Such information, attended with such circumstances, very much alarmed the frontier inhabitants, much more than can be conceived, or scarcely believed, but by such as have either seen or heard the particulars upon the spot; but they are now recovering themselves, and will, I hope, be able to profit by their folly, when an attack may really be made.

Although I have paid such credit to the information given by the Bloody Fellow and the Glass, as to discharge the militia called into service by my order of the 11th instant, in consequence of the letters from the Little Turkey, and others, yet, I have my apprehensions, that smaller parties of Cherokees will join the Creeks in committing depredations on the frontiers; and to protect them, I shall order additional numbers of militia into service, for a three months' tour of duty; respecting which, I shall report to you particularly, by Mr. Allison, who will leave this in eight days at the farthest, for Philadelphia, and would before this, but for this unexpected alarm of wars.

As his arrival will be so immediately after this reaches you, and the information by him, respecting this country, more full, permit me to suggest whether it would not be best to postpone the forwarding to me any orders, until his arrival.

The gentleman who, I informed you in a former letter, I had engaged to attend the treaty or conference the Spaniards were about to hold with the Southern Indians, to collect information, has not yet returned; his name is James Alexander Douglass, a Scotchman by birth, (he will get ready access to Panton, and all the Scotch, of course) has been bred a Jesuit, and understands the Spanish language; has lived several years among the Indians; introduced to me through General Pickens, with whom he had lived as a teacher of his children several years. The general thinks well of him, and I have the fullest expectations he will answer the object of his mission.

I am yet without the honor of any advices from you, since the 22d April,

But have that of being, with very great respect and esteem, your obedient humble servant.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

At this time I am in a bad state of health, and my brother the Glass has told you the reason of our young warriors being assembled together at this time, from different parts. I overtook them at this place, and it was a long time before I or the other head-men could put a stop to their intended proceedings, as we much pitied the innocent people that must have suffered on both sides.

It is but a short time since I came from seeing the President of the United States; my tracks are scarce yet blotted out. The talks we had, was, that we should not war with one another, and that his people should not encroach upon our lands; but in place of that, they are daily encroaching, and building houses on our lands; this is not what we agreed upon.

I let all my people know what I agreed upon with the President; he was to let the different Governors know, so as they might not let the people settle on our lands, as they have formerly done.

I hear you are displeas'd with us for holding talks with the Spaniards, or any other neighboring Power; why should we not hold talks with our neighbors, as we do not want to be at war with any body, if we can avoid it?

What I tell you is the truth; it has given me a great deal of trouble; but I am glad it was in our power to put a stop to the effusion of blood. If you was to consider well, you would see it was more your people's fault than mine, by daily encroaching on our lands, and sending threatening talks. If there is any bad people in your land that wants to hurt us, I hope you will likewise stop them, as I have done mine, and that we may live in peace one with another, and hear no more of war. You will, likewise, please to send to Cumberland, and let them know that it is not our people that may do them any harm for the future, as we wish to be at peace with them.

The friends of the White Man-killer, of this town, think very hard of his losing his horses at your place, and the other fellow that was with him; if his creature was proven away, he did not steal it, but bought it of the Creeks; therefore, I think the owner ought to pay one half the value; if they are found, pray have them sent to the Hanging Maw's. This is all at present,

From your friend and brother,

THE BLOODY FELLOW.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

It is but a few days since I sent a talk to Captain John Chisolm. I suppose you have seen it; remember it well, as I never tell you any thing but the truth. At that time, I let you know the minds of the people, and now I am about to let you know what had like to have happened since I wrote to Captain Chisolm.

Codeatoy returned here from the treaty at Nashville, and tells us that Colonel Robertson said that there had been a great deal of blood spilt in his settlement, and that he would come and sweep it clean with our blood. This caused our young warriors to assemble together, in order to meet him, as he told Codeatoy that the first mischief that should be done, that he would come, and we knew, of course, it would not be long before something might happen, as there is Creeks daily going to that settlement; and as they expected to suffer for the doings of others, they resolved they would meet him, or go to the settlements and do mischief, as they were to be sufferers, do it who would; but, with the assistance of the Bloody Fellow, John Watts, and some other head-men, we have sent them to their different homes, to mind their hunting, in hopes you will not suffer any of your people to send in any more threatening talks. We took pity upon the innocent that might suffer on both sides, which undoubtedly would have been the case. As I have always listened to your talks, I hope you will listen to mine, and have peace.

I mentioned to you several times concerning your people coming in here; pray do not let them come unless it be upon public business, then let them come to Estanaula.

If our people has any beaver, or any other thing that suits to trade, in your settlement, let them come in with it.

There was a friend of mine, the White Man-killer, that was in your settlement some time since; he lives in the Turkey's town; your people threatened to shoot him, and beat him in a dreadful manner. This I never suffered to be done to any of your people.

I hope we will hear no more bad talks from each other, but that peace and brotherly love may continue.

These from your friend and brother,

THE GLASS.

Governor Blount to the Little Turkey, Chief of the Cherokees.—September 13th, 1792.

MY GOOD FRIEND AND BROTHER:

Your letter of the 2d September, was handed to me on the 11th instant, and affords a strong and pleasing proof of the sincerity of your friendship for the United States, and of your desire for peace with them, which, I assure you, they most earnestly wish.

You ask me to let you hear good, "whether you that are for peace, may stay at home?" by which, I understand you mean to ask, if none of the Indians of the other towns of the Cherokees join the five Lower towns in war against the United States, will they, the other towns, be permitted to stay at home in peace? To which I answer yes. The United States do not wish to punish the innocent for the guilty.

I should have supposed, the five Lower towns, before they had went out for war, would have made the causes for so doing known to me; such is the custom among nations; perhaps they thought to steal a march upon me, but in that they will be mistaken; I shall be ready for them.

For this proof of your friendship, be pleas'd to accept my hearty and sincere thanks, and to present them to my friends Chuleoah, Kitagiska, Cabin, and Skiuka, for the information they gave. Tell Chuleoah I cannot now get a gun to send him; the white people, since the Lower towns have declared war, cannot part with one; assure him it is not that I am afraid he would use it against the United States; I have the utmost reliance in his friendship, and a great esteem for him.

I am, your friend and brother,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

September 14th, 1792.

Since writing the above, I have received letters from the Glass and the Bloody Fellow, informing me that they and John Watts, with the assistance of some other head men, had stopped the party from going out, and that now, all the five Lower towns are for peace; I wish they may continue so; the United States prefer peace to war. I beg you, my good brother, to inform your people, that I have, and shall erect, a number of block houses on the frontiers, both of this district, and of Cumberland, and put at them a number of men, both foot and horse, for the protection of the frontiers.

These houses will be built on the lands of the United States, and not on those of the Cherokees. I beg you to order your good people not to come near them, for they, by mistake, may be taken for bad ones, and I should be very sorry for it. Should you, or any of your chiefs, wish to come to this place, I would advise the coming by Major Craig's, along the public road.

Whenever you have occasion for sending an express to me, send an Indian, I will pay him; and I beg you to continue to give me the earliest intelligence of what is doing, or intended to be done, against the United States.

I am, your friend and brother,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

The LITTLE TURKEY, Chief of the Cherokees.

Governor Blount to the Glass, a chief of the Cherokees—September 13th, 1792.

Friend and Brother:

Your letter of the 10th instant is just handed to me. I had, several days before, heard that a party of the young warriors were collecting in the five Lower towns, for war against the United States, and I was getting mine together to meet them; but I am glad to hear that you, the Bloody Fellow, John Watts, and other head-men, have sent them home. I will send mine home, except a few who I shall station on the frontiers in blockhouses, to protect the frontier people from the Creeks, who, you and your people tell me, are daily passing through your nation, with a determination to do mischief to the citizens of the United States. I shall not build these blockhouses on the lands of the Cherokees, but on the lands of the United States.

I advise you to tell your good people not to come upon the lands of the United States, because they may be taken for bad ones, and I shall be very sorry for it; but if any of your people want to come here, let them come openly and fearless along the path, by Major Craig's, then nobody will hurt them, and I will be glad to see them.

I did not hear the talk General Robertson gave to Codeatoy, but General Pickens did, and, I believe, he spoke to Codeatoy, as well as General Robertson; and, I think, as they are both good men, and known to be friends to red people, as well as white, that neither of them would send a talk that could justly have given your young people such offence. Codeatoy must not have understood what was said, or must have forgotten it before he reached your towns. I do not believe he would tell a lie; I am sure he is an honest man. But, suppose General Robertson had sent you a bad talk, he is only a warrior under me, and your people ought not to be so offended at it, as to make war against the United States. It is my talks you ought to attend to, and not to those of any body else, except to those of the President, or the Secretary of War; it is us, and nobody else, the United States have authorized to talk to you, and transact business with you, on their part.

The making war, be the offence what it will, is a very serious thing with all nations, and never should be entered into without being first well considered; the consequences are always dreadful, not only to the warriors, but to the innocent and helpless women and children, and old men.

I did, as you supposed, see your letter to Captain Chisolm, and was well pleased with it, and I saw Jack Sevills, who brought it. He gave a very good report of you; and I read Captain Chisolm's answer, of which I approved.

I have inquired into the beating which you complain your friend, the White Man-killer, received at this place. It happened, as you know, while I was at Cumberland. It appears the White Man-killer was drinking with some white people, in a tavern at this place, among whom was a Mr. White; that the White Man-killer, having drank too much, insulted Mr. Jehu White, who had also drank to great excess, which provoked Mr. White to strike him, but not with an intention to kill. It was a drinking affair only, and I understood was so settled when the parties got sober.

I shall be glad to see you, and take you by the hand to my house, whenever you will please to come.

I am, your friend and brother,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

Governor Blount to the Bloody Fellow, a chief of the Cherokees—September 13, 1792.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

Before your letter came, I had heard every thing that was doing in the five Lower towns, and I am glad to hear that you, and the other head-men, have stopped the party; if you had not, the consequences would have been dreadful.

The President has not been unmindful of the promises he made you, that settlers should not encroach on your lands, and I am surprised you should write me, "That the citizens of the United States are daily encroaching and building on your lands." I deny, positively, that a single house, or settlement, of any kind, has been made, since the treaty by me entered into on the part of the United States, with your nation, on the lands of the Cherokees.

I have, my good brother, considered well, and cannot agree with you that the white people are as much to blame as the Cherokees. The white people have not killed any Cherokees, except in defence of their persons and horses; and I well know how many white people the Cherokees of the Lower towns have killed, and made prisoners; many of them helpless women and children, and that they have stolen a great many horses.

I have a long written account of these things, and I know well who have been killed and captured by the Cherokees, and who by the Creeks; and I shall send this account to your father, the President, and he will judge who of us is the most to blame. Keep your people from going to Cumberland, and I will answer that you will receive no disturbance from that quarter, neither in words nor in acts; those people have been always observers of treaties, and never intruders on your lands; and I shall inform them, that your young people have desisted from their determination of invading them for the present, but I shall direct them to keep strong guards in the blockhouses, which I have ordered to be erected on their frontiers, not to offend any good people, but to protect the citizens of the United States against bad ones, Creeks, and others.

The people of Cumberland are citizens of the United States, and as much the care of the President as the people of Philadelphia are; and he is equally desirous that your people should treat them well, and will not suffer them to be treated ill by any body.

The friends of the White Man-killer have no cause of complaint about his losing his horses at my house. It does not appear that they were stolen by white people; all that is known of them, is, that he turned them in the woods, and, after a week's search, and inquiry, by my servants, and others, they could not be recovered, nor heard of. I then informed him that he should be paid for his horses, and before he went away paid him a part, and would have paid him the whole, if he had not declined receiving it. He hoped, and so did I, that when he went away his horses would be recovered, but they are not yet heard of.

The other man who was with him also turned his horses out, and they for several days came up; but, for his want of care, at length went down the river to the house of a man from whom one of them had been stolen; he took possession of her, brought her up to me, and proved her before a justice of the peace, by the oath of several disinterested evidences, to be his property; and, by the law of the white people, he is entitled to keep her, without paying any thing. The man, when he bought her from a Creek, must have known she had been raised by the white people, and was stolen. Does not all your nation agree in informing me that the Creeks are daily stealing horses from the white people? Then why do they purchase horses from them?

I have not told any body that I was displeas'd that your people had talks with the Spaniards; but I have expected that you, from your friendship for the United States, would have made me acquainted with what was there done. At the treaty of Nashville I invited you and Watts to be present, and see and know what I did with the Chickasaws and Choctaws; and as Watts chose to go to the Spaniards in preference, to be sure I expected he also would have inform'd me what was there done.

Now, my good friend and brother, I have answer'd your letter, let me tell you I have a great love for you, and will be ever happy to see you and take you by the hand, and I shall be ever happy in seeing John Watts.

I am, your friend and brother,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

Information from the Red Bird, a Cherokee, who came to Nine-miles, on the 4th September, to the house of Major Craig, and told him that six or seven Indians were out, in order to do mischief on the frontiers, and, he believed, in the south of Holston; that part of the men were Shawanese, and part Cherokees, from Running Water, or Nickajack. A few days afterwards, to wit: a day or two after Cockran was shot at, he came back and told Major Craig, that the Indians had heard that he had given the information, and were much dissatisfied with him, and that he was threaten'd with the law, referring to one that had been made some time before: "That any Indian, a native of the Cherokees, who should give intelligence to the whites of any orders which the nation took in council, or otherwise, he should forfeit his property, and be banish'd the country." He then told him that John Watts had been to Pensacola; that he brought home seven horse loads of ammunition, and as many accoutrements as were sufficient to equip two hundred horsemen, to wit, swords, &c. and that Watts was appointed to command the Creeks and the Cherokees who should be call'd into the field, and be for war, and that the Creek nation had met in council, and agreed to the appointment.

That the determination of the War Department was, provided the Upper towns of the Cherokees would not come into the measures of war, that they would send out a party, and fall on the frontiers next the Upper towns, and so harass them, that the whites would be irritat'd to kill some of the Indians of those towns, which would induce them to consider the war general. He yesterday told Major Craig, that he might rely thirty Creeks had cross'd the Tennessee, near Nive, about eight miles above the junction with the Holston, and suppos'd them out for the purpose he before told him, and that the whites ought to be on their guard. That the party from the five towns, who were gather'd together to declare war against the United States, and to commit depredations on the frontiers, were not so much stopp'd by the Glass, the Bloody Fellow, and Watts, as by Unanecata, who return'd from Knoxville just as they had assembled.

That the head-men of the other towns sent talks to the five Lower towns, not to go so soon to war; their corn was not yet ripe; that the white people would come and destroy it and their towns, and they would not be able to stand hunger and cold both at the same time.

The Red Bird adds, he does not know whether it was policy of the head-men to stop the party from going to war, or whether they meant that they were willing for war after the corn was hard and gather'd, but he should soon know, and inform Major Craig.

NOTE. This information was deliver'd to Governor Blount by Major Craig, on the 13th September, 1792.

The Red Bird is a fellow of understanding, and has heretofore been consider'd a great enemy to the white people, and is as likely to be in the councils of those who machinate mischief, as any other man.

The deposition of William Cockran, son of John Cockran. Being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that his father, with whom he usually dwells, lives on the waters of Holston, about one mile north of the ridge which divides the waters of little river from the waters of the Tennessee, and hath there resid'd for two years past; that yesterday, as the deponent was travelling along a path about one quarter of a mile from his father's, he heard a person halloo, on which he halted, look'd about, and saw nobody; in a few seconds after, the halloo was repeated; he again stopp'd, and then saw a man approaching on horseback in a gallop, about one hundred and fifty yards distance from him, who continu'd to approach until he came within ten paces; he appear'd to be a half breed Indian, dress'd in the Indian garb, except his hair, which was tied behind; he stopp'd, and ask'd the deponent where he was going; who answer'd, home; and then ask'd the Indian where he was going: to which he made no answer; but, after a pause, observ'd, by saying, "I'll be damn'd friend if there will not be some body kill'd in these settlements;" at that instant this deponent saw three persons, whom he believes to have been Indians from their garb and color, rise and fire at him about forty yards distance from him; they rose immediately in the rear of the man on horseback; one ball pass'd through the hat of this deponent, and another through his jacket; whereupon the deponent ran towards his father's house, about two hundred paces, when stopp'd and turning round, he perceiv'd that he was pursu'd by one Indian, and at the same time he saw the horseman galloping from him. The deponent then ran to his father's house, and saw no more of them.

Sworn before me, David Campbell, Esq. one of the judges of the territory South of the Ohio, at Knoxville, this seventh day of September, 1792.

Attest, DAVID CAMPBELL.

WILLIAM COCKRAN.

KNOXVILLE, September 20, 1792.

SIR:

Herewith I enclose you the minutes of the conference held at Nashville, with the Chickasaws and Choctaws; of the former, there was a very full representation, both of chiefs, and others; but, of the latter, there were only one hundred and ten chiefs, and others; what part of them were chiefs will appear by the minutes.

I do not know better how to explain to you the cause of there being only so few Choctaws, than by enclosing to you the report of Mr. Forster, one of the gentlemen who carried my letter of invitation to them to attend.

You will observe that he supposes one cause to have been the conduct of one of his colleagues, meaning Captain David Smith, who I engag'd to accompany him, and Mr. James Randolph Robertson, from a belief that he, David Smith, as he had frequently been in the nation and spok'd the tongue, was the most proper man in the territory in all respects to be engag'd in such business; in fact I add'd him to those gentlemen who I first employ'd, fearing, if I did not, and any failure should take place, that it might be imputable to me for not having sent him.

It seems, on the arrival of Mr. Forster and Captain Smith, they found this Mr. Brassheart, who Mr. Forster mentions in his report, there resid'g, a trader much attach'd to the Spanish interest; and that Captain Smith and he had been old acquaintances, and not friends; that on meeting, they presently fell into warm disputes concerning the American and Spanish Governments, and their respective consequence and influence in the Choctaw nation: at length each agreed that he would be determin'd by the number that should accompany Smith to the conference, or that Brassheart should prevent.

This Brassheart was the only man who had any taffia in the town where the council assembled, and it was no doubt he who made the party drunk, and induced them to break up the council and tear the belts, so that the insult which appeared to be offered to the United States, is justly to be attributed to him and his taffia, and not to the nation.

Captain Smith is a warm zealous man, who I have no doubt conceived he was acting for the interest of the business he was engaged in, but it gives me pain that the failure of a fuller representation should be imputable in any shape to his imprudence.

Another artifice made use of by Mr. Brassheart was to inform the chiefs that there was something in the letters which had not been explained in council, written in red ink, by which he foresaw the Choctaws, if they went, would be put to death, and as the letters were in his care, it is highly probable he might have inserted some words with red ink. Many are the artifices of this kind made use of by the white people living among the Indians, to the injury of the best concerted measures of Government, and cannot be counteracted until they have had the pernicious effects intended by their authors.

The Spanish interest must unquestionably have had its weight, and in that may justly be included the conduct of Mr. Brassheart.

With the Choctaws that did come to the conference came Mr. Pitchlyn, who was the interpreter of the treaty of Hopewell, a warm active man, and friend to the United States, who seemed to have great command over them, and could, as he believed, have led the greater part of them to the aid of the United States, northwest of the Ohio, or elsewhere; and it was his opinion, given in decided terms, that he could and would, upon having a supply of arms and ammunition, lead a great part of the nation to war against their old enemies the Creeks, but said they could do nothing without both, for they had neither, and were very poor: Pitchlyn added, the Choctaws, from their dependent situation, were obliged to keep up the appearance of friendship for the Spaniards, but that a very great part of the nation had a dislike to them, and would be very glad to have their trade and supplies from the United States.

A letter from Ben James, a man of the first property and probity in the nation, also speaks the same language; a copy of which is enclosed.

I questioned Pitchlyn touching the particulars of the treaty which the Spaniards held at the Natchez, by Governor Gayoso and the Choctaws, from which the chiefs had returned but a few days previous to the arrival of Mr. Forster and Smith in the nation: he said it had not been a full representation; that it consisted only of the Spanish party, and that the chiefs said they had given permission only to the Spaniards to continue their new fort at the Walnut Hills, near the mouth of the Yazoo, but had sold them no lands, and even this displeased the younger part of the nation so much that they frequently threatened to kill the chiefs who had been at the treaty. But from information I have since received, I believe there is no doubt but Governor Gayoso obtained a relinquishment of a large tract of country, beginning at the mouth of the Yazoo; thence ten miles up it; thence southeast to a river which empties into lake Pontchartrain, (I believe called Midway) and down that river.

Both nations arrived at the treaty many days before the goods got round, which run the expenses much higher than they otherwise would have been, and there were several contingent charges not foreseen nor enumerated in the estimate, particularly one for mending a great number of old guns, which appeared essential to the interest of the United States.

During the conference, by which I would be understood to mean not only the time of the public formal meetings at the Arbour, but also, the many private conferences which General Pickens and myself held, both nations gave the strongest assurances of friendship for the United States, and of their perfect satisfaction at the treatment they received, and appeared to be gratefully impressed with the value of the presents they had received.

That part of the Chickasaw nation called Piamingo's, which is much the stronger party, repeatedly assured us, in case of a war with the Creeks and Cherokees, that the Chickasaws would be a party, and they as repeatedly said they were sure these two nations shortly intended war with the United States, and that the Spaniards were urging them to it.

General Pickens and myself having already given the reasons, in former letters, why no attempts were made to induce a party to join the arms of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, I conceive it unnecessary to repeat them here.

I have the honor to be, &c.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Anthony Forster to Governor Blount.

NASHVILLE, 29th July, 1792.

Sir:

In consequence of your commands, I feel a sensible pleasure in throwing together some observations which I made on the manners and conduct of the Chickasaw and Choctaw tribes of Indians, whilst in the execution of the commission which I had the honor to receive from your Excellency. I have taken the liberty to communicate the information of which I am possessed, in an epistolary manner, this being the only mode to which I have been accustomed, and in which I flatter myself I can express myself with a greater degree of precision. On the sixth of June last, I left Nashville, on my way to the Chickasaws, and arrived there on the eleventh. The village in which the Hair-lipped king lived, was the first that I came to. I had not then an opportunity of seeing the king, but passed on to the Mountain-Leader, who lives about three miles from the first village. We were cordially received by Piamingo, who appeared to listen with attention and complacency, to such explanatory remarks as we made, relative to the objects of our mission. A convention of the chiefs of the Chickasaw nation was called on the third day after our arrival, which was on the fourteenth of June, at which appeared all the chiefs of the nation, (together with a number of others) of whom I acquired my information, except the Wolf's Friend. In this convention, or council, the Mountain-Leader was exceedingly active; appeared to embrace the views of the United States, and exhibit unequivocal marks of his attachment and fidelity to its citizens. Upon this occasion, the dispositions of the whole assembly appeared to be friendly and candid, except the Hair-lipped king, whose conduct indicated an aversion to the views and measures of the council; upon which I was induced to inquire into the principles and reasons of his behavior, which was so eccentric, that he retired from the council apparently much disgusted and chagrined; the reason of which was, that the address of the letter manifested a pre-eminence of the Mountain-Leader, inasmuch as it did not expressly mention the king by name. In order to reconcile him, and remove, if possible, the cause of his disgust, I informed him that the reason of his not being addressed by name by the Secretary of War and your Excellency, was, that he had not been to see them, as the Mountain-Leader had; the great officers of the United States had not the same opportunity to know his power and authority in the nation, that they had with respect to the Mountain-Leader, nor had they a complete opportunity to be acquainted with the full extent of his authority till now; that, hereafter, if he would go and see the white people, that every respect and attention due to his dignity and character, would be paid him. In consequence of this talk, he appeared to be better satisfied; returned and took his seat, and wrote a letter to the Choctaws, in which he endeavored to enforce the propriety of the measures held out by the Federal Government, and recommended the care and protection of our persons. A similar letter was also written by the Mountain-Leader. In this convention, I discovered a general disposition for war, excited, as I supposed, by the letters from the Secretary of War and your Excellency; which I informed them would be pleasing to the United States—not that the great power and strength of the United States could avail itself of their services, but that it would afford an additional proof of their affection, make them better acquainted, and as one people. This ardor for military fame, so generally prevalent at that time, was much abated at the close of a council at Duck river, on their way to this country. Having your Excellency's commands always in view, I inquired into the reason why their martial spirit had so much subsided. I received but little information. A Captain George, with whom I suppose your Excellency is acquainted, argued strenuously against the propriety of the measure, saying, as I was informed, that it was only the wish of the United States to get the Indians to war against themselves, and it was said, enforced his arguments with some examples.

Having afforded your Excellency such information as I am possessed of, I shall now resume my journey from the Chickasaw to the Choctaw nation. On the 15th same instant, we left the Chickasaw nation, and arrived at the Choctaw nation on the 19th, and proceeded to the Yazoo towns, in company with Mr. Pitchlyn, a linguist; on the 23d, a general assembly of the chiefs of the nation, held at the opening of the convention, a friendly disposition seemed to prevail, and a general desire to gratify the wishes of the United States; after the council had sat two or three hours at a time, when the clashing of opinions of the different chiefs were urging to one uniform point of decision, a mob of drunken Indians (three of whom appeared to be most active) broke up the assembly by threats of violence, and also tore the peace belt in pieces, and manifested marks of disapprobation. As your Excellency must necessarily conclude that there were some existing causes for this faction, I conceive it incumbent on me to give you all the information of which I am master; but as they are tedious and complicated, involve a number of conjectural opinions, as well as references to the conduct of one of my colleagues, whose conduct previous to that occasion, in the Choctaw nation, was not entirely consistent with my opinion of the measure to be pursued, relative to the attainment of the objects of our mission, I think your Excellency will excuse me from committing it to paper, and be of opinion, that a personal interview, if required, would be better. After the dissolution of the council, we talked with several of the chiefs, as we could find them, who appeared desirous to come on to this country; and I believe a number more would have come on, had it not been for a continuance of the same causes which operated at the time of the faction; one of which, I may venture to say, was the Spanish influence. We left the town in which the council was held, on the same evening, on our return to Pitchlyn's, where I continued several days, for the purpose of conducting such as should assemble to come to this country, and Captain Smith continued on his return to the Chickasaw nation. About four days after I arrived at Pitchlyn's, messengers arrived, who informed me that the greater part of the Choctaw nation had declined coming on, in consequence of a talk given them by one Brass-heart; however, I was determined to make a vigorous exertion, to assemble as many of the chiefs and warriors as I possibly could, and immediately despatched messengers to the most inconvenient towns, and went in person to others, by which means, I assembled the number your Excellency has seen. Your excellency expressed a desire to know something of the disposition of the Indians. It was impracticable to acquire any positive and authentic information, but it was the opinion of the white people in the nation, that they would go to war with cheerfulness, upon hostilities being commenced by the whites against either the Creeks or Spaniards, and then receiving a supply of ammunition, &c. I was further confirmed in this opinion, by some expressions of astonishment by them, relative to the conduct of the United States and the Creeks, as well as the habits of enmity against that nation. Agreeably to your Excellency's request, I inquired if the talk communicated to the President by the Bloody Fellow, was authorized by the chiefs of their nation; to which they answered, that the talk was not official, nor authorized by them, but that some of their people might have assumed such a power, and given a talk to the Bloody Fellow, for ought they knew to the contrary.

Having given your Excellency every material information relative to the trust reposed in me, I must beg your Excellency's indulgence, with respect to faults in diction, not having been accustomed to arrange my ideas on paper. I am, with the highest respect.

CHOCTAW NATION, June 30, 1792.

SIR:

I take the liberty to inform you, that I had the opportunity of seeing your letter to this nation, and I think you must be sensible that every white man in this nation must be dependent to Spanish government. If you are not sensible of it, you must have heard that the Spaniards are a jealous people, and I have always been pointed out as an American. But I have always been true to that power who protected me; but the whole is, I am protected at my own expense. My reason of speaking to you in this manner is, that I have received several insults from the Creeks, and obliged to put up with it. For what reason? Because I am not able to help myself.

I would apply to the Spanish Government for protection, but I am so sensible that they must encourage the Creeks, that I cannot.

Now, sir, look at my situation; weigh the matter in your own breast; to be censured without meddling. I have passed through all the difficulties of the war, without the least blemish on my character, and have gathered a small property together, and now lies at stake, in case you do not support us, and that shortly.

My life I disregard, for I am partly past being of service to king or country; the Creeks have threatened me ever since peace took place between America and Great Britain, but I am alive yet, if you pay any regard to my lines.

I saw your letter; you want the Indians to pitch on a place for you to send your goods; no place suits as well as the Chickasaw Bluff, or say the mouth of Wolf river. If you will furnish for this nation 2,000 pounds of powder, and 4,000 pounds of lead, and deliver it there, and other things equivalent, such as flints, knives, and arms, at a certain time, and let me know it by a private letter, I will meet it there to receive it; if the matter is published, it will be apt to be intercepted.

These lines I send you by a young Choctaw that is worthy of notice; if you do not approve of these lines, after reading of them, please to commit them to the flames, and I will work my file as well as I can.

Mr. Alexander M'Gillivray is now at New Orleans, and it is not for the good of the States of America that he is there, nor yet for the nation.

Mr. John Pitchlyn is your interpreter, very capable, and a worthy young man, but has been unfortunate enough to have no learning, being raised partly in this nation. Nothing more, but I am, with regard, unknown,

BEN JAMES.

Mr. James must have been mistaken, in saying in the fifth section of his letter, that I wrote to the Chickasaws that I wanted them to pitch upon a place to which I would send them goods. I wrote them no letter but the one of which I sent a copy to the War Office, and it contained no such passage.

WM. BLOUNT.

Governor Blount to the Head-men and Chiefs of the Chickasaws and Choctaws.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

The first thing necessary is, that I inform you who I am, and who General Pickens is. I am Governor of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, and Superintendent of Indian Affairs, for the Southern district; General Pickens was a great warrior against the British and against the red people, in the late war; he is a beloved man of the President, and attends here at his request; whatever is said to you by either, you are to consider as said by both. Governor Blount then proceeded to address them:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

It is now seven years since General Pickens and myself had the pleasure of seeing your nations in council at Hopewell, in South Carolina, when you formed treaties with the United States. Here is a copy, (holding it up.)

The object of the present meeting is not to alter these treaties, but to strengthen and keep alive that friendship of which those treaties are the basis, and to beg your acceptance of a quantity of valuable goods, as a proof of the sincere friendship of the United States.

Another object is, publicly to present Piamingo, the Colberts, and their followers, who joined the arms of the United States last year, and fought against their enemies, hearty and sincere thanks for their services, and to present them each with a rifle.

You have been told that we want, and will ask you for land; we shall not; we wish you to enjoy your lands and be as happy as we ourselves are; nor do we want the land of any red people; the United States have land enough.

At the treaty of Hopewell, you requested that a trading post should be established at the mouth of Bear creek. The reason it was not immediately done after that treaty was, that the United States were not in a situation to do it; but they are now grown strong and rich, and have for their President the illustrious General Washington, the greatest of all men; and we inform you that he will shortly afford you a trade from that place, as agreed by that treaty.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: We have reason to believe that a chief called Double-head, of the Cherokees, a signer to the treaty at Holston, with some other Cherokees, and some Northwards and Creeks, in all about forty, have settled on the south side of the Tennessee, near the mouth, on your lands, as we suppose; this Double-head, otherwise Tuscalateague, and his party, have killed a number of the citizens of the United States; and as your nations and the United States are friends, and we hope ever will be, it will be well for you to drive these people off your lands, or give us leave to destroy them if we please; and to the end that it may in future be known on whose land the people reside, who commit depredations on the citizens of the United States, it is essential that the bounds which divide your lands from those of other red people, should be marked out and made known to us.

We will say no more to day, but we request, when you come to reply, that you will speak freely, and tell us every thing that is in your minds; friends ought to keep nothing from each other; to speak freely is a proof of friendship.

WEDNESDAY, 8th August, 1792.

WOLF'S FRIEND, in reply.—I call you friends and brothers: we have met about half way between our nations, where we each of us have our warriors. I have not been here before to talk myself; the Mountain Leader is here, who is a great warrior under me; whatever he has done on the part of the nation, is binding on the whole. I am glad to hear your talks, and that your talks are so good; they please me very well.

It is a custom among us, when we speak, to give a token of friendship; I will give you this; there is not a speck in my heart but what is good, (giving to Governor Blount a string of white beads, and desiring that it might be kept clean and unstained that the day never should come that he would let it slip.)

I must explain the truth; I was somewhat suspicious you wanted land; I am glad you did not; and if ever the President calls us together again, I request that land may never more be mentioned to us.

I always look on the whites and ourselves as one people; I love to use them well, and as brothers. We are naked, and have no doubt that the United States have great feeling for us: but I think it is not so far from the nation, but that trade can be carried on from this place, and we hope it will not be brought nearer to us than the line agreed upon at Hopewell.

[Wolf's Friend meant thus to give his dissent to the establishing of a post at the mouth of Bear creek, as agreed by the treaty of Hopewell. Since his arrival on the conference ground, he had repeatedly told his people and the Choctaws, that the Americans had hard shoes, and if they permitted them to establish that post, they would tread upon their toes. Knowing that he had made use of these arguments, was the inducement for speaking in such positive terms, that trade would shortly be afforded from that place, hoping that would be an inducement sufficient for him to agree to it. Wolf's Friend is a great man; in council ranks among the first of his nation; has a considerable property, is a large man, of a dignified appearance; he appeared at the conference in scarlet and silver lace, and in the heat of the day with a large crimson silk umbrella over him.]

I think short talks are the best; I like yours the better for being so; when a man talks long, it is a proof his heart is not straight.

LEFOGENAATLA, alias Shot in the Mouth.—I came from the Choctaw nation, a stranger, but hope the longer we are acquainted, the better we shall both like each other, and have our talks renewed by treaties hereafter. I am here, have smoked the pipe of friendship, and do give my talk and nation into your care.

I wish to explain my friendship in a short way; we have met in the middle ground, where we hope to meet often. I am sorry I have no token of friendship to give, but I hope my talk will be received as well as though I had.

Governor BLOUNT.—It will.

TUNNAHTHOOMAH, or Red Enemy.—I am from the Choctaws, to this mid-land. I believe the whites have great troubles and fatigues in getting here, but we have got here to my great joy, and speak in friendship; in my own country, I never dreamed of finding such a people as I here find, for which I may thank my elder brothers the Chickasaws.

Whenever the red people have long talks, it may be they say more than they remember; mine are short, and I will always hold you by the hand. My brothers are here in hearing; I want not to say any thing disagreeable to them, but I speak in public, and wish to be understood and remembered.

The whites, I am told, are very powerful; hereafter, I want to have peace and good talks at this middle ground. I am told you have a different way of fighting—can make ditches for your defence, and it may be, you can make it reach my country.

It is good for a younger brother to be advised by an older; what our elder brothers the Chickasaws do, I will abide by, and am happy we have so good talks.

RED Wood the 2d, Man holding several Strings of Beads.—I pull these out in public, though I do not own them; a great man of my nation received them from the United States; when he died, I kept them as a token of friendship; this is the way I got them. This great man and the United States used to have good talks together; these talks I am come to renew; when that man was alive, I never thought it would come to me to talk in his place with my brothers and friends as I now do. It is not every brother who thinks one way, but I am of the same way of thinking with the man of whom I got them, and hope our young people on both sides will grow up in happiness and peace. My talk is short. You see I take the beads, and will keep them, leaving to my superiors to make longer ones.

RED BREATH.—I was at the treaty of Hopewell; to convince you I have held it fast, I have come to see you again; that has been several years past, but I find you remember it as well as I do, which makes me happy. We are here, know one another's talks, and take each other by the hand; our elder brothers see and hear us likewise. The talks we have had are very pleasing, and hope they will always continue. Short talks between friends may be always better remembered; we have met in the centre between our nations, and hope we shall, each of us, return safe to our proper homes.

PIAMINGO rising.—I have nothing to talk, only I wish to have boundaries settled; [then addressed the Chickasaws in a speech of some minutes, when, turning to Governor Blount and General Pickens, and taking them by the hand, said,] It is no new thing for me to take the whites by the hand, but I am glad to do it, if I am absent only one night.

I have no long talks to give; it is all peace, and every thing is good, and firm; [then handed a letter from the President; which he had received by Major Doughty, and a map of the country, made at Hopewell, showing the line established by that treaty.]

The map being opened on the table, and explained,

WOLF'S FRIEND said the line between the Chickasaws and the United States was right; and the Governor replied, the United States would never want to pass it.

PIAMINGO.—This map is old, I want to have a new one.

General PICKENS.—We will try to have a new one made like it.

PIAMINGO.—I will describe the boundaries of our lands; It begins on the Ohio, at the ridge which divides the waters of Tennessee and Cumberland, and extends with that ridge, eastwardly, as far as the most eastern waters of Elk river; thence to the Tennessee, at an old field, where a part of the Chickasaws formerly lived, this line to be so run as to include all the waters of Elk river, thence, across the Tennessee, and a neck of land, to Tenchacunda creek, a southern branch of the Tennessee, and up the same to its source; then to the waters of Tombigby, that is, to the west fork of long leaf Pine creek, and down it to the line of the Chickasaws and Choctaws, a little below the trading road.

At the treaty of Holston, I am told, the Cherokees claimed all Duck river. I want to know if it is so.

NONTUAKA.—It is true. I told the President so, and coming from him I told my nation so. I never knew, before the present, that our people divided land and made lines like white people.

PIAMINGO.—I am the man who laid off the boundary on that map; and to save my own land, I made it plain: I knew the fondness of the Cherokees to sell land.

NONTUAKA.—As to the boundary, I do not look to it. The President advised us to let one line serve for the Four Nations; he would never ask for any land south of it, nor suffer others; all the hunting ground within said boundary should be for the Four Nations.

PIAMINGO.—By marking my boundary I did not mean to exclude other nations from the benefit of hunting on my lands. I knew the Cherokees had often pretended to take the whites by the hand, but instead of doing it in good faith, they are always sharpening their knives against them. I feared the whites, in retaliation, would fall on the Cherokees, and that they might take my land, supposing it belonged to the Cherokees: for this reason I have marked it.

NONTUAKA.—This is not right; I want but one line between the Four Nations and the whites: it is true the Cherokees have disposed of their best hunting grounds.

PIAMINGO.—I never understood this matter in this light, nor did I, as before said, intend to bar the Cherokees from hunting on our lands; I only meant to preserve them.

Governor BLOUNT to NONTUAKA.—I was not at Philadelphia to hear what you said respecting your claim to land; but when you returned, you brought me a great book, said to contain all the talks held there. In that book, it was written that it would be proper for the Four Nations to explain their boundaries between themselves; this is one of the reasons I asked the Chickasaws how far the bounds of their claim extended. It is not meant that one nation should restrain another from hunting on their lands, but allow it, like good neighbors. There is another reason: if any red people should come and settle in any of your countries, and do mischief to the whites, when their different boundaries are known, it would be easy to know to whom to apply to have the injuries redressed.

NONTUAKA.—I know very well that Governor Blount was not there to hear what the President said. I was, and heard the words drop out of his mouth; the words were, there ought to be one line between the Four Nations and the whites, but not lines between the Four Nations; that they must not sell it; but, if they would sell it, it was he only who should buy.

PIAMINGO.—I want no long talk on the subject: the Cherokees are blood thirsty; they never go out but they bloody their weapons in the white people, and I knew the whites, in retaliation, would take their land; this I have before said, and for fear they should take mine, supposing it to be the Cherokees', is my reason for explaining the boundary.

WOLF'S FRIEND.—What I say is, that we are friends, and that the meaning of this line is not to hinder the Cherokees from hunting on our lands, but we wish to keep bad people from settling on it.

NONTUAKA.—Here is the map belonging to the Chickasaws; my own people are jealous; let me carry this map and show it to the head-men; the whites can make another like it for Piamingo.

PIAMINGO.—I am satisfied with the Cherokees having a copy. When my uncle, the Little Turkey, sees it, and is informed that it is not intended to prevent the Cherokees from hunting on our land, he will be pleased.

JOHN THOMPSON.—We do not find fault with the line between the white people and the Chickasaws, nor with the place where the Chickasaws' line crosses the Tennessee; but I have not before been so fully informed of the claim of the Chickasaws.

PIAMINGO.—I have made endeavors to preserve the land, and have ever refused to part with it.

WOLF'S FRIEND.—The map is plain; I know not what objection they can make to it, since we have explained our motive. It is right to mark our boundaries on the map; some red people are good, others have sharp hearts. I came here to hear good talks, and have heard them. Be not uneasy that every one does not speak: the King, myself, and Piamingo, were appointed to do the business; what we say is binding on the nation. I speak for the king and myself.

General PICKENS.—It gives me much pleasure to accompany Governor BLOUNT to this place, to meet the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and delivering the good talks from our Great Father, who has appointed Governor Blount to receive your good talks, and to deliver his; you may be assured his talk is the same as though you heard it from the mouth of our Great Father, General Washington; his heart glows with love both to the Chickasaws and Choctaws.

Since the time you took us by the hand at Seneca, it has never been known that a Chickasaw or Choctaw has spilled the blood of an American; we have now come here, if possible, to strengthen that friendship, and make it last between us, while the sun shines. It is the wish of our Great Father General Washington, as well as all your brothers here, to make you a great and happy people.

We will always look upon it that your enemies are our enemies, and ours, yours.

We know you have been told that, when you were invited here, you would be asked for land; you are now convinced to the contrary, and you will now be able to give the lie to such reports.

What makes the President and ourselves unhappy is, that it is with difficulty trade can be extended by the United States to your country.

These presents, sent you by your Great Father the President, were brought here with great danger and difficulty. Wolf's Friend has expressed his objections to having it brought nearer to you than this place, but he is wrong, because the path to and from this place, and which your people and the traders would have to pass, is often bloodied by the enemy; to remove that difficulty, we wish, for the good of both parties, to have trade established at the mouth of Bear Creek, the place agreed upon by the treaty of Hopewell.

I am apprehensive bad people will say, we mean not only to establish a post, but form settlements; but that is not true. Trade at that place will be most advantageous to you, where, beside clothing and other necessaries, arms and ammunition shall be kept in plenty. The people living south of you supply you very sparingly; the President wishes you to have all things in plenty, and be happy, and that you should be in a situation to defend yourselves against your enemies.

PIAMINGO.—You have spoke a second time, therefore I conceive I have a right so to do.

Governor BLOUNT.—It is our wish that you should; we will hear you with pleasure, and wish you to speak freely.

PIAMINGO.—There is the man (pointing to Mingatuska) who was the first occasion of this mark, (pointing to the post as marked down at the mouth of Bear Creek and as agreed on by the treaty of Hopewell) but I do not now want a post established there, because it would occasion blood to be spilled. We are, as you say, both one people; if a post is settled there, it will bring on an open war. I know how it would be, and so may you, by seeing how your people are killed or wounded even at this place.

Governor BLOUNT.—We have heard that you complained that that article of the treaty, which respected the post at Bear Creek, was not complied with; and the President would not wish you to have complaints against the United States.

PIAMINGO.—All people are not alike; to prevent shedding of blood we object, that good men may not be lost. If all things were on a right footing, I should have no objection; but it seems as though I had reached over the heads of enemies, to take hold of you. Could I once see the day that whites and reds were all friends, it would be like getting new eye-sight.

Governor BLOUNT.—To-morrow I will meet you again; I have a little more to say to you, and close our business.

THURSDAY, August 9th, 1792.

Governor BLOUNT.—I make no doubt but the Indians northwest of the Ohio, with whom the United States are at war, have informed you that the cause of the war is, that the United States want to take their lands from them.

PIAMINGO.—They have.

Governor BLOUNT.—It is not true; the United States have taken no lands from them; all they have sold or settled, they have bought from the red people who claimed them; but, if these people, when at war with the United States, could show that they have even a color of right, such is the justice of the United States, they would purchase it.

The United States do not want to take land from any red people; they have land enough.

The true cause of the war with these people Northwest of the Ohio is, that they have killed more than one thousand citizens of the United States; took many boats on the Ohio, loaded with valuable goods, and stole a very great number of our horses; and even yet, if these people would give proof of their wishes for peace, and assurances of future good conduct, the United States would forget and forgive what is past; but if they do not, a large army is raising, and the war will fall on them heavier than ever.

I have mentioned these things to you, to show you at once the justice and moderation of the United States, and the causes of the war. Respecting the post at Bear Creek, at the treaty of Hopewell you requested trade to be carried to that place; you have complained that it was not heretofore done; now you have been informed it was shortly to be done, you object, and say it will be attended with bad consequences. I shall conclude for the present on that subject by informing you, the President will put it off for a time.

These Cumberland people, as well those who surround us as all the other inhabitants, have ever been good people, and strict observers of treaties; and I hope you will continue that love and friendship to them which you have heretofore shown them, in particular as they are your nearest neighbors. I beg you to give them the earliest information of any hostile designs you may know to be formed against them.

The map you yesterday requested to be drawn anew, is done, and here it is, and with it a copy of the treaty of Hopewell, (presenting them to Piamingo.) This treaty is not altered.

WOLF'S FRIEND.—I give this to you, (presenting one end of a string of white beads to the Governor;) hold it fast; I will, as a token of peace and friendship.

I hope peace and friendship will be perpetual; that our children may be raised up in all possible happiness. Piamingo and myself are one; he is my father. I have no great deal to say: those who mean truth, can express it in a few words: I speak nothing else. Piamingo caused me to come here. Hold this talk fast, (delivering the other end of the white beads to the Governor.)

Governor BLOUNT.—I receive it with great pleasure, and will preserve it as an evidence of the friendship you profess.

We are truly sensible of the great service Piamingo has done his nation and the United States, and there is no doubt that he will lead his nation to happiness and glory, if they continue to follow him.

I am equally anxious with you, that our children should grow up in all possible happiness, and that peace and friendship should be perpetual, and, I assure you, on the part of the United States, that they will do every thing to contribute to these blessings.

PIAMINGO.—I have something more to say; it is concerning useful implements of husbandry, such as I hear our Great Father gives the Creeks and the Cherokees. We want a great many axes and hoes, but not so many ploughs, and we hope he will give them to us also.

Governor BLOUNT.—Do you think your people will use them?

PIAMINGO.—They know how to use the axes and hoes, and some to plough.

Governor.—I cannot promise them to you, but I will make your request known to your father, the President, who would be happy in seeing you live like white men, by cultivating the earth, in preference to hunting.

I have to ask you, the Chickasaws, to whom I am to address my public letters? Answer. To Chenumbe, the king. Who shall be your interpreter in the nation? Answer. Malcolm McGee. Who do the Choctaws want for their interpreter? Answer. John Pitchlynn.

By the letters you received from the Secretary of War, it appeared, the President wished to see some of your chiefs at Philadelphia: the letters mention the number. It is not for me to say when you shall go, or whether you shall go at all; but, if you do go, the President would not wish to see more than he has invited, and General Robertson, the deputy superintendent, will be glad to see them on their way at his house, and so will I at mine; and will give them the necessary assistance: let me know, in the course of this day, whether you go or not, and if you do go, when.

To-morrow morning the goods will be given out: apply, one town at a time, and determine the order in which they shall apply.

The guns, for those who went with Piamingo and the Colberts, will be delivered to-day; they are requested to collect together, and march to the store to receive them.

The chiefs will to-day also receive their clothing.

FRIDAY, 10th August, 1792.

The goods having been previously divided into as many shares as there were Indians, were delivered, to each his share. The inhabitants of Long Town first marched up, with Piamingo at their head; and after, the other towns, according to their order, headed by their chiefs; and after the Chickasaws, the Choctaws according to their order.

SATURDAY, 11th August, 1792.

Tom Brown, addressing himself to Governor Blount and General Pickens, presenting a string of white beads: Piamingo requests this string of beads to be forwarded to the President, as a token that he is coming to visit him. He will commence his journey early next spring for Philadelphia.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, September 26th, 1792.

SIR:

Herewith I enclose the information of Joseph Deraque, given on oath before Robert Hays, a justice of the peace of Davidson county, Miro district; and of Richard Finnelson, penned by myself at this place, together with their passport from the Baron de Carondelet, Governor of Louisiana, to which I pay full faith and credit; and I send forward Richard Finnelson himself, with the bearer, that he may be examined by you, believing that you will be better satisfied and informed by so doing, than you can any otherwise.

I do not found my faith on the credit due to Finnelson, so much as on the consistency and corroborating circumstances contained in his narrative, and on the clear manner in which he has delivered it to me; and I make no doubt will to you, which must afford additional proof, enforcing conviction, which cannot be so fully expressed on paper.

I also enclose you information respecting the conduct of the chiefs whose names are mentioned in Finnelson's narrative, the better to shew to what cause this sudden change of conduct, and general disposition for war, is to be attributed.

If a war with the Southern Indians is by you viewed as inevitable, as it is by me, it will no doubt become a question, where are men to be immediately raised? It is my opinion, that many valuable men can readily be raised for that service in the district of Washington, in Virginia, in those of Salisbury and Morgan, in North Carolina, and that of Ninety-Six, in South Carolina; I mean, to serve as militia: and, if, as a commander, my commendation was necessary, or would have any weight, I would most heartily give it in favor of General Pickens, to head those of the Carolinas; he unquestionably is a brave, prudent, experienced officer in Indian warfare.

The Baron de Carondelet, Knight of the order of St. John, Colonel of the Royal Troops, Governor, Intendant General of the Provinces of Louisiana and West Florida, and Inspector of the Troops:

I grant free and safe passport to the Cherokee Indian, called Richard, to go to his nation, with a person of the name of Deraque; from whence they may return by such ways as they may find most convenient.

I order the commandants of posts, by which they may pass, not to molest them, but, on the contrary, to give them what assistance they may stand in need of.

[L. s.] Signed with my hand, and sealed with my seal, and countersigned by the underwritten Secretary for his Majesty, in this Government and Intendancy. In New Orleans, 28th July, 1792.

BARON DE CARONDELET.

ANDRES LOPEZ ARMESTO.

Information by Richard Finnelson.

That he was at L'Ance la Grace in May last, came from thence with letters from the Governor of that post, to Gen. Robertson; that he arrived at Clarksville early in June, at the mouth of Red river, and from thence, on the 16th June, took a passage in a boat belonging to a Mr. Fagot, who was himself on board, and returned to L'Ance la Grace in fifteen days; Mr. Fagot stayed five days at L'Ance la Grace; on the day after his arrival, the Governor of that post met Finnelson at the gate of the fort, and asked him if he had been at Cumberland; he answered he had been as high as the mouth of Red river; the Governor then asked him if he had any news; he answered, the Cumberland people were for peace with the Indians, knowing that was the subject of the letter he had carried for General Robertson: the Governor added, Mr. Fagot had informed him that the people of Cumberland and Kentucky intended to come and take L'Ance la Grace, and all the Spanish posts above, on the river. On the fourth day of the stay of Mr. Fagot at L'Ance la Grace, the Governor delivered him a large packet of letters for the Governor at New Orleans. On the fifth day he proceeded, with Mr. Fagot, down the Mississippi to the Natchez, where they arrived and stayed three days; during which time, Governor Gayoso asked Finnelson how were the Indians with the people of Cumberland; he answered, they were very troublesome, and had killed many of the Cumberland people. The Governor replied, that is a thing well enough, for the lands belong to them. There was a young man on board Mr. Fagot's boat, of the name of Sam Osborne, who had sundry letters from the people of Cumberland to others residing at the Natchez settlements, which Mr. Fagot took from him, by order, as he said, of Governor Gayoso, that no private letters were to be delivered before read by the Governor. On the third day Mr. Fagot pushed off down the river for Orleans, and arrived in four days. Mr. Fagot immediately went up to wait on the Governor; and returning to the boat, said to Finnelson, that he must go up to the Governor the next day, at 8 o'clock. The next day, (for distinction say the first day of Finnelson's conference with the Governor) Mr. Fagot and Finnelson waited on the Governor, who told the latter that he wanted him to do some business for him, for which he would give him four hundred dollars. Finnelson answered, he would do it if he could, he was willing to serve the Governor. He then desired F. to come the next day at 8 o'clock, and he should be informed what it was. On the second day, Finnelson went at 8 o'clock, and found the Governor and his Secretary in his study, with many papers before them. He informed F. that he had engaged Joseph Deraque to go with him to the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Creeks, and Cherokees, with letters; that he was to tell the heads of these nations to come to him to receive arms, ammunition, hatchets, knives, clothes, and paint, of which he had a plenty for them all, directed him to go to the store, and be an eye-witness that he had these articles in plenty, and to witness it to the nations to which he was sending him. Finnelson was accordingly conducted to a large store, by the Governor's Secretary, in which were all the articles the Governor had mentioned, in abundance, and sundry others, proper for Indians. On his return, the Governor asked him if he thought there were goods enough; he answered, yes. The Governor replied, you shall see as many more to-morrow. "These goods," adds the Governor, "are for your people, not to buy lands, but to give to them out of good friendship; and this is not all, they will, ever hereafter, have plenty at this place, Pensacola, and L'Ance la Grace; at the latter, a store shall be settled, in which there will be a very large quantity of guns, ammunition, hatchets, and other goods for Indians." The Governor asked F. if he knew McGillivray; he answered, very well; he replied, if you had been here a few days ago you would have seen him, he has turned to be a new man; has resigned up the commission he received from Congress, and that for so doing, he, the Governor, allowed him 1,500 dollars a year. The Governor expressed his sorrow that any of the Indians made treaties with the United States; they only deceive the Indians with the appearance of friendship, until they can conquer the Shawanese, and then fall on the Southern Indians. You are always quarrelling about your lands; the lands belong to the Indians, and they must have them; the King has so ordered; showing a large written paper, saying, it contained his instructions to that effect; that he, the Governor, had plenty of arms and ammunition, the Indians should never want them; and that if they could not themselves regain their lands, he would assist them with men, as well as arms and ammunition; that they must go to war and regain their lands, and that directly; that one of the letters he should give F. was for Mr. McGillivray; and Governor O'Neal, on F.'s arrival at Pensacola, would give him a letter for John Watts; that O'Neal had already given Watts his orders, but he would write him again by F., lest Watts should forget the instructions he had received. On the third day F. went to the Governor's, as requested, and found him and his Secretary in his study, as the day before; he expressed his wish to have the business F. was going on, with the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Creeks, and Cherokees, quickly completed, and that F. should bring down to him, at New Orleans, three or four of the heads of the Cherokees; that he wanted to see them; this, he says, must be done immediately, or as quick as possible. At this time, Mr. Fanton passing by, saw Mr. F. in the study, and said, how do you do, Mr. Finnelson? I little thought to have seen you here. F. stepped towards him, and the Governor followed, and asked Panton to walk into the parlor, and the Secretary conducted F. to the office, where they drank wine for an hour, conversing on slight uninteresting subjects. The Governor then sent for them to the study, where he and Panton were sitting. Panton then informed F. he had lately been in the Cherokee country, and that he expected John Watts, the Young Dragging Canoe, and the Little Turkey were then at his house, in Pensacola, and that they would wait his return home. Dinner coming on, and while at it, Mr. Panton asked F. if he intended going to the Chickasaws and Choctaws from this place? He answered, he should, the Governor wanted him so to do. Panton then informed the Governor that he himself would go to the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and that it would be best for F. to go with him to Pensacola, and directly on to the Creeks and Cherokees; to which the Governor agreed, and said, Governor O'Neal would supply F. with a gun, ammunition and provision, horses, saddles and bridles. The Governor then sent an officer with F., to show him another store with Indian goods, in which he saw a very great abundance of such articles as seen and described in the store he had visited the day before. On the fourth day after arriving at Orleans, F. went, at 11 o'clock, to the Governor. He expressed his gladness to see him; informed him Panton's vessel would be in the river the succeeding evening; that he must hold himself in readiness, with Jo. Deraque, to go on board when Panton should send for them. After dining with the Governor, as on the second and third days, and being requested to call in the evening for the letters, he took his leave. In the evening he called on the Governor, who told him that the wind blew too hard for the vessel to sail, that he must call in the morning of the next day.

On the sixth day, Finnelson and Jo. Deraque, called early in the morning, and received a letter for McGillivray and a passport. The Governor asked F. how long he would be gone; he answered from two to two months and a half, drank and took leave, and embarked on board Panton's vessel for Pensacola. On the second day after leaving the Bis, was met by a schooner from Pensacola, by which Panton received a letter, and after reading it, turned to F. and said, John Watts, and two other young warriors, had been at Pensacola, but were returned home; expressed his sorrow at not being at home to see them, and said, had he been there, he would have made half the horses that carried goods, carry ammunition in preference, and said no more, but seemed much concerned. The fourth day after leaving Orleans, arrived at Mobile, when F. waited on the Governor by Panton's advice. The Governor told him he was glad to see him, Mr. Panton had been there already; then asked for the passport, read and returned it, and desired him to proceed without delay to Governor O'Neal, at Pensacola, and to make no delay, except that of waiting for Governor O'Neal's despatches. On the third day after the arrival at Mobile, sailed for Pensacola, and being over the bar, Mr. Panton told F. that the Governor at Orleans was a good man, to attend to what he had said, to delay no time in executing what he had directed, and that it would be better for him and his country; that he (Panton) had been in the Cherokees, and could have told them a great deal, but did not want his name brought in question. On the third day after leaving Mobile, arrived at Pensacola. Finnelson, with Jo. Deraque, waited on Governor O'Neal, and shewed him their passport; the Governor said it was very well, he would see Mr. Panton, and told F. to call on him next day. F. then returned to Mr. Panton, and informed him what the Governor had said, upon which Panton immediately took his umbrella and walked to the Governor's, where he stayed about three hours. Finnelson next day called on Governor O'Neal again, who assured him, that on the succeeding day, he and J. Deraque should have horses, saddles, bridles, a gun, ammunition, and provisions; but said, if he would wait a day or two, the Creeks would be down for their arms and ammunition, and he would have their company on his journey. The Governor informed F. that he had told John Watts to go to war, together with the Creeks and Choctaws, against Cumberland; that he had also already talked to the Creeks, concerning their land on the Oconee; that he had ordered them to go and demand it, and if the whites would not go off civilly, to fall on them and cut them off; and desired F. to tell all the Creeks he saw, to join the Choctaws and Cherokees in war, and to go quickly, for now was their time to strike, or never, as the United States were engaged in a war with the Shawanese. The Governor said he had already told John Watts these things, but he, F. must repeat them to him.

On the third day after arriving at Pensacola, Governor O'Neal delivered F. and J. Deraque the horses in his yard, and a gun and ammunition from the King's store, and a letter from John Watts, and gave an order on Panton for the saddles and bridles, which were delivered. Upon Finnelson returning to Panton's house with the letter, Panton said, if there was any thing the Governor had been deficient in, to inform him (Panton) and it should be supplied. Upon F. being about to leave Pensacola, Panton said he should shortly set out for the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and expected to be with them as soon as F. could be in the Cherokees. Governor O'Neal, in his conversation with F. this day, said, Governor Blount, who was a cunning artful man, was sent to hold treaties with the Southern Indians, and to keep them in peace until the United States had conquered the Shawanese, and then they would have nothing to do but to fall on them and cut them off, and that now, or never, was the time to strike. Governor O'Neal also told F. to tell John Watts, to make no delay, but send down immediately for his arms and ammunition; to call on the Spanish commissary, who lives at McGillivray's town, at the Hickory Ground, and get tickets as to the number of the warriors in the respective towns. On the fourth day after arriving at Pensacola, Finnelson and J. Deraque sat out for the Creeks and Cherokees; they met on the path, going to Pensacola, in different parties, about three hundred Creeks, who said they were going for their ammunition and guns, and that on their return, they would go to war against Cumberland. On the third day, in the evening, after leaving Pensacola, Finnelson and Deraque, arrived at the Savannah town (of the Creeks) and hearing McGillivray was not at home, but sick at his sisters, F. left the letter he received from the Governor at Orleans, with one of McGillivray's traders. They stayed at the Savannah town one night, there they saw the Black Dog, the chief of the town; he said, as soon as his people returned from Pensacola, we shall turn out to war against Cumberland, in conjunction with the Cherokees; this he said F. might depend upon, as the two nations were friends, and the Cherokees may expect to see us at the beginning of the next new moon, and requested F. to tell his friends, the Cherokees, to remember his talk—that he would be with them with his warriors. The Black Dog named the Creek towns that were for war, namely: the Savannah, the Eufaulies, Tuckaubatchees, Wackakoy, the Cow Towns, the Little Eufauly, the White Ground, the Hickory Ground, the Oakbusky, Tuskegee. The Black Dog and the Standing Turkey informed F. that McGillivray had resigned his commission from Congress, and taken the Spaniards by the hand, and expressed their gladness on the occasion. Stayed one night at the Savannah town, and started forward for the Cherokees, and arrived at Red-headed Will's town, commonly called Will's town, the residence of John Watts, about ten o'clock the fourth day, who had then returned from Pensacola, three days before, together with Talonteskee (commonly called Watts' uncle) and the Young Dragging Canoe, where were assembled a great number of Cherokees in council, at the square. Finnelson and J. Deraque halted, and listened fifteen minutes—John Watts was speaking; he said the young fellows were always wanting war; now the time was come, when they might try themselves; there are enough of us, and if there are not, we have friends enough to back us of Creeks and Choctaws, likewise our old brothers the Spaniards. This is what I have been told by Governor O'Neal. This is the truth, and you may depend upon it. I have seen him and talked to him myself; you now must show yourselves. All you young men who like war, go with me to-morrow; we will have a great many more men, and we will settle matters better when we all get together. Watts sat down, and F. turned off and went to Red-headed Will's, and turned out his horses, as did also J. Deraque, and stayed there until the afternoon, and returned to the square, where the Bloody Fellow was up speaking in the centre of the council. He told them not to go to war; it was a bad step they were taking; that he had been to hunt for the brothers they thought were dead, and that he found them; they were good people, the same as ever; they did not wish to hurt them (the Cherokees) nor their children. Look here at the things I fetched for myself, likewise for you warriors! When was the day that ever you went to your father and fetched as much as I have? I did not go by myself, others went with me. If I had gone by myself, perhaps you might have thought that I had made it myself. You had better take my talk and stay at home, and mind your women and children. The Bloody Fellow still standing, Talohitsky rose and said, "I too have been to Pensacola, and seen the Governor as well as Watts, and heard his talk. I think a great deal of his talk, for it is good. I shall try to do as he directed me;" and sat down. The Bloody Fellow proceeded: "Look," says he, "at that flag; don't you see the stars in it? They are not towns, they are nations; there are thirteen of them. These are people who are very strong, and are the same as one man; and if you know when you are well, you had better stay at home and mind your women and children." The Bloody Fellow still standing, John Watts again got up and came forward, said, "the day is come when I must bloody my hands again. To-morrow I shall send off a runner to the Creek nation to fetch my friends in. Then I shall have people enough to go with me to Cumberland or any place that I want to go to." All then dispersed for about half an hour, then returned stripped all to their flaps, painted black, dancing the war dance in the square around the flag of the United States, and continuing to dance until the evening. At night they went to the town house, and continued the war dance all night. On the second day after arriving at Will's town, Finnelson returned from Red-headed Will's again to the square, met the Bloody Fellow, who took him by the hand, and asked him where he had been so long? F. answered, travelling through the Spanish country. John Watts sitting near, and hearing the conversation, called F. to sit down by him, and asked the news from the Governor at Orleans. F. answered, not much, but he wanted to see some of the Cherokees, for to deliver to them their guns and ammunition. Watts asked F. if there was no other news. He answered no, not choosing to give him any other answer. Watts said, you have a letter; Little John saw it falling out of your clothes at Red-headed Will's. F. answered he had a paper, but it was not for him. Watts desired him to go and bring that paper. F. went and took the letter Governor O'Neal had given him, for Watts, tore it and flung it into a creek, and brought the passport from the Governor at Orleans, which having the Spanish arms on it, satisfied Watts, Little John declaring those were the arms he saw on the paper that dropped. The Bloody Fellow standing by and hearing this, spoke and said: "I have been and found my lost brothers; see how well they have used me! I mean no war with them," taking hold of his medal; "this is silver, and surely must have cost a good deal of money," and his coat with silver epaulettes, and his scarlet match coat, with broad silver lace, "when was the day that ever you went to see your old brother (meaning Stuart, the British superintendent) and that you brought home the like of this? I have brought a good deal of good rich clothes to many of you as well as myself. I would wish none of you to go to war, but lay at peace, as I intend to do myself. I can go over the mountains and live in peace." John Watts, upon the Bloody Fellow mentioning the medal, pulled his off and laid it on the ground. The Bloody Fellow still standing on the block, the son of the White Owl rose and said: "My father was a man, and I am as good as he was. To war I will go, and spill blood in spite of what you can say. From this day out I will do as I please." John Watts then got up and took him by the hand, and leading him forward, said to him, "You are a man, and I like your talk; to war we will go together." The Bloody Fellow proceeded, "You had better not go, for you know nothing about what you are going to do." The Bloody Fellow continuing to stand, the Shawanee warrior (who has for years past lived in the Running Water with about thirty other Shawanees) rose, and advancing said, stretching out his hands, "With these hands I have taken the life of three hundred men, and now the time is come when they shall take the life of three hundred more; then I will be satisfied, and sit down in peace. I will now drink my fill of blood." The Bloody Fellow having sat down, rose and spoke, "If you will go to war you must go; I shall not," and sat down, appearing much dejected and dissatisfied. John Watts. To-morrow you must repair to the Look-out Mountain town, where we will assemble together and lay off how we will attack the frontiers of Holston; upon which the council generally rose, declaring they would join with Watts in war, and dispersed for about an hour and a half, then from four to five hundred returned to the squares, stripped to their flaps, painted black, with their guns and hatchets, and commenced the war dance round the flag of the United States, which they continued till night. During their dancing, many of them fired balls through the flag, upon which the Bloody Fellow ordered them to desist, or he should do as he had before done, (meaning kill some of them.) The firing at it ceased. At night the war dance was removed to the town house, and kept up till next morning. On the third day after arriving at Will's town, the whole party assembled at the Look-out Mountain town, to the number of 600, and 200 were picked out for horsemen, and John Taylor appointed to command them. There were at least two hundred good horses on the ground, which had certainly been stolen from the citizens of the United States. In the afternoon the place of attack was taken up, and it was determined to attack the Holston settlements in four divisions of two hundred in each division, and to sweep the settlements as far as the Long Island of Holston, then to divide into smaller parties up French Broad, and sweep it to the head. The council then adjourned, and went to the war dance, which they continued until next morning, painted black as before. On the fourth day after arriving at Will's town, the party met again at the Look-out Mountain town, and determined to attack Cumberland in four divisions, and clear that county of all living people. Orders were given by Watts, Taylor, The Glass, Talohitske, Fool Charles, (by some called Captain Charley) and The Breath, to provide provision on the next day, and be ready to start for war on the succeeding day. About an hour and a half after issuing these orders, information was received that the White Man-killer had arrived in a canoe from Knoxville, with a quantity of whiskey, at the mouth of the Look-out Mountain creek, distant from the Look-out Mountain town about fifteen miles. Men were immediately despatched to bring it up to the town, and, on its arrival, all hands turned in to drinking, neglecting the order for providing for war.

On the fifth day after arriving at Will's town, the party generally lay drunk and stupefied, and no public talk was held. Jo. Deraque spoke English as well as Finnelson. He had been at Cumberland several months previous to his going down the river with Mr. Fagot, and felt for the people there. He observed to Finnelson it was a pity they should be murdered there, without having notice to defend themselves, and proposed to F. that they should contrive some mode to do it. F. told him it would be a hard matter to get there, but if he would leave it to him, he would manage it: for he also having been there, and well treated, felt for the people of that country, and in order to get themselves in a situation to get off on the fourth day after arriving at Will's town, they went to Nickajack, twelve miles from the Look-out Mountain town, and they concluded they would tell the Indians who were for war, that the Governor at Orleans had a friend, a spy, living at Cumberland; that they were sent to this spy friend, (Mr. D. Mombreun) to collect intelligence as to the number of men, and in what manner the place could be best attacked, to ensure success with the least loss. On the sixth day, in the morning, that is, after arriving at Will's town, J. Deraque was sent for from Nickajack to the Look-out Mountain town, to be examined touching his instructions from the Governor at Orleans, to his friend M. D. Mombreun, at Cumberland, who so satisfied the council and warriors of the truth of what he said, that they agreed that he, with Finnelson, should go on to Cumberland, to Mr. D. Mombreun, and gave him ten days precisely to return; and that they would desist from war until that time; and that, if he did not arrive in that time, they were to be sure he was dead. Immediately after the return of J. Deraque to Finnelson, at Nickajack, they started for Cumberland, that is, on the sixth day, two hours before sunset, fearing, if they stayed till morning, that they would not be permitted to go on. Whilst J. Deraque was gone to the council at the Look-out Mountain town, a woman informed F. that Shaw and Carey had informed Governor Blount of what the Lower towns were about, and that the warriors were determined to kill them and the Indian who should have been the carrier of the letters, and persuaded F. to go and give them notice, that they might escape. The Breath arrived at Nickajack a little before J. Deraque returned to F., and informed him that the council had agreed to their going to Cumberland, and added that the council had also determined to write to Governor Blount, and inform him that the rumor of war in the lower towns arose from a few drunken young fellows, and that the heads, who were for peace, had stopped them. This, he said, would prevent any bad consequences from the information given by Shaw and Carey, and put the Governor off his guard. On the fifth day after leaving Nickajack, they arrived at Cumberland, about eleven o'clock, and made the whole matter known. On their way, they pushed so hard, lest they should be pursued by the Cherokees, that Joseph Deraque killed his horse, and then pushed forward on foot.

Finnelson adds, that Governor O'Neal told him he had silver hilted swords making for the Cherokee chiefs, to distinguish them in battle.

UNITED STATES,
DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, } to wit:

On the first day of November, in the year of our Lord 1792, before me, Richard Peters, Judge of the district court of the United States in and for the Pennsylvania district, came Richard Finnelson, a Cherokee Indian of the half blood, and being sworn on the holy evangel of Almighty God, (after having the nature of an oath explained, and declaring that he believed in the doctrines contained in the New Testament, and its divine authority) doth depose and say, that he is perfectly well acquainted with the contents of the foregoing papers, which were written from information given by him, and that the said papers contain a just and true account of the several matters and things therein set forth. The deponent speaks the English language well, and says that he could read and write in that language, but has not now the same facility, either in reading or writing, he formerly had.

Given under my hand and seal, at Philadelphia, the day and year aforesaid.

KNOXVILLE, September 26, 1792.

John Watts was a signer to the treaty of Holston; was in February with Governor Blount several days at Knoxville, received several valuable presents from him, and expressed the strongest friendship for the United States, and his great personal attachment for the Governor. He again met the Governor at the conference at Coyatee, was the immediate author of the honor there paid the United States and the Governor, and during the stay of the Governor at Coyatee several days, he appeared the warm and open friend of the Government and the Governor. When the Governor was about to leave Coyatee, and return home, Watts assured him he would be with him in ten nights at Knoxville, spend some days with him, and that he would then determine where he would meet the Governor, to accompany him through the wilderness to Nashville, where the Governor had invited him to attend, and be present at the conference with the Chickasaws and Choctaws. Thus, at parting with Watts at Coyatee, the Governor considered him as the great friend of the United States and himself, nor does the Governor yet doubt that was surely the fact. But there is great reason to believe that Watts received a runner at Coyatee, a few hours after the Governor left it, from Panton. It is beyond all doubt Panton induced him to go to Pensacola. The information given by Deraque and Finnelson, may account for his conduct since his return.

Tolottiske is also a signer to the treaty of Holston; is the nephew of the old Tassel, has ever breathed resentment for his death; that he probably was readily induced to adopt the measures recommended by Governor O'Neal. Watts is also the nephew of the Tassel; but after the treaty, he declared he would no more think of revenge; that he had already sought and obtained it.

Panton is well acquainted with the Cherokees, as well as the other three nations: must have known these things, and selected them as proper instruments for that reason.

John Taylor, to whom the command of the cavalry was given, was the first Indian who appeared on the ground at the treaty of Holston; was very instrumental, on his return to Chota, in getting the chiefs of the nation forward to treat; returned to the ground with them, lived with Governor Blount as one of his family during the continuance of the treaty, ate and drank at his table as one of his family, and slept by his side, and received particular marks of his favor. He did not sign the treaty, because he was not, by the nation, considered a chief.

He again visited the Governor in February, at Knoxville, with Watts, stayed with him as long, was treated as he had been at the treaty of the Governor, and again received particular marks of his favor. During his stay with the Governor, he assured him that he had a wish to raise a company of Cherokees, in which he wanted a lieutenant's command, to fight against the Shawanese, and proposed that John McKee should be the captain. So well did he express his friendship that the Governor believed, and often said, that, in case even of a general war with the Cherokees, he was sure of a friend in John Taylor, under every contingency.

The Breath of Nickajack was at the conference at Coyatee. Besides his public talks, he made repeated professions of his attachment to the United States, and his determinations to adhere to the treaty of Holston. He met the boats with the goods for the Chickasaw and Choctaw conference, at Tuskegee; went on board one of them with Mr. Allison, and proceeded down to Nickajack; giving undoubted and strong proofs of his friendship for the United States, declared, if the boats should be attacked as they passed the Running Water, which there was great reason to expect, by the Shawanese warrior and his party, that he would assist in the defence of them, and Mr. Allison believes he would.

Fool Charles, or Captain Charley, a chief of the Running Water, was at the conference at Coyatee; there gave assurances of his determination to adhere to the treaty of Holston, and proof of his attachment to the person of the Governor. On his return from the conference to the Running Water, he gave such proofs of his attachment to the United States, that the Shawanese living in that town took offence, fell on him, and much injured him; he met the boats at Tuskegee with the goods for the Chickasaw and Choctaw conference, went on board as an escort, until he arrived near the Running Water, then advised the sending forward a quantity of whiskey to the Shawanese warrior and his party, at the Running Water, in order to draw their attention from the boats, which it was feared they would attack; took a canoe and went with it himself, in order to assist in carrying his plan into execution. Mr. Allison then considered him as one of the firmest friends the United States had.

The Glass, of the Look-out Mountain town, Governor Blount has never seen, but has received repeated written and verbal assurances of peace and friendship, since March last, in which the Governor had full faith.

Such was the conduct of these chiefs but a short time previous to the return of John Watts from Pensacola, and such was his own previous to his going to Pensacola. To the Spanish Government is this change of conduct justly to be charged.

WM. BLOUNT.

The information of Joseph Deraque.

I am a native of Canada, and came first to Cumberland in the employ of a Mr. Fagot. On the 16th June Mr. Fagot left Red river and proceeded down the Cumberland. In his boat I embarked for New Orleans, as a laborer to row. On coming near L'Ance la Grace, Mr. Fagot told me and all his men to tell the same story to the commandant which he should, which was, that the people of the United States from Cumberland and Kentucky were preparing to attack the Spanish settlements. The commandant at L'Ance la Grace gave Mr. Fagot a large packet to Governor Carondelet, at New Orleans, which, when Mr. Fagot delivered, he told the same tale, as to the hostile intentions of the United States, that he had to the commandant of L'Ance la Grace, as I have every reason to believe: for the officers and others at Orleans told me so, and asked me if it was true. To this I answered, I had no reason to question the veracity of Mr. Fagot, but I was not informed of the intentions of the Americans. Governor Carondelet then told me he had sent by McGillivray to inform the Creeks, Cherokees, and Choctaws, they must come to him to get arms and ammunition, but he wanted me to go again on the same errand, which I agreed to. One Richard Fannelson, a Cherokee half breed, who came down in the boat from Cumberland, he sent with me, and gave us a passport. He told us to invite the Creeks, Cherokees, and Choctaws, but more particularly the two first, to come to him and get guns and ammunition, and go to war against the people of Cumberland and Holston; that the lands were theirs, and the property of no other people, and he would furnish them with means to defend it; and to be active and unanimous in going to war quickly. We came by water to Mobile, and, from thence, to Pensacola, then to the Creeks, by land. Between these two last places we met, in several different parties, about three hundred Creek Indians, going to Pensacola for arms and ammunition, as they said, to go to war against the United States, and that by the directions of the Spanish officers. Indeed Governor O'Neal, commandant at Pensacola, told me himself he had orders to excite the Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, to war against the United States, though he doubted whether the last would join.

On arriving among the Creeks, we found them generally preparing for war against the United States, and they said they would set out as soon as their ammunition should arrive.

Willstown was the first Cherokee settlement I came to, which was about the 2d instant. There I found them assembled, to the number of at least six hundred, debating whether they should come to war against the people of Cumberland or not. The White Owl's son said, among the first, that he would not be restrained from going to war; Tahlontiske was the next; they were followed by Watts, John Taylor, Young Draggng-canoe, the Glass, and others. They seemed very unanimous to go to war immediately against the people of Cumberland and Holston. This was vehemently opposed by the Bloody Fellow, who spoke two days against it, to no purpose. Finding they were determined to set off for war, and I being very desirous they should not, in order to circumvent them, I told them I was sent from Governor Carondelet to one de Mombre, at Cumberland, who would inform him of the situation of that country, and point out the most proper places to be attacked. By showing them the Governor's passport, they were deceived, and suffered us to go on. They agreed they would wait ten days for our return, and no more. The letters which de Mombre should write to Governor Carondelet I was to show them.

On the way from the Cherokees to Cumberland, I came by a camp of four Creeks, who were hunting for moccon skins and provision, to enable them to come to war against Cumberland. These Indians told me, as many of the Creeks when in their nation had done, that, as soon as their ammunition should arrive from Pensacola, upwards of a thousand of them would turn out to war against Cumberland and Holston, and that they certainly would be at Cumberland this moon.

When I was among the Cherokees, they told me a Mr. Shaw had given to Governor Blount information, by letter, of their intentions to go to war; but that Watts, the Glass, and some others of the hostile chiefs, would write another letter to Governor Blount, feigning their friendship, to take off the bad effect of Mr. Shaw's, and deceive Governor Blount.

When I came away from Orleans, Mr. Fagot could not pay me my wages, because he had not sold his cargo. The Governor promised me five hundred dollars to do his business, and deliver the forementioned message to the four nations, and to Richard Fannelson he promised four hundred.

NASHVILLE, September 15, 1792.

This day Joseph Deraque, who has signed the within, personally came before me, a justice of the peace for the county of Davidson, and made oath, on the holy Evangelists, that the facts related in the within narrative, where mentioned to be of his own knowledge, are true, and where not to his own knowledge, he believes them to be true; in short, that it is a true narrative,

ROBERT HAYS, Justice of the Peace.

NASHVILLE, September 15, 1792.

I was the whole of Joseph Deraque's journey from Nashville to Orleans, and back by land to this place in his company, and do aver that the within is a true narrative.

RICHARD FINNELSON, his + mark.

KNOXVILLE, September 25, 1792.

Upon inquiry, I find that Joseph Deratte, otherwise Deraque, had lived at Nashville about six months previous to his going down the river with Mr. Fagot, and that he was and is there considered a man of veracity. He was well known to M. De Mombay, of Nashville, as was also Mr. Fagot; M. De Mombay is a man of undoubted veracity and character, and he fully believes the foregoing information is true. It is supposed that Mr. Fagot's motives for giving the information he did, was to obtain favor with the Spanish Government, to the end that he might get his tobacco into the King's stores, and obtain the price there given, and the influence of Government to save him from the arrest of his Spanish creditors, who were numerous.

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, September 27, 1792.

I have determined to call into the field, for the protection and defence of the territory, as quick as possible, in addition to the troops enumerated in my letter of yesterday's date, seven companies, from the different counties; one for three months and the other for six weeks; and the Greene county troop of cavalry, making in the whole (all of the district of Washington, besides Sharp's battalion, whose times, as I have before informed you, will expire on the 11th of October) fourteen companies of Infantry, and the Greene troop of cavalry, with the necessary field officers, and to be commanded by Brigadier General Sevier, whose high character in Indian warfare, and the necessity for his service, will, I hope, justify his being called to the command of so few troops.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, Sunday, October 7, 1792.

SIR:

The enclosed papers contain all the information I have received, worth communicating, from the Cherokees, since writing you by Mr. Allison on the 26th September. For many days past I have hourly been in expectation of an express from Cumberland; nor have I heard of the Creeks and Cherokees, since they passed the Tennessee, as mentioned in the letter of the Breath and Charley, and by John Boggs on the 17th of September.

The militia are turning out with unusual alacrity; some of them have made their appearance from the upper counties, and the whole number called for, will be here by Saturday night.

I hope for the honor of your orders as speedily as possible, and have that of being, with very great respect, yours, &c.

[ENCLOSURES.]

LOOK-OUT MOUNTAIN, September 15, 1792.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

We have heard your letter you sent to the Glass and the Bloody Fellow; the Bloody Fellow is at home, and the Glass is gone to the Little Turkey; we are very glad to see it; we are likewise glad to see it is in our power to stop the young fellows from going to war with the whites, our elder brothers, as our people and your people are living as it were together, you and them is so near each other; you mention that we ought to consider matters well, before beginning a war; it is very true; war is very bad, and I hope you nor us shall see no more of it, but live in peace.

But we are sorry to inform you—you may think it a lie, but we assure you it is the truth—that we are very sorry that, four days after our people had dispersed to their different homes, there was a great number of Creeks passed by here for several days; it was out of our power to stop them; they said there was several hundreds crossed the river low down, and had with them 500 lbs. of powder and lead accordingly; they said they were going to Cumberland; it is not the principal head-men of the Creek nation, but young fellows, and indeed a great number of them boys.

They said, that Colonel Robertson and General Pickens had told Codeatoy what we before told you, that they would go and see Colonel Robertson at his home.

We are much obliged to you for your advice in telling us take care, as the innocent would undoubtedly suffer.

We have told you of the Creeks always going, and we hope you will not let any of our people suffer for the bad doings of the Creeks, for we tell you they are gone; the exact number we do not know.

We heard that John Sevier says it will not be long before he sets out for war; that he is to come to this place, and all about here, and that there is another warrior to come, with an army from Tugulo, in order to destroy the nation; such talks makes our young people very uneasy; we could wish that your warriors would not send such talks, unless you intend to do so. These from

Your friends and brothers,

THE BREATH and CHARLES.

His Excellency WILLIAM BLOUNT.

NOTE.—There must be a mistake in the date of this letter; from the information collected from Boggs, it must have been written on the 23d September, 1792.

On Friday the 28th September, 1792, John Boggs returned to Knoxville, from the five Lower towns, where he had been to carry the letters of the 14th instant, from Governor Blount to the Glass and the Bloody Fellow, in answer to theirs of the 10th September, and delivered to Governor Blount the letter of The Breath of Nickajack, and Charley of the Running Water, dated September 15th, 1792. [There must have been a mistake in the date of this letter, it was probably written on the 23d September.] Boggs continued with Governor Blount, from Friday the 28th, to Sunday the 30th, and with him the Hanging Maw, Unacata, the brother of John Watts, and three other Indians. During this time, Governor Blount extracted all the information he possibly could, respecting the Indians, and both Boggs and the Maw appeared to be quite candid and communicative. The amount of the information given by John Boggs, was, that from the 15th to the 17th instant, the Creeks were passing the Tennessee at the Running Water, Nickajack, and at a place called the Creek-crossing-place, about thirty miles below Nickajack, on their way to invade the district of Miro. (Cumberland settlement) and that they were joined by from 100 to 200 Cherokees, among whom was John Watts, and that the Creeks had with them a great quantity of powder and lead, which they had received from the Spaniards; that the whole were to rendezvous at the place where the different paths came together on their way towards Nashville, and concert their measures of attack upon the Cumberland settlements. That while he was at the Look-out Mountain, he was informed that Richard Finnelson and a Frenchman had passed on from Pensacola to Cumberland, to obtain information of the true situation of that country, and were to return in ten nights, and report such as they could collect. That he found it generally understood in the Lower towns, as well as the other parts of the nation through which he passed, that such of the inhabitants of the five Lower towns as did not want war, had best leave them; and that such of the other towns as did want war had best move to them, and that some of both parties were moving, so as to take the situation which best suited their wishes and disposition for war or peace. Boggs is a half breed, well known to many white people, and by all parties viewed as a man of veracity.

The Hanging Maw said he and the Little Turkey, and all the chiefs of the Cherokees, except of the five Lower towns, were for peace; and that the five Lower towns were for war; that they expected to be attacked and destroyed, and were providing against that event: some intended moving nearer the Creeks; others to go west of the Mississippi, near L'Ance la Grace, and others, among whom was the Shawanese warrior, and his party of the Running Water; to form a settlement at the Creek crossing place of the Tennessee, a small distance above the Shoals, at the mouth of a creek on the south side, there to be joined and supported in a perpetual war against the United States, by a party of Shawanese, who are expected shortly to arrive at that place by water, by way of the Ohio and Tennessee.

Unacata the brother of John Watts, a good natured pleasant fellow, on Saturday, having drank freely of whiskey, and conversing with the Maw, Boggs, and the other Indians, told several stories, with much humor, of the attention that Governor Blount and the white people had always paid to Watts, whenever he came among them: now he said Watts was for war with the whites, and had sent for him to join him; and he had given Watts for answer that the whites had given him (Watts) a great many fine clothes; and that he had grown saucy: all the clothes he (Unacata) had, he had earned and paid for; and that if he (Watts) went to war and fell, he might lie there, he (Unacata) would not pick him up; meaning he would not revenge his death, according to their law. This conversation was overheard by Captain Chisolm and Mr. McKee, who understood what he said. Governor Blount asking the Hanging Maw about another Unacata, who, with his wife, had been with the Governor in the latter part of August, ten or twelve days, been well treated, and made great professions of friendship, was answered, that he, too, had thought him a good man; but Watts had carried him to war, and he supposed he must be killed.

KNOXVILLE, September 30th, 1792.

A message from Kenoteta, or rising Fawn, of Hiwassee, to Governor Blount, received at Hiwassee on the 1st, and delivered at Knoxville on the 5th of October, 1792, by John Christian. [Kenoteta is an old head-man, and was a signer to the treaty of Hopewell.]

“The mountains near you have many Indians in them for war; take care of your people; don't let them go out by twos or threes even to their fields. The Lower towns are all together, and so are the Creeks; make haste and come and destroy them. Come by Hiwassee, and I will find you provisions as you pass. Talahuske was here the other day from the Lower towns, saying that he had thrown away his war talks, and was now for peace: don't you believe him, he is still for war, and means to raise a party and join his brother. The Bench and another brother of his, the Tail, passed here yesterday with three other Cherokees of Will's town, and five Creeks, declaring they were going to kill Jo. Sevier. Take care of them, they will do some mischief before they return.

“A number of Shawanese have already settled down on the Big river,* at the mouth of a creek; and many more are coming: those who have arrived, have with them many goods—blankets, and strouds, and other goods; where they got them I do not know; but they must have destroyed a good many people, to get them either by water or land.”

* The Cherokees call the Tennessee the Big river.

Information by John Christian, who lives at Estanaula, with James Carey, and who brought up Gallaspie's son from thence to his father, and arrived at Knoxville the 5th October, 1792.

That as he came through the Cherokee nation with Gallaspie's son, Moyatoy, a Cherokee at Springston's place,* came up to them, and said to him, you are an old man, go along, but this boy and his horse I will have. Christian replied to him he was joking: no, he said, he was not, he would have boy and horse. Upon which the warrior's son of Estanaula, who had been selected by the head-men of that place to accompany Christian, and ensure safety to young Gallaspie, stepped up, and said he would protect him at the risk of his life. Moyatoy desisted, and Christian proceeded in safety with the warrior's son to Hiwassee, and there Culsetahe, the son-in-law of the Rising Fawn, joined the party, the better to ensure safety to young Gallaspie, and came with them to Craig's station on Nine-mile creek. Christian adds, that the chiefs, without exception, of all the Cherokee towns, except the five Lower, were for peace; but, that many of the young men of every part of the nation, discovered an inclination to join the war party of the Lower towns.

On the 2d of October, 1792, Black's blockhouse, on the head of Crooked creek, a branch of Little river, at which there was a sergeant's command from Captain Crawford's company, was attacked by surprise about an hour and a half in night, by a party of Indians, commanded by a Cherokee of Will's town, called the Tail, a brother of the Bench and Talotiske, consisting of three other Cherokees and five Creeks. James Paul was killed in the house, and George Moss and Robert Sharpe sitting out by a fire, and John Shankland wounded, and three horses were killed and seven carried off.

KNOXVILLE, October 10th, 1792.

SIR:

Yesterday I received an express from General Robertson, by which I have the enclosed account of the attack upon Buchanan's station on the 30th September: his letter was dated on the 3d instant, on the Indian Trail, four miles from Buchanan's station, where he was encamped with three hundred men, waiting the return of the reconnoitering party. The express informs me, after he left the General, he (the express) received information of twenty-four Indians being seen on that morning at Fletcher's Lick, eight miles southwest of Nashville, and seven on the north side of the river, about as many miles distant from the town: the first mentioned fired upon Mr. Joselin, and the latter upon Mr. McRory; but neither received any wound. This is all I have yet heard of the large body of the Creeks and Cherokees that passed the Tennessee, from the 15th to the 17th September, as mentioned by the Breath, Charley, and John Boggs. Fourteen days elapsed from the passing of the Tennessee to the attack upon Buchanan's station, when the distance between could have been marched in from four to six days. Difference in opinion, as to the mode and place of attack, at the rendezvous after they passed at the Tennessee, probably was the cause of the delay; I have no other way to account for it; and it is a rock on which large parties of Indians have generally split, especially when consisting of more than one nation.

It is to be hoped the repulsed party will return with their wounded, and it is to be feared, from the firing of the parties upon Joselin and McRory, that such small parties will continue on the frontiers, and commit depredations, but not such as were justly apprehended, when it was known so large a party had passed the Tennessee. General Robertson received my order of the 14th to discharge the militia in service, under my order of the 11th, on the 20th of September, but, hesitated to execute it, because he had been previously informed by Jo. Deraque and Richard Finnelson, that the chiefs of the Lower towns would write me as they did, (alluding to the letters of the Galls and the Bloody Fellow) with an intention to deceive me; the event has proved the truth of the information, and justified the General's conduct. The express further informs me that the Cumberland people are in good spirits; and employ every hour, when they are not embodied for the common defence, in erecting block-houses and stockades, the better to ensure safety to their families. I am without information worth communicating, both from the Upper and Lower Cherokees, since that received by John Bogs and the Hanging Maw. Since the 11th of September, the day on which I received the letter from the Turkey and the other chiefs of the Upper towns, giving me notice of the determination of the five Lower for war, and of theirs to continue in peace and friendship, I have omitted no occasion of impressing the people under my government with the necessity of considering the Upper towns as much friends as if the Lower had not declared for war; and I have the pleasure to assure you that their conduct, not only in observing the treaty, but in their treatment of the friendly Indians, deserves the highest commendation; and upon the complaint of the Hanging Maw, that some of the frontier people of North Carolina, at Swannano, had behaved "cross," as he expressed it, to some of the Cherokees of the Upper towns, I thought it proper to forward an address to them on the subject, a copy of which you have enclosed. Nevertheless, I have information on which I fully depend, that several young men of the Upper have joined the Lower towns; and there is no doubt but more will; and even suppose they ultimately all should, (which I do not suspect) I trust it will be thought good policy in me to keep the friendship of as many as I can, until I have the honor of your orders on that head.

Only part of two companies have arrived here since the return made to your office of Major Sawyer's battalion; but in the course of ten days I expect nearly the whole number called for by my order of the 27th September, of which I gave you information in my letter of that date by Mr. Allison.

The Captain de Mombray, of Nashville, whose name is mentioned in the information of Jo. Deraque and Richard Finnelson, is the bearer of this letter, an old resident of Kaskaskias, where he served as a Captain under General George Rogers Clark, last war, with reputation, and is now a valuable and respectable citizen.

I have the honor to be, &c.

An account of the attack, by the Creeks and Cherokees, upon Buchanan's Station, on the 30th September, 1792.

On the 30th September, about midnight, John Buchanan's Station, four miles south of Nashville, (at which sundry families had collected, and fifteen gun-men) was attacked by a party of Creeks and Lower Cherokees, supposed to consist of three or four hundred. Their approach was suspected by the running of cattle, that had taken fright at them, and, upon examination, they were found rapidly advancing within ten yards of the gate; from this place and distance they received the first fire from the man who discovered them, (John Mc. Rory.) They immediately returned the fire, and continued a very heavy and constant firing upon the station, (blockhouses, surrounded with a stockade) for an hour; and were repulsed with considerable loss, without injuring man, woman, or child, in the station.

During the whole time of attack, the Indians were not more distant than ten yards from the blockhouse, and often in large numbers round the lower walls, attempting to put fire to it. One ascended the roof with a torch, where he was shot, and, falling to the ground, renewed his attempts to fire the bottom logs, and was killed. The Indians fired 30 balls through a port-hole of the overjutting, which lodged in the roof in the circumference of a hat, and those sticking in the walls, on the outside, were very numerous.

Upon viewing the ground next morning, it appeared that the fellow who was shot from the roof, was a Cherokee half-breed of the Running Water, known by the name of Tom Tunbridge's step-son, the son of a French woman, by an Indian, and there was much blood, and signs that many dead had been dragged off, and litters having been made to carry their wounded to their horses, which they had left a mile from the station. Near the blockhouse were found several swords, hatchets, pipes, kettles, and budgets of different Indian articles; one of the swords was a fine Spanish blade, and richly mounted in the Spanish fashion. In the morning previous to the attack, Jonathan Gee, and Clayton were sent out as spies, and on the ground, among other articles left by the Indians, were found a handkerchief and a moccason, known one to belong to Gee, and the other to Clayton, hence it is supposed they are killed.

Address of Governor Blount, of the 2d October, 1792, to the frontier inhabitants of the State of North Carolina.

WILLIAM BLOUNT, Governor in and over the territory of the United States of America South of the river Ohio, to the frontier inhabitants of the State of North Carolina:

GENTLEMEN:

No doubt, you who are so immediately interested in the event of a Cherokee and Creek war, are anxious to be informed of the conduct and intentions of those two nations. On the 11th September the Little Turkey, and the other principal Chiefs of the Upper Cherokee towns, gave me information, in writing, that the five Lower towns of the Cherokees were for war against the United States, and that every other part of the nation was for peace; and three days past the Hanging Maw, and other Chiefs of the Upper towns, were with me at this place, and gave assurances to the same purport. Good policy, as well as my own feelings, have induced me to recommend to the frontier inhabitants of this territory, to treat that part of the Cherokee nation which have declared for peace, in the same friendly manner as if no part had declared for war; and permit me, gentlemen, to extend that recommendation to you also, and to request you to continue that friendly intercourse with that part of the nation, which is adjacent to you, in the manner you have heretofore done, so long as that part shall continue their friendship for the United States. I have now, gentlemen, to inform you, that, twelve days past, about 500 Creeks passed the Tennessee, at or near the five Lower towns, on their way to Cumberland; that from 100 to 200 warriors of those towns joined the party. Cumberland was forewarned of their intended invasion, and, it is hoped, will meet and repulse them before they reach the settlements. It is uncertain in what part they will next attack; if it is this, I am prepared for them; and if I should receive information that it is against your quarter, I shall give you notice.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

KNOXVILLE, October 2d, 1792.

APPENDIX TO NO. IV.

James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War.

ROCK LANDING, ON THE OCONEE, 21st April, 1792.

SIR:

My last letter to you was from Savannah, under date of the 12th instant. Agreeable to what I then wrote, I have returned to this place, where I found my interpreter just got back from General M<sup>r</sup>Gillivray, with a letter in reply to mine of the 25th ultimo. For your information, I now enclose you extracts from his two last letters to me; by them you will be informed of his intention of coming down to meet me; he seems in good humor with me, and I hope to keep him so.

My interpreter tells me that there remains much confusion in the nation. It seems some of Bowles' associates or partners have sent large packets of letters directed to General Bowles, which they say are from his friends on the other side of the great water, and that all that Bowles promised them was on the point of being realized; and that, though Bowles is now in the hands of the Spaniards, yet, in forty days, he will return to them again.

There is a villain of the name of Willbanks, who came with Bowles, who spread those stories, and, I believe, fabricates those letters. I hope General M<sup>r</sup>Gillivray will be able to lay hands on him and his letters, and will make an example of him to the Indians and all future adventurers.

It is reported, (and I believe with truth) that two men were lately killed by the Indians about fifty miles above this place. This is said to be done by a party of the Cowetas in revenge for two of their people who were murdered by the Georgians some months past. Frequent application having been made by the Indians to the Government of this State for redress, by punishing the perpetrators, but not being able to get satisfaction in that way, they gave notice that they should retaliate, which I believe they have done, as I have advice from the kings of the Cowetas and Cussetahs, that the relations of the deceased Indians were out to take revenge, which they could not longer prevent.

These are unpleasant matters, but we may look for such events taking place frequently, whilst there is not energy in the Government of this State to punish such wretches, as those who wantonly killed the Indians, and thereby occasioned the death of the two innocent persons alluded to above.

Martin Johnston, the principal in murdering a Coweta Indian, some time past, near this place, now lives near the shoals of Great Ogeechee, about thirty miles from hence, undisturbed.

Whilst the people of this country shelter such wretches as Johnston among them, they ought not to wonder at the Indians revenging themselves on the innocent, whilst they protect the guilty.

When General M<sup>r</sup>Gillivray and the chiefs come here, I shall do all in my power to please them, and get our business forwarded. I am sorry to find so great a number of the valuable officers about to leave this place at so critical a juncture, when great discretion and strict discipline may become more necessary.

LITTLE TALLASSEE, 25th March, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

Last evening I had the pleasure of your letter 7th ultimo, by Randall. By my letter to you, by Akins, you will find that I had just arrived from Tensa, Pensacola, and Mobile. The extreme bad weather I had on the road made me apprehensive of an attack of the rheumatism, and a few days after he left this, I was unfortunately laid up till now. My indisposition prevented me from going, in person, after that vagabond Bowles; however, I sent positive orders to the Cowetas and Cussetahs to go, and either to take him or put him to death. A considerable party accordingly set out for that purpose, but before they reached St. Marks, I am informed, that the Spanish commandant seized him a prisoner. That the principal obstacle to my leaving the nation at present being removed, I am determined to comply with your requisition to meet you at the Rock Landing as soon as convenient. The lower towns have agreed to time, and have sent me notice. Cornel has my orders to be up in the first week of next month when I shall have the chiefs of these two rivers assembled, to explain to them the contents of your letter, and we can be with you about the latter end of the month.

Expecting to have the pleasure of taking you by the hand at the time mentioned, I remain, &c.

LITTLE TALLASSEE, 8th April, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

The day before yesterday I had the pleasure of your despatch by Mr. Bryant. I am surprised to find that Jamy Randall has not proceeded with my letter to you. We have exceeding high waters here. Bryant will meet some trouble in returning from this.

I find myself mending fast; the mild weather has relieved me from the rheumatism, and how soon I can get ready, will set out for your place. Its impossible, as yet, to get a horse across our rivers. Bowles is, ere now, securely lodged in New Orleans; he was taken by statagem at last; repeated attempts to take him in that way by the Spaniards he had evaded, but, on the arrival of Pantons ship, (Captain Forrest) Bowles had a design to take her, and he forgot himself so far as to accept an invitation to dine on board with some others. A Spanish guard had been previously put on board the ship, and, after dinner, Bowles was at length obliged to give up his arms, and surrender a prisoner, and was put on board an armed vessel, and sent to New Orleans; and this moment I have a letter from the Governor Baron Carondelet, who informs me he has sent Bowles to the Havana. Many of the lower people are not certain as to my intentions of going to the Rock Landing. On Akins' return, I sent them a message that I would take no steps in affairs until they satisfied me in restoring matters to their original train.

Bowles' partisans are some violent fellows, who have lost friends in the British cause in the late war, and who eagerly listen to any vagabonds that will call themselves Englishmen, and will set them on to mischief against the Americans, or encourage them to commit outrages of any kind against any people.

I shall say nothing at present of the nature of the Secretary's despatch, and will answer them from the Rock Landing.

I do hereby certify that Mr. Langley Bryant delivered a packet of letters to me from the Hon. James Seagrove, enclosing one from the Hon. the Secretary of War, dated 20th February, 1792.

ALEX. M'GILLIVRAY.

Extract of a letter from Mr. James Seagrove, addressed to Major General Henry Knox, Secretary of War.

ROCK LANDING, ON THE OCONEE RIVER, 24th May, 1792.

SIR:

When I invited the Indians to meet me here, I was well aware of the expense and danger of broils between them, and the more savage inhabitants of this frontier; but at that juncture there did not appear an alternative. My instructions pointed, in the first instance, to the suppression of Bowles, and restoring order in the nation. Unfortunately, that villain had been allowed to make so many friends to his cause in the Creek nation, that his influence would counteract any thing attempted in the towns; and as General M'Gillivray was then absent, and to every appearance his influence much lessened, there was not any principal head to which I could resort, or make use of, without danger of creating jealousy, and perhaps meet with censure from Mr. M'Gillivray, for raising a competitor or competitors with him in the nation. All these matters I weighed, but plainly saw that unless some method could be fallen on to convene the principal characters of the nation to a place where they would not be under the influence of Bowles, and then convey to their understanding, coolly and deliberately, the humane and friendly intention of the Government of the United States toward them, and to point out the absurdity of their being led away by Bowles' delusive tales, I apprehended that a total subversion of Mr. M'Gillivray's influence would shortly take place; unless some stir was made in his favor, that Bowles would rule the nation, and, on that being the case, we should see an attempt made to realise his threat of deluging our country in blood.

How far I have been right in my opinion of the power of Bowles' party, the convulsed state of the nation, ever since his capture and removal, which is kept up by some of his white partners and Indian converts, will determine.

General M'Gillivray's conduct in this business with Bowles, resembles that of Britain with America, during the early part of the late war, by undervaluing the power of their adversaries.

Although Bowles is removed, such is the baneful effect of what he has done, that the strength of his party (even at this moment) in the Creek nation, is such, that we find General M'Gillivray compelled to submit to their will.

The enclosed testimony of John Ormsbay, a man of very good character and understanding, and who is well known to several of the officers now here, will explain matters. Ormsbay's testimony is confirmed to me by every chief and head-man who have been with me. The words of the Great Natchez warrior, when answering some of my talks made in favor of the General, were: Bowles laid our beloved man, Gen. M'Gillivray, on the ground, and made him of no more consequence than a child, but we will raise him up again; and, from the talks we have now heard, we are convinced he is right; we will therefore put his enemies under him.

The enclosed letter from Timothy Barnard, a man of family and good repute, in Georgia, who has been settled as a trader in the Creek country thirty years, and always a confidential man with their Government, will further show to you the state of confusion the nation is in.

I never could scan the General's motives in affecting to treat Bowles' usurpation, and the confusion his country hath been in for near a year, with such indifference; there must be a hidden cause, but which cannot long lie dormant. I am again impelled to repeat my want of faith in this man's integrity to our country; the whole tenor of his conduct is a flimsy appearance of friendship, but not one pointed or spirited exertion in favor of the United States. I wish I may be deceived, but I fear you will not find him, in the end, the man you wish him to be. A man, to preserve his reputation, ought not to serve many masters; the General has many, and I am convinced the United States are not the favorite. A Spaniard, or an Englishman, is respectable all through the Creek nation, but it is very dangerous for any person, known to belong to the United States, to travel, or be in that country; and, I am sorry to find, that no pains have ever been taken to remove that unjust prejudice.

I now enclose you a copy of my last communication to General M'Gillivray, which is under date of the 21st instant, the contents of which anticipate what I have to say on Indian matters.

From the present confusion in the nation, and its appearing the wish of those Indians that were with me, I did not press the running of the line immediately; and therefore consented to their returning home to settle their internal matters, which, when done, they have promised to meet me, and proceed on this business.

In order to quiet the fears of the people of this country, I have written a letter to the Governor of Georgia, on the present state of Indian affairs in this quarter, a copy of which I now enclose you.

I attend to your instructions, respecting the Spanish Government; my conduct shall be conformable to your desire. They now have a resident settled in the Creek Nation; he lives at the Little Tallassee, in one of General M'Gillivray's houses; his name is Oliver; he has goods, and delivers presents to the Indians, and seems in high favor.

The Governor of New Orleans, the Baron Carondelet, hath sent an invitation to a number of the Creek chiefs to meet him as soon as possible at Orleans or Mobile, as they choose: but they have declined going, until they can settle their internal disputes. Mr. Pantons (principal of the house of Pantons, Leslie, & Co.) arrived at M'Gillivray's about the time he was to have set off for this place; unfortunately, this Mr. Pantons hath more influence over Mr. M'Gillivray, than any person living, and, it is said, directs all his movements. Pantons, from interest as well as inclination, is an inveterate enemy to the United States.

I find the Creeks have been killing some white people on their Western frontier. In my talks with the Indians, I am led to believe that the people killed, belong to a settlement south of Cumberland river, and on lands that never have been sold, or ceded by the Indians; that those people have repeatedly been ordered off by the Indians, but will not go; that, before Bowles was taken, he laid a plan with his Indian adherents to strike at those people, which they have done; and lives have been lost, and prisoners taken on both sides.

[ENCLOSURES.]

Letter from Timothy Barnard to James Seagrove, Esqr.

FLINT RIVER, 10th May, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I have been these ten days ready, prepared to start down to the Rock Landing, where I expected to have had the pleasure of seeing you. Jack Kinnard was likewise at my house, and ten of his people with him, so far on their way to the Rock Landing. They staid with me here nine days, waiting till they could hear that the Cussetah people were started, sent several expresses up to the Buzzard Roost, to bring their information on. The last news that came to them from there was, that the Cowetah people had killed two white people, and that the Cussetah King had sent out word that he had done his endeavor to get Mr. McGillivray to come down, and set off down, but that he had sent word that he was sick; and when he heard that, he was determined to have started without him; but on hearing that the Cowetas had done this mischief, it put him out of all hopes of having the line run this time, till matters are a little more settled. The White Bird king, I hear, is on his way down to the Rock Landing, and several more. I have to acquaint you, sir, that, if it had not been for this villanous piece of business that Bowles has transacted, there would have been some of the head-men from almost every town in the Creek nation to the treaty, and matters would have been completed long ago; but, as some of every town in the Lower Creeks, except the Cussetahs, have joined Bowles, it has put the friends of the United States in this quarter to a great deal of trouble. The Cussetahs and Jack Kinnard, and his people, have left no stone unturned, striving to bring matters about to run the line; and, when those rascals that had joined Bowles, found that it was near coming to the point, they thought there was no more effectual way to stop it than to go out and kill some one, for satisfaction for the man they lost. The father to the fellow that was lost, is a head-man in the Cowetas, and one of Bowles' party. Though the Spaniards took him off before their faces, they still think he will be back in a short time. What has given them another reason to expect him back is, that the Spaniards, since they took him to Orleans, have permitted him to write letters back to the nation, to one Willbanks, who is now in the nation, saying every thing he can in Bowles' favor; persuading the Indians that he will be back to the nation in a short time, with a number of goods. I cannot see into this manoeuvre of the Spaniards, giving him the privilege to write back; except it was that they thought it would be the means of pacifying the Indians, from committing violations on their territory, as I well know they are very much afraid of the Indians. As to Bowles ever coming back, I think it out of the question, after what he has done to Messrs. Pantan and Leslie, as two thousand pounds will not replace the damage those gentlemen have sustained. After the Indians find Bowles does not come back, I am very sure they will draw in their horns, and matters may be still settled. I have myself done every thing in my power to convince the Indians that Bowles is leading them on to their ruin, which he has heard, and threatens my life. Many of the head-men of the nation are of my opinion, Kinnard especially. Kinnard would not agree to go to the treaty, without I would go with him, which I should have done, as I knew his presence there was necessary. He desired me to mention that, if matters were made up, that he will still attend with pleasure; and is very sorry he has been obliged to return, through the bad conduct of the red people; but he says he still hopes matters will be made up. No more news this way arrives to me at present worth relating, therefore wish you health, and remain,

Dear Sir, your most obedient humble servant.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, 21st May, 1792.

SIR:

I have the pleasure to inform your Excellency, that, at a respectable meeting of the kings, chiefs, and warriors, of the Creek nation, at this place, I delivered them a talk, the 18th instant, on the state of public affairs, which was well received by them; and I have assurance from them, of their disposition to preserve peace and good understanding between them and the United States. That, as soon as the internal feuds in their nation can be settled, for which purpose a general meeting is now ordered by General McGillivray, they will attend me, in order to carry into effect the treaty made at New York, as well as all other matters depending. In the mean time, they will, by their example and advice to their countrymen, not only put a stop to any outrage being committed by the people of their nation, on this country, but to banish from their land all such as have advised them to measures which could tend to disturb the peace of the United States or the Creek nation.

The reason General McGillivray did not attend at this meeting, agreeably to promise, arose from the perturbed state of his nation, owing to internal matters.

From the present appearance of matters, I am fully of opinion peace will be preserved with the Creeks. I have not been able to discover any disposition in them to the contrary, and I fondly hope we shall not give them cause to change their present temper toward us.

The Creek Indians who have been with me, deny, in the most positive and pointed terms, their people having murdered, as is said, a Mr. Yarborough and his son. There had been a party of Cowetas, relations to an Indian of that town, who was killed by whites, some time past, on their frontier, (and for which they had repeatedly required satisfaction, but without effect) set out to take satisfaction, but were followed by the Cussetah chiefs, and sent home; and nothing since hath been attempted.

Reports now circulate here, which are believed, that Yarborough and son were murdered by white people.

I have reason to think, that, on investigation, your Excellency will find, that several late alarming accounts, which you have received from this frontier, have been very much exaggerated, if not totally without foundation.

As a proof of the favorable opinion I have of the Creeks' pacific disposition, I intend going into the nation as soon as I hear from General McGillivray.

On my return, I intend doing myself the honor of calling on your Excellency; in the mean time, remain, with all possible respect,

Your obedient, and very humble servant.

John Ormsbay, a native of Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, who arrived at this place last evening, from the Creek nation, declares that he was in company with General McGillivray, at the Tuckaubatchees, on the last day of April, and that he went in company with the General from thence to his house, at the Hickory Ground; that the General was prepared to set off for this place, but was prevented by the Old Tallassee king, the big half breed of the Kialle-gees, and the Mad Dog, of Tuckaubatchees, all of whom told the General that he must not meet the Virginians, as they had talks from the English people, (meaning Bowles' party) that England, France, and Spain, were all joined against America; that Bowles would return to them in a few days; that Colonel Brown (a great favorite with the Indians) was to come and join Bowles, and his party, from the Bahama Islands. That the Creek nation appeared in a most distracted state, from the stories circulated among them by some of Bowles' partners, who remain, the head of whom is a man of the name of Willbanks, a low, illiterate fellow, whom this informant saw in the Cowetahs' town, as he came along. That General McGillivray had declined coming to the Rock Landing; that he told Mr. Ormsbay he should despatch an express to Mr. Seagrove, in a day or two, with a full state of all matters. That Mr. Pantan, of the house of Pantan, Leslie, & Co. arrived at General McGillivray's on the 30th ultimo; that there was a Spanish commissary, or agent, established at Little Tallassee, and lives in General McGillivray's new house; he came from New Orleans; his name is Olivar; that he has goods, and makes presents to the Indians. That the Governor of New Orleans had sent into the Creek nation, an invitation for a number of their chiefs to meet him, either at Orleans, Mobile, or Pensacola, as most convenient to them. That General McGillivray expressed his fears, that, unless matters could soon be accommodated, the Indians would be hostile against the United States; that he said the Indians were altogether regardless of his advice; that he was determined to quit them, and go to his place on the river Tensa; that several scalps and prisoners had lately been brought into the nation, from the settlements toward Cumberland river; that the Creeks were much displeas'd at the Chickasaws and Choctaws, in consequence of the latter having favored the Americans, and some of them acted with their army, to the northward, last campaign; that it was expected the Creeks would go to war with the Chickasaws and Choctaws. The tenor of General McGillivray's conduct, whilst this informant remained in the nation, appeared friendly to the United States. That Mr. Cornell, the interpreter, at whose house Mr. Ormsby lodged, appeared very friendly to the Americans, and used what influence he had in their favor. That it is impossible for any person, known to belong to the United States, to travel in the Creek nation without insult, and danger of losing their lives; the names of English, or Spanish, must be assumed, by way of protection.

JOHN ORMSBAY.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, 11th May, 1792.

Delivered in presence of
JAMES SEAGROVE,
JAMES JORDAN.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, 21st May, 1792.

DEAR GENERAL:

I am not favored with a line from you since the 8th of last month, which induces me to believe that some misfortune hath befallen your letters on the way. My anxiety, on your account, for twenty days past, hath been extremely great, owing to the many extraordinary pieces of information brought from the nation.

On the 11th instant, a man of the name of John Ormsbay, made declaration in writing, to me, that he was in your company on the last day of April, at the Tuckaubatchee town, and went from thence with you to your own house; that you were all prepared to come here, but were stopped by the old Tallassee King, the big half breed of the Kealeages, and the Mad Dog, of the Tuckaubatchees; that those chiefs were very peremptory in forbidding your coming here. The cause of this extraordinary conduct in those people, I am led to believe, arises from the internal commotion in the nation, which, I am told, is still kept up by Bowles' party. I cannot, however, suppose, that they can be very formidable, now that their leader is removed, and that, by this time, the most simple, or obstinate, of your people, must now plainly discover that they have been dupes to the villanous impositions of Bowles.

It would have afforded me much satisfaction to have heard from you by Ormsbay, with an account of the real cause of your detention, and a full state of matters. My dear general, you must suppose the state of suspense I have been, and still am in, on your account, to be very unpleasant: for, when, at the moment I was to expect the happiness of seeing you, to receive such unfavorable accounts, really shocked me. I cannot promise myself any ease of mind, until I receive a full state of matters from your own hands.

Your not coming forward as expected hath caused many conjectures, and some alarm in the minds of the people of this country, lest something should be meditating by your people unfavorable to this frontier; but the assurance I give them of your determination to preserve peace, together with the very orderly conduct of the Indians now with me, and their friendly talks, will, in a great measure, subside their fears.

I am happy in informing you, that your good friend Chinabee, the great Natchez warrior, with thirty-five of the principal men, have been with me for ten days past. I think him a valuable friend to you and to the United States. I have paid him every attention in my power, and I believe he will return to you well pleased. I have had several private talks with him, and have communicated some matters which he will tell you. He promises me to use all his influence in restoring peace and good order, as does every Indian that has been, or are now here, give me the most solemn assurance of aiding your measures.

The Bird-tail king of the Cussetahs came here on the 15th instant, and informed me that I need not expect you; that the confusion in the towns was so great, that many of your people were openly opposed to your going any where, until there could be a general meeting of the nation, which he says you have desired to be at the Tuckaubatchees. I am extremely sorry to find, from the Old King and the other chiefs that have been with me, that the removal of Bowles hath not lessened the feuds in your country, and that the unaccountable conduct of your people in favor of this villain and his associates, is but too conspicuous and daring.

On this information, I thought it would be well to dismiss the Indians that were with me, as their presence might be necessary with you; but before I sent them away, I conceived it would not be amiss to give them a talk, which I did on the 17th and 18th instant, a copy of which you have enclosed.

It will make me happy indeed, if the contents of this, my first essay in Indian address, coincide with your opinion; if in any thing I have erred or fallen short of your wish, I hope you will attribute it to the real cause—my want of experience in matters of this kind; and also, to my not having your good counsel and assistance beforehand.

If I may judge from the declarations of the Indians who were present at my talk, they are fully convinced of the very improper conduct of that part of the nation who adhere to Bowles and his party, as well as to those who have delayed the business of the United States; and disapprove very much of the late murders of some white people on the Western waters, near Cumberland river, by some of the Creeks.

I hinted to the chiefs the idea of employing a certain number of their young men to act occasionally with our army to the Westward; they seemed to relish it very well, but I would make no engagements with them, and have referred them to you on that head. They are full of it, and will consult you thereon.

If I am so fortunate as to hear from you in a few days, and that you encourage it, I will set off to see you at the intended meeting at the Tuckaubatchee. I had determined to go out in company with the great Natchez warrior and his people, but he and the other chiefs have dissuaded me from it at this time, not thinking it advisable. They recommend my waiting here for twenty days, and if, during that time, I do not hear from you, I shall return to the river St. Mary's, and there wait to hear from you and them.

The chiefs and warriors who have been with me, give strong assurance of their using every means in their power, to bring about good order in your country, and to preserve peace with the United States: they have pledged themselves to me for the faithful performance, and I have great confidence in them. I think the Bird-tail King, the Old Head warrior of the Cussetahs, Halletemathle, Nethloe, or Second Man, and Chinabee, the great Natchez warrior, are your warm friends, and will shortly give you convincing proofs of it. You may rely, my friend, I have made use of every argument, in public and private, with them, and all the Indians I have seen, to depreciate and degrade Bowles and his villanous party, and to exalt you and your friends. I hope my endeavors will not be altogether unsuccessful.

Although my talk, which you have enclosed, is long, and touches on most of the necessary points, yet, I told them much more in different conversations, all tending to explain and set them right; but, in particular, dwelt on the unquestionable and effectual support you had at your call from the President of the United States. I took much pains, and had explained to them the President's ardent desire of being in peace and close friendship with every Indian on this continent, and that from motives of humanity and benevolence to his fellow creatures; that measures were now pursuing for that purpose with the refractory Western tribes, which is actually the case, but that, if they continue deaf to the calls of reason, they will be brought to a sense of their duty by coercive measures, which are also preparing.

Doubtless you have heard that some leading fellows from the hostile Western tribes have been among your people lately, using all their influence and address to get them to join them against the United States. I hope you have got notice of it in time to crush the evil in the bud. Chinabee, the Natchez warrior, informs me, that he fell in with three of those fellows who belonged to the Shawanese, who were out on this business; he will give you a full and satisfactory account of them. I find that they have also been in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee nations, but I hope without success in either. It is, however, well to be watchful, and these things point out (in my opinion) the necessity there is of employing some of your young men in favor of the United States, as it will be fixing them to a side. I am of opinion it will be impossible to keep them entirely neuter.

The enclosed letter from the Department of War, which came by express, and under cover to me, yesterday, will probably give you further light into matters. Should it be agreed on in the nation that the number of warriors required for service to the Westward shall go out, should any provisions be required to carry them on as far as to Governor Blount, at Nashville, I will furnish, on the shortest notice, from the stores at this place. From Governor Blount they will receive a further supply to carry them to their destination.

I am exceeding sorry that I could not see you at this time, as there are many matters I wish to communicate with you on, which cannot so well be done by letter. We must meet by some means or other. Business cannot be so well done at a distance.

Enclosed you have a list of the Indians who were present at my talk, as, also, a sketch of the presents which I gave them. I have reason to think that every man of them goes away contented, as well as possessing very different ideas to what they brought here: for they candidly told me, that they had been led to expect bad treatment and deception. The Great Natchez warrior tells me, that he and his people were forbid coming (by Bowles' party) as we had laid plans to detain them until we got their lands, or destroy them in case of refusal. The Choctaws also sent forbidding him to come, but he now says that he is happy; he did not attend to them, as he will be able on his return to convince them that they are credulous fools.

Should the feuds which distract your country unfortunately increase so as to endanger your remaining in the nation, and that you determine on a temporary removal, I would by all means advise its being to the United States, for reasons which must be obvious to you. In such case I hope you will make my house your home as long as convenient to you. This letter I have given in charge to the Blue Giver of the Cussetas, whom I think a friendly trusty fellow; he promises to deliver you this or lose his life, and I have not a doubt but he will return (if you choose) to me with your answer, for which I shall wait at this place twenty days from this date. I hope you see the necessity of my having regular, full, and minute advice from you; much depends upon it.

I wish much to send you some of the good things that I provided, in expectation of your partaking of them here; but the bearer thinks he cannot get them along at this time. I can send you some choice Coniac brandy, Geneva, spirits, and wine; also, tea, sugar, and coffee. If you think they will reach you safe, let me know by return of the express, and send a trusty person for them, and they shall be sent on.

Having much writing to do, and Long Tom pressing to get off, I must conclude this, with assurance of unalterable regard and esteem.

Dear General, yours, &c.

JAMES SEAGROVE.

General ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY, Creek Nation.

A talk delivered by James Seagrove, Esquire, Commissioner of Indian Affairs from the President of the United States.

To the kings, chiefs, head men, and warriors of the Creek nation, assembled at the Rock Landing, on the Oconee river, in the State of Georgia, on Thursday, 18th day of May, 1792:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I having it in command, from the President of the United States, to repair to the Creek nation, and there to enter on different matters of business with General McGillivray, and the kings, chiefs, and warriors of the same; but, finding on my arrival at this place, that the people of your towns were much divided and in great confusion, in consequence of the villanous imposition of a low adventurer, of the name of Bowles, I thought it would be best to call the wise men of your nation to meet me at this place, where we could deliberate, not being under any dread or influence from the spirit of the times.

In consequence of this, I sent a talk into your nation, on the 25th March last, inviting the kings, chiefs, and warriors, to meet me, to which I received their answer, that they would attend by the 22d of last month; but, the time being elapsed, and the number now here comparatively small to what I was led to believe from their promises, I am at a loss to account for so unexpected a change. From several letters I received from General McGillivray, I had not a doubt of his being present at this meeting, and I believe most of you were of the same opinion. This unaccountable delay and disappointment must remain to be explained at a future day.

Although the number now assembled is not great, yet I am happy in observing among you several of the most respectable men of your nation; I therefore conceive it my duty to make you acquainted with part of my business I have to lay before your nation, not having a doubt but you will pay every attention thereto yourselves, and, on your return to your nation, you will, as honest good men and friends, use all your influence in impressing the necessity there is of your people's conforming to the desire of the President of the United States, which alone can save them from destruction.

In the first place, I have it in command, from the President of the United States, to make known to you the very great regard and friendship he hath for the Creek nation, and that it is his constant wish to promote your happiness in every instance in his power. Actuated by these friendly motives, he hath thought fit to appoint me to meet you, and, in conjunction with your beloved man, General McGillivray, to take such measures as will put all matters depending between your nation and the United States on a firm, peaceable, respectable, and permanent footing.

Being now met on so desirable a business, I hope every man comes into this council as I do, with a heart prepared and determined to do all the good they can for their fellow men, whether white or red. Should this be the case, and I trust it is, there cannot be a doubt but we shall speedily arrange and settle matters happily for our respective countries.

The first object, my brethren, that presents for our consideration, is, the state of confusion your nation hath lately been in; and, I must inform you, it gave your good friend, the President of the United States, great uneasiness, on your account, and made him sorry to hear that any body among you could be so deceived as to listen to the infamous falsehoods which the impostor, Bowles, told them, and which have been the cause of all your confusion and delay of business.

The vile impostor, Bowles, being now removed from among you to where he doubtless will be properly punished for his crimes, makes it, in some measure, unnecessary to inform you, that I have it in command, from the President of the United States, to offer to your beloved man, General McGillivray, together with the kings and chiefs of your nation, any kind of assistance which he and you may require now, or at any future time, in order to punish such bad men as Bowles, or any other who shall dare to disturb the peace of your nation.

Perhaps some of you who are now present are not acquainted with the true origin and character of this base impostor, Bowles; I shall, therefore, give you a sketch of the man, as well to expose him and his adherents, as to caution you in future not to be so ready in listening to what every idle vagabond who comes into your land may tell you, with a view to make you angry with your best friends, with one another, and involve you in trouble, and bring ruin on your nation, if you are so unwise as to take their talks.

This Bowles is an American, of low, mean extraction, born in Maryland; he was obliged, on account of his villainy, to fly from home and follow the British army, where he was despised and treated as a bad man and a coward. Finding he could not live there, he returned to America; but, being too lazy to work at his trade for a living, he renewed his bad acts, for which he was obliged to fly his native country, or be hanged. Finding himself thus situated, he endeavored to impose on the King of England, by telling him that you had sent him there, and you wished to make him, Bowles, your beloved man; that it was your desire to make war against the United States and Spain; but the King of England, finding him an impostor, drove him out of his land, but treated the Indians that were with him kindly, on their own account, and not on Bowles's. He then went to Providence, where, we are told, he was taken by the hand by men whose characters in life have been nearly similar to his own. Those bad men encouraged him in his pursuit of coming among you and doing all the mischief he could to you and your friends. How far he has succeeded in these things, I call on your own knowledge of facts to determine.

You must, now, all of you, be sensible of the lies he hath told you: for, of all the promises he ever made you, or the many fine things he hath told you, have you ever found one word of truth in them? Instead of bringing you in goods, like an honest man, did he not rob the stores that have been supplying you for years, the owners of which are your friends? Has he not advised your young men to shed white blood? and have they not been so mad as to follow his advice, and killed some of our people on the Western waters; in consequence of which, I am told, some of your people are also killed, and others hurt? All this arises, my friends, from your listening to bad white men, whom you admit into your country. Many other acts of violence this wretch wished your young men to commit, but your old wise men prevented.

The intention of Bowles, in all this, was, to make himself a great man. Without any regard to your happiness, his views were to advise your people to commit acts that would involve you in a war with the United States and Spain, and to give you a bad opinion of your beloved man. Sorry am I to think that so many believed his lies. I am certain they must now feel ashamed of themselves, who were dupes to this fellow.

I hope all who have listened are now sensible of their error, and that, in future, they will only listen to what is told them by their beloved man, General McGillivray, and the beloved man from the President of the United States, which will always keep them in the right way. I must also inform you, that your good friend, the President of the United States, sent to the King of England about Bowles, and the said King sent a beloved man to the President, who assures him, in the name of his master, that Bowles hath no assistance, countenance, or protection, from him or his nation; that Bowles is an impostor; and that he will punish any of his people who are known to harbor or countenance him in the smallest degree.

BROTHERS: I could tell you much more about this bad man Bowles; but, as he is now gone, I will not take up your time further on this head, only to advise, that if any of his white associates, or assistants, yet remain in your land, (which I am informed there are) that you will immediately drive them out of it; but if they hesitate to depart, that you will punish them yourselves, or deliver them to me: for, whilst any such vile wretches as Bowles, or his partners, are allowed to have rest in your nation, you cannot be a happy people.

Allowing strangers to come among you without proper authority, is a very dangerous thing. You may always be certain, that when you see white men come into your nation without a proper passport, they are bad men, who run away from their own country for their crimes, and that they will impose on you by telling lies, robbing you, and, if they can, make you angry with your friends, and breed disturbance in your towns, as you find Bowles hath done. I hope, therefore, you will, in time to come, not allow any white person, whatever, trader or others, to enter your towns without a proper passport, agreeable to treaty. This will save you much trouble, and keep you in peace and quiet.

The President of the United States observes with concern the delay which hath taken place in carrying into execution the treaty made with him at New York, by your beloved man General McGillivray, and a respectable number of your chiefs and warriors, in behalf of themselves and the whole Creek nation.

BROTHERS: I hope and trust you are all well acquainted with the solemn nature and consequences of treaties formed between nations, and that, therefore, all due respect will be paid to the one now mentioned, as being of more importance to you than any you ever entered into.

The motives which gave rise to this treaty, were the disturbances which frequently took place between your nation and individual States, which were often attended with very disagreeable consequences.

In order to relieve you for ever from the imposition of any of the States, or of individuals, the President of the United States hath, by this treaty, not only guaranteed to you all your lands and possessions, but bound himself and the United States to support and defend you against the attempts of any power whatever to injure you or your property.

My friends, I must request that you will have every article of the treaty made at New York carefully explained to you by the interpreters, upon which you must see how very favorable it is in all its parts to your nation, and how much it is your real interest to have it strictly complied with.

Permit me here to observe, that, in forming treaties between nations; it is not possible to suit the interest or inclination of every class of people; therefore, individual interest must in some instances give way to the general good. I am sensible there are men among us who do not like the treaty, and perhaps it is the same case with you. This, my brethren, we may expect, in business of this kind, and it is evident the formers of this treaty must have had this full in view: for, you will observe, that, in order to compensate those individuals on your side, who might be incommoded for the public good, the President, therefore, ordered valuable presents to be made to your people, which hath been done; and he hath also bound himself and his country to pay your nation one thousand five hundred dollars every year, which also hath been done, and will be continued agreeably to treaty.

This is not all; your good friend the President, ever mindful of you, and having heard of the late confusion in your nation, and fearing that, in consequence thereof, you might have neglected your hunting, and not be able to get clothing, hath sent to me a quantity of valuable goods, which I shall distribute among you as soon as we shall have settled all our business, and you are ready to return home.

The delay in executing the business of the treaty, the President attributes to the imposition and falsehood which Bowles and his party have practised on you, and not to any disinclination in your nation to do what is just and right, agreeably thereto.

You must all see the necessity there is, that you and the white people should know what is each of your own. This cannot be done until the boundary line between you and Georgia being first ascertained, and marked agreeably to the treaty of New York. To accomplish this, you will order three old men to attend, and I shall call for the three old Georgians, who, with the surveyor appointed by the United States, will proceed on the business, attended by a part of the troops now here, who are to do the work of cutting down and marking the trees, so that this line may be seen and known as the boundary line between the whites and red people, when all of us who are now here, are under ground, and for ages after we are no more.

In accomplishing this business, I must recommend that a strict attention be paid on your parts, that no misunderstanding or disturbance take place between your and our people. I will give the most pointed orders to this effect, and I hope you will not fail to do the same.

The next object of the treaty to be attended to, is the immediate delivery of all the prisoners belonging to the United States, which are in any part of the Creek nation. An immediate and unequivocal compliance with this part of the treaty is expected, and a further delay will undoubtedly lessen you in the good opinion of the President, and all the good people of the United States. You will, therefore, give me an account of all the prisoners in your nation, and, at the same time, give orders that they be safely conveyed to this place, and delivered to me, or, in my absence, to the commanding officer of the federal troops. Suitable rewards for care and tenderness to prisoners, will be made to those who bring them in.

I am to inform you, that, as soon as the boundary line is ascertained, and the treaty complied with, measures will be taken for establishing proper Indian trading houses along your frontier and ours, where you will find plentiful supplies of goods at all seasons, and on reasonable terms, and a good market for what you may have to sell, all which will be registered in such way, as to prevent your being imposed on, which, as trade now stands, you are subject to.

When the line is run, should any white person be so impudent as to trespass on your lands, you may punish them, or not, as you please, without the President being offended. This the treaty of New York secures to you, as the line will then be known, there will be no excuse for offenders; and examples will be made of all who shall dare to transgress the law of the land, be they who they may.

From the whole of the proceedings, you will plainly discover how much your nation hath been imposed on by a set of villains, who have been persuading you that it was our intention to take a great part of your lands, even as far as the half-way house; but you now find that I ask nothing from you, but a compliance with the treaty made at New York, which hath been solemnly ratified by your nation and the United States.

The treaty has pointed out all matters so clear and distinct, that I cannot conceive that any difficulty can arise in carrying it into full and perfect effect. On the part of the President, all that the treaty stipulates hath been so far complied with; and the like good faith is now expected from your nation.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: I cannot suppose that any of you are at a loss to know how much it is for the interest of your nation, to be in close friendship with the President and the United States. You must know how much they have it in their power to befriend and assist you, beyond what any other nation or people on earth can. And I am fully empowered to assure you, that it is their wish so to do, and to live with you as friends and brothers to the end of time.

There are several of you now in this assembly, who have seen a part of the United States, (though by no means the most populous) from which you can form a judgment, and acquaint those of your friends who have not been there, how very dangerous it would be for any nation or people whatever to offend you, whilst the President of the United States is your warm friend and protector; and this will ever be the case, whilst you fulfil your engagements, and act uprightly towards him and his country. This line of conduct being observed by you, you will not have to fear from any quarter.

I shall not take up your time by detailing to you the strength and power which the United States possess; what you may be at a loss for on this head, your beloved man General McGillivray can fully inform you.

I am happy in informing you that presents will be made you from time to time, by the President, to every man in the Creek nation, who, by his decisive, active conduct, and actual service, proves himself a friend to the United States.

It is with pain that I am again under the necessity of bringing to your view, the very alarming and bad conduct of some of your people, in shedding the blood of the citizens of the United States on your western frontier. This, you must allow, is very extraordinary in a people under a solemn treaty of friendship with the nation whose people they are killing, a part of which you are now sitting with in friendship. Although the melancholy scene is distant from us, yet we feel for our brethren as we ought, and I now call on one and all of you now present, as you regard the peace and happiness of yourselves and your country, that you put an immediate stop to these unprovoked and horrid outrages of some of your bad people: for, let me tell you, my friends, unless your people are checked, and obliged to give satisfaction, that the consequences may be felt by your nation when too late for you to remedy. I must again desire that you use your influence to have all the prisoners sent to me.

There is one matter more which I have to recommend to you, and that is the practice your people have of coming into the white people's land and stealing their horses and cattle; this you know to be the case; and that several lives have been lost in consequence. Indeed, there is scarce a dispute arises but on this account. By the laws of our land it is made death for a white man to steal a horse; you must, therefore, suppose that our people will not suffer yours to commit a similar crime with impunity; it, therefore, behoves you, my friends, to put a final stop to this dangerous practice, which will redound much to your credit.

I shall now conclude my address of this day, hoping that what I have now said will be received favorably by you, and the rest of your nation; that you will think seriously upon it to night; and to-morrow I shall expect a talk from you in answer; by that time it is probable I may think of something further to acquaint you with.

ROCK LANDING, Friday, 18th May, 1792.

The following is a copy of a talk delivered by James Seagrove, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to the kings, chiefs, and warriors, at this place:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I have heard with pleasure your different talks in reply to mine delivered you yesterday. It gives me singular satisfaction to find that it is your determination to put an end to the confusion which, for some time, hath pervaded your land; that you will stop the further effusion of blood by your people, deliver up the prisoners in your land, and, by every means in your power, preserve peace and good understanding between the United States and your nation; and that, as soon as the internal affairs of your towns will admit, I may expect to meet you to carry the treaty, made at New York, into full effect; all those matters are so desirable, and I cannot doubt of your sincerity, that I shall take the earliest opportunity of making them known to your good friend the President of the United States.

BROTHERS: Since addressing you yesterday, I received a letter from your nation, confirming the accounts several of you gave me, of the very great confusion the people of your towns were in. I find that a general meeting of your nation is called, at which your presence will be necessary. I shall, therefore, not delay you longer than to-day, whilst the presents, which I have ordered for you, are getting ready.

Before we part, I must again urge the necessity of your utmost exertions in bringing about good order in your nation, and of preserving peace and good neighborhood between you and us.

On your return to your nation, I have not a doubt but you will represent matters in a just light; that you will inform your beloved man General McGillivray, and the people of your nation, that the President of the United States recognises the said General McGillivray as your great chief and director, and, as such, will aid and support him in all his just pursuits.

As soon as the time is fixed for your great meeting, you will send me notice, and, if agreeable to you, I will attend.

My place of residence, during the summer, I intend on the river St. Mary's, where runners from your nation will find me. I shall now dismiss you, and, after wishing you all safe home, remain your real friend and brother.

James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War.

ST. MARY'S, 14th June, 1792.

SIR:

Having received accounts at the Rock Landing that there were a great many hunting parties of Indians, in the settlements on the southwest frontier of this State, who were represented as being insolent to the inhabitants, and stealing their horses and cattle; dreading that bad consequences might ensue from this, I thought it would be advisable in me to investigate the business. I, therefore, set off from the Rock Landing, with an Indian and my interpreter, from thence, traversing through the woods along the banks of the Oconee and Altamaha to Beard's bluff, and from thence across to the river. In my route, of ten days, I fell in with several camps of hunting Indians, to all of whom I talked, and pointed out to them what I conceived right. I found the report of stealing horses and cattle but too just, which I did all in my power to remedy, by taking what I could find that had been stolen by the Indians, and restoring to the owners, forbidding the like in future, and advising the inhabitants not to use harsh measures on such occasions, lest they should involve their country in war. I am happy in saying that the inhabitants of this lower frontier behave with great moderation, although they are great sufferers by the daily plunders of the Indians. A stop must be put to this practice, or peace cannot be preserved.

I have, since being here, written to some of the leading chiefs of the lower towns, representing this mischief, requesting their exertions to put a stop thereto.

I think my fatiguing journey has, and will be attended with good consequences, as those parties of Indians, who were out hunting, were uninformed of what the chiefs had been doing with me at the Rock Landing; and, I think it is probable, I have prevented some of them being killed, as the settlers were getting out of all patience; but my interference hath quieted them.

Having arranged those matters as well I can for the present, I intend setting off for the Rock Landing to-morrow. By an express, I received the enclosed letter from General McGillivray, also the copy of one you will find herewith, which he wrote me. I hope that to you contains more satisfactory matter than the one to me.

By Mr. Durouzeaux's letter you will observe that the General is gone to New Orleans; a short time will unriddle his mysterious conduct. The story of the Spanish officer I do not put faith in; it can hardly be possible that the Spanish nation would interfere in such business, especially as we seem to be on good terms with them.

Since I have been here, I have, in conformity with your direction, communicated information to the Governor of St. Augustine, a copy of which you have herewith.

I do not agree with General McGillivray in opinion, that we are in danger of a war with the Creeks; I am persuaded that we are not, unless they are urged to it by those who ought not.

I shall make it my first business to ascertain the story of the Spanish officer, which you shall have without delay. Jack Kinnard is hourly expected here. I wish much to see him; but, as the chiefs, mentioned in Durouzeaux's letter, are by this at the Rock Landing, it will not do to delay. I have, however, given my brother instructions to obtain every information from him, and to forward it to me. Nothing further offering on this frontier, worthy of communication, I conclude, remaining yours.

[ENCLOSURES.]

Alexander McGillivray to James Seagrove.

UPPER CREEKS, Little Tallassee, 18th May, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I received your letter of the 1st instant. You have, no doubt, been expecting me some time: I had been waiting, this month past, to get our lower gentry into humor of attending to national matters, and to recover from the confusion they had been thrown into by the talks of the lying Captain. After he was secured by the Spaniards, I had some hopes of their soon forgetting him and his British fleets, when, to my surprise, some Indians, from Orleans, have given and spread reports that have made matters worse than ever; and a Spanish officer has actually arrived, and tells the Indians that he has orders to prevent them from running the line, or doing any other business with the Americans, and invites them to a meeting, in September next, at Pensacola. This last stroke is too much: the Indians, at least a good many, are as mad as ever, and Bowles' partisans are again getting loud about giving away land; it is no wonder the Indians are distracted, when they are tampered with on every side; and am myself in the situation of a keeper of Bedlam, and nearly fit for an inhabitant.

Finding that the Cussetah chiefs are still at home, Randall carries a talk, desiring them, in the most pressing language, to go directly and have the line run. But, since Bowles had given hopes of British aid, a majority of the towns would agree to cede no more than the east side of Oconee, and now they are told to give none at all; and I wish that more may not be insisted on at present, to avoid disputes and its horrid consequences—a diabolical war, and in which they will be supported, and in which I will not have any hand.

I am hastening to go and get an explanation from the proper persons, and their reasons for their interference. As yet, I cannot guess at their motives; you are no stranger to their dispositions.

As I presume that you communicate with none but the honorable Secretary of War, it is almost unnecessary for me to express a wish, that no paragraph, from this letter, be copied for a newspaper.

The Indians will report these Spanish talks of themselves. Please forward, as soon as convenient, the enclosed, by a safe hand. The good people of Augusta do not scruple to intercept and break open letters to and from General Knox. One from him to me was treated so last year, of which I never complained to him.

I am, dear sir, yours, &c.

James Durouzeaux to James Seagrove.

COWETAS, 28th May, 1792.

SIR:

I am desired by the honorable king of this, and the Cussetah king, to acquaint you, that the two men you mentioned in your last, being killed by the Cowetas, is not so. It was done by the Cherokees—one as satisfaction for the man that was said to be killed with John Galphin, which, by sending to the Cherokees, you can be satisfied in, with their reasons for doing it. But I must acquaint you, that the Mad Dog of the Cowetas was gone out to take satisfaction for the man killed last May, before your letter arrived. I immediately sent a runner after him, (not knowing that the murder had been committed by the Cherokees) to bring back, that satisfaction was taken, and that letters were come to me in consequence of it. Since that, I have not heard if he proceeded or not, nor the runner is not returned yet. I am also to acquaint you, that the head-men of Coweta and Cussetah, have been waiting for General McGillivray coming down, to accompany them to the Rock Landing, to take you by the hand and hear your talks, and tell you theirs, and endeavor to settle all matters for the satisfaction of both parties, that we might hereafter live in peace and friendship with each other. But now, finding that he is not coming, but is gone to New Orleans, and sent to them to come down themselves with me, they are now determined to come down and see you; they would have been down long ago, but they have been confused in separate parties, by that Bowles, who had made himself a number of friends, bought with Mr. Panton's property; that they are at a loss to determine on any thing, by reason of the villains of Bowles' party. And a Spanish agent has lately arrived here from New Orleans; he is to have a meeting in the Lower towns in a few days, after which, we are to set out for the Rock Landing. In answer to your last, they have sent this to acquaint you, and let you know, that they have not, nor did not, throw away your talks; but, that the distraction that these lower towns have been in for some time past, has prevented them until now. Their crops, as well as other matters, has been the reason of our not coming sooner.

Doubtless, but General McGillivray has acquainted you with reasons of not accompanying the Indians at this treaty. The chiefs of the Cowetas and Cussetahs, are now determined, at last, to come down and take you by the hand, and smoke a pipe of tobacco in friendship, and talk over matters, if not agree in every point. For, without talking to each other, matters never will be settled. If any thing should unawaredly happen, they hope it will not prevent our treaty.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

P. S. It is supposed, some young fellows may steal horses; if they should, and be brought in these towns, they are determined to take them and bring them down with us.

James Durouzeaux to James Seagrove.

COWETAS, 2d June, 1792.

SIR:

I received yours of 23d May with the talk, but not having time to call a meeting, I have not explained it yet, and the Cussetah king and Hallowing king of the Cowetas being determined to come down and see you, before you left the place, I have sent my son with this, that you may be acquainted with our coming. He had set out with the letters, two days, but meeting the Bird Tail king, returned to know if they were still determined to come down or not. But they are not altered from what I mentioned in my last. We shall be out in about four or five days from this, but we shall travel slow, as the weather is very hot at present.

The Mad Dog that I mentioned, who was gone out to take satisfaction for his son that was killed last May was twelve month, is not returned, but proceeded on. He told the runner, that was sent on after him, that, what the Cherokees did, was nothing to him; that, if they had done wrong, they must answer for themselves; that he had gone out, and would not return, until he had taken satisfaction for his son. The chiefs of these towns beg you will send to the Cherokees and be acquainted with the truth of the matter.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

James Seagrove to the Governor of East Florida.

ST. MARY'S, IN GEORGIA, 13th June, 1792.

SIR:

I have it in command, from the President of the United States, that, on every occasion that may occur, to evince the most cordial attention to the Spanish Government and interests on the Southern frontiers of the United States, and that, should any discovery be made by me, that might appear injurious to the interests or peace of the Spanish nation, that I should, without loss of time, communicate the same to the nearest Spanish officer.

The intention of this, is to assure your Excellency, that the most implicit obedience shall be paid by me to this command, and that, on all occasions, I shall be watchful, and give early notice of any thing which may occur within the sphere of my department.

I arrived at this place, on the 8th instant, from the Rock Landing, on the river Oconee, where I held a conference with about two hundred chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation. During my communication with them, I have not discovered any inimical design in that nation, either against Spain or the United States.

I find that Bowles hath occasioned great feuds among those unfortunate people, and that his designs were eventually hostile. But, as he is now removed, (I hope never to return) I hope the nation will soon be restored to a state of tranquillity.

There are, however, several of Bowles' white associates still in the nation, endeavoring to mislead the Indians. Some of these white wretches have lately advised the savages to commit depredations on your government.

Although it may be the general wish of the Creek nation, to be in peace with you, yet there are dissolute characters among them, who listen to such advice. I, therefore, think it my duty to mention this to your Excellency, that you may be on your guard.

The principal agent of Bowles that is now in the nation, is a man of the name of Willbanks.

I shall set off from hence for the Rock Landing, on the 18th instant; should any thing of moment come to my knowledge whilst there, that is interesting to the Spanish Government, your Excellency shall know it by express. In the mean time, I shall be happy in a line from you, before my departure, with an account of Mr. Bowles's present situation and prospects, together with any other information you may see fit. My best respects await your amiable family and self. Wishing you and them all possible happiness in life,

I have the honor to be, &c.

Translation of Governor Quesada's letter to James Seagrove, in answer to the preceding.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 14th, 1792.

SIR:

I received, with the highest esteem, your letter of the 10th instant, in which you were pleased to insert the President of the United States' commands to you, to furnish me with every communication that may be important to the interests or peace of the Spanish nation. To which liberal mode of acting I shall endeavor, in conformity to the precepts of my court and my own wishes, to correspond, as far as my faculties will reach.

I am clear, that, since the late war, various white men, of desperate fortunes, remained in, or continue going to, and coming from, the Indian nation, who, without a real attachment to, or perhaps being authorized by, any Power, have dedicated themselves (and continue to do so for their own private views, or for pure mischief's sake,) to work up the savages against Spaniards and Americans. It is very probable that Bowles aimed at something more, but he certainly assumed the character of principal in his projects. I have always considered him to be a mere tool of other persons. All I know at present of this adventurer is, that he was sent a prisoner from Apalacha to New Orleans, from thence to the Havana, and from that lately to Spain.

My family and I esteem, and return you, your attentive expressions. God preserve you many years. Your hands are kissed by

Your humble servant.

James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War.

ROCK LANDING, on Oconee, 5th July, 1792.

SIR:

Since I had the honor of addressing you from St. Mary's, on the 14th ult. I returned to this place, where I found upwards of two hundred Creek Indians waiting for me. Those people came without invitation, and altogether unexpected.

From the communications we have had together, I find the design of the chiefs who came, and the intention of those friendly chiefs whom they left behind, was to consult with me on a plan of bringing to a meeting the disaffected leaders. This they think can be effected, but not at this place, as many of them have insuperable objections to this frontier, and think we have a design on them, by asking them to a place they so much dislike. Those who are now with us, are empowered by their countrymen to request that I will meet them at the head of the river St. Mary's, as soon as the weather gets a little cool. To which place, they engage they can bring all the disaffected chiefs, and have all matters happily settled.

I have given them a conditional promise, that, if agreeable to the President of the United States, I will meet them at the head of the St. Mary's, on the first day of November next, at which time and place they think every thing can be settled to our wish. They say it is impossible for any business being done in the nation, in the present state of confusion. Those who had been with me and received my talk, have behaved remarkably well since their return home. They are now working on the disaffected, and have already changed several.

I have stipulated with those now here, that I should be allowed to meet them at St. Mary's, that not more than two or three chiefs be sent from each town, and not any of their common people; as it is very expensive maintaining so many as they usually bring; besides, they retard business. I have used every argument with those Indians now here, to preserve peace with us; and they assure me they will do all in their power to that effect. I am happy to find from them, that there does not appear a wish in the Lower towns to be at variance with the United States. I am persuaded I shall be able to keep them quiet, by talking to them, and giving them presents occasionally; and, in my opinion, the most powerful arguments, delivered by the first orator on earth, would prove ineffectual without them: for, as I have mentioned to you in former letters, of their being accustomed thereto by the British and Spanish Governments, that ours will not be a favorite with them unless something is done for them in the same way; especially at this juncture, when every manœuvre is practising on them by the latter of those nations, to give them an unfavorable opinion of the United States, and prevent them complying with their engagements.

In my last I promised to inform you respecting the Spanish officer mentioned by General McGillivray. The result of my discoveries on this head, as well as some other matters, I have made known to the President of the United States, by this opportunity. My reason for troubling the President, in the first instance, with this information, is, that it will reach him sooner than you, as I find he is now at Mount Vernon.

Should the President approve of my meeting the Indians at St. Mary's, or not, I request you will give me as early advice thereof as possible, that I may take measures in consequence of whatever may be determined on.

If the place of meeting, and doing business, with the Indians, should be fixed at St. Mary's, I wish to have your orders for removing the goods under my directions, from hence to that place, which may be done by boating them down the Oconee, or by sending them by land to Savannah, and from thence by water. The latter conveyance will be much the safest, but most expensive.

I cannot find, from the Indians now with me, that they have a single word of recommendation from General McGillivray, as to carrying the treaty into effect, or any other desirable object. He is gone to New Orleans, and it is altogether uncertain when he will return.

I know not how far it may meet the President's and your approbation, but I judged it would be bad policy to send those Indians, that are now with me, away, without making them some presents. I find what I gave the others had a happy effect in the nation. A few thousand dollars applied in this way may save a much greater, and more disagreeable expense. I shall put them off with as little as possibly I can; their consumption of provisions is very great, but unavoidable at such times. I intend sending them off to-morrow.

The great drought which hath been all this summer in the Creek nation, and also the upper part of this country, makes a famine much dreaded. I find I shall be obliged to give those Indians corn to carry home with them, to prevent their families from starving. From what I can find, unless assistance is given by the United States in this way, many of the unfortunate people of the Creek nation must perish, as their crops of corn are nearly destroyed by the drought. Permit me to suggest, whether it would not be policy, as well as great humanity, in our Government, to send a supply of corn from the Northward, to the St. Mary's, to be given to them. It cannot be had in Georgia, at any price. Should a change of affairs make it necessary to assemble a force on this frontier, (at this time) they must be fed from some other country than Georgia.

There is an absolute necessity that the form of a licence should be provided for traders from the United States to the Creek nation; and also passes for any person going there. You will observe, the Indians complain of the run of people from our country. Peace and good order never can be kept until a restraint or stop is put to this practice.

The present mode of giving passes never will answer: for, whilst so many persons have the power of granting them, and who do not give themselves the trouble to examine who are proper objects, all good intention is frustrated. In my opinion, this ought to be vested in one person, and he be furnished with proper printed, or engraved, forms of licence and passes for him to fill up. I think an engraving, with some emblematical figures, such as would be conspicuous to the Indians, and not easily counterfeited, would be best. If they could be done so as to give the Indians a check part, for them to keep, one in each of their town-houses, it would assist very much.

I wish, as soon as you have leisure, you would form something of the kind; or, if you approve, and give me directions, I will have it done.

No application hath yet been made to me for provisions or any thing else, for the Indians going out to the Westward. I do not find that General McGillivray has ever hinted it to any of his nation, so that you need not expect any from the Creeks this year.

Enclosed you have the heads of a talk which I delivered to the Indians now here, (two hundred and thirty-one in number) also, the minutes taken of their talk to me. I now send you the Indians' answer to my talk of the 5th of May, which, in hurry, was omitted.

Finding that I do not get my health at this place, (I now write with a hot fever on me) as soon as I can arrange all matters here, I shall remove to St. Mary's, where I shall remain until further orders or business may require.

I am, &c.

James Seagrove to the President of the United States.

ROCK LANDING, on the River Oconee, in Georgia, }
July 5th, 1792. }

SIR:

The information which I am about to give, appearing to me of importance to the United States, I hope will plead my excuse for thus intruding on your moments of retirement.

In my despatch of the 14th ultimo, to the Secretary of War, I promised to procure what information I could, respecting a Spanish officer, which General McGillivray mentions in his letter to me of the 18th of May, a copy of which you have herewith.

I find on inquiry of the Indian chiefs now with me, that this Spanish officer is the same person that I have mentioned in my former letters, as a Spanish resident or agent, who had arrived from New Orleans, and lived in a house of General McGillivray's, at Little Tallessee.

It remains no longer a doubt who this person is, and his business in the Creek nation. His name is Olivar, a Frenchman born, a Captain in the Spanish army, wears the uniform of the regiment of Louisiana, sent by the immediate order of the de Baron Carondelet, Governor of New Orleans, as an agent (or perhaps something more) to conduct affairs in the Creek nation.

It would appear by the style of General McGillivray's letter to me, that this Spanish agent had just arrived, and that he was a stranger to him or his business; this was not the case, for it is well known, and I can produce unquestionable proofs, that he had then been several months at Mr. McGillivray's own house, at little Tallessee. The general also took much pains in sending for a number of the chiefs, and introduced this Spaniard to them as their great friend; who was come to live among them, and to do great things for them. It can also be proven, that he was riding about the country with this Spaniard at the time when he had engaged to be with me.

I have not a doubt but the arrival of this Spanish agent, was in consequence of preconcerted plans between McGillivray and the Spaniards, on his visit last winter to their possessions, and that Captain Olivar is to be his successor in the Creek land; for you must know the general is again gone, with nearly the whole of his property, into New Orleans, and I doubt whether he returns. Certain it is, that he had engaged to attend the Spanish treaty with the Indians, at Pensacola, in September next.

As soon as Mr. McGillivray quit the nation, Captain Olivar threw off all mask, by calling meetings in the towns, directing what the Indians should, and should not do; he, in the most public and positive manner, forbids them parting with a foot of land to the United States; and forbids their running their boundary line between them and Georgia; and positively tells the Indians not to have any thing to do with the Americans. It is said by several persons (but I cannot vouch for the truth of it) that he has gone so far in the Upper towns, as to advise the Indians turning out against our people on the Western waters. I think this not improbable; for, about ten days past, he had the impudence to come into the Lower towns and give out public talks, and advised the Indians not to come near me, and on no account to run the line. This I have from persons who were present and heard him. I am happy in being able to inform you that he met but a very cool reception in the Lower towns. The Indians who have been with me were returned home, and influenced their people so much in our favor, that he found it convenient to make a speedy retreat to Little Tallassee.

A brother-in-law of General McGillivray is now here, (a white man) of the name Charles Weatherford, who confirms what I have related of this Spanish agent; and further says, that he has, at McGillivray's house, a quantity of goods, which he distributes among the Indians. That he draws orders on Government in favor of all the Indians going to Orleans, where they receive goods and ammunition, which they bring up in boats, and that they have a constant intercourse in this way. That this agent is busy in engaging the Indians to attend the treaty at Pensacola. That it was talked of in the nation, that one object of the Spanish treaty would be, to obtain leave to erect forts and establish garrisons on the Creek lands.

Those matters seem of such moment, come so direct, and I believe unquestionably true, that I have lost no time in giving you notice thereof.

I cannot account for this interference of the Spaniards. I sometimes think that Captain Olivar cannot be supported by his Government in such doings, and that he is exceeding his instructions.

By the Secretary of War's letter to me of the 29th of April, it would appear that a good understanding existed between the United States and Spain.

In consequence of the Secretary's directions, in the despatch alluded to above, I wrote a line to the Governor of St. Augustine, in order to feel his pulse on the occasion, as well as to know from him, what they had done with Mr. Bowles; a copy of our correspondence you have herewith.

My communication to the Secretary of War of the 24th of May, together with my letter to General McGillivray, of the 21st of the same month, and talks to the Indians, I must pray your perusal of.

I find that the Spanish agent is on very friendly terms with Mr. Bowles's successor in the nation, a man of the name of Willbanks.

I cannot help expressing my fears to you, that the Spaniards are playing a double game with us, on the score of Mr. Bowles. My opinion is, that they will make him useful to their views; their very kind treatment of him since he has been among them, cannot fail to create strong suspicions in the breast of any one as well acquainted as I am with Spanish want of lenity to actual prisoners, especially those who have offended against their Government.

Mr. Bowles hath not been confined by them, and it is a doubt with me but what appeared a capture of him to us, was, in fact, a concerted plan with him. He is sent to Spain, but not in confinement. Why send him there? Surely the Governor of New Orleans, or the Captain General at the Havana, are possessed of powers equal to punishing or acquitting a man of Bowles' character.

I fear there is some dark and dangerous business in contemplation among those people. I fear General McGillivray is not faithful to the United States; and I have my suspicions, that, if any mischief is a brewing, he is deeply engaged in it. I never expect he will come forward as an active character in the field; he wants spirit, and this is the reason for placing Olivar in his stead, and of his withdrawing to the Spaniards as an asylum. Olivar is represented to me as a man of good address, who speaks the French, Spanish, and English languages equally well.

I think the reason of McGillivray's not meeting me, and his not forwarding the business of the treaty of New York, as well as his evasive conduct to all the pressing arguments made use of to him by the Secretary of War and myself, arose from preconcerted plans with his Spanish and English friends, and not from any real opposition the Indians made thereto.

Agreeably to my instructions, I have labored very hard to replace this ungrateful man in the confidence of his countrymen, which he has lost from his duplicity and want of resolution. I fear I shall be censured by the Indians, who are our friends, for my zeal in his behalf. I assure you that nine out of ten of them now despise him, and seldom mention his name but with disrespect.

I conceive it my duty to have Major Call, the commander of the Federal troops, and Mr. Ellicott, the surveyor, present at my communications with the Indians, in order that they might witness the situation of matters, and act accordingly.

It is truly disagreeable to me, but duty impells me to mention to you, that this once valuable officer hath resigned himself to so continual a state of intoxication with strong liquors, as to render him totally incapable of acting, or even judging, of what is proper in the line of his duty. I have already hinted this to the Secretary of War, and referred him to the officers that went from this, for further information.

Notwithstanding the untoward state the Creek nation is represented to be in by General McGillivray, I think I can venture to assure you, that I can keep them from breaking with us, if not restore them to order, and get all matters settled with them. I hope you will see the necessity of my having it in my power to supply them occasionally.

You are too well acquainted with the nature of Indians, for me to say more to you on this head, as well as the precarious situation of those people at present.

In the execution of these or any other matters you are pleased to commit to my care, I can only say, that fidelity and industry in me shall not be wanting.

I have left open my despatches to the Secretary of War for your perusal. Should any thing further offer of consequence, I shall forward it by express.

I have the honor, &c.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, in Georgia, July 27, 1792.

SIR:

I herewith send you a copy of what I had the honor of communicating to you on the 5th instant, which I sent by express to Savannah, to be forwarded from thence by Mr. Habersham, the collector; since that date, I am not so happy as to receive a line from any of the public departments, and, as the cloud in this Southern country seems to thicken, with matter interesting to you and the Union, I must again trouble you with what information I have been able to collect since the above period.

In the first place, you will find enclosed the copy of a letter which I wrote Governor Telfair, of Georgia, and also the declaration of Charles Weatherford, against a Colonel Samuel Alexander, of the militia of Greene county, in this State, which will, in some degree, convey to you the licentious, ungovernable spirit of the people on this frontier, and on how precarious a tenure we hold peace with the Indians. The refractory conduct of the frontier inhabitants of the upper part of this State is so notorious, and so apparently determined to bring on a war with the Indians, that all endeavors to preserve peace seems in vain.

My motives for sending Governor Telfair the deposition against Alexander, and writing him, as you will please observe, was, that he should not plead ignorance at a future day of the conduct of his citizens, and at the same time to see what measures he would take to check such doings.

Was it necessary, or would it answer any purpose, I could have many, very many of such testimonies taken. Scarcely a day passes, but I have fresh instances of those frontier banditti's opposition to pacific measures, and of their flying in the face of the General Government. To such lengths have matters got among them, that they now consider the troops and servants of the United States, who are placed among them, nearly as great enemies as they do the Indians, and for no other reason than that they recommend moderation, and a compliance with the laws of the land.

It is truly distressing, that a few such vile characters should bring an odium on the State of Georgia; for they are few, comparatively speaking, to the good people in the State, who are as forward as any in the Union to support federal measures. But the misfortune is, that there is sufficient of those bad to involve the whole in great distress, which will be the case, should there be an Indian war.

Since my last to you, which was pretty full on the subject of Spanish and Indian matters, I have received many pieces of information, all tending to confirm me in the opinion, that the Spaniards are acting as much to the injury of the United States as they possibly can, and that General McGillivray hath verified my predictions of him.

From every information which I can collect from white people and Indians, there does not remain a doubt with me, but that the Spaniards will, if they possibly can, involve the United States in a war with the four Southern nations of Indians; every exertion is making by the Spaniards, and undue measures taking with the savages to stir them up against us.

The enclosed testimony on oath, of James Leonard, who appears to be a man of information, and respectable decent manners, will explain and open to you new matter of perfidy in Spain, as well as base conduct in General McGillivray. Mr. Leonard is a stranger to me, and in this country. His appearance is much in his favor—he is a modest man, of few words, and seems actuated in this information by no other motive but to serve the United States. He is a citizen of Massachusetts, and lived at Beverly.

Mr. Leonard's testimony being corroborated to me by a variety of accounts and circumstances within my own knowledge, I am the more readily led to place confidence in it. He is now with me, and I have taken much pains in cross-examining and sounding him on this information, but cannot find him defective or any room for suspicion as to his veracity.

That General McGillivray has all along been acting a traitor's part by the United States, I have long suspected and hinted to you. To him, alone, are the United States to charge all the delays, and confusions, and irregularities, which have taken place between them and the Creek nation. He it is, who hath impeded and prevented business being done with them. It is to him that Bowles owes his consequence: for certain it is, that he was weak and wicked enough to believe (for several months after Bowles's arrival in the nation) that he came under authority from the British Government, and, therefore, understandingly favored him. Bowles had address enough to impose this belief on McGillivray's director, Mr. Panton, and they carried on the deception, with a view, in the end, to injure Spain, as well as this country, and to re-establish the English with the Creeks. This I have from one of McGillivray's own family, who was let into the secret.

McGillivray is now gone, and I hope, most sincerely, never will return to the nation: for, so long as he has any thing to say in their councils, the United States never will succeed with the Indians. He is an enemy, in his heart, to our country and its measures; and is now so totally under the influence and direction of Spain and Panton, that he cannot, or dare not, serve the United States, if he was so inclined. Upon the whole, I think it fortunate that he has thrown off the mask, and taken himself out of the nation. His name will soon be despised by the Indians, provided the agents of America are allowed to speak freely to them. I can with confidence and truth say, that had not McGillivray been in the way, I should, ere this, have had all matters agreeably situated between the United States and the Creeks. He has been a heavy clog on my endeavors: for, instead of opposing him in his perfidious acts, I was using every argument to reinstate him with his country, who had penetration to see that he was acting a double part, and therefore they despised him. I view and consider him as of very little consequence to the United States; there are men in the Creek nation who may be made much more useful, and of greater influence than ever he was.

Should it be found that the Spaniards are acting as has been represented, and that you see fit to combat them in their own way, that is, make use of the Indians, I will engage to turn the tables completely on them: for you may rely, that the Indians are disposed to be our friends, notwithstanding the underhand, unwarrantable doings of McGillivray and the Spaniards. The Spaniards, it is well known, they dislike, and would sooner join any nation than them. So that, if I am allowed to speak plainly to the leading characters, and have it in my power to make them presents, I think I can not only prevent them acting against us, but secure them to act as circumstances may require. I have already taken measures to have two or three trusty fellows at the treaty at Pensacola, from whom I shall hear what is done there. To-morrow I shall set off for the head of St. Mary's, where I expect to meet Knard, the principal active man in the Lower towns, with some other chiefs, to give them their lesson before they go to Pensacola. Allow me to mention the naked, defenceless state of the Southwestern frontier—not more than fifteen men there, and those without even a sergeant to direct them. I have applied to Major Call, to send one of the companies, now here, to go to the head of St. Mary's, but he does not find himself at liberty. In my opinion, a respectable force on that frontier is necessary at this time.

Enclosed, I send you an anonymous letter, which came enclosed to me from the Creek nation—it is directed to the printer in Savannah. The writer of it I do not know, but it contains the received opinion and belief of all the white people in the nation; and many matters stated in it are absolutely true.

The situation of affairs in this quarter seems so very interesting, that I do not think it prudent to delay giving you information; and as the conveyances to me are uncertain, and the danger of despatches falling into improper hands, I have sent the bearer, James Jordan, a very trusty young man, who lives with me, and to whom you may commit the care of any commands you may have to me. He has orders to wait your time for that purpose. I have sent, also, a letter I received from Timothy Barnard; it may afford you some information, as Barnard is a man to be depended on. I have left my letter to the Secretary of War open for your perusal.

I shall continue my endeavors to discover what is going forward in the nation, as well as among the Spaniards, and convey you notice. In hope of soon hearing from you with further power and instructions,

I remain, your most obedient, most devoted,
And very humble servant,

J. S. SEAGROVE.

The President of the United States.

James Seagrove to the Governor of Georgia.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, in Georgia, July 18th, 1792.

SIR:

I did myself the honor of writing you yesterday, and enclosed you the British minister's disavowal, on the part of his court, of Mr. Bowles or his projects.

I now send, for your private inspection, the declaration, on oath, of Charles Weatherford, relative to the conduct of a Colonel Samuel Alexander, who lives in Greene county, in this State.

From what I can understand, this Colonel Alexander came to this place with intentions to create fears in the minds of the Indians, and others, so as to put a stop to any attempts to ascertain the boundary line. There being at that time, (5th instant) near three hundred Indians with me on business, it is supposed the good people in the upper part of this State were alarmed, lest the line should be run, or any thing done to keep them in peace; for it appears by Mr. Alexander's declaration, that there are many there of his sentiments.

Colonel Alexander came to the fort at this place, on the 5th instant, and desired to see me. I being then at dinner with the Indian chiefs, I thought he would not be an agreeable visitor to those people, whose relations and friends he had murdered in cool blood, and who was the principal cause (as your Excellency well knows) of involving the country in a long, bloody, and expensive war with the Creek Indians; from these motives, as well as my own dislike to all such men and their measures, I did not think it fit or right to see him; but sent him word by the sergeant on duty, that, if he had any business with me, it must be made known by writing.

Upon this, Mr. Alexander went about this place, expressing himself to almost every person he talked with, much in the same style as he did to Weatherford.

I need not point out to your Excellency the bad consequences of such declarations being known by the Indians; and doubtless pains are taken, by such men as Alexander, that they shall be known.

If such men are allowed thus to act with impunity, it is in vain that governments go to heavy expenses and much trouble, in order to preserve peace with the Indian tribes, when such men are determined it shall not be. And unfortunately, those pests to government and society, have it in their power (any day) to involve us in a diabolical war, to answer their own wicked purposes. This, I fear, will be the case ere long. Sorry am I to say that the temper and conduct of many of the settlers in the upper parts of this State, strongly justify this opinion. I fear that your Excellency's as well as the General Government's wise and humane measures, to keep this country in peace with the savages, will prove ineffectual, unless a check can be given to the licentious spirit of some, who call themselves citizens of Georgia.

The principal business of those Indians who have lately been with me, was to consult on measures for reclaiming the disaffected chiefs that are in the nation, to our Government; to fix on a time and place when the chiefs should meet me to arrange all matters; and to request that they should not be asked to meet on this frontier, giving as reason for this, that many of their chiefs disliked this frontier and its inhabitants, and that they had reason to think it was the same on the part of the white people; that they always found them cross to Indians, and charged them with stealing horses, &c. when they did it themselves, and sold them to the red people. They, therefore, thought there was danger in being here, and requested I would meet them to the southward, so soon as the weather grows a little cool. I gave them a conditional promise that I would meet them on the first of November, at the head of St. Mary's, provided the President of the United States approved.

I am happy in informing your Excellency, that those chiefs lately here, renewed and confirmed the assurances given me by those who were with me in May last, of their determination to do all in their power to preserve peace with this country; to collect and bring in to me, (for the owners) all property stolen since the treaty of New York. To prevent their people from stealing from the whites; to take up all white persons coming into the nation without passports agreeable to law, with any kind of property, and bring the whole to me. This last step, I hope, will give a check to the shameful practice now in great vogue among our white villains, of stealing horses, cattle, and negroes; carrying them into the Indian nation, and there exchanging or selling them. This is no speculative opinion; I know it to be an absolute fact.

I had four horses taken from me at this place by a man of the name of Harvey, a captain of militia, who went to an Indian (then in this camp) and offered to exchange on the south side of this river, my four large horses for four Indian jackies. The Indian informed me of this, and pointed out Harvey, who was taken up and confined in the guard house some days. The dread of his being punished, it is supposed, induced his accomplices to turn the horses loose, so as they were found, but much abused. This I have taken the liberty of mentioning, as one instance, amongst many, which have come to my knowledge.

From every appearance at present, I think the people of Georgia have no cause to be alarmed that the Creek Indians will disturb them this summer, at least.

I shall use every exertion in my power to keep them on good terms with us, and, if my labors are not counteracted by bad white people in this country, I have not a doubt of preserving peace.

The Indians who were lately here, behaved remarkably well, and went home, to all appearance, perfectly satisfied, and with dispositions to serve us.

I hope your Excellency will excuse the freedom I have taken, in thus communicating. I should not have given you this trouble, but that I believed it right that you should be acquainted with the dispositions of some of the people of this upper country.

I have the honor, &c.

That, on the 6th day of this instant, this deponent fell in company with Colonel Samuel Alexander, of Greene county, who made inquiry when the boundary line between the Creeks and the State of Georgia was to be run, and how it was to be run? Upon which, this deponent answered, that he knew nothing about the business. Said Alexander then made answer, "We are determined it shall not be run, unless the first articles of the treaty shall be complied with beforehand, as he had no idea of beginning at the tail of the business; that they (meaning the people of the upper counties of Georgia) could, in seven days, raise one thousand men, who would, by force, prevent its being run, and break up the whole business." He continued to denounce threats against all who should attempt to run the said line, unless agreeable to the wish of himself and friends, as described above.

This deponent intimated, that this conduct would be opposing the United States, as well as the Indians. His reply was, "he did not care, he and his friends were determined it should be so." Alexander also desired this deponent to acquaint the Indian agent with what he had told him, and said, "that this was the business which brought him to this place; but as he could not have a personal interview with said agent, he wished his and his friends' determination should be known."

CHAS. WEATHERFORD.

State of Georgia, } ss.

Personally appeared before me, the above mentioned Charles Weatherford, who, being duly sworn, declares the whole of the preceding testimony to be just and true.

JNO. M'KINZIE, J. P.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, 10th July, 1792

I do certify the whole of the preceding to be exact copies from the original in my possession.

JAS. SEAGROVE, Agent of Indian Affairs.

The following information delivered on oath, by James Leonard, a citizen of the United States, to James Seagrove, Agent of Indian Affairs, Southern Department.—Rock Landing, on the Oconee, in Georgia, 24th July, 1792.

That this deponent, James Leonard, came to the province of Louisiana, March third, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, on mercantile business, by way of fort Pitt, and down the Ohio to the Mississippi, and to New Orleans; that he lived in said city of New Orleans about seven months, during which time, he had an opportunity of conversing with the Governor, and almost all other ranks of people in that city; that he could discover that the French and English people who are settled in that province, are, to a man, ripe for revolt against the Spanish Government, and daily wished for the Americans to come and relieve them from the oppressive government which they were under.

That, in September of the same year, he got permission from Governor Miro to remain in either East or West Florida for six months longer, to transact his business, during which time, this deponent removed from Orleans to the river Tensa, a Spanish settlement and post, distant from the town of Mobile about fifty miles, where he remained until June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, in which month, all persons residing in that country, who had not taken the oath of fidelity to Spain, were called on to do it, and they were sworn, amongst other things, to fight for the King of Spain when called on, from the sea to the head waters of the Alabama. That the deponent refused to take the said oath, upon which he was ordered out of the country in three days, stripped of all the property he had there, even to his horse, saddle, and bridle, which hath obliged him to travel from Tensa on foot to this frontier, which is computed about four hundred miles. That Governor O'Neal, of Pensacola, had issued orders that this deponent should not be permitted to go to the United States, but that he should be sent to the West Indies. At the same time, orders were given to all the commandants on that coast, and to Don Pedro Oliver, commandant of the Creek nation, not to let any person pass to the United States, but such as were in fidelity with Spain, and who could make it appear they were going for the purpose of getting property due them in the United States. That orders were given by Governor O'Neal to the said commandant in the Creek nation, (which orders this deponent heard publicly read, at the Spanish post on Tensa) that, should any person attempt to go through the said Indian nation, contrary to orders, he should send the Indians after them, and if found, to strip and kill them.

That, when this deponent came to the Creek nation, about the 20th ultimo, on his way to this place, he found that Captain Oliver had, by talks, been preparing the Indians to meet at Pensacola in August next, to treat with the Governor General from New Orleans. That he heard the Spanish commandant (Deyveral) of Tensa, speak of three things to be demanded of the Indians at the ensuing treaty, viz. "That the Spaniards shall have leave to repair the old French fort in the fork between the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers, and to place a garrison of Spanish troops there; that the whole trade of the Creek nation must be carried on by the Spaniards; that, in order to do this, and all manner of public business among the Indians, three Spanish agents shall reside in the nation, of which three, General McGillivray shall be one, and in chief."

That, some time in the month of May last, Mr. Panton, of Pensacola, a partner in the house of Panton, Leslie and Co. went from the Creek nation, with General McGillivray in company, to the Cherokee nation. This information this deponent had from the said General when he saw him at Tensa. What Panton and McGillivray's talks were to the Cherokees, this deponent only knows by information from a half-breed of that nation, which was, "that the said house of Panton and Co. at Pensacola, would lower the price of goods to them; and that the Spanish Government would give them very great presents if they would come to Pensacola; on which invitation, he has reason to believe, several will go, as this deponent met (on his way here) four half-breeds of that country, and two white traders going to Pensacola, with about forty pack-horses, which seemed all well loaded."

That, on Panton and McGillivray's return to the Creek nation, from the Cherokees, McGillivray took his leave of Don Pedro Oliver, the Spanish commandant in the nation, who he left in full possession of his house at Little Tallassee, and committed the care of his fruit trees to said commandant; the said General not having any other property there. McGillivray then proceeded to Tensa, where this deponent met him; thence, to Mobile, where he took passage in the King's schooner for New Orleans. That this deponent understood that General McGillivray was positively to attend the treaty at Pensacola, with the Governor of Orleans.

That this deponent left Tensa the tenth of last month, or thereabouts; that, after McGillivray left the nation, Panton staid there until some time in the beginning of the present month, and returned to Pensacola by the way of St. Marks. Panton's talks in the nation were to the following purpose, viz. That he had orders from the Spanish Government to tell them that they must not, on any account, run the boundary line between them and Georgia; and not to have any trade or connexion with the Americans. That the Spanish Government would protect them and their lands, against any encroachments of the Americans; that the King of Spain had sent a great many soldiers into West Florida, for that purpose; and that, also, there was at Pensacola for them, arms and ammunition, with other presents, if they would only go and accept of them. That Panton and Oliver told the Indians that the Americans were poor, and could not give them any Indian goods, such as axes, blankets, hoes, strouds, &c.; that none of these things were made in that country; that the Americans were forced to get those goods from England for their own use. Panton further told them, that they must rob any of the American traders who might come among them, or that they should meet; giving the Indians to understand, that the Spanish subjects only were allowed to trade with them.

That a party of Shawanese Indians, who were of the hostile tribes to the northward, had come down to Orleans, and were sent from thence to Pensacola, where they were received by Governor O'Neal, who gave them presents, and sent them into the Creek nation with the Spanish King's interpreter. Those Indians declared they would be at war with the American States, as long as any of them should live; that this declaration, alone, seemed to make them acceptable to the Spaniards. They are now in what is called the Savannah's town, who are a part of the Shawanese that settled with the Creeks some years past.

That this deponent had frequent opportunities of conversing with General McGillivray, from some time in November to the 25th January last; that he often heard said McGillivray regret, that he, the said McGillivray, ever had formed any connexion with the United States, and has actually forbid this deponent, and many others, giving him the title of General; and that, whenever he went to any of the Spanish places, he forbid his being called General, conceiving it an injury to him with the Spaniards. That, some time in January last, the said McGillivray had all his negroes, and other property, taken from the Creek nation to the mouth of Little river, within fourteen miles of the Spanish commandant's house at Tensa, and within the Spanish Government, where they now chiefly remain.

That, last spring, the said McGillivray was about to burn his new house at Tallassee, but was prevented by Spanish commandant Captain Oliver, who told him he should not, as he, the commandant, should want it.

That this deponent often saw Indians come to McGillivray and tell him, that Indians of other towns had stole horses, and were troublesome to the frontiers, from which conduct they were afraid that the Americans would come and burn their towns; but that McGillivray told the Indians, that they had nothing to fear from any such misconduct; that they need only say that the white people were saucy to them, and he would free them, as he had assurance from General Washington, and General Knox, that the killing of a few people, and stealing of horses, even to the number of forty or fifty of either, from Georgia, would not cause them to send any force against them. This was the talks of Joseph Cornell, also, to the Indians.

That, during the whole time of this deponent's being acquainted with General Alexander McGillivray, there subsisted a perfect good understanding and friendly intercourse between them, so that this deponent hath not been influenced in the preceding declaration, from prejudice, malice, or resentment, against the said McGillivray; but merely from motives of justice, and the regard he has for the United States, hath induced him thus to come forward, of his own free act, and declare to the Indian agent, transactions which he conceives highly injurious to the peace and happiness of the said States.

That it is the opinion of this deponent, from what he has seen, and came to his knowledge in the Spanish country, that the Spaniards are doing every thing in their power to engage the Indians in a war with the United States; not only the Creeks, but the other three nations, viz. the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees.

That the Spanish talks seemed to have great weight on the minds of the Indians who live on the rivers of Coosa, Talapoosa, and Alabama; and that there was a very conspicuous inveteracy in the Spaniards, inhabiting the Floridas, as well soldiers as citizens, against every person whom they believed to be friends to the United States.

That this deponent received undoubted accounts, before his quitting Tensa, that five Spanish regiments, said to contain between five and six hundred men each, had actually arrived as a reinforcement to the posts on the Mississippi, since the beginning of May last; and that as many more regiments were expected from the Havana to that country. That very large quantities of artillery and stores had also arrived to the posts on said river.

That there are many other matters of like tendency which is within the knowledge of this deponent, which will be communicated in future; at present, he concludes this narrative.

CREEK NATION, June 29, 1792.

MR. PRINTER: Please to insert the enclosed intelligence, and I make no doubt you will oblige a number of friends to justice. It may be depended upon as perfectly the truth, which you will find, if you have an opportunity of conversing with any intelligent person, who was in the Indian country for this month past; and it is no more than what ought to be made public, and all underhanded doings.

Yours, &c.

A FRIEND TO JUSTICE.

We have received the following intelligence from the Creek nation, which may be depended upon: Mr. Panton has lately made a tour through the Upper Creeks to the Cherokees, and returned through the Lower Creeks to St. Mark's. He encouraged the Indians every where to oppose the Americans, and not give up their land; he particularly told the Creeks not to run the line. To back Mr. Panton, a Spanish officer has been sent into the Creeks; his talks are to the following purport, viz: Not to give up an inch of land nor run the line, and they should be protected in it; and that there was a large quantity of arms, ammunition, &c. for them at Pensacola, which he invited them to come and receive. He also told them, that, if any blood was spilled to let him know, and he would write to the King of Spain, who had soldiers enough, not far off, to assist them. He further told them, that they had frequently heard that McGillivray had sold their lands, but that he always denied it, and said it was the chiefs themselves; that now he had come into the nation and found it was McGillivray, and had wrote back so; and that, in consequence thereof, he was sent for to New Orleans to answer for his conduct. In short, his talks were encouraging the Indians to commit hostilities against the Americans, (in the Cussetahs excepted) assuring them of assistance from Spain. Talks to the same effect have been sent to the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, but we are happy to hear that neither his nor Panton's talks will be taken by the Chickasaws nor Lower Creeks, but treated with the contempt they deserve. Some of the Upper Creeks, we understand, approve of them. By persons from Pensacola we find the arms they are to receive are trading guns, of English manufacture, and must, of course, come through Panton & Co. Some Indian factors, who were lately at Panton's store, at St. Mark's, were told to tell the Indians to plunder all the American traders and send them back. The Spanish plan, we have strong reasons to believe, is to get the four nations to join them in opposing the Americans, who, we hear from undoubted authority, are preparing to attack their posts and settlements on the Mississippi. We sincerely hope they will improve this hint. It is also confidently asserted by persons from Pensacola, that the Spaniards are sending cannon, &c. from Pensacola up the river Mississippi, and Captain John Lindon is raising horsemen on Tennisaw to act against the American States, at ten dollars per month, and find their own horses. Panton's plan is easy seen into; it is no more than what he has been pursuing several years past. Bowles, we are told, is gone to the court of Spain, to negotiate some business relative to a free port; he is allowed four dollars per day during his embassy; he is treated with every mark of distinction, and not a prisoner, as has been industriously insinuated by Panton and his myrmidons.

FLINT RIVER, July 13, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I was honored yesterday with your letter by the Uchee king, and am exceedingly sorry that it is out of my power to comply with your request with respect to coming down immediately to the Rock Landing, as nothing should have hindered me at this time but so insurmountable an accident as, about ten days ago, the distemper got amongst my horses, and I have lost nineteen head, the chief of them the best I had. I had but three valuable riding horses that I kept purposely for my own riding, which are all three dead. I have not more than six or seven pack horses left, and they have, but about ten days ago, come from Beard's Bluff loaded with salt, and are none of them able to go twenty miles; therefore, I am sorry to be under the necessity of informing you that I have not a horse in the world that would carry me in ten days to where you are, at the Rock Landing. Had it not been for the misfortune of losing my horses, I could have furnished you with an excellent one for Mrs. Seagrove, and one for yourself to ride home upon, which I could have come down to you immediately with. If I can procure a horse that I think will suit a lady to ride, against I come down to St. Mary's, which will be in about two months from this, I will bring one down to you there. I am informed by the Uchee king that you mean to have your next meeting at your brother's store, on St. Mary's, which I think will answer a very good purpose, as it will be the means of getting the Chehawuseche and Kithaetta people down there, and perhaps the means of settling matters with them, which there is a great necessity for at this time, as that villain Bowles has put such notions in their heads that the devil seems to be in them ever since. The Cussetah king has been here with me these five days past, and went off for the town yesterday, just before I received your letter. The chief of his business was, to inquire of me what I thought of the present situation of affairs in the nation, as they found what I had told them respecting Bowles had turned out nearly as I had told them. He wished to know a little about the grounds of what this Spanish officer meant by the talks he had given them, which was, in the first place, not to run the line, but to come down to a meeting at Pensacola and Mobile, where the Spaniards, this officer told them, would call the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, and Creeks, and give them all one talk, and, when they had all agreed to one talk, that they should all be furnished with arms and ammunition, and all other implements of war in their land; and then, they were to lay still, till they found that the subjects encroached on their lands, and, if they did, for them to defend their rights, and that they, the Spaniards, would be at their backs. This, I told the Cussetah king, he might easily see into, as I had lately heard that there were some disputes on the Mississippi, between the Spaniards and Americans, about the land; that the Spaniards were afraid of the Americans, and that they wanted to get the Indians to fight the Americans first, to save themselves, and get the Indians all destroyed, and then think it will be time enough for them to begin. I told him many other things that I thought would take with him, which he seemed to take great notice of. He says, that as matters cannot be settled till towards the fall, with the State of Georgia, they have agreed to go and hear the Spaniards' talk, and if they have any thing to give them they will take it; but that they are determined not to take any talks to do any mischief to their friends, the Americans; and if you call a meeting in the fall they will attend to it, and hopes by that time matters will be settled agreeable to both parties. The Cussetah king says, that, if it should be so that any of the other parts of the nation should stand out and make a war with the United States, that they will single themselves off from those that want war, and let them abide by the consequences of it. The part of the nation that has taken Bowles' part has come into a resolution not one of them to go down to the Spaniards' talk, as they are, I imagine, afraid of being taken to task about robbing Mr. Panton's stores, which I think will be nothing against our country, that they do not go. The busk is now near on hand; if any thing particular should transpire at that time, I shall do my endeavor to give you the earliest information. The Cussetah king informs me that they have, a few days ago, on a meeting of several of the towns, come to a resolution to take all the horses that may be stolen from the frontiers of Georgia, and send them immediately back, and if those that bring them in make any hesitation about delivering them up, to beat them severely. This I now write you, goes by one Captain Harrison, that lives at Carr's Bluff, who arrived here yesterday in quest of six head of valuable horses, stolen from him by the Uchees. The Cussetah king and Uchee king both have promised him very faithfully to send the horses out to me, that I may send them down to him early in the Spring. The same Captain Harrison had a horse stolen and a cow killed, and other property robbed from him by the Uchees, to the amount of six pounds. Captain Harrison followed them and got his horse, after having a skirmish with them, as they fought, and were unwilling to give up the horse. As they were so rusty, and would not give up the horse willingly, he took back three of their guns, as he did not get any of the rest of his things. After they came home, they gathered a gang and was going back by my house to do mischief on the settlements; I therefore thought proper to persuade some of them back, which I effected, and gave them a letter to Captain Harrison, and informed him with what I had done, and mentioned as you were now about bringing on a treaty with the Indians, at the Rock Landing, that I made no doubt but that you would, if he gave up the guns, make him satisfaction for his losses, as you would not wish any irruption with the Indians at this time. Captain Harrison, on seeing my letter, readily complied, and gave up their guns, and they returned back in peace. All this happened while you was in the height of your business at the Rock Landing. Now, sir, as I did this with a view that nothing might interrupt your business, I shall take it kind in you to make Captain Harrison retaliation for his losses, as I promised him that you would do it. He has promised to take or send this letter up to you. I shall endeavor to be at your treaty at St. Mary's, if possible I can in the Fall, and should be glad to hear from you by the first opportunity. Nothing more, but wish you health, and remain, yours, &c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove to the Secretary of War.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, 27th July, 1792.

The quantity of provisions and liquors may seem great, but no person, who is not an eye witness to the enormous eating of Indians, can have an idea of it. I made an attempt to weigh out their allowance of a pound of beef per man each day, but found it would not do; they got out of all temper with that mode, and threatened to leave me if I would not give them their bellies full. Upon reflecting on the situation of affairs, I thought it would be bad policy to fall out with those people, and let them go home discontented on that account. I have been obliged to give way to their craving dispositions, on account of our critical situation at this juncture. Should we ever be so happy as to see the Creeks restored to order, I should treat them in a very different style. What I have bestowed on those who have been with me, and the indulgent, kind treatment they have met with, is now working powerfully in our favor in the nation. Good treatment and administering to their wants, (as sparingly as we possibly can) will be the only way to make them our friends, and keep them so: for, let me assure you, there is no middle road with those people. So soon as the United States decline purchasing their friendship as above, I would recommend by all means that they have a force ready to oppose them in the field. I hope you will excuse my giving an opinion on a matter of so much importance, and when unasked. But, as I have been honored with the confidence of the directors of the affairs of our country, I should conceive myself unworthy of the trust reposed, if I withheld either information or opinion, that I thought useful to the United States.

For me to point out, or dwell on the ruinous consequences of a war with the Creeks to the State of Georgia, and the burthen it would be to the Union, would be altogether useless to you. Your experience in those matters will fully point it out. Situated as the United States are at present with the Western tribes, I should think it advisable to keep those Southern nations in friendship, even at a considerable expense, until matters can be brought to some favorable conclusion with those we are now at war with. I am of opinion that, before the Creeks become good subjects, they must undergo a severe correction: for they have been spoiled by the British, Spaniards, McGillivray, and others, and the United States are, unavoidably, adding thereto. But, of all evils, choose the least. I think I can venture to assure you, that, if I am supported with goods and provisions to give them, and allowed to act freely with them in gaining their friendship, that, notwithstanding every thing to the contrary, I will be able to keep the Creeks in peace with us, if not make them very useful. Hitherto, you well know, I have not been able to act as my judgment pointed out. McGillivray stood in the way of all our measures. His removal from the nation, I think a fortunate event for the United States. I think it probable he may be advised by the Spaniards, and others, to continue to deceive the United States.

The Indians are very quiet, at present, in this quarter; and, if the villains on this upper frontier will let them alone, they will continue so.

I remain, with much respect, your most obedient humble servant.

SAVANNAH, IN GEORGIA, August 4th, 1792:

SIR:

I am thus far on my way for St. Mary's. I have just seen a gentleman from St. Augustine, who informs me that a reinforcement of seven hundred troops, and a large supply of artillery and stores, had just arrived at that place from the Havana: also, cash to pay off all the debts of Government, to their troops as well as individuals. This they have done in both the Floridas and Louisiana. So soon as I reach St. Mary's, I shall have it in my power to give you better information of what is going forward in East Florida. I have not heard of any change in Indian matters, since my last.

This will be handed you by James Leonard, the person whose deposition I forwarded to the President on the 27th ultimo.

Supposing that it would be satisfactory to see and examine him, on a piece of information so important, I have advised Mr. Leonard waiting on you for that purpose; which he engages to do without delay, and before he communicates with any person.

It appears that Mr. Leonard hath been a great sufferer whilst in the Floridas; that his attachment to the United States is good; and is very desirous of being useful to them in any way in his power.

You will find Mr. Leonard (though in a mean garment at present) a well-informed, intelligent man. I hope you will be able to give him some employ. I think he may be useful. I have assisted him in getting forward, as he was destitute of cash.

I remain, &c.

James Seagrove, Esquire, to the Secretary of War.

ST. MARY'S, 8th September, 1792.

SIR:

Since I had the honor of writing you from Savannah, under date of the 4th ultimo, I have not been favored with any of your commands. I am happy in informing, that no unfavorable change hath taken place in Indian affairs, notwithstanding the unremitting endeavors of the Spanish agents to prejudice them against us. Scarce a day passes, but I have additional proofs of the base conduct of the Spanish agents in the Creek nation. They, unquestionably, are using every means to induce the four Southern nations of Indians to take up the hatchet against the United States. Every undue, unjust, and villanous means are using by them, to bring these unfortunate people to act to their diabolical purposes. What the Spaniards can promise themselves by such conduct, I cannot discover: With all their promises, presents, and threats, added to the exertions of McGillivray and Panton, &c., I am hopeful they will not be able to prevail on the Creeks to join them, or even to attend the treaty at Pensacola this month.

I am using every argument with them to prevent their going; but the promise of receiving large presents, will carry some there.

Mr. Olivar, the successor of McGillivray, hath lately been in the Lower towns, inviting them to Pensacola to receive arms and ammunition from the Spaniards, and talks in the most insulting terms of the United States.

I am in hopes of momentarily receiving pointed instructions from the President on those affairs; the time is critical; as little delay as possible should be used. Should the savages once be induced to take up arms against us, it will not be easy to quell them. I have sent for Mr. Kinnard, whom I expect hourly. I have thoughts of placing him at the head of the Lower Creeks; but I shall do nothing until I hear from the President. I have advice of several of the chiefs being on their way from the nation to me on public business, the purport of which you shall know, if of consequence.

In my last I mentioned the arrival of 700 troops, as a reinforcement at Augustine. I find the number is not so great, not being more than 200; all the other information is just. I have direct information every week from thence; I do not find that any additional works are erecting; the Government, however, are grown very strict, as to who they admit among them, and absolutely deny their subjects any intercourse with the Americans or French; their vessels have been embargoed for some weeks, but that may arise from the approaching equinox.

In my opinion, remonstrance ought to be made to the court of Spain, against the House of Panton, Leslie & Co. British merchants, residing in Florida. Panton (it can be proven) openly invited the Creeks and Cherokees to Pensacola, to receive arms and ammunition to use against the Americans, and said he was authorized so to do by the Spanish Government, and that, if they entered into a war with us, the Spaniards stood ready with troops to assist them. He also advised the Indians to plunder and kill every American trader they found in the nation; declaring to them, that no one had any right or authority to be among them as traders, but such as Spain approved. I hope some notice will be taken of those men, who have, and still continue to be a principal cause in keeping up the troubles among the four Southern tribes. I think (if the Spanish court are pushed on this business) they will readily sacrifice Panton & Co., especially as they owe that concern nearly two hundred thousand dollars, for Indian supplies. I have already stated to the President the situation of that house, and the motives which actuate them.

Permit me to mention to you, the naked state of this frontier; not more than twenty soldiers, without an officer, compose our force. If St. Mary's is approved of, as the place to communicate with Indians, I would advise a respectable force to be kept at the head of this river, and some good works erected; the situation is commanding, should we be involved in a war with the Indians, and will be a great check to Spanish insolence. In hopes of soon hearing from you, I remain, with the utmost respect,

Your most obedient, &c.

Copy of a letter of James Seagrove to the Secretary of War.

ST. MARY'S, September 13, 1792.

SIR:

Since writing you on the 8th instant, I have had a talk with the White King, of the great Eufath towns, and several others, who were sent down by their countrymen to consult with me, respecting the talks of the Spanish agents in the nation, which distracts them very much. From what has been said to them here, and the attention shewn them, those chiefs set off for home yesterday, and have engaged to prevent any of their people receiving Spanish talks, or doing any thing against the interest of the United States.

I am happy in telling you that the Lower towns, who were in favor of Bowles, are coming round to our interest very fast. Kinnard is very active indeed; he publicly opposes his people having any thing to do with the Spaniards.

It will be of the utmost consequence, my receiving immediate orders respecting those Spanish proceedings. I believe I can make them repent their interference. I have not time to add, as the boat which takes this to Savannah is on the point of departing.

I remain, &c.

James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War.

ST. MARY'S, 17th October, 1792.

SIR:

By the arrival of Mr. Jordan (express) at this place, on the 1st instant, I am honored with your despatch of the 30th August last, also a copy of yours of the 11th same month, by Major Gaither, the original of which I have not received, owing to that gentleman's going from Savannah to the Rock Landing. Every part of your instructions shall receive the utmost attention in my power to give, and I hope my endeavors will be such as to answer your wishes. It is pleasing to me to find that the President of the United States and yourself approve of my services hitherto; this alone is sufficient to encourage my going on in the arduous business I have undertaken, and which, in a very great degree, now induces me to consent to that very unpleasant part of your instructions, of residing in the Creek nation a proportion of the year, say one-half. The places for deputies and myself, I intend fixing with the chiefs at our next meeting; as yet, I cannot recommend proper persons for deputies; their appointments are of consequence, and none but approved characters ought to fill those places; attention must also be had to men whom the Indians like.

Since my last respects of the 8th September, I have had frequent communications from different parts of the nation, all of which seem favorable, and promise pleasing consequences to the United States. I am happy in assuring you, that the Spaniards have totally failed in their intended treaty at Pensacola, which was to have been last month; not a single chief from the Creeks attended, and not more than ten or twelve common people—nothing whatever was done.

This gives me strong hope of my future success with the Creeks, as, their not attending was solely owing to my advice to them. From the whole of my discoveries, I am enabled to inform you, that a very favorable change hath taken place in the nation, in favor of the United States; the enclosed copies of letters which I have lately received will serve to shew this change.

Enclosed you will also find copies of several letters which I have sent into the towns, and one to Governor Telfair.

There is not any account from McGillivray, further than his being yet with the Spaniards.

Eight days past arrived here the sloop Polly, Captain Smith, and schooner Oak, Captain Maison, from Philadelphia, with corn and goods on public account. The vessels are now discharging at a place called Colerain, on this river, about seventy miles from the sea, where are convenient stores, and which is without inhabitants. I have obtained a guard from the few men that are on this station, for the care of the property. I returned last evening from where the vessels are discharging; every thing seems to come out in good order.

I have advice by a runner, that the chiefs are preparing, and that they will be down by the middle of November at farthest. The corn will be very acceptable to them, for their situation for bread is very bad indeed; the Cussetah town, which contains three thousand souls, did not actually make fifty bushels of corn this year; many other towns are equally destitute. I have strictly forbid their bringing more than three or four chiefs from each town, but notwithstanding this, I fear I shall have a much larger assemblage than I wish.

The strouds and blankets will be very acceptable, but I fear they will grumble for want of shirts, as well as small articles. I do not find that you have sent any spirits; some must be had before the time of meeting; it is impossible to talk to those people without; five or six hogsheads northward rum, and a pipe Teneriffe wine, will be the smallest quantity we can expect to do with. I hope the vessel which is bringing the remainder of the corn and goods, will have some on board from you. Should the vessel that brings you this, have a short passage, you will have time to send those articles, as there is no such thing as purchasing them here at present. Should there not any arrive from you, I shall be obliged to send to Savannah, or Charleston, for them. In this I shall find much embarrassment, as I am without money, for this, or any other purpose. I hope I may soon receive a supply from you; the vessel which brings this, returns directly here.

From the best information, the Spaniards in the Floridas are much alarmed at the present change in the disposition of the Indians.

I shall observe the most pointed conduct towards them, in conformity with your instruction, which shall also be considered, as hitherto, to General M<sup>c</sup>Gillivray. I shall obtain full proof of the Spanish agent's conduct when I meet the chiefs, and, also, on my going into the nation, which I intend shall be as soon as they and I agree on the time and place.

I attend to what you say respecting licence to trade. I shall not grant any till further instructed; I have not, hitherto, conceived myself authorized to grant them. General M<sup>c</sup>Gillivray, and no other, that I know, gave any since the treaty of New York. There will be an absolute necessity that this trade should be regulated, and allowed to be carried on; otherwise there will arise some discontent among the savages, should supplies be withheld by the servants of the United States.

Enclosed you have a memorandum of some articles, which I much want, to make the intended presents more acceptable. If you can send them in time, it will be fortunate.

I shall write you fully, in a few days, by a vessel via New York,
And am, yours, &c.

Memorandum of articles wanted, to make up an assortment of presents to the Indians expected at the head of the river St. Mary's, in November, 1792.

5 hogsheads high proof northward rum.
1 pipe Lisbon or Teneriffe wine.
2 barrels Muscovado sugar.
200 lbs. coffee.
1 hoghead tobacco; 1 box of pipes.
5 tierces rice.
50 dozen knives, commonly called scalping knives; those made in size and shape of carving knives, are best, and if bone handles, the more acceptable.
50 pieces cotton Romal handkerchiefs.
100 pieces Garlia linen, or, low priced Irish linen.
200 castor hats; a box of feathers for ditto.
1,000 yards white or blue plains, for leggins, in order to save giving strouds, which are double the price.
Gunpowder and lead are always expected by the Indians, as necessary to support their families by hunting; but, I do not wish to give it them, if it can be avoided. They grumble much at our not giving it to them.

J. S.

[ENCLOSURES.]

NEW YORK, in the Upper Creeks, 1st August, 1792.

Sir:

I have taken this opportunity to write you by Mr. Hull, and to inform you of our friendly disposition towards our brothers and friends, the white people of Georgia, and to let them know that we have not thrown away their talks. The greatest part of our nation holds, still, your talks; and the reason we could not unanimously agree to go down was, the many and great talks we daily received from different parts, that the minds of the Indians was so confused, that they did not know how to act for the want of our great chief, to join us together.

The great talks that our beloved men had with your beloved men, at New York, we still stand by, and shall consent to run the line; and, if you are agreed, we shall drink out of the same waters. Don't think that I take upon me to write for all the nations; but, this is the mouth of their greatest part of the head-men, and I look on myself as good as any, and request you to keep your people in peace, and we shall do the same. I have seen a great many of the people from the Lower towns, who have seen you, and talk well of you, and hope that you don't take it ill that we have not seen you before this; but it was entirely owing to the confused talks amongst us, and the want of a commissary, who could advise us. The day is not far off that we shall take you by the hand, and be as friends and brothers.

I am your friend and brother.

THE WHITE LIEUTENANT.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Esq. Agent of Indian Affairs, S. D. U. S.

A talk from the kings, chiefs, warriors, and head-men of the Cussetahs and Cowetas, to James Seagrove, Esq. Agent of Indian Affairs, for the Southern department.

CUSSETAH, 23d August, 1792.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

You may remember, when we were at the Rock Landing, the talks that passed between us, as, also, the talks we brought up with us. Our interpreter has, in public meeting, told them to the Lower towns, who all seemed well pleased, and are well satisfied that we shall meet and take each other by the hand in peace and friendship, at any place you may mention to us. You will let us know; and let it be as convenient as possible for both parties. You will be informed by a runner from Jack Kinnard, when we shall be ready to set out. You will see by what The White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskie has wrote you, how the Upper towns is disposed. We are informed that a young man of your people is killed by some Indians about Carr's Bluff, on the Oconee river. Who they are that committed this murder, we cannot find out as yet, but we hope it will not be long before it is discovered, as the horse and gun cannot be long concealed, which was taken; and by them we hope to find out, and make an example of, whoever it is that has committed the murder—when we shall send you word. We hope the white people will not be rash, but give us time, as we did when the like happened to us; we waited twelve months before we took satisfaction for the man that was killed, last May was twelve months. You know the time of our hunting will be coming on soon, and a number of our people will be over the Oconee, a hunting, and the white people may be assured that no guilty person will come that way. We hope that nothing may happen to prevent our meeting. There are some horses brought in our towns, which shall be gathered and sent down, three of which we send by Mr. Hull, to Mr. Barnard's, to send down to the frontiers, that the owners may get them, and the rest shall be sent, as soon as gathered.

We observe your orders respecting the stopping such people as come into our land without a pass, and should give the necessary orders to our warriors, but are afraid they might be too eager, and overdo the thing; therefore, we hope you will use your influence and put a stop to their coming, for many of them tell lies, and bring stolen property, which has a bad effect on the minds of the red people.

We conclude with wishing to meet you in peace and friendship.

CUSSETAH KING.
CUSSETAH WARRIOR'S KING.
OPAY MICO.
HALLOWING KING.

CHEEHAWS, in the Lower Creeks, 28th August, 1792.

MY DEAR BROTHER:

I wish to let you know that, according to your request, I have collected all the stolen horses that has been brought into my towns, the Cheehaws and Telhuanas, and you may depend that the head-men do not set those bad men on to steal the white people's property, nor will they suffer them to do it. I have collected twelve head of horses, which is all that is hereabout; there may be some carried up into the other towns, which I shall inquire into. I send those horses to Captain Fleming, at Trader's Hill, on St. Mary's, to be delivered to their owners on proof being made. The Indians who bring those horses down ought to receive some pay for their trouble: I think that eight kegs of rum will not be too much, as they have had much labor in collecting them. Many bad talks have been of late given out in the nation, but we are determined to listen to none of them. We have taken your talks, and will follow your advice to be at peace with every body. My dear friend, I assure you it is the wish of our nation to live in peace and friendship with you; and we are determined it shall be so. If I knew any thing to the contrary you should know it, being a friend to your nation, and ever shall be to you. I hope soon to take you by the hand, and am,

Your friend and brother.

JOHN KINNARD.

St. MARY'S, (in Georgia) 6th October, 1791.

The Kings and Chiefs of the Cussetahs and Cowetas, with all other Chiefs of the Creek nation, who may see it:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I received your agreeable talk of the 23d August last by Mr. Hull. It is very pleasing to me to find that you pay so much attention to the talks that passed between us at the Rock Landing, and that you are pursuing the measures I recommended to you, which cannot fail rendering you a happy people. Your collecting and sending back to their owners all stolen property is very commendable. Nothing will put a stop to the dangerous practice of stealing, so soon as its being discountenanced by the chiefs of the nation in this manner. I fear there is too much reason for the report, that a young man of the name of Pew was killed about three months past by some of the Creeks near Carr's Bluff, on the Oconee. If it should appear he lost his life by your people, I have not a doubt but you will give complete satisfaction, as it will unquestionably appear to have been an unprovoked wanton murder, and, therefore, it becomes the more incumbent on you to use every exertion to discover the perpetrators. Agreeable to your request, I have sent a runner along our frontier on the Oconee, desiring our people not to injure any of your people who may be among them, but, on the contrary, to use them kindly, and at the same time informed them of your talk promising satisfaction. I have also sent a talk to the Governor of Georgia, to order his people not to injure any Indians. I must request that you will give strict charges to all your people who are going out a hunting to behave with civility to all white people they may meet, and to avoid stealing. This will be the way to preserve peace.

I have just received permission from our great and good Father, the President of the United States, to meet you and the other chiefs of your nation on this river as soon as convenient. I have much to say to you from him when we meet. In order that runners may be sent to all the towns, and that the chiefs may have time to assemble, and come down, I have fixed the time of meeting me on the head of St. Mary's to be the latter end of next moon, when I hope as many as two or three of the principal chiefs from each town in the nation will attend, when, I have no doubt, all matters will be made agreeable to them.

The President of the United States having been informed by me of the failure of your crops of corn, hath, out of his great humanity and kindness toward your nation, ordered from Philadelphia a very large supply of corn, sufficient to support your whole nation until another year. He hath also ordered a large quantity of clothing against the approaching cold season. When we meet, we shall make arrangements for distributing the provisions and clothing, which your people can receive at any time afterwards, as their wants require.

I have to desire that no greater number than what I have mentioned may attend at our meeting, as a crowd of people only prevent business being done; and as I shall have proper persons at the public stores on St. Mary's, your people can receive the provisions and presents any time after our meeting. I must now request that you make this known as soon as possible in all the towns in the nation, and inform the chiefs that I shall be happy to see them as friends and brothers. I do not send this talk to any one in particular; it is intended for all; and you will, therefore, pitch upon such chiefs to meet me as you see fit.

Before I close this talk, I must recommend to you all, that, by every means in your power, you will preserve peace with all your neighbors; you have no business with war; peace alone can make you a happy nation; and which it is my ardent wish to see accomplished and enjoyed among you. As we are soon to take each other by the hand, I shall not say more at present than to refer you to the bearer, Mr. John Galphin, for further information, and am your friend and brother.

St. MARY'S, 7th October, 1792.

SIR:

It is with great pleasure that I now acknowledge my having received your agreeable talk of the 15th August last by Mr. Hull. Although I never had the pleasure of seeing you, yet I am well acquainted with your respectable character and good conduct in all matters between your country and mine, and I do assure you, that I feel a great deal of satisfaction in having this opportunity of telling you how much I respect you, and that I shall be happy, on every occasion, in giving you proofs how much I am your and your country's real friend.

Your friendly sentiments toward the United States, and your wise and just determination in holding fast the talks given by our great beloved man to yours, as also my talks given your people at different times, cannot fail to place you and your people in a respectable light with our great and beloved father, the President of the United States, who I shall take care to inform of your friendly conduct.

I am very sensible of the confused situation the Creek nation hath been in for a long while, owing entirely to designing wicked white men, who wished to see your ruin, by advising your people to measures which would have involved them in a war, and perhaps ended in their total destruction.

I am happy to find that a very great majority of your country have had wisdom enough to withstand the advice and attempts made on you by those bad men. Let me advise you to keep your ears shut against all who will attempt to advise you to acts of injustice against your neighbors. They cannot possibly be your friends who advise you to any thing but peace. The time, I hope, is near at hand, when we shall meet as friends and brothers, and when I shall explain to you many matters for the happiness of the Creek nation.

A few days past I received leave from your good friend, the President of the United States, to meet two or three of the principal chiefs from each town in the Creek nation, in order to arrange and settle all matters depending between his country and yours. I now inform you, and all the chiefs of the Upper towns, (through you) that I shall be happy to meet them the latter end of next moon near the head of this river, where every thing will be provided to make them welcome, and to give them proof how much we are their friends.

I must request you will make this known in all the Upper towns, and that you will take measures to bring the number of chiefs required down with you. Perhaps some who have taken Bowles' talks may be shy of coming, but you must tell them that I do not blame them for it; it was not their fault, but those who imposed on them. So let them come and see me, and I will receive them as friends.

I have the pleasure to tell you, and all the people of your nation, that their good friend, the President of the United States, out of his humanity and goodness, having heard from me that there was danger of your wanting bread, on account of the failure of your crops of corn, hath ordered a large quantity of corn being sent from Philadelphia to me at this place, in order to supply all your people's wants until they can make new crops. He hath also sent a supply of clothing against the cold weather which is approaching.

When the chiefs meet me we will make arrangements for the distribution of the provisions and clothing; and as I shall fix proper persons at the public stores on this river to issue the same, your people will be able to receive them any time after we have had our meeting.

I hope your beloved man, General M'Gillivray, is returned to his house, and that we shall have him with us. I have written to him by this opportunity.

I wish you to send to the Great Native Warrior, and tell him I expect him down.

I send this by Mr. John Galphin, who promises to deliver it safe, and read it for you.

In hope of soon taking you by the hand, I remain your friend and brother.

To the WHITE LIEUTENANT.

CREEK NATION, ST. MARY'S, 7th October, 1792.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I wrote you about five weeks ago; but as I have not had an answer, I fear my letter has not reached you. Mr. Bryant set off with it, but got sick on the road, and sent the letter forward by young Allen, who, I am afraid, has played some tricks with it.

I received your talk of the 28th August last, and am very much obliged by the great attention you pay to the affairs of this country and your own. Your wise advice to your people not to take any talks from the Spaniards, which might be the means of involving them in a dispute with this country, is a convincing proof of your good understanding and friendship for your country: for, without the Creeks are in peace and friendship with the United States, they cannot be happy.

Your good conduct through the whole of the confusion your country hath been in, has made your character very agreeable to the President of the United States, who has sent you a very handsome present, which you shall have when we meet.

I thank you for the trouble you have taken in collecting the stolen property, in order to send it to the owners. It is very commendable, and will be the means of putting a stop to thefts in future, which is the duty of every good man to prevent, as much as is in his power. Those people who have been endeavoring to make mischiefs between your people and ours, will have reason to repent of their folly before long.

Continue, my friend, to advise your people to sit still, and have nothing to say to such people.

I have just received permission of the President of the United States to meet two or three of your chiefs from each town in your nation, at the head of this river, in order to talk over all matters, and arrange and settle all matters like friends and brothers.

I have in consequence sent talks to the Upper towns, inviting the chiefs to meet me the latter end of next moon, and I now send this to you, and must request your attendance, and that you will immediately send off runners to all the towns below, and invite two or three of the principal chiefs from each town, and bring them with you. I hope you will excuse this trouble, as I place the greatest dependence on you. Please give the bearers of this, Mr. Bryant and Mr. Galphin, all the assistance in your power.

When I met the Indians at the Rock Landing, they expressed their fears for want of bread in the nation, owing to the failure of the crops of corn. In consequence of this, I wrote to the President of the United States, who, without a moment's delay, hath sent on a sufficient supply of corn for your whole nation, and also a large quantity of blankets, strouds, and other goods. When we meet, we shall make arrangements for distributing the provisions and goods. This, my friend, is an additional proof of the goodness and great regard the President of the United States hath for your people, and cannot, I think, fail to impress them with gratitude and love for him and his country.

I must again request that you will use all your influence to bring down every chief of any influence, and in particular those who have been deceived by Bowles, as I wish to talk with them, and convince them of their error.

I wish you to bring your brother Billy down with you. I hope General McGillivray is returned, and will be with us. Every thing among us is peace and friendship toward your country, and will continue so.

I refer you to Mr. Galphin and Mr. Bryant for further accounts, and remain your devoted friend and brother.

MR. JOHN KINNARD.

ST. MARY'S, 8th October, 1792.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I hope by this time you are safe returned to your home at Tallassee, and that you have accomplished the object of your journey. Reports have been spread in this country that you had quit the nation, not to return. This I have contradicted by every means in my power, well knowing how false it was. Indeed I have pledged myself to the public that you would be at home this fall.

I have not been favored with a line from you since your departure for Orleans; and the uncertainty of my letters finding you, hath prevented my writing you. By this opportunity I send several talks into the nation, inviting two or three chiefs from each town to meet me at the head of this river the latter end of next moon. My reason for sending talks to the chiefs, was the uncertainty of your being in the nation in time, otherwise the invitation should have been through you alone. Should this meet you, I have not a doubt but you will forward the business all in your power.

The unwarrantable attempts lately made by our neighbors to poison the minds of the Indians against the United States, as well as to have an arrangement of all matters, renders a convention of the chiefs necessary.

I hope we shall be so happy as to have you at our head. I am happy to find a most pleasing change in the dispositions of many of your people toward our country. Their eyes are opening, and they begin to distinguish their real from pretended friends.

When the Indians met me at the Rock Landing last summer, they complained much of the failure of crops of corn in their country. This I informed the President of, who immediately ordered from Philadelphia a very large supply of corn for their use, five thousand bushels of which has arrived in this river, and if more should be wanted, it will be sent.

I have also received a very considerable supply of goods, and also a number of ploughs, and other implements of husbandry, to be distributed among your people, which I shall defer doing until I see and consult you.

By the public prints it appears that Mr. Bowles was hung at Madrid soon after his arrival. I have no official account, but think it true. This I send by John Galphin, and Langley Bryant, who carry my talk, should they be so fortunate as to meet you. I hope you will give them your assistance.

There is every appearance of a general war all over Europe. Thank God our country hath every prospect of remaining in perfect tranquillity. There is great hope that the Northern hostile tribes will be led to peace by the overtures that are now making. Commissioners are gone out to them, and the army under General Wayne is halted, it being the ardent wish of the President to reduce them to reason and peace without shedding blood.

I hope I shall have the happiness of very soon hearing from you with agreeable accounts. Wishing you all possible felicity, I remain your devoted friend and humble servant.

General MCGILLIVRAY.

St. MARY'S, 5th October, 1792.

SIR:

All matters tending to promote the interest or happiness of the State of Georgia, which may come to my knowledge in the line of my department, duty, as well as inclination, leads me to give your Excellency the earliest notice of, for your and my fellow-citizens' information.

It gives me great pleasure to be enabled to assure your Excellency, that the affairs of the United States with the Creek nation, at this time, appear more favorable than for years past. Every day furnishes me with fresh proofs of their ardent desire of living in peace and friendship with this country. Thank God the cloud of misrepresentation and imposition, in which a great part of those unfortunate people have been enveloped, is now nearly dispelled, and reason again resumes a seat among them, and tells them that much of their happiness as a nation and people depends on being in strict friendship with the United States.

My negotiations with them seems drawing to a favorable conclusion, and as the Executive of the United States have put it amply in my power to prove to the Indians their unbounded humanity and tenderness, as well as great munificence toward them, I have not a doubt but that, at all the meetings which I am to have with the chiefs in the next month, all matters will be happily arranged.

The enclosed three talks, which I have lately received from principal chiefs, will serve in some degree to point to your Excellency the present disposition of the nation, as well as show the great necessity there is, on the part of the white inhabitants of this country, to observe a kind and friendly conduct towards such Indians as may fall in their way, as the season is now approaching when they will be commencing their hunts on the frontiers of this State: I hope no injury may be offered them or their property by the inhabitants.

You will please observe what is said by the Cussetah and Coweta chiefs, on the subject of a person supposed to have been killed by the Indians near Carr's Bluff, on the Oconee. I hope, agreeable to their request, no hasty measures will be adopted.

If discovery be made that it was done by Indians, they promise ample satisfaction:

I am, with all possible respect, your Excellency's devoted humble servant.

General Alexander M'Gillivray to the Secretary of War.

UPPER CREEK NATION, 18th May, 1792.

SIR:

I received the triplicate of your letter of 20th February last, by express from Mr. Seagrove, early in last month, at the same time informing me that he was appointed by his Excellency the President of the United States, a commissioner to see the treaty fulfilled, and requested my attendance with the chiefs at the Rock Landing, about the middle of the month; at that time I had a severe attack of the rheumatism in almost all my limbs, and it left me so much reduced, that I could not bear the motion of a horse till a short time ago; beside that, the Lower Indians are so distracted and divided in opinion, that they cannot be brought to agree in settling the affairs of the nation.

After that Bowles had been twice before detected as an impostor, by those Indians, I had no suspicion that any of them would have paid the least attention to his stories; at this his last arrival among them, or I should not have left the nation when I did. At the second time when he was here, he must have observed that, in many of the Lower towns, men of note still cherished the memory of the British; of this circumstance he had the art to avail himself; and on his arrival he associated with those of that description, declaring that he was sent as an agent of the British ministry to them only, and to take up the cause that I had deserted, to become an American. That the treaty of New York must not be confirmed by the nation, as the British were sending supplies to support the nation in a war with the United States, with a great deal more stuff, calculated to mislead the credulous savage; and it has had its intended effect, in exciting a clamor among those who held negroes taken in the war, and are averse to restoring them; and those who had been favorites of the British Governors of the Floridas, and have been reduced to an inferior situation since their departure, hope to regain their former consequence, all side with Bowles.

The Cussetahs, at the head of those who are in the interest of the United States, are considerable, overbalance the other, but have not firmness to oppose, with vigor, the other chiefs; and add to all this, the Spaniards, since the peace, have gained an influence likewise in this country. An officer of theirs is now here with an Indian interpreter; from what I can learn, the Spaniards are alarmed, and he means to have a meeting and talk with those of the Lower towns, and I am invited to Pensacola in pressing terms. Such is the present state of this country; I am truly sorry that it is so, at least among the principals of the Lower towns. The Upper Creeks have never taken any part with Bowles' partizans, though it cannot be long ere these dispositions must subside, as the vagabond who fomented them is held a prisoner in the Havana.

He had written some letters to the Governor of West Florida in a bullying style; this circumstance gave the Don an opportunity of laying hold of him. The Baron de Carondelet, Governor of New Orleans, sent an armed vessel to the bay of Apalachy, where Bowles remained after borrowing some of Panton, Leslie & Co's. goods to clothe his gang and self. The Spanish captain told Bowles that his letters were favorably received, and the Governor wished much to see him; to converse on the subject of his letters; he accordingly went on board the Spaniard, and was conveyed to Orleans, and from thence he was despatched to the Havana, where he possibly will be detained longer than he desires.

In June last, the articles of the treaty were explained to the chiefs of the Upper, Middle, and Lower towns of the nation; they would not agree to cede the south fork of the Oconee, as the source of it is directly between this and the Cherokees, and within the limits reserved to the latter by the United States. You will recollect, sir, that I had great objection to making the south fork the limit, and when you insisted so much, I candidly told you that it might be made an article, but I could not pledge myself to get it confirmed, nor that of the negro property, having often changed owners.

I earnestly recommend that the north side of the Oconee be accepted, that being the original object of dispute; however trifling it may appear on the map, it is a very considerable tract of country; considering the numbers and the present situation of this country, hemmed in on all sides, it cannot spare more. And I assure you from my heart, that I by no means desire to see any disputes revive between us; and I now find, from a conversation with the officer a few minutes ago, that it is the wish of his country, and that the nation will be supported in all its claims and rights, and that no land at all ought to be ceded to the United States. This kind of language had been used by some of that party some time ago, on their return from visits to Orleans, but they were not noticed; it may not make considerable impression as matters are circumstanced. I can take no open steps against them; our friends have too much at stake on that side.

My personal attendance at the Rock Landing about running the line, is not absolutely necessary; men of note were appointed by the Cussetahs and Cowetas, who had the management last year; they now can perform that business. It is very important that I should learn the motives of the Spaniards for this conduct; they knew when we were going to New York to treat, and they did not oppose the measure then.

The money allowed us by the treaty is another subject of dispute among the Indians; 'tis too much for the few who pretend to it, and too little for the many; therefore I must desire, that it be withheld entirely. The six chiefs are worthy men, and they get theirs in a way that others know nothing of it.

It has been said, that if the treaty be not fully complied with, it would blast my reputation; let the candid mind consider the foregoing, and the nature of the people whom I have to manage, and it cannot impute blame to me.

You may rely on it, sir, that, as matters are at present circumstanced, if I cannot render the United States any essential services, I will not encourage, but endeavor to prevent, any measures of any people, that may be planned against the interests of the United States.

I am with, every sentiment of respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEX. M'GILLIVRAY.

Hon. Major General H. KNOX,

Secretary of the Department of War of the United States of America.

His Excellency the Governor of South Carolina to the President of the United States.

DEAR SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you copies of letters from General Pickens and Colonel Anderson, on the subject of Indian Affairs. To me, I confess, their intelligence is unexpected: for I thought the justice and friendship the United States had treated the Creeks and Cherokees with, had entirely secured their confidence and respect; and that, notwithstanding the attempts of the Northern and Western Indians, the Spaniards, and perhaps the British, the Southern States would have been free from their hostility. To the enclosed letters I refer you for a full statement of their situation, and, as the opinions of General Pickens and Colonel Anderson, on Indian affairs, are much more to be depended upon than any others, I must submit to your better judgment the measures necessary to be pursued in this emergency, assuring you, that, while I continue in office, no endeavors of mine shall be wanting to carry your directions fully into execution. In answer to that part of Colonel Anderson's letter which seems to wish my authorizing an expedition immediately into the Indian country, I have said, that, having been always determined to make the Federal constitution my guide, and the individual States being very properly restrained from commencing or undertaking a war, without the authority of the Union, I should not feel myself, by any means, justified in sanctioning a measure of that kind, even from its necessity; because, however properly it may be done in this case, yet, still, if a precedent was once established, no doubt instances would frequently occur, where the Union might be involved in the most serious expenditures of blood and treasure, by the unjustifiable, or, perhaps, unprovoked and precipitate measures of interested States or individuals. I informed him I would, however, immediately submit the intelligence and opinions of General Pickens and himself, to you, and I had no doubt that proper measures would be adopted by the General Government to support our citizens and protect their rights. In the interim, I have ordered the frontiers of this country to be put in the best state of defence the situation of the militia will admit; and have sent, and mean to send them up such supplies of ammunition, as the commanding officer requires, and have directed block-houses to be built for the protection of the most exposed inhabitants of the frontier. The regiments of militia I have ordered to hold themselves in readiness, are some of them on, others near, and none of them more than eighty miles distant from the frontier; they consist of about 8,000 men altogether, of which I hope a sufficient number may be summoned, if they have notice, to protect it, as I have desired them to raise a corps of militia horse to each regiment, as soon as possible. I have also requested General Pickens and Colonel Anderson to send me their opinions on the subject, and, if they concur with me, I shall endeavor to have a deposite of ammunition, &c. established in a situation sufficiently near to supply them with ease, and, at the same time, so distant, as to be free from surprise. Our upper counties being covered, in some degree, by the more distant and extensive frontier of Georgia and North Carolina, I am hopeful the measures I have pursued may be sufficient to protect them, until some general system is adopted by the Union with respect to the war, which, I assure you, I am apprehensive will be much more serious than the Northern one, as the Southern States are not numerous, the frontiers extensive and exposed, the scene of action at a great distance from the seat of the Federal Government, and the hostile tribes strong and well supplied with arms and ammunition. Georgia will be the most severe sufferer: for, if a general Creek war takes place, which, from these accounts, seems unquestionable, I have very little doubt the greatest part of that country will soon be overrun by them. I shall write you again in a few days, by Mr. Barnwell, and remain, with the highest respect and attachment,

Dear sir, yours truly,

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

IN CHARLESTON, September 30th, 1792.

HOPEWELL, 13th September, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

On my arrival from the Western country, I had the pleasure of receiving your favors of the 8th and 26th July last, with their enclosures. I was very happy to see, by yours of the 26th July, that you had sent to the Colonels of the different regiments which I formerly had the honor to command, the acts of Congress, with your general orders. Had I not received this, I might have been induced to have sent the acts, and the orders from you to them, as a request from you to me, but not as an order so to do. It is long since I acquainted your Excellency what I had done in that respect, and I am now too far advanced in life to engage again in the trouble and difficulty of military affairs, especially with the militia; and have, perhaps, too long neglected the interest of a large family. Colonel Anderson, I expect, has written you fully on the state of affairs in this part of the country, and the prospects there are of a war with the Creeks, and some of the Cherokees; it might, perhaps, be well to give him some general orders, in case our frontiers should be attacked, and to make some necessary arrangements to prevent a surprise. Ammunition, I know, is very scarce in the frontier parts of this State, and I find that circumstance very much discourages the people. Whilst I was in the Western country, attending the treaties with Governor Blount, I found that country, particularly Cumberland, in a most pitiable and distressed situation, almost continually harassed by the Creeks, and the four Lower towns of the Cherokees, on the Tennessee. Just before we went there, a small station was taken, with about nineteen or twenty persons in it; all were killed or taken, but three or four who made their escape. This was done by a party of Cherokees, Creeks, and a few Shawanes, who had resided among the Cherokees for some years past; several others were killed and wounded in this country while I was there. From the different accounts which I had from the Chickasaws and Choctaws, in private conversation, as well as from persons from that country, all agree that the Spaniards are using all their influence with the Southern Indians, to engage them against the United States; and I am clearly of opinion, that the Creeks are on the eve of going to war with us, as well as those four Lower towns of the Cherokees. I believe there is no doubt but the chiefs, and a number of the warriors of the Creeks, are now at Pensacola in treaty with the Spaniards; they are soon expected here, with a large quantity of ammunition, for the purpose of going to war; the same thing has been offered to those tribes we have lately been in treaty with. This the chiefs told us in confidence; but the Chickasaws appear well attached to the interest of the United States, so did the Choctaws who attended the treaty; but the Spaniards have great influence over a great part of that nation. The cause of our misfortunes with the Indians in general, is of an old date; and our misfortunes in the Northern campaign, the last two years, and, I fear, our prospects the present expedition, in that quarter, are not favorable; all those things are against us, and encourage our enemies. Were I to venture an opinion respecting our Southern country, it would be this: make immediate preparation for the defence of the frontiers, and, as soon as possible, carry a vigorous campaign into the Creek country; this would convince the Southern Indians, in general, that we are able and determined to protect ourselves, and would chastise their insolence. This might prevent the junction of more tribes against than perhaps is now expected. It is vain to attempt treaties with the Creeks, or to make any offers to them, until they are chastised by the arm of Government.

It may be objected, that provisions are scarce in the country; that is true; but flour could be brought from Philadelphia and New York, to Savannah, and from thence to Augusta, by water, at no great expense; without some such measures are taken, I dread the consequences. Mr. Shaw, an agent from Congress, has lately come in here, and left the Cherokee nation; he thinks it unsafe at present to return, although a great majority of the Cherokees appear friendly to the United States. I have just received information that two Indians, one a chief from one of the four disaffected Cherokee towns, are on their way here, but what their business is, or talks may be, I know not.

I am, &c.

Robert Anderson to the Governor of South Carolina.—Wednesday Morning, 12th September, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

Before I had sealed your letter, and just now, I received the following intelligence, which I send you, in the author's name and words:

An extract of a letter from General Pickens, of this date.

"Mr. Shaw, agent from Congress to the Cherokees, arrived here last evening. I was from home till in the night. He says, the four Lower towns of the Cherokees in the Tennessee, have declared for war, with John Watts at their head, who was lately with the Spaniards at Pensacola. He says they were to set out in a body, on the 4th instant, and to make a stroke at Cumberland, or the settlements near Knoxville, on the Holston. He expects that their number will be from four to five hundred; the Creeks will no doubt make a part. He says the Creek chiefs are not yet returned from Pensacola, but are expected shortly, with a large quantity of ammunition, for the purpose of war. The other parts of the Cherokees from Estanaula, this way, advised him to come down here, and sent a guard with him. As you are about writing to the Governor, I have sent you this intelligence, as I wish you to write fully to him, as I am well assured, if some immediate measures are not taken to prevent it, this country will be in a distressed situation.

"ANDREW PICKENS.

"TO ROBERT ANDERSON."

SIR: Having previously conversed with the general, and having consulted my own reason, on the present prospect of Indian affairs, my real sentiments were as communicated in the letter, of the rectitude of which, there is a strong confirmation. We can only expect now to hear of the perpetration of such acts of savage cruelty, committed on the defenceless inhabitants, in all quarters of an extensive frontier, a circumstance which must be regretted by every feeling heart.

Your most obedient,

ROBERT ANDERSON.

Governor PINCKNEY.

Robert Anderson to the Governor of South Carolina.—20th September, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

Although I wrote you very fully on the subject of Indian affairs, by Captain Maxwell, which you cannot have received, nor perhaps may not, before this reaches you, yet, having since received a more full and particular information, and thinking it my duty to do every thing in my power, which may contribute, in the smallest degree, towards the safety of the lives of our citizens, I have therefore taken the liberty to write you, by express.

I send you, enclosed, the affidavit of Jesse Spears, who also will be the bearer of this. He will be upon the spot, and your Excellency can question him upon the subject. This man escaped from the Cherokees in the year 1775, came into our settlements, and gave us notice of a premeditated stroke then intended by the Cherokees against our frontier settlements. He was the only one who escaped, at least to our quarter; the Indians having been very careful to kill or otherwise secure their traders, to prevent their escaping with such intelligence as might counteract or frustrate their designs. But they struck as he had notified, and (which is very remarkable) they struck at the same time, all along the extensive frontier from Georgia to Virginia. At another time, in 1782, this same man came down, and gave notice of a strong party of Indians and Tories, who were to embody or rendezvous, beyond the Oconee river, on the back of Georgia, by a certain day, to make a stroke on the frontier settlements of that State. On his information, we immediately raised one hundred men, General Clarke as many, fell in with the party at the time and place appointed, and totally broke them up. I mention those circumstances to strengthen the belief of his present information. I have ordered the people to build block-houses, where they are exposed and intimidated, to fly to with their families, in case of alarm. I have frontier block-houses built and building, at suitable places along our frontiers, at the distance of about eight or ten miles apart; five are on the way, some of which are nearly completed, but I believe another must be appointed to complete the chain. I have ordered trusty spies to be constantly kept out at Tugulo and the Oconee mountain, as they are the spots (in all appearance) which will be most exposed. I have ordered a few men from the more interior part of the regiment, to each of the frontier posts; but in some places, there is a difficulty in providing them with provisions, the settlements being thin on the frontier, the people poor, and their improvements and crops but small. I mention those matters, to show what is done in the mean time, and to beg your Excellency's further orders and directions in those matters.

Permit me to observe, that we (having had so much experience in the ways of Indian warfare) are of opinion, that it is very expensive, hazardous, and distressing, to carry on a defensive war with Indians; they have such advantages, being so wolfish in their manner, and so savage in their nature, that we cannot war with them upon equal ground, when we only pretend to defend ourselves in our own country. Experience has discovered it to be much the better way to carry the war immediately into their own country. They seem not to be so well calculated to oppose a spirited attack in their own country, as they are to take skulking, wolfish advantages of the defenceless in ours. A very speedy and spirited attack in their country, might, perhaps, rid us of a war which might become very hazardous and expensive in the long run. We think that, if a party of men could possibly be marched through the peaceable towns, and into the disaffected towns of the Cherokees, before the Creeks made a stroke, that it might check the Creeks; at least, it might keep back their premeditated stroke, until the clumsy wheels of Government could be got turned.

But we are well aware that, if the Creeks do immediately break, (of which there is but little room to doubt) and the U. States are obliged to carry on a defensive war, if only till next June, yet it will cost them much blood and treasure; perhaps double as much as would keep our army in their country during the time. These conclusions we are warranted to draw from past experience. I just returned home from reviewing the frontier parts of the regiment—found this man waiting to give the information; the general (with whom he had been) being so unwell that he could not do the business. However, I have since seen and conversed with him on this subject; he is still unwell, but I hope will soon be recovered. Although I have been uniformly opposed to war, and therefore have been decidedly of opinion, that the strictest justice should be done to the different Indian tribes, to evade the disagreeable necessity as long as possible; and, that, if the United States must be dragged into war, they might engage in the business with that conscious rectitude on their part, which cannot fail to embolden the soldier, and give decision to the politician. Then firmness is truly justifiable, as well as absolutely necessary. But now, sir, you may rest assured, that the moment has arrived, when the most spirited exertions of Government are necessary, and I am truly sorry that the citizens cannot be permitted to defend themselves in the best way, without the approbation of Government; I mean by an offensive war; because I am of opinion that much could be done in the course of two months from this date; much blood and treasure might be saved, by a spirited exertion, before they were aware; and I have no doubt, but two or three thousand of the militia from this State and Georgia, could be immediately raised, to march light into the Creek country; about five hundred militia, horse, the rest infantry, with pack-horses. Two thousand more, from the Western Territory and North Carolina, in the same manner to march through and destroy the disaffected Cherokee towns, which would be just on their way, and meet in the Creek country, destroy what they could, and so return. This would only be a temporary relief, but it would greatly check the impetuosity of their present disposition, and, in all appearance, would save the lives of many innocent people. This could be done; and the people have firmness and resolution enough to carry such a plan into execution, if they had the sanction of any authority; self-defence would be a stimulus to spur them on. Could such a plan be sanctioned by the President of the United States and yourself, in time, I think it would be of great utility, and I have no doubt (in all human probability) but it would be carried into effect. But if your Excellency would even consent to risk your approbation to such a plan, and depend upon the necessity of the case, to justify the measure in the eyes of the President and Congress, I have hardly any doubt but that the Western country people would do their part, at all ventures: for they are well calculated for such enterprises. But if any thing of the kind was attempted to be carried into effect, General Pickens must be appointed to the command, in preference to every other man, for two reasons: first, because the people have confidence in him, and will cheerfully turn out to go under his command; and, in the next place, because he is most equal to the task. I have never hinted it to him, but I think he will serve, from the same cause by which I think the people will be induced to turn out, namely, self-defence, or, more properly, the defence of the country in which he lives; and I do think him the most suitable person that could be appointed, and he thinks it might be done in the way I have stated, as I have conversed with him on the subject. But I fear it cannot find authority under which it can claim protection; indeed, should an expedition into their country next spring, be approved, we are very scarce of flour in these Southern States, as the rust killed up the wheat generally. This is an unfortunate circumstance, but there is flour enough in the Northern States, which could be shipped to Savannah, in Georgia, and brought up in boats to Augusta. All those things must be done this winter, else no campaign in the spring; then we may as well dissolve the Union, as to pretend to hold together, because Georgia will be ruined, perhaps this State, and several others much injured. Indeed, I am of opinion (if they see Congress tardy, or relax in their exertions, as they have been against the Northern tribes) they will soon have Spain to contend with, and perhaps one more of the European Powers. Pardon these suggestions; they have just rose as I have wrote them down, for the bearer waits. I am in haste, and have kept no copy. I wrote for arms and ammunition, if possible, in my last, and, as the necessity is not lessened by this, I need not repeat the request. You will please pay the bearer for carrying this.

Your Excellency's, &c.

WABASH AND ILLINOIS TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 8, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 8th November, 1792.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to inform the honorable the Senate, that, yesterday afternoon, an express arrived, with information from Major Hamtramck, dated at Post Vincennes, on the 4th of October, that Brigadier General Putnam, who then was sick, had, on the 27th day of September, concluded a treaty of peace with the Wabash and Illinois Indians, consisting of the following tribes, to wit: Eel river Indians, Ouatansons, Pattawatamies of the Illinois river, Musquitoes, the Kickapoos of the Wabash, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias, and Peorians; and that Brigadier General Putnam was to forward to the hostile Indians, by certain chiefs of the Wabash, the messages, of which copies are herewith submitted.

Lieutenant Prior also writes, on the sixteenth ultimo, from Louisville, on the Ohio, that he has arrived there with sixteen chiefs of the Wabash Indians, who are proceeding to Philadelphia, by the way of Pittsburg.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most ob't humble servant,

H. KNOX, Sec'y of War.

The Honorable the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the United States.

The Speech of Rufus Putnam, Agent to General Washington, for the purpose of treating with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio, and concluding a peace with the same.

BROTHERS of the Delawares, Shawanese, Miamies, Wyandotts, and all other tribes inhabiting the country on the Miami and Sandusky rivers, and on the lake:

The Great Chief of the United States, General Washington, has sent, since early in the spring, messages of peace to you; and I, who have come from this Great Chief and his council, more than four months ago, have also sent a speech to you for that purpose.

BROTHERS: After waiting a long time for your answer, and not receiving any; I was encouraged to speak to the nations on the Wabash and Illinois rivers, and finding their ears open, I held a treaty with them at Tshubhicking, (Post Vincennes) where we have buried the hatchet; wiped off all the stains of blood; and concluded a firm and everlasting peace.

BROTHERS: I believe, were you but once agreed to hear what I have to say to you, and should meet, see, and hear me, you would find that it would be for your good. As long as we don't see and hear one another, but listen to the singing birds, which fly to and fro, we are carried away with every story, and not only remain strangers to one another, but enemies also.

BROTHERS: Open your ears to the truth. I speak from my heart, not with my lips only. I wish to see you happy. I wish a peace established between you and the United States. I wish to see your women and children go to rest without fear, and your young men become industrious hunters, so that you all, young and old, may live comfortably.

BROTHERS: All this can be the case if you choose it. The United States don't mean to wrong you out of your lands. They don't want to take away your lands by force. They want to do you justice.

Now, Brothers, I send you this my speech by some of those who have been here at this treaty. They have seen and heard me, and are witnesses to all that has passed between us, and they will tell you the truth.

BROTHERS: When you have heard my speech, and all that my messengers have to say to you, I desire your wise men to consider it well. The great and good spirit will then convince them of the good intentions of the United States, and that the road is yet open to them to become a happy people.

BROTHERS: I desire you to send some of your wise men with my messengers to meet me at the mouth of Muskingum, that we may see one another, and speak together, before I return again to our Great Chief, General Washington. I shall direct every thing so that you will have nothing to fear. Arise then, come and see me, and let us shake hands with one another. [A belt.]

POST VINCENNES, Oct. 5th, 1792.

In addition to the above speech, of Brigadier General Putnam, the following was addressed to the Delawares, in particular, viz: the Delaware chiefs and captains, Walendawechen, Pachgañtschihillas, Muchingwe, Pushees, Captain Pipe, &c.

BROTHERS: I am come from Bethlehem to assist in establishing a peace between you and the United States. You know I have lived with you many years, and love you. I sincerely wish your nation well and happy.

BROTHERS: The Great Chief who has spoke to you is a good man; he loves you, and will always speak the truth to you; I wish you to listen to his words, and do as he desires you. If you do so, you will find it will be good for your women and children.

BROTHERS: It is true many things have happened which were bad; but these things were the consequences of the war.

BROTHERS: I desire you not to look to what has passed, but to come forth and speak to this Great Chief, who will, with your assistance, remove all that is bad, and make every thing clear and light again. Rise, therefore, and don't lose this fine opportunity. Consider your nation; you are their wise men; they look to you to do what is good.

BROTHERS: If you come to the mouth of Muskingum, I shall see you and assist you in your business.

JOHN HECKEWELDER.

POST VINCENNES, October 5, 1792.

General Putnam's speech to the Indians, inviting a deputation to Philadelphia.

BROTHERS: I thank the Great Spirit, who has inclined our hearts to do good, and to establish a good peace between you and the United States.

BROTHERS: Let us endeavor to restore peace and happiness to all, as far as lies in our power, and for this purpose I request that you will send a speech to your neighbors, Miamies, Delawares, Shawanese, and other tribes, who have hitherto stopped their ears, and refused to speak with the United States about peace; although many speeches have been sent to them for that purpose.

BROTHERS: I propose to send one speech more, requesting them to open a road to some place or other, where we may meet and speak to one another; and I trust, with your assistance, that the Great Spirit will cause the good work to succeed.

BROTHERS: Our Great Chief, General Washington, is very desirous to see a number of your chiefs; to take them by the hand, and smoke the pipe of peace with them, at his council fire—there to brighten the chain of friendship, and personally convince them of the goodness of his heart, and show how strong he and all the great chiefs of the United States hold you.

BROTHERS: If you agree that one or two chiefs from each tribe should visit the Great Chief, General Washington, as I propose, I shall provide for every expense of the journey, and a safe convoy and accommodation, both going and returning. The route will be from here to the falls of Ohio, by land, thence by water to Pittsburg, and from thence by land to Philadelphia.

BROTHERS: If you listen to me in this, I have no doubt but you will find the interest and happiness of your tribes greatly increased, by the good things which the Great Chief will do further for you.

BROTHERS: I wish you to take my words into consideration, and return me an answer as soon as you have determined.

[2d SESSION.]

SOUTHERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 15, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November, 15th 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to submit to the honorable the Senate, by order of the President of the United States, an extract of a letter from James Seagrove Esq, temporary agent to the Creek Nation, dated the 28th ultimo, containing further information relative to Indian affairs in the Southern department.

I have the honor to be, sir, with perfect respect, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the Honorable the Senate of the United States.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War, dated

ST. MARY'S, 23th October, 1792.

My last respects were under date of the 17th instant, per the sloop Polly, via Savannah. Since then, I have received frequent accounts from the Creek nation, all of which are favorable for our country.

The greatest part of the chiefs, and many of their people, are on their way to me. In four days from this time, I expect part of them in.

Yesterday, my interpreter, Mr. Bryant, arrived from the nation, and brought me a letter from General McGilivray, a copy of which I now enclose. I know not how you may like this letter of the General's; I confess it does not by any means please me. It is, however, as I expected; that, if matters did not succeed to the wish of his Spanish friends, that we should see him back in the nation, acting with the same duplicity he ever hath done. His pretensions as to being the means of bringing the Indians to meet me at this time, are fallacious, as on a review of matters will plainly appear.

The Cowetas and Cussetahs were the first to request it, at the Rock Landing, in July last. At that time, he was not in the nation, and his absence since must have prevented, not having had any intercourse with the people. Their different talks to me, plainly show it was their own act. The favorable change of sentiment, as well as conduct of the Creek nation, since his absence, is conspicuous in a great degree. Would to God he had continued a few months longer with his friends in West Florida; but no, that would not answer their purpose; he is sent back to distract our measures, and, if possible, prevent any thing being done. His assertions with respect to the Indians being averse to running the line, are absolutely false. I am confident that all those interested in the event, are anxious to have it done, which doubtless you have observed in their communications with me.

Unfortunate man! I really pity him. He must now feel severe stings for his want of integrity to the United States, and gratitude to his benefactors, and is extremely hard driven to keep his head above water, and carry on his scene of deception toward them.

I have reason to dread that he comes determined to undermine and injure our cause all in his power; but I hope the Indians are, or will be convinced, that the United States are their best friends, and will not be led by him.

Observe again, we have his frivolous excuse, want of horses to attend our meeting. It is saying very little for his influence or consequence in the nation, that he cannot command a horse to ride. He can find plenty for any other service; but the truth is, he is ashamed to meet many of the chiefs, who, he knows, would upbraid him for his conduct, and at the same time fears offending his Spanish friends.

These, sir, are my sentiments of this man, and though I shall act to him as placing the greatest confidence in all he does or says, yet, in my heart, I must despise him, and of course will watch strictly all his plans and designs, and give you my candid opinion of them.

If I am not very much opposed by his underhand machinations, I shall have the line run this winter. I think it will be the most favorable season; the difficulty in the woods will not be so great, and the health of the troops will not be in so great danger.

What McGillivray says respecting the intrusions of the white people from the frontier of Cumberland, I have reason to fear is but too true; but this you must have more direct from Governor Blount.

It is to be lamented that the insatiable rage which our frontier brethren have for extending their limits, could not be checked, and kept within the bounds set them by the General Government. The United States, like most other countries, is unfortunate in having the worst class of people on her frontiers, where there is least energy to be expected in her civil government; and where, unless supported in the early stages of settlement by military force, civil authority becomes a nullity.

I am extremely sorry to hear that the Cherokees are likely to be hostile to the United States. I am happy to say that I cannot discover a trace of disaffection or backsliding in the Creeks, in consequence of the commotions among the Cherokees. No endeavors on my part shall be wanting to keep them apart.

Should the Cherokees have the audacity to take up arms against the United States, I fondly hope that not a moment will be lost in chastising them in the most exemplary manner. If they are allowed to proceed any length, and are successful, the infection will unquestionably spread among the other Southern tribes, and when, or where it may end, God only knows. Permit me to suggest the idea of a spirited, powerful volunteer expedition, from the three Southern States, being immediately sent into their country, and break them up.

About six days past, arrived here from the Rock Landing, a detachment of twenty men, under command of Lieutenant Nicoll, of the artillery. By him I received your favor of the 11th of August last, with one thousand dollars in bank bills, as also, the whole of the silver ware you mention, which shall be disposed of agreeably to your wish.

Last evening, arrived here, the sloop Commerce, Wm. Morrison, master, from Philadelphia, with the remainder of the five thousand bushels of corn, and some few dry goods, for Indian use. I shall discharge her as soon as possible, at the same place with the rest, where are very commodious stores provided.

If nothing unforeseen take place, I shall return with the chiefs into the nation.

It would be of great utility to the service, as well as to the citizens and commerce of this country, if the Post Office would extend their posts to this place. It now comes within eighty-five miles (to Sunbury) and from thence is a very good wagon road to this place, by the way of Reed's Bluff, on the Altamaha; where is a regularly kept ferry; from thence to the Burnt Fort, on Great Setilla, where is also a ferry; and from thence to this town, only thirty-five miles. I hope you will see the great certainty this would add to all communications; and therefore will urge its being carried into effect, as soon as possible.

[ENCLOSURES.]

James Durouzeaux, Indian Interpreter, to James Seagrove, Esquire.

COWETA, 15th October, 1792.

SIR:

I am desired by the chiefs of the Cowetas and Cussetahs to inform you, that they have once more agreed to come and see you at St. Mary's: I send you General McGillivray's letter, for fear I cannot get a horse to do myself the honor of waiting on you, as I have had the misfortune to lose all mine, by a distemper that has proved very mortal amongst the horses with us.

The Indians beg you will be so kind as to acquaint them, by a runner, the place of meeting; and to have plenty of provisions for them, as they are very scarce: some families have made none this summer.

As to other particulars, I refer until I come down, which will be with the Indians, if I can get a horse.

I am, sir, &c.

JAMES DUROUZEUX, Interpreter.

KINNARD'S COWPEN, in the Creek Nation, 15th October, 1792.

SIR:

I arrived here this morning, and, finding the Lower Towns on their way down, Mr. Kinnard and myself thought proper for Mr. Bryant to return as soon as possible to you. We still find that some busy person is still trying to stop the Cussetahs, and towns round them, from coming down to you. But I hope to be in the Cussetahs in two days from this time; and shall try to put a stop to such proceedings; and I flatter myself that I shall be able to bring the chiefs down to your satisfaction. We have heard that General McGillivray is come home, but don't intend coming down.

The Indians that Willbanks sent to Providence, are returned, and very much displeased at Lord Dunmore's treatment, not giving them any presents, and little countenance. I shall make all speed to return, but not till I see the chiefs and Indians set off, that I may be sure there will be no disappointment to you.

JOHN GALPHIN.

LITTLE TALLASSEE, 9th October, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I wrote you some time in May last, informing you of the situation of matters in this country, and of my intention to visit the Baron de Carondelet, the new Governor of Louisiana. So, on my return, landing in Mobile, there I got a violent fever which long held me: at Pensacola I found a letter from you. On my coming home, not being fully recovered, I could not go to the Lower Towns, and I sent for the Micos and warriors of the Cussetahs and Coweta towns to come up to me, and bring with them, what talks or letters you might have sent to them during my absence. They came, and handed me the talk which you delivered to the Indians in July, at the Rock Landing. On my leaving the nation, I desired them, in the most pressing terms, to pay no attention to the clamor raised by Bowles, (or, as they called themselves, the English party) but to proceed to meet you at the Rock Landing without delay, and finish the business of the nation, as has been agreed upon, at the last general meeting. They gave as a reason for not doing it, that the opposite party threatened to proceed to direct hostilities against Georgia, if the line was attempted to be run; and rather than bring on that mischief, it was agreed to postpone the matter until my return.

I found the Spaniards much alarmed at the treaty of New York, and seemed bent to use every means to overstep it. In the four months of my absence, their agents held several meetings to persuade the Indians to proceed to hostilities; but the chiefs wisely declined any measures until my arrival.

The Baron and I had long conversations on the subject of the treaty of New York. I observed to him, that, considering the circumstances under which I treated; we had no reason to complain; nor did the stipulation of it clash with those we concluded on at Pensacola, in 1784; nor would the massacre of women and children, of the State of Georgia, be of any service to the Spanish interest, and as he declared that his interference was only meant to support the rights and claims of the nation, agreeable to the article stipulated in the Pensacola treaty; that we, being the only proper judges of our own affairs, to let us settle them as we deemed best for our advantages. Agreeable to this, I have instructed the Cussetahs and Cowetas, (they being the representation of the White and War towns, and to whom it was left by a general voice in meeting, to settle the affairs of the limits) to lose no time in meeting, for the purpose to which they have assented, seemingly fully determined, and Durouzeaux attends and urges them on as fast as possible. And this letter will be sent express, via Kinnard's; and the Micoes set out in a fortnight.

I am concerned to remark, that the peace cannot be preserved so generally as we wish, owing to the Cumberland people persisting in attempting to extend their settlements south to the Chickasaw nation, in which they are assisted by Piamingo of that nation, who is not a real Chickasaw by descent, yet by his merit, as a warrior, has an influence over a party which he leads. A meeting between them has been lately held on the Cherokee river, at which the Mingo of that nation likewise attended. The result, I hear, is, that he refused the demand made for extending the settlements of the whites further west and south than Cumberland; and the hunters of this quarter will attack all they can find attempting it, or have got beyond their bounds.

The strictest inquiry has been made, without effect, to discover the murderers of young Pew: neither the gun or horse has been seen in the nation in any one's possession. This affair will deter (I imagine) any Indian from venturing in the settlements. It is of no consequence whether a line is run or not, as I have already explained to the honorable the Secretary of War. The river is a boundary that can't be mistaken or removed. For the rest I refer you to the Cussetah, Mico, and the interpreter.

We have heard of the discontents and threats of the frontier people. Let me recommend to you to settle matters as the nation now offers, and leave something to time.

A distemper, the like has not been known in the memory of man, has raged among our horses for these two years, and still continues; most of the traders and Indians have no horses left. The Choctaws and Chickasaws are in the same situation. I am entirely on foot, and to fill up the measure of distress, a bad season is starving us. With most sincere esteem and best wishes,

I remain, my dear Sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY.

NORTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 6, 1792.

*Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives:*

The several measures which have been pursued to induce the hostile Indian tribes, North of the Ohio, to enter into a conference or treaty with the United States, at which all causes of difference might be fully understood, and justly and amicably arranged, have already been submitted to both Houses of Congress.

The papers herewith sent will inform you of the result.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December the 6th, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 6th, 1792.

SIR:

In explanation of the speeches from the chiefs of the Six Nations, herewith submitted, it may be proper to observe, that Jasper Parish, who is a temporary interpreter to those tribes, informs verbally, that the said chiefs returned from the hostile tribes to Buffalo Creek about the last of October. That they immediately sent a runner to General Chapin, the temporary agent to the Six Nations, and who resides at Canandaigua, about ninety or one hundred miles distant. That he being absent, his son and the interpreter repaired to Buffalo Creek, where they received the said speeches.

Besides the papers transmitted by Mr. Chapin, the interpreter says, that a list of the tribes which composed the council at the Au Glaize, on the Miami river of Lake Erie, was taken by Mr. Chapin, but he omitted to transmit it.

He was informed by the chiefs of the Six Nations, that, at the council of the hostile Indians, which was numerous, but the numbers not specified, no other white person was admitted but Simon Girty, whom they considered as one of themselves.

That the chiefs of the Shawanese were the only speakers, on the part of the hostile Indians, and Red Jacket, the Seneca Chief, the only speaker on the part of the friendly Indians.

That Captain Brandt did not arrive at the Au Glaize until after the council had broken up, which, probably, by a comparison of circumstances, happened about the 10th or 12th of October.

That Captain Hendricks, the chief of the Stockbridge Indians, had proved unfaithful, having delivered the message, belt, and map, with which he was entrusted for the hostile Indians, to Mr. McKee, the British Indian agent, and that the said Hendricks did not repair to the council at all.

The said Jasper Parish also adds, that Red Jacket was exceedingly desirous of repairing to Philadelphia in person, but Mr. Chapin apprehending the expenses, persuaded him to the contrary. This circumstance is exceedingly to be regretted, as further information and explanations would be highly desirable at this moment, in order to judge with greater precision of the meaning of the speeches, which may have suffered in the translation, as well as in other respects.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect, your obedient and humble servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

CANANDAIGUA, November 22, 1792.

Sir:

Enclosed are the speeches of the Western Indians to the Six Nations, as also their speeches delivered to me in council, at Buffalo creek, which will be handed you by Mr. Parish, who is employed by the United States as an interpreter to my father,

You will observe by them, the mode the Indians wish to have pursued, to hold a council next spring; perhaps Mr. Parish can give you some information, which is not noted in the speeches, though I think every observation is minuted.

There were a number of gentlemen from Niagara, who attended the council at Buffalo creek, amongst which, was Colonel Butler, the Indian agent under the British Government, who, in some of his leisure hours, expressed himself, that unless proper means were taken, a lasting peace could not take place; but if the United States' proposals are honorable, he would give every assistance in his power, but if otherwise, he should prevent a peace taking place.

Major Littletrates, who represented Governor Simcoe, assured me it was the disposition of the Governor to give every assistance in his power to procure peace on equitable terms.

I am, sir, with every sentiment of respect and esteem,

Your humble servant,

ISRL. CHAPIN, Jr.

Hon. HENRY KNOX, Esq.

BUFFALO CREEK, November 16, 1792.

BROTHERS, PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, AND KING'S PEOPLE, take notice!

Last winter the President took us by the hand, and led us to the council fire, at Philadelphia; there they made known to us their friendship, and requested of us to proceed to the Westward, and to use our influence to make peace with the hostile Indians: we went accordingly, and made known to them our agreement.

When we returned from Philadelphia to Buffalo creek, the chiefs that remained at home on their seats, was well pleased with what we had done at Philadelphia; and after we had determined to proceed on our journey, some of our chiefs was detained on account of sickness.

BROTHERS, PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, AND KING'S PEOPLE:

After we arrived at the Westward, we met with an agreeable reception; they informed us we was their oldest brothers, and appeared as the sun risen on them, as they always looked to them for advice.

It is now four years since we have heard your voices, and should be happy now to hear what you have to relate to us.

The Six Nations then requested of the Western Indians what they had to relate to them, as they kindled the council fire.

The WESTERN INDIANS replied: About four years since your voices came to us, desiring us to combine ourselves together, as we was the eldest people of this island, and all of one color, that our minds may be one.

This they informed us they had attended to, and exhibited a large bunch of wampum to prove the same, from each nation.

To confirm it still further, they informed us we sent them a pipe, which passed through all the nations at the west and southward; all smoked out of it, both women and children; and as this pipe has been through the nations, and all smoked out of it, they then returned it to us, and bid us to smoke out of it ourselves.

BROTHERS: Listen once to your eldest brothers: Our forefathers have handed down to us, that we are one people, of one color, on this island, and ought to be of one mind, and had made our minds strong, and had become as one people in peace and friendship.

This being done, our chiefs agreed to hand it down to future posterity, and the same combination to continue down to them.

The nation called the Unions, took a brand from our fire and kindled it, and became a people with us; then we considered ourselves as one people, combined together.

And now there is a white people on this island who are watching our conduct; but let us attend to our own concerns, and brighten the chain of friendship with our nations: and as our minds are one, let us consider future posterity, and not consider those young warriors who are in the prime of life, and so much engaged in the pursuit of land, &c. which is the cause of so much difficulty at present.

BROTHERS: Consider your country, which is good, and conduct yourselves in such a manner as to keep it to yourselves and posterity.

Now, BROTHERS: You present us the pipe you say your oldest brothers sent you; you say your head chiefs all smoked out of it, and returning it to us again, all took it, and smoked out of it ourselves, in friendship. Now, as we are thus combined together, we are able to lift a heavy burden.

SHAWANEE NATION.—OUR ELDEST BROTHERS: We have heard what you have related—we have heard it with attention; we consider it as if you delivered it from the outside of your lips; although you consider us your younger brothers, your seats are not at such a distance, but what we can see your conduct plainly; these are the reasons why we consider you to speak from the outside of your lips; for whenever you hear the voice of the United States, you immediately take your packs and attend their councils.

We see plainly folded under your arm the voice of the United States—wish you to unfold it to us, that we may see it freely and consult on it. [Speaking on a string of wampum of three strings, throwing it across the fire to us, instead of handing it in a friendly manner.]

Then we proceeded to relate the instructions of Congress, which is too tedious to relate, and which they already know; but when we first related it, we failed for interpreters, so that they had not a proper idea of it; they appeared to be very much ruffled in their minds, and adjourned the council to the next day; then it was interpreted properly to them, and they appeared easy in their minds.

ELDEST BROTHERS: You desire us to consider our country and property; we will accept of your advice, and proceed accordingly.

SIX NATIONS.—Let us look back to the time of white people coming into this country; very soon began to traffic for land. Soon after, Sir Wm. Johnston was sent as an agent from the King, and he began to purchase at the treaty at fort Stanwix, and purchased all east of the river Ohio.

A few years after this purchase, the people of the States and the King's people broke apart, and we being persuaded to take the King's part, became very bad for us. After a few years, the King was beat; then the States took possession of all the land the English formerly took from the French.

You tell us, we come with the voice of the United States; we do, together with the advice of the King. He tells us, not to throw our minds on either side, but to listen to reason, &c. and remain a people confederated.

SHAWANEE NATION.—NOW, ELDEST BROTHERS: You come to us with your opinion, and the voice of the United States. It is your mind to put an end to all hostilities. Brothers: now we will relate what took place last fall, in our country. General Washington sent an army into our country, which fell into our hands; their orders was thus, to proceed into our country as far as the Miami towns, to the Glazie; thence to Detroit, but not to molest the King's people, and if the army should meet any people that appeared friendly, to leave them behind their backs without harm.

The President of the United States must well know, why the blood is so deep in our paths. We have been informed, he has sent messengers of peace on these bloody roads, who fell on the way. And now, as he knows that road to be bloody, no communication to take place through that bloody way, as there is a path through the Six Nations' country, which is smooth and easy. If he wants to send the voice of peace, it must pass through this road.

ELDEST BROTHERS: We have been informed, the President of the United States thinks himself the greatest man on this Island. We had this country long in peace, before we saw any person of a white skin; we consider the people of a white skin the younger.

BROTHERS: You inform us it is the wish of the white people, to hold council with us, General Washington being the head-man; we will consent to treat with them; we desire you, our older brothers, to inform General Washington we will treat with him, at the Rapids of Miami, next spring, or at the time when the leaves are fully out.

We consider ourselves still the proper owners of some land on the east side of the Ohio.

But we will deliver up that, for money that has been paid to some individuals, for land on the west side of the river Ohio.

BROTHERS: You have given us a dish and one spoon, desiring the whole combination to eat with them; we accept of them, and shall do accordingly.

We are now about to complete the business you came on. When you return, you will make known to the President, what we have done; it may be, he will not consent to what we have proposed; and if he will not, we must call on you to assist in the heavy burden which will lie on us. We have opened a path for them and pointed out a way, and, if he will not walk in it, we must have your assistance.

Now, our ELDEST BROTHERS: When the President came to you, he took you aside to hear what he had to say. He desired you to come to us, and deliver the messages; you have delivered them, and we desire you to deliver the messages we have given you to deliver to him, and desire him to send a message back, what he will do respecting what we have done and concluded on; to forward it to you, and you to us. We will lay the bloody tomahawk aside, until we hear from the President of the United States, and when this message comes to us, we will send it to all the different nations. [Speaking on three strings of wampum.]

Speech from the Six Nations to the President.

You sent us on the Westward, with a message of peace to the hostile Indians.

We proceeded accordingly to your directions, and was protected, going and coming, by the Great Spirit.

We give thanks to the Great Spirit, that we have all returned safe to our seats.

While we was at the Westward, we exerted ourselves to bring about peace. The fatigues we underwent, are not small. Now, it is our desire for your people, on the Ohio, to lay down their arms, or otherwise it is all in vain, what we have done.

Now, if you wish for peace, you must make every exertion, and proceed through this path, we have directed for you. If peace does not take place, the fault must arise from your people.

We now desire you, brothers, to send forward agents, who are men of honesty, not proud land jobbers, but men who love and desire peace. Also, desire they may be accompanied by some Friend or Quaker, to attend the council.

Wish you to exert yourselves, to forward the message to the Western Indians as soon as possible; and we are taken by the hand, and have agreed, next spring, to attend the council at the Rapids of Miami, when we shall hear all that takes place there.

Hostile Indians to Governor Simcoe.

BROTHERS: We have been informed, the late Governor is a good man; we desire that you will take the Governor by the hand, and lead him to the council next spring. Exert yourselves to get him up, that he may not be backward; that he may sit side and side with the Americans at the time of the council. And when you take him by the hand, desire him to furnish us with provisions necessary for the treaty.

Six Nations to the Governor.

BROTHERS: Now, we have laid all our proceedings before you, which took place at the Westward. You have heard the request of your Western brothers, therefore, wish you to exert yourself to grant their requests.

You informed us, to listen to the voice of peace, wherever we might hear it. Now we hear the voice of peace; we call on you for assistance, that we may obtain peace through this Island.

BROTHERS: We now sit here together; you are the man who represents the United States; we have discerned, that too great a degree of pride has subsisted between the two Governments; we desire that it may be laid aside.

When the agents from the United States come forward to the council, we desire they may bring forward all records, plans, maps, and documents, that any way respect the lands purchased from the Indians.

Fish Carrier's Speech.

Desiring this degree of pride, which has heretofore subsisted, may be done away, and that each government will mutually consent and agree on terms of peace.

Cornplanter's Speech.

He informs, that he has always attended treaties, that has been held, and has always wished for peace, and has done all in his power for peace; that he has not advised any hostilities to commence on either side, and, now wishes each government to lay aside all pride and prejudice, and to use their endeavors for peace.

After the council was over, Major Littletrates, who represented Governor Simcoe on that occasion, answered the Indians as follows:

BROTHERS:

I shall lay before the governor, your requests; and respecting his furnishing you with provisions, &c. I doubt not but he will do it agreeable to your wishes. And also, to procure all records, plans, and documents, which shall be thought necessary, and to do every thing in his power to bring about a peace, so interesting to the United States, as well as to the British Government.

2d CONGRESS.]

No. 34.

[2d Session.

SOUTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 7, 1792.

*Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you two letters, with their enclosures, from the Governor of the Southwestern Territory, and an extract of a letter to him from the Department of War.

These, and a letter of the 9th of October last, which has been already communicated to you, from the same Department to the Governor, will show in what manner the first section of the act of the last session, which provides for calling out the militia for the repelling of Indian invasions, has been executed. It remains to be considered by Congress, whether, in the present situation of the United States; it be advisable or not, to pursue any further, or other measures, than those which have been already adopted. The nature of the subject does, of itself, call for your immediate attention to it. And I must add, that, upon the result of your deliberations, the future conduct of the Executive will, on this occasion, materially depend.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 7th, 1792.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, November 8th, 1792.

SIR:

I had the honor to receive your letter of the 15th August, on the 21st of October, by a return express from Richmond, the same that conveyed my letter of the 14th of September to that place, and to receive that of the 9th of October, by Mr. Tatham, express, on the 25th of the same month, whom I have detained until this time, to convey this letter as far as Richmond. The reason why I have so long detained him is, when he arrived, and several days after, I was so indisposed as to be confined to my room, and mostly to my bed, and until now I have not been able to write you in answer, as fully as the subject required. You request a statement of the alleged and actual causes for the violent conduct of the Indians. The letter of the Bloody Fellow to me, of the 10th September, contains all that I have ever heard alleged, a copy of which I forwarded to you, and my letter to him of the 13th, in answer, a copy of which I also forwarded to your office, will be found, I hope, to contain a sufficient answer to such alleged causes. The actual causes will be found in the narratives of Jo. Deraque and Richard Finselton, already transmitted to your office, and in that of James Carey, herewith enclosed, namely, the officers administering the government of Louisiana, and their instrument, Mr. Panton.

I enclose you a return of the persons killed, wounded, or carried into captivity, in or from this territory, since the first day of January, 1791, by the Creeks and Cherokees, including, under the name of the latter, those Shawane who lived in their land, that is, about thirty.

The sufferings of these persons cannot be charged on the Spaniards, as very few of them have happened since Watts' return, but may be accounted for from a principle of Indian education, "that all national honors are acquired by the shedding of blood;" consequently, all who wish for national honors will shed the blood of white people, as Indians no longer kill Indians, as was the constant practice when the principle was established. Another reason for these depredations is, that the white people living among the Creeks and Cherokees, (the greatest of all rascals) and the half breeds, who are numerous, and mostly traders, encourage the Indians to steal horses from the citizens of the United States, to the end that they may purchase them. Thus encouraged, the Indians go into the frontier settlements in search of horses, and if they find an unarmed person, or family, fall on them; and if they take horses and are pursued, kill in their own defence. As soon as the Indians return to the nation with the horses, those who encouraged the stealing of them become the purchasers, and shortly after, knowing the quarter from whence they were taken, carry them out of the nation in a different direction, and sell them to a great profit. This is also a reason why so many horses are stolen; and I verily believe, not one less than five hundred have been stolen from this territory since the first day of January last, an account of which I have not yet been able to collect. And, to throw more light upon this subject, I conceive it necessary here to add, that the want of government, both in the Creeks and Cherokees, is such, that all the chiefs in either nation can neither restrain nor punish the most worthless fellow in it, from, nor for, a violation of the existing treaties, let the enormity of it be ever so great or evident; nor, if demanded by the United States, dare they deliver him up to be punished. Every Indian nation is divided into families, or clans; and it is a law among them, that each clan shall protect and take satisfaction for all injuries offered to the person of each individual of it, whatever his offences may be, except that of killing an Indian of another clan; and then, if the injured clan, or any of its members, take satisfaction, it is well, and the matter ends.

The better to explain how this clanish law operates, I beg leave to trouble you with the following story: The brother of the chief now called the Bloody Fellow, had killed a white man, Cameron; the British Superintendent demanded him, and upon his being delivered, had him put to death; and, in a little time after, the Bloody Fellow put to death the fellow who delivered, or caused his brother to be delivered to Cameron.

Having shown the alleged and real causes of the declaration of war, and the probable causes of the depredations committed prior to the declaration of war, I will now offer some reasons why neither may be justly charged to the encroachments on their hunting grounds. You will recollect that the Cherokee deputies who waited on you last autumn and winter, the Bloody Fellow, Nontuaka, and others, made no complaint respecting the line established by the treaty of Holston, except that they wished the ridge, which divides the Tennessee and the Little river, to be the line, in preference of a straight line, from the place where that ridge struck the Holston. Now, the settlers south of that ridge have not suffered by the Indians since the treaty of Holston, neither in person nor property, except Mr. Gallaspie, on the 12th of September, in having one son killed and another made prisoner; and that was by the Creeks; who never had a claim to a foot of land on the north side of the Tennessee.

It is observable, that most of the depredations committed before the declaration of war, and the attack since, have been committed and made on the people of Miro district, (waters of Cumberland) by the Creeks and Cherokees.

The Creeks having never had the color of claim to land on the north side of the Tennessee, it is not necessary to say any thing to show that their conduct must have been occasioned by other motives than a claim relatively to boundaries. And if the Cherokees ever had a claim, it has been extinguished by two public treaties, that of Hopewell and Holston; at the last of which, a valuable consideration was paid in hand, and since, the first annual payment has been made, and principally received by the inhabitants of the five Lower towns, who have declared war against the United States. Thus, if the Cherokees ever had a claim, it has been twice extinguished, and by two public treaties. But, by the best information I can collect, the claim of the Cherokees to the lands lying on Cumberland, is a recent thing; there are many very respectable people now living who were present at the time. Richard Henderson and Company purchased from them their claim to the lands lying on Cumberland, as well as nearly all those included within what is now the limits of Kentucky. And they told Henderson, pointedly, that they did not sell him any right, for they had none; they only sold him their claim. And a recurrence to the minutes of the late conference, near Nashville, with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, will show that the former claimed, in strong terms, all the lands north of the Tennessee, and below the old field, where a part of their nation formerly lived, and as far eastwardly as the head waters of Elk and Duck, and to the ridge which divides the waters of Cumberland and Duck. And James Carey, the interpreter, informs me, that, upon the return of the Cherokee agents, who were at that conference, and who had a literal copy of the minutes, as reported to your office, they caused it to be read and explained to the chiefs at Estanaula, and they confessed that the Chickasaw claim was just; and it will appear by the same minutes, that the Chickasaws considered that they ceded to the United States, and not the Cherokees, the lands lying south of the ridge which divides the waters of Cumberland and Duck rivers, that is, the lands lying on the waters of Cumberland river. And so they did by a treaty held at Nashville, in the year 1783, by Colonels Donelson and Martin, Commissioners from the State of Virginia, two years prior to the treaty of Hopewell, by which the Cherokees ceded them. This treaty, probably, never was reported to Congress.

Thus I have shown, the Cherokees never had a well founded claim to the lands lying on Cumberland River, and if they had, that they have ceded them, by two public treaties, to the United States; and that they have once been paid for them by an individual. His having no right to purchase or receive the title makes nothing in their favor; they had a right to divest themselves of their title or claim, if any they had.

I also enclose you an account of the number and loss of the Indians who made the attack upon Buchanan's station, and an account of Indian depredations on the district of Miro and on the Kentucky road, from the 3d to the 14th of October, by which you will be informed that, although I have chose to consider the five Lower Towns as the only ones engaged in the war against the United States, for reasons which, in my limited situation, appear politic, yet, that the contrary is the fact. If the reason given for the commission of the depredations, prior to the declaration of war, be just, they seem to prove that no faith can be placed in treaties formed with such nations, and point out the necessity of establishing fortifications for the protection of the frontier inhabitants, while those causes exist; and, if the causes assigned for the declaration of war be just, they operate as additional reasons for making them so much the stronger so long as the war shall continue.

Reference being had to the copy of my letter to the Little Turkey, and the other chiefs of the Cherokees, of the 4th of June, which has been forwarded to your office, it will appear, in that letter, I proposed to the Cherokee chiefs that they should appoint commissioners on their part, to meet commissioners which I would appoint, on the part of the United States, on the second Monday in October, to extend and mark the line agreeable to the treaty of Holston; and the journal of the council at Estanaula, a copy of which is also in your office, contains an acknowledgment of the receipt of that letter. The chiefs never answered whether they would or would not send commissioners, as by me proposed, but, lest they should send them, and complain in case I did not, I appointed and sent forward, to attend at the day and place, Judge Campbell, Charles M'Clung, and John McKee, the two latter in the place of General Smith and Colonel Carter, who could not attend; but no commissioners on their part appeared. To these commissioners I gave instructions, a copy of which you have enclosed, and they extended and measured the line agreeably to those instructions, from Clinch to Chilhowee Mountain—distance about twenty-five miles; but they have delayed to make their report, because, with it, they wish to present an accurate map of the part of the country through which it will pass, and they have not yet been able to complete it; both of which shall be forwarded to your office by the first conveyance after I receive them; but this I can now inform you, from their works which I have seen, that that line cannot be run, agreeably to the treaty of Holston, without leaving out several plantations on Nine-mile Creek, perhaps eight or ten, nor without striking near the mouth of Clinch. These settlements were all made prior to the treaty of Holston, hence I presume they will not be deemed encroachments or violations of that treaty, and I conceive cannot be so considered until the line shall be established, and these settlers shall refuse to move off.

Upon the principle that war dissolves all treaties, perhaps what I have said on the subject of this line may be considered uninteresting matter; but I have thought it necessary, lest it should be suspected, from the Bloody Fellow's letter, that encroachments had already taken place in that quarter.

General Sevier, with the troops mentioned in my letter of the 27th of September, as ordered into service, is in the field, advanced about thirty-five miles southwest of Knoxville, that is, at the mouth of Clinch, with his main force; the other parts of his brigade are detached to different parts of the frontiers of Washington district, for the protection thereof, with my orders to act on the defensive, under the limitations mentioned in your letter of the 9th of October.

The advantages of the troops at the mouth of Clinch are, they will cut off all communication by water, between the Upper and Lower Cherokees; they will deter, in a greater degree, and can more easily intercept, incursive parties from it, than any other situation; they will impress the Lower towns with apprehensions of sudden attacks by water, as well as by horsemen; the distance by water can be passed in from forty to forty eight hours. These apprehensions will induce them to stay at home, to act on the defensive, or to remove their families and property to the mountains, on the approach of an army, instead of going to attack our frontiers. Troops at that place will also give protection, in a great degree, to the travellers to the district of Miro, and they will not only awe the Lower towns but the Upper too, in a much greater degree than they would or could from any situation on the North side of the Tennessee—a thing truly necessary to keep the young fellows from joining generally the Lower Towns.

Of three companies ordered from this district for the defence of Miro district, the greater part have marched, and the remainder are here on their way. I have not heard from that district since the 14th of October.

The Hanging Maw of Chota, four friendly fellows from Estanaula, and one from Hiwassee, arrived here on Sunday, the 4th, and will leave me to day, accompanied by James Carey, the interpreter, with an escort as far as the Tennessee, to protect them from the insults of ignorant unthinking people, of which there are plenty in all countries. The principal object of their visit was to assure me of the friendship of their particular and neighboring towns, and to beg that they should be spared, when an army should enter their nation; which, from political motives, I affected to believe, although I knew the contrary, (Hiwassee in particular had sixteen warriors with Watts) treated them well, made them some small presents, and sent them home well pleased, declaring their friendship for the United States. During their stay, I endeavored, through Carey, to collect such information as might enable me to form a decided opinion of what the Creeks and Cherokees were about to do; but all they gave was so imperfect and contradictory, that no such opinion could be formed. However, I collected from them that Watts was on the recovery, could walk about; that attempts had been made, and were making, to collect another large party of Cherokees, which was not like to be crowned with such success as before, but that smaller parties, under Talotiskie and other chiefs, would certainly turn out for mischief; that runners had gone to Pensacola, with the disastrous news of the repulse of Watts, and to the Creeks, to inquire when they may be expected. I have engaged James Carey, in compliance with your order of the 9th of October, to go on to the Creeks, if he finds he dare venture, which he can only do in the disguised character of being friendly to them; in which he may serve the United States, by entering into their councils, and by collecting information of their intentions. Was he, or any other person, to appear among them in character of a friend of the United States, he would unquestionably be put to death.

In my last, I assured you of the good conduct of the people of this territory, but an event had like to have taken place that would have compelled me to have given them a different character.

On Monday night last, five Creeks, headed by young Lesley, the son of a Scotchman in the Creek nation, the same that headed the party that killed and captured Gallaspie's son, on the 13th September, came in upon the waters of Little river, about twenty miles from this place, and stole and carried off eight horses; they were traced towards Chilhowee, the nearest Cherokee town. This gave reason to suspect the Chilhowee Indians of the theft: whereupon, as many as fifty-two of the neighboring people, including the sufferers, assembled together in arms, and determined to go and destroy Chilhowee and Tallassee too, a little adjacent town, and actually did march; but General Sevier received information of their intentions, and despatched orders to them to disperse, and return home, which they obeyed; and thus the matter happily ended. This affords a proof, both of the feelings and inclinations of the people, and of their obedience to the orders of Government; but I do assure you, much as I have said in favor of their past conduct, that I am hourly in fear that their thirst for revenge, or, what is here termed satisfaction, will lead them to break through the bounds of good order and government, notwithstanding what can be said or done to prevent it. If war should be declared against the Cherokees and Creeks, or either, I conceive it essential to inform you that, in the district of Washington, in this territory, as many as five hundred horsemen, or mounted infantry, can be raised at thirty days' notice, to perform a three months tour of duty, of the best marksmen in the world, armed with good rifles, and that, in any arrangement for a campaign, they may be counted on to a certainty. I have said thirty days, but I believe, in fifteen; but it is to be understood that, in case of counting on them to a certainty, that they are to be commanded by militia officers, and to be headed by General Sevier; and I will venture to say that, besides General Sevier, there is a sufficient number of officers in this district to command that number of men, equal, in Indian warfare, to any other officers in America. Accounts from the Chickasaws and Choctaws, as late as the first day of October, on which I depend, say that the Chickasaws and Choctaws breathe the warmest spirit of friendship for the United States, and that the Choctaws, on their return home, drove Boshears, the Spanish agent, who prevented a part of that nation from coming to the conference, from among them, and that the Spanish Government have sent up a Frenchman to supply his place. I hope and trust the late conference has had the good effect to keep these two nations at least quiet, so that we shall not have them to contend with as well as the Creeks and Cherokees.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem,
Your most obedient humble servant,

WM. BLOUNT.

HENRY KNOX, Esq. Secretary of War.

Minutes of information given Governor Blount by James Carey, one of the interpreters of the United States, in the Cherokee Nation.

After leaving Coyatee, on the 25th day of May, the day after the conference at that place, which promised nothing but peace and friendship, Carey proceeded, with many Indians, (among whom was John Watts) to Toquo, distant fifteen miles, where a letter was handed to Watts, (written by Mr. Panton, a merchant of great business of Pensacola, then in the Cherokee nation) addressed to the Bloody Fellow, as well as Watts. Mr. Panton wrote it from the house of Mr. McDonald, a Scotchman, an old resident in the Cherokee nation, and, in the late war, a deputy under Colonel Brown, who succeeded Colonel Stewart in the superintendency of the nation; and McDonald forwarded it to Watts by an Indian runner. The contents of the letter was to invite Watts and the Bloody Fellow, in the name of Governor O'Neal, to come down to Pensacola with ten pack horses; that they should have from Governor O'Neal arms and ammunition, as many and as much as they wanted, and that Panton himself would supply their nation with goods in plenty. Mr. Panton, during his stay in the nation, made the house of his countryman, McDonald, his head quarters, from whence they together paid a visit to the Little Turkey, and spent several days, Mr. McDonald acting as interpreter between Mr. Panton and the Turkey. The particulars of their conversation, it is supposed, never fully transpired; but it is said, and believed, that Panton invited the Turkey to visit Governor O'Neal; assured him that the Governor would give him arms and ammunition at Pensacola; that Mr. McDonald would accompany him in such a journey; that he (Panton) would supply the nation with goods much cheaper than they had heretofore purchased them; that the Creeks had agreed that the Spaniards might erect a fort at the Alabama fork, a mile below Mr. McGillivray's house, for the protection of the Creeks and Cherokees, and where arms and ammunition would be kept for them both. This Alabama fork is a place where the French once had a fort, to and from which there is water sufficient for large boats to pass up and down from thence to Mobile. Shortly after Watts received the letter that Panton addressed to him, and the Bloody Fellow, they went together to Mr. McDonald's house, and stayed with him a day and a night. Mr. McDonald wrote a letter to Governor O'Neal, recommending Watts, and his uncle Taltieske, in high terms: he also wrote a letter to Governor O'Neal, in the name and at the request of the Bloody Fellow; the contents were, that he had been to see the President, where he was well treated, but as far to seek for his lands as ever; that he was glad to hear that the Spaniards would supply his nation with arms and ammunition, and assist in the recovery of his lands; that he had been blind a long time, but now his eyes were open, he would let go the hands of the United States, and take fast hold of the Spaniards; and requested that the Governor would not permit Watts to return without plenty of arms and ammunition, and that he himself, and the Turkey, and some other of the chiefs, would come down with Mr. McDonald, some time hence, to visit him. The Bloody Fellow then accompanied Watts to the crossing of the Coosa river, encamped with him all night, and returned; and Watts and his companions proceeded for Pensacola, with ten pack horses. At this time, (about the last of June) the national council were about to sit at Estanaula, by appointment made at the conference at Coyatee, at the request of the Bloody Fellow, to receive his report touching the business he had been on to Philadelphia, and to hear the big book read, which he had brought from the War Office. The council waited his coming three days before business was entered upon. At length he sent, as an apology, that one of his relations was unwell, and he could not come. He did not appear at the council, and his absence can be attributed only to the letters he received from Panton: for at Coyatee he was a warm partisan for the United States, as was his friend Watts.

The demand of the Little Turkey, contained in his speech, in council, of the — day of June, "that the ridge between Cumberland and Greene river should be the line," can be accounted for no otherwise than from the visit of Panton. At the time the Little Turkey was delivering this part of his speech, the Jobber's Son, sitting at a distance, observed to those around him, in a low accent, that it was now too late to talk of that line, for they had established a different one at the treaty of Holston: to which the Young Frog replied, "that is nothing; then we had nobody to back us; now we have, and can get to that line;" meaning, as Carey now supposes, the Spaniards.

Immediately after the return of John Watts and his uncle, from Pensacola to Willstown, in the latter part of August, the brother of the late Drugging Canoe, the same that the council at Estanaula declared should succeed to his brother's honors and command, came to Estanaula after the war pipe which he had brought from Detroit, and left at the house of the Old Prince, while the Old Prince was at Philadelphia; which pipe the Old Prince and the King Fisher, on their return from Philadelphia, destroyed; and, being informed of the fate of the war pipe, declared, if the King Fisher was present, he would destroy the medal that had been given him at Philadelphia; that, in future, his talks should be considered as a little boy's, and not as the talks of a man and a warrior. He then requested the Warrior's Son, the Standing Turkey, and the Half Breed, to go to a pipemaker, who lived about twenty miles from Estanaula, and have a pipe made, as near like that which was destroyed as possible, that he might have it to show to the Northwards, whom he daily expected at the Lower towns. About an hour after this conversation had passed, he took the three before mentioned Indians and the Big Fellow out from the company, and delivered them a talk from Watts; that they must attend at Willstown in eight nights; to pay no more attention to the talks of the old chiefs; that they were not to assist the old chiefs in the restitution of horses, or any other property, taken from the United States; that the day was just at hand when the blow was to be struck; that Watts had been to Pensacola, seen Governor O'Neal, and all things were to his wishes; that the thing would be fully explained to their satisfaction on their arrival at Willstown, and delivered them a string of black beads of four strands. This they agreed to, and made Carey acquainted with what had been said to them.

The next day after this conversation, Mr. Shaw presented this fellow, the Drugging Canoe's brother, sometimes called the White Owl's Son, with a scarlet match coat laced, a ruffled shirt, a handkerchief, and some feathers, and a medal. He accepted of all except the medal, offering for apology for not accepting that, that he could not, unless it was offered to him at some public meeting. He then proceeded to tell Mr. Shaw and Carey what valuable presents had been given to him last winter, by the British at Detroit, for the use of himself and his brother, the Drugging Canoe, namely, a pair of large and a pair of small arm bands for each, three gorgets for his brother and four for himself, a pair of scarlet boots and flaps, bound with ribbon, for each; four match coats, a blanket, and two shirts for each, and powder and lead, as much as he wanted, for himself and three other Cherokees who were with him. He added, that himself and the three other Cherokees, with their powder and lead, went into the battle against General St. Clair, and one of them was killed; and that he himself killed an officer in that battle.

This fellow went from the Running Water, with his three companions, to Detroit, with letters written by Mr. McDonald, and a man of the name of Willbanks, commonly called Captain Willbank, in his early days an apprentice to Rivington of New York, afterwards a refugee tory, and came into the Creek nation with Bowles, from thence passed on to the Running Water, and there lived many months with the Dragging Canoe, wearing the British uniform, and assuming to himself the title of British agent. He never left the Dragging Canoe's until just before the treaty of Holston, and is now among the Lower Creeks. The Cherokees assembled, from every quarter of the nation, at Willstown, to hear Watts' report from Pensacola, and to the green corn dance, which was at the same time to be held there.

Watts commenced his report by causing a letter, which Governor O'Neal had written by him to the chiefs, to be publicly read. The contents were, that his master, the King of Spain, had sent to his care, at Pensacola, arms and ammunition in abundance for the use of the four Southern nations, which he had divided into four separate warehouses; that Watts had been an eye witness of the quantity he had of powder, and lead, and arms; that he had sent some by Watts for the Cherokees; that the King of Spain had made a greater man of M'Gillivray than Congress did; that it was his business to deliver out these articles; that he would be at Pensacola by the middle of October, when, if the whole of the towns would come down, they should be supplied, each town with from four to five hundred pounds of powder, and more if necessary, and lead accordingly, and with arms; and, that he would have plenty of provisions provided for their support while with him; and recommended Mr. M'Donald and Alexander Campbell, their old friends, to their particular notice and protection.

The letter being read, Watts then informed what Governor O'Neal had said to him. The Governor, he said, received him with open arms; asked him if he had seen any Spanish settlers before he arrived at Pensacola; assured him that the Spaniards never wanted a back country; wherever they had landed, they sat down; even such a sand-bank as this is sufficient for them; they are not like the Americans, first take your land, then treat with you, and give you little or nothing for it; this is the way they have always served you, and, from time to time, killed some of your people. In the late war with Great Britain and the United States, the Spaniards assisted them, and lent them money, and they owe the Spaniards a great deal, and instead of paying them what they owe, they take our lands, as well as yours. That the King, his master, had sent in powder, lead, and arms, for the whole four Southern nations, in plenty; and that then was the time for them to join quickly in war against the United States, while they were engaged in a war with the Northern tribes; if they did not, that as soon as they (the United States) conquered the Northern tribes, they would be upon them, and cut them off; that the talks which that part of the nation who had been to visit the President had received, was not from the heart, but only from the teeth; that, besides guns and ammunition, they should be furnished with swords, caps, pistols, bridles, and saddles, for horsemen; that the King of Spain had ordered a fort to be built at the Alabama fork, within a mile of M'Gillivray's house, to which the Creeks had agreed, where there would always be a magazine of arms and ammunition for both Creeks and Cherokees; and that a magazine should be erected for the Cherokees at Willstown.

Watts having thus recapitulated the talks he received from Governor O'Neal, proceeded to address his audience. That his people had been to several places, to Hopewell, to Swannano, to Holston, and to Philadelphia, and he had heard all their reports, but none pleased him like what he had heard and seen at Pensacola.

Here Finnellson's narrative takes up the proceedings at Willstown, which Carey confirms, as far as he knows, and contradicts no part.

The fourth day after Watts' party determined to desist from going to war at the Look-out Mountain, (say the 14th September) Carey received three runners from the Bloody Fellow, the Breath, and the Glass, informing him that his breath had been almost gone on account of a report that he had given information to Governor Blount, that they had determined for war; but as he was raised in the land, they would look over it for that time, and in future he must quit looking towards or giving any intelligence to the Americans; for their parts, they had let go their hands, and they expected he would do the same; that they had written to Governor Blount, and informed him, that the Lower towns had given out the notion of war; but what they wrote was not their intentions; they only meant to deceive him until such time as they and their warriors could go down to Pensacola to Governor O'Neal and receive their arms and ammunition, and get their crops from the ground, and hid; that they expected to see Mr. M'Gillivray at Pensacola, and requested Carey to go with them, and he should there receive a better office than he held under the United States.

About this time, (14th September) arrived at Estanaula, the Boot or Chulcoah, the particular friend of the Little Turkey, from the Turkey's town, saying, his business was to wait there for letters from Governor Blount; when the letters arrived, he stayed himself, and forwarded them to the Turkey and John Thompson; he stayed three weeks, and at length it appeared that his real business at Estanaula was to induce, by his art and address, the young warriors of that quarter of the nation to join in sending beads, talks, and their numbers, by the Turkey and himself, to Governor O'Neal, to procure ammunition and arms for them.

When he was about to leave Estanaula, he came to Carey and requested him to deliver the following message to Governor Blount; that he had been in Estanaula to try to keep peace and friendship in that quarter of the nation; that he was so engaged in the service of the United States that he could not hunt; that he hoped the Governor would send him something for his support.

After closing this message, he informed Carey that the Turkey and himself had been invited to Pensacola by Mr. Panton, along with Mr. M'Donald; that Mr. Panton had assured the Turkey that he should be cured at his expense of an indisposition of which he complained, by a doctor at Pensacola, and if any other Indians were sick, they also should be cured, in case they would come down.

Prior to the departure of the Boot from Estanaula, a runner came to him from the Turkey, who said to him, in the Turkey's name, "What keeps you? Mr. M'Donald is about to set out for Pensacola, and if you don't come along, we must leave you." It is Mr. Carey's opinion, that the true object of the Turkey and the Boot in going to Pensacola is to get every thing they can, as well for themselves as for their quarter of the nation, not intending war against the United States; but it is to be feared that having arms and ammunition in plenty, and being so nearly connected with a number who are engaged in the war, that they must, with their parties, be also drawn in to take a part.

About twelve days after receiving the message from the Bloody Fellow, the Glass, and the Breath, Carey met with the former, who inquired the news from Governor Blount, and being informed, he said it was very well. Carey then asked him what was the reason that the Lower towns wished to go to war against the United States? His answer was, when he came from the President and left Governor Blount, at Coyatee, what was going on was little expected by him; Panton being up in the nation, and giving such encouragement, and Watts going down and bringing up such good reports, and ammunition, it was impossible to keep the young warriors from going to war. Carey then asked him, why the blow was not struck when so many were assembled at Willstown and the Look-out Mountain town? He answered, that himself and the other chiefs had prevailed on them not to strike at that time, but to stay until their crops could be got off the ground and hid out, and until himself, the Breath, and Glass, with their parties, could visit Governor O'Neal, and bring up a larger supply of ammunition and arms; he said he had written Governor Blount that they had desisted from war, but it was only a make haste, from the teeth outwards, to deceive him, until they could make ready. The Bloody Fellow then asked Carey, if he had received the message, as before recited by the runners? Carey answered yes; he then asked Carey what he intended to do; was he going to Pensacola? For his part he was going, and he expected Carey would go, and take with him six pack-horses or eight, to assist up with the ammunition. Carey agreed to go, and asked if pack-horses were scarce with him. He answered he should take down, for his own part, and use, two, and if he got more than they could bring, himself and wife could walk up, and pack their riding horses. He then desired Carey to go home, collect and hobble his horses, that when he was ready, he would give Carey notice, and then Carey would have nothing to do but to set out and meet him at the Creek village on his way. He then begged Carey not to communicate his determinations to Governor Blount, or any other person, "but let us go to Pensacola together, and see what is to be done there; and if things are as I expect, you will get better business than you are now in."

Mr. Carey confesses, that while all this business was in agitation, and to the time of his leaving the nation, he did not express his disapprobation of the measures, and on some occasions expressed his approbation; he found such conduct necessary, not only for the preservation of his person and property, but essential to the discovering the true objects and intentions of the Indians, which he conceived would the better enable him to serve the United States, under whose appointment he acted; and that, being considered as a party, he was better able by advice, by raising difficulties, &c. to counteract schemes, than if he had openly declared his sentiments.

It admits of no doubt but the talks of the Bloody Fellow, as reported by Finnelson, were well understood by Watts and his party, and that the only objection he had to war with the United States, was the time.

Immediately on the return of Watts to Willstown, he despatched four runners to the Northward Indians, to inform them of his new determination.

From the best information Carey has been able to collect, he supposes there were about thirty Cherokees in the action against General St. Clair, from different parts of the nation, not confined to the Lower towns.

Mr. Carey says, that, with respect to the Creeks, to his knowledge two of the Lower Creeks were at the taking of Gallaspie's son, one of the Broken Arrow, and the other of the Coweta towns, the other six were of the Upper Creeks, and that the chief who commanded the Creeks at the attack on Buchanan's station, on the 30th September, was Talotiskee of the Broken Arrow, the great friend of Bowles.

It has been concluded among the Creeks that the young warriors, with a few of the chiefs, should go down to Pensacola to receive arms and ammunition, and the others should go to Seagrove, at the Rock Landing, and give good talks, and obtain all the presents they could, until the nation was quite ready for war. This information given by the brother of Chinnabie the great Natchez warrior.

The eight Creeks who took Gallaspie's son, boasted, at Carey's house, that the Creeks did all they could to provoke the United States to war with them; that they killed and scalped men, women, and children; that they took them prisoners, and made them slaves like negroes; that they debauched their women, that they took their property, and that they had done it for many years, yet they could not make them mad: "What else can we do to provoke them? Shall we take some man and bouger him, and send him back to tell his people, and try if that will not rouse them to war?"

Carey, after being some days with Governor Blount, at Knoxville, was sent by him to Chota and the Hanging Maw's, to collect further information; at Chota he met with three young fellows, just returned from Cumberland Mountain, but he could collect little or no information from themselves; but a friend informed him they had been with Talotiskee; Carey went then down to Coyatee, where he met with five other young warriors, with whom he entered into a confidential conversation, which lasted upwards of an hour; they informed him that they, with the three he had seen at Chota, and many others, had been out for war, with Talotiskee,* that they had waylaid the Kentucky road until six travellers appeared, of whom they killed one; they then turned off that road to the Cumberland road, and met with four fellows who had been with Watts in his repulse at Buchanan's station, who gave them the particulars, upon which Talotiskee cried bitterly, then rose, and requested his men to divide into small parties to hunt, and kill three or four deer each, go home, get a fresh supply of provisions, and meet him at the Short mountain, equipped for war, for vengeance he would have for Watts.

Four of these five fellows, live in Chilhowee, one of whom had the scalp of the man they had killed, and holding it up asked, "don't you think it pretty hair?" and another his jackcoat. The other fellow was of Coosawatchee.

It remains yet to be added, that Talotiskee blacked himself, and raised the war-whoop at Pensacola, and declared himself for war against the United States.

From the best accounts, the Indians who attacked Buchanan's station on the 30th September, 1792, appeared to have been, Creeks, from 400 to 500; Cherokees, 200; Shawanese, from 30 to 40; of whom, three were killed, and seven wounded. The former were, Tunbridge's step-son, left on the ground; the Shawanese warrior, dragged off; a Creek chief, dragged off. The latter were, John Watts, with a ball through one thigh, and lodged in the other, supposed dangerous, but now on recovery; Unacata, or White Man-killer, supposed dangerous, but now on the recovery; the Draggin Canoe's Brother, (alias) the White Owl's Son, supposed mortal, the same who was at Detroit; a young warrior of the Look out, supposed mortal; a young warrior of the Running Water, on the recovery; a Creek warrior, since dead; a young warrior of the Running Water, since dead.

Of the signers of the treaty of Holston, besides Watts, there was the Middle Striker, and the Otter Lifter.

This Unacata mentioned above, among the wounded, left Pensacola the day Watts arrived there, and making very little halt at his own house, came on with his wife to this place, and stayed with me ten days immediately preceding the time he set out with Watts for war, ate and drank constantly at my table, was treated in the kindest manner, and made the strongest professions of friendship during his stay, and at his departure. His visit had not even the color of business, nor could it be extracted from him what he had seen or heard at Pensacola. It would seem as if he had come as a spy.

It also appears that there were sundry young warriors of the Cherokees along with Watts, besides those who live in the five Lower towns, particularly John Walker and John Fields, two young half breeds, who have been raised among and by the white people, in whom every body who knew them had the utmost confidence. The former is quite a stripling, and apparently the most innocent, good natured youth I ever saw. They were both at the treaty of Holston, and have been repeatedly here since. They acted as the advance, or spies to Watts' party, and killed Gee and Clayton.

The Cherokees say the Creeks have long been boasting that they were men and warriors, but that they proved to be great cowards, and that most of them kept such a distance from the station, that they could hardly shoot a ball to it.

Watts is called Colonel Watts since his return from Pensacola.

The same day, they fired on Francis Armstrong, at his plantation, four miles south of Nashville.

On Saturday, the 6th of October.—A company of travellers, on their way from Kentucky, were fired on in the wilderness; one man was killed, and one said to be mortally wounded. The party who attacked this company, consisted of fifty warriors, and were headed by the noted Cherokee chief Talotiskie, a signer to the treaty of Holston. He raised them generally from the Upper towns; and some of them from near the borders of South Carolina. For further particulars respecting him and his party, see the latter part of Carey's narrative.

KNOXVILLE, October 7th, 1792.

GENTLEMEN:

By the enclosed extract of my letter of the 4th of June last, to the Little Turkey, and the other chiefs of the Cherokees, you will be informed that to-morrow is the day that I proposed to them to meet the commissioners on the part of the United States at Major Craig's, on Nine-mile creek, in order to extend the line between the said nation and the United States, as stipulated by the treaty made and concluded between the said nation and the United States, on the second day of July, 1791, a copy of which you have herewith. You have also enclosed, an extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to me, of the 22d of April last, to which you will please attend, as your instructions, in case commissioners on the part of the Indians should appear, and proceed to running the line. But, in case none do appear, you will please examine where the ridge which divides the waters running into the Tennessee, from those running into Little river, strikes the Holston, and extend the line from thence to Clinch, and again, from that ridge to the Chilhowee mountain, paying strict attention to the treaty, and report your proceedings to me. I am aware that the Five Lower towns of the Cherokees have declared war against the United States, and that war dissolves all treaties. Nevertheless, I think it essential that so much of the line should be examined and reported upon, that it may appear whether there are any citizens of the United States residing on the Indian lands or not.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient humble servant.

DAVID CAMPBELL, CHARLES MCCLUNG, JOHN MCKEE.

KNOXVILLE, November the 12th, 1792.

SIR:

This morning, fifteen Indians surrounded the house of a Mr. Bryan, within eight miles of this place, in which was another man besides himself. They broke down a window with their hatchets, and pointed in their guns, but were repulsed with the loss of one killed, and another wounded, without injuring any person in the house.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Of the contingencies of the War Department for the year 1793.

In estimating the expenses of any given corps of troops in a stationary situation, or upon a peace establishment, every probable demand may be foreseen, specified, and calculated. But, in estimating the expenses of an army in the time of war, designed for offensive operations, the case is materially otherwise: for, after all the stated and probable expenses are estimated, there ought to be an allowance either to make up for short estimates of the several heads of supplies, or to serve as a fund to defray moderate losses by casualties.

All active armies are liable to the loss of provisions, the means of transportation, ammunition, clothing, &c. by numerous accidents attending a state of war. But, in the case contemplated in the estimates, the chance of such accidents is greatly increased by the subtilty and activity of the enemy, and our ignorance of the wilderness in which the troops may operate.

It has generally been considered as wise to appropriate a sum for casualties, to be applied to the public service in case of necessity. If no such case occurs, no expenditure will take place, and, of course, the money will remain in the treasury. But if no contingent fund be appropriated, the operations of an army may be arrested at a critical moment, and the army lost, or the public service greatly injured, for the want of means which might be acquired if authority and provision existed for the purpose.

But futurity being inscrutable to the limited faculties of man, he is unable to ascertain the form or value of demands which have not, and which never may have, any existence.

All that can possibly be done in the present case, is to exhibit the expenses of the late campaigns, and thence to infer the sum which may be judged proper to appropriate for the contingencies of the future, the strength and time of service of the relative armies being duly considered.

It will appear, by paper No. 1, that the claims for allowance, and the accounts actually settled, at the treasury, for the loss of horses in the expedition under General Harmar, amount to seventeen thousand eight hundred and sixty-four dollars and two cents, for which sum an appropriation was contemplated by the act of the eleventh day of February, 1791, embracing one hundred thousand dollars for the said expedition.

The estimates presented for the services of 1791 were embraced by two appropriations. The first of the eleventh day of February, 1791, for fifteen thousand three hundred and six dollars, including the sum of ten thousand three hundred and six dollars for the Quartermaster's Department.

The other, of the third day of March, 1791, for twenty-five thousand dollars, amounting in all for the said year to forty thousand three hundred and six dollars.

The stores and other property lost in the defeat of the fourth of November, 1791, as stated in the paper No. 2, amount to thirty-two thousand eight hundred and ten dollars and seventy-five cents.

In addition to these losses, it appears by paper No. 3, that the contractors have a claim at the treasury for provisions and horses, amounting to fifty-four thousand six hundred and thirteen dollars and thirty-five cents, of which, perhaps, the sum of ten thousand dollars may be estimated for contingencies, the articles having fallen into the hands of the enemy. Whether the sum will exceed or fall short of the allowance which shall be made, will depend upon the proofs which shall be produced at the treasury.

The other contingent expenses for the year 1791, are contained in paper No. 4, amounting to nine thousand six hundred and twenty-one dollars and twenty cents.

The total expenditures made, and allowances claimed, under the head of contingencies for the year 1791, will probably amount to fifty-two thousand four hundred and thirty-one dollars and ninety-five cents.

The estimates for the services of the year 1792, also specified two sums for the contingencies of the War Department. The first, of twenty thousand dollars, was authorized by the act which passed the twenty-third day of December, 1791, entitled "An act for making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1792."

The other sum, of thirty thousand dollars, was authorized by the act which passed the second day of May, 1792, entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," both sums amounting to fifty thousand dollars.

The expenses already, under this head, are contained in paper No. 5, amounting to ten thousand two hundred and twenty-nine dollars and nine cents.

It is to be observed that the fund appropriated to the Indian Department having been exhausted by goods given, and payments made, to the Creeks, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and also to the Six Nations, that, in addition to the above sum, expended in the year 1792, as contingencies, twenty-four thousand seven hundred and seven dollars and ninety-eight cents has been applied to the Indian Department.

The expenses of the Indian Department are, at this critical period, as difficult to be previously calculated as those of the army, excepting the stipulated sums to the Creeks, Cherokees, and Six Nations, and to the agents employed to the several tribes.

Besides the said expenditures, the contractors of the present year lost, about the 5th of October last, one hundred horses, said to be captured by the Indians. If they prove this, they will be entitled to an allowance, by the terms of their contract.

Hence it will appear that the sum of fifty thousand dollars, requested to be appropriated for the year 1793, is not inordinate.

For the sums which shall be expended, vouchers will be required in the usual manner of other accounts, excepting always the sums which may be expended by the Commanding General for secret services, in which it would be prejudicial to the public interests to disclose names. But this sum is not large, and his reputation stands pledged to the public for its just appropriation.

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 10, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 10, 1792.

SIR:

In obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to the Senate, the copy of a letter from his Excellency the Governor of Georgia, dated the 20th of November last, with certain enclosures, relative to Indian affairs.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the Honorable the Senate of the United States.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 20th November, 1792.

SIR:

With respect to some late outrages committed on the Cherokees, I have to transmit the following certified documents, viz:

1st. A Proclamation.

2d. A Talk to the head-men and warriors of the Cherokee nation.

3d. The Executive order of the 15th instant, to the Law Department.

4th. A communication to Major Gaither.

From all which, it will evidently appear, that there can be no doubt of the mal-conduct of certain citizens of this State, who have murdered some friendly Indians, and committed other depredations.

You will perceive that the necessary steps have been taken, to bring to justice those offenders, as well as to preserve a continuation of amity.

I have to remark, that, from the very short crops of grain last season, no period has ever been more unfavorable for war than the present; and this, among other considerations, ought to be of great weight to preserve peace with the neighboring tribes. Should my endeavors prove unsuccessful on the score of peace, it will be necessary to be prepared; and for this purpose I have to call for the establishment of magazines of provisions, without which, it will not be possible to keep that number of militia in the field, which will be necessary to give confidence to the frontier settlers to keep their ground, should even war be avoided.

From what I can learn, this violence on the part of the offenders has proceeded from the circumstances of four whites having been killed, horses stolen, and other depredations committed by the Cherokees; whatever palliating point of view this may be considered in, it cannot interfere to prevent the offenders from abiding the due execution of the laws.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most humble servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

GEORGIA:

By his Excellency Edward Telfair, Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over the State aforesaid.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it has been officially represented to me, that certain armed men on the western frontier of this State, did, of late, fire upon, and kill, several amicable Indians of the Cherokee nation: and whereas, by an act passed the 20th June, 1774, in the (then province, now) State of Georgia, it is, amongst other things, enacted, "That to murder any free Indian in amity, is, by the law of the land, as penal, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as to murder any white," and "that, by the law of the land, any person rescuing any prisoners so committed, is guilty of felony:" And whereas such unwarrantable proceedings are not only a daring violation of law, but must, if unnoticed, involve many innocent persons in all the horrors of Indian warfare; and as it is highly necessary that such atrocious offenders should receive the punishment due their offences: I have therefore thought fit to issue this my proclamation, strictly charging and enjoining all officers, civil and military, within this State, to use their best endeavors to apprehend and bring to justice such offenders; and they are hereby further enjoined, and required strenuously to exert themselves in preventing the like lawless and outrageous procedure in future.

Given under my hand, and the great seal of the said State, at the State House in Augusta, this fourteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and in the seventeenth year of the independence of the United States of America.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 14th November, 1792.

To the Head-men and Warriors of the Cherokee nation—The Talk of the Governor of Georgia.

BROTHERS: Ever since the people of the King over the great water were driven from our land, your people and the white people of this country have lived, until a few moons ago, in peace and friendship; no blood was spilt on either side; trade, mutual intercourse, and good will to each other, did prevail, and it ever has been my great desire that we should continue in friendship with each other, white the trees grow and the waters run; but, now the bright chain is become dim, and some of its links broken, whilst you, with all your good people, as well as I, and all our good people, must lament the unhappy fate of those who have fallen by the mad-men on both sides.

Then, BROTHERS: Let us not charge each other with the acts of our mad-men; and, since we cannot bring life back, let each of us punish those mad people who have spilt the blood of the innocent, and so open the path between us once more, brighten again the chain of friendship, and fasten all its links together, nor longer suffer the dark cloud to cover the little mountain that stands between us. Let the hatchet be buried, and the big sword shall remain in rust; we will then again take each other high by the arm, and fast by the hand; we shall sit under the same tree, the smoke of our pipes shall make one cloud, and we will taste of the same cup.

BROTHERS: Consider well this talk; it is the talk of peace, and will be sent to the great and beloved warrior of all the white towns, that he may know what bad men on both sides have done.

Governor Telfair to Major Henry Gaither.

Sir:

I have just received two depositions, which contain information of such moment that I find it indispensable for you to call out a considerable re-inforcement of horse to range on that part of the western frontier from Fort Mathews to Tugulo river. My information is of no less import than, that a body of fifty-nine armed men did, in a lawless manner, go into the Cherokee nation, burn a town, and kill three Indians; and that two others, of the same nation, have also been killed within the settlements in Franklin county. Those outrages have been lately committed. There is reason to apprehend that some serious and early attack is meditating by the Indians, against the settlers in that quarter.

NORTHWESTERN TRIBES AND THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 19, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 19th, 1792.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to submit to the Senate, the extract of a letter from Brigadier General Wilkinson, dated at fort Hamilton, the 6th of November last, with an enclosure from Major Adair, the copy of a letter from John Belli, deputy quartermaster general, dated Lexington, November 17, 1792; and the copy of a letter from James Seagrove, Esq. relatively to the Creek Indians, dated Saint Mary's, 22d of November, 1792.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the Honorable the Senate of the United States.

*Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated at*FORT HAMILTON, 6th November, 1792, 7 o'clock, P. M.

Just as I was about to despatch this, I received a letter from Major Adair, commandant of the Kentucky mounted infantry, of which the enclosed is a copy. The check which the enemy have experienced in this little affair, will produce good effects, and the event reflects honor upon the Major and the yeomanry of Kentucky; but the immediate consequence will be an entire stop to the transport of forage to the advanced post, as our pack-horses are either destroyed or disabled, and the riflemen dismounted; in this situation I am perplexed by difficulties, as, from my ignorance of the designs of Government, and for the want of explicit orders, I am at a loss whether to direct the purchase of more pack-horses, or to encourage the riflemen to remount themselves; on these points I shall duly deliberate, and will make such decision as my judgment may direct, relying confidently on the liberality of Government for an excuse, should I err; and, in the meantime, I shall urge forward the transport of forage from fort Washington to this post, by every means left in my power.

As this affair happened near to, and in sight of, fort St. Clair, it may be inquired why the commanding officer did not support Major Adair? The answer is short, and will, I hope, be satisfactory. The garrison under his command is posted for defence, and not offence; and although it appears, that, in this instance, to have hazarded would have been judicious, yet, as I have considered it safest for the national interests, to confine my subordinate officers, by rigid instructions, to defensive measures solely, they are bound to hazard, in no case whatever, which does not immediately and essentially interest the safety of the trust which may be confided to them; and it may be added, that, in the instance before us, the attack was a most daring one, and that neither the number, or ultimate object of the enemy, would be developed before it was discovered that Major Adair was a full match for him.

I have this moment despatched twenty of my mounted infantry, who will reach St. Clair before day-light, to aid in bringing in the wounded and the weary; and I have the honor to be, with respect, &c.

Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JAMES WILKINSON, *Brigadier General.*FORT ST. CLAIR, November 6th, 1792.

SIR:

This morning, about the first appearance of day, the enemy attacked my camp within sight of this post; the attack was sudden, and the enemy came on with a degree of courage that bespoke them warriors, indeed. Some of my men were hand in hand with them before we retreated, which, however, we did, about eighty yards, to a kind of stockade intended for stables; we then made a stand. I then ordered Lieutenant Madison to take a party and gain their right flank if possible. I called for Lieutenant Hail to send to the left, but found he had been slain. I then led forward the men who stood near me, which, together with the Ensigns Buchanan and Florin, amounted to about twenty-five, and pressed the left of their centre, thinking it absolutely necessary to assist Madison. We made a manly push, and the enemy retreated, taking all our horses except five or six. We drove them about six hundred yards through our camp, where they again made a stand, and we fought them some time; two of my men were here shot dead. At that moment I received information that the enemy were about to flank us on the right, and on turning that way, I saw about sixty of them running to that point. I had yet heard nothing of Madison. I then ordered my men to retreat, which they did with deliberation, heartily cursing the Indians, who pursued us close to our camp, where we again fought them until they gave way; and when they retreated, our ammunition was nearly expended, although we had been supplied from the garrison in the course of the action. I did not think proper to follow them again, but ordered my men into the garrison to draw ammunition. I returned, however, in a few minutes, to a hill to which we had first driven them, where I found two of my men scalped, who were brought in. Since I began to write this, a few of the enemy appeared in sight, and I pursued them with a party about a quarter of a mile, but could not overtake them, and did not think proper to go farther. Madison, who I sent to the right, was, on his first attack, wounded, and obliged to retreat into the garrison, leaving a man or two dead; to this misfortune I think the enemy are indebted for the horses they have got. Had he gained their right flank, and I once had possession of their left, I think we should have routed them at that stage of the action, as we had them on the retreat. I have six killed and five wounded, four men are missing; I think they went off early in the action, on horseback, and are, I suppose, by this, at fort Hamilton. My officers and a number of my men distinguished themselves greatly. Poor Hail died calling to his men to advance. Madison's bravery and conduct need no comment; they are well known. Flinn and Buchanan acted with a coolness and courage which does them much honor. Buchanan, after firing his gun, knocked an Indian down with the barrel. They have killed and taken a great number of the pack-horses. I intend following them this evening some distance, to ascertain their route and strength, if possible. I can with propriety say, that about fifty of my men fought with a bravery equal to any men in the world, and had not the garrison been so nigh, as a place of safety for the bashful, I think many more would have fought well. The enemy have no doubt as many men killed as myself. They left two dead on the ground, and I saw two carried off. The only advantage they have gained is our horses, which is a capital one, as it disables me from bringing the interview to a more certain and satisfactory decision. I am sorry I cannot send you better news,

And am, sir, yours, &c.

JOHN ADAIR.

Brigadier General WILKINSON.

LEXINGTON, November 17th, 1792.

SIR:

Enclosed you will find a letter directed to Colonel James O'Hara, quartermaster general, which, after reading, you will be pleased to forward to him. You will see in that letter the cause of my taking the liberty this day (by General James Wilkinson's advice) to draw on you, twenty-five days after sight, viz:

\$ 8,090 66 $\frac{2}{3}$

Which sum of eight thousand and ninety dollars and sixty-six and two-third cents, after payment, you will be pleased to charge to the quartermaster department. However disagreeable this proceeding is to me, (having had no orders from you to draw) was necessitated so to do, or, to see the General's arrangements entirely defeated. I hope the quartermaster general will in future supply me with sums equal to the demands in this quarter: for, sir, I have already spent a great many uneasy hours for want of funds; indeed, I shall now be obliged to curtail General Wilkinson's order for pack-horses, for want of money, which this country at present does not afford. If I can find another chance, will draw a few thousand dollars more. Though it may appear, by the bills, that I purchased the pack-horses of those in whose favor I drew, I can inform you to the contrary; and that those horses are to be bought from individuals only, and throughout the whole State.

I am, with respect, sir, your very humble servant,

JOHN BELLI, D. Q. M. G. United States' Army.

The Honorable HENRY KNOX, Secretary of War, Philadelphia.

SIR:

Being just arrived here from the conference ground at Colerain, in company with forty-five of the principal chiefs of the Creeks, on a visit to my residence, and finding a boat departing for Savannah, I drop you a line in haste, to inform you that every thing hath gone favorable, beyond my most sanguine expectation.

I had present at our meeting the chiefs of eighteen of the principal towns in the Creek nation. Peace and friendship with the United States they confirm, and declare pointedly against joining the Northern tribes, or any others, red or white, against us. The whole particulars you shall have without delay. In the mean time, I am happy in being able to say, that every thing is in a most pleasing state between the Creeks and our country. I hope you will excuse this, as I am now surrounded by a very noisy, but friendly crew of red kings and chiefs.

I am, with all possible respect, yours, &c.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to submit to the Senate, the copy of a letter from his Excellency the Governor of Georgia, dated Augusta, December 5th, 1792, with an enclosure, relatively to Indian Affairs in the southern department.

I have the honor to be, sir, with perfect respect, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the Honorable the Senate of the United States.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 5th December, 1792.

SIR:

The enclosed certified document, being the deposition of Owen T. Bowen, relative to the murder of eight whites, by Cherokees, on the Western frontiers of this State, will evince that the savage principle of retaliation cannot be guarded against. It will now become indispensable that measures be taken to prevent farther outrage. Three companies of horse have already been ordered to range in that quarter where the murders have been committed, and it may be necessary that additional reinforcements be called in, to give protection and confidence to the settlers. No answer has, as yet, been received to my talk sent to the Cherokees, of which, you was furnished with a copy in my last.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most humble servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

STATE OF GEORGIA, Richmond County, ss.

Owen T. Bowen, of the county of Franklin, planter, being duly sworn, saith: that, on Thursday evening last, being the twenty-ninth ultimo, he passed by the house of one Mrs. Crockett, a widow woman, in the said county, where he saw the said widow, and advised her to move away into the fort in the neighborhood, as two Indians had been, on that day, seen in the settlement. That the said Mrs. Crockett replied, she would move as soon as her son came home. That, the next morning, the deponent went to the same house, and there saw the said Mrs. Crockett, together with her son, a young man, three young women, and three children, the youngest about six years old, all lying dead, scalped, and cruelly mangled; and that, from every appearance, the said murders were committed by Indians, and by Cherokees as the deponent believes. The deponent further saith, that there were two war clubs lying by the dead bodies, and several arrows sticking in them. This deponent further saith not.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 7, 1793.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 5th, 1793.

SIR:

In obedience to the order of the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to the Senate, a message of the Cornplanter and New Arrow, to Major General Wayne, of the 8th ultimo. The subject of Indian affairs being under the consideration of Congress, the President has conceived it proper that they should be possessed of the message now submitted.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the Honorable the Senate of the United States.

The speech of the Cornplanter and New Arrow to Major General Wayne.

CHINUCHSHUNGUTHO, 8th December, 1792.

BROTHER:

We are glad that our friend, whom you send to us with your friendly message, has arrived safe at our towns, and likewise thank this young man, (the Cornplanter's nephew) who left his hunting to accompany him. He informs us that you are desirous to know what conclusions we came to with the Western Indians. We shall now give you an account of our principal proceedings. We thank the Great Spirit, that we, with the rest of our chiefs, who were at council, have again arrived safe at our towns. According to the promise of our chiefs, made last winter in Philadelphia, we have been to council with the hostile Indians, to endeavor to bring them to a peace. After we arrived at their towns, and had acquainted them that it was the wish of General Washington to be at peace with the whole of the Indians, even those from the rising to the setting of the sun: after they had considered, they all, as one, agreed to make a peace; but as General Washington did not let us know the terms on which he would make peace, it was referred to a council the ensuing spring, where they wish he should be present. They wish it to be considered that they were the first people the Great Spirit seated on this island, for which reason we look on the Americans as children, to call them our younger brethren.

In the spring, we expect to meet them in council, where we can determine on what terms peace shall be made.

We are glad a road for peace is made by our brothers the Six Nations; the same road you must come in the spring, with General Washington, and at the same time you will take our brother, the King, by the hand, and lead him to the same council fire; you can come no other road, as only this one is open the road by the Ohio is out of use, being turned; miry and swampy, by the spilling of blood, for which we blame the Americans; on which account, we say, there is only one road for you to come in the Spring.

General Washington must not think hard of the loss of Colonel Harding and others, as we since have understood they were sent with messages of peace; unluckily for them and us, they had taken the bad road; if our spies, whom we kept on that road, saw any of your people, they took them for enemies, and treated them as such; we know your people would have done the same.

BROTHER AND FRIENDS OF THE FIFTEEN STATES: We now take you by the hand. The Western nations say you always lead us to your fires. It is true, we have a strong hold of each other, so we have undertaken to lead you to their fires. It is true, we have always attended to you, and hope you will this time listen to us, and we will see you safe.

BROTHER: On our arrival at Buffalo creek, we immediately wrote to General Washington an account of the whole of our proceedings; we now let you know only the principal, as we suppose you have, before this, received a particular account from General Washington himself.

We cannot come at present to visit you, as we have so much business to do among ourselves, which we must first attend to. We thank you, and think ourselves happy in your friendship. It is the minds of the Six Nations to listen to the white people, and be friends with them; all our thoughts are how to keep the whole island in peace.

BROTHER: You have a desire to know the nations we were at council with; we cannot tell the names of them. There were present three men from the Gora nations; it took them a whole season to come; and twenty-seven nations from beyond Canada. The whole of them know, that we, the Six Nations, have General Washington by the hand. The twenty-seven nations also say, that after a peace is made with the Americans, and Western Indians, their wishes are for the whole of the Indian nations to declare themselves allies to Great Britain.

The Shawanese say, that if they make peace, it will be on these terms: The Americans to allow them all the lands they held in Sir William Johnston's time; or, at least, that the river Ohio shall be the line, and they be paid for the lands improved on the south side of said river Ohio. These, they say, are the terms, and the only ones, on which they will make peace.

BROTHER: You mention to us a reward for our services, which we are very happy to hear, and hope you will send it by our friend, who will deliver you this. We wish you also to consider the fifteen warriors, who neglected their hunting to accompany us.

These are the words of the Cornplanter and New Arrow, chiefs of the Alleghany.

Per me,

NICHOLAS ROSECRANTZ, Interpreter.

I do certify, upon oath, that the foregoing speech or message, is a true translation of that delivered viva voce, by the Cornplanter and New Arrow, to me, at Chinuchshungutho, on the 8th instant.

WABASH AND ILLINOIS TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 13, 1793.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you, for your consideration and advice, a treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded on the 27th day of September, 1792, by Brigadier General Rufus Putnam, in behalf of the United States, with the Wabash and Illinois tribes of Indians. And, also, the proceedings attending the said treaty, the explanation of the fourth article thereof, and a map, explanatory of the reservation to the French inhabitants, and the general claim of the said Indians.

In connexion with this subject, I also lay before the Senate the copy of a paper which has been delivered by a man by the name of John Baptiste Mayée, who has accompanied the Wabash Indians, at present in this city.

It will appear, by the certificate of Brigadier General Putnam, that the Wabash Indians disclaimed the validity of the said paper, excepting a certain tract upon the Wabash, as mentioned in the proceedings.

The instructions to Brigadier General Putnam, of the 22d of May, together with a letter to him, of the 7th of August, 1792, were laid before the Senate on the 7th of November, 1792.

After the Senate shall have considered this treaty, I request that they would give me their advice, whether the same shall be ratified and concluded? and, if to be ratified and confirmed, whether it would not be proper, in order to prevent any misconception hereafter, of the fourth article, to guard, in the ratification, the exclusive pre-emption of the United States to the lands of the said Indians?

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 13th February, 1793.

A Treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded between the President of the United States of America, on the part of the said States, and the undersigned, kings, chiefs, and warriors, of the Wabash and Illinois Indian tribes, on the part and behalf of the said tribes.

The parties being desirous of establishing a permanent peace and friendship, between the United States and the said Indian tribes, and the citizens and members thereof, and to remove the causes of war, the President of the United States, by Rufus Putnam, one of the Judges of the territory of the United States, northwest of the river Ohio, and Brigadier General in the army, whom he hath vested with full powers for these purposes; and the said Wabash and Illinois Indian tribes, by the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, representing the said tribes, have agreed to the following articles, viz:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the individuals, villages, and tribes, of the said Wabash and Illinois Indians.

ART. 2. The undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, for themselves, and all parts of their villages and tribes, do acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States of America, and stipulate to live in amity and friendship with them.

ART. 3. The said tribes shall deliver, as soon as practicable, to the commanding officer at fort Knox, all citizens of the United States, white inhabitants or negroes, who are now prisoners among any of the said tribes.

ART. 4. The United States solemnly guaranty to the Wabash, and the Illinois nations, or tribes of Indians, all the lands to which they have a just claim; and no part shall ever be taken from them, but by a fair purchase, and to their satisfaction. That the lands originally belonged to the Indians; it is theirs, and theirs only. That they have a right to sell, and a right to refuse to sell. And that the United States will protect them in their said just rights.

ART. 5. The said kings, chiefs, and warriors, solemnly promise, on their part, that no future hostilities or depredations shall be committed by them, or any belonging to the tribes they represent, against the persons or property of any of the citizens of the United States. That the practice of stealing negroes and horses from the people of Kentucky, and other inhabitants of the United States, shall forever hereafter cease. That they will, at all times, give notice to the citizens of the United States of any designs which they may know, or suspect to be formed, in any neighboring tribe, or by any person whatever, against the peace and interest of the United States.

ART. 6. In cases of violence on the persons or property of the individuals of either party, neither retaliation or reprisal shall be committed by the other until satisfaction shall have been demanded of the party, of which the aggressor is, and shall have been refused.

ART. 7. All animosities for past grievances shall henceforth cease, and the contracting parties will carry the foregoing treaty into full execution, with all good faith and sincerity.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined, between the United States of America and the villages and tribes of the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, the parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, at Post Vincennes, on the Wabash river, this twenty-seventh day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

RUFUS PUTNAM,

Brigadier General, and Agent for making peace with the Indians.

[Signed by thirty-one Indians, of the Wabash and Illinois tribes.]

NORTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 4, 1793.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 4th, 1793.

SIR:

In obedience to the direction of the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to the Senate the instructions to the commissioners appointed to treat with the hostile Indians, north of the Ohio, and their report, in the form of a journal of their proceedings. And, also, a statement of the troops in the legion of the United States, and certain intelligence from Major General Wayne.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

Instructions to Benjamin Lincoln, of Massachusetts, Beverley Randolph, of Virginia, and Timothy Pickering, of Pennsylvania, Commissioners appointed for treating with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio.

GENTLEMEN:

You, having been appointed Commissioners to negotiate with the hostile Indians, northwest of the Ohio, are to regard the following instructions as the general principles of your conduct, and as delivered by the President of the United States.

You must be well aware of the extreme dislike of the great majority of the citizens of the United States to an Indian war, in almost any event; and with how much satisfaction they would embrace a peace upon terms of justice and humanity. To you, therefore, this negotiation is entrusted, with the hope that you will, by your intelligence and perseverance, be able to close a scene of hostilities, which, on the part of the United States, have been dictated by the protection due their frontier citizens.

In order that you may possess all the knowledge in the power of the Executive to give, you have herewith furnished the several papers upon this subject, enumerated in the schedule annexed, which contains information, from the peace between Great Britain and France, in the year 1763, until the present time.

With respect to the treaties made between the United States and the several hostile tribes, since the peace with Great Britain, in 1783, it is to be observed, that the treaty of fort Harmar, made in January, 1789, is regarded as having been formed on solid grounds—the principle being that of a fair purchase and sale.

The Government considers the Six Nations, who claimed the lands by virtue of former conquests, lying between the Ohio and Lake Erie, which were ceded and confirmed to the United States by the said treaty, with the said Six Nations, together with the Wyandots and Delawares, and Ottawas, and other Western Indians, who were the actual occupants of the lands, as the proper owners thereof; that they had a right to convey the said lands to the United States; and that they did accordingly make the said conveyance, with their free consent and full understanding. Parties, however, who were not at the treaty of fort Harmar, may have been either at the treaty of fort McIntosh or the Miami. Puchonchehelas, a chief of the Delawares, was at the latter.

But, if it shall appear, upon a further investigation of the subject, at the place of conference, that there were other tribes interested in the lands then ceded to the United States, than those who subscribed the said treaty, or that the consideration given was inadequate, it may be proper, in either or both cases, that a liberal compensation be made to the just claimants.

It will, therefore, be one of the first objects of the proposed treaty, to ascertain from the Indians, what tribes are the allowed proprietors of the country lying to the northward of the Ohio, and to the southward of the lakes.

You will perceive by Hutchin's map, herewith delivered, the boundaries confirmed by the said treaty of fort Harmar to the United States: and, also, the tracts which have been granted by the United States to the late army, and to particular companies of men.

You will endeavor, to the utmost of your power, to induce the tribes claiming a right to the said lands, to confirm the boundary established by the said treaty of Fort Harmar, with the Six Nations, and Wyandots, Delawares, &c.; for which purpose you will, among other considerations, offer—

1st. The guarantee of the United States of the right of soil, to all the remaining Indian lands in that quarter, against the citizens or inhabitants of the United States.

2dly. That the United States will relinquish the places mentioned in the said treaty as trading posts, to the northward of the general boundary; excepting, however, the grounds upon which the forts are erected, now occupied by the British troops; and which, by the treaty of peace of 1783, were ceded to the United States, together with the portions of land in the vicinity of said forts, in possession of the white inhabitants; and which have been purchased of the Indians.

3dly. The United States will relinquish any of the military posts, which shall appear to be established, without the boundaries of the treaty of fort Harmar, or the boundaries which you may agree upon.

4thly. That the United States will pay to the several tribes, in the proportions which shall be agreed upon, the sum of fifty thousand dollars, in goods, according to a tariff of articles, to be settled at the treaty. The tariff shall include the prime cost of the goods in Philadelphia or New York, together with the charge of the transportation to the place which shall be fixed for the delivery, and no more.

5thly. That, in addition to the above sum, to be paid immediately, the United States will also pay, annually, the sum of ten thousand dollars, in goods, to such tribes, and to be delivered at such places, as shall be agreed upon.

You will observe that the space between the tracts of land granted to the particular companies, and the Indian boundary, established by the treaty of fort Harmar, will render it extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to relinquish any lands in the said space, without establishing a cause of perpetual discussions and hostilities between the whites and Indians. But, if the relinquishment of any lands, in the said space, should be an ultimatum with the said Indians, and a line could be agreed upon which would be free from dispute, you may, in order to effect a peace, make such relinquishment.

In case you should be under the necessity of making this relinquishment, it will be left to your discretion whether or not to make the same compensations as are stated for the confirmation of the general boundary established by the treaty of fort Harmar.

But, you are to understand explicitly, that the United States cannot relinquish any of the tracts of land which they have already granted, as marked upon the said map.

In respect to all that has been said, with regard to relinquishment, you will please to understand, that no particular difficulty is intended to be thrown in the way of the relinquishment of any lands westward of the Great Miami, and northward of the Ohio, from the intersection thereof by the Great Miami, except the tract of one hundred and fifty thousand acres, granted to General Clarke.

You will observe, that, as none of the Wabash tribes attended the treaty of fort Harmar, the Western boundary, then established is imperfectly described. In the treaty made by General Putnam, with the said Wabash tribes, on the fourth of October last, the boundaries are not defined. He says, that he understood the Eastern boundary, claimed by the said Wabash Indians, would be described by a line drawn from the Miami village to a creek, a few miles above the falls of the Ohio. But, it is a point of considerable importance, in case of a successful treaty, that a well defined boundary should be established with all the tribes, so that, in future, no misunderstanding should happen on that account.

It will be an object worthy of your attention, to endeavor, as far as shall be consistent with the main design of peace, to form separate contracts, or treaties, relatively to boundaries, with the several tribes to whom the lands actually belong, avoiding, as much as possible, to confirm the idea of an union, or general confederacy of all the tribes, or of any patronage of the whole over the lands of any particular tribes, or subdivisions of tribes. But, as the said Indians are much attached to the idea of a general confederacy, your proceedings, in these particulars, will require peculiar caution and management.

You will, in all your negotiations, carefully guard the general rights of pre-emption of the United States to the Indian country, against all other nations and individuals, as established by the treaty of 1783, with Great Britain. But, in describing these rights to the Indians, you will impress them with the idea that we concede to them, fully, the right and possession of the soil, as long as they desire to occupy the same; but, when they choose to sell any portion of the country, it must be sold only to the United States, who will protect the Indians against all imposition.

In case of a successful treaty, the delivery of all prisoners taken from the United States must be strenuously insisted upon. But it will be left to your judgment, whether a particular compensation shall be stipulated, or not, to the individual owners of such prisoners, as it is well known that they are not considered as the common property of the Indian communities.

While at the treaty, you must endeavor to ascertain, as accurately as may be, the names and numbers of the respective Indian tribes within the limits of the United States, north of the Ohio; and, also, the names of the influential chiefs; their divisions of lands; and all other matters relatively to trade and intercourse with them.

And as it is highly probable there will be a great number of distant Indians from the Northward, Westward, and Southward, you will endeavor to learn the tribes to which they belong, and, whether their being present, is the effect of curiosity, or invitation.

It will depend upon your judgment, whether, after the treaty shall be about concluding, to inform the Indians of the measures taken by the United States for furnishing provisions during the treaty, and of the causes which prevented. It may, also, be proper to observe, that the same causes prevented any great quantities of goods being brought to the treaty ground.

You have, herewith, delivered to you, the belt sent by the hostile Indians; with the message acceding to the treaty; this you will shew them, as the evidence that their message was received. You have also delivered, the belt of the Five Nations, received upon the same occasion.

You will endeavor to obtain permission that agents of the United States may reside among the Indian tribes, as their protectors and friends; and, also, that traders may be established among them. The United States will, hereafter, enter into arrangements with the Indians, to supply them with goods, in the manner most beneficial to them, and which shall tend to prevent all imposition.

In case of a treaty, an article to be inserted, that murderers, on either side, shall be given up, or punished with death, according to the usage of the respective contracting parties.

In case of robberies, or horse stealing, the robbers, or thieves, to be punished with fine; the amount of which to be fixed. If incurred by the Indians, who should fail in payment, the same to be deducted from the annual payment of the tribe to whom the culprit should belong.

The society of Friends have, with the approbation of the President of the United States, decided to send some of their respectable members, in order to contribute their influence to induce the hostile Indians to a peace. They are not, however, to confer with the Indians upon any subject of importance, until they shall have previously communicated the same, and received your approbation.

The Reverend John Heckewelder, a Moravian teacher, who resided many years among the Moravian Indians, of the Delawares, will accompany you, in order, also, to use his influence towards a peace. He well understands the Delaware tongue, and, although he is unwilling to act as a common interpreter, yet you may rely upon his ability to correct others, and prevent imposition. His knowledge of Indian customs and manners may be of great use in your negotiations.

You have delivered to you, one hundred sets of silver ornaments, which you will present to such influential chiefs as you shall judge proper.

It will be necessary that you should endeavor, if consistently with the public interests, to close the treaty on or before the first of August. But, whatever shall be the result of the treaty, you will inform Major General Wayne thereof, on the Ohio, as expeditiously as possible; and, in order that there may be no defect in the transmission of such information, you will send many copies, by different routes, and spare no pains or expense to render the communication perfect.

General Wayne has been instructed to issue a proclamation, informing the people of the frontiers of the proposed treaty, and prohibiting all offensive movements of the whites to the northward of the Ohio, until they shall receive further information on the subject.

The good understanding which subsists between the United States and the Five Nations of Indians, and the steps they have taken for the purpose of terminating hostilities with the Western Indians, manifested by their journey to the council of Au Glaize the last year, induce the reliance that they will still continue their endeavors to bring about a peace. Many of them will be at the proposed treaty, and you will probably be able to make considerable use of them, to instill into the minds of the hostile Indians favorable dispositions towards the United States.

You will exclude all citizens of the United States from attending the treaty, excepting such as are herein mentioned, and such others as shall actually be in your employ.

It is, however, probable that the British agents, Messrs. Butler and McKee, will be present by the desire of the Indians. To this, you will not object, although you cannot formally admit of them, or any other British agents, as mediators or umpires.

It is understood also from General Hull, that several gentlemen of Governor Simcoe's family are desirous of being present at the treaty, perhaps from motives of curiosity. If this should be the case, you will cordially accede to the idea, upon the ground that, the intentions of the United States being upright, they cannot have the least objection to the presence of any gentleman of the British Government as evidences thereof.

You will forbid all persons from attempting any negotiations with the Indians relatively to the purchase of lands, upon any pretence whatever.

The general form of such a treaty as the Government are desirous of having observed in future, is herewith delivered, to which you will adhere, as far as the same may be suitable to the state of things.

In addition to Jasper Parrish, who is the established interpreter for the United States with the said Five Nations, I have written to James Dean also to accompany you as the principal interpreter of the said Five Nations. His influence among the said Indians, and his knowledge of Indian manners and customs, may be serviceable. It is also expected that Mr. William Wilson and Mr. James Rankin will accompany you, as interpreters of the Shawanese and Delaware tongues. These men have been represented as persons having an extensive knowledge of the characters of the Western Indians, and as men of probity, upon whom reliance may be placed.

The sum of twenty thousand dollars in specie will be delivered to you for the particular purpose of gratuities, to such influential persons or chiefs as may in your judgment be necessary; and, also, the further sum of — dollars, in order to defray the expenses of yourselves, stores, and attendants.

If you should effect a peace, it might be proper to invite a number of influential chiefs to repair to this place, in order to visit the President of the United States; and, also, for the purpose of choosing such goods as would be most suitable to their wants.

Your route will be hence, by the way of New York, Albany, fort Stanwix, Wood Creek, Oswego, and Niagara; thence, Governor Simcoe will furnish you with a vessel for the purpose of conveying you to the place of treaty. I have written to General Schuyler to provide boats, for your stores and yourselves, at Schenectady; these boats will be carried by land from the Mohawk river to Wood creek. If you should prefer taking the route from Albany to Niagara by land, you will please to pursue the same.

Given by the special direction of the President of the United States, at the War Office of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, this twenty-sixth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

H. KNOX,

Secretary for the Department of War, and having the direction of Indian Affairs.

The Journal of the Commissioners of the United States, appointed to hold a treaty at Sandusky, for the purpose of making peace with the Western Indians.

Two commissions were made out, appointing Benjamin Lincoln, of Massachusetts, Beverley Randolph, of Virginia, and Timothy Pickering, of Pennsylvania, commissioners for the purpose of negotiating a peace with the nations of Indians Northwest of the Ohio, on principles of mutual justice and convenience.

By one commission, there were given to those commissioners, "or a majority of them, full power and authority to confer on, treat of, renew, conclude, and sign, with such persons as by the said nations shall appear to them to be fully authorized thereto, a treaty or treaties of peace and amity, between the United States and the said Indian nations."

By the other commission, the same power was given to those commissioners, "or to any of them, in case of the death, sickness, or non-attendance of the other two."

The commissions bear date the second day of March, 1793.

The commissioners were accompanied with instructions, of which some parts were confidential.

TUESDAY, April 30th, 1793.

Beverley Randolph and Timothy Pickering set out from Philadelphia to go to Niagara, by the way of Sunbury, Northumberland, and Muncy, Lycoming, in Pennsylvania, the Painted Post, Bath, and Williamsburg, on Genesee river, in the State of New York.

Benjamin Lincoln had set off from Philadelphia on Saturday, the 27th of April, to go by the way of New York, Albany, the Mohawk river, and Oswego, taking under his care the stores and baggage.

Beverley Randolph and Timothy Pickering arrived at Williamsburg the 11th of May, and on Monday, the 13th, at Canawagus, on Genesee, met with the Farmer's Brother, Red Jacket, and some other chiefs of the Seneca nation, with whom they had some conversation.

The commissioners informed them of the time they expected to proceed from Niagara to Sandusky, and when the treaty was to be opened. They encouraged them to attend the treaty, and mentioned the reliance of the United States on their aid in bringing about a peace.

The chiefs said, that, when some of their men were hunting about Canandaigua, the answer of the President to the speech of the Western Indians arrived, relative to the holding of the treaty. That this answer was deficient, because the British were not invited to attend the treaty; and that it was necessary they should attend, because they originally called the Indians to war against the United States. That, nevertheless, Governor Simcoe had ordered Colonel Butler to attend the treaty. That all the provisions were ready, and that the British seemed now, more than ever, desirous to have peace take place between the United States and the Western Indians, and to give all the assistance in their power in promoting it.

With respect to the President's answer to the Western Indians, the commissioners observed, that he had given such an answer as his wisdom directed, and, therefore, that they could say nothing about it.

The commissioners received from the chiefs a written speech, and four strings of white wampum, sent by the Western Indians to the President. In this, they insisted on Sandusky as the place of treaty. This speech and strings, the commissioners enclosed in a letter to General Knox, and sent it by a man going to Williamsburg, to be put in the post office there.

The chiefs handed to the commissioners some papers, which they desired to have explained to them; this was done. They were the speeches between General Wayne and the Cornplanter, last March, at Pittsburg.

The commissioners entertained the chiefs and their followers with victuals and drink, and, at their request, furnished some provisions for their journey to Canandaigua, whither they were going for the clothing procured by General Chapin, for those who went last year to the council of the Western Indians.

FRIDAY, May 17th, 1793.

This day Beverley Randolph and Timothy Pickering arrived at Queenstown, seven miles up Niagara river, above Niagara fort, and the landing place for goods to be transported above the falls; here they met Thomas Morris, of Canandaigua, to whom had been committed, in order to be delivered to the commissioners, the extract of a letter from Colonel McKee, of which the following is a copy:

Extract of a letter from Colonel McKee to Major of Brigade Littlehales, dated Detroit, April 11th, 1793.

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated 23d March. The speech of the United States to the Western Indians, was forwarded yesterday to the Glaize, by some chiefs of the Shawanese, who came here soon after its arrival, to hasten the meeting; and I beg to acquaint you, for the information of his Excellency, that, at present, it appears generally understood by all the chiefs whom I have seen, that the proposed interview with the commissioners will certainly take place at Sandusky; but the time fixed by the United States (viz: the first of June) appears too early for the Indians to be able to collect themselves; as, in all probability, the major part of them will not return from their wintering grounds before the latter end of May, exclusively of the Southern chiefs, expected with the messengers who were sent last fall; and also those who are to attend from Michilimackinac and the Mississippi, in order to accomplish a full and permanent settlement of all the existing differences between the confederated Indians and the United States.

"And I should apprehend, from their accustomary slowness in all their deliberations, that it may be the latter end of June before they are able to adjust all their business at their private councils at the Miami Rapids, preparatory to their meeting the commissioners.

"His Excellency will therefore be enabled to state to the commissioners, should they arrive at the early period proposed, the causes of the delay; and should he think proper to recommend to them to stay at Niagara until the chiefs are nearly ready, I shall not neglect to give him early information thereof, that they may have sufficient time to be at the appointed place as soon as the Indians, who are to meet them.

"Their being at Sandusky so long before the meeting, may be extremely inconvenient to them, and cannot answer any good purpose."

A true copy.

E. B. LITTLEHALES.

Mr. Morris being just then setting off for Canandaigua, the commissioners wrote a short letter to the Secretary of War, mentioning their arrival at Queenstown, and enclosed therein the foregoing extract of Colonel McKee's letter, which they delivered to Mr. Morris, desiring him to forward the same to Philadelphia the first opportunity.

The commissioners then sent off a note (by Jasper Parrish, the interpreter, who had just before arrived) to Governor Simcoe, to advertise him of their arrival, and that they would wait upon him in the afternoon. To this note the following answer was received:

NAVY HALL.

Lieutenant Governor Simcoe presents his compliments to Mr. Randolph and Mr. Pickering, and he desires the pleasure of seeing them at Navy Hall as soon as shall be convenient. The Lieutenant Governor had expected the pleasure of their companies to dinner, but must insist upon their taking beds at his house, and of partaking of such accommodations with him, as this settlement can afford.

May 17th.

There being no public house at New Ark, (which is the name of the village where the Lieutenant Governor resides, near a mile from Niagara fort, on the opposite side of the river Niagara) and the Lieutenant Governor's invitation being so peremptory, the commissioners complied therewith, and took lodgings at Navy Hall, which is the name he has given the house in which he dwells, having been formerly occupied by the naval department.

TUESDAY, May 21st, 1793.

The commissioners wrote the following letter to General Knox, Secretary of War:

NAVY HALL, opposite Niagara, May 21st, 1793.

SIR:

At the moment of our arrival at the landing, (Queenstown) seven miles above this place, on the 17th, we sent you, by Mr. Thomas Morris, an extract of a letter from Colonel McKee, of Detroit, of which we now enclose a duplicate, it being important that you should be apprised of the probable delay for at least one month, in commencing the treaty, and, because of the importance of the information, we repeat it.

On the 17th, we waited on Governor Simcoe, and expressed our desire that a vessel might be sent to Oswego for General Lincoln and the stores. He assented with the utmost readiness to have it done as soon as a vessel capable of entering the port of Oswego should arrive, and he daily expected one from Kingston, (fort Frontenac) but she is not arrived. The only vessel here was a large topsail schooner, bound to Kingston, and waiting for a wind. It seems probable, therefore, that General Lincoln will be obliged to proceed hither with his batteaux.

There is no tolerable tavern in this part of the country. We are at the Governor's; he had provided for us, and insisted upon our taking beds at his house, and of partaking of such accommodations with him as this settlement could afford.

In a former letter, we mentioned the information of the Seneca chiefs; that Captain Brandt had set off with a number of Mohawks for the Westward. His departure must have been about the 5th of this month, and doubtless his principal object was to attend the preparatory council of the Indians, to be held at the rapids of the Miami, as mentioned by Colonel McKee.

We know not when a conveyance for this letter will present; we shall embrace the first.

We are, &c.

B. RANDOLPH.
T. PICKERING.

On the same day, May 21st, the commissioners sent the following message, in writing, by Henry, to his Father, the Cornplanter, New Arrow, and other Seneca chiefs in their settlement:

BROTHERS:

By your conference with General Wayne, about sixty days ago, we find it was proposed that you should be at Niagara about this time, to meet the commissioners of the United States, and go with them to the treaty to be held at Sandusky. We take this method to inform you of our arrival here, and that General Lincoln, the other commissioner, who went by the way of the Mohawk river and Oswego, is expected in a few days to join us. We have time to give you this information, and to repeat the invitation to you to accompany us to the treaty, because it will not begin at Sandusky so soon as we expected.

The Great Chief of the United States has proposed the 1st of June (ten days hence) for the opening of the treaty; but Colonel M'Kee writes, that the Western Indians will not be able to assemble so soon; probably not till the last of June. We, therefore, give you our opinion, that, if you arrive at Buffalo creek in twenty-five days after this day on which we write to you, it will not be too late. By that time, we hope to hear of your arrival, for we have great dependance on your assistance at the proposed treaty.

We remain your friends and brothers,

B. RANDOLPH,
T. PICKERING,
Commissioners of the United States.

Written at Niagara, the 21st June, 1793.

N. B. Henry went as far as Cataragus creek, where, learning that his father had left home and gone for Genesee, he delivered the message to runners to carry it to New-Arrow.

SATURDAY, May 25th, 1793.

This day, General Lincoln and company arrived in batteaux from Oswego. Mr. James Dean, interpreter, arrived the same day by land from Oneida.

SUNDAY, May 26th, 1793.

The commissioners receiving no intelligence concerning Mr. Wilson, and another interpreter for the Delaware and Shawanese languages, and wanting also a quantity of white wampum, General Lincoln not having found any at New York or Albany, wrote the following letters to Pittsburg:

NIAGARA, 26th May, 1793.

SIR:

The Secretary of War informed us that he had written to Mr. William Wilson and Mr. James Rankin, of Pittsburg, requesting them to accompany the commissioners for holding a treaty with the Western Indians, to Sandusky, as interpreters of the Delaware and Shawanese languages, and that Mr. Wilson, in particular, had consented to go.

As he had not arrived in Philadelphia when we left it, we hoped he would come directly from Pittsburg to Niagara.

It is of the highest importance, that we have our own interpreters for those languages at the ensuing treaty.

We, therefore, entreat you to apply immediately to Mr. Wilson, and urge his coming on, if he should not have set out; it seemed that Mr. Rankin declined going, because he was not sufficiently acquainted with the Shawanese tongue to undertake the interpretation of it. If this be the case, his presence may be dispensed with. But then, we must request you to apply for another, and, if it be possible, engage some one competently skilled in the Shawanese language to attend us. We have placed such a reliance on Mr. Wilson's assistance, that his non-attendance may prove extremely injurious to the interests of the United States.

We trust, therefore, that nothing will prevent his coming. If, however, any unavoidable accident should prevent it, pray inquire for, and engage, another in his stead. The pay will be made satisfactory. There is now no time to be lost, and it is owing to an unexpected delay of the Western Indians, in assembling, that we are enabled to make this application.

We have sent Jasper Parrish, who is interpreter to the languages of the Six Nations, with this letter. We pray you to hasten your measures to obtain interpreters, that he may return with them immediately. We shall doubtless embark for Sandusky by the time he can possibly return.

We have been disappointed in our applications at New York and Albany for white wampum. Eighty thousand is the quantity we should choose to take with us. If it can be obtained at Pittsburg, pray procure it, or as much as you can, if short of eighty thousand. The enclosed contingent draft on the Secretary of War will enable you to pay it.

We have now only to request, that you will reflect on the importance of our present application; and we assure ourselves, you will cheerfully comply with our wishes.

SIR:

Not having obtained any white wampum, either at New York or Albany, we have desired Major Craig to procure any quantity, not exceeding 80,000, at Pittsburg; should he procure it, he will transmit you the account thereof, which we request you to pay, at five days' sight hereof.

NIAGARA, May 26, 1793.

SIR:

We have written to Major Craig, who is in the service of the United States, requesting him to engage interpreters for the Delaware and Shawanese languages, to go with us to Sandusky. These interpreters were expected in Philadelphia before we left it, but they had not arrived, and we have no intelligence concerning them, though we hope they are on their way from Pittsburg to this place.

Your knowledge of Indian affairs in the Western world, will enable you to point out the most suitable persons for interpreters; and we request your aid in engaging them, should those written for by General Knox fail of attending.

The bearer of this letter is Jasper Parrish, interpreter for the Six Nations, who has our directions to bring with him a quantity of white wampum, if to be obtained at Pittsburg. In this article, also, your assistance may be useful.

The importance and urgency of the business, will induce you to excuse our giving you this trouble.

NIAGARA, May 26, 1798.

Sir:

You will proceed with the letters herewith committed to you, to Pittsburg. At the Cornplanter's settlement, get one or two trusty Indians to accompany you as guides. The great objects of your journey are to procure interpreters for the Delaware and Shawanese languages, and to obtain a parcel of white wampum. Major Craig will, we doubt not, pay immediate attention to these matters, and give you all possible despatch; should he be absent, apply to General John Gibson, to whom also we have written, and whose aid, we persuade ourselves, will readily be afforded.

We wish to obtain 80,000 of white wampum; we have already enough of the black. We desire you to make all possible despatch, as we shall endeavor to embark for Sandusky by the 20th of June.

Letter to the Secretary of War.

NIAGARA, May 27, 1798.

Sir:

General Lincoln arrived here on the 25th, with the stores in batteaux. No interpreters have arrived for the Delaware and Shawanese tongues; nor could General Lincoln obtain any white wampum, either at New York or Albany. General Schuyler supplied him with about 30,000 of black wampum.

Our letter of the 16th instant, we hope you will receive; that will account for the long delay we must make at this place. A duplicate of the extract from Col. McRee's letter is enclosed, together with ours of the 21st instant.

This unavoidable delay gives us time to send to Pittsburg, to inquire after and engage interpreters, should those sent for, by you, fail of attending, and to procure white wampum. Jasper Parrish goes on this business, and will set out this forenoon. We expect he will return with ease by the 20th June, before which time, there is no probability of our sailing for Sandusky. Should we get no white wampum at Pittsburg, we shall endeavor to borrow of the British agents, here or at Detroit. As this is a very possible contingency, we wish to have it in our power to return what we borrow.

If, therefore, you should have occasion to send a messenger to this place, and white wampum can be procured by you, it may be forwarded, addressed in our absence to the care of Major Littlehales, Secretary to Governor Simcoe, Niagara. Should there be no object of importance requiring your sending a special messenger, the wampum may be sent by the post to Reading, whence it will be brought on to Genesee by Mr. Williamson's riders; the package may be addressed to Mr. Williamson, at Williamsburg, on Genesee, he having engaged to forward by the earliest conveyance, any packages or letters addressed to us. The quantity of white wampum wanted, is 80,000. Jasper Parrish says he went to some house in Philadelphia with T. Francis, where he saw a large quantity,—two millions.

If Major Craig should obtain the wampum at Pittsburg, we have desired him to send the account to you for payment.

Mr. James Dean arrived here on the 25th. The extreme jealousy of the Indians will naturally prompt them to magnify every thing wearing a hostile appearance. The movement of General Wayne to fort Washington, will probably give no umbrage; and in his speech to the Cornplanter, he assured him, he should make no advances beyond the posts already established. But if he reinforces the present posts, advanced of fort Washington, we are apprehensive it may produce mischief, if nothing worse, at least by exciting a suspicion, that it is in order to strike their towns while they are in treaty; it will still longer retard their assembling. The jealousy of the Indians is so great, Governor Simcoe says they will, during the treaty, keep scouting parties about our advanced posts; and that, if any troops should be sent forward, especially to fort Jefferson, the Indians will certainly strike them. We recollect, that your instructions to General Wayne, contained many cautions to prevent any steps which might move the jealousy or resentment of the Indians; but not remembering the precise terms, we have thought it expedient to drop this hint.

We have the honor to be, yours, &c.

P. S. On inquiring, we find Colonel Butler has no white wampum, but has sent to New York for a supply.

Letter to Major Craig, Pittsburg.

NIAGARA, May 27, 1798.

Sir:

Since writing the enclosed (of yesterday) we have found it necessary to send Mr. Parrish express to Philadelphia, where we know he can get some wampum, so that, if you can procure and send us 40 or 50,000 of white wampum, it will suffice.

With regard to the interpreters for the Delaware and Shawanese languages, we repeat our request, that they may be engaged and forwarded immediately. We expect Mr. Parrish will return from Philadelphia in twenty days, at farthest by the 20th June. He is to send some Indian runners with our letters to you. We pray you to give them all needful despatch, and the provisions necessary on their return.

Letter to General Knox, Secretary of War.

NIAGARA, 27th May, 1798.

Sir:

The letter addressed to you, which is enclosed, was, as you will see, intended to go by the way of Pittsburg; but on searching General Lincoln's trunk, the belt of the hostile Indians, according to the treaty, and that sent by the Five Nations, on the same occasion, which, in our instructions, you say are herewith delivered to us, are not found; they must still be at your office. Neither have we the white new belts, which were intended for our use. These, with what white wampum is on hand, in strings, Mr. Parrish can bring to us, with as much more as will make up eighty thousand or one hundred thousand: for, if there should be a surplus, we cannot make a more acceptable present to the Indians than wampum. For this reason, and also for the purpose of ensuring a full supply, we have continued our request to Major Craig, to send us forty or fifty thousand. The letters to Major Craig will be sent by some Indian runners, whom Parrish will despatch from Buffalo creek to the Cornplanter's settlement, where they may be delivered to the runners, who are well acquainted with the route.

Mr. Parrish, the bearer of this, says he can reach Philadelphia in eight or ten days, and will return in as many more; we pray you give him all needful despatch.

The Doctor's medicine chest was left at Philadelphia. It seems, that on his way he has bought a pound of bark, and a few other articles, of small account.

Perhaps, as the treaty may now be postponed to a later season than was expected, it may be expedient for Mr. Parrish to bring a pound of bark, and such other articles as the physicians you consulted shall recommend, and Parrish can conveniently bring.

We are, sir, yours, &c.

The commissioners having discharged twenty of their batteau-men, they gave the following order for the residue of their pay:

NIAGARA, 27th May, 1793.

Sir:

As a less sum was put into the hands of the commissioners than you expected; and, as, by a delay, which will probably take place respecting the assembling of the Indians, our expenses will be augmented, we have thought it best to draw on you for the sum of four hundred and sixty-one dollars and seventy-five cents; which draft, we doubt not, you will honor at sight, and cause payment to be made, so as best to accommodate the drawee.

NAVY HALL, 30th May, 1793.

Sir:

We, having been appointed commissioners of the United States, to hold a treaty with the Indians at Sandusky, and the time proposed for holding the treaty being the 1st of June, met at this place on the 25th instant, and should have proceeded to Sandusky, but for your letter to Major Littlehales, of the 11th of April, in which you express your opinion that the Indians would not be assembled until the last of June, and desire that the commissioners may be apprised of it. We felt ourselves obliged by this attention to our convenience, and, in consequence of this information, determined to remain here a few weeks; or until further advice from you should point out the proper time for our departure. We have now to request you will have the goodness to make known to the Indians, who propose to attend the treaty, that we are arrived at this place, and intend to be at Sandusky by the last of June, at farthest, unless, your future communications should require a different arrangement. We request, also, the favor of the earliest information on this head, to be transmitted to Major Littlehales or to us.

A general and permanent peace being the great object of our mission, we hope to receive the countenance and support of all who can feel for the happiness of the human race. Your aid, in particular, in promoting this important work, may be of the highest utility, and will be most gratefully acknowledged by,

June 1st, 1793.

William Wilson, interpreter, arrived, bringing with him Sylvester Ash, as an assistant interpreter; he brought a letter from Major Craig, mentioning the terms on which they were engaged. June 3d, Mr. Wilson set off for fort Erie, to embark for Detroit, whence, if practicable, he was to proceed to the Miami Rapids, where he might gain useful information. Captain Hendricks, with four of his men, arrived about the same time with Mr. Wilson, and also proceeded to fort Erie, to embark for Detroit.

NIAGARA, 4th June, 1793.

After discoursing with the hostile Indians about the treaty, and hearing their claims with respect to the boundary, which they propose should be the Ohio, it may be expedient for you to suggest some things for their consideration, as of yourself, in order to discover how far they may be persuaded to depart from their rigid demands.

1st. It is true, the commissioners, at some former treaties, set up extravagant claims, but perhaps the present commissioners may confine themselves to moderate limits, and relinquish all the rest of the lands.

2d. The treaties formerly made, were carried to the great council of the United States, who, seeing them signed by a number of Indian chiefs, might suppose that those chiefs represented their nations, and that the treaties were right. In consequence of which, the great council sold large tracts of land along the Ohio, to a number of people, who have since settled upon them; and being thus sold and settled, it may be very difficult, if not impossible, now to give them up. I understand that such sales have been made from the west line of Pennsylvania, (which begins at the mouth of Little Beaver creek) down the Ohio, as far as the Great Miami.

3d. Now, suppose the commissioners should relinquish the lands westward of the Great Miami, and pay a good sum of money, or a large quantity of goods, for the lands eastward of the Great Miami, would it not be well to agree to such terms, and make peace?

4th. But suppose the commissioners should be willing to do still more, and give up part of the lands southward of the line settled by the treaties of fort McIntosh and fort Harmar, would it not be well to listen to their offers?

5th. Consider, further, what are the advantages you derive from the lands which the United States wish to retain. They are, furs, skins, and meat, which you would every year obtain by hunting.

But, suppose the commissioners should offer to pay a large annual rent for those lands, in money, in goods, or provisions; would not such terms be better than war? But, probably, besides this rent, you may hunt on these same lands as long as you can find any game.

6th. At all events, keep your minds open to the talk of the commissioners. Do not fix the terms of peace before you hear them. Tell them all your grievances, and listen to their answers. Perhaps former transactions with you have not been fully understood, and thence all the evils of the war may have arisen. I think there is now a disposition in the United States to find out what is true, and to do what is right.

T. P.

NOTE.—The commissioners had conversed on the subject of the above instructions, and concluded to commit them to writing for Captain Hendricks' information; but it not having been done before his departure from Navy Hall, Colonel Pickering wrote them at Chippewa, where he overtook Hendricks on his way to fort Erie. Hendricks proposed to translate them into his own language, and then destroy the original paper.

In a few days after General Lincoln's arrival with the stores and baggage, (without which we could not provide for ourselves) we concluded to remove from Navy Hall, Queenstown, and there encamp, while we should be obliged to wait for the assembling of the Indian nations at Sandusky. But as soon as Governor Simcoe understood our intentions, he again insisted on our staying at his house, and in such terms, that we could not, without rudeness, avoid a compliance with his request.

NAVY HALL, June 6th, 1793.

At a meeting of the commissioners this day, it being thought expedient to invite General Chapin, superintendent of the Six Nations, to attend them during the treaty with the hostile Indians at Sandusky, he being present, was accordingly invited, and assured of a reasonable compensation for his time and services. General Chapin accepted the invitation, and promised to attend.

NAVY HALL, 7th June, 1793.

The commissioners presented the following note to Governor Simcoe:

The commissioners of the United States for making peace with the Western Indians beg leave to suggest to Governor Simcoe:

That the very high importance of the negotiation committed to their management, makes them desirous of using every proper means that may contribute to its success.

That they have observed with pleasure the disposition manifested by the Governor to afford every requisite assistance in the preparatory arrangements for holding the treaty with the hostile Indians. But, all the facilities thus afforded, and all the expenses incurred by the British Government on this occasion, will perhaps be fruitless, unless some means are used to counteract the effect of deep rooted prejudices, and unfounded reports, among the Indian tribes: for, the arts of a few bad men dwelling among them, or having a familiar intercourse with them, by cherishing those prejudices, or raising and spreading those reports, may be sufficient to defeat every attempt to accomplish a peace.

As an instance of such unfounded reports, the commissioners have noticed the declaration of a Mohawk, from Grand river, that Governor Simcoe advised the Indians to make peace, but not to give up any of their lands.

The commissioners further observe, that if any transactions at former treaties were exceptionable, the principles of the present treaty are calculated to remove the causes of complaint: for the views of Government are perfectly fair.

And, although it is now impossible to retrace all the steps then taken, the United States are disposed to recede, as far as shall be indispensable, and the existing state of things will admit, and, for the lands retained, to make ample compensation.

The views of the United States being thus fair and liberal, the commissioners wish to embrace every means of making them so appear to the Indians, against any contrary suggestions. Among these means, the commissioners consider the presence of some gentlemen of the army to be of consequence: for, although the Indians naturally look up to their superintendents as their patrons, yet, the presence of some officers of the army will probably induce them to negotiate with greater confidence on the terms of peace. Independently of these considerations, the commissioners, for their own sakes, request the pleasure of their company.

The commissioners feeling the greatest solicitude to accomplish the object of their mission, will be happy to receive from the Governor every information relating to it, which his situation enables him to communicate. He must be aware that the sales and settlements of the lands over the Ohio, founded on the treaties of forts McIntosh and Harmar, render it impossible now to make that river the boundary.

The expression of his opinion on this point in particular, will give them great satisfaction.

Memorandum.—Besides the reasons expressly mentioned in the note, there were other inducements to present it. With respect to the invitation to some British officers to attend the treaties, the commissioners found they were desirous of attending, and thought a direct invitation more eligible than a mere assent to their wishes.

Colonel Butler and General Chapin also deemed the invitation to be of some moment.

It was the explicit opinion of the chiefs of the Senecas, that an open communication with the Governor, on the subject of the treaty, might have a salutary effect; and Major Littlehales, the Governor's secretary, gave the commissioners to understand, that the Governor, if requested, would cheerfully give his opinion about it.

They conceived, also, that the presence of some officers of the army would add to their security from insults and from danger.

The same day, the following note was received from Governor Simcoe:

NAVY HALL, 7th June, 1793.

Colonel Simcoe, commanding the King's forces in Upper Canada, has the honor, in answer to the paper delivered to him this morning, by the commissioners of the United States for making peace with the Western Indians, to state to those gentlemen, that he is duly impressed with the serious importance of the negotiation committed to their charge, and shall be happy to contribute by every proper means that may tend to its success.

He is much obliged to them for the polite manner in which they have expressed their sense of his readiness to afford them such facilities as may have been in his power, to assist in the preparatory arrangements for holding the treaty.

He is perfectly aware that unfounded reports, and deep rooted prejudices, have arisen among the Indian tribes; but whether from the acts of a few bad men living among them, he cannot pretend to say; but, he must observe, upon the instance given by the commissioners, of one of "those unfounded reports, that a Mohawk from the Grand river should say, that Governor Simcoe advised the Indians to make peace, but not to give up their lands," it is of that nature that cannot be true; the Indians, as yet, not having applied for his advice on the subject, and it being a point, of all others, on which they are the least likely to consult the British officers commanding in Upper Canada.

Colonel Simcoe considers himself perfectly justified in admitting, on the requisition of the commissioners, some officers to attend the treaty, and, therefore, in addition to the gentlemen appointed to control the delivery of the British provisions, &c. he will desire Captain Bunbury, of the fifth regiment, and Lieutenant Givens, who has some knowledge of one of the Indian languages, to accompany the commissioners.

Colonel Simcoe can give the commissioners no further information than what is afforded by the speeches of the confederate nations, of which, General Hull has authentic copies. But, as it has been, ever since the conquest of Canada, the principle of the British government, to unite the American Indians, that, all petty jealousies being extinguished, the real wishes of the several tribes may be fully expressed, and in consequence, all the treaties made with them, may have the most complete ratification and universal concurrence, so, he feels it proper to state to the commissioners, that a jealousy of a contrary conduct in the agents of the United States, appears to him to have been deeply impressed upon the minds of the confederacy.

To the Commissioners, &c.

Letter to General Knox.

NAVY HALL, 20th June, 1793.

SIR:

We have been in daily expectation of Mr. Parrish's arrival, but probably the continual rains, (for not a day passes without them) have delayed him.

About the 6th instant, the six friends, Mr. Heckewelder, Dr. McCoskry, Captain Hendricks, and his four companions of the Stockbridge tribe, sailed from fort Erie for Detroit, to gain intelligence, and (the whites) there await our arrival. But the day before yesterday, mentioning to Governor Simcoe our intention of going to Detroit, to learn the true state of things prior to our landing at Sandusky, he objected to our proceeding up to the town of Detroit, though we might go to the mouth of Detroit river, adding, that there were settlers there, among whom we could find such accommodations as we should need; and that he would obtain letters for us, to them, from a gentleman here, (Mr. Baby) who is a member of the Legislative council.

As soon as Mr. Parrish returns, and a vessel shall arrive at fort Erie to receive us, we intend to embark for Detroit river. By all accounts, there will be a very great assembly of Indians, beyond what was expected before we left Philadelphia: Of the Six Nations, dwelling within the United States, the following numbers may attend the treaty:

Oneidas from Oneida,	-	-	-	-	14
Onondagoes from Onondago,	-	-	-	-	6
Cayugas from Cayuga, about	-	-	-	-	5
Senecas from Genesee, about	-	-	-	-	24
Do. from Buffalo creek,	-	-	-	-	47
Onondagoes do. about	-	-	-	-	10
Cayugas do. about	-	-	-	-	14

116

To these, may probably be added a number of Cayugas of Buffalo creek, who accompany Fish Carrier, who is the head of that nation.

From appearances, the conclusion of the treaty will be procrastinated beyond the time you expected, unless it should be cut short by peremptory demands, on the part of the Indians, of terms to which we cannot accede.

No further advice has been received from Colonel McKee, relative to the time when the Indians will be at Sandusky. He and Brandt attend their previous councils at the Rapids of the Miami. Colonel Butler was to have sailed about a week since, but, being taken sick, returned from fort Erie. Perhaps he may now go in the same vessel with us.

We have the honor to be, &c.

Letter to General Knox, (per Mr. Baynton.)

NAVY HALL, 26th June, 1793.

SIR:

Yesterday, Mr. Parrish arrived, with your letters of the 6th and 12th. We are happy that he has obtained a full supply of wampum.

On the 1st June, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Ash, interpreters, arrived, with a letter from Major Craig, mentioning the terms on which they were engaged. The vessel, in which the friends, Mr. Heckewelder, &c. embarked, meeting with some delay at fort Erie, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Ash had time to proceed with them to Detroit. Mr. Wilson appears to be an intelligent man; and from his acquaintance at the Westward, we hoped he might collect some useful information. He intended to go to the Rapids of the Miami, but was disappointed. His letter of the 17th, and Colonel McKee's of the 14th instant, (of which copies are enclosed) will explain the causes thereof.

Jasper Parrish left General Chapin near fort Erie, with Colonel Butler, who told him that Colonel McKee had written him on the 19th instant; that the Western Indians were waiting the arrival of the Six Nations, and desired that they might be hastened on. Colonel Butler had, accordingly, sent for those of the Six Nations, who had collected at Buffalo creek, for the purpose of proceeding to the treaty. They have, probably, embarked with Colonel Butler yesterday or to-day.

Another vessel lies at fort Erie, ready to receive us, and we shall proceed for that place to-day. Our stores are now on the way.

At our request, General Chapin has come forward, to accompany us to the treaty. He was here some time ago, and, after much conversation with him, we were of opinion that his assistance would be very useful. We have engaged him some compensation, independent of his ordinary allowance as Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

We were glad to receive the various proclamations forbidding expeditions northward of the Ohio. With all the proofs we can obtain, we shall find it difficult enough to allay the jealousy of the Indians, who will doubtless be frequently alarmed with stories, as groundless as that mentioned in the letters of Colonel McKee and Mr. Wilson. Every escort with provisions will probably occasion such reports, and, should there be any apparent accumulation of troops at the posts, beyond their ordinary complement, it may at least greatly retard our negotiations. Permit us to ask, whether a truce should not be considered as existing during the treaty, and whether a liberal observance of the laws of a truce, on the part of the United States, be not expedient? Although, by the Indians, to whom such laws are unknown, they are not respected, we shall, however, use our endeavors to impress them with the propriety and necessity of abstaining from all hostilities, while the event of the treaty is in suspense.

We ardently hope, that the minds of the Southern Indians may be quieted and peace confirmed.

Nothing would make us more happy, than to be able to relieve the President from any degree of the anxiety he feels for "the entire success of our mission." But no facts have yet come to our knowledge, by which we can warrant an opinion on the event of it. The result shall be communicated to you as early as possible, with the copy mentioned in your postscript. Mr. Baynton has made a verbal communication of what he says was entrusted to him, by you, and which we shall not forget.

We remain, sir, yours, &c.

Letter to Major Craig, forwarded by Joseph Nicholson.

FORT ERIE, 28th June, 1793.

SIR:

Mr. Nicholson arrived here on the 25th instant, with two Seneca Indians, who delivered us your letter of the 8th, with three packages of wampum. We are much obliged by your attention to our request. Fortunately, our messenger to Philadelphia returned the day before, with a full supply. We are glad that two of the Wabash Indians are persuaded to accompany the Senecas, in order to attend the treaty. The compensation to the runners was undoubtedly proper. We think a further compensation due for their faithful services; and accordingly, have now delivered to them, that is, to the two runners who have come here, eight and a third dollars, each, and to the one who remained at the Burnt towns, one guinea. To Mr. Nicholson, we have given four guineas, to support him on his return, and the Indians to their homes; for which, he will account with you. Having previously engaged very competent interpreters for the languages of the Six Nations, it was not necessary to add to the number, by retaining Mr. Nicholson. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Ash arrived here on the 1st instant, and, in a few days, embarked for Detroit. We received a letter from him at that place, on the 17th. The Western Indians were then beginning to council among themselves, at their general meeting at the Rapids of the Miami of the lake. We shall sail with the first fair wind for Detroit river, and go to Sandusky as soon as we find the Indians are ready to proceed from the Miami.

June 29th.

The commissioners and their suite went to fort Erie to embark for Sandusky; but the winds being contrary, they returned three or four miles to their lodgings.

June 30th.

The wind still contrary, nevertheless the commissioners and their suite embarked on board the schooner Dunmore, Captain Henry Ford, commander.

July 5th.

Still detained by contrary winds at fort Erie. This day arrived in a vessel from the Miami, Colonel Butler, a British superintendent of Indian affairs, and Captain Brandt, with about fifty Indians, being a deputation from the Indian nations, assembled at the rapids of the Miami, to confer with the commissioners of the United States, in presence of the Governor of Upper Canada.

The deputation being met, gave notice to the commissioners that they desired to speak with them. The commissioners attending, a Shawanese chief, called Cat's Eyes, addressed them thus:

BROTHERS: We are sent by the nations of Indians assembled at the rapids of the Miami, to meet the commissioners of the United States. We are glad to see you here. It is the will of the chiefs of those nations, that our father, the Governor of this province, should be present, and hear what we have to say to you, and what you have to say to us.

BROTHERS: Do not make yourselves uneasy that we did not meet you at the time you proposed at Sandusky. The reasons thereof will be mentioned at another time. [Four strings of black and white wampum.]

To which the commissioners, after repeating the foregoing speech, replied:

BROTHERS: The commissioners are glad to see you. We will confer with you in presence of your father, the Governor of this province, at any time and place which shall be convenient to him and you. [Returned the four strings.]

The chiefs having consulted a few minutes by themselves, again asked the attendance of the commissioners, and proposed that the conference should be at the Governor's, at Niagara, to which the commissioners agreed, informing the chiefs that they would be at the Governor's to-morrow night.

IN COUNCIL, at Navy Hall, July 7th, 1793.

Present, commissioners of the United States, Colonel Simcoe, Governor of Upper Canada, and a considerable number of civil and military officers, deputation of Indians from the council assembled at the rapids of the Miami. Captain Brandt, with a belt and strings of wampum, rose and said:

BROTHERS: We have met to-day our brothers the Bostonians and English. We are glad to have the meeting, and think it is by the appointment of the Great Spirit.

BROTHERS OF THE UNITED STATES: We told you the other day, at fort Erie, that, at another time, we would inform you why we had not assembled at the time and place appointed for holding the treaty with you. We now inform you that it is because there is so much of the appearance of war in that quarter.

BROTHERS: We have given the reason for our not meeting you, and now we request an explanation of those warlike appearances.

BROTHERS: The people you see here are sent to represent the Indian nations, who own the lands north of the Ohio, as their common property, and who are all of one mind—one heart.

BROTHERS: We have come to speak to you for two reasons: one, because your warriors, being in our neighborhood, have prevented our meeting at the appointed place; the other, to know if you are properly authorized to run and establish a new boundary line between the lands of the United States, and of the Indian nations. We are still desirous of meeting you at the appointed place.

BROTHERS: We wish you to deliberate well on this business. We have spoken our sentiments in sincerity, considering ourselves in the presence of the Great Spirit, from whom, in time of danger, we expect assistance. [A white belt of 12 rows and 30 strings of wampum, in five bunches, nearly all white.]

The commissioners answered:

BROTHERS: We have attended to what you have said. We will take it into our serious consideration, and give you an answer to-morrow. We will inform you when we are ready.

Captain Brandt replied:

BROTHERS: We thank you for what you have said. You say you will answer our speech to-morrow. We now cover up the council fire.

The answer of the commissioners of the United States to the speech delivered yesterday by Captain Brandt, in behalf of the Western Indians.

NIAGARA, 8th July, 1793.

In Council. Present as yesterday.

BROTHERS: By the appointment of the Great Spirit we are again met together. We hope he will assist us on both sides to see and to do what is right. It gives us pleasure that this meeting is in the presence of our brothers, the English.

BROTHERS: Yesterday, according to your promise at fort Erie, you told us the reason why the nations whom you represent had delayed assembling at the time and place appointed for meeting us. "That it was because there was so much of the appearance of war in that quarter."

BROTHERS: You requested an explanation of these warlike appearances.

BROTHERS: You told us that the people whom we saw here were sent to represent the Indian nations who own the lands on the northern side of the Ohio, as their common property, and who are all of one mind—one heart.

BROTHERS: You said you had two reasons for coming to speak to us here; one that our warriors, being in your neighborhood, had prevented your meeting at the appointed place; the other, to be informed whether we are properly authorized to run and establish a new boundary line between the lands of the United States and of the Indian nations. You added, that you were still desirous of meeting us at the appointed place.

BROTHERS: You desired that we would deliberate well on this business. You declared that you spoke your sentiments in sincerity, considering yourselves in the presence of God, from whom, in time of danger, you expect assistance.

BROTHERS: We have now repeated your speech as we understood it from the interpretation. We hope we have not mistaken your meaning.

BROTHERS: Now listen to our answer in behalf of the United States.

BROTHERS: You have mentioned two objects of your coming to meet us at this place. One to obtain an explanation of the warlike appearances on the part of the United States on the northern side of the Ohio; the other, to learn whether we have authority to run and establish a new boundary line between your lands and ours.

BROTHERS: On the first point, we cannot but express our extreme regret, that any reports of warlike appearances, on the part of the United States, should have delayed our meeting at Sandusky. The nature of the case irresistibly forbids all apprehensions of hostile incursions into the Indian country, north of the Ohio, during the treaty at Sandusky.

BROTHERS: We were deputed by the Great Chief and the Great Council of the United States to treat with you of peace; and is it possible that the same Great Chief and his Great Council could order their warriors to make fresh war, while we were sitting round the same fire with you, in order to make peace? Is it possible that our Great Chief and his council could act so deceitfully towards us, their commissioners, as well as towards you? Brothers, we think it is not possible. But we will quit argument and come to facts.

BROTHERS: We assure you that our Great Chief, General Washington, has strictly forbidden all hostilities against you, until the event of the proposed treaty at Sandusky shall be known. Here is the proclamation of his head warrior, General Wayne, to that effect. But, Brothers, our Great Chief is so sincere in his professions for peace, and so desirous of preventing every thing which could obstruct the treaty, and prolong the war, that, besides giving the above orders to his head warrior, he has informed the Governors of the several States, adjoining the Ohio, of the treaty proposed to be held at Sandusky; and desired them to unite their power with his to prevent any hostile attempts against the Indians, north of the Ohio, until the result of the treaty is made known. Those Governors have accordingly issued their orders, strictly forbidding all such hostilities. The proclamations of the Governors of Virginia and Pennsylvania we have here in our hands.

BROTHERS: If, after all these precautions of our Great Chief, any hostilities should be committed north of the Ohio, they must proceed from a few disorderly people, whom no considerations of justice or public good can restrain. But we hope and believe that none such will be found.

BROTHERS: After these explanations, we hope you will possess your minds in peace, relying on the good faith of the United States that no injury is to be apprehended by you during the treaty.

BROTHERS: We now come to the second point: whether we are properly authorized to run and establish a new boundary line between your lands and ours.

BROTHERS: We answer explicitly that we have that authority. Where this line should run, will be the great subject of discussion at the treaty between you and us; and we sincerely hope and expect, that it may then be fixed to the satisfaction of both parties. Doubtless some concessions must be made on both sides. In all disputes and quarrels, both parties usually take some wrong steps; so that it is only by mutual concessions, that a true reconciliation can be effected.

BROTHERS: We wish you to understand us clearly on this head: for we mean that all our proceedings should be marked with candor. We therefore repeat, and say explicitly, that some concessions will be necessary on your part, as well as on ours, in order to establish a just and permanent peace.

BROTHERS: After this great point of the boundary shall be fully considered, at the treaty, we shall know what concessions and stipulations it will be proper to make on the part of the United States; and we trust they will be such as the world will pronounce reasonable and just.

BROTHERS: You have told us that you represent the nations of Indians who own the lands north of the Ohio, and whose chiefs are now assembled at the rapids of the Miami.

BROTHERS: It would be a satisfaction to us to be informed of the names of those nations, and of the numbers of the chiefs of each so assembled.

BROTHERS: We once more turn your eyes to your representation of the warlike appearances in your country; and, to give you complete satisfaction on this point, we now assure you, that, as soon as our councils at this place are ended, we will send a messenger on horseback to the Great Chief of the United States, to desire him to renew and strongly repeat his orders to his head warrior, not only to abstain from all hostilities against you, but to remain quietly at his posts, until the event of the treaty shall be known.—[A white belt of seven rows, and twenty-six strings of wampum, nearly all white, annexed.]

The foregoing speech, having been interpreted by Mr. Dean in the Oneida tongue, was interpreted by Captain Brandt's nephew, into the Shawanese language, and from that, by another interpreter, into the language of the Chippewa nation; after which, the Shawanese chief (called Cat's Eyes) thus addressed the commissioners:

BROTHERS, the Bostonians, attend: We have heard your words. Our Fathers, the English people, have also heard them. We thank God that you have been preserved in peace, and that we bring our pipes together. The people of all the different nations here salute you. They rejoice to hear your words. It gives us great satisfaction that our Fathers, the English, have heard them also. We shall, for the present, take up our pipes, and retire to our encampments, where we shall deliberately consider your speech, and return you an answer to-morrow.

NIAGARA, 9th July, 1793.

In council, present as yesterday.

Captain Brandt arose, with the belt and strings which were yesterday delivered by the commissioners, and, addressing himself to the English and Americans, said:

BROTHERS: We are glad the Great Spirit has preserved us in peace, to meet together this day.

BROTHERS OF THE UNITED STATES: Yesterday you made an answer to the message delivered you by us, from the great council at Miami, in the two particulars which we had stated to you.

BROTHERS: You may depend on it, we fully understood your speech. We shall take with us your belt and strings, and repeat it to the chiefs at the great council at Miami.—[Laid down the strings and belt, and took up a white belt.]

BROTHERS: We have something further to say, though not much. We are small, compared with our great chiefs at Miami. But, though small, we have something to say.

BROTHERS: We think, from your speech, that there is a prospect of our coming together. We, who are the nations at the Westward, are of one mind; and, if we agree with you, as there is a prospect that we shall, it will be binding and lasting.

BROTHERS: Our prospects are the fairer, because all our minds are one: you have not before spoken to us unitedly. Formerly, because you did not speak to us unitedly, what was done was not binding. Now, you have an opportunity of speaking to us together; and we now take you by the hand, to lead you to the place appointed for the meeting.—[A white belt of seven rows.]

BROTHERS: This is all we have to say.

Afterwards, Captain Brandt, recollecting that he had not answered our request, respecting the nations and chiefs assembled at the Miami, rose and said:

BROTHERS: One thing more we have to say: yesterday you expressed a wish to be informed of the names of the nations, and numbers of chiefs assembled at Miami. But, as they were daily coming in, we cannot give you exact information. You will see for yourselves in a few days. When we left it, the following nations were there, viz:

Five Nations,	Munsees,	Pattawatamies,
Wyandots,	Miamies,	Mingoes,
Shawanese,	Ottawas,	Cherokees,
Delawares,	Chippewas,	Nantikokies.

The principal men of all these nations were there.

He then presented the list on paper.

The Commissioners then replied:

BROTHERS: Our ears have been open to your speech. It is agreeable to us. We are ready to accompany you to the place of treaty, where, under the direction of the Great Spirit, we hope for a speedy termination to the present war, on terms equally interesting and agreeable to all parties.

N. B. At the Council held at Niagara, on the 7th July, before the arrival of the commissioners from Navy Hall, Captain Brandt, in the name of the deputies, thus addressed the Governor, Colonel Sincoc:

It being agreed at the Rapids that we should come and meet the commissioners in our Father's presence, we return our thanks to the Great Spirit for seeing your Excellency well this day. Our intention and business is peaceable, and our inclination is to do what is right and just. We are all of one mind, and wished your Excellency to be present.—[A belt of wampum.]

His Excellency, in reply, said:

He was happy to see them well, and as the commissioners expressed their wishes* to meet the Indians in his presence, he should be glad to hear what they had to say.—[The belt returned.]

AT NIAGARA, 10th July, 1793.

The commissioners wrote the following letters to the President and Secretary of War, and sent them off by Jasper Parrish, express.

Letter to General Knox.

NIAGARA, 10th July, 1793.

SIR:

The enclosed extract from our journal will account for our being here. We think the coming of the deputation from the Western Indians, a fortunate event. It must have been their extreme jealousy of the United States that made them solicitous to speak with us in presence of the Governor; and our answer being satisfactory, we believe it will have a better effect, than the same sentiments delivered under any other circumstances.

Our promise to send a special messenger to the President, to desire fresh orders might be sent to General Wayne, not only to abstain from hostilities, but to remain quietly at his posts, was thought a very necessary measure; and it will be alike necessary that those orders should be issued and strictly observed. In a former letter, we intimated our opinion and wishes on this point. We now think, and our duty obliges us to declare it, that an exact observation of the laws of a truce is essential to the success of the treaty.

The Indians have information, confirmed by repeated scouts, that General Wayne has cut and cleared a road, straight from fort Washington, into the Indian country, in a direction that would have missed fort Jefferson; but that, meeting with a large swamp, it was, of necessity, turned to that fort, and then continued six miles beyond it; that large quantities of provisions are accumulated at the forts, far exceeding the wants of the garrisons; and numerous herds of horses and cattle, assembled beyond fort Jefferson, guarded by considerable bodies of troops. With these preparations for war in their neighborhood, (for it is but three days' journey from thence to the Glaize) they say their minds cannot rest easy. The distance, here mentioned, is from Captain Brandt's information, and is, no doubt, exact. We suppose that twenty to five and twenty miles may be deemed a day's journey.

The manner in which negotiations for peace are conducted by Indians, demands a particular consideration. On such occasions, not commissioners, or a few counsellors, but the body of the nations assemble. The negotiations will of course be delayed, or interrupted, if the movements of their enemies call the warriors from the council to watch or check them. The measures pursued by General Wayne appear to have produced this unhappy effect, and probably strengthened jealousies, before almost insurmountable. We know that those measures are viewed by the British as unfair, and unwarrantable; and we cannot suppose that their opinion will be concealed from the Indians, if the latter have not previously entertained the same ideas.

After this detail, it can hardly be necessary to express our opinions on the subject. It is obvious, that, to ensure a quiet, uninterrupted treaty, the cattle, horses, and troops, beyond what are proper for the posts themselves, should not be advanced from the Ohio; any that are now in advance, beyond fort Jefferson, should certainly be immediately withdrawn; and we doubt whether that would be satisfactory, if their numbers, in any degree, correspond with the reports among the Indians at their council.

We are, sir, yours, &c.

NIAGARA, 10th July, 1793.

SIR:

General Knox will of course lay before you our communications of this date. We address you that we may literally comply with our promise to the deputies of the Western Indians, "that we would desire you to issue fresh orders to General Wayne, not only to abstain from hostilities, but to remain quietly at his posts, until the event of the treaty should be known." Our sentiments on this subject are fully expressed in our letter to the Secretary of War, to which we must beg leave to refer. Those sentiments your own solicitude for peace will sufficiently enforce.

We are, sir, with great respect, yours, &c.

SIR:

We have no means of forming the tariff. We request you to send us, by Mr. Parrish, the prices of all Indian goods, and the usual expense of transportation from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, and thence to such place in the Western territory, as shall be suitable, for the delivery of them to the Indians.

July 29th, 1793.

Captain Elliot arrived with a deputation of upwards of twenty Indians, from the nations assembled at the foot of the Miami rapids. He delivered us the following letter from Colonel McKee:

FOOT OF THE RAPIDS, 28th July, 1793.

GENTLEMEN:

I had the honor to receive your letter of the 21st instant. That which you mentioned to have wrote on the 30th of May, has not yet come to hand. As soon as I am enabled to inform you at what time the Indians will meet at Sandusky, I will not fail to give you the earliest notice, and, as far as it depends on me, shall expedite it most cordially.

I am, gentlemen, yours, &c.

ALEXANDER MCKEE.

To Messrs. B. L. B. R. T. P. Commissioners of the United States.

July 30th.—In Council at Captain Elliot's, near the mouth of Detroit river.

Present, The Commissioners of the United States,
The Deputation of Indians,
The British officers and inhabitants.

The deputation addressed the commissioners as follows: A Wyandot chief, called Sa-wagh-da-wunk, (whose name signifies Carry-one-about) being their speaker.

BROTHERS, listen: We are glad to see you here in peace, and thank the Great Spirit that has preserved us to meet again.

BROTHERS: We were sent to speak to you sometime ago, at Niagara. Some chiefs are are now here, who were then present.

BROTHERS: We did not explain ourselves to each other, and we did not rightly understand each other.

BROTHERS: We desired that we might rightly understand each other. We have thought it best, that what we had to say should be put into writing, and here (presenting a paper to the commissioners) is the meaning of our hearts.

The above speech was interpreted by Simon Girty, a British interpreter.

The commissioners received the papers, and told the deputation they would well consider the subject of it, and return an answer in writing; and give them notice when they were ready to deliver it.

The contents of the paper were as follows:

To the Commissioners of the United States:

BROTHERS: The deputies we sent to you, did not fully explain our meaning. We have therefore sent others, to meet you once more, that you may fully understand the great question we have to ask of you, and to which we expect an explicit answer in writing.

BROTHERS: You are sent here by the United States, in order to make peace with us, the confederate Indians.

BROTHERS: You know very well that the boundary line, which was run between the white people and us, at the treaty of fort Stanwix, was the river Ohio.

BROTHERS: If you seriously design to make a firm and lasting peace, you will immediately remove all your people from our side of that river.

BROTHERS: We therefore ask you, are you fully authorized by the United States to continue, and firmly fix on the Ohio river, as the boundary line, between your people and ours?

Done in general council, at the foot of the Miami rapids, 27th July, 1793, in behalf of ourselves, and the whole confederacy, and agreed to in a full council.

July 31st.

At the close of the afternoon, the commissioners delivered the following answer to the deputation:

Speech of the Commissioners of the United States to the Deputies of the Confederated Indian nations, assembled at the rapids of the Miami river:

BROTHERS:

You yesterday addressed us, mentioning a former deputation, who met us at Niagara. At that meeting you said we did not come to a right understanding; that your deputies did not fully explain your meaning to us, nor we ours to them: that you desired we might rightly understand each other, and therefore thought it best that what you had to say should be put into writing. Then, handing us a paper, you said, "here is the meaning of our hearts."

BROTHERS: That paper is directed to the commissioners of the United States, and speaks to them these words, viz: [here is repeated their written address, as transcribed in the preceding pages.]

BROTHERS, the deputies here present: We have now repeated the words contained in the paper which you delivered to us; and those words are interpreted to you. We presume the interpretation agrees with your idea of the contents of the paper. It is expressed to be signed by the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Miamies, Mingoes, Pattawatamies, Ottawas, Connoys, Chippewas, and Munsees, in behalf of themselves and the whole confederacy, and agreed to in full council.

BROTHERS: We are a little surprised at the suggestion, that, in the conference at Niagara, we did not come to a right understanding, and that your deputies did not fully explain your meaning. Those deputies appeared to be men of good understanding, and when we saw them they were perfectly sober; in short, we never saw men in public council more attentive, or behave with more propriety. We could not, therefore, suppose they could mistake your meaning or ours. Certainly we were sufficiently explicit, for, in plain terms, we declared, "That, in order to establish a just and permanent peace, some concessions would be necessary, on your part as well as on ours." These words, Brothers, are a part of our speech to your deputies; and that speech, they assured us, they fully understood. What those concessions should be, on both sides, and where the boundary line should be fixed, were proper subjects of discussion, at the treaty, when we should speak face to face. This, we are certain, would be the best way to remove all difficulties. But your nations have adopted another mode, which, by keeping us at a distance, prevents our knowing each other, and keeps alive those jealousies, which are the greatest obstacles to a peace. We are, therefore, destitute of meeting your nations in full council, without more delay.

We have already waited in this province sixty days beyond the time appointed for opening the treaty.

BROTHERS: We have now expressed our opinion of the proper mode of settling the differences between you and the United States; but, as your nations have desired answers to certain questions, previous to our meeting, and we are disposed to act with frankness and sincerity, we will give you an explicit answer to the great question you have now proposed to us. But, before we do this, we think it necessary to look back to some former transactions, and we desire you patiently to hear us.

BROTHERS: We do know very well, that, at the treaty of Fort Stanwix, twenty-five years ago, the river Ohio was agreed on, as the boundary line between you and the white people, of the British colonies; and we all know, that, about seven years after that boundary was fixed, a quarrel broke out between your Father the King of Great Britain, and the people of those colonies, which are now the United States. This quarrel was ended by the Treaty of Peace made with the King about ten years ago, by which the great lakes, and the waters which unite them, were, by him, declared to be the boundaries of the United States.

BROTHERS: Peace having been thus made, between the King of Great Britain and the United States, it remained to make peace between them and the Indian nations, who had taken part with the King; for this purpose, commissioners were appointed, who sent messages to all those Indian nations, inviting them to come and make peace. The first treaty was held about nine years ago, at fort Stanwix, with the Six Nations, which has stood firm and unviolated to this day. The next treaty was made about ninety days after, at fort M<sup>o</sup>Intosh, with the half king of the Wyandots, Captain Pipe, and other chiefs, in behalf of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, and Chippewa nations. Afterwards treaties were made with divers Indian nations, south of the Ohio river; and the next treaty was made with Kakiapilathy, here present, and other Shawanese chiefs, in behalf of the Shawanese nation, at the mouth of the Great Miami, which runs into the Ohio.

BROTHERS: The commissioners who conducted these treaties in behalf of the United States, sent the papers containing them to the great council of the States, who, supposing them satisfactory to the nations treated with, proceeded to dispose of large tracts of land thereby ceded, and a great number of people removed from other parts of the United States, and settled upon them; also many families of your ancient fathers, the French, came over the great water, and settled upon a part of the same lands.

BROTHERS: After some time, it appeared that a number of people in your nations were dissatisfied with the treaties of fort M<sup>o</sup>Intosh, and Miami; therefore, the great council of the United States appointed Governor St. Clair their commissioner, with full powers, for the purpose of removing all causes of controversy, regulating trade, and settling boundaries, between the Indian nations in the Northern department, and the United States. He accordingly sent messages, inviting all the nations concerned to meet him at a council fire, which he kindled at the falls of Muskingum.

While he was waiting for them, some mischief happened at that place, and the fire was put out; so he kindled a council fire at fort Harmar, where near six hundred Indians of different nations attended. The Six Nations then renewed and confirmed the treaty of fort Stanwix, and the Wyandots and Delawares, renewed and confirmed the treaty of fort M<sup>o</sup>Intosh; some Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, and Sacs, were also parties to the treaty of fort Harmar.

BROTHERS: All these treaties we have here with us. We have also the speeches of many chiefs who attended them, and who voluntarily declared their satisfaction with the terms of the treaties.

BROTHERS: After making all these treaties, and after hearing the chiefs express freely their satisfaction with them, the United States expected to enjoy peace, and quietly to hold the lands ceded by them. Accordingly, large tracts have been sold and settled, as before mentioned. And now, brothers, we answer explicitly, that, for the reasons here stated to you, it is impossible to make the river Ohio the boundary, between your people and the people of the United States.

BROTHERS: You are men of understanding, and if you consider the customs of white people, the great expenses which attend their settling in a new country, the nature of their improvements, in building houses, and barns, and clearing and fencing their lands, how valuable the lands are thus rendered, and thence how dear they are to them you will see that it is now impracticable to remove our people from the northern side of the Ohio. Your brothers, the English, know the nature of white people, and they know that, under the circumstances which we have mentioned, the United States cannot make the Ohio the boundary between you and us.

BROTHERS: You seem to consider all the lands in dispute, on your side of the Ohio, as claimed by the United States; but suffer us to remind you, that a large tract was sold by the Wyandot and Delaware nations, to the State of Pennsylvania. This tract lies east of a line drawn from the mouth of Beaver Creek, at the Ohio, due north to lake Erie. This line is the western boundary of Pennsylvania, as claimed under the charter given by the King of England to your ancient friend, William Penn; of this sale, made by the Wyandot and Delaware nations, to the State of Pennsylvania, we have never heard any complaint.

BROTHERS: We are, on this occasion, obliged to make a long speech. We again desire you to hear us patiently; the business is of the highest importance, and a great many words are necessary fully to explain it: for we desire you may perfectly understand us; and there is no danger of your forgetting what we say, because we will give you our speech in writing.

BROTHERS: We have explicitly declared to you, that we cannot now make the Ohio river the boundary between us. This agrees with our speech to your deputies at Niagara, "that, in order to establish a just and permanent peace, some concessions would be necessary on your part as well as on ours."

BROTHERS: The concessions which we think necessary on your part are, that you yield up, and finally relinquish to the United States, some of the lands on your side of the river Ohio. The United States wish to have confirmed all the lands ceded to them by the treaty of fort Harmar, and also a small tract of land at the rapids of the Ohio, claimed by General Clarke, for the use of himself and his warriors; and, in consideration thereof, the United States would give such a large sum, in money or goods, as was never given at one time, for any quantity of Indian lands, since the white people first set their foot on this island. And because those lands did every year furnish you with skins and furs, with which you bought clothing and other necessaries, the United States will now furnish the like constant supplies; and therefore, besides the great sum to be delivered at once, they will, every year, deliver you a large quantity of such goods as are best suited to the wants of yourselves, your women, and children.

BROTHERS: If all the lands, before mentioned, cannot be delivered up to the United States, then we shall desire to treat and agree with you on a new boundary line; and for the quantity of land you relinquish to us within that new boundary line, we shall stipulate a generous compensation, not only for a large sum, to be paid at once, but for a yearly rent, for the benefit of yourselves and your children forever.

BROTHERS: Here you see one concession, which we are willing to make on the part of the United States. Now listen to another, of a claim which probably has more disturbed your minds than any other whatever.

BROTHERS: The commissioners of the United States have formerly set up a claim to your whole country, southward of the great lakes, as the property of the United States, grounding this claim on the treaty of peace with your father, the King of Great Britain, who declared, as we have before mentioned, the middle of those lakes and the waters which unite them, to be the boundaries of the United States.

BROTHERS: We are determined that our whole conduct shall be marked with openness and sincerity. We, therefore, frankly tell you, that we think those commissioners put an erroneous construction on that part of our treaty with the King. As he had not purchased the country of you, of course he could not give it away; he only relinquished to the United States his claim to it. That claim was founded on a right acquired by treaty, with other white nations, to exclude them from purchasing, or settling, in any part of your country; and it is this right which the King granted to the United States. Before that grant, the King alone had a right to purchase of the Indian nations, any of the lands between the great lakes, the Ohio, and the Mississippi, excepting the part within the charter boundary of Pennsylvania; and the King, by the treaty of peace, having granted this right to the United States, they alone have now the right of purchasing; so that, now, neither the King, nor any of his people, have any right to interfere with the United States, in respect to any part of those lands. All your brothers, the English, know this to be true; and it agrees with the declaration of Lord Dorchester, to your deputies, two years ago, at Quebec.

BROTHERS: We now concede this great point. We, by the express authority of the President of the United States, acknowledge the property, or right of soil, of the great country above described, to be in the Indian nations, so long as they desire to occupy the same. We only claim particular tracts in it, as before mentioned, and the general right granted by the King, as above stated, and which is well known to the English and Americans, and called the right of pre-emption, or the right of purchasing of the Indian nations disposed to sell their lands, to the exclusion of all other white people whatever.

BROTHERS: We have now opened our hearts to you. We are happy in having an opportunity of doing it; though we should have been more happy to have done it in the full council of your nations. We expect soon to have this satisfaction, and that your next deputation will take us by the hand, and lead us to the treaty. When we meet, and converse with each other freely, we may easily remove any difficulties which may come in the way of peace.

At Captain Elliot's, at the mouth of Detroit river, 31st July, 1793.

This speech was interpreted by Mr. Jones, in the Seneca tongue, which was well understood by the Wyandot chief, Sâ-wâgh-da-wunk, and divers others of the deputation, and by Simon Girty. The interpretation being finished, the commissioners handed the speech, in writing, to the deputation, with a white belt, crossed with thirteen stripes of black wampum. The deputation said it was now too late to make any reply, but they would speak to us in the morning.

August 1st, 1793.

In Council: Present as yesterday.

The Wyandot chief, Sâ-wâgh-da-wunk, arose and spoke: Simon Girty interpreted.

BROTHERS: We are all brothers you see here now.

BROTHERS: It is now three years since you desired to speak with us; we heard you yesterday, and understand you well—perfectly well. We have a few words to say to you.

BROTHERS: You mentioned the treaties of fort Stanwix, Beaver creek, and other places; those treaties were not complete. There were but a few chiefs who treated with you. You have not bought our lands; they belong to us. You tried to draw off some of us.

BROTHERS: Many years ago, we all know, that the Ohio was made the boundary. It was settled by Sir William Johnston. This side is ours; we look upon it as our property.

BROTHERS: You mentioned General Washington. He and you know you have your houses and people on our land; you say you cannot move them off; and we cannot give up our land.

BROTHERS: We are sorry we cannot come to an agreement; the line has been fixed long ago.

BROTHERS: We don't say much; there has been much mischief on both sides. We came here upon peace, and thought you did the same. We shall talk to our head warriors. You may return whence you came, and tell Washington.

The council here breaking up, Captain Elliot went to the Shawanese chief, Kakiapalathy, and told him the last part of the speech was wrong. That chief came back, and said it was wrong. Girty said he had interpreted truly what the Wyandot chief spoke. An explanation took place, and Girty added as follows:

BROTHERS: Instead of going home, we wish you to remain here for an answer from us. We have your speech in our breasts, and shall consult our head warriors.

The commissioners then said, that they would wait to hear again from their council at the rapids; but desired their answer might be given without delay.

THURSDAY, 8th August.

This evening arrived two of Captain Hendrick's men, with letters, requesting some necessaries may be sent him; and informing of the proceedings of the Indian council at the Miami, and the disposition of the Indian nations, relative to peace and war, after our speech of the 31st ultimo had been interpreted to them. By the information of the letters, and messengers, it appeared, that all the Indians were for peace, except the Shawanese, Wyandots, Miamies, and Delawares; that these had at length yielded to the opinions of the other nations, and that peace would probably be made. Captain Hendricks also expressed his opinion, that we should receive an invitation from all the confederated nations, to meet them, at or near the mouth of the Miami, this week.

August 9th.

Twelve Munsees and Chippewas arrived. They said they came to this side of the river on purpose to see the commissioners from the United States. They confirmed, generally, the opinion of Hendricks' men. They said they were on their way home, except a Munsee, who lives at Sandusky, (for they had worn out their clothes, and were tired of the long continuance of the treaty; and they expected, that the greatest difficulties being got over, the chiefs (some of all the nations remaining at the council) would now make peace.) Two of the eldest of them said, that when the warriors, who were going home, were about to leave the council, they enjoined it on their chiefs to make peace, that they might, without fear or interruption, return to their hunting.

Captain Bunbury (one of the British officers who accompany the commissioners) says, that one of the twelve Indians who arrived to-day, is an Ottawa; (or Tawa, as the name is often spoken) and that he said the Shawanese, and others, are strong for war, and will not abide by a peace into which they shall be dragged by the other nations.

SUNDAY, 11th August.

The King's vessel, called the Chippewa, arrived from Detroit. She is bound to fort Erie. Twelve Senecas, including women and children, and most of them sick, from the Indian council at the rapids of the Miami, came in her. These Senecas are well known to General Chapin, and Jones, the interpreter. One of them, an intelligent man, gave us the like information about the proceedings at the council, upon our last speech, with that received from Hendricks' men, and the Munsees, and Chippewas, only that the four nations who inclined to continue the war, remained obstinate when he departed from the council. That the Six Nation chiefs had twice addressed them, urging them to agree to a peace, were going to speak to them a third time, and, if they were still obstinate, would exceed their usual custom, and speak a fourth time; and, if without effect, they would then leave them, and go home. He says the Farmer's Brother told him, and his company, that they might expect to be overtaken by messengers to the commissioners before they (the informant and his company) reached Detroit; but if none arrived, before they got down to the commissioners' quarters, that then they might conclude that no peace would be made. This Seneca said, that (except the four nations before mentioned) the Indians were for peace. He particularly mentioned the Six Nations, and the seven nations of Canada, as strongly recommending to the hostile Indians to make peace; and that, for this purpose, Captain Bandt, and the Farmer's Brother spoke a great deal in the council. He added, that, of the four excepted nations, near one-half were disposed for peace, and that the Messasagoes, Chippewas, and Ottawas, are as strong for peace as the seven nations of Canada.

MONDAY, 12th August.

No deputation or official information from the Indian council having yet arrived, the commissioners judged it would be expedient to proceed, without more delay, to the Miami bay or river, that they might more easily and expeditiously send to, and receive an answer from them. They accordingly wrote the following letter to Capt. Ford, the commander of the vessel designed by Governor Simcoe for their accommodation.

MOUTH OF DETROIT RIVER, 12th August, 1793.

SIR:

We have been waiting here twelve days, for a reply to our last answer to the Indian nations, assembled at the rapids of the Miami. We can think of no sufficient reason for this delay, and must, therefore, take measures to obtain that reply, or to ascertain whether we ought any longer to expect it. For this purpose we judge it proper to proceed ourselves to the Miami bay or river, that the necessary communication with the Indians may be easy and expeditious; for it is time that the business of our mission be brought to an issue.

We, therefore, request you to be prepared to sail to-morrow morning, when we propose to embark.

We are, sir, &c.

Captain HENRY FORD, commanding the Dunmore.

Captain Ford having read the letter, came and informed the commissioners, that he was instructed to attend the commissioners, but to receive his orders from Captain Bunbury, and desired us to speak to him. We spoke to Capt. Bunbury, told him that Governor Simcoe had assigned the Dunmore, Capt. Ford, to the use of the commissioners, and that, from what the Governor, and his Secretary, had repeatedly said, we had a right to conclude she was under our direction, to go when and where we thought proper, for the purposes of the treaty, except to Detroit. He said he had his orders from Governor Simcoe, and that by those orders he could not consent that the commissioners, or any deputation from them, should go to the Miami bay or river, until Col. McKee should give notice that the Indians were ready to receive them. But, says he, if the commissioners choose to go to Sandusky, I will order the Dunmore to proceed thither. He read some broken passages in Simcoe's letter to him. The commissioners asked if he would give an extract of the letter containing his orders. He answered, that Mr. Storer might take an extract. They retired together; Captain Bunbury read, and Mr. Storer wrote down from his mouth, the following words, as an extract of a letter from Colonel Simcoe to Captain Bunbury, dated at Navy Hall, 28th June, '93: "The directing the king's vessel to carry them (the commissioners) thither: she will anchor, therefore, as conveniently as possible to the northern shore of the river, on the banks of which they purpose to remain, until they hear from Colonel McKee. The Indians do not wish they should visit the opposite shore."

DETROIT RIVER, 12th August, 1793.

The above extract is, this day, verbally given me by Captain Bunbury, who, though desired, refuses to sign it.

CHARLES STORER.

TUESDAY, 13th August.

Being thus prevented from proceeding to the Miami bay, the commissioners concluded to send a message to the Indian nations at the rapids, and a letter to Colonel McKee. The message and letter here follow:

To the Chiefs and Warriors of the Indian nations assembled at the foot of the rapids of the Miami river.

BROTHERS: It is now fifteen days since we delivered our speech to your deputies at this place, in which we explicitly answered the written question, presented by them from you, and gave our reasons why we could not make the Ohio the boundary between you and the United States. We also mentioned some of the heads of the engagements we were willing to make in behalf of the United States. The particulars, together with other stipulations, for your benefit, we judged it proper to reserve, to be explained to you in full council, when we should meet face to face.

BROTHERS: The next morning your deputies spoke to us: said they would lay our speech before you, and desired us to wait here for an answer, which we desired and expected might be speedily given.

BROTHERS: We have waited fourteen days, and as yet no answer has arrived.

BROTHERS: It is time to bring the business to a conclusion. The summer has almost passed away, and we do not yet know even whether we are to have a treaty.

BROTHERS: You know that we came to treat with you of peace; we again tell you that we earnestly desire to make peace, and in the terms of peace we are disposed to do you ample justice. But if no treaty is to be held, if peace is not to be obtained, we desire immediately to know it, that we may go home.

Done at Captain Elliot's, at the mouth of Detroit river, the 14th day of August, 1793.

Signed by the commissioners.

MOUTH OF DETROIT RIVER, 14th August, 1793.

SIR:

To the speech we delivered here to the deputation of the Indian nations assembled at the rapids of the Miami, we expected an early answer. We have waited fourteen days, and no answer has arrived. We have, therefore, despatched runners, with a speech to the chiefs and warriors, manifesting our wishes to begin the treaty, without more delay, and desiring to know immediately their decision on the subject. A copy of our speech is enclosed. We presume it will be in your power to forward the business. Your aid therein will be gratefully acknowledged. The mode in which the negotiations have hitherto been conducted is new, and as improper as it is new. All the questions which have been stated, might have been proposed to our faces, and have received prompt answers. We must soon close the negotiation, unless substantial reasons demand procrastination. In that case we may think ourselves justified in giving further proofs of our patience.

We again request your assistance to expedite the business which is the object of our mission, and are,

Sir, yours, &c.

The message, accompanied with seven strings of black and white wampum, much intermixed, and the letter to Colonel McKee, were committed to the two runners, an Onondago and an Oneida, who set off this evening, and expect to reach the rapids to-morrow night.

N. B. The message and letter were, by mistake, dated the 14th.

Instructions to the Runners.

When you arrive at the Miami council fire, find Captain Brandt, the Farmer's Brother, the Cornplanter, the Fish Carrier, and Great Sky, and tell them you have a speech to the Indian nations, there assembled, from the commissioners of the United States, and request them to call the chiefs together; when the chiefs are met, then deliver the written speech and strings of wampum. As soon as this is done, find Colonel McKee, and deliver the letter to him.

Find Captain Hendricks, the chief of the Mohicans, and tell him you have brought a written speech to the Indians, and that you have delivered, or are going to deliver it to the chiefs. We shall be glad to have you return to us speedily, but speak to Captain Brandt, and the other chiefs of the Six Nations, and take their direction when to return. Let Colonel McKee know when you propose to come back, that you may bring an answer from him. Let Captain Hendricks know when you propose to return. On your way to the Miami, and back to us, tell nobody your business.

In the afternoon of this day the commissioners received, by the hands of the two Wyandot runners, from the Indian council, at the rapids of the Miami, the following answer to their speech of the 31st July:

To the Commissioners of the United States:

BROTHERS: We have received your speech, dated the 31st of last month, and it has been interpreted to all the different nations; we have been long in sending you an answer, because of the great importance of the subject. But we now answer it fully, having given it all the consideration in our power.

BROTHERS: You tell us that, after you had made peace with the king, our father, about ten years ago, "it remained to make peace between the United States, and the Indian nations who had taken part with the king. For this purpose, commissioners were appointed, who sent messages to all those Indian nations, inviting them to come and make peace;" and, after reciting the periods, at which you say treaties were held, at fort Stanwix, fort McIntosh, and Miami, all which treaties, according to your own acknowledgment, were for the sole purpose of making peace, you then say, "Brothers, the commissioners who conducted these treaties, in behalf of the United States, sent the papers containing them to the general council of the States, who, supposing them satisfactory to the nations treated with, proceeded to dispose of the lands thereby ceded."

BROTHERS: This is telling us plainly, what we always understood to be the case, and it agrees with the declarations of those few who attended those treaties, viz: That they went to meet your commissioners to make peace, but, through fear, were obliged to sign any paper that was laid before them; and it has since appeared that deeds of cession were signed by them, instead of treaties of peace.

BROTHERS: You then say, "after some time it appears that a number of people in your nations were dissatisfied with the treaties of fort McIntosh and Miami, therefore the council of the United States appointed Governor St. Clair their commissioner, with full powers, for the purpose of removing all causes of controversy, relating to trade, and settling boundaries, between the Indian nations in the Northern department, and the United States. He accordingly sent messages, inviting all the nations concerned to meet him at a council fire he kindled at the falls of Muskingum. While he was waiting for them, some mischief happened at that place, and the fire was put out, so he kindled a council fire at fort Harmar, where near six hundred Indians, of different nations, attended. The Six Nations then renewed and confirmed the treaty of fort Stanwix, and the Wyandots and Delawares renewed and confirmed the treaty of fort McIntosh; some Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, and Sacs, were also parties to the treaty of fort Harmar."

Now, Brothers, these are your words, and it is necessary for us to make a short reply to them.

BROTHERS: A general council of all the Indian confederacy was held, as you well know, in the fall of the year 1788, at this place: and that general council was invited by your commissioner, Governor St. Clair, to meet him for the purpose of holding a treaty, with regard to the lands mentioned by you to have been ceded by the treaties of fort Stanwix and fort McIntosh.

BROTHERS: We are in possession of the speeches and letters which passed on that occasion, between those deputed by the confederate Indians, and Governor St. Clair, the commissioner of the United States. These papers prove that your said commissioner, in the beginning of the year 1789, after having been informed by the general council, of the preceding fall, that no bargain or sale of any part of these Indian lands, would be considered as valid or binding, unless agreed to by a general council, nevertheless persisted in collecting together a few chiefs of two or three nations only; and with them held a treaty for the cession of an immense country, in which they were no more interested, than as a branch of the general confederacy, and who were in no manner authorized to make any grant or cession whatever.

BROTHERS: How then was it possible for you to expect to enjoy peace, and quietly to hold these lands, when your commissioner was informed, long before he held the treaty of fort Harmar, that the consent of a general council was absolutely necessary to convey any part of these lands to the United States?

The part of these lands which the United States now wish us to relinquish, and which you say are settled, have been sold by the United States since that time.

BROTHERS: You say, "the United States wish to have confirmed all the lands ceded to them by the treaty of fort Harmar, and also a small tract at the rapids of the Ohio, claimed by General Clarke, for the use of himself and his warriors. And in consideration thereof, the United States would give such a large sum of money or goods, as was never given, at any one time, for any quantity of Indian lands, since the white people first set their feet on this Island. And because these lands did every year furnish you with skins, and furs, with which you bought clothing, and other necessaries, the United States will now furnish the like constant supplies. And therefore, besides the great sum to be delivered at once, they will every year deliver you a large quantity of such goods as are best fitted to the wants of yourselves, your women, and children."

BROTHERS: Money, to us, is of no value, and to most of us unknown: and as no consideration whatever can induce us to sell the lands on which we get sustenance for our women and children, we hope we may be allowed to point out a mode by which your settlers may be easily removed, and peace thereby obtained.

BROTHERS: We know that these settlers are poor, or they would never have ventured to live in a country which has been in continual trouble ever since they crossed the Ohio. Divide, therefore, this large sum of money, which you have offered to us, among these people: give to each, also, a proportion of what you say you would give to us, annually, over and above this very large sum of money: and, we are persuaded, they would most readily accept of it, in lieu of the lands you sold them. If you add, also, the great sums you must expend in raising and paying armies, with a view to force us to yield you our country, you will certainly have more than sufficient for the purposes of re-paying these settlers for all their labor and their improvements.

BROTHERS: You have talked to us about concessions. It appears strange that you should expect any from us, who have only been defending our just rights against your invasions. We want peace. Restore to us our country, and we shall be enemies no longer.

BROTHERS: You make one concession to us by offering us your money; and another by having agreed to do us justice, after having long, and injuriously, withheld it—we mean in the acknowledgment you have now made, that the King of England never did, nor ever had a right to give you our country, by the treaty of peace. And you want to make this act of common justice a great part of your concessions: and seem to expect that, because you have at last acknowledged our independence, we should, for such a favor, surrender to you our country.

BROTHERS: You have talked, also, a great deal about pre-emption, and your exclusive right to purchase Indian lands, as ceded to you by the King, at the treaty of peace.

BROTHERS: We never made any agreement with the King, nor with any other nation, that we would give to either the exclusive right of purchasing our lands; and we declare to you, that we consider ourselves free to make any bargain or cession of lands, whenever and to whomsoever we please. If the white people, as you say, made a treaty that none of them but the King should purchase of us, and that he has given that right to the United States, it is an affair which concerns you and him, and not us: we have never parted with such a power.

BROTHERS: At our general council, held at the Glaize last fall, we agreed to meet commissioners from the United States, for the purpose of restoring peace, provided they consented to acknowledge and confirm our boundary line to be the Ohio: and we determined not to meet you, until you gave us satisfaction on that point: that is the reason we have never met.

We desire you to consider, brothers, that our only demand is the peaceable possession of a small part of our once great country. Look back, and review the lands from whence we have been driven to this spot. We can retreat no farther, because the country behind hardly affords food for its present inhabitants; and we have therefore resolved to leave our bones in this small space to which we are now confined.

BROTHERS: We shall be persuaded that you mean to do us justice, if you agree that the Ohio shall remain the boundary line between us. If you will not consent thereto, our meeting will be altogether unnecessary. This is the great point which we hoped would have been explained before you left your homes, as our message last fall was principally directed to obtain that information.

Done in general council, at the foot of the Miami Rapids, the 13th day of August, 1793.

To the foregoing answer of the Indian nations, the commissioners immediately made the following reply, and delivered it to the two Wyandot runners, who brought the answer.

To the chiefs and warriors of the Indian nations, assembled at the foot of the Miami Rapids:

BROTHERS: We have just received your answer, dated the 13th instant, to our speech of the 31st of last month, which we delivered to your deputies at this place. You say it was interpreted to all your nations, and we presume it was fully understood. We therein explicitly declared to you, that it was now impossible to make the river Ohio the boundary between your lands and the lands of the United States. Your answer amounts to a declaration, that you will agree to no other boundary than the Ohio. The negotiation is therefore at an end. We sincerely regret, that peace is not the result; but, knowing the upright and liberal views of the United States, which, as far as you gave us an opportunity, we have explained to you, we trust that impartial judges will not attribute the continuance of the war to them.

Done at Captain Elliot's, at the mouth of Detroit river, the 16th day of August, 1793.

The next morning (Saturday, August 17th) the commissioners sent, by their own runners, (being one Onondaga, and two Oneidas) the following letter, and the paper therein mentioned, to the chiefs of the Six Nations:

To the Chiefs of the Six Nations:

BROTHERS:

Two runners were sent by us, this week, with a message, dated the 14th of this month, to the Indian nations assembled at the rapids of the Miami. Our instructions to the runners were, to inform you that they had such a message from us, and to request you to assemble the chiefs of the other nations, and then deliver it to you all together. From the report of the runners, we are apprehensive that they mistook our orders, and that our message has not been communicated to you. We, therefore, now send you a copy of it, No. 1. We, at the same time, sent a letter to Colonel McKee, of which, also, we enclose a copy, No. 2.

BROTHERS: Our runners returned hither this evening; but a few hours before their arrival, two Wyandot runners arrived, with a written answer, No. 3, to our speech of the 31st of last month, insisting on the Ohio as the boundary between the Indian lands and those of the United States. As we had already explicitly declared that we could not make the Ohio the boundary, the business, of course, was at an end. However, we delivered a short speech, in writing, to the same runners, who set off this evening to return to the council at the rapids. We enclose a copy of it, No. 4.

BROTHERS: Being desirous that you should be fully informed of these transactions, we have sent you copies thereof, which you may not otherwise obtain.

BROTHERS: We came hither with the most sincere desire to make a peace that would be beneficial to the Indians, as well as to the United States; and, had such a peace been accomplished, we felt a confidence, that the justice and humanity of the United States, according to their present views of Indian affairs, would not only have continued, but extended their beneficence to the Indian nations, and, so far as it depended on them, have rendered the peace as lasting as the hills; and we should have been extremely happy in laying the foundation of so much good.

We have now only to return home, and report our proceedings to the President of the United States. We shall sail with the first fair wind for fort Erie.

FRIDAY, August 23d, 1793.

This morning we arrived at fort Erie, and despatched the following letters:

Letters to Major Craig, Deputy Quartermaster, Pittsburg.

FORT ERIE, 23d August, 1793.

SIR:

Enclosed are two letters to Major General Wayne, which we desire you to send to him by two separate conveyances; one of them, with all possible despatch, the other, by the next conveyance which shall present. You can best tell in what way the first letter may, with the utmost speed and certainty, be conveyed to General Wayne, and that we desire you to adopt. No expense is to be spared to effect this.

The commanding officer at Pittsburg will, certainly, give you any aid in his power. We shall send you, at least, four other letters, for General Wayne, of the same tenor, which we desire you to forward to him, one by one, as fast as conveyances shall present. We are on our way home, the Western Indians having refused to make peace.

This packet is committed to Sylvester Ash.

If he delivers it to you with reasonable despatch, he is to receive ten dollars, which we desire you to pay him. If General Knox should have given you any orders about the conveyance of our letters to General Wayne, observe them, only remembering the important points of certainty and speed. The enclosed letter to General Knox, you will forward by post, unless an earlier conveyance shall offer.

We are, sir, yours, &c.

FORT ERIE, 23d August, 1793.

SIR:

We wrote you this day, and committed the letter to Sylvester Ash. The copy of our letter by him, is enclosed.

If Ash should not have arrived, then, be pleased to observe precisely, the orders expressed in our letter by him, with respect to the letters for General Wayne, sending off one, in the way which shall afford the utmost speed and certainty of conveyance.

We commit this letter to two Indian runners, to carry as far as fort Franklin, and thence the same, or others, we expect, will carry it to fort Pitt, as the commanding officer there shall think best. Whoever brings it, be pleased suitably to reward.

FORT ERIE, 23d August, 1793.

SIR:

We have written to you this day, one letter, by Sylvester Ash, and another, which we expect to commit to two Indian runners, of the Six Nations. In each of those letters, we enclosed two for General Wayne, to be forwarded in the manner directed in our letter by Ash, of which we enclose a copy. We, herein, send you two more letters for General Wayne, to forward agreeably to the same directions.

This letter is committed to the care of Mr. William Wilson, of Pittsburg, who goes home by way of Genesee river. If any accident prevents his proceeding, he is to forward it by an express, whom we request you to pay.

AUGUST 23d, 1793—at Fort Erie.

SIR:

The bearer, Sylvester Ash, is charged with a letter from us to Major Craig, at Pittsburg. We desire you to afford him every necessary aid to expedite and secure his journey thither, furnishing him, if you think them necessary, such a guard of soldiers, as you deem sufficient. The business requires the utmost despatch.

The Western Indians have refused to make peace. You will, doubtless, communicate this information to all persons within your reach, lest, from an expectation of peace, they should abate of the vigilance necessary on an exposed frontier.

FORT ERIE, 23d August, 1793.

SIR:

We have this day delivered to Sylvester Ash, a letter for Major Craig, at Pittsburg; he will call on you for information and assistance. We enclose a copy of our letter to you, by him; this letter we propose to commit to two Indian runners, who are to be engaged to carry it to you, and if necessary to Pittsburg. But, probably you may have some of the Alleghany Indians with you, whom you know, and can trust, and who are well acquainted with the path to Pittsburg, and will cheerfully undertake to carry the letter to Major Craig. We desire to leave this to your prudence. We suppose the passage by water more safe than the route by land; if so, it may be best for Ash to go by water, you sending with him one or two good canoe-men; then, the Indian runners can proceed by land, which we presume they may do with perfect safety. In this matter also we wish you to exercise a prudent discretion, governed by circumstances with which we are unacquainted; only we suppose it cannot admit of a doubt, that it will be best to send one letter by water, and the other by land.

We are, sir, your friends and humble servants,

SIR:

Pursuant to our instructions from the Secretary of War, we are sending letters to General Wayne, to be forwarded to him from Pittsburg. The business being directly in the Quartermaster's department, we shall enclose them to Major Craig; but the aid of troops may be requisite for their conveyance; and this aid we request you to furnish, especially in conveying the first letter to General Wayne, which should go with the utmost speed and certainty. FORT ERIE, 23d August, 1793.

SIR:

We are on our return home from the mouth of Detroit river, where we lay four weeks, waiting for the Indians to close their private councils at the Rapids of the Miami, that we might all remove to Sandusky, and open the treaty. But, after sending repeated deputations to us, to obtain answers to particular questions, they finally determined not to treat at all. This final answer we received on the 16th instant, when we immediately began to embark to recross Lake Erie.

Although we did not effect a peace, yet we hope that good may hereafter arise from the mission.

The tranquillity of the country Northwest of the Ohio, during the (supposed) continuance of the treaty, evinced your care of our safety, and we could not leave this quarter, without returning you our unfeigned thanks.

Letter to General Knox.

ON LAKE ERIE, 21st August, 1793.

SIR:

The Indians have refused to make peace. We have not been admitted to an interview with them, except by their deputations. The transactions with the first deputation at Niagara have been transmitted to you. Immediately afterwards we returned to fort Erie, and embarked for the mouth of Detroit river, where we arrived on the 21st July, and expected in a few days to receive notice from the Indians that they were ready to meet us at Sandusky. Captain Matthew Elliot, Colonel McKee's assistant, at whose house we were furnished with quarters, was at home, waiting for a wind to sail to the Miami. He departed the next morning, taking a letter from us to Colonel McKee, advising him of our arrival, and requesting that our meeting with the Indians might be hastened.

On the 29th, Elliot returned with another deputation of Indians, at the head of which were Packonchehelas, head warrior of the Delawares, Kakiapalathy, head warrior of the Shawanese, and Sä-wagh-dä-wunk, who is said to be the head-man of the Wyandots. The next day, they presented a written message, in the name of the confederacy, demanding an explicit answer to this question: "Are you fully authorized by the United States, to continue and firmly to fix on the Ohio river, as the boundary between your people and ours?" The next day we answered the question explicitly; previously stating the reasons why the United States could not now make the Ohio the boundary. We also mentioned the principal concessions, and the ample compensations we were ready to make, and stipulate, expressing the prompt and annual compensations, not in precise sums, but in terms which we thought would forcibly strike them with ideas of their magnitude. The next morning they met us, and after making some observations on the subject, said they would lay our speech before their warriors. The speaker indeed told us we might go home; but this seemed to be a mistake, and contrary to what our interpreters heard other chiefs say, as they sat in this council. As soon as the speaker had done, Captain Elliot spoke to the Shawanese chief, mentioning the mistake; an explanation took place, and we were desired to remain where we were for an answer; this we requested to have forwarded without delay.

On the 8th of August, two of Captain Hendricks' men arrived to obtain some necessities; by their information there seemed to be a fair prospect of peace. Some Munsees and Chippewas, who arrived the 9th, confirmed their account. On the 11th some Senecas arrived; they had come from the council by the way of Detroit, in order to go home, most of them being sick; their information corresponded with the former, in respect to all the nations, except the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, and Miamies, who remained obstinate; yet, they said, that even of these nations, near one half were for peace. They said, also, that the Six Nations, including Captain Brandt and his Mohawks, held fast together, and strongly urged the hostile nations to make peace.

We find that our speech of July 31st was well understood, having been interpreted to the Shawanese, &c. by Colonel McKee, to the Six Nations, by Captain Brandt, and to the Delawares, &c. by Captain Hendricks.

Having waited till the 12th of August without receiving an answer, we proposed going, in the vessel assigned for our use, to the Miami Bay, or to the mouth of Miami river, that we might, with more ease and expedition, communicate with the Indian council; but this we were not permitted to do. So, the next day, we sent two runners, of the Six Nations, (a few being with us) with a letter to Colonel McKee, a written message to the Indian council, and verbal messages to Captain Brandt and Captain Hendricks, to advise them of the written one. The object of the letter and messages was to obtain a decisive answer from the Indian council, whether a treaty was to be held or not, and to bring the business to a speedy issue.

On Friday, the 16th, in the afternoon, two Wyandot runners arrived, with a final answer from the Indian council. We made, immediately a short reply, and began to embark our effects. On Saturday morning, we completed the embarkation of our stores and baggage, and in the afternoon sailed for fort Erie.

On Friday evening our own two runners returned. According to their information, the Six Nations knew nothing of the contents of the final answer of the Indian council. Their names are not subscribed to it. They had heard, indeed, of an answer, but were told it was to invite the commissioners to meet the Indian nations on the Miamies (instead of Sandusky) about five miles below the Rapids, to which place the Six Nations proposed to remove, the day or the day after our runners left them. From the same information, it seemed probable that the Six Nations were not made acquainted with our written message of the 15th, nor the letter to Colonel McKee; so we made out copies of them, of the final answer of the Indians, and of our last reply, and on Saturday morning sent them off by our runners, with directions to deliver them to Captain Brandt, and to inform the other Six Nation chiefs thereof. A letter was also written to Hendricks, referring him, for information, to those copies. We verbally directed the runners to tell those chiefs to be of good heart, and to assure them of the strong and unalterable friendship of the United States for the Six Nations.

We had thought it a matter of no small moment, that the chiefs of the Six Nations should be seen and consulted, on their return from the Miami; and our runners told us that the chiefs wished us to stay for them at Buffalo creek. This did not seem expedient; but we directed the runners to tell them, that, on their return, General Chapin would meet them at any place which they should appoint, and, without delay, transmit their information, and the result of their deliberations, to the President.

Enclosed is a copy of our letter to General Wayne; we shall send the same to him by other conveyances, and all by the way of Fort Pitt. We have written to the commanding officer there, desiring him to give Major Craig, to whose care we shall send all the letters for General Wayne, every requisite aid in forwarding them, and we have also written to the commanding officer at Fort Franklin to afford his aid in conveying them, by land and by water, to Major Craig. In all these intermediate letters, we have mentioned the fact, simply, "that the Western Indians refused to make peace." We have desired Major Craig to forward the first letter to General Wayne, in that way which shall promise the utmost speed and certainty, sparing no expense to effect it, and the others in succession, one by one, as fast as conveyances shall present; but, we added, that, if you should have given any orders about the conveyance of our letters to General Wayne, he was to observe them.

If the wind had permitted, we should have set Sylvester Ash ashore at Presqu' Isle, and prepared letters accordingly to go by him. He will now proceed from Buffalo creek. We expect General Chapin will procure two Seneca runners, to go with him as far as Fort Franklin: from thence he will proceed, by land or by water, as he and the commanding officer shall think best. But, whichever route he pursues, we have desired the commanding officer to send some trusty Indians by the other, to afford the greater certainty of conveyance. We enclose him duplicate letters for Major Craig and General Wayne, for that purpose.

Mr. Wilson proposes to go as far as Genesee river, and thence proceed to the Susquehannah, and thence to Pittsburg; by him we shall send the third set of letters for General Wayne.

FORT ERIE, 23d August.

We arrived here between twelve and one o'clock this morning, and, our letters having been prepared on the voyage, we shall be enabled to send them off, as soon as General Chapin and Mr. Jones can cross the river. They will go to Buffalo creek, and procure two Indian runners to accompany Ash, and two more to carry this letter to Canandaigua, where General Chapin's son is instantly to procure an express to carry it to Philadelphia.

P. S. We could get no account of the numbers of the Indians at the Rapids, except from the British agents, who told us there were about fifteen hundred men. We have noted them accordingly; but suppose they were rather likely to be less than more.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 4, 1793.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated

HEAD QUARTERS, HOBSON'S CHOICE, NEAR FORT WASHINGTON, 5th October, 1793.

Agreeably to the authority vested in me by your letter of the 17th of May, 1793, I have used every means in my power to bring forward the mounted volunteers from Kentucky, as you will observe by the enclosed correspondence with his Excellency Governor Shelby, and Major General Scott, upon this interesting occasion.

I have even adopted their own proposition by ordering a draught of the militia, which I consider as the dernier resort, and from which I must acknowledge that I have but little hopes of success!

Add to this, that we have a considerable number of officers and men sick and debilitated, from fevers and other disorders incident to all armies. But this is not all; we have recently been visited by a malady called the influenza, which has pervaded the whole line in a most alarming and rapid degree. Fortunately this complaint has not been fatal, except in a few instances, and I have now the pleasure of informing you, that we are generally recovered, or in a fair way; but our effective force will be much reduced, as you will observe by the scale at the bottom of the general return of the legion, which I have the honor to transmit by this conveyance, so that, after leaving the necessary garrisons at the several posts, (which will generally be composed of the sick and invalids) I shall not be able to advance beyond fort Jefferson with more than twenty-six hundred regular effectives, officers included.

What auxiliary force we shall have is yet to be determined. At present their numbers are only thirty-six guides and spies, and three hundred and sixty mounted volunteers. This is not a pleasant picture, but something must be done immediately, to save the frontiers from impending savage fury.

I will, therefore, advance to-morrow with the force I have, in order to gain a strong position about six miles in front of fort Jefferson, so as to keep the enemy in check (by exciting a jealousy and apprehension for the safety of their own women and children) until some favorable circumstance or opportunity may present to strike with effect.

The present apparent tranquillity on the frontiers, and at the head of the line, is a convincing proof to me, that the enemy are collected or collecting in force, to oppose the legion, either on its march, or in some unfavorable position for the cavalry to act in. Disappoint them in this favorite plan or manœuvre, they may probably be tempted to attack our lines. In this case I trust they will not have much reason to triumph from the encounter.

They cannot continue long embodied for want of provision, and at their breaking up, they will most certainly make some desperate effort upon some quarter or other; should the mounted volunteers advance in force, we might yet compel those haughty savages to sue for peace before the next opening of the leaves. Be that as it may, I pray you not to permit present appearances to cause too much anxiety either in the mind of the President, or yourself, on account of this army. Knowing the critical situation of our infant nation, and feeling for the honor and reputation of Government, (which I will support with my latest breath) you may rest assured that I will not commit the legion unnecessarily; and unless more powerfully supported than I at present have reason to expect, I will content myself by taking a strong position advanced of Jefferson, and by exerting every power, endeavor to protect the frontiers, and to secure the posts and army during the winter, or until I am honored with your further orders.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated Camp, S. W. Branch of the Miami, six miles advanced of Fort Jefferson, October 23d, 1798.

I have the honor to inform you, that the legion took up its line of March from Hobson's Choice, on the 7th instant, and arrived at this place in perfect order, and without a single accident, at 10 o'clock in the morning of the 13th, when I found myself arrested for want of provision.

Notwithstanding this defect, I do not despair of supporting the troops in our present position, or rather at a place called Still Water, at an intermediate distance between the field of battle and fort Jefferson, and for which I shall make the necessary arrangements, in obedience to the instructions contained in your orders of the 25th of May, 1798.

The safety of the Western frontiers, the reputation of the legion, the dignity and interest of the nation, all forbid a retrograde manœuvre, or giving up one inch of ground we now possess, until the enemy are compelled to sue for peace.

The greatest difficulty which at present presents, is that of furnishing a sufficient escort to secure our convoys of provision, and other supplies, from insult and disaster; and, at the same time, to retain a sufficient force in camp, to sustain and repel the attacks of the enemy, who appear to be desperate and determined.

We have recently experienced a little check to one of our convoys, which may probably be exaggerated into something serious by the tongue of fame, before this reaches you; the following is, however, the fact, viz:

Lieutenant Lowry, of the 2d sub-legion, and Ensign Boyd, of the 1st, with a command consisting of ninety non-commissioned officers and privates, having in charge twenty wagons, belonging to the quartermaster general's department, loaded with grain, and one of the contractor's loaded with stores, were attacked early in the morning of the 17th instant, about seven miles advanced of fort St. Clair, by a party of Indians; those two gallant young gentlemen (who promised at a future day to be ornaments to their profession) together with thirteen non-commissioned officers and privates, bravely fell, after an obstinate resistance against superior numbers, being abandoned by the greater part of the escort upon the first discharge.

The savages killed, or carried off, about seventy horses, leaving the wagons and stores standing in the road, which have been all brought to this camp without any other loss or damage except some trifling articles.

One company of light infantry, and one troop of dragoons, have been detached this morning to reinforce four other companies of infantry, commanded by Colonel Hamtramck, as an escort to the quartermaster general's and contractor's wagons and pack-horses.

I have this moment received the return of the mounted volunteers under General Scott, recently arrived and encamped in the vicinity of fort Jefferson; I shall immediately order a strong detachment of those volunteers as a further reinforcement to Colonel Hamtramck.

I fear that the season is too far advanced to derive that essential service, which, otherwise, might be expected from them; whether they can act with effect, or not, is yet eventual.

It is reported, that the Indians at Au Glaize have sent their women and children into some secret recess or recesses, from their towns; and that the whole of the warriors are collected or collecting in force.

The savages, however, can't continue long embodied for want of provisions; on the contrary, we have, by great exertions, secured in this camp seventy thousand rations. I expect 120,000 in addition, by the return of the present convoy, unless they meet with a disaster—a thing that can scarcely happen, should my orders be duly executed, which I have no cause to doubt, from the character, vigilance, and experience, of the commanding officer.

A great number of men, as well as officers, have been left sick and debilitated at the respective garrisons, from a malady called the influenza; among others, General Wilkinson has been dangerously ill; he is now at fort Jefferson, and on the recovery. I hope he will soon be sufficiently restored to take his command in the legion.

I anxiously wait the safe return of the escort and convoy, when we shall endeavor to take new ground, which will probably be disputed; be that as it may, the legion will not be too far committed.

No. 41.

[1st SESSION.]

THE CREEKS, CHEROKEES, AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 16, 1798.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 16th, 1798.

SIR:

I have the honor to submit a variety of papers giving a view of the Southwestern frontiers, as connected with the Creeks and the State of Georgia, and the Southwestern territory of the United States and the Cherokees.

I have the honor to be, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

The Secretary of War respectfully submits to the President of the United States, the following statement, relatively to the Southwestern frontiers of the United States, as connected with the State of Georgia and the Creek Indians, and the territory of the United States South of the Ohio and the Cherokee Indians:

That, in the month of November, 1792, James Seagrove, a temporary agent, held a conference with the Lower Creeks, at which were present upwards of one thousand men, women, and children. That the objects of this conference were to confirm the treaty, which had been made with them at New York, and by administering to their necessities, they being greatly in want of corn and clothing, to attach them more firmly to the interest of the United States.

That, as the said Indians expressed themselves with great gratitude for the kindness they received, a hope was indulged that beneficial consequences would flow from the measure, especially as it was directed that the said agent should repair both to the Lower, and Upper Creek towns, in order to tranquillize their minds upon past, and prevent any misconceptions respecting the future conduct of the United States.

But, on the 11th day of March, these prospects were clouded by a party of about thirty of the Seminoles (some of them living to the southward of the territory of the United States) who plundered a store upon the St. Mary's river of a large quantity of goods, and killed several persons.

This outrage being followed by some others, excited a general alarm on the frontiers of Georgia. The Governor of that State called into service considerable bodies of militia, horse and foot, for the protection of the exposed inhabitants.

That, upon the receiving information of the aforesaid event, the President, on the 30th of May, directed that the Governor of Georgia should be informed, that, from considerations of policy at this critical period, relative to foreign Powers, and during the pending treaty with the Northern Indians, it was deemed advisable for the present to avoid offensive expeditions into the Creek country. But that, from the circumstances of the recent depredations on the frontiers of Georgia, it was thought expedient to increase the force in that quarter, for defensive purposes, and, therefore, the Governor was authorized to call into service, in aid of the continental troops, one hundred horse, and one hundred foot, of the militia of the said State.

That, as it did not appear that the whole of the Creek nation were disposed for, or engaged in hostility, it was considered that the above force was sufficient for the purposes designated.

That the case of a serious invasion of Georgia, by large bodies of Indians, must be referred to the provisions of the constitution.

That, on the 10th of June, the Governor of South Carolina was requested to afford aid to Georgia, in case that it should be seriously invaded by large bodies of Indians.

That a magazine of two thousand arms, and a proportionable quantity of ammunition, and some other military stores, have been established in Georgia, as a provisional measure, in case the said State should be invaded—the said articles, in that event, being subject to the order of the Governor.

That, on the 12th of June, the Governor transmitted information of an intended expedition into the Creek country, to consist of a body of about seven hundred volunteers; and on the 18th of the same month, he transmitted the result thereof, by which it appeared that the said volunteers, commanded by General Twiggs, proceeded to the Oakmulgee, about forty miles distant from the Oconee, and from circumstances of their provisions being nearly exhausted, many horses tired, and other adverse events, they returned on the 12th of the month.

That, on the 13th of August, the Governor transmitted information that he had convened a council of general officers, on the subject of reducing the five inimical towns in the Creek nation; the propositions to, with the answers of the council, he transmitted for the purpose of being laid before the President of the United States. That, in an answer to the said letter, dated the 5th of September, the Governor was informed, that, as an offensive expedition against the Creeks, of the nature, and under the circumstances mentioned, was a subject of great and complicated importance to the United States, it had engaged the serious consideration of the President, and, as the deliberate result thereof, he utterly disapproved the measure at that time, as being unauthorized by law, as contrary to the present state of affairs, and as contrary to the instructions heretofore given upon the subject.

That, on the 2d of October, the Governor transmitted the information of two officers who commanded an expedition against a Creek town, which they surprized on the 21st of September, and killed six warriors, and took eight women and children prisoners.

That it appears, from the representations of James Seagrove, that the Indian town which was surprized as before mentioned, on the 21st of September, was situated on the Chatahoochee river, and called "the Little Oakfuskee;" that the people belonging to it were among the most friendly of the Creeks, and no way concerned in stealing of horses, they being under the direction of the White Lieutenant.

That it has been the opinion of James Seagrove, communicated in his various despatches, that, notwithstanding the outrage of the 11th of March last, and the subsequent conduct of some of the banditti, the main body of the Creek nation are desirous of remaining at peace with the United States. That, in pursuance of his directions from the President of the United States, and his own opinion, he had been endeavoring for some months past to make arrangements to go into the Creek nation, for the purpose of obtaining the punishment of the banditti Indians, who have committed the outrages aforesaid, and of more closely attaching the Creeks to the United States.

That he had made an agreement to meet a number of friendly Indians on the Oakmulgee river, about the 30th of September, and with them to proceed into the Indian towns for the purposes aforesaid. But, the expedition of the 21st of September, and the violent threats of a number of lawless whites on the frontiers of Georgia, had prevented him. Some of these people appear to oppose every effort for peace, and ardently desire a war.

That, by his letter of the 21st of October, it appears that two parties were preparing to go to war against the Creeks, the result of which has not yet been known.

That the information of the Governor of Georgia to James Seagrove, dated the 26th of August last, to wit: "that, under the law of the United States, as well as for the security of this State, the Government of Georgia cannot recognise the establishment of peace without having commissioners at the treaty," is a matter which requires serious notice.

It is to be observed that the Governor of Georgia has not organized the hundred horse, and hundred militia foot, which he was authorized to do by the President, on the 30th of May last; but, instead thereof, he has kept up considerable bodies of mounted volunteers of the militia, of which no returns have been received, but which, perhaps, may be nearly, or quite, five hundred men. The payment of these troops will probably amount to a very large sum of money, and it may become a question of importance, whether the United States are responsible for their payment, the circumstances of the case being duly considered.

It is suggested in the papers which accompany this statement, that it is highly probable that it is owing to some of these troops, that Mr. Seagrove has been hitherto restrained from adjusting amicably the causes of difference with the Creek nation, and also, probably, that it was a part of them who surprized the Little Oakfuskee town.

From a review of the representations, contained in the letters of James Seagrove, Major Gaither, (the commanding officer) and Constant Freeman, herewith submitted, it will appear that the Creeks are generally disposed for peace, but that there is too much reason to apprehend, that the unjustifiable conduct of certain lawless whites, on the frontiers of Georgia, will prevent that desirable event from being realized.

The present state of this part of the frontier involves national considerations of great magnitude, whether viewed as relative to the expense which has been incurred during the past summer, of which payment will most probably be demanded of the United States, whether with regard to the claims of the Governor of Georgia, of a right of interference in any treaty with the Creeks, which is presumed to be contrary to the constitution of the United States, or whether with regard to a war with the powerful tribes of the Creeks, with the long and almost unlimited train of collateral and consequent evils attendant thereon, a measure which perhaps may be avoided, if means could be devised to keep the bold and turbulent of both sides in order.

Of the territory of the United States Southwest of the Ohio, and the Cherokees.

That it will appear, from the papers relative to the Cherokees, on the files of Congress, that, in the year 1792, a partial disposition for war existed among the Cherokees, being chiefly confined to the five Lower towns, so called, embracing, to the utmost, one-third of that nation, or six hundred and fifty warriors.

That, however, by the abilities and assiduity of Governor Blount, this disposition, in the commencement of the year, was greatly changed, and the said five towns were supposed to be desirous of an accommodation.

That, while this business was negotiating, a party of armed men, under Captain John Beard, who had been called into service by Governor Blount, with a view of protecting the settlers, did, on the 12th of June, in defiance of their orders, cross the Tennessee, and surprise and kill a number of our best friends among the Indians, at the moment Governor Blount's messengers were among them.

This violent outrage, so disgraceful to the United States, has been followed by several others, and the Southwestern territory is involved in a war with the Cherokees; which, as it relates to the above event, must be considered as highly unjust. It is to be apprehended and regretted, that, from the prejudice against Indians on the frontiers, it is but too probable that the perpetrators of these violences will escape unpunished. Such measures as the laws authorize have been directed, but, as yet, no result has been transmitted.

Great bodies of militia have been brought into service on this occasion, in order to guard against the effects of savage retaliation. Much expense has been already incurred, nor is it yet terminated: for, however hostilities shall be restrained by the severity of the winter, yet they may be expected to break out with renewed violence in the spring.

The evil seems to require a remedy; but no Indian peace will be permanent, unless an effectual mode can be devised to punish the violators of it on both sides. It will be with an ill grace that the United States demand the punishment of banditti Indians, when, at the same time, the guilty whites escape with impunity.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 13th, 1793.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 9th March, 1793.

SIR:

Several of the delegates of the State of Georgia have made application to the President of the United States to establish magazines of arms, ammunition, and provisions, in Georgia, and, also, to make a provisional arrangement for calling out the militia of the neighboring States, on the apprehension of danger from the Cherokees.

Although it is to be expected, from the measures taken to secure peace with the Cherokees, that these arrangements, to the extent required, may not be indispensably necessary, at this time, yet the President of the United States, desirous, as far as may be, to avert any apprehensions which might arise from a want of arms and ammunition, in case of need, has directed me to form a small magazine, at Augusta, of one thousand stand of arms, and a proportionable quantity of ammunition. These articles are, accordingly, in a train of preparation, and will be shipped with all convenient speed.

They will be deposited, for the present, under the charge of Major Robert Forsyth, at Augusta, who will be instructed, in case of an invasion, to issue such of them to your order as you may require, or to serve such other purposes as may be requisite for the interest of the United States. The arms which shall be issued to the militia of Georgia, and not returned, will be charged to the State, in an account with the United States.

The prospect of peace, with the Cherokees and Creeks, would render it inexpedient to take any immediate order on the subject of forming magazines of provisions, at present.

Letters were written some time ago to the Governors of South Carolina and North Carolina, relative to any irruption of Indian parties upon the frontiers.

I have the honor to be, &c.

His Excellency Governor TELFAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 29th April, 1793.

SIR:

Your two favors of the third and eighth instant have been received and submitted to the President of the United States.

Information has also been recently received from Governor Blount, relatively to the hostile dispositions of some of the Upper Creeks, and the mass of the Lower Cherokees, and that a war exists between the Chickasaws and Upper Creeks.

Governor Blount, alarmed at the posture of affairs, has set out for this city, in order to concert with the Executive of the United States the measures which shall be advisable.

As the business which he will have to transact will be blended with the state of affairs related by your Excellency, the President of the United States is desirous that some general principles should be adopted which shall be applicable (as far as circumstances will admit) to the general state of the Southern frontiers, the result of which shall be transmitted to you.

In the mean time, however, the arms and ammunition, which were mentioned in my letter of the ninth of March, are now shipped on board the schooner Peggy, Captain Skelly, agreeably to the enclosed invoice.

A letter has been written to Mr. Habersham, to have them immediately transported to Augusta.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GOVERNOR TELFAIR.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Invoice of military stores, shipped on board the schooner Peggy, Thomas Skelly, master, to the address of Major John Habersham, Savannah:

40 chests, containing—
 1,000 stand of arms,
 1,000 bayonets,
 1,000 scabbards,
 1,000 gun worms,
 400 brushes and wires.
 25 barrels gun powder, containing 100 lbs. each,
 5,000 lbs. lead, in bars and balls,
 5,000 flints.

N. B.—Powder-horns will be sent by the first opportunity.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 30th May, 1793.

SIR:

The duplicates of your two letters, dated at Savannah, on the 22d and 29th ultimo, were received on the 28th instant, and submitted to the President of the United States, who, after having seriously considered their contents, has directed me to make the following reply to your Excellency:

That, from considerations of policy, at this critical period, relative to foreign Powers, and the pending treaty with the Northern Indians, it is deemed advisable to avoid, for the present, offensive expeditions into the Creek country; but, from the circumstances of the late depredations on the frontiers of Georgia, it is thought expedient to increase the force in that quarter, for defensive purposes. The President, therefore, authorizes your Excellency to call into, and keep in, service, in addition to the regular force stationed in Georgia, one hundred horse, and one hundred militia foot, to be employed under the orders of Lieutenant Colonel Gaither, in repelling inroads, as circumstances shall require.

You will please to nominate and appoint the commissioned officers to the above corps of horse, to consist of one captain, two lieutenants, and two cornets; the non-commissioned and privates, to consist of six sergeants, six corporals, one trumpeter, and one farrier, and eighty-six dragoons.

In order that the corps shall be well equipped, the public will find the caps, swords, pistols, saddles, bridles, and carbines, all of which, however, will be deducted, at their prime cost and charges, from the pay of each individual, which, you will perceive, by the enclosed schedule, is very liberal. This corps of horse to be engaged of proper characters, to serve until the first day of May or June next, unless sooner discharged, which the Government must hold the right of doing, if it should think fit. If the non-commissioned and privates cannot be engaged for the above period, it must be left to your discretion to engage them for as long a time as possible.

The authority, for the above purpose, is specially vested, by law, in the President of the United States; but the infantry, or foot militia, must be called into service according to the general course of the militia law, to which you will please to advert. The pay of the infantry will be the same as the troops of the United States, agreeably to the schedule No. 2.

It will, however, be important, that proper endeavors be used to engage them for as long a period as the cavalry. The commissioned and non-commissioned officers, for the infantry, to be the same as for the continental troops, to wit: one captain, one lieutenant, one ensign, six sergeants, six corporals, one drum, one fife, and eighty-six privates.

An additional thousand stand of arms and accoutrements, fifty barrels of powder, and a proportional quantity of lead and flints, will be forwarded to Major Habersham, with all expedition, to be by him forwarded to Augusta, to the care of Major Forsyth, under the provisions of the former quantity.

As it does not yet appear that the whole force of the Creek nation is disposed for, or engaged in, hostility, it is considered that the above force will be sufficient for the object designated.

As it is to be apprehended the objects of the Western frontiers may, notwithstanding the treaty, require the energy of all the regular troops in that quarter, and, also, of the recruits, who are marching that way, it has been considered that no part of them could be sent to Georgia, in the present instance. But, if the treaty should be successful, or, if the troops should be victorious, it may be otherwise in future.

The case of a serious invasion of Georgia, by large bodies of Indians, must be referred to the provisions of the constitution. But the proceeding with efficacy, in future, (the necessity of which appears but too probable) requires, absolutely, that no unnecessary expense shall be incurred in the mean time.

It has been heretofore considered that block houses afford but a very imperfect security to a frontier, and nothing has occurred lately to induce a contrary impression. They serve to cover little more than the persons who are actually within them. The garrisons are, necessarily, too small to afford any considerable party to sally out; and the experience of Indian warfare evinces that the savages soon learn the force within, and either despise or avoid it. It has been found, by practice, in Kentucky, and along the whole Western frontiers, that a few scouts, or spies, who are formed of the hardiest and best hunters, and who shall be advanced a few miles of the settlements, traversing incessantly, at right angles, the paths most used by the Indians, are better calculated to give the alarm to the settlers, and secure them from danger, than any other species of troops whatever. And, in order that nothing on the part of the Government should be wanting, to induce the best frontier citizen to undertake this service, the high rate of five-sixths of a dollar, per day, has been allowed to each scout. Two men, or scouts, will cover an extent of ten or twelve miles. They are to be mustered upon oath, at the time of their entering and leaving the service: this is essential, in order to prevent abuse.

Indeed, it is indispensable that all troops who are to be paid by the General Government, should be mustered in the same manner, by some respectable magistrate, or high officer of the militia.

If your Excellency should have any map, which may be depended upon, of the Creek country, a copy of it will be of service.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

GOVERNOR TELFAIR.

[NOTE.—The enclosures in the preceeding letter of the 30th of May, were, a schedule of the pay, established by law, for the troops in the service of the United States, and an extract of an act, entitled "An act for making farther and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," passed the 5th day of March, 1792.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 10th, 1793.

SIR:

Your letter of the 8th of May has been received, and submitted to the President of the United States. The State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, the measures taken by your Excellency may be considered as indispensable. You are the judge of the degree of danger, and of its duration, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to exigencies. The President, however, expresses his confidence that, as soon as the danger, which has induced you to call out so large a body of troops, shall have subsided, you will reduce the troops to the existing state of things; indeed, to the number mentioned in my letter of the 30th ultimo, duplicates of which have been forwarded, provided the safety of the frontiers will admit the measure.

The articles mentioned in the enclosed invoice have been shipped this day, on board of the schooner Peggy, Captain Skelly, consigned to John Habersham, of Savannah, who has been directed to take your orders as to their further disposition. The remainder will be forwarded as soon as prepared, so as to complete the number and quantity mentioned in my letter of the 30th ultimo.

As a general and open Creek war, in the present crisis of European affairs, would be a complicated evil of great magnitude, the President of the United States is anxiously desirous of avoiding such an event: for this purpose, he has again directed Mr. Seagrove to repair to the heart of the Creek country, provided the measure can be attempted with any reasonable degree of safety. If a few of the most violent of the depredators, could be put to death, it ought, in the present conjuncture, to be considered as satisfactory. I enclose you a copy of the letter which has been written to Mr. Seagrove on this occasion.

I also enclose you a copy of a letter to the Governor of South Carolina, in case circumstances should require you to call for aid from that State.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

GOVERNOR TELFAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 10th June, 1793.

SIR:

The President of the United States has received authentic information from Georgia of the unprovoked and cruel outrage of parties of Creeks upon the frontiers of that State; and, as it is at present uncertain to what degree the evils complained of may be extended, the President has directed me to request your Excellency, that, in case the frontiers of Georgia should be seriously invaded by large bodies of hostile Indians, you would, upon the request of the Governor of the said State, direct such parties of the militia of the State of South Carolina to march to the assistance of Georgia, as the case may require, for the expenses of which the United States will be responsible. The militia to provide themselves with provisions to the places of rendezvous, which shall be appointed by the Governor of Georgia, where arrangements for further supply will be made by the contractors for the continental troops.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

GOVERNOR MOULTRIE.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 5th, 1793.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose to your Excellency the copy of a letter from the Governor of Georgia of the 13th ultimo, enclosing a copy of the proceedings of a council of war of the general officers of the militia of said State, and also an answer to the said letter, of this date.

The letter which was addressed to you on the 10th of the month of June (a triplicate of which is enclosed) was of so very different a nature from requesting assistance to invade the Creeks, that the President of the United States is persuaded that you would not consider it, in any degree, as sanctioning such a measure, and, therefore, that you will refrain, at this time, from affording the assistance of South Carolina to the proposed expedition.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

GOVERNOR MOULTRIE.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 30th April, 1793.

SIR:

Your letters to the President of the United States and myself, of the 17th and 21st ultimo, have been received. The information therein contained was very unexpected indeed, considering the purport of your former communications. If, after heavy expenses are incurred by conferences, the consequences are hostilities, instead of tranquillity, the propriety of such conferences will be justly questioned.

It is conceived, that a residence within the nation is the only solid principle of conciliation. On this ground, and your consent to go into the nation, it is expected that you will, if the measure can, with any safety, be adopted, repair to the Upper as well as to the Lower Creeks.

The former still permit the depredations of their young people against the Cumberland settlements; perhaps, as the Chickasaws are now at war with them, they will find other employment for their young men. Governor Blount has transmitted us recent information of this event.

All your letters which have been received, from time to time, have been laid before the President of the United States, and certain parts, relative to your conference, were laid before the Legislature.

From the complexion of the robbery at your brother's store, it would appear, at this distance, to have been the work of a predatory party, rather than any fixed plan of the nation, and the more so, as no information of any depredations have been received from the Oconee, or in that quarter.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

TO JAMES SEAGROVE, Esq.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 10th, 1793.

SIR:

The last letters from you were dated the 17th and 21st March last, which were acknowledged on the 30th April, since which we have been extremely alarmed, by information from other quarters, at the depredations of the Creeks.

It is of the highest importance that some person should repair into the heart of the country, as well among the Upper as Lower Creeks, and, as your previous knowledge of their characters, as well as your station, render you the most proper person, it is the positive orders of the President of the United States that you forthwith perform this business, having made previous arrangements for your safety.

It is understood that the White Lieutenant and the Mad Dog, of the Upper Creeks, and the White Bird king of the Cussetahs, are highly desirous for peace. It is, therefore, probable that you could make an appointment so as to meet them at some place not far from the Rock Landing, so as to escort you into the country.

The justice and moderation of the United States are so conspicuous towards the Creeks, that arguments may be multiplied without end to prove that our interest is reciprocal, and that the existence of the Creeks, as a nation, must depend upon their being at peace with us.

That, in order to this, the most notorious of the late depredators ought to be given up to us, put to death by themselves, or driven out of the nation. The latter idea is mentioned merely in case the others cannot be complied with, and as a substitute for more energetic justice.

The state of European politics renders it of high importance that the United States should be at peace with the Creeks. Exert yourself, therefore, to the utmost to this effect, always being assured that your conduct in pursuit thereof will be highly acceptable to the President of the United States, by whose special commands I write this letter.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Esq.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 16th, 1793.

SIR:

Your several letters of the 19th and 30th of April, 24th May, 14th June, 6th and 31st July, and 4th, 6th, 13th, and 17th August last, with their several enclosures, have been received, and submitted to the President of the United States.

As far as has been discovered, no zeal has been wanting on your part to quiet the Indians. The defect is the external instead of the internal application which has been practised. The orders, however, have been so explicit on this head, that much more need not be urged, especially as you seem impressed with the necessity of the measure, and are about to execute it.

I can, however, say, with entire truth, that, if you do go into the nation, and bring it to a just sense of the friendship and kindness of the United States, you will do an essential service to your country, and which will be highly acceptable to the President of the United States. Perhaps the expedient would be a good one, if you could obtain about a dozen of the real chiefs of the Upper and of the Lower Creeks to come on this winter to see the President and Congress, in order to brighten the chain of friendship. If this idea should succeed, it ought, if possible, to be avoided bringing the same people who were here in the year 1790. They ought to be the most eminent, such as the White Lieutenant, the Mad Dog, and other great chiefs. But this arrangement ought to be made within the heart of the nation. If they should agree to the proposition, it would have a good effect to avert the impending storm.

I have written a letter to the Governor of Georgia, expressing, in the most unequivocal manner, the President's disapprobation of all offensive expeditions against the Creeks, as being unauthorized by law, contrary to the present state of affairs, and contrary to the instructions heretofore given.

Letters from the Secretary of War to Major Henry Gaither, commanding the troops of the United States in the State of Georgia.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 29th April, 1793.

SIR:

From the representations of his Excellency the Governor of Georgia, founded upon the information of Mr. Seagrove, and others, it would appear that the Creeks had recently committed depredations upon the frontiers, and were disposed for war.

As to the affair at Trader's Hill, it would appear at this distance rather the robbery of some marauders, than the result of any design of the Creeks generally; at the same time it is confessed that this view may be dictated partly by the hope that the fact was so. The peaceable Creeks who were at or near Colerain, would certainly give it this complexion.

But, in case of real danger, the country ought to be protected by the militia. The propriety of the custom of calling out cavalry or horsemen, may justly be questioned. The expense would probably far exceed the value of the services between them and the foot militia.

The Western frontiers experience great benefit, and have great confidence in a species of rangers called scouts. These are the most expert and hardy woodsmen, and upon whose judgment reliance may be placed. They are generally two of them together, and they traverse the country at right angles to the paths used by the Indians. Upon discovery of Indian tracks, they alarm the neighboring country, and, by their vigilance, predatory parties of Indians are made to suffer severely for their mischief.

Would it not be proper to adopt the patrols? Six of them would be equal to the watching an extent of twenty miles of frontier. They have been allowed, in order to induce the service of the best hunters, the high sum of five-sixths of a dollar per day. If you should order any of these into the service, they must be mustered upon their entering and quitting the service.

The pay rolls of the militia horse, ordered into service by Major Call, and which you transmitted to this office some time ago, are not supported by any muster rolls. These are essential to the adjustment of the accounts. No species of troops are to be in service at the expense of the United States, but those which shall have been mustered upon oath on entering and quitting the service.

But more information is required as to the reason of the said companies having been ordered out. It is necessary to know by whose requisition, and upon what occasion, and the cause of their continuance. I request that you will minutely inquire into this business, and state the result, at large, of your investigation.

Your letters of the 13th January, and 10th February, have been received.

If the State of Georgia should be invaded, the Government will, of course, order the militia out to repel it. In circumstances of danger should, upon mature reflection, induce you to request of the Governor that some of the militia should be ordered into service for the security of the frontiers, you will do it accordingly, taking care always that the numbers so requested are not more than the nature of the case may require, and that they are again dismissed as soon as the danger is over.

But you cannot do a more acceptable service than to endeavor, to the utmost of your power, to induce the Indians to continue the peace, and to calm every attempt to raise a storm. Let this idea govern all your conduct.

Let me know constantly of every transaction of importance.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Major GAITHER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 10th, 1793.

SIR:

Your letters of the 17th and 19th April, and the 6th of May, have been received, with their several enclosures, and submitted to the President of the United States.

The information which has been received of the depredations of the Creeks, is extremely mortifying, no just cause for this conduct being known to the Government.

It would appear, from a letter of the Governor of Georgia, that he has called into service a considerable body of militia, and encamped them at Shoulderbone. It is, however, sincerely to be hoped that the necessity for this measure will be of short continuance. But the Governor has been authorized, on behalf of the President of the United States, to call into service, in addition to the regular troops, one hundred horse, and one hundred militia, with the following officers: the horse, one captain, two lieutenants, two cornets, six sergeants, six corporals, one farrier, one trumpeter, and eighty-six dragoons; and the infantry, one captain, one lieutenant, one ensign, six sergeants, six corporals, one drum, one fife, and eighty-six privates; to be engaged to serve until the first of June, 1794, and to act under your orders.

The pay of your detachment will be remitted by Captain Constant Freeman, who will go to Georgia in the capacity of public agent. This money will be issued agreeably to the regulations pointed out by the accountant of this Department.

The clothing of your detachment for the present year shall be shortly forwarded to Savannah.

You will still continue to be governed by the principles of moderation in calling militia into service, as heretofore, in case circumstances should authorize you to call into service an additional number, to the before mentioned one hundred horse and one hundred foot.

I have the honor, &c.

Major GAITHER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 17th, 1793.

SIR:

The bearer, Captain Constant Freeman, has been appointed an agent of the War Department for the troops in Georgia. The particular duties assigned him are contained in his instructions, a copy of which is enclosed.

You are hereby requested to afford Captain Freeman all the assistance in your power he may need, in the exercise of his duty.

It is of the utmost importance that every part of the administration of the public interests should be conducted with a truly republican economy.

I request that you keep up a constant correspondence with this office of all things relatively to your command.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Major GAITHER.

Letters from the Governor of Georgia to the Secretary of War.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 3d April, 1793.

SIR:

I have received intelligence, of a very disagreeable nature, from James Seagrove, Esquire, agent of Indian affairs S. D. U. S. The following are extracts of his letter, dated St. Mary's, 17th March, 1793:

"A party of Creek Indians, in number about thirty, from the lower part of Flint river, entered the store of Robert Seagrove, at Trader's Hill, on this river, on the evening of the eleventh instant, and, in the most brutal and savage manner, murdered Mr. John Fleming, the store-keeper, and Mr. Daniel Moffet; a man of the name of Upton is missing, supposed to be taken off a prisoner." "Thursday, the 14th, I received advice that some people had been killed the day before, about six miles from that place. There being now twenty two volunteers, well mounted, we proceeded, without a moment's delay, and, in less than an hour, came where we found three men, and a little girl, murdered, and one of the men scalped. These unfortunate people appear to have been coming in to settle in this country; they had a wagon with their property—the horses carried off by the murderers; and it is thought a woman and child, who are missing, are prisoners. From the defenceless situation of the Southern frontier, the inhabitants of the counties of Glynn and Camden, must remove from their settlements, if speedy and sufficient aid be not afforded."

I have made a temporary arrangement, until the President may make such dispositions as he shall judge adequate to the emergency.

Whilst I thus point out the situation of those counties, I must further remark, that every quarter of the extended frontier of this State is open to similar outrages. I mention this in order that the President may take the general defence of the said frontier under consideration. The militia remaining subject to the call of the commandant of the Federal troops, and not being drawn into service, upon pressing occasions, has abated the confidence of the people in Government; and, should a general pressure take place, (which, from the present aspect of affairs, I have reason to apprehend) I must, in a short period, be reduced to the dangerous expedient of impressing, and this, in my opinion, is to be avoided, as much as possible, by every Government.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.

STATE HOUSE, Augusta, 9th April, 1793.

SIR:

Your communication of the 9th March last, I have had the pleasure of receiving, and feel a peculiar satisfaction in contemplating the prospect of aid, both with respect to the establishment of a magazine of arms, and, also, the arrangements for calling in the militia of the neighboring States, in the event of general hostility; and I hope that a farther relief, by the establishment of magazines of provisions, will also take place. You have, enclosed, extracts of the information come to hand, since my last letter to you, from which, you will readily perceive that the depredations of the Creeks are of a very serious nature.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.Extract from a deposition by eleven inhabitants of Glynn county, dated 11th March, 1793.

The inhabitants of Glynn county have been robbed and plundered very considerably, by the Creek Indians, who are, at this time, in a state of actual hostility against said inhabitants, committing daily the most horrid robberies on them; insomuch, that, at this moment, they conceive almost all the cattle and horses of said county, being a very great number, to be in the possession of said Creek Indians.

The Creek Indians have been treated kindly and hospitably by the inhabitants of said county, and in no wise injured by said inhabitants.

WILLIAMSBURG, 21st March, 1793.

The settlers on this side the river are not rich; notwithstanding, the number of cattle taken already, as far as we can ascertain, is nearly two thousand head.

SAVANNAH, 22d April, 1793.

SIR:

Some late accounts received from the southward, regarding the Creek Indians, would appear somewhat flattering, were it not well understood that the policy of those people is to disavow, as a nation, all murders and depredations. Mr. Seagrove has communicated that a promise has been made, by some of the head-men, to surrender the murderers, and return the captured property; those are measures not to be expected; perhaps, some part of the property may be returned; and, if so, it will extend to my most sanguine expectations.

The President will, no doubt, take a serious review of the situation of the frontier inhabitants of this State, and afford a speedy relief, either by the adoption of measures for negotiation, or by coercive ones, to compel them to a due observance of amity; and such is the aspect of European affairs, that it may perhaps be necessary to have reference to them, in regulating the immediate system of policy with the savages: be the result what it may, a due observance of the sense of the President, on the subject of peace or war, shall be attended to on my part.

The arms and ammunition mentioned in your last are not yet arrived. It is my very earnest desire that two thousand stand of arms, in addition to those expected, with a proportionable quantity of ammunition, be forwarded as early as possible.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.

SAVANNAH, April 29, 1793.

SIR:

Since my last to you, dated the 22d instant, I have received the intelligence contained in the enclosed extracts, viz:

From the deposition of Benjamin Harrison and Francis Pugh, and from the information of Joseph Dabbs, there is little expectation of avoiding a general war with the Creeks and Cherokees. Blood has been spilt in every direction on the extended frontier of this State, and one man killed in the State of South Carolina. I have directed fourteen block-houses to be erected, each to be garrisoned by one commissioned officer, two sergeants, and seventeen privates. Those stations extend from St. Mary's river to the river Tugulo; which, with the federal stations, may serve as a temporary defence, adding thereto troops of horse, to act on the spur of the occasion. I shall follow this plan of operation until measures be taken by the President for the better protection of the unfortunate settlers on this exposed frontier. If I find the pressure become great, the opposition must keep pace with the several emergencies. I shall make the necessary communications to the Governor of the State of South Carolina, in order to obtain aid, as I have every reason to hope that provident measures have been taken to that effect. Should general hostilities continue, it will be well to give Governor Blount the needful instructions, to cause a co-operation on his part.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.

Extracts from the deposition of Benjamin Harrison and Francis Pugh, of Washington county.

"On the 18th April the Indians killed William, the son of Col. Pugh, and had taken Dick, a negro man of Col. Pugh's, and shot said William Pugh through the body, and two scalps were taken off his head." "There are four horses missing."

Extracts from the information of Joseph Dabbs, of Franklin county.

"That, on Tuesday, the 22d April, he saw General Clarke at the town of Washington, Wilkes county, who informed him that six persons were murdered by a party of Indians, at or near the Skull Shoals of Oconee, in Greene county, on Monday last, about 10 o'clock in the morning."

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, May 8, 1793.

Sir:

Such is the havoc and carnage making by the savages, in every direction on our frontier, that retaliation by open war becomes the only resort. The horrid barbarities committed (some recitals of which the enclosures contain) have impelled me to cause the additional aid of six troops of horse to be drawn into service, to range on the frontiers, and also to establish a camp at Shoulderbone, to consist of three battalion companies; and I have directed a general officer to repair to the said camp, to be reinforced as circumstances may require. The late respite is only to be attributed to the height of the waters, and, so soon as they subside, I have nothing to expect but an immediate renewal of the like barbarities. Every measure in my power to repel and annoy shall be taken, and, as far as means will extend, shall be carried into effect. Let no idea of peace so far amuse as to divert the necessary and immediate preparations for war. Every information you may receive tending thereto must proceed from ignorance or design. The field is now taken; the people must be protected, and a failure, in this juncture, will affect the operations of Government in a serious degree. The agent for supplies has afforded much relief by furnishing the men called into service, and, on a continuation of such supplies, will depend the fate of Georgia.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.

Extracts from the deposition of Michael Cupps and Nancy Smith, taken by Elishu Lyman, Esquire, one of the justices of the peace for the county of Greene, dated 23d April, 1793.

"Michael Cupps was near the Oconee river, on Monday, the 22d instant, and heard a gun fired, and saw about thirty Indians firing upon and massacreing Richard Thresher, two children, and a negro wench; and at the same time the wife of the deceased, with an infant, ran and leaped into the river, the Indians firing upon her as she fled. The woman was found alive, scalped, wounded in both her thighs, and her right breast with balls, and stabbed in her left breast with a knife, her left arm cut nearly off, as is supposed with a tomahawk, of which wounds she died in about twenty-four hours. The infant was found drowned, without any marks of violence upon it. Nancy Smith deposed, the number of Indians was, in her opinion, nearly one hundred."

HOPWELL, April 28, 1793.

I received this morning, by express, from a friend, that the whole of the Creek nation, except the Cussetahs, had declared war against the United States. That John Galphin, with five hundred warriors, had set out, about sixteen days ago, to join the Seminoles, and was to fall on the southern parts of Georgia; but my information leads me to believe that they intend to make a blow all along the frontiers of Georgia and this State.

Attest, W. URQUHART, S. E. D.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, June 12, 1793.

Sir:

Our frontier settlers still continue in a state of alarm: for, notwithstanding the waters still remain high, the cessations from Indian murders, and depredations of every kind, are of so short duration, that the inhabitants have not a moment's security. The number of militia drawn into actual service, in consequence of the harassed situation of the said settlers, is, by much, greater than I expected; but there is no appearance of my being able to relax: on the contrary, I shall be under the necessity to order additional reinforcements.

I have just received a letter from General Twiggs, dated west side of the Oconee, the 8th inst. which mentions that a detachment of about seven hundred volunteers will move some distance into the enemy's country. The result of this will be transmitted, for the information of the President of the United States.

There will be a necessity for additional supplies of arms: a thousand swords and two hundred and fifty pairs of pistols would be a most seasonable supply.

I shall be very happy to have communicated to me the general system that may be adopted by the President of the United States, as early as the nature of the case will, by any means, admit.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, June 18, 1793.

Sir:

Agreeably to my letter to you of the 12th inst. the result of the going out of a detachment of volunteers I have now to communicate. They proceeded on to the Oakmulgee, about forty miles distant from the Oconee, and, from the circumstances of their provisions being nearly exhausted, many horses tired, and other adverse events, they returned on the 12th. The conduct and prudence exercised by General Twiggs, who commanded, as well as some objects which he had in view, will appear by the extracts herewith transmitted.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDW. TELFAIR.

Extracts of a letter from General Twiggs, dated 13th June, 1793.

“On the morning of the 11th instant, an additional reason was given why the troops could not proceed, to wit: that there was not one day’s provision on hand.

“If we had gone on, in all human probability some of our troops would have come up with and killed some of the Cussetah nation, hunting in small parties: such a proceeding would have united the towns, who are now friendly disposed, and produced very evil consequences.”

Extract of an after-order of the 11th June, by General Twiggs.

“That the detachment of cavalry ordered this morning to be in readiness, to march without delay, under the command of Brigadier General Irwin, to the place where Tom’s path crosses Flint river, near the Buzzard Roost, from thence to the little village, known by the name of the Uchees, twelve miles below, and take, if possible, the head-men of that town, and bring them safe to camp; and to be cautious that no damage is done to any of the persons, or property of the Indians of that town; and to give them every assurance of our peaceable disposition towards them.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 24th July, 1793.

SIR:

Immediately on the return of the volunteers, General Twiggs forwarded a letter to Mr. Barnard, who resides on Flint river, explanatory of his designs when he entered the Creek nation. The messenger was a sensible half breed, who remained some time in the said nation, as well to receive Mr. Barnard’s answer, as to gain every information in his power. From the general conduct of the Creek Indians, it would appear that they are not confident in their own strength, nor generally, at this period, disposed to war: that part of the nation who profess amity, still adhere to their former application for our people to go forward, in force, to destroy the five inimical towns, who have committed murders and outrages. My former opinion, on this subject, admits of no change. By a sudden stroke at those hostile towns, we will, in all probability, effect a restoration of property, as well as the liberation of unfortunate captives from among us, now in that nation. To destroy their towns and crops, and possess ourselves of prisoners, will ensure peace on a solid basis; and no other principle can be of any duration.

A half-breed, named Cornell, going with some despatches to Mr. Seagrove, was unfortunately killed by a detachment of horse, that was out in Camden county: the particulars I have not, as yet, been satisfactorily informed of. In order to guard against future violences of this nature, I have directed all despatches by flags, from the nation, to be transmitted to me.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 30th July, 1793.

SIR:

Your communication of the 10th ultimo, with its enclosures, came to hand on the 25th instant, in consequence whereof some measures have been taken towards effecting the objects therein contained. The President shall be advised of any movements that may take place, in the event of the necessary resources being obtained. I flatter myself that the system to be pursued will, in the end, prove a saving to the United States, as well as bring about a peace on permanent principles.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 13th August, 1793.

SIR:

Since my last letter to you, dated the 30th ultimo, I have had convened a council of general officers, upon the subject of reducing the five inimical towns in the Creek nation. The propositions, with their answers, I do myself the honor of transmitting, for the purpose of being laid before the President of the United States. If the agent for supplies can draw forth resources, I flatter myself the objects may be accomplished, on a scale more circumscribed. (A map of the Creek nation, furnished by the Surveyor-general of this State, is also enclosed.)

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR,

The Secretary of War.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, AUGUSTA, Thursday, 8th August, 1793.

In conformity to notification, the general officers attended.

At a council of war, held by order of the Commander-in-Chief, in Augusta, on the 8th August, 1793.

Present. The Commander-in-Chief.

Major Generals, Twiggs, Jackson, Clarke.

Brigadier Generals, Glascock, Morrison, Clarke, Irwin, Gunn.

His Excellency the Governor, having considered it necessary, for the safety and protection of the citizens of this State, to undertake, on the part of the United States, an expedition against the hostile towns of the Creek nation, proposed the following questions:

Question. What season will be most proper to carry this expedition into execution, and what time shall the draughts from the different brigades be ordered to rendezvous at camp?

Answer. The fall: on the 15th October.

Ques. Where will be the most eligible spot to draw the army to a point?

Ans. At or near the Oconee river, where Tom’s path crosses the same.

Ques. What number of foot and horse ought to be ordered to camp, for the objects that may arise in the intended expedition?

Ans. At least two thousand horse, and three thousand foot.

Ques. Shall the militia be draughted into two divisions: and what time shall they serve, after their arrival in camp?

Ans. Yes: a term not exceeding sixty days.

Ques. Are you of opinion that it will be requisite to direct the Federal troops, now in this State, to be held in readiness, to form a junction with the militia, intended to be called out, if necessary?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Will it be expedient to notify the Governor of South Carolina to hold in readiness such a number of horse and foot, as the Governor of this State may think requisite; and to march, so as to be at camp in Georgia, at such time, and place, as may appear necessary and proper?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Are you of opinion that the object of the forces, that may be drawn into actual service, ought to be directed against the inimical towns only?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Will it be advisable to direct the officers and men to provide themselves with provisions, until they arrive at their respective brigade parades?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Will it be advisable to cause volunteer cavalry, only, to be drawn to camp, from the counties of Camden, Glynn, and Liberty, and the draught of the infantry in said counties be held in readiness, to march to such posts or places as the emergency of the case may require?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Will it be requisite to give assurances to the officers and men that do embody, and perform their tour of duty, on the intended expedition, that the Governor will use his influence with the General Assembly, at their next meeting, to make a compensation, in addition to the pay allowed by the General Government?

Ans. Yes.

Attest,

J. MERIWETHER, A. D. E.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 6th September, 1793.

SIR:

Your letter of the 19th July was handed me by Captain Freeman; its import is of great concern to this republic, and ought to have met with no impediment in coming to hand. In consequence of the contractor having bonded, with security, to furnish supplies for the militia, to act against the hostile Creek towns, a few days since I transmitted to the agent for supplies, a copy of the bond, with instructions to place in the hands of the contractor any funds he could apply towards the intended operations. So far I have progressed, and am now compelled to desist from pursuing the only measure, in my opinion, that can give ease and security to the persons and property of the unfortunate settlers in this extended frontier. It will appear, from the talk of John Galphin, and the affidavit of William Jones, herewith transmitted, together with taking into view the recent circumstances of Harrison's fort being fired upon, and depredations being committed in the neighborhood of the fort at St. Sevilla, that hostilities have not subsided, nor can it be expected that they will soon cease. Were the superintendent even in the nation, the United States can have no representation there, until the savages are brought to understand that the arms of the Union are to be directed against them. Where is the channel through which they can "be brought to a sense of their crimes, and be prevailed upon to give up at least some of the authors thereof?" How are the unfortunate captives, now among them, to be restored? and by what means will the vast amount of plunder taken from our citizens be recovered—even admitting that the feelings of humanity were not awake in the breasts of the near connexions of the women and children who have been butchered by savage brutality? I say, when I draw these gloomy reflections into view, the hope of peace and safety to the inhabitants of Georgia is very distant. The people have an indubitable claim on Government for protection, and the establishment of a paper peace can be of no duration, and, it is such, as the people of this country can have no dependence upon, without previous measures being taken to compel a due observance thereof.

The present system of defence is deemed not more than adequate for the frontier settlements; and, should the proposed alteration take place, I have little doubt but the three southern counties, viz. Liberty, Glynn, and Camden, will be entirely depopulated by a total removal of their inhabitants.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TELFAIR.

The Secretary of War.

John Galphin to General Irwin.

IN COUNCIL, Cowetas, 21st August, 1793.

SIR:

Feeling with the greatest concern the hostilities and bloodshed which has been produced by the differences subsisting between us in all parts of our borders; we now offer, in behalf of our nation, towards terminating the present war, and adjusting such terms as may decide forever the matters now in dispute. You well know, the cause of the discontent with us has ever been, the limits of our country; consider that we have retreated from the plains to the woods, from thence to the mountains; but no limits, established by nature or by compact, have stayed the ambitious, or satisfied your people. It is our determination to adhere to a line fairly agreed on, but such agreement must be by the legislative body of the nation, and not a clandestine bargain, with a few chiefs, that have no manner of right to dispose of any lands; such transactions only regenerate in fraud—always lead to animosities and bloodshed. You well know that no sovereignty was ceded to you at the peace of 1763, except such lands as was purchased by his Majesty's subjects by solemn treaty.

And we are now, as we always have been, an independent and free people; knowing this, and our abilities to maintain our independence, we view with astonishment the steps taken by the United States to rob us of our rights.

We actually see our whole country laid out into districts, without considering us to have any kind of claim or right, which nature has bestowed on us, and of which oppression or prejudice alone can attempt to rob us.

Consider well, now, the business on hand, and let us know your intention as soon as possible. I have given strict orders to our warriors, to commit no hostilities on the other side of the Oconee; and shall expect that you will give out the same to your people; but, should your intentions be dishonest, know that we have still warriors sufficient to stain your land with blood, and that it is our determination to sell our lives with our country.

Peace is best for all men, therefore we desire you will let us know, as soon as possible, at the Cowetas; where all public business will be transacted as soon as may be.

We see that numbers of people wish to get possession of our lands, and are framing plans for that purpose. This we see plainly, by a treaty held with a James Seagrove, at St. Mary's, last November, who called himself agent appointed by Congress; if so, why did he not come into the nation, where matters might have been long settled, and we might have been in peace and friendship? But no, he sent to Timothy Barnard, who made him believe he had great influence in this country. Our chiefs are too well acquainted with that man, Barnard, to adhere to any thing he may say. He cannot, nor any trader dare, give out any talks in our council, nor should it be supposed that we should put any confidence in such men; and am, sir, &c.

GEORGIA, Washington county:

Personally appeared before me, Henry Carrell, and being duly sworn, saith, that, on the evening of the 1st instant, there were two horses stolen from Captain Stokes' volunteer troop, stationed at the Long Bluff. On the second, the captain, with thirteen men, (this deponent being one) crossed the Oconee river, and pursued on the trail of the horses; and, by the appearance of the signs, there were four persons. We came up with them on the bank of the Oakmulgee, and discovered three Indians; fired on them; the fire was returned. Captain Stokes rushed upon them, and took the ground immediately. By the appearance of blood, two were mortally wounded, and one certainly killed in the river. We recovered our own two horses and one other, three rifles, and one smooth bore gun, with sundry other articles, and returned to our station without damage, except hunger and fatigue.

September 22, 1793.

WARRIORS: Your continued depredations upon the property and persons of the settlement where I command, has forced me at last to follow your latest trail up to your own hunting grounds and habitations. I could no longer remain idle and see the people under my care suffer moony losses of property and relations.

WARRIORS: You do love to war with us, at the same time that you deceive our Father at New York with peace talks; and you give your hand up to the elbow to his emissaries, whilst you keep the hatchet lifted over the heads of those of his children who are your neighbors.

WARRIORS: How shall we any longer repose any confidence in your protestations of friendship and peaceful disposition towards us? Whilst a part of your nation have been making treaties of peace with us, the other was ever busy in shedding our blood, on our land.

WARRIORS: Our Father of New York has been very good to you, and, in the time of your need, supplied you with bread, clothing, and tools to work your land; and at the same time you were lurking about our farms, carrying away all you could steal from his children, and afterwards killed and scalped all you could of them.

WARRIORS: I am proud to think you mistake our Father of New York's bounty to you, for the fear of your fighting his children, and that you think the more mischief you do them the more wide his hands will be opened to you.

WARRIORS: Ever since the English war, our Father of New York has kept our hands tied up, to keep us from ever retaliating the many wrongs we suffered from you every spring, and you know no father that will do the same with you on our behalf.

WARRIORS: Our Father of New York, and his children, always pitied, they never were afraid of you. If he choose to loosen the arm of the beloved man and head warrior of Georgia, up to the elbow, we can disturb the peace of your hunting grounds, as you disturb that of our farms; and if he choose to loosen our head warriors's arms up to the shoulders, we can go to your towns and meet you there.

WARRIORS: I am now returning from your town, and you have witnessed from the swamps and cane creeks, where you hid yourselves, the consequence of my visit to you. Your future behavior will determine my conduct towards you henceforward.

WARRIORS: I have taken with me eight of your women and children prisoners; but as they are innocent of your wrongs towards us, and that they are in our power, you may rely on their being treated with the care and attention their ages, sex, and situation, entitle them to, till I deliver them into the hands of the beloved man, once head warrior of Georgia, who, I am sure, will give you, in them, a new lesson of humanity.

Greene county, September 26th, 1793.

I have this day returned from a tour to the Creek nation, have burnt the huts of one town, killed six warriors, the number wounded is uncertain, and took eight prisoners, which I now have at the town of Greensborough.

I now wait the result of your Excellency respecting the prisoners, and request that they may be kept at some interior place, as the prejudices of the people on the frontier may operate materially against them. The want of arms, ammunition, &c. may, (and I believe will) unless soon remedied, be the cause of the frontier in this quarter being evacuated. You will receive the particulars from Brigadier General Jared Irwin.

Extract of a letter from Captain Jonas Fauche, dated September 28th, 1793.

The 7th instant the Indians stole some horses, and shot at the owners as they were following the trail, and killed one of their horses. We started from the Oakmulgee the 17th inst. and the 21st, by 2 o'clock in the morning, we discovered that the trail had led us to a town, covered by a large river, at least 500 yards wide.

We killed but six warriors, and we know nothing about the wounded, as it was not quite light. We took eight women and children prisoners, which were found chiefly in the two houses first taken. We found four scalps in the town house, and the prisoners declare they were taken last summer upon the Oconee and St. Mary's rivers. The prisoners say also, great many warriors are gone to Cumberland; and that one hundred and three of them were in the town when we stormed it.

SAVANNAH, IN GEORGIA, 3d January, 1793.

SIR:

Since I had the honor of writing you on the 12th ultimo, I have made a journey with Major Gaither to fort Telfair, on the Altamaha.

I have the pleasure to inform you, that I found all things peaceable and in good order on that frontier. I met at that place several families of Creek Indians, who were hunting in the neighborhood of that post, and who came there to supply their wants (which appeared great) with bread kind. There not being any to spare at that place, I brought eight of the Indians, with horses, into the settlements, and gave them 750 lbs. of rice, with which they were greatly pleased. Those little attentions to their wants, wherever I meet them, I am convinced will have a good effect.

Every thing in my department, continues equally favorable as when I last wrote. I shall leave this on the 7th instant for St. Mary's, and on the 10th of April I intend setting off from thence for the Creek nation, so as to be in the Cussetahs by the first of May.

ST. MARY'S, 17th March, 1793.

SIR:

Since I had the honor of writing you from Savannah, on the 3d of January last, I have been on this frontier, where every thing in my department appeared in perfect tranquillity, and all my advices from the Creek nation promised a continuance of peace and friendship, until the 11th instant, when I received information from a friendly Indian, of a party of about thirty of the Lower Creeks being on our frontier, near Trader's Hill, on the river St. Mary's, and that, from what he could discover, they were bent on doing mischief. I could scarcely give the least credit to this information, but as it came so direct, and from an Indian who I knew to be friendly, I thought it would be wrong to totally disregard it. I, therefore, called on my neighbors, and in two hours from my receiving the information, I set off with nine gentlemen, volunteers, well mounted. It being then 9 o'clock, on the 12th, we proceeded to Colerain, where we arrived by dawn of day. There we received the truly alarming and melancholy account of the Indians having, on the night of the 11th, broke into the store of Robert Seagrove, and killed Mr. John Fleming, the store-keeper, and Mr. Daniel Moffit, a gentleman who came there on business, and that another man was missing. I proceeded, without a moment's delay, with my small party, to the place where the murder was committed, in hopes of coming up with the murderers, but found that they were fled; having robbed the store of upwards of two thousand pounds sterling in goods. I was preparing to follow them, when the Indian who gave the first information came in, and informed me that he had followed them upwards of thirty miles on their way to the nation; that they were well provided with horses, and travelled with all possible haste. I, therefore, concluded it would not answer any good purpose to follow them, so returned to Colerain, to cover the public stores at that place, not knowing but that other parties might be out. I remained there on the night of the 13th, and on the morning of the 14th received information that a party of Indians had killed some people on the 13th, about six miles from us; I then mustered twenty-three volunteers, and immediately pursued, and within one mile of a place called the Burnt fort, on Great Setilla, found three men and a girl most inhumanly butchered by the savages. We took their trail, and pursued them upwards of forty miles, but could not overtake them. Our horses being much tired, and not having any provisions for two days, we returned on the afternoon of the 15th to where the last mentioned people were killed. I had them buried, and returned to Colerain, which place I am putting in a state of defence. In a few days I hope to have it in such a situation as to ensure it against any attack from savages. As the country is now alarmed, I am in hopes further mischief will be prevented. I have sent this news by express to our Governor, and to Major Gaither, commander of the federal troops in this State. A post established at Colerain, and one at the Burnt fort, on Setilla, with fifty good horsemen to scout between, (it being no more than six miles) would effectually cover the whole country below and between the river St. Mary and Setilla. I hope Major Gaither will find himself at liberty to embody a company of militia horse for this purpose: this new frontier is in a very defenceless situation. The cause of this sudden change in the conduct of the Creeks remains as yet a secret, further than you have been informed. My private despatches of this date to the President of the United States, will throw light on this business. Having received an express from town that a vessel was on the point of sailing to Philadelphia, I left Colerain, and am just arrived here for the purpose of giving the most early intelligence of this affair. Enclosed you have copies of two affidavits concerning the murder at Trader's Hill; in a day or two I shall forward you circumstantial authenticated proofs of the whole. On the 15th an Indian was taken at Trader's Hill by a small party of my people; I have saved his life, though there is little doubt of his being one of the party who did the mischief; but until we know whether or not the nation sanctioned the late outrage, or would give satisfaction, I thought it best to detain him a close prisoner; I, therefore, brought him here, and lodged him in fort St. Tammany. Should any more be taken, I will observe the same by them, as far as in my power. Should there be a war, they will serve to exchange for our people, who may be so unfortunate as to fall into their hands.

I cannot believe that the chiefs of the Creek nation are acquainted with this party being out; and I am in hopes satisfaction will be given by the nation. I shall send an account of this business immediately into the nation, and demand satisfaction on the part of my country. Had the Creek nation determined on a general war, I am confident I should have known it from different quarters, but, all my late advices are to the contrary.

That you may be enabled to judge of the situation of this country, I take the liberty of enclosing you a draught of the same, which will also serve to inform you of the course of the boundary line from the Altamaha to the St. Mary's; when you have examined it, I will be obliged to you to return it, as I have not another.

Robert Brown's Affidavit, (enclosed in the foregoing.)

STATE OF GEORGIA, Camden County:

Personally appeared before us, justices assigned to keep the peace of said county, Robert Brown, an inhabitant of Great Seilla, who, being duly sworn, deposed and saith, that he, the said Robert Brown, went in company with Daniel Moffit, on Sunday, the tenth of this instant, to the house of James Allen, on the river St. Mary's, between Colerain and Trader's Hill; on the next morning went to Mr. Gascoin's store, about one mile above said Allen's, having then in company, John Galphin and James Allen. On their arrival at Mr. Gascoin's, they met an Indian well known in this country, called Paddy Donnelly; that this Indian informed them that he had fallen in the day before with three Indians, who belonged to a camp of Creek Indians then within a few miles, who he said were painted for war, and bent on doing mischief on this frontier; and the said Indians said, that it was war all over, and that parties of Creeks were out to do mischief on the Oconee. They also said, that they should have killed a Mr. Tillet and all his family, who lived at a place of James Allen's, about four miles from Trader's Hill, but were prevented by a Lackaway Indian, then encamped near said Tillet's; this was on Sunday the 10th: That, being desirous of knowing more of this information, he, the said Brown, together with James Allen, John Galphin, and said Moffit, went to the store of Robert Seagrove, at Trader's Hill, where they met three of the identical Indians mentioned by Paddy Donnelly: That John Galphin endeavored to draw them into conversation, and to discover their intentions, but they refused, and would not know him, saying he was dressed as a white man, and that the red people were all at war with the whites; Galphin expressed a desire of going to their camp, and was attended by one of the said Indians, this deponent, James Allen, and Daniel Moffit, to the neighborhood of said camp: That Galphin and Allen went into the camp, where they remained about two hours, and then returned to where this deponent and Moffit were, having with them about ten Indians, all of whom were armed and on horseback, except one: That the whole party then proceeded together to the store of Robert Seagrove, at Trader's Hill, where Mr. John Fleming inquired the news; when Mr. Galphin answered, that matters were much better than they had heard when going up, on which Mr. Fleming asked them in to take a drink; at which instant, three Indians belonging to the party who rode in company, stepped also into the store, offering for sale three or four deer skins, which Mr. Fleming bought, and was paying the Indians for, all appearing in perfect good temper and pleased, when a gun was fired by one of the said party of Creek Indians from outside of the door, which killed the before mentioned Daniel Moffit, who was standing by the counter in said store, and within a few feet of this deponent: That John Galphin, who was then in the store, ran out and endeavored to prevent further mischief; that this deponent also went out and saw Galphin run after the Indian who fired the gun; that this deponent returned into the store, and found the before-mentioned Daniel Moffit lying on the floor dead, from the wound received from the shot fired. At this time, all the Indians pressed to enter into the store, on which this deponent rushed out of the store, and fled into some bushes about fifty yards from said store, where he could distinctly hear the Indians murdering the beforementioned John Fleming: That at this juncture, all the Indians raised the war-whoop or yell: That from the time of killing Mr. Moffit until the Indians went away, this deponent thinks it was three hours, it being the dusk of Monday evening when it begun: That this deponent remained concealed until all was quiet, and the Indians gone off; when he approached towards the store, and heard two children crying in a room adjoining the store, which children belonged to Mrs. Ann Gray, whom the Indians beat and abused, as this deponent could distinctly hear while he lay in the bushes: That this deponent understood from Mr. Galphin and Mr. Allen, that all this party belonged to the town where a James Burges, an Indian trader lives, on Flint river, in the Lower Creeks, and that a brother-in-law and son of Burges, was of the party: That this deponent swam the river St. Mary's, and went to the house of a Mr. Fitch, in Florida, about two miles, and informed of all that had passed, and got Fitch to go to said store, to see how matters then were: That the Indians took off this deponent's horse, together with several others from the store; and further this deponent saith not.

ROBERT BROWN.

Ann Gray's Deposition.

STATE OF GEORGIA, Camden County:

Personally appeared before me, one of the justices assigned to keep the peace of said county, Ann Gray, and being duly sworn, saith, that, on the eleventh instant, (March) that she, the said Ann Gray, being at the store of Robert Seagrove, in the care of John Fleming, at Trader's Hill, on St. Mary's river, between sunset and dark, there came a certain James Upton and John Galphin, to said store; that, after some time, there came four Indians, three of whom had some skins to sell, and the said Fleming chalked out the price of them, and the said Indians seemed well satisfied; that two of them received their payment, and the other said he would have his on the next day: That as the said Fleming was getting a bottle of rum, for a certain James Allen, there was a gun fired at the door of the store; that she, the said Ann Gray, heard a certain Daniel Moffit say, he was a dead man, and went and lay down, and the said John Fleming asked what it did mean, and called for John Galphin; that Galphin was not to be found; there were two Indians then in the store, which the said Fleming asked to stay in the store; that they were his friends, and that they were all his friends, and endeavored to prevail with them not to go out; that the said Fleming endeavored to shut the door, but there came so many against it, that he could not, and that she, the said Ann Gray, saw a number of Indians lay hold of the said Fleming, and threw him on the floor, and some of the Indians took hold of her and forced her out of the door; and that she, the said Ann Gray, heard the said John Fleming cry out, the Lord have mercy on me, and could hear him speak no more: That the Indians did beat, abuse, and tie her, the said Ann Gray, and she saw them robbing the store and carrying off the goods; and further, this deponent saith not.

ANN GRAY, her + mark.

Sworn before me, this 14th day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

TUCKAUBATCHEES, UPPER CREEKS, January 6, 1798.

FRIEND AND FATHER:

I am a son of a white man, Joseph Cornell, interpreter for the United States. I have brought in a scalp from Cumberland, but the blame ought not, in justice, to be laid on me, as I was urged to do it by Captain Olivar, (the Spanish Agent in the nation) and even by the Governor of Pensacola himself. In future will not molest the whites, as we have heard your talks, and like them very well. As you are coming yourself to treat with us, the Upper Creeks, we shall be glad to see you as a friend and father, and may be assured that yourself and property shall be safe. I am a younger brother of Ab. Cornell, shall take his advice.

Addressed to JAMES SEAGROVE, Esq.

DAVID CORNELL.

We solemnly declare that the above was written at the request of David Cornell, and delivered us by a Linguister.

JOHN GALPHIN,
JAMES M. HOLMES.*Letter from James Seagrove to the Chiefs and Head-men of the Cussetah and Coweta towns, dated*ST. MARY'S, 20th February, 1798.

BROTHERS:

It gave me great pleasure to hear, by letters from Mr. Barnard and Mr. Holmes, that most of your people, who had been with me at St. Marys' had got safe home, and that all matters were going on well in your towns. This I write principally to inform you that I shall be with you by the first of May, and that the talks, from our great Father, General Washington, President of the United States, is straight and good towards you, and all your country. It is his desire, as well as mine, that you will not listen to any bad talks which may be offered you from the Northward Indians or Chickamagas, as they will, most undoubtedly, lead you astray. Those Northern tribes of Indians, who have been at war with us, finding a great many ready to go against them as soon as the snow is off the ground, have sent chiefs from their towns to the President in Philadelphia to beg for peace; they are now there, and I think it probable that the great goodness of our beloved Father will spare those wretched bad people, though their crimes deserve severe punishment. I am told there is some of them come among you of late, endeavoring to lead you into trouble; but I do not mind these things, as I am persuaded my Creek friends have too much sense, and regard for themselves and country, to be made fools of by such bad people. You cannot have forgot what I have told you on this head and many others. I pray that you will recollect your promises, not to take any part with those, or any other people, against the United States. Drive from your land all those who wish you to go to a war. As to those Shawanese, who, I am told, are now among you, showing scalps of our people, I think, as your regard for General Washington, that you ought to make prisoners of those men, and bring them to me, and I shall send them to Philadelphia, that their chiefs, who are now there asking for peace, may see them, and make them ashamed of their bad doings. For each of those Shawanese, that are brought prisoners to me at this place, I will give a horse load of valuable goods; by this means you will be rid of all such applications in future, which will be a great relief to you. Mr. Barnard has my orders to wait on you with this and to explain it, as well as to tell you several other matters, to which I must request your particular attention. When I meet you, and the other chiefs of the nation, in the Cussetahs, in May, I have not a doubt every matter will be settled to your wish.

You will present my love to all your people, and tell them that I am, and ever shall be, their real friend.

*James Seagrove to David Cornell, dated*ST. MARY'S, 20th February, 1798.

MY CHILD:

I have received your talk, by Mr. Galphin, which gives me pleasure; as by it I find, that though you have been guilty of bad actions, owing to the wicked and villanous advice of white men, who, no doubt, will be made to suffer for such doings, yet there is a strong hope of your having seen your error, and will never do so any more. I know your father, and have a great regard for him; he always was a friend to the United States, which is his country, and I hope his country will do so too.

Be assured, from me, that I do not blame you for any thing you have done, but I do blame the bad whites who advised you to do so. Follow the advice of your cousin Alexander in all things, and you will find me your good friend. I shall expect you will come down to the Cussetahs, and see me; I expect to be there by the first of May. Whilst you act a friendly part towards the United States, you will be respected and rewarded by them. Give your countrymen good advice, and prevent them listening to bad talks. You will receive this as from a real and good friend to you, and all your family.

BROTHER:

I have just received your talk, sent by John Galphin, and am much pleased to find that your people take my talks as they are really intended, and dictated from the purest friendship for them and their country. Exert yourself, my friend, all in your power, to prevent your people taking any talks from the Shawanese, or any of the Northern Indians. Those who are now in your land ought to be severely punished for daring to come among you to engage you in a war against the United States, when, at the moment, the chiefs of all the tribes, that have been at war with us, are begging Congress for peace, and Indian commissioners are now at Philadelphia, with General Washington, in hopes of getting a peace, which, it is probable, they will have granted them, though it is more than they deserve. But now, that they see a great army ready to destroy them and their country, they are glad to ask for peace. Those fellows that are among you, giving out bad talks from the Northern Indians, ought to be taken up, and sent prisoners to me, unless your people choose to punish them. I will give a horse-load of goods for each of them that is brought to me, or half as much for their scalp. This I wish you to communicate to such of your chiefs and others which you see fit; and I rely on your activity and zeal in this business. If you, and a few of your friends, could accomplish this business, your fortune is made without doubt. I am sorry to hear that your nation is like to be involved in a war with the Chickasaws. But they cannot hurt the Creeks; keep in peace and friendship with us, and we will support you at all events. I hope you have seen the White Lieutenant and the Mad Dog, and given them my talks. Tell them I expect they will conform to my wishes, and that of our great Father, General Washington, which is to be in peace, love, and friendship, with the United States, to the end of time. I am sorry to hear that your family have been unwell; I hope they all recovered before this, and that every thing goes on well in your land. I shall be in the Cussetahs by the first of May, when you must meet me there; we shall talk over all matters, and, I have not a doubt, to put every thing on an agreeable footing for our country. Wishing you all possible happiness and success, I remain yours, &c.

I received a talk from David Cornell; I now send him an answer. Do, my friend, give David good advice; he is wild.

James Seagrove to Fine Bones, Chief of the Broken Arrow, dated

ST. MARY'S, 20th February, 1793.

BROTHER:

Your talk of the 11th of last Moon, was brought me by John Galphin, and I receive it kindly, and return you my warm thanks; and, at the same time, assure you that it is the sincere wish of my country and myself to keep the path between your country and the United States, white, bright, open, and clear, to the end of time; you, and every other wise man in your country must be sensible that your happiness, in a great degree, depends on having the United States your good and firm friends, and such, I do declare to you, they are, and having nothing more at heart than to contribute in making you a happy people. My talks to my Creek brothers have been always straight, and they have found them so; such they shall continue as long as I have to do with them. I shall meet you all in the Cussetah town, by the first of May, when you will hear my talks, and, I have not a doubt, but they will like them, as they are honest and friendly.

Do not, my friend, suffer your countrymen to be deceived by those Northern Indians who come among them, and endeavoring to get you to join them. They are your great enemies, and will ruin you if you are so unwise as to listen to their talks. The whole of the chiefs of the Northern tribes, who have been lately at war with the United States, are now begging for peace, and have sent commissioners to Congress for that purpose. I have heard that seven Shawanese are now in your towns, who have brought in white scalps. This, my brother, you must allow, is very wrong. Such people should not be allowed to come into your land, as you are in friendship and alliance with the nation whose people they are killing; besides, the chiefs of the very towns that those fellows belong to, are begging my country for peace, whilst those villains are murdering our people. I hope you, and every good Creek, will think seriously, and drive those wretches away, or punish them, for their daring to involve you in trouble. If they have brought a war on themselves, let them go through with it. You have no concern in the business, and I hope you will all have wisdom and virtue to treat them as they deserve.

I am sorry I had not the pleasure of seeing you, with the rest of your people, at St. Mary's, in November last. I had a talk wrote to send your nephew, but the hurry I was in when the chiefs left me, prevented its being sent. I now send him a talk. It is my wish that you, and all the chiefs of your nation, use every means in your power to preserve your country in peace with every body; that is the way to be happy and great. But should, contrary to your good intentions, any power oblige you to a war, I will, when I meet you, advise and direct you in such way as will be for your good, so far as in my power. This I send to Mr. Barnard, who will explain it to you, and to whose talks I hope you will pay attention. I have no opportunity of sending you and your nephew some presents; but if you will send down two horses, I will send you and him a handsome present. In the mean time, I have sent you a pair of elegant arm-bands, which came from our Great Father, General Washington, which please accept, and wear for his sake. I will be to you, and your country, as my good old countryman, John Galphin, was, your real friend.

I am, &amp;c.

James Seagrove to the leader of the Cowetas, dated

ST. MARY'S, 20th February, 1793.

BROTHER:

It always gives me pleasure to see or hear from my Creek friends. Your kind talk, which I received from Mr. John Galphin, made me very happy, as it will our great and kind father General Washington, President of the United States, when he hears of the peaceable, wise conduct of his Creek children. I am very glad to hear that the talks from the Upper towns continue good. I hope my friends in the mother towns, the Cowetas and Cussetahs, will always be foremost in good doing. Do not, my friend, suffer your people to be imposed on by bad talks, from red or white people. Follow what I have already told your chiefs, and you will do well. I shall be in the Cussetahs the first of May, when I shall renew my talks to you, which shall always be straight, clear, just, and friendly, to your nation. I am told there are some of the Northern Indians among you, giving bad talks; do not, on any account, as you value your happiness, listen to them, but drive them from your land. They behave like bad people, and involve themselves in a war, and now want to bring the same on you. The chiefs of all the Northern tribes, seeing the great army that is prepared and ready to go against them in the spring, are now begging for peace. I think it is probable that our great father, the President of the United States, will have pity on them, and not destroy them, although they have been very bad, and deserved to be severely punished. But he is kind and merciful. Do not suffer those bad Northern Indians to give out talks in your land, as it may poison the minds of some of your young foolish people. Continue, my friend, to give your people good talks, and keep them straight, until I meet you. Mr. Barnard will deliver you this; and I must request, that you and your people will assist and befriend him and Mr. Holmes, and pay attention to what they will tell you.

ST. MARY'S, February 20, 1793.

BROTHER:

A few days past I received a talk from you, through the medium of Mr. Townsend, and Mr. Timothy Barnard. I find, by this talk, that you had not then received my letter by Alexander Cornell, with the present of silver ware which I sent you by him. Your being from home when he arrived, must have been the cause. I was very sorry that you was not with us at the treaty on St. Mary's, as there is not a chief in the Creek nation I have a greater regard for, than yourself. I am led to this favorable opinion of your character from the voice of all who have known you, but, in particular, am induced thereto, from the great regard our great and good father, General Washington, President of the United States, has for you. He considers you as one of his best friends in the Creek land, and, as such, recommends you to me. I fully intended that you should have been at our meetings; and it was my express orders that you should be one of the very first chiefs invited. How it was omitted I am at a loss to account, but I hope you will take it for granted that it was not intended.

I doubt not but you have heard before this, the talks which I gave the chiefs of your nation on this river, in November last. I hope you find them such as to give you satisfaction, and that you will receive them, and hold them fast. Our friend, Mr. Barnard, had my orders to explain all my talks to you; and I hope you will receive them from him as from me. By Mr. Fowler, and Mr. Reilly, your horses are arrived; and when Mr. Fowler returns, I shall send them back with a handsome present to you, such a one as will leave no room to complain.

I have the pleasure to tell you, that all is peace and friendship in this country towards yours, and that it will continue so, as long as your people choose; and that it is the ardent desire of the President of the United States, that you should be a happy, free people; that he will, by every means in his power, make your situations more comfortable, and protect and support you, as long as you act well by him and his people.

I am really sorry to find that my Creek friends should continue to allow a set of villains of the Northern tribes to come into their land, and give out talks, which, if attended to, cannot fail to bring ruin on your nation. I know those people are endeavoring to get you to join them against the United States; but I hope you and your nation have too much sense to be led into such a scrape by them. I will just inform you of the situation those Northern tribes, who have been at war with us, are in, and then you shall judge, whether it would not be madness in the Creeks to have any thing to say to them.

Those tribes have been carrying on a kind of war for some years. General Washington always wished them to be brought back to their duty by lenity and kindness, and not to destroy them; for which reason, he would not send a large army among them, and, by this means, they have had an opportunity to kill a number of his people, and do a great deal of mischief. Last year he sent three commissioners, offering them peace and good treatment; but, like bad men, they murdered his commissioners. This angered him much, and he ordered a very great army of choice warriors to go against them. This army is now ready, and will march into their towns as soon as the snow is gone, and lay all in ashes before them, unless peace should be made this winter. Those tribes, finding the President determined to punish them, are now begging, in the most humble manner, for peace, and have actually sent chiefs from all the tribes, to the President and Congress, now at Philadelphia, for that purpose. Therefore, every Creek Indian who will give himself time to think but for a moment, must plainly see the design of those people is to involve you in a war, which they brought on themselves without your consent, and which they are not able to support. They are like a man a drowning, who will take hold of any bush, or even his brother, or best friend, and drown them to save himself. Open your eyes, my friends, and do not be made fools of by those bad people. Drive them from your land, or punish them as they deserve, for endeavoring to mislead you. If your nation do not choose to punish those who are now among you giving out bad talk, let them be brought prisoners to me, at this place, and I will send them on to Philadelphia, to let their chiefs that are now there see them, and make them ashamed of themselves. I will give, for each of them that is brought a prisoner to me, a horse-load of good and valuable goods.

I have to request, that, as you regard the peace and happiness of your country, you use your utmost endeavors to prevent your people taking bad talks, from either red or white people, until I meet you and them by the first of May in the Cussetahs, when I shall put every thing straight and clear for you. I should come sooner, but the path is very bad, and no feed for my horses.

I am, yours, &c.

James Seagrove to James Holmes, acting as an assistant among the Creeks.

ST. MARY'S, 24th February, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

With pleasure I received your letters of the 27th and 30th of January last, from Flint river. I attend to what you say, respecting sanctioning certain measures; I am, by no means, at liberty to do so at this moment; however, I view it in the same light as you, and think it justifiable on every principle. Should our red friends think it necessary, I must not oppose their will in what relates to their own affairs.

Galphin gave us a great alarm on his arrival here. He asserted to me, as an absolute fact, that the Creeks had broke up all the Spanish settlements on the Tensa and Bigby rivers, and made an attack on the fort at Mobile; that he was in the attack, as also yourself; that he was wounded in the thigh; that the Indians were repulsed with the loss of twenty-two men; that the Spaniards lost about seventeen men; about seventy negroes brought off by your party, with a large sum in dollars, with many more such improbable tales.

He also assured me, that a considerable body of Indians were on the head of Setilla, on their way to strike a blow on St. Johns, and only waited to get some necessary supplies from me. I knew this youth too well to put much faith in what he said, but he told me all so plausibly, that I must confess I was much staggered thereby. I concluded that, as you or Mr. Barnard had not taken the least notice of a matter of so much moment, that it must have originated in this bad young man's fruitful, inventive genius. On his arrival in town, Mr. Fowler confirmed its being a notorious falsehood. It is scarcely possible to describe the extreme irregular conduct of Mr. Galphin since he has been here; his attempt to impose on me I shall not readily forgive. I wish, from my soul, we could get clear of him; he is a very dangerous person from his falsehoods; but I hope the Indians know him so well as not to mind what he says; and I must request, if he should attempt to say any thing in the nation, that Mr. Barnard and yourself will counteract and expose his villany. It was, and still is, my wish to serve him, but he is incorrigible. As soon as Fowler came to town he cleared out, and, I believe, he is now at Colerain.

It is not a little surprising, that after all the chiefs promised me, that they should suffer these Northern rascals to come among them, and with scalps of our people. Should this be allowed by the Creeks, we must conclude them concerned in the business with the Shawanese, and others, who are our enemies. You will observe, by the talks to different chiefs that accompany this, that I have endeavored to work a change; and I must request that you and Mr. Barnard will, by every means in your power, enforce those ideas among them, and work them up to destroy those Shawanese villains; or, if not, to drive them off, or bring them prisoners to me; either of which plans being effected, would effectually sever the Creeks from those hostile tribes.

There is every appearance of a peace with those Northern Indians, which, I must confess, I am sorry for. My opinion is, that they ought first to have been thrashed on their own account, and also by way of example to others. There are commissioners now met on the business of peace, and the savages seem earnest in the business. The great preparations for a vigorous campaign in the summer, has alarmed them exceedingly. This convinces me that those fellows that are now in the Creeks, are there without authority; and, if so, are the proper subjects for the Creeks' resentment. I conceive it altogether useless in me, at this time, to dictate to you, or Mr. Barnard, what to say to the chiefs. I have only to entreat, that you will leave no stone unturned to upset these Indians' purposes, as also that of the Dons. It will be impossible for me to be with you before the first of May, but I hope no bad will arise from my not being on the spot. I send the bearer, Mordecai Light, for sake of despatch: by his return, I hope to hear fully from you, and have agreeable accounts.

James Seagrove to Timothy Barnard, dated

ST. MARY'S, 24th February, 1798.

DEAR BARNARD:

I have before me your three letters, of the 20th, 27th, and 30th ultimo. The contents of each has my particular attention. I am really sorry, and it is truly unfortunate, that your indisposition had, until then, deprived our country of your very necessary presence in the towns, in order to explain and assist in directing matters aright, as well as to counteract the machinations of the ill-disposed towards us. I hope and trust that the greatest, if not all your time, since writing, has been employed in that way, and that I shortly shall hear, that you have been able to upset the plan of the Northward Indians. You must see the necessity of counteracting the plans of those Indians, and prevent the Creeks being led into a scrape by them for this purpose. You must attend all meetings, and call meetings of your own, and speak in forcible terms to the chiefs of the consequence of their listening to those people; and that, if they do, I shall have a bad opinion of them, after their promises to me not to have any thing to do with them or the Spaniards. Herewith, you have talks from me to different chiefs, which you will peruse, deliver, and explain, as well as enforce the objects of those talks home to those people, by all the address in your power. I cannot think there is the least danger of the Creeks, as a nation, joining those people; but what I dread is, that a part of the young disorderly of them may. It therefore behooves us to use our influence to prevent them. You will see what I have wrote the White Lieutenant and Fine Bones; and I shall fulfil my promise. I wish you to send the one to Jack Kinnard, and have him up with you in the towns. You will acquaint the chiefs that I cannot be with them, before the first of May. You may give them as a reason, badness of the roads, want of grass at this season, and the like. But the true cause is, that I wait for full instructions from the President, which I do not expect sooner than the 10th April. You will see, by my letter to Mr. Holmes, the rascally part Galphin has been acting, since he has been here: Mordecai will tell you further. You will prevent his lies taking bad effect in the nation. There is no such thing as bearing with him. As to the Shawanese that are in the nation, you must, by every means possible, stir up the Creeks against them. You must see the good consequence that would result from setting them at variance, and at any rate stopping them from coming into the Creek land. I have to desire, in the most express and positive terms, that you do not yourself, or suffer any other person to, give out talks from any person or persons in any of the States, Governors, or others, without my previous knowledge of them. I am told there has been some of late from the Governor of Georgia to the Creeks, which I hold as a very improper act. Be active and resolute, my friend, in our country's cause: much depends on us.

James Seagrove to John Kinnard, dated

ST. MARY'S, 24th February, 1793.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I wrote you a letter, about three weeks past, which I hope you have received. I then told you all our talks in the United States continued straight and friendly to your country, which I now again confirm. I hope this will meet your people all well, and pursuing such plans as will make them happy. This I send by the way of our friend, Mr. Timothy Barnard, and have desired him to send it immediately to you, and request that you will come up to him, and go with him into the towns on some business of much consequence; which he will make known to you when you see him. I now entreat, my friend, that you do not let any thing stop your seeing Mr. Barnard, as soon as possible, and that you will give him all the assistance in your power, and which our Great Father, General Washington, expects of you as his good friend in the Creek land. About 300 Indians from the Seminoles, Lachaways, and other of the Southern people, have been with me since you went home. They have all returned well pleased.

James Seagrove to the Secretary of War, dated

ST. MARY'S, 19th April, 1793.

SIR:

My last letters to you were under date of the 17th and 21st ultimo: since then, we have continued, and are yet in a state of suspense as to what will be the determination of the Creek nation, when they hear of the depredations committed by some of their people on this frontier, in the last month, and also to my demand of having satisfaction for the murders and property carried off.

By the papers now enclosed, you will be informed of my communications to and from the nation since I last wrote you. Matters in the nation were getting in a favorable way, when this unfortunate affair took place. The whole of the upper towns were unanimous in rejecting all overtures of the agents of the Northern tribes to join them; and only a part of three of the Lower towns befriended them. My talks were attended to, so far as to have a general order of the nation for those agents (nine in number) to depart the Creek land in five days. You will observe that I was requested to be with the chiefs in the nation by the 22d instant, which would have been the case, as I had every thing ready to have set off on the 10th of this month, which I declined on the late outrage taking place, and until I could hear the determination of the nation on the same. Kinnard has acted wonders in the affairs of the North tribes. He has not ceased, since he went from this, in riding himself, and sending talks, to all the towns, in our favor. The White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees, and Mad Dog of the Tuckabatchees, are firm friends to the United States.

Alexander McGillivray died at Pensacola on the 17th of February last, and, from what I can learn, has mentioned Panton as his successor, to direct the affairs of the Creek nation. Should Panton be received by the nation as such, the United States can have no hope of peace with the Creeks.

From a full conviction of this, in my own mind, as well as from unquestionable proofs of the perfidious conduct of the Spanish Governors of the Floridas, and those acting under them in the Creek nation, there appears a necessity that steps should be taken, that those bloody-minded agents should fall into the pit which they have dug for the servants and friends of the Union. In my opinion, it would have been well if I had found myself, long since, at liberty to have retaliated, which has been much in my power. Self preservation renders it indispensable. The conduct of the Spaniards of late is so barefaced, that the lenity or forbearance of our country towards them, is considered by the Indians, as well as white people, as proceeding from a want of power to check such doings. The consequences of such opinions are very unfavorable to our interest.

You will observe that some of the Lower towns have become acquainted with the murders and robberies on this frontier and the Altamaha, by the return of the parties to their towns. You have, herewith, a copy of a letter received from six of the identical villains who perpetrated the crimes six miles from Colerain, and also on the Altamaha. Kinnard, on hearing of their return, sent to the chiefs of the towns whose people committed the violence, and talked very severely to them. He told them, in presence of four white men, who I can depend on, (and who came here along with my despatches) that, unless they gave immediate satisfaction for the murders and robberies, (and which he told them would be demanded) that they had nothing to expect but war and total ruin to their country.

The party that did the mischief at Trader's Hill, were from a town on the lower part of Flint river, and who were doubtless set on by Panton, and one Burges. Mr. Kinnard, the instant he heard of the affair, sent a runner with a letter to Burges, informing him that, if he did not immediately have the goods collected, and sent back, he (Kinnard) would come and take all his property, and his life, as a part atonement for that of Mr. Fleming, killed at Trader's Hill. An answer was not received when my express came away, which was the next day.

I fear that my demand, for delivering up to me an equal number of those who advised or executed the late murders, for those that were killed of our people, in order to their being punished agreeable to our laws, may appear to some to be harsh, arbitrary, or abrupt. But I am persuaded it is in conformity to the opinion and wish of a very large majority of our countrymen, and I am happy in finding myself supported therein by the treaty formed at New York with the Creek nation, and which is a supreme law of this land. I hope you will think with me, on this occasion, that, for the United States to relax an atom on this occasion, of having life for life, and full satisfaction for the property taken away and destroyed, will be at once relinquishing every idea or possibility of living in peace with those people. For, if we do not insist, and have examples made in the present instance, we shall have similar outrages daily repeated, in defiance of all treaties or engagements that can be formed, as those wretched people and their abettors will attribute all to pusillanimity in the Virginians, as the Americans are generally termed by the Creeks.

I am not without great hope, that my demand will be complied with. All the men of consequence, among the chiefs, are for being in peace with the United States; and several of the towns are determined, at all events, to be so. Should they refuse justice, their internal divisions will tend much to their speedy reduction. They are in no state at present to encourage a war with the United States. The Chickasaws and Creeks are actually at war with each other; and the Choctaws have, or are on the point of joining the Chickasaws. Their being nearly destitute of provisions, is another reason, to which may be added, a full conviction in the minds of many of their chiefs, that, if they quarrel with the Americans, they will lose their country.

They have ammunition and arms in plenty. The Spaniards give every man of them as much of those articles as they require. They have been lately drawing supplies in this way from Augustine, Pensacola, and St. Marks.

The Spaniards are busy in endeavors to patch up a peace between the Creeks and Chickasaws. For this purpose a number of the chiefs of both nations are invited to Pensacola, but whether they will go or not is uncertain.

Since the injury done on the 11th and 13th March, nothing further hath taken place on this frontier; owing, chiefly, (I have reason to think) to the precautions I immediately took of putting Colerain in a state of defence, and collecting a body of about fifty horsemen, which have done constant duty.

The Indians have almost constantly been over on the Florida side, but seeing we were prepared, and on our guard, have not yet ventured to interrupt us. But as this company are militia, and on no certain footing, I fear we shall lose them. One hundred and fifty, or two hundred continental troops, fifty of them horse, would be a seasonable relief to us. Without assistance, we cannot hold this valuable frontier. We want about one hundred stand of good muskets, with bayonets; one half, nearly of our little force being at this time without arms.

On the 17th instant, a party of Indians appeared in Florida, within five miles of Colerain; they killed cattle, stole horses and other property, took off eight negroes, robbed several houses, and burnt one, fired at some men, tied and carried off one man, who since made his escape, and says that those Indians were from Burges' town, and some who did the mischief at Trader's hill. They at the same time declaring friendship to the Spaniards, and that their intention was against Colerain and this town, as well as the Americans in general; John Galphin was with them, and very conspicuous in declarations of enmity to this country. I have offered a reward for him, and am not without hope of laying hands on him.

The Spanish settlers seem more alarmed than we are. When Robert Seagrove's store, at Trader's Hill, was robbed, all the books of Indian accounts were carried off; which, I think, cannot fail to strengthen the belief, that Panton and the Spaniards wanted to discover the nature as well as the amount of business done there, in addition to their breaking up the store.

As my letters giving you an account of the late unfortunate business in this country, must have reached you long ere this, I am in daily hopes of receiving instructions from you. You will be informed, by a copy of Mr. Barnard's letter, now enclosed, of the very irregular conduct of the settlers on the northwest frontier of Georgia; it will ever be the case.

I have given Governor Telfair regular advice, ever since the unfortunate event of Trader's Hill; but have not been favored with a line from him or Major Gaither, since then.

You will see, herewith, a copy of a circular letter, which I sent to the commanding officers of the militia of every county in the State. Being much in need of your advice and direction, in the present conjuncture of affairs, I am very anxious to hear from you.

James Seagrove to the Chiefs, Head Men, and Warriors, of the whole Creek nation, singly as well as collectively.

ST. MARY'S, 28th March, 1795.

BROTHERS:

From the solemn assurance given me, by a large majority of the chiefs of your nation, on many recent occasions, but more particularly at our conference on this river, in November last, that you would, at all events, preserve peace with the United States, and on no account join with any people, whatever, that were unfriendly to them, I was led to believe your declarations just, and, as such, communicated them to my country, who was pleased to think that your nation were acting with justice and wisdom. But, alas, of how short duration was this pleasing prospect. Scarcely had all those of your people who had been with me at the conference, returned to their homes, when the most wanton, unprovoked murder and robbery was committed on this frontier by a body of Creek Indians, on the peaceful, honest, unoffending inhabitants of the United States.

Duty to my country, as well as regard to your future peace, obliges me now, to make known to you, as heads and rulers of the Creek nation, that, on the night of the eleventh of this month, a party of the Creek Indians, in number from twenty-five to thirty, entered the store of Robert Seagrove, at Trader's Hill, on this river, and then and there murdered Mr. John Fleming, the store-keeper, and Mr. Daniel Moffit, scalped and tomahawked them, beat and abused others, then robbed the store of every thing therein, to upwards of ten thousand dollars, which they took off with them to your nation. Next day, three men and a girl were killed within fifty miles of Colerain, by a party of your people. These last that were killed, were inoffensive travellers, coming to settle in this country, and of course, could not have offended. The bodies of those unhappy victims to wanton barbarity I beheld with horror, and could scarcely allow myself to think it possible, that men belonging to a nation whom I had been feeding, clothing, and loading with every mark of my country's kindness to them, could be guilty of such villany. Indeed, I cannot yet believe, the nation were acquainted with it. I pray God this may have been the case, and that they will give immediate satisfaction for so daring an outrage, by delivering up to me the whole of those concerned in the before mentioned murder and robbery, which, alone, can appease the just resentment of the United States.

BROTHERS: What I have here stated to you are truths, and the same is supported by testimony on oath, sent herewith. It therefore admits not of a moment's delay, with honest men, the part they ought to take. If you have a wish that your land should not be deluged with blood, and that you should possess the same, and live in it in peace, you will, on receiving this, call together the chiefs of your land, and take immediate measures for delivering to me those murderers and plunderers, that they may be punished agreeable to our laws. The outrage is so enormous and unprovoked, as not to admit delay on your parts. Vengeance will be showered on your nation, if justice is not immediately done. Attend to what I say. It is my love for you, and a belief that you were ignorant of the late perfidious act of your people, that gives you this opportunity of yet living in peace with my country. You never found me to tell you an untruth, and be assured, that, what I now tell will come to pass, and that is, that inevitable ruin awaits your whole land, if you do not comply with my demand of giving up the villains who committed the late murders.

Do not suffer yourselves to be longer deceived, or suppose that the United States will stop short of doing ample justice to their citizens, and punish, in the most exemplary manner, offenders against their Government. But peace and friendship is their wish towards your whole nation, as long as your conduct as honest men justifies it. What could have driven your people to act as they have done, is what I cannot account for. Every body in this land were in perfect peace and friendship with your people, and at the moment those murders were committed, near fifty families of your town were at Colerain, receiving supplies of provisions from the public stores of the United States, which had already been the means of saving several hundred of them from perishing by famine. Shameful ingratitude to so generous a benefactor as you have found the President of the United States! If there is a spark of manly virtue left in your nation, you must shudder at the recollection, and dread how much the world must despise a people capable of such perfidy. I have reason to think, that you will find that base, ungrateful man, John Galphin, a principal in this business; if so, he deserves no mercy. The Indians who composed the party that robbed and murdered at Trader's hill, were from the town where Burges lives; Burges' son, and brother-in-law, were leaders of the party, so that you cannot be at a loss to discover the rest; and I hope you have so great a respect to the honor of your country, and your own characters as honest men, that you will attend to this business without delay, and give me such answer as to confirm me in the opinion of your being honest men and desirous of peace.

Three of your people have fallen into our hands since the time of the murders, but I would not suffer them to be hurt. One of them was frightened and fled; the other two I return safe with this, which serves to prove that we do not wish to hurt any that has the appearance of being innocent.

I shall expect a full and satisfactory answer from you in twenty-five days from this time; any person you send with letters to me, will be safe, and treated well, and return when they please.

With a hope that the path between us may ever be kept bright, and that our friendship may continue strong whilst the sun shines, is the desire and fervent wish of your real friend.

[CIRCULAR.]

St. MARY'S, 28th March, 1793.

BROTHER:

Little did I expect to have to address you and the other chiefs of your nation on so disagreeable a business as the enclosed will fully explain to you. It is of so alarming and serious a nature, as to call your attention to an immediate inquiry into the cause, as well as to take speedy measures to give satisfaction for so unprovoked and wanton an outrage on the peace of the United States, and your nation.

I have great consolation in thinking that the Creek nation were unacquainted with the wicked affair, and that their resentment will be raised against those villains, who, to gratify their private views, have committed murder and robbery, the consequence of which, if not speedily redressed, cannot fail to involve your country in a bloody and ruinous war.

I cannot doubt, that you, and every good man in your land, must feel the insult offered to you all, by the planners and perpetrators of the late murders. The chiefs, and others of the nation, had scarcely returned home from treating with me on this river, and where they pledged their nation and selves, in the most solemn manner, to preserve peace, and live like friends and brothers with the United States, until this horrid, unprovoked outrage, was committed. Such doings, my friends, cannot be overlooked by a powerful and spirited nation, such as the United States. As to the unaccountable conduct of your people, in this instance, I shall avoid any reflection or comment thereon, and submit it to your own feelings and understanding.

The President of the United States, as well as myself, having always considered you as one of our best friends in the Creek nation, and one who had the good of both countries at heart, from these reasons you are now called on by me, in behalf of my country, to use your utmost influence and exertions in procuring peace, which I fear cannot be done, unless examples are made of those who have murdered and robbed our citizens, and destroyed the peace of our land and yours.

I have sent a general talk into the nation, which I hope will be attended to by you and every friend to peace, and that you will give it your support.

I should have sent sooner, but could not find an opportunity. Having great confidence in your exertions in favor of justice and peace, I shall not say more to you on this business at present, and remain a real friend to you and every good man in the Creek nation.

[NOTE.—The preceding letter sent to twenty-one of the principal chiefs of the Upper and Lower Creeks, with the general talk enclosed.]

St. MARY'S, in Georgia, 14th April, 1793.

SIR:

Although I have not the pleasure of being personally acquainted with you, yet I am no stranger to your very respectable character and connexions in the Creek land. Ever since the United States honored me with my present appointment, I have been very desirous of seeing you, and of being in close friendship with a man of your character. I am really sorry that it has so happened that we have not met, as I have reason to think it would have been mutually agreeable, as well as serviceable, to our respective countries. But I hope it is not yet too late, and that you will favor me with a visit at this place, where nothing shall be wanting to make your jaunt agreeable, and, in return, I shall call and spend some time with you in your country.

I was just on the point of setting off into the nation, where I had agreed to meet the chiefs on the first of May, in the Cussetah town, in order to arrange and settle all matters still depending between you and my country, which there was no difficulty or doubt of accomplishing, as I had nothing to ask from them, and much to give and advise, solely for the good of the nation; but an unexpected and unfortunate affair, which took place in the upper part of this river, on the eleventh of last month, has for a time delayed my going. It is more than probable you have heard of the affair alluded to; but, lest you should not have had a true statement of it, I shall relate it to you, which is as follows:

On the evening of the eleventh of last month, a party of Creek Indians, chiefly from the town where Burges lives, in number from twenty-five to thirty, entered the store of my brother, Robert Seagrove, at Trader's Hill, on this river, and then and there killed Mr. John Fleming, the store-keeper, and Mr. Daniel Moffit, scalped and mangled their bodies in a brutal manner, beat and abused a woman who lived there, and left her lying supposed to be dead. A man of the name of Upton, who was there, is missing, and must be killed or carried off a prisoner by the same party, who also robbed the said store of goods, the first cost of which was ten thousand dollars, which they took off with them to their towns; also, a number of horses, &c. &c. Two days after, a party of the same killed three men and a girl, that were travelling about ten miles from said store, and plundered their wagons, and took off horses and all they could find, and fled towards the nation. This is a true state of the outrage, which you may rely was committed without the shadow of offence, of any kind whatever, being given by our people. On the contrary, I was at that instant feeding and giving presents from the public stores, on this river, to a great many families of Indians from the different parts of the nation, with whom all our people were on the most friendly terms, not suspecting harm, when this unprovoked, horrid murder and robbery was committed.

I have since sent a talk to the chiefs of the whole nation, and doubt not they will see the necessity there is of doing justice to my country, which, in this instance, has been very ill treated. I am happy in finding, by letters which I have received from the nation, that they knew nothing of this affair until it had taken place, and that it appears to have been done through the advice of some white villains, to serve private purposes. The insult and injury is great on the Creek nation as well as the United States, and the consequence may be of a most serious and alarming nature to the whole of the Creek land, unless their regard for justice, and a wish to live in peace and friendship with this country, shall direct your wise men to make examples of those bad men who have dared to disturb the peace of two nations, whose mutual interest it is to be friends.

My principal reason for writing to you at this time is, that, not having heretofore seen you, and that probably you may not have heard my different talks to the Creek people, I do it to assure you that it is the wish and desire of the President and United States to live in the most friendly and brotherly terms with every part of the Creek nation, and that the whole of my talks to the chiefs of your nation, has uniformly been to that effect, as well as that the Creek people should, on no account, involve themselves in a war or disputes with any people, either white or red; these are truths which cannot be denied. Happy will it be for your nation, if my advice is preferred to that of a designing, malignant set of wretches, who, from motives of personal interest or revenge, advise contrary measures, in order to involve you in a war. Such people are regardless of what may befall your land; they have nothing to lose by your misfortunes, but unquestionably will take advantage of them. As a friend to your country, I hope you will attend to what I now tell you, and use your influence to direct your people to peace and what is for their good, and will keep them in a state of prosperity. It will always give me pleasure to be of service to you or your country, and convince you how much I am your friend. I have sent my interpreter, Langley Bryant, with this, to inform you that it is our desire to be in peace and friendship with you, and request that you will let me hear from you. I should have sent you a handsome present by him, but as the path does not seem quite clear at present, I am afraid he might lose them. If you will do me the pleasure of coming here, you shall receive a present equal to the first chief of your land. In the mean time, I send you, from the President of the United States, a handsome pair of arm-bands, which please to accept and wear, as a token of his friendship for you. Notwithstanding the late murders by the Creeks, no injury has been offered any of them; although several of them have been in our possession, yet I have sent them all safe home. This alone must convince you that we wish to live in peace, provided it can be done on proper terms.

Mr. Bryant will inform you more particularly of our friendship. Wishing that your nation may have wisdom to live in peace, I conclude this talk, and remain a real friend to you and every honest man in the Creek land.

James Seagrove to the Kings, Chiefs, Head-men, and Warriors, of the whole Creek nation.

ST. MARY'S, 14th April, 1793.

DEAR BROTHERS:

I sent you a talk on the 26th of last moon, by an Indian, which I hope you have received. It was addressed to the whole Creek nation, on the late murders and robberies committed on this country by the people of the Creek towns. Lest any accident should have prevented these talks reaching you, I now send you a copy of them; and I hope that, on the chiefs of the nation perusing them, they will see the necessity of immediately complying with my demand, and deliver up to me an equal number of those who murdered our people in cold blood, and without any reason or cause whatever. It now appears that they killed seven persons; six were found, and a man of the name of Upton is missing ever since the murder of Trader's Hill, where he then was. This demand is agreeable to your own laws, and, being founded on strict justice, and the laws of nature, I cannot doubt but that you have (or will speedily have) seven of those persons who were foremost in advising, planning, or executing the horrid murders alluded to, seized on and delivered to me, that their blood may atone for what they have done. This alone can save your country: for I must inform you that, as much as the United States respects you as a people, and wishes your happiness and prosperity, yet the late wanton, unprovoked outrage of your people on this country, has been of so heinous a nature as to call loudly on our Government to see satisfaction made. Indeed, I am convinced that the citizens of America will not submit to any thing short of what I now demand. Should your people be lost to a sense of justice, and regardless of peace, or their existence as a nation, and obstinately decline a compliance with my just demand, I must desire that you will all please to remember, that no hasty steps have been taken by me or my country; but that full opportunity is now given for punishing the aggressors, and thereby you may continue to live in peace and friendship with the United States as long as you choose.

That certain white men in your land have been principal advisers and promoters of the late acts of violence, I have not a doubt. I have always told you those white villains would bring ruin on you unless you drove them from among you. Is it not very strange, that the whole of the wise men of your land should be so blind as not to discover the designs of those base men, which evidently appear to be to involve you in a war, and have you destroyed thereby, to plunder your property, and take your lands that you now live on? Rouse, my friends and brothers, and clear from among you or destroy, a set of such men as I have described; you cannot be at a loss to know them; their actions have already pointed them out as fit objects of your resentment. All those who advise your people to do mischief or go to war, those who encourage your people to steal horses and other property, and purchase them afterwards, are bad; but, above all, the adherents and supporters of Bowles' impositions on you are deserving of severe punishment, as they have kept your land in a flame for years, and imposed on your people by false promises. I expect these things will be done without delay, as, on it, your future happiness, in a great measure, depends. I was all ready to set off to meet you all, my friends, in the Cussetahs, agreeable to promise, when the murder and robbery on this river took place; this has, of course, delayed me, and will, until you have ordered examples to be made agreeably to my demand, herein contained. When this is done, I shall shortly after be with you, and when I shall make known to you many agreeable talks, which I have from our great and good father, the President of the United States, whose greatest wish is to make you, his children, happy. Notwithstanding the late very bad conduct of your people towards this country, yet you have it in your power to live in friendship with the United States, on your complying with my present demand. Now, brothers, would you not be much to blame to suffer your whole country to be ruined, to save from just punishment seven bad men, who have brought trouble and disgrace on your land, and destroyed an equal number of our people, your good friends, and that without any cause? It gives me great pleasure to find that you were so wise as not to take the Shawanese and other Northern Indians talks; you did well, and you will find the good of it. I shall let your Great Father know of your good conduct in this.

If I could be with you in peace, I could regulate all your affairs, so as to make you happy; I hope that day is not far off; it rests with yourselves. But I again tell you, that you must do justice, and remove from among you bad white men, before I can think of coming. Colonel John Kinnard will inform you of some other matters; to him I request you to attend, and also to my deputy, Mr. Tim Barnard, and let their talks take deep root in your hearts, for their talks are like mine, for the good of all my Creek friends.

I have now given you a long talk, as I know not when to stop when I talk to my Creek brothers. Attend to what I have said, and let me have such answer from you as to continue my friendship and good opinion.

I am, &c.

Timothy Barnard to James Seagrove, dated

FLINT RIVER, 26th March, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

Your express, by Mr. Mordecai, came safe to hand; I received it at the Cussetahs, where I have been ever since my last to you, by Mr. John Galphin, except five days I spent at the Buzzard Roost, where I was obliged to attend in consequence of some complaints I heard from the Indians, respecting the inhabitants on the Oconee driving great gangs of cattle over on this side in the fork of Jullah Packa, and from that up, forty or fifty miles higher; besides that the white people had built two or three houses on this side. When I got to the Buzzard Roost, I found that the report I had heard was not groundless, as there was a white man that had just arrived at the Roost from Rock Landing, who convinced me that it was the case. I heard, while I was at the Roost, that the Cowetas were just going out to drive off all the stocks and kill some of the inhabitants. I immediately sent off an express to the Rock Landing, and wrote to the commanding officer there, to order the people to drive their stocks back. I likewise acquainted his Excellency the Governor with the circumstance, and of the ill consequences that would follow, if he did not put a final stop to such proceedings; I at the same time wrote to Captain Philips, that lives nearly opposite where those cattle were driven over. I have since been at the town, had a letter from Captain Philips, where he mentions, that some of the hunting Indians had given them liberty, last fall, to drive their stocks over till the spring, which I do not believe; but whether or not, I should imagine that they might have a little more knowledge of Indian matters than to think such liberties would hold good with the whole nation. Major Gaither was kind enough to answer my letter, wherein he informs me that he has given his orders for all the stock to be driven back, which he says was duly complied with. A few days ago at the meeting, I have had more complaints laid before me of the like nature, which I immediately informed Major Gaither of, and Captain Philips; both of which is, that the white people came and encamped out, thirty or forty miles on this side the river, and hunted, with fire, and all day with rifles, and destroyed the game so bad, that they can hardly find a turkey or a deer to kill, and with great gangs of dogs hunting bear; this the Indians say they cannot put up with; and if the white people do not decline such proceedings, they will kill some of them. They say, that such proceedings as this fully convinces them, that, if there was a line run, that they would not still be restrained from such practices. I gave them to understand, that it was for want of the line that they could not be hindered, and that, when you came up, that you would have it in your power to convince them that all such matters should be finally done way, and that you would, on your part, give them satisfactory redress, to every legal complaint they had on their parts to lay before you. I have done every thing in my power to stop them from doing mischief on the stock or inhabitants, till you come up. The Cowetas have stolen a good many horses, and brought them in, which I think the white people have to blame their own conduct for, as I am told there are both horses and cattle twenty miles on this side the river; I am amazed that people will be so fool-hardy, till matters are settled, which never will be the case while the people on the frontier go so head-strong to work. I remain in hopes the Indians will remain quiet now, till you can come up. I am in dread of no danger from any part of the nation but the Chehaws below me; nevertheless, though I had been down there not more than ten days before I set off to the town, and talked above three hours to the head King of the town, and acquainted him with every necessary matter that was transacted at the treaty, he since hearing a flying report, that the Cowetas were gone out to do mischief, and some of the other towns had joined them, without waiting to hear the truth, set off with ten or twelve fellows to do mischief low down on the frontier. Though Kinnard sent them word not to go, they had gone so far they could not stop them; it's since said they only went off to hunt, which, if so, will be all the better; there were likewise runners despatched after them to turn them back, but am afraid, if they were determined to do mischief, it was too late; however, I think if they had done any mischief, they would have been in before this, as it's three weeks ago since they went out; had it not been for those imprudent steps of the Oconee settlers, driving their stocks over the river, the Shawanese talks would not have had near as much effect on the minds of the Creeks, as it was a good subject for the Shawanese to work on, telling them it was the way the white people served them to the northward. As soon as I received your express by Mordecai, I appointed another meeting in seven days, and sent off expresses to the Upper Creeks, to the Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatchees, and Alexander Cornell, and to the White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees or Nowyawger, likewise to Kinnard; they attended the meeting, likewise the heads of the other towns you see mentioned in their answer. Those head-men from the Upper Creeks assured me, that there was none of the towns in that quarter but what was for peace. Neither do I find that there is any in the lower much inclined for mischief, except the Cowetas, and Broken Arrow, and some of the Chehaws and Ousaches, and them, I believe their chief views are for stealing horses. As I got these head-men from the Upper Creeks to give them a very severe talk on that head, the Mad Dog and chief of the rest of the heads, desired me to urge you much to be up in thirty two days from the date of the meeting; I acquainted them with every obstacle that I thought might detain you, but that I knew you would lose no time. I am of opinion myself, that the sooner you can be up the better, as chief of the nation is in a starving condition, and chief of them will be under the necessity of turning out in the woods again to support their families. The Chickasaws and them are likely to settle their dispute, as they have sent runners off for that purpose. Those rascals, the followers of Bowles and Willbanks, have been lying at the mouth of Okelohne all this winter, notwithstanding, they have been frequently told by the Spaniards, that they need not expect any goods there; Kinnard likewise informed them at the meeting, that he had letters from Mr. Leslie, that informed him, that all their hopes of ships there were in vain. They are now, I hear, breaking up, as hunger obliges them to it. Willbanks set off down that way about a month ago, and had not returned when I left the towns, and I expect, without he has very good luck, I do not think he will return, as the Spaniards have offered a great reward for him; I would not do any thing respecting that matter of the prisoners in the nation at the meeting, as there was too much confusion for such business; besides, it is a matter that entirely concerns the Upper Creeks. I read and interpreted your letter to the Little Prince, the Leader I could not see; the Prince said he would have sent a horse for goods, but had none able to go down. His uncle that you wrote to, says, he hopes you will think on him when you come up, as he is an old man and your friend; he is the man you wrote the other letter to. The Mad Dog and some more of them hinted strongly for a few presents after coming so far, but I had nothing for them, as there were but little goods among the traders where I was, and had enough to do to borrow a little from them to buy provisions, which was hard to get at, paying a treble price; I hope you will, when you come up, have it in your power to furnish me with a little goods to answer such purposes, as I have none, and cannot get them without running in debt for them. What you mentioned respecting making the Shawanese prisoners, I omitted in public, as it was the advice of Cornell and the Lieutenant both, likewise the Mad Dog; as they said at this time it might make matters worse; but the Mad Dog says, as they were to set off in five days up to his town, he will give them their lesson there, and send them home, which he is sure will prevent them coming back any more with talks to the Creeks. I at the same time gave Alexander Cornell particular instructions what to put in the Mad Dog's head to say to them; it's not my opinion that they will be able to do any great damage in the nation. I had two of them over at the Cussetahs to the meeting; one of them is as white a man as me, and speaks nearly as good English. I told them in public of their nation suing for peace, and many other things, which seemed to agitate them much, as they did not seem to believe it; one of them, an Indian, got up to leave the square before our talks were over, but was called back by the Little Prince, who is their chief director. I had a good deal of private talk with the Prince, which he seemed to take pretty well, and make not the least doubt but he may be made a useful man with a good present and a little good talk. The whole burthen of interpreting lay on myself, as Dourouzeaux has been laid up with the rheumatism since he arrived, and I doubt will never be able to do much now. We have certain accounts from West Florida, that our friend Mr. McGillivray has departed this life, and was interred in Mr. Pantons's garden, as the Dons would not admit of his being laid in their burying ground.

Kinnard directed me to acquaint you, that he had done every thing in his power to reconcile matters, and should continue in so doing till you arrived, which he hoped would be as quick as possible, as he is in the same opinion as myself on that head; and thinks the longer you stay now, will be the worse to settle matters. Mr. Holmes has written you a long letter as well as myself, therefore I judge, that, betwixt us both, you will receive every necessary information for the present, till you arrive here, where we can talk over matters; till then, I wish you health.

A talk delivered by Mr. Barnard to the Indians assembled at the Cussetahs, and interpreted by himself, 22d March, 1793.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I have lived many years in your land, and have always endeavored to advise you all to follow one straight path, for the happiness of the nation.

What I have done, you all know, has been from friendly motives and not interested views. I need not tell you, that I was poor for this office that I have been honored with, but accepted of it, with a view of serving a country, in which, I have, the most of my days, resided, and where my connexions are dear to me. Consequently, you must suppose, I would not wish to see them suffer from the bad talks, which are daily sent into your land, which, if not guarded against in time, will be the inevitable ruin of your nation. The peace of your land has been greatly disturbed by talks from white people that are poor, and wish to make themselves rich, at the expense of your blood being split and your nation undone. Those men who have brought you to this, will leave you, and retire into some other country, where they will live at their ease, and laugh at your credulity for being such fools.

Do but look a few years back, and see the manner in which the British secured you. Colonel Brown (a beloved man) is now in Providence, and Mr. Tate in England, living in splendor and affluence, on the money they received from the English, for sending you to war against the Americans, and care not, should they never see you more, or even hear of your welfare. The English have not thought of you, since the American war, as they have not sent you a single piece of stroud, as a present, since they left your land, although many of you fought for them, and some beloved men have lost their lives. Had it not been for our friend, Mr. McGillivray, who is now no more, and Mr. Pantons, who obtained liberty from the King of Spain, by paying ten thousand dollars per annum, to bring goods from their land, you would have been very poor, and your women and children very naked. These, my friends, are circumstances, which ought to make deep impressions in your hearts. Some of your great men have very bad eyes; they see but a very short distance before them, otherwise, they would distinguish their friends from their enemies, and guard against the pernicious consequences attending some bad talks, which I find they have paid too much attention to, and which, if they persist in, will be their total ruin. When a thing is past, there is no recalling it; therefore, wise men ought to consider what they are about, before it is too late. Look round, my friends, and consider you are surrounded with difficulties, but you have still a door left open, if you will but keep it so. Our great and beloved father, General Washington, is still your friend, and will remain so, if you do not draw on his displeasure, by your own repeated bad conduct. While he is your friend, you have no enemies to dread. The Northward Indians, which are now amongst you, I have frequently told you, are only endeavoring to bring you into the same predicament into which they themselves are involved.

I am glad to find, there are some of my old friends here present, that still possess their senses, and are not to be frightened or led away by the Shawanese talks.

There are some of my own color amongst you, as detrimental to your peace and happiness, as these Shawanese. Willbanks is one; a man who never did, nor never will, render your country any service. It is useless for me to say any thing more respecting this base man, as you all ought to be well acquainted with his conduct, from his frequent deceptions. I have always cautioned you against listening to such men, and think it is time that your eyes ought to be opened, and view such men with contempt. Some of your own white people that are trading among you, are encouraging your young people to steal horses from the Americans, and they are buying them. Your young men pretend, that they do it, because their land is encroached upon, but your head-men that are present, ought to put a stop to such proceedings, ere it be too late, as such behavior will never establish a peace, but will be productive of much mischief and perhaps the utter ruin of your nation.

Do but be quiet, until the beloved man, Major Seagrove, comes up, and I make not the least doubt, but he will remove all such complaints, as he will be invested with full power, from General Washington, our great, good, and beloved father, who strives to do the best for both his white and red children.

Talk from the Head-men of the Chehaws and Telluiana.

MAJOR SEAGROVE:

My friend, it is not long since we were down to see you, and heard your talks, but when we got home, we heard a talk from the Upper towns from the Sawonocas, (Shawanese) and thought it was a general war, and our people went off in a hurry, and have done mischief. And since we have returned home, we find that talk was sent to us, to bring us into trouble. But we had no intent to do any such thing of ourselves, but thought that the rest were bent upon the same thing. The Ossuchees sent us word, that all the rest of the people was gone out, and we thought it was a war indeed, and on that, our people turned out. When we went out, we did not intend to have killed any body, but on going down and finding Captain Fleming dead, and the other man at your brother's store, we were sure that it was a war, and we then killed some men, but it was not us that began to kill. We are very sorry that any such thing has happened, as it was our intention to try and keep peace, but we were deceived by a bad talk, sent to us. My friend, this is all that we can say in the business, till we hear from you, which I hope will be soon, and hope you will send us a talk by Mr. Kinnard's negro boy. We have brought a great deal of property, such as horses, cattle, and negroes. As we find that it is not a war, we dont think they belong to us, and we shall keep them safe, till we hear from you, in order to return them.

Malitea desires to talk to you, which is as follows:

MY FRIEND: We have had a talk with you, which I hope will not be spoiled on account of the mischief done by our people. We have been very well used by you, and have had provisions whenever we asked for it, and I hope that the inhabitants will not run off and leave their houses and land, as we do not mean to disturb them. And as you are sent for, we hope to see you here, and settle all the talks with you. When I came home with the letter you sent by me, the people had gone out, so, that I did not see them till this mischief was done. This comes from your friends as follows:

MALITEA, STINNPEE,
SLOFIA CHOPEO,
CHEHAW TUSTANOCCA,
TUSTANOCHOGN,
COCHOXONA TUSTANOCCA,
Chiefs of Chehaws and Telluiana towns.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Superintendent, &c.

NOTE.—All those who send this talk, (except Malitea) were perpetrators of the murders, &c. near Colerain, and also, the robberies on the Altamaha. Malitea is one of the commissioners, who attended running the boundary line.

The Chehaws and Telluianas are one people; the latter is only a village detached a few miles from the former.

At a talk held in the Cussetahs, Creek nation, March 22, 1793, before Timothy Barnard, deputy agent of Indian Affairs, Southern district, United States, in behalf of said States, and John Kinnard and other Chiefs from the Hitchetas, Coweta, Cussetah, Broken Arrow, Oswitches, and Swaggles Towns, representatives for the Lower Creeks. The White Lieutenant, Mad Dog, Head King, Oakfuskees, and Alexander Cornell, for leading men from the Upper Creeks, to represent that part of the nation:

The Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatchees' Talk.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I have heard the talks sent to the nation, and receive them the same as if I were taking you by the hand and receiving them from your own mouth. It is very true, there are many very bad talks in the nation, but hope they are not so bad as they may appear, as we are using every endeavor to make them better. The talks you sent to us, we know, are for our benefit, which makes me the more anxious to see you, and it is my advice that you may be here speedily. It is true, there are mad people amongst us, who have acted imprudently, which, I think, is the case with some of yours. I have not much to say at this moment, as we expect to see you soon, when you will hear much from us; we have much to say.

In thirty-two days from the date hereof, we shall expect to see you in our land, when we take you by the hand, as our friend and father, and smoke the pipe of peace and friendship together.

ST. MARY'S, 30th April, 1793.

SIR:

On the 28th instant, I received, by express, from the chiefs of the Creek nation, the enclosed talks, by which, you will find them disposed to comply with my demand, which, if they do, will be a most happy circumstance for our country.

From the information which I have received, I have reason to look for the prisoners daily. I shall feel embarrassed what to do with them, especially the two white men, which the chiefs say shall be sent to me. Our prison, in this country, is very bad, and, to put them in fort St. Tammany, will not do, as there, they would be almost certain of escaping. The Indian which I put there made his escape, which has been a very great injury to our cause.

Yesterday, my interpreter, Mr. Bryant, returned from the Seminoles, with an answer to my letter of the 14th instant, from Mr. Payne, the head chief of that tribe. Mr. Bryant was kindly received, and Mr. Payne, with a number of his head-men, are to meet me at Colerain, in seven days from this date. By this, I hope to secure the friendship of those people.

It will be necessary that I make those Indians a handsome present, for which purpose, I shall be obliged to purchase some articles that I am deficient in.

I now send you a belt of peace, received from the chiefs of the Upper towns, to the President of the United States; and, also, a white wing, from the Cussetahs, which, you will observe, is their desire.

The Indians continue to plunder in Florida, and a war with the Chickasaws seems certain. Near two thousand Creeks are preparing to go against them.

I find, by accounts from the nation, that two men have been killed on the Oconee, by the Old Tallasee king's people; for what reason, I know not, but must suppose it owing to the ill conduct of those white people, in intruding on their lands.

CUSSETAH, 15th April, 1793.

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

This comes from the Cussetah king, and Bird-tail king. I send this beloved wing, and, when you see it, you will see my friendship, hoping that it will always be so. Mr. Seagrove, when you see my white wing, and our talks, you will send them to our great father, General Washington. I wish for a peace, and always did, for I want our women and children to grow up. The Upper towns have directly sent off to have Galphin and Upton taken. The Indians themselves say, that Galphin was the first man that went to them, and got them to go. The red men that were with Galphin, shall also be given up, as soon as our meeting is over. I have called a meeting to-day about it. It is our wish to keep peace, and always was.

There are people that are gone out, but don't know whether they can be turned back or no.

Copy of a letter from Alexander Cornell, in behalf of himself and the Upper Creeks.

CUSSETAH TOWN, 15th April, 1793.

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

This is to let you know that I have been very uneasy, as I never could hear the truth until now, (by your letter) of what mischief was done at St. Mary's. I hear now, that the old Tallasee king, and his people, are turned out for war, and the Colemmys have joined them. They are like mad people, and running crazy. What you told me to do, in the Upper towns, I did. I have done all that lies in my power; it is impossible to do more than I have done.

All the Upper towns are strong for peace but them two towns, and I have sent for them several times, when we have had meetings, but they never would come. They mean to spite the whole nation, if they can, by spoiling what talks we have had with you.

The old Tallasee king lives about twenty-five miles from my house. He was the first man that gave the land away to the white people, and now, is the first that proposes doing mischief. It must be the Northern Indians coming among us; them two towns have taken their talks. We cannot help it, therefore I hope you will not blame the Upper towns for it, for we still stand to your talk, and mean to do so. We never heard of their going out to do mischief until they were gone two days, for we never could hear from them, or understand what they meant to do. They offered to give me up the prisoners, but I told them I would wait till you came up yourself, as I had no horses to send them down. No more at present, from

Your friend and well wisher,

ALEXANDER CORNELL,
In behalf of self and Upper Creeks.

P. S. SIR: Please send by the bearer an answer, and it shall be punctually obeyed. Sir: I have heard that Galphin, and one Upton, was at the murder of Mr. Fleming, and robbing the store. We mean to give them up, and the rest that was with them. Mr. Seagrove: I never got the letters till the 15th of the month; I was waiting six days for them, at the Cussetahs, before I got them. By their detaining them so long, we have got too little time to do it. I hope, when you see our talks, you will take it in consideration, and give us longer time. I have sent our white man off directly to you, with our talk to you. We have sent off to have Galphin and Upton taken, for fear they should make their escape. We have agreed to give up two red men from the Chehaws, two from Burges' town, and one from the point. If we had got the letters sooner, you should have had the murderers by the time you mention, but you must allow us longer time, for it is the wish of the Upper towns to do it. This will be a warning to the young people; then they will mind what their head-men say to them, and not before.

TUCKAUBATCHEE, 8th April, 1793.

EAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

This comes from your brothers, the Mad Dog, the White Lieutenant, David Cornell, Alexander Cornell, Mr. Weatherford, and thirteen other head-men of the Upper Creeks, who all agree, with one talk, together. That David Cornell, and the head-men of the Upper towns, and warriors, all agree to your talk, and mean to hold them fast by the hand, and never to let it go as long as they live.

You heard the Northern Indians was among us, but we never listened to any of their talks, nor would suffer any of them to give any out among our people, for we don't want to shed no white people's blood, for I have got white people's blood in me. We intended to go to war against the Chickasaws, and, if we don't we will come again to see you. We formerly went to war against the Cumberland people, but, since we heard your talk, we don't intend to go to war against them any more. The Mad Dog's brother and nephew, went into a trader's house in the Chickasaws, and they killed them both. We mean to have satisfaction, for, if they had killed them in the woods, we might try to make it up; but, killing them as they did, we cannot put up with it. Mr. Seagrove: You told us to keep peace with all colors, which we meant to do, but our color began first, and hurt us greatly.

Dear Friend and Brother: We are going to send our feathers by our white man. There has some mischief been done your way, but we have not heard the truth of it yet; if there has been any done, it is more than any of us Upper towns did know. Our friend and father, General Washington, has sent us talks several times, which we always took, and mean to do. If there is any mischief done your way, I hope you won't blame the Upper towns, for we don't know any thing about it. We wish to have a wide path down to you, that our women and children may travel down to you; it is the wish of the Upper towns that it should be so. The Tuckaubatchee town, and the rest of the head-men, have taken your talk, and mean to live by them, as long as you and the brothers of the United States exist.

Mr. Seagrove: My name is the Mad Dog that is going to send these talks to you, and when you see my talk, it is all the same as if you seen me, and, when I see your talks, it is all the same as if I seen you. I hope, when you see my belts, you will see an everlasting peace and friendship with our great father, General Washington, and our brothers of the United States; the one stripe for General Washington, the one for Mr. Seagrove, and the other for the brothers of the United States. Mr. Seagrove: I send the belts, as our talks, for it is our way of showing our friendship as long as we live. The other belt is for Mr. Seagrove and his lady. I always listened to your talks, and mean to do so, and all my people. Mr. Seagrove: I hope your heart is in a good place, for, if there is any thing that is in it, let me know, and I will ease it if I can; if the Lower towns have done mischief, you shall have satisfaction for it; for we Upper towns all agree to it at our meeting. An answer from you shall be immediately obeyed; so no more at present from the Mad Dog, the White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees, &c.

TUCKAUBATCHEE, 8th April, 1793.

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I take the opportunity to write by the bearer, to let you know I am sorry to hear that there has mischief been done at St. Mary's. I have never heard the truth of it yet. As soon as I heard any thing of it, I sent off runners to the Upper towns and the Lower towns, to have a meeting about it, but the Half-way House king stopped our breaking days from going down to the Lower towns. This was the reason that none of the head-men of the Lower towns were at our meeting. The Mad Dog, myself, and David Cornell, are so uneasy about it we don't know what to do. We had great hopes our nation was getting very happy, for they had taken your talks, and our Great Father, General Washington's, and mean to hold it fast as long as we live, for we have thrown away the Spaniards' talk; we hold them by the hands as friends yet, but not to take any of their talks against the United States. If every man would exert himself as well as the Mad Dog, and the head-men of the Upper towns, and Mr. Weatherford, we should have an everlasting peace with our brothers of the United States. I have sent our white man with our talks to you, for he is the only one that has done any thing for us. Since he came from St. Mary's, I have been sending him through the Upper towns, to the traders, to hear what they thought of our talks, and to tell them not to give the Indians bad talks, as some of them used to do, not to tell them to go and steal white people's horses, for, if they did, and it was found out, it would be of a bad consequence to them. There was that Ash, that you gave goods to, I suppose he told you he would do a great deal for you when he went home. He has never done any thing for you. Mr. Weatherford and myself, wanted him to come down with the bearer, and he would not. Since he has come from the Upper town, I hear that Grason, that lives at the Hillebese, has been giving the Indians talks to go to war; I wish you would send me word what to do with such people. So no more at present from your friend,

A CORNELL.

HICKORY GROUND, 9th March, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

After my compliments to you and family, I have the unhappy news to communicate to you of General McGillivray's death, on the 17th of February last, about 11 o'clock at night, at Mr. S. Panton's, in Pensacola, and I being immediately sent for, by his Excellency Governor O'Neal, and Mr. Panton, on what business, as yet, I am not able to tell, but, when you come up, I shall be able to give you a full account of every particular circumstance, that will be satisfactory to you. Had it not been for my being called that way, I should have been down before this time, and the waters being high, prevented me from writing to you sooner.

As concerning the affairs of the nation, the Indians are at peace at present with the States, and wish to remain so; and since Mad Tom, of the Cussetahs, has arrived at home, he has spoke much in your favor, and looks on you as a sincere friend to the nation; likewise informed the heads of the Upper towns you are coming up; they are very desirous to see you, and every good friend to America.

With a little trouble, and good conduct, the nation will be kept at peace with the States; as there are much depending upon a man, who has considerable influence with the heads of the nation, and one who could draw the attention of the Indians to hear the talk he had to give them. As it is most certain the Spaniards will send an emissary to the nation to disturb the Indians, which I am afraid will be attended with bad consequences; but this is a serious matter, and of course I am not at this time able fully to communicate to you at present; I shall, therefore, refer it until I see you, at which time, I hope I shall be able to give you every satisfaction on the subject, as I shall start in two or three days at furthest, for Pensacola, in order to return by the time you promised to be up at the Tuckaubatchees, which, I understand, is the last of this month; and as I shall see you in a short time, I shall refer the most particular business until then.

Of course, you have heard of the Chickasaws and this nation going to war against each other; this you will be able to consider upon more fully; and if you would wish it to continue, I shall keep it on; and on the contrary, if not, I shall put a stop to it immediately, as it is my sincere wish to keep the Indians at peace with the States.

I shall always be happy in doing every thing in my power to serve you, as I have ever looked upon you as a sincere friend in every respect. I would ever wish to continue my friendship to you as before, and ever shall, as far as lays in my power, hoping that every matter of importance will be secret to you and myself alone. At this time, I am not able to give you a satisfactory account of every particular circumstance, but shall as soon as I have the pleasure of seeing you.

Contrary to your orders, I have given the head-men (of which I shall give you a list of their names, and the articles I gave them) those who had not an opportunity of going in, viz:

The White Lieutenant, Punknot,	}	10 yards Strouds,
Mad Spanyard,
Mad Tom, Cusadies,
Good Hunter, Wocke Coys,
Mad Beaver, Ala Bamer,
Mad Tiger, Sdewaetes,
Old Tales, a Warrior,
Quarterroon, Elewalies
Old Red Shoes, Cussadies.
	8 yards white Linen,
	1 black silk Handkerchief.

The above articles was delivered to each of the head-men mentioned. Likewise, Moltanhead, of the Tuskegees, received two strouds, and two duffil blankets.

These articles I have given on my account (thinking it would be agreeable to you) as I would wish to keep peace.
I am, &c.

DEAR SIR:

I am sorry to inform you, that since the death of General McGillivray, there is a great confusion in the nation; they started in order to go against the inhabitants, and I have sent the bearer to the White Lieutenant, and Mammoth of the Pialeges, and have sent them and some more of the head-men down to the Lower towns, to stop them from doing any mischief to the inhabitants. The Chickasaws and these people are continually doing mischief. The Chickasaws has killed three Creeks a few days ago, and to revenge it, the Creeks have killed some of them that lived in this nation; they killed two last night. This will not be ended without some difficulty and trouble, but I wait your approbation in this respect; a few lines from you, as soon as possible, will ever be attended with the greatest punctuality.

I am, sir, &c.

C. WEATHERFORD.

Major JAMES SEAGROVE, &c.

FLINT RIVER, April 20, 1793.

SIR:

This country is in as convulsed a state as it is possible. The majority of the head-men are for peace, and seem determined, at all hazards, to give satisfaction for the murder committed at St. Mary's. I set out from this place some days since for the Tuckaubatchees, but did not proceed further than the Cussetahs, as was informed at that place, A. Cornell had left a message, if I should come, to inform me, that it would not be prudent to go farther, as there were Indians out from the Upper towns to do mischief on the Oconee, and should they lose any men, they might wreak their vengeance on me.

They had sent off five runners to stop them, but when I left the Cussetahs, had not learned whether they had effected it or not.

Whilst I was at the Cussetahs (I only returned last evening) there came news that four fellows, belonging to the Cowetas, had brought in two scalps taken near the fork of land in dispute. The Cussetahs were for making examples of those that did the mischief, immediately; but they told them several gangs were out, and mentioned two or three different nights on which mischief would be done. One gang, they said, consisted of one hundred men. This put the Cussetahs at a stand, and concluded to defer the business until they were fully acquainted with the matter. Those concerned in the mischief already done, are using every method to make the matter general, in order to screen themselves; and I fear that such a number will be concerned, that it will be a difficult matter to give full satisfaction; however, the event is buried in the womb of futurity.

The Indians say that Allen was concerned in planning the mischief done at St. Mary's, the truth of which, I will not pretend to determine. Galphin and Upton, I believe, will be positively given up (the latter they assert was equally guilty) and the White King of the Ufalees, is to take satisfaction for the murder from Burges town. They consider it hard to demand men for the robbery, which, they say, was never done before; but satisfaction for the murder they think just on every principle.

My own private affairs put on a very gloomy aspect. I have to the amount of several hundred pounds in skins, furs, &c. at this place, but cannot get a horse to go for St. Mary's, since that mischief was done; my case is peculiarly hard, 'tis my all; and what makes the matter worse, every shilling is due to persons who reposed a confidence in me for their property. Should there be an Indian war (which God forbid) I will thank you to use your interest in procuring me a birth in the horse, should there be a troop raised. From the repeated marks of friendship which I have at times received, has induced me to take the liberty of asking this favor.

Mordecai has been gone twenty-one days; am very anxious to hear from you.

I am, sir, &c.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Esq.

Copy of a letter from Timothy Barnard.

FLINT RIVER, April 19, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I wrote you a few days ago by Aikens, who went on by way of Newport, and acquainted you with every matter that occurred to me at that time. Your demand for satisfaction has been fully explained to the Indians.

Mr. Kinnard, before your express arrived, sent me word, that when expresses came up for that purpose, to leave it to him, as he knew it would endanger my life to interfere too much in that business, as I was a white man, which I was daily informed of by Indians and white people from the Chehaws.

That notorious fellow, Galphin, has done all in his power to set those Chehaw villains on me; and Mr. Hanard, by what I can learn, has done the same; but I am in hopes those two villains' race is nearly run. I am fully convinced, that if it had not been for those two scoundrels, there would have been none of this mischief that has happened. I have great reason to believe, before many days, to hear of some of the offenders losing their lives, at least as many as were murdered on the St. Mary's; but as to their giving up the whole of the offenders to be punished, I fear that is totally out of their power.

The Upper Creeks are determined, by what I can learn, to give full satisfaction, which you will be fully informed of by Mr. McDonald, who is the bearer of this, with the express from Alexander Cornell, and the Mad Dog. Alexander Cornell has been down to the Cussetahs, on the business of getting satisfaction, and they have settled it among themselves what is to be done. I should, though at the risk of my life, have went myself to the towns on the business, but the day after I received your express, had information of the Half-way-house King, or Tail King, and all his towns round him, setting off to war on the upper parts of Georgia, and a number of the Tusehathe in the Upper Creeks, and the Tail King. On hearing of this, I sent off a runner to a village about thirty miles this side the Cussetahs, and about forty miles from where I live, where the Warrior king and one of the head warriors of the Cussetahs resided; they immediately came, and I sent the head warrior off next morning to the town, to despatch off runners after those gangs of the Upper Creeks that I heard were turned out. I, at the same time, made them both fully acquainted with your demand for satisfaction, which was immediately made known fully in the Cussetah's square, where they consulted, and were fully determined to give satisfaction; and it would have been done before this, had not those Upper town gangs turned out to war.

The people that I sent out, stopped the Tallassee king and his party, and turned them back. I have not heard of the return of the other gang, but there are five runners after them, therefore, I hope they will be stopped. I need not say much to you respecting the disposition of the Upper Creeks, as Mr. Alexander Cornell's letter will inform you fully; by what I can learn, the chief of all the Upper Creeks are much inclined for peace. It is thought those two towns that went out, were persuaded to it by that villain Grearson, which, if it is proved against him, the Mad Dog and Alexander Cornell says, shall cost him his life. Almost all the Upper Creeks, to a man, are turned out against the Chickasaws; near two thousand of them it seems have started.

Charles Weatherford, by what I can learn, is doing all he can for the good of the United States; and I think, was he sure of your protection, would be a very useful man in that quarter against those Spanish commissaries, as there is one, I hear, just arrived at the Upper Creeks, and that rascal, Melford, is at the Tuckaubatchees. Weatherford has great influence in that quarter, and wants revenge from the Dons for making a prisoner of him. I think, if you were to give him instructions, and the same to Alexander Cornell, they would soon run off the Spanish commissary, as, while they are there, there will be no good talks from them towards us. Mr. McDonald, the bearer of this, informs me, that Mr. Panton and Governor O'Neal, both, are called home to the Court of Madrid, to answer to a complaint lodged there against them by the United States, and that a Colonel White is made Governor of Pensacola; the truth of this, a little time will make appear. Mr. Panton, I find, has sent very pressing for the head-men of the Upper and Lower Creeks to come down to him; but I have done all I can to stop the Lower towns, and wrote Alexander Cornell to stop the Upper towns, and believe there is no danger of any of them going, as the Chickasaws' war will help to keep them back. The Chickasaws have already killed some of the Cussetahs, near the Mobile, and carried off some children.

The Cussetahs are still as firm friends as ever, and I believe will do every thing they can to give satisfaction for what's done. Mr. Holmes has acquainted you fully with what has happened lately with the Covetas, on the upper frontier. I am almost afraid that such intermission taking place will put matters past being settled. Those villains, the Chehaws, when some of them gets killed for what they have done, will perhaps be for doing more mischief, to make matters general. They threaten Kinnard's life, as well as mine, about satisfaction being demanded; therefore I could do no more than what I have done. I expect I shall have to clear out from this, somewhere, soon, especially when some of the murderers get killed, which I expect will be as soon as they find that those Upper Creeks are turned back, without doing any mischief. I need not mention to you, as you are able to judge, what confusion there is at this time here. Every white man that is a friend to the United States is in danger, therefore cannot act as they would wish. I now expect Mordecai up every day from you; and, if affairs do not take too bad a turn, will set off to the Cussetahs, and, from that, to the Upper Creeks, and endeavor to do the best I can.

I would have stayed at the Cussetahs, but, if I had, I must have starved, as there is not a quart of corn to be bought there at any price, nor within seventy miles round.

Alexander Cornell says he does not know how to act respecting those Spanish commissaries, without you send him instructions how to act, which, I think, if you did, between him and Charles Weatherford, they would soon rout them. Yesterday Fed. Charves arrived here back from Carr's Bluff, on the Oconee, where he had been to conduct Aikens that far into Georgia, as he found it not safe to stay any longer at the Chehaws, nor yet to go the path from there down. Charves informs me that, while he was there, General Irwin, and the Brigadier General of the State, were laying out the ground for a fort at Carr's Bluff; and, by a letter I had from there, am informed, the next day they were to proceed to Long Bluff, and, from that, to the White Bluff, for the purpose of laying the ground out for two more forts, which I am glad to hear that there is some preparation making in that way, as I am much afraid there will be a call for forts before this matter ends. I wish it may not be the case. While Charves was at Carr's Bluff, there came a man just from one John Fords, who was shot at, at Ford's house, the house plundered, and Ford's wife stripped naked. Such things as these are enough to agitate the minds of the people on the frontier, not to spare one wherever they find them. This I know to be a party of the Chehaws, who went off to steal horses, since the murders were committed, and came up, just before Charves, with six or seven head.

The sooner you can despatch McDonald back with the letters the better, as Cornell and the Mad Dog will be very uneasy till he returns. Our friends, Cornell and Kinnard, both, by what I can learn, has neither slept nor ate much since this mischief has happened. Kinnard, I am told, keeps the American colors flying, and means to do so, and remain at home, if he hears of an army marching, and the Cussetah town means to follow the same step.

My best wishes for your health, &c.

ST. MARY'S, May 24, 1793.

SIR:

The last letter I had the honor of addressing to you was under date of the 30th ult. which I hope you have received. Since then, I have been using every means in my power to obtain satisfaction, and preserve peace to our country; but I am sorry to say my endeavors have not been successful. The intentions of the well-disposed part of the Creek nation, to give satisfaction to the United States, has been frustrated by the bad men of a few towns, who, dreading the consequence of what they had done, pushed out immediately to different parts of the frontier of Georgia, and have extended their outrages too far for the chiefs of the nation to be able to give satisfaction; and, therefore, the friendly towns have requested that an army may, without delay, be sent to destroy the following towns and people, as, without so doing, there can be no hope of peace. Those towns having disregarded all advice, and denied all authority of the nation, are now become a riotous, murdering banditti, and will continue so, and probably be joined by others, unless severely punished, and that speedily.

The towns who have injured this country, and are now thrown off by the nation, are as follows: The whole of the Covetas, Broken Arrow, a part of the Uchees, Usuchees, Big Tallassee, and a part of the Chehaws. By the enclosed copy of a talk which I received yesterday from Kinnard and others, you will be informed of the disposition of the nation. There is seven-eighths of the Creek nation that is really friendly to us, and will remain so, unless they are injured by parties from Georgia going in. This I dread. I fear there will be no discrimination; and, should they fall on the friendly towns, a general war is inevitable. But, if matters are properly conducted, and only the towns I have mentioned struck at, the business will shortly be over: for I am persuaded all the rest of the nation will sit still, and view with pleasure the chastisement those villains may receive. The good effects of punishing in this way would soon be felt; it would forever after deter parties in the nation acting against the general opinion, and will encourage our friends, and establish our reputation, and give them a confidence in the justice and wisdom of the United States. At this time, I see no alternative but that of giving the six towns I have mentioned a severe blow. You may rely that their number of warriors, of every class, does not exceed four hundred and twenty-five in all. A body of one thousand horsemen, under a cool, prudent commander, to push upon them as soon as possible, would do the business, and secure us peace; if delayed, the flame may spread, and our friends in the nation get discouraged. Permit me to suggest to you the propriety of sending to this frontier an experienced major general on the federal establishment, to take the command of such army as may go against the Creeks. There are generals of experience in our militia, as well as of ability; but I fear most of them would go into a war of this kind with ideas that a discrimination of friend from foe among Indians was ridiculous and absurd, and that, if left to them, it will shortly become a general business. This, I am persuaded, you will find to be the case; and let me tell those advocates for a general Creek war, that they will find it an obstinate, bloody business, as well as a ruinous burthen of expense to the United States. This, I know, is unpopular doctrine in Georgia, but I never shall withhold an opinion when I conceive it can be of service to my country. My candor, and uniform exertions to preserve peace, prevent misrepresentation; oppression, and abuse on the friendly Indians, has drawn the resentment of a certain class of people in this country upon me, and who will injure me if in their power; but I care not for them: I have done my duty faithfully, in every instance, which I can make appear to my employers whenever called on.

Dreading that the well-disposed in the nation would not be able to obtain satisfaction for the injuries done, and fearing that, in the end, the United States would be obliged to have recourse to arms, I considered it my duty to secure the friendship of as many towns as possible, as, by dividing them, the work would be sooner effected, and peace restored. All my late letters and talks to the chiefs held up the idea of protection to all friendly towns, and strongly urged their neutrality; and, by the talks now enclosed from them, you will see that it is a desirable object to a great part of the nation.

From the papers herewith, you will observe that the Spaniards continue to insult and injure the United States. It is a matter beyond all kind of doubt, with me, that what George Galphin swears to is an absolute fact; and I am further convinced, that the old Tallassee king was employed, from the same quarter, to murder on the Oconee; in short, that they are at the bottom of the whole mischief. The Spaniards are now establishing a strong post on the St. Mary's, at a place called Newhope, twelve miles above Colerain, and four below Trader's Hill. Colonel Howard (the late secretary) was at my house four days past, on his way up this river. He is appointed to the command on this frontier. I treated him as politely as possible, and, on the 22d instant, I called on him when on my way (by water) to Colerain. He is at present quartered about thirty miles from hence, but he only waits there for the arrival of the troops from St. Augustine, who are momentarily expected. He made great professions of friendship on the part of his country toward the United States. I cautiously avoided saying a word that give could offence, or create a suspicion; and, in return, made a tender of our best offices whilst he remained on this frontier.

On the 18th instant, Mr. Payne, the king, and head chiefs of the Seminole Indians, arrived at Colerain, accompanied by twenty-one of his people; they remained with me until yesterday afternoon. I talked a great deal to them, and gave them such advice as I thought suitable on the present occasion, and state of Indian affairs. I am happy in being able to inform you that I have been able to detach them from every idea of joining the disaffected towns, and of having received from Mr. Payne and his chiefs the most solemn assurance of continuing in peace with the United States. I found Payne a very sensible, discreet Indian, and well informed. I paid him every attention, gave him and his people handsome presents, and sent them home well pleased. The Spaniards did all in their power to prevent this man's meeting me, by telling him a number of falsehoods, and making use of every low artifice to injure us in the opinion of those people. They have been disappointed, and I believe my friend Howard is not a little mortified, as he came post ahead of his troops to meet Payne, and with him an interpreter, which he, with other emissaries, sent to Colerain to meet P. on his arrival, and to lead them astray; but they were discovered, and properly attended to. Payne has determined to remove the whole of his people down to Cape-Florida, which is their hunting ground, and there remain, until the present troubles are over.

Panton, with two Spanish agents, are, by this time, in the Creek nation, under pretence of making peace between them and the Chickasaws. Probably this is part of their business, but their great object is to destroy our interest with the Indians, and, at all events, bring on a general savage war.

The seeds of the present troubles were sown by McGillivray and Panton, and they are now coming to maturity, owing, in some measure, to our over delicacy. We have had the means in our power to have made them repent of their unjust interference; and I think it is not yet too late.

The humane and worthy Governor O'Neal, of Pensacola, is promoted to the very lucrative government of Campeachy, for his faithful and unwearied services, in distressing us through the savages. A Major White, who, you may remember, came with Mr. Gardoqui to Philadelphia, is at present Governor of Pensacola. Howard is a man full of intrigue, and a bitter Spaniard. I think we shall find him troublesome.

Governor Telfair declares this State in alarm, since the 20th of April, but what measures he is taking, either offensive or defensive, I know not. I have given him regular information at all times, since my appointment, of every occurrence which concerned Georgia to know; but he has never deigned a reply to any of my communications.

Brigadier General Gunn has been with me for some time, making arrangements of the militia, and establishing posts. I was happy to see him here, as he will be able to give you a true and impartial state of matters. He has promised to write you. Major Butler has also been in our neighborhood some weeks; he will be able also to inform you of our situation. I cannot finish this letter, without again calling your attention to the conduct of the Spaniards, who most undoubtedly are determined to involve us in a general war with the Creeks. It matters not what their professions of friendship to our country are, their actions justify my opinion.

Should Spanish intrigue, or the rage of our countrymen, rouse all the Creeks against us, then my advice would be, a decided blow: for, to look to savages, so stated, for peace, before corrected, would be courting insult, and in the end prove abortive.

The mode of correction, in my humble opinion, would be best effected by a body of troops, under General Sevier, or some other of that country, well acquainted with such warfare, to fall in upon them from the westward. As many as can conveniently be sent from the frontier of South Carolina; under General Pickens, this, with the whole mounted force of Georgia, to march into the nation in different directions, and at the same instant destroying all before them. Five thousand men, thus disposed, will destroy the whole of the Creek towns in one month, and bring them to sue for peace on any terms. Whilst this is going forward, I would advise the whole of the frontier of Georgia to be well guarded, by the foot militia, as well to cover the country from skulking parties, as to secure the return of the troops on the expedition, if found necessary. The season, when the corn is fit to use, which will be in the fall, would be most suitable, on account of supplies for our horses, and distress of the enemy. Beef is plenty in that country at all seasons. I have taken measures to keep the Chickasaws and them engaged, until we see how matters go. The Indians in general are extremely alarmed, and if attacked on different quarters, and at the same time with spirit, will speedily be conquered. The Spaniards in Florida, and their spies here, give the Indians full information of all our movements. It is impossible to prevent this, whilst there is a free intercourse between Florida and Georgia.

I have prevented this frontier from breaking up, so far; and, from our exertions, and putting a good face on matters, not an Indian has appeared in this country since the murders in March. Much mischief, I find, has, and continues to be done, on other parts of Georgia less exposed, and much more populous than we are. I find, by accounts from the nation, that one Coweta Indian is killed, and two wounded, on the Oconee. Having communicated all that appears material at present,

I remain, &c.

Talk from Kinnard and other Chiefs.

The Cussetah King, the Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatchee, the White Lieutenant, and myself, have sent you an answer to your talk sent by our friend George Galphin:

HITCHETA TOWN, 16th May, 1793.

MY FRIEND:

When the Indians killed Mr. Fleming, and some others on St. Mary's, I received a letter from you which surprised me and the rest of your friends very much. We all know very well that when we held the talk with you at the treaty, that if there should be any mischief done on either side, that satisfaction was to be given: But, when the people heard they were to be delivered to you, the Tallassee King raised the affair again, and sent out, and had more killed; so that we could do nothing in it. The heads of your friend towns were determined to give satisfaction; but, after there were so many of your people killed, it was out of our power to do any more with them. The names of the towns that was always against the frontiers is, the Cowetas, Broken Arrow, Uchees, Usechees, and the Tallassee; there was some of the Chehaws, that done the first mischief, but it was a talk from the Usechees that made them turn out; but they have left their town, and has gone and joined the others, and what is left of them is all peaceable, and are your friends. I have talked until I am tired, likewise the Cussetah King, and the rest of our head-men, but to no purpose; so that the only plan we have concluded on, is, to send your people up, and give them one drubbing, and burn their towns, and drive what property they have out of the land, and without this is done, you may depend you never will get satisfaction. The Cussetahs is your friends, and lives between the Cowetas and the Uchees, and hope they won't be hurt, as they mean to lie still. If the white people should come by the Buzzard Roost, they and the Cussetahs are all one town. There is a way to cross above the Roost, straight to the Cowetas, but, I hope they won't be at a loss for a pilot. There is two men now at the Rock Landing, one Joe Ireland, and one Donnelly, that knows every path to this country. So I would have you do just as we advise you, and not to hurt any that lives at the Roost; and, I hope if any should come the road to my house, that they will not frighten our women and children, for they might run into the woods and perish. Now, my friend, I have advised you all I can, and if you should hurt any of my people round about me, I will not think well of it. When you send up to take a brush with these towns, perhaps there may be some about, that may want to join them, and if there should be any, and I should be alive till then, I will let you know. The five towns is all that are against you which I have mentioned; there is the Tallapoosa river and the Coosa river are all our friends. I am informed General Clarke is raising men to come against those Indians, and if he should meet any friendly Indians out a hunting I hope they won't be hurt. You will oblige me very much, when you receive this, to send it up immediately to General Clarke, and the rest of the officers on the frontiers. I hope that they will not come this way, that I may be contented in my house, as my people are very scary.

The mad people here says that the white people always says they are coming to drive them, and that they can't come, they are afraid. I shall be glad to hear from you.

I remain, &c.

Galphin's Deposition.

GEORGIA, Camden County:

Before me, James Seagrove, one of the justices assigned to keep the peace of the said county, personally appeared George Galphin, who, being duly sworn, deposed and saith, that he was at the house of John Kinnard, in the Hitcheta town, in the Lower Creeks, on, or about, the 9th instant, when a certain James Burges, an Indian trader, who lives on the lower part of Flint river, came to said house in consequence of a letter sent to him some time before by Mr. Kinnard, accusing said Burges of being knowing to, and concerned in, the murder and robbery, at Trader's Hill, on the river St. Mary's; said Burges, in presence of this deponent, endeavored to acquit himself of having any part therein, further than that he knew mischief would be done, as he then positively declared, that three Indians came to his (Burges') house, who informed him they were direct from Pensacola, and sent by the Governor of that place, and a Mr. Panton, a well known Indian trader, partner of the house of Panton, Leslie, & Co. of Florida, with positive directions from those men to take hair (as they term scalping) from the Americans, living on the river St. Mary's; and that their orders were not to return to their employers, without committing murder on the Americans. That Burges further declared that those three Indians were joined by a party of Indians belonging to the town where the said Burges lives; and proceeded together to St. Mary's, where they killed Capt. John Fleming, and Daniel Moffit, and robbed the store of Robert Seagrove; and said Burges also declared, that he saw the three Indians, before mentioned, on their return from St. Mary's towards Pensacola; that they were loaded with goods, the plunder of Robert Seagrove's store, and had with them the scalps of Captain Fleming and Mr. Moffit. That Burges also said, he firmly believed that the Governor of Pensacola and Panton were the means of having the said persons murdered, and robberies committed. Burges acknowledged that his brother-in-law, an Indian, was one of the party at Trader's Hill, but denied that his own son was there. Further this deponent saith not.

GEORGE GALPHIN.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Justice of the Peace.

James Aiken's Deposition.

DISTRICT OF GEORGIA, }
City of Savannah: }

Personally appeared before me, James Aiken, late a resident of the Creek nation, who, being duly sworn, maketh oath, that, about twenty-two days since, he left the Creek nation, when the Chehaws and Oakmulgees, and the Hitchetas towns, were in a restless situation, and there was no probability of the demand of Mr. Seagrove being complied with. Kinnard, the principal man in the district from whence the perpetrators of the mischief came, pressed them very hard to comply, but the head-men and warriors of the different towns told him in answer, that Mr. Seagrove's talks, in behalf of the United States, were too hard, and that they had no reply to make, until the nation at large determined the matter. They had proposed to give up the plunder, until Mr. S's talks came, demanding those who had done the mischief and committed the murders, when the Indians turned in to killing the cattle which they had taken. That, previous to his leaving the Chehaw town, where he resided, the Old Far-off King, and the second man of the town, with another, had left it, under the apprehensions of the white people making an attack on them, and taking satisfaction, and that a number of others were preparing to remove also; that the Chehaw's party alone took upwards of seventy head of cattle, fifty-three of which belonged to a Mr. Regan, a negro fellow, and a negro wench and child, wearing apparel, and household furniture, and even a bible belonging to the same person, (Mr. Regan;) that the Chehaw party brought in four scalps, but that he has not seen any of the party which robbed Mr. S. as they lived forty miles below the Chehaws, and were a part of the Seminole Indians; that one of the Chehaw Indians, known by the name of Savanoeca, and who was one appointed by the Creek nation to run the line between the St. Mary's and the Altamaha, and who, on his return, was asked by the deponent how he had been treated, and replied that Major S. had treated him very well, as Mr. Ellicott had done also, and that he was perfectly satisfied, and had received, to this deponent's knowledge, two hundred dollars, was one of the party who killed the travellers between Setillas and St. Mary's; that Kinnard desired the deponent to write to Burges, a white man, in the Seminole towns, in Kinnard's name, previous to Major S's talks arriving in the nation; that the proceedings of the hostile Indians, of which number Burges' son was one, was disagreeable to the nation at large, and that, if they persisted, the nation would throw them off, requesting that the property taken might be lodged in his (Burges') hands, to be delivered to Kinnard, who proposed to return it; that Burges' answer was, that the principal people who murdered the two persons at Mr. S's store had come ahead of the rest of the party, (three in number) and had taken the goods they had plundered in a boat, and had hid them in a swamp, and proceeded immediately on to Pensacola with the scalps they had taken, to the Spanish Governor and Mr. Panton; that the rest of the party, as soon as they returned, called at his (Burges') house, when he made them acquainted with Kinnard's demand, when they likewise told him they had left the property they had plundered in the woods, but would not agree to give it up; that Kinnard was still faithful to the Americans, and had the United States' standard flying in his yard when the deponent came off, and informed the deponent that he would continue it flying, and that if any American parties came he would receive them with it. A number of others told the deponent also that they would fly to those colors for safety; that he knows nothing more respecting the proceedings in the nation; but after he resided in the settlement of the State, he stayed two days at Captain Harrison's, near Carr's Bluff, on the Oconee, when he proceeded down the Oconee, in order to take the Altamaha path in his way to Mr. S.; after travelling about twenty-five miles, he took up at the house of a Mr. Barryhill, and shortly after, being in bed, the family were alarmed by the dogs and cattle in the yard, which they supposed to be occasioned by wolves; but in the morning, when the deponent got up to proceed, he found his horses were gone, with five head of horses belonging to Mr. Barryhill, and, on hunting for them, the deponent discovered the Indian tracks, and followed the Indians about two miles in one direction, but finding they were not to be overtaken, the deponent, and those who were with him, returned to Barryhill's house, and the deponent, going back to Harrison's house to get another horse, which he had left there, followed the track of three Indians up to the plantation of Francis Pugh, Esq. where he saw his son lay dead, having been killed, and twice scalped by that party; that there he was informed by Barryhill himself, who was not at home when the mischief was committed at his house, that the night before he was at Harrison's, and that another party of Indians had also come there, and had taken three head of horses from thence, when the deponent thought it dangerous to return to Harrison's, and came through the county of Ogechee on foot.

The deponent, James Aiken, in continuation, maketh oath, that he was made to understand in the Creek nation, that Major S. had demanded the reasons why the Indians committed depredations on the white people; the Indians informed the deponent it was from talks the Creeks had received from the Shawanese Indians, and what J. Galphin had told them respecting Seagrove and the United States; the deponent is of opinion, that Kinnard is head-man of the Lower Creeks; that an Indian runner came from Panton's store, in St. Mary's, requesting the Indians of the Chehaw town to come and get arms and ammunition from Panton's store, on which the head-men requested the deponent, being a trader there, to go and fetch such arms and ammunition.

FLINT RIVER, 9th April, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

Your express, by the two Indians, of the 28th March, was handed to me last evening by Mr. Aiken, who is this far on his way to the settlements of Georgia, as he finds it will not be safe for him to remain at the Chehaws any longer; as it is not improbable, as they have heard of your demand for satisfaction, and as there is so many of that town concerned in the mischief, that they may turn out desperate. Some of them has already said, that it would be good to put Kinnard and myself out of the way, as we are instruments of setting the other towns against them. This was said before your demand was known, and expect it will make them much inveterate against us both. For my own part, as I know their disposition so well, I look upon myself in imminent danger. Kinnard is on a better footing. Nevertheless, my attachment to my country's service still sticks by me, and I shall stand it as long as I can, and will exert myself to execute your instructions as far as my present dangerous situation will admit of, so as not to throw myself quite into the power of savage cruelty. Mr. Aiken can fully satisfy you, on how ticklish a foundation a white man's life stands, at this juncture, so near those villains, who know they have no other steps to take to prolong their own lives a little longer than to strive to make the matter general, as they now find the mouths of the heads of the chiefs of the nation are open against them. Long before this, I imagine, Mordecai has reached you. The despatches you will receive by him will inform you, somewhat, of the disposition of the rest of the nation, which, at my meeting at the Cussetahs, seemed to bear every prospect of peace and friendship with the subjects of the United States; some few of the Cowetas seemed a little tainted with inveteracy, which was owing to the Shawanese talks, and a good deal owing to the frontier settlers driving over their cattle, horses, and hogs, on this side of the river; but, as I, previous to that meeting, had wrote down to Major Gaither, to obtain such measures, and had his letter to explain to them at the treaty that the stocks were all drove back; by such convincing proofs as these that I laid before them, letting them see that every officer under the President of the United States would readily contribute to remove any acts of injustice done them; that, and through the assistance of the White Lieutenant, of the Oakfuskees, and the Mad Dog, of the Tuckaubatches, I prevailed on the Cowetas to lay still till you came, assuring them that you would remove every reasonable obstacle that prove injurious to the peace of the nation with the United States. Their eager desire for your immediate arrival in the nation will serve to convince you that they were fully satisfied of your good intentions towards them, which, if it had not been for this villanous piece of business of the Chehaws, I had not the smallest doubt but you would have had it in your power to have settled every matter to your satisfaction. As to the line, I had fully convinced the chief of the heads, the necessity there was of having it marked, as the intentions of it, I told them, was more for the benefit of the Indians than the whites. I was much more in dread of mischief breaking out up ahead than where it did, which made me pay my whole attention to that quarter, as the Shawanese were fixed amongst them; besides, as Kinnard was so near them, and you had put him in authority over them, I had not the smallest idea of danger in that quarter; nevertheless, I, about fifteen days before, started for the Cussetahs, went down there, and there was only two men in the town, the Far-off King, and one other; I went to the Far-off King, and as he was not down at the treaty, made him fully acquainted with every particular matter; charged him to restrain his young people from horse stealing, or any other depredations; acquainted him fully with the bad consequences that would attend, if such practices were still pursued. Still, this old villain, I find, was one of the most active perpetrators of this mischief; there was but few of them started from the town, but two villains went off each side of the path, and collected men as they went, telling them falsehoods, that all the other towns were on the way out to war. Shall leave you to Mr. Aiken for particulars in this matter, as it is too late to recall what's done, so must do the best we can to make matters better or worse. By every information I can get, the Chehaws were returning back with cattle, and had taken no lives till they had passed Trader's hill, and on hearing what that desperado Galphin had done, then went back and killed and plundered those people near Colerain. I have long dreaded some such consequences from that man, as I always knew him capable of every thing that was bad.

I hope you will not put any confidence in his brother, so as to send him up on business, as he is not to be depended on; he pressed me to write you in his favor, which you may observe in my letter, as I only mentioned to you to assist him to make his way good to Savannah, as he pressed very hard on me, for which I thought would be as ready a way, as any, to get him clear of the nation, as I was afraid from his situation, if his brother and he got together in the nation, no good would arise from it. As soon as your talks are made known in the Cussetahs, I shall send Mr. Holmes to Alexander Cornell, in the Upper. I shall endeavor to impress every thing on the minds of the heads of the nation, that I can discern will prove any ways effectual to urge your present requisite demand; but, though seasonable and just as it appears in our eyes, some of even our friends will say, that it was too much to demand more than man for man, is what I believe a great many of the heads of the nation will try to effect; but were they even willing to try to give up all, or even half of the offenders, they would not be able to effect it; however, a little time, I imagine, will convince us of our fate in this quarter. I wish I may, and all of my color in this land, live to see an end to the present rupture. Kinnard is doing all he can to urge them to give satisfaction; if a satisfactory one cannot be obtained, and there is preparations making for a march of troops into this land, pray let me be acquainted with it as quick as ever you can. Kinnard, I hear, means to stand his ground, and all the Cussetahs; and a number more of other towns are determined to stay, to separate themselves off from those that are determined for war. I think if such a thing can be done, such characters ought to be taken notice of, and some place appointed for them to collect at, where they may save their lives. I have a large family myself, and do not know what to advise them to do, unless some such steps are like to be taken, as I do not know how soon I may be run off from them. I have just been informed of fresh threats from the Chehaws against my life, by Ted Charves, who has half an hour ago just arrived from there. That villain Galphin has done me the injustice to say, that I was the cause of his not being appointed an officer in this land, and said he would be even with you and me both for it; he told the Chehaw Indians there was several hogsheads of rum in the vessel at Colerain, and that I had stopped you from issuing out to them, and many more such injurious speeches, which has made those murdering villains so much the more inveterate against me; but all shall not hinder me from trying all schemes to get him taken down to you, if I am obliged to run for my life afterwards. If I see matters likely to take a favorable turn, I shall immediately send off an Indian runner to you, opposite Colerain, on the Spanish side; his signal will be four quick repeated whoops, which you may, or any one there may, distinguish from any other Indian, bad or good. You may expect to hear from me soon.

If I am alive and able to stay here, would go in and stay in the Cussetahs, but there is not ten bushels of corn in the whole town, nor not to be bought within eighty miles of it, neither have I any thing left to buy it, as what little goods I had left on hand, have been obliged to expend, sending expresses about by Indians, and buying provisions to support a large family. Should be happy to hear from you as quick as possible, after you receive this; have now troubled you with a large letter, and bearer, Mr. Aikens, is just starting, as he seems a good deal frightened, and not without cause. Mr. Aikens had acted very much like a friend to yourself and the United States, and has had a great deal of trouble ever since he came up, assisting Kinnard; if you have it in your power, he is deserving of every help you can render him in his present situation. I have begged him to forward this to you as quick as possible. No more at present from, dear sir, your distressed friend, &c.

KINNARD'S COW-PEN, 12th May, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I arrived here yesterday, where I have met Mr. George Galphin, as I heard he was in the country. I sent in to the Cussetah King to meet me here, and another of the heads; accordingly they have. Mr. Galphin has been so bad with the rheumatism, ever since he arrived here, he has not been able to go about; part of my business here, was to try to get a woman, to have her sent back and her child, that is just, I hear, carried by into the Chehaw town, on the other river; for which purpose, I came by the Chehaw town on Flint river, below me, and brought five or six of them to Kinnard's, of the heads of the town, to assist in the business, as all that are left there at this time, are they that are for peace, and chief of them friends to us. The murdering and plundering villains are all moved into the Big Chehaws, on the other river, and carried off all their property; therefore, all the violators of peace are very near together, on the river Chattahoochie. The Cowetas are the highest up on the river; the Uchees, ten miles below that; the Chehaws, and the Usechees, both on one spot, three miles below that; which are the only towns that have been the cause of all this mischief, and are still keeping it up.

The towns below are lying quiet, and will hear no bad talks; the Cussetahs are on the east side of the Chattahoochee river, four miles below the Cowetas, which have, and are doing all they can, to stop matters, and picked out the men that were to die for satisfaction, before your first talk came up; but the Chehaw villains expected how it would be, and some of them had gone out again to do mischief, before your first letter came up, which put them to a stand to see what would be done; and they have kept up the game ever since, which is gone to such lengths now, that the heads see that its out of their power to kill man for man. The Cussetah king and Mr. Kinnard has concluded to send Mr. Galphin down to you, and let you know that all that can be done is, for a sufficient number of horsemen to come up, and cross above the Cowetas, and to burn, kill, and destroy, all they can find in them four towns, and that they will be sure to meet with no opposition from any of the other towns, and for my part, I see no other remedy; but there is one thing to be feared; without some very good commander should come, such a one as Major Gaither, the up-country people, will be for making no distinction, and fall on the poor Cussetahs, as they are so near; if they do, it will make the matter general, which would be, I think, a great pity that so many towns should suffer for what the villains of four or five towns have done, and the rest are all lying still. Those Chehaw villains sent the war-whoop down to the town below them; they told them not to bring it there, but to go to the Cowetas with it, as they were of the same way of thinking as themselves. The Cussetah king begs me to write to you, to strive to keep the Rock Landing path open from them, and from that to the Buzzard Roost, on to the Cussetah town, as they never mean to lift up arms till the whites fall on them, nor none of the towns in the Upper Creeks, except them rascally Shawanese that lives there, and the Tallassee King's people, which are now he says, stopped. The Cowetas passed a man, shot through the head, the other day, both his ears cut off, and scalped, and another wounded through the hand. The Cussetah king, and all his town, and Kinnard's, think the sooner the Cowetas get a rout the better, as they talk of moving off the Pea creek, near half way to Pensacola. I was trying if the Cussetah king and Kinnard, if they could not raise four or five towns and fall on those towns, and take satisfaction, but they said it was not in their power; as I told them it would be dangerous to bring the white people in their land, they seemed to say it could not be done. There has six people been killed up above the Rock Landing, four below Carr's bluff, a woman and child carried off from the Hoppees; Captain Milligan immediately sent off to me about the woman, by a mulatto that speaks the Indian tongue. I have got the head warriors of the Chehaws on this river, that had no hand in the mischief, to send in with the Cussetah king to get her, and send her to my place, which I hope will be done, and I will send her down well guarded, to Captain Milligan, at Baskett's bluff; it's a pity there was not some assistance sent to Captain Milligan before this, as he has but seven or eight people with him there, and sometimes less; I expected daily to hear of him being killed and robbed; it's very necessary, I think, a station should be kept there, as it is a mean crossing place; they have killed one man within a mile of his little fort. I had letters a few days ago, from the Rock Landing, by two Indians that I sent down, to guard Mr. Holmes and Mr. Garvin, and one Hutcheson, which came up to my house from that quarter. I am informed General Clarke has got two thousand five hundred men ready to start for the nation, and am afraid, if he starts before he hears from you, that he will kill all, without distinction. I wish he may not be started before this; Major Gaither, in his letter to me, seemed to dread some such consequence. I wish he may be stopped, till he hears who is his friends; as, if he makes a breach on the Cussetahs, it is all over with peace in this quarter. There is news come to the nation, that there is three Spanish officers to come through the Chickasaws, and to come to the Creeks, and Pantan is to meet them there, and give out their talks. I would wish to go and oppose them, but there is one thing against me—I have no commission to shew, if I should fall into their hands. The Indians, all over the nation, are much frightened; the offenders are more so than peaceable towns; there is not one out of twenty or thirty, that will offer to take up arms, if they were sure they and their towns would be spared; you are the best able to judge what to do for them. Kinnard is determined to write you fully what to do with the murdering towns.

I am, dear sir, respectfully, &c.

The answer of Mr. Payne, the great Seminole and Lackaway King, to James Seagrove, Agent of Indian Affairs, delivered at Colerain, on the river St. Mary's.

RIVER ST. MARY'S, in Georgia, 22d May, 1793.

FATHER, BROTHER, AND FRIEND:

I have opened my ears, and heard your talk. Your talk is a good talk, but I cannot answer all you have said to-day. I must consult my people first, and then I will give my talk to-morrow. We Indians don't know so much as the white people. I have been here some days, me and my people, and your people have used us like brothers; and, as I told you before, I will give you a talk to-morrow.

THURSDAY, 23d May, 1793.

I am going to talk with you, my father, brother, and friend. The sun is high, and I am near parting with you, but I shall give you my talk first. The man above made us all, and we are one people. I speak to you as having one father and one mother.

I have been told by our old people, that the great water covered all the world, and drowned all the people, except a few which was in a house on the water. Whether this is the place where the house was, I do not know.

I was told the great water divided the world in seven different parts, and this part (America) was given to the red people. And when the white people first came to this part, the red people was afraid of the white people, but, on seeing them a few times, they ventured to speak to one another. When they got acquainted, the white people planted corn, and agreed that the white people should feed the red people, and be the red people's fathers; and the white people were to run a line through their country.

We are ignorant people; we know nothing, and had hardly any thing to eat. You have clothed us and fed us a long time. I am glad I have met with such a beloved man as you are. I have often heard of you before, and of your good talks, but now I see you, and find it is all true, and I take you by the hand, as you have taken me, and I hope we shall both keep fast hold in peace and friendship.

BROTHER: I am sorry to hear that our red people have done so much mischief against your people. I will send all my people out of the way, and I hope we shall meet sooner than you expect, in peace and friendship, to live like brothers.

If you have any thing to give me and my people, we shall be glad to have it. I have nothing more to say, only that I will do as you have told and advised me. I know it is right, and for our good.

The speech of Niocfaw Mico, or Sick King, a Seminole.

MY GOOD FATHER, FRIEND, AND BROTHER:

You seem to be afraid that we cannot keep our young warriors from joining the mad people, and going to war against you. But you need not be afraid. I am the speaker of the towns, and I shall send all our people out of the way. Our people are not like the people in the mad towns. Our towns never used any white men ill, but always used them well, and always will.

I am now talking with one tongue, and what I say is true. Your talk is a good talk, and it will not dry up soon with us. We know it is better to keep peace, as you have told us, and, as we have said before, we will do as you have told us.

James Seagrove to the Secretary of War.

TOWN OF ST. MARY'S, 14th June, 1793.

About ten days past, a party of Indians were discovered near the post at Colerain, who came in freely and of their own accord. They all appear to be Cussetahs, and are eight in number, viz: four men, three lads from 15 to 18 years, and a little boy about seven years. Two of the men I know to be Cussetahs; they were with me at the Rock Landing for some time.

The account they give of themselves is, "that they have been out from home for upwards of two months, hunting on this frontier, from the Oakmulgee to the St. Mary's, during which time they have not seen a white or red person; that when they left home, it was determined by the chiefs to give satisfaction for the injuries done this country, which they expected had taken place, and therefore went out on their hunts as usual; that they never heard a word of any mischief being done but that on this frontier, in March last, until informed by me; that they are our friends, as is every man of their town."

I am led to believe their account in part is just, but as to their not having seen Indians since being out, I do not believe, as they must have seen and known of parties of Indians coming in and going out upon mischief.

At any other time but the present undetermined state of matters, and whilst the spirit of the Georgians appears so violent against every lenient measure toward an Indian, I should not have had a thought of detaining those people. But I am well convinced, that, had I suffered them to return home, the clamor in this State would be intolerable, and that all future mischief would be attributed thereto. Considering well those matters, and those people's coming appearing in rather a questionable manner, and I having found four horses in their possession, which were taken from people of this county within two months past, this, and other matters, has induced me to detain them, as well from a view of preventing reflections on the servants of the Union, as to secure the persons of those people from the resentment of hot-headed men among us, and, at the same time, to prevent them from attributing any mischief that may hereafter be done to the Cussetah town people, as those were out on our frontier, and had seen our situation. I do not, by any means, consider those men as prisoners of war, nor shall I treat them as such. They shall be treated with humanity, and want for nothing to make their detention sit light on them. I shall take measures to make their town acquainted with the reason of their detention, and doubt not I can satisfy them that it is meant for their ultimate good.

One of them, who appeared an obstinate stubborn man, cut his own throat in the night of the 11th instant, in the house where they are lodged. He kept his intentions from his companions, and committed the act so silent, as not to be discovered until expiring. He had a brother in the room, who, with all the rest, agree that it was his own act, and that no one is to blame in any respect. I think it proceeded from there being a sentinel placed at their door, and to attend them when allowed to walk out to take the air; this being necessary for their detention and preservation. His brother tells me that he expressed a dislike thereto, the afternoon before, but in a distant way.

I am very much at a loss what to do with those people. Should they be called for by the Governor of Georgia, I shall feel embarrassed: for, if they are removed from this place, I know not what would be the consequence to them. I am not without fears that an attempt may be made by white people to take them, in order to destroy them. I wish to receive your instructions what I am to do with them, and as soon as possible.

I have written General Jackson, who commands the militia of this division of Georgia, respecting those Indians, and the appearance of more being on our frontier, a copy of which I enclose you.

Yesterday the Spaniards evacuated their post, lately established on the upper part of this river, and have removed to the river St. John's, where, I am told, they are going to fortify. I suspect this sudden movement is owing to their having just received the accounts of a war between them and France.

I have not heard of any mischief being done by the Indians on the frontier of Georgia, since my last.

James Seagrove to Major General James Jackson.

TOWN OF ST. MARY'S, 12th June, 1793. Friday Morning, 9 o'clock.

DEAR GENERAL:

About eight days past, a small party of Indians appeared in the vicinity of the fort at Colerain. They first made their appearance to one of Captain Randolph's company, who was out taking care of horses, and came to the fort without hesitation, or the least appearance of fear. I had them closely examined. I find them to be Cussetahs, eight in number, viz: four men, three lads, and a little boy about seven or eight years old. Three of the men I know to be Cussetahs, having been with me at the Rock Landing. They pretend to have been from home upwards of two months hunting, and knew of no other mischief being done to the frontier of Georgia, except that on this part in March last.

They did not bring any letters or papers to me from their chiefs, or from my deputy; and their story and manner of coming at this time appearing to me rather mysterious, I conceived myself justifiable in detaining them. I therefore had them brought to this place, and confined in fort St. Tammany, where I shall keep them close prisoners until I receive orders to the contrary from the Executive of the United States, or the Governor of Georgia. Although those people may be perfectly innocent as to any bad design against this country, yet such is the situation of affairs at present, that I conceived myself justifiable in detaining them, from a variety of reasons.

For three days past, the scouts from Colerain have discovered the trail or track of foot and horse, supposed to be Indians. I received an express late last evening, from the commandant at the above station, informing, that many tracks had been discovered yesterday morning; some of them within a mile and a half of that place; that he had sent out two parties to endeavor, if possible, to discover them; that the track bore towards the burnt fort, on Setilla, and Lemon's ferry, a few miles above; from which I must conclude they intend something against Glynn or Liberty. I shall despatch a boat with notice to Glynn county as soon as it is ascertained that they have crossed Setilla. Last night, one of the Indians confined in fort St. Tammany, cut his own throat with a knife which he had secreted in the prison. His companions knew nothing of it, until awoke by the noise he made when suffocating.

They all say it was his own act, and no person is to blame, as he had no cause, he, and all of them, being well treated. I have also prisoner, a Chehaw fellow, that was taken the day after the murders at Trader's Hill, and made his escape from the fort at this place. He went into Florida, and was much caressed there. He came opposite to the station at Colerain, and was invited over; having heard of some threats he made use of while in Florida, I thought it as well to keep him secure. These prisoners may probably bring unpleasant visitors. Be that as it may, nothing shall prevent me doing what I conceive to be my duty. I have not a doubt but I shall be censured by some for detaining those Indians, but I have long since been taught to know that it is in vain to attempt to please all. My actions are directed by what I conceive just and right. This I shall invariably pursue, without paying the smallest regard to the babbling vulgar, or designing party creature: not even the combined wisdom of the grand jury of Chat-ham, and their presentments, shall ever alter my purposes.

Our duty in this county becomes very heavy on those who are disposed to defend their country. We have a number of disaffected bad men, who refuse any assistance, and have taken themselves off to Cumberland island, and others to Florida. We are greatly in want of arms for those who are willing to do all in their power. At least one-third are without a gun. Captain Randolph's company of volunteer horse musters now upwards of sixty-five young men, but they partly want swords and pistols. Pray, sir, assist us, if possible, with those articles, as they may be the means of saving our country. I shall not close this letter till I hear from Colerain.

Friday, 14th June.—By an express, I have just received from Captain Randolph, at Colerain, dated this morning, I have the pleasure to tell you, that the tracks which have been seen for some days, prove, on close examination, to be no other than that of the Indians who are now in confinement at this place. I had a boat ready to despatch to Glynn and Liberty, had the accounts been unfavorable.

In addition to all our other misfortunes, the contractor's agent is now without a single pound of bread or flour to issue to the troops on actual duty. Unless supplies arrive in a day or two, it will be impossible for the men to keep together. I hope you will inquire into the cause of such horrid neglect.

If this county should be obliged to break, Glynn cannot stand, and, of course, Liberty will be much more exposed. There is no provision in the county, or it would be procured.

ST. MARY'S, 6th July, 1793.

SIR:

I had the honor of writing to you on the 14th ultimo, since which I am without any of your letters. The present will inform you of a very disagreeable affair which took place on this frontier on the 30th ultimo, which is as follows, so far as I have been able to discover. A man of the name of McDonald, who I had sent to the nation with letters, was on his return to me, and arrived at the station at Colerain, on the St. Mary's, on the morning of the above date. He, being well known to the commanding officer, was questioned as to the news from the nation, and the state of matters there. His replies appear to have been unfavorable and contradictory; and when asked for his despatches, he said some Indians had them behind, who he had left the day before. He told the officer that he had reason to think the said Indians returned back to the nation, and by this, he supposed the Creeks all at war with the States. These accounts appear to have alarmed the officers and men not a little, who were anxious to recover the despatches, and know a true state of affairs. A party of seven horsemen was ordered to go in quest of those Indians, accompanied by McDonald, and to conduct them to the station as friends.

The party set off, but about a mile from the station, McDonald declined going forward, and returned; the seven horsemen went on, and about ten miles from Colerain, fell in with four Indians, who it appears made a shew of resistance, upon which they were charged on, and it is said, were all killed. I received advice of this unfortunate affair same evening, about 9 o'clock, and next morning set off for Colerain, to get full information. About twenty miles from town, I met a party of horse, and McDonald in custody. Here I received my despatches, which were found in one of the Indian's packs, copies of which I now transmit; by them you will be informed of the favorable situation I had got matters to, and the pleasing prospect of all coming right ere long.

David Cornell, son of Joseph Cornell, who was interpreter at New York, was killed, and a boy. The other two Indians (I have reason to believe) though wounded, have gone off, and made their way home to the nation, as their bodies were not to be found next day. I have McDonald in custody, and shall detain him until this matter can be fully investigated.

The killing of Cornell at this critical juncture, may occasion a little more bloodshed; but from the steps I have taken, and the manner I have explained it to his friends, and to the nation, I do not view it in so bad a light as some do. Enclosed you have copies of my letters sent to the nation on this occasion. I certainly should have gone into the nation if Cornell had not been killed, but until I know how they will act thereon, I think it would be unwise. As soon as I can have an opening, and a promise from some leading characters of protection, I will be there: the necessity is great.

In addition to the preceding untoward affair, the mighty expedition from the western frontier of Georgia has proved abortive. It appears to have been illy planned, and worse provided and conducted. About 450 horse, and 300 foot, crossed the Oconee near the Rock Landing, under command of a Major General, and three Brigadiers, who proceeded as far as the Oakmulgee, when a mutinous spirit took possession of a majority of officers and men, who left the camp and returned home. This obliged the remainder to abandon their plan of giving a blow to the Cowetas, and other disaffected towns, and to return home.

After so much parade and expectation, and nothing being done, it is natural to suppose the unfriendly Indians will represent it in the most unfavorable light. I, therefore, conceived it a necessary piece of policy to give it as favorable a construction as possible; which you will see in my letter to the nation. I hope what I have said will not be thought improper.

It having (I am told) been insinuated, in order no doubt to injure me, that I had concern in Indian trade with my brother Robert, I have sent you my affidavit on that head; my employers and friends only, I wish to satisfy on this and every other matter. As to the malicious attacks of the anti-federal and Yazoo gang of Georgia, I care not; indeed I think there would be room to suspect me of fidelity to the General Government, if I was spoken well of by them as an Indian agent.

I have not heard of any mischief having been done the Indians on the frontiers of this State, since I last wrote you. I am, &c.

GEORGIA, Camden county:

Before me, William Mowbray, one of the justices assigned to keep the peace of said county, personally appeared James Seagrove, Agent of Indian Affairs, in the Southern department of the United States, who, being duly sworn, deposed and saith: That, ever since receiving his appointment as Indian agent, in the employ of the United States, which was in January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, he, the said agent, hath not been concerned, directly or indirectly, in any Indian trade, or commerce, by himself, or with any person or persons, whatever. And the said deponent further swears, that, whilst he continues in the employ of the United States, as Indian agent, he will not, directly or indirectly, be concerned in any Indian trade, or commerce.

FLINT RIVER, 20th June, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

After finishing a letter to you, by request of David Cornell, with respect to his opinion of public matters, I wish here to give you mine, as near as possible as I can judge by the present situation of affairs. The Upper Creeks called a meeting at the Tuckaubatches, of all the Upper and Lower Creek towns; some of the heads from chiefs of both attended; they were concluded by the voice of the whole of the Upper Creeks, and likewise the Cussetahs, that they would take every step in their power to continue at peace with the United States; and, as they knew there was no step could be taken to effect this, but to give immediate satisfaction for the murders and hostilities on the inhabitants of Georgia, they came to a full resolution to begin on the business; therefore, thought it requisite to begin first, on those that committed the first murders. Men were despatched off from the Cussetahs to execute the business; but by what I can learn, that old villain Dourouzeaux, who has now turned a Spaniard, and has taken three hundred dollars a year for being their interpreter, he joined with some of the Cowetas, and sent out talks that caused a disappointment in the business. I was at the Cussetahs at the time; I then told them that they must still persist in the matter, and complete it, as that, and nothing short, would make atonement for what was done, so as to preserve their nation from bloodshed. I have some reason to believe there is again men sent off on the business of making a beginning on the murderers—the Cowetas, and Usuchees, and Chehaws, who are the transgressing towns. It was agreed at the meeting to return the horses, and all the property that has been taken from the settlements of Georgia; but since they returned into the Lower towns, they have altered their tone, and seem to refuse it. The Upper Creeks seem resolved, that, if they still continue obstinate, to strive what they can do by force. How far these matters may be put in force, I cannot take upon me to say, but I am fully convinced the Upper Creeks and Cussetahs are both serious, and bent to do what they can to settle matters; they have paid little or no attention to the Dons' talks, and I am sure they will not, if they can settle matters with the United States. The Cussetahs have collected every horse they can get hold of to send down. I expect they will be sent to me in four or five days. What has been done seems to have put a stop to any parties going out on the settlements. The Cowetas and Chehaws still seem very obstinate, and refuse giving up any property. If they alone could be made suffer, it would be the most effectual way to make a lasting peace; but if parties are suffered to come up, and fall on Indians without distinction, it will bring on a general war, in which they will receive every assistance by supplies from the Spaniards, and it is probable the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees, will join them.

The Spaniards have had eight or ten of the Cherokee chiefs down at Pensacola for some time, nursing them with every favor they can confer. The Spaniards continue to furnish all unfriendly Indians to the States with as much ammunition as they choose, and the obstinacy of the transgressing towns is entirely owing to their advice.

The Upper Creeks seem very desirous of your coming up, and the Cussetahs, as they say that if you were up yourself, any demands you made at this time would be complied with. I believe if you were to come up with Cornell, you might settle matters, as the whole of the nation seem inclined for it, except those few rascally towns: as to your person, I believe it might be safe, but I will not advise; you are the best judge. I think there will be some lives taken for satisfaction before long. David Cornell seems to think, if you do not come up, that, through the insinuations of the Spaniards, every good intention stands a chance of being knocked in the head. If Cornell is well used, and comes back full handed, it will be of great service to the United States, as he is now inveterate against the Spaniards and Pantan. He says they have imposed on him and the Indians.

If you come up, Cornell is to send one of his Indians ahead to inform the Cussetahs, who will send a guard to meet you and bring you to their town; from thence the Tuckaubatchees will attend you to the Upper Towns; whether you come or not, use this young man well, as he may be useful to our country. His father, James Cornell, the interpreter, who went to Congress, and was much in favor of the Spaniard's during McGillivray's life, seems now much opposed to them. Even Melford, their great Colonel, has taken miff at their putting one over him; he says, that, if you were to come up and give him any encouragement, he would soon give you a full proof, from under the Spanish Governor's own hand, that he had orders from them to set the Indians on the United States. Despatch Cornell back as quick as you can, as it may be of bad consequence to delay him.

I am, &c.

Timothy Barnard to James Seagrove.

FLINT RIVER, 20th June, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

I have been to the Cussetah town, and arrived here yesterday in company with David Cornell, a head warrior of the Tuckaubatchees. He says his business this way was by order of the whole Upper Creeks, after a meeting they had at the Tuckaubatchees, in consequence of your talk by Mr. McDonald. The conclusion of the meeting was, that satisfaction should be immediately given for the murders committed on the subjects of the United States. A number of the heads of the Lower towns were likewise present, who agreed to the same. There was men appointed, and sent off, by the Cussetahs, to do the business of killing five of the murderers; and they got down as far as the Ufewles, near where they were, and would have done the business, but that old villain Durouzeaux has turned a Spaniard altogether; and has, I find, given out some talks, which he said was by that old villain Pantan, which, I believe, got ahead of the fellows that went to do the business, and has been the means of disappointing the business for a little while; but that the whole Upper Creeks, and nearly all the Lower Creeks, are determined it shall be done, and all the horses, that have been brought up, gathered. The Cussetahs had gathered nine head before I left the town. The Cowetas were to go about gathering the next day after I left the town. They have, from the Upper Creeks, sent word to the Chehaws and Usechees, not to offer to dispose of one of the negroes they brought up. David Cornell desires me to acquaint you that the Upper Creeks are determined to make the whole nation take one peace talk, and give up all the plundered property: when he set off from his own town, by order of the whole Upper Creeks, they expected those five men would be killed, before he reached the Lower towns, which has failed for the present, but will not be so, he thinks, long; as, if not completed soon, the Upper Creeks seem determined to take it in hand. There were men again appointed, and sent off, to kill some of the murderers. David Cornell had a meeting at the Cussetahs, with several of the heads of the Cowetas present; and they have consented to abide by the talks that are agreed on in the Upper Creeks. David Cornell therefore says, that it was the particular request of the Upper Creeks, that you would come up with him, as you may be sure that, before you get up, that there will be some of the murderers put an end to; and after you get up, they will be ready to pay attention to any other demands you may think fit to make. The Spanish agent is now in the Upper Creeks; but they do not (David Cornell says) pay any great attention to his talks; nor will not, till they despair of seeing you up. David Cornell himself gave him (the Spanish agent) such an affront, that he had his horse saddled best part of the day to leave the nation: the cause of his affront was, he requested that thirty of the heads of the Upper Creeks would attend at a meeting, which the Dons were about calling on the Mississippi, where the Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Cherokees, were to be assembled; and there they wanted the Upper and Lower Creeks to go. David Cornell told the Spanish agent that none of the Creeks, Upper or Lower, would or should go there to any such meeting; therefore David Cornell desires me to acquaint you that there is no danger of your person, on your way up; that you, by McDonald, received the white wampum, in token of peace and friendship, from the Upper Creeks, which was to keep the path white between them, and you, and General Washington; and which he hopes will remain so still, though some of the towns have misbehaved very much; but, still, he says there is now no fear, but that all will be put to rights. He therefore hopes that, when you see him, you will look upon it that you are speaking with one that is a friend to the United States, and one that is representing the whole Upper Creeks, as there was thirty some odd towns met on the same business he has went on. He had some notion of turning back, when he came to the Lower towns, as he found the business was not completed, with respect to killing the murderers. He, however, after consulting with the Lower Creeks, found that it was not dropped, but would still be done; he has thought fit to proceed on, and see you before he returned. He says, if it is the wish of the whole nation for you to come and see them, that he hopes you will not fail in coming up with him, which, if you do, you may depend on every matter to be settled to your satisfaction before you return. He says, times has been as bad as this before; and agents has come up from Charleston, and matters has been completely settled, therefore he hopes you will let nothing daunt or restrain you from coming up, if you wish to have matters settled in behalf of the United States, which will be done if you come up; and if you do not, he shall despair of its being done without, as the Spanish agents are present, and are very diligent in stirring up matters, though in an underhand way. David Cornell requested me to write this for fear he might not get a good interpreter there to acquaint you fully with his business.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

Charles Weatherford to James Seagrove.

HICKORY GROUND, UPPER CREEKS, 11th June, 1798.

WORTHY FRIEND:

Yours I received by McDonald, dated 12th May last, and am under many obligations for your kindness in my behalf, therefore I have done all in my power to bring matters to a favorable situation. I hope now matters are very well settled in behalf of the United States, as I have left nothing untuned, that I thought would be beneficial, or preserve peace in that quarter. The nation, at their meeting of the Tuckaubatchees, have agreed to put to death five men, exclusive of John Galphin, which will make six. I hope the greatest part of them are already put to death, but if not, they will before this reaches you.

I have made it my business, decidedly, to every one of your requests, and in every respect, to assist you as much as possible in your undertakings. Had there been an appearance of war, you should have seen me, but, at present, there is a stop put thereto.

Your letter I received in an exceeding good time, as the Spanish talks, Chickasaws, Choctaws, Cherokees, was appointed to be given out in three days after their arrival. It was a singular satisfaction to me, to have your orders to attend in behalf of the States; and I have so fully completed the business, that I hope, for the future, there will be no danger, as the whole of the Upper towns, and a large majority of the Lower, agree to be in peace with the United States.

Concerning the Chickasaws, they have met with a very cold reception from the Creeks, as there is some matters of consequence in their own way, which puts a stop to their talk. This, together with the influence used, the Creeks unanimously agreed not to hear what they had to say, relative to peace; and, of course, the war between them will be carried on in a greater degree than ever. As to the Cherokees, there is a part of them who hath endeavored to bring some of this nation to assist them in going to war, but the Creeks have utterly refused, of course the others are of no consequence, being but a very few in number, as the greatest part of the Cherokees wish to remain in peace.

Concerning the Choctaws, their talk, in this nation, is, as yet, not concluded, but, of course, it will be difficult, as the Choctaws have unanimously agreed to assist the Chickasaws, in case of the war continuing. A proposal was made through the Spaniards, that the Choctaws and Chickasaws, also the Cherokees, should meet at the Yazoo, to hold a talk, in order to unite all those tribes in peace with the Creeks. In conformity to your instructions, I have used my influence with the chiefs and head-men, who, to a man, have determined to have no concern with their meetings; and if war comes from that quarter, they are ready to meet it.

As to the Spanish influence, I am not, at this time, able fully to satisfy you; but I detain Mr. Rawlings for a few days longer, in order to collect some further intelligence concerning them and the Choctaws, as, at this time, there seems a necessity you should have a speedy answer to your last letters. Such part of the Spanish talk as has been given out, speaks of peace; but whether they are sincere, or that it is done through fear, or to deceive, I cannot yet tell, but will fully satisfy myself, and write you by the opportunity which I detain.

I have the satisfaction to inform you, that the head-men have agreed to send me down when this business is a little more settled, with a number of the leading men, in order to bring you up to the nation, in order to hear all from yourself.

I am, &c.

The White Lieutenant, Alexander Cornell, and others, to James Seagrove.

TUCKAUBATCHEE, UPPER CREEKS, 14th June, 1793.

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

We received your talks by Mr. McDonald, which came in a very good time: for we had heard that the white people had killed McDonald, and we were afraid it was so, by his staying so long over the time he said he would be back. We were glad to see him, likewise to hear from you, which was on the 29th of last month, when the broken days were out, for the Upper and Lower Creeks to meet to hear the different talks from the Spaniards, which was to be held at the Tuckaubatchees, on the tenth of this month. There was twenty-four head-men of the Upper, and eight of the Lower towns present; they all unanimously agreed to take your talk, and hold it fast as long as they live. They all agreed to kill six of the ringleaders in the late mischief; and, when the business is done and completed, we shall send Charles Weatherford down to you. Mr. Joseph Cornell was interpreter for us; by the request of us, he hath sent his son, David Cornell, along with McDonald, that he might go down safe to you. David Cornell wishes to see you, and will tell you a true state of all things in this land. We all mean to give up, to be punished, the people you required; but it is a thing that cannot be done at once, for it must be kept a secret; for Indians are not like white men, that can do a thing directly; but by the nineteenth July, if not done, you shall be informed what steps to take. McDonald coming with your talks at the time the Spaniards was to give theirs, struck a great damp on the Spanish agent; so much, that he was afraid to give his talks out which he had from the Governor of Orleans. We had got all the Upper towns agreed to your proposal, for they always meant to be in peace with their Father of the United States, and all his people.

From your friends and brothers, in behalf of the Upper towns,

THE MAD DOG, of Tuckaubatchee.
WHITE LIEUTENANT, of Oakfuskees.
ALEXANDER CORNELL,
CHARLES WEATHERFORD.

James Seagrove to the Chiefs of the Creek Nation.

ST. MARY'S, 27th May, 1793.

BROTHERS:

Your talk, of the 16th of this month, I have received by Mr. George Galphin, and am very sorry to find that it hath not been in the power of our friends, of your nation, to have justice done us, and thereby preserve your land in peace.

It now appears that all hope of redress, or justice being done by the Creek people to the inhabitants of the United States, for the murders and robberies committed by the former, is at an end. Know, then, you who are our friends, that I have discharged my duty between you and my country; and here finishes all further application, until the sword hath brought bad men to a sense of their duty.

I hope and trust that what I have often told you and your people, is strongly imprinted on your minds; particularly when I informed you, that, to be in peace with the United States, would be happy for you; and, to make them your enemies, would be your certain ruin, and total destruction as a nation. The time approaches rapidly; ruin assails your country, in part brought on by your own bad conduct, in not punishing your bad people before matters got to such lengths.

How can a nation or people expect mercy, or forgiveness, who have acted as yours have done towards the United States? It is needless for me, at this time, to recapitulate the unbounded goodness of my country towards yours, you having all of you experienced her kindness; and you are no strangers to the base ungrateful conduct of a part of your nation, in return for such goodness and care of you.

It makes me happy to find that so many of my Creek friends have acted like wise, virtuous, honest men, and have determined to take no part with those bad people who have killed our citizens, and robbed our country.

Such towns and people as continue our firm friends, will receive our protection and friendship, now, and afterwards; whilst they will see severe chastisement inflicted on the offending towns. Be not discouraged, my friends; all will come right, and you will reap the benefit of having held us fast by the hand in friendship. It is my desire and advice that the Cussetahs, and all the other friendly towns, do call in their hunters, and keep them in their towns, as it is impossible for our people to know the difference in the woods. Keep your people close at home, and do not suffer them to go amongst the bad people, or let the murdering, robbing villains come into any of your towns, or you will bring trouble on yourselves, by our people following them. Should a large army go into your country, it's probable I shall be with them, in order to befriend your good men. Keep all your cattle and horses near you, and do not let the bad Indians have them, or you will lose them. I have ordered Mr. Barnard to stay with the Cussetahs, and I now desire they will see that no one hurts him, and he will protect them when an army comes.

I once more desire you, as you regard your peace, not to listen to any talks brought into your land, at this time, by the Spaniards, or any others, as you may depend they have your ruin in view, by involving you in a war.

I shall send runners to the Oconee, and all over, to tell you are our friends in the nation. We have now made peace with the Northern Indians, so that our warriors have nothing to do there; attend to this, and be wise; sit still, and save yourselves and country, and you will ever find me your real friend.

JAMES SEAGROVE.

To Mr. KINNARD, the CUSSETAH KING, the MAD DOG, of Tuckaubatchee, }
the WHITE LIEUTENANT, of Oakfuskees, }

And all the other kings and chiefs of the Creek nation, who are friends to the United States.

James Seagrove to the chiefs of the Lower Creeks.

ST. MARY'S, May 13th, 1793.

BROTHERS:

I received your good talk, with your white wing, which I shall hold fast. My Cussetah friends' talks are always straight and good; I wish the other towns were like them, but some of them are very bad, and are guilty of bad things. I have long expected to have seen the murderers sent in to me, or, at least, to have heard of their being destroyed, as the only means of preserving your nation in peace. I begin now to think that it never was intended, or it would have been done. I do not blame the Cussetahs, I believe it was their wish; but, as the great mother town, I think she ought to have insisted on it. I hope it is not yet too late, and that you will exert every nerve to have justice done, by complying with my demand. I sent a strong talk to you all by George Galphin; I hope you have got it, and are making good use of it. For fear it should not have reached you, I now send you a copy of it.

BROTHERS: Should the bad actions of your people bring a war on your land, and which, undoubtedly, will be the case, unless my demand is complied with, I now inform you, in behalf of my country, that all the towns in the Creek nation, who sit still and continue friendly to the United States, that they will not be hurt, but be protected in their persons and property; whilst all those towns and people who have been killing our citizens, and robbing our country, can expect no mercy. My promise to you has always been to warn you of danger—I now do it, and tell you, my friends, how to avoid it. The Cussetahs have always been our friends; we will take care of them, and such other towns and people as they can say are good and friendly. Scarcely a day passes, but I hear of murders and robberies on our frontier by the Creeks; as yet we have not retaliated, as we waited an answer to my demand; I yet expect it, and will continue to look for the delivery of the murderers for thirty days from this time; that is, an equal number to what we have lost. I hope you will take care of Mr. Barnard, and not suffer any body to hurt him. I am told that the Little Uchee village has behaved well; take them under your care; they shall not be hurt. You see now, my friends, that what I have often told you, you find coming to pass; which was, that listening to the advice of the Spanish people, and bad white men among you, would bring ruin on your land. Shame, shame—that great men and warriors would suffer themselves to be so abused, by a set of designing villains. Rouse, my friends, and clear your country of all those men; you know them well; they deserve your severe chastisement. I hope soon to hear that there is spirit left in your land, to do yourselves justice on those who have given you bad advice; who have encouraged your people to steal, and to murder, and, afterwards, purchase stolen goods. These men ought to feel your resentment. Attend to what I have said; it is for your good, and that of your nation.

Your friend,

JAMES SEAGROVE.

To the KINGS, CHIEFS, and HEAD-MEN, of the Cussetah town,

And all others, of the Lower towns of the Creek Nation.

Captain Randolph to James Seagrove.

COLERAIN STATION, 30th June, 1793.

SIR:

This day (after our scout went out) Mr. McDonald arrived from the nation; he informed me, that he saw some Indians on the path. He first said that they were six miles, and, afterwards, that they were twenty miles from the station. I immediately sent out seven men in order to discover their trail; they took it, and fell in with the Indians near Spanish creek. One of the Indians, on coming up to them, snapt his gun at Mr. Steth, (who was one of the party) within ten steps of him; our people then charged on them, and killed them all, four in number, without losing a man; they got five excellent horses from them, which we wanted much. Alexander Young, Esquire, and Mr. Wright, was here to day. They want to take possession of Bull-head block-house; they have but three men. I think it will be necessary to send a sergeant and six men to assist them. They are in want of ammunition, but am afraid I cannot spare them any.

I am, &c.

JOHN F. RANDOLPH.

James Seagrove to Timothy Barnard.

ST. MARY'S, 5th July, 1793.

DEAR BARNARD:

I now address you under great distress of mind, on account of a most unfortunate affair, which took place on the 30th ultimo, and is nearly as follows: McDonald, with my despatches from the nation, arrived at Colerain about noon of that day, and gave Captain Randolph a very confused and contradictory account of his coming; and, after remaining some time, informed that some Indians came with him, who he parted from about twenty miles back; but that, as he had reason to fear it was, by that time, a general war, he supposed a runner had been sent after them, and turned them back. This made the captain uneasy, especially as McDonald then told him one of the Indians had all the despatches, which were of great consequence. Upon this, seven men were ordered to accompany McDonald, and to go in search of those Indians, and bring them in as friends; but, if they endeavored an escape, or made resistance, then to use force. At a small distance from the station, McDonald turned back, and the party pushed on, and, about ten miles distant, discovered four Indians mounted, who, on being seen, set up a shout and ran; on which, the horsemen followed and came up. One of the Indians then took to a tree, and snapt his gun several times at one of the party. Upon this, a charge took place, and, in an instant, all four of the Indians (it is said) were killed. On inquiry of McDonald, and on perusing of my letters, which were found in one of the Indian's bundles, to our very great sorrow and distress, we find that our friend David Cornell was among those that fell, and by the hands of the identical man whose brother Cornell killed last winter, on the frontier of Cumberland. The other three were people who accompanied Cornell. Their horses, &c. I have secured for their friends.

Thus, my friend, I have given you a just account of this affair, which occasions me more uneasiness of mind than any thing I ever experienced in a political line. I have lost no time in despatching the bearer, Charves, to you with the news, that you may take such measures as may seem best for your own security, and that of all our friends in the nation.

The business is now done, and it is unfortunate; but still I have a hope that it may be settled. Every satisfaction shall be made the friends of the deceased, by presents and otherwise, if they will not take any rash steps. They must be convinced it was altogether an accident; and they ought to remember that, when our people were killed by theirs, we took no hasty measures, but applied for satisfaction in a regular way; and, I expect, they will do the same. If you are obliged to quit the nation, I wish you to come to me, where you will find a home as long as I have one.

There is another matter which you ought to know; it is the detention of eight Cussetah men and boys, by me, at this place. They came to Colerain near a month past, and told a confused story. The people were disposed to injure them. In order to prevent their being hurt, I brought them to this town, and lodged them in the fort, giving them liberty to walk about my house all day, to eat and drink as much as they chose. Another reason for my detaining them was, that I was certain of parties being out all along the frontier of Georgia, and going into the nation, who might fall in with these people and kill them, which would have been considered by their friends as done designedly by me: besides, had I let those people go at the time when robbery and murder was committing by their countrymen all along our frontiers, the people of Georgia would have had just cause to have censured me, and, perhaps, done worse. These people are very happy, and do not wish to return home, until some settlement takes place. One of the men cut his own throat, the second night after he came here, in the room with his companions. No blame is laid on the white people. They say it was his own act, and no one is to blame; his time to come, and his life, were his own.

The enclosed letter to Alexander Cornell, and one to the Cussetah king, also to Kinnard, you will forward as you think best. The bearer, Charves, will give you further particulars.

The President has ordered the Governor of Georgia to act only on the defensive, for the present; in consequence, the expedition is delayed. I cannot possibly answer your letters by this conveyance: besides, I don't know that it would answer any purpose. Your own, and the safety of all our white friends in the nation, is my object at present. I certainly should have come up, if David Cornell had not been killed.

Send Charves back as quick as you can, and give notice, as early as possible, of this, to all our white friends in the nation.

I am, &c.

ST. MARY'S, 5th July, 1793.

BROTHERS:

I suppose that, by this time, you have grown uneasy about four men and four boys belonging to your town, who have been from home above three moons. About one moon ago, these people fell in on our frontier, near Colerain station, and were brought in there, and, as soon as they were known to be Cussetahs, were treated with every kindness. There being then several parties of horse out scouring our frontier, and there being an army going in to punish the bad towns, I thought it would be wrong to suffer these, our friends, to go from this, lest they should fall in with some of these parties and be killed. I consulted with the four old men on the occasion, who were of my opinion, that it was best to remain with me until we could hear how matters were in the nation, or, until the path was clear for them to go home. They are very happy here, they have as much as they can eat and drink, and live as well as I do, being at my house every day, and lodge in a house in the fort, at night, lest any body should trouble them. Langley Bryant stays constantly with them. They live so well that they are in no hurry to go home. You may depend that I shall take every care of them in my power; and you will tell their friends not to be uneasy, as nothing shall hurt them. They shall be sent home, as soon as it can be done with safety to them and us. I am sorry to inform you, that, the second night after they came here, one of the men, named Sullapaye, (from some reason unknown to any body, red or white) cut his own throat with his knife, and died in a few minutes. His brother, Sullape, and all the rest, were sleeping along side of him on the same floor, and knew nothing of it, until it was done. His brother, and all the rest, tell me that nobody, either white or red, is to blame. He was well used, had every thing he wanted, and no white person was in the house, or near him, when he did it. I am sorry he should be such a fool. This is a true state of the business, and which will be confirmed to you when you see his brother and the rest.

Your great father, General Washington, hath forbid any troops going into the Creek towns, until it is fully known whether or not satisfaction will be given, agreeably to my demand; and, in consequence of this, the troops that had crossed the Oconee, to punish the bad towns, were ordered back, and will remain on our frontier, until the final determination of the nation is known. I hope it will be such as to preserve your land in peace, which only can be done by punishing the bad men, and restoring the stolen property.

I am, &c.

James Seagrove to Alexander Cornell.

ST. MARY'S, 5th July, 1793.

DEAR BROTHER:

I now take up my pen to describe what I conceive an unfortunate affair to you and me, and I fear also to our respective countries; it is as follows: On the 30th day of last month, McDonald arrived at the station at Colerain, and informed Captain Randolph, the commanding officer, that he was from the nation, with despatches from you and the chiefs. He was kindly received, and, after some time, gave the people to understand that four Indians came down with him, part of the way; that he had come ahead of them; but, as they delayed so long behind, he concluded they had been followed by a runner, and turned back, and gave as his reason for this opinion, that, by this time, it was a general war in the nation; and, no hopes of peace or satisfaction being given, this alarmed the officers and men; upon which, McDonald was asked for the letters, when he answered, that an Indian had them all, who was one of the party. Captain Randolph then ordered McDonald to go immediately out and meet the Indians. He went some distance, and returned, and a scout of seven men, who were out from Colerain, unfortunately fell in with four Indians, on horseback, some with guns; and, not knowing them to be friends, rode up briskly towards them, on which the Indians set up a whoop and ran. The horsemen pursued, and, being better mounted, came up with them; on which, the Indians dismounted, and took to trees. One of them snapt his gun several times, which convinced the white people that they were enemies. Upon this, they fired, and soon killed all four of the red people. On examining the letters and papers, it was found they were our friends; and what adds exceedingly to the pain and distress of myself, and every body here, is, that our good young friend and brother, David Cornell, is among them that fell.

This, my dear Alexander, is the most distressing thing I ever met with in my life; to think of friends falling by the hands of friends, through a cursed mistake, is bad indeed; but is now too late to be prevented; we, therefore, as friends and brothers, must make the best of it, and not suffer it to involve us in further trouble.

This unfortunate affair hath arose from the stupidity, or villany, of McDonald, who I shall keep a prisoner until the whole is cleared up. I have only to say, my friend, for you and the other relations and friends of the deceased, that full satisfaction shall be made, agreeable to the treaty of New York, and I have now to entreat of yourself, the Mad Dog, White Lieutenant, your uncle Joseph Cornell, and all others concerned, not to alter their good opinion of us, on account of this accident, or to take any hasty measures in consequence, as it is my determination to satisfy you fully on this business.

The horses and other property, belonging to the people killed, I have taken into my possession, and they shall be returned to their friends, as soon as the path is clear.

To convince you, my friend, that it is not our wish to hurt any of the Indians who are our friends, there are now with me at this place eight Indians, seven of them Cussetahs, and one Chehaw, who have been here a month, eating and drinking as they please, and walking about my house. They were found on this frontier, and brought in, and as there are a great many parties of bad people out, and as it was expected troops would go into the nation to punish the bad towns, I advised those people to stay with me, which they have done, and are very happy.

Our great father, General Washington, has forbid the Governor of Georgia, or any of his people, going into the Creek land to war, until I have your final answer. This is the cause of the troops, that had crossed the Oconee, being ordered back.

Remember, my friend, that, when the red people killed Captain Fleming, and the rest of our people, we did not take any hasty or rash measure, though the provocation was great, but sent to you for satisfaction, and have waited now four moons without doing any thing. I hope you will consider this, and act as we have done. Had not our friend Davy been killed, I should certainly have come up with him, agreeable to request. You have always been our good friend, and I hope you will continue so. Give your uncle a good talk from me, and tell him he will find me a better friend to him and his family than ever General McGillivray was, and that he shall have every justice done him. Depending on your friendship, I remain, &c.

James Seagrove to John Kinnard.

ST. MARY'S, 5th July, 1798.

BROTHER:

I have received your talk by George Galphin, and am very glad that all your people continue in peace and friendship with us. Continue firm, and in so doing, you will reap the benefit of it ere long.

The Chehaw fellow that is with me is certainly a fool. He lives so well, and walks about this town at his ease, that I am certain if we were to drive him away he would return. I should have sent him and seven Cussetahs, that have been with me upwards of two moons, only that I knew there was a number of parties of horse out from our frontier, and also there was troops going to punish the bad towns only; and as those people might fall in with them and be killed, I thought it best to keep them with me as friends, until the path was more clear or matters settled. They shall be well treated, and sent home as soon as it can be done with safety.

The troops from the upper part of Georgia, that had crossed the Oconee, to punish the bad towns, were called back, in consequence of an order from our great father General Washington, not to go to war, until an answer was received from your nation, whether or not they would give satisfaction, agreeable to my demand. Those troops will remain on our frontier in peace, until this is known, and time given for that purpose. I again repeat to you, that, let what will happen, you or your friends will not be hurt. Do sit still, and mind what I say to you, as your real friend and brother.

JS. SEAGROVE.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War, dated

SAVANNAH, 31st July, 1798.

The instructions and orders of the President of the United States, as contained in your letter of the 30th of April, have received my particular and immediate attention; and the enclosed papers will point out the steps which I have taken, to carry the same into effect.

From the whole of my communication with you, and the chiefs of the Creeks, you will observe that it hath been my wish to be in that nation, but, that a train of circumstances and unfortunate events, rendered it almost impossible. Whilst General McGillivray lived, I was certain of being opposed by him and his adherents, both in and out of the nation. I was so well informed of the baseness of that man, and his treacherous conduct to our country, as not to leave a doubt but that he would be guilty of kindling a flame against me, or any person who should endeavor to establish peace and good understanding between the United States, and any of the Indian tribes to the Southward, but more immediately the Creeks.

My instructions being to avoid all disputes, or give cause of jealousy or suspicion to McGillivray; in way of rivalry, I thought it most advisable not to press myself on the nation, until I had the assent of a majority of the chiefs in my favor, to that effect.

This I obtained, unanimously, from all present, at the conference at Colerain; and the time was fixed by the chiefs for my meeting them to the first of May, in order to arrange and fully understand all matters between their country and the United States.

The Indians, who were present at the conference, declared in public that they were imposed on by General McGillivray, respecting the treaty of New York, and many other matters; and that they would oblige him to appear at our general meeting, and answer for himself, or quit the nation.

This, no doubt, he heard of, and knew of my growing influence; and, finding that I would attend as agreed on, he, and his Spanish friends, in conjunction with Mr. Panton, formed and executed the bloody plan at Trader's Hill, on St. Mary's, in March last.

This opinion is corroborated by several testimonies I have already furnished, and, I think, fully confirmed by the declaration of James Burges, as sworn to by George Galphin.

There cannot be a doubt, but the Spaniards and Panton were apprehensive, that, if I was allowed to get into the nation, it would be unfavorable to their projects; and Mr. McGillivray was convinced that his double dealings would not stand the test; therefore, it was determined by those characters, to have murder and robbery committed on our citizens, in which they have been too successful. This act of violence prevented my going into the nation, although I had made every arrangement, at that time, for the purpose.

Since that period, you have been advised by me of the repeated outrages by the Creeks, as well as that they had not complied with my demand of satisfaction. Had it not been for David Cornell's being killed on the 30th ult., I certainly should, at all events, have gone into the nation, and to the Upper Creeks, with him; as, from the letters received from some of the chiefs, it appeared to be their wish.

It would have been unwise to have gone immediately after such an event, at least, until it was known how the people of the nation would act in consequence. This I do not yet know; but, from the measures which I have taken, and what I am able to judge from circumstances, I do not think any rash step will be taken by the relations of Cornell. He, in fact, is no great loss to them, having been a turbulent, ungovernable young man, and, but of late that he became a convert to our cause; which you will find by his letter sent you, in mine of the _____, wherein he acknowledges his having killed Americans on the Western waters, by desire of Governor O'Neal, of Pensacola, and Panton. By the enclosed copy of a letter, received by me the 20th instant, from the White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees, and also one from the Big Warrior of the Cussetahs, together with Tim Barnard's, of the 2d instant, I am led to believe that I may be able to effect an entrance into the nation; but not without difficulty and danger; all of which I disregard, provided I can accomplish the wish of the President of the United States, and thereby serve our country. You will see, by the letters now enclosed, that four of the Creek towns are disposed for mischief; and Panton is actually among them, stirring them up to war. He publicly tells them that they are not to fear the United States; they cannot hurt them; that they must not, on any account, consent to give satisfaction by punishing the murderers, or restoring property. That, unless the Americans remove back to the old boundary, on the Ogechee, not to treat with them.

This conduct of Panton's keeps up a flame in the nation; and as he hath at his command large magazines (both public and private property) of goods, which he distributes among those people, he is and will continue to be attended to. It matters little whether or not Mr. Panton, and others, acting in this way in the nation, are sanctioned by the government they live under—the effect of their doings are equally felt. But, as to myself, I am convinced that they are countenanced and supported in it, or they would not have the audacity—(see the oath of Wm. Stringer, before Timothy Barnard.) Every day affords fresh instances to confirm me in this belief. Whilst these things are allowed, and tamely viewed, it is in vain that I, or any other servant of the Union, labor to preserve peace with the savage tribes. The Indians, themselves, begin to see through their schemes. One of the Spanish agents, of the name of Bellue, who was busy practising on the Upper Creeks, was killed by them about a month past. I have, therefore, said so much on this subject, that I shall not add at present.

Having determined to go into the Creek towns, if possible, I shall, in conformity to your desire, repair to the Rock Landing, so as to be there, by the first of next month, to wait the movements of the friendly Indians. But, to accomplish this, there arises obstacles; the greatest is that of making my business known. To keep it secret from Governor Telfair, I may meet with censure, if not destruction: for, should his Excellency see fit to send another expedition into the nation, whilst I am treating of peace, the consequence to me is evident. I believe it will be best to acquaint him in confidence, though I have very little hope of his paying any attention thereto: for, I am told, he does not recognise me as a public officer, never having had it announced to him in form; to this I must attribute his total silence, and want of respect to my frequent letters to him.

However illy calculated this State is, at present, to engage in a general Indian war, yet, strange as it may appear, there are many warm advocates for it, some of whom, I have reason to believe, would oppose my going into the Creeks to make peace.

As a preparative to my going into the nation, I thought it a necessary step, to send home the Indians, who had been detained by me at St. Mary's, and, also, their property. This I have ordered to be done, and sent by the person who carries my despatches, which will make them the more acceptable. This step, I doubt not, will add to the number of my enemies in Georgia; but how could I appear in the nation as a friend, whilst I held their people (and those belonging to our best friends) prisoners in this country.

I have sent to St. Mary's to have my horse brought here by land, in order to proceed; should they be lost on the way, I shall find great difficulty to supply the loss.

It is a current report in this town, that Governor Telfair hath orders from the President to act on the offensive against the Creeks. This I cannot believe when I view my orders. It is, however, certain, that his Excellency hath called a council of all his general officers, to meet at Augusta, on the eighth of next month, to commence deliberations, as he terms it. What those will be, it is not with me to say; but, lest his plans and my orders should interfere to the injury of our country, I will give his Excellency timely notice.

Letter from Timothy Barnard to James Seagrove.

FLINT RIVER, 2d July, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

You will receive this by the hands of Mr. Townsend, who will be able to give you every information from this quarter you may require; and as he has been all through the Upper Creeks, has it in his power to inform you fully respecting matters in that part of the nation, relative to both red and white people, I therefore need only mention a little to you of what's going on at present, in the Lower Creeks. The Cowetas, Broken Arrow, Usechees, and Chehaws, at a meeting held at the Tuckaubatchees, Upper Creeks, agreed to quit hostilities on the State of Georgia, and give up all the property; as all the towns in the Upper Creeks made known to them that they meant to do as the Cussetahs did; keep at peace with the United States. Those four towns, Cowetas, Broken Arrow, Usechees, and Chehaws, have since declined from what they agreed to at the meeting, and have utterly refused to give up the property, and have said as much as if they still meant to continue hostilities on the frontiers of Georgia; in consequence of which, the head warriors of the Cussetahs, and two more chiefs were sent out to me to send down a talk respecting it; the very day they arrived at my house, an express arrived here from General Twiggs, who had just returned to Augusta, from an expedition against the Indians. General Twiggs' talk was to the Cussetahs, which I thought fit, on such an occasion, to explain to the chiefs here present. You will receive a copy of their answer to the General; likewise, a copy of his letter, which, I think, on the whole, the General has not acted imprudently; whether or not his first movements have been by order of the President, or the Secretary of War, I cannot tell; but as a general officer, I imagine he would not take such steps rashly; he has requested of me, to give him a true statement of matters in this quarter, which I think right for me to do, as matters are at this time so critically situated. You will receive a talk from the Big Half Breed, or White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees, which differs somewhat from the Cussetahs, but at the same time shews his good intentions towards the United States, and is a man that has full power to execute any thing he says or undertakes, and I cannot but think himself neglected, and not without cause, as I, in consequence of what you mentioned to me respecting him, made him some promises, which has been out of my power to fulfil. You may be assured, sir, that, in Mr. McGillivray's life time, it was through this half-breed's influence that he swayed best part of the Upper Creeks; this half-breed, when he wrote this talk, thought that the Cussetahs, and the rest of the Lower Creeks, had executed some of the murderers; which was concluded on at these meetings at the Tuckaubatchees, which would have been done, as men were sent upon the business, but that old villain Panton's talks got spread about among the towns where it was to be done, and made those backward that was to have assisted. Panton's talk to them, was to give up no property nor satisfaction for murders, till the white people that were settled on the Oconee moved back to the old line, and not to hurt John Galphin; but that he would send for him, and make him a useful man to the Indians, which I verily believe to be the truth, as he will now be at a loss to excuse his villanous purposes, as he has lost his tool, McG—y; therefore, any one, of even the shallowest knowledge, may see that there will never be a right understanding kept between the Indians and the United States, while Panton has permission to carry on so extensive a trade in the Spanish dominions with the Indians, as every act of his former and present behavior plainly shows, that he would rather see the whole State of Georgia in flames, and women and children massacred by the savages, than lose one hundred deer skins. Whether the Dons have given any prejudicial talks to the Indians at this time, I cannot tell; but they wink at what Panton does, or he dare not do what he has done. I am informed that Governor O'Neal has left Pensacola, and Colonel White has taken his place, who, I am informed, is a man that acts in an impartial line, and it's thought will not give Panton the liberties that Governor O'Neal did; therefore, Governor White may not yet be informed of what Mr. Panton has done. I shall, therefore, take the liberty, in behalf of the United States, to inform his Excellency Governor White, what Panton has done. I think, if you had long ago empowered some one, capable of acting, in behalf of the United States, in the Upper Creeks, it would have been of infinite service to the frontiers.

Allick Cornell, as a half-breed, has done all in his power, but it cannot be thought that one of his knowledge can see far enough into matters to conduct things as they ought to be.

Kinnard, you have put a deal of dependence in, which has done but little. Such men as those may answer particular purposes, but will never be able to do much, without white people is near them to conduct matters. You will be able to judge of matters, when you hear fully by Mr. Townsend, how matters are situated here; the half-breed seems very desirous of your coming up, and says, if you were to come, matters could be soon righted; this I shall leave to your own opinion. If matters could be settled without troops coming up, it would be better for both parties, as, if troops should come, and them militia, which are not generally under good command of their officers, and they should fall on some of the friendly towns, as the injuries they have received is full sufficient to agitate them to it, it will be the means of making the matter general; and if so, then they must be drove out of their lands, and must take refuge over the Coosa river, which is unpassable but in boats, and then, I fear, what little shallow knowledge I have of matters, that they will be egged on by the Dons, as the Shawanese are by the British, and will become as lasting, and as troublesome an enemy to the United States, as the Northward nations are. I am sensible they never give an enemy battle that they can be destroyed; and the farther an Indian has to go to fight his enemy, he is the bolder; besides, the frontiers of Georgia are so extensive, that it will ever be impossible to keep them out, if it was even possible that there could be forts at every ten miles distance; this is only my simple opinion on circumstances better known than I am able to inform. But, as I consider, at this time, that there is not two Indians out of a hundred that are for mischief, therefore, if any steps could be taken to settle matters, without letting the innocent suffer, it would be better. I still wish that, if matters could be so conducted, as for men to come up and give those towns that have done a scourging, burn down their houses, and cut down their corn, if there was but a few of them killed, it would be a scare to them in future; and they are very saucy, and say the white people are afraid to come; therefore, they ought to be convinced of their error, as they never will believe that the whites can come up till they see it. They are daily ridiculing the Cussetahs, and telling them that they are slaves to the Americans, which makes the Cussetahs backward in saying any more to them, nor do not care how soon they suffer by the whites, so that they could be sure of safety themselves. I do not make the least doubt, but, if about six hundred good horse were collected at a seasonable time, that they might get some of the Cussetahs to come to the Rock Landing, and pilot them to those towns that are enemies. There is no way of taking an advantage of them, but by a small company of good horse, and making a rapid march, and not give them time to make off with their property.

I have troubled you with a longer letter than there was occasion for, as matters are nearly as I wrote you by David Cornell. I shall hope to hear fully from you respecting every matter, by Mr. Townsend; shall do every thing for the best, as long as I can stand it here.

I remain, &c.

Letter from the White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees to James Seagrove.

UPPER CREEKS, NEW YORK, 23d June, 1798.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I have several times received your letters, and had them explained to me; I have likewise heard your last talks, which myself, and all the head-men in the Upper towns, are determined to stand by, and listen to no others; and, to convince you, I now write you this, that you may know I have you in mind, as I hope you have me. I, as well as all the head-men of the Upper towns, met at the Tuckaubatchees, and came to a resolution, as our beloved man is no more, to hold you fast by the hand, and see the treaty complied with; and, to prevent our young men from stealing, we have come to a resolution to punish them by whipping; therefore, I hope no rash steps will be taken by your mad people, but, if any disputes arise, let them be settled by friendly talks. This, and our other talk, you may certainly depend on; we now hope to pass and repass into each other's land as friends and brothers, now considering ourselves as one people. The satisfaction you now demand shall be granted, as soon as it can be obtained from the guilty; but, unreasonable it is to suppose it can be taken on the innocent; the bad men shall be killed as soon as they can be found, but, nothing more than natural, when they heard of their doom, they fled the nation, but am in hopes our good warriors will soon overtake them, and, till then, I hope you will wait with patience. The time you allow is very short; but consider it is not so long ago, since one of my Cussetah friends was killed in his peaceable camp, and another wounded, their camp plundered, and, when we demanded satisfaction, it never was given by your people, nor taken by ours, till twelve moons after the crime was committed. I suppose the murderer was not to be found, and understand by your laws that the innocent cannot suffer for the guilty; therefore, as eldest brother, hope you will not so much unman yourselves, as to deviate from your own laws, and copy ours. I likewise undertook to inform you of a thing, you, before, perhaps, have been ignorant of, viz: no sooner the talks become a little friendly, but our paths are filled with travelling renegade people, and some families that pretend they are going to the Spanish country; others of them are bad men, who steal from your people, and fly to our land, and impose their plunder on us, and we, though in a state of ignorance, are blamed for it. Our departed friend winked at those proceedings; but I hope, as you are going to take his place, that you will take such steps as will prevent the like in future; the day never was, before bad men came among us, but we were a happy people; but they have learned our young men their bad ways, and, on account of our not having laws to punish, we, by bad precedents, are become miserable. I always have understood that the Oconee was the line; and that we were both to drink of one stream; if it is otherwise, I am kept in ignorance: if so, keep your people on one side, and we will keep ours on the other, unless from traders going backward and forward that live in our land, and people you may think proper to send amongst us on business, unless it should be that some of our hunters should be distressed for some small necessaries, and may take a few skins and buy them, that is all the connexion we wish to have. I likewise take the liberty to inform you, that it is my opinion that bad men, that live on the frontiers of your country, do your people and ours great injury by getting our drunken people over the line, and buying their property from them, particularly horses, (with rum) the people are then on foot, and, sooner than remain so, go and steal the first man's horse they come across; this, I hope you will prevent by some early step, as, if suffered, it will tend to bad consequences. My unknown friend, I have very long had a particular desire to see you, and, as all our hopes are blasted by listening to bad talks, and by the death of our wise man, I hope you will revive them, by your appearance in our land; come forward, my friend, and don't be daunted; now is the time you can be of service to us, and your country as we are determined to take your talks, and stand by you to the last moment. You now have nothing to contend with but a few vagabonds, which your good advice will soon silence and dismiss. Nine-tenths of the land are your friends, therefore, come forward, or appoint such men as will do you and us justice; give your talks freely, and they shall be received by me and my friends as free. Give your orders, and they shall be executed, and don't meditate upon a war, for that is out of the question. I, and my Upper town friends, have been always friendly disposed, both now, and in the time of the British war; so have been our Cussetah friends; therefore, should you be backward in advancing, and your mad men forward, and, by that means, bring your friends to the same fate as your enemies, then the matter will become general, and more serious than you are aware of. What depredations are now committed, are entirely out of wanton cruelty; but, should your friends share the fate of your enemies, nothing can be expected but revenge, strengthened by rage and desperation. Your mad men may think that they can tear us up branch and root; but tell them the woods are large, and the days are not all gone; for true it is, you can overpower us by numbers, but your numbers must have food and raiment; as for us, we were born in the ashes, and woods, and mountains, and swamps, are our homes; if it should so happen that your madmen should make a war, tell them not to think that we are all fools, and madmen, and that we shall stand and let them take our lives with our lands. No, we will retreat as far as convenient, and then advance as we think it convenient; but I hope these things will all be done away, and our eyes opened for both our advantages. We that are your friends, are men; and tell your great beloved man that he will find us manly friends; and, should it so happen, desperate enemies. I have nothing more to add; yet, if you don't come yourself immediately, I hope you will appoint two men, one as interpreter, and the other as a beloved man, to manage the business for both you and us. Our situation, in that regard, is now deplorable, for we are obliged to apply to both your, and, I believe, our enemy's interpreter, and give out our talks; therefore, by that means, are kept in the dark, and both parties imposed upon. The bearer of this is a young man, but I think a great deal of him, and can recommend him as a man that I have confidence in. Stephen Sullivan is a man who has never spoilt his talk with me, nor my friends; him I recommend as a good interpreter; if you think good, and it is your heart to do any thing for us, appoint these two men, and I will protect them; my house shall be theirs, and my town their town; and likewise yours, whenever you think well to come forward, which I hope will be shortly, but not at the head of your madmen, for I hope you are a man, and we are men, and can punish our bad people ourselves; and the day shall come that we will do it. I shall make it my business to collect all the stolen horses I can find, and send them to the Rock Landing as soon as possible. Please send by the bearer, my horses I sent down to you by Wattalo Micco, as they have been there a long time, but I hope you don't mean to undervalue me, by keeping them all this time, and sending them back empty; likewise send your talks for me and the towns undermentioned.

TUSKENA ATCA, or WHITE LIEUTENANT, for himself, and the Upper Creeks.
STEP. SULLIVAN, Interpreter.

Copy of a talk from the Big Warrior of the Cussetahs, and two of the chiefs from the same town, in answer to General Twiggs' letter, delivered by him to Mr. T. Barnard, to be sent to General Twiggs.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I came out to Mr. Barnard's, with a determination to send my friends in that quarter a talk, where I had the good fortune to meet your talk the day it arrived. The Big Warrior says he had just arrived from a meeting in the Upper Creeks, where they had a full meeting of the heads of all the Upper towns, and likewise the Lower. The Upper Creeks agreed to continue in friendship with the United States, which he believes they will stand to; the Lower Creeks consented to the same; but, since he got home, he has heard the Cowetas, and the Broken Arrows, which is one town, as they live nearly on one spot; the Chehaws and Oswitches, which are as one town, they likewise living on one spot. He wishes to inform you, that they still mean to continue hostilities, and have refused to collect the property that belong to the States, therefore, as he found they were so inclined, and as they were the town that had done all the mischief, he thought it his duty to acquaint his friends the white people of it. The Big Warrior says, that himself, and all the chiefs of his town, have done all in their power to pacify them, but he now finds it is out of their power to get them to agree to give up any property, or give any satisfaction for the murders they have committed, therefore, he sees no other step can be taken to bring them to their senses, but for you to come amongst them and subdue them, and their matters may be settled as usual. The warrior says that he and the other towns are still determined to listen to the talks, from time to time, from their friends the whites, which they agreed for, their friends the Americans to drink water out of one side of the Oconee, and for the red people to drink out of the other, in friendship, and they hope it will remain so. He says, as those bad towns have already refused to give up any property, though they had agreed to it at the general meeting, and from what he has heard since, he is entirely convinced that they mean continuing hostilities, therefore, it is his wish, that you, and all his friends the white people, should know it, that you may take such steps as may prevent their going to too great lengths. The Big Warrior wishes to inform you, that the path you took when you crossed the Oakmulgee, led to the Buzzard Roost, where some of your friends the Cussetahs reside, and as they your friends are all near starving, and are all settled along that path, if you had continued still along that path, you would have driven them from their crops, and perhaps, as your men were angry, might have killed some of them which are your friends. He, therefore hopes, if you should come again, that you will take the Oakfuskee path, and follow that till you come near the Chatacauce river, and turn to a village where an Indian lives called Short Neck, which is thirty miles above the Cowetas, and from there, all the Indians you find on either side of the river, are Cowetas, as they are settled on both sides of the river as low as the Cowetas; and the Chehaws and Oswitches are settled about twelve miles below them, on the same side of the river that the Cowetas lies on, which is westerly. He hopes, before you start, that you will send a private express to him and his town, to let them know, that they may not be surprised at your coming, which will convince them that you do not mean to molest them. Those mutinous towns, he says, shall not know of it. He says that his business out here was to bring out some horses that he had collected, that belong to Georgia, to be sent down to the Rock Landing to their owners, and to return back from here, and, as he came out unprepared for a journey, even without his gun, or any provisions, he begs you will excuse his proceeding any further to see you, although he has a great desire to see you; therefore, as it is out of his power for the present, he hopes you will be satisfied with his talk he has sent you; and as he this day sets out for his town, he will collect the heads of his town, and acquaint them with what he has heard, and with what you say in respect of seeing some of them, which he hopes will be agreed upon, and if it is, you will hear from him as soon as opportunity will admit; but whether or not, he hopes you will consider this as a sincere talk, and from your old friends; those, you know, even when the British were your enemy, and got all the others to join them against you, and paid them well for it, we even then refused to take up arms against you, and likewise refused their goods, and endeavored to keep as many of the other towns back as we could, and were always back and forward amongst you, giving you all the information we could. This, I hope, my friends the Americans will not forget, and always listen to what I say, and not distress us, who never intended to take up arms against them, without they should put us upon a footing with their enemies. In that case, it cannot be considered our faults. He says, that those towns that took the British talks, have all got negroes, more or less, in them, to work for them; but, it is not the case with his town; they have none, but are poor, and obliged to work for themselves; therefore, he hopes their friends will not increase their poverty by driving them from their towns, though they are so near the Cowetas that are enemies, though on the other side of the river, which, as you are not at a loss for pilots, can be informed of, and you will likewise see your colors in the town. He further hopes, no town may suffer but those that are guilty, as if so, you may raise up more enemies: for, he says he is convinced no other towns are for mischief but those mentioned; neither is there any of your property amongst them. The Warrior further says, on his return to his town, he and the rest of the heads of the Cussetahs will do every thing in their power to prevent those towns from going out to do any more mischief; therefore, if they should go out, he hopes it will not be considered their faults. The Warrior wishes his friends the white people to know, that they, the red people, have no laws to restrain their people from doing mischief, neither is it in their power to command each other to take up arms to suppress such conduct. Mr. W. Pantons talks, he says, is the cause of those towns standing out so obstinately, as he told the Cowetas and Chehaws, not many days ago, not to give up their property. These people, in particular, were called down among the Spaniards, he supposes, for that purpose. He likewise told them not to give any satisfaction for the murders committed, till they would move off from the Oconee land. This, the Warrior says, Mr. Pantons does to keep up a disturbance in Georgia, that no deer skins may go that way. He further says, that he and Mr. McGillivray, in his life time, were always giving out such talks, to keep the trade in their own hands. As for the Spaniards, he says they say but little; but, Mr. Pantons, whether by the order of the Spaniards or not, has said a great deal; and had it not been for what he said, satisfaction would have been given before this time; but, as he is master of so much goods, those mutinous towns will listen to his talks. The Warrior says, this talk he has sent, is the voice of his whole town, and he hopes the white people will look upon this as a talk from their best friends, as they have always found the Cussetahs. It is all he can say at this time, and he hopes it will be sent to the great beloved man, General Washington, their father, as he knows he will make good use of it, and not treat his red children rash that do not wish to offend him, or hurt his people, but still wish to eat, drink, and remain in friendship with all white people.

LOWER CREEK NATION, FLINT RIVER.

Personally appeared before me, Timothy Barnard, deputy superintendent to the United States of America, William Stringer, a native of Georgia, and now a resident in Pensacola, West Florida, who, being duly sworn, maketh oath, that he was present and saw the Spaniard's public stores opened at Pensacola, where there was arms and ammunition both delivered to the Creek Indians; and he the deponent saith, that he heard Governor O'Neal say, that he had told the Indians that this arms and ammunition was given them to kill the Americans, and that he would give them more if they stood in need of it; the deponent further saith, that Mr. William Pantons buys the horses that are stolen from the State of Georgia, and has now several of the horses in his possession in Pensacola town. Further the deponent saith not.

Sworn the 2d May, 1793, before me:

WILLIAM STRINGER.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

SAVANNAH, IN GEORGIA, 29th July, 1793.

BROTHER:

I received your talk by Mr. Townsend, and like it well; I am pleased to find that you, and our other friends in the Upper Creeks, are acting in such a way as to restore your country to peace, and to keep the path between you and us white and clear. As it seems to be your wish that I should be among you, to assist in directing your affairs, and, it, at the same time, corresponding with my own inclination, and the desire of our great father the President of the United States, I have come to a determination that it shall be so. For the purpose of accomplishing it with safety, I now send Mr. Townsend with this talk to you, and several other chiefs in the nation; requesting, that you and them will take such steps as may seem good to you, in order to my coming. It is my wish, that as many of my friends as see fit, will meet me at the Oakmulgee, by the 10th day of September, when I will attend you into the nation, for the purpose of establishing a lasting peace and friendship between us and our countries. I shall go from this place to the Rock Landing, where I shall wait until you send Mr. Townsend, or some other trusty white person, with an Indian or two to meet me, and inform of your arrival at the Oakmulgee.

Your great father General Washington, President of the United States, ordered back those warriors who had set out from Georgia to punish the bad towns. It is his wish not to hurt any of his red people, that will act justly towards him and his people; and therefore hath forbid war being carried into your land, that you may have time to punish those who have been guilty of murder and robbery on this frontier; another reason for not letting the troops go into the nation at this time, was, from a dread that some of our friends might be hurt, and thereby make our misfortunes the greater.

A most unfortunate and distressing affair lately took place, in the death of our friend David Cornell; it was all owing to a mistake and bad conduct of the white man that came down with him. I hope no hasty rash steps will be taken by his relations or countrymen, as it is my determination they shall have full satisfaction made them, and every thing settled as well as possible.

When I come up we will arrange all these matters. My friend, you seem to think hard your horses was not sent back, and I allow you have reason; had they been under my direction, it should not have been so. I applied several times to Mr. Fowler for the horses, in order to send your goods, but never could get them. The goods were ready, and I several times told the white man, who came down with the horses, that they were ready whenever he chose to go; so that you see I have not been in fault, as you trusted your horses under Fowler and Killey's care.

I wrote you some time ago, requesting that you would take into your possession and safekeeping, every thing belonging to the United States, that might be found among Mr. McGillivray's effects. I am afraid, from what Mr. Townsend tells me, that you have not received my letter. I again request that you will have it done, and keep all safe until I come up. Mr. Townsend takes charge of some few things for you.

I have only to say, that it is the earnest desire of the President and people of the United States, to live in peace with the Creek nation, and that, if you are involved in a war, it must be your own faults. I doubt not but, that when we meet, we shall settle all matters; I therefore hope nothing may prevent. I was ready to set off for the nation when the mischief took place on St. Mary's in March last. I should most undoubtedly come with David Cornell, had he lived.

Mr. Townsend has my instructions to tell you several matters that I conceive necessary to be done, and I must request that you will attend to him.

You will always find in me a true and firm friend and brother, and I shall expect the same in you, being, with respect,

Your humble servant,

JAMES SEAGROVE,
Agent of Indian Affairs, S. D. U. S.

James Seagrove to Mr. Alexander Cornell.

SAVANNAH, 29th July, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I wrote you a long letter on the 5th of this month, respecting the melancholy fate of our friend David. I hope my letter reached you, and your wisdom and your moderation hath been the means of preventing any rash steps being taken, as I am determined that his friends shall have full satisfaction. It appearing to be the wish of all the friendly chiefs of your land, that I should come up and be among you for the purpose of settling and directing your affairs, I have long been desirous of this, and you know it was a settled plan, when I met the chiefs in November last, on St. Mary's; but the unfortunate matters which have turned up since, has alone prevented.

It is the earnest desire of the President of the United States, that I should be with you; my regard for the happiness of my Creek friends urges the same; I therefore am resolved to meet you as soon as the chiefs of the nation will say I can do it with safety; having an entire confidence in you and them, I shall cheerfully put myself under their protection. For this purpose, I have to desire that yourself and such of your friends as you think fit, will meet me on the Oakmulgee, by the 10th of September next, when I will accompany you into the nation, and then, I doubt not, we can settle all affairs on a firm footing. I doubt not but the people of the bad towns, and those in favor of the Spaniards, will oppose my coming; but, as I am led to believe that there is a great majority in the nation who are friendly to the United States, I hope they will take such measures, and act with such firmness, as to frustrate and upset all their wicked plans.

By the bearer, Mr. Townsend, I send back all the horses and property which was taken from Mr. David Cornell, and those who were with him; I have, also, sent you some goods for your own purposes.

Do not fail, my friend, to meet me, with such guard as you think necessary. Send the enclosed to Chinabee, the great Natchez warrior, and tell him I shall expect to see him with you. Let nothing prevent our meeting; that alone can now save your country.

It is absolutely necessary that the friendly towns should prevent any parties going out on our frontiers, to do mischief; if they cannot do otherwise, they ought to do it by force: for, though our troops will not, at present, go into your land, lest they should hurt our friends, yet I must inform you that large bodies, both of foot and horse, guard the frontier of Georgia from St. Mary's to Tugelo, so that, if any are so daring as to attempt coming in, they may expect to suffer, and more than probable may be followed by parties in the nation, which may be attended with disagreeable consequences to those who wish to remain our friends. It would appear very extraordinary, indeed, should any of the Creeks be allowed to rob or murder, whilst I am with them deliberating for the happiness of both countries, but more immediately theirs. I hope you will prevail on the Mad Dog and your uncle Joseph to meet me.

I have so much reliance on your goodness and friendship, that I shall not take up more of your time in pointing out any particular steps for you to take, but submit all to your own discretion, and remain your assured friend and humble servant,

JAMES SEAGROVE.

I shall go from this place to Augusta and the Rock Landing, having business that way, and I expect I shall receive advice when you will be at the Oakmulgee.

James Seagrove to the Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatchee Upper Creeks.

SAVANNAH, IN GEORGIA, 29th July, 1793.

BROTHER:

Had it not been for the death of our young friend, David Cornell, you would have seen me in the Tuckaubatchee before this day. Not a man in the Creek land feels more sorrow than I do, for the loss of him; and as I have already wrote to his cousin, Alexander Cornell, that full satisfaction shall be made his friends and the nation, I hope no hasty rash step will be taken by any of them, until they can see me, which I hope will be soon.

It has given me great pleasure to hear how much you have been our friend in all the late troubles. I have informed our Great Father, Washington, of it, and yourself, and every chief who have stood firm for us, will be rewarded. I have long wished to see you, and as there seems a great necessity that some person should be among you at this time, who is capable of directing your affairs, and this appearing to be the wish of all the well disposed chiefs, as well as the express desire of the President of the United States, I have come to a determination to come up without delay. But, as it is a matter well known, that we have people in the Lower towns who are unfriendly to us, and do not wish to see peace restored, or any person to come among them who belongs to the United States, it will therefore be necessary that the chiefs that are our friends, and friends to peace, will immediately call a meeting, and then take such measures as may seem to them best calculated to effect this desirable object, and to prevent insult or injury to my person. I have wrote to several of my friends in the nation on this business, and hope they will lose no time in complying with my wish, which is, that as many of the chiefs and warriors as choose, do meet me on the Oakmulgee by the 10th day of September, from whence I will go with them, and not leave or quit, until all matters are settled.

It is my wish to meet as many of the chiefs and warriors (that are our friends) as possible, on the Oakmulgee, as it will serve to convince all in opposition of their desire of peace, and attachment to the United States. I hope you will do me the pleasure of being there, and that this plan will meet your approbation. All will remain peace with us until we have met, and I hope, when that takes place, we shall arrange all matters so as never again to be troubled with war.

It is our wish to be in peace and close friendship with all your nation, and I live in great hope of establishing it through the assistance of yourself, and the rest of the wise men of your land. This I send by Mr. Townsend, who I request you will treat well.

In full confidence of meeting and taking you by the hand, I remain your friend and brother,

JAMES SEAGROVE,
Agent Indian Affairs, S. D. U. S.

To MAD DOG, of the Tuckaubatchee Upper Creeks.

James Seagrove to the Kings and Chiefs of the Cussetahs, and all other friends to the United States in the Lower Creek towns.

SAVANNAH, IN GEORGIA, 29th July, 1793.

BROTHERS:

I sent you a talk on the 5th of this month, informing you that seven of your people were detained at St. Mary's; and I therein gave the reasons for such a detention. On the 14th of the same month, I was obliged to leave St. Mary's, and come to this place on business, at which time all your people were well, and, to every appearance, contented. Since then, have heard that some of them have been so foolish as to run away. I cannot account for their conduct, as I had all along told them, that they should go home by Mr. Mordecai, and have every thing they wanted. I think their imprudent flight must have been owing to a Chehaw fellow that was with them. It has given great uneasiness lest any misfortune should befall them before they reach home. They ought to have known better, and have depended on my promise to them. They must allow, that my treatment of them was kind and indulgent, beyond any thing they had a right to expect. They were plentifully fed, well clothed by me, comfortably lodged, and in every other respect indulged as much as was consistent with their own safety. In short, I think they have treated me very unkind in going away in the manner they did, after my repeated promise that I would send them home as soon as it could be done with safety.

To convince you of the sincerity of my intentions, and how wrong those have been that went away, I now send those that remained, home to you, by Mr. Mordecai and Mr. Townsend, together with all their property, and a number of presents. I wish them safe home, and all I require of them, is, that they tell you the truth, as to their treatment since they have been detained, which, if they do, you will be convinced that the motives for their detention was dictated by humanity towards them, and real friendship for the Cussetah people.

Long ere this, you must have heard of the unhappy accident of killing David Cornell. Full satisfaction shall be given his family and friends for his loss, and I hope no rash steps may be taken in consequence of his death, so as to injure the prospect we have of restoring all matters to a friendly footing.

The talks in general, which I have received from the nation, give me reason to believe, that a large majority of the towns are desirous of peace with the United States, and are desirous of giving satisfaction for injuries done us. But it would seem, that you stand in need of somebody to direct you in this, as well as all other measures, for your happiness as a people. It is well known to you, that it was my determination to have been with you long ere this, had I not been prevented by the bad conduct of some of your people. Being solicited by the chiefs of the Upper Creeks, to come among them as soon as possible, and, having reason to believe that my presence will be agreeable to my Cussetah friends and several of the Lower towns, I have come to the resolution of meeting you all, for the purpose of restoring peace and friendship to our countries. In order that I may do this with safety to my person and without insult to my country, it is necessary, beforehand, that our friends in the nation should be informed, that they may take such steps, and form such plans, as will secure the objects intended. This, I think, will be best effected, by all the friendly chiefs having a meeting, and appointing a respectable guard to meet me on the Oakmulgee, by the 10th September next, such as will protect me from the insult of our enemies. On this occasion, it will give me great pleasure to meet as many of my Cussetah friends as convenient, together with the chiefs and warriors of the other friendly towns, as their forwardness on the occasion will serve to convince their kind and great father, the President of the United States, that they continue his dutiful children.

The great good that may result from our being together, must appear clear to you. I hope, therefore, that nothing may prevent its being carried into effect. Mr. Jacob Townsend, who is now with me, will inform you of my exertions in your favor, and that no troops will go into your land till all hope of satisfaction is given over. I have received the Big Cussetah warrior's talk to Mr. Barnard, on the second of this moon. He speaks like a man and a friend. I love his talk, and will send it to our Great Father, General Washington.

Until we meet, you have nothing to fear, provided your bad people lie still; but should they dare to do mischief on any part of the frontier of Georgia, they will be pursued, as the same is strongly guarded by horse and foot, from St. Mary's to the river Tugelo.

If you wish to prevent blood being spilt, you must prevent those bad people from coming out, even if you are obliged to use force. Those bad men are making war on you, that is, they will draw it on you, if not prevented by yourselves: for, should they do mischief, and our people follow them, (which undoubtedly will be the case) you, or others of our friends, may suffer, when it is not intended. I wish you to think seriously of this, and exert yourselves before it is too late; much is in your power, and I have great dependence on you. I go from this to Augusta, and from thence to the Rock Landing, where I shall wait for the arrival of my friends at the Oakmulgee. You must send me on an express, letting me know when you will be there. I shall come unattended by more than a servant or two, so that no one need be alarmed. I have only to say that I remain, as much as ever,

Your real friend,

JAMES SEAGROVE,
Agent Indian Affairs, S. D. U. S.

James Seagrove to Charles Weatherford.

SAVANNAH, 29th July, 1793.

SIR:

Your letter of the 11th June last, I received from the pack of our unfortunate friend, David Cornell, whose fate you must have heard before this. His death has given me more real anxiety than any thing I ever met with. It was a cursed stupid affair in McDonald, to leave them twenty or thirty miles behind, when he knew an armed force was kept up all along the frontier, and same time knew all the white people were angry at the unprovoked outrages committed on them by the red ones. I do not believe, from my soul, that McDonald intended them harm; but certain it is, he acted unwisely. Poor Cornell is gone, and we must make the best of it. I hope his family has not, and will not, take any rash step. I do assure them they shall have full satisfaction if they will act with moderation. As soon as the unfortunate affair took place, I despatched a runner to Barnard, in order that all our white friends in the nation might take such measures as to them would seem most advisable in the situation affairs might take. I hope, however, no change hath taken place in consequence of Cornell's death, and that the chiefs and people have not altered their opinion of us on this account.

Your conduct, in all matters, I highly approve; continue to persevere; firm, determined conduct is every thing, either with red or white. The Spaniards have been our ruin; be a thorn in their side; it is but justice to do by them as they do by us. It appears, from the whole tenor of all information from the nation, that those who wish to restore peace and order, and to have all matters brought to a respectable footing, are anxious for my coming among them. For that purpose, it being also the command of the President of the United States that I should, as well from a full conviction, in my own mind, that good may arise therefrom, I have concluded, that, if my friends in the nation can form a party sufficient to overpower our enemies, and will be firm in preserving my person from injury, or my country from insult, through me, I will meet them without delay. I think the time a critical one, and my appearance might have a good effect.

I have written several of the chiefs of the Upper and Lower towns, which, doubtless, you will see. My wish is for them to meet me at the Oakmulgee by the 10th September, with a sufficient force to escort me to the Cussetahs, and from thence to the Upper towns.

Though I have little apprehension of danger, yet I think it will have a good effect, and damp our enemies, by seeing my friends turn out numerous on this occasion. My dear Weatherford, it is useless in me to make use of arguments with you, to induce your forwarding this very desirable business. I have only to say, I depend upon your utmost exertions, and shall, without fail, expect to meet you at the Rock Landing a day or so before the time necessary for my setting off for the Oakmulgee. Tell Rawlings not to leave the nation till I see him. Bring as many of your head-men as you can. I must refer you to Townsend, and when you and I meet, we will arrange our affairs; until then,

I remain your assured friend,

JAMES SEAGROVE.

James Seagrove to Timothy Barnard.

SAVANNAH, 29th July, 1793.

SIR:

Having been obliged to come here from St. Mary's, on business, and being absent when your letters of 2d and 3d instant arrived there, Mr. Townsend came on with them to me.

As you undoubtedly would receive my letters by Charves, the day after you wrote, you are fully informed of the unfortunate end of David Cornell. I hope you sent forward my talk to his friends, and that no hasty rash steps hath been taken by them, and that you have been able to hold your ground, as at this moment your presence seems more necessary in the towns than ever. Your letters, mentioned above, contain full and minute information on the state of Indian affairs. I have transmitted copies of them to the Secretary of War, also of all the talks I have of late received. I do not conceive the death of David Cornell in so dreadful a light as you do. I never considered it as very alarming, only as it respected some one or two of our white friends in the nation, or his relations, first getting the news of it. The first gust of their passion once over, I think there is no fear but we can settle the business without difficulty.

From every appearance of matters, I think there is a favorable opportunity of our now fixing ourselves firmly in the nation. That the nation is convulsed, and their counsels distracted, is evident; the cause of which arises, in a very great degree, from want of some person to direct them, in whom they can place a confidence. McGillivray's death gives a favorable opening, and if we cannot improve it, the Spaniards will. You know my desire in that way, and that I should long since have been there, but could not, with any hope of safety. A majority of the chiefs now feel themselves embarrassed between us, the Spaniards, the Chickasaws, and Choctaws, also other matters pressing them, and appear desirous of my coming among them. Whether they are sincere or not, will soon be seen, as I have determined to give them an opportunity. You will see by the enclosed letters to all the chiefs, that I have determined to meet them on the Oakmulgee, by the 10th September next, and from thence go with them into every part of the nation that they desire, and then and there do all in my power to settle matters to the satisfaction of all.

Having received late instructions from the President of the United States to this effect, nothing remains but that you and I strain every nerve to carry so desirable a business into effect. For this purpose, I must desire that you do immediately attend the Cussetah chiefs, and, in conjunction with them, call a meeting of as many of the friendly towns, as possible, and adopt such plan as you think best calculated to secure my entrance into the nation, and security there. I am ordered to Rock Landing, where your next despatches will find me, and where I shall expect to see you a day or two before the meeting at the Oakmulgee. You must not give the Indians any expectation of receiving any presents at our meeting. The thing will be impossible in the present distracted state of this country. For me to attempt any thing of the kind, would be highly resented. I meet them to serve them, and establish them in peace; when that is accomplished, and all is quiet, I shall attend to their wants; but I cannot help saying, that too much hath been given already to ungrateful Indians. I shall find extreme difficulty, I expect, to carry out a few articles of provisions for myself, for which reason, the Indians must bring their provisions to the Oakmulgee. I observe your want of money or goods to enable you to live and carry on the public business. I am sorry that it is not in my power to assist you with money. I have not had a dollar, belonging to the United States, in my possession, for twelve months past; and I do assure you, I have exhausted all my own little resources in purchasing ready money articles, and paying unavoidable public demands.

The assortment of goods in the public store at St. Mary's, is much broke. I shall send orders to Mr. Jordan to send you a supply of such as there is, by Mordecai, as I know you cannot do without a little coffee and sugar. I have ordered 25 weight of the former, and 30 of the latter, to be put up for you, out of my family stores. When we meet at the Rock Landing I can assist you with goods.

I have prevailed on the bearer, Mr. Jacob Townsend, to engage to deliver you this, and to carry up my letters to the Upper towns, where he seems to stand well with the White Lieutenant, and other leading characters. Mr. Townsend promises every assistance in his power, and I have no doubt he will do as he says. Let me recommend a good understanding between you and him. I have seen your brother, on Wilmington island, a few days past, when on a visit to General Greene's lady, who has built on the Point, below your brother Robert's. Your family are all in health.

I shall bring, or send, the medicine you sent for. I wish you to bring the Kinnards up to meet me, lest that old villain, Panton, gets hold of them. No news of any consequence from the North. I have sent home all the Indians by Townsend and Mordecai; also all the horses and things belonging to Cornell and his party. It is impossible for me to give a rifle to Tobler, or any Indian whatever. I have them not, and if I had, I should not give arms in the present state of affairs. I will order him something as an equivalent. Do not fail to improve on the kindness shown the Indians whom I detained, and the great indulgence in sending them home.

You will urge on the friendly towns, not to suffer the unfriendly ones to send out on this frontier, for, as sure as they do, it will create fresh difficulties.

I am, &c.

JAMES SEAGROVE.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove, agent, to the Secretary of War, dated Savannah, 4th August, 1793.

This serves to enclose a copy of my letter to Governor Telfair, wrote and forwarded by yesterday's post.

Since my last, no change or novelty hath taken place in Indian affairs, that I have heard of, which leaves me only to say, that I am, with all possible respect and esteem,

Your devoted, obedient, humble servant,

JAMES SEAGROVE, Agent.

To his Excellency Governor Telfair, dated August 3d, 1793.

SIR:

By the enclosed extract of a letter from the Secretary of the War Department, your Excellency will perceive I have received positive instructions from the President of the United States, to go into the Creek nation, as soon as I shall have made arrangements for my personal safety. This measure is considered and pressed as the only one likely to restore and preserve peace and harmony with those tribes, to effect which, in the present conjuncture of affairs, is a matter of the highest importance to the United States, as well as to this State.

In consequence of these pointed instructions, I do myself the honor to inform your Excellency, that I have sent to inform the chiefs and head-men of the friendly towns, of my intentions, and that I shall go from here very shortly to the Rock Landing, and that I will meet such of them as may choose to come to accompany me, at the Oakmulgee, on the 10th September next; from whence, if I can effect my purpose, I shall proceed to the Tuckaubatchees, where I shall be able to judge in what manner I can best act, so as to encourage and animate our friends, and counteract the designs of those that are our enemies in the nation.

From accounts I received from the nation, both in the letters found with the unfortunate young man, David Cornell, and by an express received since, with talks from several of the chiefs of the Upper towns, it was resolved, in a large meeting, to give satisfaction for the late mischiefs done on our frontier, and to invite me into the nation, and David Cornell was sent, in consequence of that resolution, to escort me up. The death of Cornell prevented me from going at that time, which I should otherwise have done. But I have good reason to believe that that event may be may be got over, and satisfaction still obtained, preparatory to peace, if I can get into the nation. I know this will be attended with great hazards, which, however, I am resolved to encounter for the public good.

The great number of persons in the nation, whose interest is concerned to keep up the flame of war, if they were apprised of my intention, would exert all their arts and influence to prevent it from being carried into execution. I must, therefore, request your Excellency will please to keep the information I now communicate entirely a secret. I may, perhaps, by this means, effect my design, before those who would defeat it shall have time to lay any plans for that purpose.

The critical situation I shall be in, in respect to my own personal safety, will make it essentially necessary I should be early apprised of any military enterprises that may be intended against the nation by your Excellency, or under your authority. I request your Excellency will have the goodness to give me such timely notice as may enable me to provide for my safety. Of the eight Indians detained by me some time ago, and committed to the custody and care of Lieutenant Nichol, of the federal troops, three have made their escape since I came from St. Mary's. I thought it best, as they belong to one of the most friendly towns, to send home the others, and have given orders accordingly. I thought it necessary to do this, in order to increase and confirm the good dispositions of the Cussetahs, to whose town they belong, and who earnestly requested it. Should your Excellency wish to have personal information from me relative to Indian affairs, I will attend at any time before my going to the nation, on your giving me notice. I have the honor to remain, your Excellency's obedient servant,

J. S. SEAGROVE,

Agent Indian Affairs S. D. U. S.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove, Esquire, to the Secretary of War.

SAVANNAH, 13th August, 1793.

My last respects to you was dated the 4th instant, duplicate copies of which you will find herewith. Yesterday arrived here the person whom I sent with my letters of the 5th July, to the chiefs and others of the Creek nation, respecting the unfortunate affair of David Cornell's being killed. My letters were delivered in the Upper and Lower towns, and received with more than usual moderation and temper by the savages. They, however, insist on satisfaction for the loss of Cornell and a boy. This ought, and, indeed, must be done; but the mode, and how to accomplish it, so as to please all sides, is a difficult task.

The plan I have all along proposed, since this affair took place, was by way of a discount. Captain Fleming, who was killed at Traders' Hill in March last, was a valuable man, and one much respected by the Creeks. Him I intended to place in lieu of Cornell, and Mr. Moffit, who was killed at the same time, for the boy, who was a cousin of Cornell. This I hope still to effect, although the friends of Cornell seem pretty obstinate, insisting on having two men delivered up to them. This may arise, in some degree, from the demand which I at first made; but, as it hath not been complied with, on the part of the nation, it is forward and ill timed in them to look for any such thing. The demand in itself, I conceive altogether inadmissible; and, therefore, should the Indians insist on it, I know not what may be the consequences.

The measures which I have taken for meeting the nation on the 10th of next month, you have been advised of by me. My determination is to meet them at all events, and, though their demands in the affair of Cornell are high, yet I flatter myself I can bring them to reason, and restore peace to our country.

Exclusive of the affair of Cornell, all other matters were in a good train of being settled; but this hath given our enemies in the nation, and the Spaniards, fresh matters to keep up the unruly spirit of the disaffected towns, as well as to work on the relations of Cornell, who are numerous, and have influence.

My letters from Mr. Barnard, in the nation, are as late as the 25th ultimo. All was then quiet, and not any parties out towards the frontier of Georgia. The Spaniards in Florida have lately had a visit from them. A party of Creeks took off all the horses they could find between the river St. Mary's and St. John.

Governor Telfair, with his council of nine generals, have been sitting for eight days; but, what they have determined on, is yet a secret. I have not received an answer to the letter I wrote him the 3d instant. I observe by an Augusta paper of the 8th instant, that a most wanton outrage hath been committed on the Cherokees by a Captain John Beard, from Governor Blount's territory. It appears that the attack was made on the Hanging Maw's house, where a number of chiefs had assembled; that several were killed and wounded. I fear this may cause fresh trouble with the Cherokees. This took place on the 12th June last.

[ENCLOSURES.]

From Richard Thomas to James Seagrove, Esq.

Yours, dated the fifth instant, came to hand the 16th. Previous to its arrival, we had been alarmed by a report of the death of our brother, David Cornell. We were in hopes it was without any foundation, but your letter has confirmed the truth of it. The behavior of Mr. McDonald should be a caution to you for the future not to employ any man on such particular business but those whose former conduct has convinced you that they can be depended upon. The man on the scouting party from Colerain has not told you the truth concerning the behavior of our brother, David Cornell, and the Indians with him. It shall be now related to you in the manner we have received it from one of the party, who has returned home. The day after McDonald had left them, they discovered the scouting party riding briskly towards them. David, who was walking before, called to the Indians not to be afraid, as they were friends. At the distance of ten yards, one of the scouting party went a little to the right, and another to the left, and when our brother David, who had no gun, was pulling off his hat, a third went behind a tree and fired at him. He immediately mounted his horse, with a view of making his retreat, but was too closely pursued, and fell a victim to the villany of McDonald and his associates. The remaining Indians took refuge in a baygate until your people gave over the pursuit. A boy of ten years old, that was with David, had, during the conflict, made his escape through the woods. His track was seen afterwards on the way to the nation, but he is not come in, and we think he has perished on the road. You say our Great Father, General Washington, has forbid the Governor of Georgia, or any of his people, from war, until you have our final answer, which is peace. We are certain that peace is preferable to war, for the prosperity of our nation, and mutual benefit of both countries, and were in hopes that a firm and lasting peace would have been concluded on between our brother David and you. This last accident has retarded it for a while; but, as we put great confidence in your talks, and have not the least doubt but you will give us the satisfaction required, you will consider the peace as re-established, and the paths between us open and clear from all danger; and we desire you to give the necessary orders to your people on the frontiers. The talks of our head-men and warriors from the Upper towns in the nation to the Seminole towns, are for peace, and the minds of our young warriors are on the hunting grounds. We hope you will use the utmost of your endeavors, to prevent any of your bad men interrupting us on our hunting ground, and, as it is our wish to have a general peace, we have given orders to our young warriors not to molest the inhabitants of Kentucky, Cumberland, the new State, back parts of South Carolina, or Georgia. The satisfaction required by us is, that you keep a strict guard on McDonald, and the other two concerned in the business, and, at a time appointed by yourselves, send them under a strong guard to Mr. Tim Barnard's, where people appointed from us shall be ready to receive them, and take the satisfaction. The seven Cussetahs, and one Chehaw, we would wish you to send home, likewise the horses which was with our brother David. The bear skins they had, if of any service, you may keep, and send the value to his mother in goods.

I do hereby certify, that the above talk is the talk of the Mad Dog, a head warrior named Captain, and the Otasee King. Captain is uncle to David Cornell. And the above talk was interpreted to me by Mr. Alexander Cornell, and that it is the same in substance, if not in words. Given under my hand, at Tuckaubatchee, this 19th day of July, 1798.

RICHARD THOMAS.

From Alexander Cornell to James Seagrove, Esq.

Your letter of the 5th, came to hand four days ago. I leave you to judge of my feelings on finding the death of my cousin David confirmed, and that, at a time when we fondly indulged ourselves that he was with you, and treated as a friend and brother, and that a lasting peace would have been the consequence of your meeting. However, that object, I hope, is not irremediable. You will see the talks of the chiefs, and, I hope, give them the satisfaction required. You are a man that, I believe, has the mutual benefit of both countries at heart, and I need not inform you, that, without some example is made of those who had a hand in the death of David, it will be impossible for peace to last long. Along with the letters that David had with him, was one which had a memorandum of some articles I stand in need of, and will esteem it as a favor if you will send them by the first opportunity that offers. My cousin Davy had on, when he was killed, a pair of silver spurs; on your making inquiry, I think they may be recovered.

I am, sir, &c.

ALEXANDER CORNELL.

From James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War, dated

SAVANNAH, 17th August, 1798.

Sir:

I did myself the honor of writing you on the 13th instant, by Mr. Ellicott, but, the ship by which he goes, being detained by contrary winds, gives me an opportunity of informing you that Governor Telfair, and his council of generals, broke up on the 11th instant, without coming to any decisive measures. I have not been favored with a line from the Governor, but have seen General Jackson, who was present; from him, I understood that the generals and his Excellency did not agree as to what was necessary to be done, and the extent of his instructions; in consequence of which, I believe, the generals have left all with the Governor. From what I can understand, no immediate expedition is to take place, but, that one is in contemplation, whether with a view to strike a blow on the offending towns, or for general purposes, I am not able to say.

Am yours, &c.

SAVANNAH, August 21st, 1798.

Since writing, on the 17th instant, by Mr. Ellicott, a duplicate of your letter of the 30th April, reached me, from which, it would appear that you had no favorable opinion of good arising from my conferences with the Indians. My communications with those people you have regularly been made acquainted with, from which, you must plainly discover, that there was a pleasing prospect of a lasting peace, when the chiefs parted from me at Colerain, in November last. What hath taken place since, to destroy that prospect, you are well acquainted with; I shall not, therefore, intrude on your time, by a repetition, further than observing to you, that, to the Spanish Government, and their agents, McGillivray, Panton & Co. with others of less note, are we to attribute all disturbance and mischief that hath been done to our frontier by the Creeks, and, that that government and people will continue to oppose and distract every measure the United States may adopt, with a view to live in peace with the Southern tribes, should they be allowed to act with impunity, as heretofore. For my part, I would not wish any agency in Indian affairs, if such things are overlooked, or that I am restricted, as hitherto, respecting those people; being fully convinced, that, in such situation, I cannot render that essential service to my country, that naturally will be looked for, in return for the unavoidable heavy expenses which ever attend communications with savages. On the 25th instant, I leave this for the Rock Landing, and shall take Augusta in my way, that I may give Governor Telfair an opportunity of inquiring into Indian matters, (if he chooses.) I have not had a line from him, as yet. The Indians continue quiet on this frontier. I have advice from St. Mary's, as late as the 10th instant; the Indians who had been detained there, were sent off, under care of three white men, who would accompany them home, and a party of horse would see them clear from all the settlements, together with their property, and some presents which I ordered them. Mr. Townsend, who was charged with my despatches, went in company.

I am just informed that Colonel Gaither is in so bad a state of health, as to be obliged to quit fort Fidius, and the upper parts of that country, and is now on his way to St. Mary's, for benefit of his health; from these accounts I have, I fear his life is in danger. I am very sorry for so valuable an officer.

I hope it will be practicable for me to get into the Creek nation; if so, I may be able to reconcile and adjust matters to satisfaction; but, in this I may expect to meet pointed opposition from different quarters. All that I can promise is, that I will do all in my power to obtain justice for injuries done, and restore peace to our country.

Am, &c.

James Seagrove, Agent, to the Secretary of War, dated

Augusta, 3d September, 1793.

SIR:

My last letter to you was from Savannah, and under date of the 21st ultimo, since which I came to this place, in company with Captain Freeman, being so far on my way to Rock Landing. My motives in calling at Augusta, in my way, was, in the first place, to present myself, as Indian agent, to his Excellency Governor Telfair, and to communicate such information as in my power, (if required) and to obtain, if possible, some knowledge of his Excellency's intended plans against the Creeks; in the next place, to be able to ascertain what I ought, in truth and justice, to promise the Indians, as, from the current reports in this country, and even the publications in the newspapers of this place, as well as from measures already taken by the Governor, a war with the Creeks appears determined on, and that, as early as the 15th of next month. The Governor hath been at his plantation, about forty miles from hence, ever since my arrival on the 31st ultimo; he is expected in town to-day. Since I have been here, I have received undoubted information that Governor Telfair has had formed, a new contract for five hundred thousand rations; that he hath called on the Governor of South Carolina for fifteen hundred or two thousand men, and that three thousand are to be drawn from the militia of this State, one thousand five hundred of which to be horsemen, all of whom to be ready by the 15th of next month to enter the Creek nation, under command of his Excellency. All this shall not prevent my going forward, and, if possible, entering the nation, and using my utmost endeavors to prevent the use of such an army moving. I cannot allow myself to suppose, that Governor Telfair can have orders for what he is now doing, when I view your letter to me of the 10th June last.

I am much pleased that you have sent forward Captain Freeman; he will be able, in a short time, to give you an idea of our situation in this country. I have already given my opinion of the ruling principles in Georgia, and I have reason to think you will find I have not been mistaken. To speak of peace with the Creeks, is a crime not to be forgiven, by a very great proportion of the people in this country; and my candid opinion is, that a general war is the object, however impolitic or unjust.

I once suggested the idea to the President of the United States, of having a certain number of the most influential Creek chiefs, called to the seat of Congress, and repeat the same every year. I now beg leave to submit to your consideration, that, in case I am so fortunate as to quiet the present commotions, whether or not it would be well to invite ten or fifteen principal chiefs to Philadelphia, which will be ensuring peace whilst they are in our possession, as well as answering many other valuable purposes. Should this be approved, I hope you will lose no time in giving me directions, as, the sooner such voluntary hostages are drawn from the nation, the better.

From some recent accounts, it would appear, that the Upper Creeks are much alarmed, on account of a large body of white people, from the Western waters, having joined the Chickasaws, with the intention to attack them. What foundation there is for such report, I know not; but the Creeks go so far as to say, that the Chickasaws are furnished with some pieces of artillery, from Governor Blount's territory. The enclosed copy of a talk, sent to Major Gaither by Mr. Barnard, on this business, may serve further to explain this matter. I do not hear of any injury being done by the Indians since my last.

As I have engaged to meet the Indians by the 10th instant, I cannot wait much longer for the Governor's arrival; should I be able to see him before my departure, I will inform you, with the result of our meeting.

With all possible respect, I remain, yours, &c.

[ENCLOSURE.]

A talk from the heads of the Upper and Lower Creeks, by order of the Mad Dog, of the Tuckaubatchees, given out in the Cussetah Square, at a meeting of a number of Lower Creeks, this 21st July, 1793—to be forwarded to his Excellency General Washington, President of the United States.

We, the heads of the Creek nation, wish to acquaint your Excellency, that we are just informed, by a runner of our own people, from the Chickasaw nation, that there was some of the Chickasaws just arrived, who had been holding talks with Governor Blount; they came to Cumberland, and said that they had agreed with Governor Blount to send six thousand men to station at the Muscle Shoals, on the Cherokee river; and that the Cumberland people had agreed to send five hundred more men to join the Chickasaws, to station at a fort in the Chickasaw nation; and that the Cumberland people had already sent three pound great guns to said fort, and that the five hundred men were to be there in a short time. We, the heads of the Creek nation, wish to hear from General Washington, whether it is his desire that Governor Blount, and these Cumberland people, should go on as they are, or whether or not they are people that are under the Government of General Washington; this, we, the heads of the nation, would wish to know as quick as possible. We, the heads of the Upper and Lower Creeks, wish to inform the President of the United States, that we have given out talks to put a total stop to all our young people going out to commit any hostilities against Cumberland or Kentucky; therefore, if it is the wish of the President of the United States, that his people and the red people should be at peace, we hope he will immediately restrain Governor Blount and his people from joining the Chickasaws. It is not that we are in great dread of the consequences of those proceedings, but as we have had a long wish to settle all disputes, we hope that our friend and father, General Washington, still remains in the same opinion. We, the heads of the Lower Creeks, likewise wish to inform the heads of Georgia, that, if they still have a wish to settle matters with the red people, we hope they will, on seeing this, immediately send to Governor Blount to restrain his people till his Excellency General Washington's pleasure is known.

CUSSETAHS, July 21, 1793.

T. BARNARD.

James Seagrove, Esq. to the Secretary of War, dated at Augusta, September 5th, 1793.

SIR:

The enclosed is a duplicate of what I had the honor of writing on the 3d instant. Last evening, his Excellency Governor Telfair arrived in town, and this morning Captain Freeman and myself waited on him. I acquainted the Governor, that I was so far on my way to the Rock Landing, and from thence into the Creek nation, in compliance with your order of the 10th instant; that I had waited on him to give such information as in my power, and to obtain some idea of the plans already adopted, or in contemplation by his Excellency, relative to the Creek nation. I wish I had it in my power to say, that I received an explicit or satisfactory answer. All I could obtain from him was, that an expedition was determined on against the unfriendly Creek towns; that it was a measure much desired by the people of this State; that the depredations of the Creeks had been such as to irritate the people, so as to make it almost impossible to restrain them from immediate offensive war; that he had entered into a contract for rations, &c. for upwards of four thousand men, on an expedition against the Creeks, which men were to be drawn from South Carolina and this State; but I could not ascertain the time of calling into the field, or term of service.

His Excellency told me, in presence of Captain Freeman, that he thought my journey to the Creeks altogether useless; that a war must be had, and the Indians chastised before peace could be solid or agreeable.

I urged the ill policy of entering on a war with the Creeks, that from every appearance would be general; that such a measure, I believed, was very contrary to the wish of the General Government; and, therefore, that I should, in compliance with the desire of the President of the United States, set off to-morrow morning for the Rock Landing, and from thence, to the Creek towns, and there do all in my power to obtain satisfaction, and settle a peace; and requested of his Excellency, that, if he made any movements of a military nature against the Creeks, I should receive timely notice. At the same time, I told him I would give every information of the situation of affairs, or of any change likely to take place.

This is the sum and substance of what passed at our interview. You, undoubtedly, are the best judge how far our Governor is right. If I can obtain peace agreeably to the wish of the President, I will do it; and, if possible, obtain hostages for the good faith of the nation.

I find the murderer, John Galphin, is taken by the hand by Panton, who has dictated a very insolent letter for Galphin, and sent to the frontiers of this country. Panton never will let this country be in peace, whilst he hath any thing in his power.

There is a report in town, that General Pickens is returned home; if so, I shall hope for some good accounts by him.

With every sentiment of respect, I remain, yours, &c.

AUGUSTA, September 6, 1793.

SIR:

Since writing the preceding, I have thought it would be well to write this to the Governor, and let him know my movements, lest I should give room for reflection. I have wrote to his Excellency this morning, a copy of which you will find enclosed. I shall remain here to day to give him an opportunity, should he have any thing to say to me.

I am, &c.

JS. SEAGROVE.

James Seagrove, Esq. to his Excellency Governor Telfair, dated Augusta, September 6th, 1793.

SIR:

When I had the honor of an interview with your Excellency on the 5th instant, you intimated, that it would be more agreeable to receive my communications in writing: I, therefore, inform your Excellency, that, in conformity to the orders of the President of the United States, transmitted through the Secretary of the Department of War to me, on the 10th of June last, (a copy of which was sent you by the Secretary of War) I am thus far on my way to the Rock Landing, and from thence, if possible, into the Creek nation, for the attainment of the objects directed in the abovementioned letter of instruction.

The time which I have appointed for meeting the Indians in the nation is near at hand, and will not admit of further delay on my part, having been here six days.

I took Augusta in my way, that I might have the honor of seeing your Excellency, and of communicating fully on all matters relative to the business I am employed on. I shall now, and at all times, be happy in giving your Excellency every information in my power that may tend to promote the peace or prosperity of our country, and to aid, as much as possible the measures adopted by the General Government for restoring tranquillity to Georgia.

Should your Excellency see fit to form any military enterprise against a part of the Creek nation, whilst I am there, I shall expect to have notice given me, in time to provide for the personal safety of myself and the other citizens of the United States that may be among the savages. On my part, I shall give your Excellency regular information of my agency on this occasion, and, should any material change take place, you shall know it by express. I am under the necessity of leaving this place for the Rock Landing, on the Oconee, to-morrow morning. In the interim, should you have any commands, shall be happy to receive them, being, with all due respect, yours, &c.

FORT FIDUS, (on the Oconee) Sept. 17, 1793.

SIR:

Since writing you, from Augusta, on the 6th instant, I arrived at this place, in company with Col. Gaither, on the 9th. I could plainly discover, before I left Augusta, that the business of peace, which I was going on, was very disagreeable to many, even in that metropolis, and was informed that I should meet with insult, and perhaps worse, if I attempted going to this place. I treated all this as an idle story; however, when we had reached within thirty-two miles of this place, we were not a little surprised to see Captain Dickinson, with a party of federal troops, meeting us. They were sent, as you will observe by the enclosed paper, it being the opinion of a council of all the officers at this garrison, for our protection, they having received alarming accounts respecting us, especially myself, of whom it was currently said that parties were out, waylaying the roads, to shoot me. We did not meet with any interruption, and got safe here.

From undoubted information, which I have every day received since being here, and from the conduct of the generality of those frontier people, I find that it is a matter determined on, by them, that peace with the Creek Indians shall not take place on any terms whatever; that, in order to prevent my meeting the Indians, parties of militia are constantly kept out between this river and the Oakmulgee, to intercept and destroy myself or messengers; and, doubtless, Indians also, whether friend or foe.

On the 2d or 3d instant, a party of thirteen horsemen, under command of a Captain Stokes, of the militia, went from a place called Long Bluff, on this river, (about thirty miles below this garrison) towards the Oakmulgee, where he found four Indians cooking on the margin of that river. Stokes' party fired on the Indians, and, it is said, killed three of them. Certain it is, he brought off three horses, a quantity of deer skins, and four rifles. My informant, a man of good repute, was a witness to the sale and division of this property amongst the captors, after their return into the settlement. It is said that these Indians had stolen two horses from Long Bluff a few days before, and were followed in consequence. This affair, I fear, has prevented the Indians coming forward, agreeably to my request of the 29th July. Not hearing of any of the Indians being at the Oakmulgee, and being anxious to know the situation of matters, I despatched two trusty persons, in the night of the 11th, through the woods, with a letter to Mr. Barnard, for the purpose of obtaining information. I am not without great fear for the safety of these messengers, or any that may be coming to me from the nation, as several scouting parties of the militia of this country are constantly patrolling between this and the Oakmulgee, in order to intercept either Indians or whites, and to put them to death.

Ever since I have been here, spies are kept about to watch my movements, and threats of the most insolent kind are denounced against me, should I dare to oppose their darling object, an Indian war. For a week past, an expedition has been forming in the neighborhood of this garrison, and in Greene county, with intention, as is said, of going into the Creek towns. They call themselves volunteers; they appear to be commanded by the Colonels Alexander, Lamar, and Melton. The party, from the best information, will not exceed two hundred mounted men, with provisions for ten days. They crossed the Oconee, near Shoulderbone, on Sunday, the 15th instant. My opinion is, that they do not mean to go further than the river Oakmulgee, where they expect that the friendly chiefs will be coming to meet me. Should it be the case, and these people fall in with them, the consequence will be dreadful. By what authority this party has been raised and sent out I know not: I can only say, that there does not appear any opposition of this Government, to the violent, unwarrantable proceedings of those frontier settlers.

Whilst such measures are pursued by the people of Georgia, I conceive it would be highly imprudent in me to attempt going into the nation with a view to establishing any thing of a pacific nature with the Creeks, being fully convinced that those restless people would render the whole a nullity, if not bring much censure and discredit on the United States and their servants, with the savages, who cannot clearly discriminate the actions of individual States or people from that of the General Government. The opposition to every measure favorable to peace with the Creek Indians, as well as the pointed disrespect to every person in the immediate service of the General Government, is so conspicuous and general among the inhabitants of this upper country, as, in my humble opinion, to give just reason to fear that the cause proceeds, in a great degree, from a source in this State, which it ought not.

The conduct of some of the people of Georgia, viewed with those of other States in the Union, who are unfortunately engaged in Indian wars, is so extremely opposite as to justify an opinion that there is unfair doings here, and deep design in the business. I am sensible that those opinions, if known, would be very unpopular in some parts of this country. I believe them just, and, so long as I am employed by the General Government, I will give my opinion, as an honest servant.

I should have wrote Governor Telfair, and requested him to put a stop to those parties of his militia from going out against the Indians at this time, was I not already convinced by his conduct, that no kind of attention would be paid to my application on this, or any other, Indian business.

I have received every attention and assistance I required from Colonel Gaither, and those under his command. His returning with me to this place, (when his health required a change of climate) in order to forward the orders of the President to me, points out the attentive, faithful officer, which I do verily believe him to be, in every instance; and, to my knowledge, he has been most cruelly calumniated by the late Capt. McLean and a Mr. Minor, which will be made appear to you.

The Indians appear to be perfectly quiet in every direction along the frontier of Georgia, and I firmly believe it is their wish to continue so, if not driven to extremes by the people of this country. I shall continue here, until I can hear from the nation, and know what possibly can be done. In the present situation of matters, I cannot attempt any thing with safety. The enclosed declaration, made by James Aiken, who I sent with my packhorses from Savannah, will serve to acquaint you with the temper of the inhabitants of this country towards federal officers, and the risk we run in doing our duty on this lawless frontier.

You will also find enclosed a certified extract of a letter from Lieutenant Sedgwick, commanding at fort Matthews, mentioning that a Captain Williamson, with a troop of horse from that quarter, had gone toward the Oakmulgee, to intercept me or the Indians. I believe it will be found, on inquiry, that a principal part of those parties, who are now out to oppose me in effecting a peace, are those very militia called out by Governor Telfair, for the protection of the frontier, and who expect to be paid by the General Government.

September 22, 1793.—I have delayed sending forward the preceding in hope of hearing from the nation, but, as yet, I have not the least information of what is doing. My messengers having not yet returned, I am of opinion that the chiefs have convened, to come to some determination on my last letter to Mr. Barnard, a copy of which I herewith send you.

The Captain Williamson mentioned by Lieutenant Sedgwick, went as far as the Apalachee with 70 men, but, as usual, a dissension took place between the commanders, and he, with his party, returned. Report says that Alexander is gone toward the nation, but I believe the Oakmulgee will be his utmost range at this time. By such futile expeditions, as have of late been set on foot from this country, the minds of the Indians are disturbed, and their confidence destroyed, either as to our prowess in war, or the sincerity of our declarations for peace with them.

If such men are allowed to act in the style they now do, it is in vain that any measures are pursued to preserve a peace between this country and the Indians. The motive of such conduct with many of the principal actors, as well as a long train of associates, is so conspicuous as not to require further explanation by me.

September 22d, 2 o'clock in the afternoon.—Since writing you as above this morning, I have received an express from the nation, in answer to my letter of the 29th July, and that sent by Mr. Aiken, on the 11th instant.

It affords me exceeding pleasure to be able to inform you, that, from the information I have received, the Creek Indians appear well disposed to comply with my wish of peace, upon terms of equal justice. There appears no obstacle in the way of peace, but the refractory people of this frontier. I shall leave this in four days, in order to meet the friendly chiefs on the Oakmulgee, and go with them into the nation, and yet hope I shall live to see peace established.

I find the Spanish agents have changed their style of talk to the Indians; they are at present favorable. I wish they may be sincere.

I have wrote to Governor Telfair this day, requesting him to put a stop to parties of his people crossing the boundary line. A copy of my letter I now forward to you.
I am, &c.

P. S. I am sorry to inform you that the Cherokees have sent, twice of late, the bloody club into the Upper Creeks, calling on them to join and war against the white people, in consequence of the injury done the Cherokees by people from Governor Blount's territory, in particular that by a Captain Baird, on the Hanging Maw and others. The Creeks positively refused them, and are determined to sit still. I fear the Cherokees will do mischief ere long.

[ENCLOSURES.]

At a council of officers, called for the following purpose, viz: From the information of Mr. Aiken, an express, and a letter from James Seagrove, Esq. that he had sent his pack-horses forward, which he recommended to my care, and from the information of him, the said Aiken, that Mr. Seagrove would, at farthest, be on here by the 7th instant, accompanied by Colonel Gaither, commandant of the federal troops in Georgia, and Captain Freeman, who is public agent for the United States, who brings on pay for the troops, as can be seen by a letter directed to me, signed Henry Gaither, and dated 29th August, 1793, and hearing that Mr. Seagrove was in danger of his life in consequence of his going to hold a treaty at the Oakmulgee, with the nation of Creek Indians, and receiving intelligence that the party of militia stationed at the Rock Landing are fattening their horses at the said Rock Landing, to proceed on the 15th instant, headed by one Jeremiah Oats, and from Aiken's knowing that the treaty must be held on the 10th inst. suspecting that some fatal accident has happened, or may happen, to the aforesaid party, we, the officers, do think it expedient, from the above communication of the commandant, that he, on calling on us, should be justified in sending out a party of federal troops, consisting of one sergeant, one corporal, and twelve privates, under the command of Captain Dickinson, to afford protection, and guard the party to this post, or gain intelligence; and he is empowered to draw provisions for four days, or money, in lieu thereof, furnished by the contractor; or, if necessary, to send an express to Georgetown, and even carry the party, if expedient, to that place.

James Aiken, being duly sworn, deposed and said, that, on the 31st of August, 1793, he parted from James Seagrove, Agent of Indian Affairs, being then on the Augusta road, at a place called Lambert's tavern; that this deponent proceeded by way of Waynesborough, toward fort Fidius, on the Oconee, with the pack horses and baggage of the said agent, agreeable to orders received from him, having, as an assistant, a free negro man, named Frederick Charves; that they proceeded by way of the White Ponds, in the county of Washington, where they stopped to refresh themselves and horses; that, whilst at that place, this deponent met with very great insult, and his life was threatened by several of the inhabitants, because he was in the service of said agent, and it was understood by those people that the agent was going to the Creek Nation to establish a peace; that the people at that place, as well as on his way, appeared very inveterate, and determined to injure the agent, or any body acting under him; and declared they would kill the agent as soon as any Indian; that a man, who this deponent understood to be of the name of Randall Griffin, did actually cock and present a rifle gun at the said negro man called Frederick Charves, and swore, in a very violent manner, that he would kill the said negro on the spot, if he knew with certainty whether he had ever been in the Creek nation, on business for said agent; the negro made no reply, or gave any cause for such usage; that this deponent verily believes, that, had it not have been for the timely interference of the Reverend James Hutchinson, he, the said negro man, as well as this deponent, would have lost their lives; that the conduct of the people of the country through which this deponent passed appeared violently opposed to every thing like peace between this country and the Indians; and, that he conceives the said agent in danger of his life, as he travels through this country; and further this deponent saith not.

JAMES AIKEN.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Sedgwick, Commandant of fort Matthews.

I this day received information that Mr. Seagrove is to meet some Indians on the Oakmulgee, for to treat with them, and that Captain Williamson, with fifty or sixty militia, was to cross last evening, with an intention to surprise them, if possible.

I certify that the above extract is taken accurately from a letter of Lieutenant Sedgwick, commandant of fort Matthews, directed to me as commanding officer at this post, dated September 16th, and received the 17th instant, which I shewed to James Seagrove, Esq. Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

FORT FIDIUS, on the Oconee, 22d September, 1793.

SIR:

This morning an express arrived to me from the Creek nation, with despatches. The letters and talks which I have received, contain such expressions of friendship and ardent desire, in the principal characters, of seeing me among them, as leaves not a doubt in my breast that they anxiously wish for a peace with this country, on terms of equal justice. This your Excellency knows to be the wish of the General Government, and I fondly hope that of my fellow citizens in Georgia.

I shall leave this to-morrow for the Creek towns, where every thing in my power shall be done to obtain full satisfaction for injuries done this country, and to establish a firm and honorable peace.

This I send by express, for the purpose of making your Excellency acquainted with the present situation of Indian affairs, and to request that you will, without delay, put a stop to all armed parties of men from this State crossing the boundary line for any purpose whatever.

I am sorry to be under the necessity of informing your Excellency, that, since I had the honor of seeing you, and of addressing you on the 6th instant, on the subject of Indian matters, there hath several parties of horsemen from this frontier crossed the Oconee, with intention, as is said, of going into the Indian towns. I will not allow myself to suppose that, after the communications I have had with your Excellency on this very point, it is possible you should have had any knowledge of such parties going out, or I should have had advice of the same from you.

Should such practice be continued from your State, whilst I am in the nation, and any injury is done a Creek Indian, the consequence will be, that every white person belonging to the United States, in the power of the savages, will fall a sacrifice, and a general Indian war be brought on this country. To prevent which, as well as the horrid reflection it would bring on our Government, I doubt not your Excellency will use every exertion in your power.

I am happy to say, that, from my information from the Indian nation, a very conspicuous and favorable change hath taken place in the conduct of the Spanish agents who are among the Creeks; doubtless this is occasioned in consequence of orders from the court of Spain.

I find, by my despatches of to-day, that the Cherokees] have called on the Creeks to join them in an immediate war against the white people, but the Creeks refused them for the present. I apprehend that the N. W. frontier of your State is in danger from the Cherokees in their present temper; and, therefore, would advise the people there being put on their guard as soon as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c.

From James Seagrove to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, on the Oconee, 9th October, 1793.

SIR:

When I had the honor of writing you on the 22d ult. I fully expected the next would have been from the Creek nation, as I then had every thing ready, and should, on the morning of the 28th, have left this, escorted by twenty-five federal troops, to defend me against the outrage of parties of militia of this frontier, and to continue with me until I met the friendly Indians, who were waiting for me on the Oakmulgee; but on that morning, a Captain Sanford, of the militia, who had just returned from an expedition to the Creek towns, under Colonel Alexander, and others, as mentioned in mine of the 17th ult. came to this garrison, and publicly declared, that their party had pursued the track of some horse thieves toward the Indian nation, and on the morning of the 21st surprised a small Indian town on the Chatahochee river, called the Little Oakfuskee; killed and scalped six Indian men, and brought off three women and five girls prisoners; that they also plundered and burnt the said town, which consisted of ten houses. This town and its people being among the most friendly of the Creeks, and no way concerned in stealing horses, they being under direction of the White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees, it appeared to me an unfortunate event, and much in the way of the business I was going on. Besides, I have every reason to believe it was done chiefly with a view to destroy all hope of my being able to effect a peace. On the same day, I received certain accounts of three other parties of horse being out from this frontier for similar purposes. Indeed, one of these parties passed this garrison, and crossed this river three miles above, and went as far as the Oakmulgee. The commander of said party declared to me, that he would destroy all Indians he came across, whether friend or foe; and that he was opposed to peace. Finding such a torrent of opposition in this country against the business of peace, and not finding that Governor Telfair took any pains to prevent those parties going out, but, on the contrary, that they were acting under orders from him and his generals; and not knowing in what manner the friendly part of the nation would view the late outrage, I concluded not to proceed to the nation until I could hear therefrom, as well as to use my endeavors with the Governor to stop his people. On this matter, I consulted with Mr. Barnard and three white men from the nation, as also Colonel Gaither, who were unanimous in opinion that I ought not, on any account, to go to the towns until the people of this frontier can be restrained, and until I could have the prisoners lately taken put in my possession, to be returned to their friends on proper terms. From these reasons, I determined to rest my journey, until I can see matters on a better footing.

I despatched Mr. Barnard, on the 29th ult. to the Indians who were waiting for me on the Oakmulgee, with some goods, as presents, and gave him full instruction how to obtain the sense of the nation, and their determination on the late transaction at the Little Oakfuskee, and to transmit me the same without delay, which will govern me as to my further movements.

I now enclose you a copy of a letter, and a set of conditions, which I received from Governor Telfair, and also my letter to him of the 3d instant, which will serve to explain many matters to you, and let you see the opposition I met with. You will find herewith a copy of a letter to me from Major of Brigade Buckner Harris, proving that Governor Telfair did give him orders, to be by him, the said major, carried to General Clarke, ordering offensive operations, as well as defensive, against the Creek Indians. These orders were given by the Governor to Major Harris, in Augusta, two days after I had seen his Excellency, and remonstrated against such things being done. I shall avoid, for the present, making any comment on the very extraordinary conduct of Mr. Telfair, not having a doubt but a little time will unravel many matters.

I momentarily expect to hear from the nation; not an Indian has been heard of, on any part of this frontier, or any mischief done by them, since my last.

I have nothing to add at present, and remain, with every sentiment of respect,

Your most obedient, devoted, very humble servant,

JAMES SEAGROVE,

Agent Indian Affairs.

Major General HENRY KNOX,
Secretary of War of the United States.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 26th September, 1793.

SIR:

The Governor has taken your letter of the 22d instant into consideration, and requires that you be furnished with the enclosed.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. URQUHART, S. E. D.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 26th September, 1793.

Conditions that will be required on the part of the State of Georgia, on the establishment of peace between the United States and the Creek Indians.

The captured property to be restored, and all individual contracts with the citizens of this State fulfilled.

The prisoners in captivity to be brought and delivered up within the settled parts of Georgia.

The perpetrators of the murders committed in this State, to the number of thirteen, to be surrendered, as objects of retaliation.

Ten head-men from the Upper and Lower Creek towns, to be surrendered as hostages to the United States, and to be placed in the safe-keeping of the Executive of the State of Georgia, for the due performance of the several stipulations that respect her.

That, under the law of the United States, as well as for the security of this State, the government of Georgia cannot recognise the establishment of peace, without having commissioners at the treaty.

Attest,

W. URQUHART, S. E. D.

FORT FIDIUS, on the Oconee, 3d October, 1793.

SIR:

The duty I owe my country, and regard for my reputation, obliges me once more to address your Excellency on a subject, which, to me, is truly unpleasant.

By my communications to you of the 3d of August last, from Savannah, and of the 6th of last month, from Augusta, and 2d from this place, as well as by a copy of my instructions, which your Excellency received from the Secretary of the Department of War, you have been fully informed of my intended journey into the Creek nation, as well as the nature and extent of my business. I, therefore, could not doubt, but I should have received every aid from the Government of Georgia, in accomplishing an object, so much desired by the President of the United States, and which tended so conspicuously to promote the true interest and happiness of the people of this State. How far my expectations on this head have been answered, the following statement of facts will explain:

After having had the honor of an interview with your Excellency at Augusta, on the 5th ultimo, and of writing you a letter next day, I set off for this place on the 7th, in order to meet the friendly chiefs on the Oakmulgee, and with them, proceed to the Creek nation. I was not a little astonished, when, on the morning of the 9th, being then about thirty miles from this place, I was met by Captain Dickinson, with a party of federal troops, whom, it appeared, had been despatched, in consequence of a council of all the officers at this garrison, held from the repeated alarming accounts to them, that parties of people were out on the roads, in order to intercept and destroy me; those misguided people having heard that I was going to the Indian nation in order to make peace for this country.

On my arrival here, I received satisfactory information, that the people on this frontier were assembling in bodies, with declared intention of expeditions in different directions to the Creek towns. I could not, for some time, allow myself to suppose it possible, after the remonstrance that I made to your Excellency, to restrain all armed parties from crossing the boundary line, whilst I was on the business of peace with the Indians, without my being apprised thereof from you. But all doubts on this head were soon removed, by the expedition which was sent out from this frontier, under command of Colonels Lemar, Alexander, and Melton, who crossed the Oconee on or about the 15th ult. and on the 21st surprised a small Indian town on the Chatahoocnee, called the little Oakfuskees; which town was under the direction of the White Lieutenant, who is well known to have ever been friendly to this country.

I am informed by one of the Captains, that was of the expedition, that the party before mentioned, killed and scalped six Indian men, and brought off eight female prisoners, plundered and burnt the town, which consisted of about ten houses; and on the 26th of the same month, the party returned to Greensborough, with the prisoners and plunder.

On the 26th ult. a party of horsemen, in the public service, under command of a Captain Carson, crossed the river Oconee, three miles above this place, with intention, as he declared, to prevent my meeting the Indians, and to destroy all or any of the friendly Indians he came across; this party went as far as the Oakmulgee, but did not meet any Indians.

At the same time, I received undoubted information of two other parties of horse being out on the Indian territory from this frontier, all of them with avowed intention of opposing my meeting the Indians, or effecting a peace. To these things, I am sorry to add, that a torrent of unmerited calumny, and insolent threats, are denounced against me, by many of the people of this country, and no pains taken by the Executive of Georgia, to support a Federal officer in the faithful discharge of his duty.

In mine of the 22d ultimo, I informed your Excellency of the very favorable prospect I had, of settling matters with the Creeks on terms of equal justice, and to the satisfaction of our country; and that I should leave this the next day, in order to meet the chiefs on the Oakmulgee. But, on receiving advice of the attack made on the Oakfuskees, and the alarming accounts of so many parties from Georgia being out, and of their views, I concluded it would be best to delay my journey for some days, in order to give your Excellency time to take further measures for restraining such doings. But, to my astonishment, I have since discovered, that those parties who have engaged in offensive operations against the Creeks, are authorized by your Excellency for what they have done, and are doing in that way.

This being confirmed to me, beyond a doubt, I conceived it would have been very improper in me to go into the Creek nation to treat of peace, whilst your Excellency was actually carrying on a war against them.

Whilst in this situation, I received your Excellency's notice, of the 26th ultimo, with the "conditions required by the State of Georgia, on the establishing of peace between the United States and the Creek Indians." Whether it is proper or improper, in the Executive of Georgia, to come forward at this time, and in this manner, with such conditions, is not with me to say; that is a matter which, I suppose, will be determined by the General Government.

On the 29th ultimo, I sent my deputy, Timothy Barnard, and three trusty white persons, into the Creek nation, with instructions to use all possible address in keeping the Indians from taking revenge on this country, for the late injuries done them. Barnard writes me from the Oakmulgee on the first instant, "that he had talked with all the Indians there, who seemed to be disposed still to preserve peace with this country; that he had despatched a principal chief to the White Lieutenant, with a peace talk from me." Upon the whole, I am yet in hopes our country may enjoy the blessings of peace, if we choose it in preference to war; provided you will restrain the people of this State from acting offensively against the Creek Indians, that are our friends.

I continue here, in order to receive advice from the nation, and to act eventually. In the mean time, I have to request that your Excellency will give orders, that the eight female Indian prisoners, taken on the 21st ultimo from the little Oakfuskee town, be sent to me at this place, where they shall be taken care of, and returned in exchange for any prisoners of the United States in the Creek nation.

You will please to excuse my intruding so long on your time, and believe me to be,
Your Excellency's obedient very humble servant,

JAMES SEAGROVE,
Agent Indian Affairs, S. D. U. S.

His Excellency EDWARD TELFAIR,
Governor and Commander in Chief of the State of Georgia.

I have compared the preceding letter, and find it an exact copy.

OAKMULGEE, 1st October, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I arrived here last evening late, found all well, have despatched, agreeable to your desire, the Warrior king of the Cussetahs off with a talk in writing, as well as a verbal, to the White Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees; have likewise desired him to gather as many of the heads of the lower towns as possible, and tell them how matters are on the frontiers of Georgia. He has promised to be in the Cussetahs in four days from this; in two more the talk to be with the White Lieutenant, and then endeavor to procure an answer to be sent to you. The Warrior king of the Cussetahs has had no news from the nation since I left him; therefore he says and hopes, if matters are quiet until he gets up, he will do all he can to reconcile the Indians, and keep them from being rash in the present matter. It seems it was the Cowetas that stole the horses, and shot at the white people and killed their horses. All the Indians that are here with me, seem to agree, that those Indians that stole the horses, ought to bear the blame of the mischief done, and suffer for the same. I have encouraged that idea all I can: for, if revenge is but taken on them by the Oakfuskees, who have lost their friends, it will be the means of stopping all stealing, and the like. I shall do all I possibly can, for the good of our country. I have remained here to day to see all the Indians start off for their homes.

I am, &c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

FORT FIDIUS, 2d October, 1793.

SIR:

I apprehend that the party of militia lately out, and which brought in eight prisoners, and killed several Indians, acted consistent with the orders of his Excellency the Governor of Georgia, as his Excellency told me, about the eighth of September last, "that he had given orders to the different officers on the frontier, that they should pursue all parties of Indians that came in and committed any hostilities, or stole any horses. He also told me to inform Brigadier General Clarke to keep up the line of defence, and for the Indians to be pursued wherever they might be found on the frontier, committing any outrage whatever, and kill them."

I have the honor to be, &c.

B. HARRIS,
Brigade Major 1st Brigade 3d Division.

Delivered by Brigade Major Harris, in presence of HENRY GAITHER, Major.

I certify the above to be an exact copy from the original, in my possession.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Agent.

I hereby certify, on honor, that the information contained in the following lines, I received on my way to fort Matthews:

Ninety-one men, including officers, set off on Sunday morning (14th instant) on the trail of some horses that had been stolen about a week before, above Greensborough. As soon as the horses were missed, five men pursued them as far as the Oakmulgee. The Indians had encamped at the mouth of a creek, and waylaid their own trail, or, in other words, lay in ambush. As soon as the party had passed them, the Indians fired in their rear, mortally wounded two of their horses, and obliged them to make a precipitate retreat into the settlement. In consequence of this defeat, the above party set out, headed by Colonel Alexander, Colonel Melton, Colonel Lemar, Major Fauche, Major Adams, and several subaltern officers; they were to rendezvous at the High Shoals of the Apalache. Colonel Alexander expressed a wish to waylay the path between the Oakmulgee and fort Fidius, to intercept any Indians that might be coming in to treat with Major Seagrove. Colonel Melton rather wished to follow the trail into the towns, and destroy that to which it went; from the course of which, they think it almost certain to be one of the Cussetah towns. They were to settle this difference on their arrival at the Appalache. Mr. Adams (near Shoulder-bone) expressed a great wish that Major Seagrove and his deputy, Mr. Barnard, should be both sacrificed; that, instead of pacifying the Indians, they were only encouraging and paying them to destroy our frontier inhabitants; and, as Congress are a set of rascals, and the Secretary of War an enemy to his country, if he had it in his power, he would drown them in the sea; observing, at the same time, that he was confident, the Executive officers of the Federal Government wished that the Indians might destroy the whole State of Georgia. The Federal troops, he supposes, are of no service in protecting the frontier, and laughs at the two hundred men which the Governor is authorized to raise, and put under the command of Major Gaither. One of Adams' sons is a spy or ranger, who patrols over the river. I asked Adams, in his son's presence, whether he supposed any of the spies would kill an Indian or party of Indians, either coming in with a flag, or to hold a treaty of peace with Major Seagrove, by order of the Federal Government? He answered me, they were determined to kill any they saw, let their tribe or business be what it would. I considered the silence of his son as a tacit acquiescence of the declaration.

I inquired by what authority they went out? They told me it was recommended by Colonel Melton.

Mr. Armour (of Greensborough) also confirmed the substance of the above—particularly as to Colonel Alexander's intentions.

FORT FIDIUS, on the Oconee, 14th October, 1793.

SIR:

This instant, I am honored with your letter of the 16th ultimo, by which I observe, you had received my letters as far down as the 17th of August. My communications to you, since then, have fully explained, and, I hope, satisfied you, that I have, thus far, done all in my power to accomplish the desire of the President of the United States; and that my being here, at present, is owing entirely to the unruly conduct of the people of Georgia.

I have said so much on this in my letters of the 17th and 22d ultimo, and 9th instant, that I shall not take up your time at present, on so very disagreeable a subject, more than I am obliged. From information which I have from people of this country, I have reason to believe that there are two expeditions on foot on this frontier, against the Creek towns, which will go out in six or eight days; report makes these parties formidable, but, if two hundred men can be got out in each, I think it will be the utmost. One party goes from Greene, the other from Washington county. I am sorry to say, that I do not find any measures taken by the Governor of Georgia, to put a stop to such unwarrantable doings; on the contrary, it appears to be encouraged.

By the enclosed copy of a letter, received yesterday from Timothy Barnard, you will observe, there is a great hope of getting over the late horrid affair on the Oakfuskee village, and it is brought to a pleasant issue for this country, if revenge can but be taken on the Cowetas by the Oakfuskees, for the lives they have lost. But I fear the conduct of the people of this country will destroy all hope of good arising from any measures I have taken. I shall, notwithstanding, embrace every opening to do my duty, disregarding the malignant breath of all the anti-federal and land speculating tribe in this country.

Enclosed, you have a copy of what I wrote Governor Telfair to-day. All is quiet on the whole frontier of Georgia, as to the Indians, which must serve to satisfy you that a war is very disagreeable to the nation, or they would have been out, long ere this, to take revenge.

If Barnard gives me favorable accounts, and no parties go from Georgia, I shall be ready to push into the nation on the shortest notice.

So soon as I have further advice from the nation, you shall be informed.

I remain, most respectfully, &c.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Agent.

FLINT RIVER, 5th October, 1793.

SIR:

This is the fourth day since I arrived at home. Have had no news from the nation worth relating, as yet, but it seems to be the general opinion of the Indians, that those fellows (the Cowetas) that stole the horses from the frontiers, will be the objects of revenge, for those fellows who lost their lives at the Little Oakfuskee village, by the party that went up there. If this should be the case, it will be of good effect. Captain Millegan arrived here yesterday, from Georgia, forks of Altamaha, and proceeds on to Kinnard's, in company with Mr. Aikens and Charves. I have given Mr. Aikens instructions to be here in six days from this, at which time I expect to be ready to send him off with full accounts from the nation. However, as no one at present can positively say what may be the event of this matter, that has been done in the nation, I think it would be proper that you give out orders that the people be on their guard, and do not expose themselves on the river, as, if any of the relations of the injured tribe should take it into their heads to take satisfaction, injury may be done, when not expected or intended by the nation. You and Major Seagrove will consider this, as to both, for reasons I need not mention.

I am, &c.

James Seagrove to Governor Telfair.

FORT FIDIUS, 14th October, 1793.

SIR:

Yesterday a letter was received by Major Gaither, from Mr. Barnard, an extract of which I now enclose your Excellency, by which you will observe that there is a prospect of the Oakfuskees taking satisfaction from the Cowetas, for the injuries done the former, by people from Georgia. I hope time will be given them for the purpose, and that no act of the people of this country may prevent. I take this opportunity to inform your Excellency of the report which is current on this frontier, and which I have been made acquainted with by respectable men in this neighborhood, which is, that a party of militia are assembling in Washington county, and another in Greene county, with avowed designs of expeditions into the Creek towns; and that they will go out in six or eight days. I will not absolutely say this is the case; but, I think well to apprize you thereof, that not a moment be lost in putting a stop to such unwarrantable doings.

I, therefore, hope your Excellency will issue your proclamation, strictly prohibiting any person crossing the boundary line without proper authority.

I have not heard of an Indian having been seen or heard of, on any part of this frontier, for five weeks past. I hope this will continue long to be the case.

With respect, I remain, &c.

James Seagrave to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, on the Oconee, 21st October, 1793.

SIR:

Last evening I received an express, with letters from Mr. Barnard, as late as the seventeenth and eighteenth instant, copies of all which I now send you, in order that you may be as minutely as possible informed of the present temper of the whole of the Creek nation, and the favorable opening there now appears, of placing all matters on a favorable footing, between the United States and them, if the people of this country could be prevented from going into the Creek territory, and committing depredations.

I mentioned in my last, that two parties were going out from this frontier, against some of the Creek towns. I am now enabled to say, with great certainty, that about two hundred mounted militia crossed the Oconee, from Carr's Bluff, about twenty-five miles below this place, on the eighteenth instant, and are gone to the nation. As to the party from the upper part of this frontier, I am not able to inform, with any degree of certainty; but from report, I believe they are about going, or gone, at this day. It is said that they are to be under the command of the Colonel Alexander who I have had occasion so often to mention to you.

What will be the consequence of these parties going out, is impossible to determine at present, further than that it can answer no good purpose, and will probably be attended with many bad ones.

I have wrote Governor Telfair to day, on this subject; a copy of my letter you have herewith, as also one received by Major Gaither, from Lieutenant Van Allen, of the Federal troops, on his way to fort Telfair.

You will also find enclosed, a letter which I received from a Major Flournoy, who lives about twenty-five miles above this station. This letter I send, as it breathes the prevailing sentiment and language of this country. Flournoy is a man who has been an officer in the Georgia State troops, and is a man of some influence and property. Enclosed is my answer to said letter.

Should the parties that are now out from this country, return without doing any injury to the friendly Indians, or working any very material change in the present temper of those people, I shall, as soon as Barnard gives me notice, push into the nation, and do all possible to establish peace.

I am perfectly of your opinion, that a few of the ruling people, sent on a visit this winter to the President and Congress, will be attended with the best of consequences. I shall therefore labor to accomplish it on your principles.

A report prevailed some time since, and which was published in an Augusta paper, that a party of upwards of one hundred Creeks, were gone to war against the Southwestern territory. I am happy in being now able to say that it is without foundation. This being all that offers at present,

I remain, with due respect, &c.

FLINT RIVER, 17th October, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

Since my arrival in the nation I have done every thing in my power to reconcile the Indians, and I think they seem at present more inclinable for peace than they have been this summer past; and I think that, if the militia could be stopped from coming out to search for Indians, on this side of the Oconee, matters might soon be settled for the benefit of both parties. The Indians have now, I am convinced, stopped all stealing parties from going out; this I think you may rely on, therefore the inhabitants need be in no great dread of hostilities being committed. The whole nation seem to have a desire to have you up to settle matters, (how far you can proceed in that business you are the best judge) as the winter draws on fast, and the Indians will be soon going into the woods. I do not know when I shall be able to come down, as I have been very sick for some time past. The Spaniards and Mr. Panton have advised the Indians strongly to be at peace. Those circumstances, and the small fright they have lately got, will, I fancy, keep them quiet.

I shall expect to hear from you, by Mr. Aikens, how the country is disposed towards the Indians: for, if they still mean to be coming over the Oconee, searching for Indians, it is useless for me to try to bring about a peace; which, if it could be made on good terms, would be more for the good of the country than a war at this time. There never was a better opportunity to settle a peace than at this time. I shall, however, abide by your instructions on this business, as I am convinced you act up to the instructions you have from the President and General Knox; therefore, I think the inhabitants of Georgia, if they studied the good of the country, they would not wish to make a war, contrary to the President's wish; if they do, and have to fight the Indians without the assistance of Congress; they, I fear, will find it a hard task to subdue them. Nothing more occurs to me at present worth mentioning, therefore, wish you health, and I remain, dear sir, yours, &c.

FLINT RIVER, 17th October, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

You will receive this by Mr. Aiken, whom I send off express, informing you as nearly as possible of the situation of matters in this quarter, as I judge, before this, you must be very uneasy to know.

The Tussekee Mico, or Warrior King, of the Cussetahs, that was at the Oakmulgee with me, since our return home he has been very attentive in striving to reconcile matters, which I am informed by three men that came out from the Cussetahs to me three days ago, that he has nearly effected. On his arrival in the Cussetahs, he called a meeting of the Lower Creeks, as I desired him, and acquainted them fully of the danger they were in; which I considered would be of more service from him, (the Warrior King) than me. I likewise wrote to the White Lieutenant, with which the Warrior King himself went up to the Tuckaubatchees, and called a meeting there, and sent for the White Lieutenant and chief of the heads of the Upper Creeks, which, by what I can learn, are all for peace; and they all wish much for your arrival in the nation, to settle matters; and I think there is a greater prospect of having it completed, if you come up, than there has been for some time past. One of the heads of the Usechees was out with me about seven days ago, and assured me there should be no more hostilities committed on the frontier by his town, and that his whole town were determined to do every thing they could to settle matters. The Cowetas are likewise promised to lay quiet, which I think may now be depended on, as I think what has been done by the party that was in the nation. They have given them a fight, and it has been of infinite service. They talk strongly of killing some of the Cowetas; that stole the horses, that got the White Lieutenant's people killed, as every one that are killed and taken are his town's people; he sent a talk down to me, which was brought out by one of the heads of the Cussethas, to beg you would get the prisoners into your possession, and hoped to see them when you come up, but I fear it cannot be done. I expect the Warrior king out in four days at farthest, to go down to conduct you up to the nation, as there is less danger of your being molested than there was when I was with you last; as even the Chehaw people and Usechees are desirous of your coming up, as they all begin to be scared. Mr. Aiken can give you information how they are disposed about Kinnard's; by what I can learn, all the Chehaw people, that live about there, are sorry for what they have done, which I am fully informed of, by one of the heads that has been with me these two days, and has given me up a negro wench, that was taken off when young Gerrideau was killed, belonging to a Mr. Smith in Newport, and, I intend to send her down in a few days, by Captain Milligan, who I expect here every day, on his way home, from the nation. One of the women that was taken is the White Lieutenant's own relation, and wife to a head-man of the town. They say there is ten women and children lost, which, if there are but eight carried in, the other two must have been killed, and perhaps burnt in the houses you can inquire into this matter, as there are certainly that number missing.

I have been afflicted with a third day ague and fever, a complaint I never had before in this country. I was very bad all last night, and am hardly able to set up to write, my head is so giddy; therefore shall refer you to Mr. Aiken for further information, and conclude with wishing you health, and remain, dear sir, yours, &c.

FLINT RIVER, 18th October, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

After I had finished my despatches to you, yesterday, late in the evening, a man I had sent in to the Usechees, arrived after dark, informing me that the Warrior king of the Cussetahs had returned from the Upper Creeks, Tuckabatchees, where he had a very full meeting with the Upper Creeks, and that all the towns in that quarter were fully determined to do every thing they could to settle a peace with the white people, and that, to show their sincerity on the business, the White Lieutenant, and several more of the heads, were making ready to come down to the Cussetahs, to join the Warrior king of the Cussetahs, to go on as far as the Oakmulgee, to conduct you safe into the nation. They have likewise sent me word to be ready in four days from this, to start with them, which, if my indisposition does not prevent me, shall be with them. Mr. Townsend, I hear, is to be with them. When we arrive at the Oakmulgee, either Mr. Townsend, me, or Mr. Mordecai, will be in with you. The White Lieutenant has again sent out word to me, to beg of you to have the prisoners, women and children, ready to come up. Those towns that have committed depredations on the frontier, are all declined, and seem fully convinced of their error, and I think, I can venture to say, that there will be no more mischief done this winter, as I have had now four of the heads of the Chehaws and Usechees with me, and have all assured me that none of their young people will commit any offences more. The chief part of them are turned out a hunting with their women and children towards the head of St. Mary's, Stangesbre, and left the head men in to settle matters when you come up. The Cowetas and Broken Arrows have likewise agreed with the Cussetahs, firmly to do no more in the horse-stealing way; as they have spilt none of the white people's blood yet, they hope, they say, they can make matters up, by returning what horses they have still in their possession. There is, likewise, strong talks sent down to all the Seminole, on no pretence to commit any hostilities on the frontiers of Georgia. All I can say, is, that if the frontier inhabitants can be governed, and kept from crossing the Oconee, there never was a better time to settle matters than now, as the Cussetahs, our best friends, are so earnest to come out a hunting, as they have been detained in all this summer past, by request of their friends the white people; and when they do get out some of them, as they are so confident in the white people's friendship to them, they will be coming down near the Oconee, or perhaps to fort Fidius, as the want of salt, and the other little necessities of life, is so great amongst them. And if any of our Georgia rash scouting parties should fall in with them, and destroy them, it would overset every good intention, therefore, I think, on receipt of this, it would be necessary for you to acquaint his Excellency the Governor how matters are situated, and perhaps you may prevail on him to issue out his strict orders for none of his militia to cross the Oconee river, as I believe I can take upon me to assure him that no Indians will cross more on this side this winter, to do mischief; so that if his people cross, it will be only to strive to create a war. If any thing should happen, it will be entirely through the means of that rascal John Galphin, who now begins to find his case grown desperate, and is upheld by a few rascals like himself, which I hope will soon be at an end, when you get to the nation. I have two or three Indians now sitting round me, pestering me with their discourse, which has been the case ever since I have been up; besides, I am very unwell, therefore, can hardly collect my sentiments, to write you as fully as I could wish. I shall leave you to Mr. Aiken for further particulars, and remain, dear sir, yours, &c.

GALPHINTON, ON OGECHEE, 18th October, 1793.

SIR:

Yesterday morning, about forty or fifty horse collected at Mr. Hutchinson's store, at the White Ponds, 20 miles from fort Fidius, under the command of Captains Kitchin, Carson, Wilbern, and Hampton, on their way to Carr's Bluff, the place of rendezvous, where they were to be joined by Captains Harrison, Stokes, and Irwin, making in all, two hundred men, to march against the Chehaw town. In order to justify this excursion, I am told that two or three of them took their neighbors' horses, and brought them over the Oconee, and then propagated that horses were stole, and that their trail appeared toward the Indian country. General Irwin, I am told, ordered them to return, but they paid no attention to him.

Major Robert Flournoy to James Seagrove.

GREEN COUNTY, October 5th, 1793.

SIR:

'Tis generally supposed that a treaty is likely to take place between the Indians and yourself, as agent for the Federal Government; which is disagreeable to the people of this country, for one only reason, to wit: They believe you will be deaf to their interest, whilst, you strictly adhere to that destructive principle of our Northeast-

wardly politicians. Make peace on any terms say they; it is that disposition in our Northern brethren, which was so plainly discovered to the Indians when they were at New York, that has brought all the evils on this country which we have since experienced. The time is at length come, when justice may be demanded—when justice may be had. 'Tis reported that those intrepid young men that has so lately burnt one Indian town, has brought from thence, eight prisoners, which ought to be exchanged on no other terms but that of the Creeks restoring all the property and prisoners they have taken away; if they have sold any part to the Spaniards, let them go and steal them from those, as they did from here. I do not wish to be understood as a man that would presume to dictate to one of your understanding, but as a sufferer, I have a right to speak my mind. It has only been six months since my old father was attacked on the Kentucky road by these very people (on their way, as it is supposed, to join the Northern tribes) when he, and four others, were killed and scalped; and I have at this time, I believe, a young negro fellow in the Creek nation, who formerly waited on me, in quality of a servant. He ran away from my store, on the 4th of September last, and was assisted across the river by an old man and his son, who are living at this time one mile above Old Tom's Path, (four miles above fort Fidius.) I have not, as yet, brought him to his deserved punishment, for want of positive proof; but if you will do me the favor to demand him amongst others, you will, I believe, put it in my power to punish those that conveyed him off, and lay me under obligations to yourself, which I shall ever glory in acknowledging. The fellow is nineteen or twenty years old, slim made, with remarkable small legs, branded on the breast I S, scarcely visible; he is very black, and has a down look; I call his name Cooper.

I am, Sir, &c.

James Seagrove in answer to Major Robert Flournoy.

FORT FIDIUS, 15th October, 1793.

SIR:

I have just received your favor of the fifth instant; in reply, permit me to assure you, on my word of honor, that no treaty is even in contemplation between the United States and the Creek nation.

I am sorry to find my fellow-citizens very generally possessed with the idea of a treaty.

I will go so far to satisfy you or any other gentleman of this country, by declaring, that my orders from the President of the United States are expressly to obtain full satisfaction from the savages for all injuries done this country, as a preliminary to all measures to peace. This, I should suppose, if generally understood by the people of Georgia, could not fail to give satisfaction; but, it is to be lamented, that our Governor, who is possessed of, and has full power to promulgate, those matters, has not done it. Respect for the Government of Georgia hath hitherto prevented my interfering.

I attend to what you say respecting your negro boy. Duty, as well as inclination, leads me to do all in my power, on that head. The manner in which you have been deprived of your respected father, is truly affecting, and I sympathise in your feelings on the occasion. I shall ever be happy, either in the line of my duty, or, as a private gentleman, to render you, or any of your friends, any agreeable service,

And am, with respect, yours, &c.

James Seagrove to Governor Telfair.

FORT FIDIUS, 21st October, 1793.

SIR:

I had the honor of writing you on the 14th instant; since then, this frontier has continued free from any Indian depredations; not an Indian hath been heard of, on this side of the Oakmulgee, for several weeks. It is with pleasure I am enabled to inform your Excellency, and the citizens of Georgia, that, by an express which I received last evening from my deputy, Mr. Timothy Barnard, I have very favorable accounts of the disposition of the whole of the Creek towns at this time, and that they are very desirous all matters should be immediately settled. The friendly towns have brought those who have been doing mischief to desist altogether, and to deliver up all the stolen property, and make other satisfaction. There is a very great prospect that the friends of those people who were killed at the Oakfuskee village, are about to take satisfaction on the Cowetas. The Oakfuskees declare they will not trouble the white people on that account.

The white Lieutenant of the Oakfuskees, and other principal chiefs, are very desirous that the prisoners you have, should be sent home as soon as possible to their friends. I hope your Excellency will see the good policy of such a measure, as those prisoners belong to some of our best friends in the nation. As I have already asked for them, I hope they are on their way to this place. Your Excellency may rely that an equal number of prisoners (if as many in the Creek nation belonging to the United States) shall be delivered for them, as well as every other arrangement favorable to this country that rests with me to do. Enclosed you have extracts from Mr. Barnard's letters to me of the 17th and 18th instant, which will serve to point to your Excellency how favorable the present moment is to give peace to our country; and how unpardonable it would be not to embrace it by every just means in our power; and how much more so to throw any impediments in the way.

I am sorry to be again obliged to inform your Excellency that I have reason to believe several companies of horsemen, from the county of Washington, are gone on an expedition against some of the Creek towns. The enclosed extract of a letter from Lieutenant Van Allen, of the federal troops, to Major Gaither, will further explain the business. That such things should be done after the express order to the contrary, which hath been received from the President of the United States, is truly unaccountable. I hope, for the honor and happiness of Georgia, that your Excellency will soon be able to put a stop thereto, and that we shall once more enjoy peace. I shall hope for your Excellency's answer by the return of the express, and that I shall be informed the prisoners are on their way to me at this place.

I am, &c.

Letters from Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, April 7th, 1793.

SIR:

The Governor of this State is often calling on me to order out the militia to guard the frontier, and mentions murders and depredations committed by the Indians, that I cannot hear from any other person; I have not, neither do I mean to order them out, unless I know them to be within our limits, and in force; I have forwarded three of the Governor's letters, and two of Timothy Barnard's letters to me from the Creek nation. The complaint of the Indians is at this time groundless; I have, during my command, given to the Indians that came to me on business, ninety-five rations, forty pounds of tobacco, and twelve gallons of rum.

I expect a friendly visit from McGillivray, The Mad Dog, and Joseph Cornell, in three weeks; what their business is, I cannot learn; but have heard the Creeks and Chickasaws are at war, and all the Upper towns are our friends, except the Cowetas, and Savannahs, or Old Delawares.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY GAITHER, Major.

[ENCLOSURES.]

From Governor Telfair to Major Henry Gaither.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 4th March, 1793.

SIR:

The recent outrages committed by some whites and Indians, are such, as render the situation of many innocent defenceless families on the frontiers, critical and dangerous; under this expression, I feel every obligation to afford the best possible protection from savage barbarity; and to this end, I have to require of you, full information with regard to the number of militia now in actual service, the place or places at which they are stationed, and the tour of duty assigned to them. In addition to which, it now becomes necessary, that ten foot militia, under the command of a sergeant, be stationed at each of the following places, viz: Norris' Station, Bush's Station, Hillhouse's Ironworks, and at a Station between fort Mathews and Greensborough; which, I trust, will suffice as a temporary defence for the present emergency, or until further communications from the President of the United States be received on this subject; which I have reason to expect in a short period.

I am, &amp;c.

EDWARD TELFAIR.

Governor Telfair to Major Gaither.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 28th March, 1793.

SIR:

I have received information of the Creek Indians having committed murders and outrage in the county of Glynn; I have, therefore, to call on you for an explicit declaration of what aid can be obtained on the part of the General Government, in order that I may be more fully enabled to make arrangements for the emergency.

I am, sir, yours, &amp;c.

EDWARD TELFAIR.

Timothy Barnard to Major Henry Gaither.

BUZZARD ROOST, 18th February, 1793.

SIR:

I have not the honor of your acquaintance, but the present situation of affairs in this quarter dictates to me, that it is truly necessary you should be informed of that, which, if not obstructed, may shortly prove of very fatal consequence to the frontiers of Georgia, which is as follows: I have certain information that the inhabitants on the upper frontiers have drove over a number of cattle into the fork of the Tullapatche, which ground the Indians look upon as theirs; therefore, are determined to go down and drive off all the stock they can find there; and if they meet with any opposition, will kill those that oppose them, as you may be sure there will go a body large enough to execute their designs. I have prevailed on the head-men to restrain them for twenty days; and am setting off to the towns to do the same there; and am in hopes they will be stopped that long, till the people can get their cattle back, but there is a great probability that the hunters in the woods may collect and endeavor to drive them off; if so, those people that have put their cattle over must abide by the consequence, as they have no right to carry on such irregular proceedings. I am amazed at the heads of the country, that they will not oppose such measures at this critical juncture. There is now ten Indians from the Northward nations trying all they can to set the Creeks on the frontiers of Georgia, and such proceedings as these will be the effectual means to make the Creeks take their talks, besides ever putting it out of the power of any person to have a boundary line; I have to beg, as it is for their own good, assistance for the settlers on receipt of this, to drive their stock back; if they do not, I have now discharged my duty, and they must abide by the ill consequences that may and will attend.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

P. S. The bearers of this, three of the head-men of the Cussetahs, beg they may have a keg of rum a piece, and some corn and tobacco, to bring with them, as I have got them to take down these letters. If you give them a few articles, the Governor will not be against paying for it, as I can assure you, if those cattle are not removed, soon, the owners will lose them all, and some of their lives too; it is in vain to strive to keep the peace, when the white people go so head-long to work, before the boundary line is settled.

Timothy Barnard to Major Henry Gaither.

CUSSETAHS, March 4th, 1793.

SIR:

You will receive this per Mr. George Cornell, son of Joseph Cornell, who was linguister for the United States, upon business from the Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatchees, to this town, which is much in favor of the States, to mention that the Upper towns were of the same opinion respecting the Americans, as they were, and not to be deluded with the Shawanese talks, as they were such as would bring destruction on the land. As there might not be a linguister with you, I thought proper to acquaint you who he was, and that he is, with several white people, going into Georgia, upon business of their own. As this man is of considerable note in this country, his being well treated will be much in favor of the States; and should he be in want of provisions, &c. hope you will not let him want. The minds of the people here seem much agitated, owing to many different talks among them, particularly of the gangs of cattle being drove into the fork, which is in dispute; but hope that matter is cleared up before this, as I have wrote down to you upon that head.

Should the cattle not be drove back ere this, I fear the consequence will be serious; as they are determined to drive them off, and should they meet with opposition, perhaps blood may be spilt.

I will thank you to inform His Excellency of this; that there are many talks in the nation, but cannot determine what steps they may take.

The Cussetah king says, he hears there are many horses stole from your quarter; but may depend upon it, that its none of his people, but must be Coweta people; he also says, the white people have threatened the first man they find, to kill him, after losing their property; but hopes that you will be aware of such proceeding, and not let the innocent suffer for the guilty, especially those who have always been, and are still, your friends. I myself look upon this as a necessary precaution, and hope there will be proper attention paid.

I am, sir, yours &amp;c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

N. B. All the hunting camps near you are the people of this town; those that do the mischief are in their towns.

Letter from Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, 17th April, 1793.

SIR:

Since I had the pleasure of writing you last, I have had certain accounts of the Indians having murdered two white persons, and robbed a store of goods, at Trader's Hill, on St. Mary's, and that Mr. Seagrove has demanded of the head-men and warriors of the Creek nation, not only the murderers, but the whole party concerned in this mischief; and that the Indians of that nation appear at this time much divided on account of the demand made by Mr. Seagrove. I have had a message lately from Timothy Barnard, advising me to stand well on my guard, until I may hear from him again; this I have wrote to General Clarke, and other militia officers in this State; and this day sent back the express to Timothy Barnard. I have enclosed Barnard's two letters to me.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

[ENCLOSURES.]

From Timothy Barnard to Major Henry Gaither.

FLINT RIVER, 8th April, 1793.

SIR:

I was honored with your letter of the 21st February, at the Cussetah town, which I explained to the heads then assembled, which proved of no small service in convincing the Indians how far the leading men of the United States were from wishing to encroach on their territories. I did myself the pleasure to write to you from the Cussetahs, but am under some apprehension that my letter has not reached you, from what has happened since; at my meeting the Cussetahs, with a number of the heads of the Lower Creeks, and some of the Upper, every matter seem to conclude with a fair prospect of peace, between our red brethren and the United States; as the voice of the nation was for me to send off an express for Major Seagrove, to be up in thirty two days from that time without fail; from the last day of the meeting, in two days after, I arrived at my own house on Flint river, and next day was preparing to despatch an express off to Major Seagrove, which, before I had finished, came the dreadful news up to me from a town below me forty miles, on Flint river, that two parties out of said town, and four or five villains from a town a hundred miles below, that had just arrived from St. Mary's and Settilla, with four or five scalps from that quarter, and a great deal of plunder; those that have committed those violations, are settlements near Jack Kinnard's, and the part of the nation that Major Seagrove has given Kinnard instructions to endeavor to govern, which I cannot say but Kinnard has made use of every means in his power to keep them quiet; but the talks they get from this villain Willbanks, and from those Northward Indians, has put some of the Indians, I believe, nearly out of their heads. Willbanks, at that very time expected a vessel in, where he just at that time went down to meet her, and assured the Indians all along as he went, that she would arrive, which I could never have believed, that people would have been so mad, as to send goods on such uncertain plans; but, to my great surprise, am fully informed, that the vessel arrived on the coast with several Indians on board, that went to Providence to protect her from the insults of the Spaniards, but nevertheless the Dons acted as any other Power in such a case would, and ought to have done; took the vessel, goods and all, and conducted her to St. Mark's garrison, and it seems, bound some of the Indians fast for two or three days, which I imagine were a little insolent; they have since sent them home. A lucky circumstance for our frontiers this vessel was taken, or I fear it would have been the means of more hostilities on our frontiers. What's happened, will, I now hope, put an end to that business, and disannul all hopes of ships landing on that quarter. Poor Captain Fleming, at Captain Robert Seagrove's store on St. Mary's, fell a sacrifice to savage cruelty, and the store plundered of every thing they could take off; one other young man fell at the same place, and who he is, I cannot learn; and three more on Settilla's, near Mr. Cashin's store; that store, I hear, remains unhurt. I make no doubt, but before this you have more particular account of matters from that quarter than I can render you. Kinnard has sent off an express to Major Seagrove, respecting the business; at the same time I forwarded the peace talks from the heads of the nation, from which Major Seagrove will be able to judge, that what has been done, is far from being the voice of the whole nation. Since those villanous murderers arrived at their own towns, they have been bullied and despised by all that were in the town; Major Seagrove will, I imagine, first demand satisfaction; what will be the result I cannot take upon me to say; however, I think the inhabitants in your quarter may still remain quietly on their farms, as yet without danger, as it would be very distressing for them to break up at this time of the year. I need not, sir, have wrote you so particular, as the bearer is a very intelligent man, and a citizen and friend to the United States, and will give you every information you may stand in need of, from this quarter; and as he wished to go down that way, I thought it would be better to employ him to take this to you, than an Indian. The Indian White Fish king, as I find he styles himself to you, was desirous of going back with letters to you, but he is such a noted liar and a villain, I did not choose to trust him. Any favors you confer on the bearer, Mr. Garvin, will be gratefully acknowledged by Sir, yours, &amp;c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

FLINT RIVER, 10th April, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

Since I finished the enclosed to you, I have received an express from Major Seagrove, demanding satisfaction for the violations committed on ———; and as he has made a large demand, though no more than just, I do not know how matters may turn out; therefore should not wish the frontiers to lay too much unguarded for a while, as a short time will determine how matters are to be in this quarter; the bearer, Mr. David Garvin, can inform you with particulars, relative to this matter; nothing more, but remain,

Yours, &amp;c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

From Major Gaither to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, 19th April, 1793.

SIR:

Since writing you last, I have received certain information from the Bird king, and the Cussetah king, that the Half Way king and his warriors are actually out, and determined to spill human blood before they return. On this information, which I received late yesterday, I wrote and sent expresses to the militia officers, informing them of their dangerous situation, and desiring them all to be well on their guard, and wait for orders. Some of them came voluntarily and offered their service, and are now out on a scout with orders not to cross the river. There are many fires now in view on the Indian side of the Oconee. I mean this night to send a spy for information. I have sent a copy of this letter from the friendly kings, which, if real, is truly friendly.

The soldiers are as healthy as I could expect them any where; and perfectly reconciled and attentive to their duty. I have got all the stores from the Rock Landing, and ordered the guard from this place to join me to-morrow.

I am, yours, &amp;c.

HENRY GAITHER, Major-commandant.

[ENCLOSURE.]

CUSSETAHS, April 13th, 1793.

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I heard that the Half-way king was going to do mischief, but I did not believe it; but this day I am informed, and I know it to be the truth, that he is gone. I have been talking to the head commander; which the commander told me, if I should hear any thing respecting the nation, to inform him. The warriors are out upon the Oakfuskee path; whether they fall above, or below, I cannot tell. You may think it was the wish of the nation to be at war, but there is no such thing; it is only one town, the Half-way house king, and obstinate mad persons, that will not hearken to advice. We all hold the talks that were delivered to us last, and mean to abide by them still, until Major Seagrove comes up, when we expect matters will be settled upon good terms, both for yourselves and us. You may think, they divide themselves, the warriors, in two parties, (there is two towns) but that is not the case. I am your friend, and always have been; if any thing was to happen, I was to inform you; and, if any thing was to happen your side, you was to let me know likewise.

I have sent you this talk, and wish you to send the talk to your brother officers, above and below you, that they may be upon their guard against any thing that may happen.

The three rivers have talked, and wished for peace, and to have things settled to the satisfaction of both sides. It is only this one mad town, that is led astray by their obstinate king, which is not to be governed, nor advised. It is a pity that our nation, and your country, should suffer by a party of bad people. I send you now, to let you know my talk, that you may expect bloodshed in a few days; which I advise you to guard yourselves as much as possible, and, if they should do any mischief, punish them as you think proper; fight them, but do not come over this side the river, unless you find them coming upon you.

FRIEND, BROTHER, and FATHER: The Cussetah people are your friends, and are always passing backwards and forwards a hunting, and do not wish to be troublesome to any person. We have not taken any bad talks. If there should be any blood shed, we have no hand in it; neither will you find us to join them, is our determination. My young people are out upon this side the Oconee; if you should see any of them, they are my friends, do not hurt them.

My town, and all the other towns, are sitting still, waiting the talks of Major Seagrove, when he comes up. This one mad town has brought us into this trouble, and you likewise.

From your friends and brothers,

BIRD KING,
CUSSETAH KING.

Allick Cornell, Tuckaubatchees, wishes, as he has two brothers at the Rock Landing, that you will be kind enough to send them safe up; George, and little Tommy.

To Major HENRY GAITHER, *Commanding Officer, Rock Landing.Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War.*FORT FIDIUS, 6th May, 1793.

SIR:

Since I had the honor of writing, the nineteenth of April, we have been frequently alarmed by the inhabitants, and without real cause. The Indians have stolen horses, and crossed the river about one mile above the fort; they have killed a family of six in number, within five miles of fort Matthews, and have killed the son of a Mr. Pugh, about twenty miles below this.

I have enclosed the last accounts from Timothy Barnard; the one without a date, the bearer informed, was wrote the 26th April. I am often called on by the inhabitants to call out militia; and those I called, suffered their horses to be stolen by the Indians, and no alarm given.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

[ENCLOSURE.]

*Timothy Barnard to Henry Gaither, Major commandant.*FLINT RIVER, April 20th, 1793

SIR:

I received yours a few days ago by George Cornell; I now forward this to you, by way of the Buzzard Roost, to be conveyed down by Captain McKenzie and Mr. Hutchinson, who, I hear, are now there. I should have sent an Indian off express, but, on hearing of their being at that place, thought it a better opportunity. I have to inform you, that matters here seem to have a much worse appearance than when I wrote you last, by Mr. Garvin; not but that there is more than three parts out of four of the nation, that seems fully determined for peace, and say, that if those who have committed violations on the frontiers still continue, that they must defend themselves against the white people, as they are determined not to take any part with them, in a war with the United States. At a meeting the other day, held at Cussetahs, in conjunction with some of the Upper Creeks, they have concluded to give satisfaction for the murders done on St. Mary's, and have pitched on the men that's to die for it. Mr. John Galphin, who was a principal hand in the business, is one; and I fully believe, had it not been for him, there would have been nothing of it. I have a white man now here with me, from the Upper Creeks, sent express from the heads of the nation in that quarter, down to Major Seagrove, to allow them time to fulfil his demand respecting satisfaction, as they say the time he fixed on was too short; those two towns of the Upper Creeks, that slipt out to do mischief on the frontiers of Georgia, was done unknown to the other Upper towns, as they were off, and two days' march on their way, before it was known. I sent off men from the Cussetahs to stop them, which I find they have effected with one party; those that went after the others, are not yet returned, but am in hopes they are stopped. Should have immediately sent off an express to you respecting the business, but was in hopes of their being stopped, therefore, did not wish to give too great an alarm to the country; besides, expecting from what had been before heard and done, would put the frontiers sufficiently on their guard. I was likewise informed, yesterday, that a party of the Cowetas was discovered doing mischief on the Oconee, near where the Upper trading path crosses. They were seen by the Buzzard Roost people, who brought me this information, and say that the Cowetas mean to commit hostilities on the frontiers, and make off toward Buzzard Roost, on purpose to get the white people to kill some of the Cussetahs; which is to get the Cussetahs to take part with them, which the Cussetahs seem fully determined not to do; and has requested of me to mention to you, to speak to the officer of all the scouts, that if any mischief should be done, and the trails come towards Buzzard Roost, that they may be sure it's not the Cussetahs, and not for any one at the Buzzard Roost to be molested; as they say they hope the white people does not mean to punish the innocent with the guilty, and, if they find this takes place, are determined to lay neuter. I have, therefore, assured them, that I was convinced that you, and every officer in that quarter, would endeavor to make a distinction with them, which I think would be very necessary, as the Cussetahs are daily expecting themselves to pacify and stop all violations, and give me every information of what's going forward. They have run Mr. Willbanks out of the nation; and he has cleared out towards the Cherokees, and, I imagine, means to get to Detroit. All I can say at this time, is, for the frontiers to be as well guarded as possible, as, from one thing to another, it may grow worse. Those that went out from the Upper Creeks, it's thought, was through the persuasion of a white man in that quarter, which, the heads of the Upper Creeks say, if proved on him, shall be killed for it. These times makes the young, wicked inclined, turn out and steal horses, and there is no stopping them, which, I fear, will be a principal means of making matters worse, as some of them will, before long, undoubtedly get killed, as I hardly know how they have escaped it so long, as what's been done is unsufferable; a little time hence will convince us how matters are to be, war or peace. I have done all I can to open the eyes of those short-sighted wretches, but it seems all to be in vain with some of them, after so much lenity shown them by the President of the United States.

There is near on two thousand gone out in one body, against the Chickasaws, of the Upper Creeks, which, I imagine, will give them a hard stroke, though we hear the Chickasaws are all fortified, at a place called the Chickasaw Bluff, on the bank of the Mississippi.

Am at present much hurried; just sending off to Major Seagrove. Shall be punctual in sending you every necessary information in my power. You have all here that occurs to me at present worth mentioning.

Sir, yours, &c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

Timothy Barnard to Henry Gaither, Major Commandant.

SIR:

Since I wrote the enclosed, and sent it up to the Buzzard Roost, to go down with Mr. Hutchinson, times are much altered for the worse. On finding that Mr. Hutchinson was gone, and knowing that there was information gone to you of what was going on in this quarter, deferred sending till I could find what part of the nation were like to take. Mr. Hutchinson is again arrived here with Mr. Garvin, which, I think, was very imprudent in him, when he knew the danger he had just escaped. I have now got two Indians to conduct him, and Mr. Garvin, and Mr. Holmes, down to the Rock Landing, which is the only safe course they can take at this time, as there is several parties now out against the frontiers; and am afraid they mean to continue committing violations till they are checked by an army coming against them, as I am afraid matters are gone to too great lengths to be checked in this quarter by giving up the offenders, as there are too many concerned in the business. Therefore, it cannot be expected that the United States will put up with such unprovoked insults without revenging the cause of their injured, peaceable citizens. I cannot say that the matter yet, has any appearance of being general, as there are, as yet, only four towns in the Lower Creeks, and two in the Upper, that are concerned in the mischief that has been done; the rest seem, as yet, very quiet, especially the Cussetahs, who are determined to have no hand in the business, which they have desired me, repeatedly, to mention to every commanding officer on the frontier; and say they hope that, if the other wicked inclined towns should, by their bad doings, as they are in a fair way for it, provoke the United States to march an army against the nation, the Cussetahs hope there will be a distinction made betwixt their towns and those that are enemies; as they have now called in all their young people, and mean to keep them together, that they may not join with any of the offenders. I am apt to think, that if an army was to come soon, if there should be a necessity for it, that a number of the towns would lay still, and not take up arms, if they could be sure of not being molested by the white people. The Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatches, Upper Creeks, and the head-men of the Thirteen Towns, from that quarter, have sent a very good talk down to Major Seagrove, informing him, that they are determined to remain in peace with the United States. The express, I expect, will reach St. Mary's this day; as I sent two Indians, by order of the heads of the Upper Creeks, from this quarter, to guard the white man down with it.

I have just had a man arrived here from the Cussetahs, who informs me that there was a large party of the Cowetas had set off to do mischief on the frontiers, but that the Cussetahs had sent after them, and turned them back, and, that they had now agreed to lay still.

By the best information I can get, there is still a large party, from one town in the Upper Creeks, which are gone high up the Oconee. There are likewise several small parties out from this quarter; therefore, the inhabitants cannot be too much on their guard, as those villains that began the mischief, will strive to keep the matter as long as they can.

There are now near upon two thousand of the Upper Creeks gone out against the Chickasaws. The bearer of this, Mr. Garvin, has agreed to proceed on to St. Mary's with an express to Major Seagrove, as I think it necessary he should know how matters are going on here. Therefore, have to beg you will give him every necessary assistance he may stand in need of, for that journey, as far as Newport.

Should be glad of a small hint of your opinion, what steps, you imagine, will be taken with respect to retaliating on those savages for what they have done; whether you think, if an army comes, that there will be a possibility of making a distinction between friends and enemies? as I have assured the Cussetahs they may expect it, and what few of my own family that are about me; and, if I thought it would prove to the contrary, should be sorry to deceive them.

I have enclosed you a copy of a talk I gave the heads of the nation, from myself, at a public meeting, for your perusal, for your own satisfaction. This I told them, and a great deal more, at the same time, and at every other opportunity, for their good. I have let the wretches want for no information, respecting their downfall, if they would have listened to it.

I am, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, 23d May, 1798.

SIR:

We are and have been in alarm ever since the 18th April; many of the inhabitants, on the frontier of this State, have left their homes; the most industrious of them are fortified on their own soil; many of them I have furnished with arms, and the militia generals have ordered them rations; the contractor for supplying the federal troops issues to them about two thousand rations per day; the male negroes, in some of those families, are included in the provision returns. I have been called on to certify those issues by Major Habersham, which I refused to do, for these reasons: I expect there will be great abuses in this business, and not knowing whether it will be a State or general charge. Governor Telfair, I am informed, will, in a few days, form an encampment at the mouth of Shoulderbone, on the Oconee, which is about 20 miles above this. After getting the militia there, he means to advance into the Indian country, with those that will go voluntarily. I am in a very disagreeable situation here, occasioned by a suspicion, among the people, that I have power to call the militia into service, and afford them protection. If my conduct, during my command here, has met your approbation, I care not what those people may think or say; otherwise, it is my wish to be relieved as early as may be convenient.

I am, sir, &c.

HENRY GAITHER, Major Commandant.

Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, 9th June, 1798.

SIR:

Major General Twiggs, with Brigadiers Irwin, Clarke, and Blackburn, with about 600 inferior officers and privates, the half of them mounted on good horses, crossed the Oconee yesterday at this place, and marched this day against the hostile Indian towns. I believe the General means to avoid all those towns that have sat still this summer, and proved friendly to us. On my first hearing of this intended expedition, I informed Mr. Seagrove, and this day received his answer; shortly after the troops marched, I immediately sent Ensign Sedgwick after the General, with the names of the six inimical towns, which Mr. Seagrove sent me; I expect Ensign Sedgwick will get up with him this night.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY GAITHER, Major Commandant.

June 11th, 1793.

SIR:

Since the departure of General Twiggs, which I mentioned the 9th, I am informed the General don't mean to discriminate between the friendly and inimical Indians, the Cussetahs only excepted; should this be the case, I fear he will do much mischief to the United States on this expedition, as many of his command have been in open rebellion against the General Government, ever since the first of November; in violating the treaty with the Indians, firing their rifles at the sign of the President, and publishing the most barefaced falsehoods against the virtuous citizens of the Union, &c. &c.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY GAITHER, Major Commandant.

FORT FIDIUS, June 14th, 1793.

SIR:

The expedition, under Major General Twiggs, returned to this place yesterday; they only crossed the Oakmulgee, and laid out a fort, and the most of the command mutinied and returned. The General informed me he saw very little sign of Indians on the march.

I have heard lately of two families, in Franklin county, being killed by the Indians, but those reports so often prevail here, without foundation, that I am fearful of writing to confirm them, until they are properly authenticated.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY GAITHER, Major Commandant.

FORT FIDIUS, July 15th, 1793.

SIR:

I have the pleasure of informing you that no recent depredations have been committed by the savages, and I hope that the frontiers will enjoy a peace. The last accounts of hostilities being committed by the Indians, I received from General Twiggs, on the 8th ultimo, who informed, that three families, to the amount of thirty, had been killed in the upper part of the State, not far distant from fort Matthews. I have very strong reasons for doubting the veracity of this report; there is no talk of it in the country; and Lieutenant Bird, who has just been relieved from fort Matthews, knew nothing of it.

The militia are not yet discharged; the whole of the frontiers are lined with them.

I have been informed that a party of militia are to set off this day for the Creek nation, and are to cross at the Old fording place, above the mouth of Shoulderbone; but it is so great a secret, that I cannot hear who is to command them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY GAITHER, Major Commandant.

Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, July 20th, 1793.

SIR:

There is nothing new in this quarter, more than is contained in two letters from Mr. Barnard, which I have the honor of enclosing you. The militia of this State are yet in arms, and I cannot hear when they are to be discharged. The Governor has published an order he has received for raising one hundred militia cavalry, and one hundred infantry, both to be under my immediate command, for the defence of the frontier of this State. This, I think sufficient, provided they are judiciously posted, and arranged agreeably to a hint I have already received. The militia officers are by no means pleased with this order. They say the numbers are not sufficient to cover them, and why give the command to a federal officer? I suspect they will not allow the two hundred men to be raised, if murmuring will prevent it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY GAITHER.

Timothy Barnard to Major Henry Gaither.

FLINT RIVER, 21st June, 1793.

SIR:

I am under the necessity of sending down to your station, therefore think it my duty to give you information of the situation of affairs in this quarter, which is as follows: I arrived here four days ago, from the Cussetahs. The head-men of the Cussetahs, and likewise head-men from chief of the towns in the Lower Creeks, had just come from the Tuckaubatchees, principal town in the Upper Creeks, where they had a full meeting of all the whole Upper Creeks, and may say Lower, and it seems their conclusion was, to take every step in their power to make a peace, and settle matters with the United States. They fixed on the men that were to die for satisfaction for the murders done on the frontiers of Georgia. There were men sent off to execute the business, and I believe it would have been done, had not that old villain Panton sent up some talks, which were immediately spread about by some of his friends, which has, for a while, put a stop to it; but, the heads of the Upper Creeks seem determined to pursue what they begun. There was one of the head-men of the Upper Creeks set off yesterday from my house, down to Major Seagrove, to receive his full instructions, to know particularly what he would have done. He wants, likewise, to strive to get Major Seagrove to come up with him, if he can; but I do not imagine he will venture up, though, if he was to come up with that man, he would be perfectly safe. The Indians, at their meeting at the Tuckaubatchees, agreed to gather all the horses that have been stolen from Georgia, that they might be sent down to their owners, to the frontiers of Georgia. But, the Cowetas and Chickasaws, as soon as they got back to their own towns again, I find have refused to comply. Those two towns are the chief offenders, and them it was that began all this disturbance. The Upper Creeks and Cussetahs seem determined to force them to give up the property. If they still refuse, how far they may proceed in that business, a little time will bring about. This resolution that the Upper Creeks and Cussetahs have fell into, seems to have put a stop to hostilities for a while, as I do not find that there has any parties gone out for some time past to do mischief on the frontiers. There may be a horse-thief or so, out, but no gangs as I can hear of, have gone out, or going, for war. How long it may hold so, I will not take upon me to say; but, I am apt to think, that if Major Seagrove was to come up himself, that matters might still be settled, and he would get almost any satisfaction he could demand. The Spanish agent and old Panton are very busy in the Upper Creeks. I have said all I could say against them, and would have gone up there and faced them, but have been very unwell for these twenty days past. I have been taken down with a head pleurisy, attended with a violent cough, which has reduced me very low, and have not yet got better of it. Besides, I labor under one very great disadvantage, and that is, that I have no commission from the President of the United States, nor from none that is in authority under him; therefore, if I was by chance to fall into the power of the Spaniards, they would show me no quarters. Besides, the Indians are daily threatening to kill me, or rob me of my property, which, if they should only rob me, it would be hard upon me to lose what I have, on account of my services to the United States, and nothing to show that I was in that service. I am under some apprehension that I should not be made whole, as the appointment was verbal from Major Seagrove, at which time, he told me that a commission would come on from Congress to me, which was in November last, and have not had a scrape of a pen from him about it since.

Reason must dictate to you, sir, that such neglect as this is enough to make any man backward in risking his life and property to pursue the country business, especially one that has before, by paying attention to the service of the unthankful State of —, at the risk of my life, and got nearly ruined by it, and never any retaliation made me. I have likewise sent to Major Seagrove for a few goods to support me, and to defray public expenses that I have been under the necessity of borrowing goods to defray, and, I think I find myself somewhat neglected in that part, as I have never had a rag of goods sent me since I left St. Mary's. I was obliged to borrow part of the goods the other day, to relieve this poor woman that I now send down to you, from one of the Spanish subjects, a trader in Cussetah, Thomas Carr, who, I must give the character of being a good friend to the United States. You will see, when this poor woman gets down to you, whether she was in a situation to stay long in this quarter. I have been trying to get her ever since she has been up, which has been a month, and never could effect it till about seven days ago, and was then obliged to get two head-men out of the Cussetahs, and one that came down from the Upper Creeks, to go down to the Chehaw rascals that had her, and demand her, besides paying a great deal for her, and still they were loath to give her up. I could wish those five towns, the Cowetas, Broken Arrow, which live nearly together, within a mile I may say, as partly one town, the Cussetahs and Chehaws, which are twelve miles below that, and on the same side of the river, which is three miles above, the Chehaws, on the same side, west side of the river, if they could be made to suffer, it would be the most effectual means to settle a peace. But, if men come up and fall on, without distinction, and kill any of the Cussetahs, which are still our steadfast friends, it will bring on a very hot war, and make the matter general. Besides, as all the Upper Creeks are laying quiet, it would be a pity to put all on a footing, which would be the case. That, if they are drove out of these lands, they would move over the Coosa river, which is never fordable, and get down amongst the Spanish territories, where they would not be easily come at, and would then be desperate, and the Spaniards would make the Choctaws and Chickasaws join them, and then they would become a worse terror to Georgia than the Shawanese are to the Northward States. I was informed a few days ago, that some of the scouts from the upper parts, have come out as far as this side of the Oakmulgee, on the Cussetah path, which has frightened the Cussetahs a great deal. They have begged of me to mention to you to speak to the captain of the scouts not to trouble any one along that path, as they are their friends, except any parties should do mischief, and come back that way; in such case, to follow them, and do as they please with them, as they may know then they are Cowetas that does it; as none of these people will offer to fetch a horse, or do any mischief, but not to fall on any hunting camps about on this side of the Oakmulgees, as these people are so much distressed for provisions, they are obliged to go out that way to hunt. I shall leave you to the bearer, Mr. Mordecai, for further particulars, and remain, sir, yours, &c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

Major HENRY GAITHER.

FLINT RIVER, July 7, 1793.

SIR:

This goes by express by Carr's bluff, by General Twigg's man, that arrived here several days ago on business to me, who I have fully informed of matters in this quarter, which, I think, has a worse appearance than when I wrote you last, chiefly owing to a rash piece of murder I expect is committed on the body of David Cornell, a head-man of the Tuckaubatchees, a friendly town to the United States, as was nearly all the whole Upper Creeks. This young man was sent down by the whole Upper and Lower Creeks, on important business to Major Seagrove; the thirteenth day after he passed my house, two of the men that went with him, returned back to my house, naked, and almost perished, and informed me, that when they got within about thirty miles of Major Seagrove's station, on St. Mary's, the rascal of a white man, one McDonald, that conducted them down, pushed off a-head, and left them still to proceed on, four of them in number, David Cornell, and an Indian boy, and those two men that made their escape back, which informed me, that when they got within three miles of the station, they discovered a company of horsemen riding up towards them; Cornell never halted, but, as he was on horseback, foremost, rode on, the boy was just returned, driving three pack-horses; neither Cornell nor he had a gun in their hands; as Cornell had no gun when he past my house, which could not appear to be enemies; the other two fellows were a small distance behind, a-foot, and say, that when the white people came up within thirty yards, that those that were a-head began to speak out loud, and one man lit off his horse and stepped to a tree, and presented his gun at Cornell, who stood still till the gun fired, and then turned his horse about and ran, and the boys followed him; the whites pursued them past; pursued those two that were a-foot; but they both got to a branch that was thick, and saved themselves. One got a small cut on his arm by a sword, as he entered the thicket, and was fired on as they entered the swamp; one says, as he lay concealed, he saw one of the white people come riding up to the rest, with Cornell's hat in his hand, which was easily known, as it was stuck full of white and read leathers; from those circumstances, we may judge he is no more. This business has been done, I judge, by some of Major Seagrove's enemies, or by some rascals that want to bring on a war with the Indians, and then will run off and never wait to see the end of it. This piece of cowardly, shameful murder, it can be styled nothing else, I fear will prove of serious consequence to the United States, as I fear it will make some of our best friends our enemies; and it will, likewise, give full room to these four mischievous towns to do as they please, as the town Cornell belonged to was taking every step to make them all lay quiet, which there was a great probability of their effecting. A general war with those Indians may appear trifling to uninformed men, but, it is my shallow opinion, that, if it's once seriously begun, there will not be an end to it for several years; but what the State of Georgia or South Carolina both can do, that will put an end to it, as once they come to be drove from these quarters here, which may soon be done, they will move over the Coosa river, near the Dons, and will by them be supplied with every implement of war they stand in need of, which they are obliged to do as their allies, and according to treaty ten years ago, which is what they do daily; they will then be ever an unpassable stream, except in boats, near the Spaniards, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, which, by the Spaniards, will be forced to join them, as the Spaniards have the command of these supplies; being drove from these lands, they will then become desperate, and without the Dons are routed out of that country, there will be an endless savage war. This, I know, the heads of affairs in our country are better acquainted with than I can be, but it is not the opinion of our land hungry men in the State of Georgia; they will be better acquainted with the matter when there comes to be a trial of it, which, I fear, is now in a fair way. It is useless for me to try to pacify matters, when such rash steps are taken to destroy every good intention of the Indians; though the Indians has done some murders, they have been set on by a set of worse savages than themselves to do it, and whether or not we are not savages to copy after them, to take revenge on the innocent. This, I hope, will serve to inform you how matters are here, that you may be a little more on your guard, as I fear some of them will be turning over to do mischief soon.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

TIMOTHY BARNARD.

Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War.

AUGUSTA, 28th August, 1793.

SIR:

There were eight or nine Cherokee Indians came to the store of Mr. Whitney at Ward's Mill, about the 25th of October last, in order to trade off skins and procure winter goods for their families. After being there four or five days, they were fired on early in the morning, by unknown white men, three of them killed, and one squaw wounded, the other Indians escaped. This very much alarmed the inhabitants, and caused many to move their families, expecting the Indians would take satisfaction on some of them.

The first of November following, David McClusky, with fifty-eight men, advanced into the Cherokee nation, and in the morning of the fifth attacked the town Chinstotee, killed three or four Indians, plundered and burned the town, returned and reported this to me at fort Matthews, the 8th. This gave the inhabitants a second alarm, and caused fifty-six frontier settlers to leave their homes. On the Governor's hearing this, he sent express to me to call out the militia. This I forwarded to the fountain-head, the 19th November, 1792. I waited on the Governor, and we concluded that Captain Fauche, already in service, (by the Governor's former order to me) and Captain Williamson, and Captain Woods, should be called into service, until the inhabitants got over their panic. These three troops were ordered to fort Matthews, and there take orders from Captain Roberts, who was by me instructed to arrange and provide for them. Captain Woods never raised his troop, and Captain Phinize offered his service to Captain Roberts, who received and continued him in service instead of Captain Woods.

I have enclosed a letter from the Upper and Lower Creeks to the President. There are now, and have been the greatest part of the summer, about one hundred and eighty horse, and about five hundred infantry, of this State, in service, by order of the Governor, and who is, or pretends to be, at this time preparing an army to go against the Creeks; this army is to consist of four thousand five hundred men—one thousand cavalry, and fifteen hundred infantry, from this State, and two thousand infantry from South Carolina.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY GAITHER.

[ENCLOSURE]

A talk from the heads of the Upper and Lower Creeks, by order of the Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatchees, given out at the Cussetah square, at a meeting of a number of the Lower Creeks, this 21st of July, 1793—to be forwarded to his Excellency General Washington, President of the United States.

We, the heads of the Creek nation, wish to acquaint your Excellency that we are just informed, by a runner of our own people, from the Chickasaw nation, that there was some of the Chickasaws just arrived, who had been holding talks with Governor Blount, and that, from Governor Blount, they came to Cumberland, and that they had agreed with Governor Blount to send six thousand men to station at the Muscle Shoals, on the Cherokee river; and that the Cumberland people had agreed to send five hundred more men, to join the Chickasaws, to station at a fort in the Chickasaw nation; and that the Cumberland people had already sent off three pound great guns to said fort, and that five hundred men were to be there in a short time. We, the heads of the Creek nation, wish to hear from General Washington whether it is desired that Governor Blount, and these Cumberland people, should go on, or whether they are people that are under the government of General Washington or not. This we, the heads of the nation, would wish to know as quick as possible. We, the heads of the Upper and Lower Creeks, wish to inform the President of the United States, that we have give out talks, to put a total stop to all our young people going out to commit any hostilities against Cumberland or Kentucky; therefore, if it's the wish of the President of the United States that his people, and we, the red people, should be at peace, we hope he will immediately restrain Governor Blount and his people from joining the Chickasaws; 'tis not that we are in great dread of the consequences of those proceedings, but, as we have had a long wish to settle all disputes, we hope that our friend and father, General Washington, still remains in the same opinion.

We, the heads of the Creek nation, likewise, wish to inform the heads of Georgia, that, if they still have a wish to settle matters with the red people, we hope they will, on seeing this, immediately send off to Governor Blount, to restrain his people, till his Excellency General Washington's pleasure is known.

FORT FIDIUS, September 23d, 1793.

SIR:

On my way from Augusta, from which place I wrote you last, and in company with Mr. Seagrove, within thirty miles of this place, we met with Captain Dickinson, with a detachment of soldiers from this post; on inquiry of him, I was informed Captain Roberts had received information of our being on the way, and, supposing Captain Freeman to be with us, with a large sum of money, and Mr. Seagrove on his way to meet and treat with the chiefs and head-men of the Creek nation, and hearing that the ungovernable inhabitants of Georgia loudly threatened Mr. Seagrove's life, induced Captain Roberts to order out this party for our protection. However, we arrived without molestation, and found the soldiers healthy, and all in peace. I have since been informed that Colonel Alexander crossed the Oconee, with about one hundred men, at the old trading ford, one mile above the mouth of Shoulderbone, the 15th instant, and the same day Captain Charles Williamson, with his troop, crossed the Oconee, near fort Matthews: both those parties, I am informed, are looking out to intercept Mr. Seagrove's despatches to and from the nation, and to attack the friendly Indians that may wish to treat with the superintendent of Indian affairs, and thereby prevent a treaty. These people have been (as they say) in the service all the summer, and expect to be paid by the General Government for doing mischief. I do not mean to muster, or take any notice of them, nor any other militia, unless I call them, or know that they were called by proper authority from the United States, without I am instructed so to do.

The assistance I expect from Captain Freeman and Mr. Whitney, is truly pleasing to me, and by them promise myself great relief. I have twice waited on his Excellency Governor Telfair, and requested he would appoint the officers, and give orders to raise the one hundred cavalry, and one hundred infantry, agreeably to the President's orders, to which I could not get a direct answer. This induced me to write the enclosed letter to his Excellency, and to this I have not been favored with a reply.

I have the honor to be &c.

HENRY GAITHER.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Major Henry Gaither to his Excellency Governor Telfair.

AUGUSTA, September 7, 1793.

SIR:

The militia now in service on the frontier of Georgia, I have long considered more than is actually necessary for its defence, and I am yet of opinion, the addition of one hundred cavalry, and one hundred infantry, to the Federal troops I have the honor of commanding, if properly managed, would be sufficient to guard and protect the inhabitants thereof.

The above addition has long since been ordered, by the President of the United States, to be raised by your Excellency, and put under my command. There have been no appointments yet made by your Excellency, nor any measures taken in compliance with the President's order, neither can I get an answer whether there will be any or not.

You promised me yesterday an answer in twenty four hours, which I have not yet had the pleasure of receiving; but hope your Excellency will answer me this day, as my business calls me elsewhere to-morrow.

I have the honor to be, sir,

HENRY GAITHER Major-commandant.

Major Henry Gaither to the Secretary of War:

FORT FIDIUS, 11th October, 1793.

SIR:

Yours, of the 5th ultimo, I have received, and shall strictly attend to the contents thereof; rest assured I never had the most distant thought of acting contrary to my instructions, neither had Governor Telfair any right to intimate any such thing: for, he well knew I would not obey him in any order contrary to the orders I have heretofore received from the General Government. There are no preparations yet made by the Governor, for raising the hundred cavalry and hundred infantry, so long ordered; neither do I expect there will, from his letter to me, dated the 7th September, which I have enclosed. We are all in health and peace, at present.

I have the honor to be &c.

HENRY GAITHER.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, September 7, 1793.

Ordered, That Major Gaither be notified, that the critical situation of the frontier settlers, at this period, will not admit of any departure from the present arrangement.

Extract of a letter from Major Gaither to the Secretary of War, dated

AUGUSTA, September 3, 1793.

The militia now in service appear to me to be improperly called by the Governor, and in a greater number than is actually necessary. I have urged the necessity of making an experiment for the defence of the frontier with the Federal troops, and the hundred cavalry and hundred infantry ordered to be raised and put under my command, by the President of the United States; and, should that number prove insufficient to guard the frontier, then to call out as many militia as would be thought necessary. These measures did not meet with his approbation, nor has he made any appointments, arrangements, or any attempts to raise that number of men. Therefore, I do not wish to have any thing to do with the militia now in service, unless they are subject to my orders.

Communications from Constant Freeman, Jun. Agent to the Department of War, in the State of Georgia, to the Secretary of War.

AUGUSTA, September 4, 1793.

SIR:

I informed you, in my last, that the arms and ammunition intended for the militia of this State were put on board a flat for this place. They may be expected to arrive in about ten days.

On the road from Savannah I met with Major Gaither, who was going to St. Mary's for his health. He returned with me, and, to-morrow, he will accompany Mr. Seagrove to fort Fidius, to assist him in his proposed interview with the Indians, on the 10th instant, at Oakmulgee.

I have not had the honor to see the Governor of this State; he is now in Burke county, and will not return until to-morrow. I cannot, therefore, inform you of any measures being taken to pay those militia dragoons, whose pay rolls I have brought with me. As soon as I shall have placed the money for this purpose, in the hands of the paymaster who may be appointed, and concerted with the Governor and Major Gaither measures for the future musters of the militia now in service, I shall proceed to fort Fidius, and pay the regular troops, agreeably to your instructions.

I am informed, that there are, at this time, about six hundred militia in service, who are distributed upon the frontiers. I am not able to transmit you a return of them; I shall request one from the Governor when he returns, and forward it to you. The hundred cavalry and hundred infantry which you, some time ago, authorized the Governor to call into service, have never been raised. I cannot assign the reasons why your orders have not been complied with.

I have not heard any thing of consequence relatively to Indian affairs. Mr. Seagrove assures me, that the Indians have not committed depredations upon the frontiers for these two months past, and that the majority of the Creeks are well disposed, and desirous of continuing at peace with the United States. But, sir, it is proper I should inform you, that the Executive of this State thinks differently. Preparations are now making to march into the Indian country a powerful body of militia, to chastise the refractory towns. In consequence of your letter to the Governor, of the tenth of June last, he called a council of general officers of the militia, which was held on the eighth ultimo: the result was, that an expedition should be carried on this autumn against the Creeks. Accordingly, five thousand men are to be ordered for this service, in the following proportions, to wit: one thousand cavalry and fifteen hundred infantry, from this State, to rendezvous on the Oconee, at a place called fort Twiggs; one thousand cavalry and fifteen hundred infantry, from the State of South Carolina, to rendezvous at Petersburg, at the junction of the Broad with the Savannah river. As the contracts for supplying the troops in this State with provisions, &c. is confined to the limits of the same, the Governor has, in the name of Major Habersham, entered into a new contract for the purposes of the intended expedition. The same price is to be allowed for the ration as heretofore, but the transportation is to be at the expense and risk of the United States, after the militia shall have crossed the Oconee. I will endeavor to procure a copy of this contract, and transmit it by the next post. The time fixed for the rendezvous of the troops is the fifteenth of next month, and the term for which they are to be engaged sixty days.

It would have afforded me satisfaction if I could have given you the above information with greater certainty; but, as I have not seen the Governor, I am obliged to send the best I can procure; you will undoubtedly receive it more perfect through other channels.

Mr. Seagrove apprehends that little good can be expected from his intended meeting with the Indians on the Oakmulgee, while these preparations are making to carry on war against them. The expedition is the subject of conversation in all parts of the State, and appears to be a very popular measure.

I am induced to believe there must be some mistake in this business, for I do not, sir, recollect that you mentioned any thing of the kind to me before I left you.

Perhaps, the posture of affairs in this quarter may require some farther instructions to me; particularly I should be obliged to you to inform me, whether it will be expected that I should accompany this expedition.

I have the honor to be, &c.

AUGUSTA, 11th September, 1793.

SIR:

I had the honor to write you by the post, on the fourth instant, a duplicate of which I forwarded by the way of Savannah.

I have since had an interview with the Governor, and have laid before him all the necessary information, relative to my business in this country. I expect that, in few days, a paymaster will be appointed by him for the militia, and that orders will be given for the mustering those now in service.

The same numbers, sir, are posted on the frontiers, as when I wrote you last. I have not been able to procure a return of the number employed. The Governor thinks that it is absolutely necessary that the present force should be kept up, and that, if he were to reduce it to the hundred cavalry and hundred infantry, required in several of your letters to him, that the people on the frontiers would leave their habitations, from fear of the Indians.

I informed you in my last, that it was then contemplated to march a large body of militia into the Indian country. Your letter to the Governor, dated in July, which I handed to him, has put a stop to any further preparations for this expedition. The Governor informs me, that Major Habersham has forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury, a copy of the contract which had been made on this occasion.

On the seventh instant, Mr. Seagrove proceeded to fort Fidius, on his way to the Oakmulgee, accompanied by Major Gaither and Mr. Whitney. The Governor is fully of opinion that no good will result from his meeting with the Indians, and declares that nothing but chastisement will bring the Creeks to reason; he therefore strongly advocates an expedition into their country, and asserts that this is the very moment, and ought not to be neglected. This would certainly be very grateful to a majority of the people of this State. There are, however, some who differ in opinion from his Excellency, and assert that it would, in the end, prove ruinous, should such an expedition fail of the most perfect success.

The Indians have lately been troublesome on the frontiers. On the first instant, they stole two horses from Long-bluff, Washington county; the next day they were pursued by Captain Stokes and thirteen men, to the Oakmulgee, where he came up with them. He fired upon them; the fire was returned. The whole of the Indian party, consisting of three, were killed, the horses retaken, besides three rifles, and other booty. They have also plundered a Mr. Cribbs and a Mr. Hill, in Greene county, and stolen ten horses; this information was given to me yesterday by the Governor.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CONSTANT FREEMAN, Jr.

AUGUSTA, 18th September, 1793.

SIR:

The Indians have been quiet since the depredations mentioned in my last. It has been reported here, that a trail of forty has been discovered on this side the Oconee; but we have not yet heard of any mischief done by them.

I received, the day before yesterday, a letter from Mr. Seagrove, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose you. By this, sir, you will learn what hopes there are of keeping the Indians quiet, by any negotiations he can have with them. I would wish to believe that his apprehensions of personal danger, and his opinion of the opposition of the frontier inhabitants to pacific measures, are rather exaggerations. The people might possibly offer violence to him, but they cannot be so mad as openly to oppose the Government. It is certain, that a war with the Creeks would be very popular, and that not a few are disappointed that the late intended expedition did not proceed. It is, however, an unfortunate circumstance, that Mr. Seagrove is not a favorite with these people. He says, it arises altogether from his being an officer of the Federal Government, and because he has, at all times, shewn himself zealous in preserving peace with the Indians. I shall not attempt to give an opinion upon this dispute. I have thought it my duty to transmit a copy of his letter to me, that, if there should be any real foundation for his fears, you might have timely intimation thereof; and I have, also, for the same reason, mentioned to you the relation in which Mr. Seagrove stands with the people of this country. I know, sir, that I may write to you in the most perfect confidence. If it were to be known that Mr. Seagrove had written the above mentioned letter, the whole State would be inflamed against him.

Since writing the above, the western post has arrived, who reports, that a Mr. Alexander has gone out, with ninety men, with the determination to prevent Mr. Seagrove having any communication with the Indians; and the people on the frontiers are generally opposed to any meeting with them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CONSTANT FREEMAN, Jr.

James Seagrove to Constant Freeman.

FORT FIDIUS, 11th September, 1793.

I have this moment heard of a wagon going to Augusta, and therefore shall just tell you, that we are all got safe here, notwithstanding the plans meditated for my destruction. I was informed, whilst in Augusta, that it was determined I should not reach this place alive; that I was a most dangerous man; that I was taking measures to keep this country in peace. This may be considered by some, a crime of the deepest dye; but, as such, I did not conceive it, and therefore determined to pursue my direction to that effect.

We got on very quietly, and without any great appearance of danger, until within thirty miles of this station, when we were met by Captain Dickinson, with twenty continental troops, detached by the officers, in consequence of information that parties of villains were out on the road, determined to destroy Colonel Gaither and myself. The officers here had, I have reason to think, just ground for their fears for our safety. We, however, left the troops, and arrived at the garrison about 7 o'clock on the ninth instant. I found every body here well, but the country in a most determined state of opposition to all Federal measures. There are several parties of horsemen out, to prevent my having any intercourse with the Indians. They publicly declare, they will oppose every attempt that can be made to peace. Some parties of horse have actually had the insolence to appear before the garrison, and forbid any person going to the nation. I shall, however, despatch Aiken and the black fellow, this evening, to go forward to meet the Indians, and know their determination. I do not, yet, know whether or not the Indians are coming on to meet me. I have not time to be particular. I give you this unconnected line, just to let you see what a blessed situation I am placed in.

I am, &c.

JAMES SEAGROVE.

AUGUSTA, September 25, 1793.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, and to enclose a duplicate of mine to you, of the eighteenth.

I am happy that I anticipated your orders, as far as I was authorized, in not concurring in any arrangements for invading the Creeks. From the moment I arrived in this State, and heard of the late intended expedition, I gave it as my opinion that nothing contained in your letter to the Governor, of the 10th of June, could justly be construed as authorizing him to carry on an offensive war against the Creeks, by marching an army into their country. This I did from a conviction, that, had any such invasion been contemplated by you, you would not have suffered me to have left Philadelphia entirely unprepared for such an event. I do not recollect that I ever saw your letter, above alluded to.

As you could not, sir, foresee that I should be called upon to act in a business of this nature, you have not instructed me to interfere in any measures concerted by the Governor upon Indian affairs. I have, however, thought myself authorized to declare, that the true construction has not been put on your letter, and this also has been the opinion of several of the general officers who assisted at the council, mentioned in mine to you, of the 4th instant.

I have endeavored, sir, to transmit you the best information on public business. What I have written relatively to the force and destination of the militia who were to have been employed against the Creeks, I had from a general officer, one of the council before mentioned. Mr. Seagrove's letter to me, of the 11th, is the only authentic communication I can make relative to the state of the frontiers.

Reports circulate, which confirm, in part, what he has written. I am induced to believe that his person is really in danger. One of the Governor's secretaries, who has lately returned from the frontiers, informs me, that, from what he heard, while he was there, he makes no doubt that, should Mr. Seagrove attempt to go to the Indians, he would lose his life. It is certain that the people have great prejudices against him. They entertain an opinion that he has misrepresented the state of Indian affairs; and that, while the Indians were making depredations, he has reported them as peaceably disposed. Mr. Seagrove appears to me to have great zeal in the public service; he may, however, have erred in the measures he has pursued.

It will not, however, be in his power to preserve the peace by any interview he may have with the Indians; and his attempts, for this purpose, will fail, because of the strong disposition which the people of this country, generally, and of the frontiers in particular, have to a war with the Creeks; and it cannot be long before the flame will break out. It is with difficulty the people are now restrained; they had calculated upon the late intended expedition; that failing, their disappointment is excessive, and should any Indians unfortunately fall in their way, they would be sacrificed. The Indians are continually making depredations; and though I do not hear of their killing any person, yet scarce a day passes but we are told of some theft committed by them. These exasperate the people; they are generally pursued, and, when overtaken, killed. Add to these causes of discontent and animosity, the intrigues of certain malicious whites, who reside in the Creek nation, and who are continually insinuating the Indians to acts of hostility, and misrepresenting the conduct of the United States toward them. This seems to be the present state of the frontiers.

The militia have not been reduced since I have been here. I have made frequent applications to the Governor for a return of the force at present in service, but without effect: he says that the Adjutant General has not yet made his returns to him. It doth not appear that it is his intention to raise the hundred cavalry, and hundred infantry, for the present, but to continue the force now employed. He urges the necessity of this measure, to protect the inhabitants from the depredations of the Indians.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

AUGUSTA, 2d October, 1793.

SIR:

Mr. Seagrove has communicated to the Governor, that, on the 22d of last month, talks had been received by him from the Creeks, expressive of their desire to have a conference with him, and to treat upon the measures of preserving the peace. He complains to the Governor against the parties of volunteer horse, who have gone over the Oconee, to prevent him from fulfilling this important object. He also informs him that the Cherokees have invited the Creeks to join them in a war against Cumberland; and that the northern frontiers of this State are in danger from the former. And he requests the Governor to suggest to him any thing he may wish to be made an object at his proposed interview. In consequence of this letter, the Governor has written to him, and pointed out the particulars, for which he is to insist, on the part of Georgia, as preliminary conditions to a peace. I have the honor to enclose you an attested copy thereof. When the Governor gave me this paper, he observed to me, that he had made the demands high, but that he did not expect they would all be complied with. You will be pleased to observe, by the enclosed extract of a letter from Major Gaither to Mr. Meals, of this place, that Mr. Seagrove intended to set off from fort Fidius on the 29th ultimo, and that the danger from parties of militia has been altogether ideal.

In my letter to you of the 18th of last month, I have mentioned that a certain Mr. Alexander had gone out with a party of militia, to prevent an interview between Mr. Seagrove and the Indians, and that a trail of forty had been discovered on this side the Oconee. I have now to communicate you the true state of these reports. It appears by a letter from Colonel Melton to General Irwin, dated 27th ultimo, from which I have extracted what follows, that, on the 7th, the Indians stole five horses from Greene county, near fort Clarke, above the Rock Landing; that they were pursued by a party of five men, whom the Indians ambushed, and obliged to return without their object, and with the loss of their horses killed: that, on the 11th, Colonel Melton, with Captain Fauche's dragoons, and Captain Milton's riflemen, crossed the Oconee, at the Skull Shoals: that, on the 16th, near General Clarke's battle ground, on Jack creek, he was joined by Colonel Alexander, of Wilkes, with eight men, and Lieutenant Colonel Lamar, of Greene, with twenty-six men, chiefly officers. Fauche had his Cornet and thirty-six non-commissioned and privates; Captain Milton had fourteen; the whole party, including the commanding officer, amounted to eighty-eight: that they proceeded on the trail of the aforesaid Indians until the 21st, when they were stopped by a large river, and from the sound of bells and the crowing of cocks, they supposed themselves near a town; with some difficulty a ford was discovered by Major Adams, of Lamar's regiment: that, just before day, they crossed the river, and made an attack on the town, but not before the Indians had taken the alarm, and fled to a neighboring swamp. Six warriors were killed; the number wounded unknown. Eight women and children were made prisoners and brought off. The militia lost one killed and one wounded. The town was destroyed. That, on their return at Flint river, they left a talk for the Indians, whose town they had destroyed, a copy of which the Governor transmits you by this post. The prisoners report that a number of warriors had gone from the Creeks against Cumberland. One hundred and five warriors were in the town when it was assaulted.

It is not ascertained what town has been destroyed: it is supposed to have been the Upper Cowetas, on the Chatahochee river. I make no doubt but this stroke will put a stop to any meeting with Mr. Seagrove. The Governor thinks, that Colonel Melton has acted conformably to orders heretofore issued, for repelling the Indians.

He has ordered the prisoners to be sent to this place.

[ENCLOSURES IN THE FOREGOING LETTER.]

Copy of the conditions to be required of the Creeks, as preliminary to a treaty.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 26th September, 1793.

A letter from Timothy Barnard, Esq., dated Creek nation, the 18th instant, and also a letter from James Seagrove, Esq., of the 22d instant, were received this day and read: Whereupon, it is Ordered, That each of them be served with the following:

Conditions that will be required on the part of the State of Georgia, on the establishment of peace between the United States and the Creek Indians.

The captured property to be restored, and all the individual contracts with the citizens of this State fulfilled.

The prisoners, in captivity, to be brought and delivered up within the settled parts of Georgia.

The perpetrators of the murders committed in this State, to the number of thirteen, to be surrendered as objects of retaliation.

Ten head-men from the Upper and Lower Creek towns to be surrendered as hostages to the United States, and to be placed in the safe keeping of the Executive of the State of Georgia, for the due performance of the several stipulations that respect her.

That, under the law of the United States, as well as for the security of this State, the government of Georgia cannot recognise the establishment of peace, without having commissioners at the treaty.

Attest,

J. MERIWETHER, Sec'y E. D.

Extract of a letter from Major Gaither to Mr Joshua Meals, Merchant, Augusta, dated at fort Fidius, the 28th of September, 1793.

"Major Seagrove, it is probable, will leave this to-morrow for the Oakmulgee, where the chiefs and head-men of the Creek nation are now waiting for him. There are, at this time, several parties of militia now out, that have threatened the lives of those concerned in making peace, and any Indians they may fall in with. I mean to furnish the agent of Indian affairs with a guard, pack-horses, &c., and very probably accompany him to-morrow. I should write Captain Freeman, but having reason to believe he is on his way to this place, I have declined it."

AUGUSTA, 7th October, 1793.

SIR:

I have had the honor to receive a duplicate of your letter of the 5th ultimo. Enclosed is a duplicate of mine to you, of the 2d instant.

I received, on the 3d instant, a letter from Mr. Seagrove, dated at fort Fidius, the 28th of last month, which confirms the account of the militia having destroyed an Indian town. He differs from Colonel Melton in the relation of the affair. I should rather suppose the account of the latter ought to be the most relied on, as Mr. Seagrove has obtained his information at second hand from the Indians. I enclose you extracts from this letter.

It appears from the reports of several persons from the Westward, that Mr. Seagrove has not gone to meet the Indians as he proposed, but that he remains at the fort; and that, since the return of Colonel Melton, many of the frontier settlers have removed, and that all are putting themselves and their stations into a state of defence. We may expect every day to hear of the Indians having made retaliation, though it is generally believed that they will be quiet as long as their women and children are detained prisoners. There is not, however, any prospect of peace, and this country may now be considered as in an actual state of war. I am extremely sorry that the intelligence I have hitherto communicated has been of the disagreeable kind.

I forgot to mention to you in my last, that the conditions to be required on the part of Georgia, on the establishment of peace between the United States and the Creeks, have been published in the newspapers of this part of the country. It does not appear to have been done officially.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove, agent of Indian affairs, to Constant Freeman, dated at

FORT FIDIUS, 28th September, 1793.

I am most unpleasantly situated with respect to the business I set out on. I find that I am opposed by the armed force of this frontier militia, in my endeavors to give them peace. Parties are continually out between this and the Oakmulgee to intercept me, or any Indians or messenger from or to me. As yet, they have not been successful. I have received expresses from the nation since I have been here, and, from the appearance of matters in that quarter, I am led to believe I can settle matters to the satisfaction of the General Government, if not counteracted by the bad conduct of the people of Georgia. A party of about one hundred men, under command of Colonel Alexander, and others, went from Greene county on the 15th instant, and, on the 20th, entered a small Indian village on the Chatahoochee river, about forty-five miles above the Cussetah town, killed one Indian man, and brought off, as prisoners, one man and four women. This information I have received from Tim. Barnard, who is now here. He had it from two Indians who were sent express after him, and overtook him on the road the 27th instant. I cannot find that the white party lost any men. I cannot discover by what authority those parties are sent out, but I think it very unwarrantable. I have wrote Governor Telfair to put a stop to such practices in his State. But, as usual, I have no reply to my request, or any notice taken of so serious an application. There is a number of Indians now waiting for me on the Oakmulgee, who came forward with Barnard and Allen to escort me into the towns. I shall leave this to-morrow, with a guard of federal troops, and hope to have Colonel Gaither's company as far as the Oakmulgee, from whence I will write you, if I have time, by the return of the troops. The conduct of the Spanish agent in the nation is much changed in our favor.

FORT FIDIUS, October 14th, 1793.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th ultimo, which I received this day by express from Augusta, and to enclose you a duplicate of mine of the 7th instant.

I arrived at this post in the evening of the 10th. I found Mr. Seagrove had not gone to the Indian country, for the reasons which he has assigned you in his letters upon the subject.

I have very little news to communicate to you upon Indian affairs. The agent of this department has transmitted all the information to be obtained. I must, however, sir, observe, that a war with the Creeks is inevitable. Such is the spirit of the frontier inhabitants, unless the General Government should, in some public and decided manner, express their disapprobation of the measure, it is dangerous to advocate the cause of peace.

The success of Colonel Melton's invasion has given the people a strong desire to penetrate into the Indian country, in hopes of destroying their towns, and bringing off prisoners. For this purpose, we are informed that there are now two parties making preparations to cross the Oconee. I cannot vouch for the truth of these reports, but it would be extremely unfortunate if they should take place, as all accommodation with the Indians would then be at an end. They seem at present greatly embarrassed what measures to pursue, but are rather inclined to peace than war, as appears by Tim Barnard's letter to Major Gaither, a copy of which Mr. Seagrove transmits you.

I am induced to believe that the Governor would forbid the above mentioned parties from entering the Creek country, if he should be informed in time of their intentions; for though he conceived that Colonel Melton could be justified by the general orders he had heretofore issued for repelling the Indians, as I wrote you on the 2d instant, yet he would not countenance any further expeditions, unless authorized by the General Government. The Indian prisoners have been ordered to Augusta, where they arrived on the 12th instant.

I have the honor to be, &c.

FORT FIDIUS, 21st October, 1793.

SIR:

An express arrived last evening at this post from Timothy Barnard, Mr. Seagrove's deputy in the Creek nation, by whom we learn that the Indians are very well disposed to renew the peace with the United States, and that nothing can, at this favorable juncture, prevent perfect reconciliation, but the lawless conduct of the frontier inhabitants of this State. I mentioned to you in my last, that parties were preparing to cross the Oconee, for the purpose of breaking up the Indian towns. It is now reduced to a certainty, that one of these parties has crossed the river, four days ago, about twenty-five miles below this post, at a place called Carr's Bluff. It is to be hoped that they may be prevented from doing any mischief. Mr. Seagrove will communicate to you fully upon the present state of Indian affairs.

Agreeably to your instructions I have requested Major Gaither to appoint some fit person to inspect and muster the militia. He says that, if there are any now in service, under the authority of the United States, he is ignorant thereof, and that he cannot pretend to appoint an inspector until he shall have been regularly and officially informed that those now on the frontiers have been called into service in pursuance of such authority. He also informs me that he has written to you upon this subject.

I have, in several of my letters, informed you, that I could not obtain a return from the Governor, of the force actually employed for the defence of the frontiers, although I had repeatedly made application to him for the same, and that no measures had been taken to comply with the orders of the United States, relatively to the one hundred cavalry and one hundred infantry, which he had ordered the Governor to bring into service. I should presume that it cannot be the intention of the United States to pay from four to six hundred men, when two hundred are the extent authorized. It is also necessary to observe, that Captain Fauche, and several others, who were with Colonel Melton in his expedition against the Indians, are considered as in the service at the expense of the United States. If that expedition was a violation of the President's orders, they certainly ought not to be paid for any such service. I therefore, sir, request that you will be pleased to give me the most ample instructions on this interesting subject, and that Major Gaither may be directed how far he is authorized to muster the militia now in service. I shall communicate to the Governor the result of my demand to Major Gaither, and inform him that I shall wait your further orders before I proceed in the business.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

Letters from the Secretary of War to William Blount, Governor of the territory of the United States, south of the river Ohio.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 8th February, 1793.

SIR:

The President of the United States is highly desirous that John Watts, the Little Turkey, and as many others of the real chiefs of the Cherokees as you may judge proper to form a real representation of the tribes, should pay a visit to this place, where they shall not only be abundantly supplied with such articles as they may require themselves, but also for their nation. He wishes you to accompany them.

He conceives that the result of such a journey would have a powerful tendency to remove all causes of hostility, and prevent the repetition of such a crisis as has existed for some time past.

As to the presents promised at the proposed meeting on the 17th of April, the true cause may be assigned why their chiefs may choose them at Philadelphia. If the meeting actually takes place, some expense must be incurred. These must be regulated by your judgment, you being considered as responsible that they shall be as small as the nature of the case will possibly admit. Perhaps you may make a new arrangement, and obtain the deputation of a few of the most respectable chiefs, without the expenses which must attend a conference with a great number; but you must be the judge of this proposed alteration. The general measure, however, of obtaining a number of chiefs to repair to this place, and for you to accompany them, is considered as highly proper, and even indispensable. For their expenses, or other indispensable expenses in the case of the conference, you may draw bills, for which you will be held accountable; but I trust the amount will not be large.

I hope you have directed the militia to be regularly mustered, according to your instructions. The pay abstracts ought to be formed immediately.

I hope soon to forward the agent mentioned before.

If the formalities of the Indians, and their mode of doing business, would allow it, the meeting proposed to be had with the Cherokees on the 17th of April, might, on account of the expense, be dispensed with altogether: for, if the most influential characters in different districts are designated, and the interpreters sent to them individually, with an invitation to come to the seat of the General Government, about the time the treaty is holding with the Western Indians, say the middle of May, of which you were informed in my letter of the 25th ultimo, all the purposes, unincumbered with the expense of that meeting, will be equally well answered; but whether such a mode of proceeding comports with their customs and manner of doing business, or whether characters designated by us, would be considered by them as a representation duly authorized, without a formal ratification of their own, is a query of importance, and ought to be well ascertained.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor BLOUNT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 14th May, 1793.

SIR:

Your several favors, by Mr. Allison, were received some days past, and submitted to the President of the United States.

The affairs being in the train as stated by you, it seems unnecessary to reply particularly to your several letters, as the hope is indulged of seeing you in this place so shortly.

But Colonel Winchester, who has been here, and who has presented a memorial to the President of the United States, from the inhabitants of Mero district, seems to render it necessary to write to you upon the subject of defence of the citizens in that quarter.

You have been fully informed of the difficulties which have existed to prevent the President of the United States from giving orders, in consequence of your representations, for the most vigorous offensive operations against the hostile Indians.

If those difficulties existed while the Congress were in session, and which it was conceived they alone were competent to remove, they recur, in the present case, with still greater force: for all the information received at the time Congress were in session, were laid before both Houses; but no order was taken thereon, nor any authority given to the President of the United States; of consequence, his authority remains in the same situation it did on the commencement of the last session.

It is indeed a serious question, to plunge the nation into a war with the Southern tribes of Indians, supported as it is said they would be.

But, if that war actually exists, if depredations are repeated and continued upon the frontier inhabitants, the measure of protection is indispensable; but that protection can only be of the defensive sort. If other, or more extensive measures shall be necessary, they must, probably, result from the authority expressly given for that purpose by Congress.

Hence, if it shall be your judgment that the Cumberland settlements require the assistance of the militia of the other parts of your government, you will impart it to them for such time, and in such a degree, as shall be commensurate with the occasion, always taking care to report the number actually called into service, and the time for which they shall be engaged, and that they be dismissed as soon as the danger shall cease.

Perhaps, if Captain Kerr's company, or part of them, (although it would be prejudicial to their discipline to separate them) were ordered to Cumberland, it would be judicious.

Doctor Williamson has repeatedly spoken of the danger of the communication between Washington and Mero district, and that it would be obviated, in a degree, by a small post at the crossing of Cumberland river. This, however, and all other points of defence, must be referred to your judgment.

Colonel Winchester represents the great want of arms and ammunition. May you not, with propriety, send part of those you have to General Robertson, taking care to guard the return of them, as mentioned in my former letters on this subject?

I enclose you a return (a) of stores which General Wayne has been directed to send to the Chickasaws, in consequence of your representation, and as an evidence of your friendship for them.

Your arrival will still be anxiously expected, and that you may be able to bring with you the heads of the Cherokees. Be assured, sir, that, if you can quiet the troubles in your vicinity, by pacific measures, you will render a most acceptable service to your country, and great honor to yourself.

Of every important event you will render information: for the solicitude is great which is excited for the security of the inhabitants of your government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor BLOUNT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 26th June, 1793.

SIR:

My last letter to you was dated the 14th ultimo, and transmitted by Colonel Winchester, a duplicate of which is enclosed. Since which, I have received your several letters, dated the 9th, 23d, and 24th ultimo.

The measure of ordering Major Beard's party to the Cumberland settlements, for their protection, appears to have been highly proper, and, it is to be hoped, will be attended with salutary effects.

It is difficult to foresee the precise result of the late unprovoked and unexpected outrages of some of the Lower Creeks, on the frontiers of Georgia. Mr. Seagrave had excited a very different expectation.

The Governor of Georgia has ordered into the field a considerable force of militia, but, as it is presumed he will only act upon the defensive, and the frontiers only be invaded by small parties of savages, it is probable he will find one hundred horse, and the same number of infantry, which he has been authorized to call into service, under the orders of Major Gaither, as sufficient for defensive purposes as a greater body of men.

It really seems as if no permanent arrangement of peace could be made with the savage tribes, liable as they are to the impulses of bad men, and to other policy than that of the United States. The very Indians, who no longer ago than the last autumn were prevented from suffering the extremes of hunger, by the bounties of the United States, were, by information, of the number who have recently been either stealing horses or murdering defenceless women and children. Although these hostilities may be attributed to a particular cause, yet there are reasons of a powerful nature, as connected with the present state of European politics, which prevent a public development. Among a number of inevitable evils, the least is to be chosen. But the time may arrive when both the interest and dignity of the United States may render it expedient and proper to unfold the causes of the evils which are at present suffered by our frontier citizens. In the mean time, it is the part of wisdom to accommodate to present circumstances.

It may be depended upon, that the President of the United States has the protection of the exposed parts of the frontiers near to his heart, and that it will afford him great satisfaction when they shall be in perfect security. Humanity would rejoice were this security to be the effect of pacific arrangements with the Indians, founded upon the principles of justice and humanity.

The commissioners appointed to treat with the Northern tribes, at Lower Sandusky, arrived at Niagara the latter part of May; but they received information that the Indians would not be ready to assemble until towards the first of July. This detention, among other causes, has been probably owing principally to the desire to wait the arrival of the Shawanese ambassadors. What will be the event of this treaty cannot be conjectured at present; nor will it be known until some time in September.

If the Cherokees shall certainly have refused to enter into the confederacy, as well as the Upper Creeks which you mentioned, it may have a good effect to induce the Northern Indians to be moderate in their conduct.

It would probably be attended with the happiest effects should you be able to persuade the principal chiefs of the Cherokees to repair to this place. And at no time has there been so fair a prospect of their compliance, as at the time you wrote. If you are so fortunate as to effect this object, you will give me timely information of the visit.

As Mr. Allison will shortly return, I propose to transmit you by him a sum of money, to defray the expenses of the journey of the said Indians.

The persons who fired on the friendly Indians, near your house, deserve, and I am persuaded will receive, severe punishment; at least it is to be expected that nothing within your power will be omitted to bring them to the punishment which the laws shall decide they merit.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor BLOUNT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 26th, 1793.

SIR:

I am instructed, by the President of the United States, to express to you his extreme concern at the late violent and lawless inroads of several parties of whites, from the Southwestern territory, into the peaceable part of the Cherokee nation. He requests that you would, upon your return, make known his sentiments on the occasion, and that you would use your highest exertions, that the authors and perpetrators of such disgraceful outrages should be brought to immediate trial, and receive the punishment which the law shall direct.

Unless such crimes be punished in an exemplary manner, it will be in vain for the Government to make further attempts to establish any plan or system for the administration of Indian affairs, founded on the principles of moderation and justice. Treaties will be at an end; and violence and injustice will be the arbiters of all future disputes between the whites and the neighboring tribes of Indians; and, of consequence, much innocent blood will be shed, and the frontiers depopulated.

It will, therefore, behove every man in the Southwestern territory, who wishes to live under a government of law and order, to exert himself in obedience to the directions you may issue for the trial and punishment of the offences, which have been recently committed against the Indians.

If too many of the inhabitants of your government have not been concerned in the outrages in question, and, if it be possible for the majority to persevere in a reasonable line of conduct, it will then become a subject of your deliberation to pacify, if possible, the injured Indians. If the laws should condemn the offenders, and the powers of government should be sufficiently strong to execute the laws, it is possible the Indians may be satisfied, because they would then see that the promises made to them were not mere delusions.

But, if this should not be the case, you will be constrained to have recourse to other expedients, which, although it is highly proper they should be tried, the result may be doubtful. In order, therefore, that you may avail yourself of any favorable disposition of the Indians, David Allison, the storekeeper and paymaster, has been furnished with the quantity of goods you have estimated for this purpose, amounting to five thousand seven hundred and eighty-four dollars and seventy-one cents.

It is, however, to be understood, that you are not to issue these goods to the Indians, unless it shall be apparent to you that it will have the effect to pacify the relations of the murdered Indians, and thereby prevent further hostilities. The Executive of the United States are anxiously desirous of a peace with the neighboring Indian tribes, for the many reasons which have been given to you, both verbally and in writing. But, if the United States are constrained to enter into a war with any tribes, it ought to be under the auspices of justice, as it is not to be supposed for a moment that they will support the expenses of a war brought on the frontiers by the wanton, blood thirsty disposition of our own people, or any other unjustifiable conduct.

You will please to be frequent in your communications of all circumstances necessary to be known to the President of the United States, and you will please to bear strongly in your mind, always, that nothing can be more satisfactory to him than peace with the Indian tribes, founded in humanity and justice.

Letter from the Secretary of War to Daniel Smith, Esq. Secretary of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, dated 27th August, 1793.

SIR:

Your several letters of the 17th June, 19th, 27th, and 30th July, with their several enclosures, have been submitted to the President of the United States.

The excesses which you state, are a subject of extreme regret to the President of the United States, and seem almost to preclude the hope of establishing order and peace, upon the frontiers, between the whites and the Indians.

Your situation must have been painful indeed, to have been a witness of such lawless violence, without possessing the power of remedying them. However, your good intentions, and the approbation of the President of the United States, must be to you a great consolation.

It is unnecessary to be particular in replying to your letters, as Governor Blount, who will be the bearer of this letter, will be charged with instructions from the President, to endeavor, by every possible means, to establish order in his government.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Hanging Maw, sent by Governor Blount.

BROTHERS:

Your father, General Washington, the President of the United States, has directed me to acknowledge the receipt of your message, dated at Coyatee, the 15th of June last.

Be assured, Brothers, that the misfortune that has befallen you, has deeply afflicted your father the President, who desires that his red children should be treated with the same humanity and justice as his white children.

He expresses his highest indignation at the base attack which has been made upon you during the moments of peace; he has directed Governor Blount to endeavor, by the course of the law, to bring the perpetrators of that wicked affair to full punishment.

It is sincerely desired by the President that those bad men should not escape the law, and that you should see or know, from evidence upon which you could rely, that justice has been done you and your nation.

But, Brothers, while the laws are the protection of all good men among us, yet, sometimes, the bad escape unpunished, by the cunning of the criminals, or for want of strong evidence. In such cases, we do not permit an individual who has been wronged to be his own avenger. This is never allowed among the whites, when the society is well regulated.

Now, Brothers, listen! If the laws should not condemn the murderers of your friends, is there no other mode by which you could be satisfied? Governor Blount will talk to you upon this point, and endeavor to find some mode by which we shall still be friends.

It would afford your father great satisfaction to shake you by the hands, this fall, in Philadelphia, and, he hereby, strongly urges you, and the other chiefs of your nation, to undertake the journey. He will direct that you shall be comfortably accommodated on your way, and farther, upon your arrival here, he flatters himself, that, by being face to face, the remembrance of all former injuries will be done away, and that we may establish a firm and lasting peace and friendship.

Given at the city of Philadelphia, this twenty-seventh of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Letters, with their several enclosures, from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, JANUARY 14, 1793.

SIR:

The better to be understood, in reply to several parts of your letter of the 26th November, I beg leave first to quote them.

"It is considered that, in the minds of the Indians, there must be some pretext for the enmity of the Indians to the Cumberland settlers. I find that the Little Turkey and the Bloody Fellow, when here, and a letter from Mr. McGillivray, of the 9th of October, all unite in complaining of that part of the country;" and request me "to define explicitly what I know on the subject of their claim."

I am happy in having anticipated, in part, the answer to this question, in my letter of the 8th November, and shall now give what information I then omitted, or since obtained on that head.

At the beginning, and previous to the late Revolution, the Cherokees lived in towns, either on the head waters of the Savannah River, (Keowee and Tugelo) or on the Tennessee, above the mouth of Holston. At that time, the country which now forms the counties of Franklin and Elbert, in Georgia, several of the western counties of South Carolina, several of the western counties of North Carolina, the district of Washington, in the territory south of the Ohio, and a part of the district of Washington, in Virginia, were a part of their hunting grounds; the remainder of it was down the Tennessee, on the south side; they very rarely went on the Cumberland waters, and when they did, they considered themselves as hunting on grounds not their own. At that time they had no need of the Cumberland country to hunt in, for they had enough of a much more open and agreeable country. That, in the year 1776, General Williamson marched an army from South Carolina, and destroyed the towns on the Keowee and Tugelo, among them old Seneca, a very principal one, and erected fort Rutledge on its ruins. That General Rutherford marched another, from North Carolina, and Colonel Christian, a third, from Virginia, and destroyed most of the principal ones on the Tennessee. That, shortly after the return of these armies, two treaties were held with the Cherokees, one at Duet's corner, by commissioners appointed by the States of South Carolina and Georgia, at which a large tract of country was claimed by these two States, and ceded by the right of conquest. The other at the Long Island of Holston, by commissioners appointed by the States of North Carolina and Virginia, at which also a large tract of country was ceded to these two States, are facts with which you cannot be unacquainted. The lands by these treaties ceded, are those above mentioned, on which the western counties of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, and the district of Washington, in this territory, are formed. The Cherokees being thus burnt out of their towns, and by these treaties very much curtailed in their hunting grounds to the eastward and northward, shortly began to erect new towns, lower down the Tennessee, and on the waters of Mobile river. The most bold and active part settled on a creek called Chickamauga, 100 miles below the mouth of Holston. The whole of this party being averse to peace, attended neither of the treaties. This afforded a pretext to the parts of the nation that did, to say, whenever injuries were done to the citizens of the United States, commit them who would, that it was the Chickamaugas, and would often add, as a proof of their sincerity, why did not the white people cut them off? they were murderers and thieves, and they who treated had nothing to do with them. In the year 1782 they abandoned Chickamauga creek, believing it was infested with witches; some returned to the old towns, others went lower down the Tennessee, 40 miles, and laid the foundation of the five towns, now generally called the five Lower towns on the Tennessee, to which since have repaired and settled, the young and active, more or less from every town in the nation, and have now become the most formidable part of it, not only from their disposition to commit injuries on the citizens of the United States, but from their ability to perform it. Every move made down the Tennessee was so much nearer the Cumberland settlements, which were formed in the year 1780, consequently the Cumberland lands became more an object with them, and especially so, as they had ceded such large quantities, which were actually their own; that is, unclaimed by any other tribe at the before mentioned treaties. I have given this account of the settlements of the Cherokees at the commencement of the Revolution, their then hunting grounds, and the progress of their settlements since, down the Tennessee, to shew the improbability of their claiming the Cumberland lands at that time, and the probable reason why they have since done it.

I shall now offer some reasons, shewing that the right to the Cumberland lands, at the time the Revolution commenced, lay in the Chickasaws, in preference to the Cherokees.

1st. The Chickasaws, prior to the Revolution, (how long I do not know) lived a considerable part, if not the whole, (and which I know not), on the north side of the Tennessee, at least fifty miles lower down the Tennessee than the present lowest Cherokee town. The greatest contiguity to hunting grounds, and the prior use of them, seems to be the best claim Indians can establish to them.

2d. The Chickasaws claimed and ceded the Cumberland lands at the treaty held by Donnelson and Martin, (I believe) under the authority of Virginia, in the year 1782.

3d. They did the same by the treaty of Hopewell, as well as the Cherokees.

4th. They did the same at the late conference at Nashville, in presence of the Cherokee agents, who did not deny their claim; they only said, they did not know before, that red people divided land like white people.

5th. That, when the minutes of the conversation that passed at the late conference at Nashville, was read at Estanaula, the Cherokees there present admitted the Chickasaw claim was just. James Carey, the interpreter, first gave me this information, as it has since been confirmed by George Paris. Paris bore a captain's commission in Brown's Florida rangers, and is a man of veracity.

6th. A Cherokee chief, at the treaty of Long Island of Holston, expressed himself in the following words: "You, Carolina Dick, (Richard Henderson) have deceived your people; you told them we sold you the Cumberland lands; we only sold you our claim; they belong to our brothers, the Chickasaws, as far as the head-waters of Duck and Elk rivers."

For this quotation I am indebted to Colonel Tatham, of Richmond, who recorded the proceedings of that treaty. It will be observed that the line here described well agrees with that described as bounding the claim of the Chickasaws, by the Mountain Leader, at the conference at Nashville.

Against the claim of the Cherokees to the Cumberland lands, may be offered, that the Northern tribes have ceded all the lands north of the Tennessee, by two or more treaties, to the crown of Great Britain.

By the Little Turkey's complaint, I understand you to allude to his speech made in the council at Estanaula, in June last, because I have neither seen nor heard any thing else of or from him that could be so understood. I have since asked John Thompson, the interpreter, and the Little Turkey's bosom friend, what he could mean or intend by such a speech, adding, that he certainly must know the President could not grant him the line he asked. Thompson answered, yes, the Turkey knew it very well; he only meant to please the young warriors, who were always grumbling that the old chiefs had sold their land, and they had none to hunt on.

The nature of the Indian government, or, more properly, the total want of it, often subjects the chiefs or head-men to the necessity of acting as the Turkey appears to have done on this occasion. There is ever among them, young warriors, wishing to rise into consequence, and nothing so like to effect it as complaining against chiefs for having sold their hunting grounds. This, at once, pulls down the chiefs, makes way for themselves, and gives them popularity with the young and rising part of the nation, with whom alone popularity is of any worth; and such is the fear of the head-men of losing their consequence, that it is very rare that one of them, on such occasions, will declare they did sell lands; and, if they do admit they did, to save their consequence, will say they were wrong advised by some bad man, or deceived by the purchaser, and, in either case, Indians do not consider the bargain binding. I will recite a circumstance within my own knowledge: At the return of the head-men from the treaty of Hopewell, finding the ceding of lands to the south of Cumberland was displeasing to the young warriors, they declared that the Cumberland river was the line, and that they had ceded no lands to the south of it; and at the treaty of Holston, the Hanging Maw, who was a signer to that of Hopewell, had the assurance, in council, to deny, in my presence, who was a witness, that the Cherokees, by the treaty of Hopewell, had ceded any lands south of Cumberland, and to insist that the Cumberland was the line, and after, in private, confessed to me that he knew the line did go to the south of Cumberland, as I had asserted, but, he was obliged to deny it before the young warriors.

Under these circumstances, it is not to be wondered at, that the young and rising generation should claim the lands which their predecessors have fairly ceded. They ever have, and probably ever will, while their present want of government exists.

I shall now make some observations on the speech itself of the Little Turkey. He only expresses a wish that the line should run as he described, not upon the principles that he claims the land such a line would give, but on the score of pity, and in consideration of the Long Island of Holston, to which, he says, he has a just claim, and which he would give in exchange. At the treaty held at that island, the Cherokees certainly reserved it as a place to hold beloved talks forever, although they ceded a body of lands lying below it. At the treaty of Hopewell, where lands were also ceded lying below that island, they made no exception, nor said any thing about it, until the treaty was signed. At the treaty of Holston, Watts spoke of the claim to it, and I believe would not have signed the treaty, had I not promised him that the matter should be stated to the President, and he would do what was just on the occasion. I conceived that I had complied with my promise by forwarding the minutes, or journal, of that treaty, and, in the additional annual allowance of five hundred dollars, I had supposed a consideration for the island was intended by the President.

That the Bloody Fellow complained against the Cumberland settlers, when at Philadelphia, I was never before informed.

Upon what ground M<sup>r</sup> Gillivray can found his complaints, I am at a loss even to conjecture. Unquestionably, the Creeks have no claim to the Cumberland lands, nor from any thing I have ever heard, to a foot of land on the north side of Tennessee. There is not a Creek village within less than two hundred miles of the Cumberland settlements, and M<sup>r</sup> Gillivray himself, who may be said to live in the centre of the Upper Creeks, is at least three hundred miles distant from Cumberland. The facts respecting the Cumberland settlers and the Creeks, are, the Creeks, since the treaty of New York, have killed many of the Cumberland settlers in their houses, and about their ordinary business, regardless of age or sex; that they have carried into captivity Miss Thompson, a young lady of handsome fortune, and Mrs. Caffray, and her child, whom they treat as slaves; and, that they have stolen hundreds of their horses; that the Cumberland settlers have never done the Creeks any injury, except in defence of themselves, or in immediate pursuit of such as have injured them. In this, I see no cause of complaint on the side of the Creeks.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Gillivray to me, in which he expresses his approbation of the treaty of Holston. If the Creeks had claimed any part of the lands ceded by the Cherokees, instead of approving, would he not have disapproved, both of the treaties of Hopewell and Holston? You will recollect I have forwarded to your office copies of two letters which I wrote him; the first by your order, on the subject of the injuries done the Cumberland people by the Creeks, both of which have been delivered to him, but to neither have I received an answer. This is mentioned to inform you that he has failed, on his part, in that friendly correspondence you recommended to us.

Is it known to you that the Cherokees, constantly, and without interruption, and sometimes a part of the Creeks, hunt on a large space of the best hunting grounds in America, containing at least from five to six millions of acres, which they have long since ceded, that is, the unsettled country between Virginia and Kentucky, and between Kentucky and Cumberland? This is an indulgence for which they ought to be thankful, instead of complaining, without a cause, of encroachments.

To conclude on this head, I declare that I have never heard, or been informed, of any complaints from the Cherokee nation, or any part or member thereof, against the Cumberland settlers, except the speech of the Little Turkey may be so understood.

Again you say: "The number of militia which you appear to have called into service, might probably, at the moment of danger, have appeared to be necessary, and justifiable by the occasion, but it is of the highest importance they should not have been in service any longer than circumstances render indispensable. This is a point to which I am directed to request your serious attention.

"But prior to the expected invasion in September, it has appeared, at this distance, that rather a greater force has been kept up than the danger rendered indispensable for defensive protection."

To the last paragraph, as it is first in point of time, I shall first reply. That you may perfectly understand the situation of Mero district, which this force was principally kept up to protect, I will give you a description of it.

The settlements of Mero district extend up and down the Cumberland river, from east to west, about eighty-five miles, and the extreme width, from north to south, does not exceed twenty-five miles, and its general width does not exceed half that distance, and, not only the country surrounding the extreme frontier, but the interior part (which is to be found only by comparison with the more exposed part) is covered generally with thick and high cane, and a heavy growth of large timber, and where there happens to be no cane, with thick underwood, which afford the Indians an opportunity of laying days and weeks in any and every part of the district, in wait near the houses, and of doing injuries to the inhabitants, when they themselves are so hid or secured that they have no apprehensions of injuries being done in return, and they escape from pursuit, even though it is immediate. This district has an extreme frontier of at least two hundred miles.

The protection of that district, the most difficult to protect in the Union, of its size, as well as every other part of the territory south of the Ohio, was confided to me by the President. This placed me between the Government and the people of the territory, answerable to the Government that I did not incur too great an expense in giving protection to the frontier inhabitants, nor yet suffer them to be killed or robbed of their property; and to the people themselves, who looked to me, from the nature of my appointment, that I should not suffer them to be murdered and robbed.

A recurrence to the list of killed and wounded, forwarded to your office with my letter of the 28th November, I trust, will afford sufficient evidence of the indispensable necessity for keeping up the force by me ordered prior to the invasion; and, comparing the protection given by the Federal Government, to the frontiers of Georgia, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, with the sufferings of their citizens, I conceived myself not only justified in giving the protection I did, to the frontiers of this territory, but that it was my indispensable duty so to do.

The greatest force ever afforded the exposed and suffering frontiers of Mero district, at one time, was two hundred and twenty-five. Besides the example of the protection given to the other frontiers by the Federal Government, and a knowledge of the sufferings of the people of Mero district, was the clamor of the people against the Government for not giving protection, which alone appeared to render the degree of protection I gave that district indispensable. I can truly say, all faith appeared to be lost in Government, until Sharpe's battalion was ordered into service.

If the observations, on the little use of block-houses, or stationary troops, are intended to point out the impropriety of my disposition of the troops ordered into service for the protection of Mero district, I beg leave to request your attention to my order to Major Sharpe, by which you will see, that the persons at the block-houses were directed to patrol and reconnoitre, &c. which was done for the protection of the frontiers; and, as a justification of my disposition of them, to inform you that it met the approbation of the people they were intended to protect. The block-houses were only intended as barracks for them, and to give an advanced situation from the frontier houses, from which they could range with more advantage than from the frontier-houses.

Morgan's and Nash's companies, who immediately preceded Sharpe's battalion in service, ranged from the frontier houses, and, it was believed, had not afforded so great a degree of protection, as they would have done from block-houses more advanced on the frontiers.

The necessity of a Major or field-officer, in preference of independent companies, was, that the troops were from Washington, altogether unacquainted with the frontiers of Mero district. Major Sharpe was of Mero district, and perfectly acquainted with the frontiers; and, besides, there appeared to me a necessity for such an officer, to pass from station to station, to see that the officers at the respective stations did their duty.

I come now to reply to the first paragraph; by which I understand, I am called upon to assign reasons for ordering and continuing in service the militia, commanded by Brigadier General Sevier. The time when ordered into service, and when discharged, I have already informed you; their greatest number, as appears by General Sevier's monthly report, was eight hundred and thirty. My reasons for ordering them into service were, that I had received authentic information, contained in the letters of the Little Turkey, other principal chiefs, the interpreters Thompson and Carey, and in the narratives of Jo. Deraque, and Richard Finnelson, that the five Lower Cherokee towns had declared war against the United States; that they would be joined by a large number of Creeks, and that, with their united force, they would immediately attack the frontiers of this territory, and that both were supported by the Spaniards.

My reasons for continuing them in service, were to give protection to the people of this territory, which had been confided to me, in their persons and property, against a numerous body of Indians, who had declared war against them, not only in words, in a more formal manner than Indians ever did, to my knowledge, before, but by a powerful invasion of a part of the territory, by at least seven hundred warriors, headed by the bold and enterprising John Watts, and by many other acts of hostility. Let it be supposed I had discharged the militia, and the party who had declared war, and from whom I had no right to expect any thing but war, had fallen on the unprotected citizens, should I not have deserved, and received, the heaviest censure of the Federal Government, and the execrations of the people?

It is a received opinion, that nothing inclines people at war more readily to peace, than a belief that the adverse party are also prepared; this afforded another reason, and, I trust, the effect will be found to justify the measure.

It will, no doubt, be observed, that General Sevier's brigade of militia is not equal to a regular regiment in numbers, consequently, that there must have been an over-proportion of officers. In reply to this I have to inform you, that the militia were called out under the militia-law of North Carolina, and I conceived it essential to form them into a brigade, otherwise I could not have had the services of General Sevier, whose name carries more terror to the Cherokees, than an additional regiment would have done.

I have the honor to be, &c.

LITTLE TALLASSEE, 30th July, 1791.

SIR:

I had the pleasure of your letter, by Captain Heth. The Little Turkey sent in a copy of the treaty, for my information; in return, I sent him a talk approving of the same, with some advice to have the same observed, and which will be given out in the beloved town of Estanaula, where a general meeting is to be held in next month.

I observe what you say respecting the establishment of a post on Bear creek. Such a measure would immediately give discontent to the Indians, as they would suppose it was a beginning of the intended settlements of the Georgia company; so, in my opinion, it had better be deferred for a time.

Young Thompson informs me of some conversation that happened between you, respecting his acting in a public capacity. He is of a considerable family, and well liked by the Turkey and his party. I therefore take the liberty of advising to put him in office.

I am, with respectful regard, &c.

KNOXVILLE, January 24th, 1793.

SIR:

I enclose you minutes of a conversation between Captain Handley and myself, as information respecting the strength and disposition of the five Lower towns of the Cherokees, and of the disposition of the Upper Creeks towards the Cumberland settlers. It appears, the party that attacked Captain Handley on the 23d day of November, on Cumberland mountain, on his way, with forty-two men of his company, to the district of Mero, there to act on the frontiers, for the defence thereof, consisted of fifty-six Cherokees, Creeks, and Northwards, mostly of the former, commanded by the Middle Striker, a signer of the treaty of Holston. They treated him very roughly, after their manner, until the thirteenth day of his captivity, when it was determined in council, at Will's town, on the third day of its sitting, that his life should be spared, and after, in a most brotherly manner, from the Lower to the Upper towns, he was escorted, by the Middle Striker himself, and eleven other warriors, who went from the Upper to the Lower towns for that purpose; to each of whom I have thought it good policy to give, at this critical time, four covers, a blanket, a shirt, a pair of leggins, a flap, and binding for the two latter. Watts committed his answer, to my letter of the 26th day of December, to an Indian who came up with Handley, with orders to deliver it to the Hanging Maw, and for the Maw to bring it to me, which, as yet, he has delayed to do, owing to his being too indisposed to ride. But, from the information I have received from Captain Handley, and Arthur Coody, who lives in the lower towns, and came with him, the same who was interpreter at the treaty of Hopewell, and before a British interpreter, and John Thompson, who is also here, I have the most sanguine hopes that the measures I have and shall take, will bring about a peace with the Cherokees. Coody agrees with Captain Handley in the account of one hundred and fifty Creeks having lately gone against Cumberland.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Minutes of a conversation between Governor Blount and Captain Handley, just returned from captivity among the Cherokees.

Governor Blount.—During your captivity with the Cherokees, in the Lower towns, did you become acquainted with John McDonald? *

Captain Handley.—Yes.

G. B.—Did you become acquainted with Alexander Campbell? †

C. H.—Yes.

G. B.—Did you experience any civilities and friendship, from both, or either?

C. H.—Yes, very great from both—all their situation admitted of.

G. B.—Do you suppose they wish peace with the United States?

C. H.—I am confident they both wish it.

G. B.—Did you hear both, or either of them, say, whether or not the Spanish officers had encouraged the Indians to go to war, or whether they gave them ammunition?

C. H.—They at first denied both; but afterwards, in conversation, they acknowledged they had learned that the Spanish Governor told them, that he did not bid them go to war; but, if they were imposed upon, then he would furnish them with arms, ammunition, and men, to recover their country to the old line—the line made by the British.

G. B. What do you suppose to be the numbers of the five Lower towns?

C. H. Messrs. McDonald, Campbell, and Adair, compute them at seven hundred, exclusive of old men; that Watts had had a list drawn, and that appeared to be the number.

G. B. Did they appear to be well armed?

C. H. Yes; taking them collectively, better than I ever saw the same number of militia men.

G. B. Have they any powder and lead in store?

C. H. Plenty.

G. B. From whence do you suppose they obtained their ammunition?

C. H. From the Spaniards, so they say.

G. B. Did you understand that the Indians had formed any companies of cavalry?

C. H. Yes; three companies.

G. B. Who commands them?

C. H. John Taylor and Will. Shory command two, the third I do not know.

G. B. Did you see any swords and pistols among them?

C. H. Yes; I saw some. The pistols and holsters were new, the swords were of the British dragoon kind.

G. B. During your captivity did you see or hear of any parties of Creeks passing through the nation, for war against Cumberland?

C. H. Yes; I heard of several, particularly one of 150 lately.

G. B. Was it understood in the Lower Towns, that the Creeks were at peace with the United States?

C. H. No; it was understood the Upper were at war with the United States.

G. B. Do you think Watts is sincere in his overtures for peace?

C. H. Yes; except as to Cumberland. It is my opinion that small parties of Creeks and Cherokees will continue to infest that district.

KNOXVILLE, February 1, 1793.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you a copy of my order to Lieutenant Colonel Kelly, of the 23d, of my proclamation of the 28th, and of a letter from Colonel White, of the 30th ultimo; by which you will be informed, that a second attempt has been made by a number of people to invade the Cherokee country, and the result.

Previous to the issuing the proclamation, great exertions were made by myself, and every influential character, public and private, that I could move on the occasion, not only at Gamble's, (where I was in person on the 27th) but in every other suspected part of the country, to prevent the people from collecting together; otherwise, there is abundant reason to believe, there would have been at Gamble's at least three hundred, instead of eighty or one hundred; and, admitting "a mistaken zeal to serve their country" had been the cause of their gathering, I am apprehensive they would not have dispersed before they had destroyed as many as they could of the Cherokee towns. I can * McDonald was a deputy superintendent under Colonel Brown, now certainly has a perfect knowledge of what the Spaniards say to the Cherokees, and possesses much of the confidence of the Lower towns.

† Campbell is an old British trader, who possesses a large share of the confidence of the Lower towns.

truly say, my feelings were never more agitated than they were on this occasion. I considered my reputation as an officer, in a great measure, the reputation of the country over which I have the honor to preside, and my prospects of returning peace, all at stake upon the event.

Besides giving orders to Colonel White to order out part of the infantry of his regiment, to act eventually in case the party persisted in their determination to invade the towns, I found it necessary to order a lieutenant of cavalry and fifteen men to range from Holston to Little river, on the frontiers. This destroyed one of their strongest arguments, "that they had no protection." Two such bold attempts to violate the existing treaty between the Cherokees and the United States, seem in strong terms to point out the propriety and necessity of some tribunal being established in this country for the trial of offenders against treaties. The judges of this territory have informed me they have no authority to try offenders of that description.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Order to Lieutenant Colonel Kelly.

KNOXVILLE, January 23, 1793.

Sir:

I have heard and lament the killing of Pate as much as any man. Captain Tedford informs me, the people in the neighborhood where he was killed, are so incensed, that they are determined to fall on the near towns, for, what is foolishly termed, satisfaction; the folly and ill consequences of such conduct must be evident to you. It would be punishing the innocent for the guilty; it would be bringing on a general war at a time when I have no force in the field, and when there is no provision to be had to support one, and will be a daring insult to Government, that must not go unpunished.

You, sir, on the receipt of this letter, will consider it as my order for proceeding without delay to Captain Joseph Tedford, and from thence to such place or places on the frontiers, as you shall judge most proper, to prevent any citizen or citizens of the United States, living on the frontiers, or elsewhere, from going with arms into any town or towns of the Indians, and from crossing the river Tennessee. You are, as a civil and military officer of the country, to forbid their crossing the Tennessee, or entering any Indian town. I intreat you, as you value peace, order, and the good of the people at large, and particularly of the party attempting to go into the nation, that you use your influence and authority to prevent them from going into the towns.

I am, &c.

By William Blount, Governor in and over the territory of the United States, South of the river Ohio:

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas I have received certain information, that a number of disorderly, ill disposed persons, are about to collect themselves together, with an intention to go into the Upper Cherokee towns, on the Tennessee, to destroy the same, and kill the inhabitants thereof, regardless of law, human and divine, and subversive of the peace and order of Government:

Now, I, the said William Blount, Governor in and over the said territory, do hereby command and require the above described persons, and every of them, immediately to desist from such their intention, and to disperse, and retire peaceably, to their respective abodes, within one hour from the moment of the promulgation of this proclamation: and I do, hereby, command them, and every of them, not to go within the limits of the country guaranteed to the said Cherokees by the treaty at Holston, which is in full force and use, as they will answer the contrary at their peril. And I do command all officers, civil and military, to exercise and exert that authority, with which, by law, they are vested, to prevent so daring a violation of the law, and of the existing treaty with the said Cherokee nation.

Given under my hand and seal, at Knoxville, in the said territory, this 28th day of January, 1793.

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

Letter from Lieutenant Colonel White to Governor Blount.

KNOXVILLE, January 30th, 1793.

Sir:

On the 28th instant I returned, agreeable to your order, to Gamble's station, accompanied by Lieutenant Colonel Kelly, Captain Singleton, and William Hamilton and John Hackett, justices of the peace; where I found a number of persons, from eighty to one hundred collected, well armed, and plentifully provided with corn for their horses, and provisions for themselves, avowing their determination to go and destroy as many Cherokee towns as they could, and declaring that they momentarily expected to be joined by a much larger number from different parts of the district of Washington, offering for reason, that people were frequently killed, and horses daily taken by Indians, while they were unprotected by the Federal Government, and not permitted to take any satisfaction. Upon Mr. McKee's arriving with your proclamation, I read it with a loud voice, to which great attention was paid, and no insult was offered, either to the Government, the proclamation, or the officers of Government: They did not disperse within an hour, as the proclamation required, but determined in the evening that they would, and on the morning of the 29th, actually did, and returned to their respective homes. It is a justice due to these people to inform your Excellency, that the greater part of them appeared to have assembled upon a mistaken zeal to serve their country, not foreseeing the consequences that would attend such conduct.

Pursuant to your order of the 25th, I found it necessary to call into service Captain Ewin's company of militia, to have acted eventually in case the party had persisted in their determination of invading the towns; but I am truly happy they did not, and believing they are returned home perfectly sensible of their error,

I have the honor to be, &c.

KNOXVILLE, February 12th, 1793.

Sir:

The enclosed list of depredations was received last night from General Robertson, of Mero district. They, in all probability, must have been committed by the Creeks, mentioned as having passed the Tennessee on their way to Cumberland, by Captain Handley, and no doubt aided by a part of the Lower Cherokees.

The General speaks in strong terms of the distress of the people of that district on the occasion, which I consider unnecessary to repeat, as it can as easily be conceived as expressed.

Since writing you on the 1st instant, I have despatched Mr. John McKee, a particular friend and acquaintance of Watts, to him, to stay with and about him, in order to use his influence to the establishment of peace; Mr. McKee stands also high in the esteem of the other chiefs of the Lower towns, and is a man from whom every thing may be expected by the Government, that can be expected from any man in such a character, and the better to enable him to succeed in the objects of his mission, I furnished him with some Indian articles, to be disposed of as from himself, to Watts and other leaders of the war party. To have given them directly from the Government would have appeared in the eyes of those who had behaved friendly, as a reward for murdering and stealing, and might encourage or provoke them to do likewise.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A list of murders and depredations committed by Indians, from the 16th to the 26th January, 1793, in the District of Mero.

16th.—Colonel Hugh Tinnan, badly wounded on the north side of Cumberland, not far from Clarksville.

18th.—Major Evan Shelby, brother of Governor Shelby, James Harris, and a negro of Moses Shelby's, killed, and a number of horses taken on the north side of the Cumberland, near the mouth of Red river.

19th.—Two boys fired on in a canoe on the Cumberland, near Clarksville, of the name of Davidson.

22d.—Captain William Overall and — Burnet killed on the track from Kentucky to Cumberland, at the Dripping spring. The flesh was cut from the bones of Overall and carried off; nine horses loaded with goods and whiskey, were taken at the same time. They were pursued as far as Cumberland river; without being overtaken.

24th.—A salt boat from Kentucky and a French pirogue, were fired on, on the Cumberland, at the mouth of Half pome. In the salt boat, killed Malachia Gaskins and David Crow; wounded John McLugen in five places; his life is despaired of. Robert Wells, his arm broke; St. Clair Pruet, shot through the knee; since dead. In the French boat, two killed and one mortally wounded.

26th.—Thomas Heaton and Anthony Bledsoe, son of Colonel Anthony Bledsoe, both shot through the body, but are yet living, on the north side of Cumberland, near Nashville.

KNOXVILLE, March 20th, 1793.

SIR:

The enclosed report, and information of James Carey, one of the interpreters of the United States for the Cherokees, and a copy of a letter from a Mr. Townsend, contain the last information I have received from the Creek and Cherokee nations. The information they contain, is of so important and alarming a nature, that I have judged it necessary to forward it to you express by Mr. Carey himself, who can more fully explain to you verbally, the grounds on which he has given his answers to my questions, than could possibly be done on paper.

Truth, in all inquiries, is hard to obtain, and, in none in which I have been engaged, so much so as in what respects Indians. Of all people, they use the most deception, and are greater masters of it; but Mr. Carey, from his long and intimate habits, understanding their language, and connexion with them, has a perfect knowledge of their present intentions, and from the many proofs I have had of his veracity and his firm attachment to the United States in preference of the Spaniards, although I have every reason to believe greater offers have been made him, induce me to pay full credit to what he says.

Enclosed, also, is a list of the murders committed near this place, on the 10th and 18th instant, and lately on the Kentucky road.

I have not heard from Cumberland, Mero district, since my letter to you of the 12th February, enclosing a list of murders and depredations, from the 16th to the 26th of January, a duplicate of which is enclosed.

My apprehensions for the unhappy, exposed, and too defenceless people of that district, founded on the information of Carey, on similar information respecting Cumberland from the Hanging Maw, on the delay of an express, (James Donelson) to return to me, and on the non-arrival of several parties who have been expected here, since the 25th of the past month, are very great, and truly distressing—I mean as to what they must have already suffered.

The two young men killed on the 19th, were no doubt killed by the party mentioned in Carey's answer to my 4th question. One of that party lives next door, neighbor to the Hanging Maw, within thirty miles of this place.

If there is a friendly Indian in the Cherokee nation to the United States, it is the Maw, and he is a very great beloved man. Yet, his next neighbor, with others of the nearest towns, have killed two innocent, unarmed young men, or rather lads.

This affords a strong proof, that the old men, who are, ostensibly, the rulers of the nation, have no real government over the young warriors.

These recent murders, committed on the frontiers of the counties of Jefferson and Knox, have induced, I may say compelled me, to order out rangers for the protection thereof. Notwithstanding which, several families have quitted their habitations and crossed the French Broad, and such as have not, are generally collected at stations or block-houses, for their common defence. In fact, such have been the fears of the frontier inhabitants, who, generally, from a variety of concurrent circumstances, understand the true disposition of the Indians, that they have not left the stations to which they collected, immediately after the declaration of war in September.

The compulsion to turn out rangers, beside the absolute necessity for defence, was the quieting the people, whose sense of injuries is such, that it is with the utmost difficulty they can be restrained from embodying, going and destroying the Cherokee towns, as many as may be in their power, and, particularly, about the time these murders were committed. John Tipton, heretofore Colonel of Washington county, was actually using his endeavors to raise a large party, for that purpose, and boasted that he should be joined by at least nine hundred. His rendezvous was Jonesborough, about seven miles from his own house, on the 10th instant, where only five men appeared. This so discouraged him, that he did not proceed towards the frontiers only a few miles. But, had he come on at this unfortunate moment, it is to be feared that he would have been joined by a number of the frontier people.

The judges, upon my causing proof to be made of the intentions of Mr. Tipton to disturb the peace and order of government, have issued a warrant for apprehending him, which is probably, before this, executed. They have also issued warrants against several other turbulent characters, who appeared to be engaged with him.

What is to be the future fate of the unhappy Cumberland settlers, judging from their past and the present impending danger, is a very serious question, not only to themselves; but to me, to whom their protection is confided.

My first step will be, to give Gen. Robertson notice of the danger that awaits the district, and the necessary orders for the best possible state of defence that the number of the militia and the exposed and dangerous frontier will admit of. And, should I not receive information, that the intended invasion is desisted from, I shall order a body of cavalry or mounted infantry from the district, to their relief, to rendezvous at Southwest Point, between the 10th and 15th of the ensuing month, and to march in such direction as to intercept the Indians on the track that leads from the Lower towns to Nashville, as they advance, or to pursue them so closely in their rear, to the Cumberland settlements, as to afford those distressed and much injured people relief.

At this time, I am informed of — Taylor's being killed this morning, at Pidgeon, Jefferson county, by Indians. Many guns were fired at him; so many, that those within hearing of them, thought the adjacent station had been attacked in force.

Before this reaches you, I presume Mr. Shaw will have arrived at Philadelphia, whose conduct will be placed in its due point of view to you, by the report of Mr. Carey, and such other information as he can give you touching his transactions since he left Philadelphia.

I shall also say something on that head in my own justification. When I received your letter, authorizing me to discharge him from the service of the United States, if he was guilty, as he had been charged to you, of inebriety and great want of prudence, he was at this place, and the contents of your letter was made known to him. He pled, that he was here among strangers, without money, without clothes, and without a horse, and, that the two latter were at Seneca, General Pickens', and assured me he would immediately return to this place. Motives, as they respected Mr. Shaw, which required a better return than he appears about to make, induced me to lend him a horse and twenty dollars, to enable him to regain his clothes and horse, and return to this place.

The next I heard from him, was a letter, of which you have enclosed a copy. Finding he had returned into the nation; and, that his father-in-law, a fellow called the Half-breed, of some consequence, was attached to him, as was natural enough, I thought it imprudent to remove him at so critical a time, and wrote him a letter of instructions on the 8th January, a copy of which you have also enclosed. The original was delivered him by Mr. Carey, as he will inform you.

Whether Mr. Shaw's conduct will prevent Mr. McKee from engaging a number of chiefs of the war party, to accompany me to Philadelphia, as you had instructed me, I cannot positively say, as I have not heard from him since his departure, but judging from his conduct, Mr. Carey's information, and the many recent murders and depredations, I conceive no hopes are to be entertained on that head.

I have the honor to be, &c.

I also enclose you a copy of my letter to Mr. Shaw, of the 7th February, the delivery of which can also be proved by Mr. Carey.

Report of James Carey to Governor Blount.

KNOXVILLE, March 19th, 1793.

SIR:

With your letter of the 8th January last, addressed to the head-men and warriors of the Cherokees, the Standing Turkey, the Big Fellow, the Warrior's Son, George Paris, and myself, proceeded to Estanaula, where the head-men of that part of the nation were assembled, and it was read and explained to them, and met their approbation. They also desired, as you had instructed me, that it should be forwarded to Watts, and the chiefs and warriors of the River towns, meaning the towns situate on the Tennessee. This gave a hope, that the nation would have come into the proposed measure of a conference.

Motives of preservation prevented my going with your letter to Watts, but George Paris, the Standing Turkey, the Big Fellow, the Nettle Carrier, the Warrior's Son, and the Broom, went with it, and met Watts at Willstown, where, for want of some person to read it, they could do nothing until Mr. Shaw came, after which, the letter was handed him to read, which was done, and explained to Watts, who appeared to be satisfied with the contents, as well as the young warriors, and all present. Shortly after, Watts asked Shaw, what he thought of Governor Blount's proposals? Shaw answered, that he did not know that the Indians had any right to go to Governor Blount, as he was only a servant of the United States, as he himself was, and, that he ought not to mind Governor Blount or his letters; that they had better apply to Congress, for he knew that the United States, as soon as they had heard rightly how Governor Blount had wronged them out of their lands, he was satisfied they would restore them to the Indians again, and send commissioners to run the line to their liking. If you go to treat with Blount, you will be as far from getting your lands as ever; but can't you see, how your father, the President, wants to treat with you? for times are so with Congress and foreign Powers, that they will treat with you on good terms, and restore you all your lands again.

Observe how much better the Lower Creeks are treated than you are; that is because they have got a good man to do for them; that is more than you have got; but this is still unknown to your father the President, who loves all his red children; therefore, I request you all not to treat with Governor Blount. You know I was sent here by your father the President, to do you justice, and justice you shall have, as far as in my power; I am sure Congress does not know how you are treated by Governor Blount, neither was the matter fully explained by the Bloody Fellow, and others, when they went to Philadelphia. See how Governor Blount has run the lines, without your knowledge, or being present; heretofore I could not act as I would have wished; Governor Blount prevented me, though I know my authority is as great as his; but I will no longer be controlled by him. I will go to Congress, and recover your lands for you, to the old line; which I can easily do, as the lines of Hopewell and Holston have never been run, and I will bring commissioners with me to run the old line. Upon this, Watts jumped up and took Shaw by the arm, saying, are you an officer among us all this time, and never before told us that our lands were recoverable to the old lines? Your offering is good to us, and we wish you to go to Congress and do it for us; although you are a stranger to us, and we to you, yet, if you do that for us, we will then take you by the hand as a brother for ever. Shaw then requested that they would be still during his absence, which would be seventy-five days, and do no injury to the citizens of the United States, but hold themselves in readiness; if he did not get that line, he would return to them, and share the same fate with them; that something must be done, and they ought to be in readiness for the purpose. Shaw told them they ought not to war with each other, for perhaps they would want each other's assistance when he returned; provided he could not recover the lands for them, they must then do the best they could; he would keep nothing hid from them, and would join them in protecting their country. Watts then gave him his word that nothing should be done during that time.

Watts then commissioned the Broom, as ambassador from himself and the Lower towns, to go with Shaw to Estanaula, and consult with the Badger and other chiefs there, as to the place where the line should be. When they came to Estanaula, Shaw opened the council, telling them that Watts was opposed to treating with Governor Blount, and urged them to be also of that opinion, mentioning the Governor's running the line, as cause of the inducement thereto; to which they also agreed, and described the old line to Mr. Shaw, which he has in writing, and taken with him to the Secretary of War, and to which I subscribed as interpreter.

It is a justice due to the Indians, who accompanied me, to inform you, that they entered on the business of their mission with great zeal and warmth, and expressed in strong terms in council their disapprobation of Mr. Shaw's advice and conduct, and urged the Indians to pursue the wish and proposed plan of Governor Blount, as more advantageous to their nation. The King Fisher, Captain Dick, the Old Prince, and Captain George Miller, joined them in this opinion. They accompanied me as far as Chota, and would have come to this place, had not the recent murders excited an apprehension of danger to their persons from the frontier inhabitants. They will wait at Chota, until they hear from you in expectation of the promised rewards for their services.

I am, sir, &c.

Information by James Carey, one of the interpreters of the United States in the Cherokee nation, to Governor Blount.

KNOXVILLE, March 20, 1793.

1. Governor Blount.—Have you heard, or do you know of any parties of Cherokees, or Creeks, going lately to Cumberland, to kill or steal?

James Carey.—Yes, both; since the 25th February, as many as five parties, one from the Running Water, of eight Cherokees, and six or seven Creeks; another from Long Island village, of Cherokees and Creeks, the number not particularly known, not exceeding sixteen; two other parties from the Look-out, of five Cherokees each; the fifth headed by Tuckalateague or Double Head, consisting of a number not certainly known, but there were eight from Cusawatee, and the remainder from the Look-out.

2. G. B.—Have you heard of any other parties being about to go to Cumberland for war?

J. C.—I have heard, and believe it is true, that forty Creeks had arrived at Will's town, thirteen days past, on their way against Cumberland; and I saw and heard of several small parties, consisting of from three to six, going to that quarter.

3. G. B.—Do you suppose these Creeks will be joined by any Cherokees?

J. C.—There is reason to believe they will.

4. G. B.—Have you heard, or do you know of any Indians, Creeks or Cherokees, intending to commit murders, or steal horses from the district of Washington?

J. C.—Yes, I know that nine Cherokees passed the Tennessee at Coyattee on Sunday last, the friends of the Buck and Black Fish, who were killed at their attack on Byram's station, declaring they were going for satisfaction for the Buck, and the Black Fish; that they would take hair and horses from the frontiers, towards Clinch, and proceed on and join the Northern nations for war.

5. G. B.—In what town did these nine fellows live?
J. C.—Three are from Hiwasee, one the next door neighbor to the Hanging Maw, one from Toquo, and the others from Chilhowee.
6. G. B.—Did you hear of no other party?
J. C.—Fourteen Cherokees lately passed the Tennessee at Chestowee, declaring their determination to take hair and horses on the frontiers of Washington district, and on the Kentucky trace, and proceed on and join the Northern tribes in war.
7. G. B.—From what part of the nation were these fellows?
J. C.—Part of them from Coosawattee, some from Hightower, Salicoe, and Long Swamp or Newtown.
8. G. B.—Have you heard or been informed of any Creeks coming against the district of Washington, and what part?
J. C.—The head-man of Hiwasee informed me, that four had passed just before me, intending to take horses and hair on the head waters of the Little river, Knox county.
9. G. B.—Do you know who killed James and Thompson Nelson, on Pigeon, in Jefferson county, on the 10th instant?
J. C.—The party consisted of six or seven Cherokees, headed by Towaka, of Nickajack, and the Breath's nephew, the same who killed Richardson's family, near that place, in January last, at whose house they left the war club now in your office.
10. G. B.—Do you know, or have you heard, who it was that killed two people near the Dripping spring, on the road from Kentucky to Cumberland, in January last? They had with them whiskey and other articles, which the Indians who killed them took; the two persons above named, are Captain Overall, and ———.
- J. C.*—Yes, Double-head, and Bob Bengé, the Red-headed half breed, nephew to Watts, and other Cherokees.
11. G. B.—I have heard, that when Double-head, Bob Bengé, and others, carried the scalps of these two people into the nation, that war dances were held at several towns. Is it true?
J. C.—It is true, first at the Look-out Mountain, then at Will's town, and lastly at the Turnip Mountain, as there were fellows of the party from each of those towns.
12. G. B.—If the inhabitants of the towns in which these war dances were held, had been opposed to war, or disposed sincerely for peace, would they permit war dances to be held in them in the manner these were held?
J. C.—No, they would not.
13. G. B.—There has been a number of murders and depredations committed in the month of January last, on Cumberland, besides the killing of Captain Overall.
J. C.—I know that a white man and a negro were killed at a hunting camp, by Cherokees of the Running Water, and that other scalps, and five negroes, have lately been brought into the Lower towns, by Cherokees.
14. G. B.—Do you know, or have you heard of any horses being lately brought into the nation, I mean such as you suspect to be stolen from Cumberland or Kentucky, by Creeks or Cherokees?
J. C.—Yes, I do. They may both, with great truth, be said to be in the daily practice of horse-stealing, from those countries.
15. G. B.—In what manner do the Indians dispose of stolen horses?
J. C.—Generally they sell them to the traders for a trifle, who run them out of the nation in a different direction to that from whence they came, and barter them off for negroes, or articles of merchandise.
16. G. B.—Do you know, or have you heard, in what manner the Creeks received the Shawanese ambassadors, meaning the nine fellows, and the white man who passed the Lower Cherokee towns?
J. C.—The Creeks have built a new square, in honor of them, to receive their talks, and mean to introduce them into it, on their backs.
17. G. B.—In what part of the Creek nation is this new square said to be erected; is it in the Upper or Lower Creeks?
J. C.—In the Lower, near a town called the Broken Arrow.
18. G. B.—Have you heard whether the Shawanese have given out their public talks to the Creeks, or when they will do it?
J. C.—From the best information I have received, they were to deliver them on the 7th or 8th instant, at the new square.
19. G. B.—From what you have heard of their conduct, since they have been among the Creeks, what do you suppose will be the object of their public speeches?
J. C.—To excite the Creeks generally for war against the United States, particularly against Cumberland.
20. G. B.—Is it yet expected by the Cherokees, that these Shawanese will return through their nation, and hold a public council?
J. C.—Yes, that is agreed on, and will take place in sixteen or seventeen days from this time at farthest, probably at Will's town.
21. G. B.—Have you heard any intimations from the Cherokees, as to the probable objects of the Shawanese, in holding the council with them?
J. C.—Yes, to lay a plan for a general war against the United States, and to commence it by a powerful attack upon the Cumberland settlements.
22. G. B.—From your general knowledge of, and long acquaintance with, the Cherokees, do you believe, if that should be the proposal of the Shawanese, that they, the Cherokees, will accede to it, and go heartily into the war?
J. C.—Yes, I verily believe that the whole of the Lower towns, and the young warriors of the nation, generally, will.
23. G. B.—What did the Cherokees say, when they were informed from me, that the Northwards had determined to treat with the United States this summer, and that a number of their chiefs had arrived at Philadelphia, on a visit to the President of the United States?
J. C.—That it was a lie; and immediately dispatched five warriors to the Northern tribes, to inquire into the truth, who are to be back by the first hoeing of corn.
24. G. B.—Have you heard any thing of the disposition and determination of the Upper Creeks, as they respect the United States?
J. C. I saw at Estanaula a Natchez warrior, who lives in the Upper Creeks, in company with several Creeks, about thirteen days past, and conversed with him fully on that subject; (he spoke Cherokee.) He said the Upper Creeks had held a council shortly before his departure, and had determined to march in great force against Cumberland, in such time as to arrive there about the full of the ensuing moon, (26th of April) that they would pass through the Cherokees, and expected to be joined by a large party of the Cherokees in the invasion of that country; giving, for reason, that they were going to take satisfaction for the injuries sustained at the attack and repulse at Buchanan's station, in September last, and that, in the mean time, small parties would be continually out on that quarter, for mischief.
25. G. B.—What credit did you pay to such information?
J. C.—I verily believed it.
26. G. B.—I have heard that the Upper Creeks have lately sent a war club to the Lower Cherokee towns. Is it true?
J. C.—Yes it is, and now it remains at the Running Water.
27. G. B.—Did you understand in what manner this club was received by the Lower towns?
J. C.—With gladness; saying they would take hold of it, join the Creeks in war, and would take it with them to Cumberland.
28. G. B.—Have you heard any thing from the Lower Cherokees, since their conference with Seagrove, at St. Mary's?
J. C.—Nothing, except their having built a new square for the reception of the Shawanese ambassadors.

29. G. B.—What do you think as to the disposition of John Watts—is he for peace, or war, with the United States?

J. C.—In my opinion, he will not oppose the wish of the young men, who undoubtedly generally wish a war; and rather than lose his consequence and influence with them, will join and lead them to war.

30. G. B.—Have you heard what is the disposition and determination of the Northern tribes towards the Cumberland settlers?

J. C.—I verily believe, that they mean, if the Creeks and Cherokees will join them, to cut off the whole of those settlers this summer.

31. G. B.—Do you know, or can you conjecture, the cause for attacking the Cumberland settlers with such vengeance?

J. C.—All parties claim it as their hunting grounds; and say these people are in their way, and interrupt their communication with each other, and that they are determined to destroy them, and seize their property.

32. G. B.—Have you heard the Indians ever say, what they supposed were the reasons why the United States so patiently and tamely bore the injuries they had done them, without retaliation?

J. C.—Yes, often; they suppose that the United States must be so situated with foreign Powers, that they dare not enter into a war with them, or they certainly would not be offering and begging peace, in return for murders, bloodshed, and robbery, daily committed on their citizens. This, say they, convinces us of the truth of what the Spaniards have told us, that the United States had not money to carry on a war, and that we need not fear to do them injuries.

33. G. B.—I have heard that the Northern tribes, while the Bloody Fellow, yourself, and others, were at Philadelphia, sent to the Cherokees the war hatchet—was it true?

J. C.—Yes, it was.

34. G. B.—What has become of it?

J. C.—When we returned from Philadelphia, it was at Estanaula, and the Kingfisher, fully impressed with peaceful sentiments towards the United States, destroyed it.

35. G. B.—In what light have the Cherokees viewed this act?

J. C.—Highly censured it, and, since the arrival of the Shawanese ambassadors, a new one has been ordered to be made, as near like the one destroyed as possible, and is completed, and is now at the Running Water, to be produced to the Shawanese ambassadors on their return, as an evidence of their disposition to join them in war.

36. G. B.—Have you heard any thing of a war between the Creeks and the Chickasaws?

J. C.—Yes, there was a talk of it, and they have killed of each other, but I believe they are about to make it up; the better informed of the Creeks and Cherokees, foreseeing the danger of such a war, interposed to put a stop to it.

37. G. B.—Have the Bloody Fellow, John Taylor, Fool Charles, the Bold Hunter, and the Breath, returned from their visit to the Spanish Governor at New Orleans?

J. C.—They have not, but Moses Price, who went with them, is, and he reports that they, at the request of the Governor, are returning through the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and, that the Bloody Fellow has with him a commission of superintendent, for Mr. McDonald.

38. G. B.—From your long acquaintance with the Cherokees, and knowledge of their dispositions, manners, and customs, and their present disposition towards the United States in competition with the British and Spanish Governments, do you believe, if the United States were to give up the land, (their land as they term it) to the old British line, that it would induce them to desist, for six months, from killing the frontier inhabitants?

J. C.—I believe, verily, it would not. No price, in my opinion, would induce them to desist from assisting the Northern tribes, if they continue the war with the United States.

39. G. B.—What can have raised the Cherokees to such a degree of insolence and hostility with the United States?

J. C.—The promised support of the Spaniards, the expected support of the British, and the victories obtained by the Northern tribes, over the armies of the United States, in which numbers of their nation have acted their part, and returned, boasting their feats.

40. G. B.—I have heard that some Cherokees were engaged in the attack upon Major Adair, near fort St. Clair; do you know whether it is true or not?

J. C.—It is true. I saw two of them who had returned to the nation; they say it is nothing to fight white people in regimentals—they are such men as Grant brought many years ago against the Cherokees.

JAMES CAREY.

KNOXVILLE, March 20, 1793.

Jacob Townshend to Governor Blount.

ESTANAULA, February 15, 1793.

By these, I can assure you, that every thing seemed favorable in the Creek nation, in respect to the United States. A firm peace was agreed upon by the whole of the Lower towns, and a Virginia man became a favorable character, and would have remained so, had not the Shawanese chiefs arrived, and made it to the reverse, by their designing insinuations; their great talks as yet are a mystery to the world, but will be given out in public in the full of this moon, and if the most strenuous and early steps are not taken to confound their designs, I fear they will be attended with the most dangerous consequences to the frontiers of the United States. The Upper Creeks, by the bad management either of the superintendent or his express-carrier, were not in due time invited to the treaty, therefore never appeared, and felt themselves a little neglected by that piece of disappointment, will both be a handle for those ambassadors and Spaniards, whose bad talks have been the cause of all the bloodshed on the frontiers; for their superintendent, without any reserve, told the Indians to go and shed blood. The particulars of their talks may be procured for you, if you wish to have them collected, and you may depend that they are insufferable, and ought to be resented by the injured and bleeding States, who, it appears to me, are afraid of the consequence that might attend public retaliation; but if this be really the case, it would be easy to take a private one, by the following opportunity, and it would be done with a trifling expense, viz: there is a character that was the fictitious General Bowles' Captain, who, let the Spaniards do what they will, or say what they will, he contradicts, and keeps Bowles' party still ripe for satisfaction; he by no means is an enemy to the States, neither does he take any step towards their prejudice, but rather wishes to get in their favor; and, would some man of distinction give him a little encouragement, with a little assistance, and promise him an asylum, he would fall upon them immediately, and that would be the means of their attention being drawn from doing the States any injury for some years. This, you may depend, might have been completed long ago, if the superintendent at St. Mary's would have taken a broad hint. This character I have been mentioning, is a man of good opportunity, and, undoubtedly, a man of trust; for, since General Bowles was judaised by the Spaniards, he has had his letters and papers in possession, which the Spaniards and Panton have taken every method, both of bribe and entreaty, to get from him, but all their efforts have been in vain. The person's name is Willbanks. He is now down at Oakalocknea, on the sea-board of West Florida, a-building houses to receive goods brought in British bottoms, for the supply of the Creek nation; has hoisted a standard of English and Indian colors mixed, which he has been supplied with for that purpose, but by whom, it is as yet a secret; but this far is certain, that he is constantly receiving packets from the Bahamas, which he tells the Indians are from their Great Father over the water, which has so far influenced the Indians in his favor, that the Spaniards are alarmed, and know not what to be at. His proceedings at the present, make a great noise, and puzzle the greatest politicians, to think what is coming upon the carpet. Even McGillivray; about a month ago, demanded Bowles' papers, but he gave him so satisfactory an answer, that I believe he was sorry he had made such a demand. However, let his plan be what it will, he undoubtedly is a sworn enemy to those Spaniards, who, I believe, are the last of the Lord's creation, and will at any time, let the consequence be what it will, take any step to help the Lord away with them, or to drive them on the west side of the river Mississippi; for, among rational beings, they ought not to live. These, and the like, will ever be the sentiments of your Excellency's unknown humble servant,

JACOB TOWNSHEND.

His Excellency WILLIAM BLOUNT.

N. B. There is an absolute demand made upon General McGillivray. The question is, will or will you not fill the commission given you by the United States? When the letter arrived, he was absent; the answer is not yet made, but I was informed by his friends, that he intends resigning every commission, and retiring to private life. If so, something must be done in time by the States.

On the back of the foregoing letter is endorsed as follows:

KNOXVILLE, March 20, 1793.

Upon inquiry, I find Mr. Townshend, the signer of this letter, to be an Englishman, about four years in America, and the last six months a resident among the Creeks, at a town called New York, at the house of Steven Sullivan, a man who perfectly understands the Creek language. Mr. Townshend carried his goods into the Creek nation from St. Mary's.

WM. BLOUNT.

A list of murders and depredations committed on the frontiers of Jefferson and Knox counties, in Washington district.

February 26.—The Indians stole ten head of horses from Cozby's creek, in Jefferson county, from William McKissack and Peter Every.

March 9.—James Nelson and Thompson Nelson, (brothers,) were killed and scalped by Indians, on Little Pigeon, about twenty-five miles from this place. The Indians had formed an ambuscade, on a path near Mrs. Nelson's house. These young men were struck by eight balls, from which it is conjectured there were that number of Indians, at least, and was headed by a fellow called Towahka, who also headed the party that killed Richardson's family.

March 18.—Two young men by the name of Clements, were killed and scalped about sixteen miles below this place, by nine Cherokees from the Upper towns. These young men had just left their father's house, unarmed, in search of cattle. They likewise carried off twelve head of valuable horses, the property of Captain Amos Byrd.

March 20.—On Pigeon, in Jefferson county, thirty miles from this place, — Taylor was fired on and killed, by a party of Indians, who had formed an ambuscade on a path he was travelling, near a station. The number of guns fired by the Indians at that time, was such as to induce the people out of the station to believe it was an attack by a powerful party.

On the Kentucky road, in an early part of the month of March, a man and woman were killed, and a child taken prisoner, supposed to be done by the Cherokees.

Taken from Lowe's station, about twelve miles from this place, about the 19th instant, two horses, which were enclosed in a pen, within three or four poles of the door, by Indians.

Governor Blount to Leonard D. Shaw.

KNOXVILLE, January 8, 1793.

SIR:

My public address to the head-men and warriors of the Cherokees, of this date, will show you the spirit and wishes of the United States: I have only to instruct you, to act in conformity thereto. I shall expect to see you at the appointed time and place of meeting, namely, at Southwest Point, on the 17th day of April. James Carey's endeavors in favor of the Cherokees, deserve their particular notice and thanks, and so you will please represent him to them. Speak to James Vann, and tell him, I depend on his exertions to restore peace and good order, which is the earnest wish of the United States.

I am, &c.

Leonard D. Shaw to Governor Blount.

SIR:

When I left Knoxville last, I expected to have been back in about three weeks; but, several circumstances, that I shall now relate, put it out of my power to fulfil my intentions. I had to perform a tedious journey of two hundred and fifty miles, over the Bald mountain, before I reached Seneca. Just before my arrival, the Georgians had committed their first murder, which, together with their subsequent exploits, rendered it madness to think of visiting the nation. I employed myself as actively as I could, in endeavoring to deter the insurgents from such conduct in future, and was not sparing in denouncing the vengeance of the United States against them. I was supported by the most respectable characters, and, for the purpose abovementioned, spent a considerable time on the frontiers of Georgia. On my return, I despatched an Indian into the nation, with letters from General Pickens and myself, at the same time ordering him to bring out my horse and some of my clothes, that I had left at Allejoy. On the return of my messenger, I received intelligence that a runner was on the road from Estanaula, with letters from the Indians, that I afterwards, on perusal, found contained suspicions respecting my dismission, that ought not to be suffered to remain. The letter I will shew you when convenient; the Indians pressed my return, and I flattered myself that it might have a happy tendency, in keeping the people on the frontiers more quiet. Besides, I could think of no plan so eligible to return your horse, as taking him through the nation. About this time, likewise, I was informed of General McGillivray's return, and I instantly resolved to visit him, let the danger be what it would. The Charleston papers had given information of the pacific state of the Creeks, and that three ships, loaded with goods, had ascended the St. Mary's. I then found I had been every way unfortunate in my communications, and (if possible) felt my feelings more particularly hurt, from the last idea, than even the communication you made me. To inquire into the affairs of the Creeks, has for a long time been my favorite idea; now, that I have it in my power, and my official veracity is called in question, go I certainly will. I thought proper to give the negative to the idea circulated amongst the Indians, that I was broke; on that point I shall make no comments—my motives will readily suggest themselves to your Excellency.

It is my intention to return to Philadelphia, as soon as I possibly can; but I shall certainly see you before I go; when I do, I fancy you will be satisfied of the propriety of my conduct. I shall endeavor to acquire an accurate knowledge of every thing necessary to be known, respecting the Creeks, the Spaniards, and Bowles. My journal you shall see. My situation is distressing, to a degree you can form no idea of. I rush into danger to avoid disgrace, and feel that sullen kind of courage that makes a person despise life, and ardently desire some honorable occasion to throw it away. How I came into my present situation I will not pretend to determine, and long, long could I wish to defer the discussion; but, when once engaged in it, I hope I shall discover integrity and firmness, if not ability, or strict prudence. I thank you, again and again, for the kindness I experienced from you when last at Knoxville, and, I assure you, I have suffered not a little, from the idea of abusing it, by detaining your horse so long; but, I believe you will suffer my situation to plead my excuse. Should I never return from the Creeks, be so good as to communicate the motives of my journey to the Secretary of War, lest malice and ill nature, which have so severely persecuted me, should subject me to unmerited censure, by ascribing motives to me foreign to my heart. Mr. Carey will tell you the news. Your horse, I expect will, by him, be returned. I hope he will arrive safe; I assure you I took much pains to keep him in order.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor Blount to Leonard D. Shaw.

KNOXVILLE, February 7, 1793.

SIR: Peace with the Cherokees, is the object of the United States, as I have before informed you, and, I repeat again, use your efforts to that object. Mr. McKee comes in with Thompson, with letters, on his way to the Lower towns, who will be able to render some assistance in the restoration of peace and order, as Watts has much confidence in him. The enclosed proclamation will inform you how the President thinks of the destruction of the Cherokee town, by the Georgians, and the difficulty I have experienced in restraining the people of this quarter from committing a similar outrage.

I am, &c.

KNOXVILLE, March 23d, 1793.

SIR: Yesterday my expected express, James Donelson, returned from Cumberland; his delay was owing to the waters of that river being very high, for many days nine feet above what was ever heretofore known, by whom I received a letter from General Robertson, of the 12th instant, and a letter of the 13th February, from the whole of the chiefs of the Chickasaw nation, copies of which you have enclosed, together with a list of murders and depredations committed in Mero district, from the 1st of February, to the 12th of March.

Three Chickasaws started with James Donelson, to come on to this place; one arrived with him, and two lost their horses at Bledsoe's station, who will probably be up in a few days.

The object of their visit to me, is to obtain a supply of a part of the articles mentioned in their letter of the 13th February, and to know from me, in decided terms, what part the United States mean to take in the war against the Creeks; and, as I am without the honor of your instructions on that head, I shall endeavor to detain them at my house until I shall receive such as you may please to give.

The Chickasaw who is with me, gives the following particulars of the cause of the war against the Creeks. Four Chickasaws were in the hunting grounds fifteen miles from the towns, where a party of Creeks fired on them, and killed one, and, besides scalping him, as is usual, they very much hacked and mangled his body, and threw it into a pond of water.

The Chickasaws immediately called a national council, and, on the fourth day, which was the 13th February, unanimously determined to make war against the Creeks, and Tatholah, or the confidant of the Mountain Leader, the same that was with me last spring, on the 14th, marched in search of the Creeks, with forty warriors.

The hacking and mangling the body, is ever intended as an insult to the nation of whom the deceased was.

At this council, the Bloody Fellow, John Taylor, and the Bold Hunter, Cherokee chiefs, on their return from Orleans, were present, and endeavored, with all their address, both by persuasion and threats, to prevent the Chickasaws from their declaration of war, to which the Mountain Leader, in one of his replies "desired them to desist; that he was so determined on war, that his very breath was bloody; that they might go home, and join the Creeks, if they chose it, as he supposed they would, for he knew they had both long been at war with his friends, the people of the United States, though they pretended peace and friendship."

Should Government give the Chickasaws the supplies they ask, for themselves and Choctaws, it will be observed they wish them delivered at the Chickasaw Bluff, on the Mississippi, and the best conveyance to the Bluff will certainly be down the Ohio, in preference to the Tennessee.

If the Cherokee chiefs do not agree to go to Philadelphia, of which I have no hope, I shall feel myself at liberty to come on to Philadelphia, under the condition contained in your order for me to come on, in case they did.

I wish much to see you, and to have the honor of a personal interview with the President. I could certainly explain more fully the state of Indian affairs, and of the government committed to my charge, than I can, otherwise, possibly do.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Robertson, dated

NASHVILLE, MERO DISTRICT, March 12th, 1793.

SIR: When I had the pleasure of receiving your Excellency's letter and orders, there was great need for the additional protection your Excellency had permitted.

I have ordered out a company, including those I mentioned before, for one month; if the times seem favorable, I shall dismiss them, and order no more into service until there should be particular need.

I shall strictly observe your Excellency's orders to save expenses in Indian affairs.

The people of this district were much dissatisfied on hearing that a treaty with the Lower towns of Cherokees was on hand, well knowing no faith is to be placed in any assurances they will or can give. They consider themselves as in an actual state of war, and daily feel the effects, whatever may be said of peace elsewhere. But their spirits are much raised, supposing that, if the Chickasaws and Choctaws are assisted and supported, that the Creeks will have sufficient business to do at home, and policy will direct them to let us alone, at least until peace takes place between them and the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and, I suppose, these two nations may accomplish that at any time, if they will join in war against the United States.

I cannot suppose the Creeks will ever behave as friends, otherwise than Mr. Seagrove observes in his publication in the Georgia papers, that nine-tenths are desirous of peace, which is, in other words, a kind of war that is most to be dreaded. I do not doubt that Mr. Seagrove had sanguine hopes that the nine-tenths he spoke of, would govern the other one-tenth, for I know those kind of people are capable of deceiving any stranger, be their abilities as they may.

Your Excellency will find by the enclosed, that the Chickasaws and Creeks are actually at war; they, the Chickasaws, make no doubt but the United States consider the Creeks as enemies, hearing so many scalps and horses have been taken by them last fall and winter.

From the best information, the Creeks have done us the greatest injuries, and we are yet so apprehensive of hourly receiving death from their hands, that we venture out of doors with great caution.

I hope the Chickasaws and Choctaws will be supported, as I have told them, at all times, that the President did not desire them to war with any nation; but I believed he would not let them suffer by being friends. Such speeches I have often made, in the time I knew other nations were importuning them to join in a general war, and, I have not the smallest doubt, could the Chickasaws and Choctaws have been persuaded to have joined, but all the Indians between the Mississippi and the Apalachian mountain, would have been at war with the United States. Bob Thompson, his son, and a fellow called Colbert's uncle, is directed by the chiefs to visit your Excellency, and give assistance in taking down such articles as you may think proper to send. Piahacha, and five others, stay at my house until I hear from your Excellency. Piahacha is a chief, and is to conduct the corn down; they insist to have one white man in each boat, and, at least, they must have three boats. I have let them have six hundred bushels before; if they should want a hundred or two more than I have, I wish to know whether I have your Excellency's permission to purchase. I can get of the merchants at one third of a dollar per bushel; I shall not do it if I can well get over it. The public boats were all taken off and lost, in the time of our being invaded, except two. I must give corn, or purchase otherwise; as to the salt, I think they are extravagant; your Excellency will direct that; I have engaged six bushels, at four dollars and one half per bushel, to send by the corn boats, and, as tobacco is cheap, without your Excellency forbids, I shall send it.

Two white men came in with these Chickasaws; one is at my house, John Burrell, who says that the four days the Chickasaws were in council on war, or to take other steps, that all the traders, and two men from the Spanish Government, with letters, were courting their friendship, and promising them corn, to be brought up the Yazoo, and endeavored to prevent war, but could not get it effected. They unanimously refused receiving corn, as they said their friends, the Americans, had, and would let them have corn, and every thing they stood in need of. Burrell saw the Bloody Fellow of the Cherokees, and another old chief, and a half-breed that spoke English, then on their way from Orleans. The half-breed told said Burrell, that the Spanish Governor was a good man, and had given the Cherokees land on the Washataw river, which is a fork of Red river, emptying in the Mississippi above New Orleans, on the west side. This intended settlement is above Natchez, and some distance southwest from Ozark.

The Bloody Fellow is promised that a batteau shall meet the Cherokees at the mouth of Tennessee river, with arms and ammunition, and pilots to carry them to the new settlements. I have my suspicions, they will give us a heavy blow on their departure.

It is said by a Frenchman, lately from New Madrid, that two thousand troops are expected there this spring.

As the Indians here, are directed to stay until I hear from your Excellency, perhaps you can send me an answer and directions soon. I hope your Excellency will have it in your power to send arms and ammunition to the Choctaws, as well as the Chickasaws, as that will convince them they may be supplied.

The Spaniards have furnished the Choctaws with corn; yet I understand they speak well of the United States, and that Ben James hath taken an active part in favor of the United States.

The Chickasaws are jealous there is a design to fix a garrison at the mouth of the Tennessee, or in some place above, as repeated applications have been made to them by the Spanish Government, to obtain their permission for such an establishment. The Mountain Leader is determined to take the batteau, if in his power. The Spaniards sent him a horse and saddle, to induce him to visit them; but he, at all times, has refused to any connexion with them; he has sent by Piahacha, desiring me to ask your Excellency for two good rifles; one for himself, and the other for his son, as he cannot visit the President as soon as he expected. I have bought one swivel and three blunderbusses, to send down with the corn boats, likewise a plough, cleivisses, and other irons, necessary to send to George Colbert, one quarter cask of powder, a pot, skillet, and two axes, to send down with the boats, as they applied for some to cook in; the chief, a hat and two shirts; those that go to you, hats and some other things. I have sent the whole account in, and promised those who come to you, that you will give them clothing as much as they want. I have bought for them two horses to ride, and directed that they be delivered to you. They are young, and I expect will sell for the money, or near it, if you have not use for public horses. The account is high, but I knew not how to get over it. I have engaged for forty gallons of whiskey to send down, at one half dollar per gallon.

The Chickasaw Chiefs to General Robertson.

CHICKASAW NATION, February 13th, 1795.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I received a letter from you some time ago, when you mentioned to me and other head-men, to caution our young warriors not to regard the threats or persuasion of the Creeks, in warring with the United States.

You said the President well knew his friends, and would not let them suffer. On that account, I am, my brother, now sending you an answer.

Our talks always was, to love and esteem one another.

We heads have held you fast by the hand, and told our young warriors they must do so, and they will, as long as they are able to lift a hatchet. From the friendship we have experienced, you have spoke well.

I have sent you a war club; when we both take hold, we can stike a hard blow.

Although we wish to be at peace with all, the Creeks have spilt our blood, and we desire you will despatch expresses to every head-man in America, particularly to General Washington, the Secretary of War, Governor Blount, and the head-men at Kentucky, on fort Washington, and General Pickens, to let them know that our agreement was to be as one man, in regard to our enemies and friends; that, if one was struck, the other was to feel the blow, and be one cause.

My Brother, you must know it is on your account that we are struck, for the last talk sent to us by the Creeks, when we told them we were perfect friends with the United States, and would listen to no talk of war against them; their answer was, the Virginians were liars, and no dependence in them; that the Chickasaws were fools not to join all other Indians to cut off the Virginians, and that the Chickasaws would know their error before long, as they, the Creeks, and Northwards, would fall on them, then let the Virginians, your great friends, help you; you will see what they can do. But all their talk did not alter the minds of our people.

When you get this talk, speak strong to your young warriors, and let us join, to let the Creeks know what war is.

You make whiskey: If war, it is good to take a little at war talks; please send me some, and I will do the same, as the red people that have long been at war with yours, have struck ours on your account.

I hope, my brother, we shall now find what you have always told us, true.

I believe the Choctaws will join us, and hold you and us fast by the hand. I have sent to them. The Creeks have killed several of their Virginians among them.

We are now standing in the middle of a great blaze of fire.

When you receive this, I hope you will be as expeditious as possible to give us assistance, as red people are not long preparing for war.

We have not ammunition enough, neither have the Choctaws; therefore, if you can send a supply immediately, we desire you will do it, likewise guns for the Choctaws, as there are many of their young men have none. Such as muskets, rifles, and smooth-bores, will do; and flints we want, six swivels, ten blunderbusses; as it is now a war, I desire you will now send a blacksmith and tools, to keep our guns in order, likewise a bombardier to work our swivels.

When you receive this, we desire you will send an express to General Washington, to let him know that we are now at war with the Creeks, and the path is now stopped from our traders; as we were very scantily furnished with stores of war before, therefore I hope he will find means to send us goods, or furnish our traders, so that the Creeks may be disappointed, otherwise we soon shall be naked, and more in their power.

As we made no crop last year, we are all in a starving condition. I hope you will send a further supply of fifteen hundred bushels of corn, two barrels of flour, about one hundred bushels of salt, one hogshead of tobacco, fifty bags of vermillion, which is fifty pounds, as it is greatly wanting in war.

Please to send me some whiskey by the boats.

George Colbert gives his compliments to General Robertson, and desires that he will send him a good plough and one bushel of wheat.

Sir, I desire when you send down the river, you may send a strong and sufficient guard with the boats, as far as the bluffs.

All our nations are desirous that General Washington will erect a garrison at the Muscle Shoals or Bear creek, or where he may think best to establish a trade.

We have sent you a long talk, and depend you will exert yourself on the occasion.

We remain, your friends and brothers,

JOHN BROWN,
THOMAS BROWN,
and twenty-six others.

KNOXVILLE, March 28, 1793.

Sir:

Mr. McKee has returned, without succeeding in the objects of his mission; namely, that of inducing the chiefs of the war party of the Cherokees to accompany me to Philadelphia, and to obtain assurances of the peaceful disposition of the young warriors.

His report, which will be a very full one, upon the present appearances among the Cherokees, and will also afford proof of the hostile disposition of the Creeks, towards the Cumberland settlers, he has not had time to complete from his journal.

I shall take the earliest opportunity to forward it to you, or bring it myself, as I now contemplate the setting out for Philadelphia in ten days.

One circumstance, respecting the Creeks, I conceive essential to mention now, that, on the first of March, fifty-five were at Willstown, on their way against the Cumberland settlements.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

KNOXVILLE, April 9th, 1793.

Sir:

The information contained in the enclosed report of John McKee, and the examination of David Gilliland, added to that forwarded by James Carey, had induced me to despair of further attempts to get forward to Philadelphia a representation of the Cherokees, and to determine to have sat out myself on a visit to the President, on the 5th instant.

On the 3d instant, I had the honor of your letter of the 8th February. On the 4th, Joseph Sevier, whom I have had employed as a spy in the nation, in which he generally resides, arrived from Chota, with a message from Watts, "that he was at the Maw's, and wished to visit me at Knoxville, but, if he could not come up with safety, he would be glad to see me elsewhere."

I immediately sent him for answer that I would meet him on the 6th, at Henry's station, twenty three miles from this place, and within seven of the Maw's, where he, the Maw, and about sixty other Indians, accordingly met me, and a conference took place, the minutes of which you have enclosed. It will be observed that Watts speaks of the determination of the Creeks for war, as a thing certain, and I am assured, upon the authority of a public trader, Mr. Riley, who is considered a man of veracity, and upon that of a Mr. Springston, a resident among the Cherokees, that, in the latter part of the past month, upwards of five hundred Creeks passed on, in different parties, through the Cherokees, for war against the United States, declaring they should bend their principal force against Cumberland, and that a part would fall on the frontiers of this district. It is my opinion that the visit to Philadelphia, of a full representation of the Cherokees, as requested by the President, will depend upon the success of their deputies to the Creeks: and, if the spirit of that nation for war is as general as represented to me, it cannot be expected that they can extinguish it—the most that can be hoped is, that they will partially retard their operation for a time, perhaps a moon or two.

All the information, herewith forwarded, respecting the Creeks, goes in confirmation of Carey's, and it is highly probable that, about the next full moon, the 25th instant, is the time their murdering and rapacious hands are most to be dreaded.

Upon receiving Carey's information, I forwarded an order to General Robertson, of which you have enclosed a copy. As yet I have given no order for any troops of this district to march to the relief of Cumberland, nor shall, for more than a company of mounted infantry, for a tour not exceeding a month; unless I should receive accounts of additional numbers of Creeks having gone against it.

These alarming accounts have induced me to order out additional guards to the district of Washington, in all not exceeding two Lieutenant's commands of infantry, one for Knox and the other for Jefferson county, and thirty two mounted infantry, officers included.

By the minutes, it does not appear that I was more than one day with Watts. The fact is, I was two, but spoke only on the sixth about public business; the other was devoted to eating, drinking, and jocular conversation, of which Watts is very fond. The expenses of this conference amounted to one hundred and a third dollars, owing principally to the quantity and price of the whiskey, of which I considered it the interest of the United States to be as liberal, as Watts and his party were thirsty. He appeared truly friendly, and with his usual cleverness, and is unquestionably the most leading character of his nation; and though he would make no promise, even to use his endeavors to carry a full representation of his nation to Philadelphia, yet I have no doubt but he will; but, as I have before said, that event will depend upon the determination of the Creeks: for, the chiefs will not think it safe or prudent, however much they may wish peace, to leave their nation, their houses, and their families, while they know the Creeks are daily passing through their country, to and from war, and while they know that a great number of the junior part of their own nation will join them in the war. But, be the event what it will, it will be known to me by the 28th instant; and if the determination is, that a representation will visit the President, I shall make immediate preparation for attending them, and I now believe it will be most prudent to shape the journey through South Carolina, via Hopewell, Salisbury, Richmond &c. If the contrary, I shall consider myself at liberty to set out on a visit to the President, with whom I very much wish for a personal interview, on the subject of Indian affairs, early in the succeeding month, unless I should receive such orders from you as may prevent it.

In a former letter I informed you of my having sent a Mr. Douglas to Pensacola in search of information as to the conduct of the Spanish officers towards the Indians. I have now to inform you, that he was killed, on his return, by Indians in the Chickasaw nation, through mistake, for a man who had stolen a horse; on discovering the mistake, the nation much lamented his death.

I have just received information of killing of Adam Green and William Massey, by Indians on the frontiers of Hawkins county, whose names are contained in the enclosed list of murders.

I have the honor to be &c.

Mr. McKee's Report to Governor Blount.

KNOXVILLE, March 28, 1798.

SIR:

On the 8th day of February last, I left Knoxville, accompanied by Mr. Thompson, under your instructions to proceed to the Lower towns of the Cherokee nation, for the purpose of using my best endeavors to restore peace between the United States and that part of the Cherokee nation which had declared for war. On the 10th, we arrived at Chota, where we were informed that the Hanging Maw was then at Chilhowee, at a council of the people of that town and Tallassee. We immediately set out for Chilhowee, where we found a large assembly of Indians, to whom I communicated the objects of my coming into the nation, and begged them to exert themselves in assisting me in so good a work. The object of the Maw in this visit, was, to dissuade a party of young fellows, belonging to these towns, who he had understood were for war, from prosecuting their intentions. He informed me, that four fellows from the valley towns, had crossed the Tennessee, a few days before that, to take satisfaction (that is, hair and horses) for a relation killed by the people of Georgia, but, that he had sent a runner after them, who, he expected, would overtake and bring them back. I admonished him and the people present of their danger, in case that, or any other party, should kill or steal from the white people on the frontiers, near their towns, and advised them to be vigilant in discovering, and active in stopping such parties. I made them sensible of the difficulty with which your Excellency had prevented the white people from coming and killing them, and destroying their towns, and that a few more murders would put it out of your power to prevent their destruction. The next day we went to the Maw's, where we were detained two days by snow and rain. During my stay, I repeated to him the objects of my mission, to which he expressed his good wishes for my success, with his doubts, saying it was an useless and dangerous journey. He advised me to desist, and warned me, that if I persisted, I went to the Lower towns at the great risk of my life. On the 13th, we proceeded towards Hiwasee, where we arrived on the 14th, and were informed, that, on the preceding day, five Creeks had been seen passing under an adjoining mountain, towards the settlements of Washington district. I was afterwards informed, that these were not Creeks, but Cherokees—two from the beloved town of Estanaula, and three from Celicoe. From this place we proceeded on to a small river called Amoe, ten miles below Hiwasee; here Mr. Thompson left me, and on the next day I was overtaken by Will. Elder and Unacata, two Indians from Toquo, whom I had requested to accompany me on my tour, and as I have since been informed, were ordered by the Maw to attend and protect me. At this place I was detained six days by incessant rains, and high waters, during which time, Nontuaka, who lived at Cheestowee, about seven miles distant, visited me; he charged me very earnestly to return, and to proceed no farther toward the Lower towns; that, if I did, I would probably never return, that the people below were very cross. I asked him what he thought was the cause of their crossness; he answered, that it was their land. I told him I had my suspicions, that land was not the real cause. I asked him if he had ever known an instance of Indians recovering land by war, or whether, on the contrary, he had not observed, that the loss of land was always the consequence of going to war. He replied, that Watts had received a letter from your Excellency, in which he and his people were requested to open their ears; and that Watts had answered, that the white people had stopped theirs with land, and requested the white people to open their own ears, and move off the land. I observed, that no white people, to my knowledge, had settled on their lands since the treaty of Holston; that at that treaty the Cherokees agreed, that the white people on the frontiers should remain in the peaceable possession of their plantations until the line should be run, which the Cherokees had not attended to, at the time appointed by your Excellency; that, instead of meeting the commissioners of the United States, they had gone to war, and would not listen to the voice of those who loved their nation, and knew their interest; that in going to war, they had nearly stopped the ears of all their friends with blood, and nothing but a speedy cessation of hostilities would open them. He asked me concerning Southwest Point, whether your Excellency called that place your own? I answered no; that you had taken possession of it through necessity, as the most advantageous place to keep troops, for the protection of the frontiers; that you considered it as the property of the Cherokees, and that, as soon as the necessity for keeping up troops, for the protection of your people, ceased, you would restore the point. I remarked to him, that the Cherokees had always held up, as the ostensible reason of their going to war, that the white people had robbed them of their lands, but, that I did not think that was the real cause; it was my opinion there were too many young fellows among them, emulous of ranking themselves amongst the warriors of their nation, and that, whilst the scalp of an innocent white man, killed in time of peace, or that of a woman, or child, could entitle them to that honor, so long there would be war. If they wanted their land, why did they not, in a peaceable manner, apply to your Excellency, and inform you where the white people had encroached on them; that you would examine into the matter, and do them justice; but, instead of that, they had assembled and gone to war; that they had attacked a house within four miles of Nashville, when even that part of the nation which went to war acknowledge, they sold the land for seven miles round that place. To this he made no answer, except that the Spaniards had encouraged them. I told him I was apprehensive the Cherokees had been deceived about the Spanish talks; that the Spaniards were the friends of the United States; but that, if they had encouraged them to go to war, their former conduct towards Indians afforded reason to suspect, they were actuated by other motives than a wish to better the situation of the Cherokees. I asked him if he thought the Lower towns would join the other parts of the nation in making a peace this summer; he answered, that he did not know; he had been informed that Mr. Shaw had given out bad talks there, but he had not heard good what they were. In the course of conversation, he informed me of sixteen Cherokees being out from the Lower towns for war; they were relations of those who had been killed at Buchanan's, and he believed their destination was against the frontiers of Clinch, Washington district. He then charged me, in pointed terms, to return to Knoxville, and when I refused, told me he would write to your Excellency of my obstinacy. He appeared with his usual good nature, except being displeas'd at my refusing to take his advice to return. I then proceeded with my two Indian friends, Will. Elder and Unacata, as conductors, and John Walker, a half-breed, who speaks English; and, through heavy rains and deep waters, in three days we arrived at Chattooga, a small village, about twenty miles from Will's town, the residence of John Watts. About fifteen miles from this village I met Mr. Benge, who has lived long in the nation. He informed me, that Will. Webber, a half-breed trader, had been lately in Will's town, two days, interceding with Watts to have me put to death. At Chattooga, I was advised not to proceed immediately on to Will's town, but send some trusty person on to Watts, to inform him of my arrival; the reason given was, that a white man from the territory would be unsafe in going into the town without Watts first knowing of it. I sent off the fellows who accompanied me. Will. Elder returned in two days, on the 28th of February, with Watts; Unacata had lost his horse, and could not return. John Walker had gone on to the Look-out. Watts met me with every appearance of his former personal friendship. The first question he asked me, was, for the welfare of your Excellency, and then some others of his friends in the territory by name. He informed me, that at Will's town he had left fifty-five Creeks, fifty of them on their way to Mero district, and five destined for Washington, for the avowed purpose of killing white people, and stealing horses; that he had sat up the preceding night, endeavoring in vain to dissuade them. I asked whether any of the Cherokees had, or would join them; he replied, that none had joined them, but he supposed some would, though he did not know. He talked jocularly of his trip to Cumberland, and of his wound; he said the people of Nickajack had sent a runner to him, to know whether his wound did not hurt him yet, (meaning would he go with them to war.) He sent for answer, that it did not. They replied they did not expect it would have been well so soon. The Creeks, he said, had also urged him to go to war, but that he had told them he was determined not to go. I informed him that the Creeks, last fall, had been on St. Mary's river, and had received presents, to a large amount, from the United States, through the hands of Mr. Seagrove; that they had promised peace, and that they there said, all the murders and depredations committed by the Southern Indians on the citizens of the United States, was by the Cherokees; that it was believed by Congress, that the Creeks were in entire peace with the United States, and every part of their settlements. Watts replied, it was strange that Congress should think so: for, ever since his remembrance, the Creeks had been killing white people, and had never been chastised. I had here an opportunity of purchasing a few gallons of rum, which, I thought, might be necessary to the acquirement of information from Watts, whom I plied with it until he was intoxicated, from which I reaped no other advantage, than a conviction, that neither war, nor the solicitations of Webber, had lessened his friendship for me. His professions on that head were more extravagant than I had ever heard from him before; he assured me of safety whilst with him, but that I might on no consideration go any further, for he could not always be with me, and I might be killed by some bad young fellows. I then proposed to him, with Talotiska, and other chiefs, to meet me in six days at Spring Hill, a village newly settled by Indians, and white people from the Look-out. He promised that he would come in six or seven days, but that Talotiska was not at home, nor did he expect him in that time. I requested him to bring most of the principal chiefs, that I wished to know their sentiments respecting the proposed conference with your Excellency. During my stay at Chattooga, and whilst Watts was with me, a Mr. Grunter, an Indian trader, arrived from Charleston, and with apparent exultation informed the people present that the Indians were safe; that no State could declare war against the Indians; that, let them do what they would, your Excellency could not do them any injury in return; that the people of the territory were very anxious to have a war, and that they were the cause of the past disturbances. I told him that that information, communicated to the Indians, without also informing them of the solemnity with which the General Government has pledged itself for the protection of the territory, as well as every other part of the United States, would be attended with evil consequences; it would tend to impress on the minds of the Indians a belief, (which I was of opinion they already began to conceive) that the only business of Congress was to bind the hands of her citizens, whilst the Indians butchered them; that it was a truth that no part of the United States could declare war, without the consent of the whole; but, that any part might call forth a portion of its own militia for the purpose of defence, and that I thought justice and humanity would construe it as a defence, were the inhabitants of a country to pursue home, and chastise, an army that had invaded them; that the people of the territory were unjustly accused of wishing for a war; that, since the treaty of Holston, more than one hundred and fifty of its citizens had been killed, or made captives, whilst about their lawful business, and I believed they had not killed a single Indian except in defence of their lives or property; that I myself had seen the Warrior's Son, and others, at Major Craig's, on the very night on which Black's block-house (not more than four miles distant) was attacked, and three men killed and one wounded, and these Indians, though they remained at Craig's till ten o'clock next day, did not meet a single insult, even from those who, the evening before, were witnesses to the catastrophe at Blacks. This did not appear, I thought, as if the people of the territory were disposed to enter imprudently into a war. I remarked to him, that such information made to the Indians, would induce them to continue their hostilities, which would undoubtedly end in their own destruction.

March 8th—(the day I appointed to meet Watts) I went to Spring Hill, and there waited until the 16th, without hearing any thing from Watts. I then despatched Jack Sivils to the Look-out, to know the reason why Watts and the other chiefs had not met me as they promised, and if he was not coming at all, to invite the Glass, and the other chiefs of that town, to come over and see me. On the 18th, he returned, with information that Watts was prevented from coming to see me, by a great ball play, which was to be in a few days, (here it may not be improper to call your attention to the absurdity of the excuse, for he was to have met me on the 8th, and the ball play was on the 26th) but that he had sent a runner to me, who had lost his way. He (Jack Sivils) told me the Glass and two other chiefs would be over that evening. Here I was informed by William Burges, a half breed, that, on the arrival of Coody, eight Cherokees came to his canoe, expecting I had come down by water, (as you had informed them I would) with the intention of killing me, by the instructions of Will. Webber; that Tuskegatche, a young warrior, the brother of Richard Justice, had ordered them to go home, and be ashamed of their intention. In the evening, the Glass, Scantee, the Spider, and others, came. They met, and treated me with every mark of friendship. I addressed them in the following words:

"FRIENDS: I am glad to see you. I hope you are as anxious as I am to see peace established between your nation and the United States. A prospect of its taking place shortly, would afford me a singular pleasure. It is of great importance to your nation, that a peace should be soon concluded: for, if your people go on to kill and rob the citizens of the United States, I am afraid it will be worse times in this land than it ever has been. Such conduct will undoubtedly at last oblige your father, the President, to give out war talks in his turn, and then he will certainly have pay for every one of his citizens that have been killed by your people. If, as your people hold out, it is land they want, why do they not come forward to Governor Blount, in a peaceable manner, and have the line run agreeable to the treaty of Holston? (for which purpose Governor Blount appointed a day last summer, but your people did not appear) and after that is done, you may rest assured that every white man who is on your land will be moved off. You will never recover one foot of country by war, and those who tell you to go to war, are your greatest enemies. They may make advantage of it, but you never can.

"You certainly must discover that the United States do not wish to injure you, but, on the contrary, that they wish to make you a people like themselves. I wish your nation was possessed of a reciprocal friendly disposition; but it is evidently not the case: for, whilst your people are admitted to the honorable rank of warriors for killing white people, you, no doubt, have heard, that the white man, who, with a party of men, came into your country, and killed some of your people, and destroyed some of your towns, is loaded with irons; and if you do not stop the ears of your father, the President, with the blood of his people, that man will lose his life. I wish your people would be at peace, and suffer the United States to do something for them, which they never can whilst they are at war.

"At Chattooga, John Watts informed me that fifty-five Creeks were then (18 days ago) at Will's town, on their way to war against the United States, and endeavoring to engage some of the Cherokees to join them. I hope they will be disappointed. These Creeks passing through your towns do you much injury. They have lately been in the United States, and declared they were for peace. They are afraid to go to war openly, and own it. They go through your country, and tell the United States that it is your people that do all the mischief. I hope your father, the President, will soon be undeceived, and they will be obliged to leave off their depredations, or meet the reward of their treachery and theft.

"I have heard that Will. Webber has tried hard to have me killed, since I came into the nation. Does he wish it because I have always treated him and all your people well? He was afraid to come himself, and therefore sent others to kill me. It is such cowardly rascals as he is, that does your nation more mischief than any others. They get rich by war, and getting those killed to whom they are indebted. I am not afraid of him, nor of dying in this land. I was sent by a Government that is able to protect me, and if I should die, the United States will not suffer my death to pass with impunity."

The Glass said he wished for peace, and had from the beginning; but that, from the Creeks passing daily through their towns, perhaps some of the young fellows might join them, and he did not know how it might end. I told him, if these young fellows could not be restrained by the chiefs of the nation, it would be useless talking of making peace: for, it never could be kept inviolate, whilst it was in the power of one man to break it with impunity. That, if they did not cease their hostilities, and meet your Excellency, it must be taken for granted that it is not their land they want. I asked him whether he thought of meeting your Excellency. He answered, for his part, he would be willing to go; but, that he was but one among many chiefs; that there must be a general meeting of the headmen, and they would then decide on that point. I asked him, if they did meet your Excellency, whether he thought Nickajack, Long Island, and Crow town, would come in. He answered, perhaps they might, as most of the bad young fellows had gone to the Shawanese; fifty had started a few days before, and that more were about to start in fifteen days, and that soon, most of the bad young fellows would be gone to the Northern tribes. I told him, that, if to go to war against the United States was their object, I did not think they would be permitted to stay there, as the Shawanese were about to make a treaty with the United States. He said it might be so, but that, at that time, there were eight Shawanese chiefs in the Creek nation, endeavoring to stimulate them to war against the United States; that these Shawanese had informed him, as they passed along to the Creeks, that their people had been expecting the approach of the federal army, and had been assembled in large bodies to receive them. I then spoke of the propriety and necessity of stopping the Creeks from passing through their towns to do mischief. That, he said, was impossible, without involving themselves in a war with that nation; that he had often, to no purpose, entreated them not to pass through the towns. He asked me to write a letter for him to General McGillivray, in which he complained in a very spirited manner of the injuries the Creeks had done the Cherokees in passing through their country; that when they failed getting horses from the white people, they took them from the Cherokees; that it appeared as if the Creeks wished to make little of his people; that he did not understand such conduct, and wished to know what they meant by it. He said he knew the Creeks were fools, and he then told them so.

Previous to my departure from this place, I wrote Watts a letter, of which I have the honor to enclose you a copy. When I was about to set out, the Glass requested that I would obtain from your Excellency a paper that would protect himself, Scantee, and the people who lived at that place, as he, with them, intended to live there, and neither to join in a war nor suffer any that would do so to live with them. I observed to him, that such a paper would be unnecessary, as I had the strongest hopes of a peace taking place immediately; that such a request seemed as if he thought his nation was for war. He, without assigning any reason, repeated his request that I would procure such a paper. I assured him I would.

On the 19th, I set out on my return to Knoxville, and, on the 21st, arrived at Amoe, where I overtook John Walker, who had left me at Chattooga, and had been to Williamstown, and by way of the Look-out. He informed me that it was not the ball play that prevented Watts from meeting me at Spring Hill, but a quarrel between Talotiska and him on account of his having visited me at Chattooga; and that, though he told me Talotiska was abroad, he was, nevertheless, at home, but would not come to see me, nor suffer that I should come into town, as he did not wish to see the face of a white man at that place. Walker also informed me, that a number of the young fellows had gone to the Shawanese, and that a number more would soon set out, amongst which number he had thoughts of going; that a number of Creeks, consisting of small parties of from two to eight, had come as far as Hiwasee, but that all, except one party of three, one of whom had lived nine months in Hiwasee, were dissuaded from pursuing their intended route, to the frontiers of Washington district, by the Long Fellow and Tickakiska, and the other chiefs of that place; but that it was his opinion that the path to Washington district would soon be full of Creeks; that he had been informed, in the Lower towns, that the Creeks were determined, this summer, to carry on a general war against all parts of the United States, except such part as bordered immediately on their own nation.

I received a letter from Mr. Coody, which confirmed me in my opinion that it was not the ball play that prevented Watts from coming to see me at Spring Hill, and a copy of which I have the honor to enclose with this.

It owe it to Will. Elder and Unacata, my conductors, to acknowledge, that my most sanguine expectations did not equal their exertions for my security, particularly Will. Elder, who never left me, except when I sent him for Watts, and who, I verily believe, would have defended my life at the risk of his own. Unacata's assiduity and friendship was equal to Will's, whilst he was with me, but, when he went to Will's town, he ran a knife through his foot, and lost his horse, which prevented him from overtaking me again.

My intimate acquaintance with Watts, as well as many other chiefs of the Lower towns, and the desire of peace held out previous to my going into the nation by some of the party, who had been for war, justified the anticipation of a report more favorable to the prospects of approaching peace. It is, however, due to the nation to acknowledge, that, though the prospect of a lasting peace is, at this time, very uncertain, it is my opinion that the majority of the nation are anxious for it, and would accede to almost any terms of accommodation, were it not for the bias the Creeks and Shawanese have over all their councils.

I beg you, sir, to believe, that, although I have failed in the completion of the objects of my mission, my zeal and exertions were equal to your most sanguine wishes on the occasion; and that I am, with very great respect,
Yours, &c.

Information given Governor Blount by David Gilliland.—April 2, 1793.

1. Gov. Blount.—I have understood you went from this place, on the 8th February, with Arthur Coody, in a canoe, and arrived with him at Look-out Mountain town creek on the 14th. Is it true?

David Gilliland.—It is true.

2. G. B.—In what towns did you make your principal stay?

D. G.—At the Look-out Mountain town.

3. G. B.—How long did you stay there?

D. G.—About six weeks.

4. G. B.—During your stay did you see any scalps, or horses, brought into that town? and by whom?

D. G.—About the 18th March, a party of Creeks, consisting of thirteen warriors, returned from Cumberland, with one scalp and four horses. A few days after, twenty Creeks returned from Cumberland, with two white scalps, two negro scalps, and an old negro fellow prisoner, (who said his master's name was Parker) and four horses, among which was Drumgold's roan race horse. There were also brought into the nation, by Cherokees, two or three scalps, and three horses, a few days before my arrival.

5. G. B.—Did you hear the names of the Cherokees who brought in the scalps?

D. G.—Yes, Double-head and Pumpkin Boy were two of them.

6. G. B.—Did you see Double-head and Pumpkin Boy?

D. G.—Yes, I did, and was generally with them.

7. G. B.—How did they treat you?

D. G.—Very well, were my best friends; and I have reason to believe they prevented me from being put to death in the Lower towns.

8. G. B.—Did you see any parties of Creeks going to war against the United States?

D. G.—Yes; I saw two parties, one of upwards of fifty, and the other of three, Creeks, well armed; declaring they intended to divide, and a part attack Cumberland, and part the northern frontiers of Washington district, and the second party waylay the Cumberland trace.

9. G. B.—Do you suppose, if Mr. McKee had gone to the Lower towns, that his person would have been safe?

D. G.—No.

10. G. B.—Do you believe he would have been put to death?

D. G.—I do, verily.

11. G. B.—What did you hear while you were in the Lower towns of the Creeks? that is, did you hear whether they were for war or peace with the United States?

D. G.—In the Lower towns, it was generally understood, by traders and Indians, that the Upper Creeks had declared war against the United States, particularly Cumberland. Mr. Underwood, the interpreter between the Creeks and Cherokees, himself told me this would be a bloody summer with the Creeks, immediately after he had done speaking to them.

12. G. B.—Do you know whether any Cherokees joined the Creeks?

D. G.—I do not; but I heard Dick Justice express his fears on that head.

13. G. B.—Did you hear of any parties of Cherokees having lately gone to join the Northern tribes?

D. G.—Yes, three different companies.

14. G. B.—Did you hear of any of the Northern Indians, who reside among the Cherokees, going for war?

D. G.—Yes, three; and they mean to strike on the frontiers of Clinch.

15. G. B.—What appeared to be the conduct of Arthur Coady towards the United States? friendly, or otherwise?

D. G.—Pretendedly friendly; but the general tenor of his conduct to me appeared otherwise; in particular, he appeared dissatisfied with your Excellency, complaining you had not made him presents equal to his services.

16. G. B.—Can you tell what Coady did with the goods I sent by him to deliver to John McKee?

D. G.—Yes: he traded part of them for stolen horses, with the Creeks, and sent the rest to Mr. Mc'Kee, by Jack Sivils.

DAVID GILLILAND.

I, Joseph Greer, a justice of the peace for the county of Knox, and territory south of the Ohio, do certify, that David Gilliland this day appeared before me, and made oath to the truth of the above answers by him given to the above questions, stated by Governor Blount. Given under my hand and seal, this 2nd day of April 1798.

JOSEPH GREER.

Minutes of a conference held at Henry's Station, on the 6th February, 1798, between Governor Blount and John Watts, the Hanging Maw, Double-head, and many others of the Cherokees—Susanna Spears's interpreter.

Governor Blount.—I am happy, on this occasion, to speak to you on public business. What I have to say is short, and will be concerning things that are yet to come, not about what is past. I have lately received a letter from the President, a part of which I will read to you. It is as follows: "The President of the United States is highly desirous that John Watts, the Little Turkey, and as many of the real chiefs of the Cherokees as you may judge proper to form a real representation of the tribes, should pay a visit to this place, where they shall not only be abundantly supplied with such articles as they may require for themselves, but also for their nation. He wishes you to accompany them."

I want to know your answer to this request of the President; if you are not prepared, take time, withdraw, and consult each other. I will go with you any road you may choose to travel. The President supposes, if a full and complete representation should visit him, all matters of difference may be settled. I think so too. In this invitation which the President makes, he gives the greatest proof of his friendship, and I hope you will accept it.

Hanging Maw.—I am willing to go; but, there must be a consultation of the chiefs. You must not think the time long before we get ready, in case we conclude to go.

[Here he, Watts, Double-head, and Tuskegatahee, withdrew; and, returning, John Watts said:]

You are our father; you have told us you want us to go to Philadelphia. There are no head-men here but the Hanging Maw and myself. I can speak but little, and can give no answer to the business you propose. I must first consult our chiefs, who are gone to the Creeks; perhaps, when we get back home, they may be returned. All the nation will assemble, in twenty-one nights, at the Running Water; then all things will be taken into consideration. You shall hear the result. The business of our chiefs, who are gone on to the Creeks, is to try to stop them from going to war. They are the Glass, the Turkey, Kittagiska, Dick Justice, Hovalta, Charley, The Water Hunter, The Breath, The Drunkard, Double-head, (not him of the same name present) The Person-striker, The Spider, Chulcoah, their linguister. My own nation is at war; the Creeks and Chickasaws also. I want all these to be at peace, then I will take you by the hand and go to Philadelphia.

John Taylor* and Talotiskie are gone to the Northward to sell a negro, who, for some time past, has belonged to John Taylor. My people wanted me to go to the Creeks, but I chose to come and see the Hanging Maw and yourself. Those of my nation, who are gone to the Creeks, are gone even to their Lower towns, to use their influence to stop them from war.

Governor.—What is the reason the Creeks go to war, as they have so lately been treating with Mr. Seagrove at St. Mary's?

Watts.—I hear the Creeks have said they will be at war with the Cumberland people the longest day they have to live, on account of the land. My people have gone to bring them into measures of peace.

Governor.—Some Creeks commit depredations on the frontiers of Washington district.

Watts.—'Tis fellows who live single, not in towns, who are bad off for clothes; they steal horses to supply themselves.

Governor.—Have you heard from Mr. McGillivray?

Watts.—I have heard lately that he sickened and died at his own house. I am not going to tell you any lies. I know who do all the mischief; 'tis the Creeks. They are about at this time. Yet, I agree that some few of my young men go with them. Fifty Creeks, whom I saw, went out some time since, and many small parties of threes and fours have gone more lately.

Governor.—You say 'tis twenty-one nights till you are to meet and consult at the Running Water. Immediately after you have had your consultation, you should let me know the result thereof, that I may inform the President whether he is to expect you or not. Will it be agreeable to you that John McKee should accompany you? he can write and do business for you.

Watts.—Your own sort of people like McKee as well as we do, but he must wait and go down with Hanging Maw.

Governor.—I shall now go home and write the President, letting him know what has passed between us, and that I believe you will send a representation to Philadelphia.

Watts.—I want no lies told. It is uncertain. It will depend on the result of the council. I want matters settled first.

Governor.—To go there is the right way to settle matters. If you should not go, the President will think you are angry, as he promises goods for yourselves and the nation at large. It is a long journey, and will be expensive; therefore he wants not too great a number to go; yet he thinks all the head-men of the nation ought. I hope the business, when done, will be lasting, and done for ever.

Watts.—I cannot promise how long it may be before I go. I want matters settled first.

Governor.—You have much influence in the nation, which you cannot serve better than by using it, so as to induce a representation to visit Philadelphia. The President writes me, all the Northwards are to hold a treaty in forty-five days. Do you think they are in earnest?

Watts.—I cannot tell.

Governor.—The Northwards, who went to the Creeks, I suspect, cause the Creeks to be cross.

Watts.—What is Carey gone to Philadelphia for?

Governor.—To carry letters; and he also promised Mr. Shaw to meet him there.

Watts.—We do not like Carey's doings; he seems not to act fairly.

Governor.—I cannot help your liking or misliking Carey; you know him best; you introduced him to me as a linguister.

Watts.—The Upper towns are scarce of provisions, and my family and friends are numerous. I want you to send me, to Coyatee, some flour, bacon, and salt, to support us home; and two kegs of whiskey, for my warriors to drink your health when I get there. It will have a good effect. Damei Carmichael will deliver them to me.

* This John Taylor is the same who lately returned from Orleans, with the Bloody Fellow, by way of the Chickasaws; and Talotiskie, since his invasion of Cumberland, in September, has taken every occasion to give proofs of his disposition for war. This gives reason to suspect selling the negro is only the ostensible business.

Governor.—You shall have them.

Watts.—I have one thing more to say to you. There is a person of my own blood among the white people, and his friends want to see him.

Governor.—I have never heard of him. Where is he? or when did you hear of him?

Watts.—He was carried, by a small boy, and committed to the care of Colonel Anderson, by his friends, and we lately heard he was there working.

Governor.—I shall inquire into it, and let you know. If 'tis as you say, he shall come down, that you may see him.

Letter from Arthur Coody to John McKee.—March 10, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I am sorry you could not come to see me at present, for the Indians are much confused. If you had sent the letters to me, I could have been better able to satisfy them: for I am here just with my empty hands. If you have the letters, send them by the bearer hereof. I shall send your goods up by John Walker, to meet you at his house, in four days from this; and, when you come again, bring with you the Long Fellow, the Hanging Maw, the head-man of Chota, and John Boggs.

I have taken seven pair boots, (leggings) for the head-men, that you must charge to the public.

John Watts is offended, by some of his people, is the reason that he will not come to see you. I shall go to see him, and settle that point with him.

Richard Justice is going to see the Governor, and Mr. Ogdon, to see if he can commence a trade from that place, in order to bring about peace; through my request, Double-head and his brother were coming up likewise; but they are stopped from going at present.

There are ten Creeks, I expect here this day, with one negro prisoner; and they have killed two men, and one or two negroes besides, from Cumberland.

You will send the letters to his Excellency as soon as you can, for I have more than I can do without more help: for I have to work against the Spanish, French, and Creeks, and the best part of my own country. I shall leave nothing undone for you to come in safety, when you come again. So no more at present, but remain your dear friend,

ARTHUR COODY.

Letter from John McKee to Colonel John Watts.

SPRINGHILL, March 18, 1793.

MY GOOD FRIEND:

I anxiously waited for you at this place, in hopes to have had an opportunity of communicating to you, personally, my sentiments respecting the approaching meeting with Governor Blount. I wish you, and some of the chiefs, had come over. I wish your nation happy. I have always loved your people, and have had thoughts of living amongst you, which I cannot do till you make a strong peace with the United States. It is undoubtedly your interest to be at peace. Let me advise you to try it, at least for one or two years, and see what the United States will do for you. I tell you they will do more for you than you think. But it is impossible they can do any thing whilst your people are killing theirs, and stealing their horses. 'Tis this that stops the ears of Congress, and your father, the President; and will, if not put a stop to, undoubtedly ruin your country. Meet the Governor as soon as possible, the sooner the better. Send talks to the Creeks, and tell them, if they want war, to tell the United States of it. Tell them not to pass through your towns to bring trouble on them. If they are your friends they will take some other course. I will see you again, perhaps before you meet Governor Blount.

I am, &c.

JOHN MCKEE.

A list of murders and depredations, committed on the citizens of the United States, by Indians.

On Thursday, 19th of March, 1793, Nolan was killed on the waters of Little Harpeth, ten miles from Nashville; many horses taken, but the number not ascertained.

Since the killing of Thomas Ross (the post) on the Kentucky road, information has been received of two parties being attacked on that road, and several killed; but the particulars are not so well ascertained as to be able to give them.

William Massey, and Adam Green, on 31st March, 1793, on the frontiers of Hawkins county.

KNOXVILLE, April 11th, 1793.

SIR:

I am just informed, that the house of a Mr. Gallaher, on the south of Holston, eighteen miles from this, was burnt by Indians on the 9th instant; Gallaher himself, and his family, were at an adjacent station. The families, in general, on the frontiers, are collected at stations; at one, which I lately visited, (John Craig's) there are 280 people, men, women, and children, living in a miserable manner, in small huts.

I am, &c.

KNOXVILLE, April 12th, 1793.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose a copy of the information this morning received by Mr. William Macklin, and of a letter written to his Excellency Isaac Shelby, Governor of Kentucky, in consequence thereof, and to be, with very great respect and esteem, &c.

Minutes of information given by Mr. William Macklin, April 12th, 1793, at Knoxville, to Governor Blount.

That on the 4th instant, he met with Colonel Buford, a resident of Kentucky, and who had just then arrived from that country, who informed him that General Logan was raising a party of Kentucky militia volunteers, for the purpose of making war on the Lower Cherokees. That the number of their party was expected to be from 150 to 250. That a party, commanded by Major Whitley, which had been in search of the Indians who had done the late mischief on the road, were to join General Logan's party. That they intended to proceed to the Tennessee, which they would cross, and attack the towns, unless, on their arrival in its vicinity, they found reasons to the contrary. That Col. Buford must have left Kentucky, on or about the 1st instant, and that he believed General Logan and his party would commence their operations in a few days from that time.

WM. MACKLIN.

Governor Blount to Governor Shelby.

KNOXVILLE, April 12, 1793.

SIR:

The enclosed information was communicated to me this morning. Mr. Macklin, my informant, is a man of veracity. Colonel Buford I do not personally know, but he also has ever been represented to me as a man of veracity.

The President has instructed me to invite a full representation of the Cherokees to visit him at Philadelphia, and directed me to accompany them. The object of the invitation is, the settling all manner of difference between the United States and Cherokees. On the 6th instant I held a conference with John Watts, the Maw, and other chiefs, and made known to them the invitation of the President. They expressed their own willingness to comply with it, would give no assurances on the part of the nation, but promised that an answer should be made up in a full council, by the 26th instant, and that it should be immediately made known to me. It is my opinion that the other chiefs, as well as Watts and the Maw, wish peace with the United States, and that they will accept the invitation of the President. But, sir, should General Logan go on with his attempt, as reported by Mr. Macklin, on the information of Colonel Buford, you, from a knowledge of the defenceless state of the frontiers, and mode of warfare from incensed Indians, can readily judge the consequences.

Supposing this information true, I am much at a loss how to account for it. Surely, if General Logan is authorized by Government, a knowledge of it would have been communicated to me by Government, and it would seem as if no general would raise and march such a body of men without it. But, be it which it will, he has no right to pass the limits of the territory over which I have the honor to preside, as Governor and Commander-in-chief, without my permission, and trust he will not.

I am, &c.

KNOXVILLE, April 13th, 1793.

SIR:

Letters, of which the enclosed are copies, are this moment handed to me, express, from the Hanging Maw. I shall instantly order out two companies of mounted infantry, to the relief of Cumberland, from the district of Washington. I mean, two in all from that district.

I am, &c.

Information received since the writing this letter, that Blackburn's house was burned yesterday by the Indians. Blackburn's is about fourteen miles from this place, on the north side of the Holston.

John Watts to Governor Blount.

COYATEE, April 11th, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

Now, it is six days since I talked with you. I told you the truth about the Creeks, for they say that they never will be at peace with Cumberland, nor talk about peace in that land. Now you have warning of the Creeks. It don't look like war in our land, when we send you word of your enemy coming against you. I have only heard of the Creeks passing in large quantities, but to what part I don't know, so take care every where. I told you that the head men had gone to the Creeks, but they have not gone; they have sent. There is so many bad talks, they do not know what to do. Tell Mr. Alexander Carmichael to make haste and meet us.

I am, &c.

Arthur Coody to Governor Blount.

LOOK-OUT MOUNTAIN, April 5th, 1793.

(One of the Lower Cherokee towns.)

DEAR SIR:

This comes to inform your Excellency of the Creek Indians passing by me to war against Cumberland settlement. 29th March, came by 64, and last of March, came by 14, and the 3d day of April came by 38, and the 4th, came by 501, and they gave an account of 100 coming behind them, all against Cumberland.

These individuals wish for you to be convinced that they are for peace. They have sent to the Creeks to tell them, if they have a mind to be at war with the United States, to go against Georgia, and not to come this way to bring trouble on them, for they have put by all war for two years, to see if the white people will be as good as their words to them. Dear sir, Mr. McGillivray is certainly dead; he died about the last of February, and these Indians have sent Captain Justice, and the Little Turkey, and another chief, to make peace for all nations. I have these Indians in a better way for a peace than they have been for five years past. The most of these Indians are out hunting by water; there are none gone by land as yet. I tell them not to go over this river any distance, for fear parties, following the Creeks, might come across them.

I am, &c.

NOTE.—Arthur Coody is a half-breed Cherokee, who reads and writes English, and whom I have engaged to give me information. There can be no doubt of the truth of that contained in this letter.

WM. BLOUNT.

KNOXVILLE, April 13th, 1793.

John Boggs to the Hanging Maw; forwarded by the Maw to Governor Blount, 13th April, 1793.

(This letter has no date nor place, but was written from some one of the Lower towns of the Cherokees.)

DEAR FRIEND:

This comes to inform you, and rest of our friends, that Mr. McGillivray is dead, out of this world, and about the Creeks passing by us daily to war. Since the 29th March, to the 5th April, have passed by no less than 247 warriors. We have sent to their nation to make peace with the Breed Nation, and to keep the Creek Indians from coming through our land to war. If they will be at war with white people, to go against Georgia, and not to come and bring trouble on our land. If they will come through our land, we shall not take them as our friends; so no more at present, but remain, &c.

I could wish for the settlement people to be careful, for what I see I can believe. I have thought those people told lies about the Creeks, but I find it too true to make a laugh of.

NOTE.—John Boggs is a fellow of as much veracity as any in the Cherokee nation, and as noted a friend to peace and the United States.

WM. BLOUNT.

KNOXVILLE, April 18, 1793.

SIR:

The enclosed copy of a letter to John Watts and the Hanging Maw, will inform you of the death of Noon-day, a Cherokee of Toquo, one of the Upper towns, and the circumstances attending it. He was a fellow of very bad character, and his death, as respected himself, is not to be lamented. What his business on the frontiers was, does not appear.

I am, sir, &c.

*Governor Blount to the Hanging Maw and John Watts.*KNOXVILLE, April 17, 1793.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

Noon-day was unfortunately killed by mistake for a Creek, as he was off the path, with a gun on his shoulder, by the people who were ranging to protect the frontiers. If they had known him to be a Cherokee, they would not have injured him. This, you may know, is true; because, since they have been ranging, they have often seen Cherokees, and some with guns, off the path, and did not injure them. There is another proof they did not mean to kill him, that is, when they found that they, by mistake, had killed a friendly Cherokee, they did not scalp him, as they would have done had he been a Creek. It was so late in the evening, that the mistake was easily made. I am sure, my brothers, you will recollect what I said to you at Henry's station, on the 6th day of this month. I there told you that rangers were on the frontiers to protect the citizens of the United States against the Creeks, and that it would be best for the Cherokees to forbear to come on their lands on the north side of Tennessee with guns, for fear they should be mistaken for Creeks, and be hurt or killed. I desired, in case any of your people wanted to come into the settlements about business, for such to come along the path to Henry's station, without guns; or, if any wanted to come into the settlements to get their guns repaired, for them first to go to the Maw, and get his pass to come in, and to keep the path, then they would not be injured. That James Ore, who lived at the Maw's, would write the passes for the Maw. The Noon-day was himself to blame, because he knew all these things. Many innocent people have been killed; many on our side and some on yours. Let us forgive and forget what has passed, and endeavor to make and keep peace for the future. Watts' advice to the young men, not to go and take satisfaction, as they proposed, convinces me he is a friend to his nation, and to peace. And the peaceful manner in which your people came out the next day, and inquired into the manner and cause of Noon-day's death, does them credit. It was following the good example of the white people, who have borne many similar injuries without retaliation. I hope, my good Brothers, this unfortunate mistake will in no degree destroy or retard our pleasing prospects of returning peace. But, it may be that Noon-day's friends will not be content without satisfaction; and if they will not, and will take it in goods, I will pay them, and send the goods for them immediately to the Maw's. I hope, my Brothers, you will let me hear from you before you go down to the running water to the council; and when you are at the council, I beg you to explain every thing fully to the chiefs.

I am, &amp;c.

Noon-day was a Cherokee of Toquo, one of the Upper towns, and was killed in the dusk of the evening of the 15th instant.

KNOXVILLE, April 20th, 1793.

SIR:

The enclosed is the copy of John Watts' answer to my letter of the 17th instant, already forwarded to your office. I am this morning informed that, on the 18th instant, on the east fork of Little Pigeon, Jefferson county, thirty miles from this place, Joshua Tipton, and — Matthews were killed, and — Shields wounded, by a party of twelve Indians.

I am also just informed by a gentleman from German creek, that a party of travellers had arrived there through the wilderness from Kentucky on the 18th instant, (Thursday) who reported that, shortly before their departure from Kentucky, a station was attacked by Indians, who killed three of the inhabitants, and made eighteen prisoners, whom they carried into the woods and killed. They also reported that, on the 15th, (Monday) the day they left Kentucky, another station was attacked by Indians, but had not heard the result. As they passed the station on the trace at Rock Castle, the houses were on fire. It is supposed they had been previously evacuated.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

*John Watts to Governor Blount.*COYATEE, April 18th, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I am going now to tell you the truth. I sent your people word of the Creeks being at the Hanging Maw's, and as they returned from the pursuit of them, one of the men got drowned. I suppose that was the reason of Noon-day's being killed; and, as I wish peace, let both go together—Noonday for the man that was drowned. Noon-day was my brother in our way of kindred. Noon-day was a good man, and they wanted to kill him. They knew very well it was not Creeks, for they took his gun, and belt, and knife, and garters. At the talk at Samuel Henry's, Major Craig wanted the bad people to come to his house; and Noon-day went to Craig's, and got killed. Noon-day's own two brothers was very cross, and wanted to take satisfaction at once, but I went to them yesterday, and told them to stop; they promised me that they would. I hope they will listen to my talks. We all wish for peace. I hope the white people will do the same. Noon-day is dead, and it can't be helped. We must try to make peace, and hold our peace talks fast.

To-morrow I start for the Running Water to the talk, and the Hanging Maw. I wish Mr. McKee to come on as fast as possible. My good brother, you must send a talk to Craig, and his bad young men, to take care not to do any more mischief. When the talk is over, I will come and let you know all our talks. The wife and children of Noon-day has no corn, and if you will find them some to live on till corn comes, I shall be glad.

Your friend, &amp;c.

SIR:

The enclosed extracts from two letters yesterday received from the Glass, a Cherokee chief, and Edward Adair, contain additional proof of the intentions of the Creeks to commit hostilities against the United States. I have not heard from Cumberland since the first instant. It is hardly necessary to add, that I am in painful expectation of hourly receiving very disagreeable information from that quarter. Mr. McKee is gone down with Watts to attend the council alluded to by Adair and the Glass, now near at hand, and will give me the earliest notice of the result. My object in sending him, is to use his influence and address to the interest of the United States. The mounted infantry, ordered from the district of Washington to the Mero district, have not turned out with the readiness I expected. They will leave Southwest Point on Monday, the 29th.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

*Extract of a letter from Edward Adair (1) to Governor Blount, dated*SPRINGHILL, in the Cherokees, April 13th, 1793.

The head-men have done all in their power to procure peace with you, by restraining their young people from the doing of mischief to the United States. They talk of nothing but of going out a hunting. They have likewise sent Richard Justice, and some other head-men, to the Creek nation, to endeavor to put a stop to their coming through this land to commit hostilities upon the United States; and if they do not quit such practices, that they shall look upon them as their enemies, and not their friends any longer. There was ninety Creeks passed this place a few days ago, on their way to Cumberland, and killed six cows, belonging to Mr. Burges, (a) and said they would take as many as they pleased; afterwards went to the Look-out Mountain, and behaved in a very rude manner there. They continue daily taking horses from the white people and Indians of this land, which enraged the inhabitants much.

These people have a talk to be held in fourteen days from this date, from the Chickasaws and Choctaws, which we believe is a good peace talk, but much against the Creeks, as they (b) declared themselves in favor of the Chickasaws, by Richard Justice, and those others that are gone to the Creeks for such purposes.

Extract of a letter from the Glass (2) to Governor Blount, April 13th, 1793, from Spring hill of the Cherokees, near the Lower towns.

A few days after he (Mc Kee) left this, there were ninety (4) Creeks passed this, and killed six cows, belonging to one of our people, (Mr. Burges.) They afterwards came to the Look-out, where I was. I asked them who was the head of their going to war. They told me it was the Spaniards that caused them to be at what they were. I told them it was but nine nights since I had letters from the Spaniards, and they told us to be at peace. This, I assure you, is the truth, and I shall not keep any thing hid from you. I have sent talks by Richard Justice (3) to tell the Creeks to desist from killing the Chickasaws, and coming through this land; if not, we shall be spectators (6) to see our red brothers the Chickasaws murdered so.

In fourteen nights from this date, all the head-men of this nation are to meet, (5) at which time I expect our people will be returned from the Creeks. As soon as the talks are over, you shall hear it the same as if you was present yourself.

KNOXVILLE, April 25th, 1793.

SIR:

Since writing you of this date, I have received a letter from the Little Turkey, of which you have enclosed an extract. Contrary to my expectation, Mr. McKee was the bearer of it. The reason of his return, the enclosed report will explain.

I have the honor, &c.

Extract of a letter from Little Turkey to Governor Blount, dated New Seneca, (commonly called Turkey's town) April 21st, 1793.

It is well known I am a man that loves peace, and would do my endeavor to make peace between any set of people. Yet the Creeks are passing by every other day with scalps and horses from the frontiers. I have told them not to pass through my town, but they tell me it is what they will (d) to pass any where.

John McKee to Governor Blount.

KNOXVILLE, April 25th, 1793.

SIR:

After accompanying John Watts as far as Wockoe, we met a runner from the Lower towns, with whom Watts and the Maw held a long talk. Watts then informed me that the council would not meet as soon as he had informed your Excellency. That, since his departure from the Lower towns, talks had been received from the Chickasaws, and Choctaws, and Creeks, each soliciting the aid of the Cherokees against the other, which had much agitated the minds of the Cherokees, and these talks would be taken up first and decided upon; that the Maw and myself might return, and he would come up and conduct me to the council in which the President's invitation would be taken into consideration. When we were about to part, he desired me to inform your Excellency that the Cherokees, at all events, would not take part with the Creeks.

The small presents you sent for himself and his wife, he received as particular marks of your notice and attention to him. During my continuance with him he appeared, and I believe is, sincerely desirous of peace between his nation and the United States. Upon parting he did not express the particular time when he would return for me, but, from my knowledge of the distance, and the delay that generally attends the transaction of Indian business, it probably cannot be less than fifteen days.

I have the honor, &c.

KNOXVILLE, May 9th, 1793.

SIR:

The enclosed copies of letters and orders to General Robertson, and of my order to Major Beard, will fully inform you of the steps I have taken to relieve the district of Mero from the invasion of the Creeks. I have not yet heard from that district, since the 1st of April, nor from Major Beard, since he left southwest point. It is to be feared that my express, James Donelson, who left this on the 14th of April, is cut off; as he had my order to return without delay. The Cherokees appear generally disposed for peace, but they have not yet determined whether they will accept the invitation of the President to visit him at Philadelphia. This delay, in my opinion, is owing to the embarrassment they must feel on account of the war between their neighbors on all sides.

I am informed by a letter, dated 30th April, at the Look-out,* that two parties of Creeks had passed that place between the 25th and 30th, for war against Cumberland, one of twenty-five the other of eighteen, and that, on the 26th, a party returned from Cumberland, with hair; how much was not mentioned by my informant (Arthur Coody.) Governor Shelby assures me the report, respecting General Logan, as mentioned by Colonel Buford, is not well founded.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor Blount to General Robertson.

I am, sir, &c.

Governor Blount to General Robertson.

KNOXVILLE, March 28th, 1793.

SIR:

Your letter of the 12th was handed me by James Donelson, express, enclosing the talk of the Chickasaws, both of which were immediately forwarded, by James Carey, to the President, who was just prepared to set out as an express with other information, respecting the hostile disposition of the Creeks and Cherokees—that is, of the Upper Creeks and Lower Cherokees, towards the United States, particularly Cumberland.

At, or about, the next full moon, (the 25th April) it seems you may expect the greatest danger from them, and, to guard against them, you will order into service a full company of mounted cavalry, or infantry, that is, to consist of eighty men, exclusive of commissioned officers, to way-lay the Indian paths leading to the settlements, and to explore the woods where their principal camps may probably be formed, wherever it may be, whether on the lands of the United States, or within the limits of fifty miles from the settlements, and if they find Indians within these limits, to treat them as enemies, women and children excepted. It appears to me that this company of men had best be divided into three parties, to be commanded by the different commissioned officers; but, this is submitted to you. Let the officers be of the most active and enterprising, such as you can best depend on, and may be cavalry or infantry officers, and so may the privates be, of either: but be they of which they will, they must go well armed, with a firelock in addition to such other arms as they may choose to carry. This number of active enterprising men, advanced into the country through which the Indians have to pass, before they can reach the frontiers, would either check their incursions, by intercepting some party or other, or by intimidating them by the sign of the horses, by which they would discover the settlements were alarmed, and on their guard. In either case, you know it is probable they would retreat, and leave your frontier in security. You will order this company to commence this service between the fourteenth and eighteenth of April, and discharge them on or before the 14th May, unless the danger should continue so imminent as to render their service indispensable for the protection of the frontiers; and in that case, you will continue them in service, not exceeding two months, or may, if the danger continues imminent, discharge this company, on or before the 14th May, and order out another, as the succeeding moon is approaching the full, for a month's service.

These troops are at liberty to pursue incursive parties, not only to the limits of fifty miles, but even to the Tennessee, and punish them in the severest manner. I shall order out, from this district, another company, at least to pass at Southwest Point on the 18th April, turn off Cumberland mountain, to the southward of the trace, cross the Cany fork high up, and strike the traces that lead from the Lower Cherokees to the Cumberland settlements, and scour the country down to Nashville.

Mr. John McKee is returned, and gives no assurances of peace with the Lower towns. Watts met him at Chatoga, against the wish of Talotiske, and the warriors, and when he returned to Will's town they insulted him so that he determined to leave that town, and actually did pack up, and go off fourteen miles, and the young warriors sent and persuaded him back. Small parties of Creeks are daily passing and repossessing the Lower towns. They carried along the scalps of the people killed in February, on Cumberland, both white and black. Small parties of the Lower Cherokees are equally engaged in the business of killing the citizens of the United States, and stealing their property.

I am glad to hear of the certainty of the war with the Chickasaws and Creeks, but what part the United States will act, is not in my power to determine. I shall not feel myself at liberty to take any part in it, nor grant any part of the supplies they ask, until ordered by the President, therefore, shall endeavor that the messengers shall be detained here until advice is obtained from him. As to corn for the Chickasaws, you must supply them with such quantity as is necessary for their support, on the cheapest and best terms you can; you had best postpone giving any positive answer to them, until I hear from the President. I shall set out for Philadelphia, in eight or ten days, if General Smith arrives safe, of which I hope there is no doubt, in which case you know, by the constitution, the Government devolves on him.

I am, &c.

Governor Blount to General Robertson.

KNOXVILLE, April 14th, 1793.

SIR:

Enclosed is a copy of my letter and order of 28th March, by James Deraque, which I hope is to your hands days past. Yesterday I received undoubted information, which goes in confirmation of that on which my order of the 28th was founded, that, previous to the 5th instant, and since the 29th March, six hundred and seventeen Creeks have passed the Tennessee, in four different parties, declaring their intentions for war against the United States, and principally against the district of Mero. This number of Indians, to be sure, appears truly alarming; but, when it is recollected that their mode of warfare is never to risk their persons, I flatter myself the company already ordered will have the effect either to repulse or deter them from invading your frontiers. But, should you judge another company of mounted infantry or cavalry is indispensably necessary for the protection of your frontiers, and for the repelling those hostile and savage invaders of your country, you are at liberty to order it out, subject to my instructions of the 28th March, for a tour not exceeding one month. Permit me again to repeat to you, that these companies, whether one or two, to be entitled to pay, must actually range in advance of the settlements, as directed in my letter of the 28th March. From one hundred and sixty to five hundred mounted infantry will march to your relief as soon as possible, by the route as pointed out by my letter of the 28th March.

I have lately seen John Watts, and had a conference of two days with him, and other chiefs, among them Double-head, in which I made known to them the wish of the President that a full representation of the Cherokees should accompany me on a visit to him at Philadelphia. They replied that a full council of the nation was to be held on the 27th instant, when the President's request should be taken into consideration, and an answer given me.

Watts appeared very friendly, and to him and the Maw I am indebted for the information respecting the Creeks; and not only him, but the Cherokee nation in general, appear opposed to the conduct of the Creeks, and sincerely wish peace. It would seem as if the visit of McKee to Watts, and other measures taken by Government, would have the desired effect, so far as respects the Cherokees—the restoration of peace. It has been reported, on the authority of Colonel Buford, of Kentucky, that General Logan was about to raise a party to invade the Lower Cherokee towns. Such a measure would be totally destructive of the plans and measures of the President, and would destroy the hopes of returning peace. Should he attempt to march a body of men through the district of Mero, it will be your duty to command him, in positive terms, to desist from his object of invading the Cherokee towns, and to warn him of the evil consequences that will attend such a measure. This you may do, verbally, if you please, but you must also do it in writing for your justification. I have written Governor Shelby on the subject. In this I do not mean to prohibit the General from ranging the woods, as far as permitted by my orders of the 28th March, nor from chastising Indians within those limits.

I am, sir, &c.

*Governor Blount to General Robertson.*KNOXVILLE, April 18th, 1793.

SIR:

Major Beard, on his arrival at Nashville, will receive orders from you (which let be in writing) as to his operations to relieve the district of Mero from the invasion of the Creeks, and to the route he shall return to Southwest Point, provided he is to be permitted to return to that place in thirty one days from the time he leaves it. He will shew you my orders of this date to him.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

*Governor Blount to Major Beard.*KNOXVILLE, April 18th, 1793.

SIR:

The object of your command is to relieve the Cumberland inhabitants, Mero district, from a powerful invasion of the Creeks, who passed the Tennessee for war against the United States, particularly that part thereof.

To effect that object, you will march from this place, and proceed, without delay, by way of Southwest Point, and the southern, or upper waters of the Cany fork, to the paths which the Creeks generally pass to war against that district, and to the woods in which they form their camps, and from which they annoy the inhabitants of Cumberland in smaller parties. You will have with you, for your guide, Richard Fimnelson, a Cherokee, who is perfectly acquainted with both, and on whose fidelity you may fully depend. On your arrival at either of the before described paths or woods, you are to consider all the Indians you come across therein, or on the paths, or in the woods on the waters of Cumberland river, as low down as the mouth of Red river, Creeks and enemies, unless the contrary appears, and treat them as such, paying regard to the most humane rules and customs of war. I repeat, again, you are to consider all Indians found on the waters of Cumberland river as Creeks and enemies, and treat them as such, unless the contrary appears. But, should you come across Chickasaws, Choctaws, or Cherokees, and know them to be such, you are to consider them as friends, unless they give you proofs of their hostility, and then, as enemies. It is probable you will find none of these three last described tribes to the eastward of Nashville, and you will not go to the west of it, except you are so ordered by General Robertson. On your arrival at Nashville, you will receive the orders of General Robertson, in writing, both as to your operations during your stay in the district, and the route you are to return, to which you are to pay strict obedience. You will take your route to Nashville from the upper southern waters of the Cany fork, in such direction as you shall judge proper, and in such time, keeping in view the object of your command, which can be best effected by falling on and destroying the principal camps of the Creeks, on the Cany fork, and the other southern waters of Cumberland river, and by intercepting, or pursuing on the paths, incursive parties.

You are not to go to the southward of the Cumberland waters, except in pursuit of a flying enemy, and, in that case, you may, if you judge it prudent, pursue even to the Tennessee.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

May 9, 1793.—The number of men under the command of Major Beard, officers inclusive, is 125. They marched from Southwest Point on the 29th April.

KNOXVILLE, May 12, 1793.

SIR:

Yesterday evening my express, James Donelson, returned, via Kentucky, (being afraid to venture the night way) with letters from General Robertson, who lives near Nashville, dated 25th April, and with others from other officers, who live more to the eastward, that is, on his road to this place, as late as the 29th; from which the enclosed list of murders is collected. Donelson adds, that, before he left the Cumberland settlements, he was informed that a station had been attacked near Nashville, after his departure from it, but did not learn the particulars. The enclosed extracts from General Robertson's letter, will inform you of the supplies he has made to the Chickasaws. There are various reports in circulation respecting the war between them and the Creeks, but none that can be depended on as certain. Among others, it is said that the Choctaws have joined the Chickasaws. It is not certain, though I believe it. The Cherokee chiefs have not yet informed me whether they accept the invitation of the President to accompany me to Philadelphia, nor have I heard from Major Beard, since his departure from Southwest Point, on the 29th April.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

April 9th. Col. Isaac Bledsoe, killed in his field, near his own house, by a party consisting of twenty.

10th. The house of Mrs. Simpson was set on fire in the night, but the flames were extinguished by men who were in the house.

11th. John Harman and — Dowdy were killed near the mouth of Sycamore, in Tennessee county.

14th. Henry Howdeshell and Samuel Pharr, killed, near General Rutherford's.

18th. John Benton, killed, on the road between Captain Reese's and Col. Winchester's mill; the same day two men were killed on the road to Kentucky.

19th. Two men were killed near Clarksville.

26th. Richard Shaffer and — Gambeel were killed, and James Dean wounded.

27th. A party of Indians, at first supposed to be sixty, but since, on good grounds, believed to be two hundred, attacked the station at Greenfield, and killed John Jervis, and a negro fellow belonging to Mrs. Parker. This station was saved by the signal bravery of William Neely, William Wilson, and William Hall, who killed two Indians and wounded several others.

28th. Francis Ramer was killed near the Dripping spring, on the trace between Cumberland and Kentucky. A number of horses have been killed and taken, no particular account of which was taken.

Extract from General Robertson's letter.

They (the Chickasaws) are perfectly pleased: I furnished them with sundry articles of clothing, and answered a number of requests from the chiefs, but as sparingly as possible. These requests were for axes, smoothing irons, hoes, drawing knives, handsaws, nails, and other small articles, such as files, &c. I sent seven axes, two handsaws, six smoothing irons, a number of other small articles, one small barrel of nails, fifteen bushels of salt, as the chiefs informed me that the Mountain Leader requested a quantity of that article might be sent, on account of the war, and the scarcity was so great they would be obliged to kill a number of their cattle, and have much of each spoiled, if I did not send salt. This made me send more than I otherwise would. I shall not think myself at liberty to furnish any other articles than provisions, hereafter, without your Excellency's instructions. I engaged with Mr. John Hynes to carry 1100 bushels of corn to the Chickasaw Bluff, for which I am to give one hundred and fifty dollars; and I furnished three hands to assist in taking it down: it is in a flat bottomed boat. I could not get it down lower, and to have sent it in pettiaugers, would have cost much more, for it would be a large one that would carry 200 bushels, and would require three hands to man her. At this time I cannot get hands under thirty dollars the trip. I sent one large pettiauger manned with two of the Indians and two white men.

KNOXVILLE, May 15th, 1793.

SIR:

Enclosed is a copy of a letter I yesterday received from Mr. James Ore, with my notes subjoined thereon. Mr. Ore is a man from whom I have received many communications, respecting both Creeks and Cherokees, and have ever found him correct. He has traded, and has good sources of information in both nations. It is my opinion that the Cherokees will not be brought to join the war; but a few days will determine. I do not mean to say that I believe none of the young Cherokees will join in the war, for I have no doubt that some of them are now out with the Creeks, and many have gone northwest of the Ohio.

When it was found that corporal McDonald, and the two privates who deserted with him, were among the Cherokees, I considered it essential to the service of the United States to bid a reward above the sum authorized by the act of Congress, for their recovery. Their escaping to the Indians, and continuing with them in security, would have encouraged others to desert, and their continuing with the Indians, spreading the most injurious falsehoods, would have been attended with the worst of consequences to the United States. It is due to Lieut. Richards to inform you, that his conduct is invariably so marked with propriety, and perfect sobriety, that they were without the shadow of complaint against him as the cause of their desertion. They express they had no cause. The inducement was a desire to pass down the river to the Natchez, where they hoped to obtain forty dollars per month for their services on the public works.

I am, &amp;c.

HANGING MAW'S, May 13th, 1793.

SIR:

I send you McDonald* by four of Lieutenant Telford's men. He was brought by the Overhill Indians, for which I promised them twenty dollars; and they insisted for a keg of whiskey, which I gave them. This day the Northwards† and Cherokees hold a great talk at Will's town. The Hiwasee head-man has gone to that talk, and promises to let the Maw know what is done at it. The Northwards urge them to war, and tell them they will assist them to take Cumberland. I am informed that the Lower Creeks have taken the Shawanese talk, and that the Creek nation is all rushing for war. Five days ago three Creeks were seen on the north side of the Clinch; and they said they would cross, and take horses and hair.‡ John Boggs§ has not yet come. I shall send you the news as soon as possible, of the result of the council between the Lower towns and Shawanese.

P. S.—I am also informed of seventy Creeks going against Kentucky: fourteen days ago they passed the Running Water. I think the Shawanese will kill as they go home.

KNOXVILLE, May 23, 1793.

SIR:

Arthur Coody, of Look-out Mountain town, of the Lower Cherokees, with several other Cherokees, and two Chickasaws, arrived here on the 20th instant, by whom I am informed that two parties of Creeks, one consisting of twenty-eight and the other of forty-two, had lately passed his house, on their return from Mero district, (Cumberland settlements) with scalps and horses. The first party had one scalp, which they boasted was that of a great warrior, Colonel Bledsoe. The second party must have been the same that attacked and were repulsed at Greenfield station. The two admitted their joint loss to be one warrior killed, another killed or taken by a party of Major Beard's mounted infantry, and three wounded. The meeting of the Cherokee chiefs with the Shawanese ambassadors, (the same who were with the Creeks) was about to take place at Will's town, when Coody left the Lower towns, but he adds, the Cherokees will not engage in a war against the United States. The next object of the Cherokee chiefs will be to take into consideration the invitation of the President to visit him; and I now have hopes that they will determine to accept it. Mr. Willbanks will go on to Detroit with the Shawanese ambassadors. The reason he has given for leaving the Creeks, is, that three hundred dollars were offered for his person, and he was apprehensive of being delivered up by the Indians. I am without official information, from Mero district, since the 25th ultimo; but I have been informed, by some travellers from there, that, on the 8th instant, three children were wounded; one of them scalped, and a fourth killed, near Nashville, by Indians. The same travellers informed me of the arrival of Major Beard at Nashville, without having fallen in with but one party of Indians, of whom they killed one, and wounded another.

The Creek and Chickasaw war does not go on with the ferocity and spirit that might be expected, owing, as it is said, to Mr. Panton having informed the Creeks, that, if red people went to war with each other, he would withhold all supplies of arms and ammunition, adding, that was all the United States could wish, to see red people at war with each other, and then they could take their land with more ease. The Bloody Fellow brought a letter, addressed to the Cherokees, from the Baron de Carondelet, recommending peace to them with the United States, and all other nations, so Mr. Coody informs me, who has often read and interpreted it to the chiefs. He also brought to the nation, and forwarded to me, a very friendly and polite letter, from Governor Gayoso, in which he declares, that, if any of the Spanish officers, of Louisiana, have encouraged the Indians to go to war against the United States, it is unknown to him, and that, for his own part, he has ever acted friendly towards the United States. Nevertheless, my doubts are, by no means, removed, respecting the conduct of Governor O'Neal and Mr. Panton, but I am lately led to believe their object was mercantile, rather than national. A war between the United States and the Southern tribes, would throw the trade of the Indians engaged, into Panton's hands, at Pensacola, as in time of the British war. Governor O'Neal is said to be interested with Panton in trade. Coody informs me that, notwithstanding the number of Creeks, who have been to war lately on the Southwestern frontiers, the Creek chiefs, in council, declined taking hold of the bloody hatchet, presented them by the Shawanese ambassadors, as to the United States, but received it as to the Chickasaws; and were about to set out in great numbers against them, and were stopped by Panton's message, as before mentioned. The Spaniards being the friends of the United States, it would seem, that they could not consistently cherish and support, in the very bosom of their government, a refugee tory, (Mr. Panton) whose interest and inclination is to keep the Southern Indians, more or less, in a state of warfare against the United States, and whose influence and address put the gratification of both in his power. I wrote you, and forwarded the letters by post, (via Hawkins Court House) on the 9th, 12th, and 15th instant.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

KNOXVILLE, May 24th, 1793.

SIR:

I am under the painful necessity of informing you of a horrid attempt of three persons, yet unknown, to kill, near my house, three Indians, two Chickasaws, and a Cherokee. The circumstances are: To-day, about three * Corporal McDonald, a deserter, who had taken refuge among the Cherokees, and who had told them a variety of falsehoods, to the injury of the United States, the better to recommend himself to their notice and protection; and actually had address enough to induce a part of the nation to protect him against such confidential fellows as were sent from Chota, by the Maw, after him.

† The same ambassadors, from the Shawanese, who passed the Lower Cherokee towns in the early part of the spring, and went on to the Lower Creeks, of which repeated mention has been made in former communications.

‡ Bishop's fifteen horses, which were taken on Saturday, 11th instant, were very probably taken by these three Creeks.

§ John Boggs is an honest half-breed, of Chota, who has been some weeks down in the Lower towns, trading, and for days past expected home.

o'clock, the three above described Indians were out in the woods, about six hundred paces from my house, unarmed, and unsuspecting any injuries being offered them, in search of their horses, when three armed men approached them, fired upon them, wounded one of the Chickasaws (John Morris) with a ball, through the body; hit the other two with balls in the clothes; pursued them some distance, and actually caught the other Chickasaw by the hunting-shirt, but happily it was old and tender, and he, as well as the Cherokee, escaped unhurt. It is doubtful whether Morris' wound is mortal or not, I incline to believe it is not; but perhaps my belief is founded too much on my wishes. This Morris speaks English well, and has repeatedly been at my house, and is well known and respected in the town and neighborhood; and the other Chickasaw was his brother, and one of those warriors who joined General St. Clair with Piomingo. I instantly went to John Morris, whom his brother, and the Cherokee who escaped, reported to be killed, and, in a short time, about thirty people from this place appeared highly exasperated at the horrid attempt; and ten of them were immediately mounted on horses, and went in pursuit, or rather search, of the murderers; but, as yet, no circumstances have transpired, by which any opinion can be formed as to who they were.

Considering it essential, to the honor of the Government, that such atrocious offenders should be discovered and brought to justice, I have offered a reward of one hundred dollars, which I hope will meet the approbation of the President, and shall, in the morning, issue a proclamation accordingly. Upon examination, three of the horses belonging to the Indians are missing, and certainly stolen by the persons who fired on Morris.

I have the honor, &c.

KNOXVILLE, May 28th, 1793.

SIR:

I have now to inform you that my hopes of the recovery of John Morris, the Chickasaw, were not well founded; he died the day after he was wounded. A variety of circumstances led to a suspicion that Jacob Clement and Daniel Sleekley (two Dutchmen) were two of the party who fired upon him; and yesterday they were brought before two Justices of Knox county, (Colonel White and Mr. Green) and, upon examination of thirteen evidences, such proof came out as affords violent presumption that Micajah Carter, David Loveless, and Davis Stockton, were the persons who fired upon Morris, and against whom a warrant has issued. One reason why the suspicion fell on Jacob Clement, was, that he had lately lost two sons, killed and scalped by Indians, and had said he would take satisfaction. I have before informed you of the killing of his sons. It is a general opinion, that the persons who killed Morris intended to kill a Cherokee, against whom the frontier people, in general, are very much exasperated, for the many injuries they received, or believe they have received, from them, since the treaty at Holston; and, on the other hand, they are generally very friendly to the Chickasaws.

I caused Morris to be buried with the military honors due to a warrior of his friendly nation, at the usual burial-ground of the white people, and walked myself with his brother as chief mourners. The inhabitants of the town and adjacent country, generally, attended, and I can truly say, that I have rarely seen more sorrow expressed at a burial than at his. His brother and grandfather (an old white man eighty years of age) returned on Sunday, (the 26th) to the Cherokee towns, with Coody—the Hanging Maw and the other Cherokees apparently well satisfied, that is, convinced that Morris was killed either through mistake for a Cherokee, or by some disorderly person, contrary to the wishes and order of Government, and determined not to seek satisfaction. Morris, himself, expressed his wish that no satisfaction should be taken for him, just before he expired, except on the person who injured him, when discovered. Bob Thompson, and his son Tom, the two Chickasaw runners, who have been with me since the departure of Carey, appear also well satisfied, and highly pleased with the attention paid Morris in his burial. A brother of the Noon-day was one of the party who came up with the Maw and Coody, to whom, as well as the brother of Morris, (James Anderson) I considered it politic, nay essential, that pretty liberal presents should be given, the more effectually to bury their sorrows; and at this critical time, I thought it the interest of the United States to give some presents to the other Cherokees, who were of the party, and to the old white man, the grandfather of Morris.

On the evening of Saturday, (25th) Mr. Ore arrived here from the Maw's, who informed me that, on the 24th, Bob M. Clemore, a warrior of Watts' party, had arrived at the Maw's, as a runner, with a message from Watts, in the following words: "That the council of Will's town, with the Shawanese ambassadors, had broke up, and that all was straight; that he himself (Watts) would be up in five nights, and give the particulars, and with him Talotiske, the Bloody Fellow, and other chiefs; that he neither wrote nor sent the particulars of the proceedings at Will's town, for fear of some mistake." By "all being straight," I understand at least, that the Cherokee chiefs are for peace with the United States. Immediately after the council broke at Will's town, the Shawanese ambassadors, with Willbanks, proceeded to the Northward. I shall not permit Watts and his party to come here, as he wishes, but meet him at the Tennessee, or at Henry's, (the frontier house) lest some other untoward circumstance may take place, and at once destroy the hopes of returning peace, that has already cost much trouble, time, and expense. Many of the Creeks, in different parties, have recrossed the Tennessee, at the Lower Cherokee towns, and returned home with some scalps, not as many as might have been expected, and many valuable horses. The saddle bags, with the letters belonging to Ross, the post-rider, who was killed on the Kentucky road, are in the Lower Cherokee towns, carried in by the Shawanese who reside there. On Saturday, the 18th instant, ten horses were stolen from Pigeon, Jefferson county, and carried to Chilhowee, by Cherokees, from three very poor men, who have not even another left to draw their ploughs. I have demanded them from the Maw, and other chiefs of the Upper towns, but I am very sure they have not power or influence sufficient to have them restored.

In the morning of Saturday, the 25th instant, Thomas Gillum, and his son James Gillum, were killed and scalped, by Indians in the Racoon valley, near Clinch, eighteen miles from this place. The people who buried them, judging from the sign, report the number of Indians to be twelve. On the same day the sign of several other parties of Indians were discovered in that neighborhood, making in the whole upwards of thirty; and more than twenty horses were stolen, which were traced to Clinch. I have ordered Captain John Beard to give immediate pursuit, with fifty mounted infantry, and to scour Cumberland mountains in search of them, where it is supposed their main camp is formed, limiting his tour to fifteen days.

In giving this order, I was governed, not only by the justice of punishing the offenders, but, by the policy of keeping (if possible) the frontier people satisfied, under their many sufferings; that is, so far so that they may not openly insult Government; and a pursuit by so numerous and powerful a party, even if the offenders are not overtaken, will teach the Indians to know that their repeated injuries are no longer passively to be borne, and intimidate other parties from committing depredations on that part of the frontiers.

You, sir, can more readily conceive, than I express, the feelings and murmurings of a people in the habit of frequently seeing their friends and relations killed and scalped, and themselves robbed of their property, without the hope (as they declare) of seeing an end to their sufferings, except in their own deaths, or by abandoning their houses and homes on the frontiers. My situation is that of daily hearing their complaints, without the power of redress.

Two war clubs, left by the mangled bodies of Gillum and his son, of a form unlike any remembered to have been seen among the Cherokees, induce me to believe that it was not Cherokees who killed them; but people in general are so prejudiced, that they believe every murder is committed by Cherokees, commit it who will.

I have the honor to be, &c.

KNOXVILLE, June 4th, 1793.

SIR:

Yesterday Major Beard returned from the tour of duty, for the relief of the district of Mero (Cumberland) under my order of the 18th April, a copy of which has been transmitted to your office. He appears very literally to have complied with it: found many camps formed by Creeks, which are easily distinguished from the camps of other Indians, and lately abandoned; but was so unfortunate as to fall in with only three small parties, of which he killed two, and wounded, as is known of to a certainty, three, and it is believed more. The mounted infantry, of Mero district, killed one Creek. At one of the Creek camps, which Major Beard saw, there had been just before one hundred and thirty-nine warriors, and at many others from twenty to sixty.

My object in ordering these troops to range in search of the main camps of the Indians, in preference of immediately on the frontiers, was to intimidate the Indians, as well as to kill them: and from the little damage done the district of Mero, compared to what might have been expected, from so powerful a number, I am led to hope that object has, in a great measure, been effected; and even in future they will not feel themselves easy on these grounds, lest another party of horsemen should be on them. Letters from General Robertson, by Major Beard, inform me, that, on the morning of the 16th May, Moses Brown, in his cornfield, four miles from Nashville, and in the evening of the same day, Mr. Mullen, at the cotton manufactory, were killed by Indians. By the same conveyance, the General forwarded a letter from the Chickasaws to himself, of which you have enclosed a copy. On the date of that letter, the Choctaws had not joined the Chickasaws. The reason is believed to be fear, that, if they do, the Spaniards, on whom they are dependent for their trade, will stop it. Yesterday, arrived here express, Mr. Woodward, from the Lower towns, by way of Estanaula, by whom I received several letters from the Cherokee chiefs, and white people residing among them, from which you have enclosed, an extract from the Glass, and a copy of that of the chiefs, affording fresh assurances of the peaceful disposition of their own nation, and additional evidence of the hostile disposition of the Creeks. Mr. Woodward informs me, that, on the twelfth day of May, he saw at Hightower, one of the southern Cherokee towns, sixty-five Creeks, on their way for war against the frontiers of South Carolina or Georgia, or both, about Tugelo and Keowee, and that party informed him, that two other parties of Creeks, equally strong, had gone against the frontier of Georgia, more to the southeast. On Saturday, the first instant, a party of ten Indians attacked Holmark's station, on the Bull-run, near where Thomas and James Tillum were killed; but it was relieved by a party of Captain John Beard's mounted infantry, just in readiness to pursue the murderers of the Gillums. At this moment, I have an express that two small parties of Indians were yesterday seen near the same place, and that several families are to-day moving in for security. Davis Stockton, David Loveless, and Ephraim Carter, have been to-day examined before three justices, touching the murder of John Morris, the Chickasaw, and violent as the presumption of their guilt appeared, on the examination of evidences against Clement and Stickley, their innocence now appears. They proved an alibi. So secret has this unmanly, inhuman, and impolitic murder, been executed and concealed, that now, no conjecture can be formed as to who were the authors of it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of the Glass' letter to Governor Blount.

SPRINGHILL, May 20th, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I received your letter of the 24th ultimo, by Mr. Woodward; likewise, I heard the other letters directed to Watts, and the other head-men, at Will's town. You desire me to let you know concerning the Creeks. They are much the same as they were, daily passing to Cumberland. You likewise want to know what time we shall be ready to go to Philadelphia. We have not, as yet, our affairs properly settled, and it will take some time before we shall get our affairs properly settled; but the Bloody Fellow, and Scantee, and some others, will start for the Hanging Maw's, in five nights from this date; you and they will see each other, and they will let you know the news much better than writing.

Chickasaw chiefs to General Robertson.

CHICKASAW NATION, April 29th, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I some time ago sent you a talk in great haste. I now send you another, to confirm what I wrote you before. I am well acquainted with you, and many of your head-men, and used often to go and see you, and talk with you; but I don't know when the time will come that ever I shall see you again. This is a clear, bright day, that I am now talking to you in; but I don't know whether I shall survive ten days longer, as I am informed of a large army of Creeks that are coming against this nation. Nevertheless, I have taken every regular step, and made every preparation to receive them. I hope, when you receive this, you will think of the former promises to assist us against that, or any other nation.

I am, your friend and brother,

PIAMINGO.

MY FATHER:

I call you Father; I've a right so to do, as I received my being from one of your nation. I am, therefore, to acquaint you, that it is the friendship of this nation to your people that has caused this war to fall on us. Now, I would be glad to know whether you will assist us, or leave us to fight and suffer by ourselves. You have been a long time threatening the Creeks, and sending us word that we should hear of your guns firing in the Creek nation, but the Creek guns have fired on this nation, first; therefore, I hope you will immediately assist us. The Creeks boast that your people are not men; for my part, I think otherwise, as I have often heard of your bravery against the Northern nations. Their reason for boasting is, because you never went against them. I hope you will, when you receive this; that you will make ready immediately, and go against them: for, let a man be ever so small, let him have a big heart, and that makes the man.

I am your son,

WILLIAM GLOVER.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I am to inform you that I have just now arrived from the Creeks, where I very narrowly escaped with my life. They killed three Chickasaws while I was in that nation, and I expect they have killed more since I left it, as there is a village of Chickasaws in their land. Therefore, it is my request of you to make all despatch you can to assist us against that nation.

WILLIAM COLBERT.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

It was General Pickens' request to me, that, in case a war should arise in my nation, that I should personally acquaint him with it. Now, the Creeks have opened war against us, and, I am informed by a certain Creek half-breed, by the name of Alick Cornell, that General Pickens has treated with the Creek nation for a peace. It is the voice of every head-man in this nation, that you will think of the promises of assistance you often made them, in case of a war with any other. Now, this confirms a war with us and the Creeks.

So we all unanimously require and desire your assistance. I hope you have, by this time, sent the provision and ammunition we wrote you for.

BROTHERS: The Creeks killed Long-hair and his son, some time ago, but they have just now put that fresh in our memory, and as it was always the request of the white people that we should seek satisfaction for these two men, now the time is come that we shall seek that satisfaction that you desired us. You told us that, if any war should arise in this nation, that you would send your warriors to the Muscle Shoals. You mentioned in your letter, that, if any of our leaders, and their warriors, would go to Cumberland, your young warriors would accompany them against the Creeks. When your son comes in, that is, goes from hence, there shall a party accompany him to Cumberland. I send you this now, and shall, in a few days, send you another. I desire that, when you receive this, you will despatch an express to the President, as quick as possible. As I am now engaged in a war with the Creeks, and it was their own beginning, I am determined never to make a peace while I am alive.

PIAMINGO,
THOS. BROWN,
and six others.

KNOXVILLE, June 6th, 1793.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you a copy of a letter of yesterday's date, to the chiefs of the Cherokees, and an extract of a letter from Mr. John McKee, which will inform you of the state in which I leave the Indian business. I set out for Philadelphia to-morrow morning; shall pass through the upper part of North Carolina, but shall make no delay in my journey.

I am, &c.

Governor Blount to the chiefs of the Cherokees.

KNOXVILLE, June 5th, 1793.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I have received your letter, dated at Estanaula, May 23d, by the bearer, Mr. Woodward, in which, you inform me that your nation are determined for peace. This letter has given me great pleasure. Now, it appears, that both you, and your beloved Father, the President, wish peace, nothing remains but for you to go on to him at Philadelphia, as he has requested you, where all things will be settled, and where, upon all things being settled, the chiefs who go, and the nation at home, will be supplied with goods. All this I told Watts, and the Hanging Maw, at Henry's. I have several times so informed you, by letters, and I now repeat it. The happiness of both parties consists in peace, and I beg you to accept, without delay, the invitation of the President. It is good for your nation that you should. Now, my Friends and Brothers, I have to tell you, that, on Friday, that is, the day after to-morrow, I must set off myself to visit our common Father, the President; I did hope that you would have gone with me, but you delay so long that I can't stay for you, and, when you do go, you will go slow, and I must go in haste.

I shall inform our Father of the good conduct and intentions of your nation, and of the cruel and unprovoked war the Creeks are carrying on against the poor, defenceless, frontier people, who never did them any injury. I do not say the Creeks will be punished, because it is not with me to say what shall be done with them, but with your Great Father. But, I assure you, in great truth, that I believe he will punish them severely, that is, I believe he will send armies and destroy their nation. He has borne with them until he can no longer bear to see his innocent children killed, scalped, and robbed. Take care, my good friends, and keep your young warriors from joining, on any occasion, these Creeks, for fear your nation should get into difficulty if they do. I wish your nation peace and happiness. You have heard that I have sent strong parties of horsemen, well armed with good rifles, to the relief of Cumberland, from the invasion of the Creeks, and that many strong parties have been sent out from Cumberland, a great way to the Southward; other parties will be sent out into the same woods and mountains, in search and pursuit of Creeks. This information is given you that your people may not go into these woods or mountains, for it will be impossible to distinguish your people, if found in these woods or mountains, from the Creeks. In my absence, General Smith, whom most of you know, will act as Governor, and to whom you will attend, in the same manner as to myself.

I have before informed you, that John McKee would accompany you to Philadelphia, by way of Seneca, and provide for your journey; I now repeat it; he is a friend to your nation, to honesty, to truth, and to good men of all colors. Attend to him, be advised by him; he will lead your nation to peace and happiness. Don't let this talk pass in one ear and out at the other, but attend to it; if you do not, and your nation gets into a difficulty thereby, do not blame me; I advise you in friendship. I must say to you again, don't let your people join with the Creeks, nor steal horses: for the citizens of the United States have lost horses until they are very cross, and give me a great deal of trouble. If any are taken, they must be restored to the owners.

I am your friend and brother.

Extract—John McKee to Governor Blount.

HENRY'S STATION, June 3d, 1793.

I have recovered something from my indisposition, but am not well. Major King is here now, and brings information that Double-head, the Otter-lifter, and ten or twelve others, from the Lower towns, arrived yesterday at the Maw's. Watts is expected to-day. He says they do not talk like going to Congress soon. Two Cherokees, one is Charles Tucker's brother-in-law, and the other a fellow from Hiwasee, brought five horses from some place betwixt Cumberland and Kentucky, to the Maw's, who promised the major to take them away, after which, his (the Maw's) son, purchased two of them. The major himself scolded, and threatened them much, to no purpose.

The Chiefs of the Cherokees to Governor Blount.

ESTANAULA, May 23d, 1793.

We are come from the great talk at Will's town, with the Northward Indians, where they told us that the Creeks have taken the hatchet against the white people. Our nation is determined to be at peace, and we hope you will not blame us for any damages that may happen you. Be on your guard against them, as we inform you of danger. As they are always going to war, we hope you will not look to us for what they do to you; for we are for peace, as all the head-men of our nation have concluded to lie quiet, and let you and them try it. As the beloved men have taken pity on us, we will be at peace. This talk is from the heads and warriors of our nation; they hope that you will send trade among us, as you have done; as the young fellows are ordered to go a hunting, you will let our traders have powder and lead. As we have taken your talk, we hope you will take our talk; that is all we have to say. It is from heads and warriors of our nation.

LITTLE TURKEY,
JOHN WATTS,
and seven others.

PHILADELPHIA, August 13th, 1793.

SIR:

The trade with the Indians affords the possessors of it so many opportunities to give springs to their actions, and complexion to their national conduct, that it appears necessary every information should be given, that will throw light on the subject. Mr. Panton, a British subject, a Scotch refugee from Georgia, in the early part of the American Revolution, and now a resident at Pensacola, was, in the time of the last war, the particular friend and agent of Colonel Brown, who succeeded Colonel Stuart in the British superintendency of the four Southern nations of Indians, and through his hands passed the goods, generally, which the superintendent disposed of in presents to those nations; besides, he supplied these nations, generally, with such goods as they purchased. He was also agent for the officers of Brown's regiment of Florida rangers, of whom several, as high in rank as captains, were Cherokee half-breeds.

In other words, from the time Colonel Brown was appointed superintendent, to the close of the war, the goods generally with which the four Southern nations were supplied, whether presents from the British crown, and they were very liberal, or by purchase, passed to them through the hands of Panton, or his connexions, stationed at convenient places in the Floridas. Immediately after the peace took place, Mr. Panton, with others, of whom Alexander McGillivray was said to be one, and McClatchey, also a Scotch refugee, another, obtained a permission from the Spanish Government to import into the Floridas, directly from England, goods sufficient to continue their supply to these nations. His annual imports are estimated at forty thousand pounds sterling, on which, it is said, a duty of twenty-five per cent. is paid, but of this I am not certainly informed. This permission from the Spanish Government has enabled him to support the consequence and influence which he had acquired under Colonel Brown's superintendency, and to use both, as shall indulge his inclinations, or serve his interest.

It cannot be presumed that his inclination would lead him to good offices towards the United States, nor is it his interest that a free trade and unlimited influence should be kept up between the United States and those tribes; for it is a well known fact, that, since the treaties of New York and Holston, with the Creeks and Cherokees, he has been undersold on every part of the frontiers, even where the transportation has been by land from Philadelphia. Since those treaties, the Cherokees generally, and a part of the Creeks, have been supplied by the United States, but the greater part of the Creeks, and the Chickasaws and Choctaws, continue generally to be supplied by this man.

As a proof of the power and influence of trade, I will relate a recent fact. A large party of the Creek nation were collected together about the month of May, with a declared determination to go and cut off the Chickasaw nation. Mr. Panton, upon hearing of it, despatched a runner to them, with a message, giving them to understand that he did not give the red people supplies for to cut each other off, and that, if they did not desist from their determination against the Chickasaws, that he would stop all supplies from them; upon which the party dispersed and desisted.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ABINGDON, VIRGINIA, 140 miles from KNOXVILLE, October 5th, 1793.

SIR:

At this place I met John McKee, with Piamingo, the great chief of the Chickasaws, and four other Chickasaws, some of them of the first note in that nation, with a Mr. McClish, their interpreter, on their way to visit the President. I conceived it proper to state to them the danger of the fever at Philadelphia, in case they continued their journey, with such other reasons as occurred to me; whereupon, they have determined to return with me to Knoxville, and thence home. By this determination the United States are relieved of a heavy expense, which must certainly have attended the journey, and the President, and yourself, from the trouble of what appeared to me an unnecessary visit. The letters of the Secretary, General Smith, which are forwarded herewith, contain the most recent information from the Southern territory, to which I beg leave to refer you.

I am, sir, &c.

KNOXVILLE, October 12th, 1793.

SIR:

By the letter of the Secretary of the territory, of the 27th September, you have been informed of the large body of Indians that invaded the district of Washington on the 25th. It remains for me to inform you, that, on the 30th of that month, he issued an order to General Sevier, a copy of which you have enclosed, in consequence of which the General, with the force under his command, has passed the Tennessee, into the nation, in pursuit of these invaders. The long sufferings, and present spirit of the people, required such a measure. I shall embrace the earliest opportunity to report to you the progress and events of the pursuit. Since the Secretary's letter of the 25th, that is, on the second instant, Polly Lewis, a young lady of eighteen years of age, and a little brother, were killed on the south side of French Broad, passing a public road near Dandridge, (Jefferson court house) by a party of Indians, who waylaid it; and, on the next day, a Mr. Cunningham, going to assist in removing their bodies, was also killed by them; and on the same day, (the third) a party of Indians, consisting of thirty, plundered the house of Mr. Copeland, on the south bank of French Broad, Mr. Copeland and his family having, a few minutes before, crossed that river, and were eye witnesses of the number and depredations.

People having reported so repeatedly the loss of horses by Indians, without redress, have generally declined to report them at all to my office, for some time past; nevertheless, they are daily losing them, on some part or other of the frontiers. Many have lost every one they possessed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Secretary Smith to General Sevier.

KNOXVILLE, September 30th, 1793.

SIR:

In answer to yours of the 27th instant, which I acknowledge to have received, I hold it would be proper to follow the trace of that large body of Indians who massacred Mr. Caveat's family, on the twenty-fifth instant, and, if possible, inflict due punishment on them. The country is to be defended in the best manner we can, comporting, as near as may be, to my general instructions to you of the 17th instant.

I have the honor, &c.

KNOXVILLE, October 18th, 1793.

SIR:

I have not heard of General Sevier since his passing the Tennessee, on the 9th instant, nor has a return of his numbers been made to this office; but are reputed to consist of about six hundred mounted infantry. The measures that took place in my absence, the last of which is General Sevier's march into the nation, has cut off all communication with the Cherokees from this quarter; the only part that is open is by way of Seneca, General Pickens', and I have sent John McKee to obtain the best information that can be collected in that quarter. It is hardly necessary to say, that there appears but too little probability of a reconciliation with the Cherokees, until a general pacification with all the nations takes place, though it will be my duty to make every effort.

I am, sir, &c.

Letters from Daniel Smith, with sundry enclosures, to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, June 13th, 1793.

SIR:

It mortifies me much that the first communications I make you, after Governor Blount's departure, should be of so disagreeable a nature. The enclosed report of Major King and Daniel Carmichael will inform you of the perpetration of as inhuman an act as ever was committed—committed by Captain John Beard, who was ordered out by Governor Blount, before his departure, to inflict punishment on the murderers of the Gilhams, and positively restricting him from crossing the Tennessee. How detestable is this act to all good men!

I shall direct Colonel White to call a court martial for the trial of Captain Beard, and mean to give the judges and attorney for the district information of his violent conduct and injuries to the Indians, that they may exert the force of law against him under the eleventh article of the Holston treaty.

I had been, for some time past, suspicious that the rage of many of the inhabitants of this district would burst out in some very unjustifiable act. But this exceeds any thing that could have been supposed.

There are many, too many, individuals of this country, whose conduct is so violent that they have no just claim to the benefits of Government, while their frenzy continues; at the same time there are great numbers of meritorious citizens who ought instantly to have it. I have written to General Sevier to exert himself quickly to execute an order, issued to him by Governor Blount, to have one-third of the militia of Washington district made in readiness to march for the defence of the frontiers at an hour's notice. I did not call for them to be actually marched as yet, because a fortnight applied to labor, at this time of approaching harvest, would be highly beneficial to the inhabitants; and I must have certain information of a powerful invasion, or of its approach, before I call for them. Nor have I ordered Colonel White, of this county, to call out into actual service more than half of five of the more interior companies of militia of this county, who will be ordered to take post at the most proper places on the frontiers. I also enclose to you a copy of a letter which I addressed to the chiefs of the Cherokee nation; not that I believe my advice to them will be followed, but because I thought it my duty to make the attempt. I have directed Major King, if he believes his person could not be safe in a personal interview with any Indians he could meet near their towns, to hang up this letter in some conspicuous place, that they may be sure to get it. If it leads to any communications at all, it will be beneficial.

I regret the absence of the Governor, who, I hope, will soon be back again, for my situation is truly painful.
I have the honor to be, &c.

Major King and Daniel Carmichael's report to Secretary Smith, referred to in the foregoing letter.

CAPTAIN CHISOLM'S, June 12th, 1793—in the evening.

SIR:

At the appearance of day light this morning, Captain John Beard, with his company of mounted infantry, to our great surprise, made an attack on the Indians at the Hanging Maw's. They have killed Scantee, Fool Charley, the Hanging Maw's wife, Betty, the daughter of Kittakiska, and we believe eight or nine others, among them William Rosebury, a white man, the Hanging Maw shot through the arm, Betty, the daughter of Nancy Ward, wounded. The fire of this inhuman party seemed to be directed at the white people who were there as much as at the Indians. Therefore, we made our escape through it as quick as possible, and cannot give a minute account of the whole of the damage. By hard pleading, we got them to spare the rest of the Hanging Maw's family, and his house from being burnt. Such a detestable act as this would be base at any time, but, as they were there at the request of Governor Blount, it will be attended with fatal consequences, and retaliation will surely take place.

We informed the white inhabitants of Baker's creek, Nine-mile, and Little river, of this horrid deed, as we came here; they are much alarmed, blame the perpetrators, expect the utmost hostility of the Indians, and are crying out for assistance on the frontiers.

Copy of a letter from Secretary Smith to the Hanging Maw, and other Chiefs of the Cherokee nation.

KNOXVILLE, June 13th, 1793.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I still give you that appellation, though I confess we have not a right to have it retained. Governor Blount went away to Philadelphia at the time he told you he would. The young inconsiderate men have taken advantage of his absence to commit the atrocious act of yesterday morning. They say, as I hear, that some Indians stole some of their horses, whom they followed as far as Coyatee. Then, foolishly supposing these Indians were some of the party at the Hanging Maw's, went there and committed the violent deed of yesterday, of which I am ashamed, and despise the perpetrators: for their act was horrid and unmanly.

I wish you to be not too angry to hear good advice. I will tell you what I think is for the good of your nation. Don't join the Creeks in the unprovoked war they are carrying on against us, but listen to the advice of Governor Blount, and go to Philadelphia, by way of Seneca, not through this country, and Mr. John M'Kee, your friend, will go with you. Be not rash and inconsiderate. Hear what your and our great father, the President, will say. Go and see him, as he has requested. I assure you, in great truth, I believe he will give you satisfaction, if you forbear to take it yourselves.

I wish you to send to me some person, who can come in safety, to let me know what you will do, and let us try if peaceful communications can take place.

Letter from Daniel Smith to the Secretary at War.

KNOXVILLE, June 17th, 1793.

SIR:

Since writing you, on the 13th instant, some communications have taken place between the Hanging Maw and Double-head and myself. Copies of their letters to me, and mine to them, together with the copies of letters which I have wrote to John Watts, Edward Adair, and Major King, will show the state the business is now in. I can see no one who does not appear convinced a general war from the nation will ensue; and such are the opinions of Major King and Mr. Ore, whose names I mention because their opinions ought to have weight.

Letter from the Hanging Maw to the President of the United States.

COYATEE, June 15th, 1793.

BELOVED FATHER:

I received the talk of our great Father, and always held it fast. You sent me word, that nothing should happen me at my own house. It was but four nights after Governor Blount left home until this happened to me.

I am writing to the President of the United States. It is a long time since I have seen him, but I have seen him, when we were both young men and warriors.

It was but a few days since I received an invitation from the President to go to Philadelphia; part of our head-men had gathered at my house, and the balance were on the way, and a party of white people came and wounded me, and killed several more, some of them chiefs. We thought very well of your talk of restoring peace, and our land being made safe to us; but the white people have spoiled the talk at present. The heads of our land thought very well of going to Philadelphia, but some of them now lie dead, and some of them wounded. You need not look for us to go there at this time. The Little Turkey has sent to the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and has gone to the Creeks himself, to let these nations know that he was going to Philadelphia this Fall, that a head-man from each nation might accompany him, that the whole might agree on one thing, and all be at peace.

Letter from the Hanging Maw to Secretary Smith.

COYATEE, June 15th, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

It is but a few days since you were left in the place of Governor Blount. While he was in place, nothing happened. Surely they are making their fun of you. Surely you are no head-man nor warrior. I am just informed you will take satisfaction for me, and I shall reckon it just the same as if I had taken it myself. I reckon you are afraid of these thieves, when you talk of sending to Congress. If you are left in the place of Governor, you ought to take satisfaction yourself. It was but a few days since I was at your house, and you told me that nothing should happen to me nor any people at my house; but since that, blood has been spilt at both our houses. I reckon that the white people are just making their fun of you. Governor Blount always told me that nothing should happen me as long as I did live, but he had hardly got out of sight until I was invaded by them, and like to have got killed. I think you are afraid of these bad men. They first killed the Chickasaws at your house, and this is the second time of their doing mischief. I think you are afraid of them. When is the day that a white man was killed at my house? I think the white men make fun of you. Now, blood is spilt at both of our houses by your people. I think they are making fun of you, and won't listen to your talks.

Letter from Double-head to Secretary Smith, dated

COYATEE, June 15th, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I am still among my people, living in gores of blood. When is the day that I shall get a full answer from you? Be strong, and don't be afraid, but get satisfaction for me. I am still waiting to get a satisfaction talk from you. Why do you talk of sending to the President to ask advice? These people did not ask any advice when they came and killed our people: for the head-men can't give out any peace talk concerning going to Philadelphia until you give us satisfaction for what is done. The head-man is at the Lower towns. I am but a boy, although I am giving out this talk. I can't think of going to the Lower towns until I get a fuller answer. If you will give me satisfaction for my people, I shall think you our friend, and think you mean to do justice to our land. We have lost nine of our people, that we must have satisfaction for. My heart is much troubled about what has passed, and I shall not go from this place until I get a full answer from you, and as soon as I get a full answer, shall start down to the head-men, and let them know the truth of every thing. There is some of the first and principal head-men of our nation fell here, and they are not without friends, and the head-men of their land is their friends. This is the third time that we have been served so when we were talking in peace, that they fell on us and killed us.

Letter from Secretary Smith to Double-head, dated

KNOXVILLE, June 17, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I am in much sorrow and trouble on account of the blood which has lately been shed in your land in so disgraceful a manner. I want to redress your wrongs, and doubt not of doing it, if you forbear to take satisfaction yourselves. The Hanging Maw has written to our beloved father the President. I will have his letter conveyed, with one which I will write myself, to him and Governor Blount. I beg you to wait till you hear from them. The innocent ought not to die for the guilty, which would be the case if you take satisfaction yourselves. The President has waited long, and forborne to take satisfaction of those who have killed and robbed his people, because he knows the innocent would then be punished with the guilty, which would make him sorry. You know it was agreed, in the treaty at this place, that if any white men of the United States should go into your land and commit crimes there, against your people, they shall be punished for it in the same manner as if the crime had been committed against white people. You know that it was also agreed that, in case of violence being committed on the personal property of the individuals of either party, neither retaliation nor reprisal should be made by the other, until satisfaction should have been demanded of the offending party, and refused.

The President is a great and good man, and will keep his word, and I beg of you not to take satisfaction yourselves, but wait, and let us punish them for you. Thus may peace be restored to the land.

Letter from Daniel Smith to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, June 22d, 1793.

SIR:

Since writing you on the 17th instant, other communications have taken place with the Cherokees. The enclosed papers, which I have the honor to transmit, will shew what they have been, as nothing material is left out of them.

You will observe the Indians have agreed to wait and hear the determination of the President. The nation, because of scarcity of provision, and attention to their crops, is not in a condition for a general war, and I believe the chiefs are sincere; but I doubt their power to influence all small parties to pacific measures. It seems to me, that without some unexpected and unforeseen event diverts their attention, powerful invasions from them will ensue; I mean after sufficient time elapses to transmit your answer. The animosity from the whites continues as high against them as ever, as the Indians have lately stolen horses from Gamble's station, and, to my great pain, I find, to punish Beard by law, just now, is out of the question.

I have thought it expedient to order a subaltern's command of horse from Capt. Evans' company, not more than eight or nine, for a short time, to commence next week, to reconnoitre the woods for about twenty miles westward of Southwest Point, to discover the approach of an enemy, for within that bounds they will be most likely to direct their course to attack the northwest frontier. And I shall also use all means in my power to draw information from the nation.

I at first thought of writing you by post, but on reconsidering the matter, believe it best to send express, to prevent accidental delays.

After writing the foregoing, as I was closing the letter, Colonel Doherty arrived here, and brings me certain information of a large party of Indians being in Wear's Cove, on Little Pigeon; they have cut down about a quarter of an acre of corn, killed one horse, stolen ten others, took seven bags of meal out of Wear's mill, and broke to pieces such parts of the mill as they could, with little difficulty; also killed two cows and one hog. This was done on the night of the 19th instant; I have only to remark, that this mischief too quickly succeeded the unwarrantable action at the Hanging Maw's, to have been occasioned by it; and there is the strongest reason to believe the perpetrators came from the town of Tallassee, or another town above it. Colonel Doherty tells me Lieutenant Henderson, who is in service with about thirty men, was yesterday to set out in pursuit of the enemy. I have not yet determined what further order to take on the occasion, but I shall restrict the whites to defensive measures only.

[ENCLOSURES.]

Letter from the Little Turkey to Governor Blount, dated

NEW SENEGA, 5th June, 1798.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I am now to inform you of all that has passed here of late amongst us. A few days before our meeting with the Northward Indians, I received two talks upon paper, one from the Chickasaws, the other from the Choctaws, with their token of friendship; that is, beads, which was very good talks, desiring of us all, if possible, to keep peace with all the States of America, and all white people, and hold them all fast by the hand, which pleased me very much, and which I am determined to do as long as it is in my power; and if the Creeks or Northward Indians send or deliver any bad talks to us, not for us to mind them, nor to take hold of them, but to abide and remember the talks we hear and receive from our oldest brothers, the white people; which I sent them my talk back, and thanked them for their advice to me, and was glad to hear both nations thought and was of the same mind as myself. Now my friend I shall acquaint you with our meeting with the Northward Indians. But it is too long to put on paper; what is not wrote here I refer you to my friend John Thompson. When we all met I told all my people for every man to speak his mind freely, and not for them to think one thing and speak another; if any of them was for war let them say it publicly, and them that was for peace let them say it; now was the time for all of us to speak. As soon as I had done, the head-man of the Northwards got up and gave out his talk from thirty-three different nations, which was long, and not pleasing to me; I sat still to hear what answers my own people would give; they got up one after another, and every head-man delivered their talks to them, which pleased me very much. I then was the last; I got up and told how they had served us twice before now, encouraging us to break out war with the white people, and you would assist us; we did so twice. All the time we were at war, where was there a man of you ever offered to come to our assistance? Now you want to deceive us the third time; but don't you think now we are to be deceived again by your talks. You tell us you are at war with the white people, and you have plenty of goods and ammunition amongst you, and we might have the same amongst us. I now ask you how we should be supplied; you say we might go or send for it. I now tell you it is too far for us to go where they lived, and we could not make it ourselves; they said we might apply to the Spaniards; it was not far off. I told them they were strangers to me, and to the chief of our nation, and was a lying, deceitful, treacherous people, and was not real white people, and what few I have seen of them looked like mulattoes, and I would never have any thing to say to them. After I had told him a great deal more about other things which is not wrote here, which my friend will acquaint you of, the head-man of the Northwards got up, when he found we were all for peace, and said: He did not now want us to go to war, but for us all to be on our guard against the white people encroaching on us, taking our land from us, and when he wanted us to break out war, he would let us all know when to take up the bloody hatchet. I told him we head-men were all for peace, and to have no war, neither with white people nor red, but wanted peace with all, which was best for us all to do and abide by. You may be assured both the Spaniards and these very Northward talks that was given out all over the Creek nation, which created a great confusion amongst them, which had like to turned out to very bad consequences, and would had it not been for the Mad Dog of the Tuckaubatchees, who is a good man, and sent me in a good talk to keep peace if possible, as he wants to do, and not to give ear nor to take no notice of the Northward Indian's talk, which I have sent my talk back to him; I would not take hold of it as some of the Lower Creeks had done, for they were glad of the Spaniards' talk, and the Northwards, and killed some people, and would have done a great deal more, only the Mad Dog interposed, and I hope has put a stop to it; that it will not come to an open war, which would be very bad; but he says it is impossible for him to keep all the foolish mad young men from stealing horses, and killing white people, and this disturbance that exists in the Creeks, was the reason of my not answering yours, and our father's, the President's, kind invitation to go and see him this summer. Now I will acquaint you with my reason likewise; if all the head-men here was to go, perhaps it would be of very bad consequence; when we are all gone, perhaps some of our foolish young men, like the Creeks, might take the Northward talks and go and do mischief after we were gone; which we have concluded to stay until every one is settled in their mind, and we hear the Creeks and Georgia people have settled all their disturbances; and then I will let you know when we are ready to go with you to Philadelphia to see our father. And one great reason for our not going this summer is, corn being so scarce amongst us, that we are obliged to buy every grain we eat at a very dear rate, and what little we get are obliged to go at least one hundred and forty or fifty miles for it. I expect in three or four days our hoeing will be done for the first time; then I shall set off a corn hunting, and when I return I expect to come home naked, being obliged to give all my own clothes, as well as my woman's, for corn, and not me alone, for there is three or four more as poor as myself. Now, my friend, you may always look to hear the truth from me, for you shall never hear a lie, and all news that is of any consequence I would be glad you will write me, and let me know how you like our proceedings with the Northward Indians, and conclude with my being your friend and brother.

Letter from Secretary Smith to Edward Adair, dated

KNOXVILLE, June 17, 1798.

SIR:

The nature of my office, which I believe is not unknown to you, has led me to a knowledge of the communications which have come to the Cherokee nation to Governor Blount, and which no other person besides the Governor knows of. The late unwarrantable act committed by the white people, at the Hanging Maw's, will, I fear, impel the nation to take satisfaction without waiting an answer from the President, which would be wrong, contrary to the Holston treaty, and injurious to the nation, and perhaps involve it in ruin. For if they would wait, and not take satisfaction themselves, it would be given them by the President. I scarcely need observe how kindly it would be taken from you to write me.

Letter from Secretary Smith to Major King, dated

KNOXVILLE, June 17, 1793.

SIR:

You have, enclosed, a letter to Colonel Watts; also, two others, one to the Hanging Maw, and another to Double-head, which I want you to have read to the Indians, with any comments thereon, which you may judge requisite. I want to obtain intelligence from the Lower towns as soon as they have determined what they will do. For this purpose I have wrote John Watts a friendly letter, which I wish you to deliver to Mr. Woodward, who can deliver it to Watts, and it will furnish him with a pretext to deliver the one addressed to Mr. Edward Adair. Give Mr. Woodward the best advice you can, in private, when you deliver him Mr. Adair's letter, as to his conduct in this business, and how he may best effect bringing an answer back from Mr. Adair, unknown to the Indians. Mr. Woodward, for doing this business, will be entitled to pay, which you will acquaint him with. Adopt such conduct besides seeing the Indians, as will be most likely to bring out information from the Lower towns, from any other person you think it likely to proceed from.

Letter from Secretary Smith to John Watts.

KNOXVILLE, June 17th, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

No doubt but you have heard of the base act which has been committed by a party of wicked white men. This act was committed altogether without the knowledge of Governor Blount or myself. I have written to the President and to Governor Blount, and the Hanging Maw has also written to the President on the occasion. What I mean to advise you, is for the good of the nation. These good men of yours who have fallen, have friends, and they ought not to take satisfaction themselves, but wait till they hear from the President. You know he has long waited with those who have injured his people, and forbore to take satisfaction, because, in that case, innocent blood would be shed, which would make him sorry; besides, you know, in the treaty held at this place, it was agreed that, in case an act of violence or wrong should be done your people, they should not retaliate until satisfaction had been demanded of the offending party, and refused. The President is a great and good man, and will keep his word, and I beg of you not to take satisfaction yourselves, but wait, and let us punish them for you. Thus may peace be restored in the land.

Letter from John Thompson to Secretary Smith.

HANGING MAW'S, 18th June, 1793.

SIR:

I came here yesterday from the Little Turkey, with the letter to Governor Blount by me. But hearing that a man could not pass through the settlements with safety, I concluded to stay where I was. I send Mr. Fulton on with the letter, and I refer you to him for the news in this land, and likewise the Creeks, and among the Spaniards. He can give you the full accounts of all that's passing. You will see what the Turkey has to say. There are about forty or fifty Indians here, come to see the Hanging Maw, and others that were wounded, and provision is hard to be got, without you send orders or appoint a man to get it for them. There are a good many gone back that were coming to trade and pay what debts they owed to the people in the settlements. The Indians are for peace, if the whites will let them alone. They say it is best to leave it to the consideration of their brothers of the United States, and see what will be done for them. They have sent runners through the whole nation, not for a man to attempt to take satisfaction, until they see what is to be done. I am starving myself. I have spoken to Mr. Fulton to speak for some flour and some dried meat, for my own use, as I expect to stay here some time. I will be much obliged to you, if you will be so good as to assist him; and I have sent for other articles, such as goods, to be brought out to buy; there are furs here. There is no danger for a person to come out to this place.

The Indians intend to send you their talks; there are about ten or twelve head-men at this place.

Letter from the Bold Hunter and others to Secretary Smith.—18th June, 1793.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

We have received your letter, wherein you advise us to look into the treaty, and we have all concluded to do so, and leave it to our father, the President. We remember what was said at the treaty; it was told us by our brother, not to seek satisfaction until it was refused; and we hope that our brother will not tell us any falsity, saying that we should have satisfaction; and we hope that you will not forget it. And you acquaint us that you knew nothing of it, nor Governor Blount, of those men's coming. They have laid our warriors on the ground, which we are sorry for. We hope, as you have wrote to a good many head-men, that you would have satisfaction for us; and we have heard your good talk. We shall look to you to see it done; and not for our young warriors to say that you told them lies. And those men that came, that done the bad action, have made the beloved men ashamed, both white and red; as we think the white people should know better than to do so, without orders. We are here met together from almost all parts of the nation, and have heard your good talk; and we have sent your letters on to other head-men of different towns, that your talk may be heard through the land. I am from Hiwasee, who gives you this talk. It is not my talk alone, but all the head-men here present. This talk that we send you is the talk from us here. You leave every thing to the President, and we shall leave it to the Little Turkey, and warriors of our land. The next that is sent will be from them. They have all heard of the accident that has happened here, though the beloved men will hear your good talk, promising that you will use your endeavors to have satisfaction for us, as all the head-men and warriors will hear your promise. So much from your friends and brothers,

THE BOLD HUNTER AND OTHERS.

P. S. The beloved man of Hiwasee.—Now you have heard the warrior's talks, and I will send you mine. I am glad to find that my young warriors are for leaving every thing to the beloved men, and I hope that we will not tell lies to each other, as we are brothers.

We, beloved men, hope that things will be made up; though we leave every thing to the Little Turkey. He is the head-man of our lands, and we know that he is a good man, and expect that things will be made up on good terms, as he knows the talk that has been given out from the other head-men, and he will consider of us, and whatever he says shall be a law. Now, I have given you all my talk, I hope that you, my brother, will consider us. We are here, hungry, and will be glad you will send us something to eat; and when it comes, our hearts will be straight, to have something to eat and a little to carry home to our children. The young men are glad to hear your good talks, and hope you will send them some whiskey to make their hearts merry and straight, as we both eat, drink, and smoke. We will be glad you will send us a little salt. I hope you will send it down in three nights, as we want to go home and weed our corn. We want to have a little while we are at work.

TICKEKISKY.

Letter from Secretary Smith to John Thompson.

KNOXVILLE, June 20th, 1793.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 18th instant, and am pleased to be informed by it of the pacific conduct of the Cherokees. I have made some answers to the chiefs who wrote, which, though short, are intended for their good. They seem to know the true interest of the nation, and I hope they will follow it, in which I know they will receive your good advice.

The repeated hostilities committed on these frontiers had enraged the white people to such a degree, that their reason seemed to be laid aside. The Indians must refrain from stealing horses and doing acts of violence. If they will refrain, I can easily keep the white people from doing them any injury. They do right to send runners through the nation to prevent mischief. I hope they will be particular to do it to those places especially, which they most suspect to be disposed to spoil our good intentions. I believe some white men will carry goods to the Hanging Maw's. As to money, you do not write for any particular sum as due to you, nor can I, in Governor Blount's absence, ascertain what may be due; as he will be back in a short time, (for he will ride very fast) would it not be better to let this matter lie over till his return? Should Major King want assistance to have any goods forwarded to you, which you want, I will most cheerfully give it. You will transmit me any information, from time to time, that appears material, for which I will pay the express. I want you to present my thanks to the Little Turkey, in a particular manner, for his letter to the Governor, which he will answer on his return.

Letter from Secretary Smith to the Chiefs of the Cherokees.

KNOXVILLE, June 20, 1793.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I wish you all to know the great pleasure all the good white people, your Brothers, express, at hearing your determination to forbear, and not take satisfaction yourselves, for the late unwarrantable act; but, that you leave it to the President and Little Turkey, and other head-men, who every body knows to be good. Hereby you give proof of your knowing the true interest of your nation, and your love of peace.

But, my good Brothers, since we have agreed to look up to our common father, the President, to give satisfaction and do that which is right betwixt both people, let me advise you as a friend not to weaken his hands, or stop his ears against redressing your wrongs, by suffering bad men of your nation to injure the white people, by killing them or stealing their horses. It was such acts of your bad men, as these I mention, made the young white men mad, and they have given me a great deal of trouble. I believe some of your people up the Tennessee have lately stolen horses; if they have, they ought to restore them. I speak this for your good.

As I know you want some provisions, your friend Major King will tell you I have given directions to have some carried to you, which he will distribute. Also a little whiskey, which will be comfortable after the talks of business are over, and a little of the white people's tobacco, to promote good thoughts as you smoke.

The information of Samuel Fulton, a native of Fayetteville, North Carolina.

The propensity I had to travel was stimulated by an accidental meeting I had with Mr. McGillivray, who I saw at my mother's (then a resident of Guilford county) on his way to New York. I went to Pensacola, about two years ago, and resided in the house of a Captain John Lindar, who has lately died. I have been present at sundry meetings which Governor O'Neal had with the Creek Indians. I have heard him strongly urge these Indians to go to war with the citizens of the United States, to order all of them off, who resided westward of the old line, which had formerly been established by the court of Great Britain, and if they did not go, to kill them.

I have heard Mr. Panton also urge them, often times, to go to war; and when I have seen him giving them guns and ammunition, which he frequently did, he would commonly tell them these guns were to kill the citizens of the United States, and he would rather they should be applied to this use than to kill the deer. Such discourse I have heard him repeatedly use.

I have heard Mr. McGillivray say, the Spaniards had given him three thousand five hundred dollars to resign up to them the government of the Creek nation for one year, and I have heard Mr. Olivar, a Spanish agent, say, he was present at the Spanish treasury, when Mr. Lewis Christian, Panton's clerk, drew this money out of the treasury, only three days before Mr. McGillivray's death. Governor O'Neal is lately withdrawn, and one ——— White is in his place, who I have not heard give such advice. I have heard the Indians, in general, say, it was to their interest to keep up a war with the United States; that when they had committed ravages against them, of ever so great a nature, they could easily hold a treaty, and get large presents to be at peace, which conduct they could then repeat, for the people of the United States were very good natured.

A party of traders, who reside in the frontiers of Georgia, particularly one ——— Hull, tell the Indians the Congress have thrown away the people of Cumberland, and 'tis what they will, to kill, plunder, and commit devastations there, for Congress will not be angry at them for it. The Indians and several white traders have told me this. I met a party of Creeks on their return home from Cumberland, with four scalps.

KNOX COUNTY, June 21st, 1793.

SAMUEL FULTON.

This day the above named Samuel Fulton came before me, a justice of the peace for the aforesaid county, and made oath that the above information is true.

JAMES WHITE, J. P.

Daniel Smith, Esquire, to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, July 19th, 1793.

SIR:

The invasion of Indians into Wear's Cove, on the 19th ultimo, which I mentioned to you in mine of the 22d, was in two parties. A party of seven of Lieutenant Henderson's militia, who were vigilant in their duty, ranging the mountain, discovered the trace where one of the parties went back with horses on the 20th, and pursued without knowing what damage the Indians had done. They soon overtook, and gave them an unexpected and well directed fire, which it was afterwards known killed two, and 'tis believed wounded others. The Indians ran off a little distance, leaving the horses tied, but on seeing there were so few of the whites, made a stand. The whites cut loose the horses, and rode off with them all, except one, which was shot down by the enemy. None of the whites were hurt.

A Mr. Samuel Wear, about the same time, raised a party of volunteers; Lieutenant Henderson joined them, and thoughtlessly suffered Mr. Wear to take the command of the party, in number about sixty. They pursued the main body of the Indians to the town of Tallassee, on the north bank of the Tennessee, where they killed fifteen men and one woman, as they say, and brought in four women prisoners. It is not probable that those who suffered were the immediate aggressors, for the horses stolen had been taken across the Tennessee.

On the 29th June, a small party of Indians came to one Lloyd's house, more than sixty miles above this, and about eleven miles from Greene court house, on the south side of Nonachuchy river. They killed his wife and two children, and badly wounded a third, plundering the house of every thing of value. This occasioned Lieutenant Colonel McNab to raise a party of volunteers, without my knowledge; they consisted of ninety-one, and I am informed they followed the Indian trace to a small Indian village, supposed to be on the Tuckasegee river; there they killed two Indians, one of them a woman, fell out among themselves, and returned home. Since that time, for a week or two, the Indians have done but little damage, owing probably to their having promised me to forbear to take satisfaction for the injury done them by Beard till they should hear from the President. When I say little, 'tis to be considered as speaking comparatively with what they had done before: for they fired at a man on Pistol creek, and burnt the house of a Mr. Hog, on Nine-mile creek, with his crop of flax, and cut up part of his crop of corn. This was the 2d instant, and shortly after they stole, I think, seven horses from Bird's station, twelve miles below this, and the clothes of four families, which were in the wash.

Such behavior still augments the flame of the white men's passion, already very high. On the 15th instant, I received information that a large party of men were to assemble next day, near Campbell's station, fifteen miles below this, to go into the nation, and do the Indians all the damage they could. On the 16th I went to Campbell's station, to endeavor to prevent them. Their place of rendezvous, I found, was at one Blackburn's plantation, now lying waste, two or three miles still lower. At Campbell's, I saw several parties going down to their rendezvous, with many of whom I conversed, reasoned with them on the impropriety of their going; that the Indians had done but little damage for a week or two; that this was probably owing to their having promised me not to do us any until they should hear from the President; that, in all probability, effectual measures would be taken, on the return of the Governor, which would be in a short time, and that they ought to blame themselves for all the bloodshed their conduct would be the cause of, as we were not in a situation for war; but, all I could say, was in vain. When I found them so determined to go, I wrote the order, of which the enclosed is a copy, and caused Captain Campbell to deliver it to Beard, who, I am told, is their commander, and have it read to the other militia officers of their corps; neither had this any effect. This was on the 17th. The same day, I am informed, they moved on toward the Southwest Point, a few miles, in number 120 or 130; and I, much mortified, sat out for this place.

I had information, as early as the 12th instant, that there was an appointment of this kind of people, to rendezvous on the 1st of August, for the beforementioned purpose. Their attempt, so much earlier, was quite unexpected, or I could have used more likely means to turn them, by ordering them under some officer in whom I could confide, to perform a tour of duty down the north side of the Tennessee, and towards Cumberland. But their true intent was kept carefully concealed from me. This spirit for war against Indians, pervades people of all ranks so far, that no order of Government can stop them; and, I suppose, if I cannot prevent it, another party, similar to Beard's, will set out about the 1st of August. General Sevier has signified his desire to head a party of 100 or 150 mounted infantry, to explore the country on the north side of the Tennessee, as low down as the Lower Cherokee towns. I have wrote to him to come down here, that we may consult together on the occasion, and I now think of sending him with such a party as he proposes. The exploring the country will answer a useful purpose. 'Tis probable he will find Indians advancing towards us, and it may have some tendency to support the, at present, feeble force of law, by disconcerting the disorderly party; but, I will write you by next post the consequence.

Governor Blount's absence, I very much regret. The influence of his character is of far greater extent on these people, than any other; to lead them to adhere to good order, and support the laws, and by influential characters, is now the only resource to rule them; not by their love of good order and government. Many officers of the territory exert their influence the contrary way, and those who remain silent and inactive, I cannot but view, at present, as countenancing disorder. You can better conceive, than I express, the painful sensations I endure.

I have received no intelligence from General Robertson, of Mero district, since Governor Blount's departure. A week ago, or more, I sent back the Chickasaw Thompson, with a few articles of clothing, and a letter to their nation, enclosing a list of supplies to be furnished them by the United States, which, if they have not received, I tell them they soon will. I also wrote General Robertson, to cause a contract to be made for supplying part of Captain Kerr's company with rations at the crossing of Cumberland, intending to send them there in October next. At that time, it is expected a number of families will remove to Cumberland, to whose safety these regulars may contribute. They will be aided, I believe, by a small militia guard from Mero district.

SIR:

As the court martial has not yet proceeded to judgment on your former conduct, you are yet to be considered as an officer subject to the order of Government, and I now call upon you, requiring you to desist from your unwarrantable conduct, to disband your men, and send them to their respective homes. It must be expected that all officers will pay regard to these orders, which I require you to make known to them; their oaths cannot be so lightly looked upon, or, at least, I hope they are not, as to permit them to disregard this order, for they will have to answer the contrary at their peril.

SIR:

John Beard's party, which sat out, as I had the honor to inform you, on the 17th instant, returned on the 23d. I learn that they have done the Indians less damage than could have been supposed. Some of the party say they killed seven or eight Indians, others, only three or four, besides a squaw, and that they had two squaws prisoners, but dismissed them. In truth, the Indians repulsed them by occupying some strong houses they had in the town of Hiwasee, out of which they fired, and killed one man and wounded a second; the others came off in confusion.

The Indians have done no damage here for about a week or ten days. But this calm is only viewed, here, as the forerunner of a storm.

I still hold the design I mentioned to you on the 19th, of sending General Sevier, with 100 or 150 horsemen, down the north side of the Tennessee. The General will not expect any other pay, than according to the number of men he may command. I still believe a large number of volunteers, as they call themselves, will assemble about the first or second of August, to make an incursion on the Cherokees. I can think of no plan so likely to disconcert theirs, as by calling on him to act as I have said, and he will probably meet and repel Indians who will be invading us.

I anxiously wish for Governor Blount's return, and view it as the most hopeful means to produce good order.

KNOXVILLE, July 30, 1798.

SIR:

Last night a company of travellers arrived at this place from Mero district. General Robertson has wrote me, by them. I send you an extract of his letter, and a list of the names of persons murdered there since the 20th May, together with a copy of a letter from Piamingo to General Robertson. On contrasting this information with the Little Turkey's letter of the 5th June, which I had the honor to transmit to you, some further light will be thrown on the conduct of the Cherokees. I must send such assistance to Cumberland as I told you I had in view.

Extract of a letter from General James Robertson, of Mero District, to General Smith, dated Nashville, July 20, 1798.

Bad as the times were when you left this country, they are much more gloomy at present. Indians are plenty on all quarters. I enclose you a list of their depredations since the twentieth of May; they do, of late, penetrate further in our settlements than before; they seem resolved to make good their word to the Chickasaws, that this season they would cut us off totally—I mean the Cherokees. We seemed to have peace for some time after Major Beard marched through, to and from this country, and while our horse were in service, which service expired the fourteenth day of last month. I apprehended, from your Excellency's letter, that you supposed them to have been in service when you wrote. I have ventured to call into service one company of mounted infantry, eighty in number, exclusive of officers, according to Governor Blount's last orders. When your Excellency considers the circumstance, I hope you will think me justifiable, and give your approbation. If you disapprove, I beg you will send me express, for be assured, that no person can be more unwilling to incur expense that can be avoided, than myself; nothing less, would, in any manner, reconcile our frontiers, as I never saw them so much dispirited, as since my son, Randolph, came home from the Chickasaw nation. About the twelfth of last month, while he was in that nation, came in three Cherokees—Cottetoy was interpreter, as he speaks Chickasaw; they brought in a bow, bloody arrows, hatchet, scalping knife, and pipe; they presented them to the Chickasaws, and desired their influence to be used with the Choctaws, soliciting them to join in a common war with all other tribes against the United States; the chief was mightily rigged with silver, and made a great parade; his arm-bands had the Eagle on them; he told the Chickasaws, that his nation made no doubt but them and the Choctaws must, by that time, have seen their folly, as all other Indian tribes had combined to cut off the Americans; and that, if they and the Choctaws did not now lay too their hands, there would be nothing for them to do, as all other tribes, the present moon, were to strike the whites, and that the Northward army were all killed; the Western country was making up an army, but it would be small, and that the united tribes would soon finish them; that they, the Cherokees, had eat a great quantity of the white's flesh, which they were very fond of at first, but they had had so much of it, had got tired, and thought it too salt; this they spoke in way of derision, though I suppose it was them that cut off Overall's flesh;* they said the bow, arrows, hatchet, and scalping knife, were sufficient weapons to kill whites with. They told, that forty Cherokees, and some Creeks, had been sometime at or about the mouth of Duck river, to cut off the communication between them and us; and to exasperate them, said we were clearing a great road to this place. But, after finding all they said ineffectual, and did not move the Chickasaws, they appeared to make light of their assistance, and threatened, in the Chickasaw nation, to return to a party they had left at the mouth of Bear creek, and way-lay every crossing place on the Tennessee river, for Randolph Robertson, and said they would catch him on his way home, when they heard that he intended to ride, therefore he took it on foot. The Chickasaws were loath he should come; but I had directed him, if any thing particular, to let me know at all events. I should have let you know sooner, but the times appeared more favorable than they had been, inasmuch, that I had discharged the horse; and, as a company were to set out on Monday next, I thought it best to save the expense of an express. Sir, cannot you send some men immediately to our assistance? Will it be possible I can have a sergeant and twelve men from those regulars with you? All the stations near me talk of breaking, and if so, I must do it, having but four men in my station, and cannot call on men to leave their families; and if I am obliged to go, or should fall, I know not where the frontier would be, for people do not act as they used to do, stop in the settlement, but go quite off. The Cherokees have done much mischief on the Ohio; at the mouth, took a large boat; it is supposed Mr. Josiah Love is killed, but not yet certain. If you do not send assistance, and the Indians are as bad as expected, I shall be obliged to enter more men in service, and they must be horsemen, as the Cherokees told, in the Chickasaw nation, that they intended making station camps, and coming in small parties; and we must endeavor to break up their camps, for we can do nothing with the small parties in our settlements; and if we are not able to drive them off, we may as well surrender to them; they have got off most of the horses on the south side of Cumberland river, that were not stabled. I believe the stations on the south side, above Stone's river, are or will break soon. The Mountain Leader would not go to the Cherokees' talk. Wolf's Friend told them he would send their message to the Choctaws, but that he thought they would take no notice of it; he told them that he had eaten weeds and grass, and such as brutes eat, but it would be a long time before he thought of eating the Virginians' flesh. The Cherokees stayed only three days there. Never was a people more attached to a nation, than the Chickasaws are to the United States. A treaty was to have been held at the Walnut Hills, on the twenty-fifth of last month, by Spanish authority, with all the Southern Indians, but is postponed for a longer time. A cessation of arms has taken place between the Creeks and Chickasaws; it is said by the whites, as well as the Indians, to be brought about by Spanish agency, as matters were brought on in order to humble the Chickasaws, and bring them to their interest. A large army of Creeks had set out against the Chickasaws, and were stopped by Spanish orders. Three sent in a flag, who were treated with great contempt; those with the flag, said they had no power to make articles, but at the intended treaty, the Spaniards would assist them. I am of opinion, it was the stiffness and preparation the Chickasaws had made, as they were gathered in a few towns, and had upwards of thirty forts; they were determined to attack any number that should come against them. Wolf's Friend, when at Orleans, was invited by the Governor to the intended treaty; he asked the Governor what that treaty meant, and if it was to lessen the friendship of his people to the United States, he might as well desist, for their friendship was not to be broken. The Governor told him that some of his nation had promised to assist them against any people; the answer was, that if they had, it must be such as were of no account, and wanted presents, for there was not one man in that nation would fight the Americans; for his own part, he had not known them until the last summer treaty, but he had given Governor Blount his heart, and nothing should induce him to break the friendship he then made, and that, if the Americans and Spaniards fell out, he would not interfere on either side; the Governor then commended him, and said he would send his speech to the King of Spain. Application had been made by that Government, for leave to fix forts at the Chickasaw Bluff and Iron Banks; the former they say they will have, whether they get leave or not.

CHICKASAW NATION, June 17, 1793.

DEAR OLD FRIEND:

I have received several letters from you since I was able to answer you, owing to matters being unsettled, as they are here at present. I received the corn, and other articles, by your son Randolph, for which I thank my brothers, the Americans, for considering us in so great need. Our situation has been such, that we could not pass to you as usual. I have sent one man with your son, as he requested, and hope shortly to come in myself. Whether this will ever reach you, is uncertain, for I hear the path is watched by Creeks and Cherokees, in order to intercept all messages passing, and I fear your son will never reach Cumberland; but if he should be so fortunate as to get in, he can inform you the circumstances of all matters, as I have made him fully acquainted with all within my knowledge. His being a woodsman, and going on foot, gives me hopes he may get in safe. He can inform you of my unsettled situation, which, as soon as I can alter, and get my business arranged, you may be sure of seeing me. I endeavored to prevail with your son to wait longer, until he might go safer, but in vain, as he was anxious to get in, to let you know how matters were, that you might inform Governor Blount, so that he prefers going at the risk of all. I have often told you of the bad doings of the Creeks and Cherokees, which I am sure they will not cease to continue, till they feel the weight of the white people, which, I hope, will not be long. Surely, my friend, if you knew how lightly and despidingly they speak of you and your friends, you could not bear it, as you do. If we did not know you to be warriors, we should not know what to think of you calling them friends, and treating them as such, when they are continually killing your people, and taking your horses. We, the Chickasaws, that are but as one very small house in the great city, the United States, could not bear to throw away, and let the blood of one man pass without retaliation. The Creeks were the aggressors, and asked a cessation of arms of us, as your son can inform you. If you would treat them so, they would not think as little of you. There are very bad talks going on at this time, of which I shall be better able to inform you hereafter. Your son can tell you of seeing Cherokees coming in, which he saw with scalps and war instruments, to invite us and the Choctaws to join all the Indians to war against the United States. The Spaniards are getting all the Indians they can, to a treaty at the Walnut Hills. What their intentions are is uncertain; but I apprehend nothing to your advantage, which you will be the better able to judge when I arrive; it will then be in my power to inform you of all that is of consequence. I intend to visit the President when I come in—your son has promised me to go with me. I hope you will not be against it. Please to let Governor Blount know of it, which will be about four or five weeks. I want you to get Simson to make me a gun like Colonel Mansker's. I hope you will take great care of yourself, as both the Creeks and Cherokees will try to get you. Keep out your scouts at a great distance, it will be the best for safety, and not let them hunt near you, as they always do you mischief when breaking up to go home. I am very glad to hear you say, that the President has sent a greater warrior to command his army against the Northern tribes, if they do not treat. But, my brother, I hardly know what you mean by treating with tribes that are always at war with you, and will be, until you whip them; perhaps you may then have a treaty with them that may keep peace. Did I not tell how the Creeks and Cherokees would behave when they treated? I said they would pay no regard to what they did; so you found it. If we confirm a treaty with the Creeks, they will be told every injury done us will be retaliated for, and we will observe to do it.

I am, and will be, your friend and brother,

General ROBERTSON.

PIAMINGO.

Daniel Smith to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, August 31, 1793.

SIR:

The expectations that the Indians would invade this district in great force, seem as though they would be verified. At the appearance of day light on the 29th instant, a numerous party of Indians made an attack on Henry's station. Their real number cannot be known, and opinions differ on that head from one hundred to three hundred. Lieutenant Tedford and another man had gone out to a cornfield when the firing commenced, at which they attempted to run to the station, but got among the Indians unexpectedly. The lieutenant was took prisoner, carried about one hundred and fifty yards, and put to death, his body mangled in a most inhuman manner. The other man fortunately made his escape, and ran to a neighboring station, from whence all the adjacent frontier was alarmed. One other man, who happened to be out, was all they killed, besides the lieutenant.

The upper county militia have not yet come down, but are to be expected in a few days. Had they been on the frontier, I think these Indians might have been intercepted. I have proposed to General Sevier to come down, and take the command. His name carries terror to the Indians. Although the number of men on duty here may be not such as would demand an officer of his rank, I have thought it will be most expedient to call for him.

I have heard nothing of Major Beard since he left Southwest Point; but, ere this, he must have arrived at Nashville.

Enclosed are extracts of two letters from General Robertson, and an account of Indian depredations since my former account.

It is expected that General Sevier, with the third of the militia of the three upper counties, will be on his way to the frontiers in a few days. His force, except a few to protect exposed places, I mean to continue in a body, that they may be in readiness to intercept or repel any numerous party of Indians that may invade the country.

Governor Blount has not arrived yet: his return is impatiently wished for by the inhabitants. The people are relinquishing their irregular designs of invading Indians, against the order of Government.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Robertson, of Mero District, to Secretary Smith, dated August 17, 1793, at Nashville.

The distresses of this district has caused me to call out into service one company of mounted infantry; and, if the Indians execute their threats to attack our settlements, shall be obliged to order more, unless you can give relief from Washington district. I sent out Captain John Rains on the 20th July, on an eight days' tour. He discovered the trace of many parties coming in, but had not the good fortune to overtake any of them, owing to the thickness of the cane on Duck river. At that time, our settlements were much distressed by Indians, stealing our horses, and penetrating further into our settlements than ever they had before, which caused me to order out Captain John Gordon, of the cavalry, on the 5th instant, who, with Captain Rains, pursued some Indians, who, on the second instant, had killed one Samuel Miller, at Joslin's station, six miles from this place. After crossing Duck river, they found the sign of a number of different parties falling into the trace. After pursuing some time, observed the fresh trace of four horses and seven Indians to come in. On pursuing six or seven miles further, found them encamped. Our men killed five, and took prisoner a boy between twelve and fourteen years of age. They were Creeks. I suppose more Indians would have been killed before they returned, but, finding the sign of a company making to the settlement, pursued them, expecting they might be overtaken before they could reach the frontiers, but unluckily they got among the sign of stock, and could not be followed. Some time past, Captain Bosley's barn was burnt in the night, and two thousand bushels of wheat in it. 'Tis suspected to have been done by a negro, but many people think it was Indians, as they stole horses the same night out of the middle of the settlement, on the north side of Cumberland, near Heaton's old station, and some the next day from one William Smith, on White's creek,* which he and some others followed, and retook the horses. Colonel Winchester, of Sumner county, being apprehensive of another incursive party making an attack on his neighborhood, solicited me to send out Captain George D. Blackmore, with his troop, up the Cany fork, as most Indian depredations near him had been from that fork. Knowing myself that cavalry does deter Indians, and believing it had been the means of saving many lives this summer, I ordered out the troop, to be discharged at the expiration of a month, unless you should direct their discharge to be sooner. Sir, it is with great reluctance that I called men into service without your express order; but the danger was imminent. The Creeks have lately sent deputies into the Choctaw nation, and invited some of the Chickasaw chiefs to meet them there, in order to confirm a treaty of peace between those nations. A number of the Chickasaws are against carrying the matter any farther than that with honor they may join an army, in case one should go from the United States against the Creeks. They (the Creeks) declared at that treaty, that their nation and the Cherokees were determined on war against the United States, and particularly to break up this district this summer. This I have from a man who was among the Choctaws at the time, one Thomas Fletcher, as well as confirmed by the Chickasaws. Lieutenant William Clark has returned from delivering the supplies to the Chickasaws, which gave them infinite satisfaction. Seven have gone with him to head quarters. The Mountain Leader intends visiting the President shortly. I have been cautioned by the Chickasaws and Choctaws, to guard against the Creeks taking me by counterfeiting friendship; that is, passing themselves upon me for Chickasaws or Choctaws. I have great doubt they will make the attempt; and, if they do, they will succeed as when at home, and that home immediately on the frontiers. We are but four men strong, and both the Creeks and Cherokees know that both Chickasaws and Choctaws frequently come to my house without my knowing who they are, until it would be too late to stop them with so few men.

Extract of a letter from General Robertson to Governor Blount, dated

NASHVILLE, August 22d, 1793.

Since my former letter, the Indians have been very commonly in our settlements, though in small parties, which cannot well be followed. On the 19th instant, the sign of a party was discovered coming in. The same night a good many wearing clothes were stolen by them from Brown's station, which were in wash. Next night two horses were stolen from Colonel Barton's. The horses were retaken yesterday. Yesterday Colonel Barton narrowly escaped being fired on in his field. On the 20th instant, in Tennessee county, some Indians were discovered plundering an evacuated house. The man raised a party of seven men, and went in search of the Indians. It was in the night before they got to the place where the Indians were expected; and, just before they got there, they met the Indians in the path, who appeared to be about their own number, as near as they could distinguish. The whites fired first, and retreated, because the Indians' guns were then charged. Next morning, on viewing the ground, they found one Indian lying dead, and two traces of blood making off, as though there were that number wounded. This day, Captain John Gordon has set out, to range at a considerable distance south of our settlements, as we can do nothing with them in the cane. Rains' tour is expired; and I fear your Excellency might think I went too far, if I ordered more into service, until I receive your orders, which I have hopes of every day: and I have sanguine hopes of at least one company of cavalry from Washington district. We cannot doubt your Excellency's continuing to give us relief, as you did in the spring: for it was evident that Major Beard's horse was of great service to this district. Last spring one Abraham Castleman, who was a soldier, but a disorderly person, who had several of his relations killed, bearing in mind the injuries he received, raised a party of fourteen volunteers lately, and set out to take satisfaction, as he termed it. They could find no Indians on their route, on the north side Tennessee. As they were strictly forbid to cross that river, all his company turned back on their arriving to it, except Castleman and four others, who did cross the river, which I believe was at a place known by the name of the Creek crossing place, and the road leads towards Will's town. The road was very plain, and much sign of war parties on it, such as scalps figured on trees, &c. About ten miles south of the river, they discovered a party of Indians sitting at breakfast, as they supposed, in number upwards of forty. Both parties immediately fired at each other, as they were only about thirty yards apart. Three of Castleman's party came in yesterday; one slightly wounded, another with four bullet holes through his shirt. They suppose Castleman and the other man to be killed.† They say they must have killed some Indians, as they saw two or three fall. They must have been a party coming to war, as they had no horses nor squaws, but large bundles to carry on their backs. This happened the 15th instant. I am very impatient to hear from your Excellency. I shall send in a guard, as mentioned by General Smith, to escort families that may be moving here, and shall have a block house built, as a beginning stand, for the party of regulars which, he has informed me, will be at that time marched out to the Crossing of Cumberland.

I have found the Indian boy, taken prisoner as mentioned in my last, to be a Creek, from the Uphaulie towns. I set out with him to-morrow to Clarksville, to gather as much information as possible. John Dier, who lives there, speaks the language well. I am convinced the party he belonged to were those from whom the horses were retaken; they had killed a cow, and were barbecuing the flesh; when run off, they left four blankets, four knives, some hatchets and kettles, a leather shirt, supposed to belong to the prisoner boy. And the party, when defeated over Duck river, had but two blankets and three knives; they seemed to lack all that was taken when the horses were re-taken. John Dier speaks the Creek and Chickasaw tongues perfectly, and I have endeavored to get him to live at my house, but cannot do it without engaging him one hundred dollars per year: I offered him one hundred bushels of corn each year, and as much cleared ground as he chose to cultivate; but as he supports his family by hunting, would not agree without money. Would it not be reasonable that the United States paid such a person, as the Creeks will be much how, as well as the Chickasaws and Choctaws, whenever they may be at peace? Sir, will you be so condescending as to write me on this subject; I would pay half myself, sooner than be without him.

* Places opposite to Bosley's, who lives on the south side.

† Castleman and the other man came in safe the day the General wrote, as the company informed me, but the General had not heard it. They agree in the same account with the first three.

Indian depredations, not before mentioned.

About the 1st August, the Indians killed one Samuel Miller, at Joslin's station, on Cumberland.

On the 21st, the Indians killed the widow Baker and all her family, except two children, who were big enough and fortunate enough to make their escape. Her family of children was numerous.

About the same time, Robert Wells' family, consisting of a wife and two children, were killed. Mr. Wells himself was from home.

The widow Baker and Mr. Wells lived in Tennessee county.

August 31st, 1793.

David Smith to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, September 27th, 1793.

SIR:

On the 30th July, I had the honor to enclose you a copy of the Mountain Leader's letter to General Robertson, dated June 17th, in which he mentions his design to visit the President. The Leader himself, four other Chickasaws, and an interpreter, of the name of Mr. Lish, are now this far on their way, for that purpose. As I know you are acquainted with the character of that chief, and his attachment to the United States, I need say nothing on that head. He requested me to send with him some person of account, (his own words) to accompany and provide him with supplies for the journey. I have made choice of Mr. John M<sup>c</sup>Kee, of whose abilities and merits I have a very good opinion. He has been heretofore conversant in Indian business, and I think may, if requisite, be made useful in influencing the conduct of the nation. I have recommended him to go by Richmond, and convey them to you in an expeditious and economical manner; but should he be compelled to draw a bill on you for a few dollars to defray their expenses, I hope it will be honored.

On the 16th instant, Major Beard returned from Cumberland with his party. He had not the fortune to fall in with any parties of Indians. The inhabitants of that district, and General Robertson in particular, are strongly of opinion, that his searching for them through the woods in which they have been accustomed to encamp, and from whence they annoyed that district, has much deterred the enemy.

With much concern, I have to inform you, that besides other previous depredations of the Cherokees, of a less nature, they made an invasion into this district on Wednesday, the 25th instant, in force, as is generally believed, not less than a thousand; in many places they marched in files of twenty-eight abreast, each of which 'tis supposed was composed of forty men; besides, they appeared to have about a hundred horse. They crossed the Tennessee below the mouth of Holston, on Tuesday evening, marched all night towards this place, and about sun rise or a little after, attacked and carried the house of Mr. Alexander Cavet, about seven miles below this place. His whole family, thirteen in number, fell a sacrifice. A man of common delicacy would want language to convey to another, the horrid manner in which the poor women and children were treated, as much as I do to make you sensible of the sufferings of the frontier inhabitants, pent up in their small huts. General Sevier lay, at that time, on the lower frontier, on the south bank of Holston, about eight miles from the Tennessee, at one Ishe's, with about four hundred men. I speak in round numbers, for I have had no return. He had got there but a few days before; I am now endeavoring to augment his number, to enable him to pursue the enemy; they crossed Clinch the same evening. Lieutenant M<sup>c</sup>Clelland is now out with a party of horse, reconnoitering their movements.

General Sevier has told me, that every night of his stay at Ishe's, the Indians were reconnoitering his camp, till his sentinels one night killed one of them, since which they have been more cautious.

The large party of Indians passed up on the north side of Holston, within three miles of the General's camp, and I suppose would have marched higher, perhaps to this place, but for fear of his intercepting them, as they know not his number.

The frontiers are infested with these Indians, from opposite Greene court house, round by Ishe's, and up Clinch on the northwest frontier, a distance of at least two hundred miles. You can better conceive, than I describe, the many sufferings of the inhabitants.

I am, sir, &c.

Governor Blount has, by letter of 28th August, informed me, he expects to be here by the middle of October. His arrival will be an event highly pleasing to me, and the inhabitants in general.

SOUTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 18, 1793.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 18th, 1793.

SIR:

In pursuance of directions from the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to the Senate, further information relatively to the Southwestern frontiers.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

James Seagrove to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, ON THE OCOONEE, 31st October, 1793.

SIR:

Since writing you on the 21st instant, the party of mounted militia, consisting of one hundred and thirty, from this county, crossed the Ocoonee, at Carr's Bluff, and proceeded direct to the Chehaw town on the Flint river, where they expected a large booty in negroes and other property. But in this, they were disappointed. The Indians discovered their approach, and attacked, when endeavoring to ford the river directly opposite the town, killed two, and wounded two more, on which, the party retreated, leaving behind, their dead. They returned into the settlement about the 26th instant. By certain information received from Mr. Barnard, the Indians did not lose any, and had only three men slightly wounded. That only sixteen Indians and four negroes were opposed to the white party—all the rest belonging to the town, were out hunting on the frontier of Florida. Thus you see the repeated impediments thrown in my way by the people of this State.

On the 27th instant, Charles Weatherford, a white man, who lives in the Upper Creeks, came here with letters to me, and orders from the chiefs, to bring me into the nation, they being desirous to settle all matters, and live in peace with us. Weatherford was accompanied, as far as the Oakmulgee, by some chiefs and warriors as an escort for me. I should have set off immediately with him, but for the following reasons, viz: My having wrote Governor Telfair for the Indian prisoners on the 21st, and sent a public wagon from this to Augusta, in order to convey the prisoners up here, that I might take them with me to their friends. Knowing that this would have a good effect, I delayed, to have the Governor's answer, which I received in the negative, by return of express last evening. Another reason was, that I wished to hear from Mr. Barnard, what effect the expedition against the Chehaw town would have on the minds of the Indians, as I expected him here, if matters continued favorably, to accompany me out. Accordingly, he arrived here on the evening of the 29th, as already related, and, that he had reason to think no unfavorable change would take place, as the Indians had not suffered.

Mr. Barnard was accompanied to the Oakmulgee by some Indians, and, from information; there are about ninety now there, waiting for me. In order that the Indians there should not get impatient at any delay on my part, I sent off Weatherford on the morning of the 29th, to keep them easy, and since then, have been preparing for my journey, and should set off to-morrow, were it not that I have, this morning, received certain information that another party of mounted militia had crossed the Oconee, about fifteen miles above this place, on the morning of the 29th instant, under Colonel Alexander, with declared intentions of attacking some of the Indian towns. This being the case, I am very much at the loss what to do.

I think it will be best to delay setting off, until I know what this last party will do.

From these repeated incursions of the people of Georgia into the Creek towns, I fear the minds of the savages will be irritated and soured to such degree, that it will be impossible to convince them of the good intentions of the President of the United States towards them, and that, if those things are not speedily stopped, a general Indian war is inevitable.

From decided and clear information, I am enabled to say, that the whole of the Creek nation is desirous of peace with the United States, and would conclude it with me, could I be amongst them, uninterrupted by the Georgians. The Indians discover the temper of the people of this country, and, in consequence, are prepared for the worst, and will go into a general war, if I cannot soon get amongst them. The Creeks have made peace with their neighbors, the Chickasaws and Choctaws, both of which nations have agreed to aid them in a war against this country, in case they require it. The Choctaws agree to furnish four thousand men. The Cherokees undoubtedly will join them, and most of them have moved on the Creek frontier, to be ready. Matters being in this situation, nothing, in my opinion, but an immediate change in the conduct of the Governor of Georgia, through the interference of the General Government, can avert the calamities consequent to a war, with powerful savage tribes.

Should a war take place, it is a happiness to reflect, that the General Government have left nothing undone to prevent it, and it will plainly appear to the world, that the Executive Government and certain people of Georgia, are the cause, as peace, on terms of equal justice, hath and is still in their offer.

Extract of a letter from Constant Freeman, Jr. to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT FIDUS, 5th November, 1793.

SIR:

Mr. Seagrove set off this morning for the Creek nation. He goes by the way of Rock Landing; from thence, he will be escorted by a party of militia horse to the Oakmulgee, where several chiefs are waiting to conduct him to their country.

Mr. Barnard, his deputy, has been here several days; he returns with him. From the accounts he gives of the disposition of the Indians, there is reason to hope that all disputes between them and the whites may be amicably settled, provided the people on this frontier should not interrupt the business. But, this is rather to be wished for, than expected. Parties are continually going out, in violation of all order. On the 18th ultimo, one crossed the Oconee, at Carr's bluff, consisting of 125 men, under the command of a Major Brenton. General Irwin, the Brigadier of the county, forbid their proceeding, but without effect. On the 22d, they attempted to ford the Flint river, at the Little Chehaw village, and were opposed by a few Indians, who obliged them to retreat. They returned without doing any thing, and with the loss of two killed and two wounded. The Indians had, in this affair, three slightly wounded. It is reported that Colonel Alexander is at this time out with a party; it will therefore be impossible for Mr. Seagrove to accomplish the objects for which he is sent, unless a stop can be put to these irregularities. He has repeatedly made representations to the Executive of this State, but to no purpose. And it would seem that every obstacle has been thrown in the way, whether with design or not I shall not presume to determine. As long as I have been at this post, I have been witness to his zeal and indefatigable labor, and it would be impossible to imagine a more unpleasant life than he leads in consequence of his office.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, October 28th, 1793.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you the report of General Sevier, of the 25th instant, respecting the pursuit by him given to the large party or army of Indians, Creeks and Cherokees, that invaded the county of Knox, and killed Alexander Cavet and family, within eight miles of this place, on the 25th of September.

As yet, I have not heard from John McKee, whom I have sent, as I before informed you, to the frontiers of South Carolina, to open, if practicable, a communication with the Cherokees in that quarter: for, from this, no person will venture among them, even with a flag.

Since General Sevier's return, I have not heard of the approach of any large party of Indians; but the frontiers are daily harassed with small ones.

On Sunday, the 13th of October, a party of twenty-eight killed Mrs. Lewis and five children, burnt and destroyed the buildings and grain in the Greasy cove, in Washington county, one hundred miles to the eastward of this. The inhabitants in this cove, for years, have been thought in perfect safety.

A more certain and direct conveyance, will leave this place in time to reach you before the session of Congress, by which I will write you more fully.

General Sevier to Governor Blount.

ISHUE'S MILL, 25th October, 1793.

SIR:

In obedience to an order from Secretary Smith, I marched in pursuit of the large body of Indians, who, on the 25th of last month, did the mischief in Knox county, near the Gracy valley. For the safety and security of our army, I crossed at one of the upper fords on the Tennessee river, below the mountains. We then bent our course for Hiwasee, with expectations of striking the trail, and before we reached that river, we discovered four large ones, making directly into the mountains. We proceeded across the Hiwasee, and directed our march for Es tanaula, on the Coosa river, at which place we arrived on the 14th instant, discovering on our way several other trails leading to the aforesaid place. We there made some Cherokee prisoners, who informed us that John Watts headed the army lately out on our frontiers; that the same was composed of Indians, more or less, from every town in the Cherokee nation; that, from the Turkey's town, Sallyquoah, Coosawaytah, and several other principal ones, almost to a man was out, joined by a large number of the Upper Creeks, who had passed that place on their return, only a few days since, and had made for a town at the mouth of Hightower river. We, after refreshing the troops, marched for that place, taking the path that leads to that town, along which the Creeks had marched, in five large trails. On the 17th instant, in the afternoon, we arrived at the forks of Coosa and Hightower rivers. Colonel Kelly was ordered, with a part of the Knox regiment, to endeavor to cross the Hightower. The Creeks, and a number of Cherokees, had entrenched themselves, to obstruct the passage. Colonel Kelly and his party passed down the river, half a mile below the ford, and began to cross at a private place, where there was no ford. Himself and a few others swam over the river; the Indians discovering this movement, immediately left their entrenchments, and ran down the river to oppose their passage, expecting, as I suppose, the whole intended crossing at the lower place. Captain Evans, immediately, with his company of mounted infantry, strained their horses back to the upper ford, and began to cross the river. Very few had got to the south bank, before the Indians, who had discovered their mistake, returned, and received them furiously at the rising of the bank. An engagement instantly took place, and became very warm, and notwithstanding the enemy were at least four to one in numbers, besides the advantage of situation, Captain Evans, with his heroic company, put them in a short time entirely to flight. They left several dead on the ground, and were seen to carry others off both on foot and horse. Bark, and trails of blood from the wounded, were to be seen in every quarter. Their encampment fell into our hands, with a number of their guns, many of which were of the Spanish sort, with their budgets, blankets, and match coats, together with some horses. We lost three men in this engagement, which is all that have fell during the time of our route, although this last attack was the fourth the enemy had made upon us, but in the others, repulsed without loss. After the last engagement, we crossed the main Coosa, where they had thrown up some works and evacuated; they suffered us to pass unmolested. We then proceeded on our way down the main river, near the Turnip mountain, destroying in our way several Creek and Cherokee towns, which they had settled together on each side of the river, and from which they have all fled, with apparent precipitation, leaving almost every thing behind them. Neither did they, after the last engagement, attempt to annoy or interrupt us on our march, in any manner whatever. I have great reason to believe their ardor and spirit were well checked. The party flogged at Hightower, were those which had been out with Watts. There are three of our men slightly wounded, and two or three horses killed; but the Indians did not, as I have heard of, get a single horse from us the time we were out. We took and destroyed near three hundred beeves, many of which were of the best and largest kind. Of course, their losing so much provision, must distress them very much. Many women and children might have been taken; but, from motives of humanity, I did not encourage it to be done, and several taken were suffered to make their escape. Your Excellency knows the disposition of many that were out on this expedition, and can readily account for this conduct.

KNOXVILLE, November 21st, 1793.

SIR:

We still continue to enjoy an unexpected cessation of hostilities, the Indians, as yet, not having committed a single murder since the visit General Sevier paid the nation by order of Secretary Smith. I am unable to offer any single reason for this cessation, as all friendly communication between the Indians and citizens of the United States is cut off; but my opinion is, that it is fear of a second visit that for the moment restrains them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THE WABASH TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 7, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I herewith transmit the copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, stating the circumstances which have hitherto prevented any explanation of the fourth article of the treaty with the Wabash Indians.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 6th January, 1794.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 2, 1794.

SIR:

Most of the principal chiefs of the Wabash Indians, who visited this city, having died with the small-pox, it would have been improper and nugatory to have attempted with the remainder any explanation of the fourth article of the treaty of Post Vincennes, the seventh day of September, 1792.

It was presumed, that, at the intended treaty to be held with the Northwestern Indians, the Wabash tribes would have been represented. With a view therefore to this subject generally, the following article was inserted in the instructions of the commissioners: "You will, in all your negotiations, carefully guard the general rights of pre-emption of the United States to the Indian country, against all other nations and individuals, as established by the treaty of 1783, with Great Britain. But, in describing these rights to the Indians, you will impress them with the idea, that we concede to them fully, the right and possession of the soil as long as they desire to occupy the same; but when they choose to sell any portion of the country, it must be sold only to the United States, who will protect the Indians against all imposition." But the expectation of the treaty having been frustrated, nothing has been effected upon the subject.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 22, 1794.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 22, 1794.

SIR: Communications relative to the Southwestern frontiers having been laid before Congress, the President of the United States has directed me to submit to the Senate, further information just received from James Seagrove, of his having restored peace between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

TOWN OF TUCKAUBATCHEE, ON THE TALLAPOOSA RIVER, }
UPPER CREEKS, 30th November, 1793. }

SIR: It is with pleasure I inform your Excellency, that, in consequence of a meeting which I have had at this place, with the chiefs of all the Creek nations, peace and good understanding is again re-established between the United States and the said nations.

The Creeks bind themselves to deliver to me, all the prisoners in this land, to restore all the negroes, horses, and cattle, taken from Georgia, for twelve months past; to punish capitally, two or more of their first aggressors. Measures are taken for carrying into effect all these desirable objects, and runners are sent in every direction, to make known the news of peace, and strictly to forbid their people from injuring the persons or property of the people of your State, or of the United States.

I have, therefore, to request, that your Excellency will lose no time in promulgating this information throughout your State, thereby to prevent any outrage being offered to such Indians as may appear on your frontier, belonging to this nation, whilst they conduct themselves as friends.

I have not time to be more particular at present, but shall do myself the honor of writing you again in a few days, and am, with respect,

Your obedient humble servant,

JAS. SEAGROVE,
Agent of Indian Affairs, S. D. U. S.His Excellency the Governor of Georgia.

Extract of a letter from James Seagrove, Agent of Indian Affairs of the Southern Department, to the Secretary of War.

TUCKAUBATCHEE, ON THE TALLAPOOSA RIVER, }
UPPER CREEKS, 30th November, 1793. }

SIR:

I had the honor of writing you on the 28th instant, which went by way of St. Mary's. I shall now endeavor to give a more minute detail of my proceedings, since my departure from Georgia.

By a reference to my letters to you, down to the 31st ultimo, you will see the difficulties I had to encounter in Georgia, in order to effect an entrance into this country. On the 5th instant, I left fort Fidius, escorted by thirteen mounted militia, whom I got, to prevent my being robbed by the frontier banditti, who, two days before, took ten of the horses which I had to convey goods, &c. to the nation, for the use of the Indians. This guard attended me as far as the Oakmulgee, where I arrived on the 7th, and there found one hundred and thirty chiefs and warriors ready to receive me. Here I discharged the militia, and next day proceeded with the Indians towards the Cussetahs, where we arrived on the 14th, and took quarters in a house set apart for me by the king of the town. On the morning of the 15th, I was saluted by several discharges from a piece of artillery, and drums beating. At ten o'clock, I was received in great form by all the chiefs and people of the town, in the public square, as the agent of the United States.

As far as expressions and actions could extend, I received proofs of their sincere joy in seeing me among them. Runners were despatched to all the Lower towns, to acquaint them with my arrival, and ordering the immediate attendance of the chiefs at that place. On the 18th, the chiefs of the Lower towns and myself received a letter from the chiefs of the Upper towns, desiring our attendance at this place, the Tuckaubatchee, that being the place fixed on to settle the business of the nation. Accordingly, we set off, and arrived here on the 22d. On the 23d, I was received in form, and acknowledged as the agent of the United States; but my reception did not appear accompanied with that warmth of expression or apparent friendship I met with in the Cussetahs. I could plainly discover a sullen countenance on many of the principal people, especially those belonging to the clan of the unfortunate young warrior, David Cornell, who fell at St. Mary's.

On the 23d, there then being a full representation of all the Creek nations, I proceeded to business; my talk to the chiefs continued the whole day. I left nothing unsaid that could favor the cause of my country, and though standing on dangerous ground, and surrounded by numerous enemies, both white and red, yet these things did not, in the smallest degree, prevent my speaking in plain and decided terms, pointing out their transgressions, and demanding justice from them, as a preliminary to reconciliation and peace with the United States. After sitting in council two days and nights, without adjourning, it was unanimously determined on, that all acts of hostilities or depredations should, from that moment, cease between the United States and the Creek nations. To which I agreed, on condition that all white prisoners in their nation be immediately delivered to me, to be sent to their respective homes. That all negroes, horses, and cattle, that hath been taken from the people of Georgia, since the conference at Colerain, in November last, be delivered to me for the use of the owners. That satisfaction be given by the nation, for the murders committed on St. Mary's, in March last, by capitally punishing two or more of the principals in that affair. To all of which conditions they have agreed, and solemnly pledge themselves to see carried into effect. As agent of the United States, I have promised the nation and friends of David Cornell, who was murdered at St. Mary's, when coming with a flag of truce and despatches from the chiefs of the nation to me, that every step will be taken by the United States to bring to punishment the murderer or murderers of that young man. Upon which, the business is rested for twelve months from this time. I hope, sir, you will see the necessity of having a proclamation issued without delay, offering a suitable reward for apprehending and convicting the perpetrators of that horrid deed. I also engaged that the prisoners in Georgia should be returned without delay; but as the Governor of that State hath already refused delivering them to me, (as you have been advised) I apprehend the interference of the General Government may be necessary, ere they are delivered. Should this be the case, I must request that no time be lost.

The Spanish agent, (or, as he is styled, commissary) Mr. Olivar, paid me a visit soon after my arrival. He informed me that his orders were, to act in all things toward my country or self, with friendship, and that he should comply therewith, as far as in his power. He was present during my business, and declared himself much pleased with my conduct. He continued in the same house with me until yesterday, when he returned to his home at Little Tallassee, about twenty-five miles below, on this river.

The White Lieutenant possesses nothing of an Indian, but the name. He is a virtuous, good man, and his friendship to our country is not equalled by any in this land. As an instance of this assertion, allow me to mention, that, after having eighteen of his people killed and prisoners, in consequence of the Oakfuskee village affair, his son and three of his family killed by the Cumberland people, yet this was the man to step forward to save my life, when a large majority of those Upper towns had meditated my destruction, and to his manly exertions, among his savage countrymen, do we owe, in a very great degree, their present pacific disposition. I shall not lose sight of such a friend to my country. I am happy to say, I can plainly discover a very material change in the temper and conduct of all around me. Candor, and the virtuous cause I am engaged in, having been fully explained to them, the cloud of deception hath been expelled, and impostors are obliged to seek shelter. I am now considered as their real friend, and treated kindly.

I have, by this express, wrote the Governor of Georgia, informing him with what I have done; a copy of my letter you have herewith. I have sent expresses to different parts of the frontier of Georgia, with like information, and desiring their not committing any outrage on Indians. I hope it will be attended to.

I am requested by the chiefs of this nation, to send an express to Governor Blount, desiring him to restrain his people from injuring the Creeks on their hunting ground. I shall comply with their desire, as they appear desirous of peace with that quarter. The chiefs also request that I will apply to their Great Father, the President of the United States, on the same business.

If a stop is not speedily put to this affair, it will spread beyond what may, at present, be apprehended by people at a distance. Had I not been here to have stopped them, a large body of warriors would have been out, ere this, to have taken revenge for the Lieutenant's son, and others. As soon as I have collected the prisoners, about ten in number, chiefly from the westward, I shall send them to fort Fidius. Finding the people of the Upper towns very naked, and there being a quantity of blankets and strouds remaining on hand at fort Fidius, I have determined to send for them, and distribute at this place, as I conceive such a step, at this time, will have a good effect on those naked people.

Before the general meeting of the nation broke up, they appointed three commissioners to attend and remain with me, and to settle all other matters, as well as to carry into effect what was determined on. These commissioners are, the White Lieutenant, Mad Dog, of Tuckaubatchee, and Hallowing king, of the Cowetas.

The Indians are now all pushing out to their hunting grounds. their chiefs having sent runners after those already out, strictly forbidding their offering injury to the persons or property of the Americans. I hope, for the sake of humanity, and the reputation of our country, that similar orders will be given along the frontier of Georgia. Please excuse this long detail of matter, and believe me, with the utmost respect,

Sir, your obedient, &c.

SOUTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 30, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate

and of the House of Representatives;

Communications have been made to Congress, during the present session, with the intention of affording a full view of the posture of affairs on the Southwestern frontiers. By the information which has lately been laid before Congress, it appeared that the difficulties with the Creeks had been amicably and happily terminated. But it will be perceived with regret, by the papers herewith transmitted, that the tranquillity has, unfortunately, been of short duration, owing to the murder of several friendly Indians, by some lawless white men.

The condition of things, in that quarter, requires the serious and immediate consideration of Congress, and the adoption of such wise and vigorous laws as will be competent to the preservation of the national character, and of the peace made under the authority of the United States with the several Indian tribes. Experience demonstrates that the existing legal provisions are entirely inadequate to those great objects.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 30th, 1794.

Copy of a letter from Constant Freeman, agent for the Department of War, in Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT FIDIUS, 1st January, 1794.

SIR:

I had the honor to write you yesterday, and to inform you of the flattering prospects there then was of all differences being amicably settled, between the inhabitants of this country and the Creeks. But an unfortunate event, which happened on the 28th of last month, may destroy our best hopes. The Bird-tail king and eight of his town were most treacherously attacked by a party of whites, about fifteen miles on the other side of the Oconee, and two of their number killed. The Indians fled to this post for safety. They came in this morning. They demand, in the most peremptory terms, the reasons of such procedure; allege that they have solaced themselves under the protection of the United States, and were hunting on their own lands, under the assurance of safety pledged to them by Mr. Seagrove, the agent. The Bird-tail king particularly recapitulated the talks given out at New York, in 1790, and those since made to his nation, in the name of the President of the United States, which he said he had always believed very true, and on which he had hitherto relied.

We have made every exertion in our power to pacify them. It is a most unfortunate affair, and may destroy the friendship of this worthy chief, who has uniformly shewn himself a real friend of this country.

I have written to the Governor, requesting him to take measures to bring the murderers to justice. Enclosed is a copy of my letter.

I should send a duplicate of my last, did I not expect that you would receive this by the same post.

I have the honor to be, &c.

2d.—I now, sir, enclose you the duplicate of a declaration made by Bartlet Walker, relative to the murder of the Indians abovementioned. I am seriously alarmed for the safety of the Bird-tail king and his men, as I make no doubt but that there are several parties now out on the watch for him. It seems to be the determination of some people in this country to prevent all reconciliation with the Creeks.

[ENCLOSURES.]

Constant Freeman to the Governor of Georgia.

FORT FIDIUS, 1st January, 1794.

SIR:

It gives me pain to inform your Excellency of an unfortunate circumstance which has taken place within a few days, and which may interrupt the harmony between the inhabitants of Georgia and the Creek Indians, if measures should not be immediately adopted to prevent this calamity.

On the 28th of last month, the White Bird-tail king and eight Cussetahs, encouraged by assurances of safety from Mr. Seagrove, were hunting on this side the Oakmulgee, when two of their number were most treacherously murdered by a party of whites, about midway between that river and the Oconee. Three men, who appeared to be hunters, came to their camp, without arms. The Indians received and entertained them in a friendly manner, gave them something to eat, and shewed them every attention in their power. After staying some time with the Indians, they left them, and returned, with their arms and the rest of their party, fired upon and killed two of them. The Bird-tail king and the other six immediately fled; and, this day, they came to this post, to demand the reasons why they had been thus attacked, while they were hunting under the protection of the United States. They were also induced to make us this visit, because they knew that Weatherford was at this time here, on business from Mr. Seagrove. Every possible exertion has been made by the commanding officer to pacify them, and I have assured them that I would write to your Excellency, and solicit for them the justice which their case seems to require.

I am induced to believe that it is directly contrary to your Excellency's wishes that any armed party should cross the river, especially while Mr. Seagrove is endeavoring to induce the Indians to peace, and is on the eve of this happy event.

It will be impossible for the United States to keep the Indians quiet, if such atrocious acts should be permitted to go unpunished. I therefore request that your Excellency would be pleased to issue such orders as you may judge expedient for bringing the perpetrators to justice.

The Bird-tail king and his party will re-cross the river to-morrow, and return to their nation. It is to be apprehended that some mischief may ensue. The Bird-tail king, however, has promised me that he will not retaliate, but wait until he can learn what measures may be adopted to do him justice.

I am extremely sorry that, after the information I gave your Excellency yesterday, of the peaceable temper of the Indians, I should so soon have reason to complain against the whites.

Mr. Newman, who will deliver your Excellency this letter, will return immediately to this post. He will receive your orders.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

2d January.—Since writing the above, a young man, by the name of Walker, has made the enclosed declaration, which I have thought of sufficient consequence to transmit to your Excellency.

I have further to add, that a Mr. Booth has this moment informed me that an express was sent last night to Captain Sandford, from Major Adams, of Greene county, ordering him to collect as many men as possible, and meet him this morning at the Cedar Shoals, eight or ten miles above this post, in order to pursue the Indians. Captain Sandford is absent, therefore his men were not collected. The Indians crossed the river about half past twelve this day.

Bartlet Walker's declaration:

Personally appeared Bartlet Walker, aged sixteen years, and declares, in presence of Almighty God, that he was at Chambers' mill, upon Shoulderbone creek, on the 31st of last month, and that he there heard Captain Jonathan Adams, of Greene county, in the State of Georgia, declare, that he, and three others, did, on last Saturday, fire upon, and kill, two Indians, on the other side of the Oconee; that he, the said Adams, did kill one of the said Indians himself, and the other was killed by the fire of two of his party; that one of his party did not fire; and that he, nor any of his party, did not go near the Indians whom they had killed, and farther saith not.

BARTLET WALKER.

FORT FIDIUS, January 2d, 1794.

SIR:

Major Gaither being gone on a visit to the lower posts, and the command here devolving on me, I think it my duty to inform you of the most wanton and deliberate murder, committed, on the 28th ultimo, on a hunting party of Indians, friendly to the United States. This party were then hunting by leave of Mr. Seagrove, who is at present in the Creek nation. The perpetrators of this murder were out as spies on the other side of the Oconee, by what authority I know not. Tuskatchee Mico, or the White-bird-tail king, with six warriors of the Cussetah town, came into this post yesterday, at noon, to know the meaning of such outrages: for, it seems, the Indians killed were from his town. He seemed greatly concerned, and wished for some redress. I made use of every argument I was master of, to convince him the United States, far from authorizing such licentious acts, had ordered a peaceable conduct towards the friendly Indians, and wished for a peace, which they thought, with the White-bird-tail king, was about to be established. I told them I should write to you and the Governor of the State, who would put an end to such bad behavior in future. That I requested they would neither retaliate on Mr. Seagrove, nor any of the whites, until they heard from you. Such arguments, and supplying them with every thing they stood in need of, seemed at length to appease them. I have furnished them with a passport to hunt, to come and go, to and from, this post, whenever they pleased. It is impossible to say, sir, whether this pass will be regarded by the Georgians or not, as some of them have been heard publicly to declare, the death of Mr. Seagrove is what they earnestly desired; and, I have not a doubt, this murder was done with a view of retaliating on the agent. Captain Freeman will forward to you the declaration of a young man, signed in the presence of the officers, informing who the perpetrators of the murder were. It has also gone on to the Governor, to whom I have written on this occasion, and requested a stop might be put to such outrageous acts, if he wished not to see his country involved in a war, shocking to humanity. A copy of the letter to the Governor is enclosed.

FORT FIDUS, January 2, 1794.

SIR:

It is with the greatest regret that the painful task is left me to inform your Excellency of the most perfidious and wanton murder, committed on the 28th ultimo, by some of the militia of this State, on a hunting party of friendly Indians; Tuskatchee Mico, or the White-bird-tail king, with six warriors, arrived at this post yesterday, about noon, and informed me that, on the 28th ultimo, as they were quietly encamped some where on the little river, a party of about three white men came unarmed into their encampment, where they met with a friendly reception, and experienced acts of hospitality from the savages; such as eating with them; that they then went away; but, soon after, returned, with their arms, and fired on the helpless encampment, by which means two Indians were killed. The unfortunate fate of these two Indians is more peculiarly offensive, to the savages, as they were all of the Cussetah town.

The White-bird-tail king wished to know from me, whether this party had gone out by authority, and proceeded to say he had met Mr. Seagrove at that town, and received him as a brother; that he went from thence into the Upper Creek towns, where he met the like reception. That the Creeks had supposed, from Mr. Seagrove, that a firm peace was established between the United States and them; that he had obtained leave from the agent to hunt; that the Cussetahs were always known to be friends to the whites; when any of their young men had committed depredations, and brought horses to their town, he invariably returned them; that, before he ever came into the settlements, he had been fired upon, and lost two of his townsmen; that it appeared to him to be a concerted matter, and that the declaration of peace was no more than a mask for their destruction. I urged every thing in my power to convince him that the murder was perpetrated by some lawless people, contrary to the wish or inclination of the United States, or the authority of this State; that we all anxiously wished for a permanent peace; that I would inform you of it, and I was very sure you would take such measures as to put an end to the like enormities in future.

I take leave to represent to your Excellency, and my duty to the United States, as one of their officers, urges me to do so, that, Mr. Seagrove being among the savages at this moment, he is, in some degree, a hostage for the due performance of peaceable acts; and should a stop not be put to such unjustifiable proceedings, his life must pay the forfeit. Humanity is shocked at the dreadful thought, that one of our countrymen, in the very act of making peace, should fall a victim to the wanton barbarity of a set of unthinking lawless men.

I have this moment received certain intelligence that Captain Adams, of Shoulderbone, was the commander of the party that killed the Indians. Bartlet Walker, the son of a citizen, about a mile from this post, is ready to swear he heard Adams say he shot one of them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. B. ROBERTS.

KNOXVILLE, December 26th, 1793.

SIR:

I enclose you copies of three letters, received four days past, from John McKee; they contain all the information I have received from the Cherokees, since my return from Philadelphia.

On Monday, the 23d instant, a party of Indians, the number unknown, way-laid a path leading from Well's Station, (blockhouses) and fired upon a party of citizens conveying a wagon load of corn, from a neighboring plantation to the station, for the subsistence of their families, killed Roger Oates and Nicholas Ball, captured a mulatto boy, and took the wagon horses—Well's Blockhouses are twenty two miles from this place. A gun; of the description of those given by the Spaniards to the Creeks, was left on the ground by the Indians, which gives reason to suspect some of them were Creeks, and this suspicion is strengthened by the information of Charles Tucker to John McKee. I have not heard from Mero district since the 20th November, and on this part it is most probable the party of Creeks mentioned by Tucker will aim their blow.

I have the honor, &c.

John McKee to Governor Blount.

OCONEE MOUNTAIN, frontiers South Carolina, November 18, 1793.

SIR:

Under your instructions of the 17th ultimo, I proceeded to this place by way of Swannano and General Pickens'. At Swannano I did not go to the extreme frontier, as I learned from good authority that a communication with the Cherokee nation from that quarter* was impracticable, owing to the violent conduct of a Captain Smith, ——— Davidson, (son of Colonel William Davidson) ——— Foster, and two or three others, who way-laid the path leading from Davidson's to the nation, and killed two Cherokee fellows, who had been peaceably trading in the settlement, and took a woman prisoner, whom they despatched in a day or two, with a letter from Major William Wilson, informing the Indians that the mischief was done by people from the territory, which so far pacified them that they have not yet killed any person on that frontier. I was detained by heavy rains, and consequent high waters, and General Pickens had started to Philadelphia a few days previous to my arrival at his house. The communication from this place with the Indians is more difficult than I expected to find it, as the Georgians, it is said, are almost daily lying on the path leading to the nation, so that those who pass have to pass along some by-way in the mountain. Indeed, some people in this neighborhood, though they have been injured by the Cherokees less than any frontier adjacent to that nation, talk very rash, and denounce many threats. I have been advised by some traders, lately from the nation, that it would be extremely dangerous for me to go in at this time, and I have therefore declined it for the present; but, from the best information I can get, the chiefs of the Upper towns are desirous of peace, though their young fellows are daily stealing horses from the frontiers of the territory, and that the Lower towns, with Watts and the Bloody Fellow, are for war. These two chiefs, with many others from different parts of the nation, were at the massacre of Cavet's family, and I have been informed one of the family, a small boy, is yet alive, and a prisoner in the Creek nation; he was taken by Watts, who had no other way of saving him from the fury of the young fellows, but by giving him to the Creeks. There is also a prisoner, supposed from the Greasy Cove, of Lewis's family, now in the Valley towns, the young fellows of which are daily in the habit of committing depredations on the frontiers of Washington and Hamilton districts, and two or three of them have lately been killed on Pigeon—so says Charles Tucker. I have despatched the letter of the Secretary of War, of the 27th of August last, and by the bearer have requested the Maw to come to this place to see me: if he comes, I shall be enabled fully to inform you of the situation and disposition of the nation; if he should not come, I have instructed the bearer of the letter to go to the Lower towns, and at his return to let me know their intentions. Tucker says that, about eight days ago, near three hundred Creeks had passed through the Cherokee nation, for war against the territory, and that they intended to divide in small parties, and skulk along the frontiers.

I have the, &c.

* On the frontiers of North Carolina.

KNOXVILLE, December 26, 1793.

The circumstances attending the killing the Indians at Swannano, on the frontier of North Carolina, mentioned by Mr. McKee, as they have been represented to me by various reporters, and I believe truly, are, "that some Cherokees, in the latter part of September, or the early part of October, went to the house of Colonel William Davidson, of Buncombe county, trading, and as they were peaceably returning home, Captain Smith, young Mr. Davidson, (son of the Colonel) Mr. Foster, and others, forelaid them on their path, fired on them, and killed two fellows, and made a woman prisoner, and, after keeping her some days, sent her to the nation with a letter, giving information that the two fellows were killed by the people of the territory south of the Ohio. This false information was given the nation no doubt to the end that satisfaction might be taken upon the inhabitants of the territory south of Ohio, and not upon the guilty persons residing on the frontier of North Carolina. The citizens of North Carolina were without the color of justification for this barbarous and treacherous murder: for it is a fact, that no citizen of that State has been killed by Indians since the treaties of New York and Holston.

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

John McKee to Governor Blount.

OCONEE MOUNTAIN, November 26, 1793.

Sir:

Since my last, of the 18th instant, I have seen no person from the nation, and I am afraid it will be some time before any Indians can be prevailed on to come in: for, I am sorry to say, that even the conduct of Captain Beard is eclipsed by the conduct of some men from Keowee, about eight miles from this place, on Tuesday last, the 19th instant, who, in number twelve, armed, set out for the nation, under pretence of recovering some horses they said they had lost, and they acknowledge that an Indian fellow, who had taken them from the thief, gave them up, gave them victuals, and piloted them through the most difficult part of their road home; after which, they met a peaceable young fellow, who had been in the settlements trading, and without any provocation, in cold blood, wantonly put him to death. If such flagitious acts are permitted to pass unpunished, it will be in vain to make any attempts towards the re-establishment of peace. The proper officers have had notice of the murder, but what will be done I know not.

I have, &amp;c.

John McKee to Governor Blount.

OCONEE MOUNTAIN, December 5, 1793.

Sir:

Two of the perpetrators of the murder, mentioned in my letter of the 26th ultimo, have been taken before a magistrate; but, as there was no proof, except their own previous acknowledgment, which they then retracted, they were not committed, and it may be, that they raised the report to alarm the frontiers, though I am afraid it is too true.

Yesterday Mr. Edward Adair arrived from the nation, and informs me that the Little Turkey, John Watts, Eskaquia, and a number of the other chiefs, have gone to the Walnut Hills, where a deputation from the Cherokee, Creek, Chickasaw, and Choctaw nations, and Shawanese if any were in the Cherokee nation, are invited, to a treaty or conference with the Spaniards, whose last talks to the Cherokees were expressive of a strong desire that they should live at peace with their neighbors the citizens of the United States, unless invaded in their territory, and then to fight with all their force, and they should be supported; and that they have actually built a strong fort in Will's town, in expectation that the Spaniards would man it. Mr. Adair also says that the Glass, and some others of the chiefs, talk strongly for peace, the attainment of which desirable object, in my opinion, depends on the conference with the Spaniards, from which (I will speak plainly) I anticipate but little good to the United States: for, though I hope and believe the Spanish Government is well affected towards the United States, yet I am afraid some influential character, under that Government, has been active in spurring on these infatuated people to persevere in their acts of hostility.

I intend going to Will's town, and the other Lower towns, as soon as Watts returns, if I find I can do it with any prospect of safety.

THE SOUTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 19, 1794.

Mr. PICKINS, from the committee to whom was referred the message from the President of the United States, of the 30th ultimo, transmitting the copy of a letter from Constant Freeman, agent for the War Department, in Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated the first of January last, with sundry enclosures, relative to the Creek Indians, made the following report:

That the present situation of the Southwestern frontier requires that the Government of the United States take the most speedy and efficacious measures, as well to afford ample protection to the exposed inhabitants of that frontier, from the repeated depredations of the hostile Indians, as to prevent unauthorized attacks, by the lawless white inhabitants, on the Indian tribes.

That, in order to effect these purposes, the committee recommend the following resolutions:

That the President of the United States be authorized to call out such a number of the militia of the said States, as may be requisite to carry on offensive operations against such tribes or towns of Indians as may continue hostile, if, in his opinion, such offensive measures may be necessary, for the security of the frontier inhabitants, by compelling the Indians to a strict compliance with their treaties, and to prevent unprovoked aggressions by them: Provided, That the whole number of militia, so to be called into service, at any one time, shall not exceed _____ officers and privates, and be continued in service, at any one period, longer than the term of _____ months; the President to be authorized to establish such military posts as he may judge necessary, to prevent, as far as practicable, every depredation of the Indians, within the boundary line, fixed by treaty between the United States and them; and also to prevent any lawless attacks, by the white inhabitants, on the Indians, or encroachments on their hunting ground, without the said line; and to cause military posts to be guarded, by troops raised for the defence of the frontiers; and to cause to be raised, on the terms of the present military establishment, one or more troops of horse, to be employed as patrols between the said posts.

That every officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, of the militia of the United States, who shall go armed, over the mutual boundary line, and commit murder, or other depredations upon the Indians, without being legally authorized thereto, under the President, every such person, so offending, shall be considered as having voluntarily put himself under military power, and shall be tried by a court-martial, and, if convicted of the murder of any Indian, shall suffer death: and, if convicted of any offence, short of murder, shall suffer such fines and penalties as shall be adjudged by the said court-martial, not extending to the taking life; and, moreover, if such offender be an officer, upon such conviction, he shall be cashiered, and forever thereafter disqualified from holding a military commission within the United States: Provided, That this prohibition shall not extend to militia officers or privates, pursuing any Indian party, which may have been committing depredations within the present limits of the said States.

THE CREEKS AND CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 8, 1794.

Mr. CARNES, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the representatives of the People south of the river Ohio, praying protection from the hostile incursions of the Indians, made the following report:

That, from the representations made to your committee, and the facts stated in the memorial, the citizens resident on the Southwestern frontiers have experienced, and still continue to suffer, the most cruel and inhuman aggressions from large bodies of savages of the Creek and Cherokee nations. That, notwithstanding their solemn engagements to the contrary, and the most express stipulations in the treaties of Holston and New York, they have continued to invade the settlements on that frontier, and to commit thefts and murders unparalleled but by people of the like savage and ferocious nature. The settlers, on the other hand, determined on a due observance of the compacts made on the part of the United States, have done nothing more than act on the defensive. Your committee further report, that the situation of the Southwestern frontier in general, and Mero district in particular, calls for the most energetic measures, on the part of Government, to prevent the repeated depredations of those hostile tribes, and to afford speedy and effectual protection to the exposed inhabitants of that frontier; and, in order thereto, recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to call out such number of the militia of the government of the territory south of the river Ohio as may be requisite to carry on offensive operations against any nation or tribe of Indians that may continue hostile. And, whereas great inconvenience may arise to the citizens on the frontier, if they are not permitted to repel and pursue any invading body of Indians until orders for that purpose can be received from the President of the United States: Be it, therefore,

Resolved, That, whenever the Governor of the territory south of the Ohio shall have just cause to apprehend that an invasion is contemplated by any body or nation of Indians, he shall be, and is hereby, authorized to order out such part of the militia of said territory as he shall judge proper to repel, annoy, and pursue, such invading party of Indians, and shall transmit, by express, to the President of the United States, as accurate accounts as can be obtained, of the destination of the party so invading, the force ordered out to oppose them, and such other circumstances respecting the invasion and situation of the militia so ordered out, as may have come to his knowledge; and to continue the aforesaid militia in the field until the cause ceases, or until further or other orders are received from the President of the United States.

Resolved, That the President be authorized to cause to be established, and guarded, by troops raised for the defence of the frontiers, and, on the terms of the present military establishment, such military posts as, in his judgment, will be necessary for the permanent security of the frontier settlers, and to employ one or more troops of horse as patrols, or rangers, between the said posts.

THE SIX NATIONS AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MAY 21, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senateand of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, in confidence, sundry papers, by which you will perceive the state of affairs between us and the Six Nations, and the probable cause to which it is owing. And, also, certain information, whereby it would appear that some encroachment was about to be made on our territory, by an officer and party of British troops. Proceeding upon a supposition of the authenticity of this information, although of a private nature, I have caused the representation to be made to the British minister, a copy of which accompanies this message.*

It cannot be necessary to comment upon the very serious nature of such an encroachment, nor to urge, that this new state of things suggests the propriety of placing the United States in a posture of effectual preparation, for an event which, notwithstanding the endeavors making to avert it, may, by circumstances beyond our control, be forced upon us.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 21st May, 1794.

At a meeting between the Indians of the Six Nations, and their confederates, at the Onondaga village, on Buffalo creek, and John Butler, Esquire, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, at Niagara, in the Province of Upper Canada, and Israel Chapin, Esquire, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, in the United States' Northern Department, on Tuesday, the 8th day of October, 1793:

After the council had met, the Onondaga chief, CLEAR SKY, spoke as follows:

BROTHERS: We thank the Great Spirit for our happy meeting, that he has preserved us through all difficulties, dangers, and sickness, and given us an opportunity of meeting together at this place. He then went through the regular ceremony of condolence, and, severally, addressed Colonel Butler, General Chapin, and Indians of the several nations assembled; which ceremony was returned by Colonel Butler and General Chapin, in their separate characters, agreeable to the custom of Indians.

THE FARMER'S BROTHER then delivered the speech of the Shawanese, Delawares, and Twithuays, and spoke as follows:

BROTHERS: Colonel Butler, and General Chapin, we wish you to attend the Shawanese, and other nations of Indians; thanked the Six Nations for their attention, and were glad to see them at the great council fire, which had been kindled some time at the rapids of the Miami; and then proceeded:

BROTHERS: You are acquainted with the friendship which once subsisted between you and our fathers; and the reason that the present fire is kindled, is to renew that friendship.

BROTHERS: We mentioned this to you last fall, at a council at the Glaize, and we now repeat it, to put you in mind of that friendship which once subsisted between you and our wise forefathers.

[A belt of white wampum, made in a circular form, representing their place of meeting, as in the centre, and crossed by four stripes of black wampum, representing all their confederates, East, West, North, and South.]

The seven nations of Canada then asked how long the confederacy had subsisted between the Shawanese, &c. and the Six Nations, and their confederates; the answer was, three lives.

The Shawanese, &c. then proceeded:

BROTHERS: The ancient confederacy which subsisted between us and the Five Nations, was, that, if any of the Five Nations were in distress, we would take them to us; we now see that you are in distress; that you are surrounded by water, and have not dry land to stand upon; that a large white beast stands with open mouth on the other side, ready to destroy you. We have dry land for you to stand on; and we now take you by the hand, and invite you to come, and bring your beds, and sit down with us.—[A belt of seven rows of black and white wampum.]

The warriors now joined with the chiefs, and repeat the ancient agreement, and recommend a union of all the different nations, and ask them to follow what is requested of them by the chiefs.—[Sixteen strings of wampum.]

The Six Nations then advised the hostile Indians to send for the commissioners of the United States, who had arrived at the mouth of Detroit river, and take them by the hand, and lead them to the council fire which was then kindled.

PUCK-ON-OHE-LUH, head warrior of the Delawares, then spoke:

BROTHERS: I call you my uncles, and all the other Indians my grand-children; them I have already united and bound together, and I now bind you all together with this string.—[A large bunch of black wampum.]

The sachems of the Delawares then spoke:

BROTHERS: You have heard the speech of the chief warriors; we join with them, are glad to hear they have bound all their grand-children together, and that they have spoke with great respect to their uncles, and recommended to all to be of one mind.—[Four belts of wampum.]

The Six Nations returned thanks for the advice they had received from the Delawares.

The Wyandots then spoke:

BROTHERS: You came to us one hundred and fifty years ago, when we lived above Detroit, with a speech from the Six Nations, assembled at their council fire at Onondaga hill, and recommended to us to be friends, and advised us not to listen to any bad report, or any thing that would disturb our minds.

BROTHERS: Listen to a few words more we have to say to you; we hear the Virginians are near us; we shall not go to meet them; but if they should come among us, we do not know what will be the consequence.

The Chippewas, and twenty-six other nations, their confederates, then spoke:

BROTHERS: We are sorry that the business, for which the council fire was kindled at the rapids of the Miami, has not been completed as we could wish. We were desired, by the different nations which we represent, to attend the council, and use our endeavors to bring about a general peace, and unite all the nations.

The Wyandots again spoke, with a very large belt of wampum, with three pictures upon it, one in the middle, and one at each end, representing the Americans at one end, the Six Nations in the middle, and themselves at the other end, and expressed their sorrow that the Americans were gone before they had an opportunity to speak to them.

The Chippewas, Ottawas, and Pattawatamies, deputies from twenty-seven nations, inhabiting along the Lakes, and above Michilimackinack, then spoke:

* The copy here alluded to may be found with the Message of the 23d May, 1794, Vol. I.

BROTHERS: We are sorry that we have attended all summer at the council fire, and have not done any business, as we expected.

BROTHERS: We are now united with you, the Six Nations, and ask you to return to your seats, and let the United States know our determination, and return with an answer to us by the middle of winter, and not stop, as some nations may confuse you, and make your minds bad.

The Six Nations, in answer to the Chippewas, &c.

BROTHERS: We thank you, and, as soon as we get to our seats, we will kindle our council fire, and call Canadasago, our agent, appointed by the United States to meet with us, and, through him, will have our determination communicated to Congress.

The chiefs of the Six Nations to Colonel Butler and General Chapin:

BROTHERS: We have now made known to you our proceedings, at the late proposed treaty at the rapids of the Miami, and have informed you of the proposed line between the Indians and the United States, which, if accepted, we shall assist the white people to make a peace.

Proceedings of a Council held at Buffalo Creek, October 10th, 1793.

Present: John Butler, Esquire, Superintendent of Indian affairs; Israel Chapin, Esquire, Superintendent of Indian affairs, Northern Department United States, with the chiefs of the Six Nations.

The FARMER'S BROTHER, in addition to what passed in council the 8th October, instant, addressed them as follows:

BROTHERS: I am sorry we were the other day obliged to close the council, as we expected the Mohawks would have been present, and could have assisted in giving a fuller explanation of the business we had called you together upon, than was, at that time, in our power; they are now arrived, and Captain Brandt will further inform you what we have to say.

Captain Brandt then spoke as follows:

BROTHERS: You, the King, our father, and you, our brother, the United States, attend to what we have to say. We will now explain to you the material point, upon which we have requested your attendance at this council, and which has not been fully explained. We wish to act openly, that the world may judge of our proceedings.

BROTHERS: It is unnecessary to repeat what passed at the great council, at the Miami rapids, as we know that you are already acquainted therewith. We shall therefore point out the cause of our parting from the meeting, in the manner we did.

BROTHERS: When the first deputation from the confederate Indians met the commissioners of the United States, at Niagara, every thing seemed to promise a friendly termination of the treaty; but, before their return to the council fire, at the rapids of the Miami, messengers from the Creek nations arrived there, and brought authentic information of the white people having encroached upon that part of the confederacy.

This intelligence at once gave a change to the face of our proceedings, and, probably, was the sole cause of the abrupt termination of the negotiations for peace. Thus, you see, that claims upon our lands always have been, and still continue to be, the cause of the war.

BROTHERS: About five years ago, we agreed upon a line of demarcation with the United States, which you know to be the Muskingum; and, notwithstanding the various accidents that have since occurred, we will still adhere to that boundary.

BROTHERS: We think the United States will agree to this line, which will shew the sincerity and justice they always profess for the Indians; should they agree to this, we sincerely hope that peace will still take place, and we think, that the weight of our branch of the confederacy will be able to accomplish peace upon the reasonable line we have just mentioned, and we shall be exceeding sorry to find that this proposal should not be generally accepted by the confederacy. If it is rejected, we must be involved in difficulties in our own country.

BROTHERS: We will now proceed to explain the line upon which we hope peace will be made. We know that the lands along the Ohio are claimed by the Indians, but we propose to give up such part of those lands as are actually settled and improved; which settlements are to be circumscribed by a line drawn round them, and no further claims are to be admitted beyond such line. The remainder of the boundary to be explained by General Chapin, for which purpose it is the general wish of the Six Nations that General Chapin will, himself, proceed with this speech to Congress. [A belt of black and white wampum.]

Message from the Secretary of War to the Sachems, Chiefs, and Warriors, of the Six Nations.

BROTHERS:

A copy of your proceedings at Buffalo creek, on the 8th day of October last, has been received by General Chapin. These proceedings contain the sentiments of several chiefs of the various tribes who were assembled at the great council fire, which was kindled at the rapids of the Miami the last summer.

And, in addition to this information, you add, in your meeting of the 10th of the same month, your desires of a boundary, which you say will be further explained by General Chapin.

All these communications have been submitted to your Father, General Washington, the President of the United States, who desires the Six Nations to receive his sincere and hearty thanks for their assurances and acts of friendship to the United States.

While your Father, the President, has observed with great pleasure the pains you have taken to effect a peace between the United States and the hostile Indians, he is, at the same time, very sorry that any circumstances should have prevented the accomplishment of a measure affecting the happiness of both parties. Peace is best for the whites as well as for the red people, and it is always the cause of sorrow among good men, when misunderstandings arise which create wars.

The United States consider that they have taken all the requisite means to obtain a peace, which their duty or their humanity required. They appointed respectable and wise characters as commissioners, who were accompanied by a deputation of friends, the known advocates for peace. Those commissioners, under discouraging circumstances, persevered, for a long time, to obtain an interview with the great council of the Indians. This being ineffectual, they made, in good faith, such liberal offers in writing, to ensure the future comfort and prosperity of the Indians, as were never before given to the Indians of North America.

These circumstances being known, forever acquit the character of the United States from all imputations of desiring a continuance of the war.

The same principles of moderation and humanity which before dictated the offers to the Indians, and a sincere friendship for the Six Nations, have induced your Father, the President, to consider attentively your proposition for a new boundary. Although the lines you mention are considered as liable to considerable objections, yet, it is hoped, when all difficulties shall be discussed at a treaty or conference, by moderate men, with upright views, that some agreement may be made which would lead to a general peace.

On this ground, the President consents that a conference should be held at Venango, on the 15th, or middle of May next.

It is expected that the chiefs of the Six Nations and Chippewas will attend, and the chiefs of all such of the Western tribes as the said Six Nations and Chippewas may invite. And, if the hostile tribes should think proper to attend, they will be well received and treated, as people ought to be who are holding friendly treaties.

But, it cannot be unknown to you, that, by the late abortive efforts to negotiate, the American army was restrained from offensive operations against those tribes, who appear deaf to the voice of reason and peace. Such a conduct will not be observed by the United States again. This must be clearly understood; let it be remembered, therefore, that there is no deception on our parts. Our army must be left entirely at liberty to act as circumstances may require. The scene of operations, however, will be far distant from Venango, the proposed place of meeting.

It is to be observed, that in case any of the Western Indians attend at Venango, it would be proper they should proceed by water, at least as far east as Presqu' Isle, and thence to French creek by land. It would be dangerous for them to proceed from the westward by land, for the same reason they gave last year, namely, that the said paths are bloody paths.

BROTHERS: If you agree to the time and place of meeting, it will be proper that you should immediately signify the same to General Chapin, that due preparations may be made at the said place.

Given at the city of Philadelphia, by order of the President of the United States, the 24th day of December, 1793.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

To the Sachems, Chiefs, and Warriors, of the Six Nations.

BROTHERS:

Your Father, General Washington, has directed, as an evidence of his affection, and a reward for your services the last summer, that you and your families should be well supplied with good warm clothing.

Your friend, General Chapin, has this clothing in possession, for the purpose of being delivered to you.

Receive, therefore, these presents, with the same affection and sincere friendship that they are delivered to you by the United States.

Given at the city of Philadelphia, by order of the President of the United States, the twenty-fourth day of December, 1793.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Letter from Israel Chapin to the Secretary of War.

CANANDAIGUA, February 25th, 1794.

SIR:

Enclosed are the proceedings of a council, holden at Buffalo creek, the 7th of this instant. There were present at the council, the principal sachems, chiefs, &c. of the Six Nations, together with one Shawanee Indian that attended the council. There were a number of the British, from Upper Canada, also, who attended the council, agreeable to the Indians' request, viz. Major Littlehales, and others, of the Indian department. I proceeded on business, agreeable to your direction. The speech from the President was interpreted to them, and, although a little different from what they expected, (yet was gratified in the same.) I also informed them respecting the supply of clothing, &c. forwarded them by the President's directions, which they received with much gratitude, and as a new token of his fatherly disposition towards them; but I believe had not the same effect with those who, they at present, call their brothers, the other side of the water. They did not give me a direct answer to the President's speech, as they wanted some time, for several reasons; some of their chiefs were absent, and some of them in the Shawanese country, in order to find out the dispositions of them towards the United States, &c. Captain Brandt was present at the council; and, from every information I can obtain, the Six Nations, together with the Chippewas, will, undoubtedly, agree to hold a treaty next summer, agreeable to the President's request. As soon as I receive their answer, will forward it without loss of time, which will probably be in one month from the date.

I am, sir, with respect and esteem, your most obedient servant,

ISRAEL CHAPIN.

Proceedings of a council holden at Buffalo Creek, February 7th, 1794.

Present: The principal sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Mohawk, Cayuga, Oneida, Delaware, and Tuscarora nations of Indians.

From the United States—General Chapin, the superintendent, Mr. Colt, and Mr. Parrish, the interpreter.

From Upper Canada—Major Littlehales, Captain Bunbury, and the officers of the Indian department.

After going through the usual ceremonies of congratulation, RED JACKET, a Seneca chief, spoke as follows:

BROTHERS: (addressed to General Chapin.) We are happy that the Great Spirit has protected you to and from the President of the United States, with our proceedings relative to a boundary line, and with his, the President's, answer thereto.

BROTHERS: (addressed to the British.) We are glad to see you, the King's people, here, as we sent for you to listen to the answer of the President of the United States. Now, brothers of the United States, proceed.

General CHAPIN returned the compliment to the Indians, adding, that he was glad that they had sent for the King's people, to hear the speech about to be delivered, observing, also, that the sickness in Philadelphia, and Congress not being met together, had occasioned his delay.

General Chapin then read the President's speech. After the speech had been interpreted by Mr. Parrish,

General CHAPIN said:

BROTHERS: Having been absent from my family a greater part of the time, for the last year, I hope to have an answer to the President's speech, as soon as you can conveniently give one.

BROTHERS: When I was in Philadelphia, I requested your father, the President of the United States, to give each of your people, who attended the treaty last summer, a suit of clothes, as a reward for their services; I likewise desired him to furnish your poor and distressed people with some ammunition, and a few articles of clothing; and it is with pleasure I can inform you, that those requests were readily granted. I have procured the articles for you, and expect they will shortly be brought to my house.

RED JACKET replied:

BROTHERS: (of the United States.) We have heard the speech which has been delivered to us, with great attention, and shall now remove the council fire to our castle, to take it into private consideration.

Red Jacket then took the speech and belt, and gave it to Major Littlehales, desiring him to peruse it attentively.

Major Littlehales then addressed himself to the Indians, as follows, returning the strings of black and white wampum, which had been given him to attend the council.

BROTHERS: Agreeably to your invitation, communicated to me in the absence of the Governor from Niagara, and his information soliciting my attendance with some of the King's, your father's, officers, together with the officers of your own department, we immediately proceeded here, and thank the Great Spirit for bringing us safe to your council fire.

Present, as before, viz:

February 9th, 1794.

The principal Sachems, Chiefs, and Warriors, of the Six Nations; Red Jacket, speaker; Mr. Parrish, interpreter.

BROTHERS:

We have taken your speech into consideration, and our eldest brother, Captain Brandt, is to relate the result of our meeting in private council yesterday.

Captain Brandt then spoke as follows, with nine strings of white and black wampum:

BROTHERS: I now address myself to you, General Chapin, of the United States, and to you, Major Littlehales, in behalf of the King, and thank the Great Spirit for bringing us again together in council, as what we are agoing to relate we wish the world to know.

BROTHERS: You have both heard the message we delivered to our brothers of the United States last fall, relative to a boundary line; and we expected a positive answer from you, brothers of the United States, whether you would accept of it or not.

BROTHERS: When we delivered the message to you last fall, for the United States, we had first taken it into serious consideration; we spoke the language of our hearts, and the Great Spirit knew our minds; all the Six Nations were of the same opinion, and we are well assured, that, had the United States accepted our proposed boundary line, peace would have certainly taken place.

BROTHERS: The speech you have brought us, has given us great uneasiness; we are greatly at loss how to act; we expected a direct answer to our proposals of a boundary line; now we are much distressed that you have brought us but half an answer; the kindling a council fire at a distant place, is what we are not prepared to give a reply to.

BROTHERS: Provided the United States had accepted our proposed boundary line, we should have sent immediately to our Western brethren, who know our sentiments, and we should have attended your council and confirmed it.

BROTHERS: Make your minds easy; but in consequence of the importance of your speech, we must have time to deliberate very seriously upon it; we cannot give you an immediate answer; we must have a general council of all the chiefs; only a few are now present, and we should all be together. The reason of so much counselling at different times, has proceeded from so small a number of our sachems and chiefs being assembled, and this has been the principal cause of the present trouble.

BROTHERS: You, General Chapin, live near us; we have two months and a half to consider of your speech, and by that time we will give you a final answer. We pray the Great Spirit that these difficulties may terminate to the happiness of both parties.

BROTHERS: You requested an answer as soon as was convenient, but in such very weighty business, it is impossible to give one immediately. With regard to provision, there is plenty in your country, and, if we should agree to meet you, you need not be particular about what we shall consume, for we shall not expect any thing but provision.

BROTHERS: We now conclude, and we pray the Great Spirit to protect you safe home, and we desire you will bear it continually on your minds, that you will soon receive an answer. [The nine strings of wampum delivered to General Chapin.]

The address of General Chapin to the Six Nations.

BROTHERS: I thank the Great Spirit for preserving us, and am happy that we are again met together on this important business. The answer that you have made to the President's speech, has been taken down in writing.

BROTHERS: The business which has been laid before you, is of great importance, and it gives me great pleasure that you consider it so, and that you are going to call together all your sachems and chiefs to consider upon it seriously.

BROTHERS: You may rest assured, that your father, General Washington, wishes for peace, and the reason he wishes for the proposed treaty is, that all the Indian nations may come and talk together in a most serious manner. It is his desire, that those that are at war, as well as the other Indian nations, may come and discuss the matter fairly, to find where the difficulty lies, that peace may be made. He is sensible that the Six Nations have been very active in endeavoring to bring about a peace, and he hopes that their good works may be attended with success.

BROTHERS: I shall now return to my seat, and wait patiently for your final answer, and I earnestly hope, that all the Indian nations may be agreed, and that matters may be settled in such a manner, as will give satisfaction to the United States and the Indian nations.

Extract of a letter from Detroit, dated April 17, 1794.

"We have lately had a visit from Governor Simcoe; he came from Niagara, through the woods; he has gone to the foot of the Rapids, and three companies of Colonel England's regiment have followed him, to assist in building a fort there."

CANANDAIGUA, 29th April, 1794.

SIR:

I had the honor of informing you in my last, that I had received a runner from Buffalo Creek, requesting my attendance at a council summoned to meet there.

The enclosed are the proceedings of that council.

I have every reason to suppose, that the Six Nations had fully made up their minds, previous to the meeting of the council, to hold a treaty, agreeable to the wishes of the United States, in order to bring about a general peace. But the inflammatory speech of Lord Dorchester, which was interpreted to them by Colonel Butler, together with the presents heaped on them by the British, on this occasion, induced them to give up that friendly intention.

Colonel Butler and Captain Bunbury attended the council, in behalf of the British Government. They took pains, on all occasions, to represent a war between their government and ours, as inevitable; and, although in my presence, they did not intimate that their assistance would be wanted by the King, yet, I am persuaded, that, on other occasions, every effort is made to secure it.

The presents that I brought from Philadelphia, for, and delivered to the Indians, proved very satisfactory to them; and am persuaded, that, at the present time, a continuation of the generosity of the United States will be highly serviceable.

This part of the country being the frontier of the State of New York, feels very much alarmed at the present appearance of war.

Destitute of arms and ammunition, the scattered inhabitants of this remote wilderness would fall an easy prey to their savage neighbors, should they think proper to attack them.

When I was at Buffalo Creek, Governor Simcoe had gone to Detroit. He started for that place immediately after receiving Lord Dorchester's speech to the Indians.

The expenses of the Indians increase very fast. Their demands increase with the importance they suppose their friendship is to us.

However, sir, you may rest assured, that I endeavor to make use of all the economy that I can.

I have the honor to be, with respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ISRAEL CHAPIN.

P. S. My son will inform you many particulars that I thought proper to omit mentioning in this letter.

Reply of the Six Nations, assembled at Buffalo Creek, on the 21st of April, 1794, to a speech from General Knox, Secretary of War to the United States, delivered by General Chapin, on the 10th February, as interpreted by Jasper Parrish, one of the interpreters for the United States.

Clear Sky (an Onondaga chief) spoke as follows:

GENERAL CHAPIN: We are happy to see that you are arrived safe at our council fire, and that you have been preserved, by the Great Spirit, in good health.

COLONEL BUTLER: We are also very happy to see you at our council fire, as representing the King.

Captain Brandt then spoke as follows:

BROTHERS: You, of the United States, listen to what we are going to say to you; you, likewise, the King.

BROTHERS: We are very happy to see you, Colonel Butler and General Chapin, sitting side by side, with the intent of hearing what we have to say. We wish to do no business but what is done open and above-board.

BROTHER: You, of the United States, make your mind easy, on account of the long time your President's speech has been under our consideration; when we received it, we told you it was a business of importance, and required some time to be considered of.

BROTHER: The answer you have brought us is not according to what we expected, which was the reason of our long delay; the business would have been done with expedition, had the United States agreed to our proposals. We would then have collected our associates, and repaired to Venango, the place you proposed for meeting us.

BROTHER: It is not now in our power to accept your invitation; provided we were to go, you would conduct the business as you might think proper; this has been the case at all the treaties held, from time to time, by your commissioners.

BROTHER: At the first treaty, after the conclusion of the war between you and Great Britain, at fort Stanwix, your commissioners conducted the business as it to them seemed best; they pointed out a line of division, and then confirmed it; after this, they held out that our country was ceded to them by the King; this confused the chiefs who attended there, and prevented them from making any reply to the contrary; still holding out, if we did not consent to it, their warriors were at their back, and that we would get no further protection from Great Britain. This has ever been held out to us, by the commissioners from Congress; at all the treaties held with us since the peace, at fort McIntosh, at Rocky river, and every other meeting held, the idea was still the same.

BROTHER: This has been the case from time to time. Peace has not taken place, because you have held up these ideas, owing to which much mischief has been done to the Southward.

BROTHER: We, the Six Nations, have been exerting ourselves to keep peace since the conclusion of the war; we think it would be best for both parties; we advised the confederate nations to request a meeting, about half way between us and the United States, in order that such steps might be taken as would bring about a peace; this request was made, and Congress appointed commissioners to meet us at Muskingum, which we agreed to, a boundary line was then proposed by us, and refused by Governor St. Clair, one of your commissioners. The Wyandots, a few Delawares, and some others, met the commissioners, though not authorized, and confirmed the lines of what was not their property, but a common to all nations.

BROTHER: This idea we all held out at our council, at Lower Sandusky, held for the purpose of forming our confederacy, and to adopt measures that would be for the general welfare of our Indian nations, or people of our color; owing to those steps taken by us, the United States held out, that when we went to the Westward to transact our private business, that we went with an intention of taking an active part in the troubles subsisting between them and our Western brethren; this never has been the case. We have ever wished for the friendship of the United States.

BROTHER: We think you must be fully convinced, from our perseverance last summer, as your commissioners saw, that we were anxious for a peace between us. The exertions that we, the Six Nations, have made towards the accomplishing this desirable end, is the cause of the Western nations being somewhat dubious as to our sincerity. After we knew their doubts, we still persevered; and, last fall, we pointed out methods to be taken, and sent them, by you, to Congress; this we certainly expected would have proved satisfactory to the United States; in that case we should have more than ever exerted ourselves, in order that the offers we made should be confirmed by our confederacy, and by them strictly to be adhered to.

BROTHER: Our proposals have not met with the success from Congress that we expected; this still leaves us in a similar situation to what we were when we first entered on the business.

BROTHER: You must recollect the number of chiefs who have, at divers times, waited on Congress; they have pointed out the means to be taken, and held out the same language, uniformly, at one time as at another; that was, if you would withdraw your claim to the boundary line, and lands within the line, as offered by us; had this been done, peace would have taken place; and, unless this still be done, we see no other method of accomplishing it.

BROTHER: We have borne every thing patiently for this long time past; we have done every thing we could consistently do with the welfare of our nations in general—notwithstanding the many advantages that have been taken of us, by individuals making purchases from us, the Six Nations, whose fraudulent conduct towards us Congress never has taken notice of, nor in any wise seen us rectified, nor made our minds easy. This is the case to the present day; our patience is now entirely worn out; you see the difficulties we labor under, so that we cannot, at present, rise from our seats and attend your council at Venango, agreeable to your invitation. The boundary line we pointed out, we think is a just one, although the United States claim lands west of that line; the trifle that has been paid by the United States can be no object in comparison to what a peace would be.

BROTHER: We are of the same opinion with the people of the United States; you consider yourselves as independent people; we, as the original inhabitants of this country, and sovereigns of the soil, look upon ourselves as equally independent, and free as any other nation or nations. This country was given to us by the Great Spirit above; we wish to enjoy it, and have our passage along the lake, within the line we have pointed out.

BROTHER: The great exertions we have made, for this number of years, to accomplish a peace, and have not been able to obtain it; our patience, as we have already observed, is exhausted, and we are discouraged from persevering any longer. We, therefore, throw ourselves under the protection of the Great Spirit above, who, we hope, will order all things for the best. We have told you our patience is worn out; but not so far, but that we wish for peace, and, whenever we hear that pleasing sound, we shall pay attention to it.

[The belt and speech, sent by General Knox, were then returned to General Chapin.]

Speech of General Chapin to the Six Nations.

BROTHERS:

I am happy in this opportunity of meeting you in so general a council, but am sorry to find that your exertions for bringing about a peace to the Westward, have been checked by the rumor of a British war. Lord Dorchester's speech, which has been explained to you, has been the cause of your uneasiness; and pains have been taken to increase that uneasiness, by filling your heads with an idea that a war between Great Britain and America is inevitable. For my own part, I do not believe that a war will take place. I am sure that our President and our Congress are averse to it; and that, if peace can, with honor, be maintained by the United States, that war is not their wish.

BROTHERS: I still hope and believe, that the black clouds that are gathering around us, will shortly be dispersed, the sun will again shine bright, and you will be able to keep your seats with comfort to yourselves.

BROTHERS: Even if the storm should thicken, why need your minds be troubled? Why need you be called from your seats, in order to forward the pretensions of Great Britain?

BROTHERS: You have not yet heard the voice of the President; he has not yet told you that we are going to take up the tomahawk. Until you hear this voice, I hope you will keep your seats, and not suffer your minds to be troubled by any fear of war. When the President does speak, I am sure that his voice will be pleasing to you. I have no more to say to you at present; I shall now return home to my seat.

General Chapin was then requested, by the chiefs, to forward their proceedings to the Secretary of War, either personally or by his son.

THE CREEKS AND SOUTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 2, 1794.

*Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives:*

I send you certain communications, recently received from Georgia, which materially change the prospect of affairs in that quarter, and seem to render a war with the Creek nation more probable than it has been at any antecedent period. While the attention of Congress will be directed to the consideration of measures suited to the exigency, it cannot escape their observation, that this intelligence brings a fresh proof of the insufficiency of the existing provisions of the laws, towards the effectual cultivation and preservation of peace with our Indian neighbors.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, June 2, 1794.

Copy of a letter from Major Richard Brooke Roberts to the Secretary of War.

FORT FIDIUS, May 10, 1794.

SIR:

From the information of Mr. Barnard, the deputy of Mr. Seagrove, I have the following intelligence, which I conceived my duty, as commanding officer of this garrison, absolutely required my making you early acquainted with; and, from a letter directed to Major Gaither (which I opened) from a Mr. Jordan, whom Mr. Seagrove left in the Creek nation to give intelligence, I find that a village of the Tallassee town, called the Half-way-house, were determined for war, and meant to make a stroke somewhere on the frontier; that the head-men of the Cussetahs had sent to stop and prevent them from committing mischief, but that the event was doubtful.

I have the misfortune to acquaint you, that, two days ago, as the Dog king of the Cussetahs and his brother were hunting on Little river, twenty miles above its confluence with the Oconee, a party of ten whites, who crossed the river, penetrated as far as they were; on perceiving the Indians, two white men beckoned to them; the Indians seeing them make some motions with their guns, which indicated hostility, ran off; the whites fired on them; the Dog king unfortunately received the shot in his belly; they made their escape into a swamp, and his brother returned the fire without effect. The Dog king is not killed, and I am in hopes he will recover.

I have to observe, sir, on this occasion, some matters to you, which I hope may be attributed to the true motives, viz: the sole desire of doing my duty to the United States with fidelity and zeal.

The whole strength of this garrison amounts to no more than sixty-nine effective. The Indians and Georgians seem now mutually roused, and there is not a doubt in my mind, but that a war will break out in all its horrors, in about two months. Should an attack take place on this garrison, with this small force under my command, I leave you to judge what defence can be made. I shall be guarded on all occasions; I shall make use of every exertion in my power, to keep the people from molesting the Indians, and I shall make the best defence possible; both duty and inclination prompting me to maintain this post to the last extremity. I repeat to you, sir, a war with the Indians seems inevitable, and this handful of men, under my command, being entitled to their discharges, every day the force will be considerably reduced; but, small as it is, every thing shall be done that can be done.

I know that one great effort often commands success, and that vigilance often counteracts a superior force. I am determined to make use of all mine, and, at all events, prevent a surprise.

P. S. I have this moment received a letter from Lieutenant Sedgwick, commandant of fort Matthews, which I send enclosed to you. You will see from its contents, that a war with the Creeks is not mere conjecture. Should one take place, the situation of this country will be horrid, beyond description, as, from the information of Mr. Seagrove, lately from the nation, they can bring ten thousand gun-men into the field.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Theodore Sedgwick to Captain Richard B. Roberts.

FORT MATHEWS, 7th May, 1794.

SIR:

I have sent Frederick Myers and Lewis Branan, to Fort Fidius, whose terms are out. On the night of the 2d, the Indians stole some horses; about four or five miles from this, and were pursued by some of the inhabitants as far as the militia station, at the high shoals of the Apalachy, where they were joined by Lieutenant Hay, and some of his dragoons, which made eighteen in number. They then followed the Indians about fifteen miles, beyond the High Shoals, where the Indians lay in ambush, and defeated the militia, and killed Lieutenant Hay, and one of his men, and wounded another. Them that made their escape brought off six horses, besides one that was stole, that broke loose from the Indians in the time of action.

I am told that General Clarke is to cross here to day, with a number of militia; it is supposed with an intention to take some Indians that are at Montpelier.

N. B. The men that were in the action, say it was the Creek Indians that stole the horses.

Copy of a letter from James Jordan to Major Henry Gaither, dated

CUSSETAHS, 5th May, 1794.

SIR:

About ten days ago, there was a small party from the Usechees, set to steal horses, but on what part of the frontier they will strike, is unknown. The head-men of the town sent after them to bring them back, but the runners could not come up with them nor discover what route they had taken.

A town called the Half-way House, are determined for war, and are expected to start to-morrow. This, I have informed this town of, this morning, in the square. They have taken measures to endeavor to stop them, but whether they will succeed or no, I am not able to say.

I am in hopes of the horse being returned, which was stolen about the 20th ultimo. Some of the head-men have said, I may expect them when the pay comes for the negroes.

From circumstances, I do not know but what I may be obliged to leave the nation before the return of Mr. J. Seagrove, and, sir, by the letter which accompanies this, I have requested him to deposit one hundred dollars in your hands for me, which, sir, if you will be so good as to take charge of, I shall ever esteem it as a particular favor.

I am, sir, with due respect, your most humble servant,

JAMES JORDAN.

Copy of a letter from Major R. B. Roberts to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT FIDIUS, May 10th, 1794.

SIR:

Just after I enclosed my despatches to you, the friendly Indians, encamped on the bank of the river, were attacked by a party of militia, under the command of Major Adams. As soon as I heard the firing, I sent Doctor Dalcho over the river, to request the commanding officer of the party to desist from their proceedings. His report I send enclosed to you. The Indians flew to this garrison for protection, but I got them off safe, I expect, over the river. I fear very much the White Bird-tail king will be killed on his route to this post; he has been to Augusta with Mr. Seagrove, with the Tuckaubatchee king, &c. However, I am informed General Glascock will escort him with a strong party. Thus, sir, you see an Indian war has commenced. This garrison totally defenceless; no water within three hundred yards of the fort, that, from our force, may be taken possession of at any time by an enemy. The weak force of this garrison, not able to enforce a protection to either the inhabitants or themselves, they must fall a sacrifice. It has been long reported to the War Office, the weak situation of this garrison. If any misfortunes happen to it, it shall not be my fault, for I am determined to risk every thing in its defence.

Copy of a letter from Constant Freeman, agent for the Department of War in Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT FIDIUS, 9th May, 1794.

I am, sir, extremely sorry, that almost every other letter I have had the honor to write you, has contained disagreeable intelligence. The prospect of a permanent peace with the Creeks was very flattering when Mr. Seagrove left the nation. The reverse is now the case.

On the night of the 1st instant, a party of Indians stole some horses from or near Spark's station, on the Oconee. They were pursued by a Lieutenant Hay, and fifteen horsemen, who fell into an ambuscade near the Apalachy High Shoals. Mr. Hay and two men were killed, and one wounded. It is not ascertained whether these Indians were Creeks or Cherokees, but, it is probable, they were of the latter. This has greatly alarmed the frontiers, and we are informed, that a large party has, or is about to march on their trail, until they shall come up with them.

It might have been possible for the Creeks, if they were not the aggressors, to have convinced the people of this State of their peaceable intentions; but an unfortunate accident happened yesterday, which will probably lessen their inclination to do it. The Dog king of the Cussetahs and his brother were hunting on the south side of Little river, when they fell in with a party of ten mounted militia, who seemed to be friendly, but, as the Indians approached them, they thought they discovered hostile intentions. They, therefore, turned about to run; the militia fired, and wounded the Dog king, and last night, they sent a runner to the camp, now opposite to this post, with the above information, which has greatly alarmed the Indians.

It appears, sir, by information this day received from the Creek nation, that there are many evil disposed men in that country, who wish to bring on a war. On or about the 5th instant, intelligence was received at the Cussetah town, that the Tame or Tallassee king had collected a party, to march against the upper settlements on this frontier. The next day, the Cussetah king, and the Big Warrior of the Cussetahs, the Hallooing king, and the Head Warrior of the Cowetas, set off to persuade the Tallassees to desist from their hostile intentions, and the runner who brings us the news, says, that there cannot be a doubt but that they would prevail upon them to be quiet. He farther says, that there had not any parties marched from the Creek nation before he left it. It is, therefore, probable, that the party which killed Lieutenant Hay were not Creeks.

It is also reported here, by some Uchee Indians, that, about the 23d of last month, three parties had set off from the Usechees and Chehaws, toward the lower frontier, on the Altamaha, with an intention to steal horses and negroes.

Notwithstanding these unfavorable accounts, it may be relied on that a majority of the Creek nation wish to live in peace with the inhabitants of this State, and they have lately given proofs of their good disposition.

I suggested, sir, to you, in my letter of the 10th of February, that the erecting posts on the Apalachy would give umbrage to the Indians, and Mr. Seagrove, and all those with whom I have conversed from the nation, confirm me in my opinion. I am now to inform you of the exact position of these posts. Lieutenant Sedgwick has transmitted me the following account of them: That there is one erected at the mouth of the Apalachy river, twenty miles; one at the High Shoals, ten miles; one at the Flat Shoals of the middle fork of the Oconee, eighteen miles, and the other at the Hurricane Shoals, on the north fork of the same river, twenty-five miles from fort Mathews. These posts are about eighteen miles from each other, and on a straight line to the Currahee mountain. They are each garrisoned by twenty horse and twenty foot.

He also informs me, that Captain Williamson had made an irruption into the Cherokee nation, and returned without seeing any Indians; and that the same officer proposed to march on the 5th instant, against the Creek towns. I have not heard whether the last expedition had taken effect.

The White Bird-tail king or Big king of the Cussetahs, and five other chiefs and warriors, went down to Augusta, with Mr. Seagrove. They have not yet returned. Mr. Baruard, who came this day from that place, informs me, that the Governor intends to send a strong guard under General Glascock, to escort them as far as this post.

The Indians, now opposite to this garrison, will, in consequence of the alarm, return immediately to the nation.

FORT FIDIUS, 10th May, 1794.

SIR:

The express was to have left this post early this morning, with the letters written yesterday to you and the Governor, containing information of the unpleasant situation of the frontiers. He was detained longer than was expected; and now I am under the disagreeable necessity of adding to the bad news.

This morning, between the hours of ten and eleven, the Indian camp, opposite to this post, was attacked by a party of one hundred and fifty mounted militia, under the command of Major Adams. There was, at the time, about twenty Indians in the fort, and about ten fled from the camp, and sought protection with us. We have been placed in a very critical position; to afford protection to the Indians, was irritating the militia; to deliver them up, would be to violate the faith of the United States, in which they had confided. It was, therefore, thought advisable to send them away, and let them make their escape, if possible. Accordingly, they set off about two o'clock, and I have reason to believe they have crossed the river without interruption.

In the affair of this morning, one white man was mortally wounded: it is not yet ascertained whether any of the Indians have been killed or wounded. Soon after the firing was heard, Captain Roberts, the commanding officer, sent Dr. Dalcho over the river to the militia, to hear from them the reasons which induced the attack. I enclose you his report. The Indians were waiting for the return of their chiefs from Augusta, as I wrote you yesterday. I must now inform you, that all hopes of peace must be given up; nothing but the most cruel war will follow what has happened within these few days. Both sides are irritated beyond all reconciliation.

It is also proper that I should inform you, that the militia have threatened to take the Indians out of the fort by force. I therefore urged most strenuously to the commanding officer, the sending them away: for I conceived it never could be the intention of Government that the Federal troops should be involved in a contest with the militia. I am apprehensive that the chiefs who are on their return from Augusta will be killed, notwithstanding the guard which has them under their protection.

Since the party of Indians left us at two o'clock, Long Tom, and two other Indians, came to this fort to make inquiries relatively to the attack of this morning. As soon as we could give them some refreshment, they were hurried away. It is proper that the Government of the United States should be informed, that the Indians have always paid the greatest respect to the garrisons of the Federal troops posted in this country. They cannot understand the connexion there is between this State and the General Government: the idea is too complex for their comprehension.

I enclose the deposition of Mr. Barnard, Deputy Agent of Indian affairs.

The report of Dr. Frederick Dalcho, Surgeon's Mate to the troops of the United States in Georgia.

In consequence of an order from Richard Brooke Roberts, Captain-commandant, to ascertain the cause of the firing that was heard over the river, I crossed this morning for the purpose.

On rising out of the cane-brake, I saw two different parties of militia; the one on the edge of the cane-brake, employed in plundering the Indian camps; the other at some considerable distance, on the hill. I inquired for the commanding officer, whom I found to be Major Adams. I demanded, in the name of the United States, the cause of their attacking the Indians, who were on a friendly visit, with Major Seagrove, at this post, and while they were under the protection of the United States? He told me, that, in consequence of the death of Lieutenant Hay, on the Apalachy, he had raised one hundred and fifty men, to pursue and destroy any party of Indians he might gain intelligence of; that an Indian who was wounded at that time was now in our garrison, under the care of the surgeon, from which he supposed he was one of the party who are now here, and that he was determined not to return until the whole of them were killed; that he would advance to the mouth of the cannon, and take them from the fort: for he was able to do it. I assured Major Adams that the wounded Indian had not been at our garrison since the accident happened. I demanded Mr. Barnard's horses. This brought on the most bitter exclamations from a number of them, particularly Major Adams, who swore he would rather kill Barnard than an Indian; for he had given a pass to the Indians who killed Lieutenant Hay, certifying that they were friendly disposed towards this country; that this pass was found sticking up on a sapling, over the dead body. He told me that Mr. Barnard's horses should not be taken; when a number of his men exclaimed, that it was the lives of the Indians they wanted, and not their property; notwithstanding which, I discovered several of them with Indian horses, rifles, skins, &c. Mr. Barnard's negro boy, who was with me, was threatened by a number of the men. I was further informed, that the Big king, and the rest of the chiefs who are now on their return from Augusta, where they have been on a visit to the Governor, should be killed; that they should make no distinction of tribes. I told them it was in vain to talk so, for the Governor had given assurances to Major Seagrove that they should be escorted by a strong guard, under the command of Brigadier General Glascock. Some of them immediately replied, that they could raise more men than General Glascock, and would take them. I heard several of them mention, that a party, under Col. Lamar, were on their way down, on this side the river. One of the militia received a ball through his belly, which I believe will prove mortal; the loss of the Indians is not yet known: one only was seen to fall, who crept into the cane-brake. Just before I left them, Major Adams swore he would have hair before to-morrow night; and that Brigadier General Clarke had marched against the Creek towns.

Given under my hand, at Fort Fidius, this 10th day of May, 1794.

THE SOUTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 5, 1794.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 5th, 1794.

SIR:

In obedience to the order of the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to Congress, further information relatively to the recent events upon the Southwestern frontiers.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States and President of the Senate.

Copy of a letter from Constant Freeman, Agent for the Department of War, in Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated .

FORT FIDUS, 11th May, 1794.

SIR:

The Indians who left the fort yesterday, made their escape; had they remained until night, they would not have effected it, as parties of militia were lying on the banks of the river to cut them off. It is, perhaps, a fortunate circumstance, that they crossed without interruption, as it may yet be possible to restore peace, should the chiefs arrive from Augusta in safety. The officers of the Federal Government are placed in a delicate situation.

It is expedient that I should explain, sir, to you, the reasons of the Creeks having been about this garrison for some days past. When Mr. Seagrove returned from the nation, on the twenty-fifth of last month, he was accompanied by the Big king of the Cussetahs, and about forty other chiefs and warriors, who came with him to shew their attachment to his person, and the desire they had of perpetuating the peace. In the fullest confidence of security, the White-bird-tail king, or Big king of the Cussetahs, the Tuckaubatchee King, the head warrior of the Tallasses, the Mad Dog's nephew, of the Tuckaubatchees, George Tool, Big Fear, and the Little Warrior of the Cussetahs, all influential men, went with him to Augusta, to brighten the chain of friendship with the Governor. When Mr. Seagrove left this place, he directed the Indians who remained, to hunt between the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, until the return of their chiefs, and particularly cautioned them against going far above this post. Since he left us, several other parties came in, staid a few hours, and returned to their hunts; that, at one time, there were about one hundred and thirty at the camp opposite this garrison; they demeaned themselves peaceably, and did not, on any occasion, shew a hostile disposition, particularly Long Tom, brother to the two Cussetahs who were killed last December; he had assured Mr. Seagrove that he would not do any mischief, but wait until he should hear from him at Philadelphia. When Mr. Barnard returned from Augusta, on the 9th instant, where he had heard of the mischief which had been done above, and of the death of Lieutenant Hay, he sent the Indians away, lest any injury should befall them, and that night, the most of them decamped. At the time of the attack, yesterday morning, there were about twenty-five or thirty in the camp, and twenty in this post; their intentions were to have left us in the evening; they had been alarmed by the accident which had befallen the Dog king of the Cussetahs. Some, however, were desirous to stay for the return of their chiefs, for whose safety they were extremely anxious. What has happened to them since, under the persuasion that it was the Creeks who had done the mischief, I have before detailed in my letters to you, of the 9th and 10th instant.

It is possible that some straggling Indians of that nation may have stolen the horses at Sparks' station, but, the presumption is much stronger that it was done by the Cherokees. Had the former been disposed for war, they had the fairest opportunity to break up the settlements in this quarter; on the contrary, they went into the country without their arms, mixed with the inhabitants, and discovered no signs of fear; besides, it is well known that Indians are very careful to preserve the lives of their chief men. At the time the theft was committed, the Big king, and those before mentioned, were on their way to Augusta, and might well be supposed a security for the good behavior of those they had left behind. The exertions made by the Cussetah king, and the other chiefs, to prevent the Tallasses from marching against the settlement, most certainly are evidences of their peaceable temper. Things of less moment have also happened, which indicate that they were generally this way disposed. Some time ago, some horses strayed from a party of the French legion encamped opposite to the Rock Landing; they were found by three Creeks, who were hunting in that quarter, and brought to their owners, but, not before the whites had taken a number from an Indian camp. When Mr. Seagrove came to this garrison, a horse thief had made his escape from justice, had crossed the river, and was flying to the nation for refuge. He was stopped by some Indians, between this and the Oakmulgee, and although he broke from them, they brought the horse, and delivered it to the owner. Cattle have been put over the river; they have not driven them off, but complained regularly to Mr. Seagrove, and requested that they might be removed. I enclose you the copy of a letter which has been this moment received from Mr. Jordan, who had been left by Mr. Seagrove at the Cussetahs. By this, it also appears, that the general wish of the nation has been to preserve the peace. The runner who brought it, could not be prevailed upon to cross the river, but delivered it to a soldier who had been sent down to bring him over. The report of the Uchee Indians, mentioned in my letter of the 9th, was, probably, premature.

From the above statement of facts, it may be presumed, that the mischief which provoked the attack of yesterday, was not done by the Creeks, and that they had not any desire to renew the war with the people of this country.

Nothing has occurred in this quarter since yesterday. The Indians have all gone to the nation. We hear that a large party of militia were to have crossed the Oconee, at the Cedar Shoals, last night, to attack the Creek towns. I shall, this evening, despatch an express to the Governor, with a copy of the letter received from Mr. Jordan.

I am, &amp;c.

Copy of a letter from James Jordan to Lieutenant Colonel-commandant Henry Gaither.

SIR:

I wrote you a few days ago, by William Gray, that the Half-way house Indians were turning out for war; the report was, at that time, believed, but they have either been stopped by the Upper towns, or altered their intentions, for, at this time, is in, the Broken Arrow, and denies that it is his intention to go to war without the whole nation.

The head-men of this town are uneasy about their people that went down with Mr. Seagrove, and they are afraid that Gray will circulate the false report of the Half-way house Indians going to war.

They have ordered me to inform you, sir, and they request that you will endeavor to prevent Gray from circulating these lies, and, also, to inform the people of Greene and Franklin not to be under any apprehension of danger; they assure me, that, if they can hear or discover any thing of that kind, they will give them the earliest information they can, through you.

On this occasion, the head-men of this town, and the Cowetas, have exerted themselves much to their credit; they have runners out on all quarters, to stop them if they have, or had, attempted to go. But, sir, the king himself contradicts it.

On the 15th instant, one Milford is to have a meeting in the Broken Arrow, but, upon what business, I cannot say. I wish, if possible, Mr. Barnard to be here by that time, and will be much obliged to you to inform him of it, should he be at the fort.

I am, sir, &c.

JAMES JORDAN.

P. S. They request that you will prevent any scouts from crossing the river, as the people are all hunting between the Oakmulgee and Oconee, and that you will be so good as to inform Barnard that Gray's talks are all lies.

I am, &c.

FORT FIDIUS, 14th May, 1794.

SIR:

The letter I had the honor to write you, on the eleventh inst. was to have been sent by the way of Savannah; but, the person to whom I had given it in charge, being stopped at the first house, after he had left this post, by some armed men, I thought it highly prudent to take the letter from him, lest they should make an improper use of the information it contained, if it should have fallen into their hands. It is now sent by the post from Augusta.

On the tenth, General Glascock left that place with the Big king, and the other chiefs, under his charge, whom he was directed to conduct to this post. On the eleventh he met the express I had sent to the Governor, who informed him of the attack made on the Indians, and of the threats which had been given out to take the chiefs from him: this being confirmed from other quarters, he altered his route; and, on the evening of the same day, he crossed the chiefs at the White Bluff, fifteen miles below this. They are, I imagine, safely arrived in the nation. General Glascock came last evening to this place.

Mr. Barnard, the deputy agent, had crossed the river, about an hour before, to return to the nation. It would have been fortunate if he had seen General Glascock; he has promised me that he would use all his influence to keep the Indians quiet, until measures can be taken to restore peace. If the chiefs should arrive in safety, it may yet be possible to prevent the horrors of war. Mr. Barnard will send a runner to me, as soon as he can learn the temper of the Indians. This man has suffered greatly for his attachment to the United States.

The Governor was sending on three of the Indians prisoners, taken last year at the Oakfuskee village; they had left Augusta. As soon as General Glascock heard the bad news, he directed them to return, as he was apprehensive of danger to their persons.

I have written this day to the Governor, requesting him to cause inquiry to be made into the affair of the tenth.

General Glascock, who takes this letter to Augusta, is now waiting for me to close it, or I should be more particular. It, however, contains the information upon which I should suppose you to be the most anxious.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, &c.

SAVANNAH, 16th May, 1794.

SIR:

I had the honor of writing you on the 27th ultimo, from fort Fidius, by post: on the third instant I reached Augusta, with six of the principal Creek chiefs, on a visit of friendship to the Governor of Georgia, leaving at, and in the vicinity of, fort Fidius, near one hundred and fifty Indians, who came with, and followed me, out of friendship, when I came from the nation. Governor Mathews received the Indian chiefs with kindness; and I believe was fully satisfied, from what they informed him, of their ardent wish to live in peace with this country. Whilst the chiefs and myself were with the Governor, he received account of two men, belonging to the militia, being killed by Indians, (supposed to be Cherokees) and that the people of the upper part of this State were embodying, to destroy the Indians who came with me. This alarmed me for their safety, and I applied to the Governor, to have them safely conveyed back to fort Fidius; he accordingly put them under the care of Brigadier General Glascock and a party of horse, who left Augusta the same day I did, which was the 10th instant, but I have not yet heard of their arrival.

In my last I informed you that I had established peace with the Creeks, but I fear my labor is now destroyed by the outrageous doings of the lawless people of Georgia. The enclosed papers, which I received last evening by express, from Governor Mathews, and my letter to him, this day, will explain their conduct, and show you the unhappy situation of matters at this time.

I came here in order to meet some despatches which I was informed, at Augusta, were lodged here for me, from the War Office. I find that Major Habersham has sent them to St. Mary's, and that the same respects the fortifications to be erected there. I shall leave this to-day for that place; and, as soon as I have done what is desired, I shall lose no time in seeing you.

I am, with all possible respect, sir, your devoted, obedient, very humble servant,

JAMES SEAGROVE, Agent Indian Affairs.

Copy of a letter from the Governor of Georgia to James Seagrove.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 12th May, 1794.

SIR:

Enclosed you will receive a letter from Captain Freeman, which will, I presume, inform you of the unpleasant situation we are likely to be placed in, with the Indians.

This unfortunate event has, in all probability, taken place in consequence of the depredations committed on us, whilst you was in Augusta; and which, there is too much reason to apprehend, was committed by the Creeks, as it appears, by a letter from Captain Roberts, that a small party, from the Usechees, had set off to steal horses on our frontiers, and that the Half-way house had determined for war.

Such is the situation of affairs, that it is difficult to know what is best to be done; however, I should suppose it would be most advisable for you to endeavor to know what will be the determination of the Indians, before you go on to Congress; and, from the circumstance of no lives being lost, I am hopeful some means may be adopted to prevent the peaceable part of the nation from being engaged in a war, which, I think, there is too much reason to fear, is inevitable.

I am, sir, with respect, your obedient humble servant,

GEORGE MATHEWS.

JAMES SEAGROVE, Esq. Agent Indian Affairs, Savannah.

Copy of a letter from James Seagrave, Esq. to his Excellency the Governor of Georgia.

SAVANNAH, 16th May, 1794.

SIR:

I received last evening the letter you did me the honor to write, of the 12th instant; it is impossible to express to your Excellency the mortification I feel, at the intelligence conveyed by it. After having submitted, for six months past, to live among the Indians, subject to every possible inconvenience, and exposed every moment to danger of being destroyed, for the purpose of establishing peace, to see the fruit of my labors destroyed in a moment, by the rash and lawless conduct of individuals, at a time when an entire good understanding was established, and in a manner which promised to be permanent, fills my mind with the deepest regret.

The Indians, on whom this attack has been made, were of tribes who have been the uniform friends of the white people, and it was done when the chiefs were under sanction of the United States and this State, giving your Excellency sincere proofs of their good disposition, by delivering the prisoners in their possession; and they were preparing, also, to deliver the property taken, since the conference at Colerain, as I had the honor of stating to your Excellency when I was at Augusta. The manner and circumstance attending this unfortunate affair, must convince your Excellency, as well as every other unprejudiced mind, that it is the result of a premeditated combination, among a number of individuals, to force the Indians to war, contrary to their ardent wishes for peace, and in violation of the laws of the United States and this State.

The persons who have committed these outrages are officers in authority in the militia, and some of whom have been guilty of similar acts not long since. What good purpose can it answer for the public agents to make compacts, or enter into explanations, and labor to avert the mischiefs of war, when the militia officers embody their men at pleasure, and attack and destroy even those who are under the immediate sanction and protection of your Excellency? This attack has been so wanton and unprovoked, that it would be vain to propose any terms of accommodation, unless the persons who made it are punished. Your Excellency, who is the depository of the public force, to execute the laws, can best judge how far that is right and practicable; but, unless something of that kind previously takes place, I am so certain the Indians would not listen to any overtures of accommodation, that I shall not propose any. I have done my duty. Peace was completely restored, and in a way that appeared to satisfy your Excellency that the Indians meant candidly to observe the terms of it. It now remains with the Government of Georgia to punish those of its citizens who have thus wantonly violated it on their part, or to prepare for a war with the whole Creek nation, the mischiefs of which are not so easily calculated.

The contest is between this Government and its citizens. If the latter cannot be restrained, the Indians have no alternative—they must defend themselves; if they are restrained, and the present aggressors punished, according to law, your Excellency then might certainly count on the continuance of peace; but, I confess, I think not otherwise. Should any opportunity offer of doing any thing, tending to a peace, I shall seize it with zeal.

I cannot yet believe that it was Creeks who stole the horses from Franklin county, on the 1st instant; but, allowing it was, it could not justify Major Adams' attack, with one hundred and fifty mounted militia, on the friendly Indians, encamped opposite fort Fidius, on the 10th instant, or that of another party, of ten horsemen, the preceding day, on the camp of the Dog king of the Cussetahs, who the militia shot through the body.

My fears for the safety of the six chiefs who visited your Excellency, and whom you sent, under care of General Glascock, for fort Fidius, is great, as I have information that their destruction was contemplated by parties of men from the upper counties of this State, and that the General, being apprehensive of danger to those people, had altered his route. Should any injury be done these chiefs, all hope of peace with the Creeks will be at an end.

Some unexpected public business calls me to St. Mary's, previous to my going to Philadelphia. I expect, however, to sail for the latter place in ten days from this time, and shall be happy to hear from you before then.

[2d SESSION.

GENERAL VIEW.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 20, 1794,

And referred to in the speech of the President of the United States, of the 19th of the same month, of which the following is an extract:

“The intelligence from the army, under the command of General Wayne, is a happy presage to our military operations against the hostile Indians, north of the Ohio. From the advices which have been forwarded, the advance which he has made must have damped the ardor of the savages, and weakened their obstinacy in waging war against the United States. And yet, even at this late hour, when our power to punish them cannot be questioned, we shall not be unwilling to cement a lasting peace, upon terms of candor, equity, and good neighborhood.

“Towards none of the Indian tribes have overtures of friendship been spared. The Creeks, in particular, are covered from encroachment by the interposition of the General Government and that of Georgia. From a desire, also, to remove the discontents of the Six Nations, a settlement, meditated at Presque Isle, on Lake Erie, has been suspended; and an agent is now endeavoring to rectify any misconception into which they may have fallen. But, I cannot refrain from again pressing upon your deliberations the plan which I recommended at the last session, for the improvement of harmony with all the Indians within our limits, by the fixing and conducting of trading houses, upon the principles then expressed.”

Copy of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated

HEAD QUARTERS, Greenville, 7th July, 1794.

SIR:

At seven o'clock in the morning of the 30th ultimo, one of our escorts, consisting of ninety riflemen and fifty dragoons, commanded by Major McMahon, was attacked, by a very numerous body of Indians, under the walls of fort Recovery, followed by a general assault upon that post and garrison, in every direction.

The enemy were soon repulsed, with great slaughter, but immediately rallied and reiterated the attack, keeping up a very heavy and constant fire, at a more respectable distance, for the remainder of the day, which was answered with spirit and effect, by the garrison; and that part of Major McMahon's command that had regained the post—

The savages were employed, during the night, (which was dark and foggy) in carrying off their dead by torch light, which occasionally drew a fire from the garrison: They, nevertheless, succeeded so well, that there were but eight or ten bodies left upon the field, and those close under the influence of the fire from the fort.

The enemy again renewed the attack, on the morning of the 1st instant; but were ultimately compelled to retreat, with loss and disgrace, from that very field where they had, upon a former occasion, been proudly victorious.

Enclosed is a particular general return of the killed, wounded, and missing. Among the killed, we have to lament the loss of four good and gallant officers, viz: Major McMahon, Captain Harthorne, and Lieutenant Craig, of the rifle corps, and Cornet Torry, of the cavalry, who all fell in the first charge. Among the wounded are the intrepid Captain Taylor, of the dragoons, and Lieutenant Drake, of the infantry.

It would appear that the real object of the enemy was to have carried that post by a coup de main: for they could not possibly have received intelligence of the escort under Major McMahon, which only marched from this place on the morning of the 29th ultimo, and deposited the supplies, the same evening, at fort Recovery, from whence the escort was to have returned at reveille the next morning; therefore, their being found at that post was an accidental, perhaps a fortunate, event. By every information, as well as from the extent of their encampments, (which were perfectly square and regular) and their line of march in seventeen columns, forming a wide and extended front, their numbers could not have been less than from fifteen hundred to two thousand warriors.

It would also appear that they were rather in want of provisions, as they killed and ate a number of pack horses, in their encampment, the evening after the assault; also, at their next encampment, on their retreat, which was but seven miles from fort Recovery, where they remained two nights, probably from being much incumbered with their dead and wounded. A considerable number of the pack horses were actually loaded with the dead.

Permit me now, sir, to express my highest approbation of the bravery and conduct of every officer and soldier of the garrison and escort, upon this trying occasion; and, as it would be difficult to discriminate between officers equally meritorious and emulous for glory, I have directed the adjutant general to annex the names of every officer of the garrison and escort, who were fortunate enough to remain uninjured, being equally exposed to danger with those who were less fortunate.

But I should be wanting in gratitude were I to omit mentioning, in particular, Captain Alexander Gibson, of the 4th sub-legion, the gallant defender of fort Recovery.

Here, it may be proper to relate certain facts and circumstances, which almost amount to positive proof, that there were a considerable number of the British and the militia of Detroit mixed with the savages, in the assault upon fort Recovery, on the 30th ultimo and 1st instant.

I had detached three small parties of Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, a few days previous to that affair, towards Grand Glaize, in order to take or obtain provisions, for the purpose of gaining intelligence. One of these parties fell in with a large body of Indians, at the place marked Girty's town, (in Harmar's route) on the evening of the 27th ultimo, apparently bending their course towards Chillicothe, on the Great Miami. This party returned to Greenville, on the 28th, with this further information, "that there were a great number of white men with the Indians."

The other two parties got much scattered, in following the trails of the hostile Indians, at some distance in their rear; and were also in with them when the assault commenced on fort Recovery. These Indians all insist that there were a considerable number of armed white men in the rear, who they frequently heard talking in our language, and encouraging the savages to persevere in the assault; that their faces were generally blacked, except three British officers, who were dressed in scarlet, and appeared to be men of great distinction, from being surrounded by a large body of white men and Indians, who were very attentive to them. These kept a distance in the rear of those that were engaged.

Another strong corroborating fact that there were British, or British militia, in the assault, is, that a number of ounce balls and buck shot were lodged in the block houses and stockades of the fort. Some were delivered at so great a distance as not to penetrate, and were picked up at the foot of the stockades.

It would also appear that the British and savages expected to find the artillery that were lost on the 4th of November, 1791, and hid by the Indians in the beds of old fallen timber, or logs, which they turned over and laid the cannon in, and then turned the logs back into their former birth. It was in this artful manner that we generally found them deposited. The hostile Indians turned over a great number of logs, during the assault, in search of those cannon, and other plunder, which they had probably hid in this manner, after the action of the 4th November, 1791.

I therefore have reason to believe that the British and Indians depended much upon this artillery to assist in the reduction of that post; fortunately, they served in its defence.

The enclosed copies of the examination of the Pattawatamy and Shawanee prisoners, will demonstrate this fact, that the British have used every possible exertion to collect the savages from the most distant nations, with the most solemn promises of advancing and co-operating with them against the legion, nor have the Spaniards been idle upon this occasion.

It is therefore more than probable, that the day is not far distant, when we shall meet this hydra in the vicinity of Grand Glaize and Riche de Bout, without being able to discriminate between the white and red savages.

In the interim, I am in hourly expectation of receiving more full and certain intelligence of the number and intention of the enemy.

I have no further or other information respecting the mounted volunteers of Kentucky, than what you will observe in the enclosed copies of the correspondence between Major General Scott and myself. I hope they may be completed to their full number, because it would appear that we shall have business enough for the whole of them.

You will herewith receive the general and field return of the legion, the quarterly return of ordnance and ordnance stores, at this place, the Quartermaster General's return, and the return of the hospital department.

The horses that were killed, wounded, and missing, in the assault against fort Recovery, will not, in the least, retard the advance of the legion, after the arrival of the mounted volunteers, because I had made provision for those kind of losses and contingencies, which, from the nature of the service, must be expected, and will unavoidably happen.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTY WAYNE.

Examination of two Pattawatamies, captured by Captain Alexander Gibson, on the north side of the Miami of the Lake, on the 5th of June, 1794.

Query 1. How long have you been from your nation?

Answer. Four days before our capture.

Query 2. When did your nation receive the invitation from the British to join them, and go to war with the Americans?

Answer. On the first of the last moon; the message was sent by three chiefs, a Delaware, a Shawanee, and a Miami.

Query 3. What was the message brought by those Indian chiefs, and what number of British troops were at Roche de Bout, on the 1st of May?

Answer. That the British sent them to invite the Pattawatamies to go to war against the United States; that they, the British, were then at Roche de Bout, on their way to war against the Americans; that the number of British troops then there, were about four hundred, with two pieces of artillery, exclusive of the Detroit militia, and had made a fortification round Colonel McKee's house and stores at that place, in which they had deposited all their stores of ammunition, arms, clothing, and provision, with which they promised to supply all the hostile Indians in abundance, provided they would join, and go with them to war.

Query 4. What tribes of Indians, and what were their numbers, at Roche de Bout, on the 1st of May?

Answer. The Chippewas, Wyandots, Shawanese, Tawas, Delawares, and Miamies. There were then collected about one thousand warriors, and were daily coming in and collecting from all those nations:

Query 5. What number of warriors do you suppose are actually collected at that place at this time, and what number of British troops and militia have promised to join the Indians to fight this army?

Answer. By the latest and best information, and from our own knowledge of the number of warriors belonging to those nations, there cannot be less than two thousand warriors now assembled; and were the Pattawatamies to join, agreeably to invitation, the whole would amount to upwards of three thousand hostile Indians. But we do not think that more than 50 of the Pattawatamies will go to war.

The British troops and militia that will join the Indians to go to war against the Americans, will amount to five hundred, agreeably to the promise of Governor Simcoe.

Query 6. At what time and at what place do the British and Indians mean to advance against this army?

Answer. About the last of this moon, or the beginning of the next, they intend to attack the legion of this place. Governor Simcoe, the great man who lives at or near Niagara, sent for the Pattawatamies, and promised them arms, ammunition, provision, and clothing, and every thing they wanted, on condition that they would join him, and go to war against the Americans; and that he would command the whole.

He sent us the same message last winter; and again, on the first of the last moon, from Roche de Bout; he also said, he was much obliged to us for our past services; and that he would now help us to fight, and render us all the services in his power, against the Americans.

All the speeches that we have received from him, were as red as blood; all the wampum and feathers were painted red; the war pipes and hatchets were red, and even the tobacco was painted red.

We received four different invitations from Governor Simcoe, inviting the Pattawatamies to join in the war; the last was on the first of last moon, when he promised to join us with 1500 of his warriors, as before mentioned. But we wish for peace; except a few of our foolish young men.

Examined, and carefully reduced to writing, at Greenville, this 7th of June, 1794.

Examination of two Shawanese warriors, taken prisoners on the Miami of the lake, twenty miles above Grand Glaize, on the 22d instant, June.

They say that they left Grand Glaize five moons since, i. e. about the time that the Indians sent in a flag, with propositions of peace.

That they belonged to a party of twenty, who have been hunting all this spring on the waters of the Wabash, nearly opposite the mouth of Kentucky river, and were on their return when taken; that about half the party had gone on before them; and that the remainder were coming on slowly, and hunting as they came. That they had stolen about fifty horses from the inhabitants of Kentucky, on the Salt river, during this spring and summer; that they only killed one man, and took no prisoners; that the man was killed by a white interpreter belonging to the party, whose name is Riddle; (those two Indians had five horses, loaded with deer and bear skins, and jerked venison.) That, on their way in, they met with a party, consisting of four Indians, i. e. three Delawares and one Pattawatamy, who were then on their way to the Big-bone-lick, to steal horses; that this party informed them that all the Indians on White river were sent for to come immediately to Grand Glaize, where the warriors of several nations were now assembled; that the chiefs were yet in council, and would not let their warriors go out; that they could not depend upon the British for effectual support; that they were always setting the Indians on like dogs after game, pressing them to go to war, and kill the Americans, but did not help them; that unless the British would turn out and help them, they were determined to make peace; that they would not be any longer amused by promises only.

That the Shawanese have 380 warriors at, and in the vicinity of Grand Glaize; and generally can, and do, bring into action about 300. Their great men, or sachems, are the Black Wolf, and Kakia-pi-la-thy, or Tame Hawk; their principal warriors are Blue Jacket, and Captain Jonny; that the Delawares have in and about Grand Glaize 480 warriors; that they actually had four hundred in the action against General St. Clair; that the Miamies are at present but about one hundred warriors, who live near Grand Glaize, several of them having removed towards Post Vincennes, and the Mississippi; that the Wyandots never send into action more than about one hundred and fifty warriors; they live along the lake, towards Sandusky; they don't know the number of the Pattawatamies, nor the number of the other Indians or nations that would actually join in a war, should they determine to continue it; that the Chippewas would be the most numerous, and were generally on the way to the council; but that war or peace depended on the conduct of the British; if they would help them, it would probably be war, but if they would not, it would be peace; that the Indians would no longer be set on like dogs, by themselves, unless the British would help them to fight; that the British were at the foot of the rapids, and had fortified at Roche de Bout; that there were a great number of British soldiers at that place; that they told the Indians they were now come to help them to fight; and if the Indians would generally turn out and join them, they would advance and fight the American army; that Blue Jacket had been sent by the British to the Chippewas, and Northern Indians, a considerable time since, to invite them, and bring them to Roche de Bout, there to join the British and other hostile Indians, in order to go to war.

I do certify, that the foregoing is an exact and true narrative, delivered by the two Shawanese warriors, prisoners, upon examination before me, at Greenville, through my interpreter, Christopher Miller, this 26th day of June, 1794.

Copy of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated Head Quarters, Grand Glaize, 14th August, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you, that the army under my command took possession of this very important post on the morning of the 8th instant—the enemy, on the preceding evening, having abandoned all their settlements, towns, and villages, with such apparent marks of surprise and precipitation, as to amount to a positive proof, that our approach was not discovered by them, until the arrival of a Mr. Newman, of the Quartermaster General's department, who deserted from the army near the St. Mary's, and gave them every information in his power, as to our force, the object of our destination, state of provision, number and size of the artillery, &c. &c. circumstances and facts that he had but too good an opportunity of knowing, from acting as a field quartermaster on the march, and at the moment of his desertion. Hence, I have good grounds to conclude, that the defection of this villain prevented the enemy from receiving a fatal blow at this place, when least expected.*

I had made such demonstrations, for a length of time previously to taking up our line of march, as to induce the savages to expect our advance by the route of the Miami villages, to the left, or towards Roche de Bout, by the right; which feints appear to have produced the desired effect, by drawing the attention of the enemy to those points, and gave an opening for the army to approach undiscovered by a devious route, i. e. in a central direction, and which would be impracticable for an army, except in a dry season, such as then presented.

Thus, sir, we have gained possession of the grand emporium of the hostile Indians of the West, without loss of blood. The very extensive and highly cultivated fields and gardens, show the work of many hands. The margins of those beautiful rivers, the Miamies of the lake, and Au Glaize, appear like one continued village for a number of miles, both above and below this place; nor have I ever before beheld such immense fields of corn, in any part of America, from Canada to Florida.

We are now employed in completing a strong stockade fort, with four good block houses, by way of bastions, at the confluence of Au Glaize and the Miamies, which I have called Defiance. Another fort was also erected on the bank of the St. Mary's, twenty-four miles advanced of Recovery, which was named Adams, and endowed with provision and a proper garrison.

Every thing is now prepared for a forward move to-morrow morning, towards Roche de Bout, or foot of the rapids, where the British have a regular fortification, well supplied with artillery, and strongly garrisoned, in the vicinity of which the fate of the campaign will probably be decided; as, from the best and most recent intelligence, the enemy are there collected in force, and joined by the militia of Detroit, &c. &c. possessed of ground very unfavorable for cavalry to act in. Yet, notwithstanding this unfavorable intelligence, and unpleasant circumstances of ground, I do not despair of success, from the spirit and ardor of the troops, from the generals down to the privates, both of the legion and mounted volunteers.

Yet I have thought proper to offer the enemy a last overture of peace; and as they have every thing that is dear and interesting now at stake, I have reason to expect that they will listen to the proposition mentioned in the enclosed copy of an address, despatched yesterday by a special flag, who I sent under circumstances that will ensure his safe return, and which may eventually spare the effusion of much human blood.

But, should war be their choice, that blood be upon their own heads. America shall no longer be insulted with impunity. To an all-powerful and just God I therefore commit myself and gallant army, and have the honor to be, with every consideration of respect and esteem,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,

ANTHONY WAYNE.

The Hon. Major General Knox, Secretary of War.

To the Delawares, Shawanese, Miamies, and Wyandots, and to each and every of them, and to all other nations of Indians, northwest of the Ohio, whom it may concern:

I, Anthony Wayne, Major General and Commander-in-chief of the Federal army now at Grand Glaize, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States of America, for settling the terms upon which a permanent and lasting peace shall be made with each and every of the hostile tribes, or nations of Indians northwest of the Ohio, and of the said United States, actuated by the purest principles of humanity, and urged by pity for the errors into which bad and designing men have led you, from the head of my army, now in possession of your abandoned villages and settlements, do hereby once more extend the friendly hand of peace towards you, and invite each and every of the hostile tribe of Indians to appoint deputies to meet me and my army, without delay, between this place and Roche de Bout, in order to settle the preliminaries of a lasting peace, which may eventually and soon restore to you the Delawares, Miamies, Shawanese, and all other tribes and nations lately settled at this place, and on the margins of the Miami and Au Glaize rivers, your late grounds and possessions, and to preserve you and your distressed and hapless women and children from danger and famine, during the present fall and ensuing winter.

The arm of the United States is strong and powerful, but they love mercy and kindness more than war and desolation.

And, to remove any doubts or apprehensions of danger to the persons of the deputies whom you may appoint to meet this army, I hereby pledge my sacred honor for their safety and return, and send Christopher Miller, an adopted Shawanese, and a Shawanese warrior; whom I took prisoner two days ago, as a flag, who will advance in their front to meet me.

Mr. Miller was taken prisoner by a party of my warriors, six moons since, and can testify to you the kindness which I have shown to your people, my prisoners, that is, five warriors and two women, who are now all safe and well at Greenville.

But, should this invitation be disregarded, and my flag, Mr. Miller, be detained, or injured, I will immediately order all those prisoners to be put to death, without distinction, and some of them are known to belong to the first families of your nations.

BROTHERS: Be no longer deceived or led astray by the false promises and language of the bad white men at the foot of the rapids; they have neither the power nor inclination to protect you. No longer shut your eyes to your true interest and happiness, nor your ears to this last overture of peace. But, in pity to your innocent women and children, come and prevent the further effusion of your blood; let them experience the kindness and friendship of the United States of America, and the invaluable blessings of peace and tranquillity.

ANTHONY WAYNE.

GRAND GLAIZE, 13th August, 1794.

* This man having called at the War Office, on his way from Niagara to Kentucky, (as he said) a few days previous to the receipt of this letter, immediately on the arrival thereof, information respecting him was transmitted to Pittsburg, with directions to apprehend and secure him. He has been accordingly taken, is now secured at that place, and ordered to be sent down the Ohio, to Head Quarters.

Copy of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated

HEAD QUARTERS, GRAND GLAIZE, 28th August, 1794.

SIR:

It is with infinite pleasure that I now announce to you the brilliant success of the Federal army under my command, in a general action with the combined force of the hostile Indians, and a considerable number of the volunteers and militia of Detroit, on the 20th instant, on the banks of the Miami, in the vicinity of the British post and garrison, at the foot of the rapids.

The army advanced from this place, on the 15th, and arrived at Roche de Bout on the 18th; the 19th we were employed in making a temporary post for the reception of our stores and baggage, and in reconnoitering the position of the enemy, who were encamped behind a thick brushy wood and the British fort.

At 8 o'clock on the morning of the 20th, the army again advanced in columns, agreeably to the standing order of March, the legion on the right, its right flank covered by the Miamies, one brigade of mounted volunteers on the left, under Brigadier General Todd, and the other in the rear, under Brigadier General Barbie. A select battalion of mounted volunteers moved in front of the legion, commanded by Major Price, who was directed to keep sufficiently advanced, so as to give timely notice for the troops to form in case of action, it being yet undetermined whether the Indians would decide for peace or war.

After advancing about five miles, Major Price's corps received so severe a fire from the enemy, who were secreted in the woods and high grass, as to compel them to retreat. The legion was immediately formed in two lines, principally in a close thick wood, which extended for miles on our left, and for a very considerable distance in front, the ground being covered with old fallen timber, probably occasioned by a tornado, which rendered it impracticable for the cavalry to act with effect, and afforded the enemy the most favorable covert for their mode of warfare. The savages were formed in three lines, within supporting distance of each other, and extending for near two miles, at right angles with the river. I soon discovered, from the weight of the fire and extent of their lines, that the enemy were in full force in front, in possession of their favorite ground, and endeavoring to turn our left flank. I therefore gave orders for the second line to advance and support the first, and directed Major General Scott to gain and turn the right flank of the savages, with the whole of the mounted volunteers, by a circuitous route; at the same time I ordered the front line to advance and charge with trailed arms, and rouse the Indians from their coverts at the point of the bayonet, and when up, to deliver a close and well directed fire on their backs, followed by a brisk charge, so as not to give them time to load again.

I also ordered Captain Mis Campbell, who commanded the legionary cavalry, to turn the left flank of the enemy next the river, and which afforded a favorable field for that corps to act in. All these orders were obeyed with spirit and promptitude; but such was the impetuosity of the charge by the first line of infantry, that the Indians, and Canadian militia, and volunteers, were drove from all their coverts in so short a time, that, although every possible exertion was used by the officers of the second line of the legion, and by Generals Scott, Todd, and Barbie, of the mounted volunteers, to gain their proper positions, but part of each could get up in season to participate in the action, the enemy being drove, in the course of one hour, more than two miles, through the thick woods already mentioned, by less than one half their numbers.

From every account, the enemy amounted to two thousand combatants. The troops actually engaged against them were short of nine hundred.

This horde of savages, with their allies, abandoned themselves to flight, and dispersed with terror and dismay, leaving our victorious army in full and quiet possession of the field of battle, which terminated under the influence of the guns of the British garrison, as you will observe by the enclosed correspondence between Major Campbell, the commandant, and myself, upon the occasion.

The bravery and conduct of every officer belonging to the army, from the Generals down to the Ensigns, merit my highest approbation. There were, however, some, whose rank and situation placed their conduct in a very conspicuous point of view, and which I observed with pleasure, and the most lively gratitude. Among whom, I must beg leave to mention Brigadier General Wilkinson, and Colonel Hamtramck, the commandants of the right and left wings of the legion, whose brave example inspired the troops. To those I must add the names of my faithful and gallant Aids-de-camp, Captains De Butt and T. Lewis, and Lieutenant Harrison, who, with the Adjutant General, Major Mills, rendered the most essential service by communicating my orders in every direction, and by their conduct and bravery exciting the troops to press for victory.

Lieutenant Covington, upon whom the command of the cavalry now devolved, cut down two savages with his own hand, and Lieutenant Webb one, in turning the enemy's left flank.

The wounds received by Captains Slough and Prior, and Lieutenant Campbell Smith, an extra aid-de-camp to General Wilkinson, of the legionary infantry, and Captain Van Rensselaer, of the dragoons, Captain Rawlins, Lieutenant McKenny, and Ensign Duncan, of the mounted volunteers, bear honorable testimony of their bravery and conduct.

Captains H. Lewis and Brock, with their companies of light infantry, had to sustain an unequal fire for some time, which they supported with fortitude. In fact, every officer and soldier, who had an opportunity to come into action, displayed that true bravery which will always ensure success. And here permit me to declare, that I never discovered more true spirit and anxiety for action, than appeared to pervade the whole of the mounted volunteers, and I am well persuaded, that, had the enemy maintained their favorite ground for one half hour longer, they would have most severely felt the prowess of that corps.

But, whilst I pay this just tribute to the living, I must not neglect the gallant dead, among whom we have to lament the early death of those worthy and brave officers, Captain Mis Campbell, of the dragoons, and Lieutenant Towles, of the light infantry, of the legion, who fell in the first charge.

Enclosed is a particular return of the killed and wounded. The loss of the enemy was more than double to that of the Federal army. The woods were strewn for a considerable distance with the dead bodies of Indians, and their white auxiliaries, the latter armed with British muskets and bayonets.

We remained three days and nights on the banks of the Miami, in front of the field of battle, during which time all the houses and cornfields were consumed and destroyed for a considerable distance, both above and below fort Miami, as well as within pistol shot of that garrison, who were compelled to remain tacit spectators to this general devastation and conflagration, among which were the houses, stores, and property, of Colonel McKee, the British Indian agent, and principal stimulator of the war now existing between the United States and the savages.

The army returned to this place on the 27th, by easy marches, laying waste the villages and cornfields for about fifty miles on each side of the Miami. There remains yet a great number of villages, and a great quantity of corn, to be consumed or destroyed, upon Au Glaize and the Miami, above this place, which will be effected in the course of a few days.

In the interim, we shall improve fort Defiance, and, as soon as the escort returns with the necessary supplies from Greenville, and fort Recovery, the army will proceed to the Miami villages, in order to accomplish the object of the campaign.

It is, however, not improbable that the enemy may make one desperate effort against the army, as it is said that a reinforcement was hourly expected at fort Miami from Niagara, as well as numerous tribes of Indians living on the margin and islands of the lakes.

This is a business rather to be wished for than dreaded, whilst the army remains in force. Their numbers will only tend to confuse the savages, and the victory will be the more complete and decisive, and which may eventually ensure a permanent and happy peace.

Under these impressions, I have the honor to be your most obedient and very humble servant,

ANTHONY WAYNE.

The honorable Major General H. Knox, Secretary of War.

N. B. I forgot to mention that I met my flag on the 16th, who was returning with an evasive answer, in order to gain time for the arrival of the reinforcement mentioned by the Shawanee Indian, and which actually did arrive two days before the action.

No. 1.

Major William Campbell to Major General Wayne.

MIAMI RIVER, August 21, 1794.

SIR:

An army of the United States of America, said to be under your command, having taken post on the banks of the Miami for upwards of the last twenty-four hours, almost within the reach of the guns of this fort, being a post belonging to his Majesty the King of Great Britain, occupied by his Majesty's troops, and which I have the honor to command, it becomes my duty to inform myself, as speedily as possible, in what light I am to view your making such near approaches to this garrison.

I have no hesitation, on my part, to say, that I know of no war existing between Great Britain and America.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WILLIAM CAMPBELL,

Major 24th regiment, commanding a British post on the banks of the Miami.

To Major Gen. WAYNE; &amp;c.

No. 2.

Major General Wayne to Major William Campbell.

CAMP, ON THE BANK OF THE MIAMI, August 21, 1794.

SIR:

I have received your letter of this date, requiring from me the motives which have moved the army under my command to the position they at present occupy, far within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the United States of America.

Without questioning the authority or the propriety, sir, of your interrogatory, I think I may, without breach of decorum, observe to you, that, were you entitled to an answer, the most full and satisfactory one was announced to you from the muzzles of my small arms, yesterday morning, in the action against the horde of savages in the vicinity of your post, which terminated gloriously to the American arms; but, had it continued until the Indians, &c. were driven under the influence of the post and guns you mention, they would not have much impeded the progress of the victorious army under my command, as no such post was established at the commencement of the present war between the Indians and the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

ANTHONY WAYNE,

Major General, and Commander in Chief of the Federal Army.

To Major WILLIAM CAMPBELL, &amp;c.

No. 3.

Major William Campbell to Major General Wayne.

FORT MIAMI, August 22d, 1794.

SIR:

Although your letter of yesterday's date fully authorizes me to any act of hostility against the army of the United States of America in this neighborhood, under your command, yet, still anxious to prevent that dreadful decision, which, perhaps, is not intended to be appealed to by either of our countries, I have forborne, for those two days past, to resent those insults you have offered to the British flag flying at this fort, by approaching it within pistol shot of my works, not only singly, but in numbers, with arms in their hands.

Neither is it my wish to wage war with individuals; but, should you, after this, continue to approach my post in the threatening manner you are at this moment doing, my indispensable duty to my King and country, and the honor of my profession, will oblige me to have recourse to those measures, which thousands of either nation may hereafter have cause to regret, and which, I solemnly appeal to God, I have used my utmost endeavors to arrest.

I have the honor to be, sir, with much respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WILLIAM CAMPBELL,

Major 24th regiment, commanding at Fort Miami.

Major General WAYNE, &amp;c. &amp;c.

[No other notice was taken of this letter than what is expressed in the following letter. The fort and works were, however, reconnoitred in every direction, at some points possibly within pistol shot. It was found to be a regular strong work, the front covered by a wide river, with four guns mounted in that face. The rear, which was most susceptible of approach, had two regular bastions, furnished with eight pieces of artillery, the whole surrounded by a wide deep ditch, with horizontal pickets projecting from the burn of the parapet over the ditch. From the bottom of the ditch to the top of the parapet, was about twenty feet perpendicular. The works were also surrounded by an abattis, and furnished with a strong garrison.]

Major General Wayne to Major William Campbell.

CAMP, BANKS OF THE MIAMI, 22d August, 1794.

SIR:

In your letter of the 21st instant, you declare, "I have no hesitation, on my part, to say, that I know of no war existing between Great Britain and America."

I, on my part, declare the same, and that the only cause I have to entertain a contrary idea at present, is the hostile act you are now in commission of, i. e. by recently taking post far within the well known and acknowledged limits of the United States, and erecting a fortification in the heart of the settlements of the Indian tribes now at war with the United States. This, sir, appears to be an act of the highest aggression, and destructive to the peace and interest of the Union. Hence, it becomes my duty to desire, and I do hereby desire and demand, in the name of the President of the United States, that you immediately desist from any further act of hostility or aggression, by forbearing to fortify, and by withdrawing the troops, artillery, and stores, under your orders and direction, forthwith, and removing to the nearest post occupied by his Britannic Majesty's troops at the peace of 1783, and which you will be permitted to do unmolested by the troops under my command.

I am, with very great respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

ANTHONY WAYNE.

Major WILLIAM CAMPBELL, &amp;c.

No. 5.

Major William Campbell to Major General Wayne.

FORT MIAMI, 22d August, 1794.

SIR:

I have this moment the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date; in answer to which I have only to say, that, being placed here in the command of a British post, and acting in a military capacity only, I cannot enter into any discussion, either on the right or impropriety of my occupying my present position. Those are matters that I conceive will be best left to the ambassadors of our different nations.

Having said this much, permit me to inform you, that I certainly will not abandon this post at the summons of any power whatever, until I receive orders to that purpose from those I have the honor to serve under, or the fortune of war should oblige me.

I must still adhere, sir, to the purport of my letter this morning, to desire that your army, or individuals belonging to it, will not approach within reach of my cannon, without expecting the consequences attending it.

Although I have said, in the former part of my letter, that my situation here is totally military, yet, let me add, sir, that I am much deceived, if his Majesty, the King of Great Britain, had not a post on this river, at and prior to the period you mention.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the greatest respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,
WILLIAM CAMPBELL,

Major 24th regiment, commanding at fort Miami.

To Major General WAYNE, &c.

[The only notice taken of this letter, was, by immediately setting fire to, and destroying, every thing within view of the fort, and even under the muzzles of the guns. Had Mr. Campbell carried his threats into execution, it is more than probable he would have experienced a storm.]

Examination of a Shawanee prisoner, taken by Captain Wells, on the evening of the 11th of August, 1794, near the foot of the Rapids.

Question. When did the Indians receive information of the advance of the army?

Answer. The first information was from a white man, who came in of his own accord, about ten days since.

Question. Where are the Indians at this time?

Answer. At Colonel McKee's.

Question. Where are the British, and what are their numbers?

Answer. In a fort about one mile below Colonel McKee's, on the north side of the river, situate on a hill, or bank, close by the margin, where there are about 200 men. They are now at work at the fort.

Question. What number of great guns have they in the fort?

Answer. Four or five.

Question. What number of warriors are at McKee's, and what nations do they belong to?

Answer. There are six hundred, who abandoned this place on the approach of the army.

Shawanees, about	- - - - -	200, but not more.
Delawares, - - - - -	- - - - -	300
Miamies, - - - - -	- - - - -	100
Warriors of other tribes,	- - - - -	100

Total, 700

Question. What number are expected to assemble, in addition to those now at the foot of the Rapids?

Answer. In all, about 400 men, viz.

Wyandots, - - - - -	- - - - -	300
Tawas, - - - - -	- - - - -	240
		540

Question. What number of white men are to join, and when?

Answer. Mr. or Captain Elliot set out for Detroit six days since, and was to be back yesterday, with all the militia, and an additional number of regular troops, which, with those already there, would amount to 1000 men. This is the general conversation among the Indians, and Captain Elliot promised to bring that number. Colonel McKee's son went with Elliot, as also the man who deserted from the army on its march.

Question. When, and where, do the Indians mean to fight this army?

Answer. At the foot of the Rapids. The white man who came in, told the Indians and Colonel McKee, that the army was destined for that place.

Examination of Antoine Lassell, a native of Canada, and a volunteer in Captain Caldwell's company of refugees, friends and allies of the hostile Indians, captured in the action of the 20th instant.

He says that he has resided for twenty-nine years in Upper Canada, twenty-one of which he has passed at Detroit, and on this river, and that he has constantly traded with the Indians all that time; that he resided at the Miami villages for nineteen years before Harmar's expedition, when he kept a store at that place, and used to supply other traders with goods; that he has since lived chiefly at Bean creek, or Little Glaize, at the Little Turtle's town.

That, having lived so long among the hostile Indians, he is perfectly acquainted with the tribes and numbers.

That the Delawares have about 500 men, including those who live on both rivers, the White river, and Bean creek. That the Miamies are about 200 warriors, part of them live on the St. Joseph's, eight leagues from this place; that the men were all in the action, but the women are yet at that place, or Piquet's village; that a road leads from this place directly to it; that the number of warriors belonging to that place, when all together, amounts to about 40.

That the Shawanees have about 300 warriors; that the Tawas, on this river, are 250; that the Wyandots are about 300.

That those Indians were generally in the action of the 20th instant, except some hunting parties. That a reinforcement of regular troops, and 200 militia, arrived at fort Miami a few days before the army appeared; that the regular troops in the fort amounted to 250, exclusive of the militia.

That about seventy of the militia, including Captain Caldwell's corps, were in the action. That Colonel McKee, Captain Elliot, and Simon Girty, were in the field, but at a respectful distance, and near the river.

That Colonel McKee's existence now depends upon the exertions he can make to retrieve the loss and disgrace of the Indians; that he will use every influence and means in his power, to raise the distant nations to come forward immediately; and assist in the war.

That, should they not be able to collect in force sufficient to fight this army, their intention is to move on the Spanish side of the Mississippi, where part of their nations now live; that Blue Jacket told him (Lassell) that he intended to move immediately to Chicago, on the Illinois.

That the Indians have wished for peace for some time, but that Colonel McKee always dissuaded them from it, and stimulated them to continue the war.

CAMP GRAND GLAIZE, 23th August, 1794.

Examination of John Bevin, a drummer in the 24th British regiment, commanded by Colonel England:

Who says, that there are now four companies of the 24th at fort Miami, averaging about 50 men, non-commissioned officers and privates included; that there was part of Governor Simcoe's corps in the garrison, together with about sixty Canadians; that the whole number of men actually in the garrison, including officers, &c. exceeded 400; that the number of Indians, Canadians, &c. in the action, were at least 2,000, according to the report made by Colonel McKee and Captain Elliot, to Major Campbell, after the action, who declared, in his presence, that there was actually that number engaged.

That there were four nine six-pounders, two large howitzers, and six six-pounders, mounted in the fort, and two swivels, and well supplied with ammunition.

That the Indians were regularly supplied with provision drawn from the British magazine, in the garrison, by Colonel McKee.

That a certain Mr. Newman, a deserter from the American army, arrived at the fort about eight days before the army made its appearance, who gave information to Major Campbell, that the object of the Americans was to take that post and garrison; that General Wayne told the troops not to be uneasy about provision, that there was plenty in the British garrison.

That Governor Simcoe was expected at that place every hour; in consequence of an express sent to Niagara, after the arrival of Newman, the deserter, but had not arrived when he came away; that the distance from fort Miami to Detroit, is sixty miles, which is generally performed in two days.

That the militia of Detroit, and its vicinity, amounts to near two thousand; that a Colonel Baubee commands them; that McKee is also a Colonel of militia; that a Lieutenant Silve, of the 5th British regiment, is in the Indian department, and acts as secretary to Colonel McKee; that a Captain Bunbury of the same regiment is also in the Indian department.

That he has seen a great number of wounded Indians pass the fort, but did not learn what number were killed; that the retiring Indians appeared much dejected, and much altered to what they were in the morning before the action; that he knew of one company of volunteers, commanded by Captain Caldwell, all white men, and armed with British muskets and bayonets, who were in the action.

James Neill's information to the Secretary of War, taken 21st October, 1794.

James Neill, a pack-horseman in the service of Elliott and Williams, aged about 17 years, and belonging to Beardstown, in Kentucky, was in the action of the 30th June, at fort Recovery, and taken prisoner by the Indians, together with Peter Keil, and another by the name of Cherry, all three pack-horsemen.

After he was taken prisoner he was carried to the British fort, at the Miami, where, however, he was not permitted to be seen by the British, as the Indians wanted to carry him to their own town; thence he was taken to Detroit, and thence to Michilimackinac, where a British officer bought him, who sent him to Detroit, to Colonel England, who treated them well, and sent them to Niagara, at which place Peter Keil, being an Irishman, enlisted in the Queen's rangers.

Neill understood that there were of Indians and whites, 1,500 in the attack of fort Recovery; he himself did not see the whole, but he saw upwards of seven hundred.

He understood they lost a great many in killed and wounded; he himself saw about twenty dead carried off, and many wounded, while he was tied to the stump of a tree, about half a mile distant from the firing.

The Indians, on their return to the Miami fort, asserted, that no enemy ever fought better than the people at fort Recovery; and Neill was told, by Captain Doyle, at Michilimackinac, that the Indians lost two to one that they did at St. Clair's defeat.

Neill was taken by the Shawanese, and made a present to the Ottawas, who live near the fort at Michilimackinac.

Neill was at Detroit when the news arrived of General Wayne's action with the Indians, the 20th August. He received the information from one John Johnson, who had been a deserter from General Wayne's army, and then was a militia man of Detroit, and in the action against General Wayne. He spoke of the affair as a complete defeat; that the Indians lost a great many, but he could not tell how many. He says the Indians, upon being defeated, wanted to take refuge in the British fort; that they were denied, which greatly exasperated them.

The militia of Detroit were again ordered out, and several Captains put in the guard-house for refusing. He understood the militia men were forced on board of vessels and sent to Roche de Bout.

Upon his arrival at Niagara, he understood that most of the troops were ordered to reinforce the garrison at the Miami river, but Governor Simcoe did not go.

Neill says, that it was generally said, there were only seven hundred Indians at General St. Clair's defeat.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 19th August, 1794.

SIR:

I had the pleasure to receive your communication of the 28th ultimo, this day, and it is with real regret I inform you, that the information therein contained, is in a great part too true. Some time in May I learnt that settlements were making on the southwest side of the Oconee; the supposition then was, that the adventurers were part of those who had embarked in the French interest, and that, in a short time, they would of themselves disperse; but finding that not to be the case, and fearing lest they might contemplate a serious settlement, I, on the 20th of May, ordered General Irwin to direct the settlers immediately to remove; soon after, I was informed the removal had taken place. On the 14th July I received a letter from Lieutenant Colonel Gaither, stating that Elijah Clarke, late a Major General in the militia of this State, with a party of men, had encamped on the southwest side of the Oconee, opposite to fort Fidius. On the 24th, General Irwin sent a couple of officers to Clarke, with orders for him to move off immediately, which he positively refused; and, on the 28th, I issued a proclamation, forbidding such unlawful proceedings. I also wrote to one of our judges to issue his warrant, and have Clarke apprehended. At the supreme court in Wilkes county, I am informed, he surrendered himself to the judge, who, on consulting with the attorney general, referred him to some of the justices of the county; a copy of their decision is herewith enclosed, and from which there is reason to conclude, there are too many who think favorably of the settlements; but I still flatter myself a large majority of the citizens are opposed to such lawless acts.

Enclosed is a copy of my instructions to Captain Fauche, who commands the troop I informed you, in my letter of the 5th instant, I had called into service. It will be necessary, I conceive, for the captain to be reinforced with another troop, which I shall immediately order, and with which I am hopeful the objects of his command will be effected; should it prove otherwise, I shall lose no time in having recourse to a sufficient military force: for, however unpleasant the task may be, of shedding the blood of acquaintances, and those whom we wish to view as fellow-citizens, yet the President may rest assured that no exertions on my part shall be wanting.

Herewith I transmit a copy of a talk I sent lately to the Creek Indians, and a copy of a deposition of William Jones, taken by Judge Walton. I sincerely wish it had been in my power to have given a more pleasant account of the situation of things in this quarter.

GEORGE MATHEWS.

*Discharge of General Clarke by the Justices of Wilkes County.*STATE OF GEORGIA, Wilkes County:

Whereas a proclamation was issued, on the 28th day of July last, by his Excellency George Mathews, Esquire, Governor of this State, stating, that "Elijah Clarke, Esquire, late Major General of the militia of this State, has gone over the Oconee river, with an intent to establish a separate and independent government, on the lands allotted for the Indians for their hunting grounds, and commanded, in the said proclamation, all judges, justices, sheriffs, and other officers, and all the other citizens of this State, to be diligent in aiding and assisting in apprehending the said Elijah Clarke, and his adherents, in order that they might, severally, be brought to justice: And whereas the said Elijah Clarke, who is the object of the said proclamation, hath this day personally appeared before us, the undersigned, justices of the peace for the county of Wilkes, and surrendered himself into custody, and it being our duty to do speedy justice to the said State, as well as the party charged, we proceeded to the most mature consideration of the cause, and, after an examination of the laws of the State, and the treaties made, and laws passed, by the United States, do give it as our decided and unanimous opinion, that the said Elijah Clarke be, and is hereby, discharged.

Attest,

J. MERIWETHER, Secretary E. D.Instructions for Captain Fauche.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 30th July, 1794.

SIR:

You will recruit a troop of horse, to consist of (besides commissioned officers) six sergeants, six corporals, one farrier, one trumpeter, and eighty-six privates, and station a sub-sergeant, corporal, and twenty dragoons, at each of the following places, viz. Wafford's, the high shoals of the Apalachy, fort Twigg, and the White bluff; a sergeant, and six dragoons, you will send to Phillips' mile shoal. The detachment at Wafford's will perform as constant a scout to Ward's station, on Tugelo, and the hurricane shoals of the Oconee, as the horses are capable of; that at the high shoals of Apalachy will, in like manner, scout to the Hurricane shoals, and to the mouth of the Apalachy; that at fort Twigg, to the mouth of the Apalachy, and to fort Fidius; and that at the White bluff, to fort Fidius, and Carr's bluff. You will take care to render the citizens every protection in your power, and endeavor to prevent parties of men from crossing the temporary line, except in cases where they are in pursuit of Indians that have committed murder, or stolen property; in those cases, you will use your best exertions to recover the property, and chastise the offenders.

You will be particularly vigilant in preventing provisions, or parties of men, from being thrown into the posts which have been established, without authority, by Elijah Clarke, Esquire, on the southwest side of the Oconee; and, in case either should fall into your hands, you will take them to the nearest magistrate, in order that the men may be bound over to their good behavior, and the provisions subjected to a legal adjudication. You will conduct yourself with the greatest circumspection, and, in no instance, commit an act of hostility, unless in self-preservation.

You are to inform Lieutenant Colonel Gaither you will receive his orders in any emergency that may occur. Should any Indians come on the frontiers in a friendly manner, for the purpose of restoring prisoners or property, you will treat them with friendship and attention.

Your knowledge as an officer, renders it unnecessary for me to urge the necessity of a strict discipline being observed in your troop.

J. MERIWETHER, Secretary E. D.To the Head-men and Warriors of the Creek Nation.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 11th August, 1794.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I have received three talks from your land, by Mr. Mordecai, part of which I take well, others I am at a loss what they mean.

When your head-men were at New York, and made peace with General Washington, the great warrior of America, I was there. Agreeably to that treaty, the river Apalachy, or Tulapaka, was agreed to be the temporary line between your nation and the people of Georgia. Some goods were promised to you, which you received; and you were to make a plain line between our people and yours. This you failed to do. Some time after, General Washington, your father, heard you were poor, and wanted bread for your squaws and children; to relieve you from want, he sent you corn to St. Mary's, for which he asked nothing. Agreeably to his promise, a store was opened there for you to trade to; your father hoping, by this kind treatment, that the good men of your nation would return the property you promised at the treaty at New York, run the line, and be at perfect peace and friendship with all white people of the United States.

After all this kindness, what have your nation done? You have not returned our prisoners, nor restored our property, or acted as friends. The men that kept the store for you to trade to, were killed by your people, and the goods carried into your land; you have not punished the men that did this, or given any satisfaction for the injury done. John Galphin was the main hand in those murders and robberies. Major Seagrove informed me, last winter, he was condemned to die in your land, and had fled to the Spaniards. I am informed he is now returned as their agent; and, wishing to disturb your land with bad talk, wants you to go to war with the United States. This is Mr. Panton's doings; he wishes to have all your trade, and make you give what prices he pleases to ask for his goods. Does your father, General Washington, order any of his agents to ask you to make war on any other nation? No, he is too good a man to do it; he wishes to see you, and all nations, at peace and friendship. You have killed many of our citizens, and carried away a great number of our horses, cattle, and negroes; all this your father, General Washington, has borne with, from a wish to be the friend of your nation, and all the red people, as he is to all white ones. As a proof of this, he sent Major Seagrove into your land last winter, to see if peace was to be restored; you told Mr. Seagrove you were for peace, and that you would give the prisoners and negroes, and return the property; but in the spring, when he returned, he only brought four prisoners, and none of our negroes, or property. After so many disappointments, on your part, ask yourselves, what your father, General Washington, or the people of Georgia, have to expect from you? On his part, all the goods that were promised you, have been given; and a wish still remains to keep the path open and white, and with your nation it rests whether it will be so or not. If you return to us our prisoners and property, restrain your bad men from stealing our horses, all will be peace, and General Washington will open a trade to your land, when you may have goods for one-fourth less than you now give Mr. Panton for them, and get more for your skins and furs.

In one of your talks you say a ship of Mr. Panton's is taken, that was bringing your goods; and ask, whether we are at war with the British and Spaniards? To which I answer, we are neither at war with the British nor Spaniards, or know, or care, any thing about Mr. Panton, or his ship; the British and Spaniards are at war, with your fathers, the Frenchmen, who have taken a great many of their ships, and it is possible Mr. Panton's is one of them.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: In wars between white people, I would advise you to take no part; peace is best for you; carry your skins and furs to the nation that will give you the most for them, and let you have goods cheapest: for, compared with any white nation, you are a poor and weak people; you cannot make your own cloths, nor guns that kill your provisions, nor your powder or lead; therefore, you are in need of the assistance of white people, and should make it your study to be at peace with them all; and when any white men wishes you to go to war on their account, they wish to ruin your nation.

You ask about forts on the Apalachy, or Tulapaka. There are two forts built by my orders on that river; I told the White-bird king last winter, at fort Fidius, I would build them; our situation with the Cherokees required it; they are on the north side of the river, and on the lands that were given by your nation at the treaty at New York, for which you have been paid, and cannot see why you complain of it. By that treaty your nation is to receive twelve hundred dollars a year for the lands, which is ten times as much as all the game you can kill on it in one year is worth. I cannot see how your nation can dispute the river's being the line, as it was agreed on at three treaties in Georgia, and the one at New York. At the one at New York, all your warriors that met General Washington, your father, at the great council house, where the old men of the United States sat to make laws for the whole nation, the treaty you had signed was read and interpreted, and General Washington, on his part, for the United States, promised to perform it, and all your warriors then promised the same on the part of your nation; from this, it appears to me, you only wish to treat with a view to get presents, and have no intention of complying with any part of your treaties. The fort you complain of over the Oconee, is not built by my orders, nor your father, General Washington; it is done by men that are acting without any authority. I am informed they intend to rent the land of you; but if you don't choose to let them live on it, and you will comply with your treaties, by giving up our prisoners, and restoring our property, you need not be uneasy about them; your father, General Washington, will have them put off of it. You talk of two men you had killed on the Oconee last winter—I might tell you of many.

You have killed our people, but I refrain doing so. If we wish to have peace, we must not think of matters that are past. We must pull up a large oak tree, bury the bones of those that have been killed on both sides under it, then plant the tree, that it may grow in remembrance of our being one people; then, when we meet in the woods, we will eat and drink together as friends, and not wish to kill one another.

You say, you are afraid we wish to take all your lands; that it is your father, and can't spare it. If you will be at peace, we want no more of your land. It is a father to us as well as you; by ploughing and planting, it gives bread and meat to our wives and children, and gets us all the goods we want. But, when your bad men steal our horses, we cannot plough and work our land, and our wives and children want meat and clothes. Therefore, when you steal our horses, you rob us of what our father, the land, gives us.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: Open your ears, and hear now what your father says to you. If you stain our land again with blood, your father, General Washington, will not think of peace with you again. Your land will be the seat of war, and you will have no place of safety for your squaws and children; but if you listen to the talk of peace I now send you, and return our prisoners and property, I will write to your father, General Washington, to open a trade with you, so that your nation may be supplied with every thing you want. We live in the same land, and under the same sun; therefore, good sense and reason says, we should be friends. Major Seagrove, your friend, has gone to see your father, General Washington; he was sick for some time after he left your nation, therefore you must not expect to see him as soon, by two moons, as he told you.

True copy.

Attest,

J. MERIWETHER, S. E. D.

Deposition of William Jones.

GEORGIA:

William Jones, of the county of Wilkes, in the State aforesaid, being duly sworn, maketh oath, and saith, that, about four months ago, he was employed, and did go through the Creek country, to carry a letter to Ford, Reid, & Co. at Pensacola, from Willing, Morris, and Swanwick, of Philadelphia; that, arriving at Pensacola, the Lieutenant Governor directed him to go to the principal Governor at New Orleans, which the deponent did; that, returning from New Orleans, and arriving again at Pensacola, about four weeks since, he there saw Colonel Brown and Colonel Richard Paris, of and from the island of New Providence, with letters from Lord Dunmore to the Governor of Pensacola, to obtain a passport to the Creek country, which letters he saw delivered; and that the deponent understood they had a large quantity of goods for the Creeks, and was told by Baillie China, and the Indian Trader Russel, that they were to hold a treaty with the Creek nation. The deponent further saith, that, from the above facts, and the circumstances of the apparent gladness of the Tories, who fled from the States, and live there and at Tombigny, he supposes they were on a public embassy, and not on a trading scheme.

The deponent, upon his said oath, further saith, that the house of Panton, Leslie, and Forbes, lately sent a parcel of goods to the Chickasaw country, and that the Mountain Leader had seized them, and made prisoners of the traders, alleging a treaty with the United States; and the deponent heard that their goods were also sent by the said Brown and Paris.

Sworn to in Scriven county, the 15th day of August, 1794.

WILLIAM JONES.

In addition, the deponent further saith, that although he had been promised a pass to return to Georgia, after the arrival of Brown and Paris, he was refused, otherwise than circuitously by water.

Sworn as above, before me.

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, 30th August, 1794.

SIR:

Nothing extraordinary has taken place since my communications to you of the 19th instant. I have to request the President's instructions with respect to the prisoners which may fall into my hands in the event of a military force being employed against the settlements forming on the southwest side of the Oconee. Enclosed I send you a printed copy of Judge Walton's charge to the grand jury of the county of Richmond. I feel myself much indebted to the Judge for his spirited exertions on this occasion.

I have furnished General Twiggs with copies of that charge; the solicitor general's opinion, and your letter, and directed him to repair to the settlements before alluded to, and, after explaining the nature of his mission, to order the settlers immediately to remove. Should the order not be obeyed, I shall lose no time in drawing together a force adequate to compelling them.

I have no doubt of your having instructed the agent of supplies to direct the contractor to furnish what may be wanting in the commissary's and quartermaster's department.

GEO. MATHEWS.

Judge Walton's charge to the Grand Jury of Richmond County, State of Georgia.

GENTLEMEN OF THE GRAND JURY:

The eastern circuit, for the present summer, ended in Burke; the term for this county being appointed to be held after all the rest, it is to be considered as the court at which the judges are met to decide on cases reserved for consultation; and by an union of session, to assimilate the doctrine and practice of the circuits, and to close the whole in like manner as it used to be in Burke.

With the knowledge and experience of this usage, and with this construction of the intention of the Legislature, I do propose to share the labors and responsibility of office with my brother Smith, upon the present occasion.

I shall do this the more readily, because the moment is eventful; because the eyes of the Union are necessarily turned towards this State; and because it is disgraceful for public men to shrink from the duties of their appointment.

In addition to the presentment of the grand juries for the counties of Chatham and Burke, where I presided, I have seen in the public prints, that it is alleged by the Executive department of Government, that certain and divers persons have gone over the temporary boundary line, between the white and Indian inhabitants of this State, "with intent to establish a separate and independent government, on the lands allotted to the Indians for their hunting grounds." That the proclamation in which this is alleged, warns the citizens from engaging in such unlawful proceeding, and commands and requires all judges, justices, sheriffs, and other officers, to be aiding and assisting in apprehending and bringing them to justice.

What has been done in pursuance of this proclamation, I know only from general report, and the public prints. These state that General Clarke, who is at the head of the enterprise, surrendered himself at Washington, in the county of Wilkes, during the sitting of the superior court, to a justice or justices of the peace, and was discharged, as having offended against no known law.

Not having been in the way to act, and duly respecting the presentments of the grand juries before mentioned, as well as the Executive department and the Government of the United States, I consider it a duty I am not at liberty to dispense, as one of the judges of the republic, to state this case, in my place, for your information, and that of my fellow citizens at large.

In doing this, I feel myself moved by no other considerations than those of the public law and order, the collective and individual rights of the citizens, and the obligations of office. With the gentleman who directs this enterprise, I have been a long time in the habits of regard and friendship; I have known his virtues, and esteemed them. In the long and arduous war, which produced our liberty and independence, he stands high in the lists of Revolutionary patriots and soldiers. But he himself will forgive and justify me, in detailing the laws against a scheme which tends to undermine the fair fabric he contributed to raise, and to subvert the order of that society, of which he has been so long an useful member.

It was in a former charge to the grand jury, at Washington, in Wilkes county, in the summer western circuit of the year 1792, that I had occasion before to treat of this subject. It was then, and in that place, that I stated the existing laws against encroachments on the Indian hunting grounds, belonging to the State, and before a very large assemblage of the citizens, and which the present occasion demands to be repeated.

Before the Revolution, the laws imposed the severest penalties upon those encroachments. But, as these succeeded a new order of things, we will confine our attention to the acts which have been passed since.

Immediately after the peace, a law passed at Savannah, for opening the Land Office, dated the 17th day of February, 1783, and which contained the following clause:

"And be it further enacted, That all surveys, which have or may have been made, or lines run, by any means or under any pretence whatever, beyond the present temporary boundary line within this State, between the white inhabitants and the Indians belonging to the same, or on any part of the lands not already laid out into counties, but allowed to remain as hunting grounds for the Indians at present, shall, and the same is, and are hereby, declared to be null and void, to all intents and purposes, as though such surveys or lines had never been made; and all and every person and persons whatsoever, who shall hereafter survey, or assist in surveying, or procure to be surveyed, and marked with lines, any of the lands above described, whereon the Indians are allowed to hunt for their support, or who shall obtain, or attempt to obtain, a grant for the same, before such lands are taken, within the boundary of the white inhabitants of this State, and the mode of granting such lands so to be taken in, be agreed and determined on by the Legislature, and published by proclamation, all and every such person and persons shall forfeit and pay a penalty of twenty shillings for every acre of land he, she, or they, shall so run, or attempt to run or obtain, or attempt to obtain a grant for; which said penalty shall be recovered in any court of record or conscience (according to the amount thereof) within the State; and shall be for the use of any person or persons, who will inform of, and sue for the same, either by way of information or action; and if any person or persons, against whom a judgment shall be obtained, for any penalty as aforesaid, shall be unable to pay the same, or will not produce property whereon the sheriff may levy to the amount thereof, he, she, or they, shall be liable, and the justices of the county where such cause shall be tried, shall order him, her, or them, into close confinement, without bail or mainprize, for the space of two days, for every twenty shillings the said penalty, so recovered as aforesaid, shall consist of, and which shall remain unpaid out of the property of the delinquent."

And to another clause in the same act, declaring the real boundary line of the State, it is added:

"Provided nevertheless, That nothing herein before contained, shall extend, or be construed to extend, to authorize and empower any surveyor, or other person or persons whatsoever, to survey, run, or mark lines, upon the lands before described, as being allowed to the Indians for hunting grounds, or any part or parcel thereof, before or until permission for that purpose shall be granted by the Legislature, and made known by proclamation."

Two years after this, on the 22d February, 1785, the Legislature passed another act, having for object, among other things, the prevention of surveys being extended over the temporary boundary line. The clause respecting the latter is as follows:

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That, in case any surveys have been made, or grants obtained, for any lands lying and being without, or beyond, the lines of some one of the counties of this State, already laid out, all and every such survey or grant, shall be considered as fraudulent, and the same is hereby declared to be null and void; and the person or persons making such survey, or obtaining such grants, shall be prosecuted, and punished agreeable to the 11th section of the said land act, passed the 17th February, 1783."

This doctrine was again repeated two years afterwards, on the 10th of February, 1787, in an act passed for the appointment of commissioners to run the line designating the Indian hunting grounds. By this act, fine and imprisonment for the first offence, are added to the penalties herein before pointed out, for marking, surveying, or attempting to survey, or obtain, grants beyond the temporary line; and the second is made felony.

It was some time afterwards, in the year 1791, the two branches of the Legislature passed the following resolution: "Resolved, That the judges of the superior courts of this State, or one of them, be required, on proper information thereof being given, to issue a warrant against any surveyor or surveyors, who have or shall run any lands beyond the boundary line, designating the Indian hunting grounds; so that they may be, and appear, before the superior courts, in their respective counties, to answer for such conduct."

Thus far on the part of this State. On that of the United States, it is provided in the federal constitution, section 3d of article 4th: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

And, in an act of Congress of the 1st March, 1793, is the following clause:

"And be it further enacted, That, if any such citizen or inhabitant shall make a settlement on lands belonging to any tribe, or shall survey such lands, or designate their boundaries, by marking trees or otherwise, for the purpose of settlement, he shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, nor less than one hundred dollars, and suffer imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, in the discretion of the court before whom the trial shall be; and it shall, moreover, be lawful for the President of the United States, to take such measures as he may judge necessary, to remove, from lands belonging to any Indian tribe, any citizens or inhabitants of the United States who have made, or shall hereafter make, or attempt to make, a settlement thereon."

The same act contains a clause prohibiting any purchases to be made, but through the agency of the United States.

Soon after the accession of all the States to the present federal constitution, I stated my doubts to a grand jury, also of Wilkes county, as to treaties with savages being of the same rank of those with civilized nations; and was inclined to be of opinion, that they ought not to be considered in the list of supreme laws, and of equal efficacy with those in the statute book; but the construction of the United States has been otherwise. This has established it in law, in practice, and opinion, and it is my duty to acquiesce. It appears, indeed, that General Clarke claims with impunity, from the tenor of an article in the treaty of New York, which gives to the Indians the right of repelling, and which it would seem, he did not fear. That treaty, therefore, may, on every account, be fairly resorted to.

The 5th article of the said treaty is in the following words: The United States solemnly guaranty to the Creek nation, all their lands within the limits of the United States, to the westward and southward of the boundary described in the preceding article. And the Creeks have lately demanded of the Governor, whether this settlement has been made with the knowledge and consent of the President.

Whether, therefore, we have reference to the laws of the United States, or of this State, the enterprise must be considered as illegal, and of course liable to prosecution and penalty, if persisted in.

But, independent of this, and regarding the persons engaged as still our friends and fellow citizens, it will not be amiss to state, that the lands, which are the object of their plan and their hopes, belong to the public or State at large; and that all the citizens have an equal claim upon them, when they shall be made grantable, and of which they will be deprived by this anticipating monopoly. This is unjust; and this opinion has been of long standing with me.

In the charge before referred to, is the following clause: "The motives which have uniformly governed the Legislature, and induced it so often to repeat its prohibitions, were no doubt of a general nature; to preserve good faith with the Union, and peace with the savages, to prevent surreptitious grants, and the monopoly of vacant territory; but more especially, that all the citizens should have equal and common right, when such territory is permitted by law to be taken up. Upon this occasion I will add, that it is well, at any time, to be right; but still better to be uniform."

Should the spirit which generated the plan of this new settlement, still urge its pursuit, what mischiefs may it not produce to the community. A young country, scarcely recovered from former ravages, but with the means of progressive amplification and aggrandizement, to be involved in a civil war, with all the evils incident to it, will have the effect of arresting its progress, and putting it in the back of any present calculation.

It is already known that the President of the United States has directed, in the event of other means failing, that the settlement should be suppressed by military coercion. And shall the blood of citizens be spilled, to support the pretensions of a small part of the people—pretensions without law, and resting not on the foundations of justice? But, it is said, they have expatriated themselves. This is neither fact, or capable of being made so. The district, the object of their contemplation, is still Georgia; and they must be either citizens or insurgents. Would that these new settlers might attend the voice of reason, of benevolence, and moderation, before they plunge themselves and their country in distress and trouble. A little time will extend our limits, and we shall then be all upon a footing.

But suppose that the State, from the recollection of the past services of the principal in this adventure, and a tender regard to his adherents, (the United States out of view for the moment) should be disposed to wink at the establishment of this intended settlement, Is the extent of the precedent perceived? The richest jewel the State of Georgia possesses, and the real basis of her future wealth and rank in the Union, is her western territory; and if one set of men should be permitted to take possession, and keep a part of it, without the consent of her government, will it not be an example of right, for any other set of men to do the same, with any other part, or with the whole of it?

Hence, I conclude, that if General Clarke has the same regard for the State he has heretofore given so many proofs of, he will desist from an enterprise so pregnant with evils to her. It is not to be wished, that the Federal Government should have occasion to exert its power upon any such occasion. It might, one day, give color to pretensions, not consonant with the interests of the State. There ought to exist no fears at present; but who can keep pace with the progress of time and of revolution?

GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY:

I have now given a state of this case to you and to the world. In doing it, I have done my duty, because I think so. At the seat of Government, in the centre of business, and where courts so very frequently return, it is not necessary for me to add any thing upon your particular duties. Intend well, and act as you intend. Consult your oath, and be governed by it, and you cannot fail to do right.

GEORGE WALTON.

AUGUSTA, 26th August, 1794.

Extract of a letter from the Governor of Georgia to the Secretary of War, dated

STATE HOUSE, AUGUSTA, October 12, 1794.*

Major General Twiggs having returned from the settlements formed by Elijah Clarke, on the southwest side of the Oconee, with a positive answer from Clarke that he would not relinquish his enterprise, I lost no time in putting Brigadier General Irwin in motion, with a sufficient detachment of militia to cut off the communication, and otherwise act as circumstances should require. I also ordered another detachment to hold themselves in readiness to march as soon as some heavy artillery could be brought from Savannah, but, from the prudence and address of General Irwin, the marching of this detachment became unnecessary. He soon compelled the adventurers to propose relinquishing their unlawful attempts, and submit to the laws of their country. The posts are all burnt and destroyed, and the whole business happily terminated without the loss of blood. I have the pleasure to inform you that the militia, on this occasion, showed a determined disposition to act with firmness in support of the laws of their country.

Enclosed you will receive a copy of a deposition relative to some murders and depredations which have lately been committed by the Indians in Greene county. I have also received a letter from General Jackson, informing me of some negroes and horses which have been taken from Liberty county; and late accounts from the Creek nation state, that the Tallassee King and Broken Arrow are both for war.

STATE OF GEORGIA, Greene County:

The year and day hereafter specified, came before me, Messrs. John Mikal, wagon-man, and Davis Harrison, of aforesaid State and county, and, after being duly sworn, declareth; that, on the 30th of September, 1794, they both were near fort Fidius, where a young lady of the name of Catharine Cessna, had been just shot down, and, on examination, found a shot gun wound through her body, of which wound she died, and had been scalped; they also declare having seen a negro wench, which had received two gun shot wounds, was scalped, but had yet life in her; that, by every circumstance, they have reason to believe these horrid murders were committed by Indians; that they have heard the negro wench declare she saw five Indians, and that she was thus barbarously treated by them. The aforesaid deponents further say nothing.

September 30, 1794.

* Received November 8, 1794.

I do certify the above to be the truth, being there shortly after, and seeing the dead and wounded, and followed the trail of said Indians some distance.

Sworn to the above on the above date.

FORT FIDUIS, 29th September, 1794.

SIR:

I have the pleasure to inform you, that the post opposite to us, on the south side of the Oconee, has been taken and destroyed by the militia, and that General Clarke and his adherents have been removed.

Soon after the Governor's proclamation was issued against General Clarke, he delivered himself up to the superior court in the county of Wilkes, who dismissed him, because it was their opinion that he had not violated the laws of this State. This decision greatly encouraged his party, and the settlements were pushed with vigor. The measure had also become very popular, and it was believed by him and his adherents, that the militia would never march against them. Under these flattering circumstances, his works were completed; houses were erected within his forts, a town was laid off at fort Advance, the post opposite to us; General Clarke was chosen Major General, and placed at the head of the enterprise; the members were elected for the general committee, or committee of safety, and every thing bore the appearance of a permanent settlement. I enclose you a copy of the letter written by General Clarke, on this occasion, which has been furnished me by Colonel Melton.

On the third instant, Lieutenant Devereaux, of Fauche's dragoons, stopped a wagon, said to be loaded with military stores, for fort Advance, but, as nothing was found, it was dismissed; about this time the Governor received his orders from the President of the United States. His Excellency directed one third of the militia to hold themselves in readiness to march. In the mean time, he sent Generals Twiggs and Irwin to General Clarke, to induce him to remove. These officers visited him at his post; and General Gunn and Mr. Carnes had an interview with him at Georgetown, thirty miles from hence, but without effect.

General Twiggs had ordered Major Adams to cross the river, and endeavor, by persuasion, to remove the settlers from fort Defiance, six miles above; his life was threatened, and the person who commanded ordered his men to fire upon him. This exasperated the inhabitants in that neighborhood, who held a meeting, the result of which was, that Major Adams should proceed to Augusta, and request the Governor to give him orders to dispossess these people.

On the twenty-third, a cornet and eighteen men, of Fauche's dragoons, came to this post, and, near to it, took a prisoner, one of General Clarke's lieutenants; the same day, a lieutenant and twenty men joined, took two prisoners, and occupied the landing opposite to fort Advance, and, as far as their force would admit, cut off the supplies. On the twenty-fifth, Captain Fauche joined, with another detachment of his corps, and took two prisoners. General Clarke made every exertion to strengthen his post. Some of those above were abandoned, and the garrison removed to fort Advance.

General Irwin had collected a party of militia, and lay at Town creek, nine miles from hence; on the twenty-sixth he encamped on the bank opposite to fort Advance; Colonels Melton and Lamar, Major Adams, and other officers of the militia, crossed the same day, with one hundred and thirty men, and cut off the communication on the south side of the river. General Irwin promised General Clarke that, if he would evacuate the post, himself and his men should be protected in their persons and property. Accordingly, next morning, the baggage was removed, and, in the evening, a party of the militia took possession of the works. Yesterday morning the fort was set on fire, and destroyed, and parties were detached to demolish fort Defiance, and the other posts above. There has been no lives lost in this business; the prisoners are all set at liberty except one, who is detained in our guard house until farther orders.

I never could, sir, ascertain, with any precision, the number of men who have joined General Clarke in his enterprise; there have a great many enrolled themselves, who would not appear on the present occasion; the greatest force that has, at any time, been collected at fort Advance, was on the morning of the twenty-sixth, when there were about eighty men within the fort, but, at the time it was taken, there were not twenty.

The militia have shown great zeal to support the laws, and have preserved good order and conduct; there has been the greatest harmony between them and the Federal troops. They all returned to their homes yesterday, and were mustered before they left this place. I suppose there has been about two hundred, exclusively of Fauche's dragoons. As soon as I receive the rolls I shall transmit them.

It is of consequence that I should, sir, inform you that settling the lands on the south side of the Oconee is a favorite object with the inhabitants of the upper counties, although General Clarke's plan has not been approved.

They would conceive themselves safe from Indian depredations, were these lands occupied, and exertions will be made to induce the Assembly, at their next session, to open a land office for that purpose. I enclose you the copy of a petition which has been offered to the inhabitants in this neighborhood. It is to be observed, that it has been drawn up by the party the most violently opposed to General Clarke.

It is a singular circumstance, sir, that not the least opposition has been shown by the Indians to the settlements which were making on their lands; otherwise than by representations to the Governor, and they have at no time been more quiet than they are at present; we have not heard from the nation since the fourth ultimo. Colonel Gaither proposes, as soon as he can procure a proper person, to send a message to the Indians, to inform them that the Government has removed all encroachments from their lands:

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.
CONSTANT FREEMAN.

Copy of a petition for opening an office for the lands south of the Oconee, which is to be presented to the Legislature of Georgia.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia:

Your petitioners humbly shew: Whereas the State has an only right of soil to the vacant territory granted the Indians for their hunting grounds, who dwells within its respective limits, and who as a conquered people preserved merely to themselves the claim of vassals at the definitive treaty of peace, concluded between the United States of America and Britain, &c. and that said claim, through cruel outrages, has frequently been broke by the most aggravating hostile proceedings on their part; and that our government, by a law, entitled "An act to suppress the violence of the Indians," passed in 1787, has guaranteed certain bounties to soldiery raised for the purpose of repelling the dangers of such unwarrantable doings of said savages, together with other reasons which is too tedious to be described here, which we humbly conceive justice and policy loudly call on you seriously to consider, and actuated by the high sense generally entertained of the magnanimity and wisdom of the honorable the Legislature, and from a mature consideration become sensible of the grand benefit an enlargement would speedily render to the State from the rapidness of migration of substantial farmers from our sister States and Europe, that stand in need of farms, your petitioners humbly solicit that you, in your wisdom, may open an office for the land lying southeast of a line drawn from the Currahee mountain, the nearest direction to the Chatahoochee river, thence down the said river until it intersects the Spanish line, thence with the said line to the temporary line on St. Mary's river.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

FORT ADVANCE, 5th September, 1794.

GENTLEMEN:

Your favor of the 3d instant is now before me; accept my thanks for your information and attention to what may, if ever neglected, so materially injure our enterprise. I consider myself honored by meeting with the unanimous voice of all the officers belonging to the different garrisons. I shall always endeavor to acquit myself worthy of the command committed to my charge. The information you have received agrees with mine from Augusta. The artillery of Augusta are ordered to be in readiness to march in eight or ten days, and one-third of the militia are directed to be draughted. It has been tried in Burke and Richmond counties, but quite unsuccessful; the troops declare they will not fight against us. I am happy to find the disposition of the people with you, so exactly agrees with my own friends' here; I believe it to be the general disposition of every garrison. I am determinately fixed to risk every thing, with my life, upon the issue, and for the success of the enterprise; you will apply to the enclosed orders how to conduct yourselves with inimical individuals. In case of a body appearing, you will give me the earliest information. If you are summoned to surrender in the garrison, you must refuse, with a firmness ever accompanying the brave. Inform those who apply, that, if you have done wrong, and the grand jury of the county have cognizance of your crime, you will cheerfully submit to be tried by a jury of your fellow-citizens. But you will consider any orders from the Secretary of War, to be unconstitutional; the Governor's proclamation, as determined in Wilkes, illegal. I am informed that Captain Fauche's troop are directed to stop men and supplies, crossing to the south side of the Oconee. They have no right to take hold of any private property whatever, and, for every thing detained, to the value of one shilling, belonging to any adventurer, they shall suffer the penalty of the law. If such case should turn up, apply to a magistrate, and bind the party offending to the next superior court. To avoid disputes, it will be best to use a prudent precaution in every case. The president of the board of officers, E. Bradley, Esq. mentions my appointing a meeting of the committee of safety on Monday, the fifth of October; if it is the first Monday of the month, that is the day on which our constitution requires them to meet. If two members meet, they may adjourn from day to day, until the whole or a majority of them can be convened. It is entirely out of my power to appoint the 22d of this month, or any other day, if it does not agree with the constitution; you will attend to appointing your members for the committee on the 15th of this month, at the several garrisons. Meet the first Monday in next month, but, in case of the election as mentioned, the members who cannot attend on Monday, meet on Tuesday or Wednesday, that is, those who first meet must adjourn from day to day, until they are convened. Must beg you to copy orders, and send them to the several garrisons above you.

Yours, &amp;c.

E. CLARKE.

NOTE.—You receive one petition, which will suit every body but a real tory. Our own people and particular friends will subscribe them, with the addition of the office being opened to no persons but those who will become settlers.

AUGUSTA, 12th October, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose a duplicate of my letter to you of the twenty-ninth of last month. I arrived at this place, from fort Fidius, last evening. When I left the frontiers, the troops were in perfect health, excepting Col. Gaither, who was then indisposed.

The Indians, who had been for some time quiet, killed and scalped, on the thirteenth ultimo, a white woman and a negro wench, near the Cow ford on the Oconee; they also have stolen horses and negroes, from Liberty county. Colonel Gaither has received letters from the nation, informing him that the Tallassee king had gone out for war; the chiefs disapproved of his conduct. We have not, however, heard of any mischief being done by him; and as runners were sent after him, to persuade him to return, I have hopes that he has not proceeded.

As soon as I shall have examined and forwarded the militia muster and pay rolls for the services performed last year, I shall return to the frontiers.

Yours, &amp;c.

CONSTANT FREEMAN.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to his Excellency the Governor of Georgia, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 28th, 1794.

SIR:

It is with great regret that the President of the United States has been lately informed, that a considerable body of people, in the upper part of Georgia, have associated themselves for the purpose of setting up an independent government on the territory belonging to the Creek Indians, and of erecting forts from the Oconee to the Oakmulgee. We only understand, in general, here, that such a movement, without the sanction of your Government, is contrary to the laws, without being informed, at the same time, of the name and degree of offence in your criminal code.

Notwithstanding the formation of a new State cannot take place without the consent of Congress, as well as the State concerned; and the United States, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive of a State, when its Legislature cannot be convened, are bound to protect it against domestic violence; it might, perhaps, be proper to leave this attempt, under its present circumstances, to the management of your own State, if it were not that the laws of the United States are infringed thereby. And yet, sir, so serious a struggle as this against the authority of the State, and the erection of forts, (both of which steps may be so easily turned against the United States) would be sufficient in themselves to call forth precautions on the part of the General Government.

The President, however, entertains the most perfect reliance on your exertions, to repel the mischief arising from this quarter.

But the Government has its own obligations to fulfil on this occasion. The President is required, by a law of the United States, passed the 28th February, 1793, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," to take such measures as he may judge necessary to remove from lands, belonging to any Indian tribe, any citizens or inhabitants of the United States, who make, or attempt to make, a settlement thereon.

We cannot expect to live in peace with those tribes, if individuals are at liberty to invade their lands. We cannot expect to bring them to the proper temper for any of the operations of Government.

These considerations determine the President to meet the evil in the commencement, and he therefore requests your Excellency to adopt the following line of conduct, without delay:

1st. To warn, by proclamation, these disturbers of the peace, that they are offending against the laws of the United States and of Georgia, and that their attempts will be repelled by military force.

2d. To embody such parts of your militia as may be necessary to accomplish the business with decision.

3d. To call upon the commanding officer of the Federal troops in Georgia, who is instructed to obey your Excellency's orders, to co-operate in the removal of these settlers from the Indian lands.

The foregoing is founded on the supposition of the intelligence, stated at the head of the letter, being true. Indeed, it is supposed to be known to your Excellency to be true. If it be not of the magnitude represented here, still a monitory proclamation seems to be expedient, and upon the whole of this affair, it is confided to you to render your efforts commensurate with the necessity, so as in the most complete manner to avert the evil which threatens the United States from these turbulent spirits.

The President, moreover, requests your Excellency to communicate to him, at the earliest possible moment, the actual state of things in your quarter, and particularly to note whether it will be necessary to resort to the militia of any other State for aid. The Attorney of the United States for the District of Georgia will receive your commands, and be ready to institute prosecutions in any cases which you may be pleased to lay before him.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to his Excellency the Governor of Georgia, dated WAR DEPARTMENT, September 25, 1794.

SIR:

In the absence of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters to his Department, of the 5th, 19th, and 30th of August, and to reply to such parts as are the most pressing, referring the others to the return of that officer.

Among the posts which have been established, that at Doclar's town creates a question, in consequence of Lient. Colonel Gaither's information, that it is within the Indian boundary. This is a matter which ought to be unequivocally ascertained, and if found to be within the Indian line, or if it be even doubtful whether that be the case, the post must be immediately removed. It is deemed essential that no encroachment should take place. And your Excellency is relied upon for a strict and scrupulous adherence to this principle.

Under the circumstances which led to it, the President has thought proper to authorize the adoption, by the United States, of the new troop ordered by you into service, from the time of its commencement, and to continue until the first of November ensuing, when it is to be disbanded.

And you are at liberty, if the state of things shall render it, in your judgment, essential, to substitute at that time a company of infantry for the same service. Corps of horse, upon the terms on which that in question is engaged, are expensive in the extreme; and in a much greater proportion, compared with infantry, than any supposable superiority of usefulness can justify. Indeed, it would require a treasury much better supplied than that of the United States, to support the expense of a multiplication or extension of such corps. Consequently, that multiplication or extension would tend to defeat its own object: for our instruments of defence, to be durable, must be relative to our means of supporting them. And when we find, as in the instance of the insurrection now existing in the western parts of Pennsylvania, that those for whose immediate benefit the objects of military expenditure occur, are among the first to resist, even to violence, the necessary means of defraying them, it is easy to appreciate the perplexing dilemma to which the Government is reduced, between the duty and the means of affording protection, and the necessity, consequently, of economy in the modes of effecting it.

Your Excellency is pleased to express your concern, at being so repeatedly compelled to solicit protection for the State of Georgia. This is not understood as implying any want of due disposition on the part of the Executive of this Government, to afford all the protection which is within the compass of the means placed within its power, having regard to all the objects which, along a very extended frontier, equally demand attention. It is not doubted that you render justice, in this respect, to the views of the Executive.

But the observation you have made, in this particular, naturally leads to another, which calls for the most serious attention of the Governments of the States, exposed to Indian depredations. It is this, that there is a reciprocal duty in the case. The obligation upon the United States, to afford adequate protection to the inhabitants of the frontiers, is no doubt of the highest and most sacred kind. But there is a duty no less strong upon those inhabitants, to avoid giving occasion to hostilities, by an irregular and improper conduct; and upon the local Governments, sincerely and effectually to punish and repress instances of such conduct, and the spirit which produces them. If these inhabitants can, with impunity, thwart all the measures of the United States for restoring or preserving peace; if they can, with impunity, commit depredations and outrages upon the Indians, and that in violation of the faith of the United States, pledged not only in their general treaties, but even in the special (and, among all nations, peculiarly sacred) case of a safe conduct, as in the instance of the attack upon the Indians, while encamped within our protection, on the 10th of May last; can it be surprising if such circumstances should abate the alacrity of the National councils to encounter those heavy expenses, which the protection of the frontiers occasions, and of the readiness of the citizens of the United States, distant from the scenes of danger, to acquiesce in the burdens they produce? It is not meant, by these remarks, to diminish the force of the excuse, within due limits, which is drawn from the conduct of the Indians towards the frontier inhabitants. It cannot be denied, that frequent and great provocations to a spirit of animosity and revenge are given by them; but a candid and impartial survey of the events which have from time to time occurred, can leave no doubt that injuries and provocations have been too far mutual; that there is much to blame in the conduct of the frontier inhabitants, as well as in that of the Indians. And the result of a full examination must be, that, unless means to restrain, by punishing the violences which those inhabitants are in the habit of perpetrating against the Indians, can be put in execution, all endeavors to preserve peace with them must be forever frustrated.

An example, worthy of imitation, in its spirit, has lately been given, by the surrender to Governor Blount of some Indians who lately committed a murder upon one John Ish, an inhabitant of the Southwestern territory, and who have been tried and executed. The record of such an example of justice and fair dealing, will give occasion to us to blush, if we can cite no instance of reciprocity, amidst the numerous occasions which are given for the exercise of it.

These reflections, your Excellency may be assured, are merely designed to present to consideration some very important truths—truths, a due attention to which are of the most serious concern to those States which have an exposed frontier. To give full weight to their claims, upon the exertions of the Union to afford the requisite protection, it is of great moment to satisfy the United States, that the necessity for them has not been created, or promoted by a culpable temper, not sufficiently restrained, among those to whom the protection is immediately to be extended.

The President learns, with great pleasure, the measures your Excellency had begun, and was about to pursue, for the removal of the settlers under General Clarke. It is impossible to conceive a settlement more unjustifiable in its pretexts, or more dangerous in its principle, than that which he is attempting. It is not only a high handed usurpation of the rights of the General and State Governments, and a most unwarrantable encroachment upon those of the Indians; but, proceeding upon the idea of a separate and independent government, to be erected upon a military basis, it is essentially hostile to our republican systems of government, and is pregnant with incalculable mischiefs. It deeply concerns the great interests of the country that such an establishment should not be permitted to take root, and that the example should be checked by adequate punishment; in doing which, no time is to be lost: for, such is the nature of the establishment, that it may be expected rapidly to attain to a formidable magnitude, involving great expense and trouble to subvert it.

The President, therefore, depends absolutely upon measures, equally prompt and efficacious, to put an end to it.

Mr. Habersham, agent for supplies, is instructed to co-operate; and the Governor of South Carolina is requested to afford, upon your application, the aid of the militia of that State, if circumstances, as does not appear probable, should require it.

No agreement or arrangement which may be made, or pretended to be made, between these settlers and the Indians, ought to be suffered to make any alteration in the plan of suppressing the settlement: for, no such agreement, or arrangement, can possibly be legal, or, considering the manner in which the settlement has been commenced, can, without affording a most pernicious example, receive the future sanction of Government.

You desire instructions with regard to the prisoners that may be made, in the event of the employment of force. You will be pleased to cause them to be delivered over to the custody of the judiciary, and in preference, to that of the United States; as their laws define and prescribe particular punishments in such cases.

ALEX'R HAMILTON.

Extract of a letter from his Excellency Governor Mifflin to the President of the United States.

Permit me, sir, to take the present opportunity of transmitting, for your information, a copy of an act of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, entitled "An act for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle;" and of the proceedings which have been instituted for the purpose of carrying that law into effect.

PHILADELPHIA, 28th March, 1794.

Copy of an Act of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle.

Whereas establishing a town at Presqu' Isle would promote the settlement of the neighboring country, and thereby place the frontiers of Pennsylvania in a safer situation: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That the Governor be, and he is hereby, empowered to cause to be surveyed, the tract reserved, at and near Presqu' Isle, by the act, entitled "An act for the sale of the vacant lands within this Commonwealth," passed the third day of April, 1792; and at the most eligible place, within the said tract, he shall cause to be laid out and surveyed, sixteen hundred acres of land, in town lots, not more than one-third of an acre each; and, also, three thousand four hundred acres, adjoining the same, in out lots, not less than five acres, nor more than ten acres each: Provided, always, That the Governor shall reserve, out of the lots of the said town, so much land as he shall deem necessary for public uses; also, so much land, within or out of the said town, as may, in his opinion, be wanted by the United States for the purpose of erecting forts, magazines, arsenals, and dock yards.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the first two hundred persons that shall actually inhabit and reside, on or before the first day of January next, within the said town, shall each and every of them be entitled to one unappropriated town lot, and one out lot, to be ascertained by lottery, for which they shall, respectively, receive a deed, clear of all charges: Provided, That such persons, respectively, or their respective representatives, or assignees, shall inhabit and reside within the said town, for the term of three years; and, also, within the said town, build, or cause to be built, a house at least sixteen feet square, and containing, at least, one brick or stone chimney, on the town lots to be granted in pursuance of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the Governor is hereby authorized to sell two hundred of the town lots, exclusively of those granted by the next preceding section, and the whole of the other out lots, in such manner as he shall think most to the advantage of the State, and make conveyances of the same; excepting, always, such as shall be made upon this condition: that the respective purchasers shall, and do, within the term of three years, erect and build one house, at least sixteen feet square, and containing, at least, one brick or stone chimney, on each and every town lot by them purchased; and no deed of conveyance shall be granted by the Governor, to any purchaser, nor, after the expiration of the said term of three years, shall the sale be deemed, or construed, to vest any title, claim, or demand, in any purchaser, unless satisfactory proof be first given that a house has been erected and built, on the town lots sold, as aforesaid, according to the true intent and meaning of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the streets, lanes, and alleys, of the said town and out lots, shall be common highways forever; and that, previous to the sale, or sales, of the said town lots and out lots, notice shall be given of the same, in at least three of the newspapers of the State, at least ten weeks previous to such sale or sales.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the expenses necessary to carry this act into operation, shall be paid out of the moneys arising from the aforementioned lots and out lots.

GERARDUS WYNKOOP,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL POWELL,

Speaker of the Senate.

APPROVED: April 8, 1794.

THOMAS MIFFLIN, Governor of Pennsylvania.

Copy of a letter from Governor Mifflin to Captain E. Denny.

PHILADELPHIA, 1st March, 1794.

Sir: Enclosed you will receive a copy of an act of the General Assembly, entitled "An act for more effectually securing the trade, peace, and safety, of the port of Philadelphia, and defending the Western frontiers of the Commonwealth;" a commission, by which you are appointed Captain of the Alleghany company; a sketch of the appointments and arrangements of all the companies directed to be raised; and a copy of an act, entitled "An act for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle."

You will be pleased, sir, to take all lawful measures, under the instructions of the brigade inspectors of the county, and with the aid of the officers of your company, for engaging, during the term, and for the pay prescribed by the act for the defence of our frontiers, four sergeants, four corporals, one drummer and fifer, or two buglers, and sixty-five rank and file, or privates. In making your enlistments, you will stipulate with the men, that, if the state of the war, on the frontiers, shall, in my judgment, require their continuance in the service of the Commonwealth, after the expiration of the term of eight months, mentioned in the law, they shall continue accordingly, until the meeting of the Legislature, next ensuing the expiration of the said term, or for any shorter period that I may direct.

From the sketch of the appointments, and arrangements of the several companies, you will perceive that you are called on to command the detachment which is made, in order to carry into effect the act, entitled "An act for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle;" and the importance of the object, as well as the difficulties that may attend its accomplishment, will evince the confidence that is reposed in your zeal, spirit, and prudence. In the discharge of your trust, I am persuaded you will pay a due respect to the design and spirit of the laws which I have communicated to you; and, therefore, I shall content myself with suggesting the following general regulations:

1st. Messrs. Irvine, Ellicot, and Gallatin, the commissioners who are employed to lay out the town at Presqu' Isle, will probably be engaged in that duty, early in the month of May next. It will be necessary, therefore, that, before that time, arrangements should be made for establishing some post of protection and defence in the neighborhood of Presqu' Isle; and the commissioners have thought that a spot at Le Bœuf will be the most eligible and convenient for their undertaking. The lieutenant, who is detached from the artillery company, will transport thither, under the convoy of his detachment, a competent supply of provisions, cannon, arms, ammunition, and camp equipage. Of these articles, an officer, in the nature of quartermaster, will have the immediate custody; but they are, nevertheless, to be considered as being under your superintending care and disposition, to be preserved with the greatest caution; not to be used, but in cases of necessity; and to be accounted for, by you, to any person who may be appointed to succeed in your command, or who may be authorized to receive the same, where the purposes of the post shall be attained. You will be pleased to strengthen the detachment of artillery by a party of the infantry, under your command, whenever they advance from Pittsburg; and this party should consist, I think, of not less than a sergeant and fifteen men, or, if circumstances will admit, of an officer and twenty men.

2d. As the object of the detachment under your command is to carry the act for establishing a town at Presqu' Isle into effect, you shall deem it your duty to comply with every lawful request of the commissioners, in stationing the men in such numbers, and at such places, as they shall, from time to time, think requisite to ensure their safety and defence, and generally, in aiding and facilitating their measures by all the means in your power.

3d. The Legislature having made provision for surveying and opening the roads, one from Reading, and the other from French Creek, to Presqu' Isle, it is obvious that the establishment of the town is intimately connected with those objects; and therefore, you shall deem it your duty to grant all the aid and protection to the respective commissioners and contractors employed in surveying and opening those roads, that is compatible with a due attention to the particular charge which is confided to you.

4th. In the present state of our Northern frontier, you will deem it a duty peculiarly incumbent on you, to avoid giving any occasion of offence to the peaceable Indians, or to the British garrisons which are in that quarter. You will endeavor, in case any intercourse should necessarily or accidentally take place with them, to conciliate and cultivate a good and friendly understanding, and you are, above all things, to remember, that the objects of your appointment are strictly those of protection and defence, and that any act of aggression or hostility, committed against any person or persons, in amity with the United States, or committed against any person or persons whomsoever, out of the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania, will be unauthorized, and punished according to law.

5th. For the purposes of information, you will keep a journal of your proceedings, and maintain a regular correspondence, as well with the commissioners appointed to lay out the town at Presqu' Isle, as with the Brigade Inspector of Alleghany county; and when any matter of public importance shall occur, you will, with all possible despatch, communicate the same to me.

To these regulations, it is perhaps unnecessary to add, that it is expected that you will give the strictest attention to the health, order, and discipline, of the detachment under your command; and in all things so act, as to justify the confidence which your country has reposed in you.

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

SIR:

In the absence of the Governor, permit me to communicate to you, for the information of the President, copies of letters which have been received this day from General Wilkins and Captain Denny, relatively to the arrangements that are made for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle, agreeably to a law of the State of Pennsylvania, and the possible opposition which the Indians may give to the accomplishment of that object.

FORT FRANKLIN, 25th April, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

I arrived at this place yesterday evening. There came a party along, consisting of about forty men, from Captain Denny's command, and thirty volunteers, from the county of Alleghany. We proceed to-morrow to Cassawago. The news at this place is not favorable towards our establishment at Presqu' Isle. All the persons most conversant with the Indians at this place, as well as the commanding officer of this fort, agree, that the Indians, irritated by the British, are meditating an opposition to the designs of Government respecting that place. Cornplanter, and the other Indians on the Alleghany river, have been invited to a council at Buffalo creek, to which place he and they immediately went; and, on the result of that council, seems to hang peace or war, between us and the Six Nations. There have been a great deal of pains used lately, by the English, to sour their minds; and they seem, in some measure, to have effected it. The claims of the Six Nations seem to rise as the Western Indians are successful against the army of the United States, and as the British promise to afford them assistance. This council, to which the English has summoned, and the readiness with which the Indians obeyed the summons, promises no good towards this part of the country.

My intention is to proceed to Cassawago, and wait for further intelligence a day or two; and should a serious opposition seem to be meditating by the Indians, to proceed no farther with the stores, until reinforced by more men, to enable the effecting an establishment at Le Bœuf. The water is very low; it is with the utmost difficulty we will be able to go on with small canoes at present, but live in hopes that we shall have a rise in the waters.

PITTSBURG, April 25th, 1794.

SIR:

I had the honor of writing to you by the last post, mentioning the necessity we were under of calling out a few militia, in order to take advantage of the rivers, while up. I then could not calculate, with any certainty, what time the detachments from the other counties would arrive; however, the greatest part of them came in time to join the volunteers. They marched on Monday last, and encamped, the first night, twenty one miles from here, on the route to fort Franklin, and in all probability would reach that place yesterday. Ensign Mehaffy, from Westmoreland, had the direction of the State troops, two sergeants, two corporals, and forty three privates; the volunteers consisted of a captain, lieutenant, thirty men; total, one captain, one lieutenant, one ensign, and seventy-seven men. They will go no further than Le Bœuf.

I have not such confidence in the Six Nations as to think they will favor the establishment; and a small party, subject to the power of a few ill disposed Indians, would be more liable to be stopped by them; not that I think they will offer any violence immediately, but I think they will throw some objections in the way; perhaps desire the business postponed for a while. We have certain information, that the chiefs were lately assembled in council at the mouth of Buffalo; their meetings there have always been influenced by British agents, and I should not be surprised to find them return with a wish to prevent the settlement at Presqu' Isle. I have received letters from the Inspectors of Washington and Westmoreland counties, informing me of the orders they had from you, telling me that, whatever reinforcements we required, might be depended on. Doctor Wilkins is gone in company with the party to Le Bœuf. I have requested him, and directed Mehaffy, to write to me by every opportunity; and should any thing material be discovered, to send off an express.

I am, with respect, &c.

PITTSBURG, May 2d, 1794.

SIR:

I had the honor to address you on the 25th ultimo, since which nothing material has happened. The party sent forward to establish a post of protection and defence at Le Bœuf, consisted of a captain, lieutenant, and thirty volunteers, and an ensign and forty-seven of the State troops; they were at fort Franklin the 24th, as expected. A very seasonable rain, which fell while they were on their march to that post, will (provided the way is open) enable the contractor to push all the provisions and stores up the creek, without loss of time. We are not without apprehensions that this council-holding between the chiefs of the Six Nations and the British, at the mouth of Buffalo creek, may terminate unfavorably to our establishment. The Cornplanter is not with them; but I am told he has ordered away the traders, who had stores in his town.

Before our detachment proceeds farther than Mead's settlement, the disposition of those Indians will be known; and, in case any opposition is offered, the party will halt, and secure themselves and the stores until a sufficient reinforcement joins them. I depend upon Doctor Wilkins and Ensign Mehaffy's earliest notice.

Lieutenant Murphy and Ensign Patterson have been about three weeks away, endeavoring to find men for the Alleghany company. Patterson has been tolerably successful; Murphy, I have not heard from; he is in Fayette county. They must both be here in a few days, now. No doubt but you have been informed of the death of Lieutenant Hazlewood; his men will reach this, perhaps, in six days.

I acknowledge the honor of your letter of the 25th April. The delays which took place in sending on the men from the other counties; the inspector took pains to account for, and I am in hopes there will be no ill consequences. The inspectors are all desirous to promote the establishment at Presqu' Isle, and have informed me of their orders from the Governor.

PHILADELPHIA, May 23, 1794.

SIR:

As I am desirous to furnish the President with every article of useful intelligence which I receive, I have thought it proper to communicate to you, for that purpose, a copy of a letter from Brigadier General Wilkins, dated the eleventh current, relatively to the murder of a friendly Indian at fort Franklin, and the prospect of opposition from the British troops, in laying out a town at Presqu' Isle, agreeably to the directions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. On the first of these subjects, I have received the copy of Lieutenant Polhemus' letter, enclosed in yours of this day, but the depositions mentioned by General Wilkins, as well as by Lieutenant Polhemus, have not been transmitted to me; I shall, however, refer the case to the attorney general of this State, with instructions for proceeding, in the most expeditious manner, to bring the murderer to justice.

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

Copy of a letter from General Wilkins to Governor Mifflin.

FORT FRANKLIN, 11th May, 1794.

SIR:

On the 1st of this month a very disagreeable affair happened at this place. A white man by the name of Robertson killed a friendly Indian. The man was taken into custody immediately, by the commanding officer, and still remains in confinement. Robertson is a young man, and perhaps was a little intoxicated, but his character is not good. It is thought best not to remove him from this place, until the Indians are satisfied. If he is removed before, some innocent person may suffer, as the Indians say the white people always tell them they will punish crimes of this kind, but never yet have done it, and they are determined not to let this instance pass without having justice. The father of the young man, who is a decent old man, living at Pittsburg, has sent Joseph Nicholson to endeavor to satisfy the friends of the deceased. Yesterday, Nicholson had a council with the Indians that were here, at which we all assisted, and offered about one hundred dollars to replace, in the Indian way, the man that is dead. The Indians were all well satisfied with the offer. The property is to be deposited in the hands of the commanding officer, until the relations come for it, if they are satisfied with it, and the young man is to remain in confinement at this place, until the opinion of the relations is taken. Too much cannot be done at present, by the State of Pennsylvania, to keep the Six Nation Indians friendly, and, perhaps, on this occasion, some person might be authorized to make them some presents. I enclose the depositions I took of some white men who were present.

The troops of the State took possession of the forks of French creek, about two miles below the old post of Le Bœuf, and had a small block-house built, to which place I accompanied them. I was with them two days, but a runner from the Indians occasioned my return to this place, on account of the man being killed. The troops would move forward to Le Bœuf in two or three days; only waited the cutting of logs out of the creek, which obstructed the navigation, and until the fatigue parties had finished getting materials, so that the whole might go forward at once, and cover themselves. This part of the business has been accomplished by about seventy men, consisting of forty men, raised by Captain Denny's command, and thirty volunteers from Alleghany county. The greater part of the military stores have been forwarded as far as Cassawago, but, owing to the low waters, from the advanced season of the year, they now remain, and I am waiting the first rise in French creek, to convey them completely to Le Bœuf.

No doubt but you have been officially informed of the result of the council at Buffalo creek, held by the Six Nations. They refuse attending a treaty they were invited to, at this place, by the agent of the United States.

All the friendly Indians I have talked with here and at other places, say, the British are determined to oppose the progress of the State troops from Le Bœuf to Presqu' Isle. An Indian, this day, a very honest intelligent fellow, told me, that the English were fixed in making an opposition to the first party that should attempt opening the road from Le Bœuf to Presqu' Isle, by sending a number of Indians and English to cut them off. Cornplanter writes to the commanding officer of this post nearly to the same effect. I mention these circumstances, and I mean to know more, as it is probable he will have to be strengthened by a party of militia.

I am, &c.

From Governor Mifflin to the President of the United States, dated

PHILADELPHIA, 25th May, 1794.

SIR:

I have occasion to regret that your opinion on the expediency of suspending, for the present, the establishment at Presqu' Isle, was not communicated to me previously to the receipt of the letter from the Secretary of War, dated yesterday, in which that opinion is, for the first time, explicitly expressed. I am apprehensive, indeed, that it is too late to prevent the execution of the measures, which, under the authority of the law of Pennsylvania, were concerted relatively to that object, and of which, I had the honor, regularly, to apprise you. But, ever anxious to promote the views of the General Government, and to avoid increasing the dissatisfaction of the Six Nations, or, in any other manner, extending the sphere of Indian hostilities, I shall consider your interposition and request as a sufficient justification for attempting, even at this late period, to arrest the progress of the commissioners in laying out the town at Presqu' Isle, conformably to those directions of the Legislature, which, I could not, on any less authority, venture to supersede. Copies of my letters to the commissioners, to the captain of the detachment, and to the brigade inspectors of the western counties, for that purpose, are now enclosed.

It may not, at the same time, be improper, sir, to remark, in vindication of the measure projected by the Legislature, that the territory, within which the town is directed to be laid out, has not only been purchased from the United States by Pennsylvania, but has likewise been ceded to her, for a valuable consideration, by the Six Nations. It could not, therefore, be in the contemplation of her government, that any hostile opposition would be made to her settling upon a property thus fairly acquired, or, that the advancement of her peculiar interests in that respect, would be deemed incompatible with the general interests of the Union. In regard to my agency upon the occasion, permit me also to trouble you with a short recapitulation. On the 8th of April, 1793, the act for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle, was passed, in which I was empowered to obtain a survey of the reserved tract in that quarter, and directed to cause a certain number of acres to be surveyed and laid out in town lots and out lots. It was obviously the intention of the Legislature, that this trust should be speedily executed, as the bounty offered to settlers, was limited to those who should actually inhabit and reside in the town, before the 1st of January, 1794. But the dangerous state of the frontiers, at that time, induced the commissioners, appointed for making the survey, to protract their departure till the meeting of the Legislature, in December last, when I represented the necessity of providing adequate means for the protection and safety of those gentlemen, if the accomplishment of the plan confided to them was deemed of immediate importance. Accordingly, during the same session, two laws were passed; by one of which, I was authorized to make a detachment for that particular service, from the four defensible companies raised by Pennsylvania, and the other, the period for allowing bounties to settlers, was extended to the 1st day of May, 1795. The language and spirit of these Legislative provisions left me no alternative, but as to a choice of means for carrying them into effect; and lest, even in that respect, any interference with the Federal arrangements should occur, I have punctually communicated to you, information of every step that was taken, as you will perceive by a reference to my several letters of the 28th of March, the 9th, 23d, and 24th of May, 1794.

Under these circumstances, sir, I trust it will appear, that I could not, with justice to my official station, act upon the bare intimation given on the 10th current, by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and, that I sufficiently manifest my confidence in your advice, by pursuing it, when it is expressly stated.

[ENCLOSURES.]

No. 1.

Governor Mifflin to the Commissioners for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle, dated

PHILADELPHIA, May —, 1794.

GENTLEMEN:

The enclosed copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, which was transmitted to me, subsequently to the departure of the post on the 24th current, will show you, that it is the particular request of the President of the United States, that the survey and establishment of the town at Presqu' Isle should, for the present, be suspended. Though I have reason to lament that this interposition was not made at an earlier period, a sincere desire to promote the views of the General Government, and to avoid the imputation of extending the sphere of Indian hostilities, commands, on my part, a prompt and willing acquiescence. You will therefore be pleased to suspend all proceedings for executing the law directing a town to be laid out at Presqu' Isle, until further orders, and, in the mean time, I shall direct Captain Denny's detachment to remain at Le Bœuf.

No. 2.

From the Governor to Captain Denny, dated Philadelphia.

SIR:

The enclosed copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, which was transmitted to me, subsequently to the departure of the post, on the 24th current, will show you, that it is the particular request of the President of the United States, that the survey and establishment of the town at Presqu' Isle should, for the present, be suspended. Though I have reason to lament that this interposition did not take place at an earlier period, a sincere desire to promote the views of the General Government, and to avoid the imputation of extending the sphere of Indian hostilities, commands, on my part, a prompt and willing acquiescence. I have, consequently, instructed the commissioners to suspend all proceedings for executing the law directing a town to be laid out at Presqu' Isle; and, as the only object of your detachment, was to protect them in discharging that trust, your further progress has of course become unnecessary. You will, therefore, remain at Le Bœuf, until further orders, taking every lawful precaution for the safety of your detachment, and the general protection of the neighboring frontier.

No. 3.

From the Governor to the Brigade Inspectors of the Western counties, dated

PHILADELPHIA, 24th May, 1794.

SIR:

At the particular instance and request of the President of the United States, (communicated to me subsequently to the departure of the post, with my letter of the 23d current) I have been induced to suspend, for the present, the execution of the act of the General Assembly for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle. You will therefore consider my orders for draughting from your brigade — men, being your quota of one thousand militia, intended to support the detachment under Captain Denny's command, as rescinded by this letter.

I do not mean, however, to withdraw, or to impair the general authority, which I have heretofore given, for embodying, in cases of emergency, a force of the militia, competent to repel any threatened or actual invasion, and hostility: for the existing circumstances of the Indian war seem, on the contrary, to require the utmost vigilance and spirit, in providing for the safety and defence of our frontiers.

From Governor Mifflin to the President of the United States, dated

PHILADELPHIA, 24th May, 1794.

SIR:

The information contained in the letter from General Wilkins, which I communicated to you yesterday, and the general aspect of our affairs on the frontiers, enforcing the necessity of an immediate exertion, to support the detachment which the Legislature of Pennsylvania directed to be formed, for the purpose of protecting the commissioners, who were authorized to lay out a town at Presqu' Isle, I have issued orders for draughting one thousand militia from the Western brigades, for that particular service. I have the honor to enclose a copy of my orders.

[CIRCULAR.]

From the Governor to the Brigade Inspectors of Westmoreland, Washington, Alleghany, and Fayette counties, dated

PHILADELPHIA, 23d May, 1794.

SIR:

The information that I have received, relatively to the hostile disposition of the Indians, as well as of the British, upon our Northern frontier, convinces me of the necessity of immediately taking effectual measures, to ensure the execution of the law, which directs a town to be laid out at Presqu' Isle. Notwithstanding, therefore, the general discretionary authority which I have formerly given, I have determined to direct a draught of one thousand militia, officers included, from the brigades of Westmoreland, Washington, Alleghany, and Fayette, expressly to co-operate under the command of General Wilkins, with Captain Denny's detachment. The quota of the _____ brigade, amounts to _____, which you will muster with all possible despatch, and march them to such place of rendezvous as General Wilkins and the Brigade Inspectors of the other counties, above mentioned, shall agree upon. In this and every other arrangement, however, relatively to the Presqu' Isle object, I wish particular attention to be paid to the opinion and advice of General Irvine, who will, I hope, be at Pittsburg before the receipt of this letter. Should the establishment of block-houses, on the route to Presqu' Isle, be deemed indispensable to the safety of the detachment, and the execution of the law, a judicious and an economical plan, of that kind, will also meet my approbation.

I rely essentially upon your zeal and prudence, in the execution of these orders, which, owing to my distance from the scene of action, and the nature of the service, must be in a great measure discretionary; but I am persuaded you will proceed with such circumspection as to preclude every idea of reproach, either with respect to your own conduct, or the confidence I have reposed in you. I shall therefore only add a wish to hear from you, by every regular opportunity, and if any extraordinary event occurs, you will communicate it by express.

From Governor Mifflin to the Secretary of War.

PHILADELPHIA, June, 1794.

SIR:

For the information of the President, I have enclosed a copy of a letter from Brigadier General Wilkins, dated the 23d of May, in which he represents some circumstances relatively to the disposition of the British and Indians, on our Northern frontier.

I am, &c.

From Brigadier General Wilkins to General Mifflin, enclosed in the foregoing.

PITTSBURG, 23d May, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

I this moment received yours of the 17th instant. I arrived about fifteen minutes ago from Le Boeuf. I have left the small detachment there well covered, and in good spirits. They have built, under my directions, two small block-houses, picketed, which, I think, will render them sufficiently strong, until the reinforcement goes under Captain Denny. The Indians I have conversed with, still continue of opinion, that the British will make an opposition to the establishment at Presqu' Isle. There arrived at Cassawago, while I was there, an Indian from Sandusky, where he had been left by the Senecas last fall, sick. He says, McKee, the Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, and Elliot, the Indian agent, both refugees from this country, were visiting all the Indian towns in that quarter, and exciting them then to continue their opposition to the Americans, and assuring them of support from their father, the British monarch. He further adds, that they were prepared for fighting General Wayne, the moment he moved, and that the British were erecting garrisons at the Miami river. He confirms the accounts of the other Indians, that they were determined to oppose the establishment at Presqu' Isle. I cannot say more, as the post is just going.

I take the liberty to request, likewise, that those parts of this correspondence, which are of a private nature, may be considered as a confidential communication.

From Governor Mifflin to the President of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 14th June, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge your answer, communicated in a letter from the Secretary of War, (dated this day) to my letter of the 13th instant, stating that the reasons, which induced your opinion relatively to the suspension of the Presqu' Isle establishment, continue to operate, and have not been weakened by any information since received.

The nature of the trust reposed in me, by the act of the General Assembly, the dissatisfaction which the suspension of the proceedings of the commissioners has excited, and the ambiguity of some of the expressions contained in the Secretary's letter, seem to demand an early explanation of the principles that have regulated my conduct upon this occasion.

As it is the peculiar province of the Legislature to judge of the policy of the laws, it would be thought, perhaps, an act of supererogation on my part, were I to attempt to enumerate the various motives, which suggested, and justify, the act for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle; but I may be indulged in observing, generally, that the maintenance of a system (for the sale and settlement of the public lands, by which a sufficient revenue had been produced to exonerate the State from the pressure of her debts) and the obligation of the Government to strengthen the means of protecting our distant frontiers, might fairly be considered by the representatives of Pennsylvania, as very cogent inducements to the measure which they contemplated. With a right acquired by honest purchase, either to advance, or to decline, the establishment of a town at Presqu' Isle, the expediency of exercising that right must have formed the principal subject of consideration; and, when we reflect, that the consequences of a rupture with the Six Nations, would, in a peculiar manner, be injurious to the citizens of this State, we must presume, that the Legislature either thought that the improvement of our territory in that quarter could not be obnoxious to the Indians, or, that the projected establishment would afford the most effectual defence against that hostile disposition, which even the Northern tribes had previously manifested, for reasons certainly unconnected with our plan of settlement. Nor could a collision of the State and Federal institutions have been anticipated, as naturally flowing from the measure, since it was rather to be expected by the Legislature, that, independently of the constitutional obligation of the Union, to protect all its members in the enjoyment of their respective territorial rights, the General Government was, in this instance, peculiarly bound to maintain the title and occupancy of the State, as vendor, for a valuable consideration, of the property in question.

But, whatever may be the policy of the Legislature, however erroneous in its principle, or pernicious in its consequence, the province of an executive magistrate is certainly circumscribed to inquire what the law is, not what it ought to be; to perform the task prescribed, not to arraign the wisdom that prescribed it. Hence, sir, you will perceive, from the documents (which have been regularly communicated to you) that the prosecution of the preparatory steps for forming a settlement at Presqu' Isle, was imposed upon me as a duty; and, consequently, that the most cogent reasons will be necessary, on my part, to justify a neglect or suspension of the work. By the act of the 18th April, 1793, it is declared, in mandatory terms, that, in the most eligible spot within the reserved tract on lake Erie, "the Governor shall cause to be laid out and surveyed, one thousand six hundred acres of land, in town lots, not more than one third of an acre each; and also, three thousand four hundred acres adjoining the same, in out lots, not less than five acres, nor more than ten acres." And, that every obstacle arising from an apprehension of hostile opposition might be removed, an act of the 28th February, 1794, after providing for the security of the port of Philadelphia, and the defence of our Western frontiers, authorizes "the Governor to detach from the several companies of artillery and infantry, raised by the State, as many men as can be conveniently spared from the specific objects of protection and defence, for which the companies were particularly destined; and to station the detachment, so made, at such place, or places, at, or near, Presqu' Isle, on Lake Erie, as shall, in his judgment, be best calculated to carry into effect, the act, entitled "An act for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle, to protect the infant settlements beyond the river Alleghany, and to promote the general defence of the frontiers." By the language of these acts, it is obvious, (as I have remarked on a former occasion) that nothing was expressly left to my discretion but the mode of carrying them into effect; and conclusively to demonstrate the legislative expectation of a speedy execution of that trust, it can only be necessary to consider, that, by the first regulation, the time for allowing a bounty to persons who "shall actually inhabit and reside within the town," was limited to the first of January, 1794; that, by the second regulation, it is only protracted to the first of May, 1795; and that, by the third regulation, the very existence of the companies, from which the detachment is formed, to carry into effect the act for laying out the town, is limited, in its utmost extent, to the meeting of the General Assembly in the ensuing month of December.

Acting under these peremptory injunctions, to perform a specific duty, I have not, sir, been regardless, either of the respect that is due to the General Government, or of the precautions, which a movement of so deliberate a nature required. The laws, and my instructions founded on those laws, for forming the detachment and laying out the town, were communicated to you during the session of the General Assembly; and, although any attempt to interrupt the proceedings of the commissioners, must have been accompanied with a deliberate and hostile invasion of the territory of Pennsylvania, for it never has been intimated that the station at Presqu' Isle is actually pre-occupied by any other power, whether British or Indian; I admonished the officers and commissioners to observe a friendly and conciliatory conduct towards every description of persons whom they should meet; and, even in the event of an attack or menace, from any quarter, to confine their resistance strictly to defensive operations within the acknowledged boundaries of the State.

The machinating efforts of the agents of a foreign nation, in the neighborhood of the United States, and not the inimical disposition of the Indians, produced in my mind the apprehension of a design to oppose the settlement at Presqu' Isle, soon after the detachment for effecting this object was formed at Pittsburg; and the intelligence which was brought by successive posts, and punctually communicated to you, sir, rendered it, at last, expedient, in my judgment, to resort to the general authority of the militia law, for calling into actual service a competent force to repel the threatened invasion; to support the party destined for Presqu' Isle; and, generally, to prevent a failure of the measures which the Legislature had directed to be pursued, and which, without father authority, I did not conceive it would be warrantable to abandon. On your receipt of a copy of my orders for making this draught, it was, for the first time, directly stated to me, that you deemed it advisable to suspend, for the present, the establishment at Presqu' Isle; and "it will, indeed, be happy, that the circumstances which have already occurred should not be found to have matured the evil beyond the possibility of a remedy." I derive some consolation in recollecting, that you were possessed of the law while the Legislature (whose power was alone competent to repeal it) was in session; that you were seasonably apprised of every step that was taken to carry it into effect; and that, if, from information unknown to me, an earlier discontinuance of the Executive proceedings was deemed salutary, my conduct will evince the readiness with which I should have acquiesced in an earlier declaration of that opinion.

But I confess, sir, that, on this ground, I perceive very little cause for disquietude or reproach. If the Legislature has prescribed a task to the Executive magistrate, which cannot be performed without endangering the public tranquillity, the Legislature, and not the Executive magistrate, must be responsible for the consequences. But there is, indeed, another reflection, which weighs heavily on my mind at the present moment, and which claims, perhaps, an interest in your consideration of the subject. Can the requisition or advice of the Executive authority of the United States justify the act which suspends the operation of a positive law of Pennsylvania? The constitutional supremacy of the laws of the Union will not be disputed: but may it not be asked, what law of the Union does, nay, what power is there to pass a law which could control the Commonwealth in the legitimate exercise of her territorial jurisdiction? Where there is no law, there can be no obligation; nor, consistently with the principles of a republican government, can reasons of State, or the admonition of circumstances, (upon which the Secretary of War relies) furnish an Executive Magistrate with an authority to substitute his opinions for legislative institutions. While, then, I was impressed with these sentiments, the prompt compliance which followed the communication of your wishes for the suspension of the Presqu' Isle establishment, must, at least, be regarded as an incontrovertible evidence of an official disposition to promote the views of the General Government; of an ardent desire to cultivate every possible means of peace; and of a personal confidence in your judgment and patriotism. But, however consolatory such considerations may be to my private feelings, as my public trust may require other instruments of vindication, I receive with peculiar satisfaction "an assurance, that nothing will be omitted to obviate the temporary obstacles which exist."

The bare suspension of our measures, will, probably, indeed, increase the difficulty of accomplishing them; and any great delay might eventually introduce a controversy upon the right of doing so. The evil would become irremediable by any peaceable process, if, taking advantage of the circumstances which have already occurred, either the Six Nations, or any other ill-disposed neighbor, should seize on the station which has been designated for our establishment.

For these contingencies, however, and for the expense which the State has already incurred, I have no doubt the justice of the General Government will satisfactorily provide. It only remains, therefore, sir, to repeat, that (notwithstanding the remark made by the Secretary of War in his letter of the 24th ultimo) I am not sensible of having failed in duly appreciating every consideration of delicacy and moment, connected with the subject; and that, whatever may be the result, the establishment at Presqu' Isle will be suspended until you shall vary the opinion which you have delivered.

I am, &c.

No. 1.

From General Gibson to Governor Mifflin.

PITTSBURG, June 11, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

Enclosed are two depositions, taken by me, by which you will be informed of what has happened since my last to you, per post; also of the disposition of the Indians: From every account, I have reason to believe the Six Nations mean to be hostile.

The detachment under Captain Denny, with whom went Mr. Ellicot and General Wilkins, marched from this place on Saturday last, and, on Sunday evening, I received from them the enclosed letters. I immediately transmitted to them a copy of Vert's deposition, and gave it as my opinion that they ought to remain where they were, until Ransom and the Broken Twig came here, as we then might be better able to judge what was best to be done; since which I have not heard from them. I have wrote to the different inspectors of my division, pressing them to have the men ready, agreeable to the requisition of the Adjutant General, and you may rely on my using every means in my power for the protection of the Western frontiers. The bearer, Mr. Sloops, intended setting out on Monday, but I detained him until Ransom came in: he has promised to go express with those letters. I hope you will please to allow him for his trouble.

I shall esteem myself happy on hearing from you, and am, &c.

No. 2.

Deposition of D. Ransom.

ALLEGHANY COUNTY, &c.

Personally appeared before me John Gibson, one of the associate judges of the above county, Daniel Ransom, who, being duly sworn, depose and saith, that he, this deponent, has, for sometime past, traded at Fort Franklin with the Senecas and other Indians, and that a chief of the Senecas, named Tiawancas, or the Broken Twig, came there and informed him the times would soon be bad, and advised him to move off his family and effects. On this he, this deponent, asked him how he knew the times would soon be bad. The Indian then informed him that the British and Indians had sent a belt of wampum to him, inviting him to council at Buffalo creek; that he had declined going, and that the messengers then informed him of the intended plans of the Indians: they said that the Cornplanter had been bought by the British, and had joined them; that he, the Cornplanter, intended soon to come to fort Franklin, on pretence of holding a council respecting the Indian who was killed by Robertson; that there the British and Indians were to land at Presqu' Isle, and then form a junction with Cornplanter on French Creek, and were then to clear it by killing all the people, and taking all the posts on it; that he was so much affected as to shed tears, and said, what shall I do? I have been at war against the Western Indians, in company with Captain Jeffers, and killed and scalped one of them. If I now go back to the Indians, after having discovered this, they will kill me. He also informed this deponent, that a number of cannon had been purchased by the British, and collected at Junisadagoe, the town where Cornplanter lives, for the purpose of conveying the Indians down the river.

He, this deponent, further saith, and the Standing Stone, a chief of the Onondagoes, also informed him, at fort Franklin, that he thought the times would soon be bad, and pressed him very much to leave fort Franklin, and assisted him in packing up his goods, &c.; that, from what he heard, and seen, from other Indians, he has every reason to believe the above account to be true.

That seven white men came down the Alleghany, a few days ago, to fort Franklin, who informed him they saw the abovementioned cannons at Junisadagoe, and that the Indians appeared very surly, and had not planted any corn on the river, at their towns.

Sworn and subscribed at Pittsburg, this 11th June, 1794.

Deposition of Henry Verts.

ALLEGHANY COUNTY, ss.

Personally appeared before me, John Gibson, one of the associate judges for the above county, Henry Verts, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith: That he, this deponent, left fort Franklin, at the mouth of French creek, on Thursday, the fifth instant, in company with three other men, at three o'clock, P. M.; that they came along the road leading to this place, about ten miles, and encamped; that, in the night, one of the cattle, which had been sent off the day before, by a certain Ransom, in order to be driven to this place, passed them in the night; that the next morning, they started by break of day, and came along the road, about four miles, when they met the remainder of the cattle, turning back to fort Franklin; that, on their proceeding about a mile further, he, this deponent, heard a noise like a man groaning, and immediately discovered a man lying on the ground, dead, or dying, as he appeared bloody about the shoulders and body; that the party being very much alarmed, they left one of their horses, and luggage, and immediately took into the woods, came to the mouth of Pine creek, on the Alleghany river, and from thence to this place. He further saith, that the commanding officer and inhabitants, at fort Franklin, told them they were expecting an attack from the Indians, daily, and were much alarmed.

Sworn and subscribed, this 9th of June, 1794.

No. 4.

From A. Ellicot and E. Denny to General Gibson.

CAMP, three miles from Pitt, June 8, 1794.

SIR:

From the information received last evening, by two men from fort Franklin, we have some reason to apprehend, that the Six Nations have determined upon joining our enemies. The account is, that D. Ransom was told, by the Standing Stone, that it was, or would be the case; and it seems Ransom must believe it, from his breaking up his store at French creek, and bringing off all his effects, cattle, and every part of his property; and it appears, that Tiavancas, an old friendly Indian, has also taken the alarm (from some cause, no doubt) and is on his way down, with all his family. The bearer is sent back to bring forward to us the facts upon which these apprehensions are founded. We wish you, sir, to take Ransom's deposition, and to get every thing possible from the Indian. You will be able to judge whether we ought to proceed, or not, until reinforced by volunteers, or by a draught of militia. If it is true, that the Six Nations are at war, it would be no difficult matter for them to send a party to meet us. The bearer will wait your orders, and remain until Ransom gets down, which will be to day, we suppose. We intend halting at Ewault's Cabins until he joins us, and will be governed by your opinion.

We are, &amp;c.

EWAULT'S CABINS, 2 o'clock, June 8, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

Since we have been on this ground, Mr. Woods, one of the spies, came to us, and informed us, that four men had made their way good to the mouth of Pine creek, where Woods left this morning. That the said four men were just from fort Franklin; that they came ten miles only, upon the common road, and there met with Ransom's cattle, turned back; that the people who were drawing them down to Pitt, were killed by the Senecas; however, you will have an opportunity of getting more particular information, and we trust you will take such measures as will be best.

From Presly Neville to Governor Mifflin.

PITTSBURG, June 10, 1794.

SIR:

On Friday last, General Wilkins, Mr. Ellicot, and some volunteers, with Captain Denny, and his detachment, left this place for Le Bœuf, since which, alarming accounts have arrived from Venango, by one Ransom, a trader, and an Indian, called Broken Twig, of the Senecas. The statement of the former, on oath, is forwarded to you by General Gibson. The substance of the whole is, that the Six Nations, at the instance of the British, had joined the other Indians against us, and that a large body assisted by them (the British) some in crossing the lake, and others in descending the Alleghany, were to take fort Franklin, destroy the settlements at Cassawago, and make an establishment at Presqu' Isle. What credit is to be given to these reports, I will not pretend to say; but this trader, well acquainted with Indian affairs, believes them. He moved his family and goods to this place by water, and sent his cattle with three white men, who were killed near fort Franklin. For my own part, I have no doubt of the hostile disposition of the Senecas, and that they actually committed the late murder on the Alleghany river.

I think we shall have interesting news shortly from Venango, which I shall communicate without delay.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

From Governor Mifflin to the President of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, June 20, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit, for your information, copies of two letters, both dated the 15th instant, and received by yesterday's post, from Pittsburg; one from General Gibson (enclosing a letter from Lieutenant Polhemus) and the other from Mr. Neville.

I am, &amp;c.

From General Gibson to Governor Mifflin.

PITTSBURG, June 13, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

Since my last, per Mr. Sloops, I received the enclosed from Lieutenant Polhemus, commanding at Venango. The messenger who brought it says, that the Senecas disavow the relation of the Broken Twig, as mentioned in my last, and threaten to kill him. Captain Denny, and his party, have proceeded on to Venango. I have wrote him, that on his arrival there, in case he found the reports to be well founded, to inform me, and I would endeavor to support him.

I have also wrote to the different brigadiers and brigade inspectors to have their quotas ready, and shall think myself justifiable in ordering them out, should these accounts prove to be true.

Captain Powers, in a letter from Cassago to General Wilkins, writes, that on the people who live there, hearing of the murder of the two men, as mentioned in the letter of Lieutenant Polhemus, they were going away, and that he would, if possible, try and move the artillery to fort Franklin.

I have ordered one hundred and fifty of the militia of Westmoreland to range on the frontiers of that county, in order to protect the inhabitants. Should the present alarm subside, they shall immediately be discharged.

I have appointed James Bryson, Esquire, one of my aids. You will please to order a commission to be sent for him.
I have the honor to be, &c.

From Lieutenant Polhemus to General Gibson.

FORT FRANKLIN, 9th June, 1794.

SIR:

From my letter, which I expect you have received from Mr. Wolf, who left this place the 2d instant, you may have reason to suppose, I consider those under my command exposed to the intentions of the hostile Indians; since which time, on the 5th day of this month, three men, named Wallace, Power, and Richard Van Sickler, on their way to Pittsburg, were overpowered by Indians. The two former were killed; the latter returned, who gave me this information. The day following, I ordered five Seneca Indians, and five white men, not belonging to the garrison, to go in search of the deceased. They found Wallace and Power, shot, scalped, and tomahawked.*

You will please to judge, whether the application which I have already made, be rational; I will endeavor not to be deficient in doing that which may be most for the benefit of my country.
I am, &c.

From Presley Neville to Governor Mifflin.

PITTSBURG, June 13th, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

Since I had the honor of addressing you last, we learn that one man of the party, said to be all killed near fort Franklin, had escaped. We have, also, reason to believe, that the Indians who did the mischief were from the West, and not of the Six Nations; nay, by the accounts from the officer commanding fort Franklin, so far from being hostile, a party of Senecas, joined to a detachment of that garrison, went in pursuit of the perpetrators of that last murder. The fluctuation and inconsistency of our news is such, that it is difficult to form a proper opinion; Captain Denny has continued his march, and, I suppose, is now at Venango. I shall continue the company of militia, about thirty-five in number, on the frontier of this county.

We have only twelve of Denny's men; should you think proper to order a completion of the Presqu' Isle business, and a draught be necessary for that purpose, I flatter myself this county will be excused, on account of having spared her whole protection already to that object; for the twelve men left as above mentioned, are the refuse of the earth, some of them cannot walk.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor Mifflin to the Secretary of War.

PHILADELPHIA, 24th June, 1794.

SIR:

The cultivation of a good understanding between the officers of the Federal and State Governments, has been among the favorite objects of the administration, which my fellow-citizens have entrusted to my care, and I am persuaded that the President of the United States will not perceive any thing, in the recent explanation, which I have given of my conduct, relatively to the Presqu' Isle establishment, that would warrant a deviation from that cordial and harmonizing spirit, by which he has been reciprocally actuated.

That the Northern Indians, previously to the passing of the act, by which I was enabled to carry into effect the law for laying out the town at Presqu' Isle, had manifested a hostile disposition, for reasons unconnected with our plan of settlement, is a fact of such notoriety, that I did not think the evidence of official documents would be necessary to establish it. But it may be proper, in answering your letter of the 21st instant, to refer you to the reply which the Six Nations made to a speech, delivered by General Chapin, on the 10th of February last, a copy of which you transmitted to me on the 24th day of May. By this document, furnished from the records of your office, independently of all other evidence, it will, I think, appear, that some old grievances, alleged to have been suffered from the Union, the inflammatory speech of Lord Dorchester, the constant machinations of British agents, and the corruption of British bribes, had, in truth, previously excited that hostile disposition, which you seem to consider as the effect of the measures pursued by Pennsylvania, for establishing a town at Presqu' Isle.

I am not inclined, sir, to enter into a discussion of the extent or operation of those principles of society, or of that practice of political communities "which," you observe, "will frequently concur in postponing the enjoyment of a particular right, or interest, of a part of a nation, to considerations respecting the safety or welfare of the whole nation;" but it is obvious, that a doctrine of this nature must depend essentially upon the terms of the social or political compact to which it is applied, and that, of all the modifications of which it is susceptible, the least adapted to our system of Government, (a Federal Republic) would, perhaps, be the acknowledgment of a discretionary power in the Executive magistrate of a particular State, to suspend, under any circumstances, the execution of a law, enacted by the only competent authority, and directed by legitimate means, to a legitimate end. The question on the propriety of consulting the welfare and interest of the whole nation, at the expense of a part of it, might, indeed, be justly proposed to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and would, I am persuaded, receive, from that department of our Government, a liberal consideration; but you will recollect, sir, that my difficulty occurred, because the question was proposed to the Executive magistrate, who, if he had not originally the authority to interpose, could not, I was apprehensive, acquire it, merely from the consideration of "the weight of the reasons" which might be suggested on the subject.

It may be proper here to remark, that my determination to continue the suspension of the Presqu' Isle establishment, till the President shall vary the opinion which he has delivered, is founded principally on the assurances I have received, that the obstacles are of a temporary nature; and, consequently, that the success of the attempts, which you inform me are put in train to remove them, may be so seasonably attained, as to admit, not only of an accommodation of the views of the General Government, but also, of the execution of the law of Pennsylvania, within the period contemplated by the Legislature. For, although no arguments can be necessary to convince me of the patriotic attention of the President to the interests of the Union, it would be contrary to the ideas which I entertain of his justice, candor, and wisdom, to suppose, that, in order to facilitate the duties of his station, he would advise me to pursue a measure, inconsistent with the duties of mine, or that he would deliver an opinion to the Executive of any State, which it might be thought indelicate to disregard, and illegal to adopt.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

* You will please to have the above inserted in the Pittsburg Gazette.

PHILADELPHIA, 30th June, 1794.

SIR:

On the receipt of your letter of the 24th, covering an extract from General Chapin's letter, dated the 12th current, in which that gentleman states, "That the Indians do not acknowledge the validity of the Cornplanter's sale to Pennsylvania," referring, I presume, to the triangular tract on lake Erie, I have thought it proper to prepare and communicate the enclosed copies of the deeds of cession, for the information of the President.

I take this opportunity likewise to transmit a copy of a letter, dated the 20th inst. and the accompanying documents, which I received from General Gibson by the last post.

I am, &amp;c.

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

Copy of the articles between the Chiefs, &c. of the Six Nations of Indians and the Commissioners of Pennsylvania.

BE IT REMEMBERED, BY ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

That, on the ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord 1789, in open and public council, we, the undersigned chiefs, warriors, and others, representing the following named tribes of the Six Nations, to wit: the Ondawagas, or Senecas, Cayugas, Tuscaroras, Onondagas, and Oneidas, for, and in behalf of ourselves, our tribes, our and their heirs and successors, on the one part, and Richard Butler and John Gibson, Esqrs. commissioners for, and on behalf of the State of Pennsylvania, (Onas) on the other part, did make, and conclude upon the following articles, viz:

ARTICLE 1. That, as soon as these articles are signed, interchangeably, by the aforesaid chiefs and commissioners, the said chiefs will execute a deed of conveyance to the State of Pennsylvania, for a tract of country, as shall hereafter be described.

ARTICLE 2. The signing chiefs do acknowledge the right of the soil, and jurisdiction to, in, and over, that tract of country, bounded on the south, by the north line of the State of Pennsylvania; on the east, by the west boundary of the State of New York, agreeable to the cession of that State, and the State of Massachusetts, to the United States; and on the north, by the margin of lake Erie, including Presqu' Isle, and all the bays and harbors along the margin of said lake Erie, from the west boundary of Pennsylvania to where the west boundary of the State of New York may cross, or intersect, the south margin of the said lake Erie; to be vested in the said State of Pennsylvania, agreeable to an act of Congress, dated the 6th day of June last, 1788.

ARTICLE 3. The said chiefs do agree that the said State of Pennsylvania shall, and may, at any time they may think proper, survey, dispose of, and settle, all that part of the aforesaid country, lying, and being west of a line running along the middle of the Conowago river, from its confluence with the Alleghany river into the Chadochque lake, thence along the middle of said lake, to the north end of the same, thence a meridian line from the north end of the said lake, to the margin, or shore, of lake Erie.

ARTICLE 4. The said chiefs do agree, that the navigation, or water communication, of the said Conowago river, and the Chadochque lake, shall be free to the citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, in common with themselves; but that neither party shall build, or erect dams, over or across the Conowago river, so as to obstruct the passage of boats or canoes, up and down the same to the Alleghany river.

ARTICLE 5. That, as several villages, belonging to the signing chiefs and their people, are now living on the said Conowago creek, and in other parts of the country, supposed to be within the tract of country west of the west line of the State of New York, and east of the line through the waters, as described in the third article: and as they have no country to remove to, from where they now live, the said chiefs do reserve for their own and their people's residence, hunting and fishing, all that part of the tract of country described in the second article, passing from the Alleghany river, along the middle of the Conowago creek, the Chadochque lake, and a meridian line from the north end of said lake to lake Erie.

ARTICLE 6. The said chiefs do engage for, and in behalf of themselves and their tribes, to give protection to the citizens of the said State of Pennsylvania, and others who may come to trade or transact business, under proper authority, among them, and to live peaceably with all the citizens of the United States.

ARTICLE 7. The said Richard Butler and John Gibson, Esqrs. commissioners, for, and in behalf of the State of Pennsylvania, do agree to the aforesaid articles, in their true intent and meaning; and they do further engage, on the faith of the State of Pennsylvania, that the aforesaid chiefs, and the people of their tribes, shall have full and peaceable liberty to hunt and fish within any part of the country first above described, they demeaning themselves peaceably towards the inhabitants. But the said chiefs, or their successors, shall not, at any time hereafter, directly, or indirectly, lease, rent, or make sale of, any part, or parcel, of the tract here reserved, for their use and residence, to any other State, person, or persons.

In testimony of the above articles being duly, openly, and fairly agreed and concluded upon, the chiefs and commissioners aforesaid, have interchangeably set their hands, and affixed their seals, the day and year first above written.

Copy of a letter from General Gibson to Governor Mifflin.

PITTSBURG, June 20, 1794.

Sir:

I had the honor of receiving yours per this day's post: in my last, I informed you that I had ordered one hundred and fifty militia, for the protection of the frontiers of Westmoreland, and have wrote to the different brigade inspectors to have their quotas complete.

The enclosed letters have since come to hand, and from their contents, and the information received by a man, who left Cornplanter's town about twelve days ago, we have every reason to conclude that the Six Nations will be obliged to join the Western Indians. This man declares, that an attempt had been made to take his life, by an Indian, but that the Cornplanter prevented it, by telling the Indian the time was not yet come for them to strike: that the Indians, at the towns, appeared very surly and ill-natured, and that a person of the name of Jennings, who lives at the Cornplanter's town, informed him, that he thought the Cornplanter must join the Western Indians.

I am in great hopes Captain Denny, with his detachment, will get safe to Le Bœuf, and will be able to make a stand, until he can be supported. I shall use every means for the protection of the frontiers, and shall afford Captain Denny every assistance in my power, if necessary.

It is more than probable, that, in a few days, the result of the council at Buffalo creek will be known; if favorable, the Indians will send in messengers to palliate their conduct; if the reverse, they will strike on our frontiers. I shall, at any rate, give you the earliest information.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

Extract of a letter from Captain Denny, dated fort Franklin, June 14th, 1794.

Sir:

I have the honor of acknowledging your two letters, dated the 9th and 11th instant: after receiving the first, we concluded it would be best to proceed upon our march. We arrived here the day before yesterday, all well. The account of Ransom's people being killed was too true, but by what nation of Indians, is yet doubtful. Mr. Ellicot and Mr. Wilkins have written, and sent two runners for the Cornplanter, and they have requested me to wait the return of the express: when they arrive you shall be informed of the success of the message. I am suspicious the old fellow will not show himself. The fact is, that the Indians, about here, from twenty downwards, for some time past, have been exceedingly insolent, treated the officer, the fort, and every person about it, with the utmost contempt; but, since our arrival, they have altered their tune, so say Lieutenant Polhemus and Doctor McCray. We have written to Le Bœuff, and gave the officer there a caution: the day after to-morrow the runner is to be back. Van Horn and Bales, the two men who brought your last letter, saw one Indian at the plain, about twenty miles this side of Pittsburg, and the trace of six or seven.

June 16th. Yours, enclosing a copy of Polhemus', came yesterday. The Cornplanter's nephew arrived from the towns about the same time. He delivered a long speech from his uncle to Lieutenant Polhemus. Upon summing up the whole, we have not a shadow of doubt, but that a plan was formed to destroy all the posts and settlements in this quarter. It was all done upon the strength or prospect of a war between the British and ———; that subsiding, the other, I am in hopes, has also. There is no doubt but the English will urge them to join the Western Indians, and have done every thing possible, and perhaps a few may; but I rather think that, unless we have a war with them, we'll have none with the Six Nations generally.

The Cornplanter has gone to another council at Buffalo; he set out the same time the nephew started for this place, and will return in about ten days. He says he is very sorry for the mischief done lately, and is extremely concerned at the account given of their going to take up the hatchet; says they are bad men that reported it; that it's a lie, and insists upon knowing who the information came from, as it is evident that a stroke was meditated, but now, perhaps, dropped. Every apology, which he can possibly make, won't be sufficient to clear him of the imputation of a traitor.

Some of the nation say the English have bought O'Beal. We shall spend two days to come, in helping Mr. Polhemus to put his garrison in some state of defence: for, should any thing happen it, we should fare the worse above.

PHILADELPHIA, 15th July, 1794.

Sir:

I have the honor to transmit, for your information, copies of the various documents which I have received, by express, from General Gibson, stating, among other things, the proceedings of a council held at fort Le Bœuf, on the 26th ultimo, between Captain Denny and Mr. Ellicot, and a deputation from the Six Nations, in the presence of General Chapin.

The requisition which has been made on this occasion, for the abandonment of a great portion of the territory of the State, is so extravagant, that we must suppose it to proceed from the instigation of a policy more hostile to the United States than can reasonably be ascribed to the natural arrogance or enmity of the Indians themselves. It is a circumstance, indeed, additionally mortifying, that no attempt was made even to conceal the source from which the insult came. Mr. Johnson, the British agent, attended the council.

It will be obvious to you, sir, that it is not in my power to authorize a compliance with the requisition, or to treat upon the subjects. My duty calls upon me to execute the laws; and, in doing so, it will be incumbent on me to maintain, not only the public claim of jurisdiction, but the private rights and property throughout the State, against invasion and outrage. For that important purpose, I shall exert all the legal authority of my office; and I take this opportunity to request the co-operation of the General Government, as far as its Federal obligations extend. The suspension of the Presqu' Isle establishment has probably increased the difficulty; but, after the information which has been just received, I conceive the essential interests of the State, the safety of its citizens, and the preservation of its property, are involved in the immediate prosecution of our object, and I trust that you will now find reason to concur in that opinion.

I am, with respect, &c.

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

SIR:

The enclosed papers, from Captain Demy, came to hand yesterday, which, with two other letters directed to your Excellency, and one to General Knox, I now send to you, by express, as they contain matter of the utmost importance to the State.

The British have, at length, succeeded in accomplishing their long wished for object, in getting the Six Nations to join the Western Indians against the United States, and I am afraid our frontiers will feel the effects. Your Excellency may rest assured, that nothing shall be wanting on my part to afford them and Captain Denny every assistance in my power. I was under the necessity of promising forty dollars to the express for his service, as none could be got to engage lower; you will please to order him to be paid.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PRESQU' ISLE, Tuesday, 24th June, 1794, at 3 o'clock P. M.

DEAR SIR:

I have just arrived at this place, with a deputation from the Six Nations of Indians, consisting of sixteen chiefs and warriors, with a message we were desired to deliver to some people, whom they supposed were here. I thought it would be consistent to inform you of my arrival, and that I shall be at Le Bœuf to-morrow, at 2 o'clock, with this deputation.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

Copy of a letter from Captain Ebenezer Denny to Major General Gibson.

FORT LE BŒUF, June 27th, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

Enclosed you will receive a copy of a message brought me by a deputation of chiefs and warriors sent for that purpose, from the Six Nations, and also our reply. You will perceive by the message, that the Indians are disposed to have us pushed back; and if we dont leave the country, they are to consider us as no friends. I don't apprehend much danger here, as long as we can keep our men together; but, at present, a number of the people who were on before me, are ill with the flux; and the working parties, which we are necessarily obliged to have at some distance, together with two escorts, one sent to Franklin with pack-horses, the other somewhere between, and Cassewago, with boats, reduces our force very considerably. Doctor Wilkins has made a requisition for ten or twelve men, to be sent to Pitt, to guard a drove of cattle on to this place. From the present appearances, it would be very improper to detach so many men from my command; I am, therefore, here under the necessity of begging a few militia for that purpose; they will be wanted about the first week in the next month. Indeed, at this particular juncture, I don't think a company would be too many to assist us in having the supplies brought forward. The people at Cassewago wished for a guard of my men; I could not spare them yet; the consequences, I am afraid, will be a total evacuation of that settlement. If you should think proper to send on a company, a part posted at Mead's will answer a double purpose; there the contractor has a deposite, and it serves our people as an intermediate post between Franklin and this place, which ought to be by all means supported. You promised you would not neglect us.

I am, with great regard, &c.

EBENEZER DENNY, Captain Pennsylvania State troops.

Copy of a letter from Andrew Ellicot to Governor Mifflin, dated

FORT LE BŒUF, June 29, 1794.

SIR:

In my last letter to you, from Pittsburg, I mentioned that you might expect to hear from me, both from fort Franklin and Le Bœuf; but, from a variety of circumstances, no opportunity occurred of writing from the first. On my arrival there, the place appeared to be in such a defenceless situation, that, with the concurrence of Captain Denny and the officer commanding at the fort, we remained there some time, and employed the troops in rendering it more tenable. It may now be considered as defensible, provided the number of men is increased. The garrison, at present, consists of twenty-five men, one-half of whom are unfit for duty; and, it is my opinion, that double that number would not be more than sufficient, considering the importance of the safety of the settlements on French creek. At fort Franklin, General Wilkins and myself wrote to the Cornplanter to attend there, that we might have an opportunity of explaining to him the nature of our business, and of obviating any difficulties that might arise in our proceedings. However, he did not come, as was expected, having gone some days before to a council of the Six Nations, at Buffalo.

With this letter, you will receive a copy of their message, presented by General Chapin and Mr. Johnson, to Captain Denny and myself, with our reply to the same. I leave to yourself to consider the propriety of a British agent attending a considerable number of Indians, with a superintendent of Indian affairs of the United States, to order the people of Pennsylvania to remove from those lands, which had been ceded to them by treaty, by the King of Great Britain, and since that time regularly purchased from the Six Nations, and punctually paid for. After repairing fort Franklin, we proceeded to this place, and are now beginning to strengthen the works here, so as to render it a safe deposite for military and other stores; and in doing which, agreeably to instructions, economy shall be strictly attended to.

The line described by the Indians, on the map, will take from the State of Pennsylvania the Cassewago settlement, being part of the purchase of 1784, and the whole of the purchase of 1788. But, with respect to this claim, they can be serious only so far as encouraged by the British agents, and the countenance shewn them by the late interference of the United States.

The objection made by Mr. Brandt, to General Chapin, that the establishment at Presqu' Isle would cut off the communication between the Six Nations and the Western hostile Indians, and thereby diminish their joint strength, is the strongest argument that can be urged in favor of that establishment. General Chapin and myself are of opinion that all differences between the State of Pennsylvania and the Six Nations might be accommodated by treaty, which treaty ought not to be held in the neighborhood of any post occupied by the British, the United States, or this State, at present; and that Presqu' Isle is the most eligible place for such a treaty. General Chapin, I presume, has communicated his sentiments to General Knox on this subject.

Standing Stone, a chief residing at Conyat, has informed us, since we arrived at this place, that the late mischief on the Alleghany river and Venango path was done by a party of eight warriors, from Huron river, which falls into Lake Erie, about twenty-six miles above Cuyahoga. One of his brothers saw them on their way to commit those depredations. Those Indians are only to be chastised by the way of the lake; but it is neither the interest of the British, Brandt, nor the other agents, to have them punished; it is the interest of the United States; and yet the United States, by directing a suspension of the business at Presqu' Isle, have taken effectual measures for the security of this nest of murderers, whose cruelties have, for some years past, been severely felt by the citizens of this State.

You must recollect that I always had my doubts respecting the fulfilment of the contract for opening the navigation of French creek, and a road from Le Bœuf to Presqu' Isle, and, agreeably to my expectations, have hitherto not been able to discover any thing done in that business. For the further security of the frontiers of this State, it would be necessary to erect two block houses on the Venango path, between fort Pitt and Venango, and a third between Venango and this place. At present, Meade's settlement appears to me to be the most proper situation.

I am, with great respect, your real friend,

ANDREW ELLICOT.

A true copy: JAMES TRIMBLE, Deputy Secretary.

Extract of a letter from Captain Ebenezer Denny to Governor Mifflin, dated June 29th, 1794.

The route from Franklin to Le Bœuf, by way of Cassewago, is not less than sixty miles. The first part may be made good, but the other will be very difficult. A straight route from Franklin to Le Bœuf won't exceed 45 miles; but it's yet uncertain what kind of road the country will afford.

We would be much the better of a surgeon. Many of the men who were on here are lying bad with the flux. However, we are doing every thing possible to get them on foot. Constant salt provisions, and not the least attention paid to cleanliness, has caused it to spread. Our fresh meat, with the little knowledge we have of medicine, has already had a good effect.

The evening of our arrival here, I received the enclosed letter from Israel Chapin, superintendent for the Six Nations. The next day, by the time mentioned, he and the Indians arrived. They expected to meet us at Presqu' Isle. They came from the mouth of Buffalo there, in a row boat. Next morning we met and received their message, a copy of which, together with our reply, is also enclosed.

William Johnson, who is mentioned in the message, is a British agent; he acted slyly as prompter to the chiefs. They denied having sold their country; told us that the paper (deed) which they signed at Fort Harmar was thought by them then to be nothing but a treaty of peace, and that the goods which was delivered them, they considered as presents. Money, they say, they received none. The line which they had marked upon their map began at O'Beal's town, and in a direct line crossed French creek, just below Mead's, and on the Head of Cuyahoga; from thence to the Muskingum, and down the Ohio, and to its mouth, and up the Mississippi, leaving a small square for a trading house at the mouths of the rivers, and one where Clarkesville now is. The fellows were very inquisitive to know if any surveyors were out, and told us to stop every person going towards the lake. They will expect an answer from our great council.

I would just remark, that, in case of a war, it will be very difficult keeping either horses or cattle about the place, and impossible to get any supplies, being so near their towns, unless we have three times the number of men which we now have, and establish several intermediate posts. I have the honor to enclose a return of the troops, and am, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

E. DENNY, Captain.

A true extract: JAMES TRIMBLE, Deputy Secretary.

Copy of the proceedings of a council held with the Six Nations at fort Le Bœuf, 26th June, 1794.

At a council holden at fort Le Bœuf, June 26th, 1794, by Mr. Ellicot and Captain Denny, with General Chapin and a deputation from the Six Nations. General Chapin opened the business by reading the proceedings of the council at Buffalo, which were as follows:

At a council holden at Buffalo creek, by the Six Nations of Indians, June 18, 1794, General Chapin was addressed as follows: Captain O'Beal, Speaker.

BROTHER: When we sent for you it was because we placed great dependence upon you. We expected that you would not fail in doing every thing in your power to assist us.

BROTHER: We now hope that you will exert yourself in removing those people off our lands. We know very well what they have come on for, and we want them pushed back.

BROTHER: We now wish that you and Mr. Johnson would go together and remove those people back over the line which we have marked out upon the map.

BROTHER: If these people remove off immediately, we shall consider them as our friends; if not, we shall consider them as no friends.

BROTHER: We wish that you and Mr. Johnson would go together upon this business, and we shall send ten warriors to attend you; and we shall expect that you will bring us word when you return.

This speech was delivered with six strings of black and white wampum.

After the above speech had been read, Mr. Ellicot and Captain Denny desired an interval of one hour to prepare an answer; at the expiration of which, Mr. Ellicot delivered the following reply to the message sent by General Chapin and William Johnson:

BROTHERS OF THE SIX NATIONS:

Your brethren of Pennsylvania have always been attentive to the interest of the Indians, especially to that of the Six Nations, and happy to meet with them in peace and unity.

BROTHERS: We have heard your message by General Chapin, and have considered the request.

BROTHERS: By the peace of 1763, the King of Great Britain ceded to your brethren of Pennsylvania all the lands which they claim, but, from a regard to justice, and considering you as the real owners of the soil, could not consider themselves as entitled to it, until fairly purchased from yourselves.

BROTHERS: The lands which you have requested us to move off have for several years been purchased by the State of Pennsylvania from the Six Nations, and the lines bounding the same were opened and marked with their consent and approbation. The purchase north of the north boundary of Pennsylvania, west of the Conewango river, lake Chataque, and the path leading from thence to lake Erie, and south of the said lake, was made of your chiefs at fort Harmar, (by General Butler and General Gibson) and the money and goods punctually paid to them.

BROTHERS: Your brethren of Pennsylvania have fairly and openly made the purchase of all the lands to which they lay claim, and have sold those lands to such people as choose to settle and work them; they think it now their duty to protect such settlers from the depredations of all such persons as may attempt to molest them.

BROTHERS: The present military preparations of your brethren of Pennsylvania were intended to protect their citizens against the Western hostile Indians only, not supposing any protection necessary against the Six Nations, whom they consider as their friends and allies.

BROTHERS: The line which you have marked upon the map will take back from your brethren of Pennsylvania a large tract of land, which they have purchased from you. We cannot, therefore, consistently with our duty, remove from those lands, unless directed by the great council of our people, to whom we shall immediately send your message.

BROTHERS: We are sorry that our continuing on the lands which you have sold to your brethren of Pennsylvania, should be the cause of any uneasiness, or why we should not be considered by you as friends.

BROTHERS: Your brethren of Pennsylvania are a generous people; they have never wished for more than they were willing to pay for, and have never attempted to take what did not belong to them. They will be glad to meet you at all times, and afford relief to the weak and hungry of your people, who may take the trouble to come and see them at this place. In the mean time, as we are ordered here by the great council of your brothers of Pennsylvania, we cannot, consistently with our duty, remove from hence, until orders come from them for that purpose. Your message, however, shall be immediately forwarded by express to them, for their consideration.

From Governor Mifflin to the President of the United States, dated

PHILADELPHIA, 18th July, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's answer to my letter of the 15th instant, communicated in a letter from the Secretary of War, dated yesterday; and it is with peculiar regret that I perceive the embarrassment of my situation, relatively to the Presqu' Isle establishment, increasing with every addition to the correspondence which the subject has produced. I certainly, sir, have hitherto proceeded upon the presumption, that, whatever form of words may have been employed, it was your request that the execution of the Presqu' Isle law, should be suspended; and as you possessed all the information upon which that request was founded, I have thought, likewise, that you would readily assume the responsibility attached to a prompt and confidential compliance with it. But, when the Secretary of War remarks, that you never contemplated carrying your opinions upon the subject farther, than to state them as strongly as they were conceived; he leaves it to be inferred, that, for all the consequences of the suspension, without possessing the information, or, perhaps, entertaining the sentiments that led to the measure, I am deemed to be exclusively responsible.

This idea, sir, claims and justifies, on my part, the utmost circumspection; and I am persuaded that, while the Executive of the General Government is solicitous to avoid reproach for inattention, or neglect to make full representations of any danger which is apprehended to the interests of the Union, a similar solicitude in the Executive of a particular Government to avoid reproach, either for transgressing the constitutional boundaries of his authority, or for sacrificing the interests of the State, will be equally approved and indulged. Hence, sir, I have been induced, in order satisfactorily to compare your opinions on this occasion with my constitutional and legal powers, to take the advice of the attorney general of Pennsylvania, and I have the honor to enclose a copy of the letter in which his sentiments are expressed. From this document you will perceive, that, although any delay, consistent with the performance of the duties enjoined upon me, may be permitted, a delay, which will prevent the execution of the law, within the time prescribed, will not be justifiable. It is of importance, therefore, to know how long the temporary obstacles, which induced you to advise the suspension of the establishment at Presque Isle, are expected to continue: for, if they should not be shortly removed, I must either direct the commissioners to proceed in laying out the town, or (resorting to the alternative suggested by the attorney general) convene the Legislature upon the occasion. The latter measure, however, I shall not think it expedient to adopt, unless you expressly request it.

Though the title of the State to the jurisdiction and soil of the territory, on which she proposes to form her settlements, can admit of no just controversy, I would cheerfully, as far as my power extends, co-operate in any amicable proceeding to conciliate the minds of the Six Nations; but I have no authority to appoint a commissioner to treat with them upon the subject; and, indeed, the Secretary of War has misunderstood the purport of my conversation in that respect, since he ascribes to me an opinion, that, under the present circumstances, all differences may be accommodated by treaty. The truth is, that, if a sense of justice influenced the conduct of those Indians, no opposition would have been made to our improving the lands, which we had fairly bought, and the sale of which they have repeatedly acknowledged; and if they act (as I believe they do) under the direction and control of British agents, their opposition must be expected to last as long as the policy by which it is excited. If, however, sir, you should be pleased, on the part of the United States, to authorize a treaty to be held, I shall think it my duty to furnish you with all the documents that relate to the title of Pennsylvania, and its repeated recognitions by Cornplanter, and the other Indians who now presume to deny it.

From A. J. Dallas to Jared Ingersoll, Esq. Attorney General, dated 14th July, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

The Governor directs me to submit to your consideration, the various measures which have been pursued to carry into effect the act for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle, and the correspondence that has passed between the President and him, relatively to a suspension of the proceedings of the commissioners. When you have perused these documents, and the laws to which they refer, the Governor requests you will favor him with your opinion on the following proposition:

Can the Executive of Pennsylvania, under all the circumstances of the case, justify, in point of law, a continuance of the suspension of the proceedings of the commissioners, beyond a period that will admit of his carrying into effect the act for the laying out of the town at Presqu' Isle, as directed by the Legislature? It may be proper to remark, that, in order to ascertain the period alluded to, the Governor must eventually take into consideration the limitation of the time for allowing bounties to persons who shall actually settle in the proposed town; the limitation of the time for which the corps is enlisted that furnishes the detachment to protect the commissioners; and the length of time that will probably be consumed in making the necessary surveys.

The Governor is anxious, as far as is consistent with the power and duty of his office, to promote the views of the General Government; and even should it be your opinion, that his authority, as an Executive magistrate, does not extend to the present object, he will propose convening the Legislature, if the President shall declare, in his opinion, the interests of the Union require it.

From the nature of the inquiry, you may readily suppose, that the Governor is anxious to receive an early answer.

From Jared Ingersoll, Esq. to Alexander J. Dallas, Esq. dated

PHILADELPHIA, July 18th, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

I have considered the question you state, as arising upon the law for laying out a town at Presqu' Isle. The terms in which you have expressed yourself, as well as the nature of my office, excludes from my view, in giving an opinion, every consideration of policy or expediency.

In point of law, I conceive, even under the circumstances mentioned in the communications enclosed, the Executive of Pennsylvania cannot justify omitting to conform to the directions of the act of the Legislature to which you refer, though the Executive may justify any delay, consistent with the performance of the duties enjoined, within the time prescribed.

The United States are at war with the Indians; a State may, therefore, raise troops; the law is not contrary to the federal constitution; the act is imperative in its language, and obligatory.

The circumstances you recite, the limitation for allowing bounties, &c. determine the period, beyond which, delay could not be justified.

If it shall appear that measures of a general concern will be defeated by pursuing the line of conduct pointed out by the Legislature, as the Governor has no dispensing power, convening the Legislature is the only remedy for the inconvenience.

From Governor Mifflin to the President of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 22d July, 1794.

SIR:

I have received a letter from the Secretary of War, dated the 21st instant, in which he informs me of your intention to appoint a commissioner, for the purpose of holding a treaty with the Six Nations, at Canandaigua, on the 15th of September next; and I shall, with all possible despatch, transmit, for your information, the documents relating to the title of Pennsylvania, so far as it is founded on a purchase of the Indian claims, within the limits particularly designated in the late council at Le Bœuf. But, at the same time, I wish it to be clearly understood, that, on my part, no assent is given to any proposition, that shall bring into doubt or controversy the rights of the State.

With respect to the opinion expressed by the Secretary of War, that, before the lapse of the period, during which, it is thought, the Presqu' Isle settlement may lawfully be suspended, there is sufficient time for holding a treaty with the Six Nations, if begun about the middle of September, I confess, my judgment has not dictated the same conclusion, from a consideration of the circumstances, which the case presents to my view. It is true, as the Secretary of War observes, that the enlistments of the troops do not expire till the 1st of December, and that they may be continued until the meeting of the Legislature, that is, until the 2d December; but, independent of the various casualties, which usually protract, and sometimes defeat, the project of Indian treaties, it must be obvious, that a knowledge of the result of a treaty, held at Canandaigua, on the 15th September, cannot reasonably be expected in this city, till the middle of October; that, after knowing the result, a fortnight or three weeks must necessarily be employed in notifying the commissioners, and in the prosecution of their journey to Presqu' Isle; and that, by a progress of this kind, the surveys must be executed (if any men, indeed, can then be found, so hardy as to undertake the task) in the depth of winter, and at the very moment when the authority for affording protection to the commissioners expires by its own limitation.

Nor is the subject without embarrassment, when we consider it in relation to the bounties offered to the persons who shall actually inhabit and reside in the town, on or before the 1st May, 1795: for, no residence can take place till the surveys are returned; and the surveys cannot be returned, under the circumstances which have been remarked, till the winter and its effects, have, probably, rendered it impracticable to travel to the settlement within the limited period. Not only may the public policy be thus defeated, but the hopes of many adventurous individuals will be totally destroyed.

Under the impression of these sentiments, I might be tempted to express a wish, that an earlier day should be fixed for holding the proposed treaty, but that a sense of duty suggests an impropriety in the slightest interference upon the occasion. I will content myself, therefore, with informing you, that I shall instruct the commissioners to hold themselves in readiness to perform their trust, as soon as the treaty is over; if the issue is favorable to our object, they will be authorized immediately to proceed to Presqu' Isle; but, if the Indians should menace opposition, directions will be given to wait for a further communication from me. In the latter event, I shall rely upon receiving the military aid of the General Government, not only to prevent any inconvenience that may arise from the expiration of the Pennsylvania enlistments, but effectually to subdue that resistance to the execution of the law of Pennsylvania, which its suspension, by giving time and confidence to our ill disposed neighbors, must naturally increase.

I am, &c. &c.

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

The Secretary of War to Alexander Dallas, Esq.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 10, 1794.

I had the honor to lay before the President of the United States your letter of yesterday.

I am instructed to say, that, under the actual circumstances of the United States, it becomes a subject of serious consideration, whether any measures ought now to be urged, which are likely to produce disgust to our friends, the Six Nations, and to extend Indian hostilities.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 24, 1794.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter of this date, enclosing a copy of the orders which you have issued, for draughting one thousand militia from the western brigades, to support the detachment which the Legislature of Pennsylvania directed to be formed, for the purpose of protecting the commissioners who were authorized to lay out a town at Presqu' Isle.

It was intimated to the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, by me, on the 10th instant, that, under the actual circumstances of the United States, it became a subject of serious consideration, whether any measures ought now to be urged, which are likely to produce disgust to our friends, the Six Nations, and to extend Indian hostilities.

Since then, information has been received from Israel Chapin, of which a copy is herein enclosed,* by which it will be perceived, that affairs are critically circumstanced between the United States and the said Six Nations.

The President of the United States, on mature reflection, is of opinion that it is advisable to suspend, for the present, the establishment at Presqu' Isle. That, independent of certain other considerations of delicacy and moment, which, at no distant day, will be better appreciated, the high probability of an immediate rupture with the Six Nations, if the measure be persisted in, countenanced by the late information, and increased by the recent murder of one of their people, appears to him a solid reason for a temporary suspension.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 27, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor, in confidence, to transmit your Excellency the extract of a letter received from General Chapin, agent to the Six Nations, dated at Canandaigua, the 6th instant.

And I am instructed, by the President of the United States, to acknowledge, that yesterday, he received your favor of the 25th instant, and its enclosures, stating the measures which you have taken to suspend, for the present, the establishment at Presqu' Isle, conformably to his opinion transmitted to you on the 24th instant. This opinion was communicated on the same day your letter was received, announcing your orders for draughting a thousand militia, to support the establishment, and it was the result of a general view of the subject, founded upon the recent information which had been received.

[ENCLOSED.]

Extract of a letter from General Chapin to the Secretary of War.

Since the departure of my son, I have received more direct information of the British having began to erect a fort at Sandusky, than I had when I had the honor of writing to you by him. I therefore, at that time, only verbally directed him to acquaint you therewith.

They feel very much alarmed at the garrisoning of Presqu' Isle, and endeavor to persuade the Indians that it is only to secure the property of that place, which, they contend, was fraudulently purchased of a few individuals, and not of the nation. If the garrison destined for that place is not pretty strong, it is doubtful whether it will not be attacked.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 14th June, 1794.

SIR:

I am instructed by the President, to reply to your letter of the 13th instant, and to inform you, that the reasons which induced the opinion communicated to you on the 24th ultimo, continue to operate, and have not been weakened by any information since received.

It must be obvious to you, sir, and seems even to result from some of the information which you have transmitted, that the proposed movement is an extremely delicate one, as it regards our peace with the Six Nations. To bring on hostilities with those nations, would be, at any time, a serious evil; considered in reference to the operations we are carrying on against the more western tribes, its possible mischiefs assume a still more important aspect. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon the inconveniences which might ensue to those operations, by throwing, unexpectedly, in the midst of a campaign, so considerable an additional weight into the adverse scale.

When we take into the calculation, the precarious situation of our affairs with the Creek Indians, hostilities with the Six Nations might co-operate to place us too near the verge of a general Indian war, not to admonish us to particular caution in any step which might lead to those hostilities. It will be happy, indeed, if the circumstances which have already occurred, should be found not to have matured the evil beyond the possibility of a remedy.

A comprehensive view of the subject, cannot but include some considerations relative to the foreign nations in the neighborhood of the United States, in aid of the primary ones which respect the Indian nations. In the present delicate, if not critical, posture of our affairs, viewed in connexion with those of Europe, amidst negotiations, which concern not only our peace, but other great interests of our country, where every moment may be expected to bring some new developments, very cogent and urgent reasons, indeed, ought to be found in support of any measure which may have even a remote tendency further to embarrass or embroil.

If, in the execution of the measures which are in train, there shall be found reason for varying the opinion now delivered, it shall be communicated to you without delay; and you may be assured, that nothing shall be omitted to obviate the temporary obstacles which exist.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 19, 1794.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter of this date, addressed to the President of the United States, has been opened by me. The appearances up the Allegheny dictate that fort Franklin be reinforced. I have, accordingly, ordered this done, and Captain Crawford is to assume the command, and to have with him an abundant supply of provisions and military stores.

Besides this measure, some recruits, on their march to Pittsburg, amounting to about one hundred, will be detained there for the present, under Major Butler, excepting such a portion of them as shall be necessary to reinforce the garrison of fort Franklin.

In addition to this, I have forwarded five hundred arms and accoutrements, one hundred barrels of powder, and twenty tons of lead, to form a magazine at Pittsburg, to serve in case of an exigency.

* See letter from General Chapin, dated 29th April, 1794; and proceedings of a council holden at Buffalo creek, 21st April, 1794, transmitted 21st May, 1794.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 21, 1794.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter to the President of the United States, dated the 14th instant, (which has been opened pursuant to general directions) was only delivered to Mr. Dandridge, the Secretary, on the 17th instant, at three o'clock. The departure of the President for Mount Vernon, on the morning of that day, prevents my being able to reply to it at this time under his immediate direction.

But antecedent communications with the President, on the transaction to which your letter relates, and my immediate agency in the matter, afford me the means of offering some explanatory observations, which I shall do in a spirit that will accord with what I know to be a primary rule of conduct on his part—the steady cultivation of harmony and cordiality between the officers of the general and particular Governments.

With regard to that sentence, in my letter of the 14th instant, which has been particularly adverted to, and which is in these words: "It will be happy, indeed, if the circumstances which have already occurred shall not be found to have matured the evil beyond the possibility of a remedy," it will, I hope, be sufficient to say, that it was a mere general reflection on the probable or possible tendency of the circumstances which had occurred; without intention of passing an opinion on the motives or reasons for the measure which had been pursued by the government of Pennsylvania, either in a legislative or an executive capacity. Among the circumstances alluded to, was the unfortunate coincidence of the murder of one of the Indians of the Six Nations, an ingredient which was mentioned in my letter of the 24th of May.

In order to avoid the inference of having acquiesced in the suggestion, I beg leave to add, that there is no evidence in the possession of this office which establishes the fact of a previously hostile disposition of the Six Nations.

Your Excellency appears to lay stress on the lateness of the communication of the President's opinion as to the expediency of suspending the proposed establishment.

In proportion to the validity of the considerations which support the right of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to project and make the establishment, was the delicacy of the interference of the United States. Whatever may have been the anticipations entertained of the effect of the measure, the situation seemed to require that an opinion should be deferred till the progress of the experiment had produced some indications of probable consequences. When this happened, the opinion was given. Had it been given sooner, it might, perhaps, have been deemed premature.

The rights of Pennsylvania in this case, and the obligations which are urged to exist on the part of the United States in relation to them, would be improperly made a question. But the fundamental principles of society, and the practice of all political communities, frequently concur in postponing the enjoyment of a particular right or interest of a part of a nation, to considerations respecting the safety or welfare of the whole nation; the propriety, then, of a temporary suspension, in the present instance, must depend on the weight of the reasons which dictate it.

The discussion how far the requisition or advice of the Executive of the United States can justify such a suspension, under the circumstances of the laws of Pennsylvania, is rendered more absolutely useless by your Excellency's determination, that, whatever may be the result, the establishment at Presqu' Isle will be suspended, until the President shall have varied the opinion which has been delivered. No arguments, I am persuaded, can be necessary to satisfy you, that, when he saw, or thought he saw, in a measure of a particular State, consequences endangering important interests of the Union, he discharged a duty in declaring to the Executive of that State an opinion that it was advisable to suspend the execution of the measure, leaving that opinion to be appreciated as it deserved.

The President of the United States cannot fail to do justice to the disposition which has produced the determination you have announced, to comply with his opinion.

No time will be lost, after the arrival of the President, in submitting to him your letter, and this reply; and, in the mean time, the attempts for obviating the temporary obstacles, are put in a train of execution.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 24, 1794.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, for your information, the enclosed extract of a letter from General Israel Chapin, this moment received.

Extract of a letter from General Israel Chapin to the Secretary of War, dated

CANANDAIGUA, June 12, 1794.

The council, which was to have been held at Venango, is to meet at Buffalo creek. I have already received three messages from the Indians, requesting my immediate attendance. I was in hopes that I might have been able to put off going until the return of my son, but this last message presses me, in the most earnest manner, to repair thither immediately, and I shall, accordingly, start to-morrow.

I am afraid of the consequences of the attempt to settle Presqu' Isle at present. The Indians do not acknowledge the validity of the Cornplanter's sale to Pennsylvania.

I shall inform you, by express, of the result of the treaty at Buffalo creek, on my return to Canandaigua.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 15, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit, for your information, a letter from General Chapin, Agent to the Six Nations, dated at fort Le Bœuf, the 26th of June, last. You informed me that you had had transmitted to you the proceedings of the council at Buffalo creek, and the answer thereto, by Mr. Ellicot and Captain Denny, dated at Le Bœuf, the 26th of June.

General Chapin to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT LE BŒUF, June 26, 1794.

HON. SIR:

I left Canandaigua on the 13th of this month, in order to attend a council at Buffalo creek. I waited more than a week, after my first notification, for my son to return, that I might have an answer from you; but the chiefs, growing impatient, kept constantly sending runners. I was obliged to set out at last, to my great disappointment, without having received any information from you. On my arrival I found the minds of the Indians much agitated with regard to the movements made by the State of Pennsylvania. On the 18th I met the Indians in general council, the proceedings of which you find here enclosed. At this council I was requested to go to Presqu' Isle, (as you will see by their speech) to desire those people to move off who had made encroachments on their lands. I found that no excuse would answer, and was finally obliged to comply with their request. On the 19th I left Buffalo creek, accompanied by a deputation from the Six Nations, consisting of sixteen chiefs and warriors. I arrived at Presqu' Isle on the 24th, but, finding no person there, I proceeded to Le Bœuf, where I found Mr. Ellicot, and Captain Denny. After informing those gentlemen the business I came upon, I gave them a copy of the speech which had been delivered to me at Buffalo creek. The answer which they made I send you, enclosed with the other speeches.

Although the minds of the Six Nations are much disturbed at the injuries which they say they have sustained, they are still opposed to war, and wish, if possible, to live in peace with the United States. They are much opposed to the establishing of garrisons in this quarter, as they think it will involve them in a war with the hostile Indians. They are likewise displeased with having those lands surveyed, which they say were not legally purchased. In this critical situation, would it not be best to have commissioners appointed to treat with the Six Nations, that all difficulties may be settled which subsist between them and the United States, especially those that regard the State of Pennsylvania? And it is the wish of the Six Nations, that this treaty should be holden at their council fire at Buffalo creek.

I shall return by the way of Buffalo creek, where I expect to hold another council; the proceedings of which I shall forward to you as speedily as possible.

Proceedings of a Council holden at Buffalo creek, by the Six Nations of Indians, on the 18th of June, 1794.

Present: The principal sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Six Nations. From the United States, General Chapin, with his attendants. From Upper Canada, Mr. Johnson, the Interpreter of the Indian Department; Captain O'Bail, Speaker; Mr. Horatio Jones, Interpreter.

BROTHER: (addressed to General Chapin.) We are thankful that you have attended to the call of the Six Nations, and that you have been preserved by the Great Spirit, &c.

BROTHER: (addressed to the President of the United States.) I have for a long time aimed at the good of both parties. I have paid you different compliments, as that of brother, father; and now I call you friend. We were pleased when we heard that you were appointed to have the chief command of the United States.

BROTHER: The Great Spirit has so ordered, that every nation shall have some one to be at their head. You are to look over your people, and settle all difficulties; and we, the Six Nations, expect that you will not be unmindful of us, but see that we have justice done, as well as your own people.

BROTHER: We, the Six Nations, now call upon you. We pay no attention to what has heretofore been done by Congress: their proceedings we consider as unjust. We wish for nothing but justice, and hope that it will take place.

BROTHER: You know our demands; we ask but for a small piece of land; and we trust, as you are a great man, you can easily grant our request.

BROTHER: You wish to be a free people in this country, who have come from the other side of the water and settled here; and why should not we, whose forefathers have lived and died here, and always had possession of the country?

BROTHER: We, the Six Nations, have determined on the boundary we want established, and it is the warriors who now speak.

BROTHER: You have the map on which the boundaries are marked out which we want established.

BROTHER: We want room for our children. It will be hard for them not to have a country to live in after that we are gone.

BROTHER: It is not because that we are afraid of dying that we have been so long trying to bring about a peace. We now call upon you for an answer, as Congress and their commissioners have oftentimes deceived us; and, if these difficulties are not removed, the consequences will be bad.

This speech was delivered with eight strings of black and white wampum.

BROTHER: We have opened this fire upon two different kinds of business; we wish you to listen to them with attention.

BROTHER: We are in distress. A number of our warriors are missing, and we know not what is become of them, but suppose that they have been killed by the Americans.

BROTHER: Last fall an Indian chief, by the name of Big Tree, left this country, and went to the American army in a friendly manner, and we have since been informed that he was killed by them.

BROTHER: The other day a very unfortunate circumstance happened. One of our nephews (of the Delaware nation) was killed at Venango, by a party of warriors, who were going on to Presqu' Isle, without giving us any notice whatever.

BROTHER: You are sensible this must be very hard, to have a man killed in time of peace, one who was sitting easy and peaceable on his seat. You certainly would complain if we were to treat you in the same manner.

BROTHER: It has been customary, when one person has killed another, that those who have done the injury go to the injured party and make satisfaction.

BROTHER: We told you that we had two pieces of business to attend to; we hope that you will pay attention to both.

BROTHER: The establishing a garrison at Presqu' Isle may occasion many accidents, as the Southern Indians may do injury, and we may be blamed without a cause.

This speech was delivered with ten strings of black wampum.

Captain O'Bail then addressed himself to General Chapin:

BROTHER: When we sent for you, it was because we placed great dependence upon you; we hoped that you would not fail of doing every thing in your power to assist us.

BROTHER: We now expect that you will exert yourself in removing those people off our lands. We know very well what they are come on for, and we want them pushed back.

BROTHER: We now wish that you and Mr. Johnson would go together and remove those people back over the line which we have marked out upon the map.

BROTHER: If those people remove off immediately, we shall consider them as our friends; if not, we shall consider them as no friends.

BROTHER: We expect that you and Mr. Johnson will go together on this business, and we shall send two warriors to attend you; and we expect that you will bring us word when you return.

This speech was delivered with six strings of black and white wampum.

General Chapin's answer to the speech delivered by Captain O'Bail.

BROTHERS: I have heard the speeches which you have delivered, with great attention, and have thought seriously on what you have communicated to me. You have requested me to go to Presqu' Isle. As I wish to do every thing in my power, both for the United States and the Indians, I shall comply with your request.

BROTHERS: I can do no more to those people than to give them my advice. It is not in my power to drive them off.

BROTHERS: You must be sensible that I am obliged to look to the interest both of the United States and the Indians, and consider myself as accountable to both for whatever I do, and you may depend that, when I return, I will give you a just account of whatever takes place.

BROTHERS: This business is of a serious nature, and is really a matter of importance to both parties. You may rest assured that the President is your friend, and that he will pay attention to the business which you laid before him.

BROTHERS: You observed that you would send ten warriors to attend me. I must also request that you would send two of your chiefs.

BROTHERS: The business which you desire me to do, is what I had little thought of. I am unprepared for the journey; however, as I informed you that I would go, I shall set out immediately.

BROTHERS: The speeches which you have delivered for the President, shall be sent on as soon as is convenient, and you may shortly expect to receive an answer.

The Secretary of War to Governor Mifflin.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 17, 1794.

SIR:

The letter which your Excellency addressed to the President of the United States on the 15th instant, while it presents a new aspect of our affairs with the Six Nations, does not remove the suspicion originally entertained. The proceedings at Buffalo creek on the 26th June, 1794, speak in threatening language the dissatisfaction of those tribes with the new settlements proposed. A second interview was had between General Chapin and them, at the same place, on his return from Le Bœuf, on the 4th instant, and a copy of the minutes is now enclosed. The answer of Mr. Ellicot and Captain Denny could not move their purpose, as formerly expressed, and General Chapin, on the 29th of the same month, writes to me that, "if he had not proceeded to Le Bœuf, and the party of surveyors, &c. had proceeded, he believes that blood would have been shed." We cannot well doubt, therefore, that the immediate prosecution of the establishment at Presqu' Isle would call that confederacy to arms against the United States.

If, indeed, sir, no hope remained of quieting them, or, at least, of preventing them from joining the hostile nations, forbearance might perhaps be misplaced. But General Chapin, whose duty requires him to attend minutely to those people in particular, and who, by enjoying their confidence, possesses full opportunity to be well informed, has delivered this opinion in his letter of the 26th ultimo: "Although the minds of the Six Nations are much disturbed at the injuries which they say they have sustained, they are still opposed to war, and wish, if possible, to live in peace with the United States. They are much opposed to the establishing of garrisons in this quarter, as they think it will involve them in a war with the hostile Indians. They are likewise displeas'd at having their lands surveyed, which, they say, were not legally purchased." On the 9th instant he adds: "Their main anxiety is, at present, respecting the settlement at Presqu' Isle, as, they say, they have not fairly sold the land; the lines I described to you last winter are strongly adhered to by them, and, if the party at Le Bœuf proceed to erect garrisons at Presqu' Isle, it will immediately call the attention of the hostile Indians that way, and would, in a short time, involve the Six Nations in a war which they wish to avoid. They wish to continue in a state of neutrality, if possible."

In both these letters, sir, General Chapin urges the appointment of commissioners, who may treat on behalf of the United States and Pennsylvania, with the Six Nations; and he is of opinion, that such an appointment would answer valuable purposes. Mr. Ellicot, who has been employed by Pennsylvania, thinks that all differences may be accommodated by treaty. Such, also, I understood, were the sentiments of your Excellency, in a conversation which I had the honor of holding with you, on Tuesday last.

The President of the United States, therefore, instructs me to inform you, that he is ready to nominate a commissioner, for opening a treaty with the Six Nations, at the Genesee river, on the fifteenth day of September next; that he shall have it in charge to endeavor, in conjunction with a commissioner from Pennsylvania, to adjust all differences against the establishment at Presqu' Isle, and that the Department of War shall make all necessary arrangements, upon this head, with your Excellency. It is not his intention, by this proposition, to cast any doubts upon the validity of the Pennsylvania title; that must stand upon its own ground. But, under the present circumstances, it must occur to you, sir, that the peaceable accommodation of the heart-burning of the Six Nations, is an object of great importance.

There are other considerations, of real weight, which have been already communicated to you; these, too, have lost nothing of their force from late events.

It was never contemplated by the President of the United States to carry his opinions upon this subject farther than to state them as strongly as they were conceived by him. It is with your Excellency to compare them with your constitutional and legal powers. If our enemies should receive so powerful an accession as the Six Nations, the General Government cannot be reproached for inattention, or a neglect to make full representation of the danger to be apprehended.

The following are the proceedings of a General Council of the Six Nations, holden at Buffalo Creek, on the fourth of July, 1794.

CLEAR SKY (an Onondaga chief) first spoke: He thanked the Great Spirit for the preservation of those who had been sent with the message to Le Bœuf. He then observed, that they had appointed Captain O'Bail, a Seneca chief, to be their speaker.

The speech of Captain O'BAIL:

General Chapin, Mr. Johnson, and the whole deputation, attend; I thank the Great Spirit that you have all returned in safety.

Captain O'BAIL then addressed himself to General Washington, and said, now I call you friend. We, the Six Nations, ever since the beginning of the world, have had love for one another. We have now assembled concerning the business we sent to Presqu' Isle, as we have received an answer to the message which we sent to that place.

The answer we had brought from the men at Le Bœuf, relates every thing that has taken place since the peace; they mention every payment that has been made, and the greater part they have told us is not true.

General Washington, attend; what gives us room for the making of so many speeches, is, because you relate all the former deceptions which have been used.

There is but one word that was said at Le Bœuf that makes me glad, which was, that they had given me land; but, to complete my wishes, I desire that the whole Six Nations might have land given them also.

General Washington, I depend upon you to gratify our request, and that will make my mind easy: for sometimes I hear that I am going to flee from my seat for the injuries I have done. These reflections make me so unhappy, that I am almost tempted to die with the Six Nations.

BROTHER: We are as determined now, as we were before, that the line shall remain. We have fully considered on the boundary we have marked out; we know all that we have received, from time to time, and we think, if you establish this line, it will make us about even.

BROTHER: If you do not comply with our request, we shall determine on something else, as we are a free people. BROTHER: We are determined to be a free people. You know, General Washington, that we, the Six Nations, have always been able to defend ourselves, and we are still determined to maintain our freedom.

BROTHER: You must not suspect that any other nation corrupts our minds; the only thing that can corrupt our minds, is not to grant our request.

BROTHER: If this favor is not granted, I wish that my son may be sent back with the answer, and tell me which side he means to join; if he wishes to join that side, he is at liberty.

General Washington, I wish you would give an answer as soon as is possible to this speech; and I desire the messengers who bring it, should come to this place.

And you, General Chapin, stand between the Indians and the United States; we wish that you would give every assistance in your power to forward the business.—[This speech was delivered with eight strings of black and white wampum.]

General CHAPIN's answer:

BROTHERS: I am happy the Great Spirit has preserved us again to meet in council. I have heard with attention the speeches which you have made, and have had committed to writing; they have since been explained to you, and you see there is no deception.

BROTHERS: I give it as my opinion, that General Washington is a firm friend to the Six Nations, and that he will not, by any means, see you wronged.

BROTHERS: I am happy to hear that you think yourselves a free independent people; that is the case with the United States; they are free and independent, and wish to take you by the hand as brothers. It seems now that there is some dispute, but the only way to have it settled is to come together, face to face, and talk the matter over candidly.

BROTHERS: I shall now return home, and I shall forward your speech to General Washington as soon as is possible. In the meantime, I hope you will sit easy on your seats, until you hear General Washington's voice.

BROTHERS: I always consider myself accountable to the Indians, as well as the United States. I aim at the good of both parties, and you may rest assured that nothing in my power shall be wanting to assist you. I shall prepare a copy of your determinations, to be sent on to Le Bœuf, provided you send runners for that purpose.

N. B. The mention made of lands by Captain O'Bail, has reference to Mr. Ellicot's conversation in the council at fort Le Bœuf. Mr. Ellicot, after relating the particulars concerning the treaty at fort Harmar, informed the Indians that the State of Pennsylvania had made three grants of land to Captain O'Bail.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1794.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter of the 18th instant, to the President of the United States, has been duly received. It certainly was not his intention that personal embarrassment should be produced to you, from the suspension of the establishment at Presqu' Isle. It has been uniformly avowed to your Excellency to be his wish, that it should be suspended until the efforts should be made for removing the temporary obstacles. The expression of this wish was a duty, inasmuch as an harmonious co-operation of the State Governments with the General Government must always be necessary, upon subjects in which the movements of the former might essentially counteract those of the latter. Still the President does not mean to press upon your Excellency the slightest infringement of your constitutional or legal powers: for, while he himself pursues the constitution and laws of the United States, he shall always observe respect to those of individual States. Whatever responsibility, therefore, is attached to this communication of this desire to your Excellency, he readily assumes, and he deems it a fortunate circumstance that you have thought yourself hitherto at liberty to comply with it.

How long the temporary obstacles to this settlement will continue, it is impossible to determine; they will certainly last until the campaign against the Western Indians is ended, unless the disposition of the Six Nations should be materially changed. Neither your Excellency, nor the attorney general, have defined the period to which the suspension may, under the circumstances stated by him, be legally continued; but, as the enlistments of the troops do not expire before the first of December, and may be continued longer, and as the period for allowing bounties for actual settlement does not close before the first of next May, it is evident there is sufficient time for holding a treaty with the Six Nations, if begun about the middle of September. A commissioner will attend for that purpose, in behalf of the United States, at Canandaigua, on the fifteenth day of September next, and those tribes will be invited thither. As the object will be not only to prevent them from engaging in hostilities against us, but also to procure an acquiescence in the settlement proposed, it may be naturally expected, that their objections to the purchase will stand very forward.

It might prove beneficial if a commissioner could be sent from Pennsylvania; but it appears from your Excellency's last letter that this cannot be done. Our commissioner will, therefore, take charge of the documents which you have promised, and will use his best endeavors to quiet the discontents. He will not be authorized to make any concessions injurious to the title, nor to give expectation of any further compensation from your State. If he cannot accommodate the dispute under the influence of the United States, by proper explanations, he will report the result, as the basis of ulterior measures.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 31, 1794.

SIR:

The Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has transmitted to the President of the United States the enclosed copy of a law, for raising four companies of troops for the port of Philadelphia, and the defence of the frontiers. And, as it may be considered by some persons as a matter of doubt, whether this measure of Pennsylvania is not incompatible with the constitution of the United States, I am instructed to request your opinion thereon in writing.

Answer of the Attorney General.

April 3d, 1794.

SIR:

By your letter of the 31st ultimo, I understand that a question is made, how far the measures contemplated by an act of Pennsylvania, for securing the trade, peace, and safety, of the port of Philadelphia, and defending the western frontiers of the Commonwealth, are consistent with the constitution of the United States. I have, therefore, considered that question with attention, and have now the honor to state to you my opinion, agreeably to your request.

The act authorizes the Governor to raise by enlistment, from the militia of the Commonwealth, three companies of riflemen, and one of artillery, to serve under his orders and instructions for eight months, and from thence, until the next meeting of the Legislature, if, in his opinion, the war in Europe, or on the frontiers, shall require it. The artillery company is to be stationed at fort Mifflin, for the purpose of securing the trade, peace, and safety, of the port of Philadelphia—a measure which the preamble declares to be expedient. “during the continuance of the war which now rages in Europe;” the rest of the companies (with a detachment of the artillery, which the Governor is empowered to make) are to be stationed for the defence of the Western frontiers, and to protect the infant settlements at Presqu' Isle.

By the constitution of the United States, it is provided, “that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace,” &c. This restriction on the power of keeping troops, I am of opinion, is not absolute, but that the qualification intended by the terms “in time of peace,” extends to it as well as to that of keeping ships of war. There is, therefore, I apprehend, nothing in the constitution which prohibits the several States from keeping troops in time of war.

So far, then, as the act in question contemplates the defence of the Western frontiers against the hostilities of the Indians now at war with the United States, I consider it as within the strictest limits of the constitution. Such measures have heretofore been pursued by the State of Pennsylvania, without objection, and a practical construction of this clause has thus been given.

The rest of the act, however, is questionable, and it is not without some hesitation that I decide upon it. The spirit of a prohibition to keep troops in time of peace, seems to imply, that the troops raised and kept in time of war, ought to be raised, kept, and employed, with reference to the objects of that war. It is easy to perceive that the dangers which the people of the United States intended to guard against by this prohibition, will exist, if on every breaking out of Indian or other hostilities, the members of the confederacy may raise troops, and build ships of war for any object but that of repelling such hostilities. But, although these consequences are evident, I cannot find in the instrument itself, any thing which prohibits the States from stationing and employing the troops which they have a right to keep in time of war, in such manner as they please, so that it be within their respective limits, and do not interfere with the Federal arrangements. I consider all those clauses in the constitution, which restrict the powers of the several States, as subject to a strict construction; and, that these prohibitions are not to be extended by implication, nor the natural and obvious meaning of the words to be enlarged by a consideration of inconveniences which may possibly result from adhering to it.

But, I am also of opinion, that so much of the act as goes to authorize the Governor to keep up those companies, if the circumstances of the war in Europe should, in his opinion, require it, is not compatible with the constitution of the United States. If peace shall be made with the Indians, and the United States be engaged in no other war, these troops cannot be constitutionally kept up by Pennsylvania, although the war should continue to rage in Europe.

GENERAL VIEW.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 1, 1794.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the speech of the President of the United States which relates to the improvement of harmony with the Indian nation, within the limits of the United States, by fixing and conducting of trading houses, made the following report:

That, in their opinion, it would conduce to the honor and prosperity of the United States to cultivate peace with the Indian tribes.

It appears to your committee that the establishment of trading houses, under the direction of the President of the United States, would have a tendency to produce this laudable and benevolent effect. From the best information the committee can obtain, they are induced to believe a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, would answer the purpose. The articles to be purchased by an agent or agents, and sold at such posts or places as may be the most convenient for the several nations of Indians within the limits of the United States. That the agent or agents to be appointed should receive stated salaries for their services, to take an oath or affirmation for the faithful discharge of his or their duties, and moreover give bond and sufficient security for the due performance thereof. It should be the duty of the agent or agents to make up their accounts half yearly, and transmit them to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. That, as this transaction is intended to conciliate the affection of the Indians, it should not be the object of Government to profit thereby; hence a stated price should be fixed on the articles to be sold, having regard to the profit or loss on the articles received in payment, in such manner that, although nothing is to be made by the Government, the capital should be kept entire.

The committee therefore submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated, for the purpose of carrying on trade with the Indian nations.

Resolved, That a bill or bills be brought in, conformably with the above report, to be in force for and during the term of ———, and no longer.

NORTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 17, 1794.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 17th, 1794.

SIR: The President of the United States has instructed me to communicate, in confidence, to Congress, the despatches from Major General Wayne, herewith transmitted, dated the 17th of October, and 12th of November, 1794, which were received last evening.

I have the honor to be, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

[Addressed to the Presiding Officers of both Houses of Congress.]

Copy of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War.

HEAD QUARTERS, Miami Villages, 17th October, 1794.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a duplicate of my letter of the 20th ultimo, together with the general return of the legion, and an invoice of stores and medicine wanted in the hospital department.

The great number of sick belonging to the mounted volunteers, added to the sick and wounded of the legion, has exhausted all the stores forwarded for the year 1794, so that I shall be under the necessity of ordering the Surgeon General to purchase a temporary supply at fort Washington, at an advanced but current price, at that place.

The Quartermaster General is directed to make out a return of the stores issued, on hand, and wanting, in his department. Major Burbeck has similar orders for the Ordnance Department, which will be transmitted by the first opportunity.

The unfortunate death of Mr. Robert Elliot, the acting contractor, who was killed by the Indians on the 6th instant, near fort Hamilton, added to the deranged state of that department, has made it my duty to order the Quartermaster General to supply every defect on the part of the contractors, and at their expense, in behalf of the United States, to be settled at the treasury at a future day.

The posts in contemplation at Chillicothe, or Picque town, on the Miami of the Ohio, at Lormie's stores, on the north branch, and at the old Tawa town, on the Au Glaize, are with a view to facilitate the transportation of supplies by water, and which, to a certainty, will reduce the land carriage of dead or heavy articles, at proper seasons, viz: late in the fall, and early in the spring, to thirty-five miles, and in times of freshets, to twenty in place of 175, by the most direct road to Grand Glaize, and 150 to the Miami villages, from fort Washington, on the present route, which will eventually be abandoned, as the one now mentioned will be found the most economical, and surest mode of transport, in time of war, and decidedly so in time of peace.

The mounted volunteers of Kentucky marched from this place on the morning of the 14th instant, for fort Washington, where they are to be mustered and discharged, agreeably to the instructions mentioned in the enclosed duplicates of letters to Major General Scott and Captain Edward Butler, upon the occasion.

The conduct of both officers and men of this corps, in general, has been better than any militia I have heretofore seen in the field for so great a length of time. But it would not do to retain them any longer, although our present situation, as well as the term for which they were enrolled, would have justified their being continued in service until the 14th of November, in order to escort the supplies from fort Washington to the head of the line, whilst the regular troops were employed in the completion of the fortifications, and keeping the enemy in check, so as to prevent them from insulting the convoys; but they were home-sick. All this I am now obliged to perform with the skeleton of the legion, as the body is daily wasting away from the expiration of the enlistments of the soldiery. Nor is it improbable that we shall yet have to fight for the protection of our convoys and posts. It is therefore to be regretted that the bill in contemplation, for the completion of the legion, as reported by the committee of the House of Representatives, was not passed into a law in the early part of last session of Congress.

The enclosed estimate will demonstrate the mistaken policy and bad economy of substituting mounted volunteers, in place of regular troops; and unless effectual measures are immediately adopted by both Houses, for raising troops to garrison the Western posts, we have fought, bled, and conquered, in vain; the fertile country that we are now in possession of, will again become a range to the hostile Indians of the West, who, meeting with no barrier, the frontier inhabitants will fall an easy prey to a fierce and savage enemy, whose tender mercies are cruelty; and who will improve the opportunity to desolate and lay waste all the settlements on the margin of the Ohio, and which they will be able to effect with impunity, unless some speedy and proper measures are adopted to re-engage the remnant of the legion. The present pay, and scanty ration, will not induce the soldiery to continue in service after the period for which they are now enlisted, and which will expire, almost in toto, between this and the beginning of May.

I had the honor to transmit you a copy of the deposition of a certain _____, a Canadian prisoner, taken in the action of the 20th of August; his brother arrived at this place on the 13th instant, with a flag and three American prisoners, which he redeemed from the Indians, with a view of liberating. Enclosed is his narrative, given upon oath, by which you will see, that Governor Simcoe, Colonel McKee, and the famous Captain Brandt, are at this moment tampering with the hostile chiefs, and will undoubtedly prevent them from concluding a treaty of peace with the United States, if possible. I shall, however, endeavor to counteract them through the means of _____, who has a considerable influence with the principal hostile chiefs, and whose interests it will eventually be, to promote a permanent peace. But, in order to facilitate and effect this desirable object, we ought to produce a conviction to them, as well as to the British agents, that we are well prepared for war; hence I have been induced to bestow much labor upon the two forts, of which the enclosed are draughts, and I am free to pronounce them the most respectable now in the occupancy of the United States, even in their present situation, which is not quite perfect as yet. The British, however, are not to learn, that they may possibly be left without garrisons; they well know the term for which the veterans of the legion are engaged, as well from our laws and proceedings of Congress, as from our deserters, and that no provision is yet made to supply their places; circumstances that Mr. Simcoe will not fail to impress most forcibly upon the minds of the Indians, with whom he is now in treaty; and to hold up to them a flattering prospect of soon possessing those posts, and their lost country, with ease and certainty.

I have thought it my duty to mention those facts to you at this crisis, to the end that Congress may be early and properly impressed with the critical situation of the Western country, so as to adopt measures for retaining the posts, and for the protection of the frontier inhabitants, previously to the expiration of the term of service for which the troops have been enlisted.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTHONY WAYNE.

Major General KNOX, Secretary of War.

Estimate of the expense attending the raising and arming 2,000 non commissioned officers and privates, regular troops, for three years.

Ten dollars bounty, and ten dollars per stand of arms, equal to twenty dollars each man	-	$40,000

Pay for 192 non-commissioned officers, for four months; say 12 serjeant-majors, and quartermaster serjeants, at 7 dollars, each, per month,	-	336
84 serjeants, at 6 do.	-	2,016

1,808 privates, at 3 dollars per man, per month, for four months,

Balance in favor of Federal troops,

$264,996

By a fair and candid comparative view of this plain and simple statement of facts, every unprejudiced mind, and every real friend to the true interests of America, must be convinced of the false and idle policy of substituting a precarious auxiliary force, of two thousand volunteers, for four months only, in place of a permanent regular force, of equal numbers, raised, armed, and equipped, for three years, completely clothed for one year, and paid and subsisted for four months, the time for which the volunteers are to serve; besides leaving a balance in the treasury of 107,028 dollars, which will now be expended on the mounted volunteers, for four months service, leaving the frontiers totally unprotected, in the course of a few months more, as nearly one third part of the troops' term of service will expire by the last of December, and almost the whole, on or before the middle of May next. This is a true but melancholy statement of facts.

It may be asked, how this business could have been remedied? The answer is plain and decisive, viz: by giving an additional bounty of ten dollars to each recruit, and one dollar per month additional pay, with a reasonable increase of the rations. This, in the course of three years, would only have amounted to 92,000 dollars, which would have ensured two thousand regular troops for that term; besides leaving a balance then in the treasury of 15,028 dollars, in favor of two thousand regular troops for three years, in place of that number of volunteers for four months only.

Perhaps 200 acres of land, in the vicinity of the posts, might be substituted in place of the ten dollars additional bounty, to each recruit, with better effect.

Estimate of expense attending the raising and paying of two thousand mounted volunteers, of Kentucky, for four months, exclusive of forage and subsistence.

MIAMI VILLAGE, sci.

Personally appeared before me, a certain Indian trader, and native of Canada, as flag, to redeem his brother, in consequence of a letter from the said ———, from Grand Glaize, wrote by my permission, which he received by the hand of an Indian, about the 24th ultimo, who declares, and saith, that Governor Simcoe, Colonel McKee, and Captain Brandt, arrived at fort Miami, at the foot of the Rapids, on the 30th ultimo: that Brandt had with him one hundred Indians, Mohawks and Messasages.

That Governor Simcoe sent for the chiefs of the different hostile Indians, and invited them to meet him at the mouth of Detroit river, eighteen miles below Detroit, to hold a treaty; that Simcoe, Colonel McKee, and Captain Brandt, together with Blue Jacket, Backongelies, the Little Turtle, Captain Jonny, and other chiefs of the Delawares, Miamies, Shawanese, Tawas, and Pattawatamies, set out accordingly, for the place assigned for the treaty, about the first instant: that the Indians are well and regularly supplied with provisions from the British magazines, at a place called Swan creek, near Lake Erie.

That, previously to the arrival of Governor Simcoe, Blue Jacket, the Shawanese chief, two of the principal chiefs of the Tawas, and the principal chiefs of the Pattawatamies, had agreed to accompany him, the said ———, with a flag to this place.

That Blue Jacket informed him, after the arrival of Simcoe, he would not now go with him, until after the intended treaty; but that his wishes, at present, were for peace; that he did not know what propositions Governor Simcoe had to make them, but that he and all the chiefs would go and hear; and, in the interim, desired him, the said ———, to inquire of General Wayne in what manner the chiefs should come to him, and whether they would be safe, in case they should determine on the measure, after the treaty with Simcoe, and after the said ——— should return to Detroit: that, had it not been for the arrival of Governor Simcoe, Colonel McKee, and Captain Brandt, with his Indians, he is confident the chiefs, already mentioned, would have accompanied him to this place, at this time, as before related.

HEAD QUARTERS, GREENVILLE, 12th November, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit you a duplicate of my letter of the 17th ultimo, from the Miami villages, and to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from Colonel Alexander Hamilton, of the 25th of September, enclosing an extract of a letter from Mr. Jay, Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, at the court of London, dated the 12th July, 1794; also a letter from Major Stagg, of the 4th ultimo.

The enclosed copy of a correspondence between the contractor's agents, the Quartermaster General, and myself, will inform you of additional measures taken to obtain supplies for the support of the respective posts, and the skeleton of the legion. I have the honor to enclose copies of certain overtures and speeches, from the Wyandots, settled at, and in the vicinity of, Sandusky, together with my answer; what the result may be is yet very problematical; they have, however, left two hostages with me (one of them a young chief) until the return of the flag that went from this place on the 25th instant, and promised to be here again in the course of twenty days, with an answer to my propositions.

From the enclosed narrative of ———, a half-breed, and brother to ———, (whose interest I have made it to be true and faithful to the United States) it would appear that the savages are playing an artful game; they have most certainly met Governor Simcoe, Colonel McKee, and Captain Brandt, at the mouth of Detroit river, at the proposed treaty of hostile Indians; and, at the same time, sent a deputation to me, with the overtures already mentioned, as coming from only part of one nation; it is, however, understood, by all, that there shall be a temporary suspension of hostilities for one moon, say until the 22d instant: in fact, it has been a continued suspension, upon their part, ever since the action of the 20th of August, except a few light trifling predatory parties; it's true, we always moved superior to insult, which may account for this apparent inactivity.

Permit me now to inform you that the skeleton of the legion arrived at this place, on the 2d instant, in high health and spirits, after an arduous and very fatiguing, but a glorious tour of ninety-seven days; during which period, we marched and countermarched upwards of three hundred miles, through the heart of an enemy's country, cutting a wagon road the whole way, besides making and establishing those two very respectable fortifications, the draughts of which were enclosed in my letter of the 17th ultimo.

As soon as circumstances will admit, the posts contemplated at Picque town, Lormie's stores, and at the old Tawa towns, at the head of navigation, on Au Glaize river, will be established for the reception, and as the depositories, for stores and supplies, by water carriage, which is now determined to be perfectly practicable, in proper seasons; I am, therefore, decidedly of opinion, that this route ought to be totally abandoned, and that adopted, as the most economical, sure, and certain mode of supplying those important posts, at Grand Glaize and the Miami villages, and to facilitate an effective operation towards the Detroit and Sandusky, should that measure eventually be found necessary; add to this, that it would afford a much better chain for the general protection of the frontiers, which, with a block house at the landing place, on the Wabash, eight miles southwest of the post at the Miami villages, would give us possession of all the portages between the heads of the navigable waters of the Gulfs of Mexico and St. Lawrence, and serve as a barrier between the different tribes of Indians, settled along the margins of the rivers emptying into the creek, as mentioned in the enclosed copy of instructions, of the 22d ultimo, to Col. Hamtramck.

But, sir, all this labor, and expense of blood and treasure, will be rendered abortive, and of none effect, unless speedy and efficient measures are adopted by the National Legislature, to raise troops to garrison those posts.

As I have already been full and explicit upon this subject, in my letter of the 17th ultimo, I shall not intrude further upon your time and patience, than to assure you of the high esteem and regard with which I have the honor to be, &c.

Copy of a letter from — to Major General Wayne, dated

SANDUSKY, 17th September, 1794.

BROTHERS:

I send you the extract of a speech which the chiefs and warriors was to have sent you, if the evil advice had not been heard to; after all the plan I had proposed to them was finished, they, then, took it into consideration that it would be proper to let their confederates know, at the Miami river. They received an answer from them to this purport: "Elder Brothers, we have received your speech; you say that you are just upon the point of sending speeches to the Americans. We are happy to think that you thought proper to let us know. I now request of you to drop that; you must not believe the Americans, for they only wish to decoy us into a snare, with their fine speeches they have frequently sent us. We should listen to what our father says to us, as he is now arrived, and, also, that the Five Nations are coming to this Miami river."

This is all they said. I have now, from this infamous work against my good will, sent you three of my confidential friends, which you may not in the least doubt of their fidelity for the undertaking. You will send two of them back with your answer to my calls for your assistance, without delay, which you may depend on will be the utmost benefit to the United States, and, I hope, will be the means of drawing all the Indians back; however, you will be better convinced, when you see this bold attempt of mine put into execution. As for the third man, he is my brother, and will remain with you. You must report that these three came from Pittsburg, belonging to the Six Nations, for I hear daily that your men are deserting from you, who might be the cause of a discovery; you know best who to trust with an affair of such importance. Farewell; I have nothing more to add.

AN EXTRACT.

BROTHERS of the thirteen United States of America:

Listen to us chiefs and warriors of Sandusky: It is now arrived to this period since we had intercourse with each other. When in council, at Muskingum, we settled all matters, and linked our chains of friendship strong; this is what you and I did when I returned home; the evil things were set in operation against our good works we had just finished, and, in a short time, all things were in such a confusion, that nothing but a rupture must take place between the thirteen United States of America, and us Indians, which affair still remains undecided.

BROTHERS: You told us, when the path was made from the council fire to our towns at Sandusky, that this should be the way for you and I to communicate our affairs of importance to each other; and, moreover, you said that nothing should happen to any of us, if this path was followed; that we were to let each other know, if in case any thing bad threatened either of us.

BROTHERS: I say this is the promise we made to each other; but we have never heard a word from you, nor you from us. I must acknowledge that we have sometimes heard from you, by divers channels, and then, in such a manner, we could not tell the right end of it. We now speak, and send forward this speech to you, by one of our best and wisest men, whom we esteem to be the dearest of our blood, and, from him, you will receive this; or any thing else he may have to say will stand valid; our reasons for sending him was, that you might believe in us.

BROTHERS: We request of you to bring forth, from the bottom of your hearts, your sentiments respecting to making a definitive treaty of peace, and upon what terms. We shall deliver our prayer daily to the Great Spirit above, our Maker, that you will open your hearts and sentiments to our beloved warrior.

For the chiefs and warriors of Sandusky.

SANDUSKY, 26th September, 1794.

Speech of — — —, a Wyandot chief, delivered viva voce to General Wayne, at Greenville, the 3d November, 1794.

BROTHER:

I thank the Great Spirit that I have now an opportunity to see you. I have come a great way to speak of peace; I live at Sandusky; we Wyandots now wish for peace, and are determined to bury the hatchet and scalping knife deep in the ground. We pray you to have pity on us, and leave us a small piece of land to build a town upon.

BROTHER: The Great Spirit has given land enough for us all in this world to live and hunt upon. We have looked all around us for a place to move to, but cannot find any. We want to know your mind. Our people will be all assembled at Sandusky by the time we get home.

We have moved about half a mile from the river, where we intend to build a stockade and blockhouse, to defend ourselves until we hear from you. We don't know whether we are right or wrong in doing it, but have pity on us.

I have nothing further to say than what is contained in the papers sent you, but to request an answer in writing, to let our people know your real mind.

— — — then read and spoke as follows:

BROTHER:

I have come to you in behalf of my Father, and his little town. We are for peace, and intend to move about ten miles from where we now live, to the head waters of Scioto, in order to be out of the way of the horse thieves, who, after doing mischief, always come home by our town, which may be the means of our suffering for their bad deeds.

We are determined for peace, if you will grant it, and to tell you where we live, so that we may not be hurt on account of the bad Indians, should they continue to be hostile.

From — — — to A. Wayne, Major General, Commander-in-Chief of the army of the United States of America.

SANDUSKY, 27th September, 1794.

BROTHERS: To all the United States of America:

I request you to allow me the honor of communicating you a few words upon the subject of the greatest importance to the thirteen United States, and us brown skin people. It is now better than five years since the commencement of this war. I think it is most time that we should take our rest, and enjoy, the remainder of our lives, the blessings of peace.

It has been always my heart's desire to live in this state of bliss. The regret I feel for my countrymen is inexpressible. They are now in the utmost distress; and the appearance of a total extirpation from our native soil is a most alarming circumstance for a human being to condole upon. Who have we to blame for our present misfortunes? The world knows. I have exerted myself to shew my abilities to the chiefs and warriors at this place, to inculcate in them the same ideas as I possessed. If they go wrong, the charge of their ignorance cannot be upon me. I am determined to let my brothers know, the United States of America, the abuse and imposition we have received from a people who call themselves Christians. I demand redress from the United States, by sending an army to this place without delay, for I wish to save my people of Sandusky. I have always acted the part of a faithful and true subject to them. I hope to see the day wherein I shall have the pleasure of convincing my countrymen how far they are wrong.

I am now determined, as I said before, to disclose my heart and sentiments. I will do every thing that lays in my power to save my people. I am an offspring of theirs, and therefore I have a right to support their cause, and conduct them the right way.

Can there be any honor in any civilized nation to advise us to a thing that would ruin us? O! fie upon them that are guilty! they had much better show us the right than wrong.

You see, brothers, how we are imposed upon. You may rely on what I say to be truth, for I speak from the true principles of man's loyalty to his country. We want nothing but justice, and I know the United States will grant it.

The cause of my doing this now is, I have been twice disappointed in attempting to have peace; the first was last March, 1794, and the latter, lately. Now, my blood has got warm, and I will have satisfaction. I hope the United States will cast their eyes upon me, and see the distress I am in for my relations.

The Speech of Major General Wayne to the Wyandots, of the 4th November, 1794.

To Tarke, and all the other chiefs and warriors of the Wyandot nation living near Sandusky, and in its vicinity, and to all and every other tribe and nation of Indians, whom it may concern:

BROTHERS:

I have listened with attention to the message sent; and am rejoiced that the Great Spirit has, at last, opened your hearts and ears to the voice of peace; but am sorry that the evil spirit has been busy in attempting to prevent you from accomplishing that desirable object. Yet, I hope and trust that your eyes are now opened, and you will no longer suffer yourselves to be imposed on by the bad advice of those interested men, who have so often deceived you, and betrayed you into error, by fair and plausible, but false promises, of assisting you to fight against the Fifteen Fires of the United States.

I have already told you that those people had neither the power or inclination to protect you; the truth of which you have dearly experienced.

BROTHERS: You request me to bring forth, from the bottom of my heart, my sentiments respecting a definitive treaty of peace, and upon what terms.

The enclosed copies of my speeches, addressed to you and all the other hostile tribes of Indians, will best demonstrate the sincerity and wishes of my heart, and show the pains I have taken to bring about a happy peace, and prevent the further effusion of human blood.

BROTHERS: I now call upon you to open your hearts and ears, and exert every power of attention to what I shall say.

It is close upon six years since the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pottawatomay, and Sac nations, concluded a treaty at the mouth of Muskingum, with Governor St. Clair, for removing all causes of controversy, and for settling boundaries between the aforesaid tribes of Indians and the United States of America.

That treaty appeared to be founded on principles of justice and equity, and to have been clearly and fairly understood, and satisfactory to all parties at that period, being the same which you have recognised and recapitulated in your speech to me, at this time.

I, therefore, propose it as a preliminary or foundation, upon which a permanent and lasting peace shall be established between the United States of America and your nation and nations of Indians.

Should you have any well grounded objections to this proposition, come forward and speak your minds freely, in the manner mentioned in my speech of the 12th September last, and rest assured of a sincere welcome, and the most perfect security to yourselves and friends, both in coming to this place and in returning home, when most agreeable to you.

ANTHONY WAYNE,

Major General, Commander-in-Chief of the legion of the United States of America.

HEAD-QUARTERS, GREENVILLE, November 5, 1794.

SIR:

Your several letters of 27th of September, and an extract of a speech which the chiefs and warriors were to have sent from Sandusky, "if the evil advice had not been heard to," was delivered at the Miami villages by ———, some days since; he now remains at this place, to take care of ———, who has been very unwell, but now on the recovery; every attention shall be paid to him, until he is perfectly restored to health.

The part you have taken to bring about a peace, between the United States and the hostile tribes of Indians, is highly pleasing to me. Continue to exert your influence to accomplish that good work, and you shall be liberally rewarded for your fidelity and trouble.

You will observe, by my speech of the 4th instant, that I have proposed the treaty, made at Muskingum, on the 9th of January, 1789, as a preliminary, or foundation of a permanent and lasting peace. A duplicate of this treaty was delivered to the Wyandots, and is probably now in your possession; from part of it being recognised, and quoted in the extract of the speech of the 26th of September, 1794, and as you attended that treaty, you must be well acquainted with the principles upon which it was founded.

I have cause to believe, that my speech to the hostile tribes of Indians, of the 12th of September last, was in great part suppressed by some of the bad white people at the foot of the Rapids. I, therefore, send a copy of it, as well as my speech of the 13th of August, by this opportunity, which you will please fully and clearly to explain to your people; perhaps you may find it convenient to come to this place, immediately after the receipt of this, when matters can be better and more fully understood; and I hereby pledge my sacred honor for the safe return of yourself, and all such chiefs and warriors as may accompany you.

Wishing that the great spirit may incline all your hearts and minds to peace, and that we may soon have a happy interview,

I am, your friend and brother,

A. WAYNE.

To ———.

Confidential intelligence given at Greenville, the 10th day of November, 1794, to Major Gen. Wayne, by——,

Who came as a flag from the Wyandotts, settled at the foot of the rapids of Sandusky, as mentioned in certain communications signed ——, and saith, that his tribe are determined for peace; that the chiefs were prevented by the British agents, Governor Simcoe, Colonel McKee, and Captain Brandt, from coming forward at this time, as they found it expedient to send one or two chiefs to the proposed treaty of the British, at the mouth of Detroit, where his brother also went.

That Captain Brandt insisted they should try one more desperate effort, and that they, the Six Nations, were now determined to join them; that he had now come forward with a chosen body of his own warriors, and would wipe the tears from their eyes; to keep a good heart, and forget their late disaster, and to look forward to better fortune and success; that their father, the king, would assist them with his warriors; that the army was now advancing to join them; to come to the treaty at the Big Rock, and hear what their father, Governor Simcoe, had to say to them. This message was sent by David Patterson, a Mohawk, and principal chief under Brandt; that three of the principal war chiefs of the Wyandots, belonging to his town, and who were always for war, were killed in the action of the 20th August, and that the principal chiefs, now living, are very anxious for peace.

That the first intelligence the Indians received of the advance of the army towards Grand Glaize, was from a certain Newman, who deserted from the St. Mary's, as the troops were on their march, in order to give every intelligence in his power; that it was known by several of the Indians, that he (Newman) had a brother, an officer, now at Detroit.

That Newman, most certainly, was not captured by the Indians, but came in voluntarily, to give them notice of the advance of the army; so far from being taken prisoner, he never saw the sight of an Indian, until he arrived at the settlements, in the vicinity of Grand Glaize; that immediately upon his arrival, runners were sent in every direction, to collect the Indians, and he was sent to Detroit, from the foot of the Rapids, by Major Campbell. That the Indians would have been completely surprised at Grand Glaize, but for the arrival and information given them by this man.

That the Shawanese appeared determined to remove to the west side of the Mississippi; that there are now out, upwards of a hundred Shawanese warriors, hunting on the head waters of the Miami of the Ohio and Scioto, who, when the hunting season is over, say about Christmas, intend to disperse, and steal horses to carry them and their families to the Mississippi, where several of their nation, and many of the Delawares, are already settled; he, therefore, is of opinion, that those nations will severally remove, rather than make peace.

That the Indians, by this time, have heard the proposals of the British and Six Nations, with regard to assistance and support, and will determine, for peace or war, according to the certainty or uncertainty of effectual support from the British, after receiving the proposals now sent them.

No. 55.

[2d SESSION.]

THE SOUTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON THE 19TH, AND TO THE SENATE ON THE 22D DECEMBER, 1794.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 19, 1794.

SIR:

I am instructed by the President of the United States to submit to Congress, communications from Governor Blount, of the territory of the United States, southwest of the Ohio, which accompany this letter.

I have the honor to be, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

[Addressed to the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress.]

Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, October 24, 1794.

SIR:

In my letter of the 2d instant, I enclosed you a copy of Major Ore's report respecting the destruction of the Running Water and Nickajack, two of the most hostile of the Lower Cherokee towns, together with a copy of my letter to the General of the 1st instant. I now enclose you a copy of the General's answer to that letter, and a copy of his order to Major Ore.

Whether the General's reasons are such as will justify his order, I judge most prudent to leave to your determination; consequently shall expect your order on that head. My last accounts from Mero district are as late as the 20th instant, when only one man was killed in that district since the 16th ultimo. The person killed was Thomas Bledsoe, one of the soldiers belonging to the post at the ford of Cumberland, on the 2d instant. I also enclose you a copy of a letter from General Robertson to John Watts, of Will's town, the greatest chief of the nation, (Will's town is within thirty miles of the Running Water) to which he immediately sent a string of white beads in answer to John McKee, the agent resident at Tellico block house, to be by him forwarded to me.

The enclosed copy of Major Doyle's letter from fort Massac, will inform you of the state of the garrison at that place, and the relief afforded it.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

General Knox, Secretary of War.

Copy of a letter from General Robertson to Governor Blount, dated

NASHVILLE, October 8th, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter of the 2d instant. Enclosed you have a copy of my order to Major Ore, of the 6th of September; my reasons for giving it were, that I had received two expresses from the Chickasaws; one by Thomas Brown, a man of as much veracity as any in the nation, the other by a common runner, giving information that a large body of Creeks, with the Cherokees of the Lower towns, were embodying, with a determination to invade the district of Mero; and not doubting my information, I conceived, if Major Ore did not meet this invading army of Creeks and Cherokees, as I expected, that it could not be considered otherwise than defensive to strike the first blow on the Lower towns, and thereby check them in their advance; nor could I suppose that the pursuing of parties of Indians, who had recently committed murders and thefts, to the towns from whence they came, and there striking them, could be considered as an offensive measure, unauthorized by the usage of nations in such cases. It cannot be necessary to add, as a justification, the long, repeated, and I might say, almost daily sufferings of the people of the district of Mero, by the hands of the Creeks, and Cherokees of the Lower towns. The destruction of the towns by Major Ore, was on the 13th of September. On the 12th, in Tennessee county, Miss Roberts was killed on Red river, forty miles below Nashville, and on the 14th, Thomas Reasons and wife were killed, and their house plundered near the same place by Indians. On the 16th, in Davidson county, twelve miles above Nashville, another party killed — Chambers, wounded John Bosley and Joseph Davis, burned John Donaldson's station, and carried off sundry horses; and in Sumner county, on the same day, a third party of Indians killed a woman on Red river, near Major Sharp's, about forty miles northeast of Nashville, and carried off several horses; this proves that three separate and distinct parties of Indians were out for war against the district of Mero, before the march of Major Ore from Nashville.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter from Doctor R. J. Waters, a citizen of the United States, resident at New Madrid, to John Easten, his factor, in Tennessee county, strongly supporting the information the Chickasaws had given of the intended invasion of the Creeks; and is not the Old Maw's information to yourself, in the latter part of August, to the same purport? And to him, and his friendly party, are the people of this country indebted for their not invading us, as they intended. If I have erred I shall ever regret it; to be a good citizen, obedient to the laws, is my greatest pride; and to execute the duties of the commission, with which the President has been pleased to honor to me, in such a manner as to meet his approbation, and that of my superiors in rank, has ever been my most fervent wish. Previous to the march of Major Ore from Nashville, Colonel Whitley, with about one hundred men, arrived there from Kentucky, saying they had followed a party of Indians who had committed depredations on the southern frontier of that country; that in the pursuit they had a man killed by the Indians, and several horses taken, and that they were determined to pursue to the Lower towns. They were attached to Major Ore's command, which augmented the number to upwards of five hundred and fifty men. I should be happy if my apprehensions of a Creek invasion were removed: but they are not, for Billy Colbert, and other Chickasaws, inform me, that they yet threaten Mero district, not in so large numbers, but in small detached parties, which are equally dangerous, as there is no possibility of guarding against a number of small parties invading the frontiers, at different places, at the same time. Enclosed is a copy of a letter from John Watts; and, from my experience of Indian affairs, I have my hopes that, from the scourging Major Ore has given the Lower Cherokees, we shall receive less injury from them than heretofore. I also enclose you Major Doyle's letter from fort Massac to me, in consequence of which, I ordered to his relief an ensign, sergeant, corporal, and eighteen privates, mounted infantry. I have engaged Mr. Shute fifty dollars for going to you, express.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

JAMES ROBERTSON.

His Excellency Governor BLOUNT.

Copy of General Robertson's order to Major Ore, dated

NASHVILLE, 6th September, 1794.

The object of your command is to defend the district of Mero against the large party of Creeks and Cherokees of the Lower towns, which, I have received information, is about to invade it, as, also, to punish, in an exemplary manner, such Indians as have committed recent depredations in the said district.

For these objects, you will march, with the remainder of your command, from Brown's block house, on the 8th instant, and proceed along Taylor's trace towards the Tennessee, on which, from the information I have received, you are momentarily to expect to meet a large party of Creeks and Cherokees, advancing to invade this district; and if you do not meet this party before you arrive at the Tennessee, you will pass it, and destroy the Lower Cherokee towns, which must serve as a check to the expected invaders, taking care to spare women and children, and to treat all prisoners, who may fall into your hands, with humanity, and thereby teach those savages to spare the citizens of the United States, under similar circumstances.

Should you, in your march, discover the trails of Indians, returning from the commission of recent depredations on the frontiers, which can generally be distinguished by the horses stolen being shod, you are to give pursuit to such parties, even to the towns from whence they come, and punish them for their aggressions, in an exemplary manner, to the terror of others from the commission of similar offences; provided this can be consistent with the main object of your command, as above expressed—the defence of the district of Mero against the expected party of Creeks and Cherokees.

I have the utmost confidence in your patriotism and bravery, and with my warmest wishes for your success,
I am, &c.

MAJOR ORE.

Copy of a letter from John Easten to General Robertson, dated

CLARKSVILLE, October 1, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

I think it highly incumbent on me to transmit to you a copy of a letter from Doctor R. J. Waters, dated New Madrid, September 13, 1794, relative to an army of Creeks coming against this territory; I will copy it exactly, so that you may judge from his fears on the occasion. The Doctor supposed I would go to Kentucky, and had sent, by Mr. Handy, a few days before the date of this, one thousand dollars for this place; but he was robbed of all the money, by the Cherokees, at the mouth of the Ohio.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Copy of a letter from Doctor R. J. Waters to John Easten, dated

NEW MADRID, September 13th, 1794.

SIR:

Since my last, per Mr. Handy, some reports here have given me some uneasiness; and my regard for you, my own interest, and the welfare of the people of Cumberland, makes it necessary I should transmit the cause by this opportunity; a very formidable invasion, by the Creeks, is announced among the Indians as certain, and that they will consist of at least nine hundred men; their object appears important; they mean to strike at the thick, strong, settlements, and endeavor at extirpating all together; how far this report is to be relied on, must be judged of by concurrent circumstances and appearances; it comes to me by a Shawanese, who is in good repute here, and who says he is very lately from among them; he adds, that, let their success in their first attempt be as it may, they mean, afterwards, to beset Cumberland river, and the Ohio, a little below the mouth of Cumberland. 'Tis very certain the Indians do, in many instances, tell a great many lies; but I think there is some probability in this. I would wish you to judge with caution, and with good evidence. I do not wish to run risks much longer; we have run too many; and yet, if we give ear to every alarm, we may never be quiet. I must beg you to use your utmost caution and circumspection; make the necessary inquiries, and act, from the result, according to your own judgment and feelings on the occasion. If you find much danger like to await you, and your apprehensions up, without a sufficient force, or protection, I recommend you not to run too much risk, but rather abandon a prospect so obstructed with danger; but, if you find your own inclinations inclined towards the enterprise, do not suffer me to damp your hopes and expectations. I shall not blame you on my own account. I am principally concerned about you, and am really apprehensive you will venture once too often, so most earnestly beg you to be very cautious.

Copy of a letter from General Robertson to John Watts, dated

NASHVILLE, 20th September, 1794.

OLD FRIEND:

I am glad to hear you talk as you did in old times, "that peace is good;" this I hear from your people, (prisoners.) They say that Nickajack and Running Water were just listening to good talks; but, that we did not know: for our people were killed every day; the trails came and went towards them towns; and, one thing we do know, we found property that was taken from our people when killed, and letters that people had who were killed on the Kentucky roads; so them towns cannot plead innocence; and we have long known them to be our enemies; but, if they are about to be good, we are sorry we did not know it in time; but what is past cannot be recalled; so, if friendship is to be between us, we must take care, on both sides, for the future. We will not listen to half-way peace, that we are tired of; our ears are shut to such talks; but our eyes are open, and, if we see no white people killed, we shall not kill or distress the Cherokees. Our people were strong enough to have gone to Look-out Mountain, or Will's town; but they heard Dick Justice was head of Look-out Mountain, and is known to be a good man, and that the Middle Striker did live at Will's town, and you were now giving good talks; so they returned, to see if enemies come again from that way, and, if they do, our people will soon return the visit. This I do not tell you as a threat, but you may depend on the truth of it; so let your people not blame us for the future, if the innocent should suffer with the guilty: for, when our people go to the towns, they cannot distinguish the innocent from the guilty; so, it will lay on your head-men to send a flag, which can, at all times, come safe, and let us know who are enemies; so that the innocent can be spared. We have borne with your injuries a long time; but you will find our people as dreadful, when forced to take arms, as they are peaceable when you do not injure them. There are so many of them who have seen their near relations lying cut to pieces, by your people, that, when they find their enemies, they will have no mercy on them. Your nation sent men to make a treaty with the President, and, in the mean time, while they were talking, you killed his people. These are the talks we are done listening to. I do not hear that one of you talk of punishing those that murdered the people in the boats, taken this summer, neither have I heard of your sending in the negroes; but it is as well to say no more; we want peace, and love it, and, if you do the same, take steps to bring it about. Do not let the Creeks pass through your country to war against us. There is a new town settling below; if that is to flourish, let them be peaceable, or their towns will be spoiled. We have got seventeen of your people prisoners, who will be well treated till we hear from you. Our people will not go to war against your towns any more, if you come in and make peace. We shall wait long enough for you to come with a flag; but, if you do not come, our people will be sure to come again to war; and we have men enough to fight, and destroy you all, and burn your towns. Four of your prisoners are taken to Kentucky, by some of their men who went with us to war, and they will keep them till you send in four negroes you have taken from General Logan, who lives in that country, and will come after his negroes if peace is not soon made. The prisoners we have will be returned, if you will come in with a flag, and good assurances of a peace, and bring in a girl you took prisoner, and killed her father and mother, on the Tennessee, on their way from the Chickasaw nation, whose name was Collins; when I say you, I mean your nation.

I am your old friend,

JAMES ROBERTSON.

JOHN WATTS, Chief of the Cherokee Nation.

Copy of letter from Major Thomas Doyle to General James Robertson, dated

FORT MASSAC, September 19, 1794.

SIR:

Enclosed I send you information very interesting to the people of your country. From the present state of my garrison, having many sick, I shall not be able to render that service I could wish, as to giving information, watching the movements of the Indians in this quarter, which fifteen or twenty woodsmen would enable me to do. I am confident, had I those, I could render great services to my country: therefore I have to request you will send that number for a few weeks; as it is for the public good, I am confident you will comply with this my request. Mr. Henley, who also writes by this conveyance, will no doubt give you an account of his defeat near the mouth of the Ohio. Nothing else worthy of notice has transpired since mine by Mr. McFarland.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

THOMAS DOYLE, Major, Commanding fort Massac.

General JAMES ROBERTSON.

Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, November 3d, 1794.

SIR:

The enclosed copy of my letter, of the 29th of October, to Double-head, in answer to his of the 20th, will inform you of the pleasing prospects of peace at that time with the Lower Cherokee towns; but, since that time, I have received information of an intended invasion of those towns, by a volunteer army, headed by General Logan, from Kentucky; for the particulars of which, so far as yet come to my knowledge, and the measures I have taken to prevent, I refer you to the enclosed copies of my letters to General Logan, Colonel Whitley, General Robertson, the chief of the Lower Cherokee towns, John McKee, and my orders to Sergeant McClellan. Whether these measures will have the desired effect, time only can determine, but I am induced to hope, that, when General Logan is informed that the Indians have notice of his intentions, he will be induced to desist, and return home; because he can but discover that the Indians will warmly oppose him, or flee to the mountains; and, in either case, he must fail of his objects; and, as he is not made acquainted with the contents of my letter to the chiefs, the most probable construction he can draw, from their having any knowledge of his approach, must be, that they will oppose him at the crossing of the river, and every difficult pass upon his march.

A daily and friendly intercourse is kept up at Tellico blockhouse (on the north bank of the Tennessee) between Mr. McKee, the temporary agent, resident at that place, on the part of the United States, where James Carey, the interpreter, also resides; and the Upper Cherokees, and the people generally on the frontiers, who have for upwards of two years been miserably huddled together in stations, for their common defence, have such confidence in the sincerity of this part of the nation, not only that they will not injure themselves, but will guard them against such other Indians as may be hostilely disposed, that they are generally about to move out to their respective farms.

Should General Logan desist from his attack upon the Lower towns, I am of opinion the appointment of Mr. Dinsmoor to reside in the nation will have happy effects; but I would advise that his general residence should be in Will's town, in preference of the Turkey's. My reasons are, the Turkey's is, and has long been, one of the most peaceable towns in the nation, nor do, if any of the war parties of Creeks pass through it, to, or from, Cumberland; so his presence or address, at that place, does not appear necessary to restrain either Cherokees or Creeks from war. Will's town is one of the most powerful of the Lower towns, the residence of John Watts, a very leading chief, the most contiguous of them to the towns of the Creeks, and through which the hostile parties of Creeks frequently pass to and from Cumberland. Here his presence, address, and information, could but be of great service to the United States. Before I found it essential to the interest of the United States to order Mr. McKee to reside permanently at Tellico block house, I contemplated that town as his place of residence, where it could be done with safety to his person. But, admitting the Lower Cherokees, as well as the Upper, should, from the measures taken with them, preserve an inviolate peace, it will not give peace to the frontiers, unless the Upper Creeks can be induced or compelled to follow their example. They can be induced, if at all, only by some person acquainted with Indian customs and manners, in whom they have confidence, residing among them, in the character of agent. Such a person, I have been taught to believe, for I have no personal acquaintance with him, now lives at Will's town, a Scotchman, of the name of John McDonald, heretofore in a subordinate character, under the British superintendent, Colonel Brown, who, I have reason to believe, would accept such an appointment, provided the salary was a good one—say equal to that allowed Mr. Dinsmoor. But salary alone would not be sufficient; he ought to be allowed to keep a table better than his salary would support; and, on proper occasions, to reward, with presents, such Indians as should render services, or give uncommon proofs of friendship towards the United States. This would have a greater degree of influence and confidence, and the better enable him to effect the object of his appointment. The particular towns he should reside in, I cannot, at this moment, recommend; but it ought to be one of the most hostile of those lying contiguous to the Lower Cherokee towns, and most directly on the way from the other hostile towns of the Creeks, to and from Cumberland. Another advantage, in appointing this gentleman, would be, that he has as much, or more, influence with the Lower Cherokees, than any other man who resides among them; and, being in the pay of the United States, that influence would, consequently, be exerted over them in aid of Mr. Dinsmoor; and a third reason is, there are several Scotch traders, heretofore adherents to the British Government, in the Lower towns, inferior in consequence to McDonald, who would be pleased with his being noticed by the United States, and support him and his measures to peaceful objects.

My reason for believing Mr. McDonald would accept the appointment in the Creeks, is, that he has informed me, by letter, not long since to my hands, though written in May, 1793, that he would accept such an appointment from the United States to the Lower Cherokees.

The want of wagons, in the first instance, at Manchester, and, after procured, the death of several of the horses, the poverty of others, and the want of health of the wagon drivers, have delayed the last load of the Chickasaw goods until to-day; but, a boat and hands being in readiness, to-morrow Opoia Mingo and party take their leave for the mouth of Bear creek, where they expect to meet their nation, prepared with pack horses, to take home the goods given them at Philadelphia.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WM. BLOUNT.

COOSAWATEE, October 20, 1794.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I send you this talk from this town, on my way home, just returned from our father the President, and our beloved brother General Knox. Now, my brother Governor Blount, you know very well, and the rest of the white people, when I and some of our people went to Congress, we were sent by our head-men of our land to go to that place. Now we have returned back, the head-men and warriors, and young men also, are satisfied with what we have done, and are determined to hold the United States fast by the hand, and keep peace. Now, this is the talk of them all, and I am glad to inform you so, my friend, and it is pleasing to me that I did not spend my breath for nothing. But, it appears now we shall have a lasting peace between us, which the old head-men strove a long time for. We shall now live in peace like brothers. My people are now wanting to go out a hunting, which you know is high time to be out; for you all know very well where our hunting ground is, on the other side of the Big river, and on the mountain, and on the waters of Cumberland, though you know very well where we hunt, and we hope you will keep the white people from coming to hurt the hunters, as we all want to live in peace now with you all. Now, if some of our mad young men should go and steal a horse from some of your people, you must not get in a passion for that with us, but wait till the horse or horses shall be returned to you again. This is what the great beloved men told us, to return all such horses, and keep our young men from doing any bad thing to the white people. When I was at Oconee mountain, we sent all the head-men at it to the Big river (the Tennessee) to come down there and hear all the talk we had brought with us. But, however, they did not all come, on the account of some people having come in and killed some of them; that it was not our people's doings that made the white people come in and kill our people, but it was the Creeks doings that caused all this. And when we gave them the talk, they all received it, and have taken hold of it fast; and we all mean to hold the talks that are given us by the President and General Knox, and we hope the white people will not let our hands go, but hold us by the hand as we mean to do. What mischief has been done, was done by the Creek Indians' doings; and if the white people hold us by the hand, we may still stand our ground with them: for, it is they who have made us angry with one another. We hope you have now found them out, and our foolish young men who used to be set on by them. We send the Quadroon and his friend to carry this talk to you, and we hope you will receive them kindly, and treat them well, that they may have a good talk to tell their friends when they come home, and we hope you will send us the truth about our people's going a hunting: for they will all be wanting to hear the news from you, whether they may hunt in peace or not.

I am your friend and brother,

DOUBLE HEAD, his + mark.

Governor BLOUNT.

KNOXVILLE, October 29, 1794.

MY FRIEND AND BROTHER:

Your letter of the 20th instant, was delivered to Mr. John McKee, the agent resident at Tellico block house, and by him forwarded to me express by Andrew Millar. The Quadroon, the Turkey's Son, and the other two messengers, wait there for my answer, which I hasten to give you. Mr. McKee, I am sure, will treat them well. That you and other deputies of the Cherokees have been to visit the President of the United States, and your beloved brother General Knox, there made a peace, and that you and your people, now you are returned, are well pleased, and determined to keep the peace you have made, is truly pleasing to me. It is hardly necessary for me to repeat to you and to your nation, that ever since I have acted in the character of superintendent of it, I have always wished and exerted myself to keep peace between your nation and the citizens of the United States, and now, with your exertions for peace on the part of your nation, and the continuance of mine on the part of the United States, I hope we shall have no more war. In your letter, you say, "now, if some of our mad young men should go and steal a horse, or horses, from some of your people, you must not be in a passion or mad with us, but wait, and the horse or horses so stolen, shall be returned to you again." To this proposal I agree, and whenever a horse is stolen, I will give your nation notice, and allow thirty days to return the horse or horses stolen, to John McKee, at Tellico block house; but, if the horse or horses stolen are injured, damage must be paid, as well as the horses be returned.

You next ask, "if your hunters may go out to their hunting grounds in safety?" My answer to that question is, that though the white people have lost a great deal of blood, and many horses, they wish peace, and will not hurt your people, if all red people cease to injure them. I say the white people will not hurt your people, if all red people cease to injure them, and by all red people, I mean Creeks as well as Cherokees: for, if Creeks hurt them, they will not be able to distinguish them from Cherokees, and may hurt your hunters in retaliation.

It is true, I have long found out that the Creeks kill the citizens of the United States, and I fear they will continue so to do, and if they do, your people will surely be blamed for it; and if you earnestly wish peace, you and your people must stop them, and turn them back from annoying our frontiers. Or if you see or hear of their returning with hair or horses, you must apprehend them, and bring them to Tellico block house, as the Maw's people served one last summer: for it is better you have war with the Creeks, who, you say, have already brought great mischief upon your people, than with your friends, the citizens of the United States, who sincerely wish peace with your nation, and the world at large. And if you, for the sake of peace with the United States, are forced into a war with the Creeks, you may be sure of friends enough: for, besides the white people, who must be your friends, the Upper Cherokees, the Chickasaws, and Choctaws, neither, love the Creeks.

It now appears, that you, and myself, and our people, wish peace; and, for fear it should be disturbed or broken, while some or both sides can't quite forget their relations and friends, I would advise your hunters for this winter, not to cross the ridge that divides the waters of Duck river and Cumberland, nor to come near the Cumberland nor Kentucky traces, nor near the frontiers of this country; there is ground enough besides to hunt on this winter; and this winter passing off in entire peace, people will be more good humored next summer, and will more firmly believe that there is really a peace taken place between us. My friend Colonel Watts, who has received a letter from General Robertson, respecting the destruction of the Running Water and Nickajack, will inform you the reasons the general gave for its being done. The Quadroon, the Turkey's son, and your other runners, will report to you the good understanding and peace that subsists between the United States and the good old Maw, and all the Upper towns. John McKee resides at Tellico block house, in the character of a temporary agent, to cherish and keep up this friendship, and all times, when you wish to write me, or send me a runner, let it be done by way of that place. Peace is my wish, but, by peace I mean that not one more white person is to be killed.

I am your friend and brother,

WM. BLOUNT.

DOUBLE-HEAD, a Chief of the Cherokees.

Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to Brigadier General Robertson, dated

KNOXVILLE, November 1st, 1794.

SIR:

Enclosed are copies of my letters to Colonel Whitley, and General Logan, and the newspaper containing a copy of Double-head's letter to me, and my answer; the latter serving to show the prospects of returning peace, and the former my sense and disapprobation of General Logan's intended invasion of the Lower towns. It is a duty you owe to the office and rank you hold in government, to your common country, and to your exposed fellow frontier citizens, in particular, to use your authority and address, to compel or induce General Logan to desist from his unauthorized invasion of those towns. My letter of information to the Indians, of the approach of General Logan, of this date, will appear in the next number of the Knoxville Gazette. Captain Evans is to remain on the frontiers of Mero district, and range, under his present order, until such time in December as shall be sufficient to afford him only time to appear at this place, and muster out of service on the last day of that month.

[ENCLOSURES.]

From Governor Blount to Colonel Whitley, dated

KNOXVILLE, November 1st, 1794.

SIR:

I have been informed, first, by Housen Kenar, which has been in a greater degree confirmed since, by the examination of Major Ore, the bearer, that you passed this place yesterday, with an intention to join General Logan, who is said to have marched from Kentucky, in force, to invade the Lower Cherokee towns. The newspaper you will receive herewith, contains copies of a letter of the 26th ultimo, to me, from Double Head, a principal chief of those towns, and my answer to him of the 29th, by which you will understand these towns, as well as every other part of the Cherokee nation, are considered in the peace of the United States. By what authority General Logan has raised an armed force to invade a nation, declared by public authority in peace with the United States, I am uninformed. Hence, I am compelled to suppose he has no legal authority for so doing, and to command him, you, and all others concerned, to desist from such illegal and unauthorized enterprise. Having so recently received from, and given to the Cherokees, assurances of peace, as the above mentioned letters will prove to you, it becomes an official duty in me, to give information to the Cherokees of the intended invasion of General Logan, and the feelings of humanity equally compel me so to inform you, and, if possible, the general himself. It is my wish to act, so as that neither party can charge me with improper conduct, and to save the effusion of human blood. From the character of General Logan and yourself, I readily believe that you both wish peace and security to the frontier inhabitants; but should you persevere in your intended attack upon the Lower towns, it is my opinion, that the effect will be the drawing the Lower Cherokees and the Upper Creeks, highly incensed, upon those exposed people.

From Governor Blount to General Benjamin Logan, dated

KNOXVILLE, November 1st, 1794.

SIR:

Enclosed is a copy of my letter to Colonel Whitley, of this date, forwarded to him express, and one of the newspapers containing the copies of the letters of Double-head, a principal chief of the Cherokees, of the 20th ultimo, to me, and my answer of the 29th, as alluded to in my letter to the colonel. The first (the letter to the colonel) serving to show you the information I have received respecting your intended invasion of the Lower Cherokee towns; and the latter, the pleasing prospects of a continued peace between the United States and the Lower Cherokees. Upon your receiving this information, I cannot suffer myself to doubt, but your love of peace and order will induce you immediately to desist from your intended enterprise. But, in this instance, it is my duty to command as well as inform: Therefore, I command you, as well as the men with you, or under your command, forthwith, to desist from the attempt of invading the Lower Cherokee towns, who are in the peace of the United States. And, I further command you, and the men with you, respectively, not to enter, in a hostile manner, the country or lands guaranteed to the Cherokee nation, by the treaty between the United States and the said Cherokees, commonly called the treaty of Holston, warning you and them, that, in case of a violation of this order, which is issued by virtue of the authority in me vested, you and they will answer the same at your peril. Having received my appointment from the Federal Government, I am answerable for my acts only to it; yet, it may not be improper to give you my reasons for my conduct on this occasion; they are contained in part of my letter to Colonel Whitley, to which I refer you; and an additional one is, my great desire to promote the peace and happiness of our frontier fellow citizens, and our common country at large. This letter will be delivered to you by Sergeant McClellan, who I have sent with ten men, for that purpose, under instructions to follow you, if he does not sooner meet with you, to the banks of the Tennessee.

Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to Double-head, and other Chiefs and Warriors.

KNOXVILLE, November 1st, 1794.

William Blount, Governor in and over the territory of the United States of America, south of the river Ohio, and Superintendent of Indian Affairs, for the Southern district, to Double-head, and the other Chiefs and Warriors of the Lower Cherokees:

It is only two days since I wrote you, in answer to your letter of the 20th October, and informed you the citizens of the United States all wished peace with you, since you were determined to be at peace with them, and so I then believed. But now I have to tell you, that I am just informed that General Logan, of Kentucky, has raised, or is about to raise, a large army of volunteers, unauthorized by Government, to invade and destroy the Lower Cherokee towns. The reason given for raising this army to destroy the Lower towns is, that the people of the Lower towns have unprovokedly shed a great deal of blood of the frontier citizens, and stolen and robbed them of much property, which they yet hold in their hands, consisting of negroes and horses. I give you this information, that you may not charge the United States nor myself, of having deceived you, by telling you all wished peace, when a large party were just about to invade your country. I have sent to General Logan, informing him of the good talks that have passed between you and myself, with orders to desist from his intended invasion of your country, which I hope he will attend to, and return home; but it may be that he will not return, but pursue his first intention, and invade your country. Here I feel myself at a loss, in case General Logan does invade your country, how to advise you to act for the best. But knowing the Government of the United States wish peace with your nation, and all the world, and believing you have now seen the folly of war, and also wish peace, I advise you, in case General Logan does enter your country, that you all quit your towns, and remove your stock, and other property, to the woods, leaving your houses and such of your corn as you cannot remove, to the mercy of General Logan, and his party, and forbear to do him or his party, the least injury in person or property, relying that Government will compensate your loss of horses and corn, in preference to having the blood of their citizens shed in defence of them. Too much blood has been shed already, and if more is shed, it will increase the difficulty of securing the blessings of returning peace. Peace ought to be the wish of both parties, for, in peace consists the true interests and happiness of both parties. War will cost the United States much money, and some lives, but it will destroy the existence of your people, as a nation, forever.

I would advise you to deliver up at the Tellico block house, to John M'Kee, without delay, all the deserters, prisoners, negroes, and horses; then the people of Kentucky can have no more cause to invade your country.

The Cherokee chiefs are requested, after this letter has been explained to them at Will's town and the Look-out Mountain, to forward it to Mr. Dinsmoor, at the Turkey's town.

Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to John McKee.

KNOXVILLE, November 1st, 1794.

SIR:

Explain the enclosed letter to the Hanging Maw, and the Upper Cherokees, and immediately forward it by a runner, to the Lower towns; unsealed you have also a copy, which you are at liberty to show to whom you please, but not to give a copy to any body.

It has not been even hinted to me, that Logan, in case he succeeds in the destruction of the Lower towns, will pass up by the Upper towns, and do them much injury; yet, it is possible; and, to guard as much as possible against such conduct, I would advise that the Upper towns keep spies below, and in case of his advance, to evacuate their towns, taking with them their most valuable effects, and leaving their houses and corn to his mercy.

I cannot permit you to come up here, until the event of this lawless expedition of Logan's is known.

This letter will be delivered to you by Captain Ricard.

Mr. JOHN MCKEE, temporary agent to the Cherokees, resident at Tellico block house.

Copy of an order from Governor Blount to Serjeant M'Clellan.

KNOXVILLE, November 2d &amp; 3d, 1794.

The object of your being ordered on duty, is to go express with a letter to General Logan, who, from the information I have received, I have reason to believe, is on his march from Kentucky, with an army of volunteers, having an intention to invade the Lower Cherokee towns, unauthorized by Government.

My information respecting the time when the General would march from Kentucky, is so vague, as not to enable me even to form any tolerable conjecture, where or when you will most probably fall in with him; but it is certain, if he does not desist from his enterprise, that he will march by way of Mero district, and from thence, by way of Ore's trace, to the Tennessee, where Ore crossed it. You will take such course as will intercept him to the greatest certainty, before he arrives at the Tennessee, which will be to turn off the common trace to Nashville, at or near the Crab Orchard, and to proceed by such course as shall strike Ore's trace, from Nashville to the Tennessee, about midway between the two places; and upon striking of it, you will readily discover whether he has passed on towards the Tennessee or not; if he has, you will pursue to the Tennessee, if not, you will turn towards Mero district, and upon finding the General, you will deliver him the letter addressed to him. It may be, that you may fall in with a part of the army of General Logan, and not with himself, and to provide against such an event, I herewith deliver to you a copy of my letter to the General, and a copy of my letter to Colonel Whitley, also a newspaper, containing copies of Double-head's letter to me, of the 20th October, and my answer of the 29th, all of which you will read publicly to such party, and make known to them, that it is my order and command to them, to desist from their attempt to invade the Lower Cherokee towns. And should General Logan, upon your delivering the letter to him, refuse to open it, or after he does open it, should neglect to make the contents known, you will, in either case, inform him that you have it in command from me, to order him, and the men with him, to desist from his and their intended invasion of the Cherokee country; and in either case, you will read aloud to him and the men with him, or under his command, the letters above mentioned. And to the end that no party may enter the Cherokee towns or country, unadvised of their danger, you are commanded to declare to all and every party, who appear to have the entering of either their object, that I have apprised the Indians of their approach, and you may add that I have considered it my official duty so to do, and that a copy of my letter to the Indians, on that head, will appear in the next number of the Knoxville Gazette, to the end that the impartial public may judge of the propriety of my conduct in so doing.

You have also, herewith, a letter addressed "General Robertson or Colonel Winchester, Mero district," with which you will despatch two of your command, from the Crab orchard, along the old trace, directly to Colonel Winchester's, and from thence to General Robertson.

Having completed this order, so far as respects General Logan, you may return directly to this place, or go into the Cumberland settlements, and refresh from five to ten days, and return to this place, to be mustered out of service.

Sergeant M'CLELLAN.

MONDAY MORNING, November 3d, 1794.

Having received more certain information of the intended movements of General Logan, namely, that he, with his party, are to rendezvous at the foot of the Cumberland mountain, on the north side, on the 9th instant, I find it proper to order that you, instead of turning off to the left, at the Crab orchard, push directly, with all possible haste, to Mero district, where you probably will arrive before the General leaves that district, and deliver the letter to him; but, should he have marched from Mero district before your arrival, you will instantly follow him, and pursue to the banks of the Tennessee, if you do not sooner overtake him. You are to consider the order of the 2d instant in force, except where this order otherwise directs.

Sergeant McCLELLAN.

*Copy of a letter from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, dated*KNOXVILLE, November 10th, 1794.

Sir:

Enclosed are copies of sundry papers, a list of which is subjoined, serving to inform you of the pleasing prospects of peace with the Lower Cherokee towns. It is now my opinion these towns wish peace with the United States with great sincerity, and that that sincerity has its source in the victory obtained by General Wayne over the Northern Indians, in the successful attack made by Major Ore upon Running Water and Nickajack; and in the decided part taken by the Upper Cherokees against the Creeks, whereby they may eventually be brought into a war with that nation. The frontier people, too, generally, appear as sincerely to wish peace with the Indians; and that they have, without exception, in the districts of Hamilton and Washington, quit the stations or forts, and moved out to their farms, affords a proof of their entire confidence in the assurances of the Cherokees.

Permit me, sir, to congratulate you on these pleasing prospects of peace, and to assure you, that you could not have received the many accounts of murders and thefts, by the Cherokees committed, which I have been compelled to give, with more pain than I penned them.

It remains yet to realize these prospects, that are to secure a continuance of peace between the United States and the whole of the Cherokee nation, which I have the most sanguine hopes is practicable, provided the Government of Great Britain or Spain, nor the subjects of either, do not stimulate them to murder or rob the citizens of the United States, and provided the Creeks can also be induced or taught to desist from killing the citizens of the United States.

One great source of hostility with the Cherokees has been horse stealing, which, it is to be feared, will be continued, if measures are not taken to prevent it; and one of the most effectual is, to stop the sale from the Indians to the white people; which can only be done by proper persons, under the appointment and in the pay of the United States, being posted at the places where the horses stolen are carried to the settlements for sale. The markets within the United States, for the three last years, for stolen horses, have been Swannano in North Carolina, the settlements at the foot of the Oconee mountain in South Carolina, and at Tugelo in Georgia. From one to twenty at a time have been carried and sold at one or other of these places, without being in the least degree (that I have heard of) prevented by the law, now in force against that iniquitous and injurious traffic. The most probable remedy that presents itself to me, for the prevention of this traffic, would be, to divide a company of the Federal troops into three parts, and station one at some well chosen spot upon the Indian boundary, near each of those places, the officer at each post to have authority as to the execution of the law respecting trade with Indians, with additional pay for that duty. If it should be asked why I have not suppressed this traffic at these places, the answer is, that neither is within the country I have the honor to govern, and that the whole of them are very distant from me; the nearest, Swannano, upwards of one hundred miles. These posts would also serve as trading posts, and the only ones necessary, upon the frontiers of the States in which they respectively shall be, as well as posts for the preservation of peace and order between the whites and the Indians.

In this country, early after my arrival, I issued a proclamation forbidding the citizens to purchase horses from Indians, which has been strictly obeyed; while the Indians have continued to steal horses from them, and to carry them to the three before mentioned markets. It will be readily seen, that the officers, commanding at these posts, ought to be appointed with an eye to the duties they are to perform.

I have heretofore informed you, that I had made five detachments from the Federal company at this place, and posted them at different places on the frontiers, in advance of the settlements of Knox county, Hamilton district; and, to save you the trouble of having recourse to my letters, I mention three of them, which, in my opinion, ought to be permanently kept up, namely, the post at Southwest point, which is situate upon the south bank of the Clinch, within half a mile of its junction with the Tennessee, forty miles from this place, and twenty-five in advance of the settlements (the road from this place to Nashville passes the Clinch at this post); fort Granger, upon the north bank of the Holston, at its junction with the Tennessee, twenty-two miles from this place, and seven in advance of the settlements; and Tellico block house, on the north bank of the Tennessee, immediately opposite the remains of fort Loudoun, thirty-two miles from this place, and seven in advance of the settlements: the two first for the preservation of peace and order between the citizens of the United States and the Indians only; the latter also to serve for that purpose, and for a trading post through which all intercourse with the upper part of the nation, by myself or others of this territory, should take place.

With respect to the district of Mero, the most difficult settlement in America to protect, I am more at a loss what to recommend as a probable mean of preserving peace between the citizens of it and the Cherokees. This district is ninety miles from east to west, and its extreme width, from north to south, does not exceed thirty miles, surrounded by a heavy timber, &c. no five miles of which, together, but what has been stained with the blood of the inhabitants, since my arrival in this country. Hence, if it is contemplated to give effectual protection to this district, supposing the Indians should recommence hostilities, its situation being so well described to you, you can as well judge as any man as to the number of men necessary to give such protection. But the presumption with me, is, that the Cherokees, as a nation, wish peace with the United States, and that but few, if any, individuals of it will kill in future; then, as the most eligible plan that I can think of to induce the Indians to continue their friendship with that district, or, in other words, to awe them from depredations, is to establish a post, with a company of Federal troops, if the Cherokees will permit it, at the lower end of the valley formed by the Tennessee and the Cumberland mountain, on the north bank of the Tennessee, nearly opposite the mouth of Look-out mountain creek, where there is a good ford across the river. The advantages of this post would be, that, while it awed the evil disposed, it would serve as a trading post, in the midst of the Indian hunting grounds, which would tend, by the daily intercourse, to humanize the savage mind, and more firmly strengthen the friendship between the respective parties; another advantage of this post, and, in my opinion, a very essential one, would be, that, if, after all attempts to preserve peace with the Lower towns, they should recommence hostilities, it would afford a proper place for a repository of provisions for militia or other troops, who might be employed to teach these towns the value of peace. You will readily see, to this post, there is a water conveyance down the Tennessee and its different branches, from every quarter of this country. From Southwest Point, (the mouth of Clinch) the distance to it is about one hundred miles, all the way down a valley so open and level, that twenty-five pioneers can clear a road as fast as a wagon could be driven, along which, troops destined against the Lower towns, could, at all times, pass to that post. Its distance from Will's town, the most distant of the Lower towns from it, would not exceed forty miles, and not above twenty to the Look-out mountain, Running Water, or Nickajack, the two latter of which will probably be rebuilt. In other words, while it will awe the evil disposed to keep the peace, and to strengthen and cherish the friendship of the friendly, it will serve to render extremely easy and certain the chastisement and destruction of the Lower towns, in case they recommence hostilities, by a body of militia, that can, at any time, be raised at a weeks' notice, and, in one month, destroy the towns, and be returned to their respective homes. The Captain who commands at this post, to be a person proper for conducting Indian affairs, with an additional salary. General Robertson, and others, of the best informed of the Cumberland people, are of opinion that this post would more probably give quiet to them, than the establishment of any other post or posts, except such numbers were established as would actually cover their whole frontier, which is at least two hundred miles, and would, at least, require a brigade. It will be recollected, I recommend this post in case the Cherokees will agree to it, respecting which, I have made no inquiry; but if the Indians of the Lower towns are as fully impressed with their own folly, or with fear that the frontier people will no longer bear their many murders and thefts, as I believe they are, it is my opinion I can obtain their permission for its establishment, for a small annuity, if not on the score of being particularly beneficial to them, which I verily believe it would be. At this time, too, I possess, with the principal chiefs and other leading characters, not only of the Lower towns, but of the whole nation, a very great share of their confidence and attachment, owing, as they declare, to their being now truly sensible that, if it had not been for my efforts, the frontier people would long since have overrun their nation, and taken their country; and my conduct towards them, in Logan's affair, can but confirm that opinion. These posts being established, would, in my opinion, supersede the necessity of an agent in the nation. It is also my opinion, that no person whatever, ought to be permitted to carry trade to the Indians, but at one or the other of these posts, under the eye of the deputy or agent, residing at them, respectively. It is essential to the execution of this plan, that the officers, acting as deputies, at the different posts, should be men of good understanding, prudence, and address, and particularly, that John McKee, the present temporary agent, resident at Tellico block house, should continue there: for, besides his having a great share of the confidence of the nation, he is, from his abilities and knowledge of Indians, their habits and dispositions, the most proper man within my acquaintance or knowledge, for a deputy; and, if it should be necessary to his continuance, that he should be an officer, I can assure you that he is not only qualified, by his bodily and mental abilities, to perform the duties of a captain, but of a field or general officer.

I do not offer this as a plan of complete defence, but as a plan which, if executed, may probably prevent the necessity of it. But, lest I should be mistaken, and more effectual protection should become indispensably necessary, it may be proper I should repeat to you, that the districts of Washington and Hamilton have a very exposed frontier, of upwards of two hundred miles; upon almost every part of which the Indians have killed and robbed, since I have been in this country. Nor would I be understood as being so certain of the continuance of peace, pleasing as prospects are, as to render it unnecessary for Congress to provide against a change in the conduct of the Cherokees.

In your letter of 21st July, you say, "the goods which are at Knoxville, and promised to be delivered to the Cherokees, I pray may be done, without the least deduction whatever, as per invoice marked No. 2." A part of these goods had been delivered to Opoia Mingo and his party, on their way to Philadelphia, and, if I recollect, reported to you by Captain Chisolm. It was essential that Opoia Mingo and his party, should receive sundry articles to fit them for their journey to Philadelphia, and I judged it more to the interest of the United States, to furnish from the public store, than to purchase from individuals, at the advanced prices at which goods sell at this place; the remainder of them have mostly been delivered to the Cherokees, at Tellico block house, and proper vouchers of delivery taken, and the whole will be delivered at that place, at the time proposed for an exchange of prisoners, if not before, so that the account of delivery will be completed within the year, and the account exhibited for settlement.

I have long expected Mr. Dinsmoor at this place, but I have not yet heard of his arrival in the nation, and report says, he has returned to Philadelphia.

The Hanging Maw and the friendly part of the nation had, by some means, been informed that these goods were to be delivered to Double-head and his party, upon which he promptly demanded of Mr. McKee, whether they were to be delivered to Double-head, and his party of murderers, or to that part of the nation who had given proof of their friendship to the United States, by taking one Creek and killing two others in the settlements, as well as by other acts; if the latter, he said, the friendly part of the nation would know how to ensure the reward of the United States for their services. So far as they have been delivered, every part of the nation have received a part, but those who have given the greatest proofs of their friendship, have received the greatest share.

It is to be observed, that few, none that I know, of the latter description, attended at the Oconee mountain to receive any part of those brought from Philadelphia by Double Head; hence, upon that score, they had a claim to a good share.

May I ask, would it not be advisable to send on the annual payment for the year 1795, as early as possible; for, in the nature of Indian business, it is next to impossible to preserve their friendship, without occasionally bestowing some presents, and sometimes goods are wanting to reward particular ones, for meritorious services; I mean for the Cherokees and Chickasaws, and Choctaws too, if any are allowed for them, for goods are very dear, both here and at Nashville, and the necessity of occasionally purchasing small articles is submitted to with great reluctance.

That the Creeks will desist from their depredations upon Mero district, until compelled, I have not the least hope; nor do I entertain the least doubt but I can, if so instructed, in any short time, induce the Cherokees, (I believe the whole nation) the whole of the Chickasaws, a part of the Choctaws, and, eventually, the whole of them, to aid the arms of the United States, in the total destruction of that nation. The destruction of the Creeks, by the aid of these three nations, could be effected, not only much cheaper than by an army of citizens, but it would, to a certainty, prevent a combination of the Southern tribes at a future day, against the United States.

If the citizens of the United States do not destroy the Creeks, the Creeks will kill the citizens of the United States; the alternative is, to kill or be killed.

Under the impression that the prospects of peace with the Cherokees is such as may be relied upon, from a certain knowledge that the people in general are more unanimous, and better disposed to support peace and order, than for two years past, and with the hope that no change will take place in my absence, I solicit permission to visit Philadelphia, in the latter part of January, or early in February.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

WM. BLOUNT.

At a conference held on the 7th and 8th November, 1794, at Tellico block house, upon the north bank of the Tennessee, between William Blount, Governor in and over the territory of the United States of America south of the river Ohio, and Colonel John Watts, of Wil's town, (one of the Lower Cherokee towns) Scolacutta, or the Hanging Maw, and other chiefs of the Cherokee Nation; at which were present four hundred warriors and several citizens of the United States, namely, Colonel Abisha Thomas, Major Sevier, Major David Craig, Ensign Samuel R. Davidson, of the Federal troops, commanding at this post, and others.—James Carey, interpreter.

Governor BLOUNT: (addressing himself to Colonel Watts.) Upon being informed by Mr. McKee that you were here, and wished to see me about the affairs of your nation, I hastened to meet you. I am happy in this interview, because your presence here is an evidence of the wish of the Lower towns for peace, whose principal chief I have ever considered you, and in Scolacutta I behold the true head of your whole nation. Having opened the conference, I shall sit down, and first expect the talk of Colonel Watts.

Colonel WATTS.—This meeting appears to me ordered by the Great Spirit, and affords me great pleasure. There is Scolacutta; he is old enough to be my father, and from my infancy he was a great man, and is now the great chief of the nation. In the spring of the year he sent a talk to the Lower towns, telling them he and the Upper towns had taken the United States by the hand, with a determination to hold them fast during life, and inviting the Lower towns to do the same. With tears in my eyes have I thought of this talk, and beheld the folly of the Lower towns, who at first refused to hear it. But, just before the destruction of the Running Water and Nickajack, by Major Ore, I went to them as well as the Look-out Mountain town, and exerted myself for the restoration of peace, and I verily believe those towns had heard my talks, and were determined to be at peace with the United States. I do not say Running Water and Nickajack did not deserve the chastisement they received; nevertheless; it so exasperated those who escaped from the ruins, that, for a time, I was compelled to be silent myself; but the Glass went to the Running Water people, and they told the Glass that, notwithstanding the injury they had sustained, they had not forgot my good talks, but still held them fast, and desired me to take measures for the recovery of their prisoners. When this answer was reported to me by the Glass, I had my doubts, and could not act upon it; for they had told me so many lies, I was afraid to trust them. I then sent the Bloody Fellow to the Running Water, and he returned with the same report, which induced me to come forward to you, knowing you were the man the United States had authorized to transact such business. I deliver you this (presenting a string of white beads) as a true talk, and a public talk from the Lower towns to you. Scolacutta, the head of the nation, is sitting by me; the Lower towns instructed me to request him not to throw them away, but to come with me to you, and present this talk in their behalf.

By a prisoner taken by Major Ore, and sent back by General Robertson, I received a letter from him, requiring me to deliver up a white prisoner, and a certain number of negroes, and that the prisoners taken by Major Ore should all be restored to their nation. In this letter the General invited me to come in to him with a flag; but as the woman was pursued by some bad white people, and obliged to quit her horse, and save herself in the cane, although I know General Robertson to be a good man, I thought it imprudent to go to him; besides, I know that an exchange of prisoners could only be negotiated with you. As to the prisoners in my town, Will's town, there are none; and when the people of my town once took a man of great worth (Captain Handy) they restored him without price.

SCOLACUTTA, or the Hanging Maw. I too have a talk from the Lower towns; they were once my people, but not now; yet I cannot but think much about the talk I have now received by Watts. Before any thing happened to these towns, I had sent them many peace talks, which they would not hear; but now, since the attack made upon them by Major Ore, they send to me to make peace for them, in conjunction with Watts. I am the head-man of my nation, as Governor Blount is of the white people; it was not the fault of either that those towns were destroyed, but their own conduct brought destruction upon them; the trail of murderers and thieves was followed to those towns. Nevertheless, I cannot neglect the request they have made to me, to make peace for them; as I hope they have seen their folly, and will desist from murdering and robbing the people of the United States, and live in peace. I shall then hope to live much longer: for their bad conduct drew the white people on me, who injured me nearly unto death. This talk I deliver on the part of the Lower towns; and if they do not now desist from war, and live at peace, I will give them up to the United States, to deal with as they shall judge proper.

All last winter I was compelled to live in the woods, by the bad conduct of my own people drawing war upon me. In the spring of the year, a communication was opened with you; you invited me to meet your deputy, John McKee, in nine days, which I did. John McKee assured me of the peaceful disposition of the United States, and told me and my party to return to our houses and fields; this I also did. I could hear from several parts of the nation threats against my life, to be effected by killing the white people in my neighborhood, and thereby draw them on me and my friendly party. I then solicited that this block house or fort should be erected, as serving to protect me and my friendly party, as well as the frontier inhabitants, and open a communication between the white and red people. I still heard murmurings from several parts of my nation, with threats that they would have no intercourse with it, or with John McKee; but I see, now standing round me, many of those very people who are glad to come to it, and to be in friendship with John McKee, and at peace with the United States. They need not find fault with John McKee; I have found him to be an honest man, and never heard any thing from him but the truth.

November 8th.

Governor BLOUNT.—It is with pleasure I receive from you the information that the Lower Cherokees wish peace with the United States. When you, (addressing himself to Watts) the Bloody Fellow, and the Glass, the three greatest chiefs of the Lower towns, come forward with such assurances, I can no longer doubt the sincerity with which they are made. Peace with the whole Cherokee nation has ever been the wish of the United States, and it is yet their wish; so that the Lower towns have only to keep peace on their part, and it will be peace.

By saying the Lower towns requested you to take measures for the recovery of the prisoners, I understand that they wish an exchange of prisoners; to this I agree, and propose that a general exchange shall take place at this post, on the 18th of December. All negroes in your hands, whether captured, or absconded from their masters, are to be considered as prisoners in your hands, and are to be delivered up.

My letter to the chiefs of the Lower towns, of the 1st instant, has informed you of the threatened invasion of those towns by General Logan, with a large party of men from Kentucky, unauthorized by Government. I have now to add, as my advice to you and your people, that in case Logan should carry his intended invasion of your country into execution, and should he kill many or few of your people, or destroy little or much of your property, that it shall not prevent the meeting at this place on the 18th of December, and the proposed exchange of prisoners, when we will endeavor to heal all matters of difference that can at that time exist between the Lower towns and the United States; and in the mean time let the injuries received by your nation, from General Logan, be what they may, you will consult the happiness of your nation, and ensure the blessings of returning peace, by restraining the warriors from turning out and taking satisfaction. Peace must take place at some time, and the less blood is shed, the sooner and more easily will it be effected. I assure you, in case you do not oppose General Logan, nor take satisfaction for such injuries as he may do you, that the United States will pay you for the loss of such houses and corn as he may destroy; your other property you can move out of his way. The United States are very tender of their citizens, and love peace, and would prefer paying you for your houses and corn to having them killed in satisfaction for your injuries, or to being forced into a war with your nation.

It is essential to the happiness of your nation that I should speak plainly to you about the Creeks, by whose hands you are sensible the frontier inhabitants of this country have bled at every pore; they are without the pretext for such conduct—that these people have taken their lands: for is it not a fact, that, in the division of lands among the red people, that the ridge that divides the waters of Mobile and Tennessee bounds them on the north? Then they pass quite through the Cherokee or Chickasaw lands to arrive at our frontiers, and there kill our men at their ploughs, or our women and children in their houses.

If you would secure a continuance of peace with the United States, it will be a duty you owe to yourselves, as well as the United States, not to permit the Creeks to pass through your country; or, if any should slip through, and your people should discover them, on their return, with hair or horses, to seize them, and bring them to this place, as the Upper towns served one last summer.

I have now to tell you what I believe to be the general will of the United States, with respect to the Creeks; which is, if they do not immediately desist from murdering the frontier citizens, and also cease to rob them of their property, that, next spring or summer, they will see a strong and powerful army in their country; and it is well known that the Chickasaws, and part of the Choctaws, are great friends of the United States, and enemies of the Creeks, and it is recently proved that the upper part of your nation are determined no longer to submit to their insolence and injuries. You are at liberty to tell to the Creeks what I say, not so much as a threat, but as an information to them, to enable them to judge how best to seek their own happiness.

Colonel WATTS.—I wish the time proposed for the exchange of prisoners had been sooner; but, as I suppose you put it off to so distant a day to afford time to collect them, I agree to it. I fear the damage General Logan will do my people will be very great, but, as you advise, I shall instruct all my people, and whatever he may do, shall not prevent the proposed meeting and exchange of prisoners. What you say about the boundary of the Creeks' lands is right; but, they are a great and powerful nation, and the Cherokees are but few, and cannot prevent their passing through their lands, when they please, to war; and on their passage they kill our hogs and cattle, and steal our horses, which we dare not resent. The Upper Cherokees were right in seizing one last summer, and delivering him up to you, and in killing two others. They live far from the Creek country, and have the white people to support them; but the Lower towns are but few, live near the Creeks, and too distant from the white people to be supported by them. I know the Chickasaws, and five of the Choctaw towns, are friends of the United States, and will fight against their enemies.

SCOLACUTTA, or Hanging Maw.—I ordered the Creek seized, I ordered the two Creeks killed, I will kill my own people, if they kill white people. Here is some tobacco, sent by the Long Warrior, just delivered to me by a runner; you must smoke some of it. [Here a pipe was handed, and Scolacutta, Watts, the Governor, and others, smoked.] He speaks peace for his part of the nation; he has been long a head-man, and loves peace.

Governor BLOUNT.—I have omitted to give you the particulars of General Wayne's victory over the Northern Indians, (addressing himself to Watts) but if you wish to hear them, I will now give them.

Colonel WATTS.—I do not; some of my people were in the action, who have already informed me.

Governor BLOUNT.—Then I have nothing to add, except to repeat to you, and your nation, that peace is the wish of the United States.

TELlico BLOCK-HOUSE, October 28th, 1794.

SIR:

On the 24th instant, James Davidson, a distinguished chief from the valleys, with about four hundred and fifty of his people, arrived at this place.

On the twenty-fifth he met me, with the chiefs and warriors of his quarter, and, in council, delivered me a talk, which you will receive herewith enclosed, and a string of beads, mixed black and white; the white beads, he said, were emblematic of his friendship towards the United States, and the black of his enmity to the Creeks.

I told him that it was undoubtedly his duty, both as a friend to his own nation, and the United States, to apprehend and bring to this post, or put to death, any Creeks that he might see or hear of, passing through his nation, to injure the citizens of the United States; and if, on account of this conduct, he should be involved in a war with the Creeks, he would, undoubtedly, gain the confidence and friendship of the United States, who could not suffer their friends to be injured on their account. Considering the interest of Davidson and his party of consequence to the United States, I made considerable presents, out of the public goods in my possession, agreeably to your order, and supplied them with provisions. They staid here until this morning, when they took their leave, apparently much pleased with their treatment at this place, and declaring their promptness to lend all the assistance in their power to support the arms of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN McKEE.

Copy of a letter from John McKee to his Excellency Governor Blount, dated

TELlico BLOCK HOUSE, November 4, 1794.

SIR:

On the 29th ultimo, Tickagiskee, one of the chiefs who accompanied Double-head to Philadelphia, arrived at this place, with about three hundred Indians, from Hiwasee, Chestue, Tellico, and some from the valleys. They requested provisions, which I conceived it my duty to give. Tickagiskee confirmed a report which I had before heard from the Turkey's son, who was here a runner from Double-head, with the letter I sent you from Miller, that the Deer's-head, the mate of Double-head, and Dick Justice's brother, of the Look-out Mountain town, immediately after the breaking up of the conference at Seneca, had stolen eight horses from Connoross, a branch of Tugelo, and that a man had been shot there, supposed to have been done by the same party.

This day Colonel Watts arrived here from Will's town; his object, he says, is to negotiate for an exchange of prisoners. He expresses a great desire to see your Excellency, and I think your presence here will promote the interests of the United States much.

Watts says it is a fact, that, one or two days before the destruction of Nickajack, and the Running Water, two scalps were brought into the former, one by a Cherokee, a nephew of the Fool Warrior, and the other by a Creek fellow.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN McKEE.

A Talk delivered at Tellico block house, on the 25th day of October, 1794, by James Davidson, a distinguished chief of the Valley and Overhill Towns, of the Cherokees, to John McKee, agent to the said Cherokees, resident at that post.

I have been raised in the valleys; and because I not only avoided killing white people, and stealing their property myself, but have endeavored to restrain my young fellows from doing so, I was compared by the Lower towns to an old woman, and not much noticed by the white people. I have long sought a place where I might hold good talks, and now I am glad I have it in my power to take you, my oldest brother, by the hand, and hear your talk. I wish every body to hear my talk; I am a man, and will do what I say. The Creeks, and perhaps some of my own people, intend to strike the United States. I am the man who will throw down Creeks, and take their hair, and, with my part of the nation, will support the arms of the United States, though it should draw on me the vengeance even of my own people of the Lower towns. I know it is common with too many of the head-men of this nation, particularly of the Lower towns, to make great promises of friendship, which they have no notion of performing; but you shall soon have greater proofs than words of my sincerity.

NOTE.—James Davidson arrived at Tellico block-house on the 24th of October, with four hundred and fifty warriors from the Valley towns, and in their presence, and in the presence of Scolacutta, or the Hanging Maw, and many warriors of the Upper and Lower Cherokees, delivered the above talk.

KNOXVILLE, November 16, 1794.

SIR:

I cannot better inform you of the state of this district, than by forwarding copies of several letters I last night received, a list of which is subjoined, and an original letter from the Baron of Carondelet, Governor of Louisiana, to the chiefs of the Cherokee nation, taken by a soldier under the command of Major Ore, at the destruction of Nickajack.

I hope the recent murders committed in that district will prove, as General Robertson supposes, to have been perpetrated by Creeks.

I consider war with the Creeks unavoidable, and my hope of peace with the Cherokees is not abated, but increased, since it is certain that General Logan has been disappointed in his intended invasion of their country.

2. Colonel Winchester do. to do. 9th and 10th.
3. Major Doyle to General Robertson, October.

General Robertson to Governor Blount.

NASHVILLE, MERO DISTRICT, November 7th, 1794.

SIR:

I have the misfortune to inform your Excellency that the people of this district have been much alarmed in my absence, as well as before I left home. Signs of Indians were discovered on all quarters, making to the frontiers; a sergeant's command of mounted infantry were ordered out of every regiment in the district, to range in front of their respective settlements, and, to this end, Captain Evans and his command performed good service; to their exertions are attributed the saving of many lives, as companies of Indians, with every warlike appearance, were discovered approaching our settlements, but they contented themselves with stealing some horses, and made off with precipitation.

At this time we have no reason to believe that any enemy Indians are in or about our settlements; they have carried off a number of horses; among them, two valuable mares belonging to my son, Jonathan Robertson, which were taken from my cornfield on the 24th ultimo. Watkins was killed and scalped at the corner of Colonel Winchester's fence, near his mill. On the 26th, Cornet Evans' detachment was fired on by Indians (three guns) after dark, between Colonel Winchester's and Bledsoe's Lick, as he was returning from a scout; he received no injury. Much credit is due to that officer, for his exertions in protecting that frontier, which has been more alarmed of late, than since the country was first settled. The widow Bledsoe, is actually about to remove, as are many other families.

We are informed by the Chickasaws, that the Indians lately on our borders have been altogether Creeks; they, the Chickasaws, saw several families of Cherokees moving to L'ance la Grace, as well as six canoes of men and corn going down the Tennessee, to settle there; all agreed that they were tired of war, and were going there to live peaceably, and that their nation, generally, wished peace; but doubted whether the Creeks would not delude some of their silly young men, and gave that as their reason for moving. A few days before the said canoes arrived at Occochappo, where a large party of the Chickasaws were waiting the arrival of the Mountain Leader, with the goods from Philadelphia, the Creeks reported that the Cherokees had killed him and his party, which so exasperated them, that William and George Colbert formed a party of Chickasaws on each side of the Tennessee, to cut off the Cherokees who were expected in the canoes, but Levi Colbert, and some others, prevailed on them to desist, until certain intelligence could be obtained. Shortly after the passing of these canoes, another was going down with corn, one man, two women, and two children. William Colbert hailed, and ordered them to come on shore, but they bore away, which, he alleged, proved their guilt, and gave chase. The Cherokees took to land, the man hid, the others kept on, were taken, and brought back; the man was found, whom Colbert tomahawed and scalped. The death of this fellow is related to me as a secret; no person here, besides McCleish and myself, are informed of it. William Colbert declares, if the Cherokees retaliate, that he will cry havoc! and let loose the dogs of war through their whole nation, alleging them to be the first aggressors.

Levi Colbert, and one other Chickasaw, left my house yesterday; their business was to inquire after the Mountain Leader and his party.

I have enclosed, to your Excellency, Major Doyle's letter, and have permitted him to keep Ensign Bird, and his detachment, till further orders, or, as long as he may judge their service essential to the United States.

November 8.

Last night, about 12 o'clock, an express arrived, informing me that Colonel Isaac Fitzworth, and his brother, John Fitzworth's families were murdered on the waters of Red river; seven persons were killed and scalped on the spot, and their property taken; these families were moving, and encamped in the woods, but not more than four miles from the settlement. The Indians were followed, and three prisoners retaken, all scalped; one has since died, the others are so wounded, their heads being altogether skinned, that their lives are despaired of; the property was likewise retaken, together with a considerable quantity of Indian property. It is supposed there were at least fifty Indians, who, by keeping a good look out in their rear, discovered their pursuers, and thought proper not to risk an engagement; one negro likewise escaped, badly wounded.

On the 24th ultimo, John Leiper, and another man, were fired on by Indians, near Leiper's house; this proves the information given us by the Chickasaws, that the Creeks had declared publicly their intentions of distressing this district, or, if able, to extirpate it altogether, to be just. Is it possible that this Congress will not take measures to check the Creeks? Nothing less will do than putting to death some of the aggressors, or making a campaign against the towns. Levi Colbert tells me that his two brothers bid him inform, that, if the United States will send an army against the Creeks, they, the Chickasaws, will keep them from running away on the other side, and that they had been notified that the Tuckaubatchees had sent to the Chickasaws, that, if they should lose a man, they may know what has become of him, as that town had missed the Mad Dog's brother. So, it appears, they expect war, for they declare they will take no insult from the Creeks or Cherokees.

I will write your Excellency, more particularly, an account of Colonel Fitzworth's defeat, by Captain Evans.

Colonel Winchester to Governor Blount.

CRAG FORT, November 9, 1794.

SIR:

The Indians continue their depredations as usual; on Friday the 24th ultimo, Evan Watkins was killed and scalped, within one hundred yards of my mill; he was shot with nine balls, and a tomahawk left sticking in his skull. Though I was with his body in a few minutes after the guns were fired, the murderers had fled, and were out of sight; I found it impossible to track them with the best woodsmen, and I can assure your Excellency, that no pains or vigilance were spared on this occasion.

The day following, Cornet Evans discovered recent signs of about 12 fellows, who had crossed the road between Bledsoe's lick and Shaver's cabins; the dryness of the season, the falling of the leaves, together with the quantity of stock ranging here, rendered it out of our power to trace them any distance. The next day, Sunday evening, Cornet Evans was fired on by three or four fellows, between Mrs. Bledsoe's and this place. On the following Wednesday the spies discovered twelve Indians crossing Cumberland river, at the mouth of Buffalo Run, about five miles from this place. These several parties of Indians, appearing in and about the settlement at and near the same time, have alarmed the inhabitants unusually; every body in this neighborhood has for some time remained shut up in stations, like besieged garrisons, no intercourse or communication kept up amongst them, except by strong parties of armed men. I have visited the most exposed places on the frontier of this county, and I hear nothing but clamoring for more effectual protection. They say, if Congress knew their deplorable situation, and have the feelings of men, they would not suffer a banditti of merciless savages to murder the citizens of the United States continually, with impunity. They will not believe that a faithful account of their situation ever reached the ears of the President of the United States.

I am credibly informed that General Logan has not met with the success he expected, in raising men for his intended expedition, and that it is therefore necessarily laid aside, until a more favorable opportunity.

I enclose, for your Excellency's perusal, an original letter, from the Baron of Carondelet, to the Cherokee nation, taken at Nickajack.

MONDAY, November 10, 1794.

SIR:

Since writing the foregoing, I received your packet by Sergeant McClellan, directed to General Robertson or myself; your Excellency will no doubt be informed, before this reaches you, that not above thirty men met General Logan at his general rendezvous, and that of course and necessity he has not marched on his intended expedition. Ten men, I am informed, arrived a few days ago at Nashville, on their way to meet Colonel Whitley, to let him know that the expedition had failed, &c. I have a pleasure, sir, in saying, that I verily believe but few men in Mero district will be found marching on an unauthorized expedition, though against a sanguine and bitter enemy, whose savage cruelty most of us have witnessed.

Peace always sounds sweet in our ears, but we have so often been deceived by them, that we must actually experience peace before we can rejoice, which is the first and greatest wish of your obedient servant.

Eight o'clock at night.

I am just now informed, that two families, by the name of Titsworth, on their way from Tennessee county to Logan county, at a place called the Double Licks, were, on Wednesday night last, surprised by a party of about thirty Indians; seven were left dead on the spot, and five were taken prisoners; they were pursued the next day, and three of the prisoners retaken, though scalped and tomahawked; one is since dead, and the others are expected to die.

Major Doyle to General Robertson.

FORT MASSAC, October, 1794.

SIR:

Ensign Bird, with his detachment, arrived here the 19th instant, and handed me your letter of the 8th. I am happy to find my requisition answered by you in a manner which I think so advantageous to the interest of the United States; my views in making it have been altogether directed to that point; as I conceive that the protection of a valuable settlement, and of the trade along this stream, will be greatly promoted thereby. I have informed the Commander-in-chief and the Secretary of War, of my said requisition, of the views which prompted me to it, and of your ready compliance with the same.

I keep five men to watch the mouth of the Cumberland, and as many that of the Tennessee, with a canoe to each party, so that in case of their making any discovery, I may receive the earliest information, which I shall transmit to you by a runner, if need be; this party will be relieved every third or fourth day, and I have my hopes, from the character of Mr. Bird, that the service will be performed to the advantage of the Union.

The mere defence of my garrison, from the number of my men, is all that Government will expect from me, particularly when my sick are taken into consideration; my desire to be useful to my country, and fellow citizens at large, dictated this measure, which I saw pregnant with public utility, and it is my happiness to find, that my principles are not mistaken on this particular head.

I send two men, agreeably to your request. I have no doubt, as Governor Blount will see the advantages to be derived to your settlement from such stations, that he will fully approve of your compliance with my request; they, indeed, appear to be not only proper, but such as ought to be kept up by your Government: for you well know my force to be only adequate to protect what falls immediately under my view; and the danger arising to the navigation, from the Cumberland and Tennessee, to be too far out of my reach to afford assistance in case of need.

Ensign Bird shall be in readiness to cover any boats up the Cumberland that you may desire. You will be pleased to mention the day.

Mr. McCleish to Governor Blount.

CUMBERLAND, November 7th, 1794.

SIR:

I embrace the opportunity of acquainting you, that, on my arrival here, at General Robertson's, I met with Levi Colbert, from the mouth of Bear creek, who informed me, that the Indians had got intelligence that the Mountain Leader and his company were taken by the Cherokees, on which, the said Levi Colbert and another Chickasaw were sent in to get information of the same. The Chickasaws, hearing of six canoes of the Cherokees coming down the river, the Chickasaws waited on both sides of the river, under the determination to kill and destroy the whole of them; but the above mentioned Levi Colbert, and a few more, pleaded very hard to the contrary, and at length prevailed to let them pass, till they could be better informed. But Bill Colbert, not being fully satisfied, fell on a canoe that had one Cherokee man, and two women, and two children in it; he killed the fellow and scalped him, and has got the women and children prisoners. I understand that he will send them in here, as some of the Indians are not agreed to take them to the nation, for it is kept as secret as possible, till the boats get down. There is nobody that has heard of the same, but General Robertson and myself, but I thought it my duty to inform your Excellency of it. I have complied with the Leader's request to me, that was, to despatch word to his people at the river, to wait with patience, and if any of them should be gone home, to have them sent for. I have done according to his directions, which is carried by Levi Colbert, who was very glad to hear from him, as his staying so long, over the time appointed to meet at the Muscle Shoals, they were very doubtful some accident had happened him, and the chief part of the Indians had gone home.

Yesterday, arrived here, one Choctaw, from the army Northwest of the Ohio, but has no news worth relating; so, I am happy to have the happiness of being you Excellency's humble servant.

The Baron of Carondelet to the Cherokees, dated

NEW ORLEANS, July 4th, 1794.

Answer to the talk of Ouletays and Tetinkee, chiefs of the Cherokee nation.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

The Governor of Pensacola has sent me your talk, which I have received with all the consideration and satisfaction it deserves. Be assured, that it is engraved in my heart; I love all the red people in general, and only wish for their preservation and happiness. The Great King my master, who protects all those who implore his assistance, is desirous that the Cherokee nation should live in peace, and multiply the lands of its ancestors, like the star of the firmament. I have directed to him, the complaints of the whole nation; open your ears and be attentive to what he has ordered me to say to all the Cherokees.

The war against the inhabitants of the United States is of long standing, and, consequently, it is difficult to know whether the Cherokees are in the fault or not. But since the Cherokee nation, entering into a treaty of alliance and friendship with Spain, desires that the great king should be a mediator between it and the United States, for a final and permanent marking of limits, which should leave no motive of dispute or enmity on either side, the great king, conformably to the 3d, 7th, and 8th articles of the treaty concluded at the Zazon, by which it puts itself under his protection, is at present occupied in the arrangement of all his differences, and requests the Cherokee and Creek nations to suspend all hostilities, and remain on their own lands, content with defending themselves in case of being attacked there: for a nation cannot, from time to time, prevent evil disposed white men, without orders, from committing mischief on some red men. But, on a complaint to the chiefs of the white men, justice will be rendered them, and it is only in case of a refusal, that they are entitled to take it themselves.

The great king desires that the nation shall live in peace with the inhabitants of the United States; the powder, balls, guns, clothes, vermilion, bracelets, &c., which he gives to the nation, are only the voluntary effect of his goodness, and, that it may not be jealous of others, the arms are for hunting, and the clothes to preserve them from the cold. He makes an annual present to the nations in amity with him, as a mark of his remembrance, but not to put them in a situation of maintaining themselves without hunting or labor. Should an attempt be made to deprive his friends of their lands, or drive them from their villages, then, the great king will give them arms and ammunition in abundance, to defend themselves and make war; he will make it with them, to force their enemies to restore what they have usurped, and to leave his allies in peace.

I will propose to the great king, to send Mr. Francis Bellestre to the nation; but I do not know him of whom you speak, when you say you will not have the American I have given you.

The great king is in friendship with so many nations of red men, that it is impossible to tell their number. As he is the father of all, it becomes him to distribute something to each nation; he cannot, therefore, give to one alone, all that you demand. Next spring, the nation will receive another present, like all the rest, but not before: for there is mention made in the treaty, but of one annual present.

I wish you a good journey, a good hunt, and the observation of the treaty which I have asked for you of Congress, since the first of April, and until the great king arranges all the differences of the nation, which will be in a very short time. I cordially shake hands with you, and bear in my heart the remembrance of you and yours.

KNOXVILLE, 18th November, 1794.

SIR:

Upon reviewing my letter to you, of the 10th instant, I discover that I have omitted what appears to me, may eventually be essential to the preservation of the peace with the Cherokees, which is, in case of a murder being committed by a Cherokee, or Cherokees, that satisfaction shall instantly be demanded of the town, or towns, in which the murderer, or murderers, live, and, if not given, taken. Such conduct on the part of the United States will probably prevent a repetition of murders, without bringing on a national war. But, admit it should bring on a national war, it could be terminated in the course of a few months, at less expense of blood and treasure than defensive protection would cost, upon so extended and exposed a frontier. All my experience in Indian affairs teaches to believe, that decided and positive measures with them are best.

From Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, November 22d, 1794.

SIR:

Enclosed is a copy of my order to General Robertson, of this date, which I have judged necessary to forward to your office, that you may be informed of the degree of protection I have ordered to be afforded to the district of Mero.

From Governor Blount to Brigadier General James Robertson, dated

KNOXVILLE, November 22d, 1794.

SIR:

In pursuance of the instructions of the Secretary of War, of the 14th April, 1794, I, on the 29th May, issued orders to the respective colonels of the counties composing the district of Mero, for the protection thereof, until the first day of December. I issued them directly to the Colonels, and not through you, because you were absent from the district.

Enclosed herewith you have a copy of that order of the Secretary of War, in which you can but observe, that the Secretary has fixed the first of December as a probable point at which the degree of protection authorized, would become unnecessary; hence I limited my orders, of the 29th May, to the respective Colonels, to that period.

You will observe, that the Secretary, in the latter part of the first paragraph, has the words, "or longer if the danger shall render the said defence indispensable." Now, sir, you are to consider the said order of the 14th April, in force, as to the degree of protection you are to afford the district of Mero, against hostile parties of Indians, until the first day of April, and give orders accordingly. Troops will not be sent to the defence of Mero district, from Washington and Hamilton districts, except in case of an invasion by a numerous party of Indians. Captain Evans is at present on duty under that order of the Secretary, who, as has already been ordered, is to remain until the last of December; that is, to be mustered out of service on that day, at this place, so that the party which succeeds him, is not to take place before the first day of January. Would it not be well to order the mounted infantry, who succeed him, from every part of the district of Mero, say ten from Sumner, fifteen from Davidson, and five from Tennessee counties; this would afford an opportunity to pick the most active men, and best horses, and let the whole three months be so served by one party. The greatest, or principal service, so small a party can do, is to act as spies; hence it will be necessary that it should be divided, and range in advance of the frontiers.

All militia in service in the district of Mero, for the protection thereof, to be mustered out, and discharged on the last day of December, in which number is to be included Lieutenant Bird and his company, sent, by your order, to fort Massac. The post at the ford of Cumberland appears to me an essential one, and, if possible, under the order of the Secretary. I wish it kept up by the militia of Mero district, until the first day of April.

You cannot be too particular in reporting to me the murders and thefts committed by Indians in the district of Mero, and it is my wish that you should, as minutely as possible, report to me every party of Indians that is discovered on the frontiers, even if such party does no mischief.

From Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, November 28th, 1794.

SIR:

I am still under the painful necessity to report to you, that the Creeks continue to murder the citizens of the United States, resident in this territory, in their houses and fields, for the particulars of which, I refer you to the copies of the several letters yesterday received express from General Robertson, a list of which is subjoined.

Permit me to repeat, that I have not the least doubt but the Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Cherokees, will readily aid the arms of the United States, in chastising and humbling this blood thirsty nation, who, for upwards of ten years, without the least provocation, have killed the citizens of this territory, and robbed them of their property, with an almost unremitting hand. The killing and scalping the Cherokee, by the Chickasaws, at the mouth of Bear Creek, is a thing not to be wished, since the Cherokees appear so sincerely to desire peace with the United States; but I have no doubt but this breach can be healed, if it should be judged necessary to unite them against the Creeks. It will be observed, that I have written in positive terms, that the Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Cherokees, will aid the arms of the United States against the Creeks, but it is to be understood with a proviso; which is, that I must have the earliest instructions, as to the wish of the United States, on that head, to the end that I may be enabled to speak to them in decided terms, which, as yet, I have forborne to do.

The districts of Washington and Hamilton enjoy an entire peace. The friendly Cherokees serve as a guard against the hostile Creeks.

Copy of a letter from Brigadier General Robertson to Governor Blount.

NASHVILLE, November 15, 1794.

SIR:

Your Excellency will have a view of the sufferings and apprehensions of the people of this district, when you cast your eye over the enclosed letters of Mr. John Easten, and Mr. Anthony Crutcher, last night delivered to me by Mr. James, express.

I have ordered Captain Evans, with that part of his command which was near this place, to Clarksville, augmented with a sergeant's command, to scout on the frontiers of Tennessee county, for fifteen days, and to return to this place; from thence, on the south of Cumberland; which will, I trust, prevent the settlement about Clarksville from breaking, and afford a temporary relief. The detachment of militia that pursued the Indians, who killed the families of Colonel Fittsworth, and his brother, have not yet returned. I believe that a large party of Creeks are encamped, low down on the Tennessee river, for the purpose of annoying the frontiers of this district; and I have no doubt, but it is the Creeks who killed Colonel Fittsworth's and Colonel Sevier's families. The information of the Chickasaws, warrants this belief and opinion. Should not Congress, this session, take measures for chastising the Creeks, it is impossible to say to what extremities the people of this district will be driven. Five Chickasaws and four Choctaws have been at my house for several days; they brought me the Cherokee scalp, taken by the former, on the Tennessee, at the mouth of Bear creek, and offered, if encouraged by the United States, to scout in the Cherokee hunting grounds, and kill all they could. I thought it best to keep the United States clear of blame, on that head, and left them to their own opinions. They were particular in their inquiries, how much longer the murders and thefts of the Creeks would be borne, and when an army would march against them, expressing their desire to lend a hand. I understood a party of the Choctaw chiefs intend, next spring, to visit the President. A small part of the Kentucky volunteers of General Logan arrived in this district, but readily obeyed your orders to desist from invading the Cherokees, and received, with pleasure, the news of the overtures of peace from the Lower towns.

Besides its being essential that you should be acquainted with the alarms that prevail in this district, resulting from the late murders, it has appeared to me of importance that you should receive the earliest information, to the end that it may be immediately transmitted to Congress, in the early part of the session. Therefore, I have forwarded this letter to you, express, by Samson Williams, who leaves this place to-morrow morning.

Heretofore, the Creeks generally afforded us a respite for murder and thefts, during the session of Congress, as if they had been guided by some directing hand; but at present, they have been more bold, or less cautious, and I hope their punishment will be more certain.

P. S. Since writing the above, I am informed that, on the 12th instant, the Indians killed John Covington, on his way from the Red Bank to Muddy river, in Kentucky.

DEAR BROTHER:

Yesterday I was a spectator to the most tragical scene that ever I saw in my life. The Indians made an attack on Colonel Sevier's station, killed Snyder, his wife, and child, one of Colonel Sevier's children, and another wounded and scalped, which must die. On hearing the guns, four or five of us ran over; we found the poor old Colonel defending his house with his wife. It is impossible to describe this scene to you. Mr. James, who goes to you, and was an eye witness, can give you the particulars. The crying of women and children in town, the bustle and consternation of the people, being all women and children, but the few that went out to Sevier's, was a scene which cannot be described. This is a stroke we have long expected, and from every intelligence, we hourly expect this place to be assailed by the enemy. Colonel Sevier is now moving, and the town will not stay longer than Mr. James' return. My wife now lies on her bed, so ill that it would be death to move her; thus are we situated. This place will, without doubt, be evacuated in a day or two, unless succor is given by the people from the interior part. Pray ask the influence of Major Tatum, Douglass, and all our friends, with General Robertson, to guard us, or at least help us away.

CLARKSVILLE, November 12, 1794.

DEAR SIR:

I flatter myself that the contents of this letter will be as seriously considered as the premises demand. Yesterday, about eleven o'clock in the morning, a heavy firing commenced at Colonel Sevier's, by a party of about twelve or fifteen Indians. The Colonel bravely defended his own house, and kept the savage band from entering; but they cruelly slaughtered all around him; three of his own children fell dead; Charles Snyder, and two small children, also fell. Unfortunately for us, in this place, we were not prepared to go to their assistance, for the want of men; however, I was on the ground the first man, and was the first spectator to behold the horrid sight—some scalped and barbarously cut to pieces; some tomahawked very inhumanly, and the poor helpless infants committed to the torturing flames. However, without entering farther into the horrors of this barbarous massacre, suffice it to say, that we consider ourselves in imminent danger. Indian signs almost in every quarter, which lead us to think, we stand in great need of protection. This is the object of this letter, favored by Mr. Daniel James, who comes mostly on this particular business, and I hope his journey, or the cause of his journey, will be attended to; if not, I am confident Clarksville will be evacuated; but, I flatter myself, a protection will be willingly and speedily granted.

NOTE.—Clarksville is distant from Knoxville, west, two hundred and twenty miles. The courts of Tennessee county are held at Clarksville.

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 30, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you, for your consideration, certain additional articles of the treaty with the Cherokees, stipulated the 28th of June last, together with the conferences* which occasioned the formation of the said articles.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 30, 1794.

Articles of a Treaty between the United States of America, and the Cherokee Indians.

Whereas the treaty made and conducted on Holston river, on the second day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety one, between the United States of America and the Cherokee nation of Indians, has not been fully carried into execution, by reason of some misunderstandings which have arisen:

ART. 1. And whereas the undersigned, Henry Knox, Secretary for the Department of War, being authorized thereto by the President of the United States, in behalf of the said United States; and the undersigned chiefs and warriors, in their own names, and in behalf of the whole Cherokee nation; are desirous of re-establishing peace and friendship between the said parties, in a permanent manner, do hereby declare, that the said treaty of Holston is, to all intents and purposes, in full force, and binding upon the said parties, as well in respect to the boundaries therein mentioned, as in all other respects whatever.

ART. 2. It is hereby stipulated that the boundaries mentioned in the fourth article of the said treaty, shall be actually ascertained and marked, in the manner prescribed by the said article, whenever the Cherokee nation shall have ninety days' notice of the time and place at which the commissioners of the United States intend to commence their operation.

ART. 3. The United States, to evince their justice, by amply compensating the said Cherokee nation of Indians for all relinquishments of land made, either by the treaty of Hopewell, upon the Keowee river, concluded on the twenty-eighth of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, or the aforesaid treaty made upon Holston river, on the second of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, do hereby stipulate, in lieu of all former sums to be paid annually, to furnish the Cherokee Indians with goods suitable for their use, to the amount of five thousand dollars yearly.

ART. 4. And the said Cherokee nation, in order to evince the sincerity of their intentions in future, to prevent the practice of stealing horses, attended with the most pernicious consequences to the lives and peace of both parties, do hereby agree, that, for every horse which shall be stolen from the white inhabitants by any Cherokee Indians, and not returned within three months, that the sum of fifty dollars shall be deducted from the said annuity of five thousand dollars.

ART. 5. The articles now stipulated will be considered as permanent additions to the treaty of Holston, as soon as they shall have been ratified by the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined between the United States of America and the whole Cherokee nation, the parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, in the city of Philadelphia, within the United States, this twenty-sixth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

GENERAL VIEW.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 30, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senateand of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a report made to me by the Secretary of War, respecting the frontiers of the United States. The disorders and the great expenses which incessantly arise upon the frontiers, are of a nature and magnitude to excite the most serious considerations.

I feel a confidence that Congress will devise such constitutional and efficient measures as shall be adequate to the great objects of preserving our treaties with the Indian tribes, and of affording an adequate protection to our frontiers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 30th, 1794.

The Secretary of War respectfully submits to the President of the United States the following observations respecting the preservation of the peace with the Indian tribes with whom the United States have formed treaties:

To retrace the conduct of the Government of the United States towards the Indian tribes, since the adoption of the present constitution, cannot fail to afford satisfaction to every philosophic and humane mind.

A constant solicitude appears to have existed in the Executive and Congress, not only to form treaties of peace with the Indians, upon principles of justice, but to impart to them all the blessings of civilized life of which their condition is susceptible.

That a perseverance in such principles and conduct will reflect permanent honor upon the national character, cannot be doubted. At the same time, it must be acknowledged that the execution of the good intentions of the public, is frequently embarrassed with perplexing considerations.

* Not on file.

The desires of too many frontier white people, to seize, by force or fraud, upon the neighboring Indian lands, has been, and still continues to be, an unceasing cause of jealousy and hatred on the part of the Indians; and it would appear, upon a calm investigation, that, until the Indians can be quieted upon this point, and rely, with confidence upon the protection of their lands by the United States, no well grounded hope of tranquillity can be entertained.

The encroachment of white people is incessantly watched, and in unguarded moments, they are murdered by the Indians. Revenge is sought, and the innocent frontier people are too frequently involved as victims in the cruel contest. This appears to be a principal cause of Indian wars. That there are exceptions will not be denied. The passion of a young savage for war and fame, is too mighty to be restrained by the feeble advice of the old men. An adequate police seems to be wanting, either to prevent or punish the depredations of the unruly. It would afford a conscious pleasure, could the assertion be made on our parts, that we have considered the murder of Indians the same as the murders of whites, and have punished them accordingly. This, however, is not the case. The irritated passions, on account of savage cruelty, are generally too keen, in the places where trials are had, to convict and punish for the killing of an Indian. It is considered as unnecessary to cite instances, although multitudes might be adduced in almost every part of the country, from its first settlement to the present time.

If this view of the inability of both parties to keep the peace, be correct, it would seem to follow, as a just consequence, that an adequate remedy ought to be provided for an evil of such magnitude.

It is certainly an evil to be involved in hostilities with tribes of savages, amounting to two or three thousand, as is the case northwest of the Ohio. But, this evil would be greatly increased, were a general Indian war to prevail south of the Ohio—the Indian warriors of the four nations in that quarter not being much short of fourteen thousand, not to advert to the combinations which a general Indian war might produce with the European Powers, with whom the tribes, both north and south of the Ohio, are connected.

It seems that our own experience would demonstrate the propriety of endeavoring to preserve a pacific conduct, in preference to a hostile one, with the Indian tribes. The United States can get nothing by an Indian war; but they risk men, money, and reputation. As we are more powerful, and more enlightened than they are, there is a responsibility of national character, that we should treat them with kindness, and even liberality. It is a melancholy reflection, that our modes of population have been more destructive to the Indian natives than the conduct of the conquerors of Mexico and Peru. The evidence of this is the utter extirpation of nearly all the Indians in most populous parts of the Union. A future historian may mark the causes of this destruction of the human race in sable colors. Although the present Government of the United States cannot with propriety be involved in the opprobrium, yet, it seems necessary, however, in order to render their attention upon this subject strongly characteristic of their justice, that some powerful attempts should be made to tranquillize the frontiers, particularly those south of the Ohio. The situation of the settlements on Cumberland, loudly demand the interference and protection of Government. It is true, some unauthorized offensive operations have proceeded from thence, against the Lower Cherokee towns, and victims were sacrificed. Whether these victims were all warriors, or whether women and children were not involved in the destruction, seems to merit inquiry.

Upon the most mature reflection the subscriber has been able to bestow upon this subject, arising from the experience of several years' observation thereof, he humbly conceives all attempts to preserve the peace with the Indian tribes, will be found inadequate, short of an arrangement somewhat like the following, to wit:

1stly. That a line of military posts, at such distances as shall be directed, be established upon the frontiers, within the Indian boundary, and out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, provided consent can be obtained for the purpose from the Indian tribes; that these posts be garrisoned with regular troops, under the direction of the President of the United States.

2dly. That, if any murder or theft be committed upon any of the white inhabitants, by an Indian known to belong to any Indian nation or tribe such nation or tribe, shall be bound to deliver him or them up, to the nearest military post, in order to be tried and punished by a court martial, or, in failure thereof, the United States will take satisfaction upon the nearest Indian town belonging to such nation or tribe.

3dly. "That all persons who shall be assembled or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the territory south of the Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations upon any Indian town, or persons, or property, shall thereby become liable and subject to the rules and articles of war, which are, or shall be established for the government of the troops of the United States." This was a section of a bill which the Senate passed the last session, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontiers;" but it was disagreed to by the House.

If to this arrangement the expense should be objected, it is to be remembered, that the President of the United States, in pursuance of law, has authorized both the Governor of Georgia, and the Governor of the Southwestern territory, to establish a defensive protection, which amounts to a large sum annually.

Posts, therefore, requiring garrisons, amounting to one thousand five hundred non-commissioned and privates for the whole Southwestern frontiers, from the St. Mary's to the Ohio, would probably be adequate to this object.

If the posts belonging to the United States, and now occupied by the British, north of the Ohio, be soon delivered up, they, with a post at the Miami villages, and posts of communication down the Wabash, on the south, and the Miami river, to lake Erie, on the north, together with a post at Presqu' isle, would be a pretty adequate protection to the frontiers north of the Ohio, and a curb to any Indian tribes discontented, without just cause; which, it is presumed, will never be afforded by the Government of the United States.

If to these vigorous measures should be combined the arrangement of trade, recommended to Congress, and the establishment of agents to reside in the principal Indian towns, with adequate compensations, it would seem that the Government would then have made the fairest experiments of a system of justice and humanity, which, it is presumed, could not possibly fail of being blessed with its proper effects—an honorable tranquillity of the frontiers.

All which is respectfully submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 29th, 1794.

THE SIX NATIONS, AND ONEIDA, TUSCARORA, AND STOCKBRIDGE TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 2, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

A spirit of discontent, from several causes, arose, in the early part of the present year, among the Six Nations of Indians, and, particularly, on the ground of a projected settlement by Pennsylvania, at Presqu' Isle, upon lake Erie. The papers upon this point have already been laid before Congress. It was deemed proper, on my part, to endeavor to tranquillize the Indians by pacific measures; accordingly, a time and place was appointed, at which a free conference should be had upon all the causes of discontent, and an agent was appointed, with the instructions, of which No. 1, herewith transmitted, is a copy.

A numerous assembly of Indians was held at Canandaigua, in the State of New York, the proceedings whereof accompany this message, marked No. 2.

The two treaties, the one with the Six Nations, and the other with the Oneida, Tuscarora, and Stockbridge Indians, dwelling in the country of the Oneidas, which have resulted from the mission of the agent, are herewith laid before the Senate, for their consideration and advice.

The original engagement of the United States to the Oneidas, is also sent herewith.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 2d January, 1795.

A Treaty between the United States of America and the tribes of Indians called the Six Nations.

The President of the United States having determined to hold a conference with the Six Nations of Indians, for the purpose of removing from their minds all causes of complaint, and establishing a firm and permanent friendship with them; and Timothy Pickering being appointed sole agent for that purpose; and the agent having met and conferred with the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Six Nations, in a general council: Now, in order to accomplish the good design of this conference, the parties have agreed on the following articles, which, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, shall be binding on them and the Six Nations:

ARTICLE 1. Peace and friendship are hereby firmly established, and shall be perpetual, between the United States and the Six Nations.

ART. 2. The United States acknowledge the lands reserved to the Oneida, Onondaga, and Cayuga nations, in their respective treaties with the State of New York, and called their reservations, to be their property; and the United States will never claim the same, nor disturb them, or either of the Six Nations, nor their Indian friends, residing thereon, and united with them, in the free use and enjoyment thereof; but the said reservations shall remain theirs, until they choose to sell the same to the people of the United States, who have the right to purchase.

ART. 3. The land of the Seneca nation is bounded as follows: beginning on Lake Ontario, at the northwest corner of the land they sold to Oliver Phelps; the line runs westerly along the lake, as far as Oyongwongyeh creek, at Johnston's Landing Place, about four miles eastward, from the fort of Niagara; then, southerly, up that creek to its main fork; then, straight to the main fork of Stedman's creek, which empties into the river Niagara, above fort Schlosser; and then onward, from that fork, continuing the same straight course, to that river; (this line, from the mouth of Oyongwongyeh creek, to the river Niagara, above fort Schlosser, being the eastern boundary of a strip of land, extending from the same line to Niagara river, which the Seneca nation ceded to the King of Great Britain, at a treaty held about thirty years ago, with Sir William Johnston;) then the line runs along the Niagara river to Lake Erie; then along Lake Erie, to the northeast corner of a triangular piece of land, which the United States conveyed to the State of Pennsylvania, as by the President's patent, dated the third day of March, 1792; then due south to the northern boundary of that State; then due east to the southwest corner of the land sold by the Seneca nation to Oliver Phelps; and then north and northerly, along Phelps's line, to the place of beginning, on Lake Ontario. Now, the United States acknowledge all the land within the aforementioned boundaries, to be the property of the Seneca nation; and the United States will never claim the same, nor disturb the Seneca nation, nor any of the Six Nations, or of their Indian friends residing thereon, and united with them, in the free use and enjoyment thereof; but it shall remain theirs, until they choose to sell the same to the people of the United States, who have the right to purchase.

ART. 4. The United States having thus described and acknowledged what lands belong to the Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas, and engaged never to claim the same, nor to disturb them, or any of the Six Nations, or their Indian friends residing thereon, and united with them, in the free use and enjoyment thereof: now, the Six Nations, and each of them, hereby engage that they will never claim any other lands within the boundaries of the United States, nor ever disturb the people of the United States in the free use and enjoyment thereof.

ART. 5. The Seneca nation, all others of the Six Nations concurring, cede to the United States the right of making a wagon road from fort Schlosser to Lake Erie, as far south as Buffalo creek; and the people of the United States shall have the free and undisturbed use of this road, for the purposes of travelling and transportation. And the Six Nations, and each of them, will forever allow to the people of the United States, a free passage through their lands, and the free use of the harbors and rivers adjoining, and within their respective tracts of land, for the passing and securing of vessels and boats, and liberty to land their cargoes, where necessary, for their safety.

ART. 6. In consideration of the peace and friendship hereby established, and of the engagements entered into by the Six Nations; and because the United States desire, with humanity and kindness, to contribute to their comfortable support; and to render the peace and friendship hereby established strong and perpetual, the United States now deliver to the Six Nations, and the Indians of the other nations residing among, and united with them, a quantity of goods, of the value of ten thousand dollars. And for the same considerations, and with a view to promote the future welfare of the Six Nations, and of their Indian friends aforesaid, the United States will add the sum of three thousand dollars to the one thousand five hundred dollars heretofore allowed them by an article ratified by the President, on the twenty third day of April, 1792, making in the whole four thousand five hundred dollars; which shall be expended yearly, forever, in purchasing clothing, domestic animals, implements of husbandry, and other utensils, suited to their circumstances, and in compensating useful artificers, who shall reside with or near them, and be employed for their benefit. The immediate application of the whole annual allowance now stipulated, to be made by the superintendent, appointed by the President, for the affairs of the Six Nations, and their Indian friends aforesaid.

ART. 7. Lest the firm peace and friendship now established should be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, the United States and Six Nations agree, that, for injuries done by individuals, on either side, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaint shall be made by the party injured, to the other: by the Six Nations, or any of them, to the President of the United States, or the superintendent by him appointed; and by the superintendent, or other person appointed by the President, to the principal chiefs of the Six Nations, or of the nation to which the offender belongs; and such prudent measures shall then be pursued, as shall be necessary to preserve our peace and friendship unbroken, until the Legislature (or great council) of the United States shall make other equitable provision for the purpose.

NOTE. It is clearly understood by the parties to this treaty, that the annuity, stipulated in the sixth article, is to be applied to the benefit of such of the Six Nations, and of their Indian friends united with them, as aforesaid, as do or shall reside within the boundaries of the United States: for the United States do not interfere with nations, tribes, or families of Indians, elsewhere resident.

In witness whereof, the said Timothy Pickering, and the sachems and war chiefs of the said Six Nations, have hereunto set their hands and seals.

Done at Canandaigua, in the State of New York, the eleventh day of November, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

A Treaty between the United States of America and the Oneida, Tuscarora, and Stockbridge Indians, dwelling in the country of the Oneidas.

Whereas, in the late war between Great Britain and the United States of America, a body of the Oneida and Tuscarora and Stockbridge Indians, adhered faithfully to the United States, and assisted them with their warriors; and, in consequence of this adherence and assistance, the Oneidas and Tuscaroras, at an unfortunate period of the war, were driven from their homes, and their houses were burnt, and their property destroyed; and, as the United States, in the time of their distress, acknowledged their obligations to these faithful friends, and promised to reward them; and the United States being now in a condition to fulfil the promises then made, the following articles are stipulated by the respective parties, for that purpose; to be in force, when ratified by the President and Senate:

ARTICLE. 1. The United States will pay the sum of five thousand dollars, to be distributed among individuals of the Oneida and Tuscarora nations, as a compensation for their individual losses and services, during the late war between Great Britain and the United States. The only man of the Kaughnawaugas, now remaining in the Oneida country, as well as some few very meritorious persons of the Stockbridge Indians, will be considered in the distribution.

ART. 2. For the general accommodation of these Indian nations, residing in the country of the Oneidas, the United States will cause to be erected a complete grist mill and saw mill, in a situation to serve the present principal settlements of these nations; or, if such one convenient situation cannot be found, then the United States will cause to be erected two such grist mills and saw mills, in places where it is now known the proposed accommodation may be effected. Of this the United States will judge.

ART. 3. The United States will provide, during three years after the mills shall be completed, for the expense of employing one or two suitable persons to manage the mills, to keep them in repair, to instruct some young men of the three nations in the arts of the miller and sawyer, and to provide teams and utensils for carrying on the work of the mills.

ART. 4. The United States will pay one thousand dollars, to be applied in building a convenient church at Oneida, in the place of the one which was there burnt by the enemy, in the late war.

ART. 5. In consideration of the above stipulations, to be performed on the part of the United States, the Oneida, Tuscarora, and Stockbridge Indians, aforementioned, now acknowledge themselves satisfied, and relinquish all other claims of compensation and rewards for their losses and services in the late war; excepting, only, the unsatisfied claims of such men of the said nations as bore commissions under the United States, for any arrears which may be due to them as officers.

In witness whereof, the chiefs of those nations, residing in the country of the Oneidas, and Timothy Pickering, agent for the United States, have hereto set their hands and seals, at Oneida, the second day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 12, 1795.

*Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before Congress for their consideration, the copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied by an extract from a memorandum of James Seagrove, Agent of Indian affairs.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 12th, 1795.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 31st, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you the opinion of James Seagrove, agent for the Creek nation, upon the subject of the negroes which ought to have been returned in pursuance of the treaty of New York.

I beg leave to add, that, if the United States deem it inexpedient to press for a return of the negroes, that it would appear proper that the owners should be compensated, conformably to some equitable principles to be devised.

If this idea should be just, it would be proper for the President to present it to Congress, in the just shape of which it is susceptible.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the United States:

Memorandum from James Seagrove, Agent of Indian Affairs, for the Secretary of War United States.

[EXTRACT.]

It is the agent's opinion, that it is a thing impossible for the Indians to comply with the treaty of New York, so far as respects giving up the negroes, and other property taken from the citizens of Georgia, from the conclusion of the late British war, until the time of forming said treaty; and that, therefore, to prevent a useless and disagreeable altercation, the General Government had better make good the losses sustained, which will not be very great. The number of negroes taken, under these circumstances, by the Creeks, cannot, he thinks, exceed sixty or seventy. The former owners of negroes would be pleased with this mode of settlement.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 27, 1795.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 26th, 1795.

SIR:

In pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 21st instant, requesting the President of the United States to "direct the proper officer to lay before the House a statement of the number of troops that will be necessary to maintain such a line of military posts as it will be expedient to establish, effectually to protect the frontiers of the United States," I submit the following report; and am,

With great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Report of the Secretary of War on the above-mentioned Resolution.

The attempt to form the statement required in the resolution, has been found extremely embarrassing: our situation, at this time, presenting no definite object to which military operations shall be pointed.

Although, lately, on our Northwestern frontier, victory attended our arms, and the principal villages of our savage enemies were destroyed; yet it does not appear that these events have produced amongst them a general disposition to make peace. If they continue hostile, a force merely defensive will be insufficient to secure the advantages we have gained. Our most advanced posts are from a hundred and fifty to nearly a hundred and eighty miles from the Ohio. At present we can support them with troops, stores, and provisions, only from that river. For this purpose, a chain of posts must be maintained, besides a very respectable force, to ensure the safety of the convoys. The hostile nations may yet embody in numbers nearly equal to those which opposed our arms in the last campaign. Consequently, the convoys should be of strength, not only to resist, but to overcome them; otherwise, the necessary support of the posts may fail, and then they must be abandoned, or left to fall victims to famine or the enemy. But to abandon those posts, would be, in a great measure, to surrender the fruits of the last campaign. It would be a confession of our weakness; and, by encouraging the enemy to persevere, prolong the war.

On the frontiers of the Southwestern territory, and of Georgia, there is not yet, indeed, an open war; nevertheless, the continued depredations of the Creeks and Cherokees have rendered it necessary to keep up in the former a small permanent force, and occasionally to call out bodies of the militia. But the representations from that quarter, now before the House, show how inadequate have been the forces for the effectual protection of that frontier.

In Georgia, the dangerous situation of its back settlers, as exhibited by the Governor of that State, induced the President to authorize him to erect, with his militia, so many stations as, joined with those garrisoned by the Federal troops, formed a chain of posts along its whole extensive frontier, and corps of militia-horse patrolled between them. But, numerous as were the stations and troops, the Governor (an experienced soldier) deemed them unequal to the object of a full defence.

Besides our Indian frontier, the sea-coast is to be guarded. The fortifications, now erecting, will require, to aid in completing, and to man them, the greater part of the corps of artillerists and engineers; which seems to have been organized principally for that purpose.

In this view of the situation of the United States, while negotiations with the foreign nations who possess adjoining territories are depending; while a restoration of peace with the Western Indians is uncertain; and while an extension of open war with other and more powerful tribes is impending; it would seem highly inexpedient and unsafe to depend on a permanent force, short of our present military establishment, especially when it is considered that sickness and other contingencies will forever make large deductions from its efficient numbers.

All which is respectfully submitted.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of War.

THE NORTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 30TH OF JANUARY, 1795.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 30, 1795.

SIR:

The President of the United States has instructed me to communicate, in confidence, to the Senate, the despatches from Major General Wayne, herewith transmitted, dated the 23d of December last, and which were received on the 28th instant.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wayne to the Secretary of War, dated

HEAD QUARTERS, GREENVILLE, 23d December, 1794.

S:

I have the honor to inform you, that the flag from the Wyandots of Sandusky, after an absence of forty-two days, returned to this place on the evening of the 14th instant.

The enclosed copies of letters and speeches, will best demonstrate the insidious part recently taken by the British agents, Messrs. Simcoe, M<sup>r</sup> Kee, and Brandt, to stimulate the savages to continue the war, who being but too well acquainted with the near approach of that period, in which the legion will be dissolved, have artfully suggested a suspension of hostilities until spring, in order to lull us into a state of security, to prevent the raising of troops, and to afford the Indians an opportunity to make their fall and winter hunt unmolested.

In the interim, the British are vigilantly employed in strengthening and making additions to their fortification at the foot of the rapids of the Miamies of the lake, evidently with a view of convincing the Indians of their determination to assist and protect them; hence, there is strong ground to conclude, that Governor Simcoe has not received any orders to the contrary, otherwise he would not presume to persevere in those nefarious acts of hostility.

The Wyandots and other Indians, at and in the vicinity of the rapids of Sandusky, are completely within our power, and their hunting grounds all within striking distance; hence their present solicitude for a suspension of hostilities.

It is, however, probable that ——— may now be seriously inclined for peace, being the only surviving principal chief out of four, belonging to the Wyandots of Sandusky; the other three were killed in the action of the 20th August, and he himself shot through the right elbow, which has deprived him of the use of that arm; add to this his present candid information and opinion, which is corroborated by ———, now with me, who has a little village of his own, consisting of a few Indian families, settled at ———, and well known to be friendly to the United States.

All those people either are, or affect to be, in dread of the hostile Indians in the vicinity of Detroit, (who are under the immediate influence of the British agents) on account of the part they have recently taken.

——— says, that the present flag is sent without the privity or consent of those tribes, and expresses some doubts of its safe return, should any of the hostile Indians meet it on its way home, and discover the object of its mission.

I shall endeavor to benefit by this real or affected dread, and propose to take them under the immediate protection of the United States, and to build a fortification at the foot of the rapids of Sandusky, as soon as the season and circumstances will permit; this will serve as a criterion by which their sincerity may be tried, and perfectly consistent with the treaty of the 9th January, 1789.

But unless Congress have already, or will immediately adopt effectual measures to raise troops, to garrison this as well as the other posts already established, it would only be a work of supererogation, as the whole must be abandoned by the middle of May.

I have, however, succeeded in dividing and distracting the counsels of the hostile Indians, and hope, through that means, eventually to bring about a general peace, or to compel the refractory to pass the Mississippi, and to the northwest side of the lakes.

The British agents have greatly the advantage in this business at present, by having it in their power to furnish the Indians with every necessary supply of arms, ammunition, and clothing, in exchange for their skins and furs, which will always make the savages dependent upon them, until the United States establish trading houses in their country, from which they can be supplied with equal facility, and at as reasonable rates.

The country we acquired in the course of the late campaign, and the posts we now occupy, are happily situate for this purpose, and which, with the addition of a post at Sandusky, and one at the mouth of the Miamies of the lake, would render the Indians as dependent upon the United States then, as they are now upon the British.

If my recollection serves me, the President has, more than once, recommended this measure to the serious attention of Congress; and without it is adopted, we can never expect a permanent peace with, or fidelity from the Indians.
