the party arrived at the post of the Washita, in lat.  $32^{\circ} 29' 37.25''$  north, where they were politely received by Lieut. Bowmar, who immediately offered the hospitality of his dwelling, with all the services in his power.

From the ferry to this place, the navigation of the river is, at this season, interrupted by many shoals and rapids. The general width is from eight to a hundred yards. The water is extremely agreeable to drink, and much clearer than that of the Ohio. In this respect it is very unlike its two neighbors, the Arkansas and Red rivers, whose waters are loaded with earthy matters of a reddish-brown color, giving to them a chocolate-like appearance; and, when those rivers are low, their waters are not palatable, being brackish, from the great number of salt-springs which flow into them, and probably from the beds of rock-salt over which they may pass. The banks of the river presented very little appearance of alluvial land, but furnished an infinitude of beautiful landscapes, heightened by the vivid coloring they derive from the autumnal change of the leaf. Mr. Dunbar observes, that the change of color in the leaves of vegetables, which is probably occasioned by the oxygen of the atmosphere acting on the vegetable matter, deprived of the protecting power of its vital principle, may serve as an excellent guide to the naturalist who directs his attention to the discovery of new objects for the use of the dyer. For, he has always remarked, that the leaves of those trees whose bark or wood is known to produce a dye, are changed in autumn to the same color which is extracted in the dyer's vat from the woods; more especially by the use of alum, or some other mordant, which yields oxygen: thus, the foliage of the hickory and oak, which produces the Quercitron bark, is changed, before its fall, into a beautiful yellow; other oaks assume a fawn color, a liver color, or a blood color, and are known to yield dyes of the same complexion.

In about lat.  $32^{\circ} 18' N$ . Dr. Hunter discovered, along the river side, a substance nearly resembling mineral coal; its appearance was that of the carbonated wood described by Kirwan. It does not easily burn; but, on being applied to the flame of a candle, it sensibly increased it, and yielded a faint smell, resembling, in a slight degree, that of the gum lac of common sealing wax.

Soft friable stone is common, and great quantities of gravel and sand upon the beaches in this part of the river. A reddish clay appears in the strata, much indurated, and blackened by exposure to the light and air.

The position called fort Miro, being the property of a private person, who was formerly civil commandant here, the lieutenant has taken post about four hundred yards lower; has built himself some log houses, and enclosed them within a slight stockade. Upon viewing the country east of the river, it is evidently alluvial; the surface has a gentle slope from the river to the rear of the plantations. The land is of excellent quality, being a rich black mould, to the depth of a foot, under which there is a friable loam of a brownish liver color.

At the post of the Washita, they procured a boat of less draught of water than the one in which they ascended the river thus far. At noon, on the 11th of November, they proceeded on the voyage; and in the evening encamped at the plantation of Baron Bastrop.

This small settlement on the Washita, and some of the creeks falling into it, contains not more than five hundred persons, of all ages and sexes. It is reported, however, that there is a great quantity of excellent land upon these creeks, and that the settlement is capable of extension, and may be expected, with an accession of population, to become very flourishing. There are three merchants settled at the post, who supply, at very exorbitant prices, the inhabitants with their necessaries; these, with the garrison, two small planters, and a tradesman or two, constitute the present village. A great portion of the inhabitants continue the old practice of hunting, during the winter season, and they exchange their peltry for necessaries with the merchants, at a low rate. During the summer, these people content themselves with raising corn, barely sufficient for bread during the year. In this manner they always remain extremely poor. Some few, who have conquered that habit of indolence, which is always the consequence of the Indian mode of life, and attend to agriculture, live more comfortably, and taste a little the sweets of civilized life.

The lands along the river, above the post, are not very inviting, being a thin, poor soil, and covered with pine wood. To the right, the settlements on the Bayou Barthelemi, and Siard, are said to be on rich land.

On the morning of the 13th, they passed an island, and a strong rapid, and arrived at a little settlement below a chain of rocks, which cross the channel between an island and the main land, called Roque-raw. The Spaniard, and his family, settled here, appear, from their indolence, to live miserably. The river acquires here a more spacious appearance, being about one hundred and fifty yards wide. In the afternoon they passed the bayou Barthelemi, on the right, above the last settlements, and about twelve computed leagues from the post. Here commences Baron Bastrop's great grant of land from the Spanish Government, being a square of twelve leagues to each side, a little exceeding a million of French acres. The banks of the river continue about thirty feet high; of which eighteen feet from the water are a clayey loam, of a pale ash color, upon which the water has deposited twelve feet of light sandy soil, apparently fertile, and of a dark brown color. This description of land is of small breadth, not exceeding half a mile on each side of the river, and may be called the valley of the Washita, beyond which there is high land, covered with pines.

The soil, to the 'Bayou des Buttes,' continues thin, with a growth of small timber. This creek is named from a number of Indian mounds discovered by the hunters along its course. The margin of the river begins to be covered with such timber as usually grows on inundated land; particularly, a species of white oak, vulgarly called the overcup oak; its timber is remarkably hard, solid, ponderous, and durable; and it produces a large acorn in great abundance, upon which the bear feeds, and which is very fattening to hogs.

In lat.  $32^{\circ} 50' 8''$  north, they passed a long and narrow island. The face of the country begins to change; the banks are low and steep, the river deeper and more contracted, from thirty to fifty yards in width. The soil in the neighborhood of the river, is a very sandy loam, and covered by such vegetables as are found on the inundated lands of the Mississippi. The tract presents the appearance of a new soil, very different from what they passed below. This alluvial tract may be supposed the site of a great lake, drained by a natural canal formed by the abrasion of the waters; since which period, the annual inundations have deposited the superior soil; eighteen or twenty feet is yet wanting to render it habitable for man; it appears, nevertheless, well stocked with the beasts of the forest, several of which were seen.

Quantities of water fowl are beginning to make their appearance, which are not very numerous here until the cold rains and frost compel them to leave a more northern climate. Fish is not so abundant as might be expected; owing, it is said, to the inundation of the Mississippi, in the year 1799, which dammed up the Washita some distance above the Post, and produced a stagnation, and consequent corruption of the waters, that destroyed all the fish within its influence.

At noon, on the fifteenth of November, they passed the island of Mallet, and at ninety yards northeast from the upper point of the island, by a good observation, ascertained their latitude to be  $32^{\circ} 59' 27.5''$  north, or two seconds and a half of latitude south of the dividing line between the territories of Orleans and Louisiana. The bed of the river, along this alluvial country, is generally covered with water, and the navigation uninterrupted; but in the afternoon of this day, they passed three contiguous sand bars, or beaches, called "Les Trois Battures;" and before evening, the "Bayou des Grande Marais," or Great Marsh creek, on the right; and "La Cyprieri Chattelrau," a point of high land on the same side, which reaches within half a mile of the river. As they advanced towards the Marais de Saline on the right, a stratum of dirty white colored clay, under the alluvial tract, showed them to be leaving the sunken, and approaching the high land country. The salt lick marsh does not derive its name from any brackishness in the water of the lake or marsh, but from its contiguity to some of the licks, sometimes termed "saline," and sometimes "glaise," generally found in a clay, compact enough for potters' ware. The Bayou de la Tulipe, forms a communication between the lake and the river. Opposite to this place, there is a point of high land forming a promontory, advancing within a mile of the river, and to which boats resort when the low grounds are under water. A short league above, is the mouth of the Grand Bayou de la Saline, (Salt Lick creek.) This creek is of a considerable length, and navigable for small boats. The hunters ascend it, to a distance of one hundred of their leagues, in pursuit of game; and all agree that none of the springs which feed this creek are salt. It has obtained its name from the many buffalo salt licks which have been discovered in its vicinity. Although most of these licks, by digging, furnish water which holds marine salt in solution, there exists no reason for believing that many of them would produce nitre. Notwithstanding this low and alluvial tract appears in all respects well adapted to the growth of the long moss, (tilandsia) none was observed since entering it in lat.  $32^{\circ} 52'$ ; and as the pilot informed them none would be seen in their progress up the river, it is probable that the latitude of thirty-three degrees is about the northern limit of its vegetation. The long-leaf pine, frequently the growth of rich and even inundated lands, was here observed in great abundance; the short-leaved, or pitch pine, on the contrary, is always found upon arid lands, and generally in sandy and lofty situations.

This is the season when the poor settlers on the Washita turn out to make their annual hunt. The deer is now fat, and the skins in perfection; the bear is now also in his best state, with regard to the quality of his fur, and the quantity of fat or oil he yields; as he has been feeding luxuriantly on the autumnal fruits of the forest. It is here well known, that he does not confine himself, as some writers have supposed, to vegetable food; he is particularly fond of hog's flesh; sheep and calves are frequently his prey; and no animal escapes him which comes within his power, and which he is able to conquer. He often destroys the fawn, when chance throws it in his way; he cannot, however, discover it by smelling, notwithstanding the excellence of his scent; for nature has, as if for its protection, denied the fawn the property of leaving any effluvia upon his track, a property so powerful in the old deer.* The bear, unlike most other beasts of prey, does not kill the animal he has seized upon, before he eats it; but, regardless of its struggles, cries, and lamentations, fastens upon, and, if the expression is allowable, devours it alive. The hunters count much on their profits from the oil drawn from the bear's fat; which, at New Orleans, is always of ready sale, and much esteemed for its wholesomeness in cooking, being preferred to butter or hog's lard. It is found to keep longer than any other animal oil without becoming rancid; and boiling it from time to time, upon sweet bay leaves, restores its sweetness, or facilitates its conservation.

In the afternoon of the 17th, they passed some sand beaches, and over a few rapids. They had cane-brakes on both sides of the river; the canes were small, but demonstrate that the water does not surmount the bank more than a few feet. The river begins to widen as they advance, the banks of the river show the high land soil, with a stratum of three or four feet of alluvion, deposited by the river upon it. This superstratum is greyish, and very sandy, with a small admixture of loam, indicative of the poverty of the mountains and uplands where the river rises. Near this, they passed through a new, and very narrow channel, in which all the water of the river passes, except in time of freshes, when the interval forms an island. A little above this pass is a small clearing, called "Cache la Tulipe" (Tulip's Hiding-place;) this is the name of a French hunter, who here concealed his property. It continues the practice, of both white and red hunters, to leave their skins, &c. often suspended to poles, or laid over a pole placed upon two forked posts, in sight of the river, until their return from hunting. These deposits are considered as sacred, and few examples exist of their being plundered. After passing the entrance of a bay, which, within, must form a great lake during the inundation, great numbers of the long-leaf pine were observed; and the increased size of the canes along the river's bank, denoted a better and more elevated soil. On the left, was a high hill, (300 feet) covered with lofty pine trees.

The banks of the river present more the appearance of upland soil, the understratum being a pale, yellowish clay, and the alluvial soil of a dirty white, surmounted by a thin covering of a brown vegetable earth. The trees improve in appearance, growing to a considerable size and height, though yet inferior to those on the alluvial banks of the Mississippi. After passing the 'Bayou de Hachis,' on the left, points of high land, not subject to be overflowed, frequently touch the river, and the valley is said to be more than a league in breadth, on each side. On the left are pine hills, called 'Cote de Champignole.' The river is not more than fifty or sixty yards wide. On the morning of the 20th, they passed a number of sand beaches, and some rapids, but found good depth of water between them. A creek, called 'Chemin Couvert,' which forms a deep ravine in the high lands, here enters the river. Almost immediately above this is a rapid, where the water in the river is confined to a channel of about forty yards in width; above it, they had to quit the main channel, on account of the shallowness and rapidity of the water, and pass along a narrow channel of only sixty feet wide: without a guide, a stranger might take this passage for a creek.

Notwithstanding the lateness of the season, and the northern latitude they were in, they this day met with an alligator. The banks of the river are covered with cane, or thick underbrush, frequently so interwoven with thorns and briars as to be impenetrable. Birch, maple, holly, and two kinds of wood to which names have not yet been given, except 'water-side wood,' are here met with; as also, persimmons, and small black grapes. The margin of the river is fringed with a variety of plants and vines, among which are several species of convolvulus.

On the left, they passed a hill and cliff, one hundred feet perpendicular, crowned with pines, and called 'Cote de Finn, (Fin's hill,) from which a chain of high land continues some distance. The cliff presents the appearance of an ash-colored clay. A little further, on the right, is the Bayou d'Acacia, (Locust creek.) The river varies here from eighty to an hundred yards in width, presenting frequent indications of iron along its banks, and some thin strata of iron ore; the ore is from half an inch to three inches in thickness.

On the morning of the 22d of November, they arrived at the road of the Cadadoquis Indian nation, leading to the Arkansas nation. A little beyond this, is the 'Ecore a Fabri, (Fabri's cliffs,) from eighty to an hundred feet high; and a little distance above, a smaller cliff, called 'le petit ecor a Fabri,' (the little cliff of Fabri;) these cliffs appear chiefly to be composed of ash-colored sand, with a stratum of clay at the base, such as runs all along under the banks of this river. Above these cliffs are several rapids, the current is swifter, and denotes their ascent into a higher country. The water becomes very clear, and equal to any, in its very agreeable taste, and as a drinking water. In the river are immense beds of gravel and sand, over which the water passes with great velocity, in the season of its floods, carrying with it vast quantities of drift wood, which it piles up, in many places, to the height of twenty feet above the present surface, pointing out the difficulty and danger of navigation, in certain times of the flood; accidents, however, are rare with the canoes of the country.

As the party ascended, they found the banks of the river less elevated, being only from nine to twelve feet, and are, probably, surmounted by the freshes, some feet. The river becomes more obstructed by rapids, and sand and gravel beaches; among which, are found, fragments of stone, of all forms, and a variety of colors, some highly polished and rounded by friction. The banks of the river, in this upper country, suffer greatly by abrasion; one side, and sometimes both, being broken down by every flood.

At a place on the left, called 'Auges d'Arclon,' (Arclon's troughs,) is laminated iron ore, and a stratum of tenacious black sand, shining with minute crystals. The breadth of the river is, here, about eighty yards; in some places, however, it is enlarged by islands, in others, contracted to eighty or a hundred feet. Rocks of a greyish color, and rather friable, are here found in many places on the river. The banks rise into hills of free stone, of a very sharp and fine grit, fit for grindstones, the strata irregular, inclining from 20° to 30° down the river. On the banks grow willows, of a different form from those found below and on the margin of the Mississippi; the last are very brittle; these, on the contrary, are extremely pliant, resembling the osier, of which they are, probably, a species.

At noon, on the 24th, they arrived at the confluence of the lesser Missouri with the Washita; the former is a considerable branch, perhaps a fourth of the Washita, and comes in from the left hand. The hunters often ascend the little Missouri, but are not inclined to penetrate far up, because it reaches near the great plains, or prairies, upon the Red river, visited by the lesser Osage tribe of Indians, settled on the Arkansas; these last frequently carry war into the Cadadoquis tribe, settled on the Red river, about west-southwest from this place, and, indeed, they are reported not to spare any nation or people. They are prevented from visiting the head waters of the Washita, by the steep hills in which they rise. These mountains are so difficult to travel over, that the savages, not having an object sufficiently desirable, never attempt to penetrate to this river, and it is supposed to be unknown to the nation. The Cadadoquis (or Cadaux, as the French pronounce the word,) may be considered as Spanish Indians; they boast, and it is said, with truth, that they never have imbrued their hands in the blood of a white man. It is said, that the stream of the Little Missouri, some distance from its mouth, flows over a bright, splendid bed of mineral, of a yellowish white color, (most probably martial pyrites) that, thirty years ago, several of the inhabitants, hunters, worked upon this mine, and sent a quantity of the ore to the government at New Orleans, and they were prohibited from working any more.

There is a great sameness in the appearance of the river banks; the islands are skirted with osier, and immediately within, on the bank, grows a range of birch trees, and some willows; the more elevated banks are covered with cane, among which grows the oak, maple, elm, sycamore, ash, hickory, dogwood, holly, iron wood, &c. From the pilot, they learned, that there is a body of excellent land on the little Missouri, particularly on the creek called the Bayou à terre noire', which falls into it. This land extends to Red river, and is connected with the great prairies which form the hunting grounds of the Cadaux nation, consisting of about two hundred warriors. They are warlike, but frequently unable to defend themselves against the tribe of Osages settled on the Arkansas river, who, passing round the mountains at the head of the Washita, and along the prairies which separate them from the main chain on the west, where the waters of the Red and Arkansas rivers have their rise, pass into the Cadaux country, to rob and plunder them.

The water in the river Washita rising, the party are enabled to pass the numerous rapids and shoals which they meet with in the upper country, some of which are difficult of ascent. The general height of the main banks of the river are from six to twelve feet above the level of the water; the land is better in quality, the canes, &c. shewing a more luxuriant vegetation; it is subject to inundation, and shevs a brown soil, mixed with sand. Near Cache Maçon, (Mason's hiding place,) on the right, they stopped to examine a supposed coal mine. Doctor Hunter and the pilot set out for this purpose, and, at about a mile and a half northwest from the boat, in the bed of a creek called Coal Mine creek, they found a substance similar to what they had before met with under that name, though more advanced towards the state of perfect coal. At the bottom of the creek, in a place then dry, was found detached pieces, of from fifty to one hundred pounds weight, adjoining to which, lay wood, changing into the same substance. A stratum of this coal, six inches thick, lay on both sides of this little creek, over another of yellow clay, and covered by one foot of gravel; on the gravel is eight inches of yellow loam, which bears a few inches of vegetable mould. This stratum of coal is about three feet higher than the water in the creek, and appears, manifestly, to have been, at some period, the surface of the ground. The gravel and loam have been deposited there since, by the waters. Some pieces of this coal were very black and solid, of an homogeneous appearance, much resembling pit coal, but of less specific gravity. It does not appear sufficiently impregnated with bitumen, but may be considered as vegetable matter in the progress of transmutation to coal.

Below the 'Bayou de l'eau froide,' which runs into the Washita from the right, the river is one hundred and seventy yards wide, flowing through tolerably good land; they passed a beautiful forest of pines, on the 28th, fell in with an old Dutch hunter and his party, consisting in all of five persons.

This man has resided forty years on the Washita, and before that period has been up the Arkansas river, the White river, and the river St. Francis; the two last, he informed, are of difficult navigation, similar to the Washita; but the Arkansas river is of great magnitude, having a large and broad channel, and when the water is low, has great sand banks, like to those in the Mississippi. So far as he has been up it, the navigation is safe and commodious, without impediment from rocks, shoals, or rapids; its bed being formed of mud and sand. The soil on it, is of the first rate quality. The country is easy of access, being lofty open forests, unembarrassed by canes or other under growth. The water is disagreeable to drink, being of a red color, and brackish when the river is low. A multitude of creeks, which flow into the Arkansas, furnish sweet water, which the voyager is obliged to carry with him for the supply of his immediate wants. This man confirms the accounts of silver being abundant up that river; he has not been so high as to see it himself, but says he received a silver pin from a hunter, who assured him that he himself collected the virgin silver from the rock, out of which he made the epinglette, by hammering it out. The tribe of Osages live higher up than this position, but the hunters rarely go so high, being afraid of these savages, who are at war with all the world, and destroy all strangers they meet with. It is reported that the Arkansas nation, with a part of the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Shawanese, &c. have formed a league, and are actually gone, or going, eight hundred strong, against these depredators, with a view to destroy or drive them entirely off, and possess themselves of their fine prairies, which are most abundant hunting grounds, being plentifully stocked with buffalo, elk, deer, bear, and every other beast of the chase, common to those latitudes in America. This hunter having given information of a salt spring in their vicinity, from which he frequently supplied himself by evaporating the water, Dr. Hunter, with a party, accompanied him, on the morning of the 29th November, to the place; they found the saline about a mile and a half north of the camp from whence they set out, and near a creek which enters the Washita a little above. It is situated in the bottom of the bed of a dry gully. The surrounding land is rich, and well timbered, but subject to inundation, except an Indian mound on the creek side, having a base of eighty or a hundred feet diameter and twenty feet high. After digging about three feet, through blue clay, they came to a quicksand, from which the water flowed in abundance; its taste was salt and bitter, resembling that of water in the ocean. In a second hole, it required them to dig six feet before they reached the quicksand, in doing which, they threw up several broken pieces of Indian pottery. The specific gravity, compared with the river, was, from the first pit, or that three feet deep, 1.02720; from the second pit, or that six feet deep, 1.02104, yielding a saline mass, from the evaporation of ten quarts, which, when dry, weighed eight ounces; this brine is, therefore, about the same strength as that of the ocean on our coast, and twice the strength of the famous licks in Kentucky, called Bullet's lick, and Mann's lick, from which so much salt is made.

The "Fourche des Cadeaux" (Cadadoquis fork) which they passed on the morning of the 30th, is about one hundred yards wide at its entrance into the Washita from the left; immediately beyond which, on the same side, the land is high, probably elevated three hundred feet above the water. The shoals and rapids here impede their progress. At noon, they deduced their latitude by observation, to be  $34^{\circ} 11' 37''$  north.

Receiving information of another saline or salt lick, Dr. Hunter landed with a party to view it. The pit was found in a low place, subject to be overflowed from the river; it was wet and muddy, the earth on the surface yellow, but on digging through about four feet of blue clay, the salt water oozed from a quicksand; ten quarts of this water, produced, by evaporation, six ounces of a saline mass, which, from taste, was principally marine salt; to the taste, however, it showed an admixture of soda, and muriated magnesia; but the marine salt greatly predominated. The specific gravity was about 1.0176; probably weakened from the rain which had fallen the day before. The ascent of the river becomes more troublesome from the rapids and currents, particularly at the Isle du bayou des roches (Rocky creek island) where it required great exertions, and was attended with some hazard, to pass them. This island is three-fourths of a mile in length. The river presents a series of shoals, rapids, and small cataracts; and they passed several points of high land, full of rocks and stones, much harder and more solid than they had yet met with.

The rocks were all silicious, with their fissures penetrated by sparry matter. Indications of iron were frequent, and fragments of poor ore were common, but no rich ore of that or any other metal was found. Some of the hills appear well adapted to the cultivation of the vine; the soil being a sandy loam, with a considerable portion of gravel, and a superficial covering of good vegetable black earth. The natural productions are, several varieties of oak, pine, dogwood, holly, &c. with a scattering undergrowth of whortleberry, hawthorn, china brier, and a variety of small vines.

Above the Isle de Mallon, the country wears another aspect; high lands and rocks frequently approach the river. The rocks, in grain, resemble free stone, and are hard enough to be used as hand-mill stones, to which purpose they are frequently applied. The quality of the land improves, the stratum of vegetable earth being from six to twelve inches, of a dark brown color, with an admixture of loam and sand. Below Deer island, they passed a stratum of free-stone, fifty feet thick, under which is a quarry of imperfect slate, in perpendicular layers. About a league from the river, and a little above the slate quarry, is a considerable plain, called "Prairie de Champignole," often frequented by buffalo; some salt licks are found near it, and in many situations, on both sides of this river, there are said to be salines which may hereafter be rendered very productive, and from which the future settlements may be abundantly supplied.

About four miles below the "chutes" (falls) they, from a good observation, found the latitude  $34^{\circ} 29' 25.5''$ . The land on either hand continues to improve in quality, with a sufficient stratum of dark brown earth. Hills frequently rise out of the level country, full of rocks and stones, hard and flinty, and often resembling turkey oil stones; of this kind was a promontory, which came in from the right hand a little below the chutes. At a distance, it presented the appearance of ruined buildings and fortifications; and several isolated masses of rock, conveyed the idea of redoubts and out-works. This effect was heightened by the rising of a flock of swans, which had taken their station in the water, at the foot of these walls. As the voyagers approached, the birds floated about majestically on the glassy surface of the water, and in tremulous accents seemed to consult upon means of safety. The whole was a sublime picture. In the afternoon of the 3d of December, they reached the chutes, and found the falls to be occasioned by a chain of rocks, of the same hard substance seen below, extending in the direction of northeast and southwest, quite across the river. The water passes through a number of breaches, worn by the impetuosity of the torrent, where it forms so many cascades. The chain of rock, or hill on the left, appears to have been cut down to its present level by the abrasion of the waters. By great exertions, and lightening the boat, they passed the chutes this evening, and encamped just above the cataracts, and within the hearing of their incessant roar.

Immediately above the chutes, the current of the water is slow, to another ledge of hard free stone; the reach between is spacious, not less than two hundred yards wide, and terminated by a hill three hundred feet high, covered with beautiful pines. This is a fine situation for building. In lat.  $34^{\circ} 25' 48''$  they passed a very dangerous rapid, from the number of rocks which obstruct the passage of the water, and break it into foam. On the right of the rapid, is a high, rocky hill, covered with very handsome pine woods. The strata of the rock has an inclination of thirty degrees to the horizon, in the direction of the river, descending. This hill may be three hundred, or three hundred and fifty feet high. A border, or list of green cane, skirts the margin of the river, beyond which, generally rises a high, and, sometimes, a barren hill. Near another rapid, they passed a hill on the left, containing a large body of blue slate. A small distance above the Bayou de saline, they had to pass a rapid of one hundred and fifty yards in length, and four feet and a half fall, which, from its velocity, the French hunters have denominated "La Cascade." Below the cascade, there are rocky hills on both sides, composed of very hard freestone. The stone in the bed of the river, and which had been rolled from the upper country, was of the hardest flint, or of a quality resembling the Turkey oil-stone. Fourche au Tigre, (Tiger's creek) which comes in from the right, a little above the cascade, is said to have many extensive tracts of rich level land upon it. The rocky hills here frequently approach the Washita on both sides; rich bottoms are, nevertheless, unfrequent, and the upland is sometimes of moderate elevation, and tolerably level. The stones and rocks here met with, have their fissures filled by sparry and crystalline matter.

Wild turkeys become more abundant, and less difficult of approach, than below; and the howl of the wolves is heard during the night.

To the Fourche of Calfat (Caulker's creek) where the voyage terminates, they found level and good land on the right, and high hills on the left hand. After passing over a very precipitous rapid, seemingly divided into four steps or falls, one of which was at least fifteen inches in perpendicular height, and which, together, could not be less than five and a half feet, they arrived at Ellis's camp, a small distance below the Fourche au Calfat, where they stopped on the 6th of December, as the pilot considered it the most convenient landing, from whence to carry their necessary baggage to the hot springs: the distance being about three leagues. There is a creek, about two leagues higher up, called "Bayou des sources chaudes," (Hot Spring creek) upon the banks of which, the hot springs are situated, at about two leagues from its mouth. The banks of it are hilly, and the road less eligible from Ellis's camp.

On ascending the hill, to encamp, they found the land very level and good; some plants in flower, and a great many ever-green vines; the forest oak, with an admixture of other woods. The latitude of this place is,  $34^{\circ} 27' 35.5''$  north. The ground on which they encamped, was about fifty feet above the water in the river, and supposed to be thirty feet higher than the inundation. Hills of considerable height, and clothed with pine, were in view; but the land around, and extending beyond their view, lies handsomely for cultivation. The superstratum is of a blackish brown color, upon a yellow basis, the whole intermixed with gravel and blue schistus, frequently so far decomposed as to have a strong aluminous taste. From their camp, on the Washita, to the hot springs, a distance of about nine miles, the first six miles of the road is in a westerly direction, with many sinuosities, and the remainder northerly: which courses are necessary, to avoid some very steep hills. In this distance, they found three principal salt licks, and some inferior ones, which are all frequented by buffalo, deer, &c. The soil around them, is a white tenacious clay, probably fit for potter's ware: hence the name of "glaise," which the French hunters have bestowed upon most of the licks frequented by the beasts of the forest; many of which exhibit no saline impregnation. The first two miles from the river camp, is over level land, of the second rate quality; the timber chiefly oak, intermixed with other trees, common to the climate, and a few scattering pines. Further on, the lands on either hand, rise into gently swelling hills, covered with handsome pine woods. The road passes along a valley, frequently wet by the numerous rills and springs of excellent water, which issue from the foot of the hills. Near the hot springs, the hills become more elevated, steeper of ascent, and rocky. They are here called mountains, although none of them in view, exceed four or five hundred feet in altitude. It is said, that mountains of more than five times the elevation of these hills, are to be seen in the northwest, towards the sources of the Washita. One of them is called the Glass, Crystal, or Shining mountain, from the vast number of hexagonal prisms of very transparent and colorless chrysal, which are found on its surface: they are generally surmounted by pyramids at one end, rarely on both. These crystals do not produce a double refraction of the rays of light. Many searches have been made over these mountains for the precious metals, but, it is believed, without success.

At the hot springs, they found an open log cabin and a few huts of split boards, all calculated for summer encampment, and which had been erected by persons resorting to the springs for the recovery of their health. They slightly repaired these huts, or cabins, for their accommodation during the time of their detention at the springs, for the purpose of examining them and the surrounding country, and making such astronomical observations as were necessary, for ascertaining their geographical position.

It is understood, that the hot springs are included within a tract of some hundreds of acres, granted by the late Spanish commandant of Washita to some of his friends; but it is not believed that a regular patent was ever issued for the place, and it cannot be asserted, that residence, with improvement, here form a plea to claim the land upon.

On their arrival, they immediately tasted the waters of the hot springs; that is, after a few minutes cooling, for it was impossible to approach it with the lips when first taken up, without scalding. The taste does not differ from that of good water rendered hot by culinary fire.

On the tenth they visited all the hot springs. They issue on the east side of the valley, where the huts are, except one spring, which rises on the west bank of the creek, from the sides and foot of a hill. From the small quantity of calcareous matter yet deposited, the western spring does not appear to be of long standing; a natural conduit probably passes under the bed of the creek and supplies it. There are four principal springs rising immediately on the east bank of the creek, one of which may rather be said to spring out of the gravel bed of the run; a fifth, a smaller one, that above mentioned as rising on the west side of the creek; and a sixth of the same magnitude, the most northerly, and rising near the bank of the creek. These are all the sources which merit the name of springs, near to the huts; but there is a considerable one some distance below; and all along, at intervals, the warm water oozes out, or drips from the bank into the creek, as appears from the condensed vapour floating along the margin of the creek, where the drippings occur.

The hill from which the hot springs issue, is of a conical form, terminating at the top with a few loose fragments of rock, covering a flat space twenty-five feet in diameter. Although the figure of the hill is conical, it is not entirely isolated, but connected with the neighboring hills by a very narrow ridge. The primitive rock of this hill, above the base, is principally silicious, some part of it being of the hardest flint; others, a freestone, extremely compact and solid, and of various colors. The base of the hill, and for a considerable extent, is composed of a blackish blue schistus, which divides into perpendicular lamina, like blue slate. The water of the hot springs is therefore delivered from the silicious rock, generally invisible at the surface, from the mass of calcareous matter with which it is incrustated, or rather buried, and which is perpetually precipitating from the water of the springs. A small proportion of iron, in the form of a red cala, is also deposited, the color of which is frequently distinguishable in the lime.

In ascending the hill, several patches of rich black earth are found, which appear to be formed by the decomposition of the calcareous matter; in other situations the superficial earth is penetrated or incrustated by limestone, with fine lamina, or minute fragments of iron ore. The water of the hot springs must formerly have issued at a greater elevation in the hill, and run over the surface, having formed a mass of calcareous rock one hundred feet perpendicular, by its deposition. In this high situation they found a spring, whose temperature was 140° of Fahrenheit's thermometer. After passing the calcareous region, they found the primitive hill covered by a forest of not very large trees, consisting chiefly of oak, pine, cedar, holly, hawthorn, and others common to the climate, with a great variety of vines, some said to produce black, and others green grapes, both excellent in their kinds. The soil is rocky, interspersed with gravel, sand, and fine vegetable mould. On reaching the height of two hundred feet perpendicular, a considerable change in the soil was observable; it was stony, and gravelly, with a superficial coat of black earth, but, immediately under it, lies a stratum of fat, tenacious, soapy, red clay, inclining to the color of bright Spanish snuff, homogeneous, with scarcely any admixture of sand, no saline, but rather a soft agreeable taste. The timber diminishes, and the rocks increase in size to the summit; the whole height is estimated at three hundred feet above the level of the valley.

On examining the four principal springs, or those which yield the greatest quantity of water, or of the highest temperature, No. 1 was found to raise the mercury to 150°, No. 2 to 154°, No. 3 to 136°, and No. 4 to 132° of Fahrenheit's thermometer. The last is on the west side of the creek. No. 3 is a small basin, in which there is a considerable quantity of green matter, having much the appearance of a vegetable body, being detached from the bottom, yet connected with it by something like a stem, which rests in calcareous matter. The body of one of these pseudo plants was from four to five inches in diameter, the bottom a smooth film of some tenacity, and the upper surface divided into ascending fibres of one-half or three-fourths of an inch long, resembling the gills of a fish, in transverse rows. A little further on was another small muddy basin, in which the water was warm to the finger; in it was a vermes, about half an inch long, moving with a serpentine or vermicular motion. It was invariably observed, that the green matter forming on the stones and leaves, covered a stratum of calcareous earth, sometimes a little hard or brittle, at others, soft and imperfect. From the bottom of one of the hot springs, a frequent ebullition of gas was observed, which, not having the means of collecting, they could not ascertain its nature; it was not inflammable, and there is little doubt of its being carbonic acid, from the quantity of lime, and the iron held in solution by the water.

They made the following rough estimate of the quantity of water delivered by the springs: There are four principal springs, two of inferior note, one rising out of the gravel, and a number of drippings and drainings, all issuing from the margin, or from under the rock which overhangs the creek. Of the four first mentioned, three deliver nearly equal quantities; but No. 1, the most considerable, delivers about five times as much as one of the other three; the two of inferior note, may, together, be equal to one, and all the drippings, and small springs, are probably under-rated at double the quantity of one of the three; that is, all together, they will deliver a quantity equal to eleven times the water issuing from the one most commodiously situated for measurement. This spring filled a vessel of eleven quarts in eleven seconds; hence, the whole quantity of hot water delivered from the springs at the base of the hill, is one hundred and sixty five gallons in a minute, or 3,771½ hogsheds, in 24 hours; which is equal to a handsome brook, and might work an overshot mill. In cool weather, condensed vapour is seen rising out of the gravel bed of the creek, from springs which cannot be taken into account. During the summer and fall, the creek receives little or no water but what is supplied by the hot springs. At that season the creek itself is a hot bath, too hot, indeed, near the springs; so that a person may choose the temperature most agreeable to himself, by selecting a natural basin nearer to, or farther from, the principal springs. At three or four miles below the springs, the water is tepid, and unpleasant to drink.

From the Western mountain, estimated to be of equal height with that from which the hot springs flow, there are several fine prospects. The valley of the Washita, comprehended between the hills on either side, seemed a perfect flat, and about twelve miles wide. On all hands were seen the hills, or mountains, as they are here called, rising behind each other. In the direction of north, the most distant were estimated to be fifty miles off, and are supposed to be those of the Arkansas river, or the rugged mountains which divide the waters of the Arkansas from those of the Washita, and prevent the Osage Indians from visiting the latter, of which they are supposed to be ignorant; otherwise, their excursions here would prevent this place from being visited by white persons, or even Indians of other tribes. In a southwest direction, at about fifty miles distance, is seen a perfect level ridge, supposed to be the high prairies of the Red river.

Notwithstanding the severity of the weather, a considerable number, and some variety of plants were in flower, and others retained their verdure: indeed, the ridge was more temperate than the valley below; there, it was cold, damp, and penetrating; here, dry, and the atmosphere mild. Of the plants growing here, was a species of cabbage; the plants grow with expanded leaves spreading on the ground, of a deep green, with a shade of purple; the taste of the cabbage was plainly predominant, with an agreeable warmth, inclining to that of the radish; several tap roots penetrated with the soil, of a white color, having the taste of horse radish, but much milder. A quantity of them taken to the camp and dressed, proved palatable and mild. It is not probable that cabbage seed has been scattered on this ridge; the hunters ascending this river, have always had different objects. Until further elucidation, this cabbage must be considered indigenous to this sequestered quarter, and may be denominated the cabbage radish of the Washita. They found a plant, then green, called by the French "racine rouge" (red root) which is said to be a specific in female obstructions; it has also been used, combined with the china-root, to dye red; the last, probably, as a mordant. The top of this ridge is covered with rocks of a flinty kind, and so very hard, as to be improper for gun flints: for, when applied to that use, it soon digs cavities in the hammer of the lock. This hard stone is generally white, but frequently clouded with red, brown, black, and other colors. Here and there fragments of iron stone were met with; and where a tree had been overturned, its roots brought to view fragments of schistus, which were suffering decomposition from exposure to the atmosphere. On digging, where the slope of the hill was precipitous, they found the second stratum to be a reddish clay, resembling that found on the conical hill, east of the camp. At two thirds down the hill, the rock was a hard free stone, intermixed with fragments of flint, which had probably rolled from above. Still lower was found a blue schistus, in a state tending to decomposition, where exposed to the atmosphere, but hard, and resembling coarse slate, in the interior. Many stones had the appearance of the turkey oil stone. At the foot of the hill, it expands into good farming land.

Doctor Hunter, on examining the water of the hot springs, obtained the following results:

It differed nothing from other hot water in smell or taste; but caused a slight eructation shortly after drinking it. Its specific gravity is equal to rain or distilled water.

It gave to litmus paper, a slight degree of redness, evincing the presence of the carbonic acid, or fixed air. Sulphuric acid threw down a few detached particles. Oxylat of ammoniac caused a deposition and white cloud, shewing the presence of a small portion of lime. Prussiat of potash produced a slight and scarcely perceptible tinge of blue, designating the presence of a small quantity of iron.

Sixteen pounds of water, evaporated to dryness, left ten grains of grey powder, which proved to be lime.

The myrtle wax tree grows in the vicinity of the springs. At the season in which the voyagers were there, the wax was no longer green, but had changed its color to a greyish white, from its long exposure to the weather. The berry, when examined by a microscope, is less than the smallest garden pea, approaching to an oval in form. The nucleus, or real seed, is the size of the seed of a radish, and is covered with a number of brownish kidney shaped glands, of a brown color, and sweet taste; these glands secrete the wax, which completely envelops them, and at this season, gives to the whole the appearance of an imperfectly white berry. This is a valuable plant, and merits attention: its favorite position is a dry soil, rather poor, and looking down upon the water. It is well adapted to ornament the margins of canals, lakes, or rivulets. The cassina yapon, is equally beautiful, and proper for the same purpose; it grows here along the banks of this stony creek, intermingled with the myrtle, and bears a beautiful little red berry, very much resembling the red currant.

The rock through which the hot springs either pass or trickle over, appears undermined by the waters of the creek. The hot water is continually depositing calcareous, and, perhaps, some silicious matter; forming new rocks, always augmenting, and projecting their promontories over the running water of the creek, which prevents its formation below the surface. Wherever this calcareous crust is seen spreading over the bank and margin of the creek, there most certainly the hot water will be found; either running over the surface, or through some channel, perhaps below the new rock, or dripping from the edges of the overhanging precipice. The progress of nature, in the formation of this new rock, is curious, and worthy the attention of the mineralogist. When the hot water issues from the fountain, it frequently spreads over a superficies of some extent; so far as it reaches, on either hand, there is a deposition or growth of green matter: several lamina of this green matter will be found lying over each other; and immediately under, and in contact with the inferior lamina, which is not thicker than paper, is found a whitish substance, resembling a coagulum; when viewed with a microscope, this last is also found to consist of several, sometimes a good number of lamina, of which that next the green is the finest, and thinnest, being the last formed; those below increasing in thickness and tenacity, until the last terminates in a soft earthy matter, which reposes on the more solid rock. Each lamina of the coagulum is penetrated in all its parts by calcareous grain, extremely minute, and divided in the more recent web, but much larger, and occupying the whole of the inferior lamina. The under stratum is continually consolidating, and adding bulk and height to the rock; when this acquires such an elevation as to stop the passage of the water, it finds another course over the rock, hill, or margin of the creek; forming, in turn, accumulations of recent matter, over the whole of the adjacent space; when the water has found itself a new channel, the green matter, which sometimes acquires a thickness of half an inch, is speedily converted into a rich vegetable earth, and becomes the food of plants. The surface of the calcareous rock also decomposes, and forms the richest black mould intimately mixed with a considerable portion of soil; plants and trees vegetate luxuriantly upon it.

On examining a piece of ground upon which the snow dissolved as it fell, and which was covered with herbage, they found in some places a calcareous crust on the surface, but in general a depth of from five inches to a foot of the richest black mould. The surface was sensibly warm to the touch. In the air, the mercury in the thermometer stood at forty-four degrees; when placed four inches under the surface, and covered with earth, it rose rapidly to sixty eight degrees; and upon the calcareous rock, eight inches beneath the surface, it rose to eighty degrees. This result was uniform over the whole surface, which was about a quarter of an acre.

On searching, they found a spring about fifteen inches under the surface, in the water of which, the thermometer shewed a temperature of one hundred and thirty degrees. Beneath the black mould, was found a brown mixture of lime and silix, very loose and divisible, apparently in a state of decomposition, and progressing towards the formation of black mould; under this brownish mass, it became gradually whiter and harder, to the depth of from six to twelve inches, where it was a calcareous sparkling stone. It was evident, that the water had passed over this place, and formed a flat superficies of "silicious lime stone;" and that its position, nearly level, had facilitated the accumulation of earth in proportion as the decomposition advanced. Similar spots of ground were found higher up the hill, resembling little savannas, near which hot springs were always discovered, which had once flowed over them.

It appears probable that the hot water of the springs, at an early period, had all issued from its grand reservoir in the hill at a much greater elevation than at present. The calcareous crust may be traced up, in most situations, on the west side of the hill, looking down the creek and valley, to a certain height, perhaps one hundred feet perpendicular. In this region the hill rises precipitously, and is studded with hard silicious stones; below, the descent is more gradual, and the soil a calcareous black earth. It is easy to discriminate the primitive hill from that which has accumulated by precipitation from the water of the springs. This last is entirely confined to the west side of the hill, and washed at its base by the waters of the creek, no hot spring being visible in any other part of its circumference. By actual measurement, along the base of the hill, the influence of the springs is found to extend seventy perches, in a direction a little to the eastward of north. Along the whole of this place, the springs have deposited stony matter, calcareous, with an admixture of siliceous, or crystallized lime. The accumulation of calcareous matter is more considerable at the north end of the hill than the south; the first may be above a hundred feet perpendicular, but sloping much more gradually than the primitive hill above, until it approaches the creek, where, not unfrequently, it terminates in a precipice, of from six to twenty feet. The difference between the primitive and secondary hill is so striking, that a superficial observer must notice it. The first is regularly very steep, and studded with rock and stone of the hardest flint, and other silicious compounds; and a superficies of two or three inches of good mould covers a red clay. Below, on the secondary hill, which carries evident marks of recent formation, no flint or silicious stone is found; the calcareous rock conceals all from view, and is itself frequently covered by much fine, rich, black earth. It would seem that this compound, precipitated from the hot waters, yields easily to the influence of the atmosphere: for, when the waters cease to flow over any portion of the rock, it speedily decomposes: probably more rapidly from the heat communicated from the interior of the hill, as insulated masses of the rock are observed to remain without change.

The cedar, the wax myrtle, and the cassia yapon, all evergreens, attach themselves particularly to the calcareous region, and seem to grow and thrive, even in the clefts of the solid rock.

A spring, enjoying a freedom of position, proceeds with great regularity in depositing the matter it holds in solution. The border, or rim, of its basin, forms an elevated ridge, from whence proceeds a glacis, all around. When the waters have flowed for some time over one part of the brim, this becomes more elevated, and the water has to seek a passage where there is less resistance; thus forming, in miniature, a crater, resembling, in shape, the conical summit of a volcano. The hill being steep above, the progress of petrification is stopped, on that side, and the waters continue to flow and spread abroad, encrusting the whole face of the hill below. The last formed calcareous border of the circular basin is soft, and easily divided. At a small depth, it is more compact; and, at the depth of five inches, it is generally hard white stone. If the bottom of the basin is stirred up, a quantity of the red calx of iron rises, and escapes over the summit of the crater.

Visitors to the hot springs, having observed shrubs and trees, with their roots, in the hot water, have been induced to try experiments, by sticking branches of trees in the run of hot water. Some branches of the wax myrtle were found thrust into the bottom of a spring run, the water of which was 130°, by Fahrenheit's thermometer. The foliage and fruit of the branch were not only sound and healthy, but, at the surface of the water, roots were actually sprouting from it. On pulling it up, the part which had penetrated the hot mud, was found decayed.

The green substance discoverable at the bottom of the hot springs, and which, at first sight, has the appearance of plush, on examination by the microscope, was found to be a vegetable production. A film of green matter spreads itself on the calcareous base, from which rise fibres more than half an inch in length, forming a beautiful vegetation. Before the microscope, it sparkled with innumerable nodules of lime, some part of which was beautifully crystallized. This circumstance might cause a doubt of its being a true vegetable; but its great resemblance to some of the mosses, particularly the byssi, and the discovery which Mr. Dunbar made, of its being the residence of animal life, confirmed his belief in its being a true moss. After a diligent search, he discovered a very minute shell fish, of the bivalve kind, inhabiting this moss, its shape nearly that of the fresh water muscle, the color of the shell a greyish brown, with spots of a purplish color. When the animal is undisturbed, it opens its shell, and thrusts out four legs, very transparent, and articulated like those of a quadruped. The extremities of the fore legs are very slender and sharp, but those of the hind legs somewhat broader, apparently armed with minute toes. From the extremity of each shell issues three or four forked hairs, which the animal seems to possess the power of moving. The fore legs are probably formed for making incisions into the moss, for the purpose of procuring access to the juices of the living plant, upon which, no doubt, it feeds. It may be provided with a proboscis, although it did not appear while the animal was under examination. The hind legs are well adapted for propelling it in its progress over the moss, or through the water.

It would be desirable to ascertain the cause of that perpetual fire which keeps up the high temperature of so many springs as flow from this hill, at a considerable distance from each other. Upon looking around, however, sufficient data for the solution of the difficulty is not discoverable. Nothing of a volcanic nature is to be seen in this country. Neither could they learn that any evidence, in favor of such a supposition, was to be found in the mountains connected with this river. An immense bed of dark blue schistus appears to form the base of the hot spring hill, and of all those in its neighborhood. The bottom of the creek is formed of it; and pieces are frequently met with, rendered soft by decomposition, and possessing a strong alluminous taste, requiring nothing but lixiviation, and crystallization, to complete the manufacture of alum. As bodies undergoing chemical changes generally produce an alteration of temperature, the heat of these springs may be owing to the disengagement of caloric, or the decomposition of the schistus. Another, and, perhaps, a more satisfactory cause may be assigned: It is well known, that, within the circle of the waters of this river, vast beds of martial pyrites exist; they have not yet, however, been discovered in the vicinage of the hot springs, but may, nevertheless, form immense beds under the bases of these hills, and as in one place, at least, there is evidence of the presence of bitumen.* The union of these agents will, in the progress of decomposition, by the admission of air and moisture, produce degrees of heat capable of supporting the phenomena of hot springs. No sulphuric acid is present in this water; the springs may be supplied by the vapor of heated water ascending from caverns where the heat is generated; or the heat may be immediately applied to the bottom of an immense natural cauldron of rock, contained in the bowels of the hill, from which, as a reservoir, the springs may be supplied.

A series of accurate observations determined the latitude of the hot springs to be 34° 31' 4.16" north, and longitude 6h. 11' 25", or 92° 50' 45" west from the meridian of Greenwich.

While Mr. Dunbar was making arrangements for transporting the baggage back to the river camp, Doctor Hunter, with a small party, went on an excursion into the country. He left the hot springs on the morning of the 27th, and after travelling, sometimes over hills and steep craggy mountains, with narrow valleys between them, then up the valleys, and generally by the side of a branch emptying into the Washita, they reached the main branch of the Calfat in the evening, about twelve miles from the springs. The stones they met with, during the first part of the day, were silicious, of a whitish grey, with flints, white, cream colored, red, &c. The beds of the rivulets, and often a considerable way up the hills, shewed immense bodies of schistus, both blue and grey; some of it efflorescing and tasting strongly of alum. The latter part of the day they travelled over, and between hills of black, hard, compact flint, in shapeless masses, with schistus, as before. On ascending these high grounds, you distinctly perceive the commencement of the piny region; beginning at the height of sixty or seventy feet, and extending to the top. The soil in these narrow valleys is thin and full of stones. The next day, which was stormy, they reached a branch of the Bayou de Saline, which stretches towards the Arkansas, and empties into the Washita many leagues below, having gone about twelve miles. The mountains they had passed being of the primitive kind, which seldom produce metals, and having hitherto seen nothing of a mineral kind, a little poor iron ore excepted, and the face of the country, as far as they could see, presenting the same aspect, they returned to the camp at the hot springs, on the evening of the 30th, by another route; in which, they met with nothing worthy notice.

In consequence of the rains which had fallen, Mr. Dunbar, and those who were transporting the baggage to the river camp, found the road watery. The soil on the flat lands, under the stratum of vegetable mould, is yellowish, and consists of decomposed schistus, of which there are immense beds in every stage of dissolution, from the hard stone, recently uncovered, and partially decomposed, to the yellow and apparently homogeneous earth. The covering of vegetable mould between the hills and river; is, in the most places, sufficiently thick to constitute a good soil, being from four to six inches; and it is the opinion of the people upon the Washita, that wheat will grow here to great perfection, although the higher hills, three hundred to six hundred feet in height, are very rocky; yet, the inferior hills, and the sloping bases of the first, are generally covered with a soil of a middling quality. The natural productions are sufficiently luxuriant, consisting chiefly of black and red oak, intermixed with a variety of other woods, and a considerable undergrowth. Even on these rocky hills, are three or four species of vines, said to produce, annually, an exuberance of excellent grapes. A great variety of plants, which grow here, some of which, in their season, are said to produce flowers highly ornamental, would probably reward the researches of the botanist.

On the morning of the 8th January, 1805, the party left Ellis's, on the river camp, where they had been detained for several days, waiting for such a rise in the waters of the river, as would carry their boat in safety over the numerous rapids below. A rise of about six feet, which had taken place the evening before, determined them to move this morning; and they passed the chutes about one o'clock. They stopped to examine the rocky promontory below these falls, and took some specimens of the stone, which so much resemble the turkey oil stone. It appears too hard. The strata of this chain was observed to run perpendicularly, nearly east and west, crossed by fissures at right angles, from five to eight feet apart; the lamina, from one-fourth of an inch to five inches in thickness. About a league below, they landed at Whetstone Hill, and took several specimens. This projecting hill, is a mass of greyish blue schistus, of considerable hardness, and about twenty feet perpendicular, not regularly so; and, from a quarter to two inches in thickness, but does not split with an even surface.

They landed again on the morning of the 9th, in sight of the Bayou de la prairie de Champignole, to examine and take specimens of some free stone, and blue slate: the slate is a blue schistus, hard, brittle, and unfit for the covering of a house; none proper for that purpose have been discovered, except on the Calfat, which Doctor Hunter met with in one of his excursions. On the evening of the 10th, they encamped near "Arclon's troughs," having been only three days in descending the distance, which took them thirteen to ascend. They stopped sometime at the camp of a Mr. Le Fevre. He is an intelligent man, a native of the Illinois, but now residing at the Arkansas. He came there with some Delaware and other Indians, whom he had fitted out with goods; and receives their peltry, fur, &c. at a stipulated price, as it is brought in by the hunters. Mr. Le Fevre possesses considerable knowledge of the interior of the country; he confirms the accounts before obtained, that the hills or mountains which give rise to this little river, are in a manner insulated; that is, they are entirely shut in and enclosed by the immense plains, or prairies, which extend beyond the Red river to the south, and beyond the Missouri, or at least, some of its branches, to the north, and range along the eastern base of the great chain, or dividing ridge, commonly known by the name of the Sand hills, which separate the waters of the Mississippi from those which fall into the Pacific ocean. The breadth of this great plain is not well ascertained; it is said by some to be, at certain parts, or in certain directions, not less than two hundred leagues; but it is agreed by all that have a knowledge of the Western country, that the mean breadth is at least two-thirds of that distance. A branch of the Missouri, called the river Platte, or Shallow river, is said to take its rise so far south, as to derive its first waters from the neighborhood of the sources of the Red and Arkansas rivers. By the expression plains, or prairies, in this place, is not to be understood a dead flat, resembling certain savannas, whose soil is stiff and impenetrable, often under water, and bearing a coarse grass, resembling reeds. Very different are the Western prairies, which expression signifies only a country without timber. These prairies are neither flat nor hilly, but undulating into gently swelling lawns, and expanding into spacious valleys, in the centre of which is always found a little timber, growing on the banks of brooks and rivulets of the finest water. The whole of these prairies are represented to be composed of the richest and most fertile soil. The most luxuriant and succulent herbage covers the surface of the earth, interspersed with millions of flowers and flowering shrubs, of the most ornamental kinds. Those who have viewed only a skirt of these prairies, speak of them with a degree of enthusiasm, as if it was only there that nature was to be found truly perfect: they declare, that the fertility and beauty of the rising grounds, the extreme richness of the vales, the coolness and excellent quality of the water found in every valley, the salubrity of the atmosphere, and above all, the grandeur of the enchanting landscape which this country presents, inspires the soul with sensations not to be felt in any other region of the globe. This paradise is now very thinly inhabited by a few tribes of savages, and by the immense herds of wild cattle (bison) which people these countries. The cattle perform regular migrations, according to the seasons, from south to north, and from the plains to the mountains; and in due time, taught by their instincts, take a retrograde direction. These tribes move in the rear of their herds, and pick up stragglers, and such as lag behind, which they kill with the bow and arrow, for their subsistence. This country is not subjected to those sudden deluges of rain, which, in most hot countries, and even in the Mississippi territory, tear up, and sweep away with irresistible fury, the crop and soil together: on the contrary, rain is said to become more rare in proportion as the great chain of mountain is approached; and it would seem that, within the sphere of the attraction of those elevated ridges, little or no rain falls upon the adjoining plains. This relation is the more credible, as in that respect our new country may resemble other flat, or comparatively low countries, similarly situated; such as the country lying between the Andes and the western Pacific. The plains are supplied with nightly dews, so extremely abundant as to have the effect of refreshing showers of rain; and the spacious valleys, which are extremely level, may, with facility, be watered by the rills and brooks, which are never absent from these situations.

Such is the description of the better known country lying to the south of the Red river from Nacogdoches towards St. Antonio, in the province of Texas. The richest crops are said to be procured there without rain; but, agriculture, in that quarter, is at a low ebb; the small quantities of maize furnished by the country, are said to be raised without cultivation. A rude opening is made in the earth, sufficient to deposite the grain at the distance of four or five feet in irregular squares, and the rest is left to nature. The soil is tender, spongy, and rich, and seems always to retain humidity sufficient, with the bounteous dews of Heaven, to bring the crops to maturity.

The Red and Arkansas rivers, whose courses are very long, pass through portions of this fine country; they are both navigable, to an unknown distance, by boats of proper construction; the Arkansas river is, however, understood to have greatly the advantage with respect to the facility of navigation. Some difficult places are met with in the Red river, below the Natchitoches, after which, it is good, for one hundred and fifty leagues, (probably computed leagues of the country, about two miles each.) There the voyager meets with a very serious obstacle—the commencement of the "raft," as it is called; that is, a natural covering, which conceals the whole river, for an extent of seventeen leagues, continually augmenting by the drift wood brought down by every considerable fresh. This covering, which for a considerable time was only drift wood, now supports a vegetation of every thing abounding in the neighboring forest, not excepting trees of considerable size; and the river may be frequently passed, without any knowledge of its existence. It is said that the annual inundation is opening for itself a new passage, through the low grounds, near the hills; but it must be long before nature, unaided, will excavate a passage sufficient for the waters of Red river. About fifty leagues above this natural bridge, is the residence of the Cadeaux, or Cadadoquis nation, whose good qualities are already mentioned. The inhabitants estimate the post of Natchitoches to be half way between New Orleans and the Cadeaux nation. Above this point, the navigation of Red river is said to be embarrassed by many rapids, falls, and shallows.

The Arkansas river is said to present a safe, agreeable, and uninterrupted navigation, as high as it is known. The lands on each side, are of the best quality, and well watered with springs, brooks, and rivulets, affording many situations for mill seats. From description, it would seem, that, along this river, there is a regular gradation of hill and dale, presenting their extremities to the river; the hills are gently swelling eminences, and the dales, spacious valleys, with living water meandering through them; the forests consist of handsome trees, chiefly what is called open woods, without cane brake, or much underwood. The quality of the land is supposed superior to that on Red river, until it ascends to the prairie country, where the lands on both rivers are probably similar. About two hundred leagues up the Arkansas is an interesting place, called the Salt prairie; there is a considerable fork of the river there, and a kind of savanna, where the salt water is continually oozing out, and spreading over the surface of a plain. During the dry summer season, the salt may be raked up in large heaps; a natural crust, of a hand-breadth in thickness, is formed at this season. This place is not often frequented, on account of the danger from the Osage Indians; much less dare the white hunters venture to ascend higher, where it is generally believed that silver is to be found. It is further said, that, high up the Arkansas river, salt is found in form of a solid rock, and may be dug out with the crowbar. The waters of the Arkansas, like those of Red river, are not potable during the dry season, being both charged highly with a reddish earth or marl, and extremely brackish. This inconvenience is not greatly felt upon the Arkansas, where springs and brooks of fresh water are frequent; the Red river is understood not to be so highly favored. Every account seems to prove, that immense natural magazines of salt must exist in the great chain of mountains to the westward; as, all the rivers, in the summer season, which flow from them, are strongly impregnated with that mineral, and are only rendered palatable after receiving the numerous streams of fresh water, which join them in their course. The great Western prairies, besides the herds of wild cattle (bison, commonly called buffalo), are also stocked with vast numbers of a wild goat, (not resembling the domestic goat) extremely swift footed. As the description given of this goat is not perfect, it may, from its swiftness, prove to be the antelope; or, it may, possibly, be a goat which has escaped from the Spanish settlements of New Mexico. A Canadian, who had been much with the Indians, to the westward, speaks of a wool-bearing animal, larger than a sheep; the wool much mixed with hair, which he had seen in large flocks; he pretends, also, to have seen the unicorn, the single horn of which, he says, rises out of the forehead, and curls back, conveying the idea of the fossil cornu ammonis. This man says, he has travelled beyond the great dividing ridge, so far as to have seen a large river, flowing to the westward. The great dividing mountain is so lofty, that it requires two days to ascend from the base to its top; other ranges of inferior mountains lie before and behind it; they are all rocky and sandy; large lakes and valleys lie between the mountains. Some of the lakes are so large as to contain considerable islands, and rivers flow from some of them. Great numbers of fossil bones, of very large dimensions, are seen among the mountains, which the Canadian supposed to be of the elephant. He does not pretend to have seen any of the precious metals, but has seen a mineral which he supposed might yield copper. From the top of the high mountain, the view is bounded by a curve, as upon the ocean, and extends over the most beautiful prairies, which seem to be unbounded, particularly towards the east. The finest of the lands he has seen, are on the Missouri; no other can compare in richness and fertility with them. This Canadian, as well as Le Fevre, speak of the Osages, of the tribe of White Hairs, as lawless and unprincipled; and the other Indian tribes hold them in abhorrence, as a barbarous and uncivilized race; and the different nations who hunt in their neighborhood have been concerting plans for their destruction.

On the morning of the 11th, the party passed the petit ecore à Fabri. The osier which grows on the beaches above, is not seen below upon this river; and here they began to meet with the small tree, called "charnier," which grows only on the water side, and is met with all the way down the Washita. The latitude of 33° 40', seems the northern boundary of the one, and the southern boundary of the other of these vegetables. Having noticed the limits set to the long moss, (tillandria) on the ascent of the river, in latitude 33°, Mr. Dunbar made inquiry of Mr. Le Fevre, as to its existence on the Arkansas settlement, which is known to lie in about the same parallel; he said, that its growth is limited about ten miles south of the settlement, and that, as remarkably, as if a line had been drawn east and west for the purpose; as it ceases all at once, and not by degrees. Hence, it appears that nature has marked, with a distinguishing feature, the line established by Congress between the Orleans and Louisiana territories. The cypress is not found on the Washita, higher than thirty four degrees of North latitude.

In descending the river, they found their rate of going to exceed that of the current about six miles and a half, in twenty-four hours; and that, on the 12th, they had passed the apex of the tide, or wave occasioned by the fresh, and were descending along an inclined plane, as they encamped at night; they found themselves in deeper water the next morning, and on a more elevated part of the inclined plane than they had been in the preceding evening, from the progress of the apex of the tide during their repose.

At noon, on the 16th, they reached the post of the Washita.

Mr. Dunbar being anxious to reach Natchez, as early as possible, and being unable to procure horses at the post, took a canoe, with one soldier, and his own domestic, to push down to the Catahoola, from whence to Concord, there is a road of thirty miles, across the low grounds. He set off early on the morning of the 20th, and at night reached the settlement of an old hunter, with whom he had conversed on his way up the river. This man informed him, that, at the place called the Mine, on the Little Missouri, there is a smoke which ascends perpetually from a particular place, and that the vapour is sometimes insupportable. The river, or a branch of it, passes over a bed of mineral, which, from the description given, is, no doubt, martial pyrites. In a creek or branch of the *fourche à Luke**, there is found, on the beaches, and in the cliffs, a great number of globular bodies, some as large, or larger, than a man's head; which, when broken, exhibit the appearance of gold, silver, and precious stones; most probably, pyrites and chrysalized spar. And at the "fourche des glaises à Paul,"† near the river, there is a cliff full of hexagonal prisms, terminated by pyramids, which appear to grow out of the rock; they are from six to eight inches in length, and some of them an inch in diameter. There are beds of pyrites found in several small creeks communicating with the Washita; but it appears that the mineral indications are greatest on the Little Missouri, because, as before noted, some of the hunters actually worked on them, and sent a parcel of the ore to New Orleans. It is the belief here, that the mineral contained precious metal, but that the Spanish Government did not choose a mine should be opened so near to the British settlements. An express prohibition was issued against working these mines.

At this place Mr. Dunbar obtained one or two slips of the "bois d'arc," (bow wood) or yellow wood, from the Missouri. The fruit which had fallen before maturity, lay upon the ground; some were of the size of a small orange, with a rind full of tubercles; the color, though it appeared faded, still retained a resemblance to pale gold. The tree, in its native soil, when laden with its golden fruit, (nearly as large as the egg of an ostrich), presents the most splendid appearance; its foliage is of a deep green, resembling the varnished leaf of the orange tree, and upon the whole, no forest tree can compare with it in ornamental grandeur. The bark of the young tree resembled in texture the dogwood bark; the appearance of the wood recommends it for trial, as an article which may yield a yellow dye. It is deciduous, the branches are numerous, and full of short thorns or prickles, which seem to point it out as proper for hedges, or live fences. This tree is known to exist near the Natchitoches (perhaps in latitude 32°) and upon the river Arkansas high up, (perhaps in latitude 36°); it is, therefore, probable that it may thrive from latitude 38° to 40°, and will be a great acquisition to the United States, if it possess no other merit than that of being ornamental.

In descending the river, both Mr. Dunbar and Dr. Hunter searched for the place said to yield gypsum, or plaster of Paris, but failed. The former gentleman states that he has no doubt of its existence; having noted two places where it has been found; one of which is the first hill or high land which touches the river on the west, above Bayou Calumet, and the other is the second high land on the same side. As these are two points of the same continued ridge, it is probable that an immense body of gypsum will be found in the bowels of the hill where they meet, and perhaps extending far beyond them.

On the evening of the twenty-second, Mr. Dunbar arrived at the Catahoola, where a Frenchman, of the name of Hebrard, who keeps the ferry across Black river, is settled. Here the road from the Washita forks, one branch of it leading to the settlements on Red river, the other up to the post of the Washita. The proprietor of this place has been a hunter, and a great traveller up the Washita, and into the Western country; he confirms, generally, the accounts received from others. It appears, from what they say, that, in the neighborhood of the hot springs, but higher up, among the mountains, and upon the Little Missouri, during the summer season, explosions are very frequently heard, proceeding from under the ground. And, not rarely, a curious phenomenon is seen, which is termed the blowing of the mountains; it is confined elastic gas, forcing a passage through the side or top of a hill, driving before it a great quantity of earth or mineral matter. During the winter season the explosions and blowing of the mountains entirely cease, from whence we may conclude that the cause is comparatively superficial, being brought into action by the increased heat of the more direct rays of the summer sun.

The confluence of the Washita, Catahoola, and Tensa, is an interesting place. The last of these communicates with the Mississippi low lands, by the intervention of other creeks and lakes, and by one in particular, called "Bayou d'Argent," which empties into the Mississippi about fourteen miles above Natchez. During high water there is a navigation for batteaux, of any burthen, along the Bayou. A large lake, called St. John's lake, occupies a considerable part of the passage between the Mississippi and the Tensa; it is in a horse-shoe form, and has, at some former period, been the bed of the Mississippi. The nearest part of it is about one mile removed from the river, at the present time. This lake, possessing elevated banks, similar to those of the river, has been lately occupied and improved. The Catahoola bayou is the third navigable stream; during the time of the inundation, there is an excellent communication by the lake of that name, and from thence, by large creeks, to the Red river. The country around the point of union of these three rivers, is altogether alluvial; but the place of Mr. Hebrard's residence is no longer subject to inundation. There is no doubt, that, as the country augments in population and riches, this place will become the site of a commercial inland town, which will keep pace with the progress and prosperity of the country. One of the Indian mounts here is of a considerable elevation, with a species of rampart surrounding a large space, which was, no doubt, the position of a fortified town.

While here, Mr. Dunbar met with an American, who pretended to have been up the Arkansas river three hundred leagues. The navigation of this river, he says, is good to that distance, for boats drawing three or four feet water. Implicit faith, perhaps, ought not to be given to his relation respecting the quantity of silver he pretends to have collected there. He says he has found silver on the Washita, thirty leagues above the hot springs, so rich, that three pounds of it yielded one pound of silver; and that this was found in a cave. He asserts, also, that the ore of the mine upon the Little Missouri was carried to Kentucky, by a person of the name of Boon, where it was found to yield largely in silver. This man says he has been up the Red river likewise; and that there is a great rapid just below the raft, or natural bridge, and several others above it; that the Cadeaux nation is about fifty leagues above the raft, and near to their village commences the country of the great prairies, which extend four or five hundred miles west, to the Sand mountains, as they are termed. These great plains reach far beyond the Red river to the south, and northward over the Arkansas river, and among the numerous branches of the Missouri. He confirms the account of the beauty and fertility of the Western country.

On the morning of the twenty-fifth, Mr. Dunbar set out on horseback, from the Catahoola to Natchez. The rain which had fallen on the preceding days, rendered the roads wet and muddy, and it was two in the afternoon before he reached the bayou Crocodile, which is considered half way between the Black river and the Mississippi. It is one of the numerous creeks in the low grounds, which assist in venting the waters of the inundation. On the margin of the water courses the lands are highest, and produce canes; they fall off in the rear, into cypress swamps and lakes. The waters of the Mississippi were rising, and it was with some difficulty that they reached a house near Concord that evening. This settlement was begun since the cession of Louisiana to the United States, by citizens of the Mississippi territory, who have established their residence altogether upon newly acquired lands, taken up under the authority of the Spanish commandant, and have gone to the expense of improvement, either in the names of themselves, or others, before the twentieth of December, 1803, hoping, thereby, to hold their new possessions under the sanction of the law. Exclusive of the few actual residents on the banks of the Mississippi, there are two very handsome lakes in the interior, on the banks of which similar settlements have been made. He crossed at the ferry, and at mid-day of the twenty-sixth, reached his own house.

Dr. Hunter, and the remainder of the party, followed Mr. Dunbar down the Washita, with the boat in which they ascended the river; and, ascending the Mississippi, reached St. Catherine's Landing on the morning of the 31st January, 1805.

No. 114.

[2d SESSION.

THE DELAWARES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 26, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress, the memorial and petition of Montgomery Montour, respectfully sheweth:

That he is one of the Delaware nation, who resides on White Woman's creek, near Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, and son of the late Captain Montour, who served the United States faithfully during the Revolutionary war. That his nation, who anciently resided in the lower parts of Pennsylvania, gradually moved back to make room for the white people, until they settled down in their present situation; that, after a war with other Indians, about the land they have long occupied, they came to be peaceably possessed of it by a treaty, made long since with the other Indians. That, however, it appears, by a late treaty made by, and between the United States and the Delawares, Pattawafimies, Miamies, &c. that the Delawares had relinquished their claims to the said tract, and guaranteed the same to the United States. This treaty is ratified by the President, April 24, 1806; and another treaty of purchase appears to have been negotiated by William H. Harrison, with the Delawares and other Indians, on the 21st of August, 1805, and ratified on the same day as the former. Both treaties appear to have been signed by one or more chiefs of the Delaware nation, but your memorialist asserts, from his own knowledge, and undertakes to prove, that the chiefs of his nation, whose names are affixed to the said treaties, were not present, but at a great distance, when these treaties were negotiated and signed, and that, therefore, the commissioner of the United States must have been some how or other imposed upon, with respect to these Delaware chiefs. He also asserts, that they claim, and always have claimed, the complete right of soil, as secured to their fathers by treaty with the other Indians; but that, even admitting that they only claimed the use and occupancy of the soil, as long as they thought proper to occupy it, it appears reasonable that they should have had some compensation for relinquishing that right, with their extensive fields of clear land, houses, &c. but no such compensation is mentioned in the treaty. Your memorialist believes, that, by the laws and usages of the white people, so long undisturbed possession, residence, and improvements, would be sufficient to confirm a title; your memorialist, in behalf of the Delawares, long settled on White Woman's creek, does not wish nor propose to enter into a controversy with the United States, as he has perfect confidence in their justice and sympathy.

The Delawares, formerly a numerous and powerful nation, are reduced, as near as your petitioner can recollect, to forty-seven, or at most to fifty men, some of whom have very numerous families of children, some more than twenty and some of them more yet; but he thinks they may on an average have from three to four or five each; they have always lived nearest the white people, and still earnestly wish to do so. They reside at present in two towns, about ten miles apart. The lowest town contains much the greatest number of inhabitants, and amount of clear land, and at this town they are all willing to reside. Your petitioner, therefore, prays the honorable Congress to direct a survey of land, including the lower town, and its improvements, to be secured to the present inhabitants of the two towns and their heirs. He is the more anxious to obtain this, as his people have no other land to go to; and, should they be obliged to go to the Missouri, to settle among strange and warlike tribes, the remains of their already exhausted nation would be cut off, or lose what advances they have already made in the arts and manners of the white people. Your petitioner is the more confident of the reasonable attention of Congress, as he believes, he asks nothing but what the white people would think reasonable to be granted to them, if they were in the same situation in which the remains of his nation now are. He assures Congress that his people love the white people, and wish to be settled near them, and even round about them; they earnestly wish to learn agriculture and other improvements of life and manners, from the white people: in short, as soon as convenient, to become willingly one people with them.

Your petitioner, in behalf of his people, would prefer a natural boundary to be run by Killbuck, or otherwise Apple creek, as this would prevent disputes between them and the neighboring Indians, and secure to the United States much the best land. And if Congress are pleased to do so, the petitioners will guaranty the remainder, free of all compensation, to the United States, and relinquish the perpetual annuities already engaged by the United States; he begs leave further to observe, that the chiefs of his nation take it very hard that their property was sold, and their names affixed to a treaty, in their absence, and without their consent. Hoping for a favorable attention to the premises, your petitioner, as in duty bound, will pray.

MONTGOMERY MONTOUR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 8, 1807.

SIR:

In reply to yours of the 2d instant, covering the petition of Montgomery Montour, I must remark that, previous to the information given by the petitioner since his arrival at this place, it was not known by the Executive that the Delaware Indians pretended to have any claim on the lands now petitioned for; and that, in the instructions given to the commissioner, who presided at the treaty, by which said lands were ceded to the United States, the Delawares were not contemplated as having any claim. Why the names of any Delawares were introduced among the signatures to said treaty, we have not been informed.

That the two detached villages of Delawares have any claim to said lands, rests, merely, on the declaration of the petitioner; but, as the inhabitants of those two villages are presumed to be destitute of any lands, which they have a right to cultivate, or on which to continue, their situation appears to call for some friendly aid; and Congress will decide whether grants of land, for the use of said villages, as long as the individuals, respectively, and their descendants, may continue thereon, will, under existing circumstances, be reasonable and expedient. A grant, on the foregoing principle, of such a tract, for each village, as would include their improvements, and afford to each family one hundred acres, would probably render general satisfaction.

The petition is herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

PATAWATAMIES AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 30TH OF DECEMBER, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress the enclosed letters from Governor Hull, respecting the Indians in the vicinity of Detroit, residing within our lines. They contain information of the state of things in that quarter, which will properly enter into their view, in estimating the means to be provided for the defence of our country, generally.

TH: JEFFERSON.

December 30, 1807.

DETROIT, November —, 1807.

SIR:

In consequence of your letter of the 27th September last, containing the instructions of the President of the United States, to be communicated to the Indians, I have called together a number of the chiefs of different nations, and delivered to them the following speech:

MY CHILDREN:

I have received a speech from your Great Father of the Seventeen Fires, with directions to communicate it to you. I do it with pleasure, because the advice in it is a further evidence of his paternal care. It is designed for your own good, and the good of your women and children. Listen to it with attention, and seriously consider its contents.

Your Father, the President of the United States, desires to recall to your minds the paternal policy pursued towards you by the United States, and still meant to be pursued. That the United States never wished to do you an injury; but, on the contrary, to give you all the assistance in their power towards improving your condition, and enabling you to support yourselves and your families. He observes, that a misunderstanding having arisen between the United States and the English, war may possibly ensue: That, in this war, it is his wish the Indians should be quiet spectators; not wasting their blood in quarrels which do not concern them: That we are strong enough to fight our own battles, and therefore ask no help: and, if the English should ask theirs, it should convince them that it proceeds from a sense of their own weakness, which would not augur success in the end: That, at the same time, as we have learnt that some tribes are already expressing intentions hostile to the United States, we think it proper to apprise them of the ground on which they now stand, and that on which they will stand; for which purpose we make to them this solemn declaration of our unalterable determination, that we wish them to live in peace with all nations, as well as with us; and we have no intention ever to strike them as to do them an injury of any sort, unless first attacked or threatened: but, that, learning that some of them meditate war on us, we, too, are preparing for war against those, and those only, who shall seek it: and that, if ever we are constrained to lift the hatchet against any tribe, we will never lay it down till that tribe is exterminated, or driven beyond the Mississippi. He adjures them, therefore, if they wish to remain on the land which covers the bones of their fathers, to keep the peace with a people who ask their friendship without needing it; who wish to avoid war without fearing it: in war they will kill some of us; we shall destroy all of them. Let them then continue quiet at home; take care of their women and children, and remove from among them the agents of any nation, persuading them to war, and let them declare to us explicitly, and categorically, that they will do this; in which case they will have nothing to fear from the preparations we are now unwillingly making, to secure our own safety.

MY CHILDREN: Thus you see the interest your Great Father takes in your welfare; how anxious he is to promote your happiness; how desirous he is to prevent you from taking any measures, which will involve you in ruin; how generous in advising you to remain quiet spectators of any differences that may take place between the white people; how candid in warning you of the fate of any tribe, who shall have the hardihood to raise the hatchet against us.

MY CHILDREN: If you are faithful to yourselves; if you desire to promote your own happiness, and that of your women and children; if you expect a continuance of protection, and those friendly offices which you are constantly receiving; if, indeed, as your Great Father expresses it, you expect to continue in the land which covers the bones of your fathers, you will listen to his paternal counsel, and call the Great Spirit to witness your solemn determination to follow his advice.

MY CHILDREN: I expect from you a plain and decided answer, which I shall immediately transmit to the great council fire of the nation.

To which Nanaume, a chief of the Pattawatamy nation, made the following reply:

FATHER:

We have listened to what you said to us yesterday: we have had a council by ourselves, and I now speak the opinion of all my brethren present; and I believe I express the wishes of the whole Pattawatamy nation.

FATHER: We thank the Great Spirit that our Father of the Seventeen Fires does not wish to involve us in the quarrels of the white people: we hope they will have none; if they have any, they had better settle them by themselves.

FATHER: We wish the British would give us the same advice as we receive from our Great Father, the President of the United States. We believe he is strong, because he does not want any aid from us: we believe the British are weak, because they want us to assist them.

FATHER: We remember former times; how they deceived us. When we pass the banks of the Miami, we see the ruins of the old British fort: it reminds us of our fathers, who fell on those fatal plains: it reminds us how they were driven to combat against the Americans, and the fatal consequences which followed: it reminds us of the ingratitude of the British; how they shut the gates against us, when we were flying to them for protection.

FATHER: We never will again place any dependence on them; they have deceived us once, and we will not confide in them again.

FATHER: Why should we fight their battles? If they should be successful, we shall gain nothing by the contest; if they should be unfortunate, it will end in our destruction.

FATHER: We live in your country: we are under your protection. You feed us when we are hungry: you clothe us when we are naked: we receive every year money and valuable goods from our Great Father, the President. Although we have not the advantages of learning, as you white people have, we have too much understanding to forfeit all these advantages: we have too much justice and gratitude to injure our friends and benefactors.

FATHER: It is true we were invited to Malden. We have been there some time: we have been promised valuable presents: we have received little besides promises.

FATHER: We have left them; we will not return to them. We will take the advice of our Great Father of the Seventeen Fires, and remain quiet spectators of your quarrels, if you should have any. This is the determination of all the chiefs here present.

FATHER: When you first sent for us, we immediately prepared to come to see you. Captain McKee prevented us from coming then; he renewed his promises of presents to us, and gave us a keg of spirits: that fatal keg then stopped us. We were stopped a second and a third time: at last, without his knowledge, we crossed the river. We are now happy on your shore, and safe under your protection.

FATHER: Inform our Great Father we take him by the hand: we will hold it fast, and always listen to, and follow, his counsel. May the Great Spirit ever protect him and the people of the United States.

Then Pooquiboad, a chief of the Chippewa nation, spoke as follows:

FATHER: Your red children present salute you. Father, your red children, through you, take their good and Great Father, the President of the United States, by the hand, and to his advice make the following reply:

Our Great Father, the President of the United States, bad birds hover about us, but our ears are shut to their advice; our ears are open to nothing but the counsels of our Great Father.

FATHER: You cannot, you must not, suppose our intentions bad, or that we are hostile to our brethren, the whites of the United States: for, do you not see us here, surrounded by our women and children, counselling with you?

FATHER: We are informed that it is possible a rupture may take place between the English and the Americans; if that event should happen, we are determined not to take a part on either side, but remain quietly in our villages, taking care of our women and children, and cultivating our cornfields.

FATHER: Your children wish to enjoy a continuance of the blessings of peace with you; our hopes are in you; our dependence is on you; our only wish is to remain forever with you.

FATHER: Many of our people are ignorant; many of them are wicked; we cannot answer for their conduct. If some of them should raise the tomahawk, they must answer for the consequences.

FATHER: Our solemn determination is, never to raise the hatchet against the United States. We too well know the fatal consequences of it: for, if we are hungry, our Father feeds us; if we are dry, our Father gives us to drink; if we are naked, our Father clothes us; all which benefits we should forfeit by so doing.

FATHER: If the war pipe is offered us to smoke, we will reject it: we will send from among us all persons who give us bad counsel.

FATHER: One of our war chiefs is going on a visit to see our Great Father, the President of the United States, we hope he will be received and treated as his son; and we pray the Great Spirit to return him to us in health.

FATHER: Bad birds fly among the whites, as well as the red people; we hope you would not listen to them, but trust to the honor of your children. May the Great Spirit watch over us all.

The chiefs of the Ottawa nation, and of the Wyandot nation, have made similar determinations, and I have great confidence in their sincerity.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM HULL.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

DETROIT, 24th November, 1807.

SIR:

I now have the pleasure to inform you that a number of principal chiefs have returned from Malden, and are now here. I have examined them separately, and they give this account, in which they all agree: That Aubayway called there on his way home from here: That great attention was paid to him by McKee and the British officers: That, four days ago, they were called to a council: That they were informed that a war would soon take place between them and the Americans, and that they (the Indians) must take up the hatchet, in their favor, against the Americans: That, before they gave an answer, they held a council by themselves, and appointed Aubayway to make their answer, which was as follows:

That they lived under the protection the United States: That they were treated with justice and kindness by their Great Father, the President: That they had lately made a treaty, in which they acknowledge themselves under the protection of the United States, and no other Power: That they had received, and were entitled to, valuable presents from the United States: That their Great Father, the President, did not ask them to involve themselves in the quarrels of the white people, but to remain quiet spectators: That they were all determined to take his advice: That it was an evidence he was strong enough to fight his own battles: That, after this council, many of them left Malden, although they were all urged to remain.

I have every reason to believe this to be true; as many as seven or eight hundred have called here within two or three days, on their way to their villages. I treat them kindly, and give them what they want to eat. I hope in a few days they will go to their villages and hunting grounds, and the issue of provisions will cease. You will find the issues of provisions the last month and this, very large, on account of the treaty; paying them their fort Industry money, and vast numbers of them returning from Malden. It is, however, nothing, compared to what has been issued by the British: that you say is no rule for us. I think, however, we had better feed them than fight them. The President's advice has a very happy effect on them.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM HULL.

THE OTTAWAS AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE ON THE 15TH JANUARY, 1808.

To the Senate of the United States:

The posts of Detroit and Mackinac having been originally intended, by the government which established and held them, as mere depots for commerce with the Indians, very small cessions of land round them were obtained, or asked from the native proprietors, and these posts depended for protection, on the strength of their garrisons. The principles of our government leading us to the employment of such moderate garrisons, in time of peace, as may merely take care of the post, and to a reliance on the neighboring militia for its support in the first moments of war, I have thought it would be important to obtain from the Indians, such a cession in the neighborhood of these posts, as might maintain a militia proportioned to this object; and I have particularly contemplated, with this view, the acquisition of the eastern moiety of the peninsula between lakes Michigan and Huron, comprehending the waters of the latter, and of Detroit river, so soon as it could be effected with the perfect good will of the natives. Governor Hull was, therefore, appointed a commissioner to treat with them on this subject; but was instructed to confine his propositions, for the present, to so much of the tract, before described, as lay south of Saguna bay, and round to the Connecticut reserve, so as to consolidate the new with the present settled country. The result has been an acquisition of so much only of what would have been acceptable, as extends from the neighborhood of Saguna bay to the Miami of the lakes; with a prospect of soon obtaining a breadth of two miles, for a communication from the Miami to the Connecticut reserve. The treaty for this purpose, entered into with the Ottawas, Chippewas, Wyandots, and Pattawatamies, at Detroit, on the 17th of November last, is now transmitted to the Senate; and I ask their advice and consent as to its ratification.

I communicate herewith, such papers as bear any material relation to the subject.

TH: JEFFERSON.

January 15, 1808.

Articles of a Treaty between the United States of America and the Ottawa, Chippewa, Wyandot, and Pattawatamy nations of Indians.

Articles of a treaty made at Detroit, this seventh day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seven, by William Hull, Governor of the territory of Michigan, and superintendent of Indian affairs, and sole commissioner of the United States, to conclude and sign a treaty or treaties with the several nations of Indians, northwest of the river Ohio, on the one part; and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Ottawa, Chippewa, Wyandot, and Pattawatamy nations of Indians, on the other part.

To confirm and perpetuate the friendship which happily subsists between the United States and the nations aforesaid, to manifest the sincerity of that friendship, and to settle arrangements mutually beneficial to the parties; after a full explanation and perfect understanding, the following articles are agreed to, which, when ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, shall be binding on them, and the respective nations of Indians:

ARTICLE 1. The sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the nations aforesaid, in consideration of money and goods to be paid to the said nations, by the Government of the United States, as hereafter stipulated, do hereby agree to cede, and forever quit claim, and do, in behalf of their nations, hereby cede, relinquish, and forever quit claim, unto the said United States, all right, title, and interest, which the said nations now have, or claim, or ever had, or claimed, in or unto the lands comprehended within the following described lines and boundaries: Beginning at the mouth of the Miami river of the lakes, and running thence up the middle thereof, to the mouth of the great Auglaize river; thence, running due north, until it intersects a parallel of latitude, to be drawn from the outlet of lake Huron, which forms the river Sinclair; thence, running northeast, the course that may be found will lead in a direct line to White rock in lake Huron; thence, due east, until it intersects the boundary line between the United States and Upper Canada, in said lake; thence southerly, following the said boundary line, down said lake, through river Sinclair, lake St. Clair, and the river Detroit, into lake Erie, to a point due east of the aforesaid Miami river; thence west, to the place of beginning.

ARTICLE 2. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, on the part of the United States, as a consideration for the lands ceded by the nations aforesaid, in the preceding article, that there shall be paid to the said nations, at Detroit, ten thousand dollars, in money, goods, implements of husbandry, or domestic animals, (at the option of the said nations, seasonably signified, through the superintendent of Indian affairs, residing with the said nations, to the Department of War,) as soon as practicable, after the ratification of the treaty, by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. Of this sum, three thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars, thirty-three cents and four mills, shall be paid to the Ottawa nation: three thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars, thirty-three cents and four mills, to the Chippewa nation: one thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars, sixty-six cents and six mills, to the Wyandot nation: one thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars, sixty-six cents and six mills, to the Pattawatamy nation; and likewise an annuity forever, of two thousand four hundred dollars, to be paid at Detroit, in manner as aforesaid; the first payment to be made on the first day of September next, and to be paid to the different nations in the following proportions: Eight hundred dollars to the Ottawas; eight hundred dollars to the Chippewas; four hundred dollars to the Wyandots; and four hundred dollars to such of the Pattawatamies as now reside on the river Huron of lake Erie, the river Raisin, and in the vicinity of the said rivers.

ARTICLE 3. It is further stipulated and agreed, if at any time, hereafter, the said nations should be of the opinion, that it would be more for their interest, that the annuity aforesaid should be paid by instalments, the United States will agree to a reasonable commutation for the annuity, and pay it accordingly.

ARTICLE 4. The United States, to manifest their liberality, and disposition to encourage the said Indians in agriculture, further stipulate to furnish the said Indians with two blacksmiths; one to reside with the Chippewas at Saguina; and the other to reside with the Ottawas, at the Miami, during the term of ten years; said blacksmiths are to do such work for the said nations, as shall be most useful to them.

ARTICLE 5. It is further agreed and stipulated, that the said Indian nations shall enjoy the privilege of hunting and fishing on the lands ceded as aforesaid, as long as they remain the property of the United States.

ARTICLE 6. It is distinctly to be understood, for the accommodation of the said Indians, that the following tracts of land, within the cession aforesaid, shall be, and hereby are, reserved to the Indian nations: One tract of land, six miles square, on the Miami of lake Erie, above Roche de Bœuf, to include the village where Fondagame (or the Dog) now lives; also three miles square on the said river, (above the twelve mile square ceded to the United States by the treaty of Greenville) including what is called Presqu' Isle; also, four miles square, on the Miami bay, including the villages where Meshkeman and Waugau now live; also, three miles square, on the river Raisin, at a place called Macon, and where the river Macon falls into the river Raisin, which place is about fourteen miles from the mouth of said river Raisin; also, two sections, of one mile square, each, on the river Rouge, at Seginservin's village; also, two sections, of one mile square, each, at Tonquish's village, near the river Rouge; also, three miles square, on lake St. Clair, above the river Huron, to include Machonee's village; also, six sections, each section containing one mile square, within the cession aforesaid, in such situations as the said Indians shall elect, subject, however, to the approbation of the President of the United States, as to the places of location. It is further understood and agreed, that whenever the reservations cannot conveniently be laid out in squares, they shall be laid out in parallelograms or other figures, as found most practicable and convenient, so as to obtain the area specified in miles; and in all cases, they are to be located in such manner, and in such situations, as not to interfere with any improvements of the French, or other white people, or any former cessions.

ARTICLE 7. The said nations of Indians acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States and no other Power, and will prove, by their conduct, that they are worthy of so great a blessing.

In testimony whereof, the said William Hull, and the sachems and war chiefs, representing the said nations, have hereunto set their hands and seals. Done at Detroit, in the territory of Michigan, the day and year first above written.

WILLIAM HULL, [L. s.]
PEE-WEN-SHE-ME-NOGH, [L. s.]
And other Indians.

Extract of a letter from Governor Hull to the Secretary of War, dated

DETROIT, 23d December, 1807.

Before this reaches you, you will have received the treaty, which I have concluded with the Indians. As yet, I have heard of no complaint from a single individual of the Indians, respecting it. I believe a treaty was never made on fairer principles. Every thing relating to it, has been fully explained; they were not even urged to the measure; full time was given for them to deliberate, and this, sir, you may be assured of, it was the result of their own choice.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 27th, 1807.

SIR:

With this, you will receive a commission, to hold a treaty with the chiefs of such Indian tribes or nations as are actually interested in the lands hereafter described, and to which, the President of the United States is desirous of obtaining the Indians' title, on reasonable terms, if practicable.

You will determine on the most suitable time and place for holding the treaty, and will, accordingly, take the necessary measures for having the chiefs duly notified.

No greater number of Indians should attend the treaty than what will be necessary to include all the chiefs of note, of the respective nations.

You will find it necessary for you to be particularly attentive to this object, otherwise, you will have such a concourse, as will not be only troublesome, but very expensive. From fifty to one hundred is as great a number as ought to be allowed to attend. You will, I presume, find it expedient to hold the treaty in the vicinity of Detroit, and will, of course, give due notice to the contractor's agent, to be prepared to furnish necessary rations.

You will have such articles procured, as may be necessary for your own and for the accommodation of the secretary to the commission, whom you will appoint, and who will be allowed three dollars per day, while actually employed as such. You will employ such faithful interpreters as may be requisite, who will be allowed one dollar per day, each, while actually employed, except such as are in the service of the Government, who ought not to receive any other compensation, in addition to their annual pay, than their subsistence while attending the treaty.

It ought to be understood, that you are not to entertain, at the public expense, a concourse of white people, who may have the curiosity to attend the treaty.

Very little spirit ought to be allowed the Indians, pending the negotiation.

It will be difficult to ascertain, with any tolerable degree of certainty, the quantity of acres included in any purchase you may make, but you will endeavor to calculate the price in such manner, as not, on any condition, to exceed two cents per acre. And I presume it will not be necessary to exceed one cent per acre.

A suitable proportion of the consideration money may be stipulated to be paid on the ratification of the treaty, and for the remainder, an annuity, payable annually, equal to the yearly interest of said remainder. The payments should be stipulated to be made, partly in money, and partly in such articles as may be most useful. The first tract contemplated to be treated for, comprehends, (besides certain lands heretofore ceded and confirmed to the United States by the treaty of Greenville) the residue of the lands included within the following lines, viz: Beginning at the mouth of the river Miami of the lake; thence, up said river, to a bound, to be fixed opposite the mouth of the Auglaize; thence, to run northwesterly without deviating materially from a north line, as nearly as may be, between the head waters of such rivers and streams as empty into the river St. Joseph and lake Michigan, on the one side, and those which empty eastwardly into lake Huron and lake Erie, and the intermediate waters, on the other; the said line to be continued northwardly, until a due east course will strike the head of Saguna bay; thence, by said course, to the head of Saguna bay; thence, by said bay, to lake Huron; thence, by lake Huron, and the shore below, to the mouth of the Miami of the lake.

This tract, calculating the line from the mouth of Auglaize to run nearly north, probably contains (exclusive of former cessions and confirmations to the United States) from four to five millions of acres.

The other tract to be treated for, is comprehended between the following lines, viz: Beginning at the mouth of the river Auglaize; thence, running due east to Sandusky river and to the Western line of the Connecticut western reserve; thence, north by the said western line, to lake Erie; thence, by lake Erie, to the mouth of the Miami of the lake; thence, up the Miami, to the mouth of the river Auglaize.

It will probably be necessary and proper to stipulate for such reservations, adjoining and contiguous to the eastern line of this tract, as may be useful to the Indians, for the purposes of agriculture &c. If they should be inclined to dispose of this tract on reasonable terms, with the condition of reserving ten or fifteen miles in width, on the eastern side, it will be desirable to make the purchase, reserving a right to a road through such reserved tract, from the Connecticut reserve to the Miami river.

It should be recollected, that, by the treaty of Greenville, we have one tract of six miles square, and one of two miles square, on the bay and river Sandusky.

The last mentioned tract to be treated for, will, probably, contain from seven to nine hundred thousand acres, exclusive of the tract obtained by the treaty of Greenville. Each mile reserved on the eastern end, will probably be about twenty thousand acres; of course, ten miles would contain two hundred thousand acres, to be deducted, say from eight hundred thousand acres, leaving, for the cession now contemplated to be obtained within the lines of the last described tract, six hundred thousand acres.

For such expenses as may be necessary for holding the proposed treaty, you will draw bills on this Department. But I must take the liberty of cautioning you against any unnecessary expenditures.

If the chiefs, generally, of the Wyandots and Ottawas, should not be disposed to attend the treaty, with an intention of disposing of the last mentioned tract, that object should be given up, as it would be improper, after what took place in 1805, to attempt any purchase of them, without the general concurrence of the chiefs.

His Excellency Gov. HULL.

THE CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 15, 1808.

To the Senate of the United States:

Although it is deemed very desirable that the United States should obtain from the native proprietors the whole left bank of the Mississippi, to a certain breadth; yet, to obliterate from the Indian mind, an impression deeply made in it, that we are constantly forming designs on their lands, I have thought it best, where urged by no peculiar necessity, to leave to themselves, and to the pressure of their own convenience only, to come forward with offers of sale to the United States.

The Choctaws being indebted to certain mercantile characters, beyond what could be discharged by the ordinary proceeds of their huntings, and pressed for payment by those creditors, proposed, at length, to the United States, to cede lands to the amount of their debts, and designated them in two different portions of their country. These designations not at all suiting us, their proposals were declined for that reason, and with an intimation that, if their own convenience should ever dispose them to cede their lands on the Mississippi, we should be willing to purchase. Still urged by their creditors, as well as by their own desire to be liberated from debt, they at length proposed to make a cession, which should be to our convenience. James Robertson, of Tennessee, and Silas Dinsmoor, were, thereupon, appointed commissioners to treat with them on that subject, with instructions to purchase only on the Mississippi. On meeting their chiefs, however, it was found that such was the attachment of the nation to their lands on the Mississippi, that their chiefs could not undertake to cede them; but they offered all their lands south of a line to be run from their and our boundary, at the Omochito, eastwardly, to their boundary with the Creeks, on the ridge between the Tombigby and Alabama, which would unite our possessions there, from Natchez to Tombigby. A treaty to this effect was accordingly signed at Pooshapukanuk, on the 16th of November, 1805. But this being against express instructions, and not according with the object then in view, I was disinclined to its ratification, and therefore did not, at the last session of Congress, lay it before the Senate for their advice, but have suffered it to lie unacted on.

Progressive difficulties, however, in our foreign relations, have brought into view considerations, other than those which then prevailed. It is now, perhaps, become as interesting to obtain footing for a strong settlement of militia along our southern frontier, eastward of the Mississippi, as on the west of that river; and more so than higher up the river itself. The consolidation of the Mississippi territory, and the establishing a barrier of separation between the Indians and our southern neighbors, are also important objects. The cession is supposed to contain about five millions of acres, of which the greater part is said to be fit for cultivation, and no inconsiderable proportion of the first quality, on the various waters it includes; and the Choctaws and their creditors are still anxious for the sale.

I therefore, now transmit the treaty for the consideration of the Senate, and I ask their advice and consent as to its ratification. I communicate, at the same time, such papers as bear any material relation to the subject, together with a map on which is sketched the northern limit of the cession, rather to give a general idea, than with any pretension to exactness, which our present knowledge of the country would not warrant.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Treaty of Limits between the United States of America and the Choctaw nation of Indians.

Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, by James Robertson, of Tennessee, and Silas Dinsmoor, of New Hampshire, agent for the United States to the Choctaws, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States, on the one part; and the mingoes, chiefs, and warriors, of the Choctaw nation of Indians, in council assembled, on the other part, have entered into the following agreement, viz:

ART. 1. The mingoes, chiefs, and warriors, of the Choctaw nation of Indians, in behalf of themselves and the said nation, do, by these presents, cede to the United States of America, all the lands to which they now have, or ever had claim, lying to the right of the following lines, to say: Beginning at a branch of the Hoomacheeto, where the same is intersected by the present Choctaw boundary, and also, by the path leading from Natchez, to the county of Washington, usually called McClarey's path; thence, easterly along McClarey's path, to the east or left bank of Pearl river; thence, on such a direct line as would touch the lower end of a bluff on the left bank of Chickasawhay river, the first above the Hiyoowanee towns, called Broken Bluff, to a point within four miles of the Broken Bluff; thence, in a direct line, nearly parallel with the river, to a point where an east line of four miles in length will intersect the river, below the lowest settlement, at present occupied and improved in the Hiyoomanee town; thence, still east four miles; thence, in a direct line nearly parallel with the river, to a point on a line to be run from the lower end of Broken Bluff, to Faluktabunnee, on the Tombigby river, four miles from the Broken Bluff; thence, along the said line, to Faluktabunnee; thence, east to the boundary between the Creeks and Choctaws, on the ridge, dividing the waters running into the Alabama; from thence, running into Tombigby; thence, southwardly along the said ridge and boundary, to the southern point of the Choctaw claim; reserving a tract of two miles square, run on meridians and parallels, so as to include the houses and improvements in the town of Fuketcheepoonta, and reserving, also, a tract of five thousand one hundred and twenty acres, beginning at a post on the left bank of Tombigby river, opposite the lower end of Hatchigbee Bluff; thence, ascending the river four miles front and two back, one half for the use of Alzira, the other half for the use of Sophia, daughters of Samuel Mitchell, by Molly, a Choctaw woman, the latter reserve to be subject to the same laws and regulations as may be established in the circumjacent country. And the said mingoes of the Choctaws request, that the Government of the United States may confirm the title of this reserve in the said Alzira and Sophia.

ART. 2. For, and in consideration of, the foregoing cession on the part of the Choctaw nation, and in full satisfaction for the same, the commissioners of the United States do hereby covenant and agree with the said nation, in behalf of the United States, that the said States shall pay to the said nation, fifty thousand five hundred dollars, for the following purposes, to wit: forty-eight thousand dollars, to enable the mingoes to discharge the debt due to their merchants and traders, and also, to pay for the depredations committed on stock, and other property, by evil disposed persons of the said Choctaw nation; two thousand five hundred dollars, to be paid to John Pitchlynn, to compensate him for certain losses sustained in the Choctaw country, and as a grateful testimonial of the nation's esteem. And the said States shall also pay, annually, to the said Choctaws, for the use of the nation, three thousand dollars, in such goods (at nett cost of Philadelphia) as the mingoes may choose, they giving at least one year's notice of such choice.

ART. 3. The commissioners of, the United States, on the part of said States, engage to give to each of the three great medal mingoes, Pukshunnubbee, Mingo Hoomastubbee, and Pooshamataha, five hundred dollars, in consideration of past services in their nation, and also to pay to each of them, an annuity of one hundred and fifty dollars, during their continuance in office. It is perfectly understood, that neither of those great medal mingoes is to share any part of the general annuity of the nation.

ART. 4. The mingoes, chiefs, and warriors, of the Choctaws, certify, that a tract of land, not exceeding fifteen hundred acres, situated between the Tombigby river and Jackson's creek, the front or river line extending down the river, from a blazed white oak, standing on the left bank of the Tombigby, near the head of the shoals, next above Hobeckenlopa, and claimed by John M'Grew, was, in fact, granted to the said M'Grew by Opi-a-mingo, Henetta, and others, many years ago, and they respectfully request the Government of the United States to establish the claim of the said M'Grew to the said fifteen hundred acres.

ART. 5. The two contracting parties covenant and agree, that the boundary, as described in the second article, shall be ascertained, and plainly marked, in such way and manner as the President of the United States may direct, in the presence of three persons, to be appointed by the said nation, one from each of the great medal districts, each of whom shall receive for this service two dollars per day during his actual attendance; and the Choctaws shall have due and seasonable notice of the place where, and time when, the operation shall commence.

ART. 6. The leave granted for establishments on the roads leading through the Choctaw country, is hereby confirmed in all its conditions; and except in the alteration of boundary, nothing in this instrument shall effect or change any of the pre-existing obligations of the contracting parties.

ART. 7. This treaty shall take effect, and become reciprocally obligatory, so soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

Done on Mount Dexter, in Pooshapukanuk, in the Choctaw country, this sixteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and five, and of the independence of the United States of America the thirtieth.

JAS. ROBERTSON, [SEAL.]
SILAS DINSMOOR, [SEAL.]
And a number of Indian Chiefs.

Extract of instructions from the Secretary of War to General James Robertson and Silas Dinsmoor, Esq. dated March 20th, 1805.

GENTLEMEN: The object of the proposed treaties with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations being highly interesting, not only to the United States, but to the State of Tennessee and the Mississippi territory, it is confidently expected that no exertions, on your part, will be wanting in conducting the business confided to your direction, in such a manner as will be best calculated for securing, by all the fair and honorable means in your power, the object in view.

You will find, herewith enclosed, a petition from the principal chiefs of the Choctaw nation, requesting the President of the United States to purchase so much of their lands, between the mouth of the Yazoo river and the Chickasaw nation, as will satisfy a demand which Panton, Leslie, and Co. have against them. The lands to be ceded are to extend from the Mississippi, at the mouth of the Yazoo, along the present boundary to the Big Black river, and there carrying the whole width of the said tract, between those two rivers, viz: the Mississippi and the Big Black, so far as to contain a sufficient quantity for the payment of the debt above mentioned, amounting, as stated in the enclosed account from the said house of Panton, Leslie, and Co. to the sum of $46,09 02.

But, should a cession be obtained, amounting in value to this sum, and, on investigation, it be found that the Choctaws themselves do not, in fact, owe the whole, then, whatever balance may be left, after the payment of debts, actually and justly due from them to the said house, shall be paid to the Choctaw nation. You will endeavor to extend the cession, from the main source of the Big Black, say north or north northeast, and up the Mississippi to the Chickasaw boundary; and if the whole tract shall exceed what would be reasonable to demand, for the sum above mentioned, and the expense of the treaty, you will stipulate for the payment of such annuity to the Choctaws, in goods or money, as may be reasonable, but which shall not exceed the interest of such a capital, as, together with the debt aforesaid, and the expense of the treaty, will make the average price for the cession proposed, more than at the rate of two cents per acre.

It may not be improper, when estimating the value of the lands with the Indians, to have particular reference to the probable annual profit which they actually derive from them, in peltries and furs, as a data, by which you may enable the Indians to understand their present value, but which is constantly diminishing, from the decrease of the game.

The average price paid for Indian lands, within the last four years, does not amount to one cent per acre. It is not, however, the wish of the Government, to insist on such average price with the Choctaws or Chickasaws.

The whole amount of the tract, claimed by the Choctaws, and bounded as above, may, probably, amount from three and a half to four and a half millions of acres, allowing their boundary, on the Mississippi, to be, as stated by their chiefs, when at this place in the winter of 1804, viz: above the mouth of the river St. Francis, running from thence, southwardly, so as to strike a certain branch of the Tombigby, near their upper towns or settlements. It is presumed that a considerable proportion of the proposed cession is overflowed every year, and, of course, of but very little value, except for hunting, and until it shall be inhabited, which will, probably, never be the case. The Indians will be allowed to hunt on it, as heretofore, as long as they continue friendly to the United States.

Two thousand dollars, by way of annuity, which will be equal to more than thirty two thousand dollars prompt pay, is considered the highest sum which ought to be given as an annuity, in addition to the debt above mentioned, together with the expense of treating for the whole tract as above described.

PENSACOLA, 5th September, 1806.

SIR:

From what passed during our interview at Washington in 1804, I shall not, I hope, require any apology for again intruding the Indian claims of our house on your notice. On my arrival from Europe in April last, I was much gratified by the reports given me by my partners, of the prospect of their final extinguishment, which I flattered myself was, in part, owing to the favorable impressions entertained by your Government, that our influence with the Indians had not been altogether fruitlessly exerted, when called upon. A few months have elapsed, and circumstances have arisen in that short period of sufficient importance to awaken my fears, although they cannot destroy my confidence in your promises to Mr. Simpson and me.

On reference to your letter addressed to me under date the 2d May, 1804, and the Choctaw petition forwarded to the Executive in the month of August same year, you will find that the latter is strictly conformable to the arrangements pointed out in the former, as being most agreeable to the views of your Government. Why the original idea was given up, and the treaty of November last substituted in its place, it does not become me to inquire. It was no sooner suggested by the commissioners, that their object was the acquisition of the territory ceded by that treaty, than all our exertions were again employed in procuring the assent of the Indians; and, notwithstanding the interference of some despicable characters, who attempted, by the most contemptible untruths, to delude the Indians, we flatter ourselves that our influence was not without its due weight in the negotiation. Impressed as I am, therefore, that our house has not been unsuccessful in its endeavors to forward the views of the American Government, and assured as I have been, by the Indian agents, that our services were known and properly mentioned to the Executive, I must confess that I was disappointed in the result; and were it not for the high opinion I entertain of the honorable sentiments that guide your national councils, I should despair of seeing myself indemnified, notwithstanding the incalculable expense and trouble we have been at.

But it is not alone the Choctaw treaty which gives rise to my fears (for which I hope there is no foundation.) After a most expensive, troublesome, and disagreeable application to the Creek nation, a promise was obtained from them, in 1803, that they would pay their debts so soon as they sold the Oakmulgee lands; to this promise, the agent, Colonel Hawkins, was privy, and, I may say, a party, as it was at his suggestion that the demand was urged, and pressed upon them in that form, as being connected with the favorite wish of your Government. The land has, at length, been sold, but our debts have been left out of the calculation. When the Indians met to ratify this treaty, in May last, one of my partners attended to claim the fulfilment of their promise, but, after much shuffling, they rejected my claim, on the ground alluded to in the enclosed letter from Colonel Hawkins. The fact is shortly this: finding the Upper and Lower Creeks unwilling to admit, as a part of my claims on them, the robberies committed by Bowles and his Seminoles, I treated for, and obtained, from the Seminoles, as an indemnification, a tract of land lying within the Spanish limits, for the cession of which, according to the Indian laws, they were fully competent, by which means my general claims against the nation were reduced within $40,000. This bargain, I do assert, was as fair a purchase as ever was made from red men, since the treaty of William Penn, and has been formally ratified in presence of the King of Spain's representative, by all the chief men of the Seminoles, on whose hunting ground the land is situated, and you will the more readily admit my position, when informed, that, for a tract of country containing probably less, but certainly not more, than one million and a half of acres of poor land, we gave up claims to the amount of $47,000, principal of which, $16,000, ought to bear interest from 1791, and $11,000 from the year 1799, being the dates of Bowles' two robberies, independent of our expenses in treating, &c. Had we been so base as to allow cupidity to influence us in our operations, the rejection of our remaining claims by the nation would have been a just punishment on us, but, so far from this being the case, my agent and partner was instructed, and accordingly offered, to give up the lands to the nation, on their agreeing to admit and pay our claim as originally presented to them; this they refused to do, in a very unexpected, and, I may say, unprincipled manner. I certainly had reason to expect different treatment, and, although I have had many hints given me that improper influence was used to bring about the rejection, I am too well acquainted with the Indian character to doubt its having been a measure entirely their own.

This sketch of our situation is given you, with the view of introducing a request that you will favor me with an answer, in which you can give me assurances that the Choctaw treaty will be probably ratified, or, that in any new treaty made with that nation, our claims, already acknowledged by that nation, will be attended to. You will confer an obligation on me of the greatest importance, and you will add considerably thereto, by favoring me with your advice respecting the Creek debts, on the principle that we will have no objection to give up the land purchased of the Seminoles for what it cost, provided the residue of our claim can be secured.

With respect to our claim on the Chickasaws, I have assurances from the chiefs that it will be paid as soon as provision is made for it by the United States; but, as I understand that a new agent has been appointed, will you be so good as to mention our names to him, in such a manner as to secure his active interference in our favor, in case of necessity.

I remain, with sentiments of great respect and consideration,
Sir, your obedient humble servant,

JOHN FORBES.

The Hon. HENRY DEARBORN, Esq. Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 12th, 1806.

SIR:

Your letter of the 5th of September has been duly received and considered. In answer, I can only remark, that the Creeks absolutely refused to accede to my request, to have provision made in the convention for the payment of the balance due from them to your house; and observed, that a great part of your debt had been paid by lands sold to your house in Florida, and that they should take proper measures for paying the balance.

The Chickasaws will, I presume, pay their debt, as soon as the appropriation is made by Congress, which will probably take place in the ensuing session.

Whether the treaty with the Choctaws will ultimately be ratified or not, I cannot undertake to say. If it should be ratified, it is presumed there will be no obstacle to your recovering your due, out of the consideration to be paid for the land.

I hope no influence of your house has been brought to bear on the free navigation of the Mobile,
And am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

JOHN FORBES, Esq.

PENSACOLA, 7th February, 1807.

SIR:

I hasten to reply to your letter of the 12th November, which reached my hands on the 3d instant. I flattered myself, by recalling to your memory the motives on which I had acted, and the assurances given me by you, personally, as well as by letter, that you would have been so good as to use your influence, in order that justice might be done us by the Creeks, who, of all the Southern tribes, possess the means of indemnifying us with least prejudice to themselves. The ostensible motives of their refusal, I did myself the honor of detailing to you, in my letter of the 5th September last, with candor, and it is scarcely necessary to remark, that our having been paid a specific part is so far from being a reason for withholding the balance still due, that it ought to operate rather as a motive for completing the payment, as it can now be done at one half the original sacrifice demanded of them; but, unless the Executive of the United States will condescend to interpose, I fear the Indians themselves will be a long time in taking measures to effect it.

I certainly was, and am yet, under the impression that your letter to me, dated the 2d May, 1804, was a pledge, on your part, that Government would assist us in this recovery, whenever the Oakmulgee lands should be obtained; and I appeal to yourself, whether I am not justified in considering it in this light. On this principle, I would beg leave to request, as an act of justice, that Colonel Hawkins be instructed to insist on a final adjustment of our claims on the Creek nation, and that they take immediate steps to pay them, either by a further sale of their lands to the United States, or by instalments from their other funds. The whole balance is now under $40,000, principal, as mentioned in my last, a sum of trivial importance to a nation, but too much for an individual to lose. You conclude with hoping that our influence may not have conduced in thwarting the free navigation of the Mobile. I can assure you, not; and what is more, that no officer of his Catholic Majesty, on this side of the Atlantic, is vested with powers to permit the free navigation of that river on the terms demanded by your Government. The Captain General of the province has lately ordered a junta to report to him on the subject, and it is my intention to lay before it a memorial respecting the duties exacted at fort Stoddart on the packhorsemen going by land to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations; but neither measure, I believe, will affect the present order of things, until the king's pleasure is known.

If I am thus candid with you, I have been equally so with others, who, if they do me justice, may easily give you unequivocal proofs, that our conduct has ever been uniformly that of conciliation betwixt the two Governments. The high standing we enjoy under the protection of his Catholic Majesty never has, and never shall be, prostituted to views we deem inconsistent with our honor. Our establishment is of a political nature, it is true, but it is such as we have no reason to disavow, and, however it may be narrowed in its operation, by circumstances, will ever be important to this province. It has, however, been my wish, for some time past, to relinquish, and I regret that the non-payment of our Indian debts obliges me still to continue in the country, after it has ceased to be the object of my choice.

Requesting that you will favor me with an answer, and make use of this communication with the necessary reserve, I remain, with sentiments of great regard and personal esteem,

Sir, your obedient humble servant,

JOHN FORBES.

THE CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 30, 1808.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The Choctaws being indebted to their merchants beyond what could be discharged by the ordinary proceeds of their huntings, and pressed for payment, proposed to the United States to cede lands to the amount of their debts, and designated them in two different portions of their country. These designations not at all suiting us, were declined. Still, urged by their creditors, as well as by their own desire, they at length proposed to make a cession which should be to our convenience. By a treaty signed at Pooshapukanuk, on the sixteenth of November, one thousand eight hundred and five, they accordingly ceded all their lands south of a line to be run from their and our boundary at the Omochito, eastwardly to their boundary with the Creeks, on the ridge between the Tombigby and Alabama, as is more particularly described in the treaty, containing about five millions of acres, as is supposed, and uniting our possessions there from Adams to Washington county.

The location contemplated in the instructions to the commissioners, was on the Mississippi. That in the treaty being entirely different, I was, at that time, disinclined to its ratification, and have suffered it to lie unacted on. But progressive difficulties in our foreign relations have brought into view considerations other than those which then prevailed. It is now, perhaps, as interesting to obtain footing for a strong settlement of militia along our southern frontier, eastward of the Mississippi, as on the west of that river, and more so than higher up the river itself. The consolidation of the Mississippi territory, and the establishment of a barrier of separation between the Indians and our southern neighbors, are also important objects; and, the Choctaws and their creditors being still anxious that the sale should be made, I submitted the treaty to the Senate, who have advised and consented to its ratification. I, therefore, now lay it before both Houses of Congress, for the exercise of their constitutional powers as to the means of fulfilling it.

OTTAWAS AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 30, 1808.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The posts of Detroit and Mackinac having been originally intended by the Governments which established and held them, as mere depots for commerce with the Indians, very small cessions of land around them were obtained, or asked, from the native proprietors, and those posts depended for protection on the strength of their garrisons. The principles of our Government leading us to the employment of such moderate garrisons, in time of peace, as may merely take care of the post, and to a reliance on the neighboring militia for its support, in the first moments of war, I have thought it would be important to obtain from the Indians such a cession in the neighborhood of these posts, as might maintain a militia proportioned to this object: and, I have particularly contemplated, with this view, the acquisition of the eastern moiety of the peninsula between the lakes Michigan, Huron, and Erie, extending it to the Connecticut reserve, so soon as it could be effected, with the perfect good will of the natives.

By a treaty concluded at Detroit, on the seventeenth of November last, with the Ottawas, Chippewas, Wyandots, and Pattawatamies, so much of this country has been obtained, as extends from about Sagunia bay southwardly to the Miami of the lakes, supposed to contain upwards of five millions of acres, with a prospect of obtaining, for the present, a breadth of two miles for a communication from the Miami to the Connecticut reserve.

The Senate having advised and consented to the ratification of this treaty, I now lay it before both Houses of Congress, for the exercise of their constitutional powers, as to the means of fulfilling it.

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 10, 1808.

To the Senate of the United States:

A purchase having been lately made from the Cherokee Indians, of a tract of land six miles square, at the mouth of the Chickamauga, on the Tennessee, I now lay the treaty and papers relating to it before the Senate, with an explanation of the views which have led to it.

It was represented that there was within that tract a great abundance of iron ore, of excellent quality, with a stream and fall of water suitable for iron works; that the Cherokees were anxious to have works established there, in the hope of having a better supply of those implements of household and agriculture, of which they have learned the use and necessity; but, on the condition that they should be under the authority and the control of the United States. As such an establishment would occasion a considerable and certain demand for corn and other provisions and necessaries, it seemed probable that it would immediately draw around it a close settlement of the Cherokees, would encourage them to enter on a regular life of agriculture, familiarize them with the practice and value of the arts, attach them to property, lead them, of necessity, and without delay, to the establishment of laws and government, and thus make a great and important advance towards assimilating their condition to ours. At the same time, it offers considerable accommodation to the Government, by enabling it to obtain, more conveniently than it now can, the necessary supplies of cast and wrought iron, for all the Indians south of the Tennessee, and for those, also, to whom St. Louis is a convenient deposite; and will benefit such of our own citizens, likewise, as shall be within its reach. Under these views the purchase has been made, with the consent and desire of the great body of the nation, although not without some dissenting members, as must be the case with all collections of men. But it is represented that the dissentients are few, and under the influence of one or two interested individuals. It is by no means proposed that these works shall be conducted on account of the United States; it is understood that there are private individuals ready to erect them, subject to such reasonable rent as may secure a reimbursement to the United States, and to such other conditions, as shall secure to the Indians their rights and tranquillity.

The instrument is now submitted to the Senate with a request of their advice and consent to its ratification.

Meigs, who was appointed to hold a conference with the Cherokees, for the purpose of purchasing a tract of land, a site for iron works, and at the mouth of Chickamauga creek, on the south side of Tennessee.*

Whereas it has been represented to the chiefs and warriors of said nation, that such a site would be desirable both for the United States and the Cherokee nation, and to their mutual advantage, the chiefs and warriors have agreed to, and sold to the United States, six miles square, at the mouth of Chickamauga creek, on the south side of Tennessee, and to be laid off in a square tract, so as to include the creek to the best advantage for said site.

2. And it is further agreed, that the United States shall pay the Cherokee nation, the sum of five thousand dollars, so soon as the said treaty shall be ratified, and one thousand bushels of corn: Provided, nevertheless, That, if the iron ore should fail within said limits ceded to the United States, then, and in that case, the United States shall have full liberty to get ore off their land in the most suitable place.

In testimony whereof, the undersigned commissioner, and the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokee nation, have set their hands and seals.

[Signed also by a number of chiefs and warriors.]

HIWASSEE, 3d December, 1807.

Sir:

Enclosed I transmit, by Colonel Earle, a cession made to the United States by the Cherokee nation, of a tract of land six miles square, at the mouth of Chickamauga creek, on the south side of Tennessee river, for the purpose of an establishment of iron works, as stated in your letter of the 28th February last.

The creek is large and navigable through the ceded tract, and many miles higher up. Colonel Earle has satisfactorily informed himself of this place, having all the requisites for the business, with respect to ore, timber, and ease of transportation, to and from the works.

The price of this tract, compared with large cessions, will appear high, but, considering its value for the object of Government, it is very low, and hope it will meet your approbation.

I have agreed to pay the Cherokees $2,500 in merchandise, out of the United States' factory here, which they will receive this day, and in the spring, 1,000 bushels of corn, delivered at the mouth of Chickamauga creek, and the balance when directed by the Executive.

Colonel Earle will inform you of the difficulty in obtaining the cession, (although intended, through benevolence, for their advantage) principally through the opposition of Vann; yet he has the art to keep himself out of the way, and put the unfortunate task of opposition on others, and who, notwithstanding they threaten the lives of those who are in favor of the Government views, are always defeated.

This threatening the friends to good order is intolerable, and requires some measures of an exemplary kind, on the part of the United States, to deter such hardy villains, and their abettors, and for the relief of the well affected.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHEROKEES AND SIOUX.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 29, 1808.

To the Senate of the United States:

When the convention of the 7th of January, 1806, was entered into with the Cherokees, for the purchase of certain lands, it was believed by both parties, that the eastern limit, when run in the direction therein prescribed, would have included all the waters of Elk river; on proceeding to run that line, however, it was found to omit a considerable extent of those waters, on which were already settled about two hundred families. The Cherokees readily consented, for a moderate compensation, that the line should be so run as to include all the waters of that river. Our commissioners accordingly entered into an explanatory convention for that purpose, which I now lay before the Senate for consideration, whether they will advise and consent to its ratification; a letter from one of the commissioners, now also enclosed, will more fully explain the circumstances which led to it.

Lieutenant Pike, on his journey up the Mississippi, in 1805-6, being at the village of the Sioux, between the rivers St. Croix and St. Peter's, conceived that the position was favorable for a military and commercial post for the United States, whenever it should be thought expedient to advance in that quarter; he, therefore, proposed to the chiefs a cession of lands for that purpose. Their desire of entering into connexion with the United States, and of getting a trading house established there, induced a ready consent to the proposition, and they made, by articles of agreement, now enclosed, a voluntary donation to the United States, of two portions of land, the one of nine miles square, at the mouth of the St. Croix, the other from below the mouth of St. Peter's, up the Mississippi, to St. Anthony's falls, extending nine miles in width on each side of the Mississippi. These portions of land are designated on the map now enclosed. Lieutenant Pike, on his part, made presents to the Indians to some amount. This convention, though dated the 23d of September, 1805, is but lately received; and, although we have no immediate view of establishing a trading post at that place, I submit it to the Senate for the sanction of their advice and consent to its ratification, in order to give to our title a full validity on the part of the United States, whenever it may be wanting for the special purpose which constituted, in the minds of the donors, the sole consideration and inducement to the cession.

Whereas, at a conference held between the United States of America and the Sioux nation of Indians, Lieut. Z. M. Pike, of the army of the United States, and the chiefs and warriors of the said tribe, have agreed to the following articles, which, when ratified and approved of by the proper authority, shall be binding on both parties:

ARTICLE 1. That the Sioux nation grants unto the United States, for the purpose of the establishment of military posts, nine miles square at the mouth of the river St. Croix, also, from below the confluence of the Mississippi and St. Peter's, up the Mississippi, to include the falls of St. Anthony, extending nine miles on each side of the river. That the Sioux nation grants to the United States, the full sovereignty and power over said districts, forever, without any let or hindrance whatsoever.

ART. 2. That, in consideration of the above grants, the United States

ART. 3. The United States promise, on their part, to permit the Sioux to pass, repass, hunt, or make other uses of the said districts, as they have formerly done, without any other exception but those specified in article first.

SIR:

Some time before Double-head's decease, I stated to him your request, as expressed in your letter of the 1st of April last, that the convention line should be so extended as to comprehend all the waters of Elk river. He readily said, he would go with me, and selected three others on whom he could depend, and assured me, that the line should be so extended; but, on his being killed, I expected to meet with difficulty in effecting that business. A few days before I set out on that business, I communicated your request to a large council of chiefs, who were here, receiving their money on account of that convention, and part of their annuity for the present year; from some, through ignorance, and others, from views of taking advantage to raise the compensation, I only received an evasive answer. I then invited the Black Fox, and some others, in whom I could confide, to go with me to the place of commencing the line; and on the 7th instant, met General Robertson and Mr. Freeman, at the Chickasaw Old Fields. When on the ground, we soon agreed that the line should be so run as to comprehend all the waters of Elk river, as will appear by the enclosed agreement; we then run such courses as the nature of the ground would admit of, until we intersected the first waters that fall into the Elk, then a direct line to the Cumberland mountain, and fixed a point on the side of the mountain, from which the rocky face of the mountain is the boundary to lands before ceded. With respect to compensation and presents, as you left it to our discretion, we did the best we could. There is upwards of two hundred families on the land, and all that part of it lying above the Tennessee line, surveyed into sections, and covered by land warrants. The Cherokees being in debt to the United States $1,823, I offered to cancel that debt as a compensation to the nation, for the alteration of the line; they requested to have it made up to $2,000, and $1,000 and two rifles, as presents to the chiefs transacting the business. General Robertson was fully in opinion with me, that we ought not to hesitate as to these terms, and they were agreed to. I will state some of the reasons that induced us to these terms: 1st. Although they had not the right, they had the power to refuse to extend the line. 2dly. It would have required at least thirty days to have run the traverse, and the true line, at an expense of at least thirty dollars per day, so that near $1,000 is saved on that account. 3dly. To have marched a detachment to remove the inhabitants, would have caused considerable expense; it would have brought distress on the citizens, many of whom went on the land without any design to infract the laws. These people now feel sentiments of gratitude towards the executive department, and the jurisdiction of the State will now be extended over them; it is really an acquisition to the State of Tennessee. With respect to the chiefs who have transacted the business with us, they will have their hands full to satisfy the ignorant, the obstinate, and the cunning of some of their own people, for which they well deserve this silent consideration. At the time the convention was made, every body supposed that the waters of Duck river had their source more east than the waters of Elk river, and that the convention line would cover all the land which was in dispute between the Chickasaws and Cherokees. It is a handsome country, and is now settled cheap enough in all conscience. I am authorized by General Robertson to make this report in his absence.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

RETURN J. MEIGS.

THE SIOUX.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 13, 1808.

Mr. MITCHELL from the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, of March 29th, and the treaty with the Sioux tribes of Indians, made the following report:

The amount of land ceded by the Sioux, is a tract of nine miles square, at the mouth of the river St. Croix, amounting to acres,	51,840
And another tract, at the falls of St. Anthony, containing, by estimation, (18 miles by 9) a sum of acres equal to	103,680
Amounting, in the whole, to	Acres, 155,520

This people had been induced to cede these tracts of land in consideration of about two hundred dollars' worth of goods and merchandise, and of the benefit they would derive from the establishment of a trading house, and of protection from a military station in their country.

There is a blank in the second article, which the committee learn, from Captain Pike, was intended to be filled up with some valuable consideration, to vest the title fully and fairly in the United States.

As the sum to be given by the United States is wholly optional and gratuitous, it is believed, by the agent, that two thousand dollars would be considered by the Sioux a very generous compensation. This amounts to not much more than one cent and twenty-eight mills the acre.

The committee, after considering the agreement of the agent with the Sioux chiefs, and such information as they have been able to procure from Captain Pike thereon, report to the Senate the following amendment:

After the word "States," in the second line of the second article, insert the following words: "shall, prior to taking possession thereof, pay to the Sioux two thousand dollars, or deliver the value thereof in such goods and merchandise as they shall choose."

THE ALABAMAS AND CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DEC. 30, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

I lay before the Legislature a letter from Governor Claiborne, on the subject of a small tribe of Alabama Indians, on the western side of the Mississippi, consisting of about a dozen families. Like other erratic tribes in that country, it is understood that they have hitherto moved from place to place, according to their convenience, without appropriating to themselves, exclusively, any particular territory; but having now become habituated to some of the occupations of civilized life, they wish for a fixed residence. I suppose it will be the interest of the United States to encourage the wandering tribes of that country to reduce themselves to fixed habitations, whenever they are so disposed. The establishment of towns, and growing attachments to them, will furnish, in some degree, pledges of their peaceable and friendly conduct. The case of this particular tribe is now submitted to the consideration of Congress.

December 30, 1808.

TH: JEFFERSON.

NEW ORLEANS, November 5th, 1808.

SIR:

You have, heretofore, been informed of the messages, which, (in consequence of the late conviction of four Alabama Indians of the crime of murder,) I had sent to the Choctaws of the Bayou Chico village, and to the tribe of Alabamas, and you will recollect, that, in my message to the Choctaws, I had proposed to present to the wife and children of the Indian murdered by a white man, of the name of Thomas, merchandise to the value of sixty dollars. By a letter from Judge King, the bearer of my messages, I learn that the Choctaws "will not permit the widow to receive the presents," alleging that, notwithstanding my assurance to the contrary, "it would have very much the appearance of a compromise for Thomas, and would be so considered by other Indians."

As relates to the Alabamas, Judge King reports as follows: "They, the Alabamas, appear perfectly satisfied and grateful for your clemency; they, however, complain of great distress, inasmuch as they share no claim to any land in the country; but have resided, many years, on ground claimed by white individuals, who have lately suggested to them the necessity of removing; they say that they have lived here, among the white people, forty years; that their men are in the habit of hunting, driving cattle, and acting as boatmen, and their women and children of gathering cotton, by which means they support their families; that they are unwilling to leave the neighborhood, and are desirous of knowing whether they will be permitted to establish a small village, sufficient for about a dozen families, on the lands of the United States, which they may expect will be permanent."

The Alabamas formerly resided on the waters of the Mobile, and emigrated to Louisiana about forty-two years ago; a few families set themselves down in Opelousas; but the greater number settled on the Sabine. Feeling sensibly for these poor wanderers, or rather exiles from the country of their ancestors, and desirous to contribute to their happiness, I have, in a letter to Judge King, dated on the first instant, thus expressed myself: "I feel no hesitation in taking upon myself to give permission to the Alabamas to settle upon lands of the United States, and to accompany it with an assurance that I will intercede in their favor with the Government, and endeavor to obtain for them a grant for two or three thousand acres of land, which, I presume, will be as much as they would desire; will you have the goodness, therefore, to advise with the Alabamas as to the spot where they would wish to reside, and if you should find it belonging to the United States, and so situated that no inconvenience is likely to result to the citizens of Opelousas, from its being settled by Indians, you will, (in my name) authorize the Alabamas to remove thereto."

I am persuaded that, on this occasion, my feelings are in unison with the Government, and that, so long as the few Alabama families, now in Opelousas, shall conduct themselves with propriety, they will find a friendly asylum. The late outrage was the first offence with which the Alabamas had been charged; and even on that occasion, the conduct of this little tribe was exemplary; they, with promptitude, delivered up the murderers, and among the most active in effecting their arrest, was the father of one of the offenders.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your humble servant,

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

TRADING HOUSES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 17, 1809.

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, January 16th, 1809.

SIR:

By instructions from the Secretary of War, to communicate to you such information, as may have been acquired in this office, as to the operation of the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, I take the liberty to address you.

By that act, it is not permitted to export furs or peltries; experience has proven, that the home demand for peltries, particularly deer skins, (of which great numbers are of necessity taken from the Indians) is by no means equal to the quantity furnished; of course, if restricted to be sold here, great sacrifices will often be made.

For furs, commonly used by hatters in the manufactory of hats, it is believed the demand in this country is sufficient to afford reasonable competition and sales, but the existing restrictions operate much against the fund, by narrowing the choice, even among our own markets.

It appears to have been contemplated by the present law, to pay from the treasury the salaries requisite to conduct the establishment; and, by not taxing the fund therewith, to give the Indians their supplies on better terms. The increase of the business, by adding to the number of trading houses, and spreading more extensively the benefits of the system among the various tribes, has, however, in part, compelled a departure from this plan, and occasioned heavy draughts on the trading fund.

The law authorized the President to draw from the Treasury, annually, a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, for the payment of the salaries of agents and their clerks, on the frontiers, and allows them to draw rations from the public supplies. These (the rations) have been commuted into subsistence money, which is paid from the funds of this establishment.

There are, at this time, located, and supplied on the frontiers, twelve trading houses, eleven of which are in full operation, and one will commence as soon as the spring opens. Of these, three have been established during the last year.

The salaries now paid for conducting them, are,

		TO AGENTS.
8 at	1,000 dollars per annum,	}	-	-	$10,920 00
and	365 do subsistence money,
3 at	800 do per annum,	}	-	-	3,495 00

1 at	750 do per annum,	}	-	-	1,020 00
and	270 do subsistence money,
		TO ASSISTANT AGENTS, OR CLERKS.
1 at	600 dollars per annum,	}	-	-	780 00
and	180 do subsistence money,
1 at	500 do per annum,	}	-	-	680 00
and	180 do subsistence money,
5 at	500 do per annum,	}	-	-	3,250 00
and	150 do subsistence money,
					$20,145 00
Interpreters are requisite at most of the posts; the average rate of salary is $400 per annum, say at eight posts,					3,200 00
It will be seen, by the statement above, that, of the twelve factories, seven only have assistant agents, or clerks; three additional will probably be wanting, at $650 per annum,					1,950 00
					$25,295 00

The allowance for clerks for this office, payable from the treasury, is one thousand dollars per annum; fourteen hundred dollars are paid, of which, four hundred dollars from the fund of this establishment, as in the case of the agents at the trading houses. An additional accounting clerk is indispensably necessary, as the business of the office cannot be kept up with the present assistance. Should it, therefore, be thought right to appropriate, from the treasury, enough to cover the annual expense of employing agents, clerks, and assistants, twenty-five thousand three hundred dollars for the trading houses on the frontiers, and two thousand four hundred for this office, will be requisite.

Whether it will be necessary to add to the general fund, for the purposes of trade with the Indian tribes, depending, in a great measure, on the policy of extending the system, it is not for me to give an opinion. It is, however, proper to remark, that the last has been an unfortunate year for the establishment, as well that the peltries depending for sale on foreign demand are a dead and perishing stock on hand, as that most of the articles usually laid in for the supplies of the factories, have risen considerably in price.

From the nature of the business of this office, you will readily see, sir, that the correspondence must be constant and extensive; and I beg to submit to you the propriety of extending the privilege of franking to it, as to other public offices.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

The Hon. THOMAS NEWTON,

Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Superintendent of Indian Trade.

TREATY OF BROWNSTOWN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 18, 1809.

To the Senate of the United States:

I submit a treaty, concluded at Brownstown, in the territory of Michigan, between the United States and the Chippewas, Ottawas, Pattawatamies, Wyandots, and Shawanese, on the 25th day of November last, whereby those tribes grant to the United States, two roads therein described, for the decision of the Senate, whether they will advise and consent to the ratification of it.

February 18, 1809.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Articles of a Treaty made and concluded at Brownstown, in the territory of Michigan, between William Hull, Governor of said territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and Commissioner Plenipotentiary of the United States of America for concluding any treaty or treaties, which may be found necessary, with any of the Indian tribes northwest of the river Ohio, of the one part; and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Chippewa, Ottawa, Pattawatamy, Wyandot, and Shawanee nations of Indians, of the other part:

ARTICLE 1. Whereas, by a treaty concluded at Detroit, on the the 17th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seven, a tract of land lying to the west and north of the river Miami, of lake Erie, and principally within the territory of Michigan, was ceded by the Indian nations to the United States: And whereas the lands lying on the southeastern side of the said river Miami, and between said river and the boundary lines established by the treaties of Greenville and fort Industry, with the exception of a few small reservations to the United States, still belong to the Indian nations, so that the United States cannot, of right, open and maintain a convenient road from the settlements in the State of Ohio to the settlements in the territory of Michigan, nor extend those settlements so as to connect them: In order, therefore, to promote this object, so desirable and evidently beneficial to the Indian nations, as well as to the United States, the parties have agreed to the following articles, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, shall be reciprocally binding:

ART. 2. The several nations of Indians aforesaid, in order to promote the object mentioned in the preceding article, and in consideration of the friendship they bear towards the United States, for the liberal and benevolent policy which has been practised towards them by the Government thereof, do hereby give, grant, and cede, unto the said United States, a tract of land for a road of one hundred and twenty feet in width, from the foot of the Rapids of the river Miami, of lake Erie, to the western line of the Connecticut reserve, and all the land within one mile of the said road, on each side thereof, for the purpose of establishing settlements along the same; also, a tract of land, for a road only, of one hundred and twenty feet in width, to run southwardly from what is called Lower Sandusky, to the boundary line established by the treaty of Greenville, with the privilege of taking, at all times, such timber and other materials from the adjacent lands, as may be necessary for making and keeping in repair the said road, with the bridges that may be required along the same.

ART. 3. It is agreed, that the lines embracing the lands given and ceded by the preceding article, shall be run in such directions as may be thought most advisable by the President of the United States, for the purposes aforesaid.

ART. 4. It is agreed the said Indian nations shall retain the privilege of hunting and fishing on the lands given and ceded as above, so long as the same shall remain the property of the United States.

ART. 5. The several nations of Indians aforesaid, do again acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other sovereign; and the United States, on their part, do renew their covenant to extend protection to them, according to the intent and meaning of stipulations in former treaties.

Done at Brownstown, in the territory of Michigan, this twenty-fifth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight, and of the independence of the United States of America the thirty-third.

[Signed, also, by a number of chiefs and warriors of the tribes enumerated in the title.]

DETROIT, 18th November, 1808.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit a treaty, which I have concluded with the Wyandot, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattawatamy, and Shawanee nations. I took no measures, whatever, to influence them to make a voluntary present of the lands described in the treaty, to the United States. It was the result of their own wishes. I presume, it will be considered by the Government, as an evidence of their friendship and attachment to the United States, and their disposition to give every facility in their power to a free communication and intercourse. In holding the treaty, I had other objects, in which all the nations did not appear to be united. In this, there was a perfect union, and, believing myself, the purposes of opening a communication and connecting our settlements would be effected, I did not hesitate in giving it my concurrence.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM HULL.

Honorable H. DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

DETROIT, July 25th, 1803.

SIR:

I have endeavored, in the following report, to ascertain, and state concisely, all those facts concerning which, I imagined, the Government would wish to be informed. It is little more than an outline, exhibiting the prominent features. The geographical marks are all made from actual observation; and I have, as seldom as the nature of the business would admit, depended on the information of others. My inquiries commence at Otter creek, the south-westerly extremity of the settlements, from whence I proceeded regularly through them to the river Sinclair.

I have avoided neither trouble nor fatigue, and have thus long delayed to advise you with respect to my progress, only that I might, by minute investigation, be enabled to give you a more satisfactory account.

Should the report, however, be still defective, if I have omitted the notice of subjects which require investigation, you have only to instruct me, that I may renew my inquiries.

I am, your most obedient humble servant,

C. JOUETT.

The Honorable HENRY DEARBORN, Esq.

Secretary of the United States for the Department of War.

MR. JOUETT'S REPORT.

Otter creek empties itself into lake Erie forty-two miles southwest of the town of Detroit, and six miles south of the river Raisin. The settlement commences at its mouth, on the lake, and extends up the creek three miles. The native right was extinguished, by purchase, from the Pattawatamy, Ottawa, and Chippewa Indians, in the year 1779; and, in the year 1794, the present occupants, to the number of twenty-three, deriving their claims from the first purchasers, began their improvements. The farms contain from seventy-five to two hundred French acres, and their boundaries extend back from the creek in parallel lines. Those lands are fertile. Those immediately bordering on the lake have a rich, black soil, well adapted to the cultivation of wheat and hemp. They are without timber of any kind; and, in the language of the country, are called prairies. The wood lands, further removed from the lake, abound in hickory, walnut, and elm, and have a soil of equal fertility, and, in a great degree, similar to those already described. Notwithstanding the many advantages this spot possesses in point of soil and convenience to market, the settlers are extremely poor. They are, however, considered freeholders, and, in their own minds, entertain few doubts respecting their titles.

River Raisin is a delightful stream, navigable, for small craft, about sixteen miles, to the highest farm. It falls into the lake six miles north of Otter creek, and thirty-six south of Detroit. There are, in this settlement, one hundred and twenty-one families, who hold their farms by one tenure, namely: deeds of bargain and sale, from the Pattawatamy, Ottawa, and Chippewa chiefs, executed in the years 1784, 1785, and 1786. The purchasers have been in actual possession since that time. Their farms contain, variously, from one hundred to four hundred French acres, each, fronting on the river, from two to six acres, and extending back from forty to one hundred and eighty, until they meet the swamps, on either side of the river, which serve as a rear boundary for all the farms.

The lands about the mouth of this river are of little value, being too wet for any kind of culture. Those further up are of an excellent soil, producing from twenty-five to thirty bushels to the acre, of wheat, or other grain, in the like proportion. The farms are tolerably well improved, having comfortable dwelling houses, built of hewn logs, and, most generally, the necessary out houses, such as barns, stables, etc. Their orchards are yet young, but promise, in a few years, to be very productive. The inhabitants are Canadian French, with only three exceptions. Among these people disputes have frequently arisen relative to their titles; and those disputes have always terminated by an adjudication in favor of the oldest Indian deed. They are considered as freeholders, and enjoy every privilege which appertains to a fee simple estate—a number of them holding offices under the territorial government.

Sandy creek empties itself into the river Raisin but a few paces from its mouth, turning abruptly to the south, having before meandered in a direction nearly parallel with that river, about three miles northward. The settlement extends three miles, amounting in number of inhabitants to sixteen, who took possession of their farms in the year 1792, under purchases from Joseph Benack, who claimed the native right, since the year 1780. None of these farms exceed two hundred acres, specifying two, three, and four, in front of the creek, and from twenty-five to fifty back. The soil is much the same as that of the river Raisin—black, rich, and favorable to the production of grass, hemp, Indian corn, and wheat. The improvements in this settlement are mean. The houses, or huts, are of such construction and workmanship as scarcely to shut out the inclemencies of the seasons. The people are all Canadians.

Rocky river discharges itself into lake Erie, three miles north of river Raisin, and eight south of river Huron. It is a small winding stream, too shallow to admit the passage of the smallest boats. The soil here differs little from that already described in the adjacent country—black and fertile, though rather too wet for the cultivation of wheat. It is timbered with elm, oak, hickory, and maple. At the mouth of this stream there is a safe harbor, formed by the projection into the lake of Point Raisin, on the one side, and Rocky Point on the other. The tenure by which these lands are held is derived from an Indian deed, executed by the chiefs, in the year 1786, to Francis Pepin. The conveyance extends thirty degrees on the margin of the lake, and runs back into the country one hundred, pursuing the meanders of the river. Pepin sold his claim to George MacDougall, who, some years since, conveyed two-thirds of the tract to Meldrum & Parks, a mercantile house in Detroit, and, conjointly with them, has erected very valuable improvements. About half a mile above the mouth of the river they have a dwelling house, a distillery, and a merchant mill, with every necessary appendage for the convenient manufactory of wheat. These buildings are worth, on a moderate calculation, ten thousand dollars.

The north side of this stream is claimed by Gabriel Godfroy, under an Indian deed in his possession, dated in the year 1788. The conveyance specifies the same quantity as was granted on the south side to Pepin. Godfroy has made little or no improvements.

There are only two families who now are on the river, those being immediately engaged in the management of the mill and distillery.

River Huron is eight miles north of Rocky river, and twelve north of the river Ecorce, and empties itself into lake Erie about four miles north of Detroit, or the strait. With respect to soil, there is a great degree of similarity throughout this part of the country; dark, or rather black, light, and, wherever, with few exceptions, it has been cultivated, productive. In these respects, none are superior to the lands on this river. They consist of extensive prairies, covered so closely with hazle and other shrubberies as to afford a pleasant shade to the delighted traveller, who cannot but take an agreeable interest in the beautiful scenery by which he is surrounded.

The river, though narrow, is navigable twenty miles for boats, and has a deep and gentle current. There is but one claim, which arises under an Indian deed, dated in the year 1794, purporting to be a conveyance to Gabriel Godfroy of four thousand five hundred acres of land, upon which tract he has placed a tenant, who lives near the river as a ferryman. The deed is signed by one chief only, and that without a witness. To a title the claimant can have no pretensions.

Ecorce, or Bark river, enters the strait eleven miles north of Huron, and eleven miles south of Detroit; as a channel of communication, presents but few advantages. The country is level, the soil rich, and sufficiently dry for any kind of cultivation. The grass and wheat are astonishingly luxuriant, and nature requires to be but little aided to produce in abundance all the necessaries of life; yet the people are poor beyond conception, and no description could give an adequate idea of their servile and degraded situation. They are sixteen in number, principally Canadian French, and hold from one to three hundred French acres of land each. Six of these farms were settled in the years 1792, 1794, and 1797, without any kind of authority. The others were purchased from the Indians in the year 1776, by Peter F. Comb, and settled soon afterwards. This appears to be the tenure by which they now hold them. The different claims were, at one time, confused and complicated, but one or two adjudications have settled the principle confirmatory of those titles held under P. Comb. In the territory these people are considered as freeholders, and enjoy the appurtenant privileges.

River Rouge, so called from its reddish appearance, is four miles north of Ecorce, and six south of the town of Detroit. It is navigable six and eight miles for boats, and three for vessels of 150 tons burthen. Narrow, winding, and almost stagnant, the current of this river is so gentle as to be scarcely observable. It has, at all times, the complexion and appearance of a pool, and its exhalations in the summer months are extremely unhealthy. The ague and fever are in these seasons very prevalent, and fevers, sometimes of a more malignant nature, confine whole families to their beds for weeks together. It is only on the south side of this river that the lands are fertile. The soil is such as has been so frequently described in the rich parts of the neighboring country. On the north side it is poor, grey, sandy, and unproductive. The settlements extend eight miles on both sides of the river, and the same order is observed in laying off their farms as has been noticed on river Raisin and Otter creek. Few or none of these exceed four hundred acres, and generally fall short of that quantity. No disputes, and few misunderstandings, have taken place with respect to boundaries, as those lines extend collaterally from the river, forming each tract into a regular parallelogram. The total amount of these are forty-three, five of which were entered on and improved, without authority, in the year 1798. The claims to all the others arise from a transference of the native right in the year 1780, at which time they were generally settled. The majority of the people are Canadian French, and better informed than those on the river Ecorce. They can have no legal title.

Settlements from river Rouge to the town of Detroit.—The strait by which the waters of the upper lakes discharge themselves into lake Erie, is thirty computed miles from the latter to lake Sinclair. Few rivers in the United States can vie in beauty and convenience of navigation with this pleasant and valuable stream. It is about three-fourths of a mile broad, and generally, in the channel, four or five fathoms in depth. The detached settlements on its banks, and in its neighborhood, have been already noticed as high up as Rouge, or Red river, two miles above the mouth of which, the country begins to assume the appearance of connexion, regularly and continued improvement. There are twenty-three farms, all of which are at this time occupied. The scarcity of springs throughout this country, has compelled the people to bound their farms, in part, by some water course, and their dwelling houses are, of necessity, erected on the banks of the streams. The farmers here are not an exception from this general practice. The lateral boundary lines extend forty, sixty, and sometimes one hundred miles back, and no tract contains more than four hundred acres.

The soil was originally good, though it has been much impoverished, and its strength, in some instances, entirely exhausted, from many years inattentive cultivation. Most of the farmers have been assiduously careful in the rearing of fruit trees. Their apple orchards are generally well enclosed with pickets, and produce fruit and cider in sufficient abundance for the consumption of the country, and even for the supply of many of the Canadian settlements, to which they are exported.

The houses and out houses are tolerably good; and, although the country is level, the height of the banks affords a commanding prospect, for several miles, of the river and its borders.

The titles to land in this settlement are variously founded. Three are derived from grants of the Marquis de Quesne, French Governor commandant of Louisiana and the Canadas in the year 1740; ten from the Marquis de la Jouveire, vested with the like powers in the year 1750; seven from Indian deeds of gift in the year 1771, and confirmed in the year 1772 by the Hon. Henry Bassett, a British officer, at that time commanding the fort; and the native right to three was conveyed by the Indians in the year 1780. It is unprecedented, and I should conceive that none of those commandants could have had any legal right to convey lands to individuals, consequently, their titles were originally bad. However, the length of their possession, and that being peaceable, too, will no doubt vest them with a fee simple. Those who hold simply from the Indians, stand upon grounds somewhat questionable.

The town of Detroit.—The charter, which is for fifteen* acres square, was granted in the time of Louis XIV. of France, and is now, from the best information I have been able to collect, at Quebec; of those two hundred and twenty-five acres, only four are occupied by the town and fort Lenault; the remainder is a common, except twenty-four, which were added twenty years ago to a farm belonging to William Macomb. As to the titles to the lots in town, I should conceive that the citizens might legally claim, from a length of undisturbed and peaceable possession, even in the absence of a more valid and substantial tenure. Several of those lots are held by the commanding officer, as appendages of the garrison.

A stockade encloses the town, fort, and citadel; the pickets, as well as the public houses, are in a state of gradual decay, and in a few years, without repairs, they must fall to the ground. The streets are narrow, straight, regular, and intersect each other at right angles. The houses are, for the most part, low and inelegant, and although many of them are convenient, and suited to the occupations of the people, there are perhaps a majority of them which require very considerable reparation.

Gros Isle is generally a mile wide, and nine miles in length, running parallel with the western or United States bank, to which it approaches more nearly than to the other. Its lower end extends to the mouth of the strait, where it discharges itself into Lake Erie, and is immediately opposite Malden, the British garrison at Amherstburg. This island is now cultivated by ten farmers, who pay an annual rent to the estate of William Macomb, by whom it was purchased of the Indians in the year 1776, and settled at that time, or soon afterwards. The height of the situation, the richness of the soil, the quantity of valuable timber, consisting of oak and hickory, with which it abounds, together with its nearness to market, obliges me to believe that it is a spot holding forth as many advantages as any other in this country.

Adjacent to this, lies Stony Island, held by the same tenure. It is nearly one mile in length, and a third of a mile broad, and rendered of value only by a quarry of lime-stone, which affords the estate of Macomb a very considerable yearly income, independently of the lime. This island is of no consideration; it has but little timber, and is remarkable for a poverty of soil, which unfits it for cultivation.

Hog Island is situated in the strait, three miles above the town, on the United States' side of the channel, and contains, by estimation, three thousand five hundred acres of land. The poverty of the soil renders it of but little value to private persons; but, as public property, I should conceive it a spot of great national importance, and highly eligible for a garrison, as the elevation of its western end has a complete command of the river. It was formerly held as an appendage of the garrison, and by the different commandants at Detroit for cutting fire-wood and for pasturage. The oldest and best informed inhabitants of this place have assured me, that it was chartered with the town of Detroit, and held by the garrison until the year 1765, at which time it was purchased of the Indians by George McDougall, whose heirs, in the year 1786, sold it to William Macomb, in whose possession, or in the possession of his representatives, it has since that time remained.

Having considered and reported the situation of lands settled in this country, south and southwest of the town of Detroit, and made some hasty remarks on the town itself, I shall proceed to the settlements above. They extend themselves from the town to Gros Point, at the outlet of Lake Sinclair, into the strait, from thence, on the borders of said lake to Milk river; they then become detached and irregular, as high up as the river Sinclair, through which Lake Huron discharges itself. I shall observe those divisions in order to give you a more clear and distinct knowledge of the country upon which those settlements have been made.

Settlements on the Strait from the town to Gros Point.—The distance is nine miles, and contains sixty farms, all of which are at this time occupied. They are, for the most part, two acres in front, by forty deep, and laid out in the same parallel order as has been already remarked in all the other settlements. The situation of these lands is low, and very unhealthy, owing to a wide marsh, which extends several miles on the strait. The soil is impoverished, and produces but little; the buildings, which were once comparatively of the better kind, are now in a state of rapid decline. On traversing this settlement, no emotions of pleasure are experienced, except that gloomy kind which are exerted by the contemplation of a ruin. The claims to lands here are similar to those below the town, viz. transfers of the native right to individuals, and confirmations of those transfers by the French commandants, in the years 1740, 1750, and 1757. I have already expressed my opinion in relation to the original invalidity of these claims, and the subsequent title acquired by length of undisturbed possession, together with the respectable light in which they were received by the British Government. The people are Canadians, with few exceptions.

Settlement on Lake Sinclair from Gros Point to Milk River.—This settlement is six miles in length, and contains twenty four farms; with a front on the lake of from three to five acres, and an extent back of forty acres. The face of the country is level, though the situation is high and commanding, and possesses, from its elevation, a pleasant and extensive view of Lake Sinclair, and its banks. The soil is dark, rich, and strong, and extremely favorable to the cultivation of wheat. Art here has done but little, and even less than the little which nature had left her to do: for the Canadian settlers are very indolent, of course very poor, and consequently very wretched. Perhaps, on a barren soil, necessity would have been an incitement to industry, the natural or rather the legitimate parent, of affluence.

The tenures by which these people hold their farms, are of two kinds. Four of them may be denominated French titles. The remaining twenty are derived from the Indians, perhaps by purchase in the year 1783, at which time they were settled.

* Palpable error in the original, which the printers have not the means of correcting.

Settlement from Milk river to river Huron.—Milk river is so inconsiderable a rivulet, and rendered, from its particular situation, so very unimportant, that I shall not waste my time, nor fire your patience, with its description. From its mouth to river Huron is twelve miles; less calculated for a settlement than any other I have seen in this country. It is low, flat, and marshy. These disadvantages, combined with its unhealthful effluvia, form obstacles which neither the industry nor perseverance of the agriculturist will be able to surmount. There are, nevertheless, thirty settlers on this tract, notwithstanding its apparent destitution of the advantages of soil, situation, and market. These people came into possession in the year 1797, without authority even from the Indians. Their divisional lines are marked by themselves, and they are ignorant of the number of acres contained in the respective farms. This settlement, however, possesses that regularity which is so remarkable in this country. The farmers are as poor, as they are unfortunate in the choice of their situation. All of them are Canadians.

The river Huron is discharged into Lake Sinclair, twenty seven miles above Detroit, and eighteen above the strait. The sameness observable in many parts of this country, compels me to fall into a monotony of expression which will be to you fatiguing. Yet simple truth must be preferred to every other consideration. The river is a narrow, gentle stream, navigable for boats thirty miles above its mouth. The settlements extend up the river nine miles, and contain thirty four families in present occupancy, laid off as those on the river Raisin, with this difference, that they have by survey no fixed or determinate rear boundaries; each tract extending back from the river or front boundary to a bog, at the distance of forty or fifty acres. This land is level, and the soil is dark and rich, laboring under no inconvenience from too great a quantity of water. It is tolerably well timbered. Hickory, oak, and elm, are most observable. Some of the people are agreeably situated; but, in general, they are poor in the extreme, owing to that indolence, and want of skill in agriculture, which so conspicuously marks the Canadian character in this country. All the settlers are of this description, except four, who are Englishmen of industry and enterprise. Twenty of these farms were purchased of the Indians, and settled in the year 1788. Ten in the years 1793, 1795, and 1796, and four in the year 1800, without authority of any kind.

From the river Huron to Sinclair river, the distance, following the circuitous margin of the lake, is fifteen miles; with respect to the intermediate space, it may be necessary to make some observations. The first and most important subject, relative to the interest of the United States, is a salt spring, on a small stream, four miles east of river Huron, and three miles up the said stream from the lake. From experiments which have been made, I am justified in saying, that this spring deserves the public attention. It was wrought some, time by a couple of men, who, owing to their want of capital, were incapable of conducting the business on an advantageous plan. By these men I have been assured that a quart of water did, with them, turn out one gill of salt, and in all their trials with greater quantities, it never failed to produce in the like proportion. There is a sufficient quantity of water for the supply of works to any extent. It is scarcely necessary to observe, that this spring is claimed by a mercantile house, under the firm of Meldrum and Parks; the particulars of which claim I considered as unworthy of investigation, well knowing that it must have been recently obtained from the Indians. The lands about the spring are rich, and favorable for tillage; particularly for the cultivation of wheat. Those extending to the mouth of the river Sinclair are rather too low and marshy. Two Canadian families have, notwithstanding, settled on them, who took possession of the spots they respectively occupy in the year 1801.

Point O' Tramble.—From the mouth of the river St. Clair, six miles up, are twelve farms, that front the river in the usual manner, from three to four and five acres, and forty back, none exceeding, in quantity, two hundred and forty. This land differs from the face of this country generally; its soil possesses every mark of poverty, sandy, and low in the extreme. Nothing exists to recommend this settlement, except its bordering on one of the most delightful rivers in the Western world. The only pretensions these people have to their farms, are derived from a simple possession, taken obtrusively, in the years 1780, 1785, and 1790. They are all Canadians. From this settlement, for twelve miles up the river, not a vestige of a house can be seen, owing, I suppose, to its being, for that distance, a perfect barren, when you are suddenly and agreeably surprised with the presentation of a number of fertile and well improved farms, edging the river for the extent of ten miles, to the amount of twenty-five farms, now under cultivation, and laid off on the river as other settlements in this country, with this difference, that the claimants extend their farms ten and twenty acres in front of the river, and, in two instances, from forty-five to fifty, all running back to one rear line, which is, by survey, forty acres.

Three thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine acres of this land was purchased of the Indians, by Patrick Sinclair, British commandant at fort Sinclair, in the year 1765, who held it until the year 1782; during that time, deriving from it considerable profit as a pinery. In the year 1782, he left this country, and gave it, by deed of gift, to a Canadian, by the name of Votieur, who sold it in the year 1784, by the auctioneer, at public sale, at which time Meldrum and Park, a mercantile house of this country, became the purchasers, who have, since that period, claimed it as their property, and erected upon it valuable improvements; there are, notwithstanding, five farmers upon it, besides the tenant of Meldrum and Parks, who forcibly settled the farms they severally occupy, in the year 1800; the other nineteen farmers claim under Indian deeds, in the years 1780 and 1782.

The river Sinclair is, in length, forty-five miles, and, in beauty, and convenience of navigation, preferable to Detroit, though it is not quite as wide. Such is its transparency, that the eye can distinguish at its bottom, in fifteen feet water, the most minute object; in it there are no shoals, and, in depth, generally, five and six fathoms.

I am, your most obedient servant.

C. JOUETT, Indian Agent, Detroit.

DELAWARES AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 22, 1809.

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration whether they will advise and consent to the ratification thereof, a treaty concluded on the 30th September last, with the Delaware, Pattawatamy, Miami, and Eel River Miami, Indian tribes, northwest of the Ohio; a separate article, of the same date, with the said tribes; and a convention with the Wea tribe, concluded on the 26th October last. The whole being accompanied with the explanatory documents.

JAMES MADISON.

December 22, 1809.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 15th, 1809.

Sir:

The President of the United States authorizes and instructs you to take advantage of the most favorable moment for extinguishing the Indian title to the lands lying to the east of the Wabash, and adjoining, south, on the lines of the treaties of Fort Wayne and Grouseland. The compensation to be paid for this extinguishment should not exceed the rate heretofore given for the Indian title to lands in that quarter. To prevent any future dissatisfaction, chiefs of all the nations who have, or pretend right to these lands, should be present at the treaty; and, if practicable, the cession should be obtained without leaving any reservations. It is discretionary with you to stipulate in what manner the consideration shall be paid, whether in a gross sum, payable after the ratification of the treaty, by instalments, or in an annuity for years, or perpetuity, or, partly, in both these modes, as you may deem most expedient. The payment by instalments is preferred.

For the expenses attending the treaty, or treaties, you will draw on this Department, except for the provisions, which you will require of the contractor, unless some other person will agree to furnish them below contract price. Besides reasonable expenses, you will be allowed six dollars per day; and the secretary to the commission, should one be necessary, three dollars per day, while actually employed.

A diary of the proceedings should be kept by the commissioner, or the secretary, and a certified copy thereof forwarded, with the treaty, to this Department.

I am, sir, respectfully, &amp;c.

His Excellency WILLIAM H. HARRISON.

A Treaty between the United States of America and the tribes of Indians called the Delawares, Pattawatamies, Miamies, and Eel River Miamies.

James Madison, President of the United States, by William Henry Harrison, Governor and Commander in Chief of the Indiana territory, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and Commissioner Plenipotentiary of the United States, for treating with the said Indian tribes, and the sachems, head-men, and warriors, of the Delaware, Pattawatamy, Miami, and Eel river tribes of Indians, have agreed and concluded upon the following treaty, which, when ratified by the said President, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, shall be binding on said parties:

ARTICLE 1. The Miami and Eel river tribes, and the Delawares and Pattawatamies, as their allies, agree to cede to the United States, all that tract of country which shall be included between the boundary line, established by the treaty of fort Wayne, the Wabash, and a line to be drawn from the mouth of a creek called Racoon creek, emptying into the Wabash, on the southeast side, about twelve miles below the mouth of the Vermillion river, so as to strike the boundary line established by the treaty of Grouseland, at such a distance from its commencement, at the northeast corner of the Vincennes tract, as will leave the tract now ceded, thirty miles wide at the narrowest place; and also, all that tract which shall be included between the following boundaries, viz: Beginning at fort Recovery; thence, southwardly along the general boundary line, established by the treaty of Greenville, to its intersection with the boundary line established by the treaty of Grouseland; thence, along said line, to a point from which a line drawn parallel to the first mentioned line will be twelve miles distant from the same, and along the said parallel line to its intersection with a line to be drawn from fort Recovery, parallel to the line established by the said treaty of Grouseland.

ART. 2. The Miamies explicitly acknowledge the equal right of the Delawares, with themselves, to the country watered by the White river; but it is also to be clearly understood that neither party shall have the right of disposing of the same, without the consent of the other; and any improvements which shall be made on the said land by the Delawares, or their friends the Mohicans, shall be theirs forever.

ART. 3. The compensation to be given for the cession made in the first article, shall be as follows, viz. To the Delawares, a permanent annuity of five hundred dollars; to the Miamies, a like annuity of five hundred dollars; to the Eel river tribe, a like annuity of two hundred and fifty dollars; and to the Pattawatamies, a like annuity of five hundred dollars.

ART. 4. All the stipulations made in the treaty of Greenville, relatively to the manner of paying the annuities, and the right of the Indians to hunt upon the land, shall apply to the annuities granted and the land ceded by the present treaty.

ART. 5. The consent of the Wea tribe shall be necessary to complete the title to the first tract of land here ceded. A separate convention shall be entered into between them and the United States, and a reasonable allowance of goods given them in hand, and a permanent annuity, which shall not be less than three hundred dollars, settled upon them.

ART. 6. The annuities promised by the third article, and the goods now delivered, to the amount of five thousand two hundred dollars, shall be considered as a full compensation for the cession made in the first article.

ART. 7. The tribes who are parties to this treaty, being desirous of putting an end to the depredations which are committed by abandoned individuals of their own color, upon the cattle, horses, &c. of the more industrious and careful, agree to adopt the following regulations, viz. When any theft or other depredation shall be committed by any individual or individuals of one of the tribes, above mentioned, upon the property of any individual or individuals of another tribe, the chiefs of the party injured shall make application to the agent of the United States, who is charged with the delivery of the annuities of the tribe to which the offending party belongs, whose duty it shall be to hear the proofs and allegations on either side, and determine between them; and the amount of his award shall be immediately deducted from the annuity of the tribe to which the offending party belongs, and given to the person injured, or the chief of his village, for his use.

ART. 8. The United States agree to relinquish their right to the reserve at the old Ouitanon towns, made by the treaty of Greenville, so far, at least, as to make no further use of it than for the establishment of a military post.

ART. 9. The tribes who are parties to this treaty, being desirous of shewing their attachment to their brothers, the Kickapoos, agree to cede to the United States, the lands on the northwest side of the Wabash, from the Vincennes tract, to a northwardly extension of the line running from the mouth of the aforesaid Racoon creek, and fifteen miles in width from the Wabash, on condition that the United States, shall allow them an annuity of four hundred dollars; but this article is to have no effect, unless the Kickapoos will agree to it.

In testimony whereof, the said William Henry Harrison, and the sachems and war chiefs of the before mentioned tribes, have hereunto set their hands, and affixed their seals, at fort Wayne, this thirtieth of September, one thousand eight hundred and nine.

[Signed also by certain chiefs and warriors of the nations enumerated in the title.]

A separate Article, entered into at Fort Wayne, on the 30th day of September, in the year of our Lord onethousand eight hundred and nine,

Between William Henry Harrison, Commissioner Plenipotentiary of the United States for treating with the Indian tribes, and the sachems and chief warriors of the Miami and Eel river tribes of Indians, which is to be considered as forming part of the treaty this day concluded, between the United States and the said tribes, and their allies, the Delawares and Pattawatamies.

As the greater part of the lands ceded to the United States, by the treaty, this day concluded, was the exclusive property of the Miami nation, and guaranteed to them by the treaty of Grouseland, it is considered by the said commissioner, just and reasonable that their request to be allowed some further and additional compensation should be complied with: It is, therefore, agreed, that the United States shall deliver, for their use, in the course of the next spring, at fort Wayne, domestic animals to the amount of five hundred dollars, and the like number for the two following years; and that an armorer shall be also maintained at fort Wayne, for the use of the Indians, as heretofore: it is also agreed that, if the Kickapoos confirm the ninth article of the treaty to which this is a supplement, the United States will allow to the Miamies a further permanent annuity of two hundred dollars, and to the Wea and Eel river tribes, a further annuity of one hundred dollars each.

In testimony whereof, the said William Henry Harrison, and the sachems and war chiefs of the said tribes, have hereunto set their hands, and affixed their seals, the day and place above mentioned.

[Signed also by certain chiefs and warriors of said tribes of Indians.]

A Convention entered into at Vincennes, in the Indiana territory, between William Henry Harrison, Commissioner Plenipotentiary of the United States for treating with the Indian tribes, northwest of the Ohio, and the Wea tribe.

The said tribe, by their sachems and head warriors, hereby declare their full and free consent to the treaty concluded at fort Wayne, on the thirtieth ultimo, by the above mentioned commissioner, with the Delaware, Miami, Pattawatamy, and Eel river tribes, and also, to the separate article entered into on the same day with the Miami and Eel river tribes; and the said commissioner, on the part of the United States, agrees to allow the said tribe an additional annuity of three hundred dollars, and a present sum of fifteen hundred dollars, in consideration of the relinquishment made in the first article of said treaty; and a further permanent annuity of one hundred dollars, as soon as the Kickapoos can be brought to give their consent to the ninth article of said treaty.

In testimony whereof, the said William Henry Harrison, and the sachems and head-warriors of the said tribe, have hereunto, set their hands, and affixed their seals, the twenty-sixth day of October, eighteen hundred and nine.

THE KICKAPOOS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 10, 1810.

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration whether they will advise and consent to the ratification thereof, a treaty concluded on the 9th day of December last, with the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, accompanied by explanations, in an extract of a letter from the Governor of the Indiana Territory.

JAMES MADISON.

January 9, 1810.

Extract of a letter from Governor Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

VINCENNES, 10th December, 1809.

The Kickapoo chiefs having arrived at this place a few days ago, and the late treaty at fort Wayne having been carefully explained to them, their consent has been obtained to the cession northwest of the Wabash; and, also, a further extinguishment of title, as high up as the Vermillion river. I was extremely anxious that the cession should have been extended to this river, by the treaty of fort Wayne, but it was objected to, because it would include a Kickapoo village. This small tract (of about twenty miles square) is one of the most beautiful that can be conceived, and is, moreover, believed to contain a very rich copper mine. I have, myself, frequently seen specimens of the copper: one of which, I sent to Mr. Jefferson, in 1802. The Indians were so extremely jealous of any search being made for this mine, that the traders were always cautioned not to approach the hills, which are supposed to contain the mine. I observe that copper mines are not reserved, by the law of Congress regulating the sales of the lands of the United States: but it ought to be done at this session, if it is supposed to be an object worth attending to, as I know that there are individuals who have turned their attention towards this mine, and will, probably, prevail upon the Indians to show them the mine, and, for a large reward, conceal it from the knowledge of the Government, or those whom they might employ to search for it. The treaty is herewith enclosed, and I hope it will prove satisfactory. I shall immediately despatch a speech to the Miamies, to communicate the new cession to them.

A Treaty between the United States of America and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians.

William Henry Harrison, Governor [of the Indiana territory, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States for treating with the Indian tribes northwest of the Ohio, and the sachems and war chiefs of the Kickapoo tribe, on the part of the said tribe, have agreed to the following articles, which, when ratified by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, shall be binding on said parties.

ARTICLE 1. The ninth article of the treaty concluded at fort Wayne, on the thirtieth of September last, and the cession it contains, is, hereby, agreed to by the Kickapoos, and a permanent additional annuity of four hundred dollars, and goods to the amount of eight hundred dollars, now delivered, is to be considered as a full compensation for the said cession.

ART. 2. The said tribe further agrees to cede to the United States, all that tract of land which lies between the tract above ceded, the Wabash, the Vermillion river, and a line to be drawn from the north corner of the said ceded tract, so as to strike the Vermillion river at the distance of twenty miles, in a direct line from its mouth. For this cession, a further annuity of one hundred dollars, and the sum of seven hundred dollars, in goods, now delivered, is considered as a full compensation. But, if the Miamies should not be willing to sanction the latter cession, and the United States should not think proper to take possession of the land without their consent, they shall be released from the obligation to pay the additional annuity of one hundred dollars.

ART. 3. The stipulations contained in the treaty of Greenville, relatively to the manner of paying the annuity, and of the right of the Indians to hunt upon the land, shall apply to the annuity granted and the land ceded by the present treaty.

In testimony whereof, the said William Henry Harrison and the sachems and head-war chiefs of the said tribe, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals, this ninth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and nine.

THE OSAGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 16, 1810.

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration whether they will advise and consent to the ratification thereof, a treaty concluded with the Great and Little Osage Indians, on the tenth day of November, 1808, and the thirty-first day of August, 1809.

January 15, 1810.

JAMES MADISON.

Articles of a treaty made and concluded at fort Clark, on the right bank of the Missouri, about five miles above the Fire prairie, in the territory of Louisiana, the tenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight,

Between Peter Chouteau, Esq. agent for the Osages, and specially commissioned and instructed to enter into the same, by his Excellency Meriwether Lewis, Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs, for the territory aforesaid, in behalf of the United States of America, of the one part; and the chiefs and warriors of the Great and Little Osages, for themselves and their nations, respectively, on the other part.

ARTICLE 1. The United States being anxious to promote peace, friendship, and intercourse, with the Osage tribes, to afford them every assistance in their power, and to protect them from the insults and injuries of other tribes of Indians, situated near the settlements of the white people, have thought proper to build a fort on the right bank of the Missouri, a few miles above the Fire prairie, and do agree to garrison the same with as many regular troops as the President of the United States may, from time to time, deem necessary, for the protection of all orderly, friendly, and well disposed Indians, of the Great and Little Osage nations, who reside at this place, and who do strictly conform to, and pursue the councils or admonitions of, the President of the United States, through his subordinate officers.

ART. 2. The United States being also anxious that the Great and Little Osages, resident as aforesaid, should be regularly supplied with every species of merchandise, which their comfort may hereafter require, do engage to establish at this place, and permanently to continue, at all seasons of the year, a well assorted store of goods, for the purpose of bartering with them on moderate terms, for their peltries and furs.

ART. 3. The United States agree to furnish at this place, for the use of the Osage nations, a blacksmith and tools, to mend their arms, and utensils of husbandry, and engage to build them a horse mill, or water mill, also to furnish them with ploughs, and to build for the great chief of the Great Osages, and for the great chief of the Little Osages, a strong block house in each of their towns, which are to be established near this fort.

ART. 4. With a view to quiet the animosities, which, at present, exist between the inhabitants of the territory of Louisiana, and the Osage nations, in consequence of the lawless depredations of the latter, the United States do further agree to pay to their own citizens, the full value of such property as they can legally prove to have been stolen or destroyed, by the said Osages since the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States; provided the same does not exceed the sum of five thousand dollars.

ART. 5. In consideration of the lands relinquished by the Great and Little Osages to the United States, as stipulated in the sixth article of this treaty, the United States promise to deliver at Fire prairie, or at St. Louis, yearly, to the Great Osage nation, merchandise to the amount or value of one thousand dollars, and to the Little Osage nation, merchandise to the amount or value of five hundred dollars, reckoning the value of said merchandise at the first cost thereof, in the city or place in the United States where the same shall have been procured. And in addition to the merchandise aforesaid, the United States have, at and before the signature of these articles, paid to the Great Osage nation the sum of eight hundred dollars, and to the Little Osage nation the sum of four hundred dollars.

ART. 6. And in consideration of the advantages which we derive from the stipulations contained in the foregoing articles, we, the chiefs and warriors of the Great and Little Osages, for ourselves and our nations, respectively, covenant and agree with the United States, that the boundary line between our nations and the United States, shall be as follows, to wit: Beginning at fort Clark, on the Missouri, five miles above Fire prairie, and running thence a due south course to the river Arkansas, and down the same to the Mississippi: hereby ceding and relinquishing, forever, to the United States, all the lands which lie east of the said line, and north of the southwardly bank of the said river Arkansas, and all lands situated northwardly of the river Missouri. And we do further cede and relinquish to the United States, forever, a tract of two leagues square, to embrace fort Clark, and to be laid off in such manner as the President of the United States shall think proper.

ART. 7. And it is mutually agreed by the contracting parties, that the boundary lines hereby established, shall be run and marked at the expense of the United States, as soon as circumstances or their convenience will permit. And the Great and Little Osages, promise to depute two chiefs from each of their respective nations, to accompany the commissioner or commissioners who may be appointed on the part of the United States to settle and adjust the said boundary line.

ART. 8. And the United States agree that such of the Great and Little Osage Indians, as may think proper to put themselves under the protection of fort Clark, and who observe the stipulations of this treaty with good faith, shall be permitted to live and to hunt, without molestation, on all that tract of country west of the north and south boundary line on which they, the said Great and Little Osage have usually hunted or resided; provided the same be not the hunting grounds of any nation or tribe of Indians in amity with the United States, and on any other lands within the territory of Louisiana, without the limits of the white settlements, until the United States may think proper to assign the same, as hunting grounds, to other friendly Indians.

ART. 9. Lest the friendship which is now established, between the United States and the said Indian nations, should be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, it is hereby agreed, that, for injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaints shall be made by the party injured, to the other; by the said nations, or either of them, to the superintendent, or other person appointed by the President to the chiefs of the said nations; and it shall be the duty of the said chiefs, upon complaints being made, as aforesaid, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished, agreeably to the laws of the state or territory where the offence may have been committed; and, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder, shall be committed on any Indian or Indians, belonging to either of said nations, the person or persons, so offending, shall be tried, and, if found guilty, shall be punished, in like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is agreed that the chiefs of the Great and Little Osages shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses, or other property, which may be stolen from any citizen or citizens of the United States, by any individual or individuals of either of their nations; and the property so recovered, shall be forthwith delivered to the superintendent, or other person authorized to receive it, that it may be restored to the proper owner; and, in cases where the exertions of the chiefs shall be ineffectual in recovering the property stolen, as aforesaid, if sufficient proof can be adduced that such property was actually stolen by any Indian or Indians, belonging to the said nations, or either of them, the superintendent, or other proper officer, may deduct from the annuity of the said nations, respectively, a sum equal to the value of the property which has been stolen. And the United States hereby guaranty to any Indian or Indians of the said nation, respectively, a full indemnification for any horses, or other property which may be stolen from them by any of their citizens; provided, that the property so stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen of the States. And the said nations of the Great and Little Osage, engage, on the requisition, or demand of the President of the United States, or of the superintendent, to deliver up any white man resident among them.

ART. 10. The United States receive the Great and Little Osage nations into their friendship, and under their protection. And the said nations, on their part, declare that they will consider themselves under the protection of no other Power whatsoever; disclaiming all right to cede, sell, or in any manner transfer, their lands, to any foreign Power, or to citizens of the United States, or inhabitants of Louisiana, unless duly authorized by the President of the United States to make the said purchase or accept the said cession on behalf of the government.

ART. 11. And if any person or persons, for hunting, or other purposes, shall pass over the boundary lines, as established by this treaty, into the country reserved for the Great and Little Osage nations, without the licence of the superintendent, or other proper officer, they, the said Great and Little Osage, or either of them, shall be at liberty to apprehend such unlicensed hunters, or other persons, and surrender them, together with their property (but without other injury, insult or molestation) to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, or to the agent nearest the place of arrest, to be dealt with according to law.

ART. 12. And the chiefs and warriors, as aforesaid, promise and engage, that neither the Great nor Little Osage nation will ever, by sale, exchange, or as presents, supply any nation, or tribe of Indians, not in amity with the United States, with guns, ammunition, or other implements of war.

ART. 13. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said Peter Chouteau, commissioned and instructed as aforesaid, and the chiefs and warriors of the Great and Little Osage nation of Indians, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals. Done at fort Clark, the day above mentioned.

P. CHOUTEAU. [L. s.]
And a number of Indian chiefs.

We, the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the band of Osages residing on the river Arkansas, being a part of the Great Osage nation, having this day had the foregoing treaty read and explained to us by his Excellency Meriwether Lewis, Esq. do hereby acknowledge, consent to, and confirm, all the stipulations therein contained, as fully and as completely as though we had been personally present at the signing, sealing, and delivering the same, on the tenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight; the same being the day on which the said treaty was signed, sealed, and delivered, as will appear by a reference thereto. In witness whereof, we have, for ourselves, and our band of the Great Osage nation, residing on the river Arkansas, hereunto set our hands and affixed our seals.

Done at St. Louis, in the territory of Louisiana, the thirty-first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-fourth.

THE OSAGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 14, 1810.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit a report of the Secretary of War, complying with their resolution of the 22d January last.

March 14th, 1810.

JAMES MADISON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 13, 1810:

In compliance with a resolution of the honorable Senate, of the 22d January last, the Secretary of War has the honor to state to the President of the United States, that, as the correspondence of this Department did not exhibit the authority under which Peter Chouteau, Esq. made and concluded the treaty with the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, General Clark was called upon to furnish such information as he either possessed or could obtain on the subject. A copy of his letter of the 20th ultimo, together with copies of Governor Lewis's instructions to Mr. Chouteau, and of his letter to the Executive of the United States, alluded to by General Clark, are now transmitted.

It does not appear, from the accounts rendered, or bills drawn on this Department, what moneys have been paid or expended, on account of the negotiation or conclusion of said treaty.

W. EUSTIS.

FINCASTLE, February 20, 1810.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you copies of the late Governor Lewis's instructions to Peter Chouteau, Esq. to carry into effect a treaty of amity and friendship, with the Great and Little Osage bands of Indians; also a copy of the Governor's letter to the Executive Department of the United States, dated at St. Louis, the 15th December, 1808. Those are all the documents which I can find among his papers, relative to the treaty that is now before the Senate of the United States, which tend to throw light on the same.

To give you a view of occurrences which led to this treaty, I must commence with the situation of the frontiers of Louisiana, in relation to the Osage tribes of Indians, at my arrival in that territory in June, 1808; at that time, Governor Lewis (whom I met with in St. Louis) informed me, that a large proportion of the Osage nation of Indians were disposed for hostility, and had taken a number of horses, robbed and plundered the inhabitants in different parts of the territory, &c. he had made a regular and unsuccessful demand of the property which they had taken. White Hare, the principal chief of the band of the Great Osages, (who was then at St. Louis) came to inform him that he could not restrain his band from those acts of violence and pillage which they had been in the habit of practising on the frontiers.

The Governor further informed me, that he had given permission to the Shawanese, Delawares, and other tribes of Indians, to attack that part of the Osage nation, which were thus hostilely disposed, and that a large party were collecting for that purpose.

On the 23d of June, I received a letter from the Secretary of War, in which he requested me to fix on a suitable site for a factory store and post, &c. Being well acquainted with the country, I pointed out a spot on the south side of the Missouri, about 300 miles up that river, as the most convenient place to several tribes of Indians. Captain Clemson, with his company of regular troops, accompanied by Mr. Sibley, the United States' factor, with goods destined for that establishment, ascended the river. On the 4th of September, I arrived with a detachment of militia at the place of destination, and despatched Captain Boon, with an interpreter, to the Osage towns, with instructions to inform the Indians where I was, and that trade and protection would be extended to that portion of the nation that had conducted themselves peaceably; and all others who wished our friendship, would deliver up the plundered property, come under the influence of the guns of the fort, and conform to our regulations.

On the 12th Captain Boon returned, with the principal chiefs and considerable men of the Great and Little Osage bands, and informed me that all their nation, except the band on the Arkansas, and a party that had been sent to St. Louis, with part of the stolen horses (under the direction of Big Soldier, a chief of the Little Osages, and White Hare's son) were on their march to that place. After explaining to the chiefs and warriors the cause of making that establishment, and the objects I had in view, they were much pleased, and expressed their satisfaction at the choice of the spot for an establishment they had long expected.

The Osages, in their several councils with me, expressed much anxiety to become more closely under the protection of the United States than they had been; they solicited the protection of the Government, in the hope that their whole nation might not suffer for the bad conduct of a part, who were willing to reform.

Finding that those Indians were anxious to be in amity with the Government, propositions were made to them to enter into a treaty, and fix on a line, &c. which they readily agreed to. On the 14th of September, we entered into and signed a conditional treaty, by which they relinquished their title, and conveyed to the United States a large tract of rich and convenient country, east of that fort, embracing all the settlements in Louisiana, between the Missouri and Arkansas rivers, to which the Indian title had never been extinguished. I wrote to the Secretary of War on the 6th and 23d of September, 1808, informing him of the measures I had taken, which he approved of.

On the 23d September, on my return to St. Louis, I delivered Governor Lewis the treaty entered into with the Osages, and related to him such other arrangements as had been made; he expressed much satisfaction at them, and then observed, "that all the difficulties with the Osages would be done away; and that doubts and embarrassments could not much longer exist in our courts of justice, for the want of a boundary line between our frontiers and the Indians."

A few days after my return, the Governor mentioned to me that Mr. P. Chouteau informed him, that the Osages who came with the horses, and were then in St. Louis, objected to the above treaty, and expressed his regret for fear a measure so necessary to the peace and quiet of the territory, and advantageous to the United States, should not be confirmed by the Osages, who had brought the stolen horses. His apprehensions were reconciled, after being reminded by me, that those articles of treaty entered into with the Great and Little Osages were conditional, and well calculated as a preparatory step to a more favorable one, &c.

Governor Lewis adopted the expedient of a new treaty, (and wrote the one which is now before the Senate of the United States) which he sent by Peter Chouteau, Esq. to the establishment on the Missouri, near which, the Great and Little Osage bands were encamped; with instructions, a copy of which is herewith enclosed.

On the 10th day of November, 1808, the Great and Little Osages adopted and signed that treaty, with Mr. Chouteau, the agent. The summer following, a deputation of the principal chiefs and warriors of the band of Osages residing on the Arkansas, accompanied by the principal chiefs of the Great and Little Osage bands, came to St. Louis, and did, on the 31st of August, 1809, approve of and sign the said treaty, which has received the approbation of all the Osage nation.

This treaty, when confirmed, will extinguish the Indian title to more than 200 miles square of the finest country in Louisiana, for which they have received merchandise to the amount of about $2,500, taken from the Indian fund. No part of the annuity of $1,500 and other stipulations, as mentioned in the treaty, has been delivered to them.

I beg leave to observe, that, if this treaty, which is now before the Senate of the United States, is not confirmed, it is my opinion it will require five times the amount to effect a purchase of the same tract of country, which may be indispensably necessary, in the extension of legal authority over that part of the territory. Doubts have arisen, and we have experienced difficulties on that head already, in our courts of justice; as, in the case of two Ioway Indians, delivered up by their nation, as the murderers of two of our citizens, the court determined they had not jurisdiction of the case, and those murderers were not punished.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient humble servant,

WM. CLARK.

The Honorable WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

Copy of instructions by his Excellency Governor Lewis to Peter Chouteau, Esq.

SIR:

The faithful services which you have rendered to the United States, in the Indian department, together with your undeviating attachment to the Government, have induced me to enclose you, herewith, a commission for the special purposes therein mentioned.

It will be your object, in the first place, to restore peace and friendship between our people and the Great and Little Osages, from whom we have of late suffered so many violations of our laws, and depredations on our frontiers. For this object you are charged with the draught of a treaty, the sanction and confirmation of which, it is expected, you will procure, by an exertion of that extensive influence which you have long possessed over those nations. This draught of a treaty, you will observe, contemplates something more than the restoration of peace: it gives to the Great and Little Osages the most efficient security, in our power to bestow; it assures to them, for their exclusive use, the lands west of the boundary line; it separates those who sanction it, from the vicious and the profligate, whom no treaties can bind, whom no menaces can intimidate, and by whose ungovernable conduct the peace of both nations is perpetually endangered. It enables us also to reduce to submission, without bloodshed, those who persevere in hostility, by withholding from them the merchandise necessary for their support. By these arrangements we shall also obtain a tract of country, west of our present settlements, and east of the hunting boundary line of the Osages, sufficient for the purpose of our white hunters, and for such Indian nations as have long been on terms of intimate friendship with us. Thus will our frontier be strengthened and secured with the least possible expense to the Government. The establishment of a boundary has long been desirable, and the want of one, settled by treaty, has never ceased to create doubts, and sometimes embarrassments, of the most serious nature, in our courts of justice.

Those of the Great and Little Osages who refuse to sanction this treaty, can have no future hopes that their pretensions to those lands, now claimed by them, will ever be respected by the United States: for, it is our unalterable determination, that, if they are to be considered our friends and allies, they must sign that instrument, conform to its stipulations, and establish their permanent villages, near the fort erected a little above the Fire prairie. Those who neglect to do so, either themselves, or by the head of their family, must not, under any pretext whatever, be supplied with merchandise, either from the factory, or by individual traders. And, that this regulation may be rigidly adhered to, you will give to each chief warrior, or man of consideration, who signs the treaty, a certificate, stating that he has done so, and recommending him to the friendly offices of the citizens of the United States. On these certificates alone will the Indians bearing them, and their families, be suffered to trade at the fort. Should a considerable part of the nation sign the treaty, all will be well; transmit it to me by a special messenger: if they refuse their assent, in such numbers as to induce a belief that the dissenting part will not, thereafter, come into measures, orders must be given to the factor and traders at the establishment, not to bestow as presents, nor trade with those who refuse, any merchandise whatever: nor, are even those who ratify the treaty, under these circumstances, to be permitted to receive at present, more than one pound of powder for each effective hunter, or warrior; but in all other articles, they are permitted to trade without limitation. If the negotiation should take this turn, you are to inform me of it, by a courier express, in order that I may place the frontiers in the best state of defence, and make the necessary preparations against them.

Even though nothing contrary to my hopes should transpire, I shall expect that you will avail yourself of every opportunity, and particularly of the messenger whom you despatch, to give me information of all passing occurrences in the Indian Department in that quarter.

I send by you no speech to the Indians: you are fully possessed of our views in relation to them. Those views have for their end, as well the happiness of the Indians as of the whites, and it is expected that the exertions on your part, to carry them into effect, will be successful.

After the accomplishment of this primary object, you will have a blacksmith's shop established within the limits of the ravelin of the fort, for the purpose of repairing the arms, and manufacturing and repairing the implements of husbandry of the Indians.

As the horse-mill, with which you are charged, is intended for the joint and common use of the Great and Little Osages, it must be established in neither of their villages, but on some convenient and intermediate spot, between those villages and the fort. It may be inconvenient for you to remain until all the works appertaining to this mill are finished: should this be the case, you will leave them to be executed by the sub-agent of the post.

Paul, the interpreter, is to be permitted to come down, as soon as possible, for his family, and will immediately return to the fort, where he is to remain, as the resident interpreter of the Osage nation.

You are at liberty to ascend the Missouri as high as a quarry of gypsum, said to be situated near the mouth of Blue water river, and to take from thence such quantity of that article as you may think proper to bring with you.

Copy of a letter from Governor M. Lewis to the President of the United States, relative to the treaty concluded with the Osage Indians.

St. Louis, December 15th, 1808.

SIR:

In consequence of the measures which were taken last spring in relation to the Osage nations, they were reduced, in the course of a few months, to a state of perfect submission, without bloodshed; this has, in my opinion, fairly proven the superiority which the policy of withholding merchandise from the Indians has over the chastisement of the sword, when their local situation is such as will enable us to practise it.

In this state of humiliation, General Clarke found them in September last, when he established the post at Fire prairie: he very properly seized this favorable moment to enter into a treaty with them, which he effected on the 14th September; the treaty you will find herewith enclosed, marked No. 1. The principal chief of the Great Osages, and the principal chief of the Little Osages, signed this treaty, though the body of the nation were not present.

General Clarke returned to St. Louis on the 22d of September, and brought with him two of the inferior chiefs, who had signed the treaty; a few days previous to the arrival of General Clarke, a party of seventy-four Osages (among whom were some of their chiefs) had reached this place, with a small number of horses they had stolen from the inhabitants of the territory, which were now delivered, in conformity to a demand made of them for that purpose. On the 25th I was informed by Mr. Chouteau, that the Indians complained they had been deceived with respect to the stipulations of the treaty, and that they intended to convey to us, by that instrument, no more than the privilege of hunting in that tract of country relinquished by the treaty. On receiving this information, I had a conversation with General Clarke on the subject; the General assured me that special care had been taken to explain every part of the treaty to them, in the most ample manner; that it had been read to them two several days previous to their signing it, and that they had given their assent with cheerfulness.

On the evening of the same day, I convened the Indians, and had the treaty read and explained to them; a chief who had signed it, protested against it, on the grounds that it had not been fairly interpreted to them, and that they had no intention, when they signed it, of conveying lands to the United States. The chiefs who were not present when this treaty had been entered into, declared that the White Hare, and the chiefs who had signed it, had no right to dispose of their lands without the general consent of the nation being first obtained in council, among themselves, and positively refused to sign it, or give their further sanction.

I am fully persuaded that the Indians were urged to make those objections by some white person, or persons, in this place, but, as I have not been able to collect any evidence of the fact, I shall avoid the mention of names.

I well know that General Clarke would not have deceived the Indians; and so fully am I impressed with the belief that Paul Louis, who was the interpreter on that occasion, had interpreted the treaty faithfully, that I have not thought proper to dismiss him, which I should have done, could I for a moment believe that he had acted otherwise.

I saw that the treaty, thus disavowed, from whatever cause such disavowal had proceeded, was not likely to ensure the advantages contemplated by it, and, therefore, determined to pursue the measures which I conceived best calculated to obtain the general sanction of the Osage nations, to the relinquishment of a country, the possession of which was so highly desirable to the United States, in many points of view. I, therefore, drew the treaty enclosed, No. 2, and despatched Mr. Peter Chouteau with it to the post at Fire prairie, with instructions to convene the Great and Little Osage nations, and obtain from them as general an assent to it as possible.

Nos. 3 and 4 are copies of the commission and instructions given to Mr. Chouteau on that occasion; you will observe that they are special, and that his powers were limited to the mere act of obtaining the confirmation of the written treaty, of which he was the bearer.

I took this course in order to prevent any interpolation of the treaty, which I had some reason to apprehend might take place, if his powers were not limited, and which, if introduced, might defeat its confirmation by the Senate of the United States.

The treaty, as prepared by me, has been duly executed and confirmed by all the chiefs and principal warriors of the Great and Little Osage nations, except the band of the Arkansas, with whom we are not yet in a state of amity.

The Indians appear perfectly satisfied with this treaty, and I hope it is such as will meet your approbation. It extinguishes their title to an extent of country nearly equal to the State of Virginia, and much more fertile; the limits are the same as those contemplated by the former treaty.

In the course of this transaction certain occurrences have taken place, which I think it my duty to mention, together with the causes which have most probably produced them. Mr. Peter Chouteau claims thirty thousand arpents of land on the south side of Missouri, embracing the entrance of the Mine river; it is extremely fertile, and includes several of the most valuable salt springs in the country; the evidences of his claim he has never shewn me: he informed me, at the time I was engaged in draughting the treaty, that the Osage nations had given it to him many years since, that it had likewise been sanctioned by the Spanish Government, and requested me to introduce an article in the treaty, further to secure his title to the land. This I positively refused, informing him that I did not conceive it a proper subject to be introduced in the treaty; that his claim ought, in common with all others in the country, to rest on its own merits; declaring my belief, at the same time, that, if it had merit, or was founded in justice, it would be confirmed. I further observed to Mr. Chouteau, that, as this land lay within the bounds contemplated by the treaty, if it was sanctioned by the Indians, it would then be in the power of the Government to place him in possession of the lands, an occurrence which could not take place, however favorably they might think of his pretensions to it, until the Indian title was extinguished by treaty. Nowel Mograin, a half breed Osage, and an interpreter now employed for that nation, has, also, a claim on the Saline creek, a branch of the Osage river, in a similar situation with that of Mr. Chouteau. How far a view to the further confirmation of these claims, on the part of the claimants, might have operated in causing the Indians to reject the first treaty, I am unwilling to determine, as I can obtain no conclusive evidence that either of them endeavored to influence the Indians on that subject. It is possible that the Indians may have been induced to the measure from the reasons they alleged, or with a further view to obtain an additional compensation for the lands they were about to relinquish: be this as it may, the doubts and suspicions which overshadowed these transactions, conspired to create such sentiments in the minds of General Clark and Mr. Chouteau towards each other, as rendered my course, in order to accomplish a treaty with the Osages, extremely difficult and embarrassing; however, it has been happily accomplished so far as it respects the treaty, but there still exists between those gentlemen a want of cordiality and confidence, which I fear may hereafter produce some irregularities in the Indian department, if not timely guarded against.

I shall be obliged to leave the territory shortly, for Washington, and Philadelphia. Mr. Bates has very earnestly requested of me not to impose on him duties in the Indian department during my absence, alleging that it is a subject with which he is wholly unacquainted. The appointments of General Clark and Mr. Chouteau, as they at present stand, are entirely distinct from each other, neither having the power of controlling the other; in this situation, should they not perfectly harmonize while I am absent, I fear that the result will not prove favorable to the views of the Government, in relation to the Indians in this quarter, particularly as Mr. Bates is extremely unwilling to exercise the authority of superintendent. I must, therefore, beg leave to recommend that General Clarke should be invested with some general power of control over all the agents and sub-agents in the territory. Yet, I am far from thinking it would comport with the public interest to dismiss Mr. Chouteau from his present employment, as he is still useful, in my opinion, as the agent of the Osage nation, and ought to be continued as such.

No. 5 contains copies of the speeches delivered by some of the chiefs of the Great and Little Osages, at the time they signed the treaty. You will observe, in one of the speeches of the White Hare, that he mentions the tracts of land which the nation had given to Peter Chouteau and Mograin, and makes a reserve of these lands in the country ceded by the treaty of the United States.

I do not consider these reservations as binding on our Government, there being no such provision in the treaty; in short, it is in direct opposition to the 10th article of that instrument; but, even should it be considered as obligatory, it can amount to no more than that the Osages have not relinquished their title to those lands, and consequently, that the right to them still remains vested in that nation. I am confident that, if the United States should never confirm the lands to the present claimants, it will not prove a source of any disquiet on the part of the Osages; and, should they be even countenanced or receive confirmation, on the ground of their being Indian donations, it would introduce a policy of the most ruinous tendency to the interests of the United States; in effect it would be, the Government corrupting its own agents; for, I will venture to assert, that, if the Indians are permitted to bestow lands on such individuals as they may think proper, the meanest interpreter in our employment will soon acquire a princely fortune at the expense of the United States.

TRADING HOUSES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 14, 1810.

MR. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, and the several acts supplementary thereto, reported the following letters for publication:

COMMITTEE CHAMBER, 3d April, 1810.

SIR:

I am directed by the committee to whom has been referred a resolution of Senate to inquire whether any, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made, in the act establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, and the several acts supplementary thereto, to ask information of you upon the following points:

What number of trading houses have been established, under the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes?

At what places have the trading houses been established?

What number of agents have been employed, and what compensation has been annually allowed them respectively?

If the annual compensation allowed them, exceeds ten thousand dollars, at what time did that excess commence, and by what authority was that excess directed to be expended?

What was the state of the trading fund, at the latest date that accounts have been rendered?

Has the capital stock been diminished, and, if it has, what is the amount of the diminution?

Accept the assurance of my high respect.

JOS. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee.

J. MASON, Esq. &c.

INDIAN TRADE OFFICE, 12th April, 1810.

Sir:

In reply to the several inquiries made by the letter you did me the honor to address me on the 3d instant, I have to state that, since the commencement of the system, fourteen trading houses with the Indian tribes have been established, at the periods and in the positions enumerated below:

- At Coleraine, on the river St. Mary's, in the State of Georgia, in the year 1795.
- At Tellico block house, in the Southwestern territory, in the year 1795.
- At fort St. Stephens, on the Mobile, in the Mississippi territory, in the year 1802.
- At Chickasaw bluffs, on the Mississippi, in the Mississippi territory, in the year 1802.
- At fort Wayne, on the Miami of the Lakes, in the Indiana territory, in the year 1802.
- At Detroit, in the Michigan territory, in the year 1802.
- At Arkansas, on the river Arkansas, in the territory of Louisiana, in the year 1805.
- At Natchitoches, on the Red river, in the territory of Orleans, in the year 1805.
- At Belle Fontaine, mouth of the Missouri, in the territory of Louisiana, in the year 1805.
- At Chicago, on Lake Michigan, in the Indiana territory, in the year 1805.
- At Sandusky, Lake Erie, in the State of Ohio, in the year 1806.
- At the Island of Michilimackinac, Lake Huron, in the Michigan territory, in the year 1808.
- At fort Osage, on the Missouri, territory of Louisiana, in the year 1808.
- At fort Madison, on the Upper Mississippi, territory of Louisiana, in 1808.

Of these, two have been discontinued, that at Detroit, in 1805, and that at Belle Fontaine, in 1808; and two have been removed, that established originally at Coleraine, on the St. Mary's, to fort Wilkinson, on the Oconee, in 1797; and again, from that place to fort Hawkins, on the Oakmulgee, in 1806: and that originally established at Tellico, to the Hiwasee of the Tennessee, in 1807.

There are now in operation twelve trading houses, viz. at fort Hawkins, at Hiwasee, at fort St. Stephen's, at Chickasaw bluffs, at fort Wayne, at Arkansas, at Natchitoches, at Chicago, at Sandusky, at Michilimackinac, at fort Osage, and at fort Madison.

There have been employed, in all cases, a principal agent at each house, and in most cases, an assistant agent or clerk at each. The compensation allowed has been from $750 to $1250, per annum, to the principal agents, and from $250 to $600, per annum, to the assistant agents or clerks, exclusive of rations or allowance for rations, paid out of the funds of this establishment.

It does not appear that the annual compensation allowed to agents and assistant agents, or clerks, exceeded the sum of ten thousand dollars, until the year 1805; previous to which time, as has been said, six trading houses had been established; during that year four additional houses were set up, and one discontinued, leaving then in operation nine houses. At this time, the allowance of rations was commuted into money, at fixed rates per annum, and the compensations paid during the latter part of this year (1805) stood thus:

8 agents, at $1,000, per annum,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	$8,000
1 agent, at	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,250
7 assistants, at $500,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	3,500
1 assistant, at	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	400
																				$13,150

Allowance for subsistence, in lieu of rations:

9 agents, at $365 per annum,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	$3,285

																				$4,365

This commutation for rations, and these rates and amounts of compensation, were directed to be paid by order of the Secretary of War. The allowance to agents and their assistants or clerks, has been increased from that time, as additional trading houses have been set up, and there are payable, for the current year, to the persons, and at the posts, named in the paper marked A, sent herewith, and as there shown in detail:

For salaries	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	$14,750
For subsistence	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	5,475
																				Together
																				$20,225

For the further information of the honorable committee, I beg leave to annex copies of three communications, made by me, as to these salaries, and other subjects relating to the business of this office, the one dated 18th January and 1st February, 1808, addressed to the Secretary of War, and by him submitted to the committee of the House of Representatives on Indian affairs; one other, dated 16th January, 1809, and addressed to the Honorable Mr. Newton, Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures of the same body, at their next session; and one other, dated 29th January, 1810, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

As to the state of the trading fund, it is not practicable, while the business is actually going on at so many different and distant points, to make up, at any given period, an accurate account; all that can be done on this subject has been now attempted, to shew, by the last accounts received, and by estimates of property on hand, of uncertain value, of the debts due, and of unsettled accounts, the probable state of this fund.

The general statement sent herewith, having reference to various abstracts annexed, for particulars, comprehends all the property and cash on hand, as well as the factories, and in the hands of agents, at other places, as at this office; deductions by estimate, for losses, being first made, leave, for the probable amount of the fund, as existing on the 31st December last, $235,461 64 cents.

The amount of the capital stock employed, is not shewn by any books or documents in this office. The business of the trading houses having been, previous to the year 1806, conducted by the purveyor of the public supplies, and others, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the books and documents relating to them have been but partially deposited with the Superintendent of Indian Trade.

But, considering the amount of the different appropriations to the trading fund to be $300,000, and that the whole of this has been drawn from the treasury, and placed, from time to time, in the hands of the public agents, for the purpose of Indian trade, except $20,000 of the appropriations of the last year, as is believed to be the fact, the capital stock, wherewith is to be compared the estimate of the present state of the fund now submitted, will be $280,000; and that estimate, amounting to $235,461 64 cents, the probable diminution will appear to have been $44,538 36 cents, since the commencement of the establishment.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

J. MASON.

The Hon. JOSEPH ANDERSON,
Chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs.

The following statement exhibits the amount of property on hand, belonging to the United States' Indian Trading House Establishment, (as more particularly shewn by the abstracts referred to) on the 31st December, 1809.

Amount of property, of various kinds, on hand at the trading houses, per abstract B,	- - -	124,041	10
Do peltries in the hands of Thomas Bourke, agent, Savannah, per abstract C,	- - -	85	00

Do furs and peltries in the hands of the superintendent, per abstract G,	- - -	8,150	00
		$253,890	33
Less amount balances on the books of the superintendent, due to sundry persons, per abstract H,		8,428	69
		$245,461	64
Deduct amount of salary, and subsistence money due to agents and assistants at the trading houses, and other balances, amounts unascertained, unpaid at the end of the year, estimated at	-	10,000	00
		$235,461	64

NOTE.—No returns from three of the trading houses, viz: at fort Wayne, fort Osage, and fort Hawkins, later than the 30th September, have been received; but, as it is believed the result will not be materially affected, they have been considered, with the others, as of the 31st December.

There is an unsettled account with the War Department, for articles occasionally furnished to this establishment, on one side, and, on the other, for goods furnished and debts given in at Indian treaties. The balance is not believed to be against this office.

NOTE. The furs and peltries forwarded from Arkansas to Mr. Saul, on the 26th December, had not reached him on the 31st of that month; but, as they have been received by him since, and are not included in the account of property on hand at the factory, at that date, it was thought proper to add them to this estimate,						65,017 69
NOTE. It is to be remarked, that all the above peltries are carried out in money at the prices at which they were taken in at the different factories, and that the practice in traffic with Indians is, to allow good prices for skins, and to obtain the rate of barter intended, by putting on the adequate advance on the goods furnished them; from this circumstance, and because great part of them have been on hand for want of a market, from one to two years, much damage may be expected; a reduction of at least forty per cent. may be estimated on the amount,						26,007 07

OFFICE INDIAN TRADE, 18th January, 1808.

SIR:

Understanding that a committee of Congress have been appointed on the subject of Indian affairs, I beg leave to submit to your consideration some alterations which appear to me to be requisite in the law regulating the trading house establishment.

By this law, it is not permitted to export, on public account, either furs or peltries. Experience, as the books and correspondence of my predecessor will show, has proven that the demand for peltries, particularly deer skins, of which great numbers, in our trade with the Indians, are, of necessity, taken, is by no means equal to the quantities furnished; of course, if restricted to be sold here, great sacrifices must be made, and such as must, in spite of every vigilance, on the part of the superintendent and the agents, inevitably diminish the fund set apart for this trade. Although it is believed that the demand for furs, commonly used by hatters, in the manufactory of hats, is sufficient, in this country, to afford reasonable competition and sales, yet the existing restrictions to hold not less than six public sales in each year, and not more than two thereof in any one State, operate much against the fund, as thereby the President has it not in his power to select that market in the United States at which may have been found the greatest demand and best prices, as was evinced by the sales of the last year.

The law authorizes the President to draw, annually, from the treasury, a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, for the payment of the agents and their clerks, at the different trading houses, and allow the agents to draw from the public supplies two rations each, and their clerks one ration each, per diem. This has been commuted to subsistence money, and is paid at this office. There are now established on the frontiers ten trading houses, having one agent and one assistant at each. The salaries stand thus:

10 agents, 1 at $1,250, 9 at $1,000, per annum	-	-	-	$10,250
Subsistence money to each, a $365, per annum	-	-	-	3,650
Allowance, annually, for furniture, a $25	-	-	-	250
10 assistants, at $600, per annum	-	-	-	6,000
Subsistence money, a $180, per annum	-	-	-	1,800
Interpreters at most of the posts are indispensably requisite—say
7, at $400, per annum	-	-	-	2,800
Occasional interpreting at other posts—say	-	-	-	250
				$25,000

Thus it appears that a sum of not less than twenty-five thousand dollars is requisite for paying the salaries at the trading houses.

The clerk hire allowed by the law, for this office, is one thousand dollars, annually. It is impossible to do the business with less than two good clerks. This, I believe, will be readily admitted, when it is recollected that the superintendent has to do, at this time, with ten different trading houses, (and their number will probably be increased) that he has not only to correspond with, but to supply them with goods from time to time, to receive and sell their peltries, to receive and settle their accounts quarterly, and to keep an extensive set of books, and a considerable correspondence with others, on the business of this establishment. Two clerks cannot be had for less than sixteen hundred dollars; and this rate is certainly moderate, when compared with the rate of clerk hire allowed in the other public offices; and it is to be remembered, that the clerks of this office are restricted from any trade or commerce, which is not the case with those in any of the other offices. If the number of trading houses are extended, more aid here will yet be necessary. At this time I have but one clerk engaged; and the fact is, with my whole time, I am not thus able to keep the business of the office from going behind hand.

As to the propriety of extending the privilege of franking letters and packets, to this office, you, sir, who have witnessed their number and frequency, in passing through your Department, and the inconvenience attending the present mode of conducting the correspondence, can best judge.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

J. MASON, Superintendent of Indian Trade.

General HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War, Washington.

OFFICE INDIAN TRADE, 1st February, 1808.

SIR:

In the letter which I had the honor to write you on the 18th ultimo, the annual compensation to the agents and assistant agents, at the different trading houses, is said to stand thus: 9 agents, at $1,000 each; 1 at $1,250; subsistence money to each, $365; 10 assistant agents, at $600; subsistence money to each, $180. This statement, which was taken from one made by my predecessor, I found in the office, and was supposed, at the time, by me, to contain the actual sums now paid. On more strict examination, I find it was conjectural only of what would probably be the settled rates of compensation.

The rates, now actually paid, are, 1 agent, $1,250 salary, and $365 subsistence money; 8 agents, $1,000 salary, and $365 subsistence money; and 1 agent, $750 salary, and $270 subsistence money; 1 assistant agent, $600 salary, and $180 subsistence money; 2 assistant agents $500 salary, and $180 subsistence money; 5 assistant agents, at $500 salary, and $150 subsistence money. There appears to be two factories, at this time, without assistant agents. (a)

Although the variation is not considerable, I consider it right to state the fact. The want of accuracy, in the first statement, I pray may be attributed to the true cause, that, from the short time I have been in office, and with but slender aid, I have not been, as yet, able to examine all the papers and accounts belonging to this establishment.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c. &c.

J. MASON, Superintendent of Indian Trade.

The Honorable HENRY DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, 16th January, 1809.

SIR:

By instructions from the Secretary of War, to communicate to you such information as may have been acquired at this office, as to the operation of the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, I take the liberty to address you.

By this act it is not permitted to export furs or peltries. Experience has proven, that the home demand for peltries, particularly deer skins, (of which great numbers are, of necessity, taken from the Indians) is by no means equal to the quantity furnished; of course, if restricted to be sold here, great sacrifices will often be made.

For furs commonly used by hatters, in the manufacture of hats, it is believed the demand in this country is sufficient to afford reasonable competition and sales, but the existing restrictions operate much against the fund, by narrowing the choice even among our own markets.

It appears to have been contemplated by the present law, to pay from the treasury the salaries requisite to conduct this establishment, and, by not taxing the fund therewith, to give the Indians their supplies on better terms. The increase of the business, by adding to the number of the trading houses, and spreading more extensively the benefits of the system among the various tribes, has, however, in part, compelled a departure from this plan, and occasioned heavy draughts from the funds.

The law authorizes the President to draw from the treasury, annually, a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, for the payment of the salaries of agents and their clerks on the frontiers, and allow them to draw rations from the public supplies. These (the rations) have been commuted into subsistence money, which is paid from the funds of this establishment.

There are, at this time, located and supplied on the frontiers, twelve trading houses, eleven of which are in full operation, and one will commence as soon as the spring opens; of these, three have been established during the last year.

The salaries now paid for conducting them, are:

To agents, 8, at each, $1,000 per annum, and $365 per annum subsistence money,	-	-	-	$10,920
3, at $800, and $365 subsistence money,	-	-	-	3,495
1, at $750, and $270 subsistence money,	-	-	-	1,020
To assistant agents or clerks, 1 at $600 per annum, and $180 subsistence money,	-	-	-	780
1 at $500, and $180 subsistence money,	-	-	-	680
5 at $500, and $150 subsistence money,	-	-	-	3,250
				$20,145
Interpreters are requisite at most of the posts; the average rate of salary is $400 per annum, say, at 8 posts,				3,200
It will be seen, by the statement above, that, of the 12 factories, 7 only have assistant agents or clerks, 3 additional will probably be wanting, at $650,				1,950
				$25,295

The allowance for clerks for this office, payable from the treasury, is one thousand dollars per annum. Fourteen hundred dollars are paid, of which four hundred dollars from the funds of this establishment, as in the case of the agents at the trading houses. An additional accounting clerk is indispensably requisite, as the business of the office cannot be kept up with the present assistance; should it, therefore, be thought right to appropriate from the treasury enough to cover the annual expenses of agents, clerks, and assistants, twenty-five thousand three hundred dollars for the trading houses on the frontiers, and two thousand four hundred for this office, will be requisite.

Whether it will be necessary to add to the general fund for the purposes of trade with the Indian tribes, depending, in a great measure, on the policy of extending the system, it is not for me to give an opinion; it is, however, proper to remark, that the last has been an unfortunate year for the establishment, as well that the peltries depending for sale on foreign demand, are a dead and perishing stock on hand, as that most of the articles usually laid in for the supplies of the factories, have risen considerably in price.

From the nature of the business of this office, you will readily see, sir, that the correspondence must be constant and extensive; and I beg to submit to you the propriety of extending the privilege of franking to it, as to other public offices.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

J. MASON,
Superintendent of Indian Trade.

The Honorable THOMAS NEWTON,
Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

INDIAN TRADE OFFICE, 29th January, 1810.

SIR:

Having remarked, in the list of appropriations lately reported to Congress for the present year, no provision for an additional clerk in this office, as allowed by an act of the last session of the tenth Congress, which, I presume, may have escaped your notice, from the circumstance of its having been inserted in an act separate from that in which other appropriations for the office were made, I respectfully beg permission to draw your attention to the subject.

The allowance for clerks for this office, by the original act of 1806, is $1,000; three clerks are employed:

Jeremiah W. Bronaugh, at	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	$800
John Fowler,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	800
And Meade Fitzhugh,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	600
								$2,200

Four hundred dollars of which are paid out of the general fund. It is not reasonable to expect, that the gentlemen whose services are now employed, can long be retained, or other sufficient clerks be had at those rates, when it is considered that the compensation paid here to the principal clerks, is not more than is received in the other public offices, by mere transcribers; and when, too, it is peculiarly the case in this office, that they are restrained from doing any business of a mercantile nature on their own accounts, it must happen, that none but young men can be employed, and that, as soon as they have become sufficiently acquainted with the business to be really useful, they will find better offers elsewhere, and may often leave the office in an awkward situation. Again, the responsibility of the clerks of this office is greater than in many others, because of the quantity of goods constantly packing and unpacking, receiving, and sending off, in their charge. The business of this office has increased much, by the addition of new trading houses. A principal clerk, of competent knowledge of business generally, and of goods suited to the trade particularly, a complete book keeper, and a transcribing clerk, are indispensably necessary.

I therefore take the liberty to solicit, that an allowance of clerk hire be made, (including the 1,000 dollars appropriated by the act of 1806) of two thousand nine hundred dollars, and I beg leave, sir, to submit to your consideration the propriety of asking of Congress an appropriation to that effect.

With very great respect, &c. &c.

J. MASON,
Superintendent of Indian Trade.

The Honorable ALBERT GALLATIN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

[12th CONGRESS.]

No. 131.

[1st Session.]

NORTH WESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 19, 1811.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress two letters received from Governor Harrison, of the Indiana territory, reporting the particulars and the issue of the expedition under his command, of which notice was taken in my communication of November 5th.

While it is deeply lamented that so many valuable lives have been lost in the action which took place on the 7th ult. Congress will see, with satisfaction, the dauntless spirit and fortitude victoriously displayed by every description of the troops engaged, as well as the collected firmness which distinguished their commander, on an occasion requiring the utmost exertions of valor and discipline.

It may reasonably be expected that the good effects of this critical defeat and dispersion of a combination of savages, which appears to have been spreading to a greater extent, will be experienced not only in a cessation of the murders and depredations committed on our frontier, but in the prevention of any hostile incursions otherwise to have been apprehended.

The families of those brave and patriotic citizens who have fallen in this severe conflict, will doubtless engage the favorable attention of Congress.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, *December 18th, 1811.*VINCENNES, 18th November, 1811.

SIR:

In my letter of the 8th instant, I did myself the honor to communicate the result of an action between the troops under my command and the confederation of Indians under the control of the Shawanese prophet. I had previously informed you, in a letter of the 2d instant, of my proceedings previously to my arrival at the Vermillion river, where I had erected a block house for the protection of the boats which I was obliged to leave, and as a depository for our heavy baggage, and such part of our provisions as we were unable to transport in wagons.

On the morning of the 3d instant, I commenced my march from the block house. The Wabash, above this, turning considerably to the eastward, I was obliged, in order to avoid the broken and woody country, which borders upon it, to change my course to the westward of north to gain the prairies which lie to the back of those woods. At the end of one day's march, I was enabled to take the proper direction, (N. E.) which brought me, on the evening of the 5th, to a small creek, at about eleven miles from the Prophet's town. I had, on the preceding day, avoided the dangerous pass of Pine creek, by inclining a few miles to the left, where the troops and wagons were crossed with expedition and safety. Our route on the 6th, for about six miles, lay through prairies, separated by small points of woods.

My order of march hitherto had been similar to that used by General Wayne; that is, the infantry were in two columns of files on either side of the road, and the mounted riflemen and cavalry in front, in the rear, and on the flanks. Where the ground was unfavorable for the action of cavalry, they were placed on the rear, but where it was otherwise, they were made to exchange positions with one of the mounted rifle corps. Understanding that the last four miles were open woods, and the probability being greater that we should be attacked in front than on either flank, I halted at that distance from the town, and formed the army in order of battle. The U. S. infantry placed in the centre, two companies of militia infantry, and one of mounted riflemen, on each flank, formed the front line. In the rear of this line was placed the baggage, drawn up as compactly as possible, and immediately behind it a reserve of three companies of militia infantry. The cavalry formed a second line, at the distance of three hundred yards in the rear of the front line, and a company of mounted riflemen the advanced guard at that distance in front. To facilitate the march, the whole were then broken off in short columns of companies—a situation the most favorable for forming in order of battle with facility and precision.

Our march was slow and cautious, and much delayed by the examination of every place which seemed calculated for an ambuscade. Indeed, the ground was, for some time, so unfavorable, that I was obliged to change the position of the several corps three times in the distance of a mile. At half past two o'clock, we passed a small creek at the distance of one mile and a half from the town, and entered an open wood, when the army was halted, and again drawn up in order of battle. During the whole of the last day's march, parties of Indians were constantly about us, and every effort was made by the interpreters to speak to them, but in vain. New attempts of the kind were now made, but, proving equally ineffectual, a Capt. Dubois, of the spies and guides, offering to go with a flag to the town, I despatched him, with an interpreter, to request a conference with the Prophet. In a few moments a messenger was sent by Captain Dubois to inform me that, in his attempts to advance, the Indians appeared on both his flanks, and although he had spoken to them in the most friendly manner, they refused to answer, but beckoned to him to go forward, and constantly endeavored to cut him off from the army. Upon this information, I recalled the Captain, and determined to encamp for the night, and take some other measures for opening a conference with the Prophet.

Whilst I was engaged in tracing the lines for the encampment, Major Daviess, who commanded the dragoons, came to inform me that he had penetrated to the Indian fields; that the ground was entirely open and favorable; that the Indians in front had manifested nothing but hostility, and had answered every attempt to bring them to a parley, with contempt and insolence. I was immediately advised by all the officers around me to move forward; a similar wish indeed pervaded all the army. It was drawn up in excellent order, and every man appeared eager to decide the contest immediately.

Being informed that a good encampment might be had upon the Wabash, I yielded to what appeared the general wish, and directed the troops to advance, taking care, however, to place the interpreters in front, with directions to invite a conference with any Indians they might meet with. We had not advanced above four hundred yards when I was informed that three Indians had approached the advanced guard, and had expressed a wish to speak to me. I found, upon their arrival, that one of them was a man in great estimation with the Prophet. He informed me that the chiefs were much surprised at my advancing upon them so rapidly; that they were given to understand, by the Delawares and Miamies, whom I had sent to them a few days before, that I would not advance to their town until I had received an answer to my demands made through them; that this answer had been despatched by the Pattawamy chief, Winnemac, who had accompanied the Miamies and Delawares on their return; that they had left the Prophet's town two days before, with a design to meet me, but had unfortunately taken the road on the south side of the Wabash. I answered that I had no intention of attacking them, until I discovered that they would not comply with the demands that I had made; that I would go on and encamp at the Wabash; and in the morning would have an interview with the Prophet and his chiefs, and explain to them the determination of the President; that, in the mean time, no hostilities should be committed.

He seemed much pleased with this, and promised that it should be observed on their parts. I then resumed my march. We struck the cultivated ground about five hundred yards below the town, but as these extended to the bank of the Wabash, there was no possibility of getting an encampment which was provided with both wood and water.

My guides and interpreters being still with the advanced guard, and taking the direction of the town, the army followed, and had advanced within about one hundred and fifty yards, when fifty or sixty Indians sallied out, and, with loud acclamations called to the cavalry and to the militia infantry, which were on our right flank, to halt. I immediately advanced to the front, caused the army to halt, and directed an interpreter to request some of the chiefs to come to me. In a few moments the man who had been with me before, made his appearance. I informed him that my object, for the present, was to procure a good piece of ground to encamp on, where we could get wood and water. He informed me that there was a creek to the northwest which he thought would suit our purpose. I immediately despatched two officers to examine it, and they reported that the situation was excellent. I then took leave of the chief, and a mutual promise was again made for suspension of hostilities until we could have an interview on the following day. I found the ground destined for the encampment not altogether such as I could wish it. It was, indeed, admirably calculated for the encampment of regular troops that were opposed to regulars, but it afforded great facility to the approach of savages. It was a piece of dry oak land, rising about ten feet above the level of a marshy prairie in front, (towards the Indian town) and nearly twice that height above a similar prairie in the rear, through which, and near to this bank, ran a small stream clothed with willows and brush wood. Towards the left flank this bench of high land widened considerably, but became gradually narrower in the opposite direction, and at the distance of one hundred and fifty yards from the right flank terminated in an abrupt point. The two columns of infantry occupied the front and rear of this ground, at the distance of about one hundred and fifty yards from each other on the left, and something more than half that distance on the right flank. These flanks were filled up, the first by two companies of mounted riflemen, amounting to about one hundred and twenty men, under the command of Major General Wells, of the Kentucky militia, who served as a major, the other by Spencer's company of mounted riflemen, which amounted to eighty men. The front line was composed of one battalion of United States' infantry, under the command of Major Floyd, flanked on the right by two companies of militia, and on the left by one company. The rear line was composed of a battalion of United States' troops, under the command of Captain Baen, acting as major, and four companies of militia infantry, under Lieutenant Colonel Decker.

The regular troops of this line joined the mounted riflemen under General Wells on the left flank, and Colonel Decker's battalion formed an angle with Spencer's company on the left.

Two troops of dragoons, amounting to, in the aggregate, about sixty men, were encamped in the rear of the left flank, and Captain Parke's troop, which was larger than the other two, in the rear of the front line. Our order of encampment varied little from that above described, excepting when some peculiarity of the ground made it necessary. For a night attack, the order of encampment was the order of battle, and each man slept immediately opposite to his post in the line. In the formation of my troops I used a single rank, or what is called Indian file; because, in Indian warfare, where there is no shock to resist, one rank is nearly as good as two, and in that kind of warfare, the extension of line is a matter of the first importance. Raw troops also manœuvre with much more facility in single than in double ranks. It was my constant custom to assemble all the field officers at my tent, every evening, by signal, to give them the watch-word, and their instructions for the night; those given for the night of the 6th were, that each corps which formed a part of the exterior line of the encampment should hold its own ground until relieved. The dragoons were directed to parade dismounted, in case of a night attack, with their pistols in their belts, and to act as a corps de reserve. The camp was defended by two captain's guards, consisting each of four non-commissioned officers and forty-two privates, and two subaltern's guards of twenty non-commissioned officers and privates. The whole under the command of a field officer of the day.

The troops were regularly called up, an hour before day, and made to continue under arms until it was quite light. On the morning of the 7th, I had risen a quarter after 4 o'clock, and the signal for calling out the men would have been given in two minutes, when the attack commenced. It began on our left flank; but a single gun was fired by the sentinels or by the guard in that direction, which made not the least resistance, but abandoned their officer and fled into camp, and the first notice which the troops of that flank had of the danger, was from the yells of the savages within a short distance of the line; but, even under those circumstances, the men were not wanting to themselves or to the occasion. Such of them as were awake, or were easily awakened, seized their arms, and took their stations, others, which were more tardy, had to contend with the enemy in the doors of their tents. The storm first fell upon Captain Barton's company, of the 4th United States' regiment, and Captain Geiger's company of mounted riflemen, which formed the left angle of the rear line. The fire upon these was excessively severe, and they suffered considerably before relief could be brought to them. Some few Indians passed into the encampment near the angle, and one or two penetrated to some distance, before they were killed. I believe all the other companies were under arms and tolerably formed before they were fired on. The morning was dark and cloudy. Our fires afforded a partial light, which, if it gave us some opportunity of taking our positions, was still more advantageous to the enemy, affording them the means of taking a surer aim; they were, therefore, extinguished as soon as possible. Under all these discouraging circumstances, the troops (nineteen-twentieths of whom had never been in action before) behaved in a manner that can never be too much applauded. They took their places without noise, and with less confusion than could have been expected from veterans, placed in a similar situation. As soon as I could mount my horse, I rode to the angle that was attacked. I found that Barton's company had suffered severely, and the left of Geiger's entirely broken. I immediately ordered Cook's company, and the late Captain Wentworth's, under Lieutenant Peters, to be brought up from the centre of the rear line, where the ground was much more defensible, and formed across the angle in support of Barton's and Geiger's. My attention was then engaged by a heavy firing upon the left of the front line, where were stationed the small company of United States' riflemen, (then, however, armed with muskets) and the companies of Baen, Snelling, and Prescott, of the 4th regiment. I found Major Daviess forming the dragoons in the rear of those companies; and understanding that the heaviest part of the enemy's fire proceeded from some trees about fifteen or twenty paces in front of those companies, I directed the major to dislodge them with a part of the dragoons; unfortunately, the major's gallantry determined him to execute the order with a smaller force than was sufficient, which enabled the enemy to avoid him in front, and attack his flanks. The major was mortally wounded, and his party driven back. The Indians were, however, immediately and gallantly dislodged from their advantageous position by Captain Snelling, at the head of his company. In the course of a few minutes after the commencement of the attack, the fire extended along the left flank, the whole of the front, the right flank, and part of the rear line. Upon Spencer's mounted riflemen, and the right of Warwick's company, which was posted on the right of the rear line, it was excessively severe. Captain Spencer, and his first and second lieutenants, were killed, and Captain Warwick mortally wounded. Those companies, however, still bravely maintained their posts, but Spencer had suffered so severely, and having originally too much ground to occupy, I reinforced them with Robb's company of riflemen, which had been drawn, or, by mistake, ordered from their position on the left flank, towards the centre of the camp; and filled the vacancy that had been occupied by Robb, with Prescott's company of the 4th United States' regiment. My great object was to keep the lines entire, to prevent the enemy from breaking into the camp, until day-light should enable me to make a general and effectual charge. With this view, I had reinforced every part of the line that had suffered much, and as soon as the approach of morning had discovered itself, I withdrew from the front line Snelling's, Posey's, (under Lieutenant Albright) and Scott's, and from the rear line, Wilson's, companies, and drew them up upon the left flank, and, at the same time, I ordered Cook's and Baen's companies, the former from the rear, and the latter from the front line, to reinforce the right flank, foreseeing that, at these points, the enemy would make their last efforts. Major Wells, who commanded on the left flank, not knowing my intentions precisely, had taken the command of these companies, and had charged the enemy before I had formed the body of dragoons, with which I meant to support the infantry; a small detachment of these were, however, ready, and proved amply sufficient for the purpose.

The Indians were driven by the infantry at the point of the bayonet, and the dragoons pursued and forced them into a marsh, where they could not be followed. Captain Cook and Lieutenant Larabee had, agreeably to my order, marched their companies to the right flank; had formed them under the fire of the enemy, and, being then joined by the riflemen of that flank, had charged the Indians, killed a number, and put the rest to a precipitate flight. A favorable opportunity was here offered to pursue the enemy with dragoons, but being engaged at that time on the other flank, I did not observe it until it was too late.

I have thus, sir, given you the particulars of an action which was certainly maintained with the greatest obstinacy and perseverance by both parties. The Indians manifested a ferocity, uncommon even with them. To their savage fury, our troops opposed that cool and deliberate valor which is characteristic of the Christian soldier.

The most pleasing part of my duty, (that of naming to you the corps and individuals who particularly distinguished themselves) is yet to be performed. There is, however, considerable difficulty in it; where merit was so common, it is almost impossible to discriminate.

The whole of the infantry formed a small brigade, under the immediate orders of Colonel Boyd. The colonel, throughout the action, manifested equal zeal and bravery, in carrying into execution my orders, in keeping the men to their posts, and exhorting them to fight with valor. His brigade major, Clarke, and his aid-de-camp, George Croghan, Esquire, were also very serviceably employed. Colonel Joseph Bartholemew, a very valuable officer, commanded, under Colonel Boyd, the militia infantry. He was wounded early in the action, and his services lost to me. Major G. R. C. Floyd, the senior officer of the fourth United States' regiment, commanded immediately the battalion of that regiment, which was in the front line; his conduct, during the action, was entirely to my satisfaction. Lieutenant Colonel Decker, who commanded the battalion of militia on the right of the rear line, preserved his command in good order. He was, however, but partially attacked.

I have before mentioned to you, that Major General Wells, of the fourth division of Kentucky militia, acted under my command as a major, at the head of two companies of mounted volunteers. The general maintained the fame which he had already acquired in almost every campaign and in almost every battle which has been fought with the Indians, since the settlement of Kentucky.

Of the several corps, the fourth United States' regiment and the two small companies attached to it, were certainly the most conspicuous for undaunted valor. The companies commanded by Captains Cook, Snelling, and Barton, Lieutenants Larabee, Peters, and Hawkins, were placed in situations where they could render most service and encounter most danger, and those officers eminently distinguished themselves. Captains Prescott and Brown performed their duty, also, entirely to my satisfaction, as did Posey's company of the seventh regiment, headed by Lieutenant Albright. In short, sir, they supported the fame of American regulars, and I have never heard that a single individual was found out of the line of his duty. Several of the militia companies were in no wise inferior to the regulars. Spencer's, Geiger's, and Warwick's, maintained their posts amidst a monstrous carnage, as indeed did Robb's, after it was posted on the left flank; its loss of men, (seventeen killed and wounded) and keeping its ground, is sufficient evidence of its firmness. Wilson's and Scott's companies charged with the regular troops, and proved themselves worthy of doing so.

Norris's company, also, behaved well. Hargrove's and Wilkin's companies were placed in a situation where they had no opportunity of distinguishing themselves, or I am satisfied they would have done it. This was the case with the squadron of dragoons, also; after Major Daviess had received his wound, knowing it to be mortal, I promoted Captain Parke to the majority, than whom, there is no better officer.

My two aids-de-camp, Majors Hurd and Taylor, with Lieutenant Adams, of the fourth regiment, the adjutant of the troops, afforded me the most essential aid, as well in the action, as throughout the campaign.

The arrangements of Captain Piatt, in the quartermaster's department, were highly judicious, and his exertions, on all occasions, particularly in bringing off the wounded, deserve my warmest thanks. But, in giving merited praise to the living, let me not forget the gallant dead.

Colonel Abraham Owen, commandant of the 18th Kentucky regiment, joined me a few days before the action, as a private in Captain Geiger's company; he accepted the appointment of volunteer aid-de-camp to me; he fell early in the action; the representatives of his State will inform you, that she possessed not a better citizen nor a braver man. Major J. H. Daviess was known as an able lawyer and a great orator; he joined me as a private volunteer, and, on the recommendation of the officers of that corps, was appointed to command the three troops of dragoons; his conduct in that capacity, justified their choice; never was there an officer possessed of more ardor and zeal to discharge his duties with propriety, and never one who would have encountered greater danger to purchase military fame. Captain Baen, of the fourth United States' regiment, was killed early in the action; he was unquestionably a good officer and valiant soldier. Captains Spencer and Warwick, and Lieutenants McMahan and Berry, were all my particular friends. I have ever had the utmost confidence in their valor, and I was not deceived.

Spencer was wounded in the head; he exhorted his men to fight valiantly; he was shot through both thighs, and fell, still continuing to encourage them; he was raised up, and received a ball through his body, which put an immediate end to his existence.

Warwick was shot immediately through the body; being taken to the surgery to be dressed, as soon as it was over, (being a man of great bodily vigor and still able to walk) he insisted upon going back to head his company, although it was evident that he had but a few hours to live.

All these gentlemen, sir, Captain Baen excepted, have left wives, and five of them, large families of children. This is the case, too, with many of the privates among the militia, who fell in the action, or who have died since, of their wounds.

Will the bounty of their country be withheld from their helpless orphans, many of whom will be in the most destitute condition, and, perhaps, want even the necessaries of life?

With respect to the number of Indians that were engaged against us, I am possessed of no data by which I can form a correct statement. It must, however, have been considerable, and perhaps not much inferior to our own, which, deducting the dragoons, who were unable to do us much service, was very little above seven hundred non-commissioned officers and privates. I am convinced there were, at least, six hundred. The Prophet had, three weeks before, four hundred and fifty of his own proper followers. I am induced to believe, that he was joined by a number of the lawless vagabonds who live on the Illinois river, as large trails were seen coming from that direction. Indeed, I shall not be surprised to find, that some of those who professed the warmest friendship for us, were arrayed against us. It is certain, that one of this description came out from the town, and spoke to me the night before the action. The Pattawatamy chief, whom I mentioned to have been wounded and taken prisoner in my letter of the 8th instant, I left on the battle ground, after having taken all the care of him in my power. I requested him to inform those of his own tribe who had joined the Prophet, and the Kickapoos, and the Winnebagoes, that, if they would immediately abandon the Prophet, and return to their own tribes, their past conduct would be forgiven, and, that we would treat them as we formerly had done. He assured me that he would do so, and that there was no doubt of their compliance. Indeed, he said that he was certain that they would put the Prophet to death.

I think, upon the whole, that there will be no further hostilities; but, of this, I shall be enabled to give you some more certain information in a few days.

The troops left the battle ground on the 9th instant; it took every wagon to transport the wounded; we managed, however, to bring off the public property, although almost all the private baggage of the officers was necessarily destroyed.

It may, perhaps, be imagined, sir, that some means might have been adopted to have made a more early discovery of the approach of the enemy to our camp, the morning of the 7th instant. But, if I had employed two-thirds of the army as out posts, it would have been ineffectual; the Indians, in such a night, would have found means to have passed between them. Placed in the situation that we were, there is no other mode of avoiding a surprise, than by a chain of sentinels, so close together that the enemy cannot pass between, without discovery, and, having the army in such readiness, that they can get to their alarm posts at a moment's warning. Our troops could not have been better prepared than they were, unless they had been kept under arms the whole night, as they lay with their accoutrements on, and their arms by their sides, and the moment they were up, they were at their posts. If the sentinels and the guards had done their duty, even the troops on the left flank would have been prepared to receive the Indians.

I have the honor to enclose you a correct return of our killed and wounded. The wounded suffered very much before their arrival here, but they are now comfortably fixed, and every attention has been, and shall continue to be, paid to them.

Doctor Foster is not only possessed of great professional merit, but is, moreover, a man of feeling and honor. I am convinced, sir, that the Indians lost many more men than we did. They left from thirty-six to forty on the field. They were seen to take off, not only the wounded, but the dead. An Indian that was killed and scalped in the beginning of the action, by one of our men, was found in a house in the town. Several others were also found in the houses, and many graves, which were fresh dug; one of them was opened, and found to contain three dead bodies.

Our infantry used, principally, cartridges containing twelve buck-shot, which were admirably calculated for a night action.

I have before informed you, sir, that Colonel Miller was prevented, by illness, from going on the expedition; he rendered essential service in the command of fort Harrison; he is an officer of great merit.

There are so many circumstances, which it is important for you to know, respecting the situation of this country, that I have thought it best to commit this despatch to my aid-de-camp, Major Taylor, who will have the honor of delivering it to you, and will be able to give you more satisfaction than I could do, by writing. Major Taylor (who is also one of our supreme judges) is a man of integrity and honor, and you may rely upon any statements he may make.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your humble servant,

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

P. S. Not a man of ours was taken prisoner, and of three scalps which were taken, two of them were recovered. The Honorable W. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

VINCENNES, 4th December, 1811.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that two principal chiefs of the Kickapoos of the Prairie arrived here, bearing a flag, on the evening before last. They informed me, that they came in consequence of a message from the chief of that part of the Kickapoos which had joined the prophet, requiring them to do so, and that the said chief is to be here himself, in a day or two. The account which they give of the late confederacy under the prophet, is as follows: "The prophet, with his Shawanese, is at a small Huron village, about twelve miles from his former residence, on this side of the Wabash, where, also, were twelve or fifteen Hurons. The Kickapoos are encamped near to the Tippecanoe. The Pattawatamies have scattered and gone to different villages of that tribe. The Winnebagoes had all set out on their return to their own country, excepting one chief and nine men, who remained at their former village. The latter had attended Tecumseh in his tour to the southward, and had only returned to the Prophet's town the day before the action. The Prophet had sent a messenger to the Kickapoos of the Prairie, to request that he might be permitted to retire to their town. This was positively refused, and a warning sent to him, not to come there. He then sent to request that four of his men might attend the Kickapoo chief here—this was also refused. These chiefs say, on the whole, that all the tribes who lost warriors in the late action, attribute their misfortune to the Prophet, alone; that they constantly reproach him with their misfortunes, and threaten him with death; that they are all desirous of making their peace with the United States, and will send deputations to me for that purpose, as soon as they are informed that they will be well received. The two chiefs further say, that they were sent by Governor Howard and General Clarke, sometime before the action, to endeavor to bring off the Kickapoos from the Prophet's town; that they used their best endeavors to effect it, but unsuccessfully. That the Prophet's followers were fully impressed with a belief that they could defeat us with ease; that it was their intention to have attacked us at fort Harrison, if we had gone no higher; that Racoon creek was then fixed on, and finally, Pine creek; and that the latter would probably have been the place, if the usual route had not been abandoned, and a crossing made higher up; that the attack made on our sentinels, at fort Harrison, was intended to shut the door against accommodation; that the Winnebagoes had forty warriors killed in the action, and the Kickapoos eleven, and ten wounded. They have never heard how many of the Pattawatamies, and other tribes, were killed. That the Pattawatamy chief left by me on the battle ground, is since dead of his wounds, but that he faithfully delivered my speech to the different tribes, and warmly urged them to abandon the Prophet and submit, to my terms."

I cannot say, sir, how much of the above may be depended on. I believe, however, that the statement made by the chief is generally correct, particularly with regard to the present disposition of the Indians. It is certain that our frontiers have never enjoyed more profound tranquillity than at this time. No injury of any kind, that I can hear of, has been done, either to the persons or property of our citizens. Before the expedition, not a fortnight passed over, without some vexatious depredation being committed.

The Kickapoo chiefs certainly tell an untruth, when they say, that there were but eleven of their tribe killed, and ten wounded; it is impossible to believe that fewer were wounded than killed. They acknowledge, however, that the Indians have never sustained so severe a defeat, since their acquaintance with the white people.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

Hon. WILLIAM EUSTIS, Esq. Secretary of War.

P. S. The chief of the Vermillion Kickapoos has this moment arrived.

NORTHWESTERN FRONTIER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 27, 1811.

At an assembly of certain citizens and inhabitants of the territory of Michigan, held on Sunday, the eighth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, in consequence of receiving information, on the preceding night, of the battle on the Wabash, of the seventh of November, one thousand eight hundred and eleven,

SOLOMON SIBLEY was elected chairman,

AUGUSTUS B. WOODWARD, Secretary.

The Gazette of Pittsburg, entitled the Commonwealth, of the twenty-fifth of November, being first publicly read in the English language, and afterwards translated into the French language, by sentences,

Resolved, unanimously, That it is necessary and expedient to adopt some immediate measures for the protection and defence of these settlements.

Resolved, unanimously, That it is indispensably necessary to organize and maintain a nocturnal guard in the city of Detroit, without intermission, for thirty days from this date, at least, and as much longer as shall appear to be requisite, from further information which may be received.

Resolved, That it is expedient, by the most prompt and practicable means, to obtain information of the dangers impending over these settlements.

Resolved, That it is expedient and necessary to appoint a committee of public safety.

Ordered, That the said committee be composed of five persons.

Ordered, That they be selected by thirteen persons, to be immediately named by the meeting, to retire into a separate apartment, and to consider of, and report the committee, by whose election the committee will abide. Thirteen persons were immediately appointed, who retired into a separate apartment, and, after some time, returned, and reported the following persons as the committee of public safety:

SOLOMON SIBLEY,
AUGUSTUS B. WOODWARD,
JAMES WITHERILL,
GEORGE M'DOUGALL,
DANIEL BAKER.

Resolved, That the committee of public safety be empowered and instructed to collect all the pecuniary and physical means of defence, which may be afforded them by the General or the civil Government, or private patriotism, and apply the same, the most effectually, in aid of the temporary protection of the country during this impending danger, and that, as citizens, we will firmly support them, in all honorable means of effecting the above object, at the risk of our lives and properties.

And then the assembly adjourned, until called together by the committee of public safety.

Attest,
A. B. WOODWARD, Secretary.

SOL. SIBLEY, Chairman.

At a meeting of citizens, called by the committee of public safety; to consider of a memorial to Congress, held on the tenth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, the following memorial was unanimously agreed upon, and ordered to be immediately transmitted, and that it be signed by the committee in behalf of the meeting.

James Witherill and Daniel Baker having declined acting, Harris Hampden Hickman, and Richard Smyth, were elected to supply the vacancies.

Attest,
A. B. WOODWARD, Secretary.

SOL. SIBLEY, Chairman.

To the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, of the United States of America,

The memorial of the undersigned, in behalf of the citizens and inhabitants of the territory of Michigan, assembled on the eight and tenth days of December, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, respectfully represents, and submits the matters following:

Dissatisfactions with the aboriginal inhabitants of these countries have been for some time engendering. They have at length been kindled into an open flame, and their blood, with that of the American citizen, has stained the plains of the Wabash; the first which has been spilt in the Northwestern country, under public authority, since the pacification of Greenville, of the third day of August, one thousand seven hundred ninety-five.

We pray the God of peace, in his mercy, to grant that these disasters, so portentous to our country, may spread no farther; and that the forbearance and moderation of our Government, and, at the same time, its firmness, will prevent the conflagration from extending along the whole line of the frontier, from Kaskaskias to Detroit, through the Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan governments.

We know, however, from too long and fatal experience, that the savage mind, once fully incensed, once diverted from the pursuit of their ordinary subsistence, once turned upon plunder, once inflamed by the loss of their kindred and friends, once gratified with the taste of blood, is difficult to appease, and as terrible as subtle in vengeance. The horrors of savage belligerence, description cannot paint. No picture can resemble the reality. No effort can bring the imagination up to the standard of the fact. Nor sex, nor age, have claims. The short remnant of life left to the hoary head, trembling with age and infirmities, is snatched away. The tenderest infant, yet imbibing nutrition from the mamilla of maternal love, and the agonized mother herself, alike wait the stroke of the relentless tomahawk. No vestige is left of what fire can consume. Nothing which breathes the breath of life is spared. The animals reared by the cares of civilized man are involved in his destruction. No human foresight can divine the quarter which shall be struck. It is in the dead of the night, in the darkness of the morn, in the howling of the storm, that the demoniac deed is done.

The anxieties which crowd upon those of tender sex and years, upon our aged and infirm, and the throb of sensibility which communicates itself from them to those of hardier ages and habits, compel us to approach the fathers of our country, to expose to them the dangers and weakness of this colonial establishment, and to demand the protection of their parental arm. While our representation is on its wing, and ere our wishes, or your intentions, or the extent of the danger, are capable, at this distant separation, of becoming known, we shall be true to ourselves, and true to you; and all that precaution, united with resolution, can effect, we shall endeavor to accomplish. But we confidently trust that inaction or hesitation may prevail no longer; and that effective measures, demanded no less by the solid and permanent interest of the United States, than by our local exposure, will not be delayed.

The first impression, which is necessary to be distinctly made, on the minds of those to whom the destinies of the republic are confided, is that of our comparative strength, our comparative weakness. To those whose duty or whose wish it may be to possess themselves of information, at once the most accurate, and the most minute, with respect to the topographical and statistical relations of this territory, we give a reference, on the one hand, to the surveys of the whole of the settled parts of this country, recently taken, and which are of record in the treasury department; and, on the other, to the enumerations of the inhabitants, which have just been completed, and are of record in the Department of State. To generalize this information, and to present it plain and naked to the mind, we will condense the results in few words.

In the territory of Michigan, there are nine principal settlements:

- |                                  |                                       |
|----------------------------------|---------------------------------------|
| 1. The River Miami.              | 6. The River Detroit.                 |
| 2. The River Raisin.             | 7. The River Huron of Lake St. Clair. |
| 3. The River Huron of Lake Erie. | 8. The River Sinclair.                |
| 4. The River Ecorce.             | 9. The Island of Michilimackinac.     |
| 5. The River Rouge.              | 10. Sundry detached settlements.      |

From the first to the second, in the order they are enumerated, the distance is thirty-two miles. From the second to the sixth, thirty-six miles. From the sixth to the seventh, forty miles. From the seventh to the eighth, thirty-five miles. From the eighth to the ninth, two hundred miles. The total, from one extreme to the other, three hundred forty-three miles.

In the three first, the whole population is one thousand three hundred forty souls. The males above sixteen, three hundred ninety-one. In the four next, the whole population is two thousand two hundred and twenty-seven; males, as before, five hundred ninety-nine. In the two last, the whole population is one thousand seventy souls; males, as before, five hundred three.

In this territory are two garrisons; one in Detroit, one at Michilimackinac. The first has ninety-four men, the second seventy-nine.

Of the whole population, four-fifths are French, the remainder American, with a small portion of British.

The whole population of the territory of Michigan, including French, Americans, and British; settlers and troops; whites and persons of color; is four thousand seven hundred sixty two.

In other frontier countries, the frontier is on one side. It is also on the extremity. The settlements thicken as you recede from the circumferential establishments.

In the peculiar manner in which this territory is settled, two striking particularities are to be observed.

First, the whole territory is a double frontier. The British are on one side. The savages on the other.

Second, every individual house is a frontier. No one farm is covered by another farm in the rear of it.

It may therefore be at once conceived, what would be the situation of the people of the territory of Michigan, in a case of determined hostility against them, by the savages. The inhabitants are so dispersed, that, to assemble one hundred men, upon any one spot, on a sudden nocturnal notice, is physically impossible; and how are even the one hundred to be induced, in the hour of danger, to relinquish the last pleasure this world can present them, that of dying along with their innocent and helpless families, and to abandon them to certain destruction, under the, perhaps, visionary hope of any where embodying in force adequate to meet an enemy! that shall reduce into concert the exertions of two distinct people, unacquainted with the languages of each other; and who have reason to be divided in the degree of their fear? Is there again a refuge for the helpless in flight? On the south, the savages intercept them from their brethren of the States. On the west, on the north, they perfectly surround them. Shall they then lift an eye to the east, throw themselves on the mercy of the British, and will they, or can they, there, find mercy? Will reason sanction the idea; or have past events authorized the hope? And what, lastly, is to be expected from the military? They can and will, defend themselves; but they will not march out of the walls of their garrison. They have not even men enough to man their works.

Viewing the situation of the country in this light, which is no other than literal truth, the essential inquiry which remains is, what is requisite to be done? Perhaps you will think it right that we on the spot should speak out our minds. We do so then; and trust our sentiments will be approved.

First: An increase of the military force is necessary, sufficient to man the works, and afford a body to march out, in aid of the militia; a part cavalry.

Second: Additional garrisons are necessary on other points of the Northwestern frontier.

To present this subject in a view more systematic, more direct, than by generally referring to it, we suggest three points for new garrisons, calculated, as we conceive, to protect the whole of the present frontier on the north.

First: A garrison at the intersection of a meridian line from the mouth of the grand au Glaize river with a line of latitude drawn from the head of the river Sinclair, or, which is the same thing, the embouchure or outlet of lake Huron, being the most northern and western points to which the native title is lawfully extinguished, according to the first article of the treaty of Detroit, of the seventeenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven.

We are decided in our sentiment that this garrison ought not to be on the course of the navigation along the great waters, but in the interior of the peninsula. Formerly, the points on the navigation were the most important. There was trade and commercial intercourse; no agriculture. Times have altered. At present, the little commerce which remains is sufficiently safe. It is agricultural protection which is wanted.

Without this garrison, you can neither run the lines of the treaty which has been last referred to, nor survey the lands acquired under it; nor sell them when surveyed; nor settle them when sold.

Second: A garrison at the mouth of the Wisconsin river, according to the eleventh article of the treaty of St. Louis, of the third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and four; being the most northern and western point to which the native title is lawfully extinguished in that quarter.

Third: A garrison in the same latitude as the mouth of the Wisconsin river, on the river Missouri, as soon as legitimate means may be used.

If peace prevails elsewhere on the frontier, notwithstanding the battle on the Wabash, the increase of the military force, before mentioned, and the establishment of the subsequent garrisons, will, as we conceive, give us protection; and, in that happy event, if we have aught to reproach ourselves with; if we have pressed too hard upon a fugitive people; if we have imposed on one that is ignorant; if, approaching the meridian of our strength, we are becoming indifferent to the happiness, to the rights of an unfortunate race of mankind, who, notwithstanding any temporary injuries they may be capable of inflicting, are destined to melt away before the irresistible advances of an empire, of whose magnitude, of whose stability, they can have no conception; if we have relinquished the feelings of their "Father" before they deprive us of the title, let us not refuse our admiration to the spirit which prompts man to defend his home, his country, to the last hour; let us seasonably retrace our steps; let us hasten to recall sentiments of humanity; let us hasten to render them justice!

If, on the contrary, pacific exertions have failed, and war and contest prevail, of which your information, notwithstanding our proximity, will be more prompt and authentic than ours; if, at the moment that our dangers and our feelings are announcing, in your halls, the warm blood of life is yet smoking on your frontier; we know of no reliance, in addition to our own exertions, and the military force to which we have adverted, but detachments of militia from the States of Ohio, Kentucky, New York, and Pennsylvania.

We need not urge the importance of our country to you. Your interest, your honor, compel you to keep it; and its intermediate protection is, on one side, a right, on the other a duty. Prompt effective defence is wisdom. The country once lost, who shall count the lives or the treasures you must expend to regain it?

All which is humbly and respectfully submitted.

TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 16, 1812.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 15th, 1812.

SIR:

In obedience to a resolution of the honorable House of Representatives, of the 19th December last, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House, by the proper officers, a statement of the capital employed in the Indian trade; the amount of annual purchases, sales, and articles received in payment; together with the number, names, and salaries, of agents employed; the places where stationed, and specifying, as far as practicable, the state of the trade, at each place, for the last four years;" the Secretary of War has the honor to transmit the enclosed documents and letter from the Superintendent of Indian Trade, which contain the information requested.

All which is respectfully submitted.

W. EUSTIS.

Honorable H. CLAY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

INDIAN OFFICE, January 13th, 1812.

SIR:

In conformity with the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 19th ultimo, transmitted me by you, I have the honor to state, that, of the appropriations made, at different times, for carrying on trade with the Indian tribes, to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars, ten thousand dollars remain in the treasury unapplied; so that the capital, as yet employed in the Indian trade, may be considered to be two hundred and ninety thousand dollars.

The amount of annual purchases, sales, and of articles received in payment, from the 1st January, 1808, to the 30th September, 1811, will be shown by the statement, sent herewith, marked A. The number, names, and salaries of agents employed, at the ten trading houses now in operation, and places where stationed, will be shown by the paper marked B; and the state of the trade, at each place, for the last four years, (that is, from the 31st December, 1807, to the 30th September, 1811) is specified, as far as practicable, by the paper marked C, and the accounts to which it refers; explanatory notes have been added to each statement and account, with a view to make them as intelligible as possible. It will be seen, that, from the nature of the case, I have been often obliged to resort to estimate; the result, however, as far as it goes, is believed to be near the truth.

It may be proper, sir, to remark, that, beside the property, by the returns herewith shewn, on hand at the factories, and on the way to them, or of remittances from them, unsold; the goods and cash on hand in this office, preparing for next year's supply; together with balances uncollected for sales, and others in hands of agents, &c. form a considerable item as to the state of the general fund.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

J. MASON,
Superintendent of Indian Trade.

Honorable WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

A.

The following statement exhibits the amounts received by the Superintendent of Indian Trade, from the factories, in cash and drafts, and for furs, peltries, &c. sold from the 1st January, 1808, to the 30th September, 1811, with the amount of furs, peltries, &c. sent from the factories, then remaining unsold; also, the amount of merchandise purchased by him, and that sent off by him to the factories, in each year during that period.

DATE.	Amount of cash and drafts received in each year.	Amount received for furs, peltries, &c. sold in each year.	Total of cash, drafts, and sales, in each year, and furs, peltries, &c. remaining unsold.		Amount of merchandise purchased in each year.	Amount of merchandise sent to the factories during each year.
1808,	$16,264 82	$21,594 18	$37,859 18	1808,	$44,520 01	$82,466 39
1809,	2,365 06	11,526 43	13,891 49	1809,	45,965 60	44,314 48
1810,	16,107 74	68,621 71	84,729 45	1810,	40,964 82	45,162 07
First three quarters of 1811,	1,024 05	31,783 94	32,807 99	For three quarters of 1811,	46,006 50	39,530 04
			$169,288 11
Amount of furs, peltries, &c. received from the factories, and remaining unsold on the 30th September, 1811, $47,996 02, about one half of which being articles other than peltries, may be estimated at cost,			23,998 01
From the other half, $23,998 01, being peltries, at this time low in price, and for some time on hand, a reduction of twenty-five per cent. from the cost may be estimated for damage and loss on sales,			17,998 51
			$211,284 63		$177,456 93	$211,472 98

NOTE. The amounts purchased in the several years here taken, disagree with the amounts sent off to the factories in the same year, because of the quantity on hand in this office, at the time at which this statement is made to commence, and because of the necessity of purchasing, in quantities, the articles required, and the breaking them up and repacking, in proper assortments, for each factory.

The amounts of the merchandise sent to the factories, and the amounts received for cash and drafts, and for sales of furs and peltries, &c. will be found to exceed, somewhat, as stated within, the aggregate of the same items shown by the accounts, respectively, of the ten factories now in operation, because of goods sent, and remittances received, occasionally, from each of three factories, which were partially in operation, or were winding up, during the period taken, and now discontinued.

C.

Statement shewing the amount of estimated gain and loss on each of the United States' Indian Factories now in operation, as more particularly shewn by the accounts referred to, from the 31st December, 1807, to the 30th September, 1811.

Nos	FACTORIES.	Gained.	Lost.
1	Fort Hawkins factory, as per account No. 1,		1,023 00
2	Chickasaw Bluffs do. as per account No. 2,	3,000 49
3	Fort St. Stephens do. as per account No. 3,		10,352 54

7	Fort Wayne do. as per account No. 7,	10,502 77
8	Chicago do. as per account No. 8,	3,725 46
9	Sandusky do. as per account No. 9,		3,366 50
10	Michilimackinac do. as per account No. 10,	3,085 56
		$40,632 07	$26,460 77
	Amount of gain, as above,		$40,632 07
	Amount of loss, as above,		26,460 77
	Total amount gained during the term taken,		$14,171 30

NOTE.—The period taken in this statement, and those to which it refers, viz. from the 31st December, 1807, to 30th September, 1811, is less by one quarter, than the term directed by the resolution of the House of Representatives: it being found, that, by commencing with a year, and ending with the last returns, from the manner of accounting at this office, most accuracy could be obtained. It has been respectfully presumed, that the object would be best answered by the mode adopted.

It will be found, that, generally, the Southern factories have lost, while the Northern factories have gained. The reason is obvious. At the first, peltries (deer skins) are in most part received from the Indians. The quantity of this article supplied in the country, greatly exceeds the home consumption. The market is on the continent of Europe. Since the obstructions to our commerce in that quarter, peltries have not only experienced a depression in price, in common with other of our produce consumed in that part of Europe, but are subject to a considerable loss by being kept over, because of the difficulty and expense of preserving from damage by vermin.

At the latter, (the Northern factories) hatters' furs are generally taken; these not exceeding the home demand, are of good sale. Another consideration is, that at some of the Northern factories, the Indians of their respective vicinities have been encouraged to employ a portion of labor on objects that are not attainable near the Southern factories. At fort Osage, in preparing buffalo tallow and candles; at Michilimackinac, in making maple sugar; and at fort Madison, in digging the ore, and melting down lead; in all which, they are succeeding tolerably well, as to quality and quantity. In the article of lead, remarkably well.

NOTE.—No returns having been received from this factory since 30th June last, the accounts, as to stock, &c. on hand, are made up only to that time, instead of 30th September. The result will be nearly the same. The Indians in that quarter having the use of money, this factory has usually been in cash, to pay salaries and other expenses on the spot; thence the large credits and small charges on these accounts; and because, also, of the peltries taken, for the last year or two, having been kept at the factory. One-half the debts are estimated bad; this, with Indian debts, is as little as can be counted on; yet it is indispensably necessary to credit them to a certain degree.

The buildings, being remote from white settlements, must lose considerably, if disposed of; they are, therefore, estimated at half their value.

NOTE. No returns having been received from this factory since the 30th June last, the accounts, as to stock, &c. on hand, are made up only to that time, instead of 30th September; the result will be nearly the same. This factory has suffered much by the late depression in price of deer skins, almost the only article it takes in. The expenses paid for it have been above the ordinary proportion; because of the heavy duties paid to the Spaniards on the passage of both merchandise and peltries on the Mobile, and of the great expenses incurred at Orleans (to which place its peltries are sent for sale) in packing, preserving, &c. It will be remarked, that its amount of traffic has been large.

One half of the debts are estimated bad; this, with Indian debts, is as little as can be expected: yet it is indispensably necessary to credit them to a certain degree.

NOTE.—The gain on this factory is because it takes in principally hatters' furs and lead, on which there is profit. For loss on buildings, see note on No. 4.—For loss on Indian debt, see note on No. 3. This factory having been established after the 31st December, 1807, to wit: in the summer of 1808, no inventory of property on hand at that date is, of course, shown; but this account exhibits its transactions from the commencement, to the 30th September, 1811.

NOTE.—This factory has suffered much by the late depression in the price of deer skins, almost the only article taken in. The expenses paid for it are large, because of the distance to transport; the heavy charges at Orleans, in preserving peltries; and the cost of buildings lately completed for its use. In estimating the present value of the buildings, 25 per cent. only is taken off, because of their immediate vicinity to the settlements. For loss on Indian debts, see note on No. 3.

 The expenses paid for this factory are comparatively small, because of a large proportion of the remittances in drafts, the rest principally in small furs, which has lessened the transportation account.

No. 134.

[1st Session.]

THE WYANDOTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 28, 1812.

To the President of the United States of America, the Senate, and House of Representatives, in Congress assembled, at Washington.

The petition of your children, the principal chiefs and sachems of the nation of Wyandots, in behalf of themselves, their warriors, their women and children.

FATHERS: Listen to your children the Wyandots, who are now desirous of letting you know their sentiments.

FATHERS, LISTEN! We, your children, now address you, on a subject of the utmost concern to ourselves, our women, and children; we hope the Master of Life will inspire you with sentiments of benevolence, to hear our complaint with patience, and that the appellation of father, which our deceased friend General Wayne, at the treaty of Greenville, assumed, and desired us, for the future, to call our Great Fathers, the Long Knives, will be realised in this instance, and that your unfortunate children will in this matter experience the indulgent treatment which they have a right to expect from a great, a rich, and a powerful nation.

FATHERS, LISTEN! For we want you to know our minds. Our friends have made our hearts glad, when they have read to us, annually, the messages of the respective Presidents of the United States to Congress, as respects ourselves, that every thing was done to ameliorate our circumstances; that ploughs, and several implements of agriculture, had been delivered to us, with many sweet talks, from the agents of the Indian department in this territory, to cultivate the earth, as the game was getting scarce.

FATHERS, LISTEN! This has given your children great pleasure to hear; we trust, when our father, the President of the Seventeen Great Fires directed these messages and talks to be sent, that he had not a bit of sugar in his mouth at the time: for we found his voice very sweet. We hope that the words came from the bottom of his heart.

FATHERS, LISTEN! We the Wyandots have taken hold of this good work, and peaceably have cultivated the land we have lived on, time immemorial, and out of which we sprung: for we love this land, as it covers the bones of our ancestors.

FATHERS, LISTEN! The bad birds are going about seeking to do mischief; we are now told, that we and our children are not to be allowed to live on this land more than fifty years, and, if we leave it, as we always have done in the winter season, to hunt on the Scioto, and other parts of the State of Ohio, that the land will be taken from us.

FATHERS, LISTEN! This is not according to the promises which were made to us at the treaty of Greenville, and afterwards, more particularly by our late friend General Wayne, after his arrival at Detroit; his death on the road, going to the seat of Government, is much lamented by us; for, if it had pleased the Great Spirit to have spared his life a little longer, his words would not have been buried with him at Presqu' Isle.

FATHERS, LISTEN! The late General Wayne was a warrior, and a brave man, and such men as he was, never tell lies.

FATHERS: Listen to your children the Wyandots. When your agent, our friend Governor Hull, told us, at the treaty of Detroit, that you wanted the land from the Big Rock towards Saguna, going to fort Defiance, we reluctantly signed the treaty, because our young warriors and women had made us solemnly promise never to dispose of that land; but our friend assured us that he would write to our Great Father, the President of the Seventeen Fires, to give us back the land we and our ancestors have so long lived on, situated between Rivière aux Ecorces, and Rocky river of lake Erie, and in that expectation we signed the paper.

FATHERS, LISTEN! The treaty of Detroit had not long been executed, when our friend Governor Hull again called us together at Brownstown. He said that Congress wanted more of our lands, and particularly a road, upwards of two miles wide, on the best part of our hunting ground from the Miami river to Sandusky, and from thence due south to the boundary line of the treaty of Greenville.

FATHERS, LISTEN! We then told our friend Governor Hull, that all our nations had agreed together, in a most solemn manner, to sell no more lands, and the council was broke off on that account; but we at length consented to make our Great Father a present of this land, in hopes that he would reciprocate with us, and let us keep the land out of which we sprung. Surely, since you call yourselves our Fathers, let your conduct answer to your professions. We have given you one hundred times as much, at the treaty of Brownstown, for nothing; we have always behaved like dutiful children; surely you will not, after this, treat us like a step father, but you will at least be the hundredth part as generous as we have been to you.

FATHERS, LISTEN! After all these explanations, made with frankness, we expect you will not turn us off of our lands at Brownstown and Menquagon aforesaid, but that you will grant us, your children the Wyandots, the land contained in the following boundary, viz: to commence at a small run, about half a mile from Maera, or Walk-in-the-Water's dwelling house, on the northeast side, to run from thence, along the Detroit river, until it crosses the river Huron, on the north side of lake Erie, for one mile, (that is, the river Huron, beyond Brownstown, to the southwest) thence, to extend back to the boundary line established by the treaty of Detroit, (beyond which to Rocky river, near river Raisin, we will forever, hereafter, abandon any further claim to) excepting, nevertheless, those lands which the commissioners of the land office at Detroit have confirmed to actual settlers.

FATHERS, LISTEN! Should you grant our wishes as above, we will undertake to keep open, and maintain in good order, all the roads and bridges which may be required on this land, by existing laws, going from Detroit to river Raisin.

FATHERS, LISTEN! Should you not like the above proposal, which we delivered to our friend Governor Hull, on the 30th September, 1809, and of which speech we now send you a copy, to be referred to, we hope you will at least grant us the land, which none shall have it in their power to sell, or dispose of, unless with the consent of the chiefs and sachems of the Wyandot nation.

FATHER, LISTEN! Several black robes (i. e. ministers) have come to our villages, to preach the religion of white people; they told us the religion of the whites consisted in a few words; that was, to do unto others as we wish that others should do unto us.

FATHERS, LISTEN! Since we have made you so large a present of land, at the treaty of Brownstown, we wish you to put the above Christian rule in practice; for we are a poor, helpless race of mortals: we are objects of compassion.

FATHERS, LISTEN! If you really want to ameliorate our condition, let us have the land given to us; we have built valuable houses, and improvements on the same; we have learned the use of the plough; but now we are told we are to be turned off the land in fifty years.

FATHERS, LISTEN! This has given us great uneasiness; this pretence of bettering our situation, it appears, is only for a temporary purpose: for, should we live on the land for fifty years, as farmers, and then be turned off, we will be very miserable indeed. By that time, we shall have forgot how to hunt, in which practice we are now very expert, and then you'll turn us out of doors, a poor, pitiful, helpless set of wretches.

FATHERS, LISTEN! We are desirous that the paper which our friends Governor Hull and Judge Woodward brought forward while they were at Washington together, about six years ago, should be passed into a law, and that we will, each, at least get sixty acres of this land per head, and that six hundred and forty acres of said land will be granted to each of our chiefs and sachems, to enable them to sustain the dignity of their offices, and to keep up their importance, as regards the necessary regulations of police.

FATHERS, LISTEN! The atmosphere is all cloudy, and every thing looks as if the Great Spirit was displeased. We are told that there is to be war between our Great Fathers and the British. We are also told, that there has been a battle between Governor Harrison's army, and those Indians who are under the influence of the Shawanee prophet.

FATHERS, LISTEN! We know that some of your wise men, who do not know our customs, will look into your book of treaties, and they will find, that, at Muskingum, fort Harmar, Greenville, and at the treaty of Detroit, this piece of land has been conveyed to the United States, by all the nations.

FATHERS, LISTEN! We can assure you in sincerity and truth, how the thing is conducted at all treaties. When the United States want a particular piece of land, all our nations are assembled; a large sum of money is offered; the land is occupied probably by one nation only; nine-tenths have no actual interest in the land wanted; if the particular nation interested refuses to sell, they are generally threatened by the others, who want the money or goods offered, to buy whiskey. Fathers, this is the way in which this small spot, which we so much value, has been so often torn from us. We, the Wyandotts, are now a small nation. Unless you have charity for us, we will soon be forgot, like the Nottaways of Virginia.

FATHERS, LISTEN! We are very desirous of living in friendship and peace with our brethren of the Seventeen Great Fires; but our young men are not satisfied to be turned off this land in their old days.

FATHERS: Listen to your children—open your ears! What we have said to you, comes from the bottom of our hearts: it is but a trifle we ask of you, as a great nation. Be charitably inclined to us, and grant us our petition.

The speech of the principal chiefs and warriors of the Wyandots, delivered on the 30th day of September, 1809.

To his Excellency Governor HULL:

FATHER:

Listen to your children, the Wyandots, delivered by their chiefs and warriors, in which they let you know their sentiments.

Father, listen! for we speak to you now to let you know the sentiments of our minds. We thought the land we resided upon was our own; formerly, our old chiefs, who are now dead and gone, made a great promise to the Great Spirit above, that they never would move from the land we, their children, now live upon and occupy.

FATHER, listen! You informed us that the land we occupy belonged to you; at the treaty of Greenville, made with our father General Wayne, he promised to us the land on which we live; and for that reason, we never will consent to give up talking upon this subject.

FATHER, listen! You will remember that some of our principal chiefs went, last fall, to visit our great father, the President of the United States; our chiefs were very sorry that they could not get an opportunity to talk with our Great Father, the President of the United States, personally.

FATHER, listen! When you arrived at this place amongst your children, you always gave your children good advice to cultivate the land. Your children of the Wyandot tribe of Indians have followed your advice, to their great benefit and satisfaction. Father, we were astonished when you told us there was a small tract of land at Brownstown and Maguawgo, for our use for fifty years, and a vacancy in the middle between the two villages.

FATHER, listen to what your children the Wyandots say; this small tract of land is entirely too small for us. What will become of our children that are growing up?

FATHER, listen! You have cut off from us the best part of our land. Your children, the principal chiefs, the old warriors, head-warriors, with some of our sensible young men, of the Wyandot nation, request you to grant them the following favor: That the boundary of our lands should commence at a small run, about half a mile from Walk-in-the-water's dwelling house, on the northeast side; to run from thence, along the Detroit river, until it crosses the river Huron for one mile, that is, the river Huron beyond Brownstown, to the southwest; thence to extend back to the extent of the United States' purchase, on a line established by the treaty of Detroit. Beyond which, to Rocky river, we will forever abandon further claim. Father, you know there is a bed of land between the two villages. The chiefs of the Wyandots, and sensible young men of our nation, wish you to let them have that bed of land which lies between the two villages. Father, the reason why your children like this bed of land so well, they have made valuable improvements thereon, which have cost them both labor and expenses; and what is still more sensible to our feelings, we love the land that covers the bones of our fathers.

FATHER, listen! Those lands are our sole dependence for cultivation and hunting.

FATHER, listen again! You inform us concerning our lands, that we are only to enjoy them for fifty years; your children are very uneasy at this information; they say let us enjoy and have our land forever.

FATHER, listen! Your children say, let your children, the Wyandots, have their land for one hundred years. The reason why we say one hundred years is this: if your children, the principal old chiefs of the Wyandot tribe of Indians, live so long in peace and quietness, when that day comes, at the end of one hundred years, father, we will again talk on the same subject.

FATHER, listen! It surprises us, your children, that our Great Father, the President of the United States, should take as much upon himself as the Great Spirit above, as he wants all the land on this island. Father, we think he takes the word out of the mouth of the Great Spirit; he does not consider that He is Master. Father, he does not think of the Great Spirit above, that He is omnipotent, and master of us all, and every thing in this world.

FATHER, listen to the request of all your Wyandot children; grant us, we supplicate you, our land, in the quantity we have requested in this speech; then, father, we will thank the voice of the Great Spirit above, and thank our father, the President of the United States, in granting this.

FATHER, listen! You requested your children, last spring, to take into consideration this subject, concerning our land; we have complied with your request, and now give this answer.

FATHER, listen! We hope you will not think that it is for want of respect to you, that we make known our sentiments on paper, by our friend Jacob Visger. Father, as you have repeatedly promised your children that you would assist them, we will never forget your paternal care of us, if you will assist us at this present time, in forwarding these, our wishes and sentiments, to our Father, the President of the United States.

No. 135.

[1st Session.

NORTHWESTERN FRONTIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 13, 1812.

Mr. McKee, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to Indian affairs, reported:

That the attention of the committee has been directed to the following inquiries:

- 1st. Whether any, and what, agency the subjects of the British Government may have had in exciting the Indians, on the Western frontier, to hostilities against the United States;
- 2d. The evidence of such hostility, on the part of the Indian tribes, prior to the late campaign on the Wabash;
- 3d. The orders by which the campaign was authorized and carried on.

The committee have obtained all the evidence within their power, relative to these several inquiries. The documents accompanying the President's message to Congress, of the 11th instant, contain all, and some additional evidence to what had been obtained by the committee, in relation to the first inquiry. Those documents afford evidence as conclusive as the nature of the case can well be supposed to admit of, that the supply of Indian goods furnished at fort Malden, and distributed during the last year by the British agents, in Upper Canada, to the Indian tribes, were more abundant than usual; and it is difficult to account for this extraordinary liberality on any other ground than that of an intention to attach the Indians to the British cause, in the event of a war with the United States.

That the Indian tribes should put to hazard the large annuities which they have been so long in the habit of receiving from the United States; that they should relinquish supplies so necessary to their comfort, if not to their existence, by a hostile conduct, in the absence of all other evidence, is not the least convincing proof that some agency has been employed to stimulate the savages to hostilities; and, having pursued a course of conduct which must lead to a forfeiture of those advantages, renders it at least probable that they had assurances of receiving an equivalent elsewhere.

Additional presents, consisting of arms and ammunition, given at a time when there is evidence that the British were apprised of the hostile disposition of the Indians, accompanied with the speeches addressed to them, exciting disaffection, are of too decisive a character to leave doubt on the subject.

With regard to the second subject of inquiry, the committee are of opinion, that the evidence accompanying this report, together with the official communication made to the Executive, by the British Government, affords such evidence of the hostile views and intentions of the Indians, as to render it the duty of the President of the United States, to use the necessary means of protecting the frontiers from the attack with which they were threatened. Accordingly, in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress, entitled "An act for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," the Executive ordered the 4th regiment of infantry, with one company of riflemen, under the command of Colonel Boyd, from Pittsburg to Vincennes, subject to the further orders of Governor Harrison, who was authorized, with this force, and such additional number of companies from the militia as should be deemed necessary, to establish a new post on the Wabash, and to march against, and disperse, the armed combination under the Prophet.

These considerations, together with the documents, are respectfully submitted.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 19th, 1811.

SIR:

In answer to the call of the honorable committee of the House of Representatives, contained in your letter of the 25th ultimo, for "all evidence tending to shew what agency the subjects of his Britannic Majesty may have had in exciting the Indians on the Western frontier to hostility with the United States; the evidence of hostility towards the United States, on the part of the Shawanee Prophet, and his tribe, and which, it is presumed, gave rise to the expedition under the command of Governor Harrison; and the orders, or authority, vested in Governor Harrison by the Government of the United States, under which the expedition is carried on:"

I have the honor to state, that the information received by this Department, relative to the subjects of inquiry, is contained in the correspondence of the Governors of the Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois territories, and of other officers and agents of Government, on the Northern and Western frontier, extracts from which, embracing the objects of inquiry of the honorable committee, together with the memorials of the inhabitants of the Indiana and Illinois territories, are herewith transmitted.

On the information and representation of facts therein contained, the 4th regiment of infantry, with one company of riflemen, under the command of Colonel Boyd, were ordered from Pittsburg to Vincennes, subject to the further orders of Governor Harrison, who was authorized, with this force and such additional number of companies from the militia as should be deemed necessary, to establish a new post on the Wabash, and to march against, and disperse, the armed combination under the Prophet.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Extracts of letters addressed to the War Department.

MICHILMACKINAC, May 24th, 1807.

There appears to be a very general and extensive movement among the savages in this quarter. Belts of wampum are rapidly circulating from one tribe to another, and a spirit is prevailing, by no means pacific. The enclosed talk, which has been industriously spread among them, needs no comment.

There is certainly mischief at the bottom, and there can be no doubt, in my mind, but that the object and intention of this great Manitou, or second Adam, under the pretence of restoring to the aborigines their former independence, and to the savage character its ancient energies, is, in reality, to induce a general effort to rally, and to strike, somewhere, a desperate blow.

Extract from a talk delivered at Le Maiouitnong, entrance of lake Michigan, by the Indian chief Le Maiquois, or the Trout, May 4th, 1807, as coming from the first man whom God created, said to be now in the Shawanee country, addressed to all the Indian tribes, (referred to above.)

"I am the father of the English, of the French, of the Spaniards, and of the Indians. I created the first man, who was the common father of all these people, as well as yourselves; and it is through him, whom I have awaked from his long sleep, that I now address you. But the Americans I did not make. They are not my children, but the children of the evil spirit. They grew from the scum of the great water, when it was troubled by the evil spirit, and the froth was driven into the woods by a strong east wind. They are numerous, but I hate them.

"My children: You must not speak of this talk to the whites. It must be hidden from them. I am now on the earth, sent by the Great Spirit to instruct you. Each village must send me two or more principal chiefs to represent you, that you may be taught. The bearer of this talk will point out to you the path to my wigwam. I could not come myself to Abre Croche, because the world is changed from what it was. It is broken, and leans down, and, as it declines, the Chippewas, and all beyond, will fall off and die. Therefore, you must come to see me, and be instructed. Those villages which do not listen to this talk, and send me two deputies, will be cut off from the face of the earth!"

MICHILMACKINAC, August 30th, 1807.

The cause of the hostile feelings, on the part of the Indians, is principally to be attributed to the influence of foreigners trading in the country.

JEFFERSONVILLE, Falls of Ohio, 14th April, 1808.

A young man from the Delaware towns came to inform me, that a Pattawatamy Indian had arrived at the towns, with a speech from the British, in which they were informed that they (the British) were upon the point of commencing hostilities against the United States, and requesting the Delawares to join them.

VINCENNES, May 19th, 1808.

The prophet has selected a spot on the upper part of the Wabash, for his future and permanent residence, and has engaged a considerable number of Pattawatamies, Ottawas, Chippewas, and other Northern Indians, to settle there, under his auspices. An intelligent man, who passed, a few weeks ago, through some of the villages of the Pattawatamies that are under the Prophet's influence, says, that they are constantly engaged in what they term religious duties; but that their prayers are always succeeded by, or intermixed with, warlike sports.

This combination of religious and warlike exercises, and the choice of weapons of their own manufacture, sufficiently indicates the designs of their author.

ST. LOUIS, April 5th, 1809.

The Indian prophets have been industriously employed, the latter part of the winter and spring, privately counselling with, and attempting to seduce the Kickapoos, Saukeys, and other bands of Indians residing on the Mississippi and Illinois rivers, to war against the frontiers of this country.

FORT WAYNE, 8th April, 1809.

The Indians appear to be agitated respecting the conduct, and, as they say, the intentions of the Shawanee Prophet. The Chippewas, Ottawas, and Pattawatamies are hurrying away from him, and say that their reason for doing so is, because he has told them to receive the tomahawk from him, and destroy all the white people at Vincennes and Ohio, as low down as the mouth of the Ohio, and as high up as Cincinnati; that the Great Spirit had directed that they should do so, at the same time threatening them with destruction, if they refused to comply with what he proposed.

St. Louis, April 30th, 1809.

I have the honor to enclose you a copy of a letter, which confirms my suspicions of the British interference with our Indian affairs in this country. (Extract from the enclosed letter:) "I am at present in the fire, receiving Indian news every day. A chief of the Puant nation appears to be employed by the British to get all the nations of Indians to Detroit, to see their fathers, the British, who tell them that they pity them in their situation with the Americans, because the Americans had taken their lands and their game; that they must join and send them off from their lands; they told the savages that the Americans could not give them a blanket, nor any thing good for their families.

"They said they had but one father that had helped them in their misfortunes, and that they would assemble, defend their father, and keep their lands." It appears that four English subjects have been at Rivière a la Roche this winter, in disguise; they have been there to get the nations together, and send them on the American frontiers. Other Indians are pushed on, by our enemies, to take the fort of Belle Vue.

VINCENNES, 3d May, 1809.

— is decidedly of opinion that the Prophet will attack our settlements. His opinion is formed from a variety of circumstances, but principally from a communication made to Mr. —, by two chiefs, his friends, the substance of which was, that the Prophet and his followers had determined to commence hostilities as soon as they could be prepared, and to "sweep all the white people from the Wabash and White river, after which they intended to attack the Miamies."

About eight days ago, he (the Prophet) had with him three hundred and fifty warriors, well armed with rifles, and tolerably supplied with ammunition; they have also bows and arrows, war clubs, and a kind of spear.

SANDUSKY, 7th June, 1809.

The conduct of British traders, in introducing spirituous liquors among the Indians in this part of the country, and their determined hostility to the measures of our Government, have long been subjects of complaint, and their infamous stories have much embarrassed our operations.

DETROIT, June 16th, 1809.

The influence of the Prophet has been great, and his advice to the Indians injurious to them and the United States. We have the fullest evidence, that his object has been to form a combination of them in hostility to the United States. The powerful influence of the British has been exerted in a way alluring to the savage character.

VINCENNES, 14th June, 1810.

I have received information from various sources, which has produced entire conviction on my mind, that the Prophet is organizing a most extensive combination against the United States.

The person who had charge of the boat, sent up the river with the annuity salt, has just returned, and reports that the Prophet and the Kickapoos who were with him, refused to receive that which he was directed to deliver to them, on his way up the Wabash; but he was ordered by the Prophet to leave the salt on the bank of the river, as he could not determine whether he would receive it or not, until his brother, the war chief, arrived from Detroit. On the return of the boat, the master was directed to take the salt on board, as they were determined to have nothing to do with it. Whilst they were rolling the salt into the boat, the Prophet seized the master by the hair, and shook him violently, asking him whether he was an American.

VINCENNES, 26th June, 1810.

Winemac assured me that the Prophet, not long since, proposed to the young men to murder the principal chiefs of all the tribes; observing, that their hands would never be untied until this was effected; that these were the men who had sold their lands, and who would prevent them from opposing the encroachments of the white people.

An Ioway Indian informs me, that, two years ago this summer, an agent from the British arrived at the Prophet's town, and, in his presence, delivered the message with which he was charged, the substance of which was, to urge the Prophet to unite as many tribes as he could against the United States; but not to commence hostilities until they gave the signal.

From this man, and others of his nation, I learn that the Prophet has been constantly soliciting their own, and other tribes of the Mississippi, to join him against the United States.

VINCENNES, July 11th, 1810.

I have received a letter from fort Wayne, which confirms the information of the hostile designs and combination of the Indians. The people in the neighborhood where the horses were stolen, are so much alarmed, that they are collecting together for their defence.

VINCENNES, July 18th, 1810.

From the Ioways, I learn that the Sacs and Foxes have actually received the tomahawk, and are ready to strike whenever the Prophet gives the signal. A considerable number of the Sacs went, some time since, to see the British superintendent, and on the first instant, fifty more passed Chicago for the same destination. A Miami chief who has just returned from his annual visit to Malden, after having received the accustomed donation of goods, was thus addressed by the British agent: "My son, keep your eyes fixed on me; my tomahawk is now up; be you ready, but do not strike until I give the signal."

St. Louis, July 20th, 1810.

A few weeks ago the post-rider, on his way from Vincennes to this place, was killed, and the mail lost; since that time we have had no communication with Vincennes. A part of the Sacs, and the greatest part of the Kickapoos, who reside east of the Mississippi, have been absent some time on a visit to the Indian Prophet. One hundred and fifty Sacs are on a visit to the British agent, by invitation, and a smaller party on a visit to the island of St. Joseph, in Lake Huron.

VINCENNES, July 25th, 1810.

There can be no doubt of the designs of the Prophet and the British agent of Indian affairs, to do us injury. This agent is a refugee from the neighborhood of —, and his implacable hatred to his native country prompted him to take part with the Indians, in the battle between them and General Wayne's army. He has, ever since his appointment to the principal agency, used his utmost endeavors to excite hostilities, and the lavish manner in which he is allowed to scatter presents amongst them, shews that his Government participates in his enmity and authorizes his measures.

DETROIT, July 27th, 1807.

Large bodies of Indians from the westward and southward continue to visit the British post at Amherstburgh, and are supplied with provisions, arms, ammunition, &c. Much more attention is paid to them than usual.

FORT WAYNE, August 7th, 1810.

Since writing you on the 25th ultimo, about one hundred Sawkeys have returned from the British agent, who supplied them liberally with every thing they stood in want of. The party received forty-seven rifles and a number of fusils, with plenty of powder and lead. This is sending firebrands into the Mississippi country, inasmuch as it will draw numbers of our Indians to the British side, in the hope of being treated with the same liberality.

VINCENNES, August 1st, 1810.

A number of the inhabitants of the northern frontier of the Jeffersonville district, have been driven off by the Indians, and much of their property destroyed.

ST. LOUIS, September 12th, 1810.

On the night of the 20th of July, four white men, who reside near the Missouri, about one hundred miles from this place, who had been in pursuit of horses which had been stolen from them, were killed in their camp, and one wounded, by the Indians.

Gomo, the principal chief of the Pattawatamies, assured me, that the portion of the Pattawatamies under his authority did not commit the murder. He blames the Prophet, with whom he disclaims any connexion.

VINCENNES, February 6th, 1811.

If the intentions of the British Government are pacific, the Indian department of Upper Canada have not been made acquainted with them: for they have very lately said every thing to the Indians, who visited them, to excite them against us.

FORT WAYNE, February 8th, 1811.

— has been at this place. The information derived from him is the same I have been in possession of for several years, to wit: the intrigues of the British agents and partizans, in creating an influence hostile to our people and Government, within our territory. I do not know whether a garrison is to be erected on the Wabash or not; but every consideration of sound policy urges the early establishment of a post, somewhere contiguous to the Prophet's residence.

CHICAGO, May 13th, 1811.

An assemblage of the Indians is to take place on a branch of the Illinois, by the influence of the Prophet—the result will be hostile, in the event of a war with Great Britain.

ST. LOUIS, May 24th, 1811.

From the hostile appearance of the Indians towards the lakes and about the head of the Wabash rivér, I have thought it a duty to keep out spies, and have at this time spies among those tribes. I enclose you a talk from the Loways (from which the following is extracted): "I tell you this, although death is threatened against those who discover it: The time is drawing nigh when the murder is to begin, and all the Indians who will not join are to die with the whites."

CHICAGO, June 2, 1811.

Several horses have been stolen by the Indians. The Indians in this quarter are inclined to hostility.

VINCENNES, June 19, 1811.

I informed you, by my last, that I had sent a pirogue up the Wabash, with the annuity salt. All the salt was taken by the Prophet, five barrels of which only were destined for the Prophet's town. — informs me, by the pirogue, that there are about six hundred men, and that Tecumseh is daily expected, with a considerable reinforcement, from the lakes.

ILLINOIS TERRITORY, June 20, 1811.

Indians hostile. Enclosing a deposition, which proves that a man was murdered, and a woman taken prisoner.

OLD STATION, June 21, 1811.

It is with pain I inform you that I just received an express, that on yesterday, nine o'clock, P. M. the Indians killed one man, and mortally wounded another.

ILLINOIS TERRITORY, June 27, 1811.

In consequence of the hostile appearance of the Indians, block houses are erecting on the frontier, in front of the settlements. As much of the regular military force should be afforded for protection as can be spared.

VINCENNES, July 2, 1811.

We were informed, four weeks ago, that it was the intention of the Prophet to commence hostilities in the Illinois territory, in order to cover his principal object, which was an attack upon this place.

These events require no comments; they merit, and, no doubt, will receive, the immediate attention of the Government. The people are in great alarm, and have talked of collecting in stations. A despatch has also been received from the Illinois territory, informing of hostilities and murders.

ST. LOUIS, July 3, 1811.

All the information received from the Indian country, confirms the rooted enmity of the Prophet to the United States, and his determination to commence hostilities as soon as he thinks himself sufficiently strong. His party is increasing, and from the insolence which himself and party have lately manifested, and the violence which has lately been committed by his neighbors and friends, the Pattawatamies, on our frontiers, I am inclined to believe that the crisis is fast approaching.

A number of horses have been taken from the Mississippi, by Pattawatamies, Winnebagoes, and others, under the influence of the Prophet.

ILLINOIS TERRITORY, July 6th, 1811.

An express has been received, with information of several other murders having been committed by the Indians on the frontiers. In fact, I consider peace as totally out of the question; we need not expect it till the Prophet's party is dispersed, and the bands of Pattawatamies about the Illinois river are cut off.

Hostility, with them, has grown into a habit; there is no reason to believe that they will make sufficient satisfaction for the murders they committed, and the goods and horses which they stole last year, or for the very aggravated and increased instances of similar hostilities in the present year. Energetic measures would lessen his power of forming coalitions with other tribes, but we have not the power of taking any efficient means to arrest his progress; if we do not make preparation to meet him, an attack is certain; if we make preparation formidable enough to deter him, though no war actually take place, we have to encounter all the expense, inconvenience, and injury, to which a war with him would subject us; and there seems to be no reasonable ground to hope for a change for the better, whilst he is permitted to increase his strength with impunity.

VINCENNES, July 10th, 1811.

I have supposed, that if the Prophet does not immediately throw off the mask and commence the war, that calamity might yet be avoided, by marching a considerable force up to our exterior boundary on the Wabash, and requiring the immediate dispersion of the banditti he has collected.

BELLE FONTAINE, July 22d, 1811.

On the eleventh instant, I detached a subaltern, sergeant, corporal, and fifteen privates, with a month's provisions, to the Illinois river, to choose a proper site for a block house, for temporary accommodation and defence; with orders to scout and reconnoitre the country, and to watch every movement of the Indians.

VINCENNES, 6th August, 1811.

The Shawanee chief, Tecumseh, has made a visit to this place, with about three hundred Indians, though he promised to bring but a few attendants; his intentions hostile, though he found us prepared for him.

Tecumseh did not set out till yesterday; he then descended the Wabash, attended by twenty men, on his way to the southward. After having visited the Creeks and Choctaws, he is to visit the Osages, and return by the Missouri. The spies say, his object in coming with so many, was to demand a retrocession of the late purchase. At the moment he was promising to bring but a few men with him, he was sending in every direction to collect his people. That he meditated a blow at this time, was believed by almost all the neutral Indians.

ILLINOIS TERRITORY, August 11th, 1811.

Nothing but the most perfect conviction of the necessity, could have induced the calling out of the militia. Whether the Prophet intends to make war, or not, partial war must continue to be the consequence; the hostility which he excites against the United States, is the cement of union among his confederates; and such is the nature of Indians, that they cannot be collected, and kept together, under such circumstances, without having their minds prepared for war; and, in that situation, it is almost impossible to restrain them from premature acts of hostility. Were this the only danger, it would be sufficient to justify the dispersion of the Prophet's party.

FORT WAYNE, August 18th, 1811.

It appears that the fruit of the Shawanee Prophet, and his band, is making its appearance in more genuine colors than heretofore. I have lately had opportunities of seeing many of the Indians of this agency, from different quarters, and by what I have been able to learn from them, particularly the Pattawatamies, I am induced to believe the news circulating in the papers, respecting the depredations committed in the Illinois territory, by the Indians, is mostly correct, and is thought by them to have proceeded from Mar Poe, and the influence of the Shawanee Prophet. Several of the tribes have sent to me for advice.

NASHVILLE, September 10th, 1811.

As I passed through the Chickasaw nation, a respectable man of that nation informed, that a deputation of eighteen Northern Indians, and two Creeks, were on their way to the Creek nation, but would not tell their business, nor the object of their mission. The party consisted of six Shawanese, six Kickapoes, and six of some tribe far to the Northwest, the name of which they refused to tell; from the manner in which they proceeded, the Indians are of opinion their intention is to stimulate the Creeks and Cherokees to hostilities against the United States.

NASHVILLE, September 9th, 1811.

There is in this place a very noted chief of the Chickasaws, a man of truth, who wishes the President should be informed that there is a combination of the Northern Indians, promoted by the English, to unite in falling on the frontier settlements, and are inviting the Southern tribes to join them.

VINCENNES, September 17th, 1811.

— — — states, that almost every Indian from the country above this, had been, or were then gone, to Malden, on a visit to the British agent. We shall probably gain our destined point at the moment of their return. If then the British agents are really endeavoring to instigate the Indians to make war upon us, we shall be in their neighborhood at the very moment when the impressions which have been made against us are most active in the minds of the savages. — — — succeeded in getting the chiefs together at fort Wayne, though he found them all preparing to go to Malden. The result of the council discovered that the whole tribes, (including the Weas and Bel rivers, for they are all Miamies) were about equally divided in favor of the Prophet and the United States. Lapourier, the Wea chief, whom I before mentioned to you as being seduced by the Prophet, was repeatedly asked by — — — "what land it was that he was determined to defend with his blood, whether it was that which was ceded by the late treaty, or not?" but he would give no answer.

— — — reports, that all the Indians of the Wabash have been, or now are, on a visit to the British agent at Malden; he has never known more than one-fourth as many goods given to the Indians as they are now distributing. He examined the share of one man, (not a chief) and found that he had received an elegant rifle, twenty-five pounds of powder, fifty pounds of lead, three blankets, three strouds of cloth, ten shirts, and several other articles. He says every Indian is furnished with a gun, (either rifle or fusil) and an abundance of ammunition. A trader of this country was lately in the King's store at Malden, and was told that the quantity of goods for the Indian department, which had been sent out this year, exceeded that of common years by £20,000 sterling. It is impossible to ascribe this profusion to any other motive than that of instigating the Indians to take up the tomahawk; it cannot be to secure their trade, for all the peltries collected on the waters of the Wabash, in one year, if sold in the London market, would not pay the freight of the goods which have been given the Indians. Although I am decidedly of opinion that the tendency of the British measures is hostility to us, candor obliges me to inform you, that, from two Indians of different tribes, I have received information that the British agent absolutely dissuaded them from going to war against the United States.

One of them (a Delaware) says that he was present at the audience given by the agent, to three hundred Sacs from the Mississippi. The latter informed him that they had taken up the tomahawk against the United States, at the request of the Prophet, and that they came there to get arms and ammunition. That — — — told them he would supply their wants, but strongly advised them to decline the meditated war.

VINCENNES, September 25th, 1811.

As Captain Piatt was coming from Louisville to this place, his horses, and that of another traveller, were taken from the stable, on the White river, thirty-five miles from this; and the night after, four others from the Roperon settlement. The trail of the horses from the latter place was very visible, and two white men, and a free negro, who speaks some of the Indian languages, went immediately in pursuit of them. They crossed the Wabash, and on the second day, near night, they came to the Indian camp. There were but three Indians in the camp, and they soon discovered their own horses, Captain Piatt's, and a number more. They agreed to give up the four horses taken from Roperon. Our people commenced their return, and had gotten but a few miles, when they perceived the Indians following them; having but one gun amongst them, they endeavored to escape by flight, but the two foremost Indians soon came so near as to fire on them. They had no other alternative than to abandon all the horses, even those which they had rode, and betake themselves to a thick swamp, which luckily presented itself.

VINCENNES, October 6th, 1811.

The Indians have been again plundering our citizens. They took eight horses from a detached settlement in the Illinois territory, about thirty miles above Vincennes, in open day-light.

ON THE WABASH, October 13th, 1811.

The Prophet has not contented himself with throwing the gauntlet, but has absolutely commenced the war. His parties were in our neighborhood, for the first time, on the night of the 10th instant. Our sentinels were fired upon, and one of the best men of the fourth regiment badly, though not mortally, wounded.

ON THE WABASH, October 28th, 1811.

The Delaware chiefs arrived in camp yesterday, and gave an account of their efforts to induce the Prophet to lay aside his hostile designs. They were badly treated and insulted, and finally dismissed with the most contemptuous remarks upon them and us. The party which fired upon our sentinels, arrived at the town when the Delawares were there; they were Shawanese, and the Prophet's nearest friends.

VERMILLION RIVER, November 2d, 1811.

A letter from Colonel Miller, (whose indisposition was such as to oblige me to leave him at the new fort) announces, that an attack has been made upon a boat loaded with corn, which was ascending the river from the fort, to this place. It was fired on, four miles above the fort, and one man killed.

CHICKASAW, November 29th, 1811.

The Shawanese Indians, and some of the Kickapoos, solicited the king of this nation for men to join the Prophet's party. I am told that there are some Creeks gone to join the Prophet's party; how many, I have not heard. I have been constantly advising this nation against, and showing them the consequences of, joining the Prophet.

ST. LOUIS, November 23d, 1811.

One of the bands of the Pattawatamies, on the Illinois river, have lately killed about twenty head of cattle, and a number of hogs, the property of the inhabitants of the village of Peoria, and have threatened the white settlers of that village with destruction, if they take part with the Americans in preference to them. A like conduct has been pursued by some of the Indians about Prairie du Chien, who have ascended the Mississippi above that place, and are wintering with a trader, who, as I am informed, has smuggled a very large supply of British goods into the Mississippi, by Prairie du Chien.

I am willing to believe, that when the unfriendly bands, towards the lakes, hear of the defeat of the Prophet, and the loss which has been sustained by his followers, that their tone will be changed, (if no exertions are made by the British agents) and they will most probably come into the measures of their chiefs, who have been willing to be on friendly terms, and do us justice.

To effect a permanent termination of the differences which now exist, I presume the Prophet's party will be pursued in every direction, caught, and punished, and temporary establishments of regular troops made, calculated to prevent Indian combinations, and check British influence with those tribes towards the lakes.

A Pattawatamy chief, called the White Rabbit, is, at this time, on a mission from the Prophet to the Sacs, Foxes, and Sioux, the object of which is to gain them over to his party; those tribes to act in the spring. I do not believe the mission will succeed; indeed, I have not been under any apprehension of the Prophet's gaining over any of the Indians of this side of the Mississippi.

The Sacs, Foxes, and some of the Ioways, were, at one time, partially under the influence of the Prophet and British, and would have done a great deal of mischief, if their plans had not been fortunately discovered in time.

I am informed that the British agents, or suspected persons, have been, indirectly, tampering with the Sacs, Ioways, and Sioux; if they meet with any success, it will be partial.

Memorials from the inhabitants of the Indiana and Illinois Territories, addressed to the President of the United States.

At a meeting of a very considerable number of the citizens of the county of Knox, at the seminary, in Vincennes, on Wednesday, the 31st of July, 1811, when Colonel Ephraim Jordan was appointed president, and Captain James Smith, secretary: Thereupon, General W. Johnson addressed the meeting, in which he informed them of the present situation of the inhabitants, of not only the town, but country, in regard to the Shawanee Prophet, his brother Tecumseh, and their confederacy of Indians, and advised, that, for the safety of the citizens, some resolutions should be fallen into; and the following were adopted, viz:

1. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the safety of the persons and property of this frontier can never be effectually secured, but by the breaking up of the combination formed by the Shawanee Prophet on the Wabash.

2. Resolved, That we consider it highly impolitic and injurious, as well to the inhabitants of the United States, as that of the territory, to permit a formidable banditti, which is constantly increasing in number, to occupy a situation which enables them to strike our settlements, without the least warning.

3. Resolved, That we are fully convinced that the formation of the combination, headed by the Shawanee Prophet, is a British scheme, and that the agents of that power are constantly exciting the Indians to hostilities against the United States.

4. Resolved, That the assemblage of Indians at this place, at this time, and under the circumstances which attend it, was calculated to excite the most serious alarm; and but for the energetic measures which have been adopted by our Executive, it is highly probable that the threatened destruction of this place, and the massacre of the inhabitants, would have been the consequence.

5. Resolved, That a temporising policy is not calculated to answer any beneficial purpose with savages, who are only to be controlled by prompt and decisive measures.

6. Resolved, That we approve highly of the prompt and decisive measures adopted by the Governor of the territory. We are convinced that the situation in which we stand with the Prophet, and his adherents, rendered them necessary for our safety, and from them we confidently expect such a termination of the presumptuous pretensions of this daring chief, as must be pleasing to every patriot, and honorable to himself.

7. Resolved, That a committee, to consist of the Rev. Samuel T. Scott, Rev. Alexander Devin, Colonel Luke Decker, Colonel Ephraim Jordan, Daniel McClure, and Walter Wilson, Esquires, and Colonel Francis Vigo, or a majority of them, be, and they are hereby, appointed to prepare, and forward to the Executive of the United States, a respectful address on behalf of this meeting, assuring him of our attachment to his person and administration, and requesting him to take such measures as his wisdom may dictate, to free the territories, in this quarter, from future apprehensions from the Prophet and his party; and that he also be requested to insist upon the surrender, by the Indian tribes, of those who have murdered our fellow-citizens, and provide compensation for such as have lost their property.

8. Resolved, That these resolutions be printed in the Western Sun; and, also, that an address may be prepared, and forwarded to the President, in pursuance of them.

E. JORDAN, President.
JAMES SMITH, Secretary.

To James Madison, President of the United States.

SIR:

In obedience to the wishes of a numerous meeting of our fellow-citizens, assembled for the purpose of taking into consideration the state of this country, in relation to Indian affairs, we have the honor to address you. In approaching the Chief Magistrate of our country, who is so deservedly celebrated for the talents which distinguish the statesman, and the virtues which adorn the man, we should not do justice to our own feelings, and the feelings of those whom we represent, if we neglected to express our confidence in his administration, and our sincere respect and esteem for his person.

In fulfilling the duty which has been assigned to us, sir, it is scarcely necessary that we should do more than to refer you to the resolutions which are enclosed; they contain a true statement of facts, and a true picture of the feelings of the citizens of this part of the country. It is impossible to doubt but that the combination which has been formed on the Wabash, is a British scheme; and it is equally certain that this banditti is now prepared to be let loose upon us, and that nothing but vigorous measures will prevent it. In this part of the country we have not, as yet, lost any of our fellow-citizens by the Indians; but depredations upon the property of those who live upon the frontiers, and insults to the families that are left unprotected, almost daily occur.

The impunity with which these savages have been so long suffered to commit crimes, has raised their insolence to a pitch that is no longer supportable.

We are not, sir, advocates for unnecessary rigor towards our Indian neighbors. The character which some of us sustain, as ministers of the Gospel of Christ, will shield us from the suspicion that we wish to plunge our country in an unnecessary war; our object is peace; but we are fully persuaded that blessing can now only be secured to us by the exertion of some vigor.

Let the savages be made sensible, that every aggression from them will meet with prompt punishment, and Indian depredations will seldom be heard of.

Since the adoption of the resolutions under which we act, we have listened to the speech delivered by the brother of the Prophet to Governor Harrison, and if a doubt remained upon our minds as to the designs of the confederacy he has formed, it has been completely removed. Shall we then quietly wait the stroke, when we see the weapon suspended over us? We hope and trust this will not be expected, and that the General Government will take effectual measures to avert the danger. What these measures shall be, we will not presume to dictate; but we beg leave most respectfully to observe, that we conceive that the country will forever be exposed to those alarms, which are at once so injurious to its settlement, and the interests of the United States, so long as the banditti under the Prophet are suffered to remain where they now are. The people have become highly irritated and alarmed; and if the Government will not direct their energies, we fear that the innocent will feel the effects of their resentment, and a general war be the consequence. The Western country, sir, is indebted to your predecessor for an undeviating attention to its prosperity; and the gratitude and attachment which they feel towards that distinguished patriot can never be effaced. With equal confidence they look up to his successor, who, pursuing the same course of politics with regard to European Powers, is to them sufficient proof of coincidence of sentiment in that which relates to the continent.

That you may be the means, under Providence, of establishing the affairs of your country, and settling its interest in every quarter of the globe, upon a secure and lasting foundation, and that you may long live to enjoy the blessing of your countrymen for the happiness procured for them, is the sincere prayer of your fellow-citizens.

SAMUEL T. SCOTT.
ALEXANDER DEVIN.
LUKE DECKER.
EPHRAIM JORDAN.
DANIEL M'CLURE.
WALTER WILSON.
FRANCIS VIGO.

At a large meeting of the inhabitants of the county of St. Clair, Illinois territory, where Colonel William Whiteside was conducted to the chair, and Samuel D. Davidson, Esquire, appointed secretary:

Resolved, unanimously, That the following memorial be presented to Ninian Edwards, Governor of the territory aforesaid, as the joint sense of the meeting, to be signed by the chairman; which humbly sheweth, that we are highly gratified with the prompt, speedy, and prudential manner in which your Excellency has issued your orders for the defence of the exposed frontiers of said country, to oppose the repetition of Indian hostilities; and that we have the utmost and incontrovertible confidence in your abilities and patriotism, for our safety in the present alarming times, as the constitutional channel between the General Government and us: Wherefore, we confidently request of your Excellency to forward the annexed memorial to the President of the United States, with such statements as may appear reasonable and just, to gain the object prayed for, as we are confident your Excellency must feel and see with us, that one or more garrisons, established and defended by the regular veterans of the United States, would be of the utmost safety to the extensive and exposed frontiers of both the Louisiana and Illinois territories, in a more particular manner as the great and numerous tribes of Indians, who had the hardihood and insolence to wage war against the United States, (and, in some instances, with effect) a few years since, that by the treaty of Greenville, and other subsequent treaties, have relinquished their title to their former hunting ground, which is now transformed into substantial plantations, and are changing their habitations fast from the lakes and waters of the Ohio, down the Illinois river to the Mississippi, where, undoubtedly, it would be necessary to establish a fort, in order to set reasonable bounds to their savage fury and unprovoked disturbance; we beg leave to refer your Excellency to a view of the great and manifest benefits lately obtained by the garrisons established far up on the two great rivers, several hundred miles above their junction, when, before the establishing of these strengths, there did not a season pass by but some innocent person fell a victim to savage barbarity, on both sides of the river, and we confidently believe it would have the same salutary effect, in establishing one fort or block house on the first eminence above either the mouths of the Missouri or the Illinois rivers, and another in the seditious village of Peoria, the great nursery of hostile Indians and traitorous British Indian traders; we hope it will not be thought superfluous to mention, that the above request is not to gratify our pride or avarice, in obtaining military pomp to decorate our streets, or the expenditure of public money to buy our produce, but it is to keep the improving citizen in peace, on a remote region from the United States, who is now working to convert the fertile and extensive plains of the Mississippi into the fairest portion of the Union.

From different circumstances, the inhabitants of this country are not in possession of a sufficiency of arms to repel any attack that may be offered; owing to the present alarm, it is not in our power to buy any, and a considerable portion of the militia are not circumstanced to buy. If your Excellency will be pleased to make use of your good office to obtain from the General Government the use of what rifles and muskets may be thought, in your wisdom, needful, it certainly would be of great service to this frontier country.

WM. WHITESIDE,
SAM'L. D. DAVIDSON.

At a numerous meeting of the militia officers, and other inhabitants of St. Clair county, Illinois territory, at the court house, the _____ day of _____, 1811, to take into consideration the alarming situation of the frontiers of this county, from the numerous and horrid depredations lately committed by the Indians; Colonel William Whiteside was conducted to the chair, and Samuel D. Davidson appointed secretary.

Resolved, That there be a memorial immediately signed by the chairman of this meeting, and countersigned by the secretary, stating to the President of the United States the necessity of his ordering what number of regular troops he, in his wisdom, may think requisite, to be stationed for the defence of said county.

Resolved, That the said memorial be sent to the Governor of said territory, requesting him to forward the same to the President of the United States, and make such statement (to accompany said memorial) as the urgency of the subject does require.

To James Madison, President of the United States, greeting:

The memorial of the inhabitants of the aforesaid county humbly sheweth:

That the inhabitants residing on the frontiers aforesaid have sustained frequent and repeated damages from the different and numerous tribes of Indians, on and in the neighborhood of the Illinois river, these five or six years past, by stealing their horses, and other property, as well as the cruel murder of some few of the citizens. In lieu of retaliating, the said citizens curbed their passions, and restrained their resentment, lest they should be so unfortunate as to draw a stigma on the Government, by punishing the innocent for the transgressions of the guilty; and, in one instance, restrained the vindictive spirit, by taking two Indians prisoners, who were in possession of stolen property, after a chase of one hundred miles, and gave them up to the law.

We are become the victims of savage cruelty in a more hasty and general manner, than what has lately been experienced in the United States. Last spring there were numbers of horses stolen. On the second of June, a house of Mr. Cox was robbed of valuable effects, five horses stolen, a young man massacred, and his sister taken prisoner; sad and conclusive presages of war! There was likewise a man severely wounded, when following the aforesaid Indians.

On the 20th of the same month, (June) a man was killed and scalped, and another mortally wounded, which can be more fully stated by the Executive of said territory. Those who have suffered, are not intruders, but are living on their own farms, on the northwestern frontier of said county. From our knowledge of the danger we are in, and our long suffering, we think we ask nothing but what is reasonable, and what will be advantageous to the United States, when we implore you to station what number of soldiers you may think sufficient, to establish a garrison at the village of Peoria, commonly called Opea, on the Illinois river; and one other on the eastern bank of the Mississippi, at or near the place once viewed and adopted by Captains Stoddart and Bissel, six or eight miles below the mouth of said Illinois river, both sites being covered by treaty. We beg leave to refer you to the Governor of said territory concerning the urgency and necessity of the case: not doubting, but that you will grant our request, if you think it will be for the welfare of the Union.

WM. WHITESIDE,
SAM'L D. DAVIDSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 17th, 1812.

SIR:

In addition to the information, heretofore given, in answer to your letter of the 25th of November, I have the honor to enclose extracts from the speeches of the Seneca and Ottawa nations of Indians.

With great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Hon. SAMUEL MCKEE, Chairman.

Extract of a speech of Red Jacket, in behalf of himself and the other deputies of the Six Nations.—Taken from the interpretation of Mr. Jasper Parrish, in presence of Erastus Granger, U. S. Agent to the Six Nations. Washington City, February 13th, 1810.

BROTHER: At the time we were making bright the chain of friendship at Canandaigua, the commissioner on your part told us, that the time might come when your enemies would endeavor to disturb our minds, and do away the friendship we had then formed with you. That time, Brother, has already arrived. Since you have had some disputes with the British Government, their agents in Canada have not only endeavored to make the Indians at the westward your enemies, but they have sent a war belt amongst our warriors, to poison their minds, and make them break their faith with you. This belt we exhibited to your agents in council, and then sent it to the place from whence it came, never more to be seen among us. At the same time, we had information that the British had circulated war belts among the Western Indians, and within your territory. We rested not, but called a general council of the Six Nations, and resolved to let our voice be heard among our Western brethren, and destroy the effects of the poison scattered among them. We have twice sent large deputations to their council fire, for the purpose of making their minds strong in their friendship with your nation; and, in the event of a war between the white people, to sit still on their seats, and take no part on either side: so far as our voice has been heard, they have agreed to hearken to our counsel, and remain at peace with your nation.

BROTHER: If war should take place, we hope you will inform us of it through your agents, and we will continue to raise our influence with all the Indians with whom we are acquainted, that they will sit still upon their seats, and cultivate friendship with our people.

[Signed by all the Chiefs.]

Extract from the speech of the Ottawa nation of Indians, delivered to the Secretary of War, by their delegation, on the 5th of October, 1811.

FATHER: A man of the Pattawatamy nation, who pretends to be a prophet among us, has frequently endeavored to stir up a hostile disposition in our minds towards the American people. He has very lately sent a speech to us and the Chippewa nation, fraught with bad and foolish advice.

FATHER: Our ears are closed to those bad birds which sing around us, and we have returned for answer, that whoever listened to the advice of the Prophet or his followers, would be destroyed by the American People.

[1st SESSION.]

HOSTILE MOVEMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 24, 1812.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, complying with their resolution of the 19th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

June 23d, 1812.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 22d, 1812.

SIR:

I have the honor to lay before you, extracts of letters from the Governors of territories, and other agents, "respecting the hostile and friendly movements and intentions of the Indians towards the United States," in conformity to a resolution of the honorable the Senate, passed June 19th, 1812.

WILLIAM EUSTIS.

The PRESIDENT.

Extract from a letter from Benjamin Howard, dated

ST. LOUIS, January 13, 1812.

I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter from Mr. Johnson, at fort Madison. The information it conveys, proves, clearly, that our difficulties with the Indians are not at an end; and, my own opinion is, that, as soon as the winter is over, we have much danger to apprehend from them. I feel no hesitation in recommending a campaign to be carried on in the spring, against the hostile Indians on the Illinois; for, until some of those tribes are punished, we shall not have a durable peace with them.

Copy of a letter from John Johnson, dated

FORT MADISON, 7th January, 1812.

SIR:

I am sorry to inform you that, on the 1st instant, a party of Puants, about twenty, arrived at Mr. George Hunt's house, lead mines, &c; killed two Americans, and robbed Hunt of all his goods. Mr. Hunt bearing the name of an Englishman, saved his life; at the same time another party went to Nathan Pryer that was, and killed him; after killing all the Americans there, as they thought, the head-man observed, the Americans had killed a great many of their people, and that they intended to kill all they saw.

I expect they went upward, in search of more. Hunt and his interpreter, Vistor Lagotery, arrived here last night. Mr. Hunt, on his way here, was informed by the Foxes, that a large party of Puants had set out for this place. The Foxes shewed every disposition to be friends, and promised to save all his goods they could. On the 3d, your express left here a-foot; poor fellow, I fear he will meet the Puants. Yesterday the express left here, with M. John McRae, for St. Louis, with many letters and public papers. Will you do me the favor to show this letter to General William Clark, and ask to write General Mason, informing him the goods I furnished Hunt, are all lost? Every hour I look for a war party, and God only knows when it will end.

I hope you will cause immediate relief, by increasing our number of men at this post.

In haste, I am your very humble servant,

JOHN JOHNSON.

His Excellency Governor B. HOWARD, St. Louis.

Extract of a letter from Governor Howard, dated

ST. LOUIS, March 19, 1812.

NOTE. In the commencement of the Governor's letter, he gives a detail of depredations and most barbarous murders.

I think nothing can prevent a strong combination among the Indians against us, now, but a succession of quick campaigns against those that are avowedly hostile, or a display of efficient defensive measures. The latter, I think, would have a tendency to deter those that are decidedly inimical to us, from attempting further mischief, and would determine those who are wavering to remain neutral.

In addition to this, I would recommend, that, when a party does mischief, that an authority be given to pursue them quickly, on horse back, to their camp or village, and cut off the band to which they belong. This was what I intended by the expedition recommended in my letter of January.

Extracts from a letter of William Wells, dated Fort Wayne, 10th February, 1812.

At the request of the Little Turtle, I enclose you his speech to Governor Harrison, of the 25th ultimo.

On the 12th ult. two British emissaries passed through this neighborhood, on their way to see the Prophet. On the 21st ultimo, they called at my house, on their return to Malden; they were two Munsey Indians. It appears that their business was to invite all the Indians to meet at Malden very early in the spring. What took place between them and the Prophet, I have not as yet learnt.

The Pattawatamy chief, Marpack, has been in the neighborhood of Malden since August last; he now is near the white settlement, on the river Raisin, in Michigan territory, and visits Malden every eight or ten days. He has about one hundred and twenty of the best warriors in this country with him, stationed in such a manner as to be unobserved by the whites; that is to say, eight or ten in one place, fifteen or twenty in another, and so on; but within such distance of each other, as to enable him to collect them all in twenty-four hours. I know this chief is hostile inclined towards the United States, and have no hesitation in saying, that he is kept at that place by the British agents at Malden; and in case the United States have war with that Power, this chief will attack our settlements immediately. I believe many of the warriors that fought Governor Harrison, have, and are now about to join him.

FORT WAYNE, 25th January, 1812.

GOVERNOR HARRISON:

MY FRIEND: I have been requested by my nation, to speak to you; and I obey their request with pleasure, because I believe their situation requires all the aid I can afford them.

When your speech by Mr. Dubois was received by the Miamies, they answered it, and I made known to you their opinion at that time.

Your letter to William Wells, of the 23d November last, has been explained to the Miami and Eel river tribes of Indians.

MY FRIEND: Although neither of these tribes have had any thing to do with the late unfortunate affair, which happened on the Wabash, still they all rejoice to hear you say, that if those foolish Indians which were engaged in that action, would return to their several homes, and remain quiet, that they would be pardoned, and again received by the President as his children. We believe there is none of them that will be so foolish as not to accept of this friendly offer; while, at the same time, I assure you, that nothing shall be wanting on my part, to prevail on them to accept it.

All the Prophet's followers have left him, with the exception of two camps of his own tribe.

Tecumseh has just joined him with eight men only. No danger can be apprehended from them at present; our eyes will be constantly kept on them, and should they attempt to gather strength again, we will do all in our power to prevent it; and at the same time give you immediate information of their intentions.

We are sorry that that peace and friendship, which has so long existed between the red and the white people, could not be preserved without the loss of so many good men as fell on both sides, in the late action on the Wabash; but we are satisfied that it will be the means of making that peace, which ought to exist between us, more respected both by the red and the white people.

We have been lately told by different Indians from that quarter, that you wished the Indians from this country to visit you; this they will do with pleasure, when you give them information of it in writing.

My FRIEND: The clouds appear to be rising in a different quarter, which threatens to turn our light into darkness. To prevent this, it may require the united efforts of us all.

We hope that none of us will be found to shrink from the storm that threatens to hurt our nations.

Your friend,

MISHECAUSQUAH or LITTLE TURTLE,
For the Miami and Eel river tribes of Indians.

Witness, W. M. TURNER,
Surgeon's mate, United States' Army.

I certify that the above is a true translation.

W. WELLS.

Extract of a letter from Captain Heald, dated Chicago, 7th February, 1812.

An express arrived at this post on the 1st instant, from General Clark. He was sent for the purpose of finding out the disposition of the Indians; he was a Frenchman, and well acquainted with the Indians. He told me, that the Indians on the Illinois, were hostile disposed towards the United States, and that the war between the Indians and white people had just commenced, alluding to the late battle on the Wabash.

Extracts from a letter of William Wells, dated Fort Wayne, 1st March, 1812.

In my letter of the 10th ultimo, I informed you that the Indian chief, Tecumseh, had arrived on the Wabash. I have now to state to you, that it appears that he has determined to raise all the Indians he can, immediately, with an intention, no doubt, to attack our frontiers. He has sent runners to raise the Indians on the Illinois, and the upper Mississippi; and I am told has gone himself, to hurry on the aid he was promised by the Cherokees and Creeks.

The Prophet's orator, who is considered the third man in this hostile band, passed within twelve miles of this place, on the 23d ultimo, with eight Shawanese, eight Winnebagoes, and seven Kickapoos, in all twenty-four, on their way as they say to Sandusky; where they expected to receive a quantity of powder and lead, from their father the British.

Extract of a letter of N. Heald, Captain commanding, dated Chicago, 7th February, 1812.

An express arrived here on the first of the month from St. Louis, sent by General Clark, Indian agent at that place, for the purpose of finding out the disposition of the Indians, between here and there. This express is a Frenchman, who is well acquainted with the Indians; and he is of opinion, that there are many of them determined to continue the war against the whites.

Extract from a letter from N. Heald, Captain, dated Chicago, 11th March, 1812.

I have been informed, and believe it to be true, that the Winnebagoes have lately attacked some traders on the Mississippi, near the lead mines; it is said they killed two Americans, and eat them up, and took all their goods; there was two French traders whom they robbed of all their goods, and suffered them to go off alive. This news came to me from a Frenchman at Millwaikie, who has been to the Winnebago nation. The Winnebagoes who escaped from the Prophet's town are still in this neighborhood.

Extract of a letter from J. Rhea, captain thirteenth regiment of infantry, dated Fort Wayne, March 14, 1812.

You say, if we have a British war we shall have an Indian war. From the best information I can get, I have every reason to believe we shall have an Indian war this spring, whether we have a British war or not. I am told the Indians are making every preparation. There is certainly a very deep plan going on among the Indians.

Extract of a letter from Captain J. Whistler, dated Fort Detroit, April 2, 1812.

Lieutenant Eastman arrived here on the evening of the 29th ultimo, from Cincinnati, and about six miles on this side of the foot of the Miami rapids, he met twenty-four Indians (who were in the action against Governor Harrison.) They were on their return from Malden, and had been there for a length of time this winter, and had, when Mr. Eastman met them, each a new stand of arms; some of them were rifles, others smooth bore; also a quantity of ammunition. One of those Indians has shown in this town several wounds he had received in the action.

Extract of a letter from Captain N. Heald, dated Fort Dearborn, at Chicago, 15th April, 1812.

The Indians have commenced hostilities in this quarter. On the 6th inst. a little before the sun set, a party of eleven Indians, supposed to be Winnebagoes, came to Messrs. Russell and Leigh's cabin, in a field on the Portage branch of the Chicago river, about three miles from the garrison, where they murdered two men; one by the name of Liberty White, an American, and the other a Canadian Frenchman, whose name I do not know. White received two balls through his body; nine stabs with a knife in his breast and one in his hip; his throat was cut from ear to ear—his nose and lips were taken off in one piece, and he's skinned almost as far round as they could find any hair. The Frenchman was only shot through the neck and scalped. Since the murder of these two men, one or two other parties of Indians have been lurking about us, but we have been so much on our guard, that they have not been able to get any scalps.

Extract of a letter from General William Clark, dated St. Louis, January 12, 1812.

I have this moment heard, by an express, from the commanding officer at fort Madison, to Colonel Bissell, that a party of Winnebagoes, (part of the Prophet's party) did, on the 1st instant, rob and kill several American traders, near the Spanish mines, on the Mississippi.

Extract of a letter from General William Clark, dated St. Louis, February 13, 1812.

On the 8th instant, a party of that nation, (Winnebagoes) some of whom were known, fired on my express, about forty miles above the settlements, who was on his return from Prairie du Chien, the mines, and fort Madison. On the 9th, an American family of women and children was killed on the bank of the Mississippi, a few minutes before the express passed the house.

Extract of a letter from General William Clark, dated St. Louis, March 15, 1812.

I this moment received an express from fort Madison, with letters from the agent at that post, which informs me "that, on the 3d instant, a war party of five Winnebagoes killed one of the corporals of that post, a short distance from the fort." By express I received a talk from a band of the Sacs, nearest our settlements, declaring their determination of continuing in friendship with the United States.

Extract of a letter from General William Clark, dated St. Louis, March 22, 1812.

The Winnebago bands, part of the Kickapoos, and some of the Pattawatamies, are yet friendly to the Prophet, and may join him again in the spring. His brother Tecumseh returned from the Southern tribes in December last; he made great exertions to get the Shawanese and Delawares of this territory to join the Prophet's party, but without success. He proceeded to the Sacs and Sioux country, where his councils have been more attended to.

The Prophet's combination is not the only one we have to watch in this quarter. I strongly suspect a coalition of the Pattawatamies will take place, under that vile fellow called the Marpuck, who has been all the winter at fort Madison, and no doubt has received his lesson, as he has sent runners to his nation, informing them, among other excitements, that he will play a new game with the Americans. The point where they are to build their town is at some small lakes, sixty miles northwest of Chicago.

I am informed through the Indians, that some of the Senecas, of Upper Canada, are coming over, either to join the Prophet, or reside with the Sacs, whom they have applied to for lands.

Extracts of a letter from General William Clark, dated St. Louis, April 12, 1812.

Some of the chiefs, considerate men, warriors, women and children, from the bands on the Illinois river, in all sixty, are now here. They came down by the invitation of Governor Edwards, to council on the differences existing between those bands and our citizens, &c. Near the mouth of the Missouri, on their way to see the Governor, they were fired on by a party of the inhabitants of the Illinois territory, fortunately no one killed. They are now under my protection, and I believe so much alarmed that they will not visit the Governor at Kaskaskia.

Those chiefs have informed me that a large party of Winnebagoes are out on a war party, intending to attack the frontiers of this territory. Governor Howard has placed the northern frontiers in a state of defence, and they will most probably meet with a warm reception.

P. S. Since writing the within letter, Mr. Payne arrived from fort Madison, by whom I received letters, mentioning that, on the night of the 29th of March, the Puants or Winnebagoes shot a sentinel at that place; on the 3d instant, one of the sentinels at that post shot and killed a Puant at the gate. During the night, several shots were fired at the fort, by the Winnebagoes. Small parties are continually about the fort.

From Erastus Granger, Agent to the Six Nations.

BUFFALO, April 18, 1812.

SIR:

I have held a council with the Six Nations of Indians, since my return; they are well satisfied with what you have done for them, and are determined to hold the United States fast by the hand.

BUFFALO, May 6, 1812.

SIR:

I had the honor of receiving your letter of the 7th ultimo, relating to a report that one hundred and fifty, or more, of the Indians under my agency, are expected to join the hostile Indians this spring.

From my own observations, and the assurances made me by the chiefs, I am confident that not a single warrior of the Six Nations, living within the United States, has expressed a wish to join the unfriendly Indians, to the westward.

BUFFALO, May 30, 1812.

SIR:

On the 29th instant I closed a council with the Six Nations of Indians; we had been four days in council.

The Senecas received their money from the United States. The Cayugas and Onondagoes, were paid their annuities from the State of New York.

They returned to their villages well satisfied, and with a determination to remain friendly to the United States.

A deputation of thirty-one started yesterday, for Grand river, to strengthen the minds of the Indians in Upper Canada to remain neutral in case of war.

From General William Hull.

STAUNTON, June 3, 1812.

SIR:

I am happy to inform you, that I have received reports already, from five or six Indian villages, since my speech was communicated, more favorable than I had reason to expect. The chiefs are now on their way to visit me, and the frontiers have already become tranquil.

From John Johnston.

PIQUA TOWN, OHIO, May 1, 1812.

SIR:

The Indians have recently murdered two men at fort Dearborn, and report says, three more at Defiance, on the Miami of the lake.

Since writing the enclosed, (above) I received two letters, which confirm the information of the murder at Defiance, and convey the first intelligence of the killing of two Americans at Sandusky.

May 5th, 1812.

The Indians have killed, within three days, a man at Greenville. The chiefs of the Wabash will not visit the President this summer.

May 21st, 1812.

As far as I am informed, the disaffection among the Indians is increasing. Some families have been killed within a few miles of Vincennes. Yesterday the Shawanese chiefs sent me notice, that hostile parties would shortly visit the country, and promised their assistance in repelling their attacks.

From Mr. Irwin.

CHICAGO, March 10th, 1812.

SIR:

The Chippewa and Ottawa nations, hearing that the Winnebagoes and Pattawatamies, were hostilely inclined towards the whites, sent speeches among them, desiring them to change their sentiments, and live in peace with the whites.

April 16th, 1812.

On the 6th instant, a party of ten or eleven Indians surrounded a small farm house on Chicago river, and killed two men. The Indians are represented to be of the Winnebago tribe, which has been since ascertained to be the fact.

From Governor W. H. Harrison.

VINCENNES, 6th May, 1812.

SIR:

On Sunday evening last, a party of Indians attacked a house on White river, about thirty five-miles from this place; killed the owner (Mr. John McGowan,) but were driven off without doing further injury. Most of the citizens in this country have abandoned their farms, and taken refuge in such temporary forts as they have been able to construct.

Nothing can exhibit more distress than those wretched people, crowded together in places almost destitute of every necessary accommodation. Unless something can be done soon to enable the people to return to their farms, I fear that there will be little or no corn planted this season.

On the second instant, I received a letter from Mr. Stickney, containing the result of the council lately held at fort Wayne, which has, no doubt, been communicated to you. This letter was brought to fort Harrison by an Indian, who was employed by Mr. Stickney for the purpose. On his way he was joined by the chief, Winnemac, with nine other Pattawatamies. They were very desirous of coming here, but were, very properly, detained by Captain Snelling. I have refused to suffer them to come further, because I am convinced they would be killed in despite of any endeavors of mine to prevent it. I also suspect that there are spies amongst them, sent by the Prophet. These people were at fort Harrison when the murder was committed on McGowan, and, very probably, by a part of the same tribe. It is thus that we are served by these scoundrels; whilst some of them are making warm professions of friendship and enjoying our hospitality, others are murdering our citizens.

VINCENNES, May 13, 1812.

The information given by the party of Pattawatamies, mentioned in my last, to Captain Taylor, at fort Harrison, was, that the Prophet was in the neighborhood of his former residence, with about three hundred Winnebagoes, and about two hundred of other tribes, and that he was daily gaining strength.

May 27, 1812.

No further mischief has been done by the Indians, that has come to my knowledge.

VINCENNES, 3d June, 1812.

The information received, within a few days, from Governor Edwards, (and he has better means of acquiring it than I have, from the intercourse that is kept up between the Tippecanoe and Illinois river) confirms that which I had previously received from a principal Pattawatamy chief, viz: that the major part of the Winnebago tribe are at Tippecanoe, with the Prophet and Tecumseh; small bands from the Illinois river and the east of Lake Michigan, making a force at least equal to that which they commanded last summer, and that their intentions were entirely hostile. The Governor also says, there are, at this time, nearly eight hundred warriors embodied at Peoria; that the British agents were endeavoring to effect a peace between the Sioux and Chippewas, for the purpose of uniting both those tribes in the war against us, and they were making large deposits of Indian goods at their establishments on Lake Michigan, and on the communication between that and Lake Superior.

Extract of a letter from Governor Edwards to Lieut. Colonel D. Bissell, dated Elveraide, Randolph county, Illinois territory, July 14, 1812.

Such is the unfavorable aspect of our Indian relations, that I feel myself constrained to ask you to cause the block house, on the Mississippi, in this territory, to be re-occupied by such a portion of the troops, under your command, as you think you can, with propriety, spare for that service.

From R. J. Meigs, Cherokee Agent.

HIWASEE, 8th May, 1812.

Three Cherokee chiefs, men of property and considerable information, came into the council and observed, that there would be war between the United States and the English, and that they thought it would be for the advantage of their nation to offer their aid to our government; and that they wished each to raise a number of young warriors, and offer their services.

From Captain H. Starke.

From Governor W. Blount.

KNOXVILLE, June 8th, 1812.

The enclosed letters from Majors Coffee and Coleman, inform that a party of Indians had, a few days ago, killed and scalped Charles Hays. That the same party killed several of the children of Crawley and Manley, in Hickman county; shot and scalped Mrs. Manley, and took Mrs. Crawley prisoner.

From Colonel Benjamin Hawkins.

CREEK AGENCY, February 3d, 1812.

Our Indians are, many of them, occupied in spinning, weaving, making new settlements, or improving those heretofore made. I believe nine-tenths of the Lower Creeks have left their old towns, and formed, or are forming settlements, on the creeks and rivers where the lands are good, and the range for stock good.

CREEK AGENCY, April 6th, 1812.

On the 26th ult. Thomas Meredith, Sen. a respectable old man, travelling with his family to the Mississippi territory, was murdered on the post road, at Kittome, a creek 150 miles from this. Sam Macnac, a half breed of large property, who keeps entertainment on the road, at whose house Meredith is buried, calls it an accident. Thomas Meredith, son of the deceased, was an eye witness, says, "there was murder committed on the body of Thomas Meredith, Sen. at Kittome creek, by Maumouth and others, who appeared to be in liquor; that is, Maumouth himself, but none of the others. The company were all on the other side of the creek, except my father and an old man. They fell on him without interruption, and killed him dead as he was trying to make his escape in a canoe, and sorely wounded the other, with knives and sticks, so much so, that I fear we shall have to bury him on the way." The Speaker of the nation and some of his Executive council were with me, returning home, at the time I received the communication, which I read to them, and directed, on their return, to convene their chiefs, and cause justice to be done without delay. Maumouth is an old chief, known to all of us. Several travellers have passed and repassed since, and I hear of no further interruption.

CREEK AGENCY, May 11th, 1812.

I have just returned from the council of the Lower Creeks, and have time only, by this mail, to write you a short letter. Charles Hicks, late interpreter of the United States, for the Cherokees, addressed, by order of his chiefs, a friendly letter to the Creeks; he said "the rumors of war which surrounded us would soon be verified, and if the Indians joined Great Britain against the United States, they would lose every foot of land; and if they joined the United States against Great Britain, they would get no land, but would secure the friendship of the United States forever." The reply was, they were determined not to interfere in the wars of white people, and should prepare the minds of their young people to be neighborly and friendly.

The council complained to me of intrusions on their rights, by building fish traps, driving stock to range on their lands, hunting with dogs, cutting cedar and other timber, and cultivating fields on the Indian side of the Oakmulgee, below fort Hawkins. They said, this unwarrantable conduct rendered their young men ungovernable, and was the real cause of all the depredations committed by them. I exhibited claims for damages done by the Indians, on the frontiers of Georgia; and impositions on traders, by taking exorbitant ferriage, to the amount, in all, of somewhat more than one thousand dollars, which I told them I should stop out of their stipend. I allowed claims of theirs for damages done them by white people, for somewhat less than one hundred dollars.

CHEROKEE AGENCY, May 25th, 1812.

Amidst the most solemn assurances to me, on the part of the chiefs of this nation, that they were friendly to the citizens of the United States, and would exert themselves to keep their young people from doing acts of violence to their persons or property, as well as to the persons and property of the Floridians, (during the unhinged state of Spanish affairs I felt it my duty to watch over the safety of my neighbors in that quarter) I was this day informed by Mr. Cornell, our interpreter for the Upper Creeks, that, on the 23d inst. a white man, William Lott, was murdered eight miles this way from his house, by four Indians, without the least provocation. The post rider gave him the information; he went immediately, met the travellers with the dead man; one of them accompanied him to the place where the Indians fired, from whence he tracked them up, until he found one he knew, and three strangers, and ascertained the town and family of the murderers. The chiefs will meet in one week, and we shall see what can be done. We have a report, also, that two families have been killed in Tennessee. To aid the chiefs to bring the murderers to justice, it is likely a show of force will be necessary within the agency.

CREEK AGENCY, June 9th, 1812.

Our chiefs have not yet returned from Tuckaubatchee, where they were convened on the demand of satisfaction for the murder of Mr. Lott, on the 23d ult. I have sent the assistant agent, accompanied by Ensign Turner, of the army of the United States, with a reiterated demand; the result of which shall be communicated as soon as received. The Indians seem much alarmed; those of the Lower Creeks, particularly, have expressed their fears, as well as determination, to aid the Upper Creeks in bringing the offenders to justice. The former have recently, on my demand, cropped and whipped two Indians, for breaking open and plundering the factory of the United States of furs, to the value of two hundred and sixteen dollars, and request me to replace the amount out of their stipend for this year.

We experience some inconvenience from loose, worthless characters travelling through this agency, and some pretending to be scientific, misrepresenting every thing they see, either from design, or from associating with persons who have fled from the restraints of civil society. You have a specimen of one of these travellers in the Georgia Journal, of 13th May, who signs himself Francis McHenry; answered in that of the 27th, by Timothy Barnard, public interpreter. This man passes himself sometimes as an Englishman, then a Virginian, and again a Scotchman. I have never seen him; I have a short letter requesting me to aid in correcting some parts of his work, relative to the Indians, which he will send me, and which I would certainly do for any man in pursuit of truth.

I have lately, on complaint being made to me by the chiefs, given orders to the marshal of the agency to apprehend all such characters found in the agency, off the post road, and deliver them to the civil authority, or to whip them out of the agency. When I had Bowles arrested, and sent to answer for his crimes, I was vested unanimously, by the four nations, with absolute authority over all white and black people, within the agency. Until Congress legislate completely within this agency, I shall execute the authority vested in me by the chiefs. As the rumor of war approaches, and probably will be realized in a month, unless something should arrive from Europe, upon which the Government can count as leading with certainty to peace, I shall soon issue a proclamation against all offenders in the premises, and suited to the approaching crisis.

Extract of a letter from B. F. Stickney, dated Fort Wayne, May 25, 1812.

My last was on the 15th instant. I told you then of the measures I had taken to make peace with the relations of the two Indians who were killed at Greenville. Before receiving this, you will undoubtedly have received more correct information of the circumstances than I could give you. The women and child who were taken prisoners, were sent to me by Mr. Johnson, with three or four horses, and as much of the other property that was taken, as he could obtain, under the care and protection of two Shawanee chiefs and ten warriors. They arrived four days ago, when there was a general collection of Indians forming, to inform me what had been doing at a grand council they had been holding on the Wabash, where twelve tribes were represented, consisting of the Wyandots, Chippewas, Ottawas, Pattawatamies, Delawares, Miamies, Eel River Miamies, Weas, Piankeshaws, Shawanese, Kickapoos, and Winnebagoes. The council here continued two days, and amounted to but very little more than that they had united to secure and maintain peace. I cannot explain the whole better than by enclosing you a copy of my letter to Governor Hull.

Copy of a letter from B. F. Stickney, Indian agent, to Governor Hull, dated

FORT WAYNE, May 25, 1812.

SIR:

The time appears to have arrived, when it is necessary, if possible, to cut off the communication between the Indians within the territory of the United States and Canada. But I do not know how far it would meet the views of the Government, at the present moment. Many circumstances having come to my knowledge upon this subject, I will give you an outline of them now, and more particular when I have more time: considering you the most proper person to give the immediate information to.

It has for some time been well understood, that the British Government has agents among the Indians within the United States; but has been almost impossible to distinguish them.

There is a man here now, who is called Shetoon, who represents himself to be a Wyandot chief from Brownstown. His mother is said to have been a Wyandot squaw, and his father a Frenchman. He appears to be more of a Frenchman than an Indian. He came here last February, and brought a letter of introduction from Mr. Atwater (your secretary) to this agency. He remained near here (with the Little Turtle) till April. The first of my seeing him was at a conference I held with the Indians, soon after I came here, about the 16th or 17th of April. His conduct appeared to me rather suspicious then: and I mentioned my suspicion, in writing to Governor Harrison. Since then he has called a general council of Indians on the Wabash, at Massasinaway, where twelve tribes were represented. They broke up their council at Massasinaway about twelve days ago, to meet here to inform me what they had been doing. When they met here, he took the lead; and it is said he took the lead at Massasinaway; when he returned here, with full evidence, having the confidence of the Miamies and Delawares, my suspicions were much abated. But at length, by the observations of interpreters in my absence, of friendly Indians, and my own observation, the matter is put beyond all doubt with me, that he is an emissary employed by Elliot, although the evidence is not of that kind that would convict him in a court of law.

Whether this business is fully known to his nation or not, does not appear. But it appears from the collected mass of circumstances, that he has been sent by his nation to preach peace to the rest, and that he has been employed by Elliot to preach peace in general, and tell the real views of the British Government to a few. He carries many speeches of war, as well as peace. Black wampum and white wampum. He told to one Indian, where he thought he was safe, that he was employed by the British Indian agent to go and advise all the Indians of this western country to be at peace with the United States: and to form a system, by which they may all be united as one nation. And the agent told him that he was going away off, where a greater agent (or chief) lived, where he should hear from the King, and receive his directions. By the time the agent should return, Shetoon said he was to have all the tribes ready to send each of them one chief, and one war chief, to the agent in Canada, where they would receive instructions what to do. This was told by Shetoon between here and Detroit, on his way coming here. His conduct has corresponded with this: but I believe he has been cunning enough to conceal his views from nearly all the Indians who are sincere friends to the United States: nor do the white people here suspect him of any improper views. Since he has returned from Massasinaway, he has told in his public speeches, and in public generally, that Tecumseh, the Kickapoos, and Winnebagoes, all acknowledge the peace with Governor Harrison, and were really disposed for peace. But at length he let it out to a Shawanee chief, with whom he was not so well acquainted as he supposed himself to be, that Tecumseh was going home to plant corn himself, and should send his young men again to Canada, to get more powder and lead. (There were twenty four of Tecumseh's men passed here on their way from Canada, the 1st of April, loaded with ammunition.) Shetoon asked the Shawanee if he thought it was likely Tecumseh's men would be permitted to pass unmolested. Shetoon, in all his communications to me, or the Indians, appeared to be anxious to have every thing left loose and uncertain. I had at length to fetch the matter to this point: that as they had told me many fine things, that 'hey meant to try to do, I would give them one moon to give up their murderers, and make the other necessary restitutions. I pledged myself to them, that the army would not strike upon them, to destroy them, in less than a moon; if the restitution was not made within that time, I would not hold myself accountable any longer for what the warriors might do to them. The army was ready and at hand to strike when our Great Father should give the word.

They have dispersed, with the appearance of a full determination to apprehend the murderers, and fetch them to justice.

I have the honor to be, your humble servant,

B. F. STICKNEY, Indian Agent.

His Excellency WILLIAM HULL.

P. S. I shall keep Shetoon amused here as long as I can, hoping to obtain more from him.

DEPREDATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 11, 1813.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a Report of the Secretary of War, complying with their resolution of the 24th December last.

January 11, 1813.

JAMES MADISON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 8, 1813.

SIR:

I have the honor to lay before you copies of the several letters which have passed between the Secretary of War and his Excellency the Governor of Tennessee and Colonel Benjamin Hawkins, agent near the Creek nation, relative to murders committed by the Indians in the State of Tennessee and its vicinity.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAS. MONROE.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

Extract of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins, Esq. Creek agent, to the Secretary of War, dated

CREEK AGENCY, 6th April, 1812.

On the 26th ultimo, Thomas Meredith, senior, a respectable old man, travelling, with his family, to the Mississippi territory, was murdered on the post road at Kittome, a creek 150 miles west of this. Sam Macnac, a half-breed, of large property, who keeps entertainment on the road, at whose house Meredith is buried, calls it an 'accident.' Thomas Meredith, son of the deceased, who was an eye witness, says there was murder committed on the body of Thomas Meredith, senior, at Kittome creek, by Maumouth and others, who appeared to be in liquor; that is, Maumouth himself, but none of the others. The company were all on the other side of the creek, except my father and another old man. They fell on him without interruption, and killed him dead, as he was trying to make his escape in a canoe, and sorely wounded the other with knives and sticks, so much that I fear we shall have to bury him on the way. The Speaker of the nation and some of his Executive Council were with me, returning home, at the time I received the communication; which I read to them, and directed, on their return, to convene their chiefs, and cause justice to be done without delay. Maumouth is an old chief, known to all of us. Several travellers have passed and repassed since, and I hear of no further interruption.

CREEK AGENCY, 25th May, 1812.

Amidst the most solemn assurances to me on the part of the chiefs of this nation, that they were friendly to the citizens of the United States, and would exert themselves to keep their young people from doing acts of violence to their persons or property, as well as to the persons or property of the Floridians, (during the unhinged state of Spanish affairs I felt it my duty to watch over the safety of my neighbors in that quarter) I am this day informed by Mr. Cowles, our interpreter for the Upper Creeks, that, on the 23d instant, a white man, William Lott, was murdered, eight miles this way from his house, by four Indians, without the least provocation. The post rider gave him the information; he went immediately, met the travellers with the dead man; one of them accompanied him to the place where the Indians fired; from whence, he tracked them up, until he found one he knew, and three strangers, and ascertained the town and family of the murderers. The chiefs will meet in one week, and we shall see what can be done. We have report also that two families have been killed on the Tennessee. To aid the chiefs to bring the murderers to justice, it is likely a show of force will be necessary within the agency. If it should, I shall apply to the General in this quarter.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Hon. WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 9th June, 1812.

Our chiefs have not yet returned from Tuckaubatchee, where they were convened on the demand of satisfaction for the murder of Mr. Lott, on the 23d ultimo. I have sent the assistant agent, accompanied by Ensign Turner, of the army of the United States, with a reiterated demand; the result of which shall be communicated as soon as received. The Indians seem much alarmed; those of the Lower Creeks, particularly, have expressed their fears, as well as determinations, to aid the Upper Creeks in bringing the offenders to justice. The former have recently, on my demand, cropped and whipped two Indians for breaking open and plundering the factory of the United States of furs, to the value of two hundred and sixteen dollars, and requested me to replace the amount out of their stipend for this year.

We experience some inconvenience from loose worthless characters travelling through this agency, and some, pretending to be scientific, misrepresenting every thing they see, either from design, or from associating with persons who have fled from the restraints of civil society. You have a specimen of one of these travellers in the Georgia Journal of the 13th May, who signs himself Francis McHenry, answered in that of the 27th, by Timothy Barnard, public interpreter. This man passes himself sometimes as an Englishman, then a Virginian, and again a Scotchman. I have never seen him; I have a short letter, requesting me to aid in correcting some part of his work, relative to the Indians, which he will send me, and which I would certainly do for any man, in pursuit of truth. I have lately, on complaint being made to me by the chiefs, given orders to the marshal of the agency to apprehend all such characters found in the agency, off the post road, and deliver them to the civil authority, or to whip them out of the agency. When I had Bowles arrested, and sent to answer for his crimes, I was vested, unanimously, by the four nations, with absolute authority over all the white and black people within the agency. Until Congress legislate completely within this agency, I shall execute the authority vested in me by the chiefs. As the rumor of war approaches, and probably will be realized in a month, unless something should arrive from Europe, upon which the Government can count as leading with certainty to peace, I shall soon issue a proclamation against all offenders in the premises, and suited to the approaching crisis.

I am, very respectfully, &amp;c.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

WM. EUSTIS, Esq. Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 22d June, 1812.

SIR:

Enclosed you will receive a letter from Governor Blount, with the papers which he transmitted to this Department, relative to certain outrages committed by a party of Creek Indians, upon the inhabitants of Tennessee. You will take the necessary measures to have the prisoner, Mrs. Crawley, restored to her friends, and the murderers given up to the laws of the United States.

Very respectfully, &amp;c.

WM. EUSTIS.

BEN. HAWKINS, Esq. Creek Agency.Extract of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins, Esq. to the Secretary of War, dated Creek Agency, 13th July, 1812.

A distinguished chief was sent yesterday to inform me that they had put to death the leader of the banditti who murdered Lott. He fled to the white town of Aobohealth Le Mico, Great Medal chief; sat down on his seat as a sanctuary; the leader of the armed party pursued and shot him on the seat, through the head and body. To-day I have two letters from Tuckaubatchee, of the 11th, from people in public service; they inform me three more are put to death. I have heard also from fort St. Stephen's, that Mrs. Crawley, the prisoner, from Tennessee, is safe there.

Extract of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins, Esquire, to the Secretary of War, dated

CREEK AGENCY, 20th July, 1812.

They continue unanimous, in all the old towns, to give satisfaction, in all cases required of them. They request me to inform the Government, they mean to punish the guilty, and look for nothing but friendship. The murderers have been eight, and ten, and some twenty years absent, and are not yet returned.

CREEK AGENCY, 28th July, 1812.

Being on the road, I have just time to inform you, that the Indian who murdered Meredith, at Kittome, was put to death on the 19th; making, in all, five executed on the demand for satisfaction. The runner says, the disposition among the chiefs to give satisfaction, in all cases, is general.

I am, respectfully, &amp;c.

BEN. HAWKINS.

WILLIAM EUSTIS, Esq. Secretary of War.Extract of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins, Esquire, to the Secretary of War, dated

CREEK AGENCY, 24th August, 1812.

The chiefs have had six murderers put to death, for their crimes on the post road, and to the northwest, and seven cropped and whipped, for thefts. Those charged with the murder on Duck river, are not yet come at. The party after them returned on the twentieth, having heard of them. Five-and-twenty men were immediately started after them. We have not had any complaints recently from the travellers, or post-riders, and the Indians appear very friendly.

Extract of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins, Esquire, to the Secretary of War, dated

CREEK AGENCY, 3d August, 1812.

By reports, up to this day, the chiefs have executed six of the murderers, and cropped and whipped five for theft.

Extracts of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins, Esquire, to the Secretary of War, dated

CREEK AGENCY, 7th September, 1812.

I have received a third report from the Executive Council of the Creeks, of the 29th ultimo. They have executed eight for murder, and seven are cropped and whipped for theft. One of those, Hillaubee Haujo, who was the leader of the banditti who committed the murders on Duck river, was, after long search after him, decoyed to the old council house, at the Hickory ground, put to death on the 21st ultimo, and thrown into Coosa river. There has been a murder committed, and a boy wounded by Indians on St. Mary's, four miles above Trader's hill, on the 11th ultimo. The Governor of Georgia has demanded the perpetrators to be delivered up for trial where the offence was committed. Our chiefs have not returned from the meeting among the Seminoles; as soon as they do, and I can convene them, I shall take measures to find out and punish the guilty.

Extracts of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins, Esquire, to the Secretary of War, dated

CREEK AGENCY, 12th October, 1812.

The chiefs of some of our largest towns of the Lower Creeks have been recently with me, on affairs of their own.—They say they are unanimously determined to preserve the friendship of the United States, and that travelling appears to be quite safe. We have had no complaints on the road, of improper conduct from Indians, since the execution of the murderers.

CREEK AGENCY, 2d November, 1812.

I am so reduced by fevers I can with difficulty sit up to write you a small note. On the 30th ultimo, the Creek chiefs in the National Council unanimously declared to remain in peace with the United States, and that they would not join, or give countenance to, the Aulochawan Indians, (Seminoles, at war in East Florida.) They are very friendly, and have no disputing among themselves.

BEN. HAWKINS.

Secretary of War.

Extract of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins to the Secretary of War, dated

CREEK AGENCY, 9th November, 1812.

General Hampton passed through here last month, and I requested the favor of him to examine into the conduct of the Creeks, as well as their fulfilment of their promises, in relation to their murderers. He promised to do so. I send a copy of his letter on the subject.

Extract of a letter from General Hampton to Benjamin Hawkins, Esquire, Creek Agent, dated

FORT STODDART, 15th October, 1812.

I got through safely and comfortably, and witnessed on my way the most friendly dispositions on the part of the Indians, as well as the most satisfactory convictions of the faithfulness with which their late executions were inflicted on their murderers, which I can regard as the best proof of their future intentions.

MILLEDGEVILLE, 24th November, 1812.

I have this day received reiterated assurances from the Creeks and Cherokees, of their unanimous determination to be in peace and friendship with the United States, and of their unbounded confidence in the justice of their President. Travelling through the Creek Agency is perfectly safe, and the Creeks more friendly than they have been to travellers.

Very respectfully, &c.

BEN. HAWKINS.

The Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 22d, 1812.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter, of the 8th instant, has been received, and transmitted to Benjamin Hawkins, Esq. Creek agent, with directions to procure the release of Mrs. Crawley, and to demand the surrender, to the authority of the United States, of the Indians who may have committed the murders.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

KNOXVILLE, June 25, 1812.

SIR: I feel it to be my duty to say, that I believe that the spirit of the people in this State is so roused, by the conduct of those Creek Indians who recently massacred some of our citizens, near the mouth of Duck river, and who took Mrs. Crawley prisoner, whom I have, in a former letter, requested that the President would, without delay, demand to be given up, that they, probably, cannot be restrained if satisfaction is not given in reasonable time, from taking it. It is said that those Creeks take that poor woman from town to town, in their nation, naked, and exulting dance around her as their captive. I have said, in a former letter to you, that if Government would order a campaign to be carried into the Creek nation, there to punish them for their crimes, that quiet would follow; I now repeat it, and recommend it as the best way of keeping peace, already violated; I repeat it, under the fullest conviction that it would be the most effectual way, permanently, to preserve peace with them, and I believe that nothing short of it will.

Your obedient servant,

WILLIE BLOUNT.

Hon. W. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

Extracts of a letter from his Excellency the Governor of Tennessee to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, July 26, 1812.

I have the honor to forward an extract of a letter from Mr. Henry to his friend, informing of the escape of Mrs. Crawley from the Creek Indians. She certainly is under no obligation to the Creeks for her liberty, but the reverse is the fact. Since the receipt of yours, of the 22d of June, respecting the demand, made of the Creek nation, for a surrender of the party of Creeks who committed the massacre at the mouth of Duck river, I have not heard from Colonel Hawkins; neither has he acknowledged the receipt of mine, of the 8th of June, on the same subject. His delay creates much surprise, and, indeed, it savors strongly of neglect. If the murderers are not given up shortly, (and, indeed, they ought to have been surrendered before this) it will be fair to presume that that nation does not intend to comply with the demand made by Government; in which case, I do not permit myself to doubt, but that Government will enforce the demand with a strong hand.

Extract of a letter from Mr. William Henry to John J. Henry, Esq. of William county, Tennessee, dated

ST. STEPHEN'S, MOBILE, 26th June, 1812.

I have this day seen Mrs. Crawley, who was carried off by the Creeks from the mouth of Duck river, Tennessee; she is at Mr. Gainiss's of this place. It would chill the blood of any human being to hear her tell her lamentable story. She says she was in her own house, and her husband absent, when eleven of those monsters attacked her early in the morning; she saw them coming, heard their hellish screams, and immediately shut the door, and placed herself against it, and resisted their attempts to force it open as long as she was able. Another woman, Mrs. Manley, who had come to her house, Mrs. Crawley's, to lie in, and whose babe was only seven days old, told her it was useless to hold the door, for they would get in at last; at length, quite overcome, the door was burst open upon her, and flung round so as to hide her behind it. The Indians immediately rushed in, and the poor woman and her babe were the first victims. Still standing behind the door, Mrs. Crawley saw them kill one of her own children in the house, shoot another in the yard, and two others of Mrs. Manley's. A young man, of the name of Hays, she also saw killed. Another little child, her own, she saw hide itself in the cellar. When she was discovered, she sprang forward and caught hold of one of the Indians, and begged her life of him; they then plundered the house and brought her off to a village on the Black Warrior river, where they prepared to kill her, and dug a grave for her; but the squaw, who had charge of her, gave her information, and she made her escape the night before she was to be put to death. The chief man of the village was disposed to be peaceable, and bought her, after her escape, and sent out several of his young men to hunt for me, by whom she was found, after two or three days, half starved and half naked, and brought by them to this place. The citizens are vying with each other to make her situation comfortable, and to have her conveyed to her friends. She seems to be a modest well disposed woman.

The foregoing is copied from a Nashville paper, and transmitted for your information.

WILLIE BLOUNT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 7, 1812.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter, of the 26th of July, is received, in answer to which, I take the liberty of enclosing a copy of a letter from Colonel Hawkins.

It is hoped the prompt manner in which the Indians have administered justice on the offenders, will supersede the necessity of making a campaign against them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Excellency WILLIE BLOUNT, Governor of Tennessee.

NASHVILLE, October 14, 1812.

SIR:

I have received your several letters, covering copies and extracts of letters from Colonel Hawkins, informing you that the Creek council had informed him that the Creeks would kill all murderers and thieves in their land, meaning to include those who had killed a number of our citizens, near the mouth of Duck river; and one, expressive of your opinion, that that round about way of giving satisfaction, or reporting about its being done, and about to be done, in that way, would be considered such a prompt execution of justice, on the part of the Creeks, in compliance with the demand made by the Government, that the Creek nation should give those offenders up to the laws of the United States, that the necessity of a campaign, to be carried against them, would be, or was thereby, superseded. I beg leave, respectfully, to remark, that our opinions, as to what amounts to a ready compliance with the demand made in that case, widely differ, and have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIE BLOUNT.

The Honorable WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

No. 139.

[3d SESSION.]

THE CREEKS, WYANDOTS, AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 18, 1814.

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration whether they will advise and consent to the ratification thereof, a treaty concluded on the twenty-second day of July last, with the tribes of Indians called the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Senecas, and Miamies.

I lay before the Senate, also, for the like purpose, an instrument, entitled articles of agreement and capitulation, made and concluded on the ninth day of August last, between Major General Jackson and the chiefs, deputies, and warriors, of the Creek nation of Indians.

These communications are accompanied by documents having relation to them.

JAMES MADISON.

November 18th, 1814.

A Treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America and the tribes of Indians called the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Senecas, and Miamies.

The said United States of America, by William Henry Harrison, late a Major General in the army of the United States, and Lewis Cass, Governor of the Michigan territory, duly authorized and appointed commissioners for the purpose, and the said tribes, by their head-men, chiefs, and warriors, assembled at Greenville, in the State of Ohio, have agreed to the following articles; which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, shall be binding upon them and the said tribes:

ARTICLE 1. The United States and the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, and Senecas, give peace to the Miami nation of Indians, formerly designated as the Miami, Eel river, and Wea tribes; they extend this indulgence, also, to the bands of the Pattawatamies, which adhere to the grand sachem Tobinpee, and to the chief Onoxa; to the Ottawas, of Blanchard's creek, who have attached themselves to the Shawanese tribe, and to such of the said tribe as adhere to the chief called the Wing, in the neighborhood of Detroit, and to the Kickapoos under the direction of the chiefs who sign this treaty.

ARTICLE 2. The tribes and bands abovementioned, engage to give their aid to the United States, in prosecuting the war against Great Britain, and such of the Indian tribes as still continue hostile, and to make no peace with either, without the consent of the United States.

The assistance herein stipulated for, is to consist of such a number of their warriors, from each tribe, as the President of the United States, or any officer having his authority therefor, may require.

ARTICLE 3. The Wyandot tribe, and the Senecas of Sandusky and Stony creek, the Delaware and Shawanese tribes, who have preserved their fidelity to the United States, throughout the war, again acknowledge themselves under the protection of the said States, and of no other Power whatever, and agree to aid the United States in the manner stipulated for in the former article, and to make no peace but with the consent of the said States.

ARTICLE 4. In the event of a faithful performance of the conditions of this treaty, the United States will confirm and establish all the boundaries between their lands, and those of the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, and Miamies, as they existed previously to the commencement of the war.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, and the said head-men, chiefs, and warriors, of the before-mentioned tribes of Indians, have herunto set their hands, and affixed their seals.

Done at Greenville, in the State of Ohio, this twenty-second day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-ninth.

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON,
LEWIS CASS.

[Signed, also, by a number of chiefs and warriors of the tribes enumerated in the title.]

Articles of agreement and capitulation, made and concluded this ninth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, between Major General Andrew Jackson, on behalf of the President of the United States of America, and the chiefs, deputies, and warriors, of the Creek nation.

Whereas an unprovoked, inhuman, and sanguinary war, waged by the hostile Creeks against the United States, hath been repelled, prosecuted, and determined, successfully on the part of the said States, in conformity with principles of national justice and honorable warfare: And whereas consideration is due to the rectitude of proceeding, dictated by instructions relating to the re-establishment of peace: Be it remembered, that, prior to the conquest of that part of the Creek nation, hostile to the United States, numberless aggressions had been committed against the peace, the property, and the lives, of citizens of the United States, and those of the Creek nation in amity with her, at the mouth of Duck river, fort Mimms, and elsewhere, contrary to the national faith, and the regard due to an article of the treaty concluded at New York, in the year 1790, between the two nations; that the United States, previous to the perpetration of such outrages, did, in order to ensure future amity and concord between the Creek nation and the said States, in conformity with the stipulations of former treaties, fulfil, with punctuality and good faith, her engagements to the said nation; that more than two thirds of the whole number of chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation, disregarding the genuine spirit of existing treaties, suffered themselves to be instigated to violations of their national honor, and the respect due to a part of their own nation, faithful to the United States and the principles of humanity, by impostors denominating themselves prophets, and by the duplicity and misrepresentation of foreign emissaries, whose governments are at war, open or understood, with the United States:

Wherefore, 1st. The United States demand an equivalent for all expenses incurred in prosecuting the war to its termination, by a cession of all the territory belonging to the Creek nation, within the territories of the United States, lying west, south, and southeastwardly, of a line to be run and described by persons duly authorized and appointed by the President of the United States: Beginning at a point on the eastern bank of the Coosa river, where the south boundary line of the Cherokee nation crosses the same; running from thence, down the said Coosa river, with its eastern bank, according to its various meanders, to a point one mile above the mouth of Cedar creek, at fort Williams; thence, east two miles, thence south two miles, thence west to the eastern bank of the said Coosa river; thence, down the eastern bank thereof, according to its various meanders, to a point opposite the upper end of the great falls, (called by the natives Woetumka;) thence, east from a true meridian line, to a point due north of the Oakfuskee; thence, south by a like meridian line, to the mouth of Oakfuskee, on the south side of the Tallapoosa river; thence, up the same, according to its various meanders, to a point where a direct course will cross the same, at the distance of ten miles from the mouth thereof; thence, a direct line to the mouth of Summochoico creek, which empties into the Chatahoochee river, on the east side thereof, below the Eufaulau town; thence, east from a true meridian line, to a point which shall intersect the line now dividing the lands claimed by the said Creek nation from those claimed and owned by the State of Georgia: Provided, nevertheless, That, where any possession of any chief or warrior of the Creek nation, who shall have been friendly to the United States during the war, and taken an active part therein, shall be within the territory ceded by these articles to the United States, every such person shall be entitled to a reservation of land within the said territory, of one mile square, to include his improvements, as near the centre thereof as may be, which shall inure to the said chief, or warrior, and his descendants, so long as he, or they, shall continue to occupy the same; who shall be protected by, and subject to, the laws of the United States; but, upon the voluntary abandonment thereof, by such possessor or his descendants, the right of occupancy, or possession of said lands, shall devolve to the United States, and be identified with the right of property ceded hereby.

ART. 2. The United States will guaranty to the Creek nation, the integrity of all their territory, eastwardly and northwardly of the said line, to be run and described as mentioned in the first article.

ART. 3. The United States demand that the Creek nation abandon all communication, and cease to hold any intercourse, with any British or Spanish post, garrison, or town; and that they shall not admit among them any agent, or trader, who shall not derive authority to hold commercial or other intercourse with them, by licence from the President, or authorized agent of the United States.

ART. 4. The United States demand an acknowledgment of the right to establish military posts and trading houses, and to open roads within the territory, guarantied to the Creek nation by the second article, and a right to the free navigation of all its waters.

ART. 5. The United States demand that a surrender be immediately made, of all the persons and property taken from the citizens of the United States, the friendly part of the Creek nation, the Cherokee, Chickasaw, and Choctaw nations, to the respective owners; and the United States will cause to be immediately restored to the formerly hostile Creeks, all the property taken from them since their submission, either by the United States, or by any Indian nation in amity with the United States, together with all the prisoners taken from them during the war.

ART. 6. The United States demand the caption and surrender of all the prophets and instigators of the war, whether foreigners or natives, who have not submitted to the arms of the United States, and become parties to these articles of capitulation, if ever they shall be found within the territory guarantied to the Creek nation by the second article.

ART. 7. The Creek nation being reduced to extreme want, and not at present having the means of subsistence, the United States, from motives of humanity, will continue to furnish, gratuitously, the necessaries of life, until the crops of corn can be considered competent to yield the nation a supply, and will establish trading houses in the nation, at the discretion of the President of the United States, and at such places as he shall direct, to enable the nation, by industry and economy, to procure clothing.

ART. 8. A permanent peace shall ensue from the date of these presents, forever, between the Creek nation and the United States, and between the Creek nation and the Cherokee, Chickasaw, and Choctaw nations.

ART. 9. If, in running east from the mouth of Summochoico creek, it shall so happen, that the settlement of the Kinnards falls within the lines of the territory hereby ceded, then, and in that case, the line shall be run east, in a true meridian, to Kitchofoonee creek, thence, down the middle of said creek, to its junction with Flint river, immediately below the Oakmulgee town; thence, up the middle of Flint river, to a point due east of that at which the above line struck the Kitchofoonee creek; thence, east to the old line, hereinbefore mentioned: to wit, the line dividing the lands claimed by the Creek nation from those claimed and owned by the State of Georgia.

The parties to these presents, after due consideration, for themselves and their constituents, agree to ratify and confirm the preceding articles, and constitute them the basis of a permanent peace between the two nations; and they do hereby solemnly bind themselves, and all the parties concerned and interested, to a faithful performance of every stipulation contained therein.

In testimony whereof, they have hereunto, interchangeably, set their hands and affixed their seals, the day and date above written.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General Commanding the 7th Military District.

[Signed, also, by a number of Creek chiefs, deputies, and warriors.]

Copy of Instructions to treat with the Indians at Greenville, Ohio, in 1814.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 11, 1814.

SIR:

The President of the United States has been pleased to appoint you commissioner to confer with the Indian nations of the west and north, and to conclude with them a treaty of peace and alliance. The treaty will be held at Greenville, in the State of Ohio, and at such time as may have been fixed in the invitation given to the Indians by General Harrison. The objects to be attained will be indicated under the following heads, viz:

1st. A peace, sincere and lasting, between the contracting parties.

2d. An alliance between the said parties, in prosecuting the present war against Great Britain; and,

3d. An arrangement for the extinction of the Indian title to the tract of land lying between the Michigan territory, on the north, the western limits of the State of Ohio on the west, the Indian boundary line, as settled by Gen. Wayne, on the south, and the line by the treaty of the 4th July, 1805, on the east.

In the 1st of these objects, the parties have a common and obvious interest.

To engage the Indians in the second, their warriors will be taken into the service of the United States, and will receive the monthly pay and subsistence of soldiers of our army. Such as bring good and sufficient arms will be entitled to a reasonable compensation for their use. Such as have not arms of this description to bring, will be supplied with muskets. To those serving faithfully, certain articles of clothing will be furnished, viz: Blankets, and cloth for leggins and breech-clouts. They will be specially commanded by their own chiefs, (who will be subject to the orders of the general officer, and officers of the United States' army, assigned to the command of the division or brigade with which they may act, &c.) who will be commissioned by medals, presented to them by order of the President.

The arrangement with regard to the exchange of lands is deemed important by some of the inhabitants of the State of Ohio. If the suggestion can be made, and the arrangement effected, without exciting in the Indians any disagreeable sensations, this object may be prosecuted, otherwise, it is not to be touched.

The land proposed to be given in exchange is a tract of equal dimensions, lying between lake Michigan and the Mississippi.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

P. S. On more mature deliberation, two alterations in these instructions have been adopted, viz:

1st. That, instead of an article stipulating alliance and subsidy by pay, &c. one shall be substituted, simply obligatory on the Indians to assist in prosecuting the war against Great Britain, if so required to do by the United States; and,

2d. That nothing be said or stipulated with regard to exchange of lands or opening roads.

Under these modifications, the treaty, if concluded, will consist of two articles: one, stipulating peace and friendship; the other, military aid to the United States, on the part of the Indians, if required.

BROTHERS: Your Father, the President, has heard of the courage and fidelity with which you have adhered to the United States during the present war.

He instructs me to make known to you his approbation of your past, and confidence in your future conduct.

You will go forth with your white brothers to battle, and share with them in the glory of conquering your common enemy.

Journal of the proceedings of the commissioners plenipotentiary, appointed on behalf of the United States of America, to treat with the Northwestern tribes of Indians.

FRIDAY, July 1st, 1814.

Major General William Henry Harrison, having been appointed by the President of the United States, jointly and severally with Governor Shelby, of Kentucky, and Governor Cass, of the Michigan territory, as commissioners plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty with the Northwestern tribes of Indians, left Cincinnati about one o'clock on Friday, the 1st day of July, 1814, (accompanied by James Dill, as secretary to the said commissioners) for Greenville, where it had previously been appointed to hold the said treaty; at which place he arrived on Sunday, the 3d of July, about four o'clock, P. M. and found about 3,000 Indians had already collected, and that the chiefs of the Wyandot, Seneca, Delaware, Miami, Eel river, and Wea tribes of Indians were assembled in council: upon which the General informed them, by their interpreters, that he would (after taking some refreshment) meet them in council. Accordingly, about five o'clock, the General repaired to the council house, where, after the mutual congratulations had passed, (which appeared to have been delivered by many of the chiefs with great cordiality and friendship) he addressed them as follows:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: I have been informed by Mr. Stickney, that it had been agreed upon between Mr. Johnston and himself, on the recommendation of the Wyandot and Delaware chiefs, to send off runners, again to invite the attendance of the tribes west of the Wabash. I am not much pleased with this plan: those tribes have already had sufficient notice of the council, and have been invited to attend it; we will not again ask them to come; they must take the consequences of their neglect or refusal of the terms offered to them by the Seventeen Fires.

The principal of the Wyandots and Delaware tribes, Crane and Anderson, then replied to the General: That they had been informed a number of the Pattawatamies and Kickapoos were afraid to come in, as it had been impressed upon their minds, by the British and their agents, that this council was only intended as a snare, to entice them into our country, for the purpose of destroying them; but that, were they to receive a message from the chiefs now assembled here, that they had been received with cordiality and friendship by their fathers, the Seventeen Fires, and that there was no danger in coming here, they would certainly attend.

Upon which the General agreed that runners should be despatched to those tribes who had failed to attend, with a message to the foregoing effect; and also to inform them, if they came in at any time before the council broke up, they would be received and treated as friends.

And the council then adjourned until Monday.

MONDAY, July 4, 1814.

It commenced raining about 8 o'clock in the morning, and rained incessantly until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. No business was, therefore, attempted.

TUESDAY, July 5, 1814.

The council house, or rather the bowery erected for that purpose, having been placed about thirty rods southwest of where the council house formerly stood, in which the justly celebrated treaty of Greenville was made and signed by General Wayne, on behalf of the United States, with the Northwestern tribes of Indians, in 1795, General Harrison gave instructions for its removal to the same spot where General Wayne's council house formerly stood; and the work commenced this morning, accordingly.

WEDNESDAY, July 6, 1814.

The council house being unfinished, and several of the Indians not having yet arrived, no business was attempted. Governor Lewis Cass, one of the commissioners plenipotentiary, arrived this day, about 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

THURSDAY, 7th July, 1814.

The council house being nearly complete, the commissioners notified the chiefs of the different tribes present that they would meet them in council to-morrow, at 10 o'clock.

The Shawanee tribe of Indians arrived this day, about 12 o'clock, and saluted the commissioners and troops as they passed, which salute was returned by some of the troops in camp.

FRIDAY, 8th July, 1814.

This day the commissioners, to wit: General Harrison and Governor Cass, proceeded to the council house, where were assembled the chiefs of the Wyandot, Seneca, Delaware, Shawanee, Miami, Eel River, Wea, Pattawatamy, Ottawa, and a few of the Kickapoo, tribes of Indians, together with a number of their young men and warriors.

The council commenced by the commissioners smoking, and presenting, to the different chiefs, the pipe of peace; after which, the commission, appointing General William Henry Harrison, Governor Isaac Shelby, and Governor Lewis Cass, jointly and severally, commissioners plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty with the Northwestern tribes of Indians, was produced, read, and explained to them, when General Harrison addressed them as follows:

MY BROTHERS:

Before we proceed to the business for which we have now assembled, I will communicate to you a message from our Great Father, the President of the United States, directed specially to those of our red brethren who have faithfully and honestly supported the interests of the United States during the present war.

[He then read and explained to them, a message from the President of the United States, directed to the Wyandot, Seneca, Delaware, and Shawanee tribes of Indians, acknowledging their faithful services, and assuring them of the high estimation in which those services were held by their Father, the President of the United States; after which, he presented to the Wyandot, Delaware, and Shawanee tribes, each, a large silver pipe, elegantly ornamented, and engraved with devices emblematic of the protection and friendship of the United States; and, after explaining to them the meaning of those devices, and the reasons why the United States had conferred on those tribes so distinguished a mark of favor, he addressed them as follows:

BROTHERS of the Wyandot, Seneca, Delaware, Shawanee, Miami, Eel River, Wea, Pattawatamy, Ottawa, and Kickapoos:

The performance of the act of justice which I have just now finished, is not the sole cause which induced us to kindle the council fire on this spot. This place has long been looked on with veneration, not only by our red brethren, but by the whites, also, because this is the very spot where that great chain was first formed which has so long been the bond of union between you and the Seventeen Fires.

It is said, my children, that there are, in the other world, evil spirits, who are ever employed in endeavoring to counteract the mercies and beneficent intentions of the Great and Good Spirit towards his creatures here below; so, on this earth, there is a nation, in sowing dissensions, and kindling wars and discord amongst their neighbors; their efforts have been but too successful in breaking the chain which had hitherto bound in friendship the Seventeen Fires with their red brethren; but we are now met to connect those broken links, once more, and, we may hope, with the assistance of the Good Spirit, we shall be able to cement them so strong, that neither the devil, nor his friends, the British, will again be able to interrupt that harmony and friendship which ought to subsist between the United States and their brethren of the forest.

It is well known, that the first manifestation of dissatisfaction from the red brethren towards the citizens of the United States, originated at this place; it was here that the combination against the Seventeen Fires was first formed, which was afterwards brought to maturity at Tippecanoe.

So just and generous, however, had been the conduct of the Seventeen Fires towards their red brethren and children, that much time was required to create bad impressions against them, and to obliterate the direful effects of British perfidy, which they had experienced in the war that was terminated by General Wayne's treaty.

The treaty made at fort Wayne, in the year 1809, furnished, at length, a subject for the Prophet, and other British emissaries, upon which to impeach the good intentions of the United States towards the Indians.

It was alleged, that the tribes who were parties to that treaty, had been defrauded. The two tribes who were most interested, and who were the proprietors of the lands then sold, are now present, and, is there one of them, Delaware or Miami, who will not bear witness to the falsehood of these assertions?

After the treaty was made, the Prophet, and his brother, who had no right to participate in it, began to propagate the principle, that the whole of the lands on this continent were the common property of all the tribes, and that no sale could take place, or would be valid, unless all the tribes were parties to it. This idea is so absurd, and so new, too, that it could never be admitted by the Seventeen Fires, either on their own account, or on that of the tribes who live near to them, and whose rights they have guaranteed; and you all know, for you were present at the discussion between Tecumseh and myself, on the subject of those lands, that this was the only claim he was able, or ever attempted to set up.

The Delawares and Miamies, who are now here present, can not only testify to the fairness with which the treaty of fort Wayne was conducted, but, they can also witness the pains which were taken by me, to prevent a recurrence to arms, even after the perpetration of innumerable murders and aggressions, by the Prophet and his party.

It was not until every hope of obtaining the delivery of the murderers was extinguished, and after the Miamies, who were the proprietors of the lands on the Wabash, and who were bound, by the treaty of Greenville, to deliver up those murderers, had declared their inability to do so, that the army under my command, commenced its march up the Wabash. Pacific overtures were not, even then, suspended; the army halted within our own boundary, and I permitted the Delawares and Miamies once more to go on a mission of peace; some of your wisest and best men were selected to carry the terms; these were so reasonable that they met the entire approbation of those who carried them. They were instructed to say, that, upon the delivery of the murderers, and an arrangement being entered into to send off the Winnebagoes, and other savages from the lakes, whose presence upon the Wabash had alarmed the Miamies, as well as the white people, the army would immediately return.

Upon the return of those chiefs, several of whom are now present, I was informed there was no hope of effecting the desired arrangement; that they had been received and treated with insult and scorn, and that, in order to put an end to the negotiation, the Prophet had despatched a war party to take scalps. This party was met by the Delaware chiefs, to whom they boasted that they had effected their great object, by firing at and wounding one of our sentinels, although they had not been able to scalp him. Thus was the first blood drawn, not by us, who had every provocation to commence hostilities, but by those, of whom we were asking redress for the innumerable injuries they had already heaped upon us, and which redress they had bound themselves, by the treaty of Greenville, to give.

I should have been unworthy the command of an army, if, after this outrage, I had longer hesitated. I ordered it to march; but, even then, I permitted the whole body of the Miami chiefs to go ahead of me, and make one more effort to bring the deluded followers of the Prophet to listen to reason. It was not, however, until my arrival with the army, in front of their village, that they manifested the least disposition to do so. Some chiefs were then sent out to me with peaceable professions in their mouths, but villany and treachery in their hearts. You all know the result. The Great Spirit, who always punishes perfidy, specially interposed in our favor; a bloody battle was terminated by the loss of their best warriors, and the destruction of their whole establishment.

You, my children, are equally well acquainted with the events which followed the battle of Tippecanoe. You know that the impostor and his followers pretended to have repented of their conduct towards the Seventeen Fires; that they sent to me and sued for peace; that peace was granted to them, and the tomahawk solemnly buried at Vincennes, about five months after the battle. You know, also, that these faithless and perfidious men again took up the tomahawk in the succeeding summer, upon the first invitation from the British.

I must now, my children, say something on the subject of our war with the British nation.

You have been told, that the Seventeen Fires declared war against the British. Such is the fact; but, it was done in consequence of a long succession of injuries, which were no longer to be borne. My children, the Seventeen Fires love peace; but they are not afraid of war. Look at the bird which they have chosen as their emblem; he holds in his right talon the olive branch, the emblem of peace, which he presents first, to all; but, in his left talon, he grasps the bunch of arrows, to shew, that (although he wishes peace) he is able and willing to fight, when his pacific overtures are rejected. With the quarrel between the Seventeen Fires and the British, the red people had nothing to do, and it was the wish of the President, your Great Father, that they would take no part in it. This sentiment of his was communicated to every tribe; unfortunately, however, our enemies pursued a different course, and many of the tribes who had been cherished by the United States, as their children, took up the tomahawk against them. It was not till some time after your Father, the President, discovered that your young men were determined to take one side or the other, in the war, that he permitted any of the red warriors to join our army; and not even then, until he had received from the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, and Shawanese, repeated solicitations to that effect.

I have thus given you a true history of the commencement of the war. If untrue, there are hundreds of you here present, who can detect its falsity. There are many of you present, my children, who recollect me since I was a boy, sitting on this spot, alongside of General Wayne; most of you know me, however, only as Governor of the Indiana territory; and if, in all my transactions with you, or any of you, you can say I have ever deceived you, or told you a falsehood, come now forward and boldly declare it; it shall be put on this paper, and faithfully transmitted to our Great Father, the President of the United States.

No, my children, I have never deceived you, and I now tell you that Great Britain never can conquer the Seventeen Fires. I will not say the Seventeen Fires can conquer Great Britain; but, I do say, we can and will, at least, take all Upper Canada, and the country occupied by the tribes of Indians who now adhere to the British. Some disaster may, however, again, as heretofore, happen to our armies; we may lose a battle, or an important post may be given up, as Hull gave up Detroit; but, it is not more certain that the sun, which is now enveloped in clouds, will again recover its splendor, than that the arms of the United States will, in this Western country, ultimately prevail. My children, the object of this council is to bury the hatchet with such of the tribes as have lately borne arms against us, and who have accepted the invitation to come here, upon condition of receiving that which we shall offer them, to make war upon the British. Those who accept this proposition will be cherished by their Father, the President of the United States, as they were before the war.

And the council then adjourned, to meet to-morrow morning, 10 o'clock.

SATURDAY, 9th July, 1814.

The commissioners again met the Indians in council, and notified all the tribes present, that they could now speak, if they thought proper. After some time had elapsed, and none of the Indians appearing inclined to speak, the Miamies, Pattawatamies, and Kickapoos, present, were particularly notified, that, if they had an inclination to speak, they would now be heard in their justification.

After some consultation together, Charley, a principal war chief amongst the Miamies, got up and observed to the commissioners, that they were rather taken at a non plus; they were not yet prepared, as they had not yet consulted together, what answer to make, owing to one of their principal chiefs being lame, and unable to attend; but they would hold a consultation, and return an answer to-morrow.

SUNDAY, 10th July, 1814.

The council was opened by General Harrison addressing the various tribes present, and observing to them, that the Miamies, Pattawatamies, and Kickapoos, had expressed a desire to bury the hatchet, and again embrace the friendship of the United States, and they had now met to listen to what these nations had to say; and that, if they had a sincere wish to bury the hatchet, it could now be done.

Captain Charley, an Eel River Miami chief, then spake as follows, to wit:

Listen Big Knife, my Father: You have requested to hear us, and you shall now hear. Listen, Father: I want you to listen attentively, and let none go away till you hear all I have to say.

BIG KNIFE FATHER: You have told the truth in all you have said; when I heard you at fort Wayne, you then said a great deal which was for the benefit of the Indians; again, father, when you were going on to Tippecanoe, for fear any interruptions should take place, I thought I would go and meet you there, in order to prevent any quarrel or misunderstanding. You then sent us on ahead of the army, to the red brethren at Tippecanoe, and told us to return with an answer. I went to Tippecanoe as you directed, and left that place to return you their answer, accompanied by two Pattawatamies, one Miami, and one Delaware chief; I did not see you, because you had crossed the Wabash, and taken another road from that I expected, and we did not overtake you, until the night of the battle of Tippecanoe; we got near you, before the battle began, but finding the battle had begun, we scattered. The not meeting you before that battle, father, was the cause of the confusion which followed; we then concluded the Great Spirit had given us up, and we all scattered. As you mentioned these things, I thought it best to mention them too, and to recapitulate the circumstances which happened, but we will now talk of other matters.

FATHER: At fort Wayne, when I again heard you speak, when our grandfather, the Delawares, were there, our brothers, the Shawanese and Pattawatamies, together with the Miamies, were invited to take a seat with you. It was at fort Wayne, when I heard you point out the lands where our younger brothers, the Weas, were settled, saying you wished to purchase those lands. I again consulted my grandfather, the Delawares, who answered, that whatever their grandchildren, the Pattawatamies, agreed to, they would acquiesce in. When you spoke at that treaty, of the lands you wanted, we told you those lands belonged to our younger brother, the Weas, and to consult them, for the lands you wanted belonged to them, and if they were willing to sell it, we would agree to the sale. After the treaty, they pointed out to you the way home, through those lands. When the treaty commenced, you and us consulted the Weas, for, had they disagreed to it, it was to be no treaty. As you recapitulated what had passed, and stated facts, we thought it right to do so too. After our council chiefs and war chiefs had consulted on these things, we held a council with Mr. Stickney, at fort Wayne. We there mentioned to him, that our elder brother, the Wyandots, had recommended it to the whole of us eleven tribes, that it was best to be quiet and remain peaceable, and not to go to war by any means. After we had heard our elder brother, the Wyandots, we told them they gave good advice, and we would follow it; that we agreed to all they had said, for they had said the things that were good, about our women and children, and as to those who thought proper not to listen to this good advice, they might act for themselves, but we would adhere to it. We, the Miamies, are determined to fulfil all our engagements with you and the Pattawatamies. After we had concluded on this, we looked aside and saw the tomahawk a-waving in the air; we looked around for the cause, but could see none. After these things, we settled our chiefs and tied them fast together at Massasinaway. Again, after we had collected our families, our women and children, together at the Little Turtle's town, we found our property destroyed, and our young men and warriors wounded, but could not tell who done those things. After all this, we even then concluded we would bear our loss, and put up with what had happened. After that, when we were all together, you endeavored to pull us one way, and the others endeavored to pull us another way. After we had heard the voice of our red brethren, who endeavored to draw us into the war, we abandoned them, and determined we would not be drawn in by them. After those red people had sent us their speeches, and found we did not attend to them, they murdered some of our young men, and even killed some of our grandfathers, the Delawares, before our eyes.

AGAIN, FATHER: I was at a loss to know which way to move, after these depredations. I thought, if our red brethren acted in this way, while we were away from them, it would be worse for us, if we went amongst them. We have, therefore, concluded it best, to stay where we were. One morning, when we looked up where the Munsees lived, we saw our grandfathers, the Delawares, packing up their property, as if they intended to run away. It was when our grandfathers, the Munsees, told us they had unloosed their warriors to hunt; we then heard the firing of a gun, and found war had already begun; we tried, but could no longer restrain our young men from joining in the fight.

THEN, BIG KNIFE, I thought you were wrong; I still heard you speak of peace, and finding you acted in this way, I thought you acted wrong; for these reasons, I concluded we were in a precarious situation; it resembled a wild horse, surrounded on every side by people, endeavoring to catch him, and at last, all fall on him and kill him. When we saw you coming, and found you made the stroke on us, we concluded we were no longer at liberty to choose. After mature deliberation on these things, we could find no other cause for your conduct, but, that we had not come to you, when you asked us. You had told us to remain at home, and we had done so. After that, we took into consideration our women and children; we looked with compassion on them, and concluded we were no longer at liberty to choose; we were no longer our own men; that the Great Author of nature had placed us in this situation, and not we ourselves. After viewing our young men, women, and children, and perceiving all our red brethren flocking towards the British, we looked around also, and concluded we were unable to stand against you, and, therefore, we determined to follow those others of our red brethren who took their course towards the British.

N. B. As it must appear, that there are a great many contradictions and repetitions in the foregoing speech, it may be proper to observe, that it was substantially taken down as delivered or rendered by the interpreters, and, indeed, almost word for word.

After Charley had concluded his speech, General Harrison addressed the Indians, in substance, as follows, viz:

That, in his speech to them, he had purposely avoided saying any thing which might wound the feelings of his children, the Miamies, Pattawatamies, and Kickapoos; that he was sorry to find they had pursued a different course; that they well knew, while he was Governor of the Indiana territory, he had treated them with every mark of friendship and attachment; that he treated them as if they were his own children; and, such was their intimacy with them, that he could call every man, woman, and child, in the nation, almost, by name; that, even after they had discovered symptoms of disaffection towards the United States, he had invited them to the council at Piqua, and informed them, if they attended that council, and listened to the voice of the Seventeen Fires, it would be considered as an evidence of their friendship, and their having a wish to take shelter under the protection of the United States; but even this they refused; that when the voice of his country and Government had called him to the command of the Northwestern army, and he marched to the relief of fort Wayne, which was besieged, he was at a loss for words to express his astonishment, at finding his own children, the Miamies, amongst the besiegers of the place, from whence they had, for many years, drawn all their supplies, nourishment, and clothing; that the destruction of their town, which followed the siege of fort Wayne, was the necessary consequence of that event; and that, had the Miamies even been friendly disposed towards the United States; had they been whites, and in the strictest alliance with the United States, good policy required that their corn should be destroyed, to prevent its supplying the hostile tribes with food; that, after all these things had taken place, and when they sent in their principal chiefs to him, he informed them the door of reconciliation was still open to them, and that peace would still be granted them, whenever they shewed, by their conduct, a sincere desire for that event; that their brothers, the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, and Shawanese, could inform them, that, by listening to his voice and following his council, they had received and secured to themselves, the protection and friendship of the United States, and were now in a prosperous and flourishing condition; that, even after the United States had, with the assistance of their red brethren, thrown their enemies, the British, on their backs, and had put down that notorious impostor, the Prophet and his party, he still held out to his red children the hand of friendship, which ought, certainly, to be conclusive evidence to them, of the regard which the United States had for their red children.

That, as it regarded the treaty of fort Wayne, there were hundreds of the Indians, now present, who could testify to the fairness with which it was conducted, and how cheerfully the Miamies had entered into that treaty.

That it was painful for him to mention these circumstances, but justice required it of him, more especially, as the Miamies and Pattawatamies appeared to have forgotten who they were addressing; that they appeared to have dreamt themselves into a belief, they were speaking to a British commander, instead of the representatives of the American nation; that duty, not inclination, compelled him to remind them of all these things, but he would now drop the subject; that, as they had now come forward on an invitation to make peace, the Seventeen Fires, generous as they were just, were still willing to bury the past in oblivion, and extend their friendship and protection to their women and children, provided they become convinced of the sincerity of the red people.

And the council then adjourned till to-morrow morning.

MONDAY, 11th July, 1814.

The council again convened, when Picon, the principal chief of the Miami tribe, addressed the commissioners as follows, to wit:

FATHER: You who are now seated before me, listen; I am glad and happy that you have invited us, the Miamies, to meet you here; I expect it is the same with you, father, and that, as you have invited us, our women, and children, to meet you here, you are equally glad to see us.

FATHER: I rejoice to see you here; I expect it is the voice of our Great Father, the President of the Seventeen Fires, we shall hear, and we reciprocate or acquiesce with him in his sentiments and views.

LISTEN, FATHER: We are glad to hear your voice; we are glad to hear the voice of our Father, the President; we expect you want to hear what your red children has to say, and, for this reason, have we come here.

LISTEN, FATHER: When we came here, we expected to hear something good from our Father at this time, and to join with him in whatever he may say or do.

After a considerable time had elapsed, and no other Indian showing any disposition to speak, Governor Cass addressed the Miamies, Pattawatamies, and Kickapoos, as follows, to-wit:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS of the Miamies, Pattawatamies, and Kickapoos:

At the commencement of the present war between the United States and Great Britain, it was the wish of your Father, the President of the Seventeen Fires, that you should remain neutral; the war did not concern you, it concerned us alone; messages were, therefore, sent to the different tribes, as you all know, requesting them to remain quiet at home, and take no part in the war; instead of listening to us, however, your ears were open to the lies of the British, and you took up the tomahawk in their behalf, and you fought on their side until we had thrown them on their backs.

Your Great Father, the President of the United States, has found that you cannot remain neutral; that you cannot or will not, remain at peace, but must fight on one side or the other; and that, if you were not for us, you would be against us.

Your Father, the President, is anxious for your happiness and prosperity; and if the British had been equally so, and equally friendly disposed towards you, there would have been no necessity for calling on you at this time, to take up the tomahawk.

The Americans are strong enough to fight their own battles; but the British, knowing their weakness, were compelled to call on you for assistance. You have now come forward to take us by the hand; we are equally anxious and willing to take you by the hand, but you must take up the tomahawk, and with us, strike our enemies; then your Great Father, the President, will forgive the past.

By this means, the blood which has been spilt between us will be covered, and you will have an opportunity of revenging yourselves on your enemies and ours. We shall expect your answer to-morrow, and from that answer we shall know what is hereafter to take place between us.

The Miamies, Pattawatamies, and Kickapoos, were then informed, that the foregoing were not only the sentiments of the Seventeen Fires, but that they were also the sentiments and wishes of the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, and Shawanese.

And the council then adjourned to meet to-morrow.

TUESDAY, July 12th, 1814.

The council convened, and, after sitting a considerable time, and none of the Pattawatamies, Miamies, or Kickapoos, evincing a disposition to speak or reply to the speech of yesterday, Crane, the head chief of the Wyandot tribe, came forward, and commenced as follows:

MY FRIENDS AND BROTHERS of the Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Delawares, Senecas, Ottawas, and Kickapoos:

I return thanks to you all; it appears that this was the day appointed by the Great Spirit, for us to meet in council here; it appears that this is the day appointed by our Great Creator, for us to meet; and I am happy that he has brought so many of different tongues, face to face, together. My friends and brothers, I wish you to listen to what I am now going to say; it is the voice of the four nations, here present in friendship with me, and it is the voice of our Great Father, the President of the Seventeen Fires; my friends and brothers, as I before told you, I wish you to listen. We have kindled a council fire three days ago, and yet there is nothing done; it is time we should proceed to the business, for which we have met together in council; my opinion is, you are very backward in speaking your sentiments; and there is an urgent necessity you should make them known at once, but I think and believe, the reason of your backwardness is, that you have some things lie in your hearts, which you are afraid to let out.

Here Crane was interrupted by Five Medals, a chief of the Pattawatamy tribe, who arose and spoke as follows, viz:

FRIEND AND BROTHER: You appear very impatient; I wish you to sit down; I was just going to speak when you commenced. Do you think your younger brother wishes to hide any thing from his Father? Sit down, and we will speak for ourselves.

Crane then sat down; when Picon, principal chief of the Miami tribe, commenced as follows, to wit:

MY FATHER, and all the tribes present, listen to me, I wish to speak to you. My father, you ask the reason why your children will not speak, and we know not what you wish us to say; but let us know what you have to propose, and then we will answer.

Well, my father; when you came to Detroit, you saw me there; I was there with my women and children; the British gave me the tomahawk, and I took it from them; but still I withheld my young men and warriors from doing mischief. My father, when I went to the British, it was one thing, when I came here, it was one thing; still the same; I found myself between two fires; both pointed to me the same road; I wished to do the best for my women and children; I looked to my red brethren, but could see no safety there. I took the hatchet from the British, it is true, but it remained in my hands unused.

MY FATHER, when I looked this way, I dreaded; I was between two fires; when I looked the other way, I dreaded also; I went to seek relief, and when I arrived there, they put the hatchet in my hands, and I took it up. My Father, you have frequently told us you loved us, we have also loved you, but you have deceived us, as has also the people on the other side; when we moved away, however, we found our elder brothers, the Wyandots, were following us.

FATHER: After we had removed to Brownstown, we saw you coming; we then moved to one side to let you pass; we moved to one side of our own accord, no one solicited us to do this.

Again, FATHER: As soon as I had moved from the place, and you passed by, you called to your red children to come to you, and they came; you held the tomahawk in your hand, and gave it to them, and they took it up.

Again, FATHER: At Detroit, when we heard you there, we expected when we heard you again here now, you would do the same; we then concluded, we had received the tomahawk from your hands, and we now expect to receive it.

Again, FATHER: I heard from you at Dayton; Mr. Johnston spoke to us there, but I did not explain any thing to him at that time; but as he returned home, I explained to him a few things of my mind. I there stated to Mr. Johnston, not to be in too great a hurry to force the tomahawk into our hands; that we had appointed a time for all the red brethren to meet together; and that I was a warrior, and would then take it up.

FATHER: Since we have come together here, you have not come to the point with us; you too, seem not to speak plain to us; but since I have been at Detroit, I have lost a number of my family, and I am displeased at the cause of my going there; and now, father, I have told you the minds of our warriors; the Kickapoos and Pattawatamy warriors are of the same mind as the Miamies; this was their voice to Mr. Johnston. I have spoke what I have to say at this time.

General Harrison then called upon Picon, to declare how, in what manner, at what time, and by whom, he had been deceived. He replied, if he had been understood to say he was deceived, it was a mistake; he neither said nor meant to say, the Seventeen Fires had deceived him; and if he had said so, it was a mistake, he was misunderstood.

Five Medals, or Onocksey, a chief of the Pattawatamy tribe, then came forward, and spoke as follows:

FATHER, listen! You want to hear from your children the Pattawatamies, the voice of their warriors. I never, when I have any thing to say, tell it as stories; I speak seriously, and hide nothing; I speak plain, and direct to the point. Father, we know the situation we were in, when the British left us at Detroit, and you took us by the hand; it is this has brought us together at this time. Our younger brothers, the Miamies, have been mistaken in saying they kept their warriors and people together; it was me, Father, who kept them all together. Father, the Great Spirit hears me; he knows I tell the truth; he knows I do not hide what I have to say, but I speak right out. I have found great difficulty in speaking about the things which have passed during the war; it would be better to drop that subject at once, and speak of it no more. Last fall, father, when we took you by the hand at Detroit, many of the Kickapoos, Miamies, and Pattawatamies, were afraid to speak to you; they asked me to speak to you, and beg you to have pity on their women and children, and I did so. Father, I remember well what I said to you; it is fresh in my mind; you then presented the hatchet to us, and we took it up.

FATHER: I then told you we were not afraid to receive the hatchet and war mallet; we looked at our organs of generation, and found we were men; we told you we were men and warriors; we know not why our brethren, the Miamies, are trying to hide these things, and do not speak out boldly. Father, the time we met at Dayton, I advised Mr. Johnston not to present the tomahawk then, as there would be more of your red children collected here; it would be better to present the hatchet here, and that the Pattawatamies and Miamies would receive it here. Now is the time, father; if you raise the hatchet and present it to us, we will take fast hold of it. If you now present the hatchet, none of your red children will refuse it; I am certain your views will meet with general approbation. I speak plain. I thank the Great Spirit I hide nothing.

Feendoo, one of the chiefs of the Wyandots, who had joined the British, then arose and spoke as follows, viz:

FATHER: I am now going to speak; I now return thanks to you and all these; we congratulate you, and we thank the Great Spirit, that we have been permitted to live, to meet together this good day, and see each other face to face.

FATHER: I shall not take the same steps my brothers the Pattawatamies did; I shall be short, and speak out plain at once. He has said too much; I shall not do so.

FATHER: I tell you, our chiefs, at the commencement of the war, made every exertion they could to keep peace; they failed in this. Our chiefs adhered faithfully to the Seventeen Fires, and to all they had engaged to do; but they could not restrain their young men; their attempts to do so were unsuccessful.

FATHER: We were taken prisoners by the British; we were actually in their power; they forced the tomahawk into our hands, and we were compelled to take it up, or our situation would have been much worse. We will now, father, tell you the minds of our people, as we suppose you wish to know it. Father, as to our having hold of the British tomahawk, it is true, we had hold of it; but we have let it go, and will hold it no longer; some evil spirit brought us into that situation; but I will venture to say it shall never be the case again.

FATHER: Here is a number of the Wyandots from Brownstown; we thank the Great Spirit for bringing so many of us together here. Father, we, the Wyandots, are happy to meet you; we take fast hold of your hand as your children; now father you have heard the sentiments of your children the Wyandots; it is from their hearts, from their souls, and do not suppose it to be merely lip deep; this is all I have to say at present. As to examining our organs of generation, to see if we are men, we have not done so.

The council then adjourned until Thursday, to allow time to prepare the necessary war belt, &c.

THURSDAY, 14th July, 1814.

The emblematical war belt not being yet prepared, the council met, but as only a few of the chiefs attended, the council, without proceeding to any business, adjourned.

FRIDAY, 15th July, 1814.

The council met about 12 o'clock: Present, nearly all the chiefs of the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, Shawanese, Miamies, Pattawatamies, Kickapoos, and Ottawas. Charley, a Miami chief, advanced to the centre of the council house, and commenced, as follows:

LISTEN, BIG-KNIFE FATHER, to the voice of our council chiefs, our war chiefs, and young men. I heard your voice, Big Knife. You pointed out to me the voice of the Seventeen Fires. You told me it was their counsel for us to sit still, and be neutral; we heard your voice pointing out to us to be quiet at home, and remain neutral. When we heard your voice to us, you told us, Brothers, be quiet; the war concerns you not; remain at peace, be neutral; we call you children, but we are all the work of the same Creator; therefore sit still, be peaceable. This was your counsel to us.

It was a great while ago, at this place, when the great council sat here, and when we were all sitting here, that you gave us this advice. You then told us the way we should go, and how we should act; from that time, and from that situation, until lately, you kept drawing us this way. You had seated us at home, and you kept drawing us away from it; our council chiefs, and our war chiefs, were at a loss to know the reason of this; after some time elapsed, perhaps you took us into consideration; you came towards us; you made several encampments, and never considered until you came to us.

You came on until you reached where our grandfathers were seated; our young men were there a-sleep; they heard the firing of a gun, they awoke suddenly, seized their guns, and fired at random. You were the first shedders of blood, and not us. Listen! my warriors never crossed your line, or your boundary, to kill your people.

Here, Charley was interrupted by Mr. Johnston, Indian agent; who observed to him, he could prove what he had asserted, to be false; that before a single Miami Indian was molested by the whites, the Miamies had killed his (Johnston's) brother, at fort Wayne, and that he could prove, by a number of Indians, now present, that the Miamies had assisted in the siege of fort Wayne.

General Harrison then addressed the Miamies, and called upon the chiefs of that nation to avow or disavow the speech of Charley; that his intention was, evidently, to interrupt the harmony which now exists between the United States and the friendly tribes present, and to prevent the conclusion of a treaty; as every word he said was calculated to rouse the passions and prejudices of the friendly tribes, against the United States. He therefore called on them explicitly to declare, whether they intended to join the United States or not; that if they thought proper not to join, they had come here in peace, under the sanction of a treaty, and might depart in peace, but that they must now explicitly declare, what course they meant to pursue.

The General then addressed all the Indians present, and observed to them that it must be evident to all, that the Miamies were endeavoring to excite in the breasts of the friendly tribes, sentiments unfavorable to the United States. He then proceeded to explain to them, that Colonel Campbell's expedition was intended solely against Tecumseh, supposed to be at Massasinaway, and such of the Miamies as adhered to him; and that Campbell was particularly enjoined, not to molest Silver Heels, but to shew him every mark of attention and kindness in his power, because he was known to be our friend; that Colonel Campbell, unable to discriminate between those who were our friends and enemies, had unfortunately and inadvertently struck some of our friends, when the blow was only intended against our enemies; that the way to avoid disasters of this kind, in future, is, and must be, for the friendly Indians to separate from those who were unfriendly to the United States, and have no communication with them; that by this means the Seventeen Fires would be able to discriminate, and would be enabled to afford to our friends that protection which they felt so willing and anxious to do. That the Miamies ought to have pursued this course, if they were so averse to war, as they now pretend; but that he was extremely sorry to find the Miamies appeared determined to harrow up every past transaction, which was calculated to excite impressions and sentiments unfavorable to the United States, when he had hoped these things would be buried in oblivion, and a permanent peace and friendship established between them; that if they thought proper to pursue this course he had no objection, but there were a number of Indians now present, who could prove the falsehood of Charley's assertions; and that he would now prove the Miamies were the aggressors; that he wished no more altercation or prevarication, but wished them explicitly to declare whether they intended to take the United States by the hand or not.

Charley then again proceeded.

FATHER: You have said I told falsehoods; my council chiefs and war chiefs have told me to come forward again and speak.

Listen to me, father Big Knife! I, Miami, am white all over, there is no spot in me; as I before told you, I tell you again, I cannot take hold of any thing bad and fix it on myself. You know, father, that he who has created bad, or been the cause of bad, it will follow him, his works will show it; I tell you again, father, we Miamies have not scattered; we hold ourselves all together. Again, father, our conduct has proved to you, that our intentions are not bad; we have brought our women and children with us, which will prove our intentions are not bad.

I again repeat that I love you; I do not intend to take hold of the tip of your finger, but to take fast hold of your whole hand, the hand nearest the heart; but I now tell you, I wish to remain at peace; I wish to remain neutral. Again, father, you told us to go away; I do not wish to do this; I wish to remain neutral alongside of you. I have told you our sincere wishes and desires; if you do not approve of it, I cannot help it; we wish to claim the ancient promise of remaining neutral. I have nothing more to say, father; I have told you all.

General Cass then observed to the Miamies, in substance, that their propositions of neutrality could not be accepted, nor were such propositions expected by the Government, especially as the Miamies had evinced, by their conduct at the commencement of the war, that they could not remain neutral. That, as it regarded their conduct, he knew nothing personally, but had every reason to believe they were the aggressors, and not the Americans; that he well knew propositions had been made to them to remain at home at peace, and to follow their ordinary occupations; that they had rejected those propositions, and had taken up the tomahawk on the side of the British; and continued to do the Americans all the injury in their power, until the British were thrown on their backs.

That when they came to Detroit, last fall, they were in a deplorable situation; their friends the British had left them to their fate; had left them to perish. That, even then, miserable as their condition was, and much as they had injured the Americans, the Seventeen Fires had generously taken them by the hand, and relieved their wants; that the Miamies then voluntarily offered their services, and promised to take up the tomahawk and strike our enemies. That the United States had since fed and clothed them, and that at Dayton, last spring, they had again renewed their promises to Mr. Johnston; that they must now be sensible it was them, and not the Seventeen Fires had used deception. That as to their having forgotten these things, it was impossible; their promises were voluntarily and solemnly given at Detroit, and he was witness to it.

That notwithstanding these solemn promises, thus voluntarily made, if they now felt a reluctance in complying with them, they were at liberty to recede; that the United States wished no assistance from them but such as should be voluntary. That they (the United States) had, thirty years ago, when in a state of infancy, put the British on their backs; that they were now a powerful nation, had attained to manhood, and could, without assistance, and with ease, throw them again on their backs. That the Miamies were not asked to take up the tomahawk in behalf of the Seventeen Fires, because we needed their assistance, but that, knowing their restless dispositions, that they could not remain neutral, that their young men and warriors could not be restrained, and if not for us, would be against us.

That the anxiety of the Seventeen Fires, for the happiness of their red brethren, was real and sincere, and not like the British, who resided three thousand miles from them, and who only pretended to care for them when they wanted to make use of them. The Seventeen Fires, on the contrary, wished to establish with them a solid and lasting friendship. That the Government of the United States had authorized General Harrison and him (Governor Cass) to conclude a firm and lasting treaty; that the propositions for a treaty had come from themselves, and had been forwarded to the President, who believed them sincere; that the United States wished for none of their lands; they merely wished to be in friendship with them; but that, if, after their own free offer and solicitations, they thought proper to treat on the terms proposed by themselves, which was, to take up the tomahawk and strike our enemies, we would give them the friendship and protection of the United States; it was well; but, if these were rejected, they (the commissioners) had no other terms to offer.

He conjured them, whatever their decision might be, to give it freely: for that, if they were determined on neutrality, or even on becoming enemies to us, they were safe here; they had come here under the sanction of a treaty, and might depart in peace; and concluded by hoping the Great Spirit, who directed all things, would direct them for the best.

General Harrison then addressed himself to the Wyandots, Delawares, Senecas, Shawanese, and the Pattawatamies, Kickapoos, and Ottawas, present, in substance as follows:

That he had hoped, this day, to have encircled in one strong chain of friendship with the Seventeen Fires, all those tribes present. That it was not so much a wish to gain their services as to secure their lasting friendship and permanent happiness, that the Seventeen Fires were anxious to cement this bond of union with their red brethren. That the United States were sufficiently strong to fight their own battles against Great Britain, without the aid of their red children, but that, knowing the restless disposition of their red brethren, and that, if not for us, they would be against us, they had a wish to secure their friendship. That the United States recollects with gratitude, the services rendered by the friendly tribes, at a time when, by treachery or cowardice, her affairs were reduced to a very low ebb, and a gloomy aspect; and even after the loss of some important battles, these tribes had faithfully adhered to the Seventeen Fires. That it was not because he doubted the sincerity or feared the defection of those tribes, that he should, at this time, again put the tomahawk in their hands, but in order again to renew those symbols of friendship, between the Seventeen Fires and their red children, which had heretofore been productive of so many benefits to both sides. That when the war belt was presented to the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, Shawanese, and those of the Pattawatamies, Kickapoos, and Ottawas, present, any individual or number of Miamies, present, who thought proper to take hold of the belt, would be received into the friendship and protection of the United States.

It being now too late in the afternoon to go through the usual ceremonies of presenting the war belt, &c. the council adjourned till to-morrow.

SATURDAY, 16th July, 1814.

The council met. Present, the chiefs of all the tribes.

Ronioness, one of the chiefs of the Brownstown band of Wyandots, addressed the commissioners as follows:

FATHER: Listen to what I am going to say to you. We thank the Great Spirit that we are met together in council this day; but, we believe, under great difficulties, as none of our principal civil chiefs are here now. However, father, a day or two ago, we Wyandots, of Brownstown, let you know our minds. We are of the same mind now. Father, listen. It is probable you know the situation we were in at Brownstown. You know we were forced by the British to act as we did, and that it was far from our wish or intention to join the British; but we were compelled to do so.

FATHER, Listen! We have now got clear of the scrape; we have let go the British tomahawk, and we never intend to take it up again.

FATHER: We from Brownstown have talked together; we are determined to adhere to the Seventeen Fires, and take part with them; we are determined to take hold of their tomahawk, and support their cause.

FATHER, listen! It would be extraordinary, if we from Brownstown should act otherwise than our brothers do. Here is our principal chief (Crane) has taken your tomahawk; we will do so too.

FATHER, listen! When you offered the tomahawk to the four nations who fought on your side, you offered it as is usual to do on such occasions. They took it voluntarily; we will do so too. Father, listen! When the British offered their tomahawks, it was different from your method. They told us if we did not take it up, to beware of the consequences. They even forced cripples, and aged men, who were not able to fight, to take up their tomahawk; but, you leave it to our own free choice. We therefore more voluntarily come forward, and take up the tomahawk with the Seventeen Fires, and with them we will strike their enemies.

FATHER, listen! I come forward voluntarily, and take your hand with my whole heart, and nothing shall again part us.

FATHER: This is the speech sent to us by Walk-in-the-Water, our principal chief. He is too sick to come here; but this is his speech, and his sentiments, and they are ours too. [He then presented a string of wampum from Walk-in-the-Water.]

General Harrison then addressed the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, Shawanese, Miamies, Pattawatamies, Kickapoos, and Ottawas, as friends, brothers, and children, and observed to them, that his friend who was joined with him in commission, had agreed that they should explain to the Miamies why their neutrality could not be accepted. He then observed to them, that, was their neutrality even to be accepted of by the United States, it would be unsafe for the Miamies, and be the eventual means of their destruction. That people who were wise, always take example by the past, to regulate their future conduct; that their own experience of late events, must have taught them there was no safety in neutrality on the frontiers; and their brothers, the Delawares, could also attest this fact. That, if their neutrality was agreed to, the enemy would take immediate measures to defeat it, by sending parties of depredators on the frontiers, and after plundering and murdering the defenceless inhabitants, returning home in a direction so as to fix the blame on the neutrals; that, suppose the intentions of the Miamies to remain neutral were sincere, and that they were to settle down quietly and peaceably on their lands near fort Wayne, or elsewhere, how easy would it be for the hostile Indians to send their plundering parties on our frontier, and after devastating and murdering our inhabitants, to return in a direction to the Miami camps; our people would of course follow, and pursuing the trace no longer than the first Indians they met with, and being unable to discriminate between friends and foes, the Miamies would of course not only be suspected, but fallen upon, and treated as the murderers and depredators. Nothing could save them from slaughter; and that this was the case, the Delawares would attest; and that their (the Miamies) adopting a neutral course, as they themselves must well know, from experience, would be the certain means of their destruction. That the Miami chief who spoke yesterday, (Charley) seemed to possess a wonderful faculty of forgetting the depredations committed by the Miamies, but took care to recollect every thing, and more than every thing, that was committed by us against them. That he was well convinced of the goodness of the chief's heart, and how much he wished to remain neutral, and prevent his young people from mischief; but that this could not be done, and the consequence would be, the first aggressions would be punished by our people following the aggressors; and not being able to distinguish between guilty and innocent, indiscriminate slaughter would be the consequence.

He therefore observed to them, that their propositions of neutrality could not be accepted, because he believed it would be the sure means of their own destruction, and because he thought, also, that, should the British but for a moment gain the upper hand, as was possible, all those who now pretended a wish to remain neutral, would instantly join them, and that, as the Miamies had rejected the propositions made to them by the United States, (a proposition which originally came from the Miamies themselves, too) of taking up the hatchet, and striking our enemies, we have no further propositions to make to them.

Crane, principal chief of the Wyandots, then got up, and commenced as follows:

FATHER, the President of the United States, and you fathers now sitting before me, listen! Brothers Shawanese, Delawares, Senecas, and all our ancient brothers, listen to the few words I have to say. It is a long time since I determined to abandon the British Government and their interest, and to join the United States. Here is this British silver I hold in my hand; (holding in his hand two British medals) I kept it, not because I thought it afforded me protection. I will now cut it to pieces, (striking the medals with a large knife) and give it up to my father the President. I have long been in friendship with the United States, and here (pointing to a large medal with the United States' coat of arms, which hung on his breast) is what I shall hold to in future. [He then handed to the commissioners, with every mark of contempt for the British medals, two valuable ones he had received from that Government.]

General Harrison then informed the Crane, that the commissioners were highly pleased with his conduct on this occasion; that it was the conduct of a sincere friend; that it had ever been the policy of the British Government to divide the citizens of those countries they had determined to conquer and oppress, and to instigate one tribe to the destruction of another; that they had pursued this policy in the East Indies, to the destruction of millions of the unsuspecting and inoffensive inhabitants; that whole principalities, districts, and kingdoms, were there laid waste by their rapacity and avarice, and that all history could attest this fact.

Picon, the principal chief of the Miamies, then spoke as follows:

FATHER BIG KNIFE, grand fathers the Delawares, brothers Wyandots, Shawanese, Senecas, Pattawatamies, and Ottawas, listen! Through the kind providence of him who made all things, we are permitted to meet together in peace. Listen, brothers: when I see you all lay fast hold of our father's hand with one consent, I join with you against our enemies the British. Listen, father Big Knife: You wish to be acquainted with me; you wish to know me. From what we have heard, all must be agreed with you. I now, father, together with all my brothers the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Kickapoos, and Ottawas, join with you and them. I see you all joined together in one. I now come in and join with you. I embrace your measures, and what you may do, I will do also. I am glad to see you all take fast hold of each other's hands, and I take fast hold with you, to strengthen that chain which binds you all together in one common band.

I now petition the great spirit to strengthen those bands, and to keep us firmly together for the future. You have now heard my sentiments; you shall hear the sentiments of the others.

Chief of the Wea band of Miamies. FATHER, listen! My elder brother Wyandots, grand father Delawares, brother Senecas, Pattawatamies, and Kickapoos, listen! Our brother has laid down these medals he received from the British Government; I have none to lay down. Our father, here, knows I never had any of their medals. For this cause, elder brother Wyandots, when you were speaking to us to-day, and stating that our fathers the British had run away, and left us at the Rapids, then I lost confidence in them, and was glad to hear you say you no longer placed confidence in the British, and I join with you in this sentiment. And now, elder brothers, the Wyandots, when we saw you lay down those medals, those instruments of deception, then did your younger brother the Weas really believe you, and that you had determined to cast off and expose the deception which they had practised on you. Now, elder brother Wyandots, you have long known me, and I know you. You called to me to come to Detroit. I have now come forward, and we see one another face to face. Your voice was extended to us; you called us together at Detroit, and then you deceived us, and led us astray.

Now, Father Big Knife, listen! When I heard your voice, I wondered at the cause. You appeared to look on us as if we were British; or perhaps you had forgot us. I heard you speak first, father; you told us of the British. You told us if the tomahawk was presented from any quarter, not to receive it; to look to you, to confide in you, and to listen to none but you. Again, father, it was at Detroit, where I had lost my own flesh, it was there I thought of the advice you had before given me. When we got to Detroit, and was sitting there, the British pointed at us, and called us Americans, and now we have come here to you, you call us British. Again, father: When I see you hold up the tomahawk to me, you tell me, if I take it, our blood shall be no more spilt by the Americans; that, if I do this, and look to you, and confide in you, all will be well with me. I therefore take hold of your tomahawk now, father, and I look to you to fulfil your words. Now, father, when I come forward to take hold of your tomahawk, you see me, and are acquainted with me. I am not the beginner, I am a younger brother, and for this reason I come in amongst the last.

Now, listen! I particularly address the Kentucky militia, and all the people who plant. I take hold of your hands for this cause; when the Kentucky militia spoke to me, I listened to what they said: I take fast hold of your hands.

And now, my elder brothers Kentucky militia, and Pattawatamies, I want you to listen to me. You are seated where I was once seated. You are now in the place, and on the lands I once occupied. And now, elder brothers Kentucky militia, I do not speak to you alone, I speak to the Pattawatamies also. I wish you to listen to me. I hope you will attend better to what I say than they do: for they never grant what I ask. What I have heretofore said, was more for amusement than any thing else.

Now, FATHER, listen: You have pointed out every thing which was good—and, in the middle of all, you have raised up the tomahawk. When I laid aside the tomahawk of the British, I never expected to take up a tomahawk again; but I now take fast hold of your tomahawk. I do not know what the result may be; it may be the destruction of all us red people, but the Great Spirit knows best, and he will direct. I understand you have been sent by our Great Father, the President, and that you expected to meet all your red children here; but, as many have not attended, I suppose you will be disappointed.

Now, FATHERS, listen: We have come here together; you are acquainted with we Weas. I am one of the younger brothers; I am not the beginner; I have come in at the last, and cast my lot in with yours.

Wabachecky, or White Fish, an Ottawa chief, then spoke as follows:

FATHERS: It is ordered by the Great Spirit that we meet here to-day, and talk together. You would have heard our voice long ago, but we waited to hear the voice of our elder brothers, the Shawanese, and they tell us to speak for ourselves. I remember what I told you on board the vessel at Erie; I then took hold of your hand. I remember I then begged you to have pity on us—to have pity on your red children; and all you see here now are friends. When you first spoke of the hatchet, we were ready to take it up; we want nothing said on the subject now. Here is a Chippewa chief, too, who is ready to take it up. We are all ready and willing to take up your tomahawk; we want nothing more said on the subject. Here is also a chief from the heads of Grand river come to this council, and has brought a speech, and a belt of wampum from his people; they are ready to join with you. The Pattawatamies, who are here, are all of the same mind as we are; they are all ready to take hold of your tomahawk.

FATHER: The reason you see our young men, and not our chief, here, is, that our chief is sick; we left him very sick, and not able to ride. These papers (handing some papers) belong to the Ottawas; these will show they are friends of yours; they have not changed their minds, and have kept these papers as an evidence of their friendship for you.

Toonqui-ish, an Ottawa, then came forward, and said:

FATHER: I do not like to hold this piece of property (holding in his hand a British medal) which I received from the Red Coats. I see my brothers, the Wyandots, have thrown theirs away; and I now throw mine away, or give it to you.

Little Otter, a Kickapoo chief, then came forward and proceeded:

Now FATHER: Seated at this place with your red children, you have heard all their voices.

FATHER: When I hear you all, when I see you all agree on one thing, and with one voice speak one thing, why should I turn aside when I see you all agree on one thing, and take measures to make the bonds of friendship more strong between you? I cast in my lot with yours.

Listen, FATHER: I discovered myself in a pitiful situation. When I saw all my red brethren flocking towards Detroit, I thought to get relief there, and I followed hindmost of all.

And now, FATHER HARRISON, listen: I often thought of the words you had spoken to me at Vincennes, but it was too late. After I had got seated at Detroit, I saw the British move off from there; I thought it would not do to follow them. I saw you coming, Father, and I remained there. And now, you have heard all I have to say, I salute you all; and I bow with reverence to the Great Spirit.

General Harrison then, after some introductory observations, presented the war belt, &c. which was accepted with great enthusiasm by the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Kickapoos, Ottawas, and a part of the Miamies present; and was carried round by the chiefs of each of the tribes in their turn, singing the war song, and dancing the war dance. And the council adjourned, after giving instructions to the agents to furnish the Indians with whiskey, to whet their hatchets, &c.

SUNDAY, 17th July, 1814.

Despatches on various subjects relative to the mission, and to Indian affairs, generally, were this day made out by the commissioners, and forwarded, by express, to Chillicothe, from thence to be conveyed by mail to Washington city, directed to the Secretary of War.

MONDAY, 18th July, 1814.

The Indians having received a quantity of whiskey, in order to sharpen their hatchets, as they expressed it, were unfit for any business this day.

TUESDAY, 19th July, 1814.

This day the council house was cleared out, and a war post erected therein, round which the Indians, at their own request, had a great war dance, which continued the greater part of the day.

WEDNESDAY, 20th July, 1814.

An invitation came from the Crane, head chief of the Wyandots, to the commissioners, asking them to attend a religious dance which their red children were to perform early in the afternoon, and no other business was attempted.

THURSDAY, 21st July, 1814.

The council met. Present: The chiefs of the Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Miamies, Kickapoos, and Ottawas.

General Harrison then addressed all the nations present; and, informing them that he had understood the British were spreading the information amongst them, that they had been at war with France for a number of years, and had finally subdued that nation, and succeeded in placing on the throne of France the brother of the former King, who was the friend of the British, and who would join them in the war against America; as, also, that several other of the Powers, on the continent of Europe, would assist them in the war against this country, and that the Americans must be beaten in the contest; the greater part of which was fabricated by them, to answer their usual purposes of deception,—he then went on to explain to them the situation of affairs on the continent of Europe, and that the present King of France was not only our friend, but that all the great Powers engaged in his cause, (the British excepted) were friendly to us; that they would take no part in the war between us and Great Britain, but would leave them and us to fight our own battles; that many of the Powers of Europe had the same jealousy of British usurpations as we had; but that, admitting they could send against us all the force of the kingdoms in friendship with them, they would be unable to conquer the United States. That the truth was, the French people themselves got tired of Bonaparte, because they found, under him, their taxes increased, their young men sacrificed to his ambition, and that, so long as he governed them, there was little probability of their ever being restored to peace. That the great council of the nation seeing this, and being joined by the people, they, with one voice, agreed to throw Bonaparte off, and to reinstate their former line of Kings; and that, so far from the British bringing all these things about, by their armies, they never were able, but in one instance, to penetrate France with their army; and that, even then, this army of theirs was several hundred miles distant from where those transactions above mentioned took place, and had no act or part in them. That our people, and the red people, were the only nations on earth who were really free, and governed by men of their own choice, and that this ought to induce them to be on terms of friendship with each other; because, when we fight, we fight to protect our rights, our women, and children, but, when the British fight, they feel no interest in the contest; they were compelled to fight as their King directed, and had no choice; they were, in fact, slaves, and obliged to obey the commands of their master; and the vast number of soldiers who deserted from the British, whenever opportunity offered, would go to prove how unwillingly they served, and how glad they were to escape. He then explained to them an affair which lately took place, on, or near, the river Thames, in Upper Canada, where thirty of our militia had surprised and beaten sixty British militia; had killed their officer, and taken all their baggage, horses, &c.

He also informed them that a runner had just arrived from Walk-in-the-Water, with a speech, expressive of his abhorrence of the British cause, and his determination to adhere, in future, to the United States; that sickness had rendered him unable to attend, but that he would be governed by any agreement Crane might enter into; and would, in all events, support the cause of the United States, and embark his all with them; and that no circumstances whatever should induce him, in future, to join the British.

He then informed all the tribes that a treaty would be prepared, expressive of the friendship of the United States and their red children towards each other, and all who thought proper, might come forward and sign it; that it would be ready by to-morrow, and would then be explained to them.

After which, Picon, head chief of the Miami nation, spoke as follows:

FATHER Big Knife, listen! Grandfather, Delawares; brothers Wyandots, Senecas, Shawanese, and all present, listen to what I have to say. You wish me, Miami, to make reply—listen. Father, when I heard you present the tomahawk to me, I took hold of it with all my might, and I join you, with my grandfather, the Delawares; brothers, Wyandots, Senecas, Shawanese, Pattawatamies, Kickapoos, and Ottawas, and will strike with you and them.

FATHER: You said you wished to hear us, and to know whether we Miamies should be included in the treaty. Why should we not be included? Father, our young men are all agreed with us. When you spoke of our lands last year, at Detroit, we laid fast hold of the tomahawk with you; we do the same now.

Now, FATHER: I was glad to hear you speak of including us in the treaty, and that our lands should be secured to us so long as the sun shone on them. All our people are glad with me, Father, that you confirm to us our lands, and that you will not deduct from us our victualling.

And now, FATHER: It is unnecessary for me to multiply words. I will do my best to comply with every thing I have engaged to do. The Great Spirit sees what we are doing, and he will be the judge of our actions, and see if we fulfil our engagements.

And the council adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, 22d July, 1814.

The council met. The treaty was submitted, and explained, particularly, sentence by sentence. The interpreters were each sworn to explain it faithfully and correctly, and, after being so explained, was signed by a number of chiefs of each nation, therein named, and by most of them with great apparent willingness and satisfaction.

After which, the council adjourned till to-morrow.

I certify that the foregoing is a correct and impartial journal of the proceedings of the commissioners, in the late negotiation with the Northwestern Indian tribes, and that, when the speeches are given at full length, they are nearly verbatim as delivered by the speaker, or, as rendered by the interpreter; and that, where the substance merely is given, the ideas of the speaker are preserved, as near as may be, allowing for the difference of style.

JAMES DILL, Secretary to the Commissioners.

GREENVILLE, 23d July, 1814.

Extract of a letter from General Harrison and Governor Cass to the Secretary of War.

GREENVILLE, 23d July, 1814.

We have the honor to enclose you a treaty, which was yesterday concluded with the several tribes of Indians assembled at this place. We flatter ourselves that both the matter and manner of the instrument will be satisfactory; two or three Miami chiefs only, refuse to sign, of all that were present. One is a half Frenchman, whom we know to have been in British pay, with the rank of Captain in the Indian Department. His objection was, that he wished to remain neutral. We gave them all distinctly to understand, that no neutrals would be permitted unless they would remain within the settlements. If they object to this, it is our decided opinion that they ought to be seized and taken to a place where they can do no injury.

The Secretary of War to Major General Pinckney.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1814.

SIR:

The policy dictated, as well by the unprovoked, and unjustifiable conduct of the hostile Creeks, as by a due regard to the future safety of the Southwestern frontier, may be brought under the following heads, viz.

1st. An indemnification (for expenses incurred by the United States in prosecuting the war) by such cession or cessions of land, as may be deemed an equivalent for said expenses.

2d. A stipulation, on their part, that they will cease all intercourse with any Spanish post, garrison, or town, and that they will not admit among them, any agent or trader, who does not derive his authority or licence from the United States.

3d. An acknowledgment of a right in the United States to open roads through their territory; to navigate all waters and streams within the same, and also to establish therein, such military posts and trading houses as may be deemed necessary and proper. And,

4th. A surrender of the prophets and other instigators of the war, who will be held subject to the orders of the President.

With these outlines as your guide, you are authorized, in conjunction with Colonel Hawkins, to open and conclude a treaty of peace with the hostile Creeks, so soon as they shall express a desire to put an end to the war.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General PINCKNEY.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 20, 1814.

Sir:

Since the date of my last letter, it has occurred to me, that the proposed treaty with the Creeks should take a form altogether military, and be in the nature of a capitulation; in which case the whole authority of making and concluding the terms will rest with you, exclusively, as commanding General. In this transaction, should it take place, Colonel Hawkins, as agent, may be usefully employed.

I am, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General PINCKNEY.

August 8, 1814.

The chiefs of the Creek nation assembled at their square, and sent for General Jackson and Colonel Hawkins, to visit them. On arriving there, the Speaker, Tustunnuggee Thluccho, likewise said he wished to confer with the General on some points relative to the boundary up Coosa river, particularly to accommodate Au-ba-coo-che, at the solicitation of Is-ho-loh-tee, by giving back some lands west of Coosa. The General objected to the accommodation, as the people in that quarter had been already sufficiently provided for, and the ground asked for had been the thoroughfare of the murderers.

The Speaker then addressed the General:

The points now about boundary are pretty well settled, and we shall sign it; but, before we do it, and yield it up, we have something to say to you. We are a poor distressed people, involved in ruin, which we have brought on ourselves. It is not caused by any foreign people among us, but of our own color, of our own land, and who speak our tongue. They rose against us to destroy us, and we could not help ourselves. We called on three brothers, Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, to help, but they did not come. We then called on Colonel Hawkins for our white friends and brothers to help, and you came. You have seen our red and white brothers mix their blood in battle; you have risked your own life for us, and came here; and here we meet. You have saved my life, and I am thankful for it. We have put our heads together and counselled on it, and have come to one opinion about it, and what we should do. We, the Creek nation, give you three miles square of land, to be chosen where you like, from that we are going to give up. We wish you to take it where you like, and as near us as you can, as, if we have need of you, you will be near to aid and advise us. We give you this in remembrance of the important services you have done us, and our token of the gratitude of the nation.

There is a man near you, Colonel Hawkins, the same, we give him three miles square. He has long been among us, helping of us, and doing good for our nation, and is their friend. He and I met at Coleraine, and were young men, and are now old; his children are born in our land. He is to select his land we give, where he chooses, on the land we are about to give up, and to sit down on it; and, if he dies, his children will have a place to live on. We do this as a token of the gratitude of the nation.

There is standing by you, George Mayfield, a white man, raised in our land, a good and true man, an interpreter; we give him one mile square of land, near you, that you may have an interpreter at hand, if we have need of you to talk with you.

Here is an old interpreter, thirty years in our service, Alexander Cornells; we give him one mile square of land to sit down on, where he selects, and near Colonel Hawkins, that he may continue his usefulness to us.

General Jackson replied, he should accept of this national mark of their regard for him, if approved of by the President, and he, the President, would appropriate its value to aid in clothing their naked women and children. He was well pleased they had noticed their old friend Colonel Hawkins, and his children born among them; and their conduct on this head, towards him and them, was much to the credit of the nation.

Colonel Hawkins replied, I have been long among you, and grown gray in your service. I shall not much longer be your agent. You all know me, that, when applied to by red, white, or black, I looked not to color, but to the justice of the claim. I shall continue to be friendly and useful to you while I live, and my children, born among you, will be so brought up as to do the same. I accept your present, and esteem it the more highly by the manner of bestowing it, as it resulted from the impulse of your own minds, and not from any intimation from the General or me.

Interpreted by ALEXANDER CORNELLS.

GEORGE LEVETT.

I certify the preceding to be the substance of what passed on the subjects embraced therein, between the parties named in my presence.

CHARLES CASSEDY, Acting Secretary.

Eight P. M. This morning the chiefs expressed to Colonel Hawkins they did not give to General Jackson the land to day to give it back to them in clothing, and other things; they want him to live on it, and when he is gone (dead) his family may have it, and that it may always be known what the nation gave it to him for. They say in the instrument to convey their intentions, expressed this day, it must be plainly expressed which are the towns, masters of the land; that they have been uniformly friendly to the United States, and faithful to their engagements in peace and war; that they consider the extending the line through their lands in the Lower Creeks as taking from them more than the equivalent offered, and they have claims which should be attended to. But as the General has no power about them, they will sign the line with him, it being demanded by him, and advised by their friend Colonel Hawkins, and there being no Red Club chiefs, masters of land, to do business with him. Mrs. Hawkins must be put in, with her children, as she has had much trouble to teach the Indians to spin and weave. The instrument of conveyance was drawn accordingly, under the interpretation of Mr. Cornells and Major McIntosh.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS, Agent for Indian Affairs.

We, the undersigned, chiefs of the Creek nation, now assembled at the treaty held between the friendly and hostile Indians, on the one part, and Major General Andrew Jackson, for the United States, of the other part, make known to all whom it may concern: That Cussetah and Coweta are the head towns of the Creeks, and, with Tuckaubatchee and Ooseoche, the owners of the Creek lands; and call ourselves, as we are, masters of the land. We have adhered faithfully, in peace and war, to our treaty stipulations with the United States. Finding that General Jackson, in drawing the lines around our country, to retain as much of that conquered from the hostile Indians as he deemed just, found it necessary, for political motives and purposes, to run a line from Oakfuskee, through our lands, which commences on the dividing ridge between the waters of the Upper and Lower Creeks, to Chattahoochee, and thence, eastwardly to the boundary of Georgia, within which there is a great quantity of lands actually our property, for which, he, as an equivalent, leaves to the conquered Indians lands between Coosa and Tallapoosa, we do not deem the exchange an equivalent. It shall not, however, interfere with the running the line, as we rely on the justice of the United States to cause justice to be done us, and on these conditions:

We request that General Pinckney's letter of the 23d April to Colonel Hawkins, and the answer thereto, of the 25th, be sent on with the treaty, which we will sign after delivering this instrument.

1st. Wishing to give a national mark of gratitude to Major General Andrew Jackson, for his distinguished services rendered at the head of the army from Tennessee, we give and grant to him, and his heirs, forever, three miles square of land, at such place as he may select, out of the retained lands.

2d. Our nation feel under obligations to Colonel Benjamin Hawkins, our agent, and to Mrs. Lavinia Hawkins, his wife, for the unwearied pains they have taken, both of them, for a long time, to introduce the plan of civilization among us, and to be useful to us; and as their children are born in our land, we, as a token of gratitude, give and grant to Colonel Hawkins, for himself, his wife, and children, three miles square of land, to him, and his heirs, forever, to be located in such part of the retained land as Colonel Hawkins may select, in one tract, or surveys of one mile square each.

3d. We give and grant to George Mayfield, our interpreter with General Jackson, a white man, raised in our land, one mile square of land, to him and his heirs, forever, where he may select, as a mark of our respect for his honesty and usefulness to us as interpreter.

4thly and lastly. We give and grant to Alexander Cornells, a half-breed, our old and faithful interpreter, who has long been in the public service, one mile square of land, at his option, in the retained land or lands of the Creeks, at his option to be located by him. We finally request, that the Government of the United States will ratify the foregoing acts of national gratitude, and by suitable deeds of conveyance to enable the parties to receive and hold the said lands, agreeable to our intentions, as herein expressed.

Given under our hands and seals, at the treaty ground, fort Jackson, 9th August, 1814.

[Signed by Tustunnuggee Thlucco, Speaker of the nation, Upper Creeks, and a number of other chiefs.]

Extract of a letter from Major General Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT JACKSON, 10th August, 1814.

SIR:

On yesterday evening my negotiations with the Creek nation were closed, by a cession to the United States of a territory, which will be considered an ample indemnification for all expenses incurred in prosecuting the war on this frontier. Considerations, interesting to the United States, relative to the Spanish dominions immediately south of us, induced me to procure the cession of all the Creek lands of consequence, bounding on foreign claims of territory, in order to prevent future connexions, injurious to our tranquillity. The documents which are evidence of this cession, I do not think proper to trust to ordinary means of conveyance, and therefore transmit them by Mr. Cassidy, from whom every explanatory information can be had, who will, as soon as practicable, hand them to the War Department.

CREEK AGENCY, 11th January, 1813.

I have not heard of the arrival of the annuity of the Creeks for the last year, and it should have been paid them by the end of the year. General Mason informed me of his having sent on that part called for in iron, steel, and cotton cards, by inland navigation. I have written to him to day; I have not heard of its arrival, and that I know of no inland navigation from Washington city to Georgia.

Travelling continues safe through the agency. I have had only one complaint for the last quarter; from a man robbed of small things on the public road, to the amount of nineteen dollars and a half, which, on application, I have paid, and charged to their stipend. Our chiefs are perfectly willing, and I am determined, that such complaints shall be satisfied in like manner.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

CREEK AGENCY, 18th January, 1813.

I have not heard from you on my communication of the 7th ult. I received from an Indian of note, low down on Flint river, the following information, which I have communicated to General Flournoy: "Paine is dead of his wounds; the warring Indians have quit this settlement, and gone down to Tellaugre Chapcopopeau, a creek which enters the ocean south of Moscheto river, at a place called the Fishery. Such of their stock as they could command had been driven in that direction, and he believed the negroes were going the same way. The lands beyond the creek towards Florida point, were, for a considerable distance, open savannas, with ponds; and, still beyond the land, stony, to the point." I have been kept too much in the dark relative to occurrences in East Florida. The political error of General Mathews embarrassed every thing. I attribute the darkness here to your being pretty much so yourselves, owing to your knowledge that something should be done, and not being authorized to act with effect.

On the 20th September, I recommended the report from the deputation to the Seminoles, in which the Spanish commandant at St. Marks was explicit as to the expected arrival of British troops. Some Indians below and near the forks of this river have received like information from Providence, and a British force is expected some where to the South and West. Our chiefs are, at times, much alarmed, from foolish reports circulated among them by idle worthless white people. Mr. Cornells, our assistant agent and interpreter for the Upper Creeks, and one of our most distinguished chiefs, writes me on the 16th: "I never saw nor heard so many lies as white people bring from Georgia: they disturb our chiefs very much. If there could be a stop put to these white liars, it would be a good thing, but I am afraid it will be our ruin." This dreadful mania seems to pervade our country, and is a serious alarming evil.

Travelling through the agency is perfectly safe, and the mails regular. The contractors are going on to complete the bridges. Captain Moore, with his command, was one hundred and seventy miles in advance on the 16th, and Captain Nix at fort Hawkins, waiting for the contract.

I am, with great personal regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Colonel MONROE, acting as Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 1st March, 1813.

I have been much afflicted of late, with a cough and rheumatism. Our winter has been very severe, and of long duration. Here, in lat. 32° 39', every thing has still a wintery appearance, except our wheat fields. Mr. Barnard, the assistant agent and interpreter for the Lower Creeks, has just returned, after accompanying the troops to the Upper towns, and visiting the executive council of the nation. He has seen and conversed with most of our distinguished chiefs, who expressed to him a unanimous determination to be and remain with us, if they can. They complain "that the current of misrepresentation against them, from their white neighbors, seems to be generating hostility towards them, which is to jeopardise their peace and safety, unless it can be checked by the President of the United States: That their nation is not only charged with what their wicked young people do, although they, without delay, give satisfaction for it; but with whatever every idle worthless vagabond chooses to invent and circulate against them."

Travelling, and the passage of the mail, is perfectly safe through the agency. We have three mails due from the city of Washington, which leaves us in the dark as to occurrences there. We have heard nothing of the stipend for the last year.

I am, respectfully, and with great personal regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 25th March, 1813.

I have sent Mr. Doyell up to you with a talk for the chiefs of the Creek nation. The subject is a serious one. Let me know the name of the Tuskegee warrior, whose name I cannot find out from the spelling of General Robertson. If your chiefs cannot fulfil their engagements, we shall be involved in ruin. We must do more than talk and promise. The killing, in a most barbarous manner, seven families, in a time of peace, and by chiefs, and their associates, sent on the business of the nation, makes this an act of the nation; and the nation must clear themselves of the guilt, by delivering up the culprits to the laws of the United States. Last year we solemnly promised to do justice to the white people, if they would give us a little time, and we executed eight for murder. There remains some yet alive, but they had fled our country. This year commences with the murder of seven families of our white friends, and war talks from the Northern nations to the four nations, to join in the war against the United States. The war talk comes with beads and hair, and our party kill seven families to hurry on the war. The Northern nations have a back country to go to, we have none. What do we want to do with war? Do we expect to drive the United States and take their country? This is impossible. Have the United States taken any land, or threatened to take any from us? They have not. Have they done us any injury for sixteen years that I have been among you? They have not. They have secured our lands so that it can only be purchased fairly from us; they have, at great expense, taught us to clothe and feed ourselves; all who have listened to my talks, can make their clothing, have hogs, cattle, farms, and money, and many of you have peaches, and might have other fruits, such as is common to white people. You have a public road through the country, on which the travellers leave a great deal of money every year. If you have any thing for sale, you can get money for it; and you now know what money is; all this is to be exchanged for war; and what will war bring us? An army, who will destroy our towns, kill our warriors, drive our women and children into the swamps to perish, and take our whole country to pay the expenses. The United States are great, powerful, and just. If we are friends, we have nothing to fear; their justice will preserve all our rights. If we make ourselves their enemies, their power will destroy us. All our old chiefs remember the last war with the British, when the Indians helped their friends, the British. The United States were then young, few in number, and unable to make their arms and other munitions of war; they have now more than doubled their numbers, can make their clothing, and every thing necessary in war. If the British and Indians could do nothing with them then, what can we do with them now? Our country is an open one; armies can come among us, any season of the year. They can bring their cattle and hogs for food with them; can find a great many cattle among us; will establish their forts at all suitable places, and keep the country; and what are we to do? We are brave men, and can die in battle; but is it not better to live, and enjoy our own property and the fine prospects before us, arising out of the plan of civilization? Is it not better to take murderers and thieves, and deliver them up to the laws of the United States, to answer for their own crimes, than for us to die in battle for them, to lose our country, and bring destruction on our women and children?

I have sent a talk to the chiefs of the Lower Creeks to help you if they can. I have stated your difficulties, and some which they are under themselves. I do not know what they can do. The love of rum has almost destroyed Cussetah and Uchee: whole families live by stealing from me. They even kill my cattle, to get the skins to buy whiskey. I have mentioned these things to the chiefs, and shall wait a little to see what they will do. I am here ready to help, but what can I do if the chiefs will not do their duty? How can I say one word in favor of a people, who, for want of doing their duty, encourage murderers to kill our friends, and the thieves to steal property from those who are placed here to save the nation? Are a few thieves to destroy the character of our nation? You are one of the great chiefs of this nation, and an officer of the United States. It is through you, principally, all my talks have gone to the nation. You have labored with me for their good; we know each other well. I have had no secrets in the affairs of your nation, or tricks to play off against you; all was public, fair, open, and above board. After all we have done, notwithstanding the murders of the last year, and the enmity manifested against us by some white people, hostile to our rights, I had confidence in the promises of the chiefs; I had confidence in their good sense, and boldly came forward in the defence of their transactions. You must exert yourself on the present trying occasion. You must cause justice to be done as it is demanded, and you must, as soon as you can, come down to see us.

Your cards and iron is come to fort Hawkins. I have hired a man to wagon it up to your house, and he will be there as soon as the road gets a little firm. I write you as one of your chiefs.

I am, your friend,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

MR. ALEXANDER CORNELLS, Assistant Agent and Interpreter, Upper Creeks.

Colonel Hawkins, Agent for Indian Affairs, to Tustunnuggee Thlucco, Oche Haujo, and every chief of the Upper Creeks.

CREEK AGENCY, 29th March, 1813.

I have received a communication from General Robertson, Agent of the Chickasaws, of the 5th of this month, from which I send you the following: "Seven families have been murdered near the mouth of Ohio, and most cruelly mangled, shewing all the savage barbarity that could be invented. One woman cut open, a child taken out and stuck on a stake. The Chickasaws were charged with the murder; but it has since so happened, that the Creeks were seen passing near Bear creek settlement, on their way home, and acknowledged they had committed the murder; that they had been with the Shawanee prophet, and had hairs and beads, with talks, from the Prophet and the Northern tribes, to these four Southern nations, to take up the hatchet against the United States. Two of the principal men of the Creek nation were along, leaders of the party, one named Tustunnuggee Ooche, of Wewocau, who lives at the Black Warrior; the other, Oosetenaule Keich Tustkey, living in Tuskegee. These are the people who brought the invitation to the Chickasaws to attend the grand council at Tuckaubatchee, after the Creeks had reported they had killed the party who murdered the people at the mouth of Duck river."

The name of the Tuskegee warrior is not spelt right, but you know him. Of all the murderous acts committed by savages against the people of the United States, this is the most outrageous. It is not done by thoughtless, wild young men, but deliberately, by a party under the command of two chiefs: and, what makes it still worse, by chiefs sent by the Creek nation on a public mission of peace and friendship to the Chickasaws, with the nation's talks, and a letter from the assistant agent and the Creeks—a great nation, in peace and friendship with the United States, and daily giving assurances to me of their determination to remain so. It now becomes my duty to inform you, this murderous outrage must be settled immediately, and in a friendly way. You must get together, one and all; turn out your warriors; apprehend the two chiefs and their associates, and deliver them to me, or some officer of the United States commanding on the frontiers, to be punished according to the laws of the United States. This you are bound to do, by the eighth article of the treaty of New York. Nothing less than this will satisfy the Government of the United States. Let me hear from you, as soon as you get together. This affair will not admit delay. The guilty must suffer for their crimes, or your nation will be involved in their guilt.

CREEK AGENCY, 25th March, 1813.

The enclosed communication will exhibit a recent complaint against the Creeks, as well as the course I have taken, in relation to it, to cause justice to be done. I have taken for granted the statement of General Robertson is true, although we have no instance, in the recollection of the oldest men among us, of chiefs, sent on a public pacific mission, ever having acted in so outrageous a manner. I received, to-day, a letter from Mr. Cornells, the interpreter for the Upper Creeks, and one of our most distinguished chiefs, of the 26th. He says, "I returned yesterday evening from a council of the chiefs: the Little Warrior, (one of the chiefs who led the party charged with the murders) who made a visit last winter to the tribes on the Northern lakes, returned home a few days since, and reported to our people that he had brought on talks from the Shawanese and from the British. The council held yesterday was in consequence of the reports, and to investigate the nature of the talks brought from the northward: but, on finding the purport of these several talks was to engage this tribe in a war with the whites, the Little Warrior was severely reprimanded by the rest of the chiefs, and ordered immediately to leave the council house, as a man unworthy to have a seat in it."

I have heard of the arrival of the cards and iron at fort Hawkins. I have delivered five hundred spinning wheels for the last year, and shall distribute the cards in the course of the ensuing week. I have not heard of the arrival of the money for the Creek stipend for the last year; the chiefs express some surprise at its being so long withheld from them.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

I have made a like communication to General Pinckney.
GENERAL ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

FORT HAWKINS, 6th April, 1813.

An express is just arrived from the chiefs of the Upper Creeks, to inform me a white man is murdered, and one wounded, on the post road; about 200 miles from this. I believe, the murder near the mouth of Ohio, will be proved in the nation on the persons charged by General Robertson. The chiefs are to meet on the 9th, and request my advice and direction, as they are determined to be friends with the white people, their friends and neighbors, if they can, and will exert themselves with all their strength to this end. The Lower Creeks have promised to aid them. I have advised them to call out their warriors immediately, and, if not sufficient, to call out the warriors of the Lower Creeks, and, if they are not sufficient, to call on me, and I will assist them. I have directed them to deliver the murderers to me, and punish the mischief makers themselves. It is certain, runners are in the Upper Creeks from the Indians of the lakes, with war talks from them and the British. They are promised arms and ammunition, to be delivered to them at Pensacola, if they will take them against the United States. The chiefs are more alarmed than I have ever known them to be before. The mischief-makers seem determined to try their strength. As soon as I hear from the meeting of the nation, I will give you all I get, in detail, and an opinion founded on it. As the mail is soon to pass, I can only add,

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

Efau Haujo, of Tuckaubatchee, died last year: these two are all remaining of those provided for by that treaty. Under the Road convention, the Creeks are to receive 500 spinning wheels, and 500 pair cotton cards, for the present year; the contracts for the whole are made to be delivered at the end of the year, at three dollars per wheel, 1,500 dollars.

There are three bridges and one flat to be finished this year, and some iron and steel to be wagoned to the agency and to Tuckaubatchee. This, with the bridges and flats made last year, cards sent on, 500 spinning wheels delivered that year, closes the contracts under that convention.

Cotton cards should be No. 10, or upwards: some numbered 4, 5, 6, sent on last year, are of no account.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS, Agent for I. A.

The chiefs are much in want of their annuity for the last year. As I know of no cause why it is suspended, I have none to assign them. They have, as usual, made due bills for the part assigned themselves, which they have negotiated with the U. States' factory. But the remainder is wanted to pay their warriors, and other contingencies of the nation, and to assist their old people in distress.

CREEK AGENCY, 26th April, 1813.

Mr. Halsted has sent me your letter to him of the 6th. You have not had a correct statement before you, of the subject to which it relates. General Hampton had the road opened through the agency, but built no bridges over the large creeks, or flats for the three rivers. By the convention, entered into at Tuckaubatchee, relative to the road, the United States were to build the bridges and flats, to regulate the tolls, and to give one thousand spinning wheels, one thousand pair cotton cards, half in 1812, half in the present year, &c. Your predecessor ordered the convention to be carried into effect. The spinning wheels for the last year have been made, paid for, and mostly delivered. The cards are received at the United States' trading house. Four bridges, over large creeks, and two flats, were made and paid for in that year; the three for which the draught in question was given, were also made. There remains one flat, and three bridges over large creeks, to be made, to complete this part of the convention. Contracts are also entered into for the five hundred spinning wheels, to be made by the end of the year.

As soon as I received orders to carry the convention into effect, I requested Mr. Halsted to advertise for contractors, in the usual form, and, on his report, to close the contracts. This was done. The rule has been, when a bridge was finished, inspected, and received, to raise an account in the usual form, on which a draft was given to Mr. Halsted to pay the same by a draft on you, at ten day's sight. The whole of the bridges and the flats would have been finished last year, but for the general sickness which pervaded all parts of our southern country. This retarded the work people of our contractors, until the rainy season put a stop to their labor. They were to resume it again the first of May, and finish the three remaining, to complete the number required by the convention.

I am, respectfully, and with great personal regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, April 26, 1813.

In my communications of the 29th March, 6th and 19th April, you have, in detail, the measures deemed proper by me, in relation to the outrageous conduct of some of the Creeks, mentioned therein. I now send you the result. No. 1, the report of the chiefs assembled in council; No. 2, my reply. I have, in my reply, availed myself of the occasion to present to the view of the Creek chiefs the necessity of viewing the navigation of Coosa river as a common right to all persons within the United States. This is alarming, in a high degree, to the Creeks, as they are fearful the whiskey trade down that river will bring ruin on their nation. But it must be got over some way, as, very soon, Tennessee must be gratified on this point.

Mr. Doyell, the assistant agent who accompanied the warriors, says he saw the four they killed at the Hickory ground: the Tuskegee warrior, one of the leaders of the murderers, was one. They could not take any alive; they fought till they were killed. Mr. Cornells, the assistant agent and interpreter for the Upper Creeks, and who is, in fact, the second chief of the nation, says he thinks the measures taken by the chiefs will apprehend or put to death the whole party. He is of opinion the reply of the chiefs is sincere, and may be relied on as such.

I am, respectfully, and with great personal regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJ. HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG.

TUCKAUBATCHEE, April 26, 1813.

We, chiefs, now in council, of the Upper Creeks, to Col. Hawkins:

You sent me a talk, and I received it. Colonel Hawkins, agent, and friend of the nation: you requested of us Upper towns to collect together, and to put to death our murderers. It is true, we have had people amongst us bringing mischief on us. Those people that committed the murder on the white people do not come in our old towns, but keep out on our frontiers, in the woods, that gives the old chiefs a great deal of trouble; and we were detained a long time, and could not get through it as quick as we wished. You mentioned the treaty of New York, made by Washington. The old chiefs turned out the young warriors; the old chiefs kept in their council; the young warriors found part of them at the Hickory ground, in a house, and they were obliged to attack them like as their enemy; they exchanged fire, and wounded one of our men; they killed four of the murderers. We thought they were all in one house, but the head of them was not, but in another house over the river. One made his escape; that party divided: one part went to the Hoithlewaulee's town; they were joined there by their brothers; and there the young warriors put to death three of the murderers. You told us that we must take them alive, and deliver them up to the laws of the United States; but that party at the Hoithlewaulee could not be taken alive, for they fought until they were killed. This is the case with all of them: for they all fight till they drop. The laws of the white people are, that they can take your people alive; but ours is not so: it is different from ours. The last murder was committed against the white people at or near the mouth of the Ohio. We old chiefs have killed seven of them; the old chiefs turned out their warriors, and punished that number; and that is all of the party that they could lay their hands on. The nation owed one life for last year: the murder that was committed on Duck river. We have been in search of this murderer ever since last Fall, but could not find him: he joined the party that committed the murder, and thought that his aunt was killed by the white people; but, since that, she has come in, and she would not let her nephew be killed; and we found out it was her fault, and we put her to death. The Little Warrior had six fellows, and he made seven, and three joined after they came in; all three we laid alongside of them; that makes seven of them. We heard of the murder that was committed on the big road, near the Wolf Path, but we could not tell, at that time, who had done it—whether it was white or red people of Oakfuskee. As soon as we found out the truth, we sent out our warriors, and had them put to death. There was two of them that committed the murder, and we killed both of them. This day we give you the account of the murderers that we have punished; and we shall make our law stronger concerning the murderers. This day we stated what we have done; and we are going to break up this day. We have been in council seventeen days. You was sent here by the United States to be agent for the Creek nation, and you was to be at the centre of the nation, near where they hold their council; and we were satisfied, when you was with us, that, when any trouble came on us, that we could be close together, and settle the business sooner; but, instead of that, you have settled off in one corner, a long way off, and we look upon you as one of our old chiefs, and you call yourself so. You sent me word that you wanted to send me an agent here; but one agent is enough for this nation. I have now given you an answer on that. Our council considers that you are a distance from us, and that we have got some of our people who have got learning from white people. This man that I want to write for us is not to be made agent of, but to write the talks of the nation.

Now I am going to state to you: You think that the Creek nation, in their mind and heart—you think that we lean to the Shawanee tribes, because you saw Tecumseh and his party dance in our square, around our fire, and some of our foolish people believed their foolish talks. It is true, they have punished white people, and we take their lives to pay, according to law. Our old chiefs and fathers have been fooled by the British. We are not a-going to follow their steps. You need not be jealous that we shall take up arms against the United States: we mean to kill all of our red people that spill the blood of our white friends. If all of the nations was a-going to make war on the white people, we would tell you that we wanted war, and not keep it as a secret; but we don't want war. The young warriors is a making of laws, the more mischief is done the more force to punish. You send a talk to the Lower Towns as well as the Upper Towns. Mr. McIntosh, of Cowetah, he brought warriors with him, and joined the Upper Towns. Mr. McIntosh's nephew was badly wounded; he was wounded at the Hickory Ground; and the other party that went to the Tekeewaulees, one of them was wounded in two places; he belongs to this town. This is all we have done on this affair.

Now, I will state another affair; we ask your opinion on the occasion: We have poor people, some may have cow hides, and some have other things, such as small fur and beeswax, to change for clothing. It appears as if all of the frontiers is blocked up, that is in Tennessee and on Tombigby settlement; some go by water. If you think but to let us know if there is no danger, that we may go to market. The Upper Towns had rather go to Tennessee, and the lower part had rather go to Bigby, by water and land, to trade. They have not got much to carry, only a little to buy some clothing, and a little powder to carry about to kill a little game, even if it is birds, not to consider it to spill blood of no color. When you think there is no danger, and send me word, then I can let the Upper Towns know.

We saw the accounts of Grierson's sons and grandsons. We old chiefs have considered the best to send them down to you, and then you can get the white people and them face to face, and settle their affair; and if they wont go, the chiefs must go and take property to satisfy the debt.

Old chiefs, your friends.

CREEK AGENCY, April 24, 1813.

I have received your communication of the 21st; your conduct does you great credit, and will give your Father, the President, pleasure. I have been of opinion that the Creek chiefs had too much understanding to meddle in the wars with white people. I never expected they would join the British against the United States; but I have expected, unless they exerted themselves, and put a stop to the murdering of our white neighbors, they would bring war and ruin on themselves. You have taken the right way to prevent this, by punishing immediately every man who violates your laws, by murdering and plundering your white neighbors. I expected you would have been able to take these fellows alive; but, as they made battle, your warriors could not do otherwise than what they have done. You must use all the measures in your power to apprehend and punish those who have escaped. If they can be taken, deliver them to me. It is not an equal number the white people want, it is the guilty; and they want no innocent person to suffer. When people join murderers to defend them, they are guilty, and it is right to punish them also.

Our armies are gathering, and I expect you will hear of a great deal of fighting this summer; take care that none of our people are engaged in it. It has been a fortunate thing that you have found out and punished the two Oakfuskee men who committed the murder and robbery on the post-road. I expect we are now in possession of Mobile, and that the Spaniards are gone off. Mobile is a part of the United States; you can go there to trade, and will be treated kindly. There is nothing to prevent your going to fort Hawkins, and the stores in the neighborhood; and your trading path to Pensacola has no obstructions. The Spaniards are our friends. In the present situation of affairs between you and Tennessee, I would not advise you to let your people go on that frontier. They are exposed on one side to the incursions of Indian war parties from the northwest, and are strongly prejudiced against you, which your people have given cause for; and, when jealousy is once up among one people against another, it requires some time to remove it. The people of Tennessee did not ask you to help them against their enemies; they looked on you as friends, and were willing to assist you to become a great people, by paying a part of the expenses necessary to the plan of civilization. While this was the case, a part of your people murdered their women and children at Duck river; and, before you settled this outrageous act, another party murdered some of their near neighbors. These things puts them to expense to raise and support armies to punish the transgressors. One complaint they have against you is, when you know these things you are slow; you do not apprehend or punish such transgressors, until it is found out among white people, and a demand made on you. As you are, from your situation, the first to know of their murdering, you should not wait to be called on, which gives an opportunity to the guilty to escape, but seize on immediately, and deliver them up to the laws of the country they have violated. As we are now in possession of Mobile, you will soon see people from Tennessee coming down Coosa, with their produce, to market; when you see that, you will see you are friends, and you may go that water path together to trade, either to Tennessee or Mobile. It is a natural right you both have; you both live in the United States; you can use the waters any where, and roads for trade or travelling, and the white people will do the same. You have, both, your land marks: touch not the land of one another, but use your waters and roads as friends. When this is the case you will be friends, and not before. When this is the case, all jealousy will be removed. All water courses were intended for the use, comfort, and accommodation, of those who live on them: those who live at the mouth use them, those who live half way up use them, and those who live on the head use them; all can make use of them, without injury to the waters or to one another. And, when that is the case, and each take care to punish transgressors, the water-path is safe and free. No one has a right to prevent the Alabama people from going to Mobile and New Orleans, through any of the waters of the United States, or the people of the Black Warrior from going the same way. It is time for us to understand these things, and to act on them.

I shall send your talk to General Pinckney, to the Secretary of War, to the Governor of Georgia, and to the Governor of the territory where the murder was committed.

I am your friend, and the friend of your nation.

It is honorable for your warriors to be wounded in obeying the orders of their chiefs.

Copy of a letter from Benjamin Hawkins to General Armstrong.

CREEK AGENCY, 3d of May, 1813.

Since my communication of the 26th ult. I have received the enclosed answer of the chiefs to my address to them of the 24th, in which I had introduced the probability of Coosa river soon being used for the purpose of trade. I have received, also, the detailed report of Mr. Doyell. The chiefs expect, as you see, a party of the Shawanese from the northwest, and are alarmed for the consequences. I am informed the Spanish commandant at St. Marks has recently issued out some powder to the Seminoles. O'Kelly, a half breed, of property, recently from Pensacola, says he saw and dined with a British officer there, who informed him he had a ship there, loaded with powder and arms, for the red people, and that, having heard the Americans had surrounded Mobile, he should go immediately and drive them off. O'Kelly had much conversation with the officer about getting drunk; he has not a distinct recollection of any thing further.

An invitation has been sent up to Tallassee, one of the largest of our Upper towns, from the Governor of Pensacola, to the British officer, to come down to Pensacola, and they have gone, about three hundred men. I know not whether this movement has originated from the information detailed by O'Kelly, or in our occupancy of Mobile; it being understood here, our troops were to take it on the 10th ult.

In the measures adopted here, I have in no instance countermanded the idea, that Indians would be employed in our wars with white people. I called on the chiefs of the Lower Creeks to aid their brethren of the Upper Creeks with their warriors, and advised their sending not less than fifty, nor more than one hundred, under their most distinguished leaders. This I was induced to do from an opinion, that, if these murderers were not punished on the first attempt, they and their adherents would gain strength; but, that a respectable force from below, under our greatest leaders, going forth, and acting promptly, and with effect, would stimulate their brethren, intimidate the adherents to war, and, if not effectually crush such abominable doings, at least give time to the chiefs to make ready to oppose with force the evils with which they were threatened.

The packet from the British, and war talks from the Indians of the lakes, were hid out by the murderers who came as runners. The speaker of the nation thinks they can be found, and in the event of their being so, shall be sent on to me. The leader of the party said he had been in one battle against the Americans, probably that against General Winchester, and came immediately thereafter to this country. The fourteen towns of the Lower Creeks, are to convene on the 5th, at Coweta, to ascertain, if they can, the object of the Spaniards in issuing out powder to the Seminoles, and what can be the object of the invitation to Pensacola, and to take measures accordingly.

The chiefs never were in greater need of their funds than at present, to pay their warriors, and contingent expenses of their government. I have told them I know not why it is withheld. It is not presumable that the calumnious reports against the Creeks, or their agent, fabricated in Tennessee and Tombigby, aided by a mite from the frontiers of Georgia, could have had any weight with the Government.

I do not know what we shall do about the stoppage of the mail in this direction. The sub-contractors and riders have been so long without money, they are discouraged, and unable to procure horses or food. I have apprised the postmaster of this on the 29th March, and subsequently.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

TUCKAUBATCHEE, 26th April, 1813.

SIR:

You have given your talks to the chiefs of the nation. They considered on it, and they give you an answer, with a runner, to let you know what they had done, and you gave them an answer, and received it. At sunset a runner came to one of the party in pursuit of the Little Warrior, of We-wo-cau; when the meeting broke up, the chiefs ordered three men, appointed to find the Little Warrior; Captain Isaac was one, Ta-lo-see Fix-i-co, Is-poak-oke Haujo, was the party. One of the party discovered where he was, in the swamp, and at last they got him out of the swamp; he was well armed with arrows, gun, and pistols, and he was determined to kill any person that would oppose him. You told us the treaty was to deliver the murderers up to the law of the United States; when we punished the others, he knew that he had to die, and it was out of our power to take him alive, and we had to put him to immediate death. You told us, that he had talks for the nation, and I told you he had no orders for these talks from the nation; what I tell you is the truth. Last night, about 10 o'clock, he was killed by Is-poak-oke Haujo, and his party, on the sunrise side, about one quarter of a mile from the Coosa river; the first and second man's gun snapped at him, but the third man's gun fired and killed; Tallitick Haujo, he is the man that killed him; he is one of the We-wo-cau; four men, that had on pouches, kept them shaking, following after him, so that he could not hear the gun snap; if he had found out that, he would have wounded a good many with his arrows; when they put him to death, they burned his arrows. When the chiefs kept in council, they made strong laws; we have killed eight for the murder at the mouth of the Ohio; two for the murder at the Wolf-path; one for last year, for the murder at Duck river; in all eleven, since the 16th of this month. The Shawanese sent the Little Warrior, as a runner, to inform this nation that they were a-coming; if they should come in this nation, you will distract the nation; I wish you would keep them back. I wish you would inform the agent of the Chickasaws not to let them come in, or through their land; and, likewise, the people of Tennessee; for, if they should come, it will not be for our good, and I leave it to you, for to keep a watch and a look out; this is the notice that I give you; do as you please with it.

There is one thing I am going to mention to you; the talks that we received from you this day, we have considered on it; we have done all we could to punish our murderers; you have told us, that if we did not punish all of them, that we should lose our land to Chattahoochee, and to Coosa waters. The chiefs thought best to save their land, and they did all in their power, and punished all they could: that no nation was to come and cross in our land by land or water, to bring trouble in our rights. Now, you white people have large, and a great many people to surround us; you have told us that there was no enemy to come and disturb us; that if you saw any, you would be able to keep them back; that nothing should fret the nation. Now, Colonel Hawkins, you say you are a friend to the nation, and one of the old chiefs; if any people of any nation should use the waters of the Coosa, it will bring trouble on us, and I hope you will inform the people of Tennessee, and Cherokees, of these talks; that if any thing should happen, I shall tell you I told you of it. I have stated this to you; the nation was obliged to give up the public road, and they knew that would bring trouble on them, and since that, the nation have spilt blood, and we had to give satisfaction. If they have give up the waters of the Coosa, it will hurt the feelings of the Creeks; it will not do. You thought you would mention this waters to them, to bring trouble on them, and destruction at once; you mean to destroy us, on these waters, in trying to make use of it, when we don't allow of it. You have mentioned nothing of the horses that I mentioned to you, and about the native that we want to write for us.

I am, your's,

BIG WARRIOR, + his mark.

Colonel BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Report of Nimrod Doyell, Assistant Agent for Indian Affairs, to Colonel Hawkins, the Agent.

On the 16th of April, the chiefs of the Creek nation assembled in their council house, at Tuckaubatchee; requested me, with James Cornelns and David Tate, to accompany the warriors, to witness their conduct in executing the orders of the nation, on the demand for satisfaction of the 25th March. The orders to the warriors was strictly in conformity to the demand. The chiefs McIntosh, of Coweta, and Tustunnuggee Hopoie, of Tuckaubatchee, commanded the party sent after the Little Warrior, and his party, who committed the murder near the mouth of Ohio, in February. The warriors marched that day, expecting to find them at the Kahowlaw village. We followed in the morning, to overtake them that day. In the evening, information was received, that the murderers, or a part of them, were at the Hickory ground, and a part gone to Hoithlewaulee; upon which, the warriors divided, marched all night, and, before day, the party going to the Hickory ground surrounded the house they occupied, and attempted to force the door. The murderers having discovered them, fastened the door, gave the war whoop, began their war dance, and fired on the warriors. It was returned, and the firing continued as long as the murderers had any balls. Fire was put to the house; the Tuskegee warrior was wounded, and burnt in the house; two others wounded, who requested to be taken out of the fire; having crawled to the door, were taken out twenty yards from the house, and there put to death with tomahawks. They were brothers of the Tuskegee warrior, and young men. Two broke from the house and run to get off; one was wounded and got off. The other, Hocolen, overtaken and killed at the river side. These two were from Tuckaubatchee, and both young men. During the fight, the Tuskegee warrior said he had killed and eaten white people, and he had killed and cut open the white woman near the mouth of the Ohio. These four we saw after they were dead; some we knew of ourselves, and the one in the house then burning, was reported to us by the warriors, who knew and reported his conversation. The Little Warrior had that night remained the other side of the river, and escaped for the present. Three chiefs, Captain Isaacs, Ta-lo-see Fix-i-co, and Is-poak-oke Haujo, were ordered by the chiefs, each of them, to take a party and pursue him. They found where he was, in a swamp, decoyed him out, and put him to death; he was well armed with pistols, a gun, bow and arrows, and fought till he was killed. Two of the warriors in the affair at the Hickory ground, were wounded; one, a nephew of Mr. McIntosh, had his left arm broke, and the ball entered his side; and Washington, son of Mr. Cornelns, wounded in the hand. The party sent to Hoithlewaulee, was commanded by Enchaw Micco, of Coweta, and Noocose Haujo, of Tuckaubatchee. They found one of the murderers, and his brother, who defended themselves, and made battle until they were killed; the other made his escape. As there were but two guilty in the town, brothers, and one killed helping his brother, the warriors were told by the king, the debt was satisfied. The one who thus escaped could speak English pretty well. This fellow got his gun and set out the morning after, to kill white people. The women hid the canoes. The old Micco Hutkeo of that town communicated this to me, and I to the chiefs. Upon reading to them your communication of the 24th April, I told them you say, "it is not an equal number the white people want, it is the guilty; and they want no innocent person to suffer." Upon reflecting on this, they determined on his execution, and sent Nagomau, of Tuckaubatchee, with warriors to apprehend or put him to death. He made battle, fired at the warriors, and was near killing one; the bullet passed near his ear. He then drew his knife and tomahawk, defended himself, and the warriors shot three balls through him. He fell, retained the power of speech till next day, and died. He said he had been to the Shawanese helping of them, and had got fat eating white people's flesh. Every one, to the very last, called on the Shawanese General Tecumseh. This fellow had been five years with the Northwestern wearing Indians, and after he was wounded, told the town people, the nation would be ruined for killing him, and not taking the Prophet's talk. Here one of the leaders of the warriors, Noocose Haujo, received two wounds; one in the hand, and one in the thigh. This fellow, who spoke English, and his brother, one of the murderers, upon returning to Hoithlewaulee, received a frolic from their town. The morning after, they loaded their rifles and went off, saying we will go on the road, kill some white people, and give you a frolic. Upon getting to the road, they were met by some of their town acquaintances with arms, coming from Pensacola, and returned with them. They repeated their attempt, and were brought back in like manner. They continued to persist in this intention till they were executed.

The two men who committed the murder on the road near the Wolf warrior's path, did it for property. One of the murderers, upon returning from Pensacola, with a saddle belonging to the murdered man, got a little drunk, and said, the master of this saddle I have left on the road dead, and have a heap of money, hard money and paper; they were both Oakfuskee people. The chiefs sent two parties after them; one they found and killed at Inmookfau, and the other at Kinhijee. Their uncles went with the warriors and pointed them out; one was arrested at Kinhijee, and when tying him, he slipped out a knife to defend himself, when a warrior standing before him with a knife in his hand, cut across his belly, let out his guts, and killed him.

The woman killed was in their way; she had been out with a party hunting, and report came, she and all her party were killed by people of Tennessee. Her nephew, believing the account, went with a party, and was one who did the mischief at Duck river. She afterwards returned, being, in this Indian's way, the cause of the murder, and charged with harboring her nephew; the chiefs ordered her execution. Kendal Lewis, who is a smith for the Upper Creeks, accompanied me, and is knowing to all I know.

CREEK AGENCY, 10th May, 1813.

The sub-contractor, Mr. Sherley, who accompanied General Flournoy through the agency, returned on the 8th, with two mails, leaving two on the way. He reports, "I did not see one rider who had any fears on account of the murder on the post-road, any more than if it had happened in the white people's country. I am certain the murderers are put to death, and all concerned with me are under the opinion they are so; and as the chiefs have acted with spirit in putting their murderers to death, we think it will have the effect of deterring others from the commission of similar crimes." I have sent his report, accounting for failures in the transportation of the mail, to the Postmaster General.

I am informed by an aid-de-camp of General Wilkinson, our troops took possession of Mobile peaceably, on the 14th ultimo.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG.

CREEK AGENCY, 17th May, 1813.

The invitation to the Tallasees to go to Pensacola, turns out to be a bubble. They have returned without receiving any thing from the commandant there. They saw no British officer with arms and munitions of war for Indians. They say they were informed the Governor of that place was at Havana, and on his arrival would leave presents for the red people.

I have received your commands of the 1st; you will, ere this, have received the proceedings of the chiefs and warriors in relation to my demand of the 25th March, which was in conformity with yours. The lower chiefs have, on the 8th, unanimously determined to conform themselves strictly to the orders of the agent for Indian affairs.

Mr. Fromentin, a Senator of the United States, and lady, are here, having come through the agency, on their way to the seat of Government. Captain Woodruff passed us with his command, (about fifty) going westwardly, a few days past.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, and with great personal regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Letter from Benjamin Hawkins to General Armstrong.

CREEK AGENCY, 7th June, 1813.

I received a letter of the 24th ultimo, from the Governor of Georgia, introducing a General Harris, a patriot of East Florida, to me. The general came with an associate, Major Sanchez; they said the object of their visit to me was to know the present disposition of the Indians towards them. They could not submit to the present order of things at St. Augustine. The military force there being of that description of people, mostly blacks or mulattoes, abhorrent to them, and from whom they were not to expect justice. They now had friends, money, and supplies, and if the Indians would not interfere, they could do very well for themselves; and as the Indians had made overtures of peace to me, they came for my advice, if I felt free to give it. I replied, "I had not heard from Government, or any officer of it, how our occupancy of East Florida had terminated. I could inform them, the Indians would not renew hostilities, unless provoked thereto by the cow and horse thieves in their neighborhood; pointed out to them how they might ascertain their disposition for peace, and gave them a short note to Mr. Kinnard, and the Wolf warrior, who, upon seeing them, would know what to say to them." They left me, and I received this note from them of 31st of May: "We met the Wolf warrior, Mr. Kinnard, the Cussetah king, and several other chiefs, among which was a deputation from Kinhijee, (king of the Seminoles) quite a providential meeting. We were treated with much respect, and every arrangement agreed on, so that we conclude our journey will be productive of much good. We go home satisfied. I write without a pen, and no more paper, or I would detail further particulars."

Finding the Governor of Georgia had received some information which he required to be explained, relative to hostile appearances among the Indians, and that he had established a scout party on the frontier, I wrote him the 31st ult. "From the present disposition of the Creeks, there is nothing hostile to be apprehended from them. The chiefs are as well convinced as I am, that their existence as a nation depends on their observance of their treaty stipulations with the United States. They have a national, as well as town government, and have found, by the recent experiment, it is efficient to a certain extent. They have put to death eleven between 16th and 26th April, for murder. I have a communication, directly or indirectly, with every town in this extensive agency; a daily intercourse with some of the chiefs, and in the habit of rendering acts of kindness to many. Situated as the agency now is, it is more likely to obtain, and to give correct information, than by any other mode. If I find any symptoms of hostility among them, I shall apprise you of it without delay. If my fellow citizens on the frontiers will withdraw their intrusions on Indian rights, and be honest, they have but little to apprehend. If they will but only lend their confidence to the officers of Government, and co-operate with them for the public peace and happiness, we should go on very well, and ease the timid mind of a frightful load."

Upon a paragraph of a letter from Governor Blount to W. G. Blount, who, on the authority of two volunteers, says, they have found three hundred fresh scalps of men, women, and children, at Aulotchetaw, which proves the hostility of the Indians, I say to the Governor of Georgia, "I believe you will not take upon yourself to say more than one of these was taken from your frontier during the last year." I have been under some apprehensions that the Creeks would be involved in difficulties by some of their neighbors hostile to their rights; but these apprehensions were removed by the arrangement of military districts, and placing all military force under an officer of the United States. As soon as I saw this, I commenced reporting the situation of Indian affairs to the commandants of No. 6 and No. 7.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, and with great personal regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

Colonel Hawkins, Agent for Indian Affairs, to the Big Warrior, Little Prince, and other chiefs of the Creek nation.

CREEK AGENCY, 16th June, 1814.

I have received your talk relative to the execution of Auttossee Emautla and son, as prophets or instigators of the war. You say the white people at the posts will kill you, if you kill the prophets. There is a mistake in this statement. The officers who take prophets and instigators of the war, will keep them prisoners until they hear from the President of the United States; such as is delivered up to them by the Red Sticks, will be kept in like manner. Those you take, you will try, and if guilty, punish your own way. Women, children, and others, should be forgiven. The white people have forgiven them. I expect Yauholo Chapco, and Hopoie Yauholo, are prisoners of General Graham, and in possession of his guard; if so, let them alone, fill you hear from the President. If they are not delivered up, you can hunt them, and all like them, and put them to death. But they would not be near the Fork unless they were delivered up by their party, or by their own consent; and of course, are prisoners to our army.

As your corn is now planted, we must begin to look about us. If the enemy are not conquered, we must go after them again, and follow them up, until we conquer them. It matters not who comes to help them, British or Spaniards; the United States will help us, and we shall be an over match for them. We fight on our own ground, and they are foreigners, who, if they come, it will be to deprive us of our rights. The British have tried us before, when we were not half so powerful as we are now, within our recollection, and found us strong enough to defend our rights.

You should keep a look out towards the Seminoles, and see what they are about. I expect they are friendly to us; we are so to them, and wish them well. If they are going to war against the people who are trespassing on their rights, at Aulotchewau, let them do so; we have no objection to their claiming and supporting their rights. They are Spanish Indians, and if the Spaniards help them with arms and ammunition, we have nothing to object to it. The Spaniards and the United States are friends. If the Spaniards help the Creeks, who are fighting us, they will break the chain of friendship between us, and we must treat them accordingly. I do not expect the Spaniards will help our enemy. They may, as an act of charity, give them something to eat; and this we will do ourselves, and forgive them their past transgressions, if they will apply to our military posts, and deliver up their prophets and leaders in mischief.

Since writing the foregoing, I received your reports from the Wolf warrior, Tullaupau Haujo, and John Stedam. It appears the British have landed some men on Deer Island, and are in possession of it. Their talk is perfectly in character with their usual mode of deceiving and using Indians, for their own wild projects of ambition. They come to see if any of the hostile Indians were left alive, and to help them. What is their help for? To destroy the old chiefs and friendly Indians. They say so. "They do not help them against the United States; they and the United States are to be friends this summer; and if they war against the United States they will be ruined." They have talks for Cussetah and Coweta, and the four nations: what have they to do with the four nations? The British have no lands here. What did they send Bowles among us for? To shew our women and children how to spin and weave, to plough, to raise hogs, horses and cattle? No! he told you to throw all these things away. Your father, the British king, did not want his red children to work; his white children would work for them.

What did your father, the British, tell the prophets, the beginning of this war? Tecumseh, in the square of Tuckaubatchee, delivered their talk. They told the Creeks not to do any injury to the Americans; to be in peace and friendship with them; not to steal even a bell from any one of any color. Let the white people on this continent manage their affairs their own way. Let the red people manage their affairs their own way, and this, too, in the name of the British. What was the actual meaning of this British talk? Your whole nation can answer this question. Kill the old chiefs, friends to peace; kill the cattle, the hogs, and fowls; do not work, destroy the wheels and looms, throw away your ploughs, and every thing used by the Americans. Sing "the song of the Indians of the northern lakes, and dance their dance." Shake your war clubs, shake yourselves; you will frighten the Americans, their arms will drop from their hands, the ground will become a bog, and mire them, and you may knock them on the head with your war clubs. I will be with you with my Shawanese, as soon as our friends the British are ready for us. Lift up the war club with your right hand, be strong, and I will come and shew you how to use it. Has this proved true? Go to the fields of Talledega, and New-yau-cau, and see them whitened with the bones of the Red Clubs. Look to the towns, not a living thing in them; the inhabitants scattered through the woods, dying with hunger, or fed by the Americans.

When this was done, the Americans destroyed, your stock, and every thing coming from them, destroyed, how were you to live? Were the British people to work and make food for you? No! the buffalo, bear, elk, deer, turkeys, ducks, wild geese, with dumplings growing on the trees; these were to be your food. Is this true? I will explain to you this talk; its meaning is clear. When you have thrown away every thing in your country, and cannot live there, go to the British, if you be but skin and bones; they will fatten you; they will feed you for your blood. They want you like blood-hounds for their purposes. As long as you will fight for them, they will give you arms, ammunition, and food. When they are driven from our country, they get on board their vessels, and leave you to be destroyed by your enemy.

When the American armies, under Washington, drove the British from this country, what did the British King do for his red children? All you old people can answer this question. He did not name you in the treaty of peace, and gave away all the lands of his red children, this side of the Mississippi. What did Washington, at the head of the American people, do for you? Your old people can answer the question. He made the treaty of New York with you, which saved your country, and sent the plan of civilization among you, to feed and clothe you. When the British want war, they are your fathers, and give you arms and ammunition for blood. In time of peace, you are a set of naked, mangy dogs, not worth their notice.

You have done right in keeping to Coweta, as the head quarters of the nation; it is so; and all public business must be done there, till the nation meets and appoints some other place. Invite the Seminole chiefs to come there, and attend to them. They are one people with us. Let the chiefs of Tuttalasee, and Okete Yocanne come, also, and treat them kindly. They have left us, we did not drive them away. If they have done no mischief, they have nothing to fear; if they have, they must give up the guilty. And, whether guilty or not, they must be safe in coming to see and talk with us.

CREEK AGENCY, 22d June, 1813.

Tustunnuggee Thlucco, (speaker for the nation) and two other chiefs, came to accompany me to meet you on the 16th, as we had appointed. We met at my house. The visit was by order of the Upper Creek chiefs. We had heard of nothing hostile, from any quarter. Yauholo Chapco, and his prophets, kept, as usual, their fooleries; and some idle young people repeated what they had heard. Just as we were ready to set out, we heard that Peter McQueen, and the old Hoboheithle Micco had given an ear to these idle tales, and we sent a distinguished messenger to them, Tustunnuggee Hopoie, of Tuckaubatchee, to know the truth. They denied any knowledge of them. However, the report coming from other quarters, the speaker returned to Tuckaubatchee, called the chiefs together, and sent a runner to the prophets, notifying them, that, in twelve days, a number of chiefs would be with you, and sent this message: "You are but a few Alabama people. You say that the Great Spirit visits you frequently; that he comes in the sun, and speaks to you; that the sun comes down just above your heads. Now, we want to see and hear what you say you have seen and heard. Let us have the same proof you have had, and we will believe what we see and hear. You have nothing to fear; the people who committed murders have suffered for their crimes, and there is an end of it." The messenger sent was one of the warriors who aided in executing the murderers. They instantly put him to death, and scalped him; and sent his scalp up to the forks of the river, where there was a small collection of followers of the Prophet. They went over to the house of Captain Isaacs, plundered, and burnt it. They executed two of his warriors who aided him to punish the murderers. After this, they gave out they would destroy Tuckaubatchee and Coveta, with every person in them; then kill Mr. Cornells, Tustunnuggee Thlucco, Mr. Hawkins, and the old chiefs who had taken his talks; after this war among themselves, they would be ready for the white people. They had power to destroy them by an earthquake, or rendering the ground soft and miry, and thunder. The chiefs of Tuckaubatchee called in all their people, and sent for the neighboring towns. Seven of the nearest refused to oppose the prophets. I was then ordered off to the Lower towns, and to you. I called on the Little Prince, who marched next day with fifty of his people, leaving orders for others to follow after him, as they arrived. On coming to Cussetah, I found them consulting in the woods; and, instead of aiding to suppress the prophets, seemed willing to apologize for their conduct. The prophets denied to them they had killed the men charged on them, and said they made circles, into one of which, reserved for their prophet, they entered without leave, and were immediately seized with madness, and died. Hoboheithle Micco, the old medal chief, he sent the denial of the murder by the prophets to Cussetah, and directed the Cussetah Micco to send it to all the towns below him, which he had done.

The chiefs are much surprised that the plan of the prophets should have been so long kept a secret from them. They looked on it as a sort of madness and amusement for idle people. But, during this period, it was secretly gaining strength and converts, and where least expected, burst forth in acts of murder, confident of its strength; and this, too, just after the chiefs had called out their warriors, exhibited the strength and ability of the nation to punish, and had executed eleven for murder.

The plan, whatever it is, must have come from the Lake Indians. We have not yet been able to find the talks brought from the Prophet of the lakes. The party who accompanied the Little Warrior of Wowocau, (executed as a leader of the murderers at Ohio) went to the Northern lakes; was carried over them to a British officer, who, in his public talks, which all heard, expressed friendship for the Creeks, and their settled mode of living; regretted his being surrounded with a bad sort of wandering Indians, some of them "man eaters." Said he used them in war, but they were so wild, he could not govern them. They warred with every body, as well the British, at times, as the Americans. They would sometimes refuse to go to war; he was afraid of them. Had to find and give them presents. The officer advised them to go home, gave them arms and clothing, and ammunition, and put them over the lakes back again. After this, Tecumseh, the Prophet, took the Little Warrior aside, and had much conversation with him, which he never communicated to the two lads, the survivors of the party.

We now believe the public talk was to deceive the old chiefs, always opposed to war, and that the talk of Tecumseh was the plan for the prophets. It was well known the Creeks were a settled people, and their chiefs occupied in peaceful pursuits; of course, the chiefs were enemies to war. Hence a determination to keep the whole plan secret from them, and let it mature itself among the opposers of civilization and the young people. From the confidence with which the prophets speak of their power, and the source of it, their ability to punish all who reveal their secret, which they have ways of knowing, prevents the young people from even communicating any thing to their own families. The prophets are, for the present, confined to the Alabamas, who, although of the Creek confederacy, are not Creeks. The towns of the Creeks who are said to have taken their talks, have not done it actively; their people are dancing their dances, but no man has moved to assist them. The prophets are enemies to the plan of civilization, and advocates for the wild Indian mode of living. It appears they are first to put to death every chief and warrior who aided to execute the murderers, then the old chiefs, friends to peace, who had taken the talks of Col. Hawkins, from whom the orders for punishing the murderers came, then Mr. Cornells, because he was the interpreter, and if they could, at the same time, to put Colonel Hawkins to death. But having killed all the others, if he escaped, it would be of no consequence, as then none would be left alive to receive and communicate his talks; and the nation could fix their affairs their own way. After this they would be ready for the white people, who could do them no injury, if they came among them, as the prophets would draw circles around their abode, and render the earth quaggy and impassable. If any Indian towns refused their aid to the prophets, they should be sunk with earthquakes, or hills should be turned over them. They had also the aid of the lightning whenever they wanted.

The chiefs sent a guard with me from Tuckaubatchee, being apprehensive for my personal safety; and ordered me to travel by night, till I saw and reported to you. Since they have begun to murder, they give out, Tecumseh is to be here this fall. Having done what I was ordered to do, your judgment will direct for the future. I have directed runners to be sent after us, to let us know what is doing. As I came on receiving information from you that General Wilkinson was on the road, with a guard, coming through, I sent after the Little Prince, to send notice to him immediately, if he heard of any hostility against white people on the road. I have done the same to the Cussetahs.

mark.

June 23.—Two runners arrived; one to inform us, Tuskeenohau of Cussetah had reprimanded the Micco for his pusillanimous conduct, and gone on with his warriors to help the chiefs; the other, Talmas Haujo, from the old chiefs, at Tuckaubatchee. "The prophets have put to death two more of our warriors; we have about 190 here, and expect more. We are of opinion, if the prophets cannot be crushed, they will bring ruin on us, and war against the white people. We have need of assistance, and we wish you, Colonel Hawkins, to assist us, by joining the white warriors with ours. Yours can come the post road opposite to us; we will then join them, go with our forces united, march on both sides of Alabama, and put an end to these hatchers of war and mischief. By showing them they are both feeble and ignorant, they will be crushed; as neither thunder, quagmire, or the sun, will come to their aid. They can soon be conquered, and those who support them at the lakes, be disappointed in their hopes of war. If your troops are so situated you cannot send them, write to our friend the Governor of Georgia. We hope he will help us, and then we shall have peace. Making peace here in this way, is making peace for our white neighbors as well as for ourselves."

Talmas Haujo, the runner, said, in discussing among the chiefs, the singular and sudden embarrassment of their affairs, "they were satisfied, to a man, its source was among the British beyond the lakes." Captain Snake, one of the prophets, being present when a part of the above was communicated to Colonel Hawkins, and believing, from what he heard, that the plan was discovered, observed, with warmth, "the prophets of Alabama had begun prematurely. They were to go on with their magic until Tecumseh arrived, who was to put the plan in motion, and he would come when his friends the British were ready for him."

24th.—Communicated the foregoing to the Governor of Georgia.

CAPT. CARR'S, near FORT HAWKINS, 22d June, 1818.

I, by express from Mr. Cornells, have received this information: "The divisions among the Indians of the Upper Creeks are coming fast to a crisis. The opposition have attacked Captain Isaacs, one of the chiefs who led the warriors against the murderers of the white families on Ohio. They have killed him, his nephew, and three more of his party. Mr. Cornells says their numbers are accumulating; and he is of opinion they will destroy all his property. He is on his way to see me; expected to be at the agency yesterday, and probably will be here to-day."

I expected a meeting of the chiefs at the agency on the 16th, on their own appointment, and on difficulties and embarrassments among themselves. I waited for them till the 19th. Some of the Lower chiefs informed me, they had appointed some chiefs to go to St. Mary's, to aid the patriots to settle their misunderstandings with the Aulotche-wau Indians. The other chiefs did not attend. It is not improbable but the opposition will be strengthened by the friends of those executed last year for their crimes, as well as those in April, as their attack has commenced on the chiefs and warriors who executed the orders of the Executive council. As soon as Mr. Cornells arrives, I will ascertain how far the divisions among themselves are likely to affect us, and if it cannot be directed to our advantage, and should it prove hostile, a military corrective must be applied. I write this, for the mail is expected momentarily to pass.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Gen. ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

Near FORT HAWKINS, 27th June, 1813.

The enclosed communication will exhibit to you a scene of embarrassment which has developed itself suddenly among the Creek chiefs. You see pretty plainly the source and object of this fanaticism. If it could confine itself to a contest among the chiefs for power, and not interfere with the friendly relations between the Creek nation and the United States, it might be policy in us to look on, and let it be settled among themselves; but, as there seems to be another object coupled with it, and that of hostility to us eventually, we must be ready to apply a military corrective in due time.

Mr. Cornells was very desirous of obtaining some aid from us, and has gone on to Milledgeville to visit the Governor of Georgia. I did not object to his going, as it might be agreeable to the Governor to see and converse with him on the communication I made him. I am on my way to the agency, and probably towards the scene of confusion. I have just received a letter from General Wilkinson, of the 22d, coming through with his family; he was near McNair's, 157 miles from fort Hawkins. He had received a message from the speaker of the nation, requesting assistance from him. He has some ladies with him, who will be alarmed, and render his situation unpleasant.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Gen. ARMSTRONG.

CREEK AGENCY, 28th June, 1813.

I give you some more information from the prophetic source. "The rising of all the Indians was not to have commenced at all sooner than the beginning of autumn, nor then, unless the British were ready. But it is probable an order had come on, from Tecumseh, the Prophet of the lakes, to put to death the persons who executed the murderers, to prevent the party being dispirited. They were not to disturb the travellers on the road, as it might give alarm to the white people too soon." The Alabamas have a pretty good supply of powder. The other Indians badly armed and supplied with ammunition. The Alabamas were the most industrious and best behaved of all our Indians. Their fields were the granary of the upper towns, and furnished considerable supplies, by water, to Mobile. But this fanaticism has rendered them quite the reverse.

Some of the Shawanese are soon to arrive from the lakes. The Auttossees, lately converted, have driven off their chiefs. They lately said to a half-breed: You think the white people strong and numerous; we shall soon try their strength. Two sons of the late Speaker of the nation apprehended an Alabama lad, and were taking him to Tuckaubatchee, who told them he had seen some of the Shawanese lately coming on. A party of the fanatics saw them, fired on them, killed one, and released the lad. Such is the degree of frenzy to which some of these people have arrived, that the brother, brother in marriage, and son, of some maniac, actually burnt his houses and destroyed much of his property. I keep the Governor of Georgia correctly informed of occurrences here, as it may probably be prudent to aid the well-disposed to punish the fanatics without delay, and before their plans are matured, as we now know them.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG.

Talosee Fixico, a runner from Tuckaubatchee, to Colonel Hawkins.

CREEK AGENCY, 5th July, 1813.

The chiefs have sent me to state to you that their difficulties continue to increase. Their opponents have killed, in all, nine of their people; one of them a woman. Foosechajuo, of Auttossee, is missing; supposed to be murdered, as blood was seen in one of his houses. He was a good man, and opposed to mischief-makers. The chiefs sent two of their great men, Tuskeenhau, of Cussetah, and Atchau Haujo, of Coweta, to Hohoheithle Micco, of Talassee, to induce him to have the war sticks and projects thrown aside, and repeated their message. But the old man rejected every thing, declared his determination to persevere until he destroyed all who aided and assisted to put the murderers to death. He looked on them as people of the United States. He would march from Tuckaubatchee to Coweta, destroy all of them, and move on for the white people, and would not stop till he had marched to Goechee. There he would pause and rest, then put off for the sea coast. All north of this line of march would be destroyed by the British. He had been plotting this secretly for some time, and now having brought it to bear, he was determined not to stop. He had his bows, his arrows, and war clubs, and, with the magic powers he possessed, aided by the British and Shawanese, who were now coming from the northwest, and were now more than half way to him, he was able to crush the Americans, and would do it.

The chiefs say they have brought themselves into their present embarrassments by their fidelity to their treaty stipulations with Washington. In giving satisfaction for the murders on the post road, on Duck and Ohio, which it was the duty of their nation to do, they are placed in a war attitude by their opponents. By doing justice to the white people, they are to be punished with death. They have about thirty fit for war, but badly armed, and without ammunition. They fear not death, although they are in a dangerous situation, and may expect it. The Prophet's party have burnt the village of Hachechubbau and several detached settlements, and destroyed cattle, hogs, horses, and corn. All who are friends to the United States are doomed to destruction. This is our true situation: we ask for aid from the white people. If you, Colonel Hawkins, cannot afford it from the troops of the United States, who we hear are towards the sea coast, ask the Governor of Georgia to aid us. If they could send from six hundred to eight hundred mounted men in two divisions, one on the old, the other on the new post road, to unite near the bridges, on Uchee creek, and then along the mail road, we would join them with two hundred horsemen, point out and attack our enemies. A number of well-disposed Indians would join. We know, when this is done, we shall conquer them. We are willing the lands on Alabama should go to pay our white friends, who, although in aiding us, will effectually aid themselves. We have sent to the Cherokees for aid, but know not the success. If we are destroyed before you aid us, you will have the work to do yourselves, which will be bloody, and attended with difficulties, as you do not know as well as us the swamps and hiding places of those people. We cannot find that the Spaniards have any hand in this, but can clearly trace it to the British on the lakes.

Written as interpreted by Alexander Cornells, Public Interpreter.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

CREEK AGENCY, 6th July, 1813.

The enclosed exhibits to you a further detail of occurrences with us. I have informed Mr. Cornells and the runner, that I can procure eleven rifles, thirty pounds of powder, some lead and flints, on the credit of their annuity, which is ready to their order. A message will go from me, to-morrow, to the principal fanatical chiefs, demanding an explanation of their conduct. I shall communicate every thing to General Pinckney, and to-morrow go for an interview with the Governor of Georgia, in company with General Wilkinson, who has arrived safe, and is on his way to you. I have advised the council, repeatedly, to order a party to attack and destroy the prophets, without delay, but they seem not equal, in their present state of alarm and confusion, to such an enterprise. They have fortified themselves at Tuckaubatchee, and have seventeen hundred bushels of corn.

A great number of Indians seem to be astonished exceedingly, alarmed, and timid, at the sudden explosion of this fanaticism. Its boasted magic powers deters them from obeying the calls of their chiefs; and the chiefs, themselves opposed to it, timid, distrustful, and incapable of estimating and resisting its effects, as they should do. Their reports relative to it, of course, cannot be true in all their details.

I am, very respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 13th July, 1813.

Enclosed I send you my demand of an explanation of conduct of the fanatical chiefs; my letter to General Pinckney, of 9th July; and the report of the Cussetah king, to whom I sent the demand, to be sent by four of his great chiefs. I had previously ordered him to send off a detachment of his warriors, and hold all the remainder ready to obey the orders of the chiefs. His report shows you the state of things to the 10th. The Wolf warrior is at the head of our Seminole towns. I sent to him and W. Kinnard to go up to aid the chiefs, with their counsels, and they are gone. The fanatical fright seems to subside a little among the Lower Creeks, and all of them, apparently, are again friendly. But some of the Upper towns remain under its influence; and, if they do not explain themselves satisfactorily, and make peace with those friendly to us, it will be proper to furnish the requisite supply of powder and arms to them, to compel the fanatics to deliver up their prophets and leaders in war and mischief. The passage of our mail is suspended for the present. By the expression "Lower Creeks," is meant those on the waters of Flint and Chattahoochee; and "Upper Creeks," those on the waters of Tallapoosa, Coosa, and Alabama.

I am, very respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG.

A demand on the fanatical chiefs and their associates, for an explanation of their conduct.

Colonel Hawkins, agent for Indian affairs, to Hoboheithle Micco, Peter McQueen, the chiefs of Tallassee, Autsosee, Foosee Hatchee, and all other chiefs who have taken the talks of the prophets:

I hear you are preparing yourselves for war; I hear you have taken part with the prophets. The prophets have put to death nine people, because they helped the chiefs to save their country, by putting the murderers of our white friends to death, which they were bound to do by their treaty with Washington. I hear you have begun the war dance, made your war clubs, and are for war with the white people. What is this for? What injury have the white people done you? You know who I am; I have been long among you. My talks have been always for peace, and they have been the saving of your country. Are you going to divide your nation, and to destroy it? Do you not know the prophets' talks will be the destruction of the Creeks, and give joy to your enemies? You have threatened the life of my interpreter, and to destroy his property. What has he done? Delivered you my friendly talks. If you do him any injury, you do it to me and all the people of the United States. I never will forgive the murderers of white people, or red people friendly to them. You threaten Kialijee, Tuckaubatchee, and Coweta. What is this for?

Speak plain to me. I have ordered four great chiefs of Cussetah to carry this talk, and bring your answer. We can settle things much better now than when you see me with an army. I am now your friend; I shall then be your enemy. You may frighten one another with the power of your prophets to make thunder, earthquakes, and to sink the earth. These things cannot frighten the American soldiers. The American soldiers are now your friends, and I hope will always be so. Take care how you make them your enemy. The thunder of their cannon, their rifles, and their swords, will be more terrible than the works of your prophets. If you are friendly, you have nothing to fear. If the white man is safe in your land, you are safe. If the white man is in danger in your land, you are in danger; and war with the white people will be your ruin.

MILLEDGEVILLE, 9th July, 1813.

Finding the conveyance by mail to you is circuitous, I determined to send this communication by express. The Governor of Georgia will lend to the chiefs, on the credit of their annuity, forty muskets and one hundred and fifty pounds powder; he has no lead. The chiefs are very urgent for some military aid to act with their warriors; and if their ex-parte representations are true, they should have it. But these, coupled with the political divisions among themselves, renders them liable to abatement. To judge from the fright among the Indians, and Indian countrymen, they are true in all their parts. As soon as I receive the reply to the explanation demanded from the fanatical chiefs, we shall be better able to judge what is proper to be done on our part. As the nation, generally, are badly armed, and much reliance placed by the opposition on their bows, arrows, war clubs, and magic, I shall be sparing in the supply of arms, although procured with their own funds, until I see they use them with effect; which I am apprehensive they cannot do without the aid of a military force from us.

A sincere desire and willingness is manifested by the militia officers in this neighborhood, and on the frontiers, to aid the friendly Indians. The Governor is, of course, ready, on application, to furnish the requisite force. He has powder and arms, but no lead. We have discussed this subject freely, accompanied by General Wilkinson. We know the importance of peace with these people, particularly in the present situation of our affairs, and that war should be avoided, if possible; therefore, if I can prevail on them to accommodate among themselves, I will do so; and, if I cannot, I recommend that a detachment of mounted infantry be sent to co-operate with the warriors of Tuckaubatchee against the Alabama party. Whether you will give orders for such an eventual movement, or whether you will wait the result of the further expected information, depends with yourself. I shall give you that information as soon as I obtain it. As the chiefs, with the warriors of three towns, are in Tuckaubatchee, and a want of provisions may render their situation desperate, they may require some aid before orders can be received from you. The Cherokees have promised assistance, from one hundred to two hundred, and have been sent for; but, from what I hear, it is probable the messenger was intercepted. I shall return towards the Agency to-day. I have drawn from Captain Cook twelve muskets and rifles, for the people there, which I deem sufficient for the present. If indications of hostility should increase, it will be proper to occupy it as a military post.

I am, respectfully, and with great personal regard.

General PINCKNEY.

With this letter was sent all information received in relation to the subject of it.

Cussetah Micco to Colonel Hawkins, Agent for Indian Affairs.

CUSSETAH, July 10th, 1813.

DEAR FRIEND:

I have arrived from the Tuckaubatchee, and they are in great distress. I have sent two hundred and some odd warriors to their assistance. The talk you sent on to the Prophet man, I sent on with the warriors, to take it to Tuckaubatchee, and try to get it to them from there. I heard they were around Tuckaubatchee, and I sent on my men to get in and save them; and if the enemy fired on them, to return the fire; and if they were for peace, to return again. The Prophet's men want the Big Warrior, his son, and the Mad Dog's son, Tuskamuggee Hopoi: and if they only give them up, they would make peace with the nation. The answer is, what is the reason they are killing cattle and people, when they want only these three men? But they need not try to fool all of us, for they say they will battle with all who take the white people's talk.

I learn again, that peace is not to be made, until they destroy Tuckaubatchee, Coweta, and Cussetah. The men in Tuckaubatchee are bad off for powder, and, for that reason, they cannot turn out to fight, but keep it until the war party charges on the fort, to defend it. The war party have taken powder from two men, that were carrying it into the fort. The war party are strong in powder. If they will not see the talk you sent them, I expect it will be the worse for them. The Chattahoochee people have heard the Tame king's talk. William Kinnard and the Wolf warrior have done all they can to get their people good, when they left them, and these two are gone to Tuckaubatchee.

The war talk is gone to the Seminoles, but I expect peace will be made with them and the white people. I have received your talks, and sent them, and you must look for an answer; and if you do not see or hear of an answer in a few days, you may think it is bad times. I hold you as my father; I have not forgot the talks you gave me; we were all friends, but it is not so now. I have given all the ammunition out to go and assist my friends. If they don't make peace, they will fight until all of it is gone, and one party or the other will be conquered. You have sent them a good and friendly talk, and we have done the same. I am afraid it will do no good, for them to save their country. I have sent on yours; if they will not receive this talk, we must look for protection.

Before we lose the Big Warrior, we will all die for him, or get him from them. Perhaps, when the war party see all my men, it may put a fright on them, and, by that means, take your talk. A great many people, who took the Prophet's talk, have since thrown it away. Kialjee, to a child, has come to the Big Warrior. The Hillaubee took the talks, but the Cherokees turned them, by telling them, take care we do not frighten your children. And they are yet at peace, I expect, for I have not heard from them since. This is the talk that I know, but in a few days I expect to get more. If they will not take the talks, news will come day and night.

CUSSETAH KING.

JOHN WARD, Public Interpreter.
NIMROD DOYELL, Assistant Agent.

Extract, 12th July.—Messrs. Doyell and Wood's report.

"We have delivered Colonel Hawkins' talk to the Cussetah king, on the 10th; they all appeared to be very friendly in our presence; we saw two hundred and odd warriors started from Cussetah for Tuckaubatchee, to assist the Big Warrior. They were all well supplied with ammunition, and if they had success, they aimed at Tuckaubatchee yesterday; they had orders to fight their way into Tuckaubatchee."

CREEK AGENCY, 20th July, 1813.

I have not received an answer to the demand I made on the Prophet's party, to explain their conduct. I have sent three white men direct to Hoboheithle Micco, the head of the party, and reiterated the demand. I expect they will have delivered it to him this evening; they are to wait two days only, for an answer. They have burnt all the houses at Mr. Cornell's, (a half breed) our interpreter for the Upper Creeks, and taken his cattle, hogs, horses, sheep, and goats. The Cussetah warrior arrived in Tuckaubatchee the 4th. A spy from the Prophet was with me on the 17th. His object is to ascertain the movements of our troops; after examining him, I sent him back. But hearing afterwards, he was accompanied by a white man, I sent after them, and apprehended the latter—a soldier, deserted from fort Stoddart.

The spy said, when Peter McQueen set out for Pensacola, he expressed his apprehensions that the Spaniards, being afraid of the Americans, would not give him powder: he had four hundred dollars. As the Spaniards had demanded back Mobile, and were of themselves unable to take it, he hoped their friends, the British, would be there to help them, and that, from them, he should get powder. Upon the arrival of a runner, who said he heard the Cherokees were coming to assist Tuckaubatchee, Hoboheithle Micco, the head of the Prophet's party, said, I am not at war with any nations of people; I am settling an affair with my own chiefs.

I am, &c.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 26th July, 1813.

The Indians of Tuckaubatchee have all removed, under a guard of Cussetah and Coweta warriors, to Coweta, and in great distress. I have ordered them a supply of one hundred pounds of powder, two hundred pounds of lead, one hundred flints, twenty-five muskets, borrowed from the State of Georgia, and ten rifles, purchased on their annuity. The chiefs say, several friendly chiefs have recently been murdered. The Governor of Georgia has offered them assistance, and they have sent to him for it. This they have informed me of. I have heard nothing from the Governor.

I have ordered the Lower towns to convene the 2d next month, at Coweta. The chiefs having arrived just as the mail was starting out, I can only add,

I am, &c.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG.

CREEK AGENCY, 28th July, 1813.

The enclosed communication to the Governor of Georgia, will show the result of my deliberate judgment on our Indian affairs. My demand on the hostile Indians, for an explanation of conduct, was offered to them in sight of Tuckaubatchee, by the Cussetah chiefs, with a declaration it was friendly. Yauflico Emautla Haujo, chief of Auttotsee said, "I will not receive it or any other talk from Colonel Hawkins, or the white people. I am done with him and his talks. Where are you going? You shall not enter Tuckaubatchee." The warriors replied: we are going into Tuckaubatchee, to our chief, for orders, and if you oppose us, we will fire on you. On the second attempt to send a message, direct to the head of the party, on the 13th, they were met by the Cussetah and Coweta warriors, who advised their return, as, in the present rage of frenzy, they could not be safe.

The Prophet's party have destroyed, in several places of the Upper towns, all the cattle, hogs, and fowls. They have moved out of their towns into the woods, where they are dancing "the dance of the Indians of the lakes." Letecau, a Prophet, eighteen years of age, native of Aubecoche, raised in Alabama, went up to Coosa, with eight young followers, sent an invitation to the chiefs of his native town to come, and witness for themselves, his magical powers. They went, accompanied by a crowd of both sexes. The Prophet ranged them in a line on the bank of Coosa river, and directed them to sit down; made his circle in front, and began "the dance of the Indians of the lakes." After exerting themselves for some time, the Prophet gave the war-whoop, attacked, and killed three of the chiefs, and wounded the fourth. The others took to the river, swam over, went up and recrossed to their towns, collected their warriors, sent after the murderers, and found them dancing. A chief went into their circle; they knocked him down with their war clubs, and put him to death with bows and arrows. The warriors put the party to death, and scalped the Prophet. They then went to Oakfuskee, a small village, where they had taken the Prophet's talks, and were dancing their dance, and put them to death. In Oakfuskee, the Prophet's party killed five chiefs, and destroyed almost all the cattle in town. Mrs. Grayson, invited there by the chief of the town, to teach the women to spin and weave, had much of her stock, her loom, and web of cloth destroyed. She moved to Hillaubee, where her husband's family lived, where she had resided twelve years, taught more than twenty women to weave, and most of those of the town to spin, and where she was universally esteemed before, was stripped of all her clothing, except the shift and petticoat on her back, and all her cattle and hogs. Mr. Grayson, a worthy Scotch gentleman, her father-in-law, had all his negroes, (seventy-three) and every eatable living thing, taken from him. Kialjee, a peaceable friendly town, in the heart of the Upper Creeks, has been destroyed, several of its inhabitants wounded, and all their hogs, cattle, and fowls killed. Two chiefs, with a party, went out foraging, from Tuckaubatchee, in the cattle range of that town; some hogs and cattle killed, and was in the stench of them for fifteen miles. Josiah Francis, a Prophet, half brother of Sam Macnac, John Macnac, his brother, and Sam's son, destroyed all his property, and burnt his houses. The declaration of the Prophets is, to destroy every thing received from the Americans; all the chiefs and their adherents who are friendly to the customs and ways of the white people; to put to death every man who will not join them; and, by those means, to unite the nation in aid of the British, and Indians of the lakes, against their white neighbors, as soon as their friends, the British, will be ready for them.

I ordered the Cussetah and Coweta warriors, if the chiefs should not order them to make battle, and their enemy would not explain, satisfactorily, their conduct, to bring off all the people of Tuckaubatchee, and to notify all in distress to fly to Chhattahoochee, and to make a stand at Coweta. Here their women and children were to be left, and their warriors to return and make battle. I had some arms and ammunition for them; an occurrence, unexpected, and not under my control, has prevented it. The Governor of Georgia, actuated, no doubt, by the purest motives, and not recollecting he was acting out of his sphere, was carrying on a correspondence with the chiefs, and, as they say, actually promised them aid. As soon as they received this promise, they determined not to make battle themselves, but wait the promised aid. Finding the chiefs in opposition, who availed themselves of this fanaticism, were unable to control it, and having all the information likely soon to be obtained, I last evening made up my opinion.

I have not heard from you on the communications on this subject.

I am, &c.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Secretary of War.

2d August, 5 P. M.—I am this moment informed an action has commenced, at Coweta; that two hundred Cherokees had come to the assistance of the friendly Indians. The runner was sent after the women and children, on Flint river, and heard the firing long after he left the town.

NASHVILLE, July 13, 1813.

DEAR SIR:

From a letter received from the Honorable S. W. Campbell, last mail, I am advised that Government has come to a determination to march an expedition against the Creeks: the writer further observes, "that part of the troops will be from West Tennessee, under your command it is presumed; this will afford opportunity for your detachment, should they still be disposed to be engaged in active service."

From the above, it appears that I may have some part in the contemplated expedition, and from which I take the liberty of giving you my idea on the subject; and, first, it is my duty to make known to you, that the volunteers composing my detachment in the late expedition down the Mississippi, two thousand strong, stand ready at the call of their country, to march at a moment's warning.

There can be no doubt but the Creeks and Lower Choctaws are excited to hostilities by the influence of the British; if so, there is no doubt but we will have to fight the combined powers of both. There is no instance, within my recollection, wherein an Indian tribe, or nation, has been invaded, but they united their whole force against the invaders: therefore, in the calculation of the force to be employed by the United States, against the Creeks and their allies, no calculation ought to be made on the division of the nation. The force employed may either unite them or create divisions; if an incompetent force is employed against them, they will be united, and, on the first reverse of our arms in that quarter, we will not only have to fight the whole Creek nation, but the greater part of the Choctaws: if a competent force is employed to ensure success, the Creek nation will be divided, to secure their territory and their property. The scenes in the Northwest is an awful lesson on this subject, to the Government, and to every beholder, and from which we ought to learn, from experience, that the true way to economize is to employ sufficient force to ensure success, and crush all opposition in that quarter at one blow. The question, therefore, will occur, what force will be competent to the object? Will the number pointed out by the Secretary of War, say fifteen hundred from Tennessee and fifteen hundred from Georgia, with the third United States' regiment, say five hundred strong, be sufficient force to ensure success, and crush the hostile Indians and their allies in that quarter? I answer in the negative. If it was intended to barely make an incursion through their towns, burn their houses, destroy their crops, and hastily to return, this force would be more than competent for a flying camp; but I understand the object of the expedition to be different; that is, to crush all hostility in that quarter; this, then, will require fortified places in the heart of the Creek nation, and a military campaign.

It is a large calculation to say that three-fourths of any military force will be any length of time fit for service: It will take one-fourth to guard the baggage, &c. &c.; one-half, therefore, of the force ordered into the field may be calculated on to be a disposable force; we can therefore count, with certainty, only on a disposable force of seventeen hundred and fifty men, after a junction is formed in the Creek or Cherokee country. I will hazard an opinion that no military man, impressed with a belief that the Indians are excited to hostilities by the British, and knowing their contiguity to Pensacola, and the ease with which Britain can land a reinforcement, and co-operate with the Indians, will say that the above force is competent to ensure success. The experience of the Northwestern armies forbids such a belief; and when any force, that may be required, can be had, I am of opinion that, from three to five thousand from this State, ought to be employed on this expedition; the latter perhaps the better calculation; these, with the third United States' regiment, and a brigade from Georgia, would be amply sufficient to drive the Indians and their allies into the ocean; and should the Spaniards give our enemies an asylum in Pensacola, would be sufficient to take possession of that place, cut off all supplies from the straggling Indians, and put an end to hostility in that quarter.

As soon as the expedition is determined on, I shall do myself the pleasure of submitting some ideas on the details of the campaign; the field ordnance necessary; the proportion of cavalry and mounted men to that of the infantry; the point of concentration; the site for a garrison, and depot for provisions, magazine stores, &c.

At present I shall close these remarks, by observing that four thousand men can be rendezvoused, in my division, in twenty days from the promulgation of the order. My brave volunteers, two thousand strong, stand ready for the call.

I am, sir, with due consideration and respect,

ANDREW JACKSON.

His Excellency WILLIE BLOUNT.

CREEK AGENCY, 10th August, 1813.

The enclosed report will show you the state of parties with us. The sixteen towns are on the waters of Flint and Chatahoochee; Tuckabautchee is with them. The others are on Coosa, Tallapoosa, and Alabama. It is thirty miles from fort Hawkins to the Creek Agency; thence, sixty miles to Coweta, the present barrier between the frontiers of Georgia and the hostile Indians. A number of families, in great distress, have fled from the Upper towns to Coweta, and to the agency, where I have to feed them. There were five hundred warriors at Coweta on the 5th, waiting the orders of their chief.

The account of the battle is probably true, but the account of ammunition is greatly exaggerated.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJ. HAWKINS.

The Secretary of War.

Big Warrior and Tustunnuggee Hopoie, head chiefs of the Upper and Lower Creeks, their talks to Col. Benjamin Hawkins, Agent for Indian Affairs.

COWETA, 4th August, 1813.

Colonel Hawkins, you have requested to know the number of towns that are friendly. There are sixteen towns down Chatahoochee, from Coweta, are friendly: there are sixteen towns have met here: there are a few small villages, which are not come in; when they go out from the meeting we will know their whole strength. The number of men we cannot give any certainty for the present: a great many are sick, which we cannot account for. We have made the broken days to go on an expedition against the hostile Indians. In twelve days from to day, we are in hopes you will be able to join us here at this place. We have a great many villages down this river and Flint river; and, in that time, we expect to have them all collected. We told you at your house that we were in haste; we now send you the appointed time to go on this expedition. We told you to be in readiness, and we hope you are, to accompany your soldiers, as you are appointed to have the care of the Indians; we hope you will be with us; we wish you to be expeditious. Let your heavy baggage come along, as you have a public road to come in our nation. We are scarce in arms and ammunition; we hope you will bring that along to furnish our people with it: we have told you our distresses and our grievance. We hope you will make all the haste you can to come to our assistance. The war party has nearly destroyed all our cattle: we will not trouble you with a long talk; we talked the whole over at your house; only come as soon as possible. We cannot give you a true account of the strength of the warring Indians; we suppose it to be at least two thousand five hundred, or thereabouts. There are, in the whole, twenty-nine towns and villages of the Upper Creeks has joined the war party; there are but five towns of the Upper Creeks that are for peace.

WILLIAM McINTOSH's, 9 o'clock at night, 4th August, 1813.

After our meeting this day, we received information from Hardy Read's wife, which is a red woman of Hoithlewaulee; she is straight from that town, who gives the following information: She saw two white men's scalps; they were brought there shortly before she left that town. Peter McQueen went to Pensacola to obtain ammunition; as he passed James Cornell's house, he took James Cornell's wife prisoner off to Pensacola; at the same time there was a white man at Cornell's house; McQueen and his party did beat him almost to death, and also a negro at Cornell's, and went on their journey to Pensacola: now, on their return, they were met by James Cornell and David Tate, and a small party of white people, where the old furrow path turned off to Pensacola; an engagement took place; there were five Indians and one negro of McQueen's party killed, and a great many wounded: of Mr. Cornell's company there were two white men killed, and several wounded: the battle lasted nearly three hours. McQueen's party kept the ground; his force was three hundred and fifty strong. Cornell's party is not ascertained to be but a small number. It is supposed that James Cornell and Tate are wounded. McQueen got Tate's horse. They scalped the two white men and brought them to Hoithlewaulee. Hardy Read's wife saw the two scalps with her own eyes. She says that Peter McQueen had one hundred horse loads of ammunition, which he received at Pensacola from the Spaniards.

After we had made the broken days, this day this information came on. It is our sincere wish for you to come on to our assistance in three or four days, if it is only two hundred men; and let the rest of the army follow as fast as they can. This is the day appointed for the war party to make an attack on us here at this place. We are all under arms, and expect every moment to be all attacked by the warring Indians.

BIG WARRIOR, his + mark.

CREEK AGENCY, August 23, 1813.

SIR:

This department has long been assailed by calumny and misrepresentation; but it has been left to the Governor of Georgia to usurp all authority of the General Government, except what relates to commerce, as you will see in the enclosed correspondence between us. As he is a man of legal knowledge, he must be operated on by a policy of his own.

I have, from an intelligent chief, this information: "I saw the Little Warrior near the Chickasaws, returning with his party from the Northern Indians. He said he had a talk from Tecumseh to his chiefs, and a letter from the British, for Pensacola; that when he left Tecumseh, he told him, as soon as they had taken one fort more from the Americans, which would be some time this summer, he should come on to join the Creeks. The Little Warrior's party must spill the blood of white people on their return; and when they delivered the talk to the Creeks, to report the number killed; he said he had killed two families." The whole party were shy, and I could get nothing further from them. The fort, probably, is Meigs.

Mr. Grayson, of Hillaubee (a hostile town of the Upper Creeks) a wealthy Scotchman in the British service during the war of the Revolution, informs me, the Spaniards have given a horse load of ammunition to every town, with a promise of a full supply to be brought from the Havana, of arms and ammunition, to enable them to prosecute the war with the United States, to be landed on Escambia. The destruction of every American is the song of the day. A chief of a village of the same town informs me, they received a small bag of powder each, for ten towns, and five bullets to each man. He conversed not with the Governor, but Peter McQueen (the head of the opposition) said to a chief in his hearing, the Governor promised a supply of arms and ammunition from Havana, if the Indians went to war with the United States; they must not come to Pensacola, for he would deliver it to them at Miller's place (up Konecau, forty miles above Pensacola.)

If I hear any thing from you by the mail of to-morrow, I shall send an express to the Governor of Pensacola, demanding an explanation of his conduct. The numerous friendly offices rendered my Spanish neighbors, particularly in quelling the hostile attacks on them by Bowles, entitles me to a frank and explicit answer, independent of our treaty stipulations with them.

A war party of twenty-three have been out from Coweta, killed three, and wounded one of the hostile Indians, and brought the scalps into the public square; one other party has taken four negroes from Peter McQueen, and a third party have taken a lad of his family, twelve years old, prisoner. The chiefs continue to solicit the aid of arms, munitions of war, and men. The Big Warrior dreads the conflict, and is much under the influence of fear; he lends a willing ear to every frightful tale. I have ordered them to place their warriors under proper commanders, and send strong detachments out to attack their enemy, a town at a time, and to collect cattle and horses. They have requested me to accompany them, and to take the direction of them; this I shall do, as soon as our stock of munitions of war will afford the requisite supply; and this I should have done ere now, had not the promise of aid, gratis, paralyzed their efforts.

I am, very respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

The Secretary of War.

Since writing, I am informed, two parties I ordered out on the 18th, to attack Peter McQueen's town (Chattuchaufale) surrounded it, and found it just evacuated. They left all their property in their fort, and a good deal of salt in their houses; the warriors took the property, burnt the fort, all their houses, and destroyed their corn.

CREEK AGENCY, September 6, 1813.

SIR:

The chiefs in opposition are exerting themselves to get the prophets under their control, but without effect. Hitherto, Peter McQueen, and Hoboheithle Micco, whose town was destroyed by a detachment under McIntosh, have moved to Auttosee, and are there dancing "the dance of the Indians of the lakes." Those friendly, are fortified at Coweta, ninety miles from fort Hawkins. Four towns are there united, and desirous a detachment of our troops would come forward, and build block houses, "to keep the ground, and have all clear in front and rear." They continue to send out detachments, and, to the first of this month, had taken two hundred cattle and some horses. Several parties are still out, but more for plunder than war. The chiefs continue excessively alarmed, and under apprehensions some of the Lower Creeks and Seminoles will join the prophets; they meet to day, at Ooseochee, on this subject. I have not received any thing from you to my communications on this civil war.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG.

CREEK AGENCY, September 13, 1813.

SIR:

From the meeting of Ooseochee, the chiefs on Chattahoochee and Flint rivers report themselves unanimously friendly to the white people. The prophets have recently killed two distinguished chiefs of Wewocau. Peter McQueen, and Hoboheithle Micco, the leaders of the opposition, recently sent an invitation to thirteen of the Upper towns, to come forward with all their warriors, for an expedition against the white people, saying their whole number would be three thousand. Four of the towns, the Fish Ponds, Wewocau, Kialijee, and Hootchoe, answered, they had one thousand one hundred warriors, but were not going to fight against the Americans. The prophets were liars.

Our chiefs are so much under the influence of fear, I no longer rely on their reports, but with great limitation. We have here, one company of regular troops, under Captain Cunningham. I yesterday furnished the escort of General Wilkinson with muskets, and sent them to fort Stoddart, as a guard to the sub-contractor, who has a pilot for an unfrequented route, and all the letters at this office, and fort Hawkins, belonging westwardly.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, October 11, 1813.

SIR:

The head quarters of the friendly Indians are still at Coweta. We have some Seminoles, of Micasooky, near St. Marks; about one hundred have crossed Chattahoochee, and been joined by some Uchees and Creeks of Tutallosee. They gave out they were on the way to join the Prophet's party, for a combined attack on Coweta, and then the white people; the friendly Indians have sent a strong party from five towns to meet them. It is probable they met yesterday; and if their object is as stated, they will be attacked.

A chief of the Upper towns informs me, he saw and conversed with a Wewocau chief, who informed him his warriors led the attack on Mimms's fort, had fifteen killed, and many wounded; there were thirteen towns in the attack, and lost many men, but would not give him their numbers; he rushed up with his party, and got under the port holes of the pickets, and on looking around, saw a great many shot down. The prophets told them, in a hard fought battle, they would lose two only; and a very severe one, three at most. One of the prophets led the way, rushed into the fort, to destroy it with his magical powers, and he heard the white people cutting him to pieces with their swords. The friendly Indians have lately taken and brought in some scalps.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

The Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, September 14, 1813.

SIR:

As I hear nothing from you relative to the communications I have made you on Indian affairs, I have judged it advisable to have an understanding with myself on my situation here. I have not been concerned directly or indirectly, in commerce, or speculations of any kind, to accumulate money. From all the savings arising from my appointment, I have not made three thousand dollars. I have considered my public standing with the Indians as public property, and to be used as such, under the orders of Government, and for no other purpose; and I believe the period is arrived, when it is essential to that interest. Yet, if the President can find a man, who can fill this office, in his judgment, more for the public interest or convenience than I have done, he owes it to his high standing, and to me, to send him on; in doing so, he will do me no injury, or excite the least resentment. My friendship for him cannot be greater than it is, and will never be lessened. I have, and always shall have, entire confidence in the purity of his republican administration, and will co-operate with him, as well in private as public life, with zeal and fidelity.

This department has always been strewed with thorns. It was first assailed by the late Governor Blount and associates, in Tennessee, and the recoil on himself destroyed his public character. It was then assailed by the British, through their agent General Bowles. The Government authorized me to arrest him with a military force, and to command it, when he was in East Florida. Under an authority vested in me by the chiefs, I sent him in irons to the Governor, General Salcedo, at New Orleans, to answer for his crimes. The calumny which hovered around, and assailed the Indians and their agent, I disregarded, as it originated from base sources, filled by dishonest motives. I am, respectfully, and with great personal regard,

Dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

Extract of a communication from the chiefs at Coweta to Colonel Hawkins.

CREEK AGENCY, 16th September, 1813.

We have a negro, which we will send to you; he says, "he was in Sam Mimms's fort at Tensaw, which was taken by the Indians about the 28th August. There were one thousand Indians; they attacked the fort about ten o'clock in the morning, and took it about one o'clock. That Siras, a negro man, cut down the pickets. The Indians lost forty, some of them said fifty. After the battle, the Indians encamped about a mile from the fort, until next day twelve o'clock, during which time, they were busy hunting negroes, horses, and cattle, and brought off a great many. A number of Indians were wounded, and two died on the road. He thinks there were sixty people in the fort. Among the killed, are McGirth, Jones, McCarty, Sam Smith, Dixon Baily, his two brothers, Mimms and his family, Captain Melton, John Randall and all his family, except Peter Durant, and one of his daughters. These are all the names he recollects. There were a great many he knew not. McGirth's wife and Jones' wife, and all their children, except one of McGirth's, killed in the fort, were taken, with the reporter, prisoners to the nation. He was taken by Russels, son of Hoithlewaulee; and a daughter of Mr. Cornells told him to make his escape to her father, and tell him what the Indians have done, and that they meant to come to Coweta, after the friendly Indians, as soon as their wounded were better. He further says, about one hundred Indians went into the fork of Alabama, but does not know what they have done. They were going to send a letter to their friends, the Spaniards, to let them know what they have done; he understands the Indian tongue."

CREEK AGENCY, 17th September, 1813.

Upon hearing of the escape of the negro, who was to be sent on here, I received from Mr. O'Riley, a respectable resident of this country, and the express, the following report:

"I had the negro under guard one night, with Messrs Doyell and Mosely; we examined him repeatedly. Mr. Mosely knew him personally; we were unanimously of an opinion, the report as made by him is substantially true. He said, he was in Mimms's house when it was taken and destroyed. An Indian seeing him in the corner, said, come out, the Master of Breath has ordered us not to kill any but white people and half breeds. An Indian woman, who was in the house, was ordered out, and to go home. Dixon Bailey's sister was asked what family she was of? She answered, pointing to her brother, I am the sister to that great man you have murdered there; upon which they knocked her down, cut her open, strewed her entrails around. They threw several dead bodies into the fire, and some who were wounded. Peter Durant and Vincy Randall had left the fort but a short time before the attack, to cross the river, after grapes. He supposes they heard the firing and communicated to the people there. There was much silver money in the house melted and run about, and some dollars blacked only. Jo, and two other of McGirth's negroes, had been sent up to this plantation, in a boat, after corn, and taken by the Indians, and probably communicated where the half-breeds were, and the situation of the place. Just before the attack, the men in the fort were sitting in two circles, in the yard, talking what they would do if Indians should come. In this situation, the first they heard, was the war whoop at the pickets. They fired the houses with cotton matches fixed to arrows. Mrs. McGirth, on her way up to the nation, was excessively distressed, and cried out aloud, on being threatened by some of the warriors, that they would put her to death. She urged them to do it, as, in the situation of her family, she wished to die. She and Mrs. Jones, with their families, were sent to Wewocau. From the number of wounded, and plundered property, they were eight days on the path returning, and met no interruption."

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

FORT HAWKINS, 21st September, 10 A. M.

I have a runner from Coweta, who left there on the 19th at 10 P. M. ninety miles from this. The report of the negro is true, in substance; the Indians had thirty killed, and a number wounded. They put all the white people to death in the fort, made prisoners only of some half-breed women and children. The one hundred Indians who went in the fork of Alabama, under Josiah Francis, a prophet, went to a fort, were fired on, had five killed, and retreated. The Prophet's party are great boasters, which has the effect expected on weak minds. I hope I shall obtain four hundred men to move on to Coweta. The chiefs are very importunate for arms and ammunition. Their warriors are determined to give battle. The runner is one of the last scouts; he saw several trails of about forty horsemen, which appear to have been waylaying the post road, forty miles beyond Coweta. When their wounded are recovered a little, they say they shall come there. Dixon Bailey, and all his half-breeds, fought desperately.

FORT HAWKINS, 21st September, 1813.

I received letters from Judge Toulmin, and General Claiborne, of the 13th, 14th, and 15th ultimo, acknowledging the receipt by Congress, of several letters from me to the public officers in that quarter; apprising them of the hostile appearances among the Indians, directing the half-breeds there to unite with their white brethren, and that the people in the fork of Alabama should put themselves into the best situation they could, to resist our attack. In the General's letter, he details his state of preparation, and closes with saying, "I only wait orders and the arrival of the 7th regiment, to enter the nation." Under impressions arising from this state of readiness, for offensive operations, I received the enclosed account of the fate of the party at Mimms's fort, which has much the appearance of being true. Yet, how such a party should get there, when there were a great many half-breeds, and negroes, who speak the Indian language, and have commissions in the hostile towns, and the party to go to the lowest settlement, and return as they did, undiscovered, and unmolested, is to me a very extraordinary thing.

The chiefs, on the receipt of the intelligence, sent runners to me, and several warriors, for arms and ammunition, that they may be able to defend themselves at Coweta, until our army advance. I gave them eight muskets, and what ammunition I had at the agency, and came on here, to obtain some for them; I have sent them 100 pounds powder, and 160 pounds lead. Our powder here, is unfit for service. We hear of some more on the road. I have just seen General Floyd, who appears to be a brave active intelligent officer; I told him I should apply for three or four companies, to go with me to Coweta, to erect some block-houses, in aid of the fortifications of the friendly Indians, and where I would organize a corps of five hundred, to co-operate with our troops. He replied he had, as yet, no orders. We, in fact, are all in the same situation, but must continue to do as our judgment directs, until we hear from you.

A half-breed Uchee, from Pensacola, says: the Spaniards told him to tell his chiefs to quit their hostility to each other, unite against the Americans, and come there; they should have arms and ammunition. Upon this, several Uchees set out, and were pursued by the Ooscooches, robbed of their horses, and told, if any of them dared to go there for supplies, they should be put to death.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 26th September, 1813.

An express mail has arrived from Mobile, in which you have, I hope, a detail of the melancholy occurrence at Mimms's fort, on the 30th ultimo. I have by Mr. Cornells' express, from the chiefs low down Chattahoochee.

"Notwithstanding the loss the Prophets have sustained, they express confidence in the successful issue of their plan. Several of their party have lately been down on Chattahoochee, encouraging the Indians, within and without our limits, to join them; and urge an immediate junction of all their forces, for an attack on Coweta, which was determined on by the Prophets, and to take place on Friday next. They are determined, if they can, to destroy Coweta, and Tuckaubatchee in terrorem. After that, they should go towards Savannah river, and were determined to give Colonel Hawkins a chase and take him, unless he was on a fleet horse, before he got there. Whilst they came this way, the British were to attack New Orleans, and Mobile, and probably Savannah; they boasted much, and declared the inability of the white people to fight them in the field, or from their forts; boasted of the immense slaughter they made at Mimms's fort, and quantity of property taken in that expedition; if the red people would unite, nothing could withstand them: and those who would not join, were to be put to death, and this was the last warning they were to have. The chiefs of Eufaulau, having made this discovery, gave notice to Coweta, they should be with them with their warriors, and those of four other towns; and if they could get ammunition, would make common cause with them and their white brethren. They directed that Mr. Cornells should be sent off immediately to Colonel Hawkins, with this information; and added, if our white friends can come soon, the Indians on both sides of our line of limits will join them, and if delayed, they, from their fears, will be compelled to join the Red Clubs."

I have apprised General Floyd of similar information received, direct from the hostile Indians, and of the necessity to arm a detachment to Coweta. He informed me he had sent to the Governor of Georgia for orders, and as soon as a movement can be made with a part of the troops, he shall send them to a situation between the agency and the enemy. The information I received to day goes also by express to him.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

The Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 30th September, 1813.

Since my communication of the 26th, I have received something further, which you ought to know. When the war party went to Pensacola, they informed the Governor of the object of their visit; they had 4,800 gun-men. Their plan first was, to force their own nation to join them, and then to make war upon the Americans, and the Spaniards must assist them. The answer was: "We will supply you with some arms and ammunition, and if the Americans should prove too hard for you, send your women and children here, and I will send them to the Havana; and if you should be compelled to fly here yourselves, and the Americans should prove too hard for both of us, I shall have vessels enough to take us all off together." They received 25 small arms, in addition to what has been stated of ammunition, and after the attack on these by the half-breeds and people of Tombigby, they came home and appointed twenty days for an attack on Coweta. But the families of the killed and wounded, and those who were plundered of the Governor's present, forced the leaders to change the attack to that of the half-breeds and their assistants. On the way down they were informed the former were at Mimms's fort, and the latter at a fort in the fork of Tombigby, and they directed their attacks accordingly. The following thirteen towns, furnished warriors for the expedition: Hoithlewaulee, Foolschatchee, Coolooma, Ecanhutkee, Sauannogee, Mooklausan, Alabama, Hookchoioocche. Ocheubofau, Wewocau, Puccuntallauhassee, Wococoie, Pochusehatche. Three towns, Oakfuskee, Tallassee, Auttossee, formed a front of observation towards Coweta, to conceal the movement. Three towns, Thlotlogulgau, Eufaulau, Kialjee, remained neuter. When you are ready to move, I will give you a topographical description of the country. Since writing the foregoing, I have a runner from Coweta, who left there yesterday. Three men from Eufaulau, and three from Kialjee, came in with a flag, from whom the most interesting part of the enclosed was obtained; (that an attack on Coweta was determined on, to take place on or about the 1st October.) Mr. O'Riley, the express, is an intelligent old man, speaks the Indian tongue, and attended the examination of the bearers of the flag. What was obtained from them, was corroborated by a negro from Coolooma, and from various other quarters. The Uchees having fled to the Prophets, the friendly Indians sent eighty women and boys to gather in their corn.

The boasted power of the Prophet to take American forts with bows and arrows, to know the secrets of their enemies, and their determination to put to death every red man who does not join them, has given to many much terror, which nothing but the presence of our army will remove. They say they want now to see us with our wagons well loaded, that they may enrich themselves with the plunder. The Master of Breath has permitted a conquering spirit to arise among them like a storm, and it shall ravage like a storm. Their number is 2,500, without the new converts. I request you to communicate this to the Governor, and any thing else I may send you interesting to him to learn.

I am, sir, &c.

B. HAWKINS.

General FLOYD.

CREEK AGENCY, 3d October, 1813.

The hostile Indians appear very active. From concurrent testimony from various quarters, they meditated an attack, yesterday or to-day, on Coweta. I am apprehensive Tombigby is again to feel, or the upper frontier of Georgia will soon feel, the force of their fanaticism and murderous warfare. The friendly Indians have done all they can, hitherto, by their concentration of force on Chattahoochee, extending strong patrols up that river, and foraging as far as Tallapoosa, to keep them off from our frontiers, until our armed force collects and moves on. But now, believing they have to contend for their existence, they have called in all their patrols but those in front of their enemy. Uchee had fled from their old town, and has joined the prophet, through terror. The friendly chiefs have sent a party who destroyed their towns, and removed every living eatable thing belonging to them.

I wish you would send out a box of muskets, fifty pounds good powder, one hundred pounds lead or bullets, fifty flints, and some cartridge paper. I wish to be prepared for events, as well as we can. If the friendly Indians are routed from Coweta, or, from necessity, constrained to come on terms with their enemy, the latter will certainly be on us, and attempt to verify their threats against the frontiers of Georgia. I have hoped, till lately, we should have no fighting on this side Chattahoochee, as I expected we should move on to support the warriors there. By this want of orders, changes my opinion.

I am, &c.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Captain Cook, Commanding fort Hawkins.

CREEK AGENCY, 4th October, 1813.

Tuskeenehau, one of the executive council, and the second man of all the Lower Creeks, is come to see me to communicate more correctly what has been obtained by the flag, and what they have further discovered. The hostile Indians were drinking their war physic, (their boosketau) making their war food, and had appointed the day for their movement, and runners were passing night and day among them. The invitation was in these words to all the Upper towns: "We have had a successful enterprise westwardly. We now point our course to the east, after red and white people. We shall destroy Ooseoochee and Cussetah, and then surround Tuckaubatchee and Coweta. Their destruction is certain, and will detain us but a short while. We then take the post road, enter Georgia, ravage all before us, out round by the Hog mountain."

Hoboheithle Haujo, of Thlotlogulgau, answered, by two runners, "My town's people are, some of them, foolish, but they have not killed me and other old chiefs, as many of you have done; and we are determined not not to kill red and white people. Your prophets said, that in battle you would not lose more than two men: if a severe battle, three at most; and you have lost much blood by listening to them." To this there has been no reply. The war party have killed several of the negro men captured at and near Mimms's fort.

Two of our patrols have come in, who went up to Hillaubee, in a line between the Hog mountain and the hostile Indians. They saw about one hundred; fifty of them with bows and arrows only, and took some of their horses. They took charge of a letter from Mr. Grierson, which is expected here to-day, and will, probably, give very interesting information. I believe all the regiments arrived from Hartford to Hog mountain, on the frontiers, should be apprised of the threats of the hostile Indians. I was in hopes all our fighting would have been at, or west of, Chattahoochee; that we should have joined and co-operated there with the friendly Indians, and fought westwardly. But I am apprehensive, from delays, inseparable from your situation, and the celerity of the hostile Indians, it will be brought to our doors.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General FLOYD.

CREEK AGENCY, 4th October, 1813.

The three enclosed letters will shew you the hazardous situation of affairs among us. I can hear nothing from you. If our friendly Indians are overpowered at Coweta, and the uplifted tomahawk, with the war whoop, is to move the army near fort Hawkins, they will soon have it. I shall send the return express to Mobile, on the arrival of the mail expected the 6th.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG.

NASHVILLE, October 15th, 1813.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your interesting letter to me of the 15th September, by last mail, prior to the receipt of which, I had been informed, through various correct channels, of the hostile intentions of a portion (probably nine-tenths) of the Creek Indians, and that Government had determined to chastise them. I had also received formal information from the Creek agent, of their intention to invade this State, as well as the State of Georgia, and the Mississippi territory; that they had actually attacked fort Mimms, that they had taken it, and had spared neither man, woman, or child; after which, that they had broken up the once flourishing settlements on the Tombigby and Mobile rivers; that the people there had fled from their homes to the forts, and that the Indians were in full possession of that fine country, laying it waste; that they were living on the crops and stocks of the farmers there; that a large body were approaching the frontier of this State; that a like force had set a time for the invasion of Georgia, and, that a similar one was actually on the march to invade the county of Madison, which information had caused a large majority of the population of that once flourishing settlement to abandon their farms. All the above information was possessed, and as many as three applications made, by express, in one day, from the people of Madison county, and several from the settlers on Tombigby, requesting that this State would afford them aid to repel approaching invasions, which they had every reason to believe would be made by the Creeks, before I had obtained the necessary authority to provide the means for the supply of a competent force to repel invasion, or was at liberty to afford our suffering neighboring settlements the aid they had so repeatedly solicited. Such a state of things gave me sensations which I have not language to describe, and such as I hope never again to experience. The moving causes which lead to the prospect of so much depredation, were not, as I believe, so fully understood by the President at an early period of those commotions among the Creeks, as they now are; but I had very satisfactory evidence, to my mind at least, that the above mentioned movements of the Creeks were planned and excited by the British, and Pensacola Spaniards, who, as there is reason to believe, have, for a long time, and from time to time, recently, supplied, and are now supplying, those Indians with arms, with munitions of war, with presents, and promising them future supplies, the better to enable and encourage them to disturb the whole southwestern frontier of the United States, which frontier relies mostly on Tennessee for immediate aid, in such cases of emergency; which evidences of their conduct have been, as they were received here, transmitted without delay to the War Department, for the information of Government, so as to apprise the President of the plans and machinations of our enemies, and hoping to be enabled, through his orders, prepared, not only for defence, and to repel invasion, but to assist in teaching these savages, of all colors, the impropriety of their conduct, by subduing them, in a great measure, before the coming in of winter, when, my calculation is, that the British will make a bold attempt to spread desolation through the Southern States, through the medium of their fleet, and by their emissaries, and to commit, with the aid of those Creeks, Spaniards, &c. &c. depredations on the whole southwestern frontier. This has been my impression of their views, thinking that the Canadas would, in considerable part, be ours before the severity of winter sets in, and, if so, believing that the British would, in that case, change the seat of war, during winter, from the northeast to the southwest, where, from the difference in climate, and from the present exposed situation of our extensive frontier, they might hope to operate more successfully, from that time, than in struggling for the repossession of Canada, which, if once ours, with good management on our part, they never can again possess. We see that the British Government is increasing their naval armament for the American coast; what is it for but to effect, if they can, something of the abovementioned kind? This has been my course of reflection since the disturbances among the Creeks took rise, fully believing, as I do, that the much formerly talked of civil war, said, by the agent, to be raging among the Creek Indians, and his opinion that that nation was pretty equally marshalled against itself, in that trying contest, which I never thought them seriously engaged in, so as to produce the destruction of either party by the violence of the other, was altogether fudge—a mere tub for the whale—thrown out by the hostile party of the Creeks, through the contrivance and suggestion of the British and Spaniards at Pensacola, as a blind to the credulous, who are too apt to believe every idle tale they hear. It is not reasonable, under all circumstances, as they relate to the supplies of those Indians, to suppose the contrary; for, certainly, the British, who have it in view to do all the injury they can to the United States, count more largely from the expenses they are at, upon receiving greater aid through the exertions of the Creeks, and from some of their emissaries and followers near them, than such as would grow out of a civil war between parties in that nation, created and fomented by the British, to serve themselves. To use best exertions to render this section of the Union safe and secure from foreign and neighboring intrigue and invasion, as well as from domestic insurrection; to render our frontier settlers secure at their homes; to promote the growth and prosperity of it, in all laudable ways; and to guard, as much as possible, against any mischiefs we might, through neglect, experience from such invasions, &c. as might be made by the Indians and their aiders and abettors on our borders, whose movements have, for a long time, been secretly planned and directed by our enemies; has, and ever will, afford me pleasure: a pleasure felt, just in proportion to my regard for independence, and in proportion to the abomination, indignation, and resentment, I feel against workers of iniquity, levelled at the destruction of the best of Governments, administered by men of our own choice, and, of course, by such as we confide in. The American People are composed of too pure materials; they feel too much self respect; they are influenced in their conduct towards other Powers by too strong a sense of justice; they have too noble pursuits in view, both morally, religiously, and politically, to permit themselves to be insulted with impunity, or to suffer their country, which is the only known asylum for freemen, to be overrun, or to have their peace and their holy altars disturbed long, by savages or by their allies. I entertain the hope and belief, that the administrators of our Government are actuated by, and that they possess too high ideas of, the value of national honor and interest; and that they feel too ardent a desire for the general improvement of the face of the country inhabited by the hostile Creeks, and that they feel too little inclination, after knowing the present and the past conduct of these people, to permit their longer residence thereon, whereby they impede the growth of this section of the Union, so important to the United States, and which looks up to the Government for the use of those natural channels, leading through that tract of country, as outlets for our redundancies, and as inlets to many comforts, to consent to their continuance there any longer than they can be ousted by our arms. Therefore, I persuade myself to believe, that, in the course of the coming fall and winter, that the Creeks will be not only whipped, but that the Floridas, from whence they derive their counsel and support, to mar our frontier, will be ours. That Tennessee will cheerfully aid in the well doing of the first, with the hope that the latter will follow, under the order of our Government, as a necessary consequence; whereby, to effect the future security, and to promote the prosperity of the Southwestern section of the United States, five thousand men, and upwards, from this State, are under marching orders against the hostile Creeks and their coadjutors. They are to be joined and aided by some thousands from Georgia, now embodied at fort Hawkins, and to act separately, or in concert, with the regular troops there. If those troops do their duty, of which fact I have no doubt, they being brave and well commanded, they, in conjunction with the forces under your command, together with the people south and west, may, under the regulations of Government, soon become the cultivators of the rich soil, which they may, in that time, soon become possessed of by their valor; and they will thereafter enjoy the blessings of the mild Government of the United States, now only partially spread over that delightful tract, at this time inhabited by savages, and which is now the thoroughfare leading to the interruption of our peace, through the machinations of the British and their Pensacola allies, enforced by those deluded and turbulent Creeks, and those who take up arms, and co-operate with them. To aid in bringing about such a change for the better, Tennesseans, at the call of Government, will turn out by the ten, twenty, and thirty thousand, or more, in addition to the five thousand now in motion. These objects once effected, each southern and western inhabitant will cultivate his own garden of Eden, and will, through the natural channels placed by a wise and just Creator, convenient for his use, export his own produce, and import such comforts as he may think desirable, by the shortest routes of communication with the ocean. And, moreover, he will be no longer disturbed, either by the British, Spaniards, or Indians. Until those objects shall have been effected, the Western people, who live plentifully and well, will be, as they now are, cramped in their trade and intercourse with the Atlantic world; and desirable general improvement at their homes, and in the vicinity thereof, will be retarded, to the injury, not only of the Western population, but the growth and prosperity of this best part of the United States, will be kept on the back ground of improvement, which Government heretofore has only submitted to, for the preservation of peace, which is now broken by the enemy. I have ever viewed the possession of West Florida, by the United States, and the settlements on Tombigby and Mobile, as the beginning of great benefits to this section of the Union, both in a national point of view, and as leading towards individual enjoyments to be experienced by the people of the West, as the channels of rivers leading from this to that quarter, are plainly in our view; this being the fact, together with an ardent desire, universally felt here, to contribute every aid in our power towards affording those suffering fellow-citizens on those rivers, relief from savage pressure, the best means of this State have been put in motion, to effect so desirable an object as would be the expulsion of the enemy from that quarter, to the end, that the condition of that important tract of country may be bettered, and that those worthy, but suffering people, may return to their homes, to rationally enjoy the comforts of life, as all Americans should be privileged to do. The march of the troops from this, thither, has only been retarded by the common attendant difficulties in getting the necessary force supplied for a march of at least four hundred miles, and in making arrangements to repel meditated invasion of the State, and for a campaign against the Creeks. I trust, however, that you will very soon be relieved by the troops now on their march to the Tombigby settlements, from this State, which have lately been put in motion, under the very laudable provisions of an act lately, almost unanimously, passed by the General Assembly, for the purpose of providing for the repulsion of invasion, aiding the Mississippi territory, and for chastising the hostile Creeks in their nation. The meeting of the General Assembly at so important a crisis, (remote as we are from the seat of the General Government) with their prompt and patriotic attention to the promotion of the public interest, by providing, in anticipation of the wishes of the Government, the necessary means for the preservation of the thinly settled and much exposed extensive frontier, has seemed, to me, like an occurrence and measure provided by providential interference, in behalf of those most exposed to savage depredation. For this patriotic act of the Legislature, they deserve well of their country.

Before the passage of that act, there existed no legal provision here for supplying troops called out to repel invasion, whilst in service, neither was there any authority vested in any person here, to afford aid to the people of your territory, against attacks by the enemy, and, of course, no provision made for affording supplies to such forces as were disposed voluntarily to go to your relief, on their own expenses; some hundreds of whom were actually in motion for that purpose, before the passage of the abovementioned act. The constitutional authority vested in the Executive of a State, to call out the militia under circumstances not admitting of delay, to repel invasion, there can be no difference of opinion about, so far as relates to the right to call a competent force out; but the power to call men into service availeth but little, without the legal provisions necessary to afford the troops, thus called into service, supplies. Such legal provision was not made here before the passage of that act, and I had received no instruction from the General Government on the subject of supplies; hence, the passage of some such act was indispensably necessary for the preservation of, not only your frontier, but for ours also; without it, the frontiers generally would have been abandoned by the settlers; hundreds, and, perhaps, thousands, would have been ruined, before instructions could have been received from the War Department; for, although the hostile disposition of one portion of the Creek Indians, against the other, was known at the seat of Government to exist, the information there probably went no further than to induce a belief of the necessity or propriety of breaking the war party down, by affording relief to the peace party, which was considered to be equal, or nearly so, in number and strength, to the war party. Information of the contemplated invasion of the States of Georgia, Tennessee, and of the Mississippi territory, by the Creeks, and their having obtained supplies from Pensacola, to enable them to act effectually, I presume, had not reached the President, prior to the latter end of August; about which time, such information was sent from this, and before that, the probability of such being the fact was suspected, and an opinion to that effect offered. The invasion would, before this, have been made on this State, no doubt, had the Governor of Pensacola been ready to have acted as he wished. He was not ready as soon as he expected to be, and he sent runners from Pensacola, into the Creek nation, with information to that effect, requesting the Creeks to delay their attacks a short time, until the British should send on the supplies from the Bahamas, as promised, and on the arrival of which he should be ready. Since the runners started to the nation, the supplies have arrived from the Bahama islands, at Pensacola; hence we may expect very shortly to hear of their being in motion; but I trust, before they will do much mischief, that they will be taught the value of the friendship of the United States, and to regret that any of the Creek nation was at Winchester's defeat; and further, they may be taught to regret listening to the counsel of the British, given at the river Raisin, at that defeat, and that any of them ever carried a letter from a British general in Canada, to the Governor of Pensacola, requesting him to arm the Creek Indians for war against the United States. The Little Warrior, a Creek chief, who headed the party which killed a number of white persons, near the mouth of the Ohio, last spring, was the bearer of such a letter; when the Little Warrior was killed in his nation, the Governor of Pensacola sent a messenger into the nation with instructions to go to the place where he was interred, to dig his body up, get the letter, and carry it to him. The Little Warrior had left the letter in the hands of his family, and a party of Indians, shortly after his death, carried it to the Governor, who, in June or July, furnished the Creeks with ammunition at Pensacola, knowing the use they intended to make of it. They held a war dance at Pensacola, and avowed their determination to go to war with the United States. They have since destroyed the settlements on Tombigby, and by their threats of invasion, the county of Madison has been almost depopulated. Thus do our Spanish neighbors, under British influence and Creek Indian alliance, act in secret, as they think, towards the United States, whilst they openly profess to be at peace. Such conduct, which is known to our Government before this, cannot long remain unpunished. The United States can have no use for such hollow-hearted, mischievous, war-dancing neighbors, in time of peace. May the language of a certain psalm shortly be applied to the Governor at Pensacola, and may his successor hold his appointment under the authority of the United States, is the earnest desire of all here who know the above mentioned facts. Delay might produce evils to the citizens of the United States, which would be incurable.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIE BLOUNT.

Brigadier General THOMAS FLOURNOY,
United States Army, commanding 7th Military District.

FORT HAWKINS, 18th October, 1813.

The friendly Indians attacked the Uchees, killed three of them, destroyed all their houses and provisions, with the loss of two horses killed and two wounded. The Seminoles retreated back towards Miccosooky, near St. Marks. The war party were concentrating their force at Tuckaubatchee, to move on eastwardly, and against the friendly Indians at Coweta. We are nearly one thousand strong there. Terms of peace have been offered Coweta: "Give up four chiefs who are named, and join us against the white people, and we are friends." Peace with them, on any terms, is refused, unless under authority from the President.

I have ordered the Indians to take sides; all who are not for the chiefs are hostile, and will be treated accordingly. There is to be no neutrals; the evidence required of their having joined the chiefs is to give battle to the adherents of the Prophets.

A detachment of about four hundred well looking, well provided, and orderly men, of the militia army, have crossed Flint river, at the agency, and are fortifying there, and detachments will move on as they are ready. I arrived here yesterday, and shall return to-morrow to the agency. I have an assistant and interpreter constantly with the friendly Indians, and I keep General Floyd informed of every occurrence.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

Gen. ARMSTRONG.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

CREEK AGENCY, October 23d, 1813.

The uncertainty of passing with safety, induced me to detain Mr. McGirt till this day; I have directed Mr. Limbaugh the D. P. M. to make up a return mail in a pair of saddle bags, to go by him. The disaster which befell the party at Mimms' fort, was to retaliate the attack made on the party returning from Pensacola. As soon as Peter McQueen returned home, twenty days were broken for an attack on Coweta, and the warriors convened, it being a primary object with the fanatics to unite the nation. But the families of the killed and wounded, and those who were plundered of the Governor's present, forced the leaders to change the attack to that of the half-breeds and their assistants. On the way down, they were informed the former were at Mimms' fort, and the latter at a fort in the fork, and they directed their attacks accordingly.

The friendly Indians still have their head quarters at Coweta; the hostile Indians on the waters of Tallapoosa, Coosa, Alabama, and Cahawba. The latter generally are out of their towns embodied at their respective towns; ready to move at short notice. General Floyd has about two thousand five hundred men in readiness, and entering the country; a detachment has crossed Flint river at the agency, and are fortifying a depot for provisions; we have about six hundred here. Our movement from this quarter, combined with that of Tennessee and Mississippi territory, will render the campaign decisive in our favor. As the communication between us will be uncertain for some time, will consider what I send you as common stock, among the public affairs.

I have paid, as you authorized, fifty-five dollars and fifty cents to your express, and have to pay for his expenses. This will be charged to the post office.

I am, very respectfully, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Judge TOULMIN.

CREEK AGENCY 25th October, 1813.

The head quarters of the friendly Indians continues at Coweta. Several detachments of them are hovering on the borders of their opponents. The speaker of the nation, and chief of the Lower Creeks, visited me the night before last, and go on to General Floyd. I sent a public interpreter with them, and shall follow after them to-morrow. Their object is to have an understanding with him, relative to their co-operation with him, and to explain fully the intention of their country and affairs. We have here about seven hundred men, and the army will be on as soon as they can get beef.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Secretary of War.

The following is a transcript of a letter from General Thomas Pinckney to Colonel Benjamin Hawkins, which, pursuant to the requisition of the chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation, I direct to be sent to the President of the United States, duly certified, upon the suggestion to the said chiefs, that my powers do not extend to embrace, by treaty or capitulation, the promises contained therein.

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General Commanding.

HEAD QUARTERS, SIXTH AND SEVENTH DISTRICTS,
Camp, Confluence of the Coosa and Tallapoosa, 23d April, 1814. }

SIR:

The complete success with which it has pleased the Almighty to bless the arms of the United States, in the present war with the hostile Creek Indians, having amply retaliated upon these infatuated people the loss of blood sustained by the citizens of the United States, and by that part of the nation who remained faithful to them; and their insolence, ingratitude, and perfidy, having been severely chastised; the Government of the United States, willing to spare the dispersed remnant of these miserable people, who may be sincerely disposed to atone for their former misdeeds, by their future good conduct; you will be pleased to communicate to them the following terms, upon which peace will be granted to them.

The United States will retain so much of the conquered territory as may appear to the Government thereof to be a just indemnity for the expenses of the war, and as a restitution for the injuries sustained by its citizens, and the friendly Creek Indians. The United States will retain the right to establish military posts and trading houses, and to make and use such roads as they may think necessary, and freely to navigate all the rivers and water courses in the Creek territory. The enemy must, on their part, surrender their prophets, and such other instigators of the war, as may be designated by the Government of the United States; and they must agree to such restrictions upon their trade with foreign nations, as shall be established by the Government of the United States. You will please, sir, to communicate these terms to the friendly Indians, and to enjoin them in the prosecution of the war against such as may continue hostile, to abstain carefully from injuring those who may be returning, with the intention of making their submission. You may likewise inform them, that the United States will not forget their fidelity, but, in the arrangements which may be made of the lands to be retained as indemnity, their claims will be respected; and such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves, by their exertion and valor in the common cause, will also receive a remuneration in the ceded lands, and in such manner as the Government may direct. You will please, sir, to take such measures as you may think expedient to communicate the above terms to the hostile party, and to point out the roads whereby they may approach the posts of the United States to surrender themselves, which roads you will also please to designate to the friendly party. The calamities of the war having reduced many of the women and children of the nation to the utmost distress, for want of subsistence, the United States will furnish provisions for them at the posts to which it can be most conveniently conveyed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

Colonel HAWKINS, Agent for Indian Affairs.

FORT TOULOUSE, 25th April, 1814.

The terms upon which peace would be granted to the deluded adherents of the prophets, as communicated to me in yours of the 23d, I have delivered to the chiefs now with the army. I told them an answer was not expected from them. They would receive it only as information, and must co-operate with us by communicating it to the hostile party, by every means in their power. As they had a perfect knowledge of the country to which the enemy were retiring, they must apprise me of the paths they deemed proper for them to approach, and military posts to surrender themselves. Yesterday the chiefs informed me, in their opinion, the path on the northwest side of Alabama, would be eligible for the Alabamas, to report themselves opposite the site for the fort; and those going towards Konocau, should report themselves at fort Decatur, coming the Pensacola path to Tuckaubatchee, or the post road to its neighborhood, to branch off as the path directs to the Red Warrior's crossing fence, just above us. The chiefs directed Mr. Cornells to inform me, that they did not believe the hostile Indians were ready for peace, although a part of them had suffered so severely in battle against our armies. They were proud, haughty, brave, and mad by fanaticism. Those of the towns on Talapoosa, below Tuckaubatchee and Alabama, had suffered the least, although they were the most culpable; and it was probable they would mistake our object in offering terms of peace to them. The friendly Indians had no confidence in any promises they might make until a great part of them were destroyed. The friendly Indians, as soon as they had put their families down to planting their fields, would be ready to join, and co-operate with our armies in such manner as you may direct, and believed, with but little aid, would be able to destroy their enemy, and their fanaticism. I replied, blood enough had been spilt, and if the terms offered were not accepted, the war, of course, would continue. They must try such means as were in their power, to apprise the enemy of them; and that every one of the warriors must aid; which, of course, would soon enable us to determine on the course to be pursued.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Major General PINCKNEY.

CREEK AGENCY, June 7th, 1814.

I was most unpleasantly situated in this country, from the commencement of the civil war, among the Creeks, until the arrival of General Pinckney, from the entire silence of the War Department, upon communications made from hence. The policy of Governor Mitchell, claiming and exercising an interference in the management of Indian affairs, allowing the General Government the regulation of their commerce only; his furnishing a map, and appointing a guide and interpreter for the army, totally incompetent to the duties of either, and disliked by the camp; the army of Georgia, a fine and powerful one, three thousand men, five hundred of them cavalry, in fine order, and all of them full of ardor, anxious and solicitous to be led against the enemy, having an open country, a fine road, bridges, and flats, to the heart of the nation, under a misguided policy to be kept inactive until their usefulness was destroyed by inaction, discontent, the camp rot, and home-sickness; the General, unmindful of his being an officer of the United States, to come into the agency, and acting without consulting the agent, accepting of his services tendered in writing, or receiving from him guides, interpreters, and a map of the country; his leaving a public interpreter I sent him, raised from infancy to manhood, in Auttossee, at fort Mitchell, when he marched to attack the Indians at Auttossee, his defeat there, and subsequent events not necessary now to detail.

The arrival of General Pinckney, his correct, intelligent, and dignified deportment, the splendid victories of General Jackson, and a new army, acting purely on national principles, has changed the face of things. The friendly Indians have entire confidence in the justice of our Government, and the hostile ones have sought, and are seeking, safety in its clemency. I have kept General Pinckney correctly informed of every occurrence, and executed with promptness whatever he required of me.

I have received your favor of the 17th ult. I understood the order, of the 22d April, to embrace as well the friendly as hostile Indians, and so I have acted. Those chiefs of Tuckaubatchee, about seven hundred, being decidedly friendly, and the first objects of resentment and attack from the Red Clubs, I removed with an armed force to Coweta. Their town, cattle, hogs, provisions, and every thing but what they brought off on their backs, being destroyed, and their warriors being always under our orders, they have been supplied. Tauthlacotchcau being destroyed and all fled to us, Coweta being the head-quarters of the friendly Indians, and Cussetah, its neighbor, both exhausted of all their eatables, have, recently, received the aid of our supplies. The whole, numbered from reports up to the 2d, who now draw provisions, are nearly four thousand. As many of them have planted, in good time, they require our aid only till their corn is made. Some of the hostile Indians will not be able to make any provisions for want of hoes, &c. The policy of the fanatics being to destroy the cattle, hogs, fowls, implements of husbandry, &c., many threw their hoes and axes into the rivers. War and famine has, too late, removed the delusion from them.

We have reports of supplies of munitions of war, and an order for the supply of provisions to the Red Clubs, being arrived at Pensacola; we have also a report that some British have arrived, and are making settlements near the mouth of the Apalachicola; the truth or falsehood of both reports I expect soon to receive. The road of communication has been travelled in perfect safety between our posts, and we have not had a man killed on it during our war.

If the rumor of peace, this summer, should be realised, I hope the President will appoint a man to succeed me, as soon as it may comport with the convenience of the Government; and I hope, in any event, except actual war in this quarter, it will be convenient to do so by the end of the year.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, and with great personal regard, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War

CREEK AGENCY, 15th June, 1814.

We have, from several quarters, reports that the Seminoles and hostile Indians have received a supply of arms and military stores at Pensacola, and from two vessels at an island in the mouth of the Apalachicola. A young man at the latter place, who saw the vessels, and supplies delivered the Indians, says the officer in charge of them gave out he was "a British officer, sent to see whether the Indians were destroyed or not, in their war with the United States; if not, to afford them help. He gave to each town four large kegs of powder, some short muskets with slings, and other articles. One of his vessels was to sail immediately for supplies for the red people, and would be back in twenty-five days, with them and a plan of future operations. It was contemplated by the British, to attack Mobile, an island near St. Mary's, an island near Savannah, and perhaps the town, and an island near Charleston, at the same time. He furnished them some provisions, and directed them, in the mean time, to recruit their strength, exhausted by their recent war and famine, and to concentrate their force near Choctawhatche."

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General JOHN ARMSTRONG.

BAY ST. LOUIS, June 17, 1814.

SIR:

Previous to my leaving at Pensacola, say on the 8th instant, the schooner ———, Captain ———, tender to the British frigate Orpheus, Captain Pigot, arrived at that place, with information that he just landed five thousand stand of arms, and cartridges in proportion, for the use of the Indians at Apalachicola, where left the frigate Orpheus, landing, on St. George's island, three hundred and odd troops, a Colonel and nine commissioned officers, where they intended erecting a fortification, and which was actually commenced. Couriers were daily going to and from Apalachicola, from Pensacola, reporting the actual arrival of the said vessels, and that they had landed twenty two thousand stand of arms, and cartridges in proportion. Mr. Inerarity, of the house of John Forbes and Co. received a letter from their agent at that place, informing him of a store being erected within about a mile of his factory, for the reception of said arms and ammunition. Report of couriers having been sent to the Big Warrior, holding out inducements and propositions for his taking interest in the war party. The Big Warrior, as was reported, replied, that he had been so often deceived in their engagements, that he could no longer place reliance in words; that he must have further proofs of their sincerity, before he could place any reliance in their propositions, or listen in any way to their entreaties. The particulars of all this I have despatched by express to Mobile, and William and J. Pierce, on the Tensaw, myself, and by others, to fort Claiborne. For further particulars I refer you to my previous letters, dated at Pensacola.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. ROBERTSON.

To Brigadier General THOMAS FLOURNOY.

BAY ST. LOUIS, 19th June, 1814.

SIR:

The enclosed information is obtained from a gentleman entitled to credit, and is corroborated by others. The obvious design of the enemy is to revive the Creek war, and to bring the Big Warrior, and his followers, into the measure, and to place arms into the hands of the blacks.

As the Big Warrior is near you, or at least under your influence, (I hope) I think proper to give you this information; and request you will acquaint Governor Earley of it.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS FLOURNOY,

*Brigadier General Commanding Seventh Military District.*Colonel HAWKINS, Agent Indian Affairs, Creek Agency.

CREEK AGENCY, 21st June, 1814.

Since my communication of the 15th, I have received further information from the British, at Deer island, in the mouth of Apalachicola. "The vessels have left fifty men on the island, and sailed, saying that they would return in twenty-five days. They gave four kegs of cartridges, of one hundred pounds each, to O-he-te-yoe-on-noe, and Tut-tal-leo-see, and some arms, short rifles and others. They gave ammunition not for war. They expected the British and Americans would make peace this summer; they must not war against the United States; if they did, they would lose all their land. They had a talk for Coweta, and Cussetah, and the Four Nations; when they returned again, they would give it to them. They should take Mobile, an island near St. Mary's, and one near Savannah, and one near Charleston, all at the same time; but Mobile, it would be taken some time after the others."

The information is from Indians of different towns, who were on the spot, and tell what they saw and heard. The enclosed address to the chiefs, will show you the notice I have taken of it. From the singularity of the civil war among the Indians, and the deadly hostility between the parties, it has been very difficult, hitherto, to obtain correct and early information of what passes between the Red Clubs, and the British or Spaniards. And this is rendered very inconvenient, as we have not the means to pay persons who would undertake such a duty.

The "Red Clubs" are making their peace as fast as they can, and receiving food from us. Our stock as yet affords but a scanty supply. I have a family here who were wealthy, and lost all of their property by their delusion. One of the men was at the Horse-shoe fort, taken by General Jackson, wounded in two or three places, and escaped by remaining in the water with his nose only out, till night, and made his way in the dark. He represents the fate of his party from the combined attack of their opponents like the fall of leaves.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

P. S. I am informed the Orpheus frigate and a sloop of war landed the men and supplies.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

The Government are certainly risking much, if the British contemplate hostility in this quarter, by their neglect of the friendly Indians, who have received no part of their annuity for 1812 and 1813, except what the chiefs received the first year. I have an express from General Graham, requesting my attendance at Tuckaubatchee, to consult with him, on the present situation of our affairs. I go immediately. The third regiment would be at fort Jackson the 20th instant.

COWETA, 3d July, 1814.

The convention of the Creek chiefs is to take place on the 7th, the Seminole and other chiefs below, are invited, and have promised to attend. The supplies of the munitions of war from the armed vessels, at the mouth of the Apalachicola, appears to have been very limited, and probably such only as they could spare from their own equipments. The Adjutant General of the seventh district has apprised us of General Jackson's being assigned to the command of that district, clothed with complete powers to arrange with the hostile Creeks, except those who have fled into West Florida, between Pensacola bay and Apalachicola. They have very generally surrendered, and are fed at our forts or depositories of provisions. Their numbers will be accurate for return by the next conveyance. Famine has tamed or destroyed many of them.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

FORT HAWKINS, 13th July, 1814.

I arrived here, last evening, with General Graham, with the troops under his command, except what was sufficient to garrison the posts in the agency. On the 8th I examined, in presence of the General and Colonel Pearson, an intelligent runner from the store of John Forbes, & Co. the east of Apalachicola, twenty miles from the bay. He said "Three British officers had sent him to Coweta and Cussetah, to invite the chiefs down to receive arms and ammunition; there was a supply for them, not for war, but to kill squirrels, crows, and turkeys. His son, Homes, (a Red Club chief of Hoithlewaulee) and seven followers, who received eight muskets, bayonets, cartridge boxes, and three small kegs of powder. There would be an abundant supply as soon as the vessel returned, and a supply of goods for the Indians. Several of the Seminoles, and neighboring towns below, had received arms once, and a chief had been sent to invite the remains of the hostile Indians from Konacau to Apalachicola, and reported they were coming, but so exhausted with famine that many must perish on the way. He knew not whether the troops left on Deer island remained there or not."

The whole number of Indians fed at our posts, and depots of provision, on the 1st July, were five thousand two hundred and fifty-seven.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Major General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 19th July, 1814.

General Jackson has appointed the 1st August for a general meeting of the chiefs of the hostile Creeks, who have submitted at fort Jackson, in order to make arrangements with them, agreeable to his instructions from your office. I am on my way to meet him, at his request.

The hostile Indians, of eight towns of Tallapoosa, are between Pensacola and Apalachicola, marching to the latter, severely chastised by famine. The conquered towns have either killed their chiefs themselves, or had most of them killed in battle. If the change of affairs in Europe should not lead to a general peace, and we should have to continue the war, the Government, by availing itself of what it knows here, may ward off much of the evils contemplated to be heaped on us, in that quarter. The friendly warriors were conspicuously brave at the battle of Auttossee, and near Nuo Yaucan.

The enclosed I have just received from General Flournoy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

CREEK AGENCY, 16th August, 1814.

General Jackson terminated his negotiations with the Creeks on the 9th, and left there on the 11th, with all the regular troops, going by water down the Alabama. The line of limits is Coosa river, with a reserve, of two miles square, for fort Williams, to the falls of the river, seven miles above fort Jackson; thence, eastwardly to a point, two miles north of Oakfuskee, (a large creek, six miles below fort Decatur) thence, across Tallapoosa, to the mouth of the creek, and, up the same, ten miles in a direct line; thence, to Chattahoochee, and across it, at the first creek, two and a half miles below Oketayocenne (about sixty-eight miles north of the confluence of Chattahoochee and Flint;) thence, east to Georgia, with an eventual reservation to accommodate the Kinnards. The details you will receive by the General's secretary.

We continue to receive daily rumors of hostile appearances at Apalachicola and Pensacola. The British armed vessels, off that coast, have manœuvred dexterously, by landing and re-embarking their crews, to deceive the Indians in that neighborhood. They have, unquestionably, furnished a considerable supply of the munitions of war, and some clothing, and are training the Indians and some negroes, for purposes hostile to us. The Indian training is to fire a swivel, sound the war whoop, fire three or four rounds of small arms, send the war whoop to every village, who repeat it, and are ready to march with the shortest notice; some have recently been to the frontiers of Georgia, and done mischief. The British officers have applied to the stock holders, in that quarter, to supply beef to the Indians, and they will pay for it. They have informed me they are apprehensive they shall not be paid.

I have communicated, in detail, to Generals Pinckney and Jackson, who must soon take order to crush the mischief hatching in that quarter; or, as soon as our new line of limits for the Creeks is known, it will rouse up and combine their whole force, in that quarter, against us. We should have ready our friendly warriors, of the Four Nations, to aid our troops in crossing them, without delay, which could readily be done.

We have, from a creditable Indian source, the following, from a British naval officer to the hostile chiefs: "The British and other Powers had conquered France. Seven Powers were now united against America. A little before white frost you will hear of smoke all round the United States, in the sea ports, and the burning of powder. The war is just beginning; there will be several armies landing in different places. His King, George, said the seven Powers would be able and were determined to conquer America, and the British would be masters of it. They need not expect to be deceived; the British would fulfil their promise, and never leave this land again."

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

General ARMSTRONG, Secretary of War.

HEAD QUARTERS, Town of Mobile, September 17, 1814.

INSPECTOR GENERAL'S OFFICE, }
7th Military District. }

GENERAL ORDERS.

Our companions in arms have triumphed over the enemy. At 4 o'clock, P. M. on the 15th instant, fort Bowyer was attacked by a superior British naval and land force, and the enemy was repulsed at all points; the naval force of the enemy consisted of two ships, from twenty-four to twenty-eight guns, mounting thirty-two pound carronades; two brigs, from sixteen to eighteen guns, mounting twenty-four pound carronades, with three tenders, all under the command of Commodore Sir W. H. Piercy. The land forces of the enemy consisted of one hundred marines, under the command of Colonel Nicolls, three hundred Indians under the command of Captain Woodbine, of the British army, and a battery of a twelve pounder and howitzer, under the direction of a British captain of the royal artillery. Our effective force, opposed to the enemy, was about one hundred and twenty men, of whom not more than ninety were engaged. The leading ship, called the Hermes, Commodore Sir W. H. Piercy, having approached within reach of our guns, our battery opened upon her, the guns of which were fired in succession, as they could be thought to bear, and, at twenty minutes after four, P. M. the engagement became general; about this time the enemy, on shore, with Colonel Nicolls at the head of the marines, Captain Woodbine at the head of their allies, the Indians, and the captain of the British royal artillery, with his battery, were put to flight by two discharges of grape and cannister from a nine pounder; at five P. M. the commander's ship swung head on to our battery, when we were enabled to rake her so effectually as to silence her guns. Having cut her cable by our shot, she drifted out and grounded, stern on, within seven hundred yards, which again afforded us an opportunity of raking her, and we continued doing so while there was light enough to see that his colors were flying; and, about sunset, the other vessels cut their cables, and stood off with a light breeze, under a most tremendous fire from our battery. At a quarter past seven, we discovered the Commodore's ship to be on fire, and at ten P. M. her magazine blew up. We cannot ascertain the precise loss of the enemy; but, from deserters who came in the morning after the battle, we learn that the Commodore and only twenty men escaped from the Hermes, her crew being originally one hundred and seventy; that eighty-five were killed and wounded on board the Charon. The loss on board the brigs is unknown, but must have been very great, from the circumstance of one of them being infinitely more exposed than the Charon.

Our loss was four privates killed, and five wounded. During the hottest of the action, our flag-staff was shot away; the flag was immediately regained, under a heavy fire of grape and cannister, and hoisted on a sponge staff, and planted on the parapet.

This achievement of our brothers in arms is dear to us, and calls for, and will have, the gratitude of a grateful country. Our arms have triumphed over the enemy. The brave officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, under the command of the gallant Major Lawrence, have done their duty, and, in point of cool and determined courage, their conduct cannot be surpassed.

There was but one feeling pervading every grade and rank throughout the whole action, and that was, who should be foremost in the race of glory; with them, the post of danger was the post of honor.

By order of Major General Jackson.

A. P. HAYNE,

Inspector General and Acting Adjutant General 7th Military District.

HEAD QUARTERS, 7TH MILITARY DISTRICT, MOBILE, 19th Sept. 1814.

The enclosed general order will give the information of the glorious victory obtained over the British, Indian, and Spanish forces, on the 15th instant. In a few days I hope to have the fort completed in such manner as it will be invulnerable; twelve guns were used only. Three gun-boats would have enabled us to have captured two of the vessels, if not the whole. I hope in a few days to hear of Major McIntosh having captured all the stores and negroes on the Apalachicola.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General Commanding.

COL. BENJAMIN HAWKINS, Agent for the Creek nation.

P. S. You will give me the force of your warriors enrolled as early as possible. If Major McIntosh, and two hundred warriors, could join me shortly, I would be happy to see him. The Indians engaged on the 15th ran, and left their clothing.

CREEK AGENCY, October 5, 1814.

I send the enclosed, on the probability that you will receive it by our mail sooner than the direct conveyance through Tennessee. Major McIntosh marched on the 23d ult., with one hundred and ninety-six warriors, twenty rounds ammunition, twenty days' provisions. Some reinforcements have followed, and some were to join from below, expecting in all from three to four hundred—enough for his object. Our chiefs complain much against us. They say “Government has not been just to them, in withholding their annuity for 1812, '13, and '14, without assigning any reason for it. They have been faithful to their treaty stipulations with us, yielding whatever was demanded of them. General Jackson is in hopes justice will be done them; but it is still delayed. They are called on for warriors, for runners, and other purposes, without receiving any pay for the services they have often willingly performed. They are now in a manner naked, their hunting done, their resources destroyed by their civil war, and they are without the means of clothing their helpless people and themselves, and winter is approaching.”

I am respectfully, and with great personal regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Mr. MONROE, Acting Secretary of War.
