Whereas the undersigned chiefs and warriors, as well as that portion of the nation which they represent, have at all times been desirous of fulfilling their treaty with the United States with perfect good faith, and for that purpose found themselves compelled, since the commencement of the late war, to separate themselves from the rest of their nation, and remove to the Missouri river, where they have continued to give proofs of their friendship and fidelity: and whereas the United States, justly appreciating the conduct of said Indians, are disposed to do them the most ample justice that is practicable, the said parties have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and that portion of the Sacs which they represent, do hereby assent to the treaty between the United States of America and the united tribes of Sacs and Foxes, which was concluded at St. Louis on the third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and four; and they moreover promise to do all in their power to re-establish and enforce the same.

GENTLEMEN:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 11, 1815.

I had the honor to transmit to you on the 24th ultimo a copy of the treaty of peace which was concluded on the 24th of December last between the United States and Great Britain at Ghent, and ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the 17th ultimo. By the ninth article of this treaty it is stipulated that the United States shall put an end to all hostilities with the Indian tribes with whom they might be at war at the time of the ratification, and to restore to such tribes all the rights and privileges to which they were entitled previous to the war: provided that such tribes or nations should agree to desist from all hostilities against the United States of America, their citizens and subjects, upon the ratification of such treaty being notified to such tribes or nations, and should so desist accordingly. By the same article it is also stipulated that His Britannic Majesty should likewise put an end, in like manner and on the same conditions, to hostilities with the tribes or nations of Indians with whom he might be at war at the time of the ratification of said treaty.

It is incumbent on the United States to execute every article of this treaty with perfect good faith, and it is their firm resolution to do it. They wish to be particularly exact in the execution of the article above recited relating to the Indian tribes. For this purpose the President has, in consequence, appointed you commissioners with full power to conclude a treaty with all those tribes, for which I enclose you a commission.

You will give immediate notice to all the tribes with whom the United States are at war on the Mississippi and its waters of the peace which has been concluded between the United States and Great Britain, and of the stipulations contained in it in regard to them; and you will likewise invite them to attend by a deputation of chiefs, at such place or places as you may appoint, for the purpose of concluding the proposed treaty of peace and amity between the United States and all those tribes. It is thought proper to confine this treaty to the sole object of peace. Other arrangements between the United States and the Indian tribes adapted to their mutual interests may be entered into hereafter.

You will avail yourself of the opportunity to inform the Indian tribes that it is intended to establish strong posts very high up the Mississippi, and from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan, and to open trading-houses at those posts, or other suitable places for their accommodation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MONROE.

Gov. CLARK, Gov. EDWARDS, and AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU, Esq.

GENTLEMEN:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 11, 1815.

Colonel McNair has recommended Mr. Robert Wash as a gentleman well qualified to act as your secretary, and it is requested that he may be appointed as such.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MONROE.

Messrs. CLARK, EDWARDS, and Colonel CHOUTEAU.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 11, 1815.

The commission for the commissioners to treat with the Indians with whom we were at war at the time the treaty with Great Britain was ratified, and instructions, are committed to Colonel McNair, who will likewise have the pleasure to deliver you this letter. Of this gentleman a very favorable opinion is entertained by the President, and had he not recommended and insisted on the appointment of Mr. Chouteau as third commissioner, he would have been appointed himself, as I have reason to believe. It had previously been determined to give him a respectable command, had the war continued, in the troops which were intended to have been raised in the western country. I mention these circumstances to show you the good opinion which is formed of him by the Government. Should any opportunity occur to enable the commissioners to avail themselves of his services with advantage in the proposed treaty with the Indians, it is desired you should do it; or should you find, hereafter, that he may be employed either with the Indians or in any other way in the Missouri Territory, or high up the Mississippi, I wish you to communicate it to the Government, and it will be considered.

I have the honor to be, &c.

His Excellency WILLIAM CLARK.

J. MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 13, 1815.

Mr. Boilvin has been continued in the Indian agency which he has heretofore held. He will take his instructions from you, and will no doubt be useful in giving notice to the Indian tribes and nations, and inducing their chiefs to attend at the treaty which you are authorized to make with them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

His Excellency WILLIAM CLARK.

J. MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 25, 1815.

At the treaty which you as one of the commissioners are authorized to hold with the Indians, the President thinks it will be proper to make some presents to the chiefs and headmen of the several tribes who may attend. For this purpose, twenty thousand dollars worth of goods have been directed to be purchased, and will be forwarded by Messrs. Johnson & Sibley, who will probably reach St. Louis with them in the first week in June. Whether it will be necessary to distribute the whole of these goods to the Indians, will depend upon the number of tribes which attend the treaty, and on the judgment and discretion of the commissioners as to the extent to which presents ought to be made. Should any Indians who have been friendly to the United States attend the treaty, it will be well, in the distribution of the presents, to let them feel that those who have been our enemies are not better treated than those who have been our friends. Among the articles to be sent out there will be some solid silver medals; and it having been understood that the late General Pike, when on his expedition up the Mississippi, took from some of the Indians medals which had been given to them by the British, it is requested that, if any of these Indians attend the treaty, a medal of the largest size be given to each of them in lieu of those taken from them by General Pike.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MONROE.

His Excellency W. CLARK, St. Louis.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 27, 1815.

You will please procure and forward to Governor Clark, of the Missouri Territory, about $20,000 worth of goods, intended as presents at the treaty to be held with the Indians who reside on the waters of the Mississippi, and who have been at war with the United States. The goods will consist of blankets, strouds, cloths, calicoes, handkerchiefs, cotton stuffs, ribands, gartering, frock coats, flags, silver ornaments, paints, wampum, looking-glasses, knives, fire-steels, rifles, fusils, flints, powder, tobacco, pipes, needles, &c. These articles should be equal in quality to those which the Indians have been accustomed to receive from the British agents.

I am, very respectfully,

JAMES MONROE.

Gen. JOHN MASON, Superintendent of Indian Trade, Georgetown.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI TERRITORY, May 15, 1815.

We have the honor to state to you that, as commissioners appointed by the President to treat with the Indians on the Mississippi river and its waters, we propose to hold the treaty at Portage des Sioux, (a few miles above the confluence of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers,) in the early part of July next; and presuming that there will be a large assemblage of Indians, a guard calculated to command sufficient respect and to maintain order seems to us so necessary, that we beg leave to solicit such orders for those purposes as you may deem it expedient to give to the officer having command on this frontier.

We have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUG. CHOUTEAU.

Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, May 22, 1815.

Various indications of the continuance of a hostile disposition on the part of the Sacs and Foxes of Rock river towards our Government and the citizens thereof, with some recent aggressions which they are with good reason supposed to have committed since they were fully notified of the ratification of the late treaty with Great Britain, and its stipulations in regard to them, induce us to consider a permanent peace with those tribes so doubtful that we feel it our duty most respectfully to suggest it as our opinion that it is highly expedient to be prepared for the alternative of war with them.

In the mean time every effort in our power will be employed to effect a pacification in conformity to our instructions; for which purpose every necessary preparatory measure has been adopted.

We have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUG. CHOUTEAU.Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, May 22, 1815.

Since writing the letter which we had the honor this day to address to you, we have received additional evidence of the determined hostility of the Sacs and others, of Rock river, in the murder of a family in the county of St. Charles on the day before yesterday.

The conduct of those savages, in the cold indifference with which they received several communications in regard to the late treaty; their insolent deportment on those occasions; their perfidy in decoying on shore and murdering one of the messengers of peace; the murders and depredations which they have repeated since they were notified of the treaty, together with the suggestions and admonitions of the British officers themselves to be on our guard against them, leave no doubt on our minds that it is the intention of those tribes to continue the war, and that nothing less than a vigorous display of military force can change their disposition.

Seeing that they have not agreed, on the notification of the ratification of the treaty, to desist from hostilities, and that they have not desisted, we feel very much at a loss to decide on the course proper to be pursued by us in relation to them.

To treat with them (even if they should not eventually decline our overture) without requiring the surrender of the authors of the recent hostilities, or some other retributions, would, we fear, be of dangerous consequences in its influence on other tribes. But upon this subject we shall be very thankful for the instructions of the President, which we will endeavor faithfully to fulfil.

We have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUG. CHOUTEAU.Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington City.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, May 27, 1815.

I received, yesterday, your letter of the 13th of March last, enclosing me a commission of commissioner to conclude, conjointly with their excellencies Governors William Clark and Ninian Edwards, a treaty of peace with the different tribes of Indians of the Mississippi and its waters. I had already received the instructions you sent me by Col. McNair, and, consequently, acted accordingly, as you may know by the different letters we had the honor to write you.

I have accepted willingly this appointment; the more so, as I expect that my zeal to perform my duty will equal the confidence you have been pleased to bestow upon,

Sir, your most obedient servant,

AUG. CHOUTEAU.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, Secretary of War.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 11, 1815.

I have received and laid before the President your communication dated the 15th ultimo.

The President regrets the hostile dispositions of the Indians; but having executed, in perfect good faith, the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, he will exert the military powers of the Government to secure the peace and safety of the country.

It is presumed that Colonel Miller, with his detachment, arrived at St. Louis soon after the date of your letters, and the enclosed copy of a letter to General Jackson will show the general matters in operation to resist and punish the further aggressions of the Indians on the waters of the Mississippi. Colonel Miller will also be authorized to continue the rangers in service, and to obtain an immediate reinforcement of militia, if the exigencies should be such as to preclude an application to this Department or to Major General Jackson.

The President has been induced, by the representations from the northwest, to appoint Governor Harrison, General McArthur, and Mr. Graham, commissioners to treat with the Indian tribes in that quarter. As the principles contained in the instructions to those commissioners may be usefully applied in the execution of your trust, I am authorized to communicate, confidentially, the enclosed copy for your information and government.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

Governor CLARK, of the Missouri Territory,
Governor EDWARDS, of the Illinois Territory, and Mr. CHOUTEAU,

Commissioners appointed to negotiate a treaty with certain Indian tribes.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 14, 1815.

The representations which have been made to the President relative to the dispositions of the Indians in various quarters induce him to apprise your excellency of the measures that have been taken since the ratification of the treaty of Ghent to restore peace with the Indian tribes, and to conciliate the good-will of the misinformed or the discontented. As this object will be easiest effected by communicating to you the instructions given to the commissioners for treating with the Northwest Indians, I have the honor to transmit (in confidence) the enclosed copy.

If the hostility of the Indians on the waters of the Mississippi should continue, or if in any other quarter danger should be apprehended, the officer commanding the troops of the United States may require the aid of the militia to resist and repel aggression. Under such circumstances, there may not be time to apply to this Department, and the officer is authorized to address himself, at once, to the Governors of the States or Territories from which assistance can be drawn with the greatest promptitude and facility. Should an application be made to your excellency, the President relies upon the benefit of your effective co-operation and good offices.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

The GOVERNORS of Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, Indiana Territory, and Mississippi Territory.

SIR:

MISSOURI TERRITORY, PORTAGE DES SIOUX, July 16, 1815.

We have the honor to inform you that we met at this place, according to appointment, on the 6th instant, and have been constantly engaged in endeavoring to discharge the trust confided to us. We are very sorry, however, to be obliged to state that the prospects of restoring tranquillity and safety to this frontier, by an amicable accommodation with the Indians, are not at all flattering.

With the Pattawatamies of Illinois river, and the small band of Piankeshaws who are prisoners of war, we shall probably conclude a treaty in a day or two.

But neither the Winnebagoes, Sacs, Foxes, Ioways, Kickapoos, or any others residing upon Rock river, have sent forward competent deputations of chiefs to treat with us. The Sacs and Foxes, in particular, have committed many flagitious acts of hostility since they were notified of the late treaty with Great Britain and the overtures of our Government to themselves.

Some of the most insignificant and contemptible wretches of these tribes, with one chief only, met us at this place. They acknowledged that they had no power to treat with us; and the chief that did attend is understood to have declared that, even if a treaty should be concluded with all the chiefs, those tribes would never consent to relinquish the lands which they have heretofore ceded to us. By their own confessions, some of their war parties have very recently made incursions into our frontier, from which a number of horses have been stolen within a few days; and even since the treaty commenced, they have waylaid and attacked some of the citizens of this Territory.

All these considerations induce us to think it very doubtful whether any treaty, upon the terms we are authorized to offer, can be effected with them. And as the lands they have heretofore ceded extend from the mouth of the Illinois river to the mouth of the Ouisconsin, and include the favorite residence of a great number of the hostile Indians, we do not believe that they would permit the military lands included within those boundaries to be surveyed, if they should eventually, for mere temporary purposes, be induced to conclude a treaty with us.

We are happy to state that the dispositions manifested by the Missouri Indians, generally, seem to be friendly, and some of them are anxious to unite with us in the war against the Sacs and Foxes.

We have the honor to transmit, herewith, the copy of a letter which we felt it our duty to address to the commanding officer in this district.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUGTE. CHOUTEAU.

To the HON. SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR:

PORTAGE DES SIOUX, July 11, 1815.

As commissioners appointed to negotiate a treaty of peace with the tribes of Indians residing upon the Mississippi and its waters, who, at the time of the ratification of the treaty with Great Britain, were at war with the United States, we, in conformity to our instructions, notified those tribes of the peace that had been concluded, and of the stipulations it contained in regard to themselves, and at the same time invited them to attend, by a deputation of chiefs, at this place, on the 6th instant, for the purpose of concluding a treaty of peace and amity between the United States and themselves.

The friendly overtures of the Government, however, do not appear to have been met by a correspondent disposition on the part of those tribes.

None of them have as yet sent forward sufficient deputations to treat with us; several of them have not sent a single man, nor have we any ground to expect they will do so; and while a considerable number of the most insignificant and contemptible persons of the Sacs and Foxes of Rock river have attended, without more than one chief, we have been informed, and have reason to believe, that their principal chiefs and warriors continue to cherish the most inveterate and deadly hostility towards the American people and Government, and that war parties from those tribes recently started for our frontier; which statement is rendered the more probable by the occurrence of some very late acts of hostility (of which they had previously committed many) since they were informed of the peace.

The Kickapoos sent one chief only, and there are strong grounds to believe that they have identified themselves with the Sacs and Foxes in their late hostilities, and that they participate their present unfriendly disposition.

Those three tribes left here privately last night, and we feel it our duty to state to you as our opinion, that the exertion of the military power of the Government will be necessary to secure the peace and safety of this country.

SIR:

PORTAGE DES SIOUX, July 22, 1815.

We have the honor to inform you that we have succeeded in concluding separate treaties of peace and friendship with the following tribes of Indians, viz: the Pattawatamies of Illinois river, the Piankeshaws, Yanctons, Teetons, Mahas, Sioux of the Lakes, (residing between Prairie du Chien and the river St. Peter's,) and the Sioux of the river St. Peter's.

We feel peculiar pleasure in acknowledging the prompt and useful assistance and co-operation afforded us in the discharge of our duties by Colonel Miller, whose whole conduct, as far as it has come under our observation, fully evinces that he merits all that honorable distinction which the Government of his country has bestowed upon him.

From various indications of the settled hostility of the Sacs and Foxes, Kickapoos, Winnebagoes, &c. of the Rock river, and particularly from some additional depredations which some of them have committed since the date of our last letter, we fear there is little ground to hope that a conflict with them can be avoided with either honor to the Government or safety to this country.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servants,

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUG. CHOUTEAU.

To the Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR:

St. Louis, September 18, 1815.

We have the honor to inform you that, since our last communications, we have concluded treaties of peace with the Kickapoos, Big and Little Osages, Sacs of the Missouri river, Foxes, and Ioways.

A considerable backwardness, if not positive reluctance, on the part of several tribes, in accepting the overtures of peace which we were authorized to offer them, has been very manifest.

The Sacs of Rock river have ultimately refused to treat with us in the most positive manner; speak, without disguise, of their opposition to military establishments on the Mississippi river; and have continued to commit occasional but serious depredations on this frontier.

By information recently received from Mr. Boilvin, agent at Prairie du Chien, the Indians about that place appear to be in considerable commotion, and are much divided among themselves with regard to peace with the United States.

A number of British traders, with goods to a great amount, on which they have paid no duties, have arrived on the Mississippi, and we feel well assured that many of the difficulties that have occurred with the Indians, and which still continue, are justly attributable to that class of people.

Lieutenant Kennerly, who was sent out for some of the more distant tribes of Indians, not having returned, and there yet being some prospect of other tribes coming in, we have adjourned to this place, and hope to finish our business in a few days, when we shall forward the report of our proceedings.

We have the honor to be, most respectfully,

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUGTE. CHOUTEAU.

Hon. Wm. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

St. Louis, October 18, 1815.

Being about to finish all the duties which, as commissioners appointed to treat with the Indians of the Mississippi and its waters, it is possible for us to perform in the present year, we feel it incumbent on us to give you a more minute detail of our proceedings, and of the causes that have protracted our duties to the present time, than has hitherto been transmitted to the Department over which you preside.

On the 11th May we met at this place, which was as soon after the receipt of our commissions and instructions as was practicable. Our first duty being to send invitations, according to our instructions, to the different tribes or nations of Indians with whom the United States were at war at the time of the ratification of their late treaty with Great Britain, every effort in our power was employed to procure proper persons for that purpose; but in this success was, for some time, unattainable. Several of the hostile tribes had previously been notified by the Governors of this and Illinois Territory of the treaty, and the stipulations it contained in regard to themselves; but, contrary to every reasonable expectation, the intelligence thus communicated seemed to have generated new and additional hostility, which was so repeatedly developed in the most flagitious depredations and massacres on the frontiers as to produce universal alarm. Those acts of hostility appearing to increase rather than diminish, after we commenced our duties, rendered it extremely difficult to engage any persons to go into the Indian country; subjected us to disappointments by some whose fears prevented them from fulfilling engagements after they had made them; put it out of our power then to send to several of the tribes, and caused our missions to be more expensive, in consequence of having to send a greater number of men together, and sending up a party in a fortified boat, as a necessary precaution, to guard against danger, without which they could not have been induced to go upon any terms.

Having at length eventually succeeded in procuring some men for the purpose, we prepared and sent off thirty-seven talks, (of which a copy is herewith transmitted,) directed to different tribes, hoping that our messengers might be able to engage Indians to carry some of those talks to those places where it would otherwise have been impossible for us to have sent them. In some instances, the Indians having left their villages and gone to their summer's hunt, our messengers were unable to find them; in consequence of which we had to wait for further information, and send again.

The messengers whom we had engaged to go by the direct route to Prairie du Chien were stopped at the mouth of Rock river by the Sacs, who would permit them to proceed no farther. This event, however, we had anticipated, and had previously determined to send some person (if one could be procured) up to the Mahas on the Missouri, thence to pass over by land to the river St. Peter's, and thence to Prairie du Chien. This mission we deemed very important for several reasons: 1st. It was well ascertained the British had been endeavoring, and with some success too, to engage the Indians of the Missouri river in the war against us. It was therefore necessary, to prevent those machinations from eventuating in hostilities, that we should apprise the tribes upon whom they had been practised of the new state of relations between ours and the British Government, as there was no reason to believe that the latter would have caused any such information to be there communicated. 2d. By the authority, and under the directions of the Governor of this Territory, with the promised co-operation of General Howard, while commanding in this district, a part of the Sioux, and other Indians of the Missouri, had been engaged in the war on our side, and were then at war with those Indians who had been hostile to us, several of whom they had killed after our treaty commenced. As, then, the war thus instigated must have been considered as the act of our Government, good faith, in consequence of the treaty with Great Britain, required that it should cease. 3d. The Government having determined to establish strong military posts high up the Mississippi river, and there then being reason to believe it would have been attempted within the past season, it was desirable that the Indians of the river St. Peter's, and others in the vicinity of Prairie du Chien, should be made acquainted with the views and intentions of our Government, as such movements, if unexplained, would naturally have excited in them fearful apprehensions, in consequence of their having been engaged in the war, and might have put it in the power of the most contemptible British trader to have produced a serious opposition in that quarter. 4th. Our instructions positively required that we should give immediate information to those tribes of the peace that had been concluded between the United States and Great Britain, and we saw no other practicable means of effecting it. Besides, it was not to be doubted that, by making them the communications and overtures we were authorized to do, many good consequences would result therefrom, and an important object of Government be effected, even if those Indians should not come down and treat with us.

We should not, however, have been able to accomplish these objects had not Lieutenant Kennerly, (one of the disbanded officers equally distinguished by his bravery and enterprise,) seeing the utter impossibility of our procuring any other person, voluntarily offered to go on this mission; in which, although he could not succeed to the extent of our wishes, in consequence of his having his horses stolen from him, his services were, notwithstanding, very important; and he succeeded in sending talks by Indians whom he met with to those he could not visit.

The Indians who had been hostile to our Government generally manifested an evident backwardness to negotiate with us; attempted to temporize in every possible way, without committing themselves too far; and particularly by promising, but delaying, to send forward deputations to treat with us, and by sending incompetent deputations: in which conduct, we have many reasons for believing that they were influenced by unprincipled British traders, who endeavored to dissuade them from coming to the treaty; represented our invitations as insidious attempts to decoy them into our power, that we might massacre them; induced them to believe that Michilimackinac would never be surrendered, and that the war between the United States and Great Britain would shortly thereafter be renewed.

Knowing that the Indians had, in several instances, and in a late one in particular, refused to comply with their treaties, because, as they alleged, those who made them had not competent power to bind the tribes to which they belonged, we felt it our duty to inquire particularly whether the tribes with whom we proposed to treat were properly represented; and, in some instances, we had to send back Indians of different tribes for more competent deputations; in all of which cases, however, the Indians, interpreters, and agents admitted that those tribes were not sufficiently represented.

Owing to the disappointments and difficulties that have already been explained, we have constantly had under our charge more or less Indians from the commencement of the treaty till the 30th ultimo, when we sent off about one hundred and twenty-five, being all that then remained.

The delays that have necessarily intervened (otherwise so much to be regretted) have certainly been productive of three of the most important treaties that we have made, viz: those with the Foxes, the Kickapoos, and Ioways, which could not have been effected upon the same terms at the commencement of the treaty, nor for some time thereafter.

Those treaties, with all others that we have concluded, have been mentioned in our former communications, and are herewith transmitted.

According to our instructions, we confined those treaties to the sole object of peace; but the Indians were in several instances extremely solicitous that they should also have embraced other subjects; and some further negotiation with some of them seems to be recommended by every dictate of policy.

The Piankeshaws are extremely anxious to reside in this Territory, and wish to be permitted to sell the small tract of land which they own in the Illinois Territory, near the Wabash, for ploughs, horses, farming utensils, &c., which are necessary to enable them to make a new establishment.

The Ioways are very desirous of coming more closely under the protection of the United States, and, for that purpose, wish to cede a part of their lands in order to obtain annuities, like the rest of the neighboring Indians. As this is a spontaneous offer on their part, and as the land would be a valuable acquisition on many accounts, and particularly so in the event of future hostilities, it might be very advisable to accede to their proposition.

The Pattawatamies now occupy and assert a right to the land on the Illinois river which is contained in the cession made by the Sacs and Foxes in 1804, and it is certainly to be apprehended that, without some adjustment of the dispute, the surveyors appointed to survey the military land within the Illinois Territory will meet with some serious opposition.

The Chippewas, Menomonies, and Winnebagoes, who were all invited to send deputations to meet us at Portage des Sioux, did not send a single man, nor assign any reason for their not doing so.

The Sacs of Rock river not only most explicitly refused to treat with us, but manifested without disguise their opposition to the views of our Government, and committed many of the most wanton depredations upon the frontier, even after the treaty commenced. Their conduct has been so outrageous and improper, that, for the sake of example to others, and to produce a proper respect for our Government, good policy requires that they should be compelled to make some retribution at least; and if it shall be thought proper that our duties shall be resumed in relation to them, we should indeed be very desirous of some particular instructions upon the subject.

The Indians about Prairie du Chien are represented by Mr. Boilvin (the agent at that place) and several other persons who have lately returned from there as being in a state of the greatest commotion, occasioned by their divisions with regard to peace with the United States; all of which, together with the conduct of the Sacs, and the failure of the Winnebagoes, Menomonies, and Chippewas to meet us, is thought by the most intelligent white men who have been in that country, as well as by some of the most respectable friendly Indians, to be the result of the immense presents which the British Government have lately distributed, and the constant intrigues of British traders, who certainly have a greater quantity of merchandise on the Mississippi at present than they have ever had in any former year; indeed, from accounts from various quarters, it appears that they are making the greatest possible efforts to retain their influence over the Indians, and to engross the whole of their trade.

Lieutenant Kennerly informs us that, while among the Indians of the Missouri, he received information that British traders were among the Mandans, where it was supposed they were making an establishment, as they had invited the Sioux to visit them at that place. This establishment is doubtless to be supplied from Hudson's bay, or by the Northwest Company of Canada, and, if permitted to mature itself, will enable them to engross the whole of the trade of the upper parts of the Missouri river; while equal exertions will be made by them to draw the trade of the upper parts of the Mississippi down the Red river of Lake Winnipeg, between which rivers the portage is very inconsiderable, and communication easy.

Having treated with a part of the Indians above Prairie du Chien, it might be desirable, for the purpose of removing all jealousies (too easily excited among them at any time) and cultivating a good understanding with them, to treat with the rest; but that in the present year is totally impracticable.

On our first meeting our attention was confined exclusively to those Indians who had been engaged in the war against us. We, however, afterwards had the honor to receive a letter from the Hon. A. J. Dallas, of 11th of June last, which, with its enclosures, enlarged our powers, and directed our attention to new objects, which have occupied a considerable portion of our time. In conformity to our latter instructions, we endeavored to keep ourselves constantly informed of the dispositions and intentions of the Indians, and the conduct of the British traders among them; the general result of which is already communicated.

We also gave invitations to and were visited by several of the tribes who had remained firm in the interest of the United States, the good consequences of which were very apparent; and, indeed, if we had not been authorized to do so, the jealousies and discontents of those tribes would have been great and serious.

The Shawanees and Delawares of this Territory made known to us at Portage des Sioux certain grievances of which they complain, in talks delivered by two of their principal chiefs, which at their request we have the honor herewith to transmit for the information of the President.

It not having been made our particular duty to investigate the causes of complaint as alleged by them, we can only say that, as at present advised, we think them well founded; and being well acquainted with the uncommon sobriety and general good conduct of those Indians, the attachment which they have evinced towards our Government, their confidence in its justice, the alacrity with which they afforded their co-operation with us in the late war, the progress of civilization among them, &c., we feel it our duty to recommend them to the benevolence as well as to the justice of our Government.

The Cherokees of Arkansas complain bitterly of the intrusion of the white people, who, they say, destroy their game, settle among them without their consent, and act in such a manner as to produce disorders, discord, and confusion.

Those Indians wish a certain tract of country to be assigned them, its bounds to be ascertained, and that the most efficient measures may be taken to prevent our own citizens from mixing with them, or otherwise intruding upon their lands.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUG. CHOUTEAU.

Talks.

It is thirty years since we came to this country; when we arrived, the Spaniards told us to look for a suitable piece of ground to settle ourselves; after we found the said above-mentioned place, we informed the Spanish officer of it, and that we intended to settle ourselves. After we were settled, the commanding officer told us to remain at peace, hunt quietly, not to steal horses, nor go to war with any other nations.

The Spanish commander told us that we might occupy the space of land between the river Cape St. Come and to the first creek above Cape Girardeau: this is what the Spaniards told us. Afterwards the Spaniards went away, and the Americans took possession of this country. Soon after we went and visited the American commander, who made us the same recommendations, and gave us the same advice we had before heard from the Spaniards, and that we should experience no difference, and that we should be as happy with them as we had been with the Spaniards. We were very much pleased. After the council we held with the Americans, we returned home, and told our warriors and young men that their speech was just the same we had understood from the Spaniards. Governor Clark, my father, since three or four years we are very much crowded by the whites, who steal our horses and many other things, but yet it has not made us angry, hoping that the American Government will do us justice and take pity on our situation. Now that the commissioners are assembled to settle all matters with different tribes, we take this opportunity to lay under your consideration our present situation, and hope you will do all in your power to see us righted. My fathers, it is all I have to say, and beg of you to inform the President of the United States of our state and situation.

WABEPELATHY.—When the Spaniards told us to choose a piece of land, and that we had made choice of it, we obtained from them a grant, which has been since recorded by the board of commissioners, and we understand that all the concessions granted to the whites by the Spaniards were all good, and we expected ours would be so too. We live amongst the whites, and our behavior has been such that no honest white man can have any cause to find fault with us, and we are certain they will never have any cause to complain of us hereafter. We have always conducted ourselves honestly, and intend to continue so.

Early in the spring, on my return from hunting, I found my house that had been broken open, and what I had left in it was all gone. I then took the resolution of moving to another place on the river Castor, to settle myself, provided my father Governor Clark would be pleased of my doing so.

He recommended to us to raise stock and cultivate our land with industry, and his advice we have followed, and wish to remain at this new settlement if we can be permitted so to do, and do not care any thing more for our old town; but again, lately, we have been encroached upon by a white family by the name of Jenkins, which we hope you will remove from those lands if we are permitted to remain on them.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 10, 1815.

The letter signed by the commissioners, and dated St. Louis, October 18, together with the treaties made with the several tribes of Indians, were duly received. The Secretary of War has not yet returned to the city, but is daily expected. I am directed by the President to request that you will take the necessary measures for removing all white persons who have intruded and settled upon the lands of the Indians within the Missouri Territory; and should military aid be deemed necessary, you will call upon the officer commanding the United States troops in the military department No. 9, who has orders to comply with any requisition that you may make on him for that object.

It is believed that the Pattawatamies can have no well-founded claim to the lands ordered to be surveyed for the military bounty lands. As they have, however, been in the habit of hunting on those grounds, and as the deprivation may be attended with some inconvenience to them, Governor Edwards has been authorized to give them two thousand dollars as a compensation.

I have the honor to be,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Chief Clerk.

WILLIAM CLARK, Governor of Missouri Territory.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 24, 1815.

The letter of the honorable Ninian Edwards and Auguste Chouteau Esq. of the 29th ultimo has been received by mail.

In concluding a peace with the Kansas tribe of Indians, you have pursued the course adopted by the commissioners appointed to treat with the northern tribes. The hostilities of the various tribes inhabiting the country west of the Mississippi have been so general, that this course appears to be necessary, and is entirely approved by the President.

The exertions which the United States have made to effect a general pacification with their Indian neighbors, pursuant to the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, the refusal of the Sacs of Rock river to attend the negotiations set on foot by the President for that purpose, and the acts of hostilities which they have committed since they were notified to attend the American commissioners, would justify the infliction of the severest chastisement upon those savages. The President, however, always disposed to pursue the most liberal policy towards the Indian tribes within our territories, preferring their reclamation by peaceful measures to their punishment by the application of the military force of the nation, receives with pleasure the intimation that this tribe has manifested a disposition at this late hour to listen to the voice of reason and justice, and to return to the habits of peace and friendly intercourse with the United States. You are therefore authorized and instructed to permit the deputation of Sacs to meet you at such time and place as shall be convenient to you, and proceed to adjust with them the conditions of peace agreeably to your general instructions. The surrender of all property stolen or plundered since they were notified to attend the commissioners of the United States may properly be required as preliminary to the permission to attend for the purpose of treating. In granting this permission, they ought to be distinctly informed that it is entirely the result of the clemency and humanity of the President towards them in particular, and of his general disposition to treat with liberality and equity all the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States whose conduct shall not render a different policy indispensable.

Instructions upon the subject of the claim of the Winnebagoes will be communicated to you in due time, if it shall be thought that they are necessary.

I have the honor to be,

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

GOVERNORS WILLIAM CLARK, NINIAN EDWARDS, and AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU, Esq.

A treaty between the United States of America and the Wyandot, Delaware, Seneca, Shawanee, Miami, Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pattawatamie tribes of Indians, residing within the limits of the State of Ohio and the Territories of Indiana and Michigan.

Whereas the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pattawatamie tribes of Indians, together with certain bands of the Wyandot, Delaware, Seneca, Shawanee, and Miami tribes, were associated with Great Britain in the late war between the United States and that Power, and have manifested a disposition to be restored to the relations of peace and amity with the said States; and the President of the United States having appointed William Henry Harrison, late a major general in the service of the United States; Duncan McArthur, late a brigadier in the service of the United States; and John Graham, esquire, as commissioners to treat with the said tribes; the said commissioners, and the sachems, headmen, and warriors of said tribes, having met in council at the Spring Wells, near the city of Detroit, have agreed to the following articles, which, when ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, shall be binding on them and the said tribes:

ARTICLE 1. The United States give peace to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pattawatamie tribes.

ART. 2. They also agree to restore to the said Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pattawatamie tribes all the possessions, rights, and privileges which they enjoyed or were entitled to in the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven, prior to the commencement of the late war with Great Britain; and the said tribes, upon their part, agree again to place themselves under the protection of the United States, and of no other Power whatsoever.

ART. 3. In consideration of the fidelity to the United States which has been manifested by the Wyandot, Delaware, Seneca, and Shawanee tribes, throughout the late war, and of the repentance of the Miami tribe, as manifested by placing themselves under the protection of the United States by the treaty of Greenville, in eighteen hundred and fourteen, the said States agree to pardon such of the chiefs and warriors of said tribes as may have continued hostilities against them until the close of the war with Great Britain, and to permit the chiefs of their respective tribes to restore them to the stations and property which they held previously to the war.

ART. 4. The United States and the before-mentioned tribes or nations of Indians, (that is to say, the Wyandot, Delaware, Seneca, Shawanee, Miami, Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pattawatamie,) agree to renew and confirm the treaty of Greenville, made in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and all subsequent treaties to which they were respectively parties, and the same are hereby again ratified and confirmed in as full a manner as if they were inserted in this treaty.

Done at Spring Wells, the eighth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

In testimony whereof, they (the said commissioners, and the sachems, headmen, and warriors of the different tribes) have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

[Signed by the commissioners of the United States and a number of Indian chiefs.]

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 9, 1815.

The representations which the President has received from the State of Ohio, and the Territories of Michigan and Indiana, have rendered it expedient, in his judgment, to take immediate measures for removing the hostile excitement which has appeared; and he has been pleased to appoint you to be the commissioners of the United States for holding a treaty with such of the Indian tribes as it shall be deemed necessary to conciliate upon the occasion. You will, therefore, give the chiefs notice of your appointment, and that a meeting will be held at Fort Wayne, or at any other place that may be more convenient, and at such time as may be fixed upon by the commissioners.

The objects of the proposed treaty are, to remind the tribes of their existing relations with the United States; to explain to them the nature of the reciprocal stipulations in the treaty of peace and amity lately concluded between the United States and Great Britain, so far as they concern the Indians; to inform them of the measures that have been taken to carry the treaty of peace into effect, by a mutual surrender of the military posts which the American and the British forces had taken from each other during the war; to warn them against any improper practices that might involve them in hostilities with the United States; to promise a punctual performance of all our engagements with them; and to insist upon the observance of good faith on their part.

When the treaty with Great Britain was ratified at Washington, the United States were at war with some of the Indian tribes, and at peace with others. By the ninth article of the treaty, the parties reciprocally engaged to put an end to hostilities with all the tribes or nations with whom they were respectively at war; and, in fulfilment of this engagement, the United States appointed commissioners for the single purpose of offering a treaty of peace to all the Indian tribes on the Mississippi and its waters with whom they were at war at the time of the ratification of the treaty. But the United States were at that time in a state of peace and friendship with the tribes inhabiting the State of Ohio and the Territories of Michigan and Indiana; and had, in particular, concluded a treaty at Greenville, on the 22d July, 1814, with the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanees, Senecas, and Miamies. The ninth article of the treaty with Great Britain did not, therefore, apply to those tribes; and the fact that peace was re-established between the United States and Great Britain being generally communicated and known throughout the Indian country, no act connected with the British treaty appeared to be necessary upon the part of the American Government to preserve peace, where peace already existed. It was also presumed that the British officers and agents would themselves communicate the return of peace to all the Indians in arms against them. There is reason to believe, however, that these grounds of distinction have not been understood by the Indians, and you will be pleased to take particular pains in explaining the conduct of the Government, so as to satisfy them that it has not neglected them or their interest.

It will be proper that you should distinctly represent to the Indians that, on the present occasion, the United States do not wish to obtain from them any new cession, grant, or privilege whatsoever, but merely to manifest their disposition to cultivate peace and good-will, and to secure to themselves the advantages of the treaties which already exist. Where the United States have already purchased and paid for cessions of land or privileges of roads, the tribes from which they were purchased must of course comply with their contracts; and, particularly, they must not, on any pretence, attempt to prevent or obstruct the necessary surveys for ascertaining the boundaries of the ceded tracts, and laying out the stipulated roads. The President will in all things set them an example of good faith; and you may assure them he will take every occasion to promote their happiness and prosperity, as long as they shall show a just confidence in his word, and a friendly disposition towards the children of the American family who are placed under his care and protection in their neighborhood.

The President entertains a strong hope that the Government of Great Britain will evince the sincerity with which it ratified the treaty of Ghent by restraining all its subjects from lawless attempts to alienate the Indians from the nation whose territory they inhabit. But every precaution ought still to be taken to detect and defeat such attempts. The right of British traders to enter the territory of the United States for the purpose of trading with the Indians is a proper subject for the consideration of the American Government; but the Government has not yet prohibited a fair and friendly intercourse of that nature, and the President is only desirous at present to impress upon the Indians that the intercourse is entirely a matter of indulgence, which may be denied whenever it is found prejudicial to the interests of the United States. The Indians should be warned against any misrepresentation of the late treaty with Great Britain, which there is some reason to think has already been misrepresented. The stipulations respecting the Indians are reciprocal, and amount, in fact, to nothing more than would have been the case if the treaty had not contained them; they merely provide that the parties, as a consequence of the peace between themselves, shall severally offer peace to the Indians with whom they were actually at war when the treaty was ratified—each party agreeing with the other to place the Indians inhabiting their respective territories upon the footing upon which they stood before the war. In doing this, the United States have acted voluntarily; and it must not be credited for a moment that Great Britain has had any peculiar agency in obtaining a benefit for the Indian tribes, whether they were at war or at peace with us. It will be of some importance also to explain the reason which has prevented the immediate surrender of Michilimackinac. The British troops have evacuated Castine, Fort Niagara, and Fort Bowyer, and they are preparing to evacuate Michilimackinac; but as their buildings on the shore of Lake Huron were burnt during the war, the British chargé d'affaires has requested that the troops might be permitted to remain where they are until a shelter can be provided for them within their own territory. The President, in a spirit of friendly accommodation, has acquiesced in the request, upon an assurance that the postponement of the surrender would not be unreasonably protracted. In the mean time orders have been issued for the surrender of Malden, provided it can be done without danger from Indian hostilities, before the surrender of Michilimackinac is effected. The object of these explanations will be to counteract any suppositions that the treaty of peace has placed Great Britain in a new and more advantageous relation to the Northwest Indians; to supersede the idea that the Indians have acquired by the treaty a more independent political character than they possessed before; and to beget a just confidence in the power as well as the resolution of our Government to maintain its rights against every opposition.

The policy of introducing military stations and factories generally into the Indian country becomes every day more and more apparent, as well for the sake of the Indians as for our own sake. An opportunity should be taken, therefore, to apprise the Indians that, in order to aid and protect them, and also to guard against encroachments upon the property and people of the United States, the President contemplates ordering a chain of establishments to be gradually extended from Chicago, along the Illinois, to St. Louis. This will secure for them supplies; will afford them an occasional asylum; and will present constant opportunities either to claim redress for any grievances that they may suffer, or to communicate intelligence of any dangers that they may apprehend at home or abroad. It is, indeed, particularly important that they should be taught a habit of giving to the public agents constant information of any occurrences that concern the peace and the safety of the country.

A short time before the treaty of Ghent was ratified, a quantity of goods had been sent to the care of Governor Cass, for presents to such of the Indians as were willing to take an active part in the war. The design was merely gratuitous; and, the occasion for making the presents having ceased, it is believed that the goods remain undistributed. If this be the case, and you should think it advisable and serviceable to distribute any part of them among the Indians on the present occasion, you may apply to Governor Cass, who will receive instructions to execute any requisition that you shall make.

The President will be desirous to hear the accounts of your progress, and of your prospect of success, as often as you can transmit them; and the result of your negotiations, if it is such as may be reasonably expected, you will put into the form of a treaty, recognising the existing state of peace, exchanging assurances of mutual friendship, and confirming all antecedent treaties and engagements, except so far as they respect a co-operation in the late war against Great Britain.

The compensation of the commissioners and their secretary upon the present occasion will be the same as was allowed for the services of the commissioners at the treaty of Greenville, in July, 1814; and the contractor will be directed to furnish the necessary supplies upon your requisition, to be deposited at such place and time as you shall desire. You will appoint your own secretary, selecting him (if you can advantageously) from the number of meritorious officers who are not retained on the military peace establishment.

If you should deem a military escort necessary to the safety of the commissioners, you will be pleased to apply to the officer commanding the American troops in the department, who will receive orders to grant your request.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

To Major General WM. H. HARRISON,
Brigadier General DUNCAN McARTHUR, and JOHN GRAHAM, Esq.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 12, 1815.

Agreeably to the intimation which was given in my letter of the — instant, the President has appointed Governor William H. Harrison, General Duncan McArthur, and Mr. John Graham, to hold a treaty with the Northwest Indians at Fort Wayne, in the Indiana Territory, at such time as they shall appoint. The President relies upon your good offices in preparing the Indians for the proposed council, and in bringing it to an amicable termination. He has directed me to communicate to you (in confidence) a copy of the instructions which have been sent to the commissioners, that you may see at once the principles upon which your co-operation is desired, and may be rendered the most efficient.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

Governor WORTHINGTON, of the State of Ohio.
Governor CASS, of the Michigan Territory.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 12, 1815.

My letter of this date informs you that Governor Harrison, General McArthur, and Mr. John Graham are appointed commissioners to hold a treaty with the Northwest Indians. If the goods which were sent to your care a short time before the termination of the war for the purpose of making presents to such of the Indians as should take an active part in our favor have not been distributed, the commissioners are authorized to make a requisition upon you for the whole or a part of the goods, to use at the proposed treaty. You will be pleased, therefore, to transmit to them an invoice of the articles, and to comply with their requisition, with as much despatch as is practicable. A copy of the invoice, of the requisition, and of the receipt for the delivery, you will be pleased to send to this Department. If a requisition should not be made by the commissioners, you will consider the former instructions respecting the disposition of these goods to be still in force.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

LEWIS CASS, Governor of the Michigan Territory.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 16, 1815.

It has been represented to the President of the United States that, during the march to Detroit, a number of cattle and hogs, and a quantity of grain belonging to the Indians, were taken, or used, or damaged by our troops. The President requests that you will examine and ascertain the facts; and he authorizes you to assume, on behalf of the United States, the payment of a fair valuation of the property in question.

I take this opportunity to enforce your general instructions respecting rights already acquired from the Indians by treaty. The act of Congress requires two millions of acres of land in the Michigan Territory to be surveyed and appropriated for the land bounty allowed by law to the army. You will apprise the Indians of an intention to make the surveys immediately, and secure their acquiescence.

Your commission to treat with the Indians has been transmitted under an envelope to Governor Harrison, the first named commissioner.

I am, very respectfully,

A. J. DALLAS.

Gov. HARRISON, Gen. McARTHUR, and JOHN GRAHAM, Esq.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 12, 1815.

In the absence of the Acting Secretary of War, I have been requested by the President to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ult., and to forward you a copy of your instructions, lest the original, which was directed to you at Vincennes, may not have been received. From these instructions, you will observe that it is not contemplated to obtain a cession of land from the Indians at the treaty which you are authorized to hold with them, but that its objects are merely those of peace and good-will, and to obtain the fulfilment of all treaties that have heretofore been entered into.

You will also perceive that the time of holding the treaty is left altogether to the discretion of the commissioners; and I am requested by the President to say that, if the preliminary measures which you propose as the means of impressing the Indians with more favorable dispositions towards us, and of inducing the tribes more generally to attend the grand council, are concurred in by the gentlemen acting with you in the commission, you are at liberty to pursue them. It is, however, desirable that the treaty should be held at as early a period as may be compatible with the attainment of the objects contemplated; and it is hoped here that the evacuation of the western posts by the British forces will have so powerful an effect as to induce them to seek an early and satisfactory termination of all differences with us.

I have the honor to be,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Chief Clerk.

Maj. Gen. WM. H. HARRISON, near Cincinnati.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 7, 1815.

At the request of the Acting Secretary of War, I enclose for your information a copy of a letter received from Governor Cass, dated the 7th ultimo. The goods forwarded to Detroit, it is presumed, will be sufficient as well for the purposes of the treaty as for those contemplated by Governor Cass. Mr. Dallas has not deemed it necessary to give any additional instructions to those which you have already.

He has approved of the measures proposed by Governor Cass for running the line, and authorized him to call out a company of rangers to attend the surveyors, if necessary.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Chief Clerk.

Gen. WM. H. HARRISON, Gen. McARTHUR, JOHN GRAHAM, Commissioners.

SIR:

DETROIT, August 26, 1815.

Having been appointed by the President of the United States commissioners for treating with certain Indian tribes inhabiting the territories of the United States, we, immediately on our arrival here, gave notice to the chiefs assembled at this place of our wish to meet in council all the Indians belonging to those tribes who had taken part in the late war against us, (some of whom, as we are informed, still remain in the territories of His Britannic Majesty,) that we might inform them of the provisions in the treaty of Ghent, so far as they were interested, and concert with them the proper measures for carrying the same into effect.

We accordingly requested the chiefs of their respective tribes to invite them to meet us on the 25th of this month. This invitation did not produce the desired effect, and we were told in council that they were detained by the British agents for Indian affairs.

Understanding that you have a general control over these agents, we have deemed it as due to the friendly relations of our two Governments to apprise you of the fact, not doubting that you will adopt such measures as may seem to you most proper to give full effect to the ninth article of the treaty of Ghent, which, you are aware, requires certain acts on the part of the Indians to whom it applies.

Our secretary, Major Langham, will have the honor to deliver you this, and will receive your answer.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

WM. HENRY HARRISON,
DUNCAN McARTHUR,
JOHN GRAHAM.

The Senior Officer Commanding, &c. Malden.

SIR:

AMHERSTBURGH, August 27, 1815.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant.

In answer to which I beg leave to inform you that the officer commanding at this post has no control or authority whatever over the Indians, they being considered as a free and independent people—consequently, at liberty to act for themselves.

All matters relating to Indian affairs are conducted by officers appointed for the express purpose, at the head of whom is a deputy superintendent, to whom all communications respecting the Indians should be made.

I have made every inquiry to ascertain if any regular communication had been received from you inviting the Indians to the council you say was directed to assemble on the 25th instant, but can only learn that private invitations had been received by individuals, who, it appears, had no objection to going over, but considered it a matter of greater importance their attending a council ordered to assemble here on the 26th instant for the explaining the articles of the treaty of Ghent.

I cannot account for the conduct of the person who delivered me your letter, with whom I sent a servant to conduct him to the quarters of the deputy superintendent of Indian affairs; but on going part of the way he dismissed the servant, and, as far as I can learn, returned immediately to Detroit, taking the letter with him.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

EDWARD BARRACK.

Major General HARRISON, &c., Detroit.

SIR:

AMHERSTBURGH, August 29, 1815.

On my landing at Sandwich yesterday, a letter signed A. L. Langham was delivered to me by an interpreter of the United States Indian Department; and the singular circumstances, altogether, on the visit of the writer to this post, and his interview with Major Barrack, induced me to defer a reply to your own letter of the 26th instant, and which I have now the honor to do.

In regard to the first paragraph of your letter, I beg leave to inform you that the different tribes of Indians and their chiefs now resident in the British territory had been fully made acquainted with every article of the treaty of Ghent, and that their satisfaction at the same was manifest, and their conduct since orderly and peaceable.

In regard to the second, I am induced to believe that no detention has taken place on the part of the British agents, or any inducement whatever held out to the Indians on this side of the river not to cross over to the councils which you speak of.

In regard to the third, it is needless for me to inform you that the Indians are their own free agents, and are not to be forced to act beyond their own pleasure; and I again disavow all knowledge, or even belief, of the fact of their being prevented attending the councils you wished; and, also, that the treaty¹ of Ghent has been most fully explained to those Indians who had been in alliance with this Government.

It may be necessary for me to remark to you, sir, that I am not at all surprised at any disinclination on the part of the Indians on the left bank of these lakes and rivers to visit the opposite shores, when such pains had so very recently (to my own knowledge) been taken to prohibit one of them ever to pass over; and to this line of conduct alone do I attribute their not attending your councils, and not to the reasons which you are pleased to assign.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WM. JAMES, Lieutenant Colonel Commanding.

To Major General HARRISON, &c., Detroit.

SIR:

DETROIT, August 30, 1815.

The letter which you did me the honor to address to me yesterday, in answer to that of my colleagues and myself of the 26th instant, was delivered last evening.

In reply to that part of your letter which relates to Major Langham, I must be permitted to believe that a knowledge of all the "circumstances" attendant on his visit to Amherstburgh would have freed his conduct at least from the imputation of "singularity."

The major, having been furnished with a conveyance by water, reached Amherstburgh late in the evening. It was his first object to procure quarters, but finding, upon inquiry, that all the public houses were full, he was under the necessity of waiting immediately upon the commanding officer, although he previously understood that he was engaged with company. Upon his delivering the letter to Major Barrack, after a hasty perusal of it, the major returned it, and informed him that a Colonel Caldwell was the person to whom the letter should have been delivered, and a servant was sent to conduct Major Langham to his residence. It was not until he advanced some distance that it occurred to Major L. that it could not have been the intention of the commissioners that their letter should be delivered to any other person than the military commandant to whom it was directed. Being unable to procure accommodations and refreshment in the public houses for himself and his men, the sun being nearly down, and being unwilling again to intrude on Major Barrack, he thought it proper to set out immediately on his return to this place.

The commissioners approve of his refusing to deliver the letter to Colonel Caldwell, and directed him to return it to Major Barrack by any conveyance that might offer. None having occurred for some hours, an interpreter was charged with its delivery. After the departure of the interpreter, the letter of Major Barrack of the 27th was received.

From the answer of Major Barrack to the letter of the commissioners, it appears that he had a very imperfect recollection of the contents of the letter. It was certainly never our intention to apply to a British officer to use any "control or authority" over the Indians to induce them to attend the council to which they had been invited. Our letter contains nothing that could warrant this idea; it was simply a communication of the information which had been conveyed to us, that an officer of the Indian department had exerted his "authority" to prevent their attendance.

It was doubtless incumbent on the two Governments to cause the article in the treaty of Ghent that relates to the Indian tribes which were respectively employed by them in the late war to be properly explained to them. I receive with pleasure the information you convey that this has been done on the part of His Britannic Majesty, that they have expressed their "satisfaction" at it, and promise in future to be "orderly and peaceable." It is much to be regretted, however, that this was not sooner done, as it might have been the means of preventing those depredations upon the property of our citizens, so vexatious and injurious to them as well as troublesome to you, and which I have understood have been continued until a very few days past.

From his excellency Governor Cass I have been informed that the restrictions upon the Indians passing the strait, to which you refer in the close of your letter, was in consequence of those depredations, but that it was never intended to prohibit the crossing of the Indians at this place.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. HENRY HARRISON.

Lieutenant Colonel JAMES, Commanding, &c., Amherstburgh.

SIR:

DETROIT, September 9, 1815.

We have the honor to inform you that we yesterday concluded and signed a treaty with the sachems, headmen, and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Shawanee, Seneca, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattawatamie, and Miami tribes of Indians. One copy of this treaty will be delivered to you by Mr. Graham, the other has been deposited with Tarhee, (or the Crane,) the principal chief of the Wyandots.

Although our instructions did not render it necessary, yet we deemed it proper to include in this treaty as well those tribes who had been friendly to us as those who had been hostile: 1st. Because many individuals belonging to the friendly tribes had taken up arms against the United States, and could only in this way be fully restored to their former situation; 2d. Because these tribes wished and expected to be included in the treaty. We hope that the President will approve this course, and that the several articles of the treaty will be satisfactory to him.

We found no difficulty in prevailing on the Indians to agree to renew and confirm all former treaties, and again to acknowledge themselves under the protection of the United States, and of no other Power. The Prophet, and most of those who were immediately connected with him, left the council and retired to the British territory before the treaty was signed. They professed, however, in open council, before they went away, the most pacific intentions, and declared that they would adhere to any treaty made by the chiefs who remained.

We had at the council a very full representation of all the tribes who are parties to the treaty, and we have every reason to believe that they will adhere to it as strictly as they ever have adhered to any former treaty with us, unless the British agents should interfere to prevent it.

The Wyandots are much dissatisfied that the road from the Rapids of the Miami to the western line of the Connecticut Reserve has been laid off so as to cross the Sandusky river at the Seneca village, instead of crossing at Lower Sandusky. They say that the road, running as it is laid out, will injuriously interfere with the settlement of the Senecas, to whom they granted the lands on that part of the Sandusky many years before the treaty of Brownstown was made; and that their understanding of the treaty was, that the road was to run from the Rapids of the Miami to the reserved tract at Sandusky. It is their wish that the road should now take that direction, but they are willing that it should strike the Sandusky anywhere between the reservation and an old Indian path that strikes the river about three miles below the fort.

Fully persuaded, from all the information we have received, that a much better road may be got in this way than that marked by the commissioners, we have written to the surveyor general, informing him of our having agreed with the Wyandot chiefs that it should be so run.

The chiefs complained to us that our citizens were constantly trespassing upon their lands, some of them having commenced considerable farms, without their approbation, while many more employed themselves in hunting and destroying the animals which were so necessary to them, and which, indeed, afforded the only support to their families.

We found, upon inquiry, that this complaint was not without foundation, and we did not hesitate to promise the Indians that decisive measures would be taken to redress them. We are induced to believe that a proclamation of the President, printed and distributed along the frontiers, would have the desired effect. It is unnecessary that we should say any thing to you, sir, of the importance of giving the Indians an example of good faith by the strictest fulfilment of every engagement we make with them. Good policy, as well as justice, requires this, as a contrary conduct would have the effect of procrastinating a further extinction of title to lands, which is now so ardently desired by the citizens of Ohio.

The subject of compensation to the Indians who remained faithful to us during the war, for property destroyed by our troops, has engaged our attention. There exists considerable difficulty in adjusting some of their accounts, from the difficulty of obtaining proper proof; and it appeared that the words of your instructions did not embrace some descriptions of property, the loss of which could be easily ascertained, as the remuneration appeared to be just and reasonable. Believing that it was within the spirit of your instructions, we have therefore agreed to include the horses that were clearly ascertained to have been stolen by our people, and to compensate the Seneca tribe for their houses which were wantonly burnt by our militia. We had less difficulty as to the former of these items, because payment, under such circumstances, is guarantied by existing treaties; and on the latter, because they were promised compensation by General Harrison at the time when the destruction of the houses took place.

As we are unable to close the accounts here for the want of the testimony of Messrs. Johnston and Stickney, Indian agents, it has been agreed that General Harrison should undertake the adjustment of the accounts of the Shawanee tribe at Piqua, on his return, and General McArthur those of the Wyandots and Senecas at Sandusky.

Illness has prevented General McArthur from signing this letter.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your humble servants,

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.
JOHN GRAHAM.

Hon. W. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

Journal of the proceedings of the commissioners appointed to treat with the Northwest Indians at Detroit.

CHILICOTHE, OHIO, August 8, 1815.

General McArthur and John Graham, esquire, two of the commissioners, met, and appointed Angus L. Langham their secretary.

August 11, 1815.—Proceeded on their journey to Detroit.

August 15.—Met General Harrison at Upper Sandusky.

DETROIT, August 22.

The commissioners held a preliminary meeting with part of the Wyandot, Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatomie tribes.

General Harrison, on behalf of his colleagues.—He saluted his red brothers, the chiefs, in the name of the President of the United States. He thanked the Great Spirit that they were again permitted to meet, and to talk of peace and friendship.

A treaty had been concluded between the American and British nations, an evidence of which was presented to the Indians in the friendly intercourse which subsisted at this time between them. In that treaty it was stipulated that peace should be offered to the hostile Indians on both sides for their acceptance. In obedience to that stipulation, and to the affection which the President felt for his red children, he had sent the commissioners not only to bury the tomahawk, and the animosity which the late contest had excited, but also its remembrance.

He wished to offer peace to all the tribes included within the limits of the United States, and all the members of those tribes, who had joined the British in the late war, and wished them all to come, and hear the good words of the President, sent through the commissioners to them. For that purpose, as all of them had not yet assembled, he appointed the 25th for the day on which they should kindle the council fire at the Spring Wells, at which he invited them all to attend, and to send word to all the absent members of their tribes, as well those on the other side of the river with the British as those on this side, promising that they should be received with friendship, entertained in safety, and might return if they chose in peace.

It had been reported to the commissioners that evil birds had been hovering about them, whispering in their ears that they were to be assembled here on the pretext of peace only to be betrayed and destroyed; that General Brown, the great war chief of the United States, (whom they then saw on his left hand,) and his warriors, were assembled here for that purpose, and other stories of that description, which the red coats had the disposition and capacity to invent. He would not condescend to controvert an imputation so foul and false. The conduct of the United States towards them they all knew, and he invited any person in the assembly to produce an instance, during their long intercourse with the United States, where they had once acted treacherously towards them.

It was the wish of the commissioners (as none of the Shawanee chiefs were present) to make known to ——— (the Prophet) and all the Indians who were now with the British at Malden, &c., that they should be met with friendship at the council fire, but they forbade any entreaties on their part to be used. To them the path to the council fire should be open and safe; they might come or stay, at their option. If they came, they should be treated as friends.

The citizens of Detroit had during the war been harassed and despoiled of their property. It would be too hard if the return of peace brought with it no security or protection to them or their property. They therefore most solemnly enjoined on them to respect the property of the inhabitants, and to abstain from excesses.

The Bay, a Pattawatomie chief.—Brothers, I salute you. I rejoice to hear the kind words which, in his goodness, our father has sent to his red children. I rejoice that the tomahawk, stained with blood, will be laid on the earth, never, I hope, to be raised again.

All the red children rejoice with me at the prospect of again treading their wilderness, and pursuing their game in peace and security.

We will comply with your request by restraining our young men from committing depredations on the property of the citizens. We both have some bad men, who act improperly. We will endeavor to restrain them. What can be done, we will do.

Father, I particularly rejoice to meet you again in council and in peace.

SPRING WELLS, August 25, 1815.

The commissioners met the chiefs of the Wyandot, Seneca, Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie tribes.

As many tribes which were expected soon had not arrived, the commissioners informed the tribes present that the lighting of the council fire would be delayed until Monday, the 28th. They expressed a wish, if they had received any answer from the Indians on the other side of the river to the invitation to attend the council, to hear it.

Tar-hee, (or the Crane,) chief of the Wyandots.—He would inform his brothers and friends of the result of the message sent to the other side of the river. The message was sent by his nephew, who was met by one of the Wyandots, who bore it to Walk-in-the-Water. Walk-in-the-Water being sick, and unable to be the bearer himself, sent one of his tribe. The messenger went to the other side, and found the Indians in council with the British agents, and delivered the message to the Wyandots. He was answered by one of the British agents, saying that they had received a message from the other side of the great waters, commanding them to hold a council at the same time that the American council should be held; that the young men who were in the habit of passing from one side to the other might attend (if they chose) the American council, but they could not spare the chiefs until their council should be over; then they wanted near their council fire, as they were convinced that their council would involve more of the interests, and be more to the advantage of the Indians, than the American council. The agent further observed that they might attend the American council after they had attended theirs.

[The above was interpreted to the other Indians by Captain Knaggs.]

Mis-col-no-mie, (or the Mad Sturgeon,) a Pattawatamie.—He sent by a Kickapoo the message to the Prophet, requesting him to come to this side and attend the council, and bring with him two chiefs of each tribe, to inform them of the truth of a complaint which had been made that the British did not issue rations sufficient. The Prophet answered that he could not come to this side until the council was terminated; after this council was terminated, he would come over and explain to them his opinions and his conduct.

General Harrison.—He discovered that the answers received were not the answers of the Indians, but of the British agents. Why they should prevent or procrastinate a treaty of peace with the Indians, he could not perceive, as it was expressly for the purpose of fulfilling a treaty with themselves; that treaty he held in his hand, an article of which expressly declared that peace should be offered to the Indians who had fought against either party.

The object of the United States was to preserve peace. This wish of theirs for peace did not proceed from a dread of war. All the Indians had experienced their bravery in the field. Nations, in their armorial bearing, had appropriated to themselves the emblem of some animal whose character they admired and wished to imitate. The Americans had taken the eagle, (the king of birds,) holding in one claw the green branch, (the emblem of peace,) in the other the arrows, (the emblem of war.) These arrows had been used with success against Great Britain; they were used until she manifested a disposition for peace. He held in his hand the result of that disposition—a treaty of peace.

In all his communications with them, he had made them acquainted with what was doing on the other side of the great waters. An event had lately occurred there, which, with the approbation of his colleagues, he would recite to them.

At the time that peace was made between the United States and Great Britain, all the world was at peace; since which time war has again commenced, by the French nation attempting to restore to their throne the great chief Bonaparte; but with the belligerents the United States are still at peace. In this last war, nine kings are arrayed against Bonaparte, at the head of whom is the King of Great Britain. These nine kings and some of the French people wish to restore Louis XVIII., another king whom the French had driven away. They have had three days of hard fighting. During two of these days Bonaparte partly defeated them, having driven them as far as from this place to the Maumee rapids. On the third day, however, we have reason to believe that Bonaparte was defeated, but it is probable that he had not suffered more than the allies had done, for they did not drive him farther than the position which he occupied the first day. The British say that they have heard more than we have, and that the French nation has dethroned Bonaparte, and restored Louis XVIII.

It was false if it had been represented to the Indians that Great Britain alone maintained the contest against France. France was almost equal to all these nine kings; but a contest between France and any one of those kings would be like a fight between the eagle and the sparrow; France would crush them in a moment.

With these European contests the Americans, as a nation, had nothing to do. These great events excited the interest and wishes of individuals, and individual opinion itself was divided—some wishing success to one side, some to the other; but as a nation they were not allied to either. Like the Indians, it is true that, being a nation of freemen, they had no regard for emperors or kings.

The foregoing he recited merely as a subject of curiosity to them, and to remove the impression which was attempted to be made on them, that the fate of America was connected with that of Bonaparte. It had no connexion with the object of this council.

A general maxim of the United States was, to consider and treat all the world as friends, unless they were at war. They wished it with the Indians, as well as the rest of the world; but, as they had been before told, they always gave the option of war or peace. Another maxim was to form no alliances with any of the European nations, being a strong and powerful nation, and capable of defending itself against all other nations. With the Indians, their neighbors, who with them inhabit the same continent, they particularly desired peace. This desire is evidenced by this circumstance, that the United States have never first commenced war against them: war has ever commenced from some one or other of their tribes.

The Shawanees, Delawares, Wyandots, and Miamies were coming, and the Saginaws were expected: the council would adjourn until their arrival. A cannon fired from the fort would be a signal for them to assemble for council.

Now-ge-sheck, (or 12 o'clock,) a Chippewa.—Brother Knaggs, I am going to interpret for my nation; do you interpret for me to my white father.

We are rejoiced at the prospect of peace, which we infer from your words; we wish for peace, and are glad that we are so disposed. I hope and expect that we will grasp each other so firmly by the hand that we will never more separate.

I have little to say at present; all our tribe are not here; when they are assembled you shall hear more; for the present, we want plenty of food.

As the council is about to be adjourned for three nights, we wish our father to bare his breast; we want some milk; we also want to smoke.

Ou-que-nog-sch, (or the Ugly Fellow.) Ottawa.—He spoke, the representative of three nations; the three considered themselves as one. They were glad that their father was willing to hear them; if he was willing to hear, they would ask for plenty to eat.

The speech of the commissioners made him smile; it made his heart smile; but both his face and his heart would smile more if his belly was full.

They also wanted a little whiskey to enable them to love their squaws more ardently.

Ordered, That the Indians receive as much provisions as they want.

DETROIT, August 26.

The commissioners sent a communication to the commanding officer at Amherstburgh, copies of which, and of the correspondence which ensued, have been furnished to the Department.

SPRING WELLS, August 28.

General Harrison.—He discovered the same reasons for adjourning the council which existed before—the non-attendance of many of the tribes.

The commissioners had received a communication from the other side of the river, in which they deny having interfered to prevent the Indians from attending this council, and that the object of assembling a council at Malden was precisely the same with this—to explain to the Indians the treaty of Ghent. It was to be regretted, as their object was the same, that they had fixed on the same time for holding their councils; but it was still probable that all the Indians who were now at Malden would also attend this council. He would explain to them again the object of the council.

When the United States, or Seventeen Fires, and Great Britain, made peace, it was agreed and stipulated that both parties should offer peace to the Indian tribes who had raised the tomahawk against them; that the King of Great Britain should offer peace to those who had fought against his people on the side of the Americans; and that the President of the United States should offer peace to those who had fought against his people on the side of the British; that the Indians who were then at war should be restored to all their possessions and privileges which they enjoyed previous to the war. On these terms peace was to be offered and concluded, provided the Indians would accept peace on such terms: on such terms the President of the United States now extended the hand of peace; if they did not take hold of it, that part of the treaty of Ghent was at an end.

If others should not come, the commissioners would make the treaty with those who were present, and forever exclude from its circle those who neglect or refuse to come and renew the chain which had united them to the American nation.

SPRING WELLS, August 29, 1815.

General Harrison observed that the same cause for postponement still presented itself—the non-assemblage of the tribes. This cause had operated so long on behalf of the commissioners that they had resolved to leave it to them (who were assembled) at what time the council fire should be lighted.

He would inform them that the commissioners had just received a communication from the Prophet, in which he professes it to have been always his determination to attend this council, (the contrary had, however, been reported to him in council,) and that a deputation of two chiefs from each tribe of those on the other side of the river would also attend on this evening at — o'clock.

He requested them to decide whether they should appoint to-morrow, or wait until the arrival of those chiefs from the other side, and jointly with them determine on the time for lighting the council fire.

The great object of the council had been often explained; he would not again repeat it. There was another object, which was to ascertain what would be the conduct of the Indians who had been hostile to the United States towards the other tribes and towards the British.

As the act of declaring war was performed after the manner of the Indians at Greenville last year, the commissioners would take the advice of their old friend the Crane, and have the ceremonies of making peace performed after the same manner. The commissioners had frequently explained their sentiments to them; they now wished the Indians to express their wishes, and give their advice as to the manner and time of performing these ceremonies. The commissioners could receive their answer now, or delay that gratification until to-morrow; if delayed, they requested those tribes that had some parts of them on the other side of the river to consult with them on the subject.

After some deliberation among the tribes—

The Crane.—As their father had left it to them to determine on the time for meeting their several tribes, the Wyandots, Pattawatamies, Chippewas, Ottawas, and their nephews, the Delawares, had determined that three nights should intervene, (making Friday.) On the day succeeding the intervening nights the council should be open. The reasons influencing this determination were, that the Shawanees had not arrived; that he understood they were very sickly, and that cause alone prevented their arrival; and further, with the approbation of the commissioners, they wished to send a messenger to the other side of the river, requesting them to come over speedily.

General Harrison.—The commissioners accorded with the Indians as to the time which they specified, but on that day they wished it to be definitely fixed. They cordially approved of their sending a messenger to the other side; they were unwilling to stand on a nice point of exactness with them; they wished them to come over and hear them, convinced that, after they heard the fair and honorable proposals which they were authorized to make, it would remove any prejudice which they might now entertain against the President of the United States and the American people.

SPRING WELLS, August 31, 1815.

General Harrison.—This being the day appointed for lighting the council fire, the first ceremony to be performed would be to remove all difficulty and impediments to their sitting around our council fire.

The Seventeen Fires had committed the performance of the ceremonies of the day to their oldest son, (the Crane,) chief of the Wyandots. The people of the United States were accustomed to liken his fidelity to them to the fidelity of the great archangel to his Creator. In war, as in peace, he had ever stood by the Seventeen Fires; and they request their red children to consider whatsoever he should say as coming directly from themselves.

The Crane.—Brothers, I salute you all; I salute you from the bottom of my heart; I rejoice that I meet you here, and return thanks to the Great Spirit that we meet in peace.

Hearken to me, who am about addressing you on behalf of the Seventeen Fires, and four tribes, the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanees, and Senecas—tribes who have sided with the Seventeen Fires, and consider themselves as one with them. Listen to us, the four tribes; we speak in behalf of all the Seventeen Fires. You, brothers, who have been on the other side of the river, I address myself particularly to you. You appear to look dark, brothers, as you sit before me; your eyes are dimmed with tears, and you cannot see aright. We have had a quarrel—that quarrel has caused your sorrow. I must now proceed to clear your sight; I shall do so in the manner and language of our forefathers, in the language which the Great Spirit gave to them to heal their difficulties, and speak peace.

Younger brothers—you, too, Wyandots, who have seceded from your tribe, and all you who have come from the other side of the river: In viewing you, you look sorrowful; you look sorrowful, not only from the operations of war, but also from sickness. This cause has not only operated on you, it has reached your women and children. This is the reason why your countenances are sad.

You, brothers, nephews, and Wyandots, who have come from the other side of the river; you who are sad of heart, and blinded by tears: I take this wampum into my hand; the Great Spirit gave it to his red children to speak with; it was the language of our forefathers; with it, as the emblem of the softest and whitest cloth, I wipe your eyes, and the eyes of your women and children, that you may all see clear again.

Brothers, listen on. Listen to the Seventeen Fires and the four nations, speaking with one voice. I speak the language which the Great Spirit permits. The same cause which prevented you from seeing, prevents you from hearing. I now take the emblem of the softest and finest feather, and clear your ears, that the words of your brothers, the Americans, may penetrate your ears, and sink deeply into your hearts.

Your throats, too, have been stopped; you could not speak the truth; you could not speak kindly to your brothers; with like affection, I will now clean your throat with the softest and whitest cloth.

Your hearts, also, in consequence of the disorganization of your senses, have been perverted; I now place them aright, that you may not only see, hear, and speak kindly to your brother Americans now, but in all times hereafter.

Brothers, &c. who have been hostile: Listen on to the Seventeen Fires and the four nations, speaking, &c. In consequence of the war and sickness which have raged, the bones of your friends are scattered over the earth; I will now gather them together, and deposite them in one grave, that your minds may be at rest hereafter.

Brothers, listen on. I have said that I collect your bones; I now bury them, and smooth their graves, that posterity travelling over them may not, by observing the protuberance, remember their former animosities.

Brothers, listen. I hope you will still attend to my words. I have collected and buried the bones of your deceased friends, and I have smoothed their graves; I have done so by the emblematic language which the Great Spirit gave to his children. I now take into my hand (another wampum) a white board, and with it I cover the bones of your friends; this board the Great Spirit gave; the sun will not warm through it, nor can the rain wet through it; it will preserve the remains of your friends dry and secure.

Brothers, listen—all listen to what we now speak. We speak in behalf of the Seventeen Fires, and of the four nations who have remained faithful to them; we have been addressing ourselves particularly to those who came from the other side of the river; but listen now all of you, that you may remember the ceremonies which now are performed.

One bunch of wampum was to clear the eyes, unstop the ears, cleanse the throat, and amend the heart; another to collect the bones, to bury them, to smooth the graves, and to secure them by a board, which the sun could not warm, nor the rain moisten.

These were all the ceremonies which would be performed, as the day was far advanced, and their father would have but little time to address them.

General Harrison.—He, on behalf of the commissioners, particularly addressed the Prophet and the Shawanees, and all those who had taken up arms against the United States. He saluted them all, and desired to speak to them of times past.

There was a time of dread and dismay, when darkness rested on the forest, when the warrior wandered in uncertainty and fear, often sleeping on the blood which covered his path, while his distant and anxious family (confined in their cabins) were looking frequently in vain for his return.

At this period you were unfriended and hopeless; he who had stood at your back, and promised to support you, had deserted you. At this period our great chief (Wayne) called you together, and took you by the hand; he and you, in the presence of all the white and red people, raised a great tree, under which you buried the tomahawk which had so long been raised between us, and had so often been stained with our blood. Under the shade of this tree, for a long period of revolving years, the white and red people enjoyed as much happiness as falls to the lot of humanity. But, unfortunately for us all, some young men, more devoted to amusements than to useful pursuits, as they were dancing around this tree, accidentally discovered the handle of this long-buried tomahawk.

The madness which resulted from this accident spread among all the tribes, and was increased by the circumstance of war having commenced about the same time between the Americans and the British. All the red people immediately and unadvisedly engaged in the contest, some on one side, some on the other; and we, brothers, instead of meeting in the peaceful council-house, encountered in the field. After a long contest between your late father the British, and your old father the American, the former acknowledged he was wrong, and agreed to make peace. Your American father, who ever regards with his own the happiness of the women and children of his enemies, agreed to make peace, and peace was accordingly made.

The ceremonies which had just been performed wiped away the remembrance of all these circumstances; it now remained to bury that mischievous instrument of which he had been speaking, and which had been the cause of all our difficulties; but what method should they take to bury this mischievous instrument? It had once been buried under the roots of the largest tree in the forest, but wicked men could there find it. He thought of burying it under a great house, and putting that house not in the care of men, but under the protection of the Deity himself. His thunder and lightning would blast the arm of the wretch who should dare to take it.

He now presented them with a bunch of wampum, an emblem that the tomahawk was buried under this great house; and, on their receiving the hands of the commissioners and the hands of the American war chiefs, they would consider war at an end and peace restored. [Hands received—council fire kindled.]

We had now lighted the council fire, and it behooved them to return thanks to the Great Spirit, who, on this day, had blessed them with so many auspicious circumstances—a cloudless sky, a pleasant breeze, and the company of the ladies. We ought to pray for some of the attributes of these ladies, who feel none of those angry and malignant passions which sometimes agitate the rougher sex. They have a lively interest in this council, for they and the tender pledges of their affection must feel severely the want of our good faith.

As the council fire which had been kindled after the treaty of Greenville, to the south of this, was extinguished, it was the wish of the commissioners that this should now be the council fire of all the tribes, around which they should hereafter assemble under their leading tribe, (the Wyandots,) who were the original proprietors; and this fire they wished extended as far as Brownstown, where it should be under its former keepers, the Wyandots, Ottawas, Pattawatamies, and Senecas.

The second in command of the hostile Indians.—He was rejoiced to hear the news of peace. How pleasing it was to see assembled, at this place and at this time, all the white and red brethren, who had so long been parted and at variance; that all their voices should now be united in one, and that one for peace! He returned thanks to the Great Spirit for these blessings.

Listen to what I have to say: I speak in the presence of the Great Spirit, from whose bounty and goodness we receive every thing, and from whose impulse we act. We solemnly promise that nothing but the mandate of the Great Spirit shall cause us to break the peace which we have now made.

He sincerely wished for peace not only with the whites but with all the tribes, one with the other; and that that peace should be lasting. He gave thanks to the Great Spirit for this fine day, for this cloudless sky, this pleasant breeze, and the attendance of the women—to women who were the mothers of mankind, every reverence and respect were due. But this happy morning is ever to be remembered and admired; for on this morning, with the rising sun, they were met by the messenger who invited them to come and to meet in peace.

He was solemnly impressed with the ceremonies which had been performed; the ceremonies of their forefathers brought to their recollection their virtues and their fidelity to their engagements. The words which had been spoken had sunk deep into his heart, after his senses were restored, where they should remain like the bones which had been buried in security, and forever. He should never forget the counsel and advice of their wise and venerable chief, the Crane, who had performed those ceremonies, nor the instruction which they convey.

We have, indeed, been distressed, and we have been far astray; but many others have gone astray. Our land has been spread with blood, and our bones have been scattered. But I hope all these bones are now collected; we will not stumble over them again to remind us of former hostilities, and that white board which protects them from injury may never be removed; recollecting the actions and precepts of our forefathers, we shall need no other inducement to act correctly.

It is true what our father has told us of times past; he recalls the burying of the tomahawk, and the erection of a great tree over it to keep it forever hid; but, unfortunately, the tree withered and fell, and the tomahawk was discovered and raised. It is most true, also, that we have suffered much in consequence of it. But now that it is to be buried under the great house, under the protection of the Great Spirit, I hope and expect it will never be raised again. We agree with our father to bury it there, and join in the wish that the thunder and lightning of Heaven may blast the arm of him who attempts to raise it.

We accept the wampum, emblem of peace, from our father and brothers, and beg leave to return it to them with similar sentiments. It is the wish and request of all who sit around me that the calumet be accepted and passed all around, and that they should recall the circumstance to mind every morning that the remembrance of it may never be obliterated; that the wampum, connecting their hands and arms together, should be remembered. They wished once more to join hands, an emblem that they should never be parted again, and that the scene of this transaction, the council-house, should ever be held in remembrance.

It was delightful to observe the whole congregation smoking together the calumet of peace; but it was now growing late. We wish to hear our father first in the morning. Here at this council fire we will again meet to-morrow, again join hands, and interchange our sentiments.

SPRING WELLS, September 1, 1815.

General Harrison.—He addressed those who were late our enemies, now our friends. He had been instructed by his old friend, the Crane, that he had omitted, inadvertently, a part of the ceremonies yesterday, which was to sweep around the council-house; he would now do so; and he hoped that they might now repose without inconvenience around the council fires.

My children, I now address all of you; I address you in the name of the great chief of the United States, and beg that you will attend to me.

When people have quarrelled and have made friends, it is always unpleasant to recur to the causes which led to the quarrel. Under this impression, I shall forbear to tell those who have lately been our enemies that they were the first to lift the hatchet; I shall proceed to explain to you all the objects with which the commissioners are charged. You have all been informed that the United States and Great Britain, being mutually tired of war, had come to a determination to make peace. But if you have been told that this peace was sought after by the United States, and that they sent their ministers to England to solicit it, you have been grossly deceived. Both parties went into the territory of a Power that was neutral and equally friendly to both, the United States having absolutely refused to go to England for that purpose.

That the willingness of the United States to make peace at that time was merely the effect of their fondness for peace, the posture of their affairs, which stood better at that period than at any other of the contest, would best evince. He would particularly cite the affairs of arms on the Niagara frontier. Victory was there claimed on both sides; but many of those who were there, and now present, could best tell with what propriety victory was claimed by the British. In giving you the history of those transactions, I shall give it to you with truth: I shall do justice to the bravery of the British troops during their contest with us, than whom no troops in the world behaved with more gallantry.

The circumstance most disgraceful to the American arms was when the enemy was carrying on his operations against the city of Washington. The British, after beating and driving some of our militia who opposed them, entered the city where our great national councils were held, and burnt the house of our great chief. They, however, only staid there one day, and, having burnt a few houses, went away.

The same British general, with a much larger army, a few days after, made an attack on one of our great cities, (Baltimore,) defended by a few regular troops and some of our militia. This attack was repulsed, their general killed, and their army retired to their ships. In this contest, however, few were killed on either side.

About the same time the British army, under their great chief, Sir George Provost, (whom they all had heard of,) marched against our post at Plattsburgh; at the same time his army was marching by land, their fleet, equal at least in force to the American fleet, came with him, and attacked them off Plattsburgh. The result was, the almost entire destruction or capture of the whole of the British fleet, and a carnage hardly ever paralleled.

At the same time, Sir George, with an army, we say of fifteen thousand, but as he says of eight thousand operated against our fort, defended by about fifteen hundred, and was repulsed and driven back. This Sir George is now in England to be tried for not doing what they think he could have done; whether he is guilty or not, we do not know; all we know, and perfectly know, is, that he was defeated.

On the great waters, where our vessels of war have been engaged, ours have almost uniformly been successful. Only in two instances, where the force was nearly equal, has the American navy been unsuccessful.

So far have those vessels of war sought each other, that the news of peace has hardly reached them. We have just heard of a hard-fought battle between our ships, in which the British were defeated, having the captain, another officer, and fourteen men killed; our vessel having only four or five killed. Any of the British officers could tell them of this fact.

He was now going to inform them of an event so miraculous that they could hardly believe it, but he called on the Great Spirit to attest the truth of it, and which any of the British officers would confirm. Our city of Orleans was defended by about five thousand militia of the western country, commanded by one of our great war chiefs,

Jackson. The British, amounting to eight thousand men, came to attack it, but they were repulsed and beaten, having lost, as we say, between two and three thousand, and, as the British acknowledge, fifteen hundred killed on the field; while, on our side, (he speaks in the presence of the Great Spirit,) not more than eight or ten were killed. He would do injustice to the British if he did not inform them that their troops behaved with the most determined bravery. The Americans were posted behind a breastwork. The British, headed by their generals, moved on them in column. The Americans were from the western country, and knew the use of a gun; every shot took effect from our riflemen, while the cannon concentrated their fire upon the enemy.

At the time that peace was made, the territory which either had acquired was trifling and comparatively equal. The British had Castine, Bowyer, Niagara, and Mackinac, which were all small, commanding little more than the ground they stood on; and we had acquired, as they all knew, the western district of Upper Canada.

Such was the posture of affairs when the British and Americans had agreed to make peace; they asked each other, what shall we do for the red people? They have assisted us in the war, let us extend peace to them also; let the King of Great Britain extend his hand to those who have fought against him, and let the President of the United States extend his hand to those who have fought against the United States. Let us all have peace. They therefore agreed that there should be peace, and forgiveness for and oblivion to past hostilities; and that the Indians should be placed on the same footing and in the same situation that they were immediately previous to the war, provided the Indians themselves should agree to these conditions and be willing to hold them by the hand.

The United States more readily agreed to this arrangement, because they were at that time only at war with parts of tribes. The Wyandots, for instance, were many of them hostile, while their great chief was ever the most faithful of their friends. They could not strike an enemy without wounding a friend; they therefore resolved to wipe the tears from the eyes of all, and, in pity to all, to make peace.

Agreeably to the treaty, the President had appointed the commissioners for the purpose of extending his hand to them. They had accepted their hand in that council, but they must identify that acceptance by a solemn treaty in the sight of Heaven. The United States had nothing to ask of them; peace was a boon which they gave without asking an equivalent; all that was required was for them to accept or reject it; if the latter, that part of the treaty of Ghent which regarded it was at an end.

It was ever the custom of the United States to do every thing in the face of day. For this purpose they held their council at this public place, and in this public manner; all might here come, even the British officers. There stood at his left hand an officer of the British Government, who had fought against the United States, on behalf of his King and country, who came there by the invitation of the commissioners, they conceiving him to be a man of an enlightened and liberal mind. All men might here learn if they should say any thing improper to them, and at the same time would bear evidence to the engagements they should enter into, and should be witness if they were broken.

He separately addressed himself to those who remained faithful to the United States.

My children, the President of the United States, your father, esteems you as he ought. You have stood by him in the hour of danger, for which he thanks you. Now he requests you to make peace with the British. The United States will do every thing in their power to prevent you from waging war against them, or any of their subjects. But if you do contrary to their advice, you do it on your own responsibility, and without our assistance.

He addressed himself to those who had been hostile.

Chiefs and warriors, if what we have told you has not been told to you by the British agents, you have been deceived; I solemnly declare to you that it has been the instructions of their Government; and they were not to aid or assist you in any hostile views which you might have meditated against the United States.

It is now time to put an end to this long talk, lest our heads should be too full and our bellies empty. We will cover the council fire for this evening, that you may refresh yourselves. We wish you to draw provisions in the evening, that we may breakfast earlier, and that we may be enabled to do more during the day.

SPRING WELLS, September 2, 1815.

General Harrison.—He could not explain to them the wishes of their great father, the President, better than they were conveyed by himself in his instructions to the commissioners. He then read that part of the instructions which directed or explained—

- 1st. That no new grants were required of them;
- 2d. The cultivation of good-will; the confirmation of all former treaties;
- 3d. Former treaties to be carried into effect;
- 4th. No interfering to prevent the surveying of lands already purchased and paid for by the United States;
- 5th. Example of good faith and a regard to their happiness so long as they manifest the same to the American family.

These were the words of the President himself; and a greater confidence could not be placed in them than was manifested by reading these instructions to them; the literal meaning of all which was to place them precisely in the same situation in which they were previous to the war.

As two of the commissioners, General McArthur and Mr. Graham, were sick, and himself unwell; as they were comfortably provided for, and the succeeding day was Sunday, he wished the council adjourned until Monday, at which time he hoped to hear them. He reminded them that there was a secretary to the commissioners, whose duty it was to minute the proceedings and the observations made on either side; by which means the President would know the sentiments and opinions, not only of each tribe, but of each individual. The delay would enable them to arrange their communications in such a manner as not to commit themselves.

Another inducement to the adjournment was the probability of the arrival of the Indians from Mackinac before Monday, as a vessel which was soon expected had instructions to receive them on board.

SPRING WELLS, September 4, 1815.

General Harrison observed that the commissioners were well satisfied with the address received in their chamber by the Crane, and said to be the same delivered by the Prophet to the assembly of Indians; but as it was not delivered in council, the commissioners requested that they would appoint some one to deliver it there, that it might be committed to paper. If their sentiments were the same as were expressed, the council could be terminated by a treaty in a few days.

As the whole tribe of the Miamics were admitted to the friendship of the United States at Greenville last year, as, also, some bands of the Chippewa, Pattawatamie, and Ottawa tribes, he wished to know if those last named tribes were represented in the council, that they might all now, as entire tribes, be included and made parties to the treaty.

The Pattawatamies of the Illinois would meet other commissioners; those of St. Joseph's, and east of it, were expected here. He wished to know if they were represented.]

The Shawanee Prophet addressed the council in a speech, the tenor and subject of which was pacific.

He said that he spoke on behalf of nine nations—those who had remained with the British, and who had lately come from the other side of the river, and he spoke to the Seventeen Fires, and the four nations who had stood by their side.

The British had told them of the treaty which they had made with the Americans on the other side of the great waters, and to their great joy taken the tomahawk out of their hands. They then came nearly opposite this place, where the news of the arrival of the commissioners met them and communicated universal satisfaction. They had now come over to this side; and here also the tomahawk was taken out of their hands, so that they were now so completely deprived of tomahawks that he was apprehensive that their old women could hardly cut wood enough to make a fire.

They were not only willing and anxious for peace, but they wanted that peace to be solid and permanent.

Here they had kindled the council fire. At this council fire they would hereafter assemble, and speak through the nations who were the keepers of the fire, as they used to do in old times.

All who came from the other side of the river were pleased with the address of the commissioners, and all took them heartily by the hand.

They were very much pleased with what was expressed the other day of the care and attention which should be paid to their women and children. They and all their young men felt tenderly for their women and children, and were rejoiced to throw aside that mischievous instrument where it should not be again seen by their young men. Indeed, they cast every thing from them that they might more readily extend their hands.

It was the universal wish of the nine nations to be at peace and in security, and, being so, to do no wrong.

He almost stood alone; he had but two chiefs with him. If there were more, there might be a diversity of opinion; but now there was none; they spoke from the bottom of their hearts. He was not skilled in speaking English; he must speak the truth, for he spoke in the presence of the Great Spirit. In his presence, I say, brothers, let us take care of our women and children.

Let us adhere to our chiefs, and thank them for what they have done for us; although we are warriors, let us attend now to our women and children, and cast behind us the implements of war, and never look at them again.

[He addressed all the Indians.]

Let us be firmly united, hold fast by each other, and direct our united efforts to take care of our families; nor suffer them, as they have been, to be dispersed and in want. This was the wish of those from the other side with him.

Brothers and warriors (the commissioners and officers) here at this council, we take you by the hand, [shakes hand.] I don't call you fathers, but brothers. Tell my sentiments to the President; he is my father.

[He addressed himself to his young men, asking them if they heard him and approved his sentiments. He also requested that his address might be interpreted to the other tribes.]

Now, brothers, we have done a good thing. Let there be no reproach or recrimination between us. While speaking, I have heard one of our children crying as we have made peace, let him be released. (One confined for murder.)

The Pattawatamie Prophet.—Brothers and warriors: We, I presume, understand each other. We have heard what has been said. All know that a solemn treaty is to be made. If there is any man who does not understand, or disagrees, let him rise up and declare it.

Let us return thanks to the Great Spirit that we have a return of peace.

We Pattawatamies speak little. I shall be short, and to the purpose. I claim your attention.

How pleasing to be assembled together, and to communicate to each other our sentiments! I shall speak my sentiments, and speak them freely. We three nations speak together, being of one mind. How flattering to the three nations that they should be so united in opinion as to consider themselves as one nation! Let us then speak freely to our father at this time, that there may be no equivocation hereafter.

Around the council fire has been swept. We have now a clear place to repose. The roads are open and smooth. Our women and children can stray without impediment. For these things let us return thanks to the Great Spirit.

You Wyandots have near you the person of our father the President, and have heard his words. If you have reported his words to us correctly, we shall agree hereafter with you in sentiment, as we agree to speak with and through you.

We flatter ourselves that you have told us the truth. You have come from the President, and with what you have told us we are highly pleased, and here accede to. Let there be no reflections or recriminations between us hereafter. Let there be nothing but peace.

How pleasing to meet with those from the other side of the river who have been hostile! They are the same flesh, the same nation, and the same species of inhabitants with us. How pleasing that they are again coming to reside among us! I address myself particularly to the American Indians. Let us return thanks to the Great Spirit—that Being who created all things—that we are now united; nor let us be ever forgetful of what is now done for our women and children. Let us realize the happy reflection that, when we are gone on the hunt, we leave them, without apprehension, in peace and security.

We thank you for the ceremonies which have been performed for the purpose of correcting our senses, that your words might sink into our hearts. I thank you for so doing; but it was unnecessary. My heart and my sentiments were with you already.

You American Indians! We thank you for the kind words which you brought to us. You came not only with your own kind speeches, but brought with you those of our father the President, telling us of peace and friendship.

Brothers, Wyandots! We Pattawatamies inhabiting the same country with yourselves, what I say to you is with the sanction of all; what I say may be relied on; my nation will stand by me. Whatsoever you say or do for us towards the United States, we sanction. We thank you for speaking in our behalf, for correcting our senses; and we here present you, the Wyandots, with this wampum, the memorial of our thanks. We wish you to speak after us. I speak on behalf of the Pattawatamie nation.

[To Tarhee, the chief of the Wyandots:]

The Pattawatamies presented their thanks for his speaking in their behalf. The wampum then given should be a memorial of the friendship of the Pattawatamies for the Wyandots. This was the wish of the chiefs, warriors, and young men of his tribe.

Wyandots and Shawanees! The Pattawatamies take you by the hand. Tell your children of this our profession of friendship for your tribes, and do you old men retain it in recollection.

We wish you to speak your sentiments. After you, the chiefs of our nation will speak.

General Harrison.—An unfortunate accident had happened between two Indian warriors, one of whom it was supposed was killed. They could not sit in council when blood was shed so near them, nor deliberate when one of the tribes must be in grief for the loss of one of their nation. The council would therefore be adjourned.

SPRING WELLS, September 5, 1815.

The Crane, (Tarhee).—Listen to what I have to say: yesterday we had some talk; we four nations return thanks to the three nations, Pattawatamies, &c. They have corrected our senses, and we return thanks to the Great Spirit that we are assembled here and united together in council.

After this purification of our senses and adjustment of our hearts, every thing which we see or hear appears pleasant to us; for this we thank you.

He thanked them for what they had done yesterday; he had not performed all the ceremonies; those that they had performed showed that they had not forgotten the language of their forefathers; he had to apologize for the omission of some by himself.

There was a time when the land was in trouble, and the council fire at which they were accustomed to sit was destroyed. This was an unfortunate circumstance, and is to be ascribed to the fault of our fathers of Great Britain and America, and those of our children who took part with them. This has been a source of much grief to the chiefs, that their council fire should be destroyed wherat they assembled.

When this unfortunate circumstance took place, all the Indian nations took part with one or the other, until all were distracted and so disunited that no one nation could say that it was entirely on one side.

At length, brothers, our fathers, the British and American, agreed to make peace; and, taking their red children into view, have afforded them the same advantages with themselves.

This wise regulation was made by their two fathers, seeing that their council fire was extinguished, and they have now kindly rekindled it. Our father, the British, in order to have a fire on his side, has either taken it from the old place on this side, where it properly belongs, or has made one of his own. Our fathers who are sitting here have kindled for us a council fire at this place, which is to extend to Brownstown—a council fire wherat all the nations may assemble. They have done it wisely. Let us thank them for it. This fire is kindled by the President, by his commissioners. It is pure and it is his own. It burns that all the nations may see it. I hope you will all join with me in thanks, in thanks sincere and from the bottom of your hearts, to the President, for kindling for us this pure fire.

It was kind in our brothers from the other side of the river, after the fire was kindled, to come over and trim it, that it might burn brighter; they, seeing its blaze from the other side, did every thing in their power to promote the good work; they besought us to take care of it, particularly the Wyandots, &c., who were the keepers of the fire.

Thus they spoke; I will repeat their speech: "You Wyandots, particularly, attend to this council fire; cherish the good work, that peace may extend to the Creeks, thence westward, and around, embracing all the Indians. You must not say that you are incompetent to the task, that you are not sufficiently skilled in the mysteries and ceremonies of your forefathers; you at least know enough to answer the purpose, and you must not relinquish, through indolence, a thing of such great importance."

He called on all to listen attentively to him at this great council fire which their fathers had prepared for them. I shall try to follow the footsteps of our forefathers.

Wherever was the council fire of our ancestors, there were their minds; here is our council fire, here then be all our minds. Place your minds at this spot. I speak from the bottom of my heart when I wish they may never wander. Be fixed here, and here be united.

Our forefathers had a maxim that they had but one road to travel in; that road was peace—a road which women and children could travel in security; a road made by their ancestors. I have said that this was the road of our ancestors; let me invite you into it. The Great Spirit inspired those ancestors with the knowledge of it; then let all turn their faces towards it.

Step into this road of your forefathers; it is endless, and it is safe even for your women and children; the only one which is good and broad.

Listen all to the language of your forefathers: they exhort you to continue in this road; they say it is dangerous to step out of it; steep precipices and dark unfathomable gulfs bind close upon it.

All, far and near, are now travelling in this peaceful road of our forefathers. We must bear in mind that our white fathers may again fall out; and our British father has ever been most ready to give us the tomahawk. Let us join neither of them hereafter. If they fight, let us retire to one side. They quarrel about things of which we know nothing, and in which we are not interested. They quarrel for a time, then make friends, and we make friends also, and join hands again as fast as ever.

He exhorts all, both far and near, to keep in this peaceful path, to take care of their women and children, and to hold fast by the United States when they take hold again.

He exhorts the warriors to hold fast to this good work, to consider the people of the United States, and to treat them as brothers. Their happiness will result from it, and the Great Spirit will crown them with prosperity.

He particularly cautions the warriors and young men of the necessity of paying attention to this good work. Wherever they meet with their white brethren, salute them kindly; treat them as relatives, and avoid any difficulties. Attention to these matters is of the highest importance, as they are the means of securing and preserving friendships.

Give no attention to bad birds; some of them are ever flying about; turn a deaf ear to them. Remember the precepts of your forefathers, the precepts which were given to them by the Great Spirit.

Turn your attention to this council fire which our father, the President, has kindled for us. Keep your minds here, and you will enjoy many years of peace and happiness.

You have all heard what has been said. We are now fast bound to the United States. We require you to inform all who are distant and absent that we are bound by the hand and arm to the United States.

As you have appointed the Wyandots to take charge of the council fire, we depend on you to publish that information, that they may be respected accordingly.

As the council fire is intrusted to him, he begs all their assistance to keep it secure. He gives wampum memorial of the transaction.

A few words more. The road leading to the council fire from all the distant brethren, which was cut by their forefathers, had grown up and was choked with briars. He would now clear it, that all who turn their faces towards the council fire might travel with security and pleasure.

For the speech of the Pattawatamies, delivered yesterday, uniting with them in council and sentiment, they return thanks; they were well satisfied with it.

General Harrison, in looking around, discovered that many were absent; (this was the day on which the Shawanee Prophet and his followers left the council;) he asked if they left any message, or if any could assign a reason for their absence. The commissioners could not avoid thinking very singularly of their going off in that manner. As no person answered, he presumed that no message was left; he would therefore inform them of the course which the commissioners were determined to pursue.

Although, by the advice of the Crane, they had performed all the Indian ceremonies, yet there were none of the Indians that did not know that our customs required that they should sign a paper which declared their agreements. They all knew that at Greenville the great chief (General Wayne) and all their principal men signed a paper. These commissioners would also make out one, and lay it before them for their signatures, which should describe nothing which had not been explained to them before—that the United States and the Indians should be at peace, and that the Indians should be placed in the same situation in which they were previous to the war.

As those who had absented themselves had been once invited, he would not again do so; if any of those present felt friendly towards them, they might give them notice, and the council would delay its meeting until 3 o'clock; if they then attended, it would be considered that they were not absent; if not, they should forever be excluded from the treaty which should then be prepared.

The commissioners do not wish to be understood as prohibiting them from coming over. Any individual may return and join his tribe if he does so peaceably. The Shawanees, for instance, may come and join their tribe; but as a nation (if they refuse to sign the treaty) they will not be permitted to kindle a fire separate from the fire or independent of the chiefs of their nation.

A warrior of the Pattawatamies from the other side came in and reproached his tribe for saying that the absent Indians had left the council in displeasure. They had left it well pleased, and, imagining that every thing was finished, had retired.

Another Indian, being interrogated, averred that an Indian from the other side told him that the British had sent word that they wanted them to come over to a council which they were about to hold, and that a speech was absolutely sent to this side.

The first named warrior then observed that the reason of their going was that too many women and children were here; that they would commit no depredations on the property of the citizens; and that they thought it not worth the while to attend longer, as every thing was done.

General Harrison, addressing the Pattawatamie warrior, told him that he might listen to what he was going to say; he would not ask him to tell it, but he might do so.

Why, my brothers, has the British agent sent for the Indians to leave this council? Has any thing been said improperly to you? Have not many of their chiefs attended this council? What has been said against the red coats, that they should act in this manner? The United States knew their strength, knew their ability to ward off any attack so well, that they never have asked assistance, and they never would have asked their red children, if the enemy had not invited them by their example to do so; and then it was done knowing that the fondness of young men for war would induce them all to join the enemy if not employed by us.

Your American father asks nothing of you but for your own benefit. He asks you to bury the tomahawk. Is that to your disadvantage? Have you been asked for your lands, or for any thing else?

Why was the speech sent in this sneaking manner? We do every thing in open day. Every person might see and hear us. British officers might attend if they chose. The weather was pleasant, nothing prevented them. If this was a good speech, why was it not delivered in public as ours are?

The council would be adjourned until 3 o'clock the next day. We will not be rash in ascribing a bad intention to those who have gone away; if they attend to-morrow, we shall consider them as being always present.

SPRING WELLS, September 6, 1815.

The commissioners explained to the tribes the substance of the treaty.

SPRING WELLS, September 7, 1815.

The treaty was interpreted to the Indians as written, and the names of the subscribers taken.

SPRING WELLS, September 8, 1815.

The treaty signed and sealed by the commissioners on behalf of the United States, and the sachems, headmen, and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Shawanee, Seneca, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattawatamie, and Miama tribes.

A chief of the Pattawatamies.—He said that he saluted the commissioners, and thanked the Great Spirit that the treaty was now finally concluded. He thanked the commissioners, and thanked the President of the United States, that they were placed in the same situation that they stood by the ancient treaty of Greenville. All the cessions of the lands made by the Indians were confirmed. He gave his consent, though with reluctance. It was the act of their ancestors, who were, perhaps, less enlightened than those of this period. But why should we uncover the graves of the dead, and disturb their ashes? He would not do it. Let the dead rest in peace. He would not reflect upon their memories. He would rather say their acts were wise.

If, however, it were to do again, he would pause; he would reflect. He would look at his children in the cradle, and ask what right he had to injure those innocents? what authority he had to deprive them of their rights?

He hoped that whilst they walked upon the grounds they had acquired of the Indians, they would remember and commiserate their situation. He was afraid that their annuities would not be sufficient for them, and hoped that they would, when necessary, throw in something in addition to that which they were entitled to by treaty.

It had pleased the Master of the Universe to place the Indians upon this land, but the scene was now changed. Their ancestors had parted with it.

He begged the commissioners that they would not listen to little stories circulated to their prejudice.

He again saluted the commissioners, and called the Great Spirit to witness, as was the custom of the Americans when they opened a solemn council.

Pacan, chief of the Miami tribe.—He accounted for their joining their old father the British during the war; expressed his satisfaction at the return of peace, and at the renewal of the treaty of Greenville. He was also much rejoiced that no new concessions of land were demanded of them. They were much distressed from the scarcity of animals, and requested that white men might be prohibited from hunting on their lands.

General Harrison had just been informed by one of our citizens that a Wyandot had told him that the British told the Indian that, by the treaty of Ghent, the American Government should pay for the injury done their property at Brownstown. It was a lie. They knew it was a lie when they uttered it; and they might tell them that he said it was a lie. There was no such thing contained in the treaty of Ghent. The Seventeen Fires intend to satisfy their own friends; but injuries done to those fighting against them they will not atone for. The Indians had a just claim on the British for a compensation for those losses. He would not be understood that the United States made the British promise in the treaty to do so. It was a thing with which the United States had nothing to do. But as the British had seduced them from their duties to the United States, and, by so doing, brought those calamities upon them, it was but fair and just that they should compensate them for it. The British knew better than to propose such a thing to our ministers at Ghent. They knew that it would have been refused with indignation. But such a proposition was never made.

CREEK GRANT TO GENERAL ANDREW JACKSON AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 19, 1816.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

JANUARY 18, 1816.

The accompanying extract from the occurrences at Fort Jackson in August, 1814, during the negotiation of a treaty with the Indians, shows that the friendly Creeks, wishing to give to General Jackson, Benjamin Hawkins, and others, a national mark of their gratitude and regard, conveyed to them, respectively, a donation of land, with a request that the grant might be duly confirmed by the Government of the United States.

Taking into consideration the peculiar circumstances of the case, the expediency of indulging the Indians in wishes which they associated with the treaty signed by them, and that the case involves an inviting opportunity for bestowing on an officer who has rendered such illustrious services to his country a token of its sensibility to them, the inducement to which cannot be diminished by the delicacy and disinterestedness of his proposal to transfer the benefit from himself, I recommend to Congress that provision be made for carrying into effect the wishes and request of the Indians as expressed by them.

JAMES MADISON.

TRADE AND INTERCOURSE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 14TH OF MARCH, 1816.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 13, 1816.

In obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 2d of March, 1815, I have the honor to transmit the enclosed documents, which exhibit the general expenses of the Indian department, embracing annuities and presents, and the general and particular views of the Indian trade, called for by the resolution.

Nos. 1, 2, and 3, exhibit the amount of annuities due and payable, and the sums actually paid to the several Indian tribes within our limits; the presents made to them; and the general expenses of the Indian department during the four years preceding the 3d of March, 1815.

In the sum exhibited as presents is included a great quantity of provisions furnished the friendly tribes during the war, who, upon account of their attachment to the United States, were compelled to abandon their country and take refuge within our settlements. The same cause prevented their engaging in the chase, the principal source of their supplies in times of peace. The embarrassments produced by a state of war prevented the regular payment of the moneyed part of their annuities, and, in many cases, rendered it impossible to discharge that portion which was payable in merchandise. This circumstance presented a strong inducement to furnish them liberally with those supplies which we had at command, and which were even more necessary to them than the merchandise which we were bound to furnish. It is, however, believed that these supplies have been swelled to an unreasonable amount by extensive impositions which have been practised upon the Government in the issue of provisions to them, which renders it necessary to discontinue the practice, or to devise new and suitable checks to guard against their repetition.

The statements marked from A to Z exhibit the state of the fund set apart for Indian trade during the four years preceding the 31st of March, 1815. It appears from these statements that, from the commencement of the trade to the 31st December, 1809, a loss of $44,538 36 had been incurred, and that, during the period designated in the resolution, the sum of $15,906 45 had been gained, notwithstanding the loss of $43,369 61 from the capture of several of the trading posts by the enemy during the war. These two items, forming the aggregate sum of $59,276 06, may be considered as the commercial profit of the establishment during that period, which would give an annual profit of nearly $15,000. But the annual expenses paid out of the treasury in support of the establishment exceed $20,000, which presents a specific loss of more than $5,000 annually. The difference in the result of the management of this fund antecedent to the 31st of December, 1809, from that which is exhibited in these statements during the four years preceding the 31st March, 1815, is, no doubt, in a great degree the effect of the experience acquired by the prosecution of the trade. It is probable that a more intimate acquaintance with the nature of the commerce, a more skilful selection of the goods, and of the agents employed in vending them, and a considerable increase of the capital invested in it, will, in a short time, produce a small and gradually increasing profit, after defraying all the expenses incident to the establishment, which are now payable out of the public treasury. Under the most skilful management, the profits cannot be an inducement for continuing the system now in operation. That inducement, if it exists at all, must be found in the influence which it gives the Government over the Indian tribes within our limits, by administering to their wants, increasing their comforts, and promoting their happiness. The most obvious effect of that influence is the preservation of peace with them, and among themselves. The exclusion of all intercourse between them and the whites, except those who have the permission of the Government, and over whose conduct a direct control is exercised, has insensibly contributed to this desirable object.

The amelioration in their condition desired by the Government has continued to advance, but in so slight a degree as to be perceptible only after a lapse of years. If the civilization of the Indian tribes is considered an object of primary importance, and superior to that of rapidly extinguishing their titles and settling their lands by the whites, the expediency of continuing the system now in operation, under such modifications as have been suggested by the experience already acquired, appears to be manifest. The success of such an experiment requires the exercise of all the influence which belongs to the annual distribution of annuities and presents, aided by that which must flow from a judicious supply of all their wants, in exchange for those articles which the chase and the increasing surplus of their stock of domestic animals, will enable them to procure. This influence, skilfully directed for a series of years, cannot fail to introduce among them distinct ideas of separate property. These ideas must necessarily precede any considerable advancement in the arts of civilization, and presuppose the institution of laws to secure the owner in the enjoyment of his individual property; because no man will exert himself to procure the comforts of life unless his right to enjoy them is exclusive.

The idea of separate property in things personal universally precedes the same idea in relation to lands. This results no less from the intrinsic difference between the two kinds of property, than from the different effects produced by human industry and ingenuity exerted upon them. The facility of removing personal property from place to place, according to the will or convenience of the owner, gives to this species of property (in the estimation of the huntsman) a value superior to property in lands, which his wants as well as his habits compel him annually to desert for a considerable portion of the year. To succeed perfectly in the attempt to civilize the aborigines of this country, the Government ought to direct their attention to the improvement of their habitations, and the multiplication of distinct settlements. As an inducement to this end, the different agents should be instructed to give them assurances that, in any treaty for the purchase of lands from their respective tribes, one mile square, including every separate settlement, should be reserved to the settler, which should become a fee simple estate after the expiration of a certain number of years of actual residence upon and cultivation of it. Perhaps an additional reservation of a quarter or half-section of land to each member of such family would add to the inducements not only to make such separate settlements, but to the raising a family. If measures of this kind were adopted by the Government, and steadily pursued for a series of years, while at the same time a spirit of liberality was exhibited in the commerce which we carry on with them, success the most complete might be confidently expected. But commerce with our Indian neighbors, prosecuted upon a contracted scale, and upon the principles of commercial profit, would tend not only to diminish the influence of the Government with them, but could not fail entirely to alienate their affections from it. A period has arrived when the trade must be greatly extended, or entirely abandoned to individual enterprise. To reserve the trade in the hands of the Government, whilst the wants of the Indians are but partially supplied, would be to make them feel its influence only in their privations and wretchedness.

The right of the British Northwest Company to participate in this trade, independent of the will of the Government, is now at an end. The settlement of the lands ceded by the Creeks in 1814 will exclude the southern tribes from all intercourse with the Spanish ports in the Gulf of Florida. The preservation of peace with those tribes, as well as the execution of the plans which may be devised for their civilization, requires that this intercourse should not be renewed. The great distance of some of the tribes in the Northwest Territory, and in the northern regions of Louisiana, from the settled parts of the United States, will probably make it necessary to permit the British merchants from Canada to participate in the commerce of those tribes, until more accurate information is obtained as to their situation and numbers, their wants, and their capacity to pay for articles of the first necessity. As this knowledge is gradually acquired, and the mode of conducting the trade better understood, the exclusion of foreigners from all participation in it may be safely effected. If the trade is to be continued in the hands of the Government, the capital ought to be increased to $500,000. The exclusion from all commercial intercourse with the ports in the Gulf of Florida, and the necessity of extending our trading establishments farther to the west and the north, with a view to the ultimate exclusion of foreign participation in it, forcibly suggest the propriety of such an increase. This capital will probably be found greatly below what is necessary to supply the wants of the various tribes within our limits. The deficiency, it is believed, will be supplied by the Northwest Company, and by individual enterprise. At present, the Governors of our Territories are compelled to give licenses to trade with the Indians to every person who can give security. The power of rejecting the application on account of the character of the applicant appears to be necessary. If the licensed traders were compelled to take an oath to observe the laws regulating Indian trade, it might aid in correcting the abuses, especially in vending spirituous liquors, which have too generally been practised by them. It is deemed expedient to establish a depot of merchandise at St. Louis, or its vicinity, under the direction of a deputy superintendent, who should have power, in addition to supplying the regular and established trading-houses, to deliver to persons of good moral character, who should be able to give security, any quantity of goods, not exceeding $10,000, for which peltries and other articles of Indian commerce should be received in payment at a fair price, and at fixed periods; or that they should be sold by the superintendent on account of the purchaser. In the latter case, a premium equal to the use and the risk of the capital should be added to the price of the goods. This, as well as several other important ideas, are more fully developed in the communication of Governor Edwards and that of the superintendent of Indian trade, which are herewith communicated, marked R and Z z.

In compliance with that part of the resolution which requires my opinion of the expediency of vesting the general management of Indian affairs in a separate and independent department, I have the honor to state that an arrangement of that nature appears to me to be highly proper if the commerce of those nations is to be retained in the hands of the Government. The only rational principle upon which it is considered necessary to place the Indian trade under the control of the War Department is the necessity of relying upon it for the small military force which has hitherto been stationed at the different trading posts which have been established. This countenance and support could be given to the department to which it might be confided, with the same facility as if it still remained subordinate to the Department of War. The accounts of the superintendent of Indian trade are now returned to the Treasury Department, to which, so far, the superintendent is accountable. The accounts of the agents of the Government for the several tribes in amity with us are still returned, and settled in the War Department. From the payment of annuities to the various Indian tribes within the United States, a new species of jurisprudence has sprung up, which operates as a heavy tax upon the time of the Secretary of War.

All losses of property by American citizens, from the robberies, thefts, and depredations of those tribes, are to be remunerated out of the annuities payable to them. The evidence in all these cases is extra-judicial, and requires the examination and approbation of the Secretary before remuneration can be made. The presents which are made to them; the allowances to artificers settled among them by the Government; in fact, every disbursement of money connected with the Indian department, except in the prosecution of trade with them, has to receive the special sanction of the head of this Department. The duties incumbent upon this officer, resulting from the control of the Indian department, are so multifarious, so impossible to be reduced within general regulations, that a considerable portion of his time is necessarily devoted to them.

The organization of the Accountant's office is such as to render it impossible for that officer, by any human exertion, promptly to despatch the business which has been accumulating from year to year, until the mass has become so imposing as to render legislative aid indispensably necessary to correct the evil.

The creation of a separate and independent department, to which all the Indian accounts, including those which are still settled in the Accountant's office, will not supersede the necessity of modifications in the organization of that office. The changes which are deemed necessary to insure the prompt settlement of the accounts of the War Department are respectfully submitted to the Senate in the paper marked A z.

If a new department be formed, much of the miscellaneous duties now belonging to the Department of State ought to be transferred to it. The changes which ought to be made in this regard will obtrude themselves upon the attention of the Senate whenever the subject shall be considered.

It is believed that, at the present moment, no plan can be devised for carrying on the Indian trade that will be equally advantageous to the Indians, although it may be more economical to the public. This opinion is founded, in a considerable degree, upon the fact that those who have a competent knowledge of the manner in which this trade must be prosecuted, to be successful, are destitute of the capital necessary for the prosecution to the extent demanded by the wants of the Indians. The capital of those parts of the Union where those persons are to be found is not sufficient for the purposes of commerce among themselves. It is exposed to no risks, and the profit is great; consequently, it will not be employed in commerce with the Indians. The risks to which capital will be subject, when placed in the hands of these enterprising traders, as well from their casual want of integrity as from the robberies and thefts of the Indians, will prevent the capitalists of the commercial cities from supplying them with the means of engaging in this commerce. The proposition to establish a depot at some point about the mouth of the Missouri, for the purpose of supplying those who may be able to give sufficient security, with such an amount of goods as will enable them to prosecute the trade to advantage, will, in a series of years, produce a number of persons skilled in the manner of carrying it on successfully, and create a capital in their hands, which will be probably continued in that channel, and eventually justify the Government in leaving it, under judicious regulations, which experience will not fail to suggest, entirely to individual enterprise.

These views are substantially founded upon the conviction that it is the true policy and earnest desire of the Government to draw its savage neighbors within the pale of civilization. If I am mistaken in this point—if the primary object of the Government is to extinguish the Indian title, and settle their lands as rapidly as possible, then commerce with them ought to be entirely abandoned to individual enterprise, and without regulation. The result would be continual warfare, attended by the extermination or expulsion of the aboriginal inhabitants of the country to more distant and less hospitable regions. The correctness of this policy cannot for a moment be admitted. The utter extinction of the Indian race must be abhorrent to the feelings of an enlightened and benevolent nation. The idea is directly opposed to every act of the Government, from the declaration of independence to the present day. If the system already devised has not produced all the effects which were expected from it, new experiments ought to be made. When every effort to introduce among them ideas of separate property, as well in things real as personal, shall fail, let intermarriages between them and the whites be encouraged by the Government. This cannot fail to preserve the race, with the modifications necessary to the enjoyment of civil liberty and social happiness. It is believed that the principles of humanity in this instance are in harmonious concert with the true interest of the nation. It will redound more to the national honor to incorporate, by a humane and benevolent policy, the natives of our forests in the great American family of freemen, than to receive with open arms the fugitives of the old world, whether their flight has been the effect of their crimes or their virtues.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your most obedient and humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

NOTE.—The foregoing statement embraces the provisions furnished Indians at different periods while in the service of the United States, as well as other articles for their equipment for war against the hostile tribes; as also their expenses visiting the seat of Government, and at councils in different places; (the rations, to a considerable amount, have been furnished without designating the names of the tribes;) also the presents forwarded by General Mason. The evidence in all cases of their application not being yet received at this office, a more detailed statement than the foregoing is at this time impracticable. The accounts for 1811 and 1812 having been destroyed at the Treasury, no selection could be made of the presents to Indians in those periods.

NOTE.—This factory was broken up by the Indians in October, 1812, the whole period of its existence being only about eighteen months; and, because of its immediate vicinity to the seat of war, the usual quarterly returns not having been regularly made, but one account in the nature of an annual account is rendered, and this is brought into the general statement of the year after, because most of its accounts were not wound up until then.

SIR:

KASKASKIA, ILLINOIS TERRITORY, November —, 1815.

Some time in September last I had the honor to receive your letter of August 17th, with the resolution of the Senate of the United States to which it referred; but, owing to my absence from home, my engagements as a commissioner to treat with the Indians, and an attack of bilious fever, it has never been in my power till now to communicate the information which you requested.

Of the annuities stipulated to be paid to the different tribes of Indians within this Territory, none has ever been sent to me, except those of the Kaskaskia tribe, which were paid within the period mentioned in the resolution of the Senate of the United States, according to a statement hereto annexed, marked No. 1.

The whole amount of goods which I gave as presents to all the Indians within my agency, during the four years preceding the 4th of March last, is \$432 03 $\frac{3}{4}$.

The Government not having furnished me with one single article, I was obliged to buy those goods at the extravagant retail prices of this country, which were nearly double what they otherwise would have cost the Government. The most of them were given at the great council which was held at Cahokia in April, 1812, with the Pattawatamies, Ottawas, Kickapoos, and Chippewas. The residue were given, on occasions that seemed absolutely to require it, to Indians belonging to the different tribes within this Territory, and to prisoners that were taken at the head of Peoria lake in the expedition of 1812. A list exhibiting the whole amount, and the dates at which the respective proportions thereof were given, is herewith transmitted, marked No. 2.

In submitting to you, agreeably to your request, the following observations upon the several questions presented in the last paragraph of the resolution of the Senate, I must premise that, as I do not profess to have a competent knowledge of the Indians in other parts of America to decide upon the course which it would be proper to adopt in relation to them, my remarks are intended to apply exclusively to this section of the Union, and to the Indians residing upon the Mississippi river and its waters, above this place.

The first question is, "whether any alteration of the powers and duties of the several officers and agents employed in the superintendence and management of Indian affairs would be advantageous?"

That inconveniences and evils have grown out of the management and arrangements that have hitherto prevailed, experience has fully testified. But whether all these have resulted from defects in the existing laws, or from an erroneous construction of them, I shall not stop to inquire.

As superintendent of Indian affairs, ex officio, by virtue of my office as Governor, it would seem that my duties and powers extended to all the Indians within the limits of this Territory; and yet a co-ordinate power in some cases, and an exclusive one in others, have been exercised by the Governor of Missouri Territory.

Mr. Boilvin, the agent at Prairie du Chien, resides within this Territory, and, as I understand, all his accounts have to be submitted to the inspection and scrutiny of Governor Clark only.

The principal residence of the Sacs is, and long has been, on Rock river; but with them nothing seems to have been left for me to do, either before or since the commencement of the late war; and without consulting me, and contrary to my most deliberate opinions, (which, as well as I now recollect, I had the honor of submitting to one of your predecessors,) that part of them which professed to be friendly to our Government were removed to the Osage river, in the Missouri Territory, whither also the agent (Mr. Blondeau) was called, and from whence he makes no report to me on any occasion; whereas, if he were now subject to my control, (as I think he ought to be,) my judgment greatly deceives me if I could not have him much more usefully employed.

Mr. Forsyth was also appointed a subagent at Peoria, with instructions to report to, and receive the orders of, Governor Clark.

Under all these circumstances, the exercise of co-ordinate powers by the latter gentleman and myself, according to the dictates of our respective judgments, rendered us liable to counteract each other in cases in which our views and opinions were different, and in other cases unnecessarily to multiply the expenses of the Government, by both of us pursuing the same object, when the measures adopted by one might have been sufficient; and although the mutual friendship and good understanding that have constantly existed between us have prevented any very unpleasant collisions, yet it can hardly be supposed that we have always thought exactly alike upon all subjects that were connected with our respective duties. It is therefore my opinion that each superintendent of Indian affairs, within his respective Territory, should in all cases be the responsible head of the Indian department therein; that all other agents should be subordinate to him; and that their accounts should undergo his examination and receive his sanction.

The delivery of annuities to the Indians of one Territory by the Governor of another is calculated to produce a conflict of authority; has a tendency to lessen the influence of the superintendent within whose jurisdiction they reside, and, by putting it out of his power to retain any part of those annuities, even in those cases in which the law would justify it, diminishes the responsibility which they [he] would otherwise feel, and destroys the check which it is essential he should hold over them to restrain them from the commission of acts of injustice, or to coerce retribution after such acts shall have been perpetrated.

The Sacs, for example, have been in the habit of receiving their annuities from the Governor of the Missouri Territory. He, however, has no cognizance of any offences committed by them. Every demand for satisfaction must be made by me, as the Governor or superintendent within whose jurisdiction they reside. He therefore ought not necessarily to be presumed to know that which it is my province exclusively to inquire into. And, indeed, with the best disposition to harmonize and co-operate, cases might happen in which it would be impossible for me to communicate in time the most important information; for the want of which, the annuities might be delivered, when, according to the spirit and intention of the law, they ought to be retained.

In other cases we might disagree as to the propriety of delivering them: of course, I could have no control; for he, having the power in his own hands, could execute it at pleasure.

It might even sometimes be useful to excite the fears of those people, in order to make a merit of forgiving them, in cases in which it would not be absolutely necessary, and might be impolitic, to punish them; but, in losing all control over the annuities, I lose the most efficient engine with which to manage them, whilst the whole burden of that duty rests upon me exclusively. Besides, nothing is more injurious in the management of Indians than for them to have a father for this, and another for that purpose. Such a system is too complex for their comprehension. The management of them, to be successful, ought to be simple and perfectly uniform; and therefore I think that all annuities, wheresoever payable, ought to be delivered to them by the Governor in whose Territory they reside, or by some person known to be specially authorized by him.

The powers and duties of the superintendents of Indian affairs, and all other subordinate agents, appear to be too limited for any real utility, or are very imperfectly defined by any statute law that I have seen; and if there be any common law upon the subject, it is extremely difficult to ascertain what it is.

In the law "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," the only powers granted to the superintendents are: 1st. To grant licenses to traders; in which he has no other discretion than to judge of the sufficiency of the security required. 2d. To revoke such licenses "for a transgression of the regulations and restrictions provided for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes." 3d. To bring suit upon such bonds as he may have taken, for the breach of any condition therein contained. 4th. To grant licenses to purchase horses in the Indian country. And, 5th. Under the direction or instructions of the President of the United States, to demand satisfaction for wrongs done by the Indians.

It is not made his particular duty, nor has he the power, to enforce any other regulations contained in the above-recited law. Persons found in the Indian country hunting, trespassing, trading without license, or engaged in any other unlawful purpose, may be apprehended by the military force of the United States, and delivered to the civil authority. But where there is no military force at hand, or where those persons are out of the reach of it, the superintendent has no power whatever to provide for their apprehension and removal, unless by application to the civil authority for ordinary process, which in many instances he could not procure, in consequence of being unable to give the names or designate the persons of the offenders; and, if he could procure it, few officers could be found that would execute it, or would be willing to do so for the usual compensation. In consequence of which, many such offenders pass with impunity, while those unlawful visits and intrusions have the most unhappy effect upon the Indians, who have repeatedly made them the subject of their bitterest complaints. Nothing less will do, to effectuate the intention of the law in this particular, but a competent power of removing such persons, and a rigid execution of it.

The difficulty of obtaining legal proof to convict, and the many chances of acquittal, are so great that few persons are deterred from those unlawful enterprises by the fear of punishment; which, when inflicted, is effected by such tardy means as never to conciliate the Indians.

Even at this very time I have the most unquestionable information that there are a considerable number of white persons hunting on the Illinois river, within the Indian boundary, and I have reason to believe that they are principally from Portage des Sioux, in Missouri Territory, though I cannot at present ascertain the name of a single one of them. Under these circumstances, being fully impressed with the impolicy as well as injustice of permitting such conduct, I cannot avoid expressing the sincerest regret at being unable to take effectual measures for the removal of those people, and their delivery to the civil authority. There are, however, those who believe that the combined powers of Governor and superintendent would authorize me to remove them by force; but, as I have no instructions whatever from the President to warrant it, I should be as unwilling to place my defence on that ground in an action of false imprisonment as if those offices were perfectly separate and distinct.

The law with regard to granting licenses I also think is very defective. Any person who tenders a bond with sufficient security conditioned for the faithful observance of such regulations and restrictions as are or shall be made for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, is entitled to demand a license as a matter of right. The regulations and restrictions at present prescribed amount to little more, if any thing, than a prohibition to purchase certain articles of the Indians; and, while the most detestable and unprincipled wretches are at no loss to obtain the requisite security, they may practise conduct the most offensive to the Indians, immoral towards other traders, and injurious to the general interest of the Government, without any breach of their bonds, or without subjecting themselves to the revocation of their licenses, or to the legal refusal of new ones.

The superintendent has no power to impose additional restrictions, and therefore could not, without special instructions from the President, (which I have never received,) prohibit even temporarily the sale of ardent spirits, though such a prohibition might be imperiously required by every dictate of a rational precaution, as is now the case on the Illinois river, where the public surveyors are engaged in surveying the lands purchased by our Government of the Sacs, but which are occupied and claimed by the Pattawatamies, who have manifested no disposition to relinquish their claim.

As to the Indian agents, the law is perfectly silent with regard to their powers and duties, or those of the superintendents in relation to them; and really I have been much at a loss to know what orders I could legally give to those who have been directed to report to me, and receive my orders; and, in general, I have been governed more by what I conceived would conciliate the Indians, promote their happiness, and advance the interest of the Government, than by any rule expressly or constructively prescribed by law.

Upon this view of the subject, I think the superintendent of Indian affairs within each Territory, and the agents under his direction within their respective agencies, should be specially required to superintend the faithful execution of the law "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians, and to preserve peace on the frontiers;" that they should be empowered to apprehend, or cause to be apprehended, all persons who shall have violated its provisions, or be found in the Indian country without license or passport; that they should deliver, or cause to be delivered, within convenient time, all such offenders to the civil authority; and that they should be authorized to incur any expenses necessary to the due execution of those powers and duties.

It is also my opinion that the discretion of the superintendent in granting licenses ought to be enlarged, and that traders ought to be required to conduct themselves peaceably and correctly towards the Indians, respectfully and dutifully towards the Government, and to abstain from the common and injurious practice of endeavoring to excite the prejudices and hostility of the Indians towards other traders; for all which, effectual provisions ought to be made by law.

On the second question presented in the resolution aforesaid, I do not possess the information requisite for forming a correct opinion, nor do I suppose any observations upon the subject of it were expected from me.

The third and last question is, "whether a plan may not be devised that will be equally advantageous to the Indian tribes, and more economical to the public, whereby the Indian trade may, under safeguards, be hereafter carried on by individuals or private companies, instead of the manner in which the same is now conducted?"

Admitting the present plan to be well calculated both to put down British traders and to conciliate the Indians, it is evident that no important consequences can be expected to flow from it without carrying it extensively into operation; for the former object cannot be accomplished without active competition in the same market; the latter can only be beneficially secured by providing the same accommodation for all the different tribes that have equal claims; as, otherwise, the jealousy that would be excited, and the hostility which would consequently be engendered, would render the plan totally abortive: for we certainly should gain nothing, if, in making one tribe our friends by our favors, we should make another, equally powerful and respectable, our enemies by our partiality or neglect; and I can venture to say that there are no people upon earth more jealous, or upon whom such a distinction would operate more injuriously, especially with the aid of British traders, in giving to it its highest possible effect.

Goods to a great amount must, therefore, be transported to the numerous trading-houses which, upon this plan, ought to be established at many different and distant points. And, besides the danger of usual casualties, the risk in trusting to the fidelity of a multitude of agents, at all times considerable, is peculiarly so in this business.

It can hardly be expected that married men of respectability would abandon their families, and desert all the comforts of civilized life, to engage in this kind of service. Single men must, therefore, be calculated on for such agencies. These, as all experience has proved, are liable to form connexions with, and to have children by, the Indian women, which, by giving birth to new attachments, produces a relish for savage life, at the same time that it destroys the inducements and interposes obstacles to a return to civil society; and instances of such effects having been produced are so common and well known, that they ought to silence all question as to the probability of their happening. Whenever, then, a man has made up his mind to exchange the ordinary pursuits of civil life for savage independence, he must necessarily become indifferent to the opinions of that society which he has concluded to desert, regardless of its claims upon him, and would most probably cease to feel the influence of those motives which constitute the most efficient safeguards of honor and integrity.

But independent of these considerations, if the risk of confiding in those agents is to be estimated in proportion to the temptation that is offered them, then certainly none can be greater which depends on the fidelity of man; for placed, as they must be, far in the interior of the Indian country, out of the reach of observation, and approximating British establishments in proportion to their distance from our settlements, nothing is more easy for them than to practise the greatest frauds without detection, or even to escape with the whole capital committed to their charge. A very few cases of this kind would make the trade a losing business to the Government, or require such an advance upon its goods as to take from it all advantages over individuals. But supposing that all those agents should make such remittances in furs and peltries as to prevent any loss on the part of the Government: what check is there to restrain them from defeating its benevolent intentions, by practising the greatest frauds upon the Indians, in selling the goods to them at the most exorbitant prices? All they have to do is, to keep two sets of entries; or to charge themselves with such quantities of goods as they can vend, and make returns for the amount so charged.

Should they all, however, act with perfect fairness and honesty, the trading-houses are notwithstanding liable to be used partially, if not extensively, as means of accommodation to British traders themselves. For example, I will suppose that Mr. Johnson (one of the agents already appointed) shall be fortunate enough to arrive with his goods at Prairie du Chien next spring, just about the time that the British traders are ready to return to that place with their furs and peltries from the river St. Peter's: he, of course, would sell much lower than they could afford to do, otherwise it would be useless for him to go there; they therefore might find it to their advantage to obtain their supplies from him, which they could do with facility, by employing some of the many Indians who always accompany them at that season of the year to trade for them; and I know not how it would be possible for him to detect all the schemes that might be adopted for that purpose. Such attempts, I am credibly informed, have been frequently known to succeed at Chicago, and doubtless have been practised with equal success at other public trading-houses.

Upon this view of the subject, it is worthy of consideration whether sufficient encouragement to a more extensive operation of the present plan can be derived from the experiment that has already been made upon it. Limited as that may have been, it ought to be considered as a sufficient test of the efficacy of the plan in those places in which it has had full effect, and upon those Indians at least who have enjoyed the full benefit of it.

For my part, I have never been able to discover, and I defy any man to specify, a solitary public advantage that has resulted from it in this country; while the melancholy fate of Chicago, the attacks upon Fort Madison, other early hostilities in its vicinity, the signal escape of the agents with the public goods from the Missouri, and the undeniable fact that, during the most successful operation of the public trading-houses at the above-mentioned places, individuals constantly vended more goods to the Indians for whose benefit those houses were established than the public agents did—all combine to afford practical demonstration that the system under consideration is neither calculated to conciliate and accommodate the Indians, nor for successful competition with British traders.

An attentive consideration of the situation of the Indians, a knowledge of their customs and habits, and of the manner in which trade with them has been conducted from time immemorial, it seems to me are all that can be necessary to produce irresistible conviction that the present plan can never succeed to any great extent in this country against competition, and it surely is not an object to pursue it where there is none.

The Indians having been long accustomed to obtain their supplies of goods on credit, about the usual time of their going to their wintering grounds, which are very remote from their villages, and at which they have constantly been in the habit of disposing of every thing of any consequence that they have had to sell, cannot, from their improvident character, be presumed to be prepared at those times to make prompt payment, without which the public factors could not safely sell to them; and therefore the cheapness of the goods is no advantage to them, because they are unable to avail themselves of it; while the traders who uniformly follow them to their hunting grounds are always anxious to advance their goods to them on credit previous to their departure from their villages, and are prepared to furnish them with additional supplies afterwards.

Even after they may have arrived at their hunting grounds, and acquired the means of purchasing goods, their object being more to supply present wants than to accumulate riches, it can hardly be supposed that, with their characteristic indolence, the prospect of getting goods a little cheaper would be a sufficient inducement with them to pack their furs and peltries a great distance to the factories, when they could otherwise obtain the supplies they wanted. But, besides the loss of time (then so peculiarly important to them) which would be attendant on occasional journeys of that kind during the hunting season, there are many other insuperable objections that forbid them; and at the expiration of their hunt they have generally little, if any thing, left to dispose of. Admitting these facts to be true, (and I think I can very safely vouch for their correctness,) how is it possible for a factory stationary at a particular spot, and selling no goods upon credit, to compete successfully with the individual enterprise which has always distinguished the British traders?

But supposing the present plan could be entirely successful in putting down British traders, our own, being much less formidable, of course would also fall victims to it; and hence would result a complete monopoly of the fur trade on the part of the Government, which would tend equally to excite the odium of the citizens of this country, and to check their further enterprises in exploring the hidden resources of wealth that remain yet to be discovered; whereby any increase in the trade would be prevented, because Government would hardly establish factories at any places except those at which experience had proved they could be advantageously employed; individuals would be deterred from making new establishments, lest, if their experiment succeeded, they might again be superseded by the Government; and thus would be lost to the nation advantages of immense importance, if any calculations can be made upon them from the enterprise of six men only, in the course of last year, who then made discoveries equal to any that ever were made in the prosecution of the fur trade, within the space of twelve months, since the first settlement of America.

The operation of the monopoly that would thus be effected, as I understand the plan of the Government, is not to make any profit by it; so that, while those citizens who have hitherto depended upon the fur trade for the support of their families would be entirely thrown out of the only business which they understand; they could not even console themselves with the prospect of participating with the nation at large in the profits of which that trade is susceptible; these would be entirely sacrificed by the Government for the purpose of preserving peace with the Indians; and as I think that less than the amount of those profits, for a single year, otherwise employed, would be abundantly more efficacious, whenever occasion might require it, it appears to me to be a useless waste of the resources of the nation to make such an immense sacrifice for a number of years in succession, without any occurrence in the mean time indicating even an apparent necessity for it; and when, too, the prospects of a rupture must be daily diminishing by the rapid increase of population on our frontiers, and by the fears with which it will necessarily inspire the Indians.

It is believed, however, that as the principal object in establishing the present plan was to drive British traders, by fair competition, out of our limits, and thereby to get rid of their troublesome machinations with the Indians, Government would no longer prosecute it after those objects should be accomplished. But suppose it already to have succeeded fully to that extent, it nevertheless would not have annihilated British capital, or the Northwest Company, or that of Hudson's Bay. What then is to prevent the British traders from returning among us after the factories shall be withdrawn? Certainly nothing that I can conceive of. To succeed to the extent I have supposed would necessarily require the lapse of some years. In the mean time, our traders, from necessity, would have sought other employments, while our engagés and voyageurs, (as the hirelings of Indian traders are called,) who are so accustomed and devoted to the Indian trade as to be, like sailors, fit for little else, would most probably, from the want of employment, have gone over to the British, and entered into their service; and, consequently, our own citizens would then be even less qualified than they are at present to enter into successful competition with our rivals.

Having satisfied myself, at least, that the Government must encounter serious and important risks in the prosecution of the present plan of conducting the Indian trade; that it never can succeed in accomplishing the objects for which it was established, or produce any other advantages equivalent to those risks; and that, if it could succeed to the full extent of the wishes and anticipations of its most sanguine supporters, it would be attended with sacrifices which are forbidden by the public interest, it is, consequently, my opinion that it would be good policy to abandon it, even if no substitute should be provided in its place.

If, however, the Government is disposed to continue its own immediate agency in the Indian trade, its first care should be to obtain goods, particularly the important articles of blankets and cloths, of equal quality to those that are carried into the Indian market by our rivals, which never has been heretofore done in a single instance. For this purpose, it might be advisable to establish a manufactory of those articles, to be placed under the special direction and management of the superintendent of Indian trade. But if this is impracticable, and suitable importations cannot be made from England, I should suppose it would not be difficult to obtain samples of the English goods, and have such articles as we require sufficiently well manufactured in France.

I would also recommend the establishment of a factory at St. Louis, whither all the goods intended for the Indians of the Mississippi river and its waters should be sent; for the management of which factory, a deputy superintendent of Indian trade should be appointed, with power to dispose of the goods to such traders as could give good security for the punctual payment of the price agreed upon, and also for their compliance with such regulations and restrictions as might be prescribed to them.

By this means the danger of trusting to the fidelity of a great number of subordinate agents would be avoided; the goods, when sent into the Indian country, would not be at the risk of the Government; and as the sales to the Indians, on this plan, would be much more rapid, the price of the goods could of course be the sooner refunded.

Those traders would be obliged to employ a great number of engagés, who as well as themselves would be interested in conducting the trade and intercourse with the Indians in such a manner as to conciliate their friendship, and therefore might be relied upon as the most efficient and faithful agents of the Government, especially under their dependance upon it for further credits.

At the same time numbers of the Canadian engagés and voyageurs, invited by the prospects of employment which the operation of this plan would afford, would readily engage in our service, which, for many obvious reasons, they decidedly prefer to that of the British. This, by increasing our means of conducting the trade, while it would lessen those of our opponents, would do them the most essential injury; for nothing enables them to prosecute the fur trade with success so much as the great number of their engagés and voyageurs, the low price at which they are hired, and the easy manner in which they are usually paid. As an example of which, it is within my own personal knowledge that the whole expense of transporting eight thousand weight of goods from Montreal to the Mississippi, wintering with the Indians, and returning with a load of furs and peltries in the succeeding season, including the cost of provisions and portages, and the hire of five engagés for the whole time, does not exceed five hundred and twenty-five dollars, much of which is usually paid to those engagés when in the Indian country, in goods, at an exorbitant price.

If, therefore, the plan which I have the honor to suggest be calculated only to weaken our opponents in those essential resources, its absolute certainty of producing that effect, and pretty extensively too, would be sufficient to recommend its adoption.

Whatever plan our Government may adopt, it is, I think, but reasonable to suppose that the British Government will endeavor to counteract it; therefore, as a further illustration of this subject, I will suppose our present plan adhered to, and the one I now recommend adopted by the British Government, and put into execution at the island of St. Joseph's.

On this supposition, Mr. Johnson (our factor) arrives at Prairie du Chien next autumn with his $10,000 worth of goods; Mr. Dickson, having obtained an equal quantity at St. Joseph's, reaches the Indian villages about the same time. Both of these gentlemen are bound to refund to their respective Governments the cost of the goods, including the expense of transportation. The Indians to whom they must vend them are, the Menomonies, Winnebagoes, Sacs, Foxes, Chippewas, and Sioux, (the very Indians intended to be supplied by our factor.) The former remains stationary at Prairie du Chien, selling only to those Indians who go there prepared to make prompt payment; the latter pursues the usual course of the trade, and sends his engagés to winter with the Indians on their hunting grounds. Can any man in this world, at all acquainted with the geography of the country, the situation and habits of the Indians, and the history of the fur trade, hesitate to believe that, under such circumstances, the latter gentleman would be able to sell the most goods, to obtain the best price, and to make the earliest payment to his Government?

The only advantage which the British really enjoy over us, consisting in the number of their engagés, would be daily diminishing, not only by the operation of the plan I recommend, in withdrawing those people from their service, but in its tendency to create new engagés and voyageurs out of our own citizens; while our superior facilities of transportation by large navigable rivers would eventually give us success throughout the whole extent of our limits at least.

If Government should determine upon declining all further direct agency in the Indian trade, I would, in that case, recommend the legal incorporation of a company at St. Louis, with power to raise a competent capital for that purpose; and, among the conditions of incorporation, it should be provided that the company should buy, at a reasonable price, all the Indian goods which the Government might then have on hand, and should keep up trading-houses at those places at which we are bound by treaty to continue them.

It might also be useful to invest the company with the privilege of employing a part of its capital in banking; but, not knowing whether the principle of either of those plans will be approved, I forbear any remarks upon minuter details.

If neither of them should be thought advisable, and Government is disposed to foster the trade in the hands of individuals, this, I should suppose, might be done by allowing a drawback of all duties upon goods exported to the Indian country, which could be effected, without danger of fraud or evasion, by checks that might be interposed through the instrumentality of the present public agents: for example, I will suppose that a trader wishes to export his goods to the villages of the Sioux and Chippewas above Prairie du Chien; he might be required to enter his goods by invoice of articles, instead of packages, with the superintendent at St. Louis, and again to have both goods and invoice re-examined by Mr. Boilvin, our agent at Prairie du Chien: by this means, it would be seen whether he had carried the whole quantity of goods as far as the latter place; and if he had done so, there would be no danger of his bringing them back, as there is no probability that any person would carry goods that far merely for the purpose of fraudulently getting clear of the duty on them.

This example, however, is stated merely to show that the proposed indulgence could be safely given by the Government to a certain extent at least; and, as far as it could be so given, it would certainly be attended with beneficial consequences. I have myself matured no plan upon the subject; but I suppose the drawback might be safely and advantageously allowed upon all goods exported from certain points on the Mississippi, Missouri, and Illinois rivers; and the points that I should recommend would be the mouth of Rock river, on the Mississippi; Fort Osage, on the Missouri; and Fort Clarke, on the Illinois; at each of which places I presume an Indian agent will be continued, so that this plan could be effected without the expense of any additional agencies.

If the present plan of the Government should be abolished, and either of those which I have the honor to recommend substituted in its place, I have no doubt that we shall soon see the fur trade floating exclusively in the channels which nature seems to have prepared for it. Being, however, sensible of my own want of information upon the subject, and believing that no man in America was better qualified to decide upon the best plan of conducting that trade than Colonel Chouteau, who has pursued it in this country for forty years with such success as to have amassed an immense fortune by it, I took the liberty of asking, and readily obtained, his opinion in writing, which I have the honor herewith to transmit for your consideration.

Very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

NINIAN EDWARDS.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War, Washington City.

NOTES.

The new method of conducting the Indian trade, for several years past, is the cause of a considerable diminution in the fur trade of the Missouri and Illinois Territories. The Government of the United States thought that, by establishing a system of factories, they would supply all the tribes of Indians, to their satisfaction, with all kinds of goods necessary for their consumption, at such low prices that by these means they would get all the furs and pelts of the Indians, and at the same time would also get their confidence, esteem, and fidelity. But, unhappily, this generous system has had a contrary effect. The diminution of the Indian proceeds, on the one part, and the diminution also of esteem and fidelity in almost all the tribes of Indians towards us in the late war, prove incontestably that the system of factories is not at all proper to conciliate the esteem of the Indians, and less so to obtain in the fur trade a preference over the strangers.

This kind of trade and the trade among whites are entirely different, and to consider them analogous would be erring considerably. It requires on the part of the trader a complete knowledge of the Indian customs, characters, habits, way of living, hunting, &c., to form his plans to trade with them, without which one will always err and fall from errors to errors.

The factories, such as they are now established, are trading-houses fixed at certain points under the protection of a fort, and more or less distant from the Indian villages. Though living at a considerable distance from those houses, Indians are obliged to go to them to trade. They get in exchange for their furs goods at a reasonable price, (however, the difference with strangers is only in powder, rifles, calicoes, saddles, wampum, and a few other articles.)

These factories never sell on credit,* whereas, for many years past, Indians have been accustomed to buy in that way, as well from the traders of these two Territories as from the British. The credits are actually indispensable, because the hunting grounds being further than they formerly were, and Indians being obliged to go more than 300 miles from their villages to hunt, if they have not a sufficient quantity of furs to buy their winter goods, they miss their hunt, because it is too hard for them, once on the hunting spot, to return in winter to the factories, through snow and frost, to trade for whatever they want to continue their hunt; and what stops them the most is, the fear of leaving their families alone, exposed to war parties from the other tribes that are constantly going about in the winter season; and themselves, in going to the factories, are exposed to fall into the hands of their enemies: this having already been the case.

The great advantages that the British traders have obtained over the factories on the Mississippi are very well known; but to give an idea of them, I will suppose four British traders going to trade with a certain tribe of Indians; these four traders will certainly be in competition one against the other, and every one of them will try to do the best business; to do which they will carry with them what the Indians love the best in every way, and open their stores in the village of that tribe. Does it start to hunt, they follow it by water from 150 to 200 miles, until the place where it stops to go in the interior of the lands. There the traders build houses, and a part of the Indians their cabins or lodges. Each Indian hunter buys on credit, sometimes to the amount of $200, according to his reputation. Each trader does his best to sell on credit to those hunters, because it is a custom with the Indians that a family who has obtained goods on credit sells all its furs to the man who has advanced those goods. When the Indian hunters have left the river shore and are on their hunting ground, soon after, the traders try their best to get the furs of those Indians that have not bought on credit; to do that, they send in every direction, to the places fixed upon by the Indians to hunt, men with fancy goods. These men or engagés carry those goods on their shoulders through frost and snow, and do whatever is in their power to trade for the furs of those Indians that have not bought on credit from their employers or bourgeois, (it is what the Indian traders call running a deouine.) I have gone through this long detail about the British traders, to show all the pains and means they make use of to obtain from the Indians their furs, and that, if we want to go into competition with them, we must do the same; for to be stable on a certain fixed point is giving positively to the strangers all kind of advantages in this kind of trade.

In the event of the abolition of the factories, the first inquiry that naturally presents itself is, what is to be substituted in place of them? Upon this subject, I must, in the first place, refer to a publication in the Ohio Navigator, which was written by me in 1805, and published in 1811, folio 268, and was the result of fifteen years' observation and experience by myself. In that publication it will be seen that the Missouri only gave annually at that time an amount of $77,971. The same produce would fetch now at least one-third more, on account of the difference in prices; add to this sum the proceeds of the following rivers, St. Peter's, Red, Crow's Wing, and a great many more of the Mississippi that are not comprehended in the observations of 1805, then the sale of furs and peltries could be safely estimated annually (independent of the proceeds of all the trade with the Indian tribes of the Missouri above the Mahas and Poncas) at $150,000 at least.

To obtain all these furs, Government ought to establish at St. Louis a store, with a capital of about $100,000, which ought to be augmented according to the augmentation of the trade. That store ought to be furnished with all kinds of goods suited to the Indian trade, well assorted in quality and quantity, and the articles in proportion to the sum. These goods ought to be selected on the notes of a man who understands perfectly well the Indian trade, and who should also know exactly what suits every nation in particular.

That store, so established, could equip (without exclusive privilege) for the present about twenty-five or thirty traders for the Missouri, Mississippi, and all the rivers that empty in these two. But to enable those traders so equipped to enter into competition with the British traders, Government ought, as much as possible, to sell these goods at a very moderate advance, and take their furs and peltries at a reasonable price. By these means Government would employ its capital to the advantage of its citizens, to the annoyance of British traders, and I am bold to say it is the only means to destroy the British trade; besides which, our two Territories would be greatly benefited thereby.

Twenty-five or thirty traders would employ about two hundred men. The necessary expenses of shipping, and some other expenses, would produce the circulation of a trading medium in the country. Add to these the advantage of forming voyageurs fit for those sorts of voyages, which, by the bye, will certainly be of great consequence.

In the above notes I have not mentioned the Indian tribes which live above the Mahas and Poncas; these are the Sioux, divided in several tribes and under different names, the Arickaras, Mandans, Gros Ventres (Big Bellies,) Pieds Noirs (Black Feet,) and a great many others who are little known that inhabit the forks of the Missouri; and particularly those of the left side, which are very near the trading-houses of the Northwest Company of Canada: as to those of the right fork, on which there is a fall, known only since the voyage of Captains M. Lewis and William Clark, their journal can be consulted. The trade with those tribes cannot be made with any advantage but by a company well organized, and which could dispose annually of about $50,000 in goods, of which sum the company could not expect any good returns before the expiration of three years, that time being necessary to go to and examine the country, build forts on the places which would be thought convenient, make friends, and open the trade with those different tribes. I dare give here my decided opinion, which is founded on premises that I believe just, that a company well conducted, which should have the Indian trade (not exclusively) from Cedar island, above the Poncas, to all the forks of the Missouri, could bring down annually, (once well established,) from that extent of country, a considerable sum in furs and pelts, which could be estimated at more than $200,000. This sum will appear exaggerated, but I found my opinion on the returns of the Northwest Company of Canada, which, though not well known, on account of the profound silence they have kept on this subject, have been thought, through the observations of knowing men, to be at least £200,000 sterling; and this sum is principally got by the trade carried on with those tribes of Indians that reside in the neighborhood of the branches on the left side of the Missouri. To arrive at those trading places, that company incurs very great expenses, which are occasioned by the difficulty of the roads, being obliged to carry their goods in very small bark canoes; and when there is no water, those goods are carried on men's shoulders. The greatest difficulty for them, and which occasions a very great expense, is the carriage of their provisions to the different forts they have on that part of the northwest. The proposed company would have a decided advantage over that of the Northwest, because it would be able to carry its goods wherever it would fix its forts, in large barges, which would save considerable time and expense, as well for sending up their goods and food as for bringing down their produce. It might yet establish easily a fort near the village of the Mandans, or any other place which might be thought proper, and there plant corn, potatoes, &c., which would diminish greatly the expenses of transportation, and even make whiskey, this liquor being indispensable in this kind of trade. With these advantages, added to many others, the proposed company must annoy and even destroy the Northwest Company; but whoever undertakes this trade may be sure that the Northwest Company will do any thing in its power, and even sacrifice large sums of money, to prevent that establishment: But if the agents of the proposed company, that would be at the head of the business in the neighborhood of the Northwest Company, should act prudently, and have engagés that know well the trade, all the efforts of the Northwest Company would amount to nothing.

The mountains that are on the west side of the Missouri Territory offer riches more considerable than those of all the rest that have been mentioned, and the more advantageous, as there would be no competition on the part of any strangers. That country, covered by a great many Indian tribes, such as Laytanés, Rapahauts, Toquibacoux, and many others, wish and ask constantly to open a trade with us. But, unhappily, we have not yet capitalists and men of enterprise in these Territories; but we may hope that some will come, when this country will be well known, and when people will appreciate its great resources in riches that are immense, which time and the enterprise of our citizens cannot fail to develop.

SIR:

INDIAN OFFICE, February 9, 1816.

In obedience to the instructions of the President, I have prepared, in conformity to the resolution of the Senate of the United States, and have the honor to transmit you herewith, a view of the trade carried on for public account with the several Indian tribes within the limits of the United States, during the four years preceding the spring of 1815.

By the mode of accounting at this office, the returns of the agents are made quarterly, and the books are struck to conform with these dates. In order to avoid fractional calculation in furnishing balances, I have taken the liberty to make it commence on the 1st of April, (the beginning of a quarter,) instead of the 4th of March, 1811, as contemplated by the resolution. Since the period embraced will be, within a very few days, the same, there can be no perceptible difference in the result.

The schedule marked Z refers to and gives the substance of each of the several papers of which this view is made up. In addition to an annual account of each of the trading-houses, and an annual account of the whole of the Indian trade, and a general account of the same during the period before mentioned, as called for by the resolution, for the better understanding of the whole subject I have furnished a general account of each trading-house, and a statement showing the amount of property on hand, or of the capital stock as it stood on the 1st of April last. It necessarily happens that in a concern, the business of which is going on at so many different and distant points, the accounts cannot be struck at any given time without having resort in many of the items to estimate. This is particularly the case in the annual statements, inasmuch as, from the nature of this trade, the returns of an outfit cannot come in within the same year, and are often out more than two years. The results, however, may be considered as nearly correct.

It will be perceived by these statements that, in the year 1811, there were ten trading-houses in operation, and that in the beginning of 1815 there remained no more than six. Four, to wit, that at Michilimackinac, that at Chicago, that at Sandusky, and that at Fort Wayne, were broken up and destroyed by the enemy. To replace these, in part, during last fall two new houses were fitted out, one to be located at Chicago, and one on Green bay of Lake Michigan.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient, humble servant,

J. MASON.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

The office of Accountant of the War Department was established under the act of 8th May, 1792. The duties of the Accountant were the settlements of all accounts relative to the pay of the army, the subsistence of officers, bounties to soldiers, expenses of the recruiting service, and the incidental and contingent expenses of the War Department. All purchases for supplying the army with provisions, clothing, supplies in the quartermaster's department, military stores, Indian goods, and all other supplies or articles for the use of the War Department, were directed to be made by the Treasury Department, and the accounts were rendered to that Department, and were settled by the accounting officers, without any agency of the Accountant.

The business of the Accountant's office was confined to the duties prescribed by the act of the 8th May, 1792, until the year 1798. On the 16th July of that year, Congress passed "An act to alter and amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," by which the duties heretofore performed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in relation to the settlement of the accounts for supplying the army with provisions, clothing, supplies in the quartermaster's department, military stores, Indian goods, and all other supplies or articles for the use of the War Department, were annexed to those of the Accountant, making it his duty to settle accounts of every description growing out of the military service of the United States, agreeably to the estimates and appropriations for the military establishment, and also for the Indian department, including the Indian annuities.

By the act of the 3d March, 1809, "further to amend the several acts for the regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," the duties of the Accountant's office were further increased, by reason of the forms prescribed for keeping and rendering the accounts of the War Department. An additional set of books for the appropriations, and also one for the expenditures, were directed to be kept in the Accountant's office. In the former, accounts of the appropriations made annually are kept under each specific appropriation, showing the moneys drawn from the Treasury, and their application, annual statements of which are rendered to Congress. In the books of expenditure, separate accounts are kept with every receiver of public money, under each specific appropriation, out of which the money is advanced, and separate accounts are required to be rendered by each agent or receiver of public money, under every specific appropriation, out of which moneys are advanced to them. Hence, the number of personal accounts and separate settlements is multiplied to a very great extent. Formerly, (that is, prior to this act,) every agent or receiver of public money rendered but one account, and had but one settlement, whether he received money under one or more appropriations; now, it frequently occurs that the commissaries, quartermasters, paymasters—in short, all disbursing agents—have from two to six, and some more, accounts open on the books; and every recruiting officer has at least two accounts on the books, which require separate settlements under each. Other duties are required of the Accountant under the same law, which consume much time, and occasion great labor, particularly when the expenditures of the Department have extended the number of accounts to what they are at present. The annual list of outstanding balances required to be laid before the Comptroller of the Treasury may be mentioned; and when the open accounts on the books of the Accountant exceed five thousand, some estimate may be formed of the labor and difficulty incident thereto. Without, therefore, going any further into the details of the duties of the Accountant's office, it may be safely stated that some alteration has become necessary to meet the present state of public business. It is, accordingly, recommended that a division of the duties of the Accountant be made, and that an additional accounting officer be appointed, to be charged with the performance of such part of them as may be prescribed by law, leaving the residue to be performed by the Accountant. By an arrangement of this kind, the business of each office will be placed within the reasonable bounds of punctual performance. The great mass of unsettled accounts, as well those already deposited in the several offices of the War Department, and remaining unsettled, as those unliquidated in every part of the country, and those about to be provided for by Congress, will be settled within a reasonable period, and in a manner calculated to secure the public interest in their adjustment. Without some arrangement of this kind, it will be impracticable to meet the public business; and the consequent delays in the settlement of the public accounts, particularly those of paymasters, quartermasters, and other agents, whose disbursements have been to a large amount, will operate greatly to the prejudice of the public interest.

There is another part of the present system, in relation to the accounts of the War Department, which it is thought may be altered with advantage to the public interest; and, with a view of elucidating that part, it is necessary again to resort to the act of the 8th May, 1792, establishing the Accountant's office. In that act, it is directed that the Accountant shall report all settlements made by him, from time to time, to the accounting officers of the Treasury, for inspection and revision. The accounts are accordingly settled by the Accountant, the balances are paid, and thereafter quarter-yearly sent to the Treasury, accompanied by statements in detail, embracing all the transactions of the office in relation to the moneys received and expended. These statements have grown to an extent, in consequence of the increased expenditures in the War Department, so as to cause, in their preparation, a great consumption of time and much labor. The accounts and vouchers settled being sent out of the office, and filed at the Treasury, is also an inconvenience, because it very generally happens that, on the settlement of an officer's or agent's account, the previous settlement becomes necessary; this must be sent for to the Treasury, and cannot always be had: hence delay in the business of the office. But the principal objection to this part of the system is, the labor it occasions in preparing the accounts for revision; notwithstanding which, the object to be effected by it does not appear of sufficient importance to justify its continuance. The accounts are never revised until months after they have been settled, the balances paid, and the claimant acquitted of his responsibility. If, therefore, errors or improper allowances should be discovered, the difficulty of correcting the one, or altering the other, must appear obvious: hence the insufficiency of the revision at the Treasury. It is, therefore, thought the more advisable that an officer should be appointed in the War Department to act as Comptroller, whose duty it should be to revise the accounts settled by the Accountant, before the balances are paid, or the accounts considered finally settled. This would supersede the necessity of sending the accounts to the Treasury for revision, would be the means of keeping in each office the accounts settled in it, and remove all the difficulties incident to the revision at the Treasury. It would also be the means, it is conceived, of securing the public interest, by withholding the payment of money until the accounts had received every check necessary to an accurate settlement. It might also be made this officer's duty to perform such other acts, as far as they are applicable in relation to the War Department, as the Comptroller of the Treasury now performs in relation to that Department; and the same officer might be clothed with power to decide on accounts not specifically provided for by law, and which now are referred to the Secretary of War, to the great interference with his other duties. In short, the appointment of a Comptroller for the War Department would be the means of concentrating in that Department the whole responsibility growing out of its receipts and expenditures, and of relieving the officers of the Treasury Department of a branch of duty which must very materially interfere with the performance of their other high and important duties.

SIR:

INDIAN OFFICE, March 6, 1816.

I had the honor to receive yesterday your letter of the 4th instant, in which I am requested to furnish you with my views of the expediency of continuing the Indian trade as now established; of the modifications which it would be proper to introduce into that system at this time; of the increase of capital which is necessary to the supplying of the numerous tribes within our limits; and of the alterations, if any, that should be made in the system of licensing private traders.

As to the first three objects of inquiry, I respectfully offer the opinion that it would not be expedient at this time to abolish the present system of trade on public account, but that it should be continued, with some modifications and an increase of capital.

However desirable it may be to relinquish ultimately to individuals all the trade with the Indians, it is believed that this cannot yet be done with propriety. If it is the policy of the Government, as it is presumed certainly to be, no longer to permit any trade or intercourse to be held by foreigners with the Indians within our limits, it becomes very questionable whether the amount of supplies heretofore furnished these in many parts of our territories by British traders can, within any short period, be substituted by American traders, independently of public aid. If British traders are prohibited, and the supplies before obtained from them cannot be had by other means, it is very certain the Indians must suffer greatly, and that, besides the inhumanity of such a result, no circumstance could tend more to alienate them from this Government. The Indian trade is of a peculiar character, and requires certain associations of local information and habit on the one hand, and of capital and perseverance on the other, that cannot be at once matured in such manner as that it be carried on for private account in all the different sections of the country, to the necessary extent, in any short time. Again: it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, so to organize a system of trade purely on public account, as that it should pervade the villages and the hunting camps of the numerous tribes within our limits, (a course, by usage, become indispensable,) without exposing the public funds engaged in it to too great risk of loss by its complexity, or from fraud in the numerous and distant subagencies which would thus, of necessity, be created. For these considerations, I would, with great deference, propose that the present capital in Indian trade (which may be considered to be now equal, or nearly equal, to the sum originally vested, to wit, $290,000,) be increased to $500,000; and that the superintendent of Indian trade be authorized, besides opening additional trading-houses at such convenient positions as may be directed by the President, to establish a depot of supplies, duly assorted for the Indian trade, at some proper place, neighboring to the Indian country, as at St. Louis, equal in amount to about $150,000, to be furnished from time to time on credit for a reasonable term, but under strict regulations as to ultimate security and the character of the persons intrusted, to American traders, who should come under engagement to barter the goods so obtained at the villages and hunting grounds of such tribes as might be designated to them, respectively; these credits to be given out in moderate sums, proportioned to the means of the trader, and made reimbursable at the depot, in the furs and peltries received from the Indians, at fair prices, such as would at the same time support the public fund, and give sufficient encouragement to the adventurer. This part of the trade might be so regulated as to leave the public trading-houses, which are stationed at some distance beyond the white settlements, to be resorted to by such of the Indians as should keep over the products of their hunts, and convey them thither, in order to obtain the best terms, while it supplied the less provident at their villages and hunting camps in quarters not frequented by American traders operating exclusively on their own resources.

By these means, it is believed, a sufficient and proper supply of goods may be forthwith furnished all the Indian tribes on our borders, from sources independent entirely of foreign capital and foreign traders; and that, in the course of a few years, the public agencies may be withdrawn, and the whole trade laid open to individual enterprise, without injury to the political interests of the United States, or disregard to the condition of the Indians.

In relation to the system of licensing private traders, I have no doubt that great abuses exist, and that alterations are requisite. In the first place, the penalties for trading with Indians without license are too light, and the forfeitures too easily evaded, to deter persons disposed to violate the law; and, in the next place, the Governors of Territories, and other agents authorized to issue licenses, are, as the existing provisions of the law on that subject have been construed, bound to give a license to any person whomsoever, foreigner or citizen, that can furnish security for $1,000. The result is, that our Indian countries are filled with persons hostile to the interests of the United States, and employed, in many instances, to excite animosities against our citizens and Government; or of desperate character, who are debasing the habits and destroying the health of the Indians, and at the same time cheating them of their little earnings, by constantly dealing out to them spirituous liquors.

I beg leave to suggest, as a remedy for these evils, that it be provided by law that no license to trade with the Indians within our limits be issued to any person not a citizen of and resident within the United States; and that the entire power to issue these be lodged with the President, through such agents and under such restrictions as he may from time to time direct. By this means the Executive will be at all times able so to regulate the private as well as the public trade as to insure from one or other of these sources a competent supply of goods in the different sections of Indian country.

Anxious, sir, to make you, as requested, an early reply, I have hastily thrown together my ideas on the subject of your letter; they have not, however, been recently formed, and have been derived from some experience in Indian affairs. I shall be much gratified if they prove in the slightest degree useful to the Government.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

J. MASON.

To the Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

JEFFERSONVILLE, IND. T., October 4, 1815.

Your communication of the 17th August came to hand. One year's annuities, which were for the year 1812, have been received by the then acting Governor, General Gibson, but none of them were disposed of as Government intended. General Gibson informs me that when General Hopkins reached Vincennes with his expedition against the Indians up the Wabash, he received an order from the general, which he conceived he was authorized to give, to deliver such articles out of the Indian annuities as might suit the militia under his command; that, agreeably to that order, all the blankets and other woollens were delivered, and he says an account kept, which account I have been endeavoring to procure to send on to your Department, but have not as yet been able to get it; this has been the cause of my delay in not acknowledging the receipt of your letter at an earlier period. Sundry of the goods have perished by damage in removing them from Vincennes to this place; what remained on hand when I took charge of the government of the Territory of Indiana amounted to about $800, and they a good deal damaged. I have given out of them at different periods, to friendly Indians, to the amount of $400; the balance are now on hand, but of such articles as are of trifling consideration. As soon as I can procure an account and statement of the goods delivered to General Hopkins's militia, I will forward it to your Department. As soon as the goods came into my hands, I wrote to the Secretary of War, and stated the situation of the goods, and suggested to him the propriety of making sale of them, but never received an answer.

Accounts of all my transactions occasioned in expenditures with these Indians professing a friendly disposition have been transmitted to the Department of War. If any other statement than this should be thought necessary, please inform me.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

TH. POSEY.

P. S. The whole of the four years' annuities are due the Indians.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

JEFFERSONVILLE, INDIANA TERRITORY, October 22, 1815.

In my letter addressed to you of the 4th instant I mentioned having received of the Indian annuities, when I took charge of them, $800 worth; but, upon further investigation, I find the amount only to be $672 worth, $400 of which I made presents to the friendly Indians, leaving a balance of $272 agreeably to the charges in the original invoice, but the residue are so damaged and culled that they are worth very little.

I have not received from General Gibson, neither has he been able to procure, an exact account of the goods from General W. Johnston, whom he intrusted to deliver them to General Hopkins's militia; he informs me that he will make a statement, as far as he is able, and send it on to the Department of War.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

TH. POSEY.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

JEFFERSONVILLE, October 22, 1815.

Governor Posey handed me a letter, together with some resolutions of the Senate, from you directed to him, respecting Indian annuities. This was done by the Governor, I presume, because in the year 1812, after Governor Harrison left the Territory, its government fell under my direction, and, of course, the Indian annuities then on hand under my care. There were at that time at Vincennes annuities for the Kickapoos, Weas, and Piankeshaws, as per invoice, to the amount of $3,144 90. Having no warehouse either public or private, I put them under the immediate care of General W. Johnston, in whom I then had confidence, and who acted as my private secretary. Some time in the same year I received a letter from the War Department, dated September 17, directing me to distribute the goods to the best advantage to the militia and volunteers then protecting the frontier. In obedience to that direction, I made distributions to a considerable amount, and directed an advance of twenty-five per cent. to be laid on the goods, to cover the expense of transportation, &c., and that duplicate receipts should be taken and forwarded to your Department. This I did, expecting the amount would be deducted from the pay of the militia and volunteers. The receipts were enclosed to Mr. Eustis, then Secretary of War, but I never received an acknowledgment of their safe arrival; I presume, however, they are now on file in your Department.

Immediately on the perusal of your letter to Governor Posey, I wrote to Mr. Johnston for an account of the annuities, as well those delivered the militia and volunteers as those then in his hands. In answer to my letter, he enclosed me the within account, (marked No. 1,) by which it would appear that the goods are all regularly accounted for. I cannot, however, refrain from remarking that the sum of $397 87½ is an improper one, inasmuch as that expense was defrayed out of a draft given the quartermaster, and which he has charged in his account; besides, the twenty-five per cent. adds to the amount charged to the different persons named in the account; that deducted will leave a considerable balance in the hands of Mr. Johnston, and for which he must be accountable. I am pretty well convinced that the account, when correctly and honestly stated, will stand as in the enclosed (marked No. 2;) and to that amount have I written to Mr. Johnston, urging on him, in as strong language as I could, the necessity of an immediate and correct settlement of the account, to which he has not as yet deigned to reply. Should I not receive an answer from him by to-morrow's mail, I will transmit to your Department a copy of the several accounts forwarded to me by Mr. Johnston, together with the vouchers, for whatever were delivered the Indians by my direction.

You will observe in the account furnished by Mr. Johnston (a copy of which is herewith enclosed) a charge to myself of $86 50; those goods I hold myself responsible for at any moment I am called on; they were mostly retained by me for some militia who were not otherwise able to supply their necessities. The above amount is charged with the twenty-five per cent. advance.

Such was my situation as acting Governor of the Territory, that I was compelled to place confidence in some person; and all I have to regret is, that that confidence fell upon a man who shamefully abused it in almost every particular.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration and respect, sir,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

JOHN GIBSON.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to General J. Gibson, dated

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 17, 1812.

Your letter of the 2d instant is received, and you are authorized to dispose of any goods within your control destined for the Indian tribes who are now hostile, and distribute them to the best advantage among the volunteers and militia who are marching to the protection of the frontier, keeping an account of the same.

SIR:

DETROIT, October 16, 1815.

I have the honor to state that no presents were issued to the Indians in this Territory, except a few from the quartermaster's department, the amount of which I have no means of ascertaining, between the period of my appointment, in 1813, and the month of August, 1814.

In the months of August, September, October, November, and December, 1814, and January, 1815, goods to the amount of $11,312 61 were distributed in presents to the Indians at this place.

But although these goods were distributed as presents, yet they were, in a considerable degree, rewards for services which had been rendered by the Indians.

I am unable to state what presents were issued antecedent to the period above mentioned. The data for that purpose can only be found in the War Office.

I transmit an abstract showing the annuities due to all the Indian tribes north of the Ohio, and east of the Mississippi. At what time any of these tribes received their last payment, I know not, nor have I any means of knowing.

I have reason, however, to believe that those tribes whose annuities are payable at this place (namely, the Wyandots, Chippewas, Ottawas, and Pattawatamies) have received nothing since 1811; and that, consequently, four years' annuities are due to them. I need not again say how necessary it is that these debts should be discharged.

I transmit an abstract showing the amount due here, presuming that no payment has been made to them since 1811.

Upon the subject of Indian affairs generally, I have nothing to add to the two letters I had the honor to forward to the War Department in July last in relation to them.

Very respectfully, sir, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

LEW. CASS.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

To give full effect to the system of Indian agency, this Territory, and the country on the Illinois river, and between that and Lakes Superior and Michigan, would most probably require, independent of a principal superintendent in this quarter, and his clerk, the following agents and interpreters, with what may be considered as adequate salaries.

Sir:

St. Louis, October 1, 1815.

By the last mail I had the honor of enclosing you a statement of annuities, presents due, paid, and delivered to the several Indian tribes under my superintendence, in conformity with a resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 4th of March, 1815.

On the subject of the several questions presented in the last paragraph of the resolution, I beg leave to observe, there is not the smallest doubt in my mind but the present mode of managing our Indian relations ought to be materially altered. Those relations are every day growing more and more imperfect; and the decided policy of England (so recently and clearly developed) of using the Indian tribes to vex and harass our frontier settlements in time of peace, and as active partisans in time of war, ought to admonish the Government of the United States to adopt a more efficient system of regulating our Indian concerns than has heretofore been in use.

In answer to the first question of the latter paragraph of the resolution, "whether any alteration of the power and duties of the several officers and agents employed in the superintendence and management of Indian affairs would be advantageous?" experience has taught us that the Indian agents should be invested with more power, under the authority of the laws, to enable them to detect illicit trade; force from the Indian country improper characters; settle the disputes between the Indians and whites; prevent impositions, and enforce all the laws and regulations of Indian intercourse.

It appears essential that the grade of Indian agency should be established in the different sections of country, from the general superintendent down to an interpreter.

"Whether the consolidation of the whole care and management of the Indian relations, and the placing the same in a single department, would be expedient?"

On this point I fear I am incapable of giving you a satisfactory view. It would appear reasonable, however, to state that the great number of Indian tribes within the bounds of the United States, differing very materially in disposition, habits, manners, customs, and trade, would require much care and attention, with a correct knowledge of the Indians, to produce any thing like system in the management of them. And on a first view of the subject, it appears to me to be necessary to place all Indian concerns, both political and commercial, under the superintendence of a separate department; and, considering that trade is the great lever by which to direct the policy and conduct of the Indian tribes towards the United States, I have ever been of opinion that the agents for trade stationed by the United States among the Indians ought also to be incorporated with the agents for political intercourse.

The third question is one of the most difficult to answer; the habits, dispositions, &c. of the whites as well as the Indians differing so materially, as they do, in so vast a tract of country as the bounds of the United States.

I have always been of opinion that some material changes were essentially necessary in the Indian trade. But to devise a plan by which that trade may be carried on with equal advantage to the Indian tribes, and more economical to the public, securing to the citizens the benefit of the Indian trade, without the exclusion of individuals, or giving to large companies a monopoly of Indian trade, is a subject which deserves more justice than I am able to bestow on it.

I do not believe it would be expedient to hazard any material alteration for the present. The United States trading-houses, when well located and properly managed, are, beyond doubt, extremely useful; and, instead of being expensive, (I am told,) are profitable to the Government.

There being at this time no public trading-houses in the Indian country in this Territory, I find, by the present mode of small companies and individual traders, the tribes are not at this time all furnished with what they absolutely require.

An alteration in our present system of intercourse of a commercial nature with the Indians, so as to compel all trade with Indians to be carried on at convenient established points, and placed under the eye of authority, may answer very well for the neighboring tribes, and those surrounded by our settlements, and would give facility in the humane policy of civilizing those tribes.

This system, I fear, cannot be pursued with effect, for many years, with the numerous tribes of this Territory situated out of the settlements. But I am very much inclined to an opinion that a well-organized company, with a large capital, and a liberal aid and protection from the Government, might be made much more efficient in managing the Indian affairs well than the present plan. But it must be a company sufficiently powerful to take in hand all the trade of the Missouri and Upper Mississippi, to carry into complete effect one great and general system, in co-operation with, and partly under, the direction of the Government. Its capital ought to be large, (say 600,000 or 1,000,000 dollars,) and divided into small shares, (say 100 dollars each share, to enable the most indigent trader to become interested,) and could be subscribed, paid in, and managed very much in the manner usual among the commercial and banking companies throughout the United States. Perhaps it would be most expedient to confine at least three-fourths of the subscriptions to the western States and Territories, and it might probably be best to use a third or a fifth of the capital for banking purposes at St. Louis, (the most central, convenient, and commercial place.)

A company thus powerful would be able to furnish all the Indian tribes with the best of goods, and would, without doubt, sweep the whole of the valuable fur trade of the Missouri and Mississippi; expel all the petty (though now very powerful) British traders; and bring into our markets immense quantities of the most valuable furs and peltries.

It would in a short time extend its influence and bear down all opposition among the most distant tribes. Its political influence should be purely American, directed in all respects, and at all places, with precisely the same policy, co-operating with the policy of, and keeping up a regular correspondence with, the Government.

The company should stipulate with Government (for equivalent advantages) to maintain regular trading-houses at such places as the United States have agreed to fix and maintain similar establishments.

An establishment of this sort would interest a vast number of our western citizens in the well-managing of our Indian affairs; it would attract the attention of enterprising Americans, and give employment to the most of our citizens who are accustomed to trade with the Indians, and be the means of discovering and drawing forth for the use and comfort of our own country all the wealth with which this country abounds in furs, peltries, a variety of minerals, lead, salt, saltpetre, and also wool, tallow, and a great variety of valuable dyeing roots and drugs, heretofore only partially known.

It would effectually draw out and keep out that restless and deadly hostile influence that has been heretofore used so successfully among the Indians to our prejudice by the British traders and agents, and which is doubtless at this moment trying to fix itself firm enough to defy all our efforts to remove them, under the present system.

A company such as I have been speaking of would be a combination of American capital and American traders to draw out foreign traders who are intruding without permission, and to place the Indian relations more under the control and management of the Government, and reap for themselves the profits of a trade immensely valuable.

I will not take up your time in going more in detail on this subject.

Small companies are found, from experience, to produce no valuable change, and are soon compelled to give up the Indian trade.

It would be unsafe to abandon the present system of trading-houses until a general system and combination of private enterprise is organized. Our own traders, acting in violent opposition to each other, (as they very commonly do,) create nearly as much confusion and dissatisfaction among the Indians as foreign traders; and I have been under an impression that it was to counteract the fatal effects of such petty squabblers that Government first instituted public trading-houses. If they have not been generally useful, is it not because they are badly placed or badly managed? The system is unquestionably a good one, and, if its operations were less limited, it would be more efficient.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

WM. CLARK.

The Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

St. Louis, October 10, 1815.

Enclosed, herewith, I have taken the liberty of sending to you some notes which I have procured from Colonel Auguste Chouteau and Mr. Thomas Forsyth, on the subject of Indian commerce, &c.

Colonel Chouteau is a very correct man of observation, and has been in the habits of Indian intercourse for nearly fifty years, a part of which time the greater part of the Indian trade of this country was conducted by him. [See his notes following Governor Edwards's letter of November, 1815, page 66.]

Mr. Forsyth, at present an Indian agent for the Illinois river, has been long in the habits of trading with the Indians, and possesses a strong mind.

I have the honor to be your most obedient, humble servant,

WM. CLARK.

The Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

St. Louis, September 22, 1815.

In consequence of a conversation that took place a few days ago between your excellency and myself about Indian affairs, I now take the liberty to give you my opinion as respects the method we ought to pursue towards the Indians to gain their good-will and friendship, by which means we may be able to procure that necessary influence over the different nations of Indians, wean them from foreign influence, and make the whole of them dependant on us; until which period we will always have the Indians as enemies when we are engaged in war with any of the European Powers.

I have been often surprised on reflecting that we, as Americans, speaking the same language, having the same customs and manners, and having the same means as the British, should have so little influence over the Indian nations; from which it would appear to me that there is a want of something somewhere.

According to the present method of treating the Indians, it is, in my opinion, utterly impossible to gain their good-will, or have any influence with them. It cannot be expected that a Governor, who is also superintendent of Indian affairs, (who, perhaps, never saw an Indian before he came to the Territory he is to govern,) can know what course to pursue towards the Indians, or, indeed, what instructions to give to an agent.

Indians are always fond of novelty, and when they hear of the arrival of a Governor, they post off to visit their new father.

The Governor, perhaps, not paying that attention to his visitants that they expected, the Indians return home much disappointed, saying that "their new father is a man of no sense, and did not offer them meat or drink, or any tobacco to smoke," by which means the Indians become prejudiced against the Governor, and in the end this leads to something serious. You well know that those little civilities shown at times to Indians have had a good effect when affairs of consequence are to be settled between the whites and Indians.

The British Government have brought their method of treating Indians to a perfect system; they have a well-regulated Indian department, with a store of goods and a blacksmith at every post for their use. No person is eligible for the place of agent unless he can speak some one of the Indian languages. It would be supposed that an agent thus appointed is acquainted with their customs and manners, as also with the different chiefs and headmen of the different nations of Indians. A British Indian agent will not think it derogatory to his rank to smoke and converse with an Indian chief or chiefs; by which means he cannot be imposed upon by designing interpreters, as sometimes happens with us.

It is my decided opinion that our Government ought to establish a distinct department for Indians affairs in this country; a principal agent ought to reside at this place, with subagents at the different posts or garrisons, whose duty it should be to report to the principal agent only, and from him to the Government. Agents thus appointed, who know their duty, I would venture to say Indian affairs would go on properly.

A department thus arranged, I would then recommend to treat the Indians well, and give them Indian law; to treat them well, I mean that a few presents be given to them every September, so that they might commence their fall hunt, with a little liquor every spring and autumn for a frolic. The sale of spirituous liquor by traders ought to be prohibited, as it is well known that Indians will sell any thing they have for liquor, when intoxicated. Listen to their complaints, and render them justice; never promise them more than you mean to perform; allow them a free trade to all places; and encourage as many traders as possible to engage in the Indian trade, so that the Indians may see that they are dependant on us; and keep them from travelling five or six hundred miles to visit a British post, where their minds are poisoned and prepared for any event that may be in agitation.

To give them Indian law, I would only make this difference: give them so many days to deliver up the transgressor; and if they failed, then retaliate, and do not allow any traders to go into their country, and there can be no doubt but they will ask for peace, and take care that mischief will not again take place; or, if it did, they would not hesitate to deliver up the culprit.

We see few or no American traders in any part of the Indian country; two reasons may be given for this: 1st. Indian goods brought on to this country are always sold high, and at a very short credit; by which means those who have the means purchase up the goods, and hire those who have not the means to purchase; to barter the goods in the Indian country, by which means a cargo of Indian goods that would employ two or three or more persons, if the credit were extended, fall into the hands of one purchaser, who employs only one person, or perhaps himself, to barter these goods in the Indian country. 2d. It is impossible that any individual can purchase goods in this country and sell them as cheap as the factories. British traders only can oppose the factories, from the extensive credit they have, and the superior quality of their goods. There can be no other way of bringing the fur trade through its proper channels than by underselling the British traders. To shut them out totally would be making bad worse, as none of our traders or factors will credit the Indians so extensively as the British traders; and it would take such a vast quantity of woollens to supply all the Indians, that it appears that it would be many years before every thing could be got in operation to content both parties. Another thing: without you can fully supply the Indians with goods for their furs, they would suppose that the shutting out of the British traders was intended to injure them, and not the whites.

Any person conversant in Indian affairs must agree that a department judiciously organized, furnished with presents for the Indians as above mentioned, having as an auxiliary here merchants who would furnish our traders with goods equal in quality and price to those brought from Canada, by which means our citizens would at least have a share in the Indian trade, would stop the baneful influence of foreign emissaries in the character of traders. A total dependance being on us for their supplies, the Indians would never again attempt to raise the tomahawk against the United States.

I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient servant,

T. FORSYTH.

His Excellency Governor CLARK.—Present.

SIR:

CHICKASAW AGENCY, October 24, 1815.

In my attempt to fulfil the expectations of the honorable the Senate of the United States of the 2d of March, 1815, and your orders of the 17th of August last, I have thought proper to enclose for your information the letter and accounts of Mr. Isaac Rawlings, United States factor at the Chickasaw Bluffs, together with the best estimate I can make of the transactions that have taken place at the agency and its vicinity for the period embraced in the resolution. You will discover that the provision account during my agency far exceeds what was usual to be given; this was rendered indispensable, as well from the unusual number of Indians that attended, as for and on account of a guard I considered it my duty to select from the most confidential Indians and Indian country men, to guard the goods until I could give notice to the nation of the time of delivering. From this guard no other expense is incurred to the United States, and I hope you will easily see that the utmost economy was used, when you are informed that

2,654 Indians attended to receive the goods; and that, notwithstanding the best exertions I could possibly make, such is their slow and awkward manner of doing business, that it took me five days to make arrangements and complete the service. I cannot indulge myself in entertaining a hope that any information I can give, except of a local nature, will be useful to you; yet, as you have been pleased to request my opinion, you will not think it arrogant in me to give it, that it may receive the corrective hand of those that are better advised; and that, by exposing my want of knowledge, I may receive such admonition or advice as will enable me in future to keep clear of a repetition of errors. Among the most important objects that have occurred to my mind, and which I think should engage the attention of the General Government, as relative to the peace and happiness of this nation, is the enacting some prohibitory and penal laws, among which I think some salutary means should be provided to prevent the sale and too frequent use of ardent spirits among the Indians; that as frequent outrages are committed, as well by imprudent white men travelling through the Indian nation intoxicated, as by drunken Indians and others, some attention of the General Government might well be bestowed on that subject. Of the road leading from Colbert's ferry to the Natchez, being the way by which many thousands trading to and from New Orleans, Mobile, &c., will pass and re-pass, and over which the public mail of the United States will have to travel, some repairs are indispensable through this nation; and I most respectfully suggest that a company of regular soldiers, in time of peace, would be well employed in making improvements on the road, and in removing and keeping intruders from off the Indian lands. A difficulty has arisen for which some remedy should be afforded: my predecessor, in the fall of 1813, ordered several parties of Indians into the service of the United States; his death, I presume, has been the cause why no proper representation has ever been made, or any pay given them for such service; and although I am well assured that the service was faithfully performed, yet there are not such vouchers and orders in my possession as to enable me to render you a proper account of that service, and the Indians that performed that duty are quite uneasy on the subject of their pay. It is my opinion that it would be a great accommodation to the Indians if two or three more blacksmiths were allowed them, and a very considerable part of their annuity given in useful articles of husbandry, as many of them seem to incline to become farmers; and surely a schoolmaster would have a good effect among them, particularly as the half-breeds are very desirous to educate their children.

Accept assurances of the high respect with which I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

WILLIAM COCKE, Agent for U. S. to Chickasaws.

The Miamies, Eel Rivers, and Pattawatamies having joined the enemy, their annuities ceased to be paid after the year 1811.

The Delawares and Shawanees remained faithful to the United States, and were paid regularly up to the commencement of the year 1815. I have no information from the War Department, as yet, of any annuities for them the present year.

The annuities due the before-mentioned tribes have always been punctually paid; and in every instance where damage or embezzlement has taken place in the transportation of the articles, the loss has been made good at the expense of the United States.

JNO. JOHNSTON, Indian Agent.

PIQUA, September 6, 1815.

B.

An account of presents made to Indians at Fort Wayne and at Piqua, under the agency of John Johnston, for four years antecedent to the 4th of March, 1815.

	From March 4 to December 31, 1811, presents issued to Indians at Fort Wayne from the United States trading-house, - - - - -	$1,353 20½
	From January 1 to August 28, 1812, presents issued to Indians at Fort Wayne from the United States trading-house, - - - - -	1,043 75
1812. September 20,	Amount of goods issued to the Indians at a council holden at Piqua, by Governor Meigs, the honorable Thomas Worthington, and Jeremiah Morrow, commissioners for holding conferences with the northern Indians, - - - - -	2,781 46
	Clothing and other supplies furnished to Indians at Piqua, in the years 1812, 1813, and 1814, amounting to - - - - - $4,233 52
	The whole of the Delawares and Shawanees had claimed and received the protection of the United States. They were moved into a compact body on this frontier, where they had to be fed and clothed. A number of Mingoes, Senecas, Wyandots, some Miamies, and a few Pattawatamies had joined them, including some prisoners, which made the whole number about three thousand souls. This amount was distributed on them, from time to time, in clothing and other necessaries, - - - - -	4,233 52
1814. July 26,	Amount of merchandise issued to the Indians at a treaty held at Greenville, July, 1814, by General Harrison and Governor Cass, commissioners for treating with the northern Indians, - - - - -	22,185 18
		$31,597 11½

It will be observed that the foregoing presents were chiefly made on account of the United States being at war, and that, in ordinary times, such disbursements are small. The Indians have no right, by treaty, compact, or agreement of any kind, to receive presents from the United States. It appears, however, to have been a custom, during every period of the American Government, and, I believe, all other Governments that have preceded it, with the Indians. The British load the Indians with presents, and thereby have imposed upon us the necessity of following their example, with this difference—that where we give one dollar, they at least give ten.

JOHN JOHNSTON, Indian Agent.

PIQUA, September 6, 1815.

C.

The Miamies, Eel Rivers, Delawares, Pattawatamies, and Shawanees are entitled to receive, by treaty, from the United States, in permanent annuities, as follows, viz:

The Miamies, - - - - -	$2,300 00
The Eel Rivers, - - - - -	1,100 00
That part of the Pattawatamies attached to the Fort Wayne agency, - - - - -	1,500 00
The Delawares, - - - - -	1,500 00
The Shawanees, under the treaty of Greenville of 1795, - - - - -	1,000 00
	$7,400 00

NOTE.—Under the treaty of Swan creek, or Fort Industry, of July, 1805, the Shawanees are entitled to a proportion of $1,000 per annum. During the years 1812, 1813, and 1814, I have paid them $500 per annum on account of this treaty, the other parties to it having joined the enemy. On account of the faithful adherence of the Shawanees to the United States during the late war, the Government should make this sum permanent to them, which would settle their annuity at $1,500 per annum.

TRADE WITH THE INDIANS.

PIQUA, September 6, 1815.

I have not materials for making out an account of the Indian trade, most of my papers having been lost or destroyed by the murder of my brother, and the burning of the public trading-house and establishment at Fort Wayne, in 1812; but there are ample materials for the purpose in the office of the superintendent of Indian trade. It may not be improper, however, to observe, that of all the trading-houses owned by the United States at the commencement of the late war, the one at Fort Wayne, of which I had the direction, yielded the most profit—about $10,000 was the clear gain; it commenced in 1802, and was destroyed in September, 1812.

The trading-houses with the northern Indians never produced any political effect in our favor among them, but the contrary. The Indians were led to believe that the object was to make money; and inasmuch as the goods were never sold cheaper than those of the common traders, it was impossible to produce a contrary impression. Those sold at the public stores were generally of an inferior quality and fashion. I do not mean by this that the superintendent furnished bad goods; he procured the best that the market would afford; but such goods as are calculated for the Indian trade are rarely imported into the United States, there being no regular demand for them. The British merchants in Canada have persons in England long used to this commerce, who send out the very articles wanted, and who never send any that are unsaleable. Under the superintendence of General Mason, the trading establishments have been as well conducted as any institutions of the kind could be, taking into view the difficulty of procuring regular assortments; but it is believed, for obvious reasons, that nothing of the kind carried on, on Government account, can be made to stand a successful competition with merchants, stimulated by private interest, so long established as those in Canada, and fortified and protected by all the power and patronage of the King's Government.

The supplies for the public trading-houses passing necessarily through many hands, great delays take place in the transportation, often arriving out of season, sometimes damaged, and sometimes embezzled. The furs and peltries, taking the same course to reach the market, often share the same fate; in one instance, I lost in Lake Erie $2,300 worth of furs and peltry through the carelessness of a drunken non-commissioned officer who had the command of the boats. The military have always been unfriendly to the trading-houses, and have invariably obstructed their successful operation. I know of no reason for this, except that they are instructed to furnish transportation, erect buildings, &c.; and this, not being connected with military operations, they do not consider as a part of their duty.

I have long been of the opinion that, so far as concerns the northern Indians, the Government should leave the trade open to individual enterprise, and that they should by all means encourage their own citizens to embark in it, to exclude as far as possible, within their own limits, the subjects of Great Britain from any participation therein. Every British trader among the Indians is a political partisan, sowing the seeds of distrust and dislike against the Government and people of the United States. It was through this description of persons that all the plans of the late Indian war were laid, matured, and brought into operation.

Associations of individuals, formed into a trading company on the plan of the British Northwest Company, would be more likely to insure a participation in the Indian trade than persons acting singly for themselves. In the commencement of the undertaking, losses might be expected; and this could be better met by a company. There can be no question but the trade, in the end, would be profitable. Immense fortunes have been made by it in Canada; and although it is not now so profitable as formerly, it would still be an object worthy the attention of the American merchant. It must be a cause of regret with all, that the subjects of a foreign nation should continue to monopolize a lucrative trade within the territories of the United States, and that, too, without the Government deriving any revenue from it; for it is notorious that the greater part of the goods taken into the Indian country by British traders are smuggled. The avowed object in retaining possession of Mackinac so long was to afford an opportunity this season of passing an immense quantity of Indian goods upwards, as well for trade as to supply the Indians on the Upper Mississippi with the means of carrying on the war against the whites. The refusal of the Indians to treat shows plainly the agency of the ever-active vindictive enemy of these States.

I have no hesitation in declaring that the views of the Government will be better promoted, in relation to the management of the northern Indians, by leaving the trade open to the enterprise of American citizens, and that such laws and regulations may be enacted as will encourage and protect them, to the exclusion of foreigners, in the prosecution of it.

Should Government, however, determine on renewing the trading-houses, I am decidedly of the opinion that a person actually experienced in the Indian trade should be kept in England, as an agent, for the purpose of selecting and procuring supplies for the trade and the annuities.

All which I have the honor to submit to the honorable the Secretary of War.

JOHN JOHNSTON, Indian Agent.

E.

INDIAN AGENCIES, &c.

Piqua, September 6, 1815.

No inconvenience or injury that I know of has ever arisen to the public service in consequence of the Secretary of War having the management of Indian affairs, nor do I know what necessity there is for placing the direction and superintendance thereof in a separate department. But there is much room for reform in the details of the plan for doing business with the Indians; the present mode is expensive, and experience has shown is productive of very little service: if proper attention had been bestowed on this subject, it is more than probable hostilities with the natives might have been avoided. In order to watch the Indians, and the traders who infest their country, the public agents should be multiplied among them; every tribe should have an agent who should be compelled to reside with them, or so near as to be able to have an eye to them at all times, and should be held accountable for the peaceable conduct of the Indians committed to his charge, or at least so far as to detect and make known any mischievous designs which they may have formed, in time that the execution thereof might be prevented; and this it is conceived would be in the power of any agent who paid attention to his duty. Agents might as well, for any good they do to the public service, reside at Washington City, as at Detroit, St. Louis, Kaskaskia, or Vincennes.

Each tribe having an agent, a certain number of agencies should be committed to the superintendance of one person—either the Territorial Governors, or any other the President might appoint. There are some objections to the Governors of Territories being ex officio superintendents of Indian affairs; some of them think the subject beneath their notice, and pay little or no attention to it; some are, of course, whatever their other qualities may be, not calculated for the purpose; the business is left to others, and in this way the service suffers. Where the Governors will bestow proper attention on the subject, they should be preferred, because their residence necessarily being near the Indian country, communications can be frequent between them and the agents. A capable, upright man, who would beget the confidence of the Indians, by application, integrity, and a scrupulous regard for truth, should be preferred to all others. Under the present plan, there is a horde of persons called interpreters and sub-agents in employ, who do no good, for they are generally permitted to reside at the seats of the Territorial Governments, where there is little or no occasion for them; it is among the Indians that such persons, to do service, must be stationed. Should an agent be appointed to each tribe, he would want but one interpreter, of course. It may be alleged that agents, to reside with the Indians, would be exposed to much personal danger. I do not believe this would be the case. The chiefs of the Indians would feel a pride in having the representative of the Government among them, and would, after a proper acquaintance, afford him all the aid and protection in their power; but if the Indian country be garrisoned, in most of cases it would suit the agents to reside near some fort. In the present unsettled state of the Indians, peace cannot be preserved, and the public authority maintained, without a respectable military force judiciously posted near their most populous settlements. There is nothing that the Indians so much dread as having garrisons in their country; and inasmuch as the means of influencing them still remain with the British, and, by the by, in a greater degree than ever, in consequence of their making common cause in the late war, it behoves the United States now to take effectual measures against any future rising of the Indians, and it is conceived this can only be done by garrisoning their country, and placing watchful sentinels over them in the character of agents. The places to be garrisoned I conceive to be Chicago; the old Peoria towns, on the Illinois river; Green Bay, somewhere near the mouth of Fox river; at the old Wea towns, on the Wabash river; Fort Harrison and Fort Wayne to be kept up; suitable positions on the Mississippi and Missouri to be garrisoned; some intermediate points between the Mississippi and Lake Michigan to be occupied and garrisoned; also, after these forts are completed, one hundred men at each will be sufficient; at some of them fifty would answer. To man the whole of the new garrisons that may be necessary among the northern Indians, one thousand men will be amply sufficient. The expense of supporting such a force is not to be placed in competition with the chances of an Indian war, which would be at least ten to one against us, in leaving the Indian country as it now is. In reviewing this subject, it may be profitable to recur to the period of the commencement of the late war, when the Indian country, in the almost total absence of the United States authorities, fell an easy prey into the hands of the enemy. Forts, situated in places not accessible to vessels that navigate the lakes, should be provisioned for a year.

The supplies of goods and other necessaries for the Indians should be forwarded to the agent of each tribe, so that they might reach him by the beginning of September, in every year. This is a short time before the Indians commence their hunting excursions for the winter; should they arrive much later, they could not receive them before the ensuing year. It is of much consequence the keeping of large numbers of Indians from being collected together; the breaking them up into separate agencies will have this effect; when a number of tribes get together, they become too sensible of their own strength and importance. The northern Indians scarcely ever meet in large numbers without plotting mischief against us.

There have been too many treaties made with the northern Indians; and when they have been broken on their part, no punishment has followed; this I take to be the grand cause of their present hostile temper. I have always thought it a questionable policy to press the Indians for such repeated cessions of their country; it has soured their minds against us, and has furnished the British with the best arguments in seducing the Indians from their duty and allegiance to the United States. In many instances, purchases have been made of their lands in places not required by the wants of our population. At a treaty held at Fort Wayne, in 1809, a large tract of land was procured on the Wabash, and a small strip fifteen miles wide on the west side of the old boundary, extending to Fort Recovery. The Indians, on the first application, consented to let us have the fifteen miles wide, because, they said, our people were crowded, and wanted more room; but they could not see what we wanted with the tract on the Wabash, where we had no people to occupy it, unless it were to get rid of the Indians who lived on it. These were the remarks of the Miami chief, (the Little Turtle,) made to myself.

The Government may rest assured that the whole of the Indian lands will fall into our hands soon enough to answer the demands of our surplus population; for when the land becomes useless to them, as no longer affording game for their subsistence, they will offer it for sale to the United States, and move back; and, seeing that all former experience proves this fact, I can see no use in distressing the natives, and making our Government and people odious to them, by pressing them for premature sales of their country. In another point of view, it is conceived to be a doubtful policy having several districts of country bordering on the Indians for sale at the same time; the consequence is, that the settlements become scattered and irregular, generally following the watercourses, thereby presenting innumerable fronts, and, in the event of war, subjecting the Government to incalculable expense in protecting them; indeed, no force can be adequate to such a purpose. On the contrary, if the settlements be made compact, they will contain within themselves a force sufficient for all the purposes of defence against savages.

Each Indian agency should be furnished with several national flags handsomely ornamented.

All which is respectfully submitted to the honorable the Secretary of War.

JOHN JOHNSTON, Indian Agent.

Sir:

INDIAN AGENCY OFFICE, FORT WAYNE, October 1, 1815.

I have been just honored, by your letter of the 17th of August, with several copies of the resolution of the Senate of the 2d of March, and requiring of me statements and observations relating to the Indian department; and I hasten to lay before you the information required.

The Delawares, Pattawatamies, and Miamies have been considered as the proper charge of this agency. But temporarily, the Wyandots, with some Senecas, Kansas, Delawares, and Shawanees, who reside with the Wyandots, were put under my charge during the war, and still remain so. The annuities of those tribes are: to the Wyandots, by the treaty of Greenville of 1795, $1,000 in goods; by the treaty of Detroit, $400 in cash; to the Wyandots, and those Indians who reside with the Wyandots, by virtue of the treaty of Swan creek, $1,000 in cash; the whole annuity to the Delawares is $1,800 in goods; the Pattawatamies receive from this agency $1,000 in goods, (their whole annuity is $2,400;) the Miamies, $2,300; and the Eel Rivers, $1,100 in goods. There was an annuity of $500 to the Miamies and Eel Rivers, that ceased to be payable after the year 1813.

I was not in office in 1811; nor is there any record left in this office that will show the precise time of the delivery of the annuities for that year. But I can state that all the Indians under my charge acknowledged the receipt of their respective annuities for the year 1811. For 1812, there were forwarded, in goods, for the Delawares, $1,800; Eel Rivers, $1,100; Miamies, $2,300; Pattawatamies, $1,000.

All the goods for the Detroit agency were forwarded to Cincinnati, and there lodged subject to my order. I ordered them to be delivered to the care of John Johnston, Indian agent, to be transported to Piqua, there to wait my further orders; the disposition of the Indians at that moment appearing doubtful. In the mean time, a general council had been directed at Piqua, and special commissioners appointed. All doubts having been removed with respect to the hostility of a great part of those Indians, and no security for the friendship of any, the commissioners advised Mr. Johnston to have the remaining goods (a small part of which had been given out at the council) transported back to Dayton, as a place of greater security. There they remained in charge of Mr. Johnston, and he informed me that he had reported the same to the War Department. I can, however, state, from undoubted authority, that a detachment of militia of Kentucky, in marching through Dayton to the relief of this fort when besieged, opened the stores containing the Indian goods, and took such articles as they chose, without rendering any account; the exact amount I cannot determine. Mr. Johnston has, no doubt, rendered an account.

From illness, I was not able to attend the general council at Piqua, and Mr. Johnston delivered out of the goods above mentioned the annuity to the Delawares and Shawanees, and $610 in goods to the Wyandots.

When, from the hostile appearance of the Indians in the neighborhood of this post, in August, 1812, it was thought advisable by the clerk of the store of goods for Indian trade to move the goods into the fort, all were moved in except a few heavy articles, such as iron and steel, in bars, and some other iron articles, and the skins that had been taken of the Indians in barter: the amount of the skins I am not able to determine—I should think about $4,000. The clerk of the store being killed by the Indians, and the factor (John Johnston) being at his residence at Piqua, I took charge of the goods. General Harrison, arriving with an army to the relief of this post, ordered me, as Governor of the Indiana Territory, to deliver over to the commanding officers of regiments all such goods as were suited to the necessities of the army; which was done, and an account rendered to John Johnston, factor.

During the siege of this place, all the buildings belonging to the Indian department and the department of Indian trade were necessarily burnt for the safety of the fort. There are no records left in this office of the expense of those buildings, nor to which department the expense was charged; but I should think it would be about $2,000.

About the close of 1812, by order of General Harrison, I removed my office to Upper Sandusky; and, in 1813, I accompanied the army under his command into Upper Canada, in command of the Indians, and by his order acted temporarily as agent at Detroit. During this year I made considerable expenditures for provisions for the Indian department, and to a small amount in presents in fitting out the Indian warriors, and some few other presents: an exact account of all which has been rendered to the War Department.

In July, 1814, a treaty with those tribes was ordered to be held at Greenville, and $20,000 worth of goods was ordered to be provided for that purpose. John Johnston was ordered to take an inventory of the goods above-mentioned remaining on hand at this post and at Dayton, and purchase at Cincinnati a sufficient quantity to make up that amount; and I believe about $24,000 amount was furnished Mr. Johnston, who will render the account of the amount purchased and on hand. We acted jointly at that treaty in the management of the pecuniary affairs, under the general direction of the commissioners; but the accounts remain with Mr. Johnston, who will transmit them to the War Department. Out of those goods the Delawares were paid all the annuity which was due to them up to that date. The Wyandots received $390, the balance due to them in goods of their annuity of 1812, and the goods, part of their annuity for 1813 and 1814. I offered them goods in lieu of the cash, but they refused to receive them, (those nations being considered as not having forfeited their claims to their annuities.) There was, therefore, remaining due to the Wyandots, and those Indians residing with the Wyandots at that time, $4,200 in cash, which was reported to the War Department by the commissioners. From the pressing urgency of the Indians, and the manifest public injury from longer delay of payment, I drew on the Secretary of War the 6th February, 1815, for that amount, and have received no advice whether honored or not.

In February last, I purchased in Cincinnati goods to the amount of \$1,398 63 $\frac{3}{4}$, which have been given in very small presents to Indians, in the ordinary cases of the Indian department as they have daily occurred from that time to this, with a small remainder of \$50 value.

It appears from the foregoing history of the pecuniary transactions of the Indian department, so far as my knowledge extends, that there fell due to the Indians at present under charge of this agency, and who adhered to the United States during the four years immediately preceding the 2d of March, 1815—

To the Wyandots, in goods, - - - - -	$4,000
To the Wyandots, in cash, - - - - -	1,600
To the Wyandots, and those Indians who live with them, in cash, - - - - -	4,000
	$9,600
Delawares, - - - - -	7,600
	17,200
To those tribes who were hostile, and embraced by the treaty of Greenville, of 1815—
Pattawatamies, - - - - -	$4,000
Miamies, - - - - -	10,000
Eel Rivers, - - - - -	4,400
Miamies and Eel Rivers, for 1812 and 1813, - - - - -	1,000
	19,400
	$36,600

If this latter sum of $19,400 to the Pattawatamies, Miamies, and Eel Rivers is considered as forfeited by their hostility, (except the annuity paid in 1811,) there remains due only for the four years—

To the Wyandots, and those who reside with the Wyandots, $4,200.

The whole amount of presents does not appear from the above account, because many presents were given by military officers out of supplies intended for the military department, and, in some few cases, reported to the agents. But I believe the whole amount (exclusive of the treaty of Greenville and provisions) has been about $4,300.

The amount of provisions given is still more difficult to determine, for the same reason; yet I think it may be estimated to have amounted in the four years, within the limits where at different times I have had charge, to about $230,000.

With respect to the question presented in the last paragraph of the resolution of the Senate, I must observe that I have during the late war had some opportunities of observing the difference in the organization between the British Indian department of the Canadas and that of the United States, and am clearly of the opinion that the British organization is, in several particulars, superior to that of the United States. The British give to all the officers of their Indian department a military brevet rank, and cause them to wear military insignia. And they give employment to every white man whom they believe to have any influence among Indians; and if he renders no service, they say it is worth more than he costs to keep him from doing them an injury; that the Government has no other concern in Indian trade than to regulate it.

The relative rank their officers acquire with their military rank has many very evident advantages, particularly in accelerating and rendering uniform all their measures; and the military rank adds greatly to their importance in the view of the Indians. It obviates, in some measure, what the United States have experienced much embarrassment from, viz: the powers of an Indian agent in the neighborhood of a military post, in relation to the officer commanding not being clearly defined. It has been my belief that there would be an advantage resulting from all Indian agents having military powers similar to the Governors of Territories, but of subordinate rank.

The experience of the late war has shown that we cannot have a British war without a war with the Indians, and that the only means of preventing their joining the enemy is, to give them immediate employment with our armies. In this case, it would be highly important that the officers of the Indian department who are individually acquainted with the Indians under their charge, respectively, should conduct them in the field. If so, military rank would be almost indispensable to the officers of the Indian department.

I have been fully satisfied that the advantages contemplated, resulting from the Indian trade carried on by the Government, have not been realized; that the Indians of the northwest have an aversion to it, from a belief that it is not carried on for their benefit, but as a matter of speculation. The enemies of the United States have persuaded many Indians to believe that it was a scheme of the United States to permit them to take the goods on credit until they should not be able to make payment, and then take their lands from them to satisfy the debt.

I believe that the Indian trade may be put under such restraints by the Government, in the hands of companies or individuals, that it may be managed with as much regularity as in the hands of the Government. I am of the opinion that the oath of allegiance should be required of all Indian traders, and that the moral character and characteristic attachment to the United States should be a matter of consideration; that there should be a power vested in the agents of the United States to inspect the trade and punish frauds.

I have no doubt that during the late war the affairs of the Indian department have languished for want of the necessary attention of the head of the War Department, (which no doubt was unavoidable.) And if putting the Indian department under a separate head can be considered consistent with its receiving military, added to its civil powers, I should be clearly of the opinion that it should be a separate department. In a state of peace, the present organization might answer every purpose. But to be prepared for a state of war must be our highest interest; and the present powers and organization appear not to be sufficiently efficient for that state.

It has been the result of my observation that the attempt to civilize Indians, while they have a widely extended forest to ramble in, will prove abortive; but that their ferocity may be neutralized by supplying their wants, and they attached to the source from whence they receive this supply; that the British have gained great advantages over us by their great liberality to the Indians; and that it has cost the United States more treasure in the late war (exclusive of blood) in opposing Indians purchased by British liberality, than would secure them to the United States for thirty years. I think we should increase our liberality to a degree at least equal to that of the British, or not give them any thing. What we give and pay them, when compared with the presents they receive from the British, appears so trifling, that to withhold all presents would not have much, if any, more injurious effect than giving them so much less; that it is much cheaper reducing them by meat and bread than by the force of arms; and, from the observations I have had the opportunity of making, that three or four months' full feeding on meat and bread, even without ardent spirit, will bring on disease, and, in six or eight months, great mortality. And would it be considered a proper mode of warfare? I believe more Indians might be killed with the expense of $100,000 in this way, than $1,000,000 expended in the support of armies to go against them.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

B. F. STICKNEY, Indian Agent.

Hon. Wm. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

Sir:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 30, 1815.

I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 17th August last, accompanied by a resolution of the Senate of the 2d March last, requiring a report on the several questions therein stated. I proceed to report first—

Of Annuities.—It is understood that annuities become due in this agency at the commencement of each year, but are not expected to be received by the Indians until the Government shall direct the payment.

On the 13th of July, 1812, I paid the Cherokee annuity for that year, and transmitted a receipt therefor,	$9,000 00
On the 1st of November instant, I paid the Cherokee annuities for the years 1813, 1814, 1815, 1816, and a balance over that will apply in part payment of their annuity for the year 1817; the amount of the four years' annuity, at $9,000 per year,	36,000 00
The balance over, to be deducted from their annuity for the year 1817, is	3,744 33½

Total amount of annuities paid in this agency within the times specified in the resolution of the Senate,	$48,744 33½
---	---------------------

Presents. —Presents, within the periods required by the resolution of the Senate, made to the Cherokees for the promotion of agriculture and domestic manufactures, in prosecution of the plan of Government to lead them from a state of hunters to that of herdsmen and cultivators, and a knowledge of the useful arts, amount to	$8,445 80
Presents to Cherokee officers of distinguished merit, who served under the command of General A. Jackson, in the Creek war,	956 29½

Total amount of presents to the Cherokees within the times specified in the resolution of the Senate,	$9,402 09½
---	--------------------

I now proceed to make such observations on the several parts of the last paragraph of the resolution of the Senate as may appear to me to be just. The first question is, "Whether any alteration of the powers and duties of the several officers and agents employed in the superintendence and management of Indian affairs would be advantageous?" On this question, I beg leave to observe that, if the Indian trade, as hitherto carried on, shall not have supported the appropriations that have been made for that department, it would seem that a remedy should be applied—that is, to empower the principal officer of the Indian department (if not already authorized) to direct the several factors in his department to put such advance on the merchandise for that trade as, after a careful estimation of all the expenses, would secure the United States from loss, and moderately increase the capital. This ought to be done to guard against adventitious circumstances, which may be expected to happen, particularly from the double transportation of the merchandise and the articles received in payment at the trading-houses. A good mercantile advance being put on the goods will not frustrate the benevolent design of the first institution of that trade; for the Indians will still be furnished with goods at the factories from fifty to one hundred and fifty per centum cheaper than they now pay to itinerant and straggling traders, who, under licenses, traverse the whole Indian countries within the United States; they meet the Indians at their hunting camps, and purchase the finest articles from them; so that the articles brought to the public stores are often of an inferior quality. This is an additional reason why a reasonable mercantile advance should be put on the merchandise at the public stores. It is my opinion, from fourteen years' observation here, that there is no benevolence in selling any thing to the Indians at such reduced prices as thereby to reduce the capital; it has the effect to lessen his industry; it cherishes his strongest passion—the love of ease; he rarely exerts his powers but from necessity.

The next part of the last paragraph of the resolution of the Senate is, "Whether the consolidation of the whole care and management thereof, and the placing the same in a single department, would be expedient?" To this question I answer in the affirmative. I have a long time been of this opinion, and have frequently expressed it. I will endeavor to give some reasons for that opinion; and here I must be indulged with a long detail of some very perplexing business which, through the Indian agencies, at present appertains to the War Department. All the burglaries, thefts, stealing horses and other property, some robberies, personal abuses, and injuries of almost every description on the frontiers—all these are as common to one party as the other, and are brought to the agent as complaints demanding redress; these complaints are in general badly stated, having no legal testimony to substantiate them. On the part of the Indians, they are still more defective for want of testimony, because, by our institutions, they are prohibited the privilege of making oath. There are hundreds of these cases, and many of them are undoubtedly just, that cannot be supported by legal evidence. They are taken up by the agent and decided on by self-created extra-judicial procedure. The agent calls to his aid one or two judicious men. We then style ourselves a board. We take up each case, examine the documents, (where there are any adduced,) and hear verbal testimony—together so on the part of the Indians; their simple narration must be attended to. After which the board gives an opinion on each case; they are then transmitted by the agent with the documents, with our remarks, to the Secretary of War, where they are re-examined, and returned to the agent confirmed or negated by the Secretary. The successful claimant is paid his damages recovered; as to the other, there is an end of the process.

This extra-judicial procedure is believed to be the only mode that can be adopted at present to do justice to these complaints, for scarcely any one of these cases could be sustained in a court of law.

Some of these cases require as much time for investigation as a trial in a court of law; and though the amount of damages is generally of inconsiderable value, yet they are of moment to the poor claimants, and must be adjusted in some way to prevent the parties from making reprisals which would lead to hostilities.

I have by this detail endeavored to show the extent of this perplexing business appertaining to the duties of the War Department under the present arrangement. It is my opinion that all the business of Indian trade, and the business of the Indian agencies, particularly such as I have just stated, ought to be transacted in another department—I mean an Indian department. It appears to me that there should be no law litigation, no chancery jurisdiction, and no counting-house rooms in the War Office. The mind of the War Department should be exclusively occupied about war and preparation for war; if in case of war there should be Indian corps organized, they, of course, become a part of the army, and will not while in service be considered as belonging to the Indian department, but under the War Department. Every thing extraneous to this highly responsible department it appears to me should be removed. We talk about peace: let us make the best use of it; from my observation, the eyes of the community continue to be yet fixed on the War and Navy Departments.

The question in the last part of the resolution of the Senate is, "Whether a plan may not be devised that will be equally advantageous to the Indian tribes, and more economical to the public, whereby the Indian trade may, under safeguards, be hereafter carried on by individuals or by private companies, instead of the manner in which the same is now conducted?" On this part of the resolution of the Senate I beg leave to observe that I cannot conceive it practicable, by any guards in the power of Government, to restrain individuals or private trading companies from taking advantages of the Indians, and such a measure might be viewed by the Indians as a relinquishment of the original plan of the institution of that trade. It appears to me that by factors under the control of Government the trade may be carried on without loss to the United States. I have always understood that benevolence and policy were combined in the plan of this trade, and it is undoubtedly true that the Indians consider the public trading-houses as their fathers' houses; they are rallying points where the Indians feel at home; they feel the paternal care of the Government; it strengthens their attachment and fidelity.

I can make no other report on the subject of Indian trade on public account than that it was discontinued here in 1811.

In your letter you gave me a latitude in making observations, which I must plead as an apology for the length of my letter.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

RETURN J. MEIGS.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

CHOCTAW AGENCY, October 25, 1815.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 17th August last, enclosing a resolution of the Senate of the United States.

The short time I have been agent, and the little of that time I had to spare from more pressing duties arising from the late war, have not afforded me leisure or opportunity to be well informed on the subjects embraced in the resolution. I requested my predecessor, Mr. Dinsmoor, to favor me with the result of his observations and experience; a copy of his note I have the honor to enclose. With a vigorous mind and solid judgment, I know no person in the Indian department that has done so much towards civilizing the Indians, and I feel confident his information and suggestions will have due weight.

During my agency I have delivered to the Choctaws $4,831 88 in goods, part of their annuity for the year 1813, leaving a balance, by report from the Indian office, December 15, 1813, of $1,028 12, and there is now in store here $5,851 for the annuity of 1814.

I am informed by Mr. Hawkinson's agent at Natchez that a quantity of goods has been received by him subject to my order, (by the invoice accompanying them, $19,001 13½) but I have not yet received the invoice, or any official information to govern me in their distribution. I understand the invoice and instructions are at Natchez. I have prepared the Indians to receive, in advance, for their annuity, such part as may have been directed by General Jackson for that purpose, and I expect to have them brought up and distributed in all this month.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN MCKEE.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

The agent has the disposal of the following articles, cash and merchandise, for the Choctaws, viz:

Sundry goods, the balance undamaged, of an invoice forwarded by General Jackson,	$18,783 88½
Annuity for 1814, including mingoes' salary and stand rent,	-	5,851 00
Balance in cash due the chiefs and nation for the year 1813,	-	1,028 12
		$25,663 00½
The agent delivers the annuity for 1814, as per invoice, -	-	$5,851 00
The balance in cash for the annuity of 1813 he delivers to the three great medal chiefs, for their salary for the years 1813, 1815, and part of 1816,	-	1,028 12
He will deliver to the mingoes, as the balance of their salary for 1816,	-	321 88
He will deliver to the mingoes, in goods, their salary for 1817,	-	450 00
He will deliver annuities, including stand rent, for 1815, 1816, and 1817,	-	16,200 00
He will deliver as presents to the mingoes, leaders, and distinguished warriors,	-	1,812 00½
		25,663 00½

CHOCTAW AGENCY, December 29, 1815.

I certify that in November last, at the request of Colonel John McKee, United States agent to the Choctaw nation of Indians, I inspected sundry packages of merchandise received for the nation, found some of the bales entirely broken up, the goods much damaged, some of the cloths absolutely rotten, and most of them injured except some packed in sound tierces.

SILAS DINSMOOR.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 17, 1815.

The enclosed resolution of the Senate clearly defines the nature of the information which you are requested to give this Department relative to the amount of annuities and presents due, paid, and delivered to the several Indian tribes within your agency, during the four years immediately preceding the 4th of March, 1815.

In directing your attention particularly to the clause respecting annuities and presents, it is not intended to confine your communications to those points. In the discharge of your official duties, you have no doubt acquired an intimate knowledge of the general nature of the subject embraced in the resolution. Your views and observations upon the several questions presented in the last paragraph will be received with great pleasure, and will meet with all the consideration which the importance of the subject requires.

My recent assumption of the duties of this Department, and the near approach of the period when the duty required by the resolution must be performed, make it necessary that the information which it is in your power to give should be transmitted with the least possible delay.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

[Addressed to the Governors of the Mississippi, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Missouri Territories; William Cocke, Chickasaw Agent; Erastus Granger, Indian Agent, Buffalo; Major Samuel Lovely, Indian Agent, Arkansas; John Johnston, Indian Agent, Pigua; Benjamin F. 14th CONGRESS.]

No. 143.

[1st SESSION.]

TREATY AND CONVENTION WITH THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 28, 1816.

To the Senate of the United States:

MARCH 26, 1816.

I lay before the Senate, for their advice as to a ratification, articles of a treaty and of a convention which have been concluded with the Cherokee nation, with documents relating to the losses by the Indians, for which indemnity is stipulated.

JAMES MADISON.

Articles of a treaty made and concluded at the city of Washington, on the twenty-second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, between George Graham, being specially authorized by the President of the United States thereto, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation, duly authorized and empowered by the said nation.

ARTICLE I. Whereas the Executive of the State of South Carolina has made an application to the President of the United States to extinguish the claim of the Cherokee nation to that part of their lands which lie within the boundaries of the said State, as lately established and agreed upon between that State and the State of North Carolina; and as the Cherokee nation is disposed to comply with the wishes of their brothers of South Carolina, they have agreed, and do hereby agree, to cede to the State of South Carolina, and forever quit claim to, the tract of country contained within the following bounds, viz: beginning on the east bank of the Chattuga river, where the boundary line of the Cherokee nation crosses the same; running thence with the said boundary line to a rock on the Blue Ridge, where the boundary line crosses the same, and which rock has been lately established as a corner to the States of North and South Carolina; running thence, south, sixty-eight and a quarter degrees west, twenty miles and thirty-two chains, to a rock on the Chattuga river, at the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude, another corner of the boundaries agreed upon by the States of North and South Carolina; thence, down and with the Chattuga, to the beginning.

ART. 2. For and in consideration of the above cession, the United States promise and engage that the State of South Carolina shall pay to the Cherokee nation, or its accredited agent, the sum of five thousand dollars, within ninety days after the President and Senate shall have ratified this treaty: Provided, That the Cherokee nation shall have sanctioned the same in council: And provided, also, That the Executive of the State of South Carolina shall approve of the stipulations contained in this article.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioner, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation, have hereunto set their hands and seals.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

[Signed also by the chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation.]

Articles of a convention made and entered into between George Graham, specially authorized thereto by the President of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation, duly authorized and empowered by the said nation.

ARTICLE 1. Whereas doubts have existed in relation to the northern boundary of that part of the Creek lands lying west of the Coosa river, and which were ceded to the United States by the treaty held at Fort Jackson, on the ninth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen: and whereas, by the third article of the treaty, dated the seventh of January, one thousand eight hundred and six, between the United States and the Cherokee nation, the United States have recognised a claim on the part of the Cherokee nation to the lands south of the Big Bend of the Tennessee river, and extending as far west as a place on the waters of Bear creek, [a branch of the Tennessee river,] known by the name of the Flat Rock or Stone; it is, therefore, now declared and agreed that a line shall be run from a point on the west bank of the Coosa river, opposite to the lower end of the Ten Islands in said river, and above Fort Strother, directly to the Flat Rock or Stone on Bear creek, [a branch of the Tennessee river;] which line shall be established as the boundary of the lands ceded by the Creek nation to the United States by the treaty held at Fort Jackson, on the ninth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and of the lands claimed by the Cherokee nation lying west of the Coosa and south of the Tennessee rivers.

ART. 2. It is expressly agreed on the part of the Cherokee nation that the United States shall have the right to lay off, open, and have the free use of such road or roads through any part of the Cherokee nation lying north of the boundary line now established, as may be deemed necessary for the free intercourse between the States of Tennessee and Georgia and the Mississippi Territory. And the citizens of the United States shall freely navigate and use as a highway all the rivers and waters within the Cherokee nation. The Cherokee nation further agree to establish and keep up, on the roads to be opened under the sanction of this article, such ferries and public houses as may be necessary for the accommodation of the citizens of the United States.

ART. 3. In order to preclude any dispute hereafter relative to the boundary line now established, it is hereby agreed that the Cherokee nation shall appoint two commissioners to accompany the commissioners already appointed on the part of the United States, to run the boundary lines of the lands ceded by the Creek nation to the United States, while they are engaged in running that part of the boundary established by the first article of this treaty.

ART. 4. In order to avoid unnecessary expense and delay, it is further agreed that, whenever the President of the United States may deem it expedient to open a road through any part of the Cherokee nation, in pursuance of the stipulations of the second article of this convention, the principal chief of the Cherokee nation shall appoint one commissioner to accompany the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, to lay off and mark the road; and the said commissioner shall be paid by the United States.

ART. 5. The United States agree to indemnify the individuals of the Cherokee nation for losses sustained by them in consequence of the march of the militia and other troops in the service of the United States through that nation, which losses have been ascertained by the agents of the United States to amount to twenty-five thousand five hundred dollars.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioner, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation, have hereunto set their hands and seals. Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST THE TREATY.

To the President of the United States of America: This memorial and remonstrance respectfully declareth:

That one of the most inestimable privileges which freemen enjoy is the right of investigating the proceedings of those whose duty it is to advance the public weal, and remove the causes which have a tendency to produce public and individual injury. Availing ourselves of this sacred right, we, your memorialists, would respectfully submit a number of the grievances under which we labor in common with the people in this State; a candid and full examination of which, we trust, will produce a removal, so far as the power of doing this, or recommending it to be done, is vested in yourself. The people of this State know that their political and individual prosperity is much retarded, and they also believe that their rights are obstructed by two causes, connected with the relations of the United States with the Indian tribes: the first of which is a failure to extinguish the Indian claim to land within the chartered limits of this State; and the second is a cession to the Cherokee Indians of that tract of country south of Tennessee ceded to the United States by the Creek Indians, by the treaty held by General Jackson. We are more concerned on the latter subject, that the Government should have yielded to the Cherokees this tract, at the very time when the nation refused to sell for a full price to the United States a portion of land on the north side of Tennessee, within this State, which is of much importance to us, and in a measure useless to that nation. To show how far the existence of the Indian claim to the land within the chartered limits of this State is a political injury, and connected with the violation of individual right, we will beg leave to call your attention to the following facts: Previous to the formation of the constitution of the United States, and when the State of North Carolina possessed the absolute sovereignty of soil in what is now the State of Tennessee, each of the States having declared independence, and after the States had conquered their enemies, foreign and internal, the Legislature of that State, with much magnanimity and justice, offered for sale her western lands to her own citizens, to extinguish the debt which she owed to the war-worn soldiers of the Revolution; that debt was paid, and a fee-simple title was vested in the purchasers to a large portion of the lands within what is now the State of Tennessee. This took place in the years 1783 and 1784. At that time the title of the Indians to the lands sold by the State was not acknowledged by any treaty or law; and it was purchased, and grants obtained, under a confidence that possession could be had so soon as the Indian nations were conquered or would cease to be hostile. Few, if any, of the tribes of Indians ever actually inhabited the lands which were sold by the State of North Carolina. That portion of territory in which the Cherokee tribe were settled south and east of Tennessee was reserved, when the boundary was prescribed of lands offered for sale. After the State of North Carolina had sold out the lands to redeem her public debt, the territory now composing the State of Tennessee was ceded by North Carolina to the Congress of the United States, reserving, however, the rights of individuals holding grants, and the right to perfect the titles of such as had purchased lands from that State, which were not granted. Since that period the United States have, by treaties or compacts with the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians, acknowledged a possessory right in those tribes to a large portion of the lands within this State; and that acknowledgment of title continues to exist, to the exclusion of citizens who have paid a fair price to North Carolina for those lands, more than thirty years since. Nay, the treaties purport to vest an absolute right to those lands in the Indians. A large portion of territory is unoccupied by the Indians on the north side of Tennessee, (except, perhaps, occasionally by a few straggling parties,) to which their title is unextinguished. This land is of vast importance in a political point of view to the State; it has also been granted by North Carolina, and the grantees are deprived of the enjoyment of their property; and yet the Cherokees refuse to sell it, with the same stubborn independence as if their title were absolute. An extensive and fertile tract is situated on the west of the inhabited part of this State, and extending to the Mississippi, which land was sold by North Carolina, and a great portion thereof granted nearly thirty years since. It is unsettled by the Indians, yet it is claimed by the Chickasaw tribe; and the grantees of the land, who have a freehold in the soil, by purchase from the State, have a more gloomy prospect of enjoying their property now than existed twenty years ago. Many individuals are deprived of their patrimony purchased by the blood of their fathers. The State is deprived of the political advantage arising from the settlement of a part of its soil, fertile beyond description, and rendered doubly important from its situation on the great navigable waters, which have become the highway to market of the produce raised by several millions of people. At the close of the American war, the absolute right to the vacant soil existed in the States, respectively; and the right was in the Indian tribes, most of whom were conquered by the States. If this right existed in the States, we would inquire whether it be consistent with the principles of a free Government to exclude the individual owners of the soil from the enjoyment of their property? And we would humbly suggest the injustice of doing this, by laws or treaties made subsequent to the vested right of the owners. This is a grievance under which the citizens of the State of Tennessee have labored for many years past. In an humble and respectful manner has it been presented to the constituted authorities of the United States by the Legislature of our State, and by our Representatives and Senators in Congress. With painful emotion it has been seen that all exertions for its removal have failed. Yet, as citizens, we were respectfully silent, hoping each succeeding year would produce a change. We fondly looked forward to the time when the rights of our citizens would be considered as paramount to the rights of the Indians; and, of two conflicting claims, that that claim would be protected which would convert a pathless wilderness into peaceful habitations of freemen, yielding individual wealth and national prosperity; and, if an indemnity was necessary, it would be conferred on those whose claim was later in point of law and acknowledgment, and least in point of use and necessity. From the arrogant and aspiring pretensions of the adjacent tribes, we have no hope that they will voluntarily yield, or even sell their claims. Recent events show that they desire to embrace every foot of territory which will lessen the facility of communication with the settlements on the Mississippi and Mobile, and retard the prosperity of this State. We would inquire, where is this matter to end? is it to be left to the will of the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians?

We would also call your attention to the peculiarity of our injury. In no other State do we know of a sale of lands, at an early period after the Revolution, where the purchasers are as yet deprived of the possession. In a few years the extinguishment of the Indian claim will be useless to the individual claimants. The destroyer Time will have soon demolished every trace or mark of the surveys and boundaries; and already almost every individual to whom they were known is consigned to the tomb. One other subject of complaint is the late cession to the Cherokee Indians of so large a portion of the territory added to the United States by the treaty held with the Creeks by General Jackson. This is considered an evil of much magnitude, and we submit the following facts to prove that the Creeks were fully empowered to make the conveyance to the United States by the treaty of 1814. It is clearly established, and it is here almost universally known, that at the first settlement of the western country, the territory in question was not held under the least color of claim by the Cherokees, but was in the possession of the Creeks, who continued to occupy it until the war in 1813, when the Creeks fled from villages within this territory, which were afterwards demolished by General Jackson. The chiefs and headmen of the Cherokees, even at that period, so far from claiming this land, declared to General Jackson that his army was in an enemy's country after crossing a small stream called Will's creek, twenty miles south of Fort Deposit, on the Tennessee river. From thence, southwardly, they said, the army was in the territory of the Creeks, and all the property was the property of the enemy. Of the truth of these facts abundant proof can be produced, sufficient to establish the same at any time when it may be desired. Did not the cession of this land to the United States by the Creeks vest in the people thereof prima facie evidence of title? If so, could the people be divested of this title by the act of the President and Senate? This committee humbly state that they do not think the constitution has vested this power in those branches of the Government. The cession of this territory to the United States was hailed with joy, as an era in the prosperity of Tennessee. By this, a communication would be had through a country inhabited by white men, and governed by laws, to the counties on the Mississippi and Mobile. We ever were informed the boundaries of the lands held by the Creeks were directed to be run by public authority, separating those lands from the Cherokees. We understand the line was run, and information thereof communicated to the proper office. But our satisfaction at this event was succeeded by surprise and regret, when we learned so much of this tract was ceded to the Cherokees as would effectually prevent that connexion in settlement with our fellow-citizens on the waters of the Mobile. We would ask, where is the policy of ceding this tract to the Cherokees, who are so tenacious of the territory which they already possess, that they will not surrender one acre without receiving what would be the value of the land? We would inquire, upon what principle of justice was this land ceded to the Cherokees? It was not useful to them for cultivation, nor due to them as a nation, to the exclusion of the people of the West, to whom the advantages from the occupation and settlement of this country were in some measure due, as a boon for its conquest. We applaud the course of policy adopted by the United States towards the Indians, replete with humanity, justice, and moderation; but we cannot agree that it is proper to sacrifice the convenience and welfare of so large a portion of the members of the community to gratify the cupidity of any tribe. The country bordering on the Tennessee, and occupied by the Creeks before the war of 1813, is that through which would pass the great highway from this State to New Orleans and Mobile. The country is fertile, and would soon be covered by a population of yeomanry, and become a perpetual barrier to the communication of the northern and southern tribes of Indians, who, from their intimate correspondence, produced such distressing effects subsequent to the declaration of war in 1812. Our citizens would then travel in security, without the risk of being murdered at every wigwam by some drunken savage, or of being ambushed and plundered until a safe passage is purchased by giving to the Indians money for permission to travel the public road. One of our neighbors a short time since was insulted, and afterwards murdered, on the road leading through that nation; and another of our most respectable citizens, when travelling with his family on the same road, was compelled to purchase his safe passage by his purse of money. The tribe will claim in palliation that such excesses are committed by drunken and profligate Indians, and perhaps will claim credit for surrendering such to be punished by our laws. These things, to us, are no satisfaction or security. The course of business requires frequent travelling along the roads leading through that country, and, while the Indians possess the soil from the Mississippi to Georgia, our citizens are not secure from attacks. We desire rather security against this mischief, than revenge for a murder when committed. If you will refer to the map of the country south of the State of Tennessee, and bring to mind that the produce of all the western country is sold at New Orleans, and that the Indians possess an extensive territory between this State and that market; that thousands of the citizens of Kentucky and Tennessee annually return by land, after selling their produce, and that this happens most frequently in the unhealthy season; that want of accommodation, sickness, insult, and injury, often await them through this Indian territory; that every year increases the quantity of produce for the market, and consequently the number of persons exposed to the evils enumerated—you will have but a faint idea of the magnitude of the object to the people of this section of the Union, and of the regret with which they beheld that a free communication was no sooner obtained from the Creeks, than it was surrendered to the Cherokees. We cannot but believe that the policy of retaining this part of the country is so evident that it would not have been surrendered to the Cherokees, except from a mistaken belief that it of right belonged to that nation; and we believe, if the fact had been known to you that the Cherokee claim was founded altogether in pretence, and had no substantial existence, that this cession would not have been sanctioned. We have heard it suggested that the treaty of 1806 contained a pledge that the United States would acknowledge the claim of the Cherokees to this treaty. We will remark that the article in that treaty which speaks of the boundary of the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians was evidently concluded by the Secretary of War, relying upon the representation of the Cherokees, and without a knowledge of the title of the respective tribes. It is beyond dispute that the land in question did not belong to, nor was it occupied by, either the Cherokees or Chickasaws, but was vested in the Creeks. An agreement on the part of the United States that they would endeavor to prevent collisions between the Cherokees and Chickasaws, by procuring the establishment of a certain boundary, did not, it seems to us, bind the United States to relinquish any title they might acquire from a third party, provided that third party had the better title, particularly when it is recollected that the projected boundary of the treaty of 1806 never was established. We might still go further in depicting the evils to be produced from carrying this stipulation into effect, after the treaty held with the Creeks by General Jackson, and after the boundaries were run and ascertained. This tract has been settled by a numerous population—by men whose lives and property have often been pledged to their Government. We will leave you to imagine the difficulty, distress, and dissatisfaction which will result from dispossessing this population of a country which was considered as a land of promise, and which they had prepared themselves to purchase by a sale of their interior possessions, and that this disposition should be made, that the country may remain a wilderness for the refuge of plunderers and murderers. We are also mortified that the treaty with the Cherokees should contain an imputation against the militia of this State, in making an appropriation of $25,500 for depredations pretended to be committed in their territory by the army of the United States. This claim, set up by the Cherokees, we believe, from good authority, to be unfounded. The language as well as the matter of this article is a subject of regret to the militia of Tennessee, since it implicates the character of their officers, who are virtually accused of leading bands of marauders, and allowing the most flagrant acts to pass unpunished. We would beg leave to bring to your notice the tedious and injurious system adopted by the War Department in the payment of accounts which have been created during the war in the quartermaster's office. The payment of these accounts has been postponed from time to time, to the great injury of those who hold unsettled claims; and, as if to increase the difficulty, it has been lately ordered that these claims should be sent to Washington for inspection, previous to their adjustment. The delay and risk of loss in transmitting the evidences of these claims are very great, and the difficulty of presenting demands, although entirely just, authenticated according to exact form, has been experienced by all interested in them, because the officers ordering the same paid are now at an immense distance from the place of their liquidation. All these embarrassments have in many instances created an expense equal to the amount of the demands producing it. The payment of the officers and soldiers for their services has been so long protracted, and so many difficulties presented, from the want of funds or otherwise, that many of the soldiers who braved the dangers of the field, and conquered the heroes of Britain, have not yet received the first cent for their services.

This committee are assured that penury has not tied the pursestrings of the nation; that appropriations were made to satisfy all demands against the pay and quartermaster's departments in this district; therefore, we most respectfully inquire, what disposition has been made of the funds appropriated to satisfy the just claims on Government?

The citizens of Tennessee deem the grievances which this committee have referred to as materially affecting the rights and happiness of the community at large; and are happy to believe that they have, by their recent and unparalleled display of patriotism and valor, secured to themselves the plaudits of the American people, and are justly entitled to a prompt removal of all the causes hereby noticed, which so materially affect the present and future destiny of this country.

For and in behalf of the citizens of Davidson county:

TREATY WITH THE CHEROKEES.

To perpetuate peace and friendship between the United States and Cherokee tribe or nation of Indians, and to remove all future causes of dissension which may arise from indefinite territorial boundaries, the President of the United States of America, by Major General Andrew Jackson, General David Meriwether, and Jesse Franklin, Esq., commissioners plenipotentiary on the one part, and the Cherokee delegates on the other, covenant and agree to the following articles and conditions, which, when approved by the Cherokee nation, and constitutionally ratified by the Government of the United States, shall be binding on all parties:

ARTICLE 1. Peace and friendship are hereby firmly established between the United States and Cherokee nation or tribe of Indians.

ART. 2. The Cherokee nation acknowledge the following as their western boundary south of the Tennessee river: Commencing at Camp Coffee, on the south side of the Tennessee river, which is opposite the Chickasaw Island; running from thence, a due south course, to the top of the dividing ridge between the waters of the Tennessee and Tombigbee rivers; thence, eastwardly, along said ridge, leaving the head waters of the Black Warrior to the right hand, until opposed by the west branch of Will's creek; down the east bank of said creek, to the Coosa river, and down said river.

ART. 3. The Cherokee nation relinquish to the United States all claim, and cede all title, to lands lying south and west of the line as described in the second article; and, in consideration of said relinquishment and cession, the commissioners agree to allow to the Cherokee nation an annuity of $6,000, to continue for ten successive years, and $5,000, to be paid in sixty days after the ratification of the treaty, as a compensation for any improvements which the said nation may have had on the lands surrendered.

ART. 4. The two contracting parties covenant and agree that the line, as described in the second article, shall be ascertained and marked by commissioners, to be appointed by the President of the United States; that the marks shall be bold; trees to be blazed on both sides of the line, and the fore and aft trees to be marked with the letters U. S.; that the commissioners shall be accompanied by two persons, to be appointed by the Cherokee nation; and that said nation shall have due and seasonable notice when said operation is to be commenced.

ART. 5. It is stipulated that the Cherokee nation will meet General Andrew Jackson, General David Meriwether, and Jesse Franklin, Esq., in council, at Turkeytown, Coosa river, on the 28th of September instant, there and then to express their approbation, or not, of the articles of this treaty; and if they do not assemble at the time and place specified, it is understood that the said commissioners may report the same as a tacit ratification, on the part of the Cherokee nation, of this treaty.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, and undersigned chiefs and delegates of the Cherokee nation, have hereto set their hands and seals. Done at the Chickasaw council-house, this fourteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

ANDREW JACKSON,
DAVID MERIWETHER,
JESSE FRANKLIN.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation.]

TREATY WITH THE CHICKASAWS.

To settle all territorial controversies, and to perpetuate that peace and harmony which has long happily subsisted between the United States and Chickasaw nation, the President of the United States of America, by Major General Andrew Jackson, General David Meriwether, and Jesse Franklin, Esq., on the one part, and the whole Chickasaw nation in council assembled, on the other, have agreed on the following articles, which, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, shall be binding on all parties:

ARTICLE 1. Peace and friendship are hereby firmly established and perpetuated between the United States of America and Chickasaw nation.

ART. 2. The Chickasaw nation cede to the United States (with the exception of such reservations as shall hereafter be specified) all right or title to lands on the north side of the Tennessee river, and relinquish all claim to territory on the south side of said river, and east of a line commencing at the mouth of Caney creek, running up said creek to its source; thence, a due south course, to the ridge path, or commonly called Gaines's road; along said road, southwesterly, to a point on the Tombigbee river well known by the name of the Cotton Gin Port; and down the west bank of the Tombigbee to the Choctaw boundary.

ART. 3. In consideration of the relinquishment of claim and cession of lands made in the preceding article, the commissioners agree to allow the Chickasaw nation $12,000 per annum for ten successive years, and $4,500, to be paid in sixty days after the ratification of this treaty into the hands of Levi Colbert, as a compensation for any improvements which individuals of the Chickasaw nation may have had on the lands surrendered; that is to say, $2,000 for improvements on the east side of the Tombigbee, and $2,500 for improvements on the north side of the Tennessee river.

ART. 4. The commissioners agree that the following tracts of land shall be reserved to the Chickasaw nation:

1. One tract of land for the use of Colonel George Colbert and heirs, and which is thus described by said Colbert: "Beginning on the north bank of the Tennessee river, at a point that, running north four miles, will include a big spring about half-way between his ferry and the mouth of Cypress, it being a spring that a large cow-path crosses its branch near where a cypress tree is cut down; thence, westwardly, to a point four miles from the Tennessee river, and standing due north of a point on the north bank of the river, three miles below his ferry on the Tennessee river; and up the meanders of said river to the beginning point."

2. A tract of land two miles square, on the north bank of the Tennessee river, and at its junction with Beach creek, for the use of Appassan Tubby and heirs.

3. A tract of land one mile square, on the north side of the Tennessee river, for the use of John McCleish and heirs; the said tract to be so run as to include the said McCleish's settlement and improvements on the north side of Buffalo creek.

4. Two tracts of land, containing forty acres each, on the south side of Tennessee river, and about two and a half miles below the Cotton Gin Port, on the Tombigbee river; which tracts of land will be pointed out by Major Levi Colbert, and for the use of said Colbert and heirs.

It is stipulated that the above reservations shall appertain to the Chickasaw nation only so long as they shall be occupied, cultivated, or used by the present proprietors or heirs; and in the event of all or either of said tracts of land so reserved being abandoned by the present proprietors or heirs, each tract or tracts of land so abandoned shall revert to the United States as a portion of that territory ceded by the second article of the treaty.

ART. 5. The two contracting parties covenant and agree that the line on the south side of the Tennessee river, as described in the second article of this treaty, shall be ascertained and marked by commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States; that the marks shall be bold; trees to be blazed on both sides of the line, and the fore and aft trees to be marked with the letters U. S. That the commissioners shall be attended by two persons to be designated by the Chickasaw nation, and that the said nation shall have due and reasonable notice when said operation is to be commenced.

ART. 6. In consideration of the conciliatory disposition evinced during the negotiation of this treaty by the Chickasaw chiefs and warriors, but more particularly as a manifestation of the friendship and liberality of the President of the United States, the commissioners agree to give, on the ratification of this treaty, to Chinnubby, king of the Chickasaws, to Tishshomingo, William McGilvery, Arpasarshtubby, Samuel Seely, James Brown, Levi Colbert, Ickaryoucellaha, George Petygrove, Immartarharmicko, Chickasaw chiefs, and to Malcolm McGee, interpreter, one hundred and fifty dollars each, in goods or cash, as may be preferred; and to Major William Glover, Colonel George Colbert, Captain Rabbitt, Hoparyeahoummar, Immoukelourshsharhoparyea, Hoparyeahoullartir, Tushkerhopoyea, Hoparyeahoummar, jun., Immoukelusharhopoyea, James Colbert, Coweamarthlar, and Illachouwarhopoyea, military leaders, one hundred dollars each; and, as a particular mark of distinction and favor for his long services and faithful adherence to the United States Government, the commissioners agree to allow to General William Colbert an annuity of one hundred dollars for and during his life.

ART. 7. Whereas the chiefs and warriors of the Chickasaw nation have found, from experience, that the crowd of peddlars who are constantly traversing their nation from one end to the other is of a serious disadvantage to the nation; that serious misunderstandings and disputes frequently take place, as well as frauds, which are often practised on the ignorant and uninformed of the nation, therefore it is agreed by the commissioners on the part of the Government, and the chiefs of the nation, that no more licenses shall be granted by the agent of the Chickasaws to entitle any person or persons to trade or traffic merchandise in said nation; and that any person or persons whomsoever, of the white people, who shall bring goods and sell them in the nation, contrary to this article, shall forfeit the whole of his or their goods, one-half to the nation and the other half to the Government of the United States. In all cases where this article is violated, and the goods are taken or seized, they shall be delivered up to the agent, who shall hear the testimony and judge accordingly.

This article was presented to the commissioners by the chiefs and warriors of the Chickasaw nation, and, by their particular solicitation, embraced in this treaty.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioners and undersigned chiefs and warriors have set their hands and seals. Done at the Chickasaw council-house, this twentieth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

TREATY WITH THE WEAS AND KICKAPOOS.

Articles of a treaty made and entered into at Fort Harrison, in the Indiana Territory, between Benjamin Parke, specially authorized thereto by the President of the United States, of the one part, and the tribes of Indians called the Weas and Kickapoos, by their chiefs and headmen, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. The Weas and Kickapoos again acknowledge themselves in peace and friendship with the United States.

ART. 2. The said tribes acknowledge the validity of, and declare their determination to adhere to, the treaty of Greenville, made in the year seventeen hundred and ninety-five, and all subsequent treaties which they have respectively made with the United States.

ART. 3. The boundary line surveyed and marked by the United States of the land on the Wabash and White rivers, ceded in the year eighteen hundred and nine, the said tribes do hereby explicitly recognize and confirm, as having been executed conformably to the several treaties they have made with the United States.

ART. 4. The chiefs and warriors of the said tribe of the Kickapoos acknowledge that they have ceded to the United States all that tract of country which lies between the aforesaid boundary line on the northwest side of the Wabash, the Wabash, the Vermilion river, and a line to be drawn from the northwest corner of the said boundary line, so as to strike the Vermilion river twenty miles in a direct line from its mouth, according to the terms and conditions of the treaty they made with the United States on the ninth day of December, in the year eighteen hundred and nine.

In testimony whereof, the said Benjamin Parke, and the chiefs and headmen of the said tribes, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals, at Fort Harrison, in the Indiana Territory, the fourth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

TREATY WITH THE SACS OF ROCK RIVER.

A treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded between William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said States, of the one part, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the Sacs of Rock river and the adjacent country, of the other part.

Whereas, by the ninth article of the treaty of peace which was concluded on the twenty-fourth day of December, eighteen hundred and fourteen, between the United States and Great Britain, at Ghent, and which was ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the seventeenth day of February, eighteen hundred and fifteen, it was stipulated that the said parties should severally put an end to all hostilities with the Indian tribes with whom they might be at war at the time of the ratification of said treaty, and to place the said tribes inhabiting their respective territories on the same footing upon which they stood before the war: Provided, They should agree to desist from all hostilities against the said parties, their citizens or subjects, respectively, upon the ratification of the said treaty being notified to them, and should so desist accordingly:

And whereas the United States being determined to execute every article of the treaty with perfect good faith, and wishing to be particularly exact in the execution of the article above alluded to relating to the Indian tribes, the President, in consequence thereof, for that purpose, on the eleventh day of March, eighteen hundred and fifteen, appointed the undersigned William Clark, Governor of Missouri Territory, Ninian Edwards, Governor of Illinois Territory, and Auguste Chouteau, Esq., of the Missouri Territory, commissioners, with full power to conclude a treaty of peace and amity with all those tribes of Indians, conformably to the stipulations contained in the said article, on the part of the United States, in relation to such tribes:

And whereas the commissioners, in conformity with their instructions in the early part of last year, notified the Sacs of Rock river and the adjacent country of the time of the ratification of said treaty; of the stipulations it contained in relation to them; of the disposition of the American Government to fulfil those stipulations, by entering into a treaty with them conformably thereto, and invited the said Sacs of Rock river and the adjacent country to send forward a deputation of their chiefs to meet the said commissioners at Portage des Sioux, for the purpose of concluding such a treaty as aforesaid between the United States and the said Indians; and the said Sacs of Rock river and the adjacent country having not only declined that friendly overture, but having continued their hostilities, and committed many depredations thereafter, which would have justified the infliction of the severest chastisement upon them; but having earnestly repented of their conduct, now imploring mercy, and being anxious to return to the habits of peace and friendship with the United States; and the latter being always disposed to pursue the most liberal and humane policy towards the Indian tribes within their territory, preferring their reclamation by peaceful measures to their punishment by the application of the military force of the nation: Now, therefore,

The said William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners as aforesaid, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors as aforesaid, for the purpose of restoring peace and friendship between the parties, do agree to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The Sacs of Rock river and the adjacent country do hereby unconditionally assent to, recognise, re-establish, and confirm the treaty between the United States of America and the united tribes of Sacs and Foxes, which was concluded at St. Louis on the third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and four, as well as all other contracts and agreements heretofore made between the Sac tribe or nation and the United States.

ART. 2. The United States agree to place the aforesaid Sacs of Rock river on the same footing upon which they stood before the war: Provided, They shall, on or before the first day of July next, deliver up to the officer commanding at Cantonment Davis, on the Mississippi, all the property they or any of their tribe have plundered or stolen from the citizens of the United States since they were notified as aforesaid of the time of the ratification of the late treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

ART. 3. If the said tribes shall fail or neglect to deliver up the property aforesaid, or any part thereof, on or before the first day of July aforesaid, they shall forfeit to the United States all right and title to their proportion of the annuities which, by the treaty of St. Louis, were covenanted to be paid to the Sac tribe; and the United States shall forever afterwards be exonerated from the payment of so much of said annuities as, upon a fair distribution, would fall to the share of that portion of the Sacs who are represented by the undersigned chiefs and warriors.

ART. 4. This treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties, unless the same shall be disapproved by the President and Senate of the United States, or by the President only; and, in the mean time, all hostilities shall cease from this date.

In testimony whereof, the said William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners as aforesaid, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors as aforesaid, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals this thirteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and warriors of the Sacs of Rock river and the adjacent country.]

The parties being desirous of re-establishing peace and friendship between the United States and the said tribes, and of being placed in all things and in every respect on the same footing upon which they stood before the late war between the United States and Great Britain, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. Every injury or act of hostility committed by one or either of the contracting parties against the other shall be mutually forgiven and forgot.

ART. 2. There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States and all the individuals composing the aforesaid tribes; and all the friendly relations that existed between them before the war shall be, and the same are hereby, renewed.

ART. 3. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and their tribes, respectively, do by these presents confirm to the United States all and every cession or cessions of land heretofore made by their tribes to the British, French, or Spanish Governments, within the limits of the United States or their territories; and the parties here contracting do, moreover, in the sincerity of mutual friendship, recognise, re-establish, and confirm all and every treaty, contract, and agreement heretofore concluded between the United States and the said tribes or nations.

ART. 4. The undersigned chiefs and warriors as aforesaid, for themselves and their said tribes, do hereby acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other nation, power, or sovereign whatsoever.

In witness whereof, the commissioners aforesaid, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors as aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals this first day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

TREATY WITH THE CHOCTAWS.

James Madison, President of the United States of America, by General John Coffee, John Rhea, and John McKee, esquires, commissioners on the part of the United States duly authorized for that purpose, on the one part, and the mingoes, leaders, captains, and warriors of the Choctaw nation in general council assembled, in behalf of themselves and the whole nation, on the other part, have entered into the following articles, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be obligatory on both parties:

ARTICLE 1. The Choctaw nation, for the consideration hereafter mentioned, cede to the United States all their title and claim to lands lying east of the following boundary: Beginning at the mouth of Ooktibbuha, the Chickasaw boundary, and running from thence down the Tombigbee river until it intersects the northern boundary of a cession made to the United States by the Choctaws, at Mount Dexter, on the 16th November, 1805.

ART. 2. In consideration of the foregoing cession, the United States engage to pay to the Choctaw nation the sum of six thousand dollars, annually, for twenty years; they also agree to pay them in merchandise, to be delivered immediately on signing the present treaty, the sum of ten thousand dollars.

Done and executed in full and open council at the Choctaw trading-house, this twenty-fourth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, and of the independence of the United States the forty-first.

TREATY WITH THE WINNEBAGOES.

A treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded between William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said States, of the one part, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of that portion of the Winnebago tribe or nation residing on the Ouisconsin river, of the other part.

Whereas the undersigned chiefs and warriors, as well as that portion of the nation which they represent, have separated themselves from the rest of their nation, and reside in a village on the Ouisconsin river, and are desirous of returning to a state of friendly relations with the United States, the parties hereto have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. Every injury or act of hostility committed by one or either of the contracting parties against the other shall be mutually forgiven and forgot; and all the friendly relations that existed between them before the late war shall be, and the same are hereby, renewed.

ART. 2. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and those they represent, do, by these presents, confirm to the United States all and every cession of land heretofore made by their nation to the British, French, or Spanish Governments within the limits of the United States or their territories; and also all and every treaty, contract, and agreement heretofore concluded between the United States and the said tribe or nation, as far as their interest in the same extends.

ART. 3. The undersigned chiefs and warriors as aforesaid, for themselves and those they represent, do hereby acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other nation, power, or sovereign whatsoever.

ART. 4. The aforesaid chiefs and warriors, for themselves and those they represent, do further promise to remain distinct and separate from the rest of their tribe or nation, giving them no aid or assistance whatever, until peace shall also be concluded between the United States and the said tribe or nation.

ART. 5. The contracting parties do hereby agree, promise, and oblige themselves, reciprocally, to deliver up all prisoners now in their hands (by what means soever the same may have come into their possession) to the officer commanding at Prairie du Chien, to be by him restored to the respective parties hereto, as soon as it may be practicable.

In witness whereof, the commissioners aforesaid, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors as aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals this third day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

TREATY WITH THE OTTAWAS, CHIPPEWAS, AND PATTAWATAMIES.

A treaty of peace, friendship, and limits, made and concluded between Ninian Edwards, William Clark, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of said States, of the one part, and the chiefs and warriors of the united tribes of Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies residing on the Illinois and Milwaukee rivers and their waters, and on the southwestern parts of Lake Michigan, of the other part.

Whereas a serious dispute has, for some time past, existed between the contracting parties relative to the right to a part of the lands ceded to the United States by the tribes of Sacs and Foxes on the third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and four, and both parties being desirous of preserving an harmonious and friendly intercourse, and of establishing permanent peace and friendship, have, for the purpose of removing all difficulties, agreed to the following terms:

ARTICLE 1. The said chiefs and warriors, for themselves and the tribes they represent, agree to relinquish, and hereby do relinquish, to the United States, all their right, claim, and title to all the land contained in the before-mentioned cession of the Sacs and Foxes which lies south of a due west line from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river. And they moreover cede to the United States all the land contained within the following bounds, to wit: Beginning on the left bank of the Fox river of Illinois, ten miles above the mouth of said Fox river; thence, running so as to cross Sandy creek ten miles above its mouth; thence, in a direct line, to a point ten miles north of the west end of the Portage, between Chicago creek, which empties into Lake Michigan, and the river Des Plaines, a fork of the Illinois; thence, in a direct line, to a point on Lake Michigan, ten miles northward of the mouth of Chicago creek; thence, along the lake, to a point ten miles southward of the mouth of the said Chicago creek; thence, in a direct line, to a point on the Kankakee, ten miles above its mouth; thence, with the said Kankakee and the Illinois river, to the mouth of Fox river; and thence to the beginning: Provided, nevertheless, That the said tribes shall be permitted to hunt and to fish within the limits of the land hereby relinquished and ceded, so long as it may continue to be the property of the United States.

ART. 2. In consideration of the aforesaid relinquishment and cession, the United States have this day delivered to said tribes a considerable quantity of merchandise, and do agree to pay them, annually, for the term of twelve years, goods to the value of one thousand dollars, reckoning that value at the first cost of the goods in the city or place in which they shall be purchased, without any charge for transportation; which said goods shall be delivered to the said tribes at some place on the Illinois river not lower down than Peoria. And the said United States do moreover agree to relinquish to the said tribes all the land contained in the aforesaid cession of the Sacs and Foxes which lies north of a due west line from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river, except three leagues square at the mouth of the Ouisconsin river, including both banks, and such other tracts on or near to the Ouisconsin and Mississippi rivers as the President of the United States may think proper to reserve: Provided, That such other tracts shall not, in the whole, exceed the quantity that would be contained in five leagues square.

ART. 3. The contracting parties, that peace and friendship may be permanent, promise that, in all things whatever, they will act with justice and correctness towards each other; and that they will, with perfect good faith, fulfil all the obligations imposed upon them by former treaties.

In witness whereof, the said Ninian Edwards, William Clark, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners aforesaid, and the chiefs and warriors of the aforesaid tribes, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals this twenty-fourth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, and of the independence of the United States the forty-first.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 3, 1816.

Difficulties having arisen in surveying the public lands upon the Wabash, from the vague terms in which boundaries of the cession have been described, or from the interested and improper views of some of the chiefs of the various tribes from whom the cession was obtained, the President has determined to remove them by amicable discussions and explanations, and by giving them an equivalent for the claims or pretensions which they still set up to some part of the lands in question. To accomplish this desirable object, he has directed me to place at your disposition the sum of five thousand dollars, over and above their annuities, which you are authorized to distribute to them for the purpose of conciliating the various tribes from whom the purchase was originally made, and such other tribes as may be present who lay any species of claim to these lands. It is not judged expedient to suffer the validity of the treaties which made the cession to be in any manner called into question; but if there is no difficulty of obtaining a general recognition of them on the part of all the tribes, it may not be improper to reduce their acknowledgment into the form of a treaty, attended with the accustomed solemnities. In the communications which you make to them, they must be distinctly made to understand that this measure has proceeded alone from the justice, moderation, and friendly disposition of the President towards them. It is of great importance that they should be thoroughly convinced that the liberality of the President in this case has not proceeded from any apprehension of their arms. The difference between the strength and resources of the United States, compared with the whole body of Indians, must convince the reflecting part of their warriors that apprehension of Indian aggression can never enter into the views of the President in negotiating with them. Nothing could be more fatal to the Indian race than an impression of this nature. At the same time, it is desirable that they should be deeply impressed with the views of justice, moderation, and benevolence by which the councils of the President are regulated towards his Indian neighbors. The President relies upon your zeal, talents, and discretion in conducting this negotiation, and making those impressions upon the Indian chiefs which are equally necessary to their own welfare and to the interest of the United States.

The people of the Indiana Territory have petitioned the President to make an effort to extinguish the Indian title to a district of country lying contiguous to the land in question. Whilst the President is disposed to gratify the wishes of the petitioners, and is solicitous to promote the growth and prosperity of the Territory in which they reside, he is unwilling to press the Indian tribes for cessions of land which they are not disposed to sell. Their dispositions upon this point may be soured, but importunity is to be avoided.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

P. S. As the goods which have been ordered on for the annuities of the Indian tribes who are to be convened on the 22d instant will not arrive in time, you are authorized to draw upon the Department for the amount specified in the foregoing instructions.

W. H. C.

BENJAMIN PARKE, and FIDELIO C. SHARP,

Commissioners to hold a treaty with certain tribes of Indians at Fort Harrison, Ind. T.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 7, 1816.

Your several letters on the subject of Indian negotiation have been received, and submitted to the President. The idea of obtaining cessions of land from distant tribes of Indians, as the consideration for granting them annuities, as has been done with those more immediately in our neighborhood, has been deliberately examined. Considering the vast extent of country to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and which is now ready to be offered for sale and settlement, the public interest, so far as the demand for land is in question, does not require any additional cessions from the Indians. The situation of particular States or Territories may render it expedient to extinguish the Indian title to certain districts of country, with the view of making the settlement more compact, or for other local purposes. Cessions from distant tribes cannot be considered desirable in any point of view. Our settlements are already extended greatly beyond what the public interest requires. The propensity of our frontier settlers to spread over the surface of every cession, however distant, affords an additional inducement to decline them. Should this disposition be restrained by the timely vigilance of the Government, the lapse of time between the cession and the actual settlement will, as in the case of the lands now surveying on the Wabash, give rise to disputes with the tribes making the cession, or with their neighbors who may have conflicting claims to the lands. Every offer of this kind must, therefore, be declined. It may be expedient to engage to make them annual presents, according to the number and character of their respective tribes. Perhaps the better mode will be to give them assurances that their situation will be correctly represented to the President, who will direct that an allowance shall be made to them, annually, according to their numbers and wants.

As the validity of the Illinois cession is contested by some of the Indian tribes who have used it as a hunting ground, the President has directed me to instruct you to use your best endeavors to quiet these claims. This may be done by giving them presents in consideration of their relinquishment of their supposed right to the land in question, or it may be effected by the stipulation to pay them an annual stipend proportioned to the colorable title which may be supposed to exist. Should the nations who originally ceded the lands set up any kind of claim to it, their demands should be promptly repelled; but presents may be given them in case of their acquiescence in the original cession. As this cession is very extensive, and greatly exceeds the demands for lands in that quarter, and would withhold, if settled, produce the necessity of establishing another Territorial Government, and give rise to a small settlement in the Indiana Territory, separated by an immense distance from the inhabited parts of the Territory, the President has deemed it expedient to offer, as an equivalent for the relinquishment of any conflicting claim to those lands, the recession of such parts as lie north of the northern line of the State of Ohio, extending westwardly to the Mississippi river, and east of the western boundary of the Indiana Territory. In tendering this cession, a reservation for a military post at the mouth of the Ouisconsin, including both banks of the river, must be made, and such other reservations for the same object as your knowledge of the country to be receded may render necessary. The relinquishment of all Indian title to the lands south and west of the lines above defined, in consideration of the proposed recession, will be more acceptable to the President than if obtained by purchase. Considering the extent of the country proposed to be receded, there is every reason to believe that the various tribes exhibiting claims to it will readily acquiesce in the proposition. Should the proposition be rejected, you will then proceed to the discussion of the consideration which it will be proper to give them. The slight degree of information possessed by the Department precludes any precise instruction as to the amount of the consideration which ought to be given. This is left to your discretion. It is conceived that you had better err on the side of liberality, taking into view the nature and validity of their respective claims. Twenty thousand dollars have been ordered to St. Louis, to be placed at your disposition, to be distributed in presents to the various tribes with whom you may have to treat. This sum is exclusive of the consideration which you may find it necessary to promise for the purpose of quieting Indian claims to the Illinois purchase. Should the tribes inhabiting the country between the cession and the southwestern margin of Lake Michigan present themselves, you are required to sound their disposition to cede a district of country which will connect the lake with the Illinois purchase. This cession would be of immense importance, and should be obtained, if practicable, at any expense, either of recession or purchase. In all other cases, importunity to cede is expressly interdicted.

It is not known whether any other tribes claiming the margin of the lake will attend the approaching negotiation. The instruction is given on the ground that they may possibly attend.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

Messrs. CLARK, EDWARDS, and CHOUTEAU, St. Louis.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 27, 1816.

Your communication of the 29th ultimo has been received, and submitted to the President.

The conduct of the Cherokees, in referring their dispute with the Osages to the decision of the officers of the United States, deserves and has received the decided approbation of the President.

Under all the circumstances of the case, the course which you have adopted seems to be judicious, and such as will most probably produce the desired effect.

If you have not already adopted measures necessary for convening the chiefs of those tribes as well as of the Quapaws, it is deemed expedient that steps should be promptly taken to effect that object.

If the Quapaws have claims to the lands ceded to the United States, and it should appear that their claim is well founded, it should be admitted; or an equivalent given for it, either by the payment of a gross sum, by an annuity for a term of years, or in perpetuity. Perhaps an annuity for a certain number of years will be the most eligible mode.

Whilst negotiating with the Osage tribe, provision should be made for running the lines of the cession made by them to the United States.

If it is thought expedient, as you have intimated, to change the boundaries of that treaty, it will be necessary to explain to this Department, without delay, the nature and effect of the change contemplated, and the reasons which are supposed to require it.

It is deemed by the President inexpedient to obtain cessions of land from the Indians which are not required for settlement. Experience has proved the extreme difficulty of preventing persons from making settlements upon the most remote points of every cession before the land is offered for sale, by which the whole frontier is rendered utterly inadequate to its protection against Indian warfare.

The adjustment of the Cherokee claim to the settlements they have made under the permission given them by Mr. Jefferson will necessarily occupy your attention. It is difficult to give precise instructions upon this subject. In deciding upon it, you must keep in view the fact that the Cherokee nation refuse to make any cession of their lands in consideration of the settlements which have been assigned to their countrymen. This may have proceeded, in some degree, from a knowledge that no lands had been specifically assigned to the Cherokee emigrants by the United States. In any arrangements of this kind, there ought to be an express provision that an assignment should not be binding upon the United States, unless the same extent of country should be ceded by the Cherokees who have not emigrated, or at least an extent of country equal to what the emigrants would be entitled to upon an equal partition of their lands, according to their relative numbers.

In arranging the various interests which will have to be considered in the negotiations which you are authorized to enter into with the Osages, Quapaws, and Cherokees, the President has implicit confidence in your discretion, and in your zeal for the public service.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

To WILLIAM CLARK, NINIAN EDWARDS, and AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU, St. Louis, M. T.

SIR:

St. Louis, June 30, 1816.

We have the honor to inform you that we are now endeavoring, by all the means in our power, to effectuate the objects authorized by your instructions of the 27th ultimo, in relation to the Cherokees and Osages. The principal cause of hostility between those tribes is, that the latter suppose the former to have settled upon their lands; which, indeed, would appear to be the case, if any published map that we have seen is to be relied upon. This is, however, generally thought to be a matter of considerable doubt and uncertainty; and General Rector, (the public surveyor for this and the Illinois Territory,) judging from lines which he has heretofore caused to be run, entertains a different opinion. It is evident, therefore, that no satisfactory adjustment can take place until the fact in controversy can be ascertained by running the line of the Osage purchase from the Missouri to the Arkansas. For this purpose we have made application to General Rector, who has promised to have the line run as soon as the Osages can be notified to attend, agreeably to the treaty between them and the United States. He, however, having no instructions upon the subject, and knowing that that line could not be run for the price usually allowed for surveying, would not undertake it without our previously agreeing to be eventually responsible for all necessary expenses, and an adequate compensation to the gentleman to be employed. We, therefore, hope that such instructions and authority may be given to him as has been usual heretofore in similar cases. Our former suggestion, that an alteration in the line of the Osage cession might be expedient, was made under the impression that the settlements of the Cherokees might be found to be on the Osage lands; and as their improvements are considerable and really valuable, and have been made upon land pointed out to them by a public agent of the Government, we thought it would be just to make such a purchase, if it should be found to be necessary, as would include their settlements; but if this measure (supposing those Indians to be actually on the land of the Osages) should not be deemed advisable by the President, it will then be a question for his consideration whether good faith does not require that the Government, with whose apparent approbation they settled, should take immediate measures for their removal from the lands of the Osages, and, in that event, whether some compensation ought not to be made them for the losses they would thereby sustain. The Quapaws are said to claim the lands on the south side of the Arkansas, including a part of the Cherokee settlements; and have the same dispute with the Cherokees on that side which the Osages are supposed to have on the north side. As your letter seems to forbid any purchases of lands from the Indians which are not required for settlement, we should be happy to receive the President's instructions upon the above-mentioned cases as early as possible.

Referring to your letter of the 7th ultimo, we beg leave respectfully to suggest it as our opinion that you are mistaken in supposing that any part of the Illinois purchase lies within the Indiana Territory, and that the quantity of land contained in that cession, "which lies north of the northern line of the State of Ohio, extending westwardly to the Mississippi river," will fall greatly short of your expectations, as will appear by Governor Edwards's map, which we understand has been transmitted to you, and which we think more correct than any other that has been made of that country. We have thought it our duty to make these suggestions from a belief that our instructions, in part, have been predicated upon a misapprehension; of which it is best, at all events, that you should be informed. We shall, however, use our best endeavors to execute the President's wishes upon the subject.

We have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your most obedient servants,

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUG. CHOUTEAU.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 13, 1816.

Your communication of the 5th of July has been submitted to the President, and I am instructed to inform you that you are authorized to accept of the property which has been delivered up by the Sacs of Rock river as a fulfilment on their part of those stipulations of the treaty relative to the delivery of property.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Chief Clerk.

Messrs. CLARK, EDWARDS, and CHOUTEAU, Commissioners, &c., St. Louis.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 17, 1816.

Your letter of the 30th of June last has been received and submitted to the consideration of the President. It is expedient, in every point of view, that the line of the Osage purchase should be run and marked from the Missouri to the Arkansas. You are hereby authorized to engage to pay such extra expenses for running that line as shall appear to you to be reasonable and just, limiting the same by a maximum which shall not be exceeded in any event. The importance of accomplishing this service without delay renders it necessary that your engagements should be definitive, without consulting the Department upon the maximum to be determined. Economy ought to be strictly adhered to, which is too frequently departed from in every transaction in which the Government is concerned.

Upon the subject of an eventual cession from the Osages or Quapaws becoming necessary to secure the Cherokee emigrants in their possessions, no precise instructions can be given. Those settlements were made upon an understanding which has never been fulfilled, or even acknowledged, by the Cherokee nation since that period. On the contrary, when urged upon that point last winter, they rejected the idea of exchange of lands in consideration for those upon which their emigrant brethren had settled, and said that they should be compelled to return and live with the nation. They even refused to consider them as entitled to any part of the annuities payable to the Cherokees.

This subject has been referred to the commissioners now holding a treaty in the Chickasaw nation with the four southern tribes. Should the condition upon which the settlements upon the Arkansas were founded be recognised by the nation, it will then become the duty of the United States to provide permanently for those emigrants by securing them in the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. Should the nation, however, persevere in the sentiments by which their deputation was animated last winter, all obligation on the part of the United States is extinguished. To their own nation they must look for indemnity for any losses which they may sustain in consequence of their emigration. The United States cannot be bound if the conditions on the other part are violated. The result of the pending negotiation will remove all doubt on the subject, either by releasing us from all obligations, or by defining the extent of the duties imposed upon us in relation to the settlers upon the Arkansas.

It is very probable that the Illinois cession may not extend eastwardly as far as the Indiana line, but it is so laid down in our maps. It is highly probable that Governor Edwards's map of the Illinois Territory may be more correct than those in our possession, especially in the delineation of the lower part of the river of that name; but there is reason to believe that even that map does not afford materials sufficiently accurate to form any conclusive opinion upon as to the extent of the cession either eastwardly or northwardly. If that cession can be extended to the southern or western margin of Lake Michigan, by relinquishing that which lies north of the northern line of Ohio, reserving certain military sites, there can be no doubt of the utility of such an exchange. The views of the President on this subject have undergone no change. If Governor Edwards's map is accurate as to the mouth of Fox river, there will be but little probability of extending the cession to the shores of the Michigan, in consideration of the relinquishment of our title to the northern extremity of the Illinois purchase. If this should be found impracticable, any exchange which will tend to render our acquisitions in that quarter more compact, and at the same time bring us nearer the lake shore, will be acceptable to the President. The determination to purchase land only when demanded for settlement will form the settled policy of the Government. Experience has sufficiently proven that our population will spread over any cession, however extensive, before it can be brought into market, and before there is any regular and steady demand for settlement; thereby increasing the difficulty of protection, embarrassing the Government by broils with the natives, and rendering the execution of the laws regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes utterly impracticable.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

General WILLIAM CLARK,
Governor N. EDWARDS, and
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU, Esq.
Commissioners, &c., St. Louis.

Sir:

WASHINGTON CITY, April 17, 1816.

The undersigned consider it their duty to draw the attention of the Executive to the situation of the State of Tennessee, which they have the honor to represent, in regard to the Indian claim still existing to lands within its chartered limits.

The western section of the State, embracing its whole width from north to south, and from the Mississippi to the Tennessee river, and towards the southern part of the State across the latter river to the river Elk, containing about eight millions of acres, is claimed by the Chickasaw Indians; none of whom, it is believed, reside thereon, and few, if any, use it even as hunting grounds, as the game is understood to be chiefly destroyed. A great portion of this tract was granted by the State of North Carolina to individuals more than twenty-five years ago, whose rights are guaranteed to the holders by the act of cession made by that State of the territory now composing the State of Tennessee to the United States.

The undersigned forbear to dwell on the great inconvenience and loss which individual claimants experience by being deprived of the use and benefit of their lands for so many years, as well as the risk they run of losing them entirely on account of not being able to identify their boundaries, by reason of the landmarks being destroyed by time and accidents.

The southeastern section of the State, extending across the Tennessee river, and reaching to the heart of the present settlements, containing nearly four millions of acres, a part of which has also been granted to individuals in the manner above stated, is claimed by the Cherokees, few of whom reside thereon, especially north of the Tennessee river, and the game is said to be so destroyed as to be of little or no value.

Thus circumstanced, nearly half her territory incumbered with Indian claims, and excluded from settlement, the State of Tennessee has looked with anxiety, but at the same time with confidence, to the National Government, in the expectation that it would in due time adopt the requisite measures to effect the extinction of those claims, and thereby give expansion to her settlements, as well as enable individuals to get possession of their just rights. During a state of war with a powerful enemy, when the undivided resources of the nation as well as the attention of the Government might be required to vindicate her rights and avenge her wrongs, Tennessee forbore to press her claims on this head; but, on the return of peace, the restoration of our affairs to their usual tranquillity, and of our finances to a flourishing condition, she feels herself authorized to bring the subject to the immediate view of the General Government, that it may receive the consideration to which it is conceived to be justly entitled.

The undersigned, therefore, entertain the hope that, for the purpose of effecting the extinction of those Indian claims, (an object so much desired by the State they represent,) it may accord with the Executive views of propriety to direct such treaty or treaties to be held with the Chickasaw and Cherokee nations of Indians as the occasion may require, and at such times and places as may be considered most convenient to the parties concerned.

The undersigned have the honor, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 4, 1816.

The uncertainty of the boundaries of the Creek cession to the west has rendered it necessary to hold treaties with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations for the adjustment of the dividing line between the United States and those tribes. For this purpose, General John Coffee, John Rhea, and John McKee, esquires, have been authorized to negotiate with the former of those tribes.

To effect the same object with the Chickasaws, the President has appointed General Andrew Jackson, the honorable Jesse Franklin, of North Carolina, and yourself.

By the next mail you will receive more precise instructions upon the measures preparatory to the opening of the negotiation, and, in due time, those which shall regulate your conduct in effecting the object confided to your management.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

General DAVID MERIWETHER, Athens, Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 1, 1816.

Lest any mistake should be committed in relation to the point called the Flat or Shining Rock in the Cherokee and other Indian treaties, it is proper to inform you that it is on Bear creek; and this is the corner of the Chickasaw possessions, according to the evidence produced by that nation. From this point their line, according to the same evidence, runs to the Long Leaf Pine, which falls into the Black Warrior.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

WILLIAM BARNETT, Huntsville, Mississippi Territory.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 5, [3,] 1816.

The difficulty of satisfactorily arranging with the Chickasaw deputation, during their visit to Washington, the western boundary of the cession made by the Creek Indians to the United States in 1814, arising as well from the nature of the evidence produced, as from the uncertainty always found in the definition of Indian boundaries, has induced the President to determine upon holding a treaty for the purpose of definitively settling all territorial controversies with that nation.

To this course the President has the more readily inclined, from the consideration that the powers of the deputation, though ample for the particular object contemplated, were, so far as the question of territory was concerned, specially limited to the settlement of boundary according to existing rights. In treating directly with the nation, whose power is unlimited, the question of boundary may be equitably arranged by mutual concessions of the lands in controversy, or by the relinquishment of all claims by the one party for a consideration to be paid by the other, proportioned to the extent of the country in dispute, and to the nature of the evidence by which the title is supported. The evidence in the present case, depending wholly upon tradition, unconnected with records, or charts, or marked lines, cannot be expected to convince either of the parties of the nullity of their respective titles. From this view of the subject, it is manifest that the controversy can be adjusted only by a spirit of conciliation and compromise, or by an appeal to force. Justice and sound policy equally forbid that this appeal should be made or provoked by the United States. The consideration that the weakness of one of the parties may insure submission to whatever decision shall be made, without regard to its correctness, so far from releasing the other from the obligations of justice, makes a forcible appeal to its magnanimity, which cannot be disregarded without loss of national character.

This consideration, however, does not require that the just rights and true interests of the nation should be impaired, much less sacrificed. The great value of the possessions of this tribe, compared with the smallness of its population, and the manifest interest which it has to increase its annuity by the sale of a part of its lands, will justify the Government in pressing the claim which it derives from the Creek cession, with the view to obtain the relinquishment of their claim to the lands in dispute for a fair consideration. It is believed that the true interests of both parties will be promoted by the adoption of this policy.

The President expects that the negotiation confided to your discretion will be conducted upon these principles. In conformity with this view of the subject, your efforts will be at first directed to obtain the relinquishment of the Chickasaw title to the lands claimed by them, which are understood to be comprehended within a line running from the Flat or Shining Rock, on Bear creek, to the ridge dividing the waters which fall into the Black Warrior from those of the Tombigbee river; thence, along the ridge, to a point due east of the mouth of Tibby creek; thence, directly to the mouth of that creek; thence, up the Tombigbee river, to the Cotton Gin Port; thence, along the line run by General Coffee, to its intersection of the Cherokee line defined by the late treaty. The importance of the territory comprehended within these limits is not to be estimated by the intrinsic value of the lands. The title to the territory in question gives us the undisputed navigation of the Tombigbee river to the Cotton Gin Port, which is the highest point of unobstructed navigation upon that river; it being expected that the negotiations set on foot with the Choctaw nation will terminate in the acknowledgment of the Tombigbee river as the boundary between that tribe and the United States. Considering the importance of the navigation of this river, in every point of view, no consideration which it may be necessary to give will be considered exorbitant which does not very far exceed the rate at which purchases of Indian lands have been heretofore made. Should it be found necessary to give a very unusual price, the reason for giving it should be fully explained, in order to preclude the expectation that like prices will be given hereafter for lands differently situated. Should you succeed in obtaining this relinquishment, various other objects will demand your attention. The agent of the Cherokee nation has been directed to renew to that tribe the offer made to their deputation last winter, to purchase their claim to the lands lying west of the Chickasaw old fields, and which are also claimed by the Chickasaws. He has also been directed to effect the purchase of all the Cherokee lands lying north of the Tennessee river, if the nation is disposed to make the sale. Should these offers be rejected, he has been directed to urge the nation to give to the deputation which shall be sent to the Chickasaw treaty full power to treat upon these subjects. In either event, you are required to make every proper exertion to obtain from them, jointly or severally, as the circumstances may require, the cession of this district of country. The difficulty of settling the conflicting claims of these two tribes will probably facilitate the execution of the first part of the duty here enjoined. The little value of the Cherokee lands lying north of the Tennessee river will probably render the second part more easy. As these cessions will connect the settlements of Tennessee with those upon the Gulf of Mexico, and as this connexion is considered an object of great importance to the general interests, you will, in fixing the price, be governed by the rules prescribed in the preceding case. Should your efforts in this respect be unsuccessful, or should the Cherokees not only have refused the offers directed to be made by the agent, but also have refused to invest their deputation with the necessary authority upon these subjects, you will endeavor to obtain, by convention, the free navigation of Bear creek, with an authority to construct a road from the highest navigable point upon that stream to the Cotton Gin Port, on the Tombigbee river, and also such other roads as your knowledge of the localities of the country shall induce you to think necessary. Perhaps the best mode of disposing of this subject will be to provide, generally, for the opening of such roads through that part of the Indian country as the President shall, from time to time, judge necessary. The toll to be received at the ferries or bridges to be established, not only upon these roads, but upon those already in use, should be regulated by treaty, in order the more effectually to guard against unjust exactions, and the vexatious disputes which necessarily result from them.

The extinguishment of the Chickasaw title to the lands lying in the Great Bend of the Tennessee river has long been an object of desire to the inhabitants of the western parts of Tennessee and Kentucky. The fertility of the soil, and the excellent navigation which that river affords from the foot of the Muscle Shoals to its junction with the Ohio, render the acquisition of this tract of country of great importance to the United States. The advantages of a natural boundary such as the Tennessee river should not be entirely overlooked by either of the parties. Under this view of the subject, the President has determined that an effort shall be made to obtain from the Chickasaw nation the cession of this valuable body of land. The consideration to be given for this cession is submitted to your discretion, with the single observation, that, as the inducements to make this purchase are believed to be inferior to those which operate in the case of the lands lying between the Tennessee river and the Creek cession, it is expected that the price of the latter will be lower than the former, the comparative extent and value of the tracts being kept in view.

It is probable that you will not be able to accomplish all these objects at the approaching negotiation. The extent and value of the cessions which you are directed to obtain, if practicable, so far exceed those which have been heretofore made by that nation, that there is some reason to apprehend that the feelings of the chiefs may be shocked at the policy which these demands may be supposed to disclose. Under these circumstances, it is with some degree of reluctance that the President feels it necessary to direct that propositions be made to them for the purchase of that part of their hunting grounds lying within the State of Kentucky. Respect to the feelings of that State, manifested by their Senators and Representatives in an application for that purpose, requires that an effort should be made to accomplish their wishes, unless the disposition of the nation should be discovered to be so adverse to it as to render it, in your opinion, injudicious to urge the subject. If the cession shall be obtained, the purchase money will have to be paid by the State of Kentucky. The validity of the treaty will, therefore, depend upon its ratification by that State.

If, in the progress of your negotiations, it shall be discovered that any one of the cessions directed to be obtained can be more easily effected than another, you are authorized to change the order in which they are to be pressed, except the cessions lying south of the Tennessee river. It is possible that the cession of the lands lying in the State of Kentucky may be more easily obtained than that of the lands in the Bend of Tennessee, as those lands are more distant from the Chickasaw settlements. The same consideration may possibly induce that nation to cede a tract of country lying immediately south of the Kentucky line, and extending from the settlements to the Mississippi river, in lieu of the lands lying in the Bend of the Tennessee. If the Cherokees cede their lands lying north of the Tennessee, a part of the consideration will have to be paid by the State of Tennessee. It is expedient that the proportion be fixed by the treaty, which will be valid only upon the ratification by the United States and by the State of Tennessee. Your knowledge of the relative value of the lands belonging to the parties will enable you to appportion the consideration to be paid equitably between them.

Although the cessions which you are required to obtain, if practicable, excite well-founded apprehensions that the views of the Government will not be fully realized, yet there are many considerations which, when properly understood and duly appreciated, forcibly unite in recommending, on the part of the Chickasaws, an acquiescence in the demands which you are required to press. Their deputation, in their recent visit to this place, have requested that English schools may be established among them, for the purpose of more effectually introducing the arts of civilized life, and of forming the habits necessary to that state of being. They all united in ascribing the little progress which had been made by them in the arts of husbandry to their incapacity to obtain ploughs, and the other necessary instruments and utensils. A cession of a considerable portion of their unoccupied lands, while on the one hand it will attest the sincerity of their desire, will, on the other, tend to hasten the accomplishment of that desirable object. On the one hand, it will diminish the temptation to waste in the chase the time which could be more profitably employed in husbandry, and, on the other, furnish the means of prosecuting their agricultural labors with the greatest success. Blessed with a fertile soil, a mild and salubrious climate, and supplied with the necessary implements of husbandry, a slight degree of labor will be sufficient to procure them not only the necessities but the comforts of life. Ease and comfort cannot fail to produce a considerable increase in their population, and rapidly destroy all reliance for subsistence upon the chase. Until the propensity for the chase be checked, until the enterprise of the nation receive a different direction, great and beneficial changes in their situation cannot be expected. Their chiefs are capable of understanding this reasoning. If they are sincere in the desires which they have expressed, of aspiring to the honorable character of American citizens, they will use their influence with the nation to make the cessions required of them.

If the cessions are obtained, the payment of the consideration should be regulated by the progressive improvements contemplated to result from the receipt of annuities sufficient to supply them not only with all the utensils of agriculture, but with many of the comforts of civilized life. At present, they are poor and destitute of almost every thing necessary to render them comfortable. Their immediate wants may be supplied in the form of presents, whilst their future necessities will be regularly supplied by the payment of a yearly stipend. In determining the amount of this stipend, the compensation for each cession may be put in the form of an annuity, decreasing every ten or five years, in the proportion of ten, eight, six, four, and three, and to cease altogether at the end of fifty years, when it may be presumed civilized habits will have rendered this resource unnecessary. Should a longer term be absolutely insisted on, the lowest annuity may be protracted; but it is extremely desirable to avoid a perpetuity, unless it be essential to the accomplishment of the main object.

If, contrary to this well-founded expectation, the tribe, instead of advancing in the arts of civilization, should retrograde, and dwindle in its population, the diminished rate of its annuity will probably continue to bear nearly the same proportion to its wants as when first stipulated. In every point of view, therefore, it is desirable that the annuity agreed upon should be greatest during the first years of its enjoyment, and that it should gradually diminish to a small amount, if not entirely cease, at a given period of time. This system will be favorable to the extinguishment of their title to such portion of their unsettled lands as may become indispensable to the United States in the progress of their population.

In the management of the various and delicate interests involved in the negotiation confided to your discretion and talents, the President places the most unbounded reliance. A variety of considerations and arguments, which it is impossible to embrace in these instructions, will necessarily arise from the discussions in which you will be engaged, which, judiciously wielded, will enable you to remove the objections urged by the nation, and secure a compliance with the views of the Government.

Your authority to make presents pending the negotiation, and after its termination, is limited only by your discretion, subject to the rules laid down in relation to the consideration to be given for each particular cession.

After having secured as many of the objects confided to your care in this negotiation as can be obtained without exciting the jealousy or alarming the fears of the nation, you are required to use your best endeavors to settle in an amicable manner all disputes between the Indian tribes represented in the negotiation, relative to their respective boundaries. If it is believed by you to be expedient that the boundaries to be settled should be marked under the authority of the United States, provision to that effect may be made in the convention which you are authorized to make upon that subject, if it be not objected to on the part of the Indians. In the event of a stipulation of this nature, one or more of the topographical engineers will be employed, according to the circumstances of the case.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

Major General ANDREW JACKSON,
General DAVID MERIWETHER, and
JESSE FRANKLIN, Esq.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 5, 1816.

On the 3d instant I had the honor to forward to Nashville the instructions for the government of your conduct in the negotiation upon which you are required to enter with the Chickasaw nation, and with such deputation as may be sent for that purpose by the Cherokees.

The views of the President having been fully developed in these instructions, I have but little to add in this letter. It is expected that your conduct will be conciliatory, and calculated to inspire the nation with a just sense of the equity and magnanimity of the conduct of the Government towards them.

From the extensive powers with which you are vested, the most beneficial consequences are anticipated; the wants of the Indians, and the conflicting claims of the Chickasaws and Cherokees, cannot fail to facilitate the accomplishment of the first two objects of your instructions. Should the others fail, although it will be the subject of regret, yet the interests of the nation will not be sensibly affected by it.

In relation to these questions, you will press or relax your efforts to secure any one of them a preference to another, according to the dispositions manifested by the Indians.

It is impossible to decide, before the experiment is made, whether they will be more disposed to cede the lands in the Bend of Tennessee in preference to the northern extremity of their possessions. It is necessary to observe that the claim of the Cherokees to the lands lying in the Bend of Tennessee have been relinquished to the United States.

The treaty of the 28th of November, 1785, held by Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, James Martin, and Lachlan McIntosh, recognises the Cherokee claim to those lands; and the treaty held a few months afterwards by the same commissioners with the Chickasaws does not exclude them in the definition of Chickasaw boundary. The letters patent, signed by General Washington, then President, in the year 1794, is the first recognition of their title to the lands in question. It is presumed that you will be able to procure copies of those treaties; if not, they will be forwarded to you.

Enclosed is evidence furnished by the Chickasaw nation, which shows that the Flat or Shining Rock referred to in some of our Indian treaties, and which is one of their corners, is a point different from the Long Leaf Pine, and that it runs from the one to the other.

The Chickasaw deputation have complained of their want of confidence in Colonel Cocke, the present agent, and have requested that another might be sent to them. There is some reason to doubt whether the deputation have correctly represented the will of the nation in this case. The President is desirous of ascertaining the truth, and has directed me to instruct you to inquire into the fact before you close the negotiations. It is desirable that this part of your duty should be executed with a proper regard to the feelings of Colonel Cocke. It is necessary that the agent should possess the confidence of the nation; if he has lost it, the public interest requires that another agent should be selected. In this measure, the reputation of the preceding agent will not be involved, as the inquiry is simply to ascertain whether he possesses the confidence of the nation in a sufficient degree to be useful to the Government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Major Gen. ANDREW JACKSON,
General DAVID MERIWETHER, and
JESSE FRANKLIN, Esq.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 5, 1816.

Since my letter of the 24th of May, it has been determined to make a more strenuous effort to obtain the lands lying between the Cherokee line and the Tennessee river, both from the Chickasaws and Cherokees, than was at that time contemplated.

In consequence of this determination, you are authorized to suspend the removal of the settlers upon those lands until the result of the negotiation with the Chickasaws shall be known. This delay will at least give them time to make their crops, and provide for the next year's subsistence.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Major Gen. ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

CHICKASAW AGENCY, July 17, 1816.

I yesterday received your letter, dated at Nashville, July 7th, and am very glad to hear of your return from the Seminoles, but am sorry to find that you were in bad health. You inform me that you have been appointed by our father the President of the United States to act as a commissioner to treat with the Chickasaw nation for the purchase or exchange of land; in answer to which I beg leave to inform you that, at a council held at my house on the 13th instant, the subject of selling or exchanging land was discussed, and it was determined by the chiefs then present that the Chickasaw nation had no lands to sell or exchange whatever. I have also to state that the warriors of this nation have been very much dissatisfied with the chiefs ever since the treaty held with you in 1816, on account of the land then sold by them. The Chickasaw nation will, however, be very happy to meet you, and to hear what you have to say to them, at whatever time you may think proper to appoint; but the chiefs would wish the place of meeting to be somewhere in the centre of the nation, as the warriors would not like any treaty to be held on the frontier. Respecting the time appointed by you for my coming to see you at the mouth of Cypress, I am sorry to say that the time is too short, as I am this day to set out on a journey to the Choctaw nation, where I shall be five or six days, for the purpose of settling our boundary line with the Choctaws. I would rather you would fix the time of meeting for the 5th of August, (if convenient to you,) when I shall be at the mouth of Cypress, and I expect some of the headmen will be there too, as I shall invite them to go with me; we can there arrange the time and place for holding the treaty with the nation.

In answer to what you say relative to the money due the nation as stipulated by the treaty, I have to inform you it has not been received, and the nation are daily looking anxiously for it. We have been told that, upon the return of Col. Butler, the money will be immediately paid us through the hands of our agent, Col. Henry Sherburne, who is now with us. I have now only to express my best wishes, &c.

Major Gen. ANDREW JACKSON.

JAMES COLBERT,
United States Interpreter.

SIR:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, NASHVILLE, July 19, 1816.

Your letter of the 5th instant, and the instructions of the same date which are to govern the commissioners in the treaty ordered to be held with the Chickasaws, are this moment received. I have, by express, ordered Captain Allen to suspend the order of the 27th of May, for the removal of the intruders and destruction of their improvements, until further ordered.

The instructions to the commissioners are ample, and I have a sanguine hope that the Cherokees, under present circumstances, will yield, for a moderate compensation, all claim to the lands south of the Tennessee, so important for national defence and the protection of our frontier.

I have very little doubt but the Chickasaws will also feel it their interest and policy to surrender all claim to the lands south of the Tennessee included within the lines run by General Coffee, for a very moderate sum; however, as far as my exertions and influence can be useful, they will be employed to obtain this all-important object. I suppose the agent for the Chickasaws has been instructed to convene the chiefs on the 1st of September, and to lay in supplies for them during the convention. I take this for granted, as there is nothing said on this subject by you. I also presume that a secretary is to be allowed to the commissioners, with the usual salary.

I am, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. Wm. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, NASHVILLE, July 20, 1816.

From a full consideration of the instructions by which we are to be governed in holding the treaty ordered with the Chickasaws, it may be necessary, in the course of the negotiation, to make the chiefs some presents; it is therefore necessary to be advised from what source they are to be drawn, and also out of what fund the contingent expenses are to be paid, and by whom the necessary supplies for the commission are to be furnished.

With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General,
Commanding Division of the South.

Hon. Wm. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 5, 1816.

Your letters of the 19th and 20th ultimo are received. Mr. Franklin will probably be with you before the receipt of this. From General Meriwether we have received no answer to the several communications that have been made to him. Mr. Cocks, the Chickasaw agent, was advised on the 26th of June that the commissioners would meet at the Chickasaw council-house on the 1st of September; and Major Colbert, who was then here, informed us that abundant supplies of provisions could be furnished by the nation. I shall write to Mr. Cocks, who will be charged with procuring the supplies of provisions, by this mail. As it was doubtful whether goods at this season could be transported in time for the treaty, none were ordered. The commissioners are authorized to draw on this Department for such sums as may be found necessary, either on account of contingent expenses, or on account of such presents as they may think proper to make to the chiefs. Some particular articles might be procured at Nashville, but I suspect that money would generally have more influence among those Indians than goods.

The commissioners will appoint their own secretary, who will be allowed five dollars a day, exclusive of his necessary expenses.

A regular commission will be forwarded to you this week; it has been delayed as well on account of the uncertainty of your acceptance, as from an expectation of hearing by every mail from General Meriwether. Should he not accept, Mr. F. Sharp, of Kentucky, will be appointed to fill the vacancy. No delay, however, will be occasioned by such a change, as the commissioners are authorized to act jointly or severally.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Chief Clerk.

Gen. ANDREW JACKSON.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 10, 1816.

Enclosed you will receive an extract of a letter from the agent of the United States in the Cherokee nation, from which it is conjectured you will receive some aid in accomplishing the objects of your mission. It is presumed that Colonel Meigs has furnished you with the information which it contains, as it will necessarily have some influence upon the negotiations with which you are charged.

The commissioners for running the lines of the Creek cession have represented that the Chickasaw nation have remonstrated against the running and marking of the line designated in the Cherokee convention as infringing upon their rights.

Although it is manifest that they have no interest in the matter, as the Cherokee claim to the lands north of that line will not receive any additional force from that event, nor the Chickasaw claim to the south of it be in any degree weakened, yet, as the negotiations with which you are charged may make the running of a part of that line unnecessary, they have been directed to postpone their operations until the result of your efforts shall be known. They have also been instructed to run and mark any line connected with the Creek purchase which may be made necessary by the treaty or treaties which you may conclude, without waiting for further directions from this Department. To enable them to fulfil this duty with the least possible delay, you are required to furnish them with a definition of the lines which it shall be their duty to run pursuant to their instructions.

It will be proper to stipulate for the attendance of Indian commissioners for the purpose of marking the lines, and that immediately after the termination of the negotiations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

General A. JACKSON,
General D. MERIWETHER, and
J. FRANKLIN, Esq.,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Commissioners, &c., Chickasaw Agency.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 10, 1816.

Your communication of the 13th ultimo, covering the address of the Chickasaw nation remonstrating against running the line designated by the Cherokee treaty, has been received.

Although it is not conceived that the running of that line can in any degree affect the claims of that nation, whatever they may be, yet, as it is probable that the result of the negotiations now pending in the Chickasaw nation may change the line in question, there is no urgent necessity for completing it at this time. Should these negotiations terminate without effecting that line, you, or either of you, will proceed to run and mark the line without further delay. Should the commissioners succeed in obtaining the cessions which they are instructed to demand, you will, upon due notification thereof, run such lines south of the Tennessee as are in any degree connected with the Creek cession, as may be defined in the treaty or treaties which may be formed by them. They will be instructed to furnish you with the definition of the lines which you are to run, with the least possible delay. Perhaps your attendance at the place of negotiation may be useful, especially as it will prevent the loss of time in receiving the information necessary for the government of your conduct, and may secure a prompt attendance on the part of the tribes concerned at the running of the lines.

What is the distance to the Flat Rock recognised by the Cherokees? What the probable course of the line from the Ten Islands to that point? Any information on any subject connected with this line, the nature of the soil, and face of the country through which it will run, will be acceptable.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

P. S. The authority to run these lines contemplated in the foregoing letter is to be understood as joint or several, for the purpose of avoiding unnecessary delay.

W. H. C.

WM. BARNETT, Esq. and General JOHN COFFEE,

Commissioners for running the line of the Creek cession.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 12, 1816.

The extracts mentioned in the postscript to my letter of the 11th instant, not being prepared at the closing of the mail, are now forwarded, together with an extract from a letter from this Department, under date of the 27th May, 1816, to the commissioners to whom the complaints of the Cherokees on the Arkansas have been referred. The bearing of these papers upon the negotiations in which you are engaged is so obvious as to require no explanation from me.

Should an arrangement be made, founded upon the principle of exchange as contemplated by Mr. Jefferson and the Cherokee emigrants, a cession adjoining the settlements of Georgia may possibly be obtained. A part of the lands ceded by the Cherokees to the State of Georgia in the treaty of 1783 was relinquished by the treaty of 1790; a considerable portion of which has never been receded, and none of it regularly. That part, at least, ought to be receded; and, if the cession could be extended to the Chattahoochie, it would not be more than what the State had a right to expect. This, however, is mentioned rather as what is expected than what is attainable. General Meriwether, one of the commissioners, is fully acquainted with all the circumstances, and will give the explanations which may be necessary, should there be a prospect of obtaining a cession.

I have the honor to be, &c.

To ANDREW JACKSON,
DAVID MERIWETHER, and
JESSE FRANKLIN,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Commissioners, &c.

SIR:

CHICKASAW COUNCIL-HOUSE, September 20, 1816.

In a communication to you of the 4th instant from Generals Jackson and Meriwether, you were advised of the Big Warrior's having sent a runner to this nation, excusing himself and the chiefs of the Creek nation from attending at this convention, but inviting the four southern tribes to assemble at Turkeytown on the 1st of October next.

It was stated that this was believed to be, in combination with the Cherokees, to defeat the objects of this conference; and that, to counteract it, George Mayfield, accompanied by a Creek chief, had been sent on a second mission to the Creek nation, to invite their attendance, and bring on, if possible, the upper chiefs of said nation.

The Cherokee delegates arrived here on the 6th instant, and on the 8th Generals Jackson and Meriwether held a conference with the chiefs of the Chickasaws, Cherokees, and Choctaws, for the substance of which, as well as the proceedings of the subsequent meetings, you are respectfully referred to the journal that will be forwarded you. As was anticipated, much difficulty was encountered in negotiating with the Chickasaws; the conference being held with the whole nation, every individual had to be consulted; and the chiefs, together with the agent, seemed more anxious to maintain their popularity, than to promote the views of Government, or the best interests of the nation they ruled. Much embarrassment was occasioned by your letter of the 16th of April to the agent having been read to the Chickasaws previous to the arrival of the commissioners, and the interpretation given it. The charter from General Washington was supposed unobjectionable, and an idea prevailed that it would be supported in preference to any other title. Generals Jackson and Meriwether, the two commissioners present, (Jesse Franklin, Esq. not having arrived,) believing that no Creek title to territory actually occupied and settled could be impaired by any charter to which the Creeks did not give their assent, deemed it an act of justice and sound policy, and absolutely necessary to the correct discharge of the duties assigned them, to examine the testimony on which the conflicting claims of the three parties were founded. They accordingly proceeded to take all the evidence offered, which has been recorded in the journal for your information. From that testimony, it appears that the Creeks were the earliest settlers of this section of country; that they were found here by the other nations on their first arrival; that they continued in possession until 1813, when they were driven away by the American troops. It also appears, from the declaration of the whole Chickasaw nation, that the Cherokees never had any land adjoining them on the south side of the Tennessee river, and that the Creeks were always their neighbors; that the Chickasaws never complained of Creek encroachments while settled at Cold Water, but permitted the Creeks to remain in peaceable possession until destroyed by General Robinson in 1786, but that the moment a settlement was attempted on Bear creek, Pioningo notifies the intruders to remove, or he will destroy them, and takes part of their goods for rent. (See Gordon's testimony.) It further appears that the Creeks were in possession not only of Cold Water, but had settlements on the Tennessee, a little below Flint, on Tarchecunda creek, and at Thompson's creek; at Black Warrior, a very old town; and at Littleputche, on Caney creek, near Will's creek, the lower boundary of lands stated to have been loaned by the Creeks to the Cherokees. From this collective testimony, and a belief that possession is the best, if not the only substantial evidence of Indian title, the commissioners then present (Generals Jackson and Meriwether) expressed their conviction of the Creek claim being the strongest, in an address to the council on the 12th instant, and then made proposals to the Chickasaws and Cherokees, as will be found recorded in the journal. The Cherokees, on the 14th, made a communication in writing, refusing to yield any lands on the north side of the Tennessee, but proposing to cede their claim to the disputed territory on the south for certain considerations, which were acceded to, embodied in the form of a treaty, and duly executed and signed by all the commissioners, (the Hon. Jesse Franklin having previously arrived.) As the Cherokee delegates seemed doubtful as to the extent of their powers, this treaty has been concluded subject to the ratification of the Cherokee nation, and it is provided that the said nation shall meet the commissioners on the 28th instant at Turkeytown, to express their approbation or not. In concluding the treaty with the Cherokees, it was found both wise and politic to make a few presents to the chiefs and interpreters.

The execution of the treaty with the Cherokees alarmed and seemed to irritate the Chickasaws, and the death of a principal chief (the Factor) appeared to distract their councils. Confusion amongst them was visible. When solicited for an answer to the propositions made them on the 12th instant, they invariably begged time to deliberate. It was soon found that a favorable result to the negotiation was not to be anticipated, unless we addressed ourselves feelingly to the predominant and governing passions of all Indian tribes, i. e. their avarice or fear. Our instructions pointed to the former, and forbade the latter; we therefore were compelled, not from choice, but from instructions, to apply the sole remedy in our power. It was applied, and presents offered to the influential chiefs, amounting to $4,500, to be paid on the success of the negotiation. This measure seemed to produce some sensible effect. Time was asked for reflection; the chiefs that had left the ground were sent for; and we have this day concluded a treaty that secures to the West a free and uninterrupted intercourse with the low country. Independent of the accession of a rich and large body of lands to the United States, the objects otherwise obtained by this treaty are of incalculable political advantage to our country. We have obtained a connexion of Tennessee with the low country; the free use and navigation of the Coosa, Black Warrior, and Tombigbee rivers; and, what is truly grateful to the human mind, prevented the destruction of many of our red brethren, and possibly a civil war; secured the affections of the population of the South and West to the present administration; and restored that confidence that formerly existed between the rulers and the people. If the annuity given has been larger than usual, it is not more than proportionate to the benefits obtained.

We have drawn upon the Department of War for the amount of those presents distributed to the principal chiefs, and which could not appear on the treaty. Secrecy was enjoined as to the names. Secrecy is necessary, or the influence of the chiefs would be destroyed, which has been, and may be useful on a future occasion. The chiefs will accompany the drafts, which we have no doubt will be duly honored and paid.

The land within the State of Tennessee, and ceded by this treaty, being within the congressional district, and all the vacant lands being the property of the United States, we did not conceive it necessary to make any discrimination. We did not consider it of any importance, when compared with the value of the cession in a political point of view; and we were more particularly urged to the measure from a belief that an adjustment between the United States and this State was practicable, and the ratification of the treaty thereby not hazarded by a reference to a State Legislature.

Finding the jealousy of the Chickasaw Indians aroused when we obtained the cessions embraced in the treaty, we did not think it prudent to urge them on the other points of our instructions; we conceived it not prudent, and of course did not name it to them.

Agreeably to our instructions, we put to the council the question whether their agent had the confidence of the nation. On this day the question was answered by Tishomingo—that they did not want their present agent, and gave this as the full sense of the whole nation. The chiefs have spoken to us this evening to say to you that they want an agent sent them from the East, capable of doing justice to their red and white brethren.

The enclosed petition of James Colbert and Turner Brashears, Indian interpreters, is referred for your consideration.

We remain, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
D. MERIWETHER, } Commissioners.
J. FRANKLIN, }

Hon. W. M. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

To the Commissioners of the Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations, appointed by the President of the United States to treat with the said nations.

Your petitioners beg leave to state to you the grievances under which we labor, as interpreters of the said nations. That, whereas we are daily called on to do business with the agent of our nations by the natives thereof, and are constantly more or less crowded with company, the support of whom is a very considerable tax upon us, the salaries which we receive from the Government of the United States is not more than sufficient to defray this unavoidable expense. We therefore request of the commissioners to take into consideration the aforesaid grievances, and to give to the United States a just view of our situation, and to request of the Government to afford to us such further allowance as will cover this expense, and thereby enable us to save our present salaries as a support for our families, and a compensation for our loss of time from our homes and attention to business.

We hope that this request will be deemed just and right by the commissioners, and that they will use their influence in our favor as far as they may deem proper, which will be thankfully acknowledged by

Your friends and obedient servants,

JAMES COLBERT,
TURNER BRASHEARS.

SIR:

CHICKASAW AGENCY, September 22, 1816.

The treaty with the Chickasaws has terminated in a manner beneficial to the United States, every way highly gratifying to all the good people of the western country, and removes many causes of discontent which unjust intrusion had created among the Indians. I assure you I should have been extremely happy to have had it in my power to concur with General Jackson in every thing that appertained to my duty as agent for the United States, and I willingly indulge the hope that neither he nor you will attach blame to me for an honest difference in opinions, which only happened as to the time and manner proper for me to impress on the minds of the Indians the benefits and advantages that would result to them from the terms offered them by the commissioners of the United States. After the propositions were made by the commissioners, an admirable letter, written by Colonel Meigs to the Cherokees, was publicly read. His advice well became that of a father and a friend. It declared to them, in the strongest terms, how much it was their duty and interest to grant to the United States all the country the President wanted. I then thought it a proper time to rise in public council and declare my concurrence with every sentiment contained in Colonel Meigs's letter, and, at the same time, to tell the Chickasaws that the doctrine was not new to them, and that their agent had on many occasions made known in their councils that the President and Secretary of War must be listened to and obeyed by them, for that they never would desire them to do any thing but what would be for the benefit of all their children. The commissioners and the whites then withdrew, and left the Indians in council, when Major General Jackson, without apprizing me of his desire, observed to me that he thought at that time I ought to have pointed out to the Indians the special advantages that would result from the terms offered them. I answered him, "Advice, when asked for, was better received, more respected, and generally more relied on, than opinion given before sought for." He replied, with a strong verification, "that the Indians were then in council, and that they would not ask my advice." I answered him in terms equally positive, affirming "that I knew I had the entire confidence of the nation, except Tishomingo and James Colbert, and that the council would call on me for my advice and opinion." While thus in conversation with the general, the council sent Levi Colbert and William McGilvery to solicit my attendance for the purpose of asking my advice, which offered me a favorable opportunity to deliver what was, and still is, my real opinion, which was as follows: As the commissioners had, from examining all the evidence that had been offered for their consideration, declared it to be their opinion that the Creek claim was the best and strongest to the land south of Tennessee and east of the line run by General Coffee, that it was, therefore, my opinion that interest and prudence united should induce the Chickasaws to make the best terms they could respecting that land, and that the land north of the Tennessee river had long been a place of contention, and that a liberal price was offered for it; that, if they refused the offer made, I did not think it probable they would ever get a better; that accepting the offer would renew and perpetuate the good understanding which so happily existed, and that a refusal might by possibility be the means of discord, and, finally, some event might happen which would produce a worse state of things; and, therefore, my opinion and advice was decidedly in favor of the policy of accepting the offer, and thereby removing all causes of difference and discontent which might grow into disturbances of a more serious nature; that the now President was kind and liberal in his offers; that none could tell what would happen in future. I will claim no honor from these sentiments; they embrace the universal opinion. But I do aver, protest, and declare, that the Chickasaws, as a nation, have at all times expressed the most sincere friendship for me, and in every council publicly declared their unbounded confidence in me. Tishomingo and James Colbert are the only Indians in this nation who appear to have any dislike to me. The first cause of Tishomingo's dislike proceeded from the wild disorder he suffered to take place by a party commanded by him when I had formed the nation into four divisions for the purpose of issuing to them provisions, while distributing the goods sent as presents and as an annuity. I ordered four beeves to be killed, and directed that one should be given to each division. Tishomingo's party, in a rude and impertinent manner, seized upon the whole. The others apprized me of the outrage; I applied to him, and informed him mildly, but positively, that I would not suffer such disorder. He answered he could not help it, and said his men would do as they pleased, appearing rather to countenance than discountenance their conduct, for which I severely rebuked him. When I proceeded to parcel out the goods, and had formed the Indians under his command for the purpose of receiving their rateable part of annuity and presents, a number of them changed their positions, and drew several times. This fraud was likewise discovered by the other Indians, and complained of, as well as seen and corrected by me. About the 1st of January last past, the storehouses of the United States near the Chickasaw Bluffs were broken open in the night-time, by a party of Chickasaw Indians, and a considerable quantity of peltry stolen out of them. Mr. Rawlings, the factor for the United States at that place, informed me of the burglary, and I called upon the chiefs to have the fellows punished; and I, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, advised him of the demand I had made. You will see Tishomingo's speech on that occasion, stating that the Indians who had committed that felony had left the nation, (which statement he knew was not true, and that those Indians were then living on Cold Water and in his neighborhood.) No person that has travelled the road in the year 1815 from Nashville to Natchez has been a stranger to the complaints which travellers frequently made of having their horses stolen and hid out by Indians on that road, in the neighborhood of the Good springs and Brown's swamp. This unpleasant state of things, in my opinion, ought to have met my disapprobation; at least, that the idea of exemplary punishment should have been holden out by the agent of the United States, you may see, as well by the deposition of James G. Neely as by that of George Maxwell, which are now in the War Office, and whose reputations and families do not rank behind any in the United States for candor, probity, and good morals. This assertion would be verified by the honorable Samuel Powell, the honorable William G. Blount, and all the Representatives in Congress from the State of Tennessee who know them. The other causes of dislike, when known, have equal claim to your approbation, the esteem of my Government, and the confidence of the Chickasaw nation.

James Colbert, William Colbert, and others, their confederates, being desirous of engrossing all the trade of this nation, demanded that I should drive all the traders trading under regular license out of the nation. This demand was also made by Tishomingo in council, early last spring, when I informed him that the power exclusively belonged to Congress to regulate trade with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. He then said his young men might steal the traders' goods—that is, he might steal them—and that then I would want him branded, (alluding to the recommendation I had given to him and the rest of the chiefs to whip and brand the Indians that had broken open the houses and stolen the peltry of the United States at the Chickasaw Bluffs.) I answered him that I hoped he was an honest man, but that if he would steal, I certainly had rather see him punished than an ignorant young man; for that he ought to set good examples to his young men, and not encourage, countenance, or excuse men who had stolen the property of the United States or of travellers; and that complaints were frequently made to me of travellers' horses being hid out by Indians to get money for feeding them; and that if he did not, I would put a stop to it, for that such conduct might, if not prevented, occasion the loss of good men on both sides. I then inquired of him if there were any horses in the possession of the Indians that belonged to the white people, and ordered, if there were, they should be given up. I then obtained the delivery of nine horses, some of which the Indians gave up with great reluctance. When the delegation of the Chickasaws was about to set out to Washington city, objections were made by a number of Indians against James Colbert going as an interpreter of the United States. I thought it advisable, and most likely to silence all clamor, to direct him to go on with the delegation. On the 17th April, the king, headmen, and warriors met at the old council-house, where it was named that James Colbert was going to take on Wigton King with him—a man that the Indians generally, and particularly Tishomingo, had requested the agent to order out of the nation for misconduct; at which time it was said that King and James Colbert's views were to join in bringing out goods, and Colbert was to cause all the traders to be drawn out of the nation, and that they were to engross the entire trade themselves. All this Colbert denied in the most positive terms, and said that no man of Wigton King's character should travel in company with him. James Colbert, at the same time, in presence of the King and the other chiefs, as well as in the presence and hearing of Mr. George Maxwell, declared his love for and confidence in the agent, calling me his father and his friend, and said I had done more for the benefit of the nation than all the agents they ever had. Major General Jackson, after he had made known the powers of the commissioners, inquired of the Indians in council whom they depended on to transact their business? Tishomingo then, in full council, informed the commissioners that their agent could write, and knew how to manage their cause, and that they would rely on him to do it. The commissioners do know that I arranged their evidence and managed their cause much to their satisfaction, without neglecting the views and interests of the United States, or departing, in any instance, from those principles of justice and liberality which it is the pride and glory of the Government of the United States to administer. Could I, for convenience, with pleasure, be as ready as some are to change with the popular sound to defame the best of men, and condemn the best of measures, because I did not know their objects, or had neither patience nor prudence to wait for information, I might be the beloved friend of discord, join the popular clamor, and retreat, like the editor of the Clarion, with disgrace to himself and friends. My errors may be many, but my enemies appear to be strangers to them; for every thing they charge me with, all who know me will affirm is directly opposite to my very nature, and contrary to the practice of all my life. I am sorry to name that, when General Jackson informed me he was merely to ask a question whether the nation had confidence in me, and that I could have no opportunity to justify my conduct, or to show that I had done my duty; and that the offender, or, I may say, the prince of offenders, was to arraign my conduct, and act in the capacity of accuser, witness, and judge, who held the power and had the will to speak his own unjust prejudices, and declare them as the voice of the nation, without being able to show a single reason why—I certainly have several times solicited an inquiry into my public conduct while agent; I repeat the solicitation, and challenge investigation.

The honorable Jesse Franklin, Esq., before the question was put, inquired of me what I thought would be the answer of the council; I informed him I knew that, if the question was put to each individual of the council, there would be no dissenting voices but James Colbert and Tishomingo; but that if Tishomingo was to speak, he would speak his own prejudices, and say the nation did not like me, although he knew the fact to be otherwise. I should not conclude this letter without informing you that several negroes have been lately murdered in this nation in a most barbarous, cruel, and unprovoked manner; one belonging to Mr. Thomas Love was shot by an Indian while in his master's yard riving boards. The only excuse for this murder is, that the Indian says he did not like Mr. Love, and that he would spoil his property. At the request of Mr. Love, I applied to the chiefs, who refused to do any thing in the matter, Tishomingo saying that the man who murdered the negro was Mr. Love's relation; as if sufficient excuse for the outrage. An Indian called the Young Factor a few weeks since murdered a negro by whipping and burning; another sufficient excuse is, that the negro belonged to him. Such are existing circumstances. I have at all times understood that I held my appointment during the pleasure of the President of the United States; recent proceedings seem to show it may depend on the Chickasaws. But I have a confidence not to be diminished in his magnanimity, justice, and good disposition, which affords a firm reliance that I will be indulged with an opportunity of a full inquiry.

Accept, sir, assurances of the high respect with which I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
 WILLIAM COCKE, Agent for the U. S. to the Chickasaws.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

NASHVILLE, October 18, 1816.

Your letters of the 10th and 12th ultimo, with the extracts referred to, were not received until my arrival at this place on the 12th instant. The important contents of those communications could, of course, have no effect on a negotiation already concluded.

As had been reported to you, I learned that the Chickasaws remonstrated with the commissioners against running the line as defined in the late treaty with the Cherokees. This remonstrance was founded on a claim to territory which the Chickasaws deemed unobjectionable, as derived from a charter given and executed by President Washington, in the year 1794, defining their territorial limits on the north and east. By a treaty with the Chickasaws in 1801, this charter was recognised, with a solemn guaranty, not only of territorial limits, but of protection in that territory from intruders of every description. The territorial boundaries of the Chickasaws, as defined in said charter, include nearly all the land ceded to the Cherokees by the late treaty, but a small triangular extent remains. These facts, no doubt, induced the commissioners to listen to the remonstrance of the Chickasaws, and suspend their operations until they had reported to you and received the positive instructions of the President of the United States on the subject. Sound policy dictated the measure; for had the commissioners run the line, it would inevitably have excited the Chickasaws to an immediate war against the Cherokees.

These guaranties and treaties are happily done away, and, generally, to your directions. The definition of the lines established by the treaties lately concluded with the Cherokees and Chickasaws shall be furnished the commissioners, with instructions to commence running the lines as early as practicable.

The Cherokees, as I believe, will make a tender of their whole territory to the United States, for lands on the Arkansas, west of the Mississippi. A council is to be held shortly at Willstown, probably to select proper persons to explore that country and report its situation, &c. to the nation. As soon as that is done, a delegation will be sent to the President to effect the exchange, and General Meriwether will be invited from Georgia to accompany them.

After the ratification of the treaty at Turkeytown, the Cherokees in council complained of the intruders on their lands north of the Tennessee river, to both the agent and myself. The agent consequently made the demand for their removal, and I have given notice to all intruders accordingly; and on the 1st of November the troops at Fort Hampton will be in motion on this service.

With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON, Maj. Gen. commanding Div. of the South.

Hon. W. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 26, 1816.

Your communication of the 4th instant, dated at Turkeytown, has been received, and submitted to the President, who expressed his entire approbation of that communication, and of the manner in which the great objects of your mission had been accomplished. It would have been very gratifying to the President to have obtained a cession of that part of the Chickasaw lands which lies within the limits of the State of Kentucky, and also of that part of the lands of the Cherokees which lies within the State of Tennessee; but it was foreseen that the attainment of the great objects of the mission would materially increase the difficulty of obtaining those cessions for the present.

Whenever the Cherokee nation shall be disposed to enter into a negotiation for an exchange of the lands they now occupy for lands on the west side of the Mississippi, and shall appoint delegates clothed with full authority to negotiate a treaty for such exchange, they will be received by the President, and treated with on the most liberal terms.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Chief Clerk.

General ANDREW JACKSON and General DAVID MERIWETHER, Nashville, Tennessee.

[Duplicates sent to General Meriwether and Major Jesse Franklin, at their places of residence.]

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 31, 1816.

Bills to the amount of $5,043, drawn by the commissioners and by Mr. Cocke, on account of the expenses attending the treaties lately held with the Indians, have been presented to this Department. As $5,000 had been remitted to you on account of expenses, &c., and as Mr. Anderson, who transmitted those bills, has requested that they may not be protested, if money had been forwarded to the commissioners, I have thought it best to return them; and to direct an additional remittance of $3,000 to be made to you, on account of the expenses attending the treaty. This course can be productive of no inconvenience, as Mr. Anderson has requested that the bills may be paid by a check on Nashville.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 7, 1816.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th ultimo, and am pleased to find that you are about to take prompt measures for the removal of all intruders on the lands of the Cherokees. In consequence of information which has been received from General Meriwether that some persons from Georgia were about to take possession of the reservations on the north side of the Tennessee, mentioned in the treaty with the Cherokees of January 7, 1806, and which are included in the late cession made by the Chickasaws, I am instructed by the President to request that you will persevere in removing all intruders from that part of the lands lately ceded by the Chickasaws, and which lie on the north of the Tennessee river, and particularly from the above-mentioned reservations. With respect to the intruders on the south side of the Tennessee, and who are not protected by the act of Congress of the last session, instructions will be forwarded to you in a short time.

The pay-roll of Captain Allen's company was approved by the late Secretary of War, and the paymaster general directed to take immediate measures for the payment of the men. I enclose to you Captain Allen's forage return, approved, and with directions to the quartermaster to pay it. It was lately returned to this Department by the paymaster to whom it had been sent with the muster-roll, as not belonging properly to his department.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

Gen. ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 11, 1816.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st ultimo, in consequence of which instructions were immediately given to General Jackson to remove all intruders immediately from the lands ceded by the Chickasaws on the north side of the Tennessee river, and particularly to prevent any person from taking of those particular tracts of land which had been reserved by the treaty of January, 1806, with the Cherokees. The bills which the commissioners drew on account of presents have been presented and paid, and eight thousand dollars have been remitted to General Jackson, at Nashville, on account of the expenses, compensation, &c. of the commissioners. After defraying the expenses of the treaty, it is probable the residue of this sum will not be sufficient to pay the compensation of all the commissioners; I will therefore thank you to make out your account, and forward it to this Department for payment.

I had the honor to address a joint letter to the commissioners a few days since, expressing the entire approbation of the President relative to their conduct in the interesting and important negotiations in which they had been engaged.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

Gen. DAVID MERIWETHER, Athens, Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 4, 1816.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, by Lieutenant Gadsden, of the 12th ultimo, together with the original treaties lately concluded with the Cherokee and Chickasaw nations. The treaties have been submitted to the President, who has expressed his entire approbation of both of them.

Your accounts, forwarded by Lieutenant Gadsden, have been approved, and an allowance made for your service as a commissioner (which is a claim of right and not of favor) of eight dollars a day from the 20th of August until the 1st of November, the amount of which will be retained by you out of the money placed in your hands for the Indian department, and the balance then remaining may be applied to the quartermaster's department. General Meriwether and Mr. Franklin will settle their accounts at this Department.

You are authorized, if you deem it proper and expedient, to make an additional present to Tishomingo of five hundred dollars.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, *Acting Secretary of War.*Gen. ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

DEAR SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 4, 1816.

I have the honor to enclose you a copy of the treaty or convention which has been made with the Cherokees for the cession of that portion of their lands which lies within the chartered limits of the State of South Carolina. It is to be apprehended that this convention will not be ratified, as it was made with some degree of reluctance, which was finally overcome by the strong desire which they felt to settle their southern boundary upon just and equitable principles. This, I believe, has been done, and they are perfectly satisfied with it.

I shall address a talk to the nation, in which I shall endeavor to impress them with the justice and fairness of the transaction, and the bad consequences which may possibly flow from its rejection.

Colonel Meigs will be instructed to use his influence with the nation to secure its ratification. He will give you the earliest intelligence of the result of his efforts. Should you be disposed to send an agent to attend the national council upon this occasion, he will be directed to give you such notice of the time and place of holding the council as will enable you to effect that object.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

DAVID R. WILLIAMS, Governor of South Carolina.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 16, 1816.

Enclosed you will receive the copy of a convention concluded at this place with the deputation of Cherokee Indians, which has been ratified by the President.

It is the desire of the President that you proceed without delay to run and mark the line defined in this convention. You will be attended by some of the Cherokee chiefs, who are acquainted with the point at which it is to terminate. The surveys which General Coffee has made will probably be of some use to you in the execution of this duty. Upon an examination of his report, which is now in this Department, he appears to have taken no notice of the point at which this line is to terminate, notwithstanding he appears to have had in view the convention made with the Cherokees in the year 1806, which proposes Caney creek, and a line drawn from its source to the "Flat Rock," as the boundary between the Cherokees and Chickasaws.

Instructions will be immediately given to the Chickasaw and Choctaw agents to collect such evidence as shall be in the power of those nations to furnish concerning their eastern boundaries. They will also be instructed to ascertain whether those nations can be induced to dispose of their possessions east of the Tombigbee river, if it shall appear that their titles to those lands are valid.

When you shall have completed the line in question, a general report of your proceedings, comprehending all the information you have acquired of the situation, extent, fertility, and salubrity of the ceded country, will be received with pleasure.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

WM. BARNETT, Esq.

Colonel BENJAMIN HAWKINS,

Maj. Gen. EDMUND P. GAINES,

Commissioners for running the line of the Creek cession.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 13, 1816.

The deputation of your nation has been received by your great father the President as children of the great American family. He has taken them by the hand, and spoken to them the words of peace and truth. He has listened to all their complaints, and has redressed, and will redress, all their wrongs.

Friends and brothers: Your beloved men who have visited your great father the President have, by your instructions, agreed upon a convention, by which a small portion of land has been ceded to the State of South Carolina for the sum of $5,000. His excellency the Governor of that State has signified to the President his assent to this convention, and has authorized me to inform you that you may draw for the money whenever your nation shall ratify the cession.

Brothers: The land ceded by this convention is of little value to you or to the State of South Carolina. It affords no game, and none of your people live upon it. It is desirable to South Carolina only as it will complete her settlements, and will bring within her jurisdiction some dishonest white men, who are equally injurious to you and to the citizens of that State. Your great father the President will be gratified by the ratification of this convention by your nation, as he will see in it a disposition to oblige him and your brothers of South Carolina when it can be done without injury to either.

Friends and brothers: The long peace which has subsisted between the Cherokees and the whites, and the good faith which the State of South Carolina has always observed towards their red brethren, will be more strongly cemented by the ratification of this convention. The ratification of this convention is due to the liberality and love for the Cherokees which your good father the President has manifested in establishing the line between your lands and the Creek cession, and in paying for all the losses which they have sustained in the course of the last war.

Your great father the President will not believe that his beloved children of the Cherokees will refuse their consent to what has been agreed upon by their worthy deputation, pursuant to the instructions which have been given to them.

Friends and brothers: Your great father the President has given orders that all white men who have settled upon your lands shall be immediately removed. Colonel Meigs, who resides among you, has been directed to call upon the military officers of the United States to remove by force all white men who have settled upon your lands against your consent. As often as they return to their settlements, they will be removed, and, besides, be punished by our courts for the violation of your rights.

Brothers: Disorderly white men have settled among you, who have harassed and vexed the peaceable inhabitants of the State of Tennessee, and have made their complaints reach the ears of your great father the President. These men ought to be removed by your nation to a great distance from our settlements, where they can do no mischief to the peaceable inhabitants of Tennessee, or your agent ought to require them to be removed from your lands as intruders.

Friends and brothers: The white men whom you permit to live among you must be considered as Cherokees, and the nation must be answerable for their actions. Your great father the President expects that you will restrain their improper conduct, or have them removed as intruders upon your lands.

Friends and brothers: The President will continue to watch over your peace and happiness: in return, you will conduct yourselves peaceably, pursuing your game, attending to your flocks, and cultivating your lands for the support of your women and children. The money which he sends you by your agent, Colonel Meigs, will furnish you with the means of buying cattle, sheep, and hogs sufficient to supply your wants. Cultivate the arts of peace with your red and white neighbors, and your happiness will never be disturbed.

To the principal HEADMEN and WARRIORS of the Cherokee Nation.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 27, 1816.

The Senators and Representatives of Tennessee, before the adjournment of Congress, presented an address to the President urging the expediency of extinguishing the Cherokee title to the lands north of the Tennessee, within the limits of that State. As there is no game upon the land, and, I believe, no Indians settled upon it but Colonel Lowry, it would appear to be their interest to sell it for a fair consideration: by giving Lowry a present equal to the value of his possessions, it is probable that a purchase can be effected of all their lands to the north of the river. The President desires that you shall make every exertion to obtain this cession at their next national council: to enable you to effect this, you are authorized to give them, either by way of annuity, or to be paid at one or more payments after the ratification, the sum of $20,000, and to distribute presents among them to the amount of $5,000, and to Lowry to the value of his possessions north of the Tennessee river. It will be proper to ascertain the relative value of the lands belonging to Tennessee compared with that in the Mississippi Territory, as the State of Tennessee ought and must pay her proportion of it.

Major Walker, in private conversation, told me that he thought the Cherokee nation would sell the land which we attempted to purchase last winter: it is deemed expedient to make the effort. You are therefore authorized to offer them for their claim to the lands lying west of a line to be run due south from that point on the Tennessee river which is intersected by the eastern boundary of Madison county, to the line agreed upon by the late treaty, an annuity of $6,000 a year in perpetuity. Considering that the most of this land is claimed by the Chickasaws, and that there is little or no game upon it, there is some reason to believe that this offer will not be rejected by the nation in their grand council.

The President calculates upon the exercise of all your influence in effecting these objects. No commissioner will be appointed, as it is deemed inexpedient to make an impression upon them that we are extremely solicitous to obtain the cessions in question.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

RETURN J. MEIGS, Cherokee Agent.

SIR:

NASHVILLE, June 10, 1816.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, in answer to mine from New Orleans of the 11th April. I regret that my best exertions to ward the Government from imposition and prevent serious difficulties have proved abortive.

Mine of April was in answer to yours of the 8th of March, announcing the disapprobation of the President to the lines run by the commissioners appointed under the Creek treaty. At that time I had no knowledge of the convention entered into with the Cherokees, and addressed you with a hope that I might prevent a hasty surrender of the country, which, for national security, was all-important to be preserved. On the principle of right and justice, the surrender ought never to have been made. The Government has certainly been imposed on. That convention should not have been ratified, unless we are getting like the nations of old, who, having become so hardened, would not listen to the voice of instruction until brought to repentance by the visitation of some serious calamities.

The treaty of 1806 is referred to in this convention as a reason for what has been done. I can either not see, or not understand, if, in the clause relied on, there is any thing like a recognition of boundary or title. The United States undertake, and so declare, that they will use their best endeavors that a settlement of the western boundary of the Cherokees shall be agreed on by the Chickasaws; but, even if it had been an absolute acknowledgment of their boundary, (which is not the fact,) let it be recollected that it was altogether an ex parte inquiry, to which the Cherokees were, alone present, and could not or ought not to affect the interest and title of adverse claimants, who were not present and not heard. Why the Government should feel a wish to aggrandize the nation at the expense of other tribes, or against the interest of their own citizens, is unknown. In this matter the Indians—I mean the real Indians, the natives of the forest—are little concerned; it is a stratagem only acted on by the designing half-breeds and renegade white men who have taken refuge in their country. If the course now adopted by the Government is to be pursued, it is difficult to say at what remote period we may calculate on our uniting settlements and giving security to our frontiers: this connexion and security, so important, it was believed, had been secured under the Creek treaty; Georgia, with the Mobile country, and Tennessee were united; the Chickasaws and Choctaws were, under that arrangement, detached from the other tribes, and here security was obtained; the communication between the northern and southern Indians was cut off by the interposition of the white settlements, and thus an additional security was had; but, in one day, at the city of Washington, without any evidence in support of the right, except what was brought forward by a party deeply interested, and in the absence of all testimony in support of other claimants, is this inquiry taken up, and the surrender made. Can it be right? Either the Creeks had a title, or they had not; if they held under the treaty, it was ceded; if not, it should have been open to investigation, that the certainty of the fact might have been ascertained, and a full adduction of every information that could be had on the subject.

Were I disposed to throw off the military garb and assume the character of a politician, I think it susceptible of argument if the President and Senate have not just as much right in hasty convention to cede away West Florida to Spain as to do what has been done. In the circumstances of the two cases there is a marked resemblance: France cedes the lower country; Spain claims it; the cession makes the title complete; and, if France had any, it estops the President and Senate to give it to any Power whatever. The Creek treaty makes the country ceded, beginning where the Cherokee southern line crosses the Coosa, and running, &c.: these lines are, by the treaty, to be ascertained by commissioners hereafter to be appointed. I understand it to be a maxim both of law and reason that what can be rendered certain is already sufficiently special. Though it was not defined where this line would cross the Coosa, yet when the commissioners, the agents of the Government, came to act, it was their duty to call in and rely on the best evidence they could procure declarative of this fact: this was done; from that moment the title to the ceded country vested in the United States became a part of its territory, and was beyond the control of the treaty-making power.

Agreeably to the present course adopted, I would ask, when will Indian claims be extinguished on our borders? The title is procured of one tribe, another claims it, and from him also is the extinguishment to be had; effect this, and again another claimant presents himself. On the principles pursued by the Government of so carefully avoiding injustice to these tribes as even to be unjust to themselves, I say it is difficult to fix a time when we may expect a connexion of our territory by the possession of their claims: the assent of all will first be necessary to be had; and all will require to be extravagantly paid. With the commissioners there was no difficulty in ascertaining the Cherokee boundary; if their report had been agreed to, all would have been satisfied, except a few designing half-breeds and white men, who have manifested such deep concern on this occasion.

I accord with you perfectly in sentiment that a nation should never acquire advantages, however important, by acts of injustice; and expect you will be equally ready to concede that, for the sake of being over just, that nation should not heap injustice on herself and her own people. Justice and right are concomitant. If a nation has no right to the thing demanded, there can be no justice in acceding to the demand; it may be charity to do so; and then I would deny they could practise this Christian virtue at the expense of their own citizens: I deny it to be good policy to buy the friendship of any nation; it costs too much; for it lasts no longer than the price is recollected and continued; and I very much question, too, if it is not of as much importance to preserve the confidence of our own citizens as that of the Cherokee Indians.

The universal clamor is, that injustice has been done, and that the Indians had no title to the lands ceded. Tennessee, I hope, will never disgrace herself by opposing the Government; but when it is recollected that, in open violation of the orders of the United States, in 1794, a campaign was set on foot that broke the hostile spirit of the Cherokees and secured peace, judging of human nature it may be believed that when these people are ordered from the old Creek villages burnt by General Coffee, and which they aided to conquer, they will feel disposed to wreak their vengeance on this tribe. Common report says that these people, who have settled in considerable numbers on this land, are much enraged; that they are perfectly disposed to meet the views of the Government, but cannot accede to the idea of its being taken away to be given to a people who have no title, and who have been assailing them from the earliest settlement of the country. Should these people be attempted to be removed, how is it to be done? The militia will not answer for this service; they are not to be relied on for such an undertaking, because their feelings are the same with the settlers. If a regular force be resorted to, that force will require to be kept up, or the situation of these people will be hazardous indeed. When I say the militia will not aid in obtaining a surrender of this land to the Cherokees, I speak in reference to the discontents, murmurs, and anxieties manifested by all upon this subject, from whence the conclusion is fairly to be inferred. Enclosed is a letter from the Governor of the State, which will show you how important the country is considered, and how unrighteous and unjust the cession is viewed.

You are mistaken in supposing an army can so readily pass this section of country; it could not be passed in two or three days, as you suppose. There is no point on the Tennessee where a road to New Orleans and Natchez will cross that is less than eighty miles from the Creek village, on the Black Warrior, burnt by General Coffee, below which the line is to cross. A road leading through this country will make the distance not less than one hundred miles. The Flat Rock spoken of in the conversation nobody knows any thing about, unless it be the southeast and northeast corner of where the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes claim, which is south of the Cotton Gin Port, on Mobile. Should the Choctaw claim prevail, as the Cherokee has done, the country below will contain a very narrow strip of good land, not sufficient to afford supplies adequate to the support of an army necessary for the defence of the lower country.

I have now done: political discussion is not the province of a military officer. As a man, I am entitled to my opinion, and have given it freely.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 15, 1816.

Your letter of the 26th ultimo reached the Department this day. In my letter of the 16th April, which enclosed a copy of the convention with the Cherokees, you were instructed to run the line agreeably to that treaty. As you do not state the date of the last letter which you have received from the Department, it is presumed that the letter before referred to had not then been received. A copy of it is enclosed.

As the resignation of General Gaines created the contingency upon which General Coffee was to act, it was thought unnecessary to give any special authority in the case.

Should he decline acting, upon the receipt of the letter this day sent to him, you are authorized and required to run the line agreeably to the treaty, in the absence of both the other commissioners, should Colonel Hawkins not have rejoined you before the receipt of this letter.

The report to which you refer has reached this Department only through Colonel Hawkins, who says he was informed of it by you. It is not an object of any importance at this time, and it is more than probable that an attempt to ascertain its truth would be fruitless.

I am obliged to you for the names of the persons who can establish the frauds practised upon the Government by the agents of the contractor. The matter must be examined, and the culprits exposed to the public indignation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

WILLIAM BARNETT, Huntsville, Madison county, Mississippi Territory.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 19, 1816.

Your letter of the 4th instant has been received this day by the mail. The paper enclosed was produced by the Cherokee deputation which accompanied Colonel Meigs to this place last winter. The whole paper, taken together, certainly presents the idea that the boundaries designated in the first part of it had been agreed upon by the parties, and that you were acquainted with the facts. The note at the bottom of that article asserts that the execution of a convention was deferred upon your advice.

I agree with you that the particular instrument to which your name is subscribed, taken separately, warrants the construction which you have placed upon it. The whole paper, taken together, is certainly calculated to make an impression that is inconsistent with the rational construction of the instrument signed by you, when considered separately. I have no distinct recollection of any representations of Colonel Meigs upon this subject; and, on that account, can only say that he made none which were calculated to remove the impressions which that paper produced, considered as one entire act.

By the proceedings of our commissioners, the Cherokee boundary was considered to extend down the Coosa to the lower end of the Ten Islands. Testimony furnished by Colonel Hawkins establishes the same fact. By our conventions with that tribe, we have admitted that their claim south of the Tennessee extended west as far as Caney creek, and from thence to the Flat Rock, and engaged to endeavor to obtain the Chickasaws' consent to that boundary. This latter tribe have the declaration of General Washington that their title extends over the greatest part of the lands claimed by the Cherokees west of the Chickasaw old fields. All these circumstances, if they do not clearly establish their respective rights, at least prove that there is but little certainty in Indian boundaries. We know that the Cherokee title extends as far south on the Georgia side as the high shoals on the Appalachee, from whence a due west line would strike the Coosa south of the Ten Islands. It is not wonderful that great uncertainty should exist in Indian boundaries, where records are unknown, and where the lands claimed are never wholly occupied. In this state of uncertainty, an enlightened and liberal nation should not set aside the claims of its ignorant and savage neighbors, where they have ever been recognised by any act of the Government. These recognitions have been made in favor of the Cherokees and Chickasaws to the land which you insist belonged to the Creeks. Where we are judges in our own cause, and where the weakness of the other party does not admit of an appeal from our decision, delicacy, as well as a proper sense of justice, should induce us to lean in favor of the claim adverse to ours. I am very far from believing that we have yielded anything to the Cherokees which they had not a right to demand. In this opinion I may be mistaken, as the evidence is certainly not of the character which amounts to demonstration. We have done, in this case, what I would have done where my individual interest was concerned, and where the decision was left to myself. This is the point of view in which the case ought to be considered. We are in no danger from any act of liberality towards the Indian tribes within our limits. The lands south of the Cherokee line, when settled, will furnish a population equal to the repulsion of any enemy which may be brought to act against it. There is, therefore, no inducement to re-examine this subject, or to question its validity. In an enlightened nation, submission to the laws is the fundamental principle upon which the social compact must rest. No apprehension is entertained of the consequences which you appear to forebode. The treaty with the Cherokees has been approved by the Senate and House of Representatives, and is the supreme law of the land. Submission to it is a duty which will not be neglected. At the same time, it is admitted that the acquisition of this territory is desirable, and no proper occasion for acquiring it will be omitted. The same policy will be pursued with regard to the Chickasaws. The claims of the United States will be pressed as far as justice will admit, and liberal compensation will be offered where their rights are deemed to be valid. For this purpose, you will, in the instructions which will be forwarded, have the most ample powers. The views of the Executive will be fully explained in those instructions, and, I have no doubt, will be approved by an enlightened public.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 24, 1816.

In my letter of the 27th of May, you were instructed to renew to the Cherokee nation the offer which was made to their deputation last winter for extinguishing their title to the lands lying west of a line drawn due south from that point of the Tennessee river intersected by the eastern boundary of Madison county. In my letter of the 15th instant, you were directed to use your best exertions to induce the Cherokees to send a deputation to the negotiations which are to be opened with the Chickasaws on the 1st of September next, for the purpose of settling all disputes in relation to boundary between the several Indian tribes represented in that negotiation.

Should you not have an opportunity to act upon the former of these instructions before this deputation shall set out for the Chickasaw nation, or should the proposition be declined, the President desires that you will make every exertion in your power to induce the nation to invest the deputation with full powers in relation to this object.

As these lands are respectively claimed by the Cherokees and Chickasaws, and as it is intended that their respective rights shall be investigated by the American commissioners, the impossibility of agreeing among themselves may lead to a determination on both sides to dispose of their litigated claims to the United States, who are disposed to give them a liberal price for the lands in dispute between them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Colonel RETURN J. MEIGS, Cherokee Agent, Rhea Court-house, Tennessee.Extract of a letter from W. H. Crawford, Secretary of War, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

SIR:

JULY 1, 1816.

The ferment produced in the public mind in the State of Tennessee, by misrepresentations in relation to the Cherokee convention, is the more to be regretted as it can only tend to the injury of those who are led astray. That convention, as well as every other which has been, or shall be, ratified by the President, with the advice of the Senate, will be strictly executed, unless the Cherokee and Chickasaw title to the lands in question shall be extinguished by the commissioners appointed to treat with the latter tribe.

The idea attempted to be imposed upon the public by the intruders, that they are ready to remove from their settlements as public property, but not as Indian lands, is too shallow a device to deceive the most inconsiderate.

The most of these intruders have entered upon the land in question since the running of General Coffee's line, and are as liable to be removed as though the act of Congress had never passed. That act provides only for those who had intruded before the 1st day of February last, on the ground that the proclamation was not known before they had entered upon the public land.

The intruders upon the lands in question acted with full knowledge upon the subject, (or, at least, they had the means of knowing that their intrusion was both in violation of the law and the proclamation,) and yet they have the effrontery to talk of submission to the laws. It is easy to make professions, and nearly as easy to devise pretexts for an unlawful act, especially if it is not thought necessary that they should even be plausible: this appears to be the case in the present instance. This delusion must be terminated. The idea of resisting the authority of the Government must not be admitted for a moment. As the execution of the law, should it be resisted, will immediately devolve upon you, as the commanding general of the southern division, it is expected that you will use your influence to arrest this momentary delusion, which, otherwise, may possibly be carried so far as to make the interference of the military indispensable. This unpleasant alternative is by no means apprehended; but the very idea of it ought not to be permitted to exist.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

[In answer to the letter of the Secretary of War, dated May 13, 1816.]

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, July 31, 1816.

We this day considered the substance of the Secretary of War's letters respecting the cession of land made to the State of South Carolina, concluded at the city of Washington. We have unanimously agreed and confirmed the above cession of land, saving and reserving five tracts of land, each tract to contain six hundred and forty acres, to each of the following improvements, viz: one tract to Samuel Adair, an improvement on the village creek, waters of Fugadoo river; one tract to Sally Nicholson, an improvement on the waters of Keowee river; one tract to Nancy Starr, an improvement on the village creek, adjoining to Samuel Adair's improvement; one tract to Waller Adair, on Chattuga river, at a place called Chattuga Old Town; one tract to Samuel Martin, on the waters of Keowee river. The above reserved tracts of land to descend to the above-named persons, their heirs, and assigns, forever. The nature of holding our lands is such, that we hold our lands in common right; the chiefs, therefore, have no right to dispossess any Cherokee whatever of his improvement without his consent, which causes us to make the above reserves to the persons above named; and, hoping all the money will be paid in specie as soon as possible,

We remain your friends and brothers, in behalf of the national council,

FOOCHALEE, his × mark.
SOUR MUSH, his × mark.
BOOTS, his × mark.

WALLER ADAIR and THOMAS WILSON, Clerks.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, August 8, 1816.

I feel anxiously concerned on account of the agitation of the public mind in relation to the late commotion of boundary with the Cherokees. I have not time to enumerate the arguments founded on documents or on traditional history that may be advanced in support of that convention; but, so far as I have been able to examine the subject, that convention, in my view, appears to have been correctly made. I have seen observations in the Clarion on that subject, that convince me that the writers were not well informed on the subject of Indian rights, or bearing on their claims. Arguments raised, and deductions and conclusions founded on premises merely assumed, not bottomed on facts, are of no value; and the connecting that subject with the character of the army under your command has an appearance of making a sectional division, which the enemies of our country may avail themselves of. I have reflected on these things with painful sensations.

As to the army under your command, it stands unrivalled in fame. The misconduct of individuals, the depredations committed by some men in an army, do no more commit the military character of that army than the spots in the sun destroy the splendor of that luminary. It may only be compared to the transit of Venus over its disk; its light and heat are not diminished by such adventitious things, which have always happened, and will ever happen, in the course of events. After the conquest of Canada by General Wolfe, General Murray commanded Quebec with a garrison of four thousand men, veteran soldiers; those veterans mutinied, and succeeded; that great general was compelled to make stipulations with them: yet I never heard that the military character of the conquerors of Canada suffered any diminution on that account. Your character, and the character of Coffee, and Carroll, and others, cannot be even touched by the conduct of some unruly, insubordinate men. And to demand the expunging an article of a treaty solemnly made by the constitutional treaty-making power, appears to me to be fraught with an evil of very great magnitude, and cannot add any thing to the acknowledged character of your army.

All the mischief that has been done only proves the acknowledged fact, that men of great virtues may make sometimes aberrations from the right, and, like the tremulous needle, settle to the polar star. My motives for giving you the trouble to read this as supplemental to my letter of the 7th are independent of all selfish considerations.

I have, &c.

Major General ANDREW JACKSON.

RETURN J. MEIGS.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, August 19, 1816.

The Cherokee chiefs and others having pay due for military service, and on account of spoliations on their property by disorderly men among the troops during the Creek war, assembled here on the 20th July ultimo, agreeably to notice, for receiving their respective dues. The principal business being done, the council broke up on the 3d instant. During their stay here, conferences were had on the subject of obtaining cessions of the lands pointed out by your instructions. Governor McMinn attended in person with Colonel Williams, the commissioner in behalf of the State of Tennessee, to negotiate with the Cherokees for the cession of the lands of that State lying on the north side of the river Tennessee, including the land in the Mississippi Territory adjoining Madison county.

In the course of the several conferences, I made every exertion in my power, and was duly aided by Governor McMinn and Colonel Williams, to induce the Cherokees to relinquish their claim to the lands on the south side of the river Tennessee, lying within the following limits, that is to say: Beginning at a point where the eastern boundary of Madison county intersects the Tennessee river, and bounded east on a line to be run due south from that point until it shall intersect the line to be drawn from a point opposite the Ten Islands in Coosa river; such course and distance as will strike the "Flat Rock or Stone, the old corner boundary," on a branch of Bear creek; thence, a direct course, to the main source of Caney creek; thence, down the said creek, to its confluence with the Tennessee river; thence with the Tennessee river, in its meanders, to the place of beginning. For this relinquishment and cession I offered them $6,000 in perpetuity, and that the first annuity arising out of this stipulation should be paid within thirty days after the ratification of the treaty. In this stage of the negotiation there appeared a good prospect of succeeding. It was urged on them that their duty to the Government, which had listened to them while at the city by their deputation, and by the constant care of them, required a compliance with the demands of that Government; that their interest, perhaps their security, required it, (having reference to the agitation of the citizens of West Tennessee;) and although in my opinion groundless, it nevertheless existed. But notwithstanding all that could be done, they the next day gave an answer in the negative, not without some apparent concern, and agreed to appoint a delegation invested with full powers to renew the negotiation with the United States commissioners at the Chickasaw national council-house on the 1st September next. The Cherokee chiefs are to meet on the 20th instant at Willstown; they will there appoint the delegation, who will proceed from that place to meet the United States commissioners at the place above mentioned on the 1st of September.

They refused to comply with the proposals and offers for the lands in the State of Tennessee lying on the north side of Tennessee river. Colonel Lowry would have been entirely willing to comply with the offers made to him, (he retaining the ferry place he now holds on the Tennessee river,) but there were others (not less than thirty or forty families) on that land; some of them have very valuable possessions, among whom are George Lowry, a brother of Colonel Lowry, Major James Brown, and John Brown. The chiefs objected to the price, ($20,000;) and the principal settlers on that land urged it as a hardship to be removed without remuneration. It was not in my power, and Governor McMinn and Colonel Williams would not take on themselves the responsibility of offering more. Governor McMinn will probably be at the council in the Chickasaw nation. With respect to confirming the treaty made conditionally at the city by the Cherokee deputation for South Carolina, they also objected to the consideration, ($5,000;) but they, as they expressed it, agreed to confirm that treaty, but annexed conditions that deprive it of half its value—by reserving five tracts for individuals, probably the most of the good land on that tract. This was deemed entirely inadmissible, as it could not be received clogged with new conditions. I enclose their answer.

Notwithstanding we failed in our efforts here, I have no doubt of their complying with and agreeing to cede the lands southwest of Madison county. They have been informed of the state of the popular mind in West Tennessee; and, whether right or wrong, it equally affects their interests. But, independent of these circumstances, it is evidently their interest to cede that land to the United States, and I am confident they will do it.

I received two letters from General Jackson, making use of strong language in reproaching the convention with the Cherokees, both with respect to boundary and the grant to indemnify the Cherokees for spoliation on their property, asking me for an explanation of the last. I have sent him a copy of all the claims, with such explanations as I think ought to remove his objections. I sent him certificates from Brigadier General White and Brigadier General Doherty, and, if it were necessary, could have sent a hundred. The more I examine those claims, the more I am convinced that they are just and ought to be paid. There may be instances of fraud—I know of none such. I had a doubt about the great claim of Ratcliff, and inquired of numbers about it; they all, except one, replied to me that Ratcliff had very large stocks of cattle. When he came for pay, I questioned him and explained to him the nature of an oath, and required of him to make affirmation of the truth of his account of loss; which he did, before I paid him, solemnly, in the presence of the Great Spirit.

I wrote two letters to General Jackson, (one of the 6th, one of the 7th, and one supplemental to that of the 7th, dated the 8th instant,) a copy of which I send by this conveyance. An attempt to expunge an article of a treaty as a peace-offering to groundless demands! What a monstrous perversion of language to say that drawing a line between two Indian tribes is a cession to either of them. By the nature of the compact between the United States and Cherokees, they were considered as in a state of minority. The United States, by the first treaty held with them, have the exclusive right to regulate trade and to manage all their affairs as they think proper, as expressed in the ninth article of the treaty of Hopewell in 1785. This language undoubtedly includes the right of the allotment of land. When the Government, therefore, propose to them an alteration of their boundary line for a valuable consideration, they, in fact, have not the right to refuse a compliance with such proposal. We have never told them this in plain language, because we wish them to see their true state and condition; they cannot carve out for themselves. If the compacts between them and the United States were dissolved, and they left as an independent community, their ruin, their annihilation as a distinct people, would very soon be a consequence of such fictitious independence. I am one of the last men that would infringe their rights. I would lead them to civilization without injuring an individual, until they gradually and almost imperceptibly become blended with ourselves. And to effect this, they must circumscribe their immense limits; for while they can roam through extensive forests, (where in this mild temperature they can partly subsist themselves on the spontaneous productions,) they will not make use of their physical or mental faculties to raise themselves up. "Poor human nature, alone, revolts at the thought of the labor required and the sacrifices to be made to arrive at a state of civilization."

One of the scribblers in the Clarion, a paper edited at Nashville, has the audacity to say, "Who ever heard of the spoliations on the Cherokees, except through the channel of the convention?" and proceeds to ask, "What services have the Cherokees rendered in the war?" It may be answered that thousands witnessed both; that, in nearly all the battles with the Creeks, the Cherokees rendered the most efficient service, and at the expense of the lives of many fine men, whose wives and children and brothers and sisters are mourning their fall. A number of the widows and children have applied to me for something for support, and I have advanced them some aid—perhaps in the whole to the amount of $100. Some of these have made repeated applications for aid, but I was compelled to deny them, having no authority to do it. I shall as soon as possible recommend a person to be appointed an assistant or deputy in this agency.

I have the honor, &c.

RETURN J. MEIGS.

P. S. If the convention of boundaries with the Cherokees shall be suffered to be mutilated, or altered in any way to deprive the Cherokees of their rights to the land as secured by that convention, or of the pay for spoliations, it will be unjust. Human ingenuity cannot make a convention better founded on justice and on the best evidence the nature of the case could possibly admit.

The writers on this subject in the Nashville papers only show their inability and their utter incompetency for discussing the subject.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, October 25, 1816.

Your confidential and esteemed favor of the 2d instant came safe to hand by the last mail. I have read its very interesting contents with my utmost attention, and very much esteem the plan for its marked circumspection, and at the same time for its liberality in point of the exercise of the power it is intended to convey.

I must beg your excellency's goodness in assuring the President of the United States that I shall equally guard against a construction of his orders which might lead to a profligate waste of blood or treasure, as I would against a parsimonious policy, which eventually might lead us into a state of difficulty and danger, without the means of being extricated; and further to express to the President that, if his highly beneficial and honorable administration is not to close without again unsheathing the sword, the citizen soldiery of Tennessee, who were last in the field at the close of the late war, will ardently thirst to be in the front at the commencement of the next.

With high consideration, &c.

JOS. McMINN.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War Department.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, KNOXVILLE, October 25, 1816.

I do myself the honor of addressing you on the subject of a treaty with the Cherokee Indians, authorized by your order of the 27th May last, for extinguishing their entire claim to lands on the north side of Tennessee river.

According to existing statutes, Tennessee was called upon to participate in the expense, and, by the same authority, became vested with a qualified power to aid in the formation of treaties within a given space. Colonel John Williams was therefore appointed commissioner, who, with myself, attended at the Cherokee agency in the latter part of July, when your instructions were read and explained, and the sum total ordered to be given was distinctly proposed by Colonel Williams in the precise manner contained in your directions before referred to.

The proposition, however, resulted contrary to our earnest wishes, and even to an expectation which was generally entertained in the latter stage of the negotiation, (the close of which took place on the 3d August,) or rather the adjournment, as the Indians proposed that we should have an interview prior to Colonel Williams setting out for Washington city, and for the result of which I beg leave to refer you to that gentleman.

In the mean time, however, I determined to make another experiment with them at the Chickasaw agency, and for which purpose I obtained the favor of General Jackson under a special commission to renew your proposition of the 27th May last, to which General Jackson made the following report: "The Cherokees would not cede their claim north of Tennessee, but are inclined, and as I believe will, shortly tender to the United States their whole territory where they now live for lands west of the Mississippi." "They say," continued he, "if we sell our lands north of the Tennessee river, we will not have sufficient area left to obtain by barter a sufficient country west of the Mississippi for our whole nation." Thus, it seems, that part of the negotiation ended.

Since the policy of the Cherokees appears to be in favor of exchanging territory, I would beg leave to be indulged in suggesting to your honor the propriety of renewing to the Cherokees a proposition made to them during the administration of Mr. Jefferson for an exchange of territory as heretofore stated, with such modifications as you may deem expedient. And I will here ask your permission to offer one or two for your consideration.

1st. That each able-bodied male Cherokee embracing the plan shall be furnished at some suitable point west of the Mississippi with a good new rifle gun, some powder, lead, &c.; and allot to those who choose to remain where they now reside, say six hundred and forty, or one thousand acres of land to each family, to them, their heirs, &c. during their continuance thereon; and each Cherokee Indian thus settled to be considered as entitled to all the rights of a free citizen of color of the United States, to be subject to the payment of taxes for their lands, polls, &c.

2d. And should any one or more of the Cherokees to whom lands have been allotted, their heirs or legal representatives, incline to dispose of their land claim with its improvements, they may be at liberty to sell, but to none other than an American citizen, and that on a lease for say five or ten years; at the expiration of which lease the land shall revert to the United States, unless it should lie within the limits of some particular State, the Legislature of which shall dispose of said lands at discretion.

Very respectfully, &c.

JOS. McMINN.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of Department of War.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, October 26, 1816.

I take the liberty of forwarding one other extract from General Jackson's letter to me of the 16th instant, in the following words: "We have obtained from the Cherokees and Chickasaws all the disputed territory on the south side of the Tennessee, and all the Chickasaw claim north of that river."

This tract of country is the one which excited so much sensibility within the State of Tennessee through the course of last summer, and it was not until the views of the General Government were in some measure disclosed that its fury could be repelled; but, sir, at present the most zealous and turbulent are hushed into a pleasing silence, and the former high confidence reposed by the citizens in the Executive and heads of departments, so far as I see and hear, is entirely restored; and, for myself, I most ardently regret its absence for a moment.

I presume I stand enrolled in your office as one of the discontented, and I became so from having a very ancient and tolerably accurate knowledge of the country, and the vast importance it would be to the nation at a period perhaps not very remote from the present; and this opinion will be demonstrated should a state of war render it necessary to march an army to Mobile, or its neighboring points of fortification. To have the possession we now enjoy of this country will not only facilitate, but it will render secure, the transportation of military stores to a more satisfactory extent than if taken through the dominions of any nation, however well disposed. But there is a second reason of at least equal weight with the preceding one. This immense territory will enable us to consolidate our settlements from Lake Erie, on the north, to the St. Mary's, Mobile, &c. on the south. These being the two extremes of the nation, and liable to attack by our late as well as by our anticipated enemy, renders the acquisition of this country valuable almost beyond description.

My third and last reason why I felt so very solicitous that the Indian claim should be extinguished to the country in question was for the special benefit of my fellow-citizens of Tennessee. The possession of that country will enable not only the citizens of Tennessee, but also those of the western counties of Virginia, to find a market for their surplus produce and domestic manufactures infinitely nearer home than any other which has been or ever will be discovered.

My object in first addressing this letter was, in the first place, to point out to your view some of the national and special advantages which I have supposed would result; and, if you conceive the positions laid to be founded in truth and national policy, I pray you to have the goodness to believe that they formed the only motive from which I acted. And the copy of my letter addressed to General Jackson, which I have already presumed is in your office, is the only paper in existence written on this subject to which my signature does appear, except what I had previously written to General Jackson; and, on the score of private interest in relation to this subject, I have not now, nor do I ever expect to possess to the amount of one cent.

In the second place, I beg leave to tender to the President of the United States, and to you as the head of the War Department, my grateful obligations, my entire approval of and high esteem for the able, frank, and friendly manner in which a period was placed to the first and only transaction through the whole of Mr. Madison's administration which did not receive the warm and decided approbation of the citizens of Tennessee, whose cheerful acquiescence, in the present instance, I beg leave to enrol with that of, sir,

Hon. W. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

Yours, &c.

JOS. McMINN.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 8, 1816.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 18th September last. Your observations relating to the present condition and future prospects of the Cherokee nation, both in this country and on the Arkansas river, correspond perfectly with my ideas. You observe that "the chiefs of that nation must be sensible that they cannot much longer exist in the exercise of their savage rights and customs; they must become civilized, or they will finally (as so many tribes have already) become extinct."

I have a long time been of this opinion, and have stated the same ideas to such of them as I thought capable of comprehending the subject. These ideas have lately apparently gained ground amongst them; a considerable number are in preparation to move to the Arkansas, where they contemplate to continue agriculture and manufactures, and the means of school education. Some of their first characters have recently expressed their determination to remove to that country. They find that pressures on them for cessions of land will probably be soon made from Tennessee, South Carolina, and Georgia; and although they can, in the first instance of the application, say no, at the same time they feel that they cannot long resist reiterated applications; and they anticipate that in this way their limits will be circumscribed. And this is not all they have to fear: for many of them will migrate to the west, land or no land. And in this way they will crumble to pieces, and their identity as a nation will be lost; to prevent which it is clear to me that they must exchange their land here for land west of the Mississippi river; there they may preserve their national existence to some more remote period. They are aware, even if placed on the west of Arkansas, that they must probably make cessions of lands to the United States in that country, but they presume that they shall be less pressed on that subject there than here; and to guard against, or rather to provide for, such a contingency, it has been suggested to me by an intelligent Cherokee, that, in allotting a tract of land for them on Arkansas river, it would be well for them, and no damage to the United States, to have only three definite lines drawn to designate such allotment, leaving the boundary westward open as a wilderness; so that, as they make cessions on the east side, they may make proportionate advances on the west. He added that he did not require the United States to buy out the Indian rights, if such existed; that the Cherokees would manage that in their own way. This state of things I have some years expected would take place, and, in order to place the subject of exchange in a more specific point of view, I have drawn for my own satisfaction the form of a treaty or convention of an exchange of land with the Cherokees—it is only an essay, but we must begin somewhere—a transcript of which will accompany this letter. It will be found, by calculation, that the cost of the articles enumerated in the second article for the encouragement of agriculture, domestic manufactures, and for hunting, will amount to about $20,000. The articles for the chase and for agriculture are of the first necessity for them on their arrival in that country. They must the first year make crops of corn for bread; they will suffer the first year unless they have the means of acquiring a subsistence ready at hand. It is a great thing to remove such a number of families to that country, and will cause a great expense. They will require a considerable number of boats to move their families of old men and young children, and such articles for housekeeping as are necessary for them. The men will principally go with their live stock by land, by way of Chickasaw Bluffs. The whole expense of moving, which will amount to some thousands of dollars, I have omitted in the estimate. Whether this expense ought to be borne by themselves or by Government, is a question for consideration. It appears to me that the expense of making the exchange ought greatly to exceed what I have stated above. The sum, as contemplated above, is only a feather contrasted with the advantage to be derived to the United States by the exchange. The garrison ought not to be considered as an expense incurred on this account, because we ought to have strong posts on the western frontier; and the factory, it may be presumed, will maintain itself. If the Spanish patriots succeed prosperously, we shall have good neighbors; but if Ferdinand shall rule Spanish America, we shall have bad neighbors: it cannot be otherwise, because superstition and fanaticism will quarrel with liberality in religion and politics.

I beg leave to hazard my opinion that if $100,000 should be expended, to be paid by proper instalments, to effect this exchange, it would be but just. The Cherokees think they have suffered great loss by the inaccuracies of land transactions with them formerly, (not from design, but from inevitable errors,) since the first treaty with them under the American Government in 1785. By the contemplated exchange we shall gain eleven or twelve millions of acres of land in the very place, above all others, where we could wish it to strengthen our country towards the sea-coast. Georgia will be made immensely rich by the exchange, Tennessee will acquire a very great addition to her wealth, and the United States will have a valuable tract for sale lying within the limits of the Mississippi Territory. Some people are willing to consider the Indians as devoid of those sentiments which we feel. Many of them have strong local attachments to the country where the bones of their fathers are deposited; some of them are well settled as able farmers. It is easily conceived, therefore, that, to induce them to move, it must be done by holding out to them real, solid, and substantial advantages. The Indians are very slow in their negotiations; it will take time to effect such an important change in their circumstances; and, as far as I can discover, they would prefer having the business in question done at the seat of Government. If not done there, it will be necessary to have two or three commissioners appointed, of very respectable characters; and if of high rank, the better; they have a strong predilection in favor of rank.

My tour to Turkeytown, and in attending trial of the two Indians, having been particularly requested, has prevented me from earlier answering your letters. I have lost by those hindrances twenty-seven days. Governor McMinn and Colonel Williams are very desirous to have a deputation of Cherokee chiefs to go to the city during the session of Congress on the business of the exchange. It is very doubtful at present whether the Cherokees will be prepared by their consultations soon enough to go before very late in the winter or early in the spring. Would it not be well to have the subject of the exchange of lands laid before the Cherokees in a specific form, or as nearly so as the nature of the business will admit? Perhaps it might be best to have a number of copies printed and circulated amongst them, because the chiefs never conclude any very important business before they find the popular sentiments of their people. I had omitted to mention that the Cherokees are not half of them armed, and those arms they have are generally bad and wanting frequent repairs. If they remove, they must have one or two good armorers, besides the common blacksmiths; these last can be induced, without any expense to the Government, except by doing work expressly required by order of the agent.

I have the honor, &c.

RETURN J. MEIGS.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

NASHVILLE, November 12, 1816.

On the 4th ult. General Meriwether and myself advised you of the ratification of the treaty made with the Cherokee delegates by a full council of their nation, and that it would be forwarded by our secretary, Lieutenant Gadsden, as early as possible. Lieutenant Gadsden has been detained here longer than was anticipated by indisposition, and in preparing copies of proceedings and instructions required by the commissioners. I have detained him likewise that he might be the bearer of the Choctaw treaty; but I have as yet received no intelligence from the commissioners treating with that nation, and am apprehensive they have encountered difficulties not anticipated.

I forward by Lieutenant Gadsden a statement of the application, in part, of the five thousand dollars remitted on account of the Indian department, as also my account of necessary expenditures, and a blank to be filled with the amount of compensation due me as commissioner. This being extra service of the most unpleasant nature, I presume I am entitled to some additional emolument, though I freely declare that I should not have urged a claim had it not been for the loss sustained by the death of my horses, amounting to more than my allowance as commissioner. It is the first time I have claimed compensation, though I might have done so for the treaty held with the Creeks in 1814. Should it be allowed, the blank in the duplicate receipt may be filled up, and the amount of my whole demand may be either passed to my credit in the Accountant's office, or a draft on the Nashville Bank transmitted me. It may be necessary to state (as appears on the face of my account) that Lieutenant Gadsden's expenses as private secretary are included with those of my own.

Major Wm. O. Butler, who was employed to run the experimental line from this place to Lake Pontchartrain, so as to ascertain the nearest practicable route for a road, returned a few days since, being compelled by indisposition to abandon the prosecution. Nearly the whole party were seriously attacked with fever, and two of the soldiers, from their low state, had to be left in the nation. As Major Butler's health will not permit him to resume this duty, I have, agreeably to your instructions, engaged a Mr. Hugh Young with the pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry, with a promise (as authorized in one of your communications) that he should be nominated to the Senate as an assistant topographical engineer. Mr. Young has been well recommended by Major Dent, judge advocate of the United States army, and says to me, in a writing, that he stands well recommended in the War Office for appointment. He is a native of Baltimore, of good connexions, as I am informed, and possesses talents improved by an excellent education. I have, therefore, to request that the promise made to him may be fulfilled. He will set out on the duties assigned him in a day or two, and will commence where Major Butler discontinued his operations. Major Butler had proceeded about eighty miles to the southwest of the Tennessee, and, when compelled to discontinue his operations, must have been about twenty miles southeast of the Cotton Gin Port, on the Tombigbee.

I have received several communications of late from the Ordnance Department on the subject of suitable positions for military depots in the western country. I had the honor of addressing you on this subject last spring, recommending Baton Rouge as an eligible site for such purpose; and, in a subsequent communication to Colonel Bomford, I have pointed out those advantages. It was not contemplated, however, that any thing more than arsenals for the reception of arms sufficient to supply the military stationed in the eighth department, and the militia of Lower Louisiana, on any sudden emergency, should be erected at that point.

From the extent of our country, it is necessary for its defence that many minor depots should be erected, all dependant for supplies on some large establishment in an interior and safe position. It is injudicious to depend on these large depots in cases of emergency; their remote situation from the exposed portions of our country and vulnerable points of attack preclude the possibility of that early and efficient aid which may be necessary; and the delays in the transportation, which are often unavoidable, may (as experience has proven) jeopardize the safety of a country. With these remarks, I observe that, in addition to Baton Rouge, and other situations which may hereafter be occupied as minor depots, it is absolutely necessary that some large establishment should be formed in this southwestern country for the supply of these lesser or minor ones, with workshops attached for the fabrication of arms, and repair of such as may be injured in the southern service. The situation of Pittsburg is too remote for these objects; the navigation from thence is often obstructed, and arms, &c. subjected to an increased and heavy charge for transportation.

The whole southern country from Kentucky and Tennessee to Mobile has been opened by the late treaties, and, from a knowledge of that country, I know of no situation combining so many advantages, and so well adapted for a large depot well stored with all the munitions of war as the lower end of the Muscle shoals, on the Tennessee river. From hence the navigation to the Ohio is unobstructed at all seasons of the year, and may be performed in two days. The falls of the shoals may be diverted into any channels, and adapted to any machinery. Shoal creek, which empties into the Tennessee half a mile above this position, is literally paved with iron ore. Extensive saltpetre caves are now in operation up the Tennessee river; and it is reported that a well-supplied cave has lately been discovered on the late Chickasaw cession. Flint abounds on the Tennessee, and I need not advert to the facility with which lead may be obtained from the Upper Mississippi.

The distance from the Muscle shoals to the navigable waters of the Tombigbee is but sixty miles, and from the Coosa eighty. This short land portage will enable Government (should it ever become necessary) to transport arms, &c. down those waters for the supply of Mobile and its dependencies. But what constitutes the chief advantage of this position is, its being at the very point where the military road contemplated to be opened must cross the Tennessee, and, consequently, on the very route of troops moving from the upper to the support of the lower country. Hence the troops may rendezvous at the depot, receive all their arms, accoutrements, &c., and transport themselves to the scene of action. Their services performed, and on their return march, they can re-deposit their arms received, to be repaired and prepared for future use.

With great respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General Com'ding.

P. S. I have just received a communication from General Coffee, stating that they [the commissioners] have concluded a treaty with the Choctaws, by which they have obtained a surrender of all their lands east of the Tombigbee.

Hon. Wm. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 20, 1816.

Enclosed you will receive instructions for holding a treaty with the Choctaw nation, for the purpose of adjusting the limits of the Creek cession as far as it interferes with the Choctaw boundary. You are required to adopt the measures necessary to convene the chiefs of that nation with the least possible delay, and to give the earliest information of the time and place of the convention to your colleagues. The President expects that you will use your best exertions to prepare the Choctaws to make the relinquishment which is desired. Considering the nature of Indian title in general, and the benefit which they derive from their lands, the sum which you are authorized to give is deemed liberal; but when the doubtful nature of the claim of that nation to the land in question is taken into view, the sum may appear rather extravagant. The President is desirous of erring (if necessary to err) on the side of liberality to the Indians, who have been our auxiliaries in the late war; and, in the event of future wars, may be rendered more useful to the United States. Every effort must be used to convince them that we require nothing of them but what is compatible with their rights and consistent with their interests.

The factor will be instructed to furnish you with the merchandise necessary for making presents to the principal chiefs. A liberal and judicious distribution of these presents among the most influential chiefs may have the most beneficial effects upon the negotiation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Col. JOHN MCKEE, Choctaw Agent.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 20, 1816.

The Choctaw and Chickasaw nations having set up claims to a part of the lands supposed to have been ceded to the United States by the treaty concluded with the Creek Indians at Fort Jackson, in the year 1814, the President has deemed it expedient to inquire into and decide upon their validity; or to obtain a relinquishment of them, for a valuable consideration, before they are surveyed and offered for sale.

To attain this object with the least possible delay, it has been determined to appoint commissioners, who, in conjunction with the chiefs of the Choctaw nation, shall have authority to investigate the conflicting claims of the two parties, and to decide upon them definitively. Confiding in your judgment, discretion, and patriotism, the President has selected you for the discharge of this important trust.

In all our transactions with the Indian tribes in amity with the United States, the appearance of force or menace should be sedulously avoided. Whilst the claims of the Government are distinctly presented, and asserted with firmness, theirs should be heard with patience and respect.

Considering the uncertainty which is generally found in definitions of Indian boundaries, it is not surprising that the claims of the United States under the treaty with the Creek Indians should be contested by all the tribes whose hunting grounds are conterminous with the lands acquired by that treaty. The cause which produces these contentions necessarily renders the testimony upon which they are to be decided vague and unsatisfactory. Under these circumstances, it is deemed advisable not to scrutinize with too much rigidity the evidence which shall be produced in support of their claim, provided that the relinquishment of their title can be obtained for a fair consideration. In fixing the sum which shall be given to them, due regard will be had to the extent of country claimed, and to the nature of the title which they shall establish, which, in no case, shall exceed an annuity of $6,000 for twenty years, and $10,000 in presents to the principal chiefs. For this sum, a full relinquishment of title to the lands claimed by the Choctaws lying east of the Tombigbee may reasonably be required of them. The possession of the left bank of this river is so important to the United States, that their right to it under the Creek cession cannot be relinquished by treaty. The importance of having a natural boundary, such as the Tombigbee river, from one end of their country to the other, cannot be overlooked by them. Its advantages should be explained and enforced upon every suitable occasion.

If, after hearing the testimony which shall be produced, the claim of the United States to the lands on the east bank of that river should appear to be doubtful, and the Choctaw nation shall refuse to relinquish their title for the consideration which you are authorized to give them, you must terminate the negotiation without entering into any convention upon the subject. The claims of both parties will remain unimpaired, until, under more favorable auspices, the controversy shall be amicably adjusted. With a view to this adjustment, you are authorized to distribute such presents among their principal chiefs as, in your opinion, will tend to hasten the attainment of that object.

Colonel McKee, one of your colleagues, will be charged with convening the chiefs of the Choctaw nation, and will give you timely notice of the time and place of the negotiation.

As a compensation for your services, you will receive eight dollars a day for the time you are actually employed in the negotiation, and in going to and returning from the treaty, besides your necessary expenses. Your secretary will be allowed five dollars a day and his necessary expenses.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

General JOHN COFFEE, JOHN RHEA, Esq., and Colonel JOHN MCKEE, Commissioners, &c. to treat with the Choctaw Indians.

SIR:

CHOCTAW AGENCY, July 1, 1816.

I am making ready, and in a few days will set out for the eastern part of the nation, to prepare for the contemplated negotiation with the Choctaws. There is nothing to prevent the assembling of the Indians immediately, but the uncertainty of procuring a sufficient supply of provisions at the new factory, which, in every other respect, is the most proper place. As soon as I am assured of provisions, I will notify my colleagues and the Indian chiefs. Among the difficulties in the way of a successful negotiation, (and if we had again occasion for the services of these people in the field, they would, I fear, be serious,) are the following claims against the United States, to which I beg leave again to call your attention.

1st. Claims presented in my letter of the 22d August, 1815, from Nashville. I told the claimants that I had made the reference to the Department of War, and entertained hopes that, if the accounts were not admitted in their present shape, some person would be ordered to audit and settle them.

2d. Many of the people living on the road had furnished provisions to the Tennessee and Kentucky militia on their passage through the nation, taking the orders of the commanding generals on the quartermaster's department in Tennessee. Of these orders, I took on upwards of $2,000 for collection last summer. Mr. Lewis, the quartermaster, had resigned before I got to Nashville, and payments were suspended till a successor could be appointed. I left the drafts in the hands of Mr. Sommerville, who writes me, on the 19th May, "they [the drafts] must be sent to the city of Washington for examination." This arrangement will subject these illiterate people to loss and vexation; ignorant as they are, how, at this late hour, are they to obtain payment for provisions so long ago sold to a Government in which they had the most implicit confidence?

3d. Pay due to the warriors who have been in the service of the United States. In some cases, muster-rolls have been made out and transmitted to the Department; in other cases, they never were made out. The company officers could not do it. I had at the time so many other duties to attend to, that it was out of my power, and there were no other persons who considered it as their duty. About six hundred, who were with me destroying the enemy's settlements on the Black Warrior, in January, 1814, are in this situation, as well as upwards of seven hundred who were at Alabama Heights in the spring following. Whilst on the subject of claims against the Government, permit me to solicit your attention to the charge of Turner Brashears, exhibited in my letter of 30th November, 1814, and referred to in those of 31st December, 1815, and 1st April, 1816. Having so often referred this particular case to the Department of War, I am unwilling to pay it on my own responsibility, though I have no doubt of its justice, (as far, at least, as the beef and corn,) and I hope to be honored as early as possible with your decision.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN MCKEE.

Hon. Wm. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR: MOUNT LAWRENCE, CHOCTAW TRADING-HOUSE, July 13, 1816.

I find it is impossible to have at this place either the provisions or goods necessary for the contemplated treaty with the Choctaws much sooner than the 15th day of October, and have appointed that day for the meeting, and notified my colleagues and the chiefs of the nation.

This will afford time to receive the decision of the Government on the subjects embraced in my letter of the 1st instant, which will, in all probability, have a great influence on the issue of the negotiation.

I will proceed in a few days to New Orleans, to superintend the selection of the goods for the occasion, with a view to the fancy of the Indians, especially in articles of clothing and ornaments for the chiefs.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN MCKEE.

Hon. Wm. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR: CHOCTAW TRADING-HOUSE, July 20, 1816.

In reply to your inquiry relating to the murder of the two Choctaws by white men in the settlement of Basset's creek, in the summer of 1813, I hand you the accompanying paper, and make no hesitation in adding my opinion that the Choctaw nation is entitled to some satisfaction for the murder. The persons who killed the Indians can have no other excuse for conduct so rash than the circumstance of some Choctaws having joined the Creeks in the war which was about that time breaking out with us.

I am, &c.

GEORGE S. GAINES.

Col. JOHN MCKEE, Agent to the Choctaws.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

AUGUST 9, 1813.

I am sorry to inform you that two of my relations have been barbarously, and without any just cause, killed by some of your people, and that at a time when we are in the sincerest bonds of friendship with your nation; I therefore wish you to inform me for what cause was this murder committed on my people, whether it was through mistake or accident, and what my people had done to provoke them to this act. My people who are living at Passechuker are near to me, and I do not wish the white people to injure them. As soon as the corn of my people is dry enough to eat, I will call them all into the nation, as it is not my wish that any of them should join the Creeks in the war with your people.

I have four men and a woman missing; they were innocently pursuing their avocations near the place where this massacre on my people took place; should any of your people have taken them prisoners, thinking them to be Creeks, you will please to treat them kindly, and send them to their own land. With regard to this murder committed on my nephews, the man who was wounded gives the following account: they had been some time encamped hunting and collecting beeswax and honey to trade with your people; with that intention they went to a house, where, finding the people had gone, they started to return to their camp; on their way, they shot a hawk; in a little time they saw a number of white people armed, and on horseback; they called to them in a friendly manner; when they came near to them, they offered them their hands as usual, but the white people surrounded them, took them, disarmed them, and tied them; they then led them to a place about three miles from where they took them; then they intended to kill them. Under this impression, they endeavored to escape: the sequel you are too well acquainted with. The guns your people took are two rifles and a shot gun, also a keg of honey. Six of my men I have sent to you with this letter. You will endeavor to send me the guns your people took in this unfortunate affair, and pay for the keg of honey, which belonged to the wounded Indian who fortunately made his escape.

It is my wish that the road between our people be always kept white; I want no blood spilt between us; I want you to answer my letter without delay, and hide nothing from me.

The President of the United States I have seen; I have given him the hand of friendship; his people I love; to him I look for injuries committed on my nation. Your quarrel with the Creeks I have nothing to do with; I love peace, and wish to remain so. As soon as my people can return to their own land and secure their corn, your people may treat as enemies any they find among the enemies of white people.

My friendship for you and your people, I again repeat, is sincere, and I hope will always remain so.

Your friend and brother,

POOSHEMATAHA, his \times mark.

SIR: NASHVILLE, August 14, 1816.

The importance of a good military road direct to New Orleans and Mobile has induced the Government to direct the undersigned to have it explored, run, marked, and opened, with the least possible delay. For this purpose they have instructed me to employ an assistant topographical engineer, who will be entitled to the pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry. Finding it impossible to procure a character competent to the task, at this season of the year, for the compensation authorized, and the safety of the lower country requiring that this duty should be executed with as little delay as possible, it has become indispensable to order you to perform it, for which you will receive the additional compensation, as an assistant topographical engineer, as specified above.

You will therefore, with as little delay as possible, proceed to run a line from Nashville to the Tennessee river, south, 20° west, marking where it crosses all public roads, watercourses, &c., noting the same in a journal to be kept for that purpose, and describing the country through which the line passes. When you reach the Tennessee river, you will explore the banks on each side, and select a good place for crossing with a ferry boat, and report the same to me at Campbell's, at the lower end of the shoals, at which place I shall be on the 24th instant. You will be governed in the selection of the crossing by the point at which you strike the shoals; as the crossing cannot be in them, it must be above or below. The course directed is supposed to be the direct course to Orleans, hence the propriety of making the crossing place of the Tennessee river as near a straight line as the river and country on the south side will permit. As soon as you fix upon the point on the Tennessee river, you will proceed to run, measure, and explore the country to Lake Pontchartrain, in a direct line, calculating the variation you have made from south 20° west run to the river; marking in your journal all the remarkable places, watercourses, swamps, and general face of the country through which you pass. You will advise me of the point at which you cross the Tombigbee as early as possible.

When you reach the lake, you will proceed to Chefuncty, taking the course and direction from the point you strike, make your calculations, and return in a direct line to the point at which you crossed the Tennessee, provided that proves the shortest practicable route for a road to Nashville; if not, you will take any other route that will accomplish the above object. You will mark the direction by which you return, so that it may be traced and followed by those ordered to superintend the opening of the road.

You will explore the country on both sides through which the road passes, and carefully note its general appearance. To assist you in this duty, I have employed an excellent woodsman to accompany you, and who will be under your orders. When you enter the Choctaw nation, you will employ a confidential Indian as a pilot, who is well acquainted with the country to the lake.

Colonel Butler, acting as quartermaster general, is instructed to procure and furnish you with the necessary supplies.

The importance of a good military road to Orleans (the emporium of the West) and Mobile, running the nearest and best way, and the confidence reposed in your integrity, skill, and enterprise, have induced the commanding general to assign to you the duty of exploring the country and selecting the route, being well assured it will be performed with skill and despatch.

Respectfully, yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Commanding Division of the South.

To Major WM. O. BUTLER,
1st Regiment United States infantry.

SIR:

NASHVILLE, August 18.

I am directed by the honorable Secretary of War to hold a treaty with the Chickasaw Indians on the 1st of next month, in conjunction with Jesse Franklin, Esq., of North Carolina, and General Meriwether, of Georgia, at the old council-house in said nation.

I am advised by the agent of the Chickasaws (Col. Cocke) that he has no instructions to provide the necessary supplies for the Indians and commissioners during the treaty.

I have received no instructions from the Secretary of War on this subject, nor can I learn that any measures have been adopted by the Department of War to insure a supply for the Indians expected to attend the treaty. Evil consequences may result from calling them together and having no supplies for them; to prevent which, I have to request that you will undertake, as agent for the commissioners, to lay in the necessary supplies for the Indians and commissioners.

Your duty in this capacity will be to provide a wagon at this place for the transportation of the necessary supplies for the commissioners and principal chiefs that may attend the treaty. Herewith I enclose you a memorandum of such articles as I think will be needed, leaving you to add such as you may think will be wanted. None of these articles can be procured in the nation.

As soon as you have accomplished this, you will proceed to the nation and procure such a supply of beef, corn, &c. as you may judge sufficient, from the information you may receive from the agent, interpreters, and principal chiefs, for the probable number that will attend, calculating on a delegation of twenty from each of the other tribes.

You will make engagements for the delivery of the beef, corn, and flour, at or near the council-house. The agent informs me that he has engaged a small quantity of flour, which you will receive and pay for. In all things you will consult economy, but you must procure a sufficient supply.

The wagon must set out by the 19th instant. I enclose you a check for $500 to cover the first expenses, and you will have to draw on me for any additional funds that may be necessary.

Yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
One of the commissioners to treat with the Chickasaws.

Memorandum of necessaries to be purchased by Mr. J. Hutchings.

Two boxes of claret.
One barrel of good whiskey.
One hundred pounds of coffee.
Two hundred pounds of sugar.
Four dozen knives and forks.
One dozen spoons.
Sixty pounds of rice.
Three loaves of white sugar.

One barrel of biscuit.
Four tin dishes, assorted.
Two dozen tin plates.
Two ovens.
One frying pan.
Two dozen tumblers.
One coffee pot.
Two tin buckets.
One keg of molasses.

J. HUTCHINGS, Esq., &c.

SIR:

NASHVILLE, August 18, 1816.

I wrote you on the 20th ultimo, calling your attention to the subject of supplies to be furnished the Indians and commissioners during the treaty to be held in the Chickasaw nation. Having received no reply to that communication, being further advised by Colonel Cocke that he had no authority for making the necessary provisions, and knowing the evil that may arise from assembling the Indians without being prepared to administer to their wants, I have been induced to appoint Captain John Hutchings as agent for this purpose. I have advanced to him five hundred dollars, with authority to draw on me for such additional sums as may be requisite in making the necessary purchases and arrangements. A copy of instructions delivered Captain Hutchings is herewith enclosed, with a hope that they will meet with your approbation.

I leave this on the 20th for the Chickasaw nation. As yet, I have no intelligence of Major Franklin or General Meriwether, but trust I shall meet them at the place and time appointed.

Finding it impossible to procure a capable person to run the line and mark the direction of the road to Mobile and New Orleans for the compensation authorized, and knowing the importance of ascertaining the point from whence the road would leave the Tennessee and cross the Tombigbee river previous to the approaching convention with the Chickasaws and other Indians, I have been induced to order Major William O. Butler to perform this arduous duty, promising him the extra compensation of an assistant topographical engineer. A copy of his instructions is herewith enclosed.

With respect, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 13, 1816.

Upon my return from the State of Georgia, your letters of the 1st and 20th of July last were laid before me. I am fearful that some of the difficulties in the way of a successful negotiation with the Choctaws cannot be removed in time. The claims presented in your letter of the 22d of August, 1815, are under the examination of the Accountant of the War Department, and will be allowed as far as the existing regulations will permit. The mass of business which had accumulated in the Accountant's office during the war has been so great as to induce the National Legislature to appoint an additional Accountant; but even this assistance will not be sufficient to secure the immediate settlement of old accounts. No time, however, will be lost in adjusting those of the Indian department.

The claims which you have left with Mr. Sommerville had better be sent on without delay, as it is more than probable their irregularity will render the sanction of the Secretary indispensable. All the Indian claims of this nature which have been presented have been found to require this sanction.

Payment has been ordered upon the muster-rolls which have been forwarded to this Department, and the money will be sent to you for that purpose as soon as the pay-rolls are made out by the paymaster general. This would have been done long since, but the muster-rolls were sent to the superintendent of Indian trade, who sent them to this office with other papers, by which means they have been overlooked until the receipt of your letter of the 1st of July.

The pay which is due to the other warriors will be discharged upon the production of the best evidence which can, at this time, be procured; which evidence you are now authorized to obtain with as little delay as possible. It is expected that you will accompany the evidence in support of their claims with such remarks as will enable the Department to decide with some degree of correctness upon them. Your opinion of the justice of the claims will necessarily have great weight. In the case of those employed on the Black Warrior, under your immediate command, it is supposed you will have no difficulty. In the case of those employed on the Alabama, the best evidence which can be obtained will be sufficient to secure them their pay.

You are authorized to pay the account of Turner Brashears as far as you are satisfied of its justice, and shall be credited for whatever amount you shall pay.

The letter of the 5th of April, in which you say the case of Wayna is mentioned, has never been received at this Department; it is therefore impossible that any decision can be made, as there is no trace of the claim except the incidental mention of it in your letter of the 20th of July last.

The request for a gin to be built for the use of the nation will be submitted to the President, who will, no doubt, order it to be erected. Cotton cards will be supplied by the superintendent of Indian trade without delay, and others will be presented to them as soon as the will of the President can be known.

Complaints of the Indians of the murder of their people by the whites must be inquired into as early as possible, with a view to do them ample justice. This inquiry is confided to you by the President. The enclosed account is transmitted as possibly having some connexion with the complaint. The murders complained of may have been committed by parties of the hostile Creeks, or other tribes not in amity with the Choctaws.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

Colonel JOHN MCKEE, Choctaw Agent.

SIR:

CHOCTAW AGENCY, November 18, 1816.

I had the honor to receive your several letters of the 2d, 13th, and 23d September last, whilst occupied in the negotiations for the late treaty with the Choctaws, which afforded me neither time nor opportunity to reply to them before my return to the agency.

I have not yet, but expect in a few days, the information necessary to a satisfactory compliance with the resolution of Congress of 27th April last, and will not delay a moment in transmitting it to you.

The letter of the 13th September arrived in good time, and had, in my opinion, a very happy effect, if not on the issue of the treaty, at least in soothing the wounded spirit of the Choctaws; for it would be misleading the Government to conceal that they were considerably mortified to find the Creek claims on Tombigbee waters more generally and zealously advocated than theirs. The papers Nos. 1 and 2 will present to the view of the President their wishes; and granting them to a reasonable extent would, I think, have a happy effect on the temper of these people. The mechanics, judging from the effect produced by those already employed, would accelerate their approximation to the habits of the whites; and schoolmasters, well selected, would aid very much in the great work of civilization.

No. 3 is a petition signed by some of the most respectable citizens in Wayne county, and the Choctaw chiefs of the district adjoining.

No. 4 covers all I have been able to collect relating to the killing of two Choctaws on Bassett's creek, east of Tombigbee, in the summer of 1813. The mingo Pooshemataha seldom fails to introduce this subject in council. He thinks, and so do most of the respectable inhabitants from the neighborhood where the act was committed, that these Indians were very improperly killed.

No. 5 is a statement of the murder of Tehoachabby, on Washita, during last winter. I have little doubt but this statement is substantially correct. In similar cases, I believe the Indians have heretofore accepted money as an atonement for the blood of their relations. I find from a memorandum book of my predecessor, that, in some cases more doubtful than those now reported, two hundred dollars were paid as an atonement for the life of a man. I am not authorized to say that this sum would be satisfactory in these cases; for, although I infer from their manner of applying to me that money would satisfy them, having no instructions on the subject, I never inquired what sum would meet their expectations.

No. 6 is the copy of my letter of the 5th April, stating Wayna's complaint, referred to in my letter of 20th July, and which had not been received at the Department.

I have fortunately been enabled to avail myself of the services of Thomas H. Williams, Esq., secretary to the late Choctaw commission, to go through the nation to collect and report a list of such Choctaws as have performed military service during the late war, and were not mustered, and such other claims as remain unliquidated and appear to be just; which I hope he will be able to complete before Christmas.

The late acquisition of territory bordering immediately on the eastern settlements of the Choctaws will, in my opinion, require an assistant in this agency, to reside on the Tombigbee, or here, if the agency should be removed to that place, as the Indians have requested. I have no person in view for such an appointment, (if it should meet the approbation of the President,) unless Mr. Nicholas Byers, late United States factor to the Cherokees, could be induced to accept it; he is honest, firm, and well acquainted with the Indian character. Such an assistant might be of great service on that frontier, until the parties, from their necessary intercourse, could become acquainted with each other, and would aid in promoting civilization among the Indians, which their narrowed limits render more necessary now than ever.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect and esteem, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN McKEE.

The Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

[NOTE.—The papers referred to in this letter from Nos. 1 to 6 are not now to be found.]

Extract from the minutes of a conference held with the Choctaws, at the Choctaw factory, by the commissioners of the United States.

THURSDAY, October 24, 1816.

David Folsom, as the organ of the Choctaw commissioners, stated that it was unanimously agreed to cede the land lying east of the Tombigbee river; that the Choctaws were always anxious to please their father the President of the United States, who had on so many occasions manifested his kindness towards his red children; was sorry to learn that the Creeks claimed the country in question as being within their original boundary; that the claim was unjust; that the land belonged to the Choctaws, who were now wishing to cede it to the United States, because there seemed to be some difficulty about the title, which they were anxious to remove, and, above all, were desirous, by thus complying with the President's wishes, to afford a strong demonstration of their respect for and attachment to him. He was instructed, he said, to urge some points in favor of the nation, before the negotiations were brought to a close, which he proceeded to state as follows:

1st. That the purchase money for the land about to be ceded should be paid in hand; or, if that was inadmissible, that the annual payments should remain in the hands of the Government, and the nation draw interest thereon. The object of this plan was to create a fund for the rising race to defray the expense of schools and other plans for their improvement.

2d. That the present system of peddling in the nation be prohibited.

3d. That the Choctaw agency be removed to the eastern part of the nation, for the purpose of having the agent's attention more particularly directed to the prevention of irregularities between the new settlers in the ceded territory and the Indians. That, on the other frontier borders, they were already acquainted with the whites, and lived in harmony.

4th. That the Indians have the option of receiving the annual payments in money or merchandise; and that, in either case, the expense and risk to be on the part of the United States.

5th. That the new as well as the old annuity be paid or distributed in future at the trading-house or factory.

6th. That, as many red people are now settled on the western bank of the Tombigbee, who cultivate lands on the east side, some indemnity should be given for their improvements in clearing and fencing their fields.

7th. That, as it has been usual in Indian treaties to make reserves in favor of individuals, the chiefs of the Choctaws in this instance wished to stipulate for reserves east of Tombigbee in favor of some half-breeds.

8th. That the Choctaw nation, in the proposed cession, do not mean to give up the reserve made at Fukitchee-pona, by the treaty of 1805.

He then concluded by inquiring whether the Choctaws would be deprived of the use of the navigation of the Tombigbee.

General Coffee, in behalf of the United States commissioners, replied extemporaneously, and in substance as follows:

With respect to the prompt payment, beyond the sum of ten thousand dollars stated in the proposition, and that the United States should retain in their hands the annual payments, and pay the Indians an interest, they were equally inadmissible.

In relation to new regulations with respect to trade, to removal of the agency, the option of receiving the payments in goods or money, and the place where to be received or distributed, they were questions within the control of the President, who would, no doubt, on the representations of the agent, take such measures as were best calculated to promote the interest and gratify the reasonable wishes of the Choctaws.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 4, 1816.

The treaty signed by the commissioners on the part of the United States with the Choctaw nation has been received, and will be approved. As all difficulties on account of conflicting Indian titles are now happily removed, every exertion will be made to complete the surveys, and bring the lands in the Mississippi Territory to market as soon as practicable; and as the opening of the contemplated road from the Tennessee river to the State of Louisiana will, no doubt, have a considerable effect on the price of the land contiguous to the road, it is desirable that the road should not only be marked off, but opened as far as practicable, previous to the sales of the public land. A knowledge of your own opinions on this subject inspires entire confidence, not only in relation to your own exertions, but as to the proper application of the means in your power to the speedy accomplishment of the object.

It is understood from Major Woolley that the requisition made on him for tools, &c. &c. has been complied with. Mr. Young, agreeably to your request, will be nominated to the Senate as an assistant topographical engineer. It would be very desirable, in laying off this road, that the number of the sections of land through which it passes should be noted: this, I presume, can only be done by the combined exertions of the surveyor of the public land and of your assistant topographical engineer.

Your idea relative to a military depot on the Tennessee, at or near the Muscle shoals, is approved; and as it may be expedient ultimately to connect an armory and foundry for cannon with this depot, I have to request that you explore, or cause to be explored by some judicious and capable person in whom you have entire confidence, the country adjacent to the Muscle shoals, for the purpose of selecting such sites as may embrace a command of water, fuel, and iron ore, that the Government may be prepared to make the necessary reservations previous to the sale of the lands. My opinion is that the reservations, altogether, should not be less than thirty thousand acres. The increased value of the lands in ten years will probably be equal to the expenses of erecting the necessary buildings for the establishment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 5, 1816.

Your communication covering the treaty with the Choctaws has been received, and I am requested by the President to express to you his approbation of the treaty which has happily terminated all our difficulties with the southern Indians. You will draw on this Department for your compensation at the rate of eight dollars per day for the time you were engaged in this business, and for your necessary expenses.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM,
Acting Secretary of War.

Gen. JOHN COFFEE,
Hon. JOHN RHEA,
Col. JOHN MCKEE,

Commissioners, &c. to treat with the Choctaw Nation.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

NASHVILLE, December 21, 1816.

Sir:

Your letter of the 4th instant, acknowledging the receipt of the late treaty with the Choctaws, came to hand by yesterday's mail, and I am happy to learn that the whole of the treaties made with the southern tribes meet the approbation of the President.

Nothing can promote the welfare of the United States, and particularly the southwestern frontier, so much as bringing into market, at an early day, the whole of this fertile country. The proceeds accruing thence to the treasury will be great, and it will also give a permanent population to that frontier competent to its defence; and the sooner the laws can be extended over that section of the country the better.

The importance of the contemplated military road is duly appreciated, and no delay will be permitted after Mr. Young, acting assistant topographical engineer, finishes the line which he is now occupied in running.

I am happy to find that Mr. Young will be nominated for the appointment of assistant topographical engineer; he possesses talents that may, with experience, be usefully employed by the United States; and, as soon as he returns, he will be instructed to note the sections through which the road passes, so soon as the sections are run and marked.

I will, at as early a day as my health will permit, explore the country adjacent to the Muscle shoals for the purpose expressed in your letter, and report the result of my researches to you without delay. I fully agree with you that the reservation of thirty thousand acres is little enough for the grand object contemplated.

I am, very respectfully,

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General Commanding.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Esq.
Acting Secretary of War.

No. 145.

[2d SESSION.]

EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITH THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 9, 1817.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed by a resolution of the 25th ult. "to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, an exchange of territory with any of the Indian tribes," reported:

That, from a view of the proceedings of Government relative to the extinguishment of Indian title and the settlement of vacant lands, it appears to have been a policy early adopted that new settlements which became necessary from the increase of population should be formed on the adjoining vacant territory, and proceed by a regular advance, so as to preserve always a compact population on the frontier. Anterior to the Revolution, that policy seems to have been pursued. The proclamation of the King of Great Britain of the 7th of October, 1763, prohibited settlements being made on the Indian territory, and the purchase of their lands by unauthorized persons. It also restricted the grants for new lands to certain defined limits. The first ordinances of the Congress under the confederation for disposing of the public lands were formed on the same principles of policy. But circumstances not originating in the measures of our Government imposed the necessity of a departure from the system first adopted. Several settlements, distant from the mass of population, and detached from each other, were embraced by the boundaries of the United States as established by the treaty of 1783. These settlements had been early formed under the Government of France, and the inhabitants had from thence derived titles to lands which were recognised as valid, and as citizens they had a just claim to defence and protection. The most easy and certain measure for their security, and to afford them defence, was the increase of their population. The Indian title to the adjoining lands was extinguished; and these separate settlements extended, while extensive intervening territory lay vacant, still subject to the claim of Indian title. The acquisition of Louisiana by the treaty of 1803 has still more increased the irregularity of the frontier boundary, and added to the number of distant and detached settlements.

The evils and inconvenience resulting from the irregular form of the frontier are manifest. While separate settlements, or such as project with a narrow front far into the Indian country, are formed, the causes of provocation to hostility with the Indian tribes are multiplied, and at the same time the means of protection and defence proportionally diminished. Where so many assailable points are presented to an enemy, the expense would be incalculable (and, indeed, no force within the means of Government can be adequate) to afford complete protection.

The present irregular form of the frontier, deeply indented by tracts of Indian territory, presents an extended boundary on which intercourse is maintained between the citizen and the savage, the effect of which on the moral habits of both is not unworthy of regard. It is an intercourse by which the civilized man cannot be improved, and by which there is ground to believe the savage is depraved; not being sufficiently enlightened to receive a favorable impression from the virtues of civilization, while he is exposed to the contagion of its vices.

The committee are of opinion that the proposition contained in the resolution on which they are instructed to report is better calculated to remedy the inconvenience and remove the evils arising out of the present state of the frontier settlements than any other within the power of the Government. The removal of the Indian tribes from their lands surrounded by and contiguous to our settlements will give place to a compact population, and give strength to the means of national defence. This, however, can only take place with the voluntary consent of those tribes, and must be effected by negotiation and treaty in the usual manner. Those tribes have been recognised so far, as independent communities, as to become parties to treaties with us, and to have a right to govern themselves without being subject to the laws of the United States; and their right to remain in possession of the lands they occupy, and to sell them when they please, has been always acknowledged. Whether any legislative aid (beyond that of appropriation of money) is necessary for forming treaties for exchange of territory with the Indian tribes, is questionable. The grant of power to make treaties is undefined by the constitution; it has been considered to extend to all subjects proper for treaty regulation with other independent States, except the cases in which the special grant of power to other branches of the Government may operate as a restriction to its exercise. The question as to the power of alienating any portion of the public domain, by treaty or otherwise, is not involved in the present case. The contemplated exchange is no other than a transfer of the Indian right of possession from one portion of the public domain to another. This transfer cannot be made without the agreement of a community independent of our laws; hence it only can be effected by a treaty with them. The incompetency of the treaty-making power to act in the proposed case, without a legislative authorization, is inferred from the power granted to Congress "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." It is probable that, viewing this provision as fixing a limit to the power of making treaties for an exchange of territory with Indian tribes, a former Congress did by law authorize the President to stipulate with the Indian tribes residing east of the Mississippi for an exchange of lands the property of the United States on the west side of that river; that law remains yet in force, except the appropriation provided by it, which must have passed to the surplus fund. No other legislative provision appears necessary on the subject of the resolution, but an appropriation of such sum of money as will enable the President to carry into effect the provisions of the former law, and form treaties with the other tribes for that purpose. The committee have not the means for ascertaining the quantity of lands to which the Indian title is extinguished west of the Mississippi that may be appropriated for the residence of tribes who may consent to remove; but it is believed there will be a deficiency, should several tribes give their consent, after a proper reservation is made, for settlements in that quarter. In estimating the appropriation to be made, the expense of negotiations with the tribes west of the Mississippi for lands to be applied for the purpose in view, must be taken into consideration. From the foregoing, the committee respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That an appropriation be made, by law, to enable the President of the United States to negotiate treaties with the Indian tribes, which treaties shall have for their object an exchange of territory owned by any tribe residing east of the Mississippi for other land west of that river.

[2d SESSION.]

EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITH THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 17, 1817.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, WASHINGTON, January 16, 1817.

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 14th of this month, requesting information respecting the "exchange of lands with any of the Indian tribes now completed, or contemplated under the act of Congress approved on the 26th day of March, 1804, entitled 'An act to erect Louisiana into two Territories, and to provide for the temporary government thereof,'" I have the honor to enclose the papers marked A, B, C, and D, which embrace all the information relative to the measures which have been taken in relation to an exchange of lands with the Cherokee nation of Indians.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

The Hon. JOHN GAILLARD, President of the Senate.

A.

My Children, deputies of the Cherokees of the upper and lower towns:

JANUARY 9, 1809.

I understand by the speeches which you have delivered me that there is a difference of disposition among the people of both parts of your nation; some of them desiring to remain on their lands, to betake themselves to agriculture and the industrious occupations of civilized life, while others, retaining their attachment to the hunter's life, and having little game on their present lands, are desirous to remove across the Mississippi, to some of the vacant lands of the United States, where game is abundant. I am pleased to find so many disposed to insure, by the cultivation of the earth, a plentiful subsistence to their families, and to improve their minds by education; but I do not blame those who, having been brought up from their infancy to the pursuit of game, desire still to follow it to distant countries. I know how difficult it is for men to change the habits in which they have been raised. The United States, my children, are the friends of both parties, and, as far as can reasonably be asked, they will be willing to satisfy the wishes of both. Those who remain may be assured of our patronage, our aid, and good neighborhood; those who wish to remove are permitted to send an exploring party to reconnoitre the country on the waters of the Arkansas and White rivers—and the higher up the better, as they will be the longer unapproached by our settlements, which will begin at the mouths of those rivers. The regular districts of the government of St. Louis are already laid off to the St. Francis river. When this party shall have found a tract of country suiting the emigrants, and not claimed by other Indians, we will arrange with them and you the exchange of that for a just portion of the country they leave, and to a part of which, proportioned to their numbers, they have a right. Every aid towards their removal, and what will be necessary for them there, will then be freely administered to them, and, when established in their new settlements, we shall still consider them as our children, give them the benefit of exchanging their peltries for what they will want at our factories, and always hold them firmly by the hand.

I will now, my children, proceed to answer your kind address on my retiring from the Government. Sensible that I am become too old to watch over the concerns of the seventeen States and their Territories, I requested my fellow-citizens to permit me to retire, to live with my family, and to choose another President for themselves, and father for you. They have done so, and in a short time I shall retire and resign into his hands the care of your and our concerns. Be assured, my children, that he will have the same friendly dispositions towards you which I have had, and that you will find in him a true and affectionate father: indeed, this is now the disposition of all our people towards you. They look upon you as brethren, born in the same land, and having the same interests. Tell your people, therefore, to entertain no uneasiness on account of this change, for there will be no change as to them. Deliver to them my adieus, and my prayers to the Great Spirit for their happiness. Tell them that, during my administration, I have held their hand fast in mine, and that I will put it into the hand of their new father, who will hold it as I have done.

TH: JEFFERSON.

B.

Extract of a letter from William H. Crawford, Secretary of War, to Messrs. Clark, Edwards, and Chouteau, commissioners, &c., St. Louis, dated

MAY 27, 1816.

The adjustment of the Cherokee claim to the settlements they have made under the permission given them by Mr. Jefferson, will necessarily occupy your attention. It is difficult to give precise instructions upon this subject. In deciding upon it, you must keep in view the fact that the Cherokee nation refuse to make any cession of their lands in consideration of the settlements which have been assigned to their countrymen. This may have proceeded, in some degree, from a knowledge that no lands had been specifically assigned to the Cherokee emigrants by the United States. In any arrangements of this kind, there ought to be an express provision that an assignment should not be binding upon the United States unless the same extent of country should be ceded by the Cherokees who have not emigrated, or at least an extent of country equal to what the emigrants would be entitled to upon an equal partition of their lands according to their relative numbers.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 12, 1816.

The extracts mentioned in the postscript of my letter of the 11th instant, not being prepared at the closing of the mail, are now forwarded, together with an extract from a letter from this Department, under date of the 27th of May, 1816, to the commissioners, to whom the complaints of the Cherokees on the Arkansas have been referred. The bearing of these papers upon the negotiations in which you are engaged is so obvious as to require no explanation from me.

Should an arrangement be made, founded upon the principle of exchange as contemplated by Mr. Jefferson and the Cherokee emigrants, a cession adjoining the settlements of Georgia may possibly be obtained. A part of the lands ceded by the Cherokees to the State of Georgia in the treaty of 1783 was relinquished by the treaty of 1790, a considerable portion of which has never been receded, and none of it regularly. That part, at least, ought to be receded, and if the cession could be extended to the Chattahoochee, it would not be more than what the State had a right to expect. This, however, is mentioned rather as what is expected than what is attainable. General Meriwether, one of the commissioners, is fully acquainted with all the circumstances, and will give the explanations which may be necessary, should there be a prospect of obtaining a cession.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

General ANDREW JACKSON,
DAVID MERIWETHER, and } Commissioners, &c.
JESSE FRANKLIN, Esqs. }

D.

Extract of a letter from William H. Crawford, Secretary of War, to Messrs. Clark, Edwards, and Chouteau, commissioners, &c., St. Louis, dated

SEPTEMBER 17, 1816.

Upon the subject of an eventual cession from the Osages or Quapaws becoming necessary to secure the Cherokee emigrants in their possessions, no precise instructions can be given. Those settlements were made upon an understanding which has never been fulfilled, or even acknowledged by the Cherokee nation, since that period. On the contrary, when urged upon that point last winter, they rejected the idea of exchange of lands in consideration for those upon which their emigrant brethren had settled, and said that they should be compelled to return and live with the nation. They even refused to consider them as entitled to any part of the annuities payable to the Cherokees.

This subject has been referred to the commissioners now holding a treaty in the Chickasaw nation with the four southern tribes. Should the condition upon which the settlements upon the Arkansas were founded be recognised by the nation, it will then become the duty of the United States to provide permanently for those emigrants, by securing them in the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. Should the nation, however, persevere in the sentiments by which their deputation was animated last winter, all obligation on the part of the United States is extinguished. To their own nation they must look for indemnity for any losses which they may sustain in consequence of their emigration. The United States cannot be bound if the conditions on the other part are violated.

The result of the pending negotiation will remove all doubt on the subject, either by releasing us from all obligations, or by defining the extent of the duties imposed upon us in relation to the settlers upon the Arkansas.

CLAIM OF THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 29, 1817.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom had been referred a resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to satisfy the claims of the friendly Creek Indians whose property was plundered by the hostile Creeks, in consequence of their attachment to the United States, reported:

That the foundation of a claim on the part of the friendly Creek Indians to an indemnity for the losses which they sustained from hostile Indians of their own tribe is best explained by the instrument delivered by them to General Jackson on the 9th August, 1814. In this they say: "We call ourselves, as we are, masters of the land. We have adhered faithfully in peace and war to our treaty stipulations with the United States. Finding that General Jackson, in drawing the lines around our country, to retain so much of that conquered from the hostile Indians as he deemed just, found it necessary, for political motives and purposes, to run a line within which there is a great quantity of lands, actually our property, for which he, as an equivalent, leaves to the conquered Indians lands between Coosa and Tallapoosa, we do not deem the exchange as an equivalent. It shall not, however, interfere with running the line, as we rely on the justice of the United States to cause justice to be done us. And, on these conditions, we request that General Pinckney's letter of the 23d of April, to Colonel Hawkins, and the answer thereto, of the 25th, be sent on with the treaty, which we will sign after delivering this instrument." The remainder of the instrument was designed to confer donations of land, and is not connected with the subject referred to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means. It is included among the documents which accompany this report, and which also comprise several letters from Colonel Hawkins on the subject of the Indian claim, and minutes of occurrences at Fort Jackson during the negotiation.

In delivering this instrument, the speaker (of the Creeks) urged "that it should be sent on to the Government, with the treaty and the letters" from General Pinckney and Colonel Hawkins; "and after this, they would sign with the general. The general said he would send up his secretary with the treaty and documents mentioned; and such of the Indians then present, who have claims, might make them out, lodge them with him, and his secretary should take them with him; which was done accordingly."

The plan of signing the treaty of cession, and accompanying it by a declaration of their claims, appears to have been supported by the advice of Colonel Hawkins, the United States agent. This gentleman writes to the Secretary of War that "he feels that the chiefs, by their confidence in the United States, will not have to reproach him for advising them to concede this line of accommodation." The instrument delivered to General Jackson, the Indians consider, according to Colonel Hawkins, as their part of the treaty.

In the letter referred to in this instrument, General Pinckney tells Colonel Hawkins that "he may inform the [friendly] Indians that the United States will not forget their fidelity; but, in the arrangements which may be made of the lands to be retained as indemnity, their claims will be respected, and such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves by their exertions and valor in the common cause will also receive a remuneration in the ceded lands, and in such manner as the Government shall direct."

These extracts appear to the committee to be sufficient to show that, if the friendly Creeks are to be considered as having consented to the cession made by the treaty of 1814, it was only on the condition that their claims to indemnity should not be disregarded. Congress, indeed, may be considered as having recognised their claim by the act of the last session for the relief of Samuel Manac, one of their number.

At the time of the treaty, the friendly Creeks would have been satisfied, in the opinion of Colonel Hawkins, to have received as an indemnity for their losses the sum of $60,000. As it is to be considered in some measure a claim under a treaty, as they seem to have expected that some fixed sum would be distributed among them as an equivalent for their losses, and as to do so will be to make it the interest of each sufferer that the losses of another shall not be exaggerated beyond their real amount, the committee believe that it will be best to appropriate a definite sum to be applied, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to indemnify the friendly Creek Indians for property destroyed by the hostile Creeks, in fair proportion to their losses.

TRADE AND INTERCOURSE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 4, 1817.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred two resolutions on the 19th of December, 1816, reported:

That the capital appropriated for the prosecution of Indian trade was, in 1809, augmented from $200,000 to $300,000, which sum, by succeeding acts, has been continued down to this period. Of the capital thus appropriated, $290,000 have been drawn from the treasury, and actively employed under the direction of the superintendent of Indian supplies. Under the various laws enacted for the support and encouragement of Indian trade, eight factories or trading posts have been established at the following points:

1. Fort Mitchell, Georgia.
2. Chickasaw Bluffs, Mississippi Territory.
3. Fort Confederation, on the Tombigbee river.
4. Fort Osage, on the Missouri river, near the mouth of the Osage.
5. Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi, near the mouth of the Ouisconsin river.
6. At a place not named, nine miles from Natchitoches.
7. Green Bay, on the Green Bay of Lake Michigan, Illinois Territory.
8. Chicago, Lake Michigan.

The committee, averse to the supposition that it was the will of the House that they should present a detailed view of the profit and loss of each particular agency, submit, in relation to the general establishment, that it has been a losing institution; owing, it is presumable, to adventitious circumstances, originating in our recent belligerent state, and not growing out of any defect in the organization or government of the trade. From the first operations of this traffic up to December, 1809, it sustained a loss of $44,538 36. Since that period the trade has been more successful, it having yielded a profit on the capital actually vested in merchandise of about $15,000 annually, after covering a loss of $43,369, which accrued in consequence of the capture of several trading posts by the enemy during the late war.

In this view of the subject the committee have not embraced an item of $20,000, annually disbursed at the Treasury, for the pay of the superintendent and his clerks, the factors, &c., and which, when applied to the concern, as necessarily it must be, in making an estimate of profit and loss, will absorb the profits arising from the funds employed in trade, and furnish an annual charge against the establishment of $5,000. This annual loss being sustained by the treasury, pursuant to specific appropriations for the pay of the superintendent and his assistants, is a positive loss to the Government, but not to the concern, in the diminution of its capital, which, under all circumstances, remains stationary. The act of the last session, giving to the President the discretionary power of licensing foreigners to a participation in the Indian trade, is less exceptionable in theory than in practice. With all the guards of the act and precautions of the Executive, it has been found impracticable, under a dispensing power, to avoid the admission of men of the most inflammable and vicious habits. Nor can such be interdicted while the door is left open to foreign traders. Either admit or exclude all. A system partial in its character will, by inhibiting a worthy applicant, do him injustice; and, by permitting the fraudulent speculator, the savage, for whom the provision is made, and the country, are wronged. In the nature of things, the Executive must rely on recommendations, in the exercise of the power deposited with him. And who is it, or what must his character be, that cannot be recommended to presidential patronage?

The committee are apprized that the exclusion of foreigners will be attended with a momentary irritation, and a temporary expense to the nation, as the inhibition will devolve on the Government an obligation to increase its trading posts and augment its Indian capital, so as to supply the wants of such tribes as are now dependant on foreign trade. The prosecution of this policy will be strongly aided by the additional vigor with which the system will inspire the commercial enterprise of the American citizen. The committee have been unable to ascertain, with any degree of accuracy, the amount of capital employed by foreigners in this trade; consequently, they are somewhat at a loss to suggest the amount necessary to fill the vacuum occasioned by the withdrawing of foreign capital. But from the best lights which have been afforded, the committee are induced to believe that $200,000, in addition to the present appropriation, having the auxiliary exertions of individual enterprise, and aided by a superintendency at St. Louis, would be amply sufficient to accomplish what must be desirable to the Government—the supply of those dependant upon her humanity, upon terms advantageous to both.

TREATIES WITH SEVERAL TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 11, 1817.

To the Senate of the United States:

DECEMBER 10, 1817.

I submit to the Senate, for their consideration and advice, the following treaties entered into with several of the Indian tribes, to wit:

A treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded by William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners on the part of the United States of America, and the chiefs and warriors of the Menomonic tribe or nation of Indians, on the 30th of March, 1817, at St. Louis.

A treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded on the 4th of June, 1817, at St. Louis, by William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners, on the part of the United States of America, and the chiefs and warriors of the Ottoes tribe of Indians.

A treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded on the 5th of June, 1817, at St. Louis, by William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners on the part of the United States of America, and the chiefs and warriors of the Poncarar tribe of Indians.

A treaty concluded at the Cherokee agency, on the 8th of July, 1817, between Major General Andrew Jackson, Joseph McMinn, Governor of the State of Tennessee, and General David Meriwether, commissioners of the United States of America, of the one part, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi river, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Cherokees on the Arkansas river, and their deputies, John D. Chisholm and James Rogers.

A treaty concluded on the 29th day of September, 1817, at the foot of the Rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie, between Lewis Cass and Duncan McArthur, commissioners of the United States, and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors of the Wyandot, Seneca, Delaware, Shawanee, Pattawatamie, Ottawa, and Chippewa tribes of Indians.

The Wyandots and other tribes, parties to the treaty lately concluded with them, have, by a deputation to this city, requested permission to retain possession of such lands as they actually cultivate and reside on, for the ensuing year.

They have also expressed a desire that the reservations made in their favor should be enlarged, representing that they had entered into the treaty in full confidence that that would be done, preferring a reliance on the justice of the United States for such extension rather than that the treaty should fail.

The Wyandots claim an extension of their reservation to sixteen miles square, and the other tribes in a proportional degree. Sufficient information is not now in the possession of the Executive to enable it to decide how far it may be proper to comply with the wishes of these tribes, to the extent desired. The necessary information may be obtained in the course of the next year; and if they are permitted to remain in the possession of the lands they cultivate during that time, such further extension of their reservations may be made by law, at the next session, as justice and a liberal policy towards these people may require. It is submitted to the consideration of the Senate, whether it may not be proper to annex to their advice and consent for the ratification of the treaty a declaration providing for the above object.

JAMES MONROE.

WILLIAM CLARK,
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and warriors of the Poncarar tribe.]

TREATY WITH THE CHEROKEES.

Articles of a treaty concluded at the Cherokee agency, within the Cherokee nation, between Major General Andrew Jackson, Joseph McMinn, Governor of the State of Tennessee, and General David Meriwether, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, of the one part, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi river, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Cherokees on the Arkansas river, and their deputies John D. Chisholm and James Rogers, duly authorized by the chiefs of the Cherokees on the Arkansas river, in open council, by written power of attorney, duly signed and executed, in presence of Joseph Sevier and William Ware.

Whereas, in the autumn of the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, a deputation from the upper and lower Cherokee towns, duly authorized by their nation, went on to the city of Washington—the first named to declare to the President of the United States their anxious desire to engage in the pursuits of agriculture and civilized life in the country they then occupied, and to make known to the President of the United States the impracticability of inducing the nation at large to do this, and to request the establishment of a division line between the upper and lower towns, so as to include all the waters of the Hiwassee river to the upper town; that, by thus contracting their society within narrow limits, they proposed to begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular government: the deputies from the lower towns to make known their desire to continue the hunter life, and also the scarcity of game where they then lived, and, under those circumstances, their wish to remove across the Mississippi river, on some vacant lands of the United States: And whereas the President of the United States, after maturely considering the petitions of both parties, on the ninth day of January, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and nine, including other subjects, answered those petitions as follows: “The United States, my children, are the friends of both parties, and, as far as can reasonably be asked, they are willing to satisfy the wishes of both. Those who remain may be assured of our patronage, our aid, and good neighborhood; those who wish to remove are permitted to send an exploring party to reconnoitre the country on the waters of the Arkansas and White rivers—and the higher up the better, as they will be the longer unapproached by our settlements, which will begin at the mouths of those rivers. The regular districts of the government of St. Louis are already laid off to the St. Francis.

“When this party shall have found a tract of country suiting the emigrants, and not claimed by other Indians, we will arrange with them and you the exchange of that for a just portion of the country they leave, and to a part of which, proportioned to their numbers, they have a right. Every aid towards their removal, and what will be necessary for them there, will then be fræly administered to them; and when established in their new settlements, we shall still consider them as our children, give them the benefit of exchanging their peltries for what they will want at our factories, and always hold them firmly by the hand:”

And whereas, the Cherokees, relying on the promises of the President of the United States, as above recited, did explore the country on the west side of the Mississippi, and made choice of the country on the Arkansas and White rivers, and settled themselves down upon the United States lands, to which no other tribe of Indians have any just claim, and have duly notified the President of the United States thereof, and of their anxious desire for the full and complete ratification of his promise; and to that end, as notified by the President of the United States, have sent on their agents, with full powers to execute a treaty, relinquishing to the United States all the right, title, and interest to all lands of right to them belonging as part of the Cherokee nation, which they have left, and which they are about to leave, proportioned to their numbers, including with those now on the Arkansas those who are about to remove thither, and to a portion of which they have an equal right, agreeably to their numbers:

Now know ye, that the contracting parties, to carry into full effect the before-recited promises with good faith, and to promote a continuation of friendship with their brothers on the Arkansas river, and for that purpose to make an equal distribution of the annuities secured to be paid by the United States to the whole Cherokee nation, have agreed and concluded on the following articles, viz:

ARTICLE 1. The chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the whole Cherokee nation cede to the United States all the lands lying north and east of the following boundaries, viz: Beginning at the high shoals of the Appalachee river, and running thence, along the boundary line between the Creek and Cherokee nations, westwardly, to the Chatahoochee river; thence, up the Chatahoochee river, to the mouth of Souque creek; thence, continuing with the general course of the river until it reaches the Indian boundary line, and, should it strike the Turrur river, thence, with its meanders, down said river to its mouth, in part of the proportion of land in the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi to which those now on the Arkansas, and those about to remove there, are justly entitled.

ART. 2. The chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the whole Cherokee nation do also cede to the United States all the lands lying north and west of the following boundary lines, viz: Beginning at the Indian boundary line that runs from the north bank of the Tennessee river, opposite to the mouth of Hiwassee river, at a point on the top of Walden's ridge, where it divides the waters of the Tennessee river from those of the Sequatchy river; thence, along the said ridge, southwardly, to the bank of the Tennessee river, at a point near to a place called the Negro Sugar Camp, opposite to the upper end of the first island above Running Water town; thence, westwardly, a straight line to the mouth of Little Sequatchy river; thence, up said river, to its main fork; thence, up its northernmost fork, to its source; and thence, due west, to the Indian boundary line.

ART. 3. It is also stipulated by the contracting parties that a census shall be taken of the whole Cherokee nation, during the month of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, in the following manner, viz: That the census of those on the east side of the Mississippi river, who declare their intention of removing, shall be taken by a commissioner appointed by the President of the United States, and a commissioner appointed by the Cherokees on the Arkansas river; and the census of the Cherokees on the Arkansas river, and those removing there, and who, at that time, declare their intention of removing there, shall be taken by a commissioner appointed by the President of the United States, and one appointed by the Cherokees east of the Mississippi river.

ART. 4. The contracting parties do also stipulate that the annuity due from the United States to the whole Cherokee nation for the year one thousand eight hundred and eighteen is to be divided between the two parts of the nation, in proportion to their numbers, agreeably to the stipulations contained in the third article of this treaty; and to be continued to be divided thereafter, in proportion to their numbers; and the lands to be apportioned and surrendered to the United States, agreeably to the aforesaid enumeration, as the proportionate part, agreeably to their numbers, to which those who have removed, and who declare their intention to remove, have a just right, including these with the lands ceded in the first and second articles of this treaty.

ART. 5. The United States bind themselves, in exchange for the lands ceded in the first and second articles hereof, to give to that part of the Cherokee nation on the Arkansas as much land on said river and White river as they have or may hereafter receive from the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi, acre for acre, as the just proportion due that part of the nation on the Arkansas, agreeably to their numbers; which is to commence on the north side of the Arkansas river, at the mouth of Point Remove, or Budwell's old place; thence, by a straight line, northwardly, to strike Chataunga mountain, or the hill first above Shield's ferry, on White river; running up and between said rivers for complement, the banks of which rivers to be the lines; and to have the above line, from the point of beginning to the point on White river, run and marked, which shall be done soon after the ratification of this treaty; and all citizens of the United States, except Mrs. P. Lovely, who is to remain where she lives during life, removed from within the bounds as above named. And it is further stipulated that the treaties heretofore [existing] between the Cherokee nation and the United States are to continue in full force with both parts of the nation, and both parts thereof entitled to all the immunities and privileges which the old nation enjoyed under the aforesaid treaties; the United States reserving the right of establishing factories, a military post, and roads, within the boundaries above defined.

ART. 6. The United States do also bind themselves to give to all the poor warriors who may remove to the western side of the Mississippi river one rifle gun and ammunition, one blanket, and one brass kettle, (or, in lieu of the brass kettle, a beaver trap,) which is to be considered as a full compensation for the improvements they may leave; which articles are to be delivered at such point as the President of the United States may direct: and, to aid in the removal of the emigrants, they further agree to furnish flat-bottomed boats and provisions sufficient for that purpose; and to those emigrants whose improvements add real value to their lands, the United States agree to pay a full valuation for the same, which is to be ascertained by a commissioner appointed by the President of the United States for that purpose, and paid for as soon after the ratification of this treaty as practicable. The boats and provisions promised to the emigrants are to be furnished by the agent on the Tennessee river, at such time and place as the emigrants may notify him of; and it shall be his duty to furnish the same.

ART. 7. And for all improvements which add real value to the lands lying within the boundaries ceded to the United States by the first and second articles of this treaty, the United States do agree to pay for at the time, and to be valued in the same manner, as stipulated in the sixth article of this treaty; or, in lieu thereof, to give in exchange improvements of equal value which the emigrants may leave, and for which they are to receive pay. And it is further stipulated that all these improvements left by the emigrants within the bounds of the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi river, which add real value to the lands, and for which the United States shall give a consideration, and not so exchanged, shall be rented to the Indians by the agent, year after year, for the benefit of the poor and decrepit of that part of the nation east of the Mississippi river, until surrendered by the nation, or to the nation. And it is further agreed that the said Cherokee nation shall not be called upon for any part of the consideration paid for said improvements at any future period.

ART. 8. And to each and every head of any Indian family residing on the east side of the Mississippi river, on the lands that are now, or may hereafter be, surrendered to the United States, who may wish to become citizens of the United States, the United States do agree to give a reservation of six hundred and forty acres of land, in a square, to include their improvements, which are to be as near the centre thereof as practicable, in which they will have a life estate, with a reversion in fee-simple to their children, reserving to the widow her dower; the register of whose names is to be filed in the office of the Cherokee agent, which shall be kept open until the census is taken as stipulated in the third article of this treaty: Provided, That if any of the heads of families for whom reservations may be made should remove therefrom, then, in that case, the right to revert to the United States: And provided further, That the land which may be reserved under this article be deducted from the amount which has been ceded under the first and second articles of this treaty.

ART. 9. It is also provided by the contracting parties that nothing in the foregoing articles shall be construed so as to prevent any of the parties so contracting from the free navigation of all the waters mentioned therein.

ART. 10. The whole of the Cherokee nation do hereby cede to the United States all right, title, and claim to all reservations made to Doublehead and others, which were reserved to them by a treaty made and entered into at the city of Washington, bearing date the seventh of January, one thousand eight hundred and six.

ART. 11. It is further agreed that the boundary lines of the lands ceded to the United States by the first and second articles of this treaty, and the boundary lines of the lands ceded by the United States in the fifth article of this treaty, are to be run and marked by a commissioner or commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be accompanied by such commissioners as the Cherokees may appoint; due notice thereof to be given to the nation.

ART. 12. The United States do also bind themselves to prevent the intrusion of any of its citizens within the lands ceded by the first and second articles of this treaty, until the same shall be ratified by the President and Senate of the United States, and duly promulgated.

ART. 13. The contracting parties do also stipulate that this treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined by and between the before-recited contracting parties, we have, in full and open council, at the Cherokee agency, this eighth day of July, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, set our hands and seals.

JOSEPH McMINN,

TREATY WITH THE WYANDOTS, SENECA, DELAWARES, SHAWANEE, PATAWATAMIE, OTTAWAS, AND CHIPPEWAS.

ART. 12. The United States engage to pay, in the course of the year 1818, the amount of the damages which were assessed by the authority of the Secretary of War, in favor of several tribes and individuals of the Indians who adhered to the cause of the United States during the late war with Great Britain, and whose property was, in consequence of such adherence, injured or destroyed. And it is agreed that the sums thus assessed shall be paid in specie, at the places and to the tribes or individuals hereinafter mentioned, being in conformity with the said assessment, that is to say:

ART. 16. Some of the Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie tribes being attached to the Catholic religion, and believing they may wish some of their children hereafter educated, do grant to the rector of the Catholic church of St. Anne of Detroit, for the use of the said church, and to the corporation of the college at Detroit, for the use of the said college, to be retained or sold as the said rector and corporation may judge expedient, each, one-half of three sections of land, to contain six hundred and forty acres, on the river Raisin, at a place called Macon, and three sections of land not yet located, which tracts were reserved for the use of the said Indians by the treaty of Detroit in 1807. And the superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory of Michigan is authorized, on the part of the said Indians, to select the said tracts of land.

ART. 17. The United States engage to pay to any of the Indians the value of any improvements which they may be obliged to abandon in consequence of the lines established by this treaty.

ART. 18. The Delaware tribe of Indians, in consideration of the stipulations herein made on the part of the United States, do hereby forever cede to the United States all the claim which they have to the thirteen sections of land reserved for the use of certain persons of their tribe by the second section of the act of Congress passed March 3, 1807, providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States between the United States military tract and the Connecticut reserve, and the lands of the United States between the Cincinnati and Vincennes districts.

ART. 19. The United States agree to grant by patent, in fee-simple, to Zee-shaw-au, or James Armstrong, and to Sa-non-do-you-ray-quaw, or Silas Armstrong, chiefs of the Delaware Indians, living on the Sandusky waters, and their successors in office, chiefs of the said tribe, for the use of the persons mentioned in the annexed schedule, in the same manner, and subject to the same conditions, provisions, and limitations as are hereinbefore provided for the lands granted to the Wyandot, Seneca, and Shawanee Indians, a tract of land to contain nine square miles, to join the tract granted to the Wyandots, of twelve miles square, to be laid off as nearly in a square form as practicable, and to include Captain Pipe's village.

ART. 20. The United States also agree to grant by patent to the chiefs of the Ottawa tribe of Indians, for the use of the said tribe, a tract of land to contain thirty-four square miles, to be laid out as nearly in a square form as practicable, not interfering with the lines of the tracts reserved by the treaty of Greenville, on the south side of the Miami river of Lake Erie, and to include Tushquegan or McCarty's village; which tracts thus granted shall be held by the said tribe, upon the usual conditions of Indian reservations, as though no patent were issued.

ART. 21. This treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the said Lewis Cass and Duncan McArthur, commissioners as aforesaid, and the sachems, chiefs, and warriors of the Wyandot, Seneca, Shawanee, Delaware, Pattawamie, Ottawa, and Chippewa tribes of Indians, have hereunto set their hands, at the foot of the Rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie, this twenty-ninth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventeen.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLES.

ART. 1. The Ottawa tribe of Indians having long since promised to Doctor William Brown, of Detroit, a tract of land for the professional services which he has rendered to them, and has promised to render to them, and for many acts of kindness; and having in open council requested that a tract of land may be granted to him by the stipulations of this treaty; the commissioners of the United States, believing that these services and assistance have been rendered and promised without any pecuniary reward, but having no authority to act in the premises, have agreed with the said tribe that three sections of land, out of the six sections reserved for the use of the said tribe by the treaty of Detroit, in 1807, and not yet located, shall be granted by patent, in fee-simple, to the said Doctor William Brown: Provided, and it is expressly declared and understood, That the commissioners are acting herein without authority, and that it is their intention merely to submit this article for consideration to the President and Senate of the United States; and if it is ratified by them, it shall be obligatory on the parties hereunto. But it is clearly understood that its ratification or rejection will not affect any other stipulation in this treaty.

ART. 2. In the year 1812 Stephen Johnson was murdered by some of the Pattawatamie Indians, while he was in the service of the United States; and the said Pattawatamie tribe have, in open council, requested that a tract of land may be granted to Stephen Johnson and Eliza Johnson, children of the said Stephen Johnson, deceased, in order to atone, after the manner of the Indians, for the said murder: the commissioners of the United States, believing, as in the next preceding article, that they have no authority to act in the premises, do, in compliance with the request of the said tribe, agree that one section of land shall be granted by patent, in fee-simple, to the said Stephen Johnson and Eliza Johnson, children of the said Stephen Johnson, deceased, to be located by John Johnson, in the tract of country ceded by this treaty to the United States, after the same shall have been surveyed.

But it is expressly understood that the stipulation in this article is subject to the same conditions to which the next preceding article is subject.

SIR:

CHILICOTHE, April 6, 1816.

I deferred answering your letter of the 14th February with the hope of ascertaining ere this the disposition of the Sandusky Indians relative to the sale of their claim to the lands in that quarter.

A few days before your letter came to hand I received a letter from the principal Indians on the Sandusky, stating that they had been informed by the Shawanee Indians who reside on the Miami that the Government was devising means to obtain their lands, and requesting me to give them any information I could on the subject. In answer to that letter, I informed them that I was confident that the Government had no wish to obtain their lands, or the lands of any Indians who were friendly to the United States, unless they felt a disposition to dispose of them; but if they wished to sell their lands, as had been frequently reported here, and would make it known to the President, I thought it probable that the Government would take the subject into consideration, and give them an answer. I assured them, however, that I thought the proposition must come from them, as the Government had already more lands than could be disposed of. To this letter I have not received an answer.

In consequence of ill health, I last winter requested Colonel John Johnston, Indian agent, and Colonel James McPherson, subagent, to settle the claims of the Sandusky Indians for property destroyed by the troops of the United States during the late war, in pursuance of an arrangement made last summer at Detroit by General Harrison, Mr. Graham, and myself. They promised to attend to this business; but Colonel Johnston writes me that the Indians have been, and will be, so busily engaged in hunting and trapping, that they cannot be collected until May. I have thought that when they are called together for the purpose of having their claims settled, a favorable opportunity will be presented to ascertain their disposition relative to selling their lands in this State, without letting them know that Government has a wish to purchase. I will endeavor to be at Sandusky whenever the Indians may be collected.

I have the honor, &c.

DUNCAN McARTHUR.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 23, 1817.

It having been deemed advisable by the President to make an effort to extinguish the Indian title to all the lands now claimed by them within the limits of the State of Ohio, I am therefore instructed by him to request that, in your route to Detroit, you would endeavor to see some of the chiefs and headmen of the several tribes who claim those lands, with a view of ascertaining how far it may be practicable to obtain a relinquishment of the whole, or any portion of them, and on what terms.

The negotiation should be founded on the basis that each head of a family who wishes to remain within the limits ceded should have a life estate in a reservation of a certain number of acres, which should descend to his children in fee, reserving to the widow (if any) her thirds; and that those who do not wish to remain on those terms should have a body of land allotted to them on the west of the Mississippi. Should you find, on an interview with some of the leading men, that it will be impossible or impolitic to make an attempt to procure all the country claimed, you will then direct your efforts to induce them to enter into a negotiation for the relinquishment of their title to a portion of the land; and, as it is an object of very great importance that there should be a strong settlement connecting the State of Ohio with the Michigan Territory, you will therefore direct your efforts to obtain a cession of the lands lying north and east of the road leading from Fort Meigs to the reservation on Sandusky, and from thence to Norton, in Ohio; or, what would be preferable, a relinquishment of the land north and east of a line to be run directly from Fort Meigs to the point where the road from Sandusky to Norton crosses the Indian boundary line. The amount which may be stipulated to be given for the relinquishment must materially depend on the number of families who would wish to remain within the ceded territory on the terms above mentioned; it cannot, however, in any event, be expected that a relinquishment can be obtained of those lands on such terms as the lands in that quarter have heretofore been ceded; and it is only by paying liberally that we can expect to obtain them.

On your arrival at Detroit, you will advise this Department whether the Indians are disposed or not to enter into a negotiation for the whole or any part of their lands. For the time which you may be detained on your route in ascertaining the temper of the Indians on this subject, you will be allowed eight dollars per day.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

Governor LEWIS CASS.

SIR:

LOWER SANDUSKY, April 17, 1817.

Agreeably to your instructions, I yesterday passed through Upper Sandusky, in order to ascertain the probable views of the Indians with respect to a sale of part or of the whole of this country. From information there obtained, I entertain no doubt but that they will consent to cede a considerable portion of this most valuable tract. The terms upon which their assent to the measure may be expected depend not only so much upon the quantity and situation, but also so much upon their whims at the moment of executing the contract, that it would be impossible for me to state (or, I presume, for you to prescribe) any definite terms. Under any circumstances, they will fall infinitely short of the pecuniary and political value of the country obtained.

From the state of the appropriation for the Indian department, and from the difficulty of making previous arrangements, I do not think it necessary that there should be more than one person appointed to manage the business. Should the President be pleased to intrust the negotiation to me, it will be expedient that instructions should be issued as speedily as practicable. The terms mentioned in your letter are dictated equally by moral and political motives; nor is any thing more necessary than the pecuniary means to be appropriated to the object. The sum to be given will depend so much upon the quantity to be ceded, and this latter so much upon circumstances which cannot now be foreseen and calculated, that I rather think no specific sum can be fixed.

The person appointed to conduct the negotiation ought to be empowered to require of the contractor the necessary provisions to be deposited and issued at the place where it may be deemed expedient to hold the treaty; and, in the event of his failure, by other means to have them issued.

Very respectfully, sir, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 19, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th ultimo, and I now enclose you a commission and instructions authorizing you and General McArthur to hold a treaty with the several tribes of Indians claiming lands within the boundaries of the State of Ohio for the relinquishment of the same. The act which passed the Senate at the last session, to authorize the President to negotiate with Indian tribes for an exchange of territory, and appropriating $50,000 for that object, was not acted upon by the House of Representatives. The fifteenth section of the act passed the 26th of March, 1804, for the erection of Louisiana into two Territories, is considered as now in force; but, as our appropriations are deficient, you will make the execution of all the stipulations of the treaty to depend upon the ratification by the Senate, and consequent appropriation.

You will give the contractor for that district due notice of the time and place which yourself and General McArthur may fix upon for holding the treaty, and of the number of rations that may be required.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Governor LEWIS CASS, Detroit.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 19, 1817.

The representations which the President has received from the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Ohio have rendered it expedient, in his judgment, to enter into a negotiation with those tribes of Indians who claim lands within the boundaries of the State of Ohio, with the view of extinguishing their claim to the whole or any part of those lands; and, confiding in your fidelity, discretion, and patriotism, he has been pleased to appoint you to be the commissioners on the part of the United States for holding a treaty with all or any of those tribes for that purpose. You will, therefore, give the chiefs notice of your appointment, and fix upon the time and place of holding the treaty; of which the contractor for that district must have due notice, in order that he may be prepared to supply the rations which may be required.

Should the information which Governor Cass has been enabled to obtain in relation to this subject, in consequence of the instructions from this Department of the 23d of March last, render it inexpedient to make an attempt to obtain a relinquishment from the Indians of all the land which they hold within the limits of the State of Ohio, you will then direct your efforts to obtain the relinquishment of their claim to a part, or the whole, of that tract of country which lies north and east of a line to be run directly from Fort Meigs, or some point higher up the Miami, to the present Indian boundary line, at the point where the road from Norton to Upper Sandusky crosses it, or to the point where the present boundary line crosses the Scioto river.

It is not deemed necessary to give any more definite instructions relative to the terms of the treaty than those contained in the letter to Governor Cass of the 23d of March, and to which you are referred. The removal of the Indians, generally, from the vicinity of Lake Erie, and the advantages that would be derived from connecting the population of the State of Ohio with that of the Michigan Territory, give to the acquisition of this country a political importance that would justify a more liberal compensation for its relinquishment than has hitherto been given for the relinquishment of Indian claims.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Gov. LEWIS CASS, and Gen. DUNCAN McARTHUR, Commissioners, &c.

SIR:

DETROIT, July 3, 1817.

To attain with more certainty the proposed cession of land from the Wyandots, a timely distribution of presents to the influential chiefs is all-important. A continued succession of treaties, during a long course of years, has created a practice which, with any regard to prudence, cannot now be violated.

I have therefore the honor to propose that arrangements be made to furnish the commissioners with six thousand dollars in silver for this purpose.

This sum, through the medium of the banks at Chilicothe, might be placed at the disposal of General McArthur, with instructions to have it brought to Fort Meigs, (which is selected as the most suitable place for the treaty,) and applied to the objects above stated.

It is impracticable to procure it here; and to apply paper to this object would be to expend for the Government the same sum without procuring any corresponding beneficial result.

Paper is, to the Indians, almost valueless. It is the specie alone which is the object of their pursuit; and, by furnishing the quantity above mentioned, I trust we shall be able to obtain the cession of an important territory.

Very respectfully, sir, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

SIR:

MIAMI RAPIDS, September 29, 1817.

The cession which has this day been made by the Indians to the United States, and the part which has been intrusted to us in the negotiation which has thus fortunately terminated, render it not improper that we should submit to the Government our views of a subject intimately connected with the pecuniary and political value of this portion of country.

It is well known that along the southern margin of this part of Lake Erie is a tract of wet land, which always presents serious difficulties to the traveller, and frequently insurmountable obstacles.

From Fort Meigs, for many miles towards Urbana, and nearly the whole distance to Lower Sandusky, it becomes a morass known by the name of the Black Swamp. To reach the Territory of Michigan from any part of the settlements of the State of Ohio, by land, this swamp must be crossed.

No description can convey to a person who is unacquainted with it an adequate idea of the difficulties to be surmounted before a tolerable road can be formed through this country. Little is hazarded in saying that individual enterprise, or the operation of ordinary causes, will not accomplish it for a period which the rapid improvement of the United States generally would leave without a parallel. But the country, from the extremities of this swamp northward to Detroit, and southward and eastward to the settlements in Ohio, is level and wet; and a good road through it, to be made at all, must be made at the national expense.

The events of the late war with Great Britain upon this frontier must have satisfied every reflecting person that a good road, at the commencement of that war, passing from the interior of Ohio to Detroit, would have saved to the nation the expenditure of immense sums of money, and would have rendered the reduction of that place at any time easy, and its tenure secure. The supplies of provisions and the munitions of war necessary to the operations of the army upon this frontier were transported at an enormous expense of time and treasure; and the principal obstacles opposed to those operations resulted from the nature of the country, and from its difficulty of access. This tract of country, in its present situation, renders the Territory of Michigan an insulated point upon the map of the nation. Its approach by water is uncertain, temporary, and, for many important purposes, inconvenient. By land it is difficult, tedious, and expensive. In any future war, its means of defence must be derived from the same States which were called upon to furnish them during the past. It is desirable, therefore, that the difficulties which were then experienced should be removed, and that the possession of a good road should enable the General Government at any time to throw into the country a force which would render it safe and secure. Such a road would remove the barriers which nature has interposed, and would, in effect, approximate this country to the western portion of the Union, and, connected with the natural advantages it possesses, would insure it a speedy settlement and an active and enterprising population.

But a road from the interior of Ohio to the lake only, would not answer this important purpose. Lake Erie may once more become the theatre of desperate exertion and skill; enterprise and courage may not again be rewarded with victory. But were our naval superiority upon this lake beyond the reach of accident, it should still be recollected that its navigation is more hazardous than that of the ocean, and, for a considerable portion of the year, closed or impeded by the ice.

It is precisely at this season, with the exception of a short time in the middle of winter, that the communication by land is most difficult; and the obstacles which are then interposed to traversing the country in any direction are serious and dangerous.

Should circumstances destroy our naval superiority upon the upper lakes, our communication with Detroit and its dependant settlements could be preserved by land only; and our possession of the country would, in a great degree, depend upon the facilities which the roads might offer to the march of troops, and to the transportation of their munitions of war, baggage, and provisions. It is to be hoped that such an occurrence is remote. But the possibility of its happening, and its disastrous consequences should we be found unprepared, furnish powerful motives to provide, as far as human wisdom can do, for the event.

By completing a road from Sandusky to Detroit, considerable progress would be made towards opening a great national communication from the capital to one of the extremities of the Union. The western turnpike from Cumberland to the Ohio, terminating at Wheeling, would leave only the portion of road between that place and Sandusky to be made. Future enterprise and industry, either individual or national, might complete the work; and it would equally promote the varied intercourse of peace and the important operations of war.

This view is prospective, but the time cannot be remote when the policy of connecting the different parts of this vast republic by great permanent roads will be felt and acknowledged; when such a policy shall banish local jealousies; and discordant interests shall furnish new and increased facilities for private industry, and shall add strength and wealth to the resources of the nation.

Forts and military positions along a remote and exposed frontier will furnish little protection, unless the communication to it is rendered easy and expeditious. A great leading road, such as the nature of this country requires and the public good demands, would add more to its permanent security than any other defensive measure which could be adopted.

But there are considerations connected with the necessity of such a road in consequence of the nature of the country, of its importance to the nation for the preservation of a weak and important frontier, and of the improbability that such a road will ever be made unless some portion of the general resources are directed to this object. But, viewed exclusively as a subject affecting the revenue, there can be no doubt but its operation would be favorable.

From the settlements in Ohio to Detroit, nearly the whole country is the property of the United States. Every consideration, either of a fiscal or political nature, demands the immediate sale and settlement of this land, and every measure is important which will facilitate the acquisition of either object. Among these measures, the most obvious in itself, and most certain in its result, is the opening of a leading road. In any country, this would be important: in this country, it is absolutely necessary. Sales will only be made with a view to settlement, and settlement will be aided and encouraged by making roads where the population of the country will long be unable to make them.

There is little difficulty in proposing a plan which would accomplish this object, and in all probability increase the actual receipts at the Treasury, after the expenditures which may be necessary in effecting it.

Previous to the sale of the public lands, were the site of a permanent well-made road located from the line of the tract recently purchased of the Indians to Detroit, and were the national faith pledged for its completion within a reasonable period, the competition excited among the purchasers to procure the land in the vicinity of this road would add greatly to its value. Any estimate upon this subject must be loose and conjectural; but when it is considered that this road would pass through lands the property of the United States for at least one hundred and fifty miles, a great part of which is fertile and susceptible of compact settlements, and much of which is equal to any land in Ohio, it cannot be doubted but it will enter the market with every prospect of obtaining a price far exceeding that fixed by law. It would not be necessary, in order to secure the desired object, that the work should be actually commenced. Every purpose would be answered by determining the site of the road, and delaying its completion till sufficient funds for that purpose were received from the sale of the land.

We have travelled out of the proper object of our mission in bringing this subject to the attention of the Government; but we trust our excuse will be found in its vital importance to this section of our country, and in the consideration that, if the present opportunity passes away without producing any favorable result, we may consider as hopeless every effort to attain it.

Considered as the means of increasing the national strength, and of securing the possession of an important frontier, we are aware that it has no exclusive claim to the attention of the General Government. Every section of the Union has an equal right to urge its claims. But there is, probably, none in which the expenditure of an equal amount would be productive of more important consequences; and certainly there is none which is weaker in itself, or more difficult, from its position, to be defended.

But when it is recollected that this whole road, from the line of the purchase now made upon the frontier settlements of Ohio to the Detroit river, will pass through a country the property of the United States, except one Indian reservation, and a few tracts which have been sold or granted at Lower Sandusky, Fort Meigs, and the river Raisin, the effect of such a road upon the sale of the land is a fair object of inquiry; and if it is believed that the receipts from the sales will be increased by it, or even if such a result is doubtful, the importance and necessity of the measure, connected with other considerations, may fairly justify its adoption.

Very respectfully, sir, we have the honor to be your most obedient servants,

LEWIS CASS,
DUNCAN McARTHUR.

SIR:

FORT MEIGS, September 30, 1817.

Accompanying this, we have the honor to transmit to you a treaty which we have concluded with the Wyandot, Seneca, Shawanee, Delaware, Pattawatamie, Ottawa, and Chippewa tribes of Indians.

The country ceded by this treaty to the United States includes nearly all the land within the State of Ohio to which the Indians have any claim, a small part of the State of Indiana, and probably a small part of the Michigan Territory. Had the Miamies attended the council agreeably to our expectations, we doubt not but the whole Indian title in the State of Ohio would have been extinguished. Circumstances, however, which it is unnecessary here to enumerate, prevented their attendance; and, in the feverish state of mind in which we found the Indians, it was considered imprudent to await the expected arrival of the Miamies. They unquestionably own the country west of the St. Mary's river, and its acquisition must, consequently, be postponed till circumstances may render it expedient again to convene the Indians to a general council.

We are somewhat apprehensive that it may be supposed we have been too liberal in the terms which we have allowed to the Indians. These terms certainly exceed what we have been accustomed to find in Indian treaties; but it must be recollected that this is not an ordinary cession, nor has its acquisition been attended with ordinary difficulties.

Its importance to the United States in a financial and military point of view is too obvious to require any observation from us. We may, in fact, consider the purchase as the great connecting link which binds together our northwestern frontier.

The Wyandots, who owned it, and the Shawanees and Senecas, who live upon it, are fully aware of its importance to us and to them. By frequent communications with our citizens, they perfectly well know upon what terms the United States sell their land; and they also know the extravagant rate at which the reservations at Sandusky and this place were sold. This knowledge led them to expect a compensation for the land far exceeding any thing which is secured to them by the treaty.

A large portion of the country is beautiful and valuable, fertile, well watered, and handsomely situated. The ancestors of some of those Indians have occupied it for many generations, and they were attached to it by all the ties which bind men, white or red, to their country. Its acquisition was also rendered more difficult, because it is the last tract of land in the possession of the Wyandots—once a powerful, and still a high-spirited people. Its cession to the United States will make it necessary for those Indians to change the manners and customs of their whole nation; from this day they cease to be hunters, and must depend upon their own industry and the produce of their reservations for support. However advantageous and speculative men may consider this to be, still we must not view it as an abstract question, but as one intimately connected with their habits and feelings for life. Changes in the manners and customs of nations are generally slow and gradual; and it is only some violent convulsion, moral or physical, which renders these changes rapid and perceptible. When, therefore, we demand of the Indians an absolute relinquishment of every thing which gives zest to savage life, we must expect that this demand will be received with regret and obeyed with reluctance. In fact, the whole of the Wyandots and all the Shawanees and Senecas in this quarter have made the last attempt to preserve the inheritance of customs and of land transmitted to them by their ancestors; they feel that our settlements are surrounding them, and that the chase furnishes a scanty and precarious supply; they will cease to be hunters, and will, we trust, become farmers.

For these reasons we have agreed to the amount of the annuities stipulated in the treaty, and we hope, on reflection, it will not be found too great.

In the progress of our negotiations with the Indians, we have experienced much difficulty in adjusting the quantity, tenure, and conditions of the reservations to their and our satisfaction. Without troubling you with the detail of these difficulties, it is sufficient to say that the treaty exhibits the result of mutual demands and of mutual compromises. We considered our instructions as rather advisory than imperative; rather intending that we should comply with the general principles than with the minuter details. Any other course would have been fatal to our exertions and to the expectations of the Government. We have been compelled to admit the claims of a number of individuals, and to stipulate that patents shall be granted to them. Almost all these persons are Indians by blood. Some have been taken prisoners in early life, have married Indian women, and have identified themselves in feelings, manners, and interest with the Indians. In a few instances only are they merely Indians by adoption.

In every case, it was the urgent wish of the Indians that land should be granted to these persons. To have refused these requests would have embodied against us an interest, and created obstacles, which no efforts of ours would have defeated or surmounted.

Under these circumstances, we judged it expedient to consider these persons as the heads of Indian families, and to make for them the provision which is found in the treaty. It will be perceived that the greater part of them live upon or near the land secured to them, and it would have been equally impolitic and unjust to have attempted their removal.

We have provided that all the annuities due by this treaty, and some of those due by former treaties, shall be paid in cash. We have acceded to the request which the Indians have made upon this subject, because it is cheaper for the United States, by the freight and charges attending the transportation of goods to this country. These goods are delivered to the Indians at the invoice price in the place where they are purchased.

In the distribution of annuities by the Indians among themselves, every person, of whatever sex or age, is included. Each is enumerated, and all draw alike. It is, therefore, very difficult for them to make a partition in goods, agreeably to their ideas. But, independent of this consideration, the goods are often bad, and not suited to the taste and wants of the Indians; when this happens, they believe the Government is speculating upon them; and there are never wanting ill-disposed and unprincipled men to turn it to the injury of the United States. By paying them in specie, these difficulties are removed; the United States save at least fifteen per cent.; the Indians can make an easy and equitable partition; they cannot complain on account of the kind or quality of the goods; and all cause of dissatisfaction with the United States on the subject of annuities is removed. We have provided, at the particular request of the Indians, that these demands shall be paid, not in paper, but in specie. Paper is almost valueless to the Indians—it is a representative of wealth, with which they are little acquainted; they require something whose amount is more palpable and obvious. Besides, with paper, they are continually liable to impositions from every unprincipled man with whom they are brought into contact. There can be no doubt but payments in specie will be productive of advantages in our intercourse with the Indians which will far outweigh any inconvenience or expense of which such payments will be productive.

We trust that all the other provisions and stipulations in the treaty so obviously result from the nature of the transaction, and from the circumstances in which we and the Indians were placed, as to require no particular observations.

We have promised to the Indians that six copies on parchment, and enclosed in tin cases, shall be made and transmitted to them. We have had neither time nor opportunity to have it done here. We pray that this promise may be complied with at Washington.

We found it necessary to a fortunate issue to the negotiation that goods to the amount of $6,000 should be purchased and distributed to the Indians.

Bills for this purchase, and for other necessary expenditures at the treaty, with the proper vouchers, have been drawn upon the War Department. We hope they will be duly honored.

Not knowing what may be the state of the appropriation for the Indian department, we have not made these bills payable till the 1st day of January next, in order that the necessary appropriation may be made, should it be found requisite, and should Congress deem it expedient.

Very respectfully, sir, we have the honor to be your obedient servants,

LEWIS CASS,
DUNCAN McARTHUR.

Hon. GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 17, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 30th ultimo, accompanied by the treaty, which shall be submitted to the President immediately on his return to this place; and who, no doubt, will be highly gratified with the result of your negotiations. The extent of the cession far exceeds my most sanguine expectations, and there can be no real or well-founded objection to the amount of the compensation given for it, except that it is not an adequate one.

The desire of the Indians to locate the lands in such manner as to give them compact settlements was natural, and, in a fiscal point of view, it was better for the United States that they should do so. The only objection is, that it will have a tendency to preserve their customs and manners for a longer period than if they had made their locations more diffusively.

This treaty may be considered, in its fiscal, political, and moral effects, as the most important of any that we have hitherto made with the Indians.

Your drafts have not been presented, but will be accepted and punctually paid when at maturity.

General McArthur was advised on the 30th of July last that a draft for $6,000 would be remitted to him by the Treasurer, which was to be paid in specie; to that letter no answer has been received.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Governor LEWIS CASS, Detroit.

General DUNCAN McARTHUR, Chillicothe.

Talk addressed to the Wyandot, Seneca, and Delaware nations.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 18, 1817.

Brothers of the Wyandot, Seneca, and Delaware nations:

Notwithstanding you have left your homes without the approbation of your agent, yet your father the President has been glad to see you, and he has provided for all your wants while you remained with him. He has listened to your complaints, as a father should always listen to those of his children; and it is his desire to gratify your wishes when they are reasonable and just, and he has power to do so. It is the wish of your father the President that the reservations which have been made for you should be sufficient to afford to every Indian family a tract of good land of not less than 640 acres; and that they should live on it, cultivate it, and be protected by the laws of the United States, in the same manner and in every respect as his white children are; and he will make no difference between them.

Brothers: All of you who now reside on the lands which have been ceded, and over which your father the President has the control, will be permitted to reside on them and cultivate them without interruption, until they are surveyed and sold out to individuals; and at the public sales any of you will have the same right to purchase as the white people. But there is a part of the land ceded over which your father the President will not have the control after the treaty is ratified, unless some provision should be made by Congress for that purpose. This is the tract of land which was given to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, and in which Solomon's town is situated. As it respects this tract of land, your father can only promise that he will endeavor to obtain from Congress such a provision as will enable the families who now live at Solomon's town to remain there until they raise one more crop.

Brothers: Your father has directed me to tell you that he will pay your expenses home, and he wishes you a pleasant journey.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 9, 1816.

The Legislature of the State of North Carolina have made an application to the President of the United States, through their Senators and Representatives in Congress, to obtain permission to hold a treaty with the Cherokees, for the purpose of purchasing such lands belonging to the nation as they may be disposed to sell, lying within the limits of that State. To this request of the State of North Carolina the President is disposed to give his assent; and I have to request that you will take immediate measures to sound the Path Killer and the other leading chiefs of the nation, for the purpose of ascertaining how far they may be disposed to enter into a negotiation for that purpose. Although the chiefs have expressed to the Government a wish not to be pressed any further at this time for a relinquishment of territory, yet, as the land which the State of North Carolina is desirous of purchasing at present is very mountainous, and of indifferent quality, and adjacent to the white settlements, and, therefore, probably of little service to the Cherokees, either for the purpose of settling or hunting upon, it is hoped that this proposition may be favorably received. You will, however, use every exertion in your power to induce the nation to consent to hold a treaty for the purposes stated in the resolution of the State of North Carolina, (a copy of which is enclosed,) and advise this Department, without delay, of the result of those exertions.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

Colonel R. J. MEIGS, Cherokee Agent, Rhea Court-house, Tennessee.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 13, 1817.

It being deemed advisable by the President to authorize you to extinguish the Indian title to the two reservations made by the first article of the convention with the Cherokees on the 7th of January, 1806, provided it can be done on such terms as you may think reasonable and just, you will please to take the requisite steps for that purpose, by a special agent, or otherwise, as you may think fit. Whether you succeed in purchasing the whole, or a part only, of these reservations from the reservees, it will be proper that the Cherokee nation be a party to the transaction, in order to quiet to the United States an undisputed jurisdiction over them; and you are hereby authorized to enter into a negotiation with the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokee nation for that purpose. The Cherokee agent will be instructed to promote your views.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

General JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 22, 1817.

Your letter of the 17th ult. has been laid before the President, who approves of the view which you have taken of the operation of the several treaties in relation to the two tracts of land reserved by the Cherokees in the treaty of 1806. The instruction to you of the 13th January was founded on the idea that some of the original reservees might possibly be settled on the land, and would interfere to prevent a relinquishment on the part of the nation; but if they have abandoned their possession, or sold out to citizens, they can have no claim. It is, however, considered necessary to obtain the relinquishment of such title or claim as the Cherokee nation may have under the fourth article of the treaty of 1806.

But as it is deemed advisable by the President to enter into a negotiation as soon as practicable with the Cherokees for an exchange of territory, in pursuance of the power vested in him by an act of the last session of Congress, I would recommend that the meeting you proposed to have with the Cherokees in May should be postponed until the 20th of June, when both objects may become the subjects of negotiation, and by which time, also, the agent will be prepared to distribute the annuities and the money due to the nation under the late treaty.

Your letter of the 12th ultimo, enclosing the survey of the lands which you had selected in pursuance of my letter of the 4th of December last, was not received until the last day of the session of Congress; therefore, no measures could be taken to obtain a legislative sanction for the reservation by the last Congress. The subject will, however, be presented to them at their next session; and as the land will not, in the mean time, be subject to location, (as I understand it is within the congressional reserve,) no serious inconvenience can result. It would be desirable to ascertain, previous to the session of Congress, whether any locations have been made on the land under warrants issued by the State of North Carolina that may be considered valid.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

General ANDREW JACKSON.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 25, 1817.

As circumstances may probably make it inexpedient to enter into a negotiation with the Cherokees for an exchange of territory at so early a period as that mentioned in my letter of the 22d instant, it will be unnecessary to take any measure for the postponement of the meeting you proposed to hold in May with the chiefs of that nation, provided such measures have not been taken by you in consequence of my letter of the 22d instant, previous to the receipt of this; and of which you will advise this Department without delay.

Mr. Meigs has drawn on this Department for the amount of the old annuities due for the year 1817, and I have requested him to draw for the amount due under the late treaty, with an expectation that he will be able to procure the money in time to distribute it at the meeting which you proposed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, *Acting Secretary of War.*General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 14, 1817.

Your letter of the 22d ultimo has been submitted to the President, who has determined to hold a treaty with the Cherokees on the 20th of June for an exchange of territory, in pursuance of the power vested in him by the fifteenth section of the act of the 26th March, 1804, for erecting Louisiana into two Territories. The act which passed the Senate at the last session, appropriating $50,000 for that object, and which I thought had also passed the House of Representatives, was, it seems, not finally acted upon by that House, in consequence of the very great accumulation of business at the close of the session. The Governor of Tennessee, and General Meriwether, of Georgia, will be joined in the commission with you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, *Acting Secretary of War.*General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 15, 1817.

The President having determined to hold a treaty with the Cherokee nation on the 20th of June next, at Hiwassee, principally with a view of effecting an exchange of territory, in pursuance of the fifteenth section of an act passed on the 26th March, 1804, for erecting Louisiana into two Territories, has thought proper to appoint you a commissioner for that purpose, to act jointly or severally with Major General Andrew Jackson and the Governor of Tennessee. I have, therefore, to request that you will inform this Department, as early as practicable, whether or not it will be convenient for you to attend to the execution of this trust.

The commission and instructions will be forwarded to General Jackson.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, *Acting Secretary of War.*General DAVID MERIWETHER, Athens, Georgia.

[A similar letter was addressed to Governor McMinn.]

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 16, 1817.

I had the honor to inform you, on the 14th instant, that the President had determined to hold a treaty with the Cherokees, for an exchange of territory, in pursuance of the authority vested in him by the fifteenth section of the act passed on the 26th of March, 1804, for erecting Louisiana into two Territories. I now enclose you a commission authorizing Governor McMinn, General Meriwether, and yourself, to negotiate with the Cherokee nation for that and other objects. The lands proposed to be given to the Cherokees on the west of the Mississippi river, in exchange for those now occupied by that nation on the east of the said river, are the lands on the Arkansas, and immediately adjoining the Osage boundary line, and which are now occupied by a part of that nation. As a further inducement to that portion of the nation whose habits of life would dispose them to remove from a country where the products of the chase are daily diminishing, and no longer afford a certain support for their families, to one where game abounds, and where the means of subsistence are easily attainable in that mode which is most congenial to their habits, you are authorized to grant a given sum of money for the purpose of affording the means of transportation; and, also, to stipulate to furnish them with such number of arms, blankets, and other articles, as you may think expedient or necessary. Those individuals (and they are understood to be numerous) who have acquired property, and wish to remain, and who experience the daily increasing embarrassments and difficulties arising from the want of proper laws for the protection and security of that property, will, it is believed, find sufficient inducements for the exchange in the benefits which they will derive from the enjoyment of the rights and immunities of a citizen of the United States, and in the protection of the laws of the particular State or Territory in which they may respectively reside; and in the assignment of a section of six hundred and forty acres of land, (and more, if, in particular instances, it may be deemed necessary,) to the head of each family, in which they will have a life estate, with a reversion in fee-simple to their child or children, reserving to the widow her dower.

I enclose, for your information, a copy of a talk delivered by the President of the United States, in 1809, to a deputation of the Cherokee nation; from which it will appear that the permission which was granted to a part of the nation to remove to the Arkansas was founded on an expectation of an exchange of territory, at least in part, and proportioned to the numbers of those who removed.

Should the nation not be prepared to enter into an arrangement for an exchange of territory at the present moment, much benefit may nevertheless be expected from your mission, as you will be able to explain fully the views and objects of the Government, and to impress on the minds of the different descriptions of people of which the nation is composed the advantages which they may, respectively, derive from an exchange of territory, the ultimate accomplishment of which will be as beneficial to themselves as to the people of the United States.

In consequence of the guaranty made in the fourth article of the convention with the Cherokees entered into at Washington on the 7th of January, 1806, it has become expedient to obtain a relinquishment of the claim of the Cherokee nation to the two tracts of land reserved by the first article of that convention; this relinquishment, it is believed, you will be easily enabled to obtain, and for a reasonable compensation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Acting Secretary of War.

General ANDREW JACKSON.

[A similar letter was addressed to Governor McMinn, and to General Meriwether, respectively.]

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

HUNTSVILLE, M. T., June 11, 1817.

SIR:

I reached this place to-day, on my way to the proposed conference with the Cherokee tribe, to be held at Hiwassee, on the 20th instant, where I received your communication of the 14th, and the subsequent instructions of the 16th ultimo, together with the enclosures.

I have had the military road surveyed and marked from the mouth of Cypress creek to the crossing on Shoal creek, under my own immediate inspection, and have directed Major Perrault to continue it from the latter place, north 20° east, as far as the northern boundary of the reservation on Shoal creek, for the foundry. In performing this duty, I was compelled to employ a practical surveyor for a few days, finding the labor too arduous for Major Perrault, of the corps of topographical engineers.

I have ordered the commandant of the company late at Fort Hampton to commence the road at the mouth of Cypress, and continue it as far as the survey of Major Perrault, at which point I believe it will intersect the road leading to Columbia, Tennessee. Before the road north of the Tennessee is completed, I trust Captain Young will have returned from Lake Pontchartrain, when the above-named company will be directed to commence on the south side of Tennessee, and progress with the road until they meet the detachment ordered to commence at Lake Pontchartrain. This road being of great importance, I will have to employ an experienced woodsman to accompany Captain Young southwardly, until the road passes the high ridges which divide the waters of the Black Warrior and Tombigbee from those of the Tennessee. It would be well for Government to select the point where the road intersects the Tennessee for a military depot, it being below the shoals, and a good site; which object had much influence with me in selecting the place for the passage of the river.

I am happy to inform you that General Coffee is progressing very well with the duty assigned him. He has assured me that in all the month of July he will have the one hundred townships surveyed; of which, from my own views, I have no doubt. This will be very important, as it will enable the sales to be made in October or November next, which will enable the purchasers to take possession and provide for crops the ensuing year. Permit me to add that it is important to have the sales at as early a day as practicable.

It is found by many that fifteen days (the time allowed by law for the sales of the lands) will not give sufficient time for the disposal of the one hundred townships. To do justice to the Treasury, it should not be hurried like sales at auction; and permit me, therefore, to suggest the propriety, in proclaiming the sale of the one hundred townships, to provide for the event, by authorizing the proper officers (should the whole of the lands not be offered for sale in fifteen days) to resume the sale at an early named day, which will afford those attending an opportunity to purchase, without the trouble and expense of returning home, and again attending.

The latter part of this communication not relating immediately to the concerns of the Department of War, I have to request that you will lay it before the President for his consideration.

I am, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Maj. Gen. Comd'g Division of the South.

GEO. GRAHAM, Esq., Department of War.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, July 2, 1817.

We have now convened in a general council of all the principal chiefs and headmen of this nation to deliberate on your talk to us. You give us to understand that you are appointed by the President of the United States to meet the chiefs of this nation and the chiefs and headmen of the Cherokees now residing on the Arkansas. We hear with sincere gratitude and pleasure with respect to the friendship of our father the President of the United States, which he has expressed towards us through his commissioners. It is well known to our father the President of the United States that it always has been our universal desire to meet and promote the views of the General Government, so far as is consistent with justice and reason.

Friends and brothers: You say about nine years ago a deputation from our nation, duly authorized, were sent on to see our father Mr. Jefferson, to transact the important concerns of our nation. We acknowledge they were sent. But we can assure the honorable commissioners that they were not authorized to transact any business as respects the division of the nation. It was merely to take leave of our father Mr. Jefferson, who was about to retire to private life, which was communicated through Colonel Meigs, our agent, to the chiefs, and that our father the President of the United States had invited his red children, the Cherokees, to visit him previous to his retiring from public life. That of a division was proposed by a few chiefs of the lower part of the nation; nor was it known to the nation, until a few days before the delegation started to the city of Washington, that such were the intentions of the lower delegates who were sent from the river at the lower towns. The delegates from the upper towns knew nothing of the designs of the delegates from the lower towns until they arrived at the city of Washington.

Friend and brothers: As soon as the idea became doubtful to the chiefs and headmen of our nation who were friendly disposed towards their country, we then appointed two other delegates, in addition to those who were first chosen, in order to frustrate the designs of that part of the delegation who should attempt to do any thing that would be in anywise injurious to the nation in general. But, unfortunately, when the delegation arrived at the city of Washington, the two delegates, in whom the faith and confidence of the nation were placed, were rejected, and were not admitted to a hearing; and, in consequence of their not being allowed their voice, the first chosen delegates were divided when the subject of division took place.

Friends and brothers: We feel assured that our father the President will not compel us into measures so diametrically against the will and interest of a large majority of our nation. A part of those very men who were on at the city of Washington, who made the proposals for an exchange of lands, have, in a general council held at Costinally, in April, 1810, signed a talk that was sent to our agent with instructions to communicate it to the Secretary of War, insomuch that the Secretary of War might know the resolutions we had made with a determination not to dispose of any of our country, as will more fully appear from the tenor of the letter.

Brothers: We wish to remain on our land, and hold it fast. We appeal to our father the President of the United States to do us justice. We look to him for protection in the hour of distress. We are now distressed with the alternative proposal to remove from this country to the Arkansas, or stay and become citizens of the United States. We are not yet civilized enough to become citizens of the United States; nor do we wish to be compelled to move to a country so much against our inclination and will, where we would, in the course of a few years, return to the same savage state of life that we were in before the United States, our white brothers, extended their fostering care towards us, and brought us out of a savage state into a state similar to theirs.

Brothers: You tell us to speak freely and make our choice. Our choice is to remain on our lands, and follow the pursuits of agriculture and civilization, as all the Presidents, our fathers, have recommended and advised us to do; and we hope, by the benevolent societies of our white brothers from the north, that, in course of time, if we should be allowed to keep our country, our white brothers will not blush to own us as brothers.

Brothers: The Cherokees are nearly as free as the breeze which fans the shade. We are not yet prepared to adapt ourselves to the laws of the United States. We, as yet, have but few laws; and, agreeably to the advice of our former father, Mr. Jefferson, we ought not to have many—only those which will be suitable to our situation. If we accede to your proposition, loaded with a burden of laws which we do not understand, we would have eventually to surrender the little which your proposals offer us. We therefore request that you will press the subject no further at present, but suffer us to remain in peaceable possession of this our country, presented to us by our great father, the Good Spirit, from the creation, for our inheritance, and suffer us to keep it for the sake of the donor.

Brothers: The emigration of a small part of our people to the Arkansas was unauthorized by the chiefs and headmen of this nation. We have always wished them to remain in their native country. This we acknowledge to be the weak and feeble defence for our beloved country.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 1, 1817.

Your communications, dated the 8th, 9th, and 10th ultimo, together with the treaty entered into with the Cherokees, and the accompanying papers, have been received.

Fully impressed with the importance of the object which has been obtained, I have, in the absence of the President, determined, on due consideration, to assume the responsibility of complying with the engagements which you have entered into. Your bills, therefore, as well as those which may be drawn by the agent under your authority, will be paid; and orders have been given for the collection, at Pittsburg, of the requisite number of rifles, with a sufficient supply of ammunition.

Should the Senate refuse their advice and consent to the ratification of the treaty, the expenses incurred will be charged to the general appropriation for the Indian department. My own opinion, however, is, that the treaty will be ratified, though there is no doubt but it will be opposed on the grounds taken in the Senate during the last session, in opposition to the general policy of removing the Indians to the west of the Mississippi. It is also probable that there will be an opposition founded on the assumption that the treaty has not received the unbiased sanction of a majority of that portion of the nation residing on the east of the Mississippi, as evinced by the small number of chiefs who signed it, in proportion to the numbers who appear to have been present during the progress of the negotiation; and on the ground that no right to any portion of the Cherokee lands had accrued to the United States in consequence of the transactions which took place in 1809; and that such right had been assumed and too strongly enforced by the commissioners.

With sentiments of very great respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Gen. ANDREW JACKSON,	} Commissioners, &c.
Gov. JOS. McMINN,
Gen. D. MERIWETHER,

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 9, 1817.

In consequence of the recommendation of yourself and the other commissioners, I have contracted with Mr. Rockhold for sixty boats, to be delivered at any point designated by the agent between the mouths of Little Tennessee and Sequatchy rivers, and also for the delivery of four tons of lead. I have concluded to forward the other articles from this place to Blountsville, at which point Mr. Rockhold is to receive and forward them to Hiwassee with the first detachment of boats, which he has contracted to deliver by the 1st of November, and earlier if practicable. The articles which I propose to forward at present are five hundred rifles, six hundred traps and kettles, (three hundred of each, if the kettles are to be had,) eight hundred red blankets, and twenty-five hundred pounds of powder. The wagons will leave this place from the 10th to the 15th of September.

It is a matter of much importance that Mr. Meigs should have an assistant who is active and intelligent, well acquainted with the Indians, and particularly one who would be zealous in his exertions to promote the removal of the nation to the west of the Mississippi. From the recommendations of Colonel McKee, when last at this place, I am induced to think that Mr. Byers possesses generally the necessary requisites; but, not knowing how far he may be disposed to promote the removal of the Indians, I have deemed it proper to enclose the letter to Mr. Meigs authorizing his appointment to you, with authority to withhold it, provided you think Byers disposed to discourage among the Indians the idea of removal. In that event, you will nominate to this Department some other person whom you may think better qualified.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Gen. A. JACKSON, Nashville.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 9, 1817.

In consequence of the recommendation of the commissioners, I have contracted with Mr. Rockhold for sixty boats, to be delivered to your order from the 1st of November to the 1st of January next, for the purpose of removing those Indians who are desirous to settle on the Arkansas. A copy of the agreement is enclosed. You will give due notice of the time and places you wish the boats to be delivered at, and you will so regulate the time and places for the Indians to assemble as that they may not be delayed for transportation. You will make a requisition on the contractors for the State of Tennessee for the necessary quantity of meat and flour, as it is not deemed necessary that any other part of the ration should be furnished. Mr. Rockhold has also contracted to deliver four tons of lead, and a ferry-boat, which is to be left with the United States factor at the Chickasaw Bluffs, for the purpose of ferrying across the Mississippi such Indians as may prefer going by that route. Should circumstances make it necessary, you will request Mr. Rockhold to finish that boat without delay, and you will have her sent to the factor at the Chickasaw Bluffs, for the purpose of establishing the ferry immediately. I shall forward from this place to Blountsville, to the care of Mr. Rockhold, five hundred rifles, twenty-five hundred pounds of powder, six hundred kettles and traps, (three hundred of each,) and eight hundred blankets, which he has undertaken to have delivered to you with the first detachment of boats. It is probable that the whole number of boats may not be required during the next winter and spring; in that case, it is presumed you will find no difficulty in disposing of them to the New Orleans traders. It is expressly understood that the boats will be such as to answer that purpose; otherwise, you are not to receive them.

You will keep this Department advised, from time to time, of the probable number of Indians who will emigrate this fall and spring; and you will make use of all the means at your disposal to induce the Indians generally to remove, and to impress on the minds of those who are desirous of remaining the advantages of selecting a section of six hundred and forty acres, and of becoming citizens of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Colonel R. J. MEIGS, Cherokee Agent.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 13, 1817.

Your letter of the 12th ultimo was received yesterday, and I very much regret it had not come to hand previous to the arrangement with Mr. Rockhold, of which you were advised on the 9th instant.

It will be necessary for you either to go yourself, or to send a person in whom you can confide, to Blountsville, for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements with Mr. Rockhold for furnishing such portion of keel-boats, in lieu of part of flat-bottomed boats, as you may deem necessary, and for fixing the price at which the keel-boats are to be furnished. The price contracted to be given to Mr. Rockhold for transportation from Blountsville was founded on the presumption that it would be necessary in order to get the goods down in time to wagon them to Knoxville, or at least to a point below Cloud's falls. A part, if not all, the wagons will leave this by the 10th of September; and as the Indians seem anxious to be getting off, it will be desirable to have the goods and some of the boats at Hiwassee as early as possible in the month of October. With that view, the necessary arrangements should be made with Mr. Rockhold, and some of the keel as well as flat-bottomed boats should be built below Cloud's falls. Relying on the recommendation of the commissioners, and the zeal manifested by Mr. Rockhold, I agreed to fix the period for the delivery of the first detachment of boats on the 1st of November, on his assurance that they should be delivered at an earlier period, if practicable.

Lest my letter of the 9th instant may have miscarried, I forward a duplicate, with a copy of the contract.

The rifles to be sent out are long rifles; and, with the view of furnishing such Indians as may wish to remove before the articles sent from this place can reach you, I will order one hundred rifles to be sent immediately from Newport, in Kentucky, to the factor at the Chickasaw Bluffs, to be delivered by him to the Indians, on your order, with four pounds of powder and twelve pounds of lead for each rifle. If the lead cannot be forwarded from Newport, the factor must endeavor to furnish it.

You will, from time to time, advise this Department of the number of Indians who enter for removal, particularly designating the number of warriors who are entitled to rifles. And should you find that the number of boats contracted for is more than will be required for the emigration of this fall and spring, you will endeavor so to modify the contract as to meet your wants. You will take care to give a written notice, agreeably to the contract, of the place or places at which you may require the boats.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Colonel RETURN J. MEIGS, Cherokee Agent.

FORTVILLE, CHEROKEE NATION, September 19, 1817.

Instructions to a deputation of our warriors, who were duly authorized and appointed, by a late council held at Amoha, to proceed on and visit our father the President of the United States, to wit: our beloved speaker Going Snake, and George Harlin, members of our council; and James Brown, Roman Nose, Richard Taylor, and Richard Riley, committee for the affairs of the Cherokee nation.

On your arrival at Washington city, you will deliver our letter to our elder brother the Secretary of War, which we have addressed through him to our new father the President of the United States. You will state to our father that you have come on for the purpose of making known to him in what manner the late treaty was conducted in July last, between Major General Andrew Jackson and other commissioners, on the part of the United States, and the headmen, chiefs, and warriors of our nation, on the other part. You will give the President, our father, a full detail of the transaction of that treaty; you will also state to our father that we have of late years been subjected to the control of the minority of our nation, which causes disaffection and jealousy among us, as will appear from our late treaty, viz: the treaty that was entered into in the Chickasaw nation. We were invited to attend that talk by General Jackson; Toochalar and others were sent on to meet the commissioners there, with positive instructions to dispose of no lands; but, contrary to his instructions, he entered into a conditional treaty to be ratified at Turkeytown on the 28th of September, 1816; that fatal treaty was confirmed by the chiefs of four towns, between the hours of 9 and 10 o'clock at night, 4th of October, 1816, and not by the whole Cherokee nation, as expressed by General Jackson in the ratification of that treaty; but, on the contrary, there were six or seven headmen present who objected to the ratification of the treaty, as the list of the towns and members from each town will show; and you will request that this subject may be investigated, as an act of justice. You will also state to our father that we have appointed thirteen warriors of our nation, and invested them with full power to transact all the national affairs of our nation, subject to the unanimous consent of the headmen and chiefs of the whole Cherokee nation; and we have also resolved that the committee of the Cherokee nation shall meet at the agency to receive our yearly annuity from our agent, as our great national meetings have of late produced quarrels among our people and divisions among our warriors. You will state to the President that the United States have been at a very considerable expense in furnishing us rations at our annuities; propose to the President to furnish us money instead of rations, and we will adopt a plan for the distribution of our annuities. Also state to the President, our father, that one of our people had purchased claims in Double Head's reserve some time previous to the relinquishment of that reservation, and solicit the President to allow him compensation for his claim, as other natives received pay for their claims in said reservation. You will state that, thirteen years ago, at a treaty held at Tellico, we relinquished a tract of country four miles wide, embracing all of William Wofford's settlement; make inquiry relative to the situation of that relinquishment. You will also state in what manner the first emigration took place to the Arkansas, and the causes of the emigration since. Also inform our father the President of the many impositions practised on us by our neighboring white brothers, viz: by committing unwarrantable murders upon us; stealing our property; intruding over into our country; destroying our range, by driving and herding large stocks of cattle on the same; though we cannot be astonished at these impositions being practised on us, as General Jackson told us, in open treaty, last summer, to look around us and recollect what had happened to our brothers the Creeks. You will also state that the road leading from Tennessee to Georgia, through our country, was given up to Colonel Erwin for seven years, to keep in repair; there has been very little work done on it since, and the blame is laid on the Cherokees for not keeping the road in better repair, for it is now almost impossible for carriages to pass; and request the management of the said road to be given up to us again. You will state that our beloved father, George Washington, had delivered a written talk, in a book, now twenty five-years ago, and said, "In order to be preserved among you as a witness of our transactions together, and to which you may have recourse in future, this book you will sacredly preserve, and not suffer any thing to be written therein. Besides this manner of recording our proceedings, I confirm all I have said to you, in your own method, by a white belt, as the emblem of the purity of our hearts towards you." These are his own words, and he has promulgated them to his white children, which have gone far and near in written talks. And as to us red people, this white belt has been delivered as the pledge of justice towards us; and upon these pledges, then, are we come before our father the President of the United States for justice. You will also state that, in a late council held at Etower, our warriors had requested our principal chiefs to apply to our new father the President of the United States for his aid and assistance in educating our children; and you are therefore requested to make this known to him, that it was the wish of our warriors, and that they had promulgated their wishes to the nation at large, for some other benevolent schools to be established in our nation, so that our children may be led to the knowledge of our Creator, and they obtain everlasting life through the merits of his Son, and that they may be taught the habits of industry and the comforts of life while here on earth.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, October 21, 1817.

This will be handed you by a deputation from the Cherokee Indians on the east side of the Mississippi. The deputation consists of six persons; they have been furnished by this agency with five hundred dollars to defray their travelling expenses to the city of Washington, and, upon their arrival there, will report themselves to you, and render an account of their expenses in travelling to the city.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. SMITH,

Acting as agent in the absence of Colonel Return J. Meigs.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington City.

BROTHER:

HIWASSEE, October 28, 1817.

Having elected six of our warriors east of the Mississippi at our last council at Amoha to visit our new father the President of the United States, their names were reported to your beloved agent to apprise you of this resolve of the national council then and there held.

Brother: We are told you are the proper organ of talks through whom to approach our father the President of the United States, and beg your attentive hearing to what our warriors shall say in behalf of our country and people; and they will state nothing but what is just and to the interest of our people at large.

Brother: We are a great way from your hearing of every transaction of our national concerns, and we are necessarily committed to the care and protection of your servants, and have had many reasons to believe that we have not been treated with justice by our white brothers, which, we are sure, is far from your instructions or wishes to your beloved agent; which causes distrust and jealousy in the minds of our people, which, we are sure, is far from your wishes, but that confidence and harmony should pervade through your white children as well as in your benevolent care of your red children; though these unfriendly acts of our neighbors, we are sure, have been awed through the hands of power to prevent greater extent; and yet, among the many ill treatments of, and discouragement in, our relative situation, to our neighbors, your encouragement to our people has not been unavailing in agriculture, and manufacturing clothing, and educating our children; yet are we told by our neighbors that we shall all have to go over to the Arkansas country as hunters, and return to that state again in which our forefathers lived; for a great many of our people are now experiencing the advantages of the domestic habits of living by industry and raising stocks.

Brother: Our warriors are instructed to enter into a treaty with the United States, (if in their wisdom they may think we have been wrongly treated,) in which may be considered, in lieu of our late treaty, an alteration in some of the articles of it, and to make some additional articles in the mode of payment in our annuity, and to make final settlement with the Arkansas and Cherokees in land and money, as it may be attended with a great deal less trouble and expense than the late treaty authorized. And to all of which we beg your sincere consideration, which is, and that which will be, laid before your honorable control; and hope you will communicate these our wishes to our father the President of the United States, and permit us to subscribe ourselves

Your friends and brothers,

By order of the principal chiefs:

PATH KILLER, his × mark.
CHARLES HICKS.

THOMAS WILSON, Clerk to the National Committee.

To the Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

FATHER:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 22, 1817.

We, the undersigned, being a deputation from the Cherokee nation, beg leave to state to our father the President, that, in July, 1816, Return J. Meigs, commissioner on the part of the United States, having been instructed by the Government in behalf of the United States, offered to give to the Cherokee nation $6,000 per annum, in perpetuity, for a cession of land, the western boundary whereof should be designated by a line beginning at a point opposite to the head of Chickasaw island, and to be drawn, due south, to a point from which a line should be drawn eastwardly to the lower end of the Ten Islands on Coosa river. When this offer was made, we declined a compliance with it, wishing to keep our land; but having been notified to meet Generals Jackson and Meriwether at the Chickasaw council-house, in September of that year, as commissioners of the United States, we met the said last-mentioned commissioners, and entered conditionally into a treaty, which we afterwards confirmed on the 4th of October, 1816, in which treaty we ceded to the United States more land than was asked for from us in July of the same year, as above stated, for the consideration of $6,000 per annum, for only ten years. When we compare the consideration finally stipulated, (that is, for only ten years,) with that previously offered us, we are astonished. We find that by this our inability in negotiating we have lost an almost invaluable annuity, which would have enabled us to educate our children, and support our old men and women and poor people. We now, in behalf of our nation, respectfully and humbly ask our father to take these circumstances into consideration, and grant us such relief as a fair investigation of the circumstances would warrant and justify. We are sensible that the treaty has been made and ratified, and that legally we are barred from any relief, and we do not pretend to fly from our obligations; yet, permit us to observe that, when our case is considered, we are confident it will appear that we are entitled to some relief, by extending that part of our annuity for a term of years longer than was stipulated by that treaty. We cheerfully and respectfully submit this statement to a Government which will not refuse to listen to representations of its youngest children.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 22, 1817.

The Cherokee deputation with the following observations may accompany their memorial this day presented. In the first place, the Cherokee deputation wish it to be understood that they disclaim every idea of improper reflection on Generals Jackson and Meriwether, and have no doubt that, as commissioners in making the treaty alluded to in the memorial, they acted with pure intentions; but, when the deputation reflect on the difference of the consideration given to the Chickasaws, and compare it with that given to the Cherokees, (their feelings suffer by the comparison,) the longer continuance of the annuity to the Chickasaws, the reserves made in favor of several Chickasaw chiefs, and pensions to several of those chiefs, (the Path Killer, our head chief, is old and infirm, and has as great claim on his country as any Indian chief—he fought for the United States in the late war,) they discover a marked difference between the two tribes, which the Cherokees conceive is not warranted, by having reference to facts and circumstances which actually exist. The deputation will enumerate some of these facts and circumstances, viz: The Chickasaws, compared with the Cherokees, are a recent people in that country; they are few in number; they acquired the residence where they now are, in the first instance, by the mere courtesy of the southern tribes, particularly of the Choctaws. We, the Cherokees, have always called them our youngest brothers; this they always acknowledge; they were once as strangers settled at the Chickasaw Old Fields, at the point where, by the Turkeytown treaty, we have established our western boundary. The Cherokees claimed that land, and drove them from that point to where they now reside.

In the grade of rank of the four nations south of Ohio, the Cherokees are the first, the Creeks the second, the Choctaws the third, and the Chickasaws the fourth: this rank has long been acknowledged. These three tribes call the Cherokees their eldest brothers, and the Cherokees call them youngest brothers and nephews. It appears to us that, by a combination of the Creeks and Chickasaws, they have deprived the Cherokees of their rights. We acknowledge that there is considerable uncertainty in traditional accounts relating to boundary; but all these tribes have no other, and, in point of credibility, Cherokee tradition is as good as others, and has been handed down from a more remote period than that of the Chickasaws.

We, the undersigned, deputies from the Cherokee nation, having delivered our instructions to Mr. Graham on our arrival here, and conversed with him on the subject of our grievances, and having a partial conversation with you on the subject of our mission, we feel assured that you understand the object of our mission. We beg that you will give us your opinion on the various subjects of our instructions, in writing. Our object for asking you to give us your opinion in writing is to show our people, on our return to our nation, the friendly disposition of the United States towards us.

DECEMBER, 1817.

On the 22d ultimo we were favored with an interview with our father the President of the United States. We then laid before him our instructions, and, at the same time, presented to him a memorial and petition on a subject of very high and dear interest to our nation. The President listened to our communication like a father, and encouraged us that we might be sure of his influence in obtaining the redress we asked for. This gave us much satisfaction; and as the great national concerns demanded his time, he informed us that future communications on the business of our mission must be made to the Secretary of War; and we thank you for the present opportunity to converse on the various subjects enumerated in our instructions, of which we shall leave a copy in your hands. Many of those subjects are interesting to our nation; and as we have full confidence in our father the President, and in his administration of every thing committed to him, we cheerfully confide all our national concerns to his wise and just administration, and are confident that his youngest children, as well as our elder brothers, will equally have a place in his mind, and that protection and measures for the amelioration of our condition will be pursued until we can rise from our present state of minority to a state of more perfect manhood, and become citizens, sharing equally with our elder brothers all the advantages of enlightened society; and, in our progress towards such a state, it is probable very interesting transactions may be necessary. And here we beg leave to ask of our father that, in future transactions of a public nature between the United States and our nation, the American Government will not require of our nation any thing which, as our protectors and guardians, they will not, after due deliberation, advise us to comply with; and, having no doubt of the magnanimity and benignity of the Government, we shall return home satisfied, and report to our nation the result of our mission to this. With the greatest respect and fidelity, we subscribe our names.

We have seen, with painful feelings, a paragraph in the National Intelligencer, under the head of Milledgeville, dated the 2d instant; in it is asserted that the Seminole Indians, now threatening the United States with war, have received considerable reinforcements from disaffected Creeks and Cherokees. The United States cannot be more surprised at that account than we are, and we are induced to believe it a fabricated calumny, intended to injure our nation. We are now returning home, and, as soon as we arrive there, we shall do ourselves the honor to transmit a faithful account in relation to that statement.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI TERRITORY, July 1, 1817.

After a long interval of business, as commissioners, &c., a very full and respectable deputation of chiefs and principal men from the Otoe, Missouri, and Poncarar tribes of Indians, accompanied by the first chief of the Pawnee republic, and two chiefs of the upper tribe of Sioux, arrived at St. Louis a few days ago, for the purpose of entering into a treaty with the United States. The cause of their not attending our general invitation earlier than the present time was (as they state) owing to an indirect warfare which existed between them and the other tribes inhabiting the country immediately between them and the white settlers. To avoid those enemies, they applied to Mr. Lisa, United States Indian agent, who has thought it his duty to accompany these chiefs to this place; and as they appeared extremely anxious to treat, and as we believed it important to gratify their wishes, on several accounts, and particularly so in consequence of the great exertions which we have some reasons to believe are making to prevent many of the Indian tribes, we, in the absence of Governor Edwards, at his home, in Kaskaskia, concluded with those tribes (who were fully represented) treaties, which we have the honor herewith to transmit.

The Upper Sioux, and the several tribes of Pawnees, not having a sufficient deputation to treat, we have postponed entering into any negotiation with them, further than merely explaining to them the just and honorable policy of the Government towards the Indian tribes. These Sioux chiefs are of a large tribe of that nation who rove on the upper parts of the Missouri. The Pawnee chief who visits us is the principal chief of one band only. It is to be regretted that a full deputation of all the tribes of the Pawnee nation did not attend and adjust the difference which exists between them and the white traders and hunters who have visited their country in the last two years, as we are informed a serious conflict took place last summer between a party of that nation and the white traders under the control of Mr. Auguste Chouteau, jun., in which one white man and several Pawnees were killed. Several other acts of violence have been committed by that nation unprovokedly. Their numbers, and the intervening country which they occupy, contiguous to the Spanish settlements, render them important to us as a nation with whom the United States should be on the most friendly terms.

In a former communication we gave it as our opinion that a treaty with those tribes would be highly important; and, should we receive instructions on that subject, we shall immediately adopt the most proper measures to have them carried into effect.

We have the honor, &c.

Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington City.

WILLIAM CLARK,
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, March 31, 1817.

A deputation of chiefs and warriors from the Menomonies arrived at this place on the 20th instant, under the invitation we gave them last year, with the view of entering into a treaty of peace and friendship with the United States.

We invited them to meet us here at the commencement of last summer, or as soon thereafter as they should find it convenient. They now say they have done so; and have come in compliance with our invitation, urging many very plausible reasons for not having attended sooner.

It would have answered no good purpose for us to have told them we had no longer any authority to treat with them. They would not have understood us; and the British traders might have handled it very much to the injury of the Government, in persuading them they were deceived and trifled with, and had been invited to travel a long journey merely to be laughed at. In this way, the dissatisfaction felt at present by many of the lake tribes would doubtless have been greatly increased, and might probably have been blown up into an open war with us.

Taking all things into consideration, therefore, and regarding the general policy of the Government, we thought its interest would be promoted by entering into a treaty with them, conformably to instructions given us on former occasions, although our authority to do so has ceased.

We have the honor, herewith enclosed, to forward you a duplicate of the treaty;

And have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servants,

WILLIAM CLARK,
NINIAN EDWARDS,
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 9, 1817.

Your letters of the 31st of March and 20th of April were submitted to the President, and returned to this Department only a few days before he left this on his tour to the eastward.

The treaty entered into with the Menomonic tribe of Indians has been approved by him, and will be submitted to the Senate at the next session.

Should a deputation of the chiefs of the Pawnee and Ottoe tribes come to St. Louis with a view of entering into a treaty in consequence of the invitation formerly given to them by the commissioners, you will, in that event, reassemble the commissioners, and enter into a negotiation with them.

No decision has yet been made on any of the claims transmitted by you to my predecessor, or on those lately forwarded.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Governor WM. CLARK, St. Louis.

15th CONGRESS.]

No. 150.

[1st SESSION.

AMENDMENTS PROPOSED TO THE TREATY WITH THE WYANDOTS, SENECA, DELAWARES, SHAWANEE, PATAWATAMIE, OTTOWA, AND CHIPPEWAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 29, 1817.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom were referred a treaty concluded on the 29th of September last with the Wyandots and sundry other tribes of Indians, and a message of the President of the United States communicating the said treaty, and a petition of a number of the inhabitants of Huron, in the State of Ohio, relating to the same subject, reported:

That, from due consideration of the provisions of the said treaty, the message of the President, and the facts stated by the petitioners, and the complaints stated by a delegation of the Wyandot and Seneca tribes, who were heard before the committee on the subject of their alleged grievances arising out of the treaty, the committee have agreed to propose several amendments to the treaty, when the particular articles to which they relate shall be under consideration in the Senate.

The articles which in their opinion require amendment are the sixth and seventh. It is provided by the sixth article that a grant be made to the Wyandot tribe of a tract of land of twelve miles square. It is objected, and appears to be a serious grievance, in their view, that the tract is too small (considering the bad soil it embraces) to afford them subsistence in the mode of life and occupation they intend to pursue—that of pasturage, for rearing and feeding of cattle.

Their tribe is computed at one thousand persons; calculating each family to consist of six persons, and allowing, on a division of property, a double quantity to the chiefs, to support their dignity, the grant would not afford to each family more than five hundred acres. And further, the grant appears in disproportion to the cession of land they have made, when compared with the cessions of other tribes, and the grants made to them. The Wyandots have ceded their whole territory, except the tract to be regranted; and their cession constitutes almost the whole of the lands obtained by the treaty. It further appears that, although they were not averse from a cession of their lands, they were not cordial in their agreement to the terms on which they actually surrendered them.

From these considerations, it has been deemed expedient to recommend that the grant to the Wyandot chiefs be so enlarged that it may contain a tract equal to sixteen miles square.

The Seneca grant provided for, of thirty thousand acres, to be laid off on the east side of the Sandusky river, is objected to, not as insufficient in quantity, but as the location excludes from its limits much of their improvements which are on the west side of the river. This fact is confirmed by the statement of the petition referred to the committee. It is not doubted that much inconvenience and distress would be occasioned to these people, destitute as they are of the habits of industry, by an immediate removal from their huts and planting grounds; to prevent which, it will be proposed that while the location of their tract will remain as provided by the treaty, the lands on the west side of the river, which have been improved and are occupied by them, shall be reserved from sale, and for their use, while they continue to occupy the same.

The committee view as exceptionable that clause of the seventh article which, without any control on the part of Government, authorizes the individuals of those tribes, after separate allotments have been made by the chiefs, to dispose of their lands, and grant them in complete title to any person whatever. This provision, it is believed, is unprecedented by any former treaty, and at variance with the general principles on which intercourse with the Indian tribes has been conducted. The laws have regulated their trade, and confined it to persons licensed to carry it on; and have also prohibited any sale of their lands, except made in public council, and to authorized agents of the Government; thus presuming their incapacity to transact their business, and assuming on the part of Government a superintending concern and guardianship over their interests, in order to protect them against the impositions of civilized men, more enlightened than they, but too often less just. To dispense in the present instance with the usual prohibitions, or some other equivalent provisions, would appear to be improper. The lands regranted by the treaty are valuable, and, from the progress of cultivation and improvement in their vicinity, will soon become more so, presenting a desirable object for attainment to our citizens. It is probable that, if this provision should be ratified in its present shape, treaties with the chiefs would soon be commenced, by unauthorized persons, for the allotment of the lands among the individuals of the tribes, and with the individuals, for the alienation of their rights; and that a capital would be employed for that purpose, different from that which is usually applied to the purchase of public lands, for settlement and cultivation; and that the chiefs and other members of the tribes would not long resist (whatever their present resolutions may be) the force of arguments, and temptations of money, which would be brought to bear on their minds to effect that object. It will be proposed that no sale or transfer of the lands regranted to the Indians be made to any person except an Indian, without the approbation of the President, or some agent specially appointed for that purpose.

An abstract view of the cessions of land made to the United States, and the grants of land provided to be made, and moneys stipulated to be paid to the Wyandot, Seneca, Shawanee, Delaware, Pattawatamie, Ottawa, and Chippewa tribes of Indians, by a treaty concluded with the said tribes on the 29th of September, 1817, at the foot of the Rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie.

In estimating the quantity of land ceded to the United States by the said treaty, perfect accuracy was not attainable. The boundary lines of the tracts ceded were traced on the map lately published by Mellish, and the length and bearing of those lines determined thereby. If his map can be relied on for a tolerably accurate delineation of that part of the country, the view now given will approximate the truth. The principal tract is that ceded by the Wyandots, in form approaching to that of a regular square, or 70 miles north and south by 75 east and west, containing 5,250 square miles, or 3,360,000 acres. Of that quantity is receded or granted to the Wyandot and Seneca chiefs, in trust, and to individuals of the said tribe, in fee-simple, 128,440 acres; that is:

Amendments proposed by Mr. Morrow.

At the end of the first paragraph of the sixth article, insert—"And, in addition to the said grants of land, there shall be reserved, for the use of the said tribe, a tract of one hundred and twelve square miles, which shall be laid off adjoining to, and on three sides of, the aforesaid tract of twelve miles square, in equal quantities on each side, so that the boundary line adjoining the tract to be granted to the Delawares at Captain Pipe's town shall remain as provided by the original article."

At the end of the second paragraph of the sixth article, insert—"And there shall be reserved from sale by the United States, after a survey of the lands shall have been made, every quarter section, and fraction of a section, lying west of and adjoining the Sandusky river, opposite the aforesaid tract provided to be granted to the chiefs for the Seneca tribe, where such quarter section or fraction is now inhabited and occupied for cultivation by any Seneca Indian or Indians, and the same shall be reserved for the use of such Indian or Indians while he or they shall continue to inhabit and occupy the same for cultivation."

Strike out the seventh article, and insert—"And the said chiefs, or their successors, may, at any time they think proper, convey to either of the persons mentioned in said schedule, or his heirs, the quantity secured thereby to him, or may refuse so to do; the use of the said land, however, shall be in the said person. But no such person, whose share of land may have been conveyed to him by the chiefs, nor person who may receive a grant of land in virtue of any article of this treaty, shall have the right or power to sell, convey, or lease the same to any person whatever, other than an Indian, unless he shall be authorized so to do by an agreement entered into between the tribe to which he belongs, convened in public council, and an agent or commissioner of the United States authorized for that purpose, and such agreement ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate."

TRADE, INTERCOURSE, AND SCHOOLS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 22, 1818.

Mr. HENRY SOUTHARD, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to Indian affairs, reported:

That the capital appropriated for the prosecution of Indian trade was, in 1809, augmented from $200,000 to $300,000, which sum, by succeeding acts, has been continued down to this period. Of the capital thus appropriated, $290,000 have been drawn from the treasury, and actively employed under the direction of the superintendent of Indian supplies. Under the various laws enacted for the support and encouragement of Indian trade, eight factories or trading posts have been established, at the following points:

1. Fort Mitchell, Georgia.
2. Chickasaw Bluffs, Mississippi Territory.
3. Fort Confederation, on the Tombigbee river.
4. Fort Osage, on the Missouri river, near the mouth of the Osage.
5. Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi, near the mouth of the Ouisconsin river.
6. Ordered to Sulphur Fork, on Red river; formerly at Natchitoches.
7. Green Bay, on the Green Bay of Lake Michigan, Illinois Territory.
8. Chicago, Lake Michigan.

The committee, deeming it unnecessary to present a detailed view of the profits and loss of each particular agency, submit, in relation to the general establishment, that it has been a losing institution; owing, it is presumable, to adventitious circumstances, originating in our recent belligerent state, and not growing out of any defect in the organization or government of the trade. From the first operations of this traffic up to December, 1809, it sustained a loss of $44,538 36. Since that period the trade has been more successful, it having yielded a profit on the capital actually vested in merchandise of about $15,000 annually, after covering a loss of $43,369, which accrued in consequence of the capture of several trading posts by the enemy during the late war.

In this view of the subject the committee have not embraced an item of $20,000, annually disbursed at the Treasury, for the pay of the superintendent and his clerks, the factors, &c., and which, when applied to the concern, as necessarily it must be, in making an estimate of profit and loss, will absorb the profits arising from the funds employed in trade, and furnish an annual charge against the establishment of $5,000. This annual loss being sustained by the treasury, pursuant to appropriations for the pay of the superintendent and his assistants, is a positive loss to the Government, but not to the concern, in the diminution of its capital, which, under all circumstances, remains stationary. The act passed 29th of April, 1816, giving to the President the discretionary power of licensing foreigners to a participation in the Indian trade, is less exceptionable in theory than in practice. With all the guards of the act and precautions of the Executive, it has been found impracticable, under a dispensing power, to avoid the admission of men of vicious habits, whose conduct tends to interrupt the peace and harmony of the United States and the Indian tribes. Nor can such be interdicted while the door is left open to foreign traders. Either admit or exclude all. A system partial in its character will, by inhibiting a worthy applicant, do him injustice; and, by permitting the fraudulent speculator, the savage, for whom the provision is made, and the country, are wronged. The Executive must rely on recommendations, in the exercise of the power deposited with him; and, no doubt, is often deceived in the character of persons recommended to presidential patronage.

The committee are apprized that the exclusion of foreigners will be attended with a momentary irritation, and a temporary expense to the nation, as the inhibition will devolve on the Government an obligation to increase its trading posts and augment its Indian capital, so as to supply the wants of such tribes as are now dependant on foreign trade. The prosecution of this policy will be strongly aided by the additional vigor with which the system will inspire the commercial enterprise of the American citizen. The committee have been unable to ascertain, with any degree of accuracy, the amount of capital employed by foreigners in this trade; consequently, they are somewhat at a loss to suggest the amount necessary to fill the vacuum that may be occasioned by the withdrawing of foreign capital. But, from the best lights which have been afforded, the committee are induced to believe that $———, in addition to the present appropriation, having the auxiliary exertions of individual enterprise, and aided by a superintendency at St. Louis, or some other suitable place, would be amply sufficient to accomplish what must be desirable to the Government—the supply of those dependant upon its humanity, upon terms advantageous to both.

Your committee further report that they consider supplying the Indian tribes with such articles of merchandise as are necessary to meet their pressing wants is not only an act of humanity, but of sound national policy; and that every measure that would tend to civilize those savage tribes ought to be pursued by the United States. Your committee are induced to believe that nothing which it is in the power of Government to do would have a more direct tendency to produce this desirable object than the establishment of schools at convenient and safe places amongst those tribes friendly to us. Your committee are aware that many plausible objections may be raised against the proposed measure; but we believe that all difficulties on this subject may be surmounted, and that the great object may be carried into practical effect. In the present state of our country, one of two things seems to be necessary: either that those sons of the forest should be moralized or exterminated. Humanity would rejoice at the former, but shrink with horror from the latter. Put into the hands of their children the primer and the hoe, and they will naturally, in time, take hold of the plough; and, as their minds become enlightened and expand, the Bible will be their book, and they will grow up in habits of morality and industry, leave the chase to those whose minds are less cultivated, and become useful members of society.

Great exertions have, of late years, been made by individuals and missionary societies in Europe and America; schools have been established by those humane and benevolent societies in the Indies, amongst the Hindoos, and the Hottentots; and, notwithstanding that superstition, bigotry, and ignorance have shrouded those people in darkness for ages, thousands of them have already yielded to instruction.

The Government has no such difficulties to encounter, no Bibles nor books to translate into foreign or other languages—only to establish some English schools. The experiment may be tried at a very small expense.

The committee believe that increasing the number of trading posts, and establishing schools on or near our frontiers for the education of Indian children, would be attended with beneficial effects both to the United States and the Indian tribes, and the best possible means of securing the friendship of those nations in amity with us, and, in time, to bring the hostile tribes to see that their true interest lies in peace, and not in war; and therefore the committee report a bill.

TREATY WITH THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE ON THE 6TH OF MARCH, 1818.

*To the Senate of the United States:*WASHINGTON, March 5, 1818.

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration and the exercise of their constitutional power of advice and consent, respecting the ratification thereof, a treaty concluded on the 22d of January last with the Creek nation of Indians. This treaty is accompanied by certain documents having relation to it.

JAMES MONROE

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 2, 1818.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit the treaty recently made by Governor Mitchell, accompanied by a plat of the cession made by Major Kearney from a map of Georgia.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A treaty of limits between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, made and concluded at the Creek agency, on Flint river, on the twenty-second day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

James Monroe, President of the United States of America, by David Brydie Mitchell, of the State of Georgia, agent of Indian affairs for the Creek nation, and sole commissioner, specially appointed for that purpose, of the one part, and the undersigned kings, chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Creek nation in council assembled, on behalf of the said nation, of the other part, have entered into the following articles and conditions, viz:

ARTICLE 1. The said kings, chiefs, headmen, and warriors do hereby agree, in consideration of certain sums of money to be paid to the said Creek nation by the Government of the United States, as hereinafter stipulated, to cede, and forever quit claim, and do, in behalf of their said nation, hereby cede, relinquish, and forever quit claim unto the United States, all right, title, and interest which the said nation have or claim in or unto the two following tracts of land, situate, lying, and being within the following bounds, that is to say: 1. Beginning at the mouth of Goose creek, on the Alatomaha river; thence, along the line leading to the Mounts, at the head of St. Mary's river, to the point where it is intersected by the line run by the commissioners of the United States under the treaty of Fort Jackson; thence, along the said last-mentioned line, to a point where a line leaving the same shall run the nearest and a direct course by the head of a creek called by the Indians Alcasalekie, to the Oakmulgee river; thence, down the said Oakmulgee river, to its junction with the Oconee, the two rivers there forming the Alatomaha; thence, down the Alatomaha, to the first-mentioned bounds at the mouth of Goose creek. 2. Beginning at the high shoals of the Appalachee river; and from thence, along the line designated by the treaty made at the city of Washington on the 14th of November, 1815, to the Ulcofauhatche, it being the first large branch or fork of the Oakmulgee, above the Seven Islands; thence, up the eastern bank of the Ulcofauhatche by the water's edge, to where the path leading from the high shoals of the Appalachee to the shallow ford on the Chatahoochee crosses the same; and from thence, along the said path, to the shallow ford on the Chatahoochee river; thence, up the Chatahoochee river, by the water's edge, on the eastern side, to Suwanee Old Town; thence, by a direct line, to the head of Appalachee; and thence, down the same, to the first-mentioned bounds at the high shoals of Appalachee.

ART. 2. It is hereby stipulated and agreed on the part of the United States, as a full consideration for the two tracts of land ceded by the Creek nation in the preceding article, that there shall be paid to the Creek nation by the United States, within the present year, the sum of twenty thousand dollars; and ten thousand dollars shall be paid annually for the term of ten succeeding years, without interest; making, in the whole, eleven payments in the course of eleven years, the present year inclusive; and the whole sum to be paid one hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

ART. 3. And it is hereby further agreed on the part of the United States that, in lieu of all former stipulations relating to blacksmiths, they will furnish the Creek nation for three years with two blacksmiths and strikers.

ART. 4. The President may cause any line to be run which may be necessary to designate the boundary of any part of both or either of the tracts of land ceded by this treaty, at such time and in such manner as he may deem proper. And this treaty shall be obligatory on the contracting parties as soon as the same shall be ratified by the Government of the United States.

Done at the place and on the day and year before written.

[Signed, also, by the kings, chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Creek nation.]

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 31, 1817.

In compliance with your request, I now enclose you a regular commission to treat with the Creeks for the lands mentioned in your former instructions. In the late treaty made with the Cherokees, they have ceded the lands lying north of a line run from the high shoals of the Appalachee to the Chatahoochee river, and bounded by that river; between this line (the line established by the treaty with the Creeks on the 14th of November, 1805,) and the Oakmulgee river, there will remain a gore of land, which it would be very desirable for the State of Georgia to obtain, and which, perhaps, may be obtained without agitating the question of the boundary line between the Creeks and Cherokees, by making the Oakmulgee river the boundary between the Creeks and us. You will therefore endeavor to obtain a relinquishment of all the lands claimed by the Creek nation on the east side of the Oakmulgee.

When McIntosh was here, he expressed much sensibility upon the question of the boundary line between the Creeks and Cherokees; and I understand that there has been a council held by the chiefs of those two nations for the purpose of settling their boundary, but that it terminated without coming to any agreement. The boundary line which is considered here as the proper one between those two nations is, a line run directly from the high shoals of Appalachee to the Ten Islands, or Turkeytown, on the Coosa river. If you find the sensibility of the Creek chiefs abated in relation to this question, in consequence of what may have passed at the council lately held with the Cherokees, and you find that the question of boundary can be agitated without endangering the other objects which you have in charge, you are authorized to establish the above-mentioned line as the northern boundary of the Creek nation; and if you can establish this line, it will justify you in giving a greater compensation for the relinquishment of the title to the two tracts of land for which you are authorized to negotiate.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

D. B. MITCHELL, Creek Agent.

SIR:

CREEK AGENCY, January 6, 1818.

I yesterday received a letter from the Little Prince, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose. It seems the messenger sent to the Seminoles has returned to Fort Mitchell without calling here. You will find the motives which induced me to send to the Seminoles explained in my letter of the 14th of December last, and, from the answer brought back, I have yet hopes that the difficulties we have gotten into with these people may be settled without entering the Spanish territory, if to avoid such a step be still desired by the Government.

All the principal chiefs and warriors of the friendly part of the nation are to meet me here on the 11th instant, and, in consequence of the report of Hopoie Haijo that he had "met the Mickasukies at the half-way ground coming with a peace talk to us," and of the wish expressed in the latter part of the Little Prince's letter respecting the Choctaws, I have despatched a messenger with a copy of the letter to General Gaines, or the officer commanding, (for I understand the general has gone to St. Mary's,) with a suggestion on my part that, if a little time is allowed for the decided interference of the friendly Indians, a settlement of differences may possibly be had; but, if not, that the friendly warriors, after their efforts shall have been ineffectual to procure peace, will heartily unite in compelling the hostile ones to submit.

Although I shall again, in a few days, have occasion to communicate the result of our deliberations at the contemplated meeting, yet I deemed it my duty not to delay one moment in communicating the result of the mission to the Seminoles.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration and esteem, your obedient servant,

D. B. MITCHELL.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

MY FRIEND:

FORT MITCHELL, December 30, 1817.

The messenger who was sent to the Mickasukies has returned with an answer to our talk. The Mickasukies say it was not they that began the war; they were sitting down in peace, and the white people came on them in the night and fired on them. The Mickasukies are all sitting down in their town, and doing no mischief, and waiting to see if the white people will make peace with them. The people that shot at the boat and killed all the white people were the Old Red Sticks from the upper towns—they that turned hostile last war. The man that was sent to the Mickasukies (Hopoie Haijo) with a peace talk met the Mickasukies at the half-way ground coming with a peace talk to us. Mr. Hambly and Mr. Doyle were taken prisoners. Hopoie Haijo saw them. Tustenuggee Chapeo has gone to relieve them, and carry them to the fort of St. Mark's.

I have sent you this little talk now; our meeting that you appointed will soon be, and then every thing will be made straight. We hear that the army has crossed at Hartford. The Chickasaws have received two letters from the army, and they had nobody to read them, and they do not know the contents, and wish the army could be stopped until our meeting is over.

TUSTENUGGEE HOPOIE.

To D. B. MITCHELL.

SIR:

CREEK AGENCY, January 28, 1818.

I have the honor to enclose a treaty made with the headmen of the Creek nation at this place on the 22d instant. The extent of territory ceded is much greater, and the price given much less, than I had any reason to expect either would be at the commencement of the meeting. It is the result of my best exertions, and I trust will meet the approbation of Government.

The great extent of territory which this nation lost by the late war makes them reluctant in parting with any more, and I could not prevail upon them to make the Oakmulgee the boundary of the second tract mentioned in that treaty; neither would they consent to bring the line of the lower tract so high up as Fort Hawkins. It is my opinion, however, that these two points can be attained before many years. There is a tract of land lying on Wills creek, and between that creek and the Coosa river, on the west side of the latter, and north of the treaty line of Fort Jackson, which they may be prevailed upon to part with; in treating for which they are willing to discuss and settle the subject of the boundary between them and the Cherokees. They, however, contend that their present boundary with the Cherokees is by the Suwanee path, where it leaves the western line of Jackson county, to the Suwanee Old Town, on the Chatahoochee river; and from thence, by a direct line, to the mouth of a certain watercourse, called by them Little river, where it unites with the Coosa. They have furnished me with a copy of certain questions put by the Creeks to an old Cherokee chief and the Cherokee interpreter, (who was their mutual interpreter on the first settlement of the Cherokees in the Creek country,) at their late meeting, a copy of which, and of the answers, is enclosed; by which it does appear that the Cherokees have for a long time occupied, and do now occupy, a certain portion of Creek land, and that they do not claim lower down the Chatahoochee than Suwanee Old Town, the path to which, from the high shoals of the Appalachee, has always been considered as their boundary east of Chatahoochee. This is a very different boundary to that which Mr. Graham informed me in his letter of the 31st October last was understood by the Government to be the boundary between the two nations.

It has always been customary, at meetings of the Indians called by the agent, either for treaty or for payment of annuities, &c., for the agent to furnish provisions during such meetings; and as the Indians, at the meeting at Fort Hawkins, in July last, paid for the provisions expended out of their annuity, Mr. Graham desired me to provide for the amount in the treaty which has just been concluded, and which was then in contemplation. This, however, has not been done, because the Indians did not seem to understand the necessity of inserting it, and did not wish the sum to appear larger than what they actually received for their land. I therefore did not insist upon it, but there can be no objection on that account to its being appropriated by Congress, when appropriations are made to carry the treaty into effect, if approved by the President and ratified by the Senate. The sum expended was a little upwards of six thousand dollars.

I shall have the honor to address you again by next mail upon some important matters relating to this agency, which the want of time prevents my doing now.

I am, sir, with high consideration and respect, your very obedient servant,

D. B. MITCHELL, Agent for Indians.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

Questions put to, and answers of Shoe Boot, interpreter for the Creeks and Cherokees, from the first settling of the latter in the Creek country. October 19, 1817.

Question 1st. Were you an interpreter for the Creeks and Cherokees when the Cherokees first came into the Creek country?

Answer. I was the linguist; but the chiefs of both nations present at that time are either dead or absent, except these men, (Chowoloca, Micco, and Sour Mush.)

Question 2d. Where did the Cherokees come from? and was the country now in dispute their country or not?

Answer. They came from Tennessee, being driven away by the white people, and came into the Creek country.

Question 3d. Within what limits did the Creeks lend them land?

Answer. They talked with the Upper Creeks, being sent there by some of the Lower Creeks who saw them on their way to the Spanish settlements. They went to Au-beh-cau, a town in the Upper Creek country, and had their talk. The Creeks told them to live down as low as Wills creek, on the west side of Coosa river. They held a second talk at Hiwassee, when the Creeks told them they might live on the head waters of the Coosa or Hiw-tower river.

Question 4th. Did you think, at the time it was lent, that it was Creek country?

Answer. I did, and the Creeks told them to live on the Coosa or Creek river.

Question 5th. Did these men now present, (Chowoloca, Micco, and Sour Mush,) know any thing about its being Creek country? and do they know any thing about it now?

Answer. The old chiefs know it, and now acknowledge it.

Several of the Creek chiefs who were at the first council with the Cherokees were present and in council when the foregoing questions were put and the answers given thereto.

WAR WITH THE SEMINOLES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 25TH OF MARCH, 1818.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

I now lay before Congress all the information in the possession of the Executive respecting the war with the Seminoles, and the measures which it has been thought proper to adopt for the safety of our fellow-citizens on the frontier exposed to their ravages. The enclosed documents show that the hostilities of this tribe were unprovoked, the offspring of a spirit long cherished and often manifested towards the United States; and that, in the present instance, it was extending itself to other tribes, and daily assuming a more serious aspect. As soon as the nature and object of this combination were perceived, the major general commanding the southern division of the troops of the United States was ordered to the theatre of action, charged with the management of the war, and vested with the powers necessary to give it effect. The season of the year being unfavorable to active operations, and the recesses of the country affording shelter to these savages, in case of retreat, may prevent a prompt termination of the war; but it may be fairly presumed that it will not be long before this tribe and its associates receive the punishment which they have provoked and justly merited.

As almost the whole of this tribe inhabit the country within the limits of Florida, Spain was bound by the treaty of 1795 to restrain them from committing hostilities against the United States. We have seen with regret that her Government has altogether failed to fulfil this obligation, nor are we aware that it has made any effort to that effect. When we consider her utter inability to check, even in the slightest degree, the movements of this tribe, by her very small and incompetent force in Florida, we are not disposed to ascribe the failure to any other cause. The inability, however, of Spain to maintain her authority over the territory and Indians within her limits, and, in consequence, to fulfil the treaty, ought not to expose the United States to other and greater injuries. Where the authority of Spain ceases to exist, there the United States have a right to pursue their enemy, on a principle of self-defence. In this instance, the right is more complete and obvious, because we shall perform only what Spain was bound to have performed herself. To the high obligations and privileges of this great and sacred right of self-defence will the movement of our troops be strictly confined. Orders have been given to the general in command not to enter Florida, unless it be in pursuit of the enemy; and, in that case, to respect the Spanish authority wherever it is maintained; and he will be instructed to withdraw his forces from the province as soon as he shall have reduced that tribe to order, and secured our fellow-citizens in that quarter, by satisfactory arrangements, against its unprovoked and savage hostilities in future.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 24, 1818.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the President of the United States all the documents in relation to the origin of the Seminole war, accompanied by a copy of an order to Major General Gaines of the 16th of December, 1817, and an extract of an order to Major General Jackson of the 26th of the same month.

J. C. CALHOUN.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Extract of a letter from R. Sands, commanding Fort Gaines, to the Commanding Officer of Fort Hawkins, dated

FEBRUARY 2, 1817.

When the colonel with the troops left Fort Scott, he gave the buildings in charge of one of the Perrymans, from whom I have just received a letter, handed me by his brother, who arrived here after I had commenced writing this.

Perryman states in his letter that the Red Sticks, (or hostiles,) after we had left the fort, came in companies and carried off every thing we had left with him, and what he had purchased of Butler; burnt three houses, and threatened, if he did not leave the place, to burn it over his head. He got what few articles he could, with his family, in a canoe, and came to his brother's, who informs me that there are at present about three hundred Indians embodied at the forks, and others constantly joining them. He does not know their intentions, but understood a party was going out to steal horses, &c.

This morning [3d] one of the settlers waited on me to advise in what manner to act, as eight or ten Indians had been at his house and ordered him off; telling him that in six days they would come back, and, if he was not gone, they would drive him away.

Extract of a letter from the Governor of Georgia to General Gaines, dated

MILLEDGEVILLE, February 5, 1817.

You, no doubt, have already been informed that the notorious Woodbine has recently made his appearance again at the mouth of the Appalachicola, and that he has an agent now among the Seminole Indians and negroes in that quarter, stirring them up to acts of hostility against this country; and that Woodbine, himself, has gone in an armed vessel to some part of the West Indies for supplies. Connected with this fact is another, which may serve as an intimation of the future conduct of these people, when once in possession of the supplies which it is said they expect on the return of Woodbine. About ten or twelve days ago, a small party of those Indians entered the frontier of Wayne county, and stole two horses and some cattle: they were pursued by some of the inhabitants, who peaceably demanded a restoration of the stolen property; and, instead of a compliance on the part of the Indians, they immediately fired upon the whites, who retired without returning a shot. One of the whites was mortally wounded.

Copy of a letter from General Gaines to the Governor of Georgia, dated

MILLEDGEVILLE, February 5, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of this date.

The facts which you have been pleased to communicate, in relation to the late hostile conduct of the Seminole Indians, must and shall receive my immediate and particular attention. I am not authorized to change the destination of the 4th infantry; but, should I receive no authority to recall a part of that corps, I shall order one or two companies of artillery (to do duty as infantry) from Charleston to the southern frontier of this State, with instructions to check Indian hostilities, and at the same time to remove from Indian land such intruders as may remain after being duly notified to remove.

I have the honor to be, &c.

E. P. GAINES.

Extract of a letter from George Perryman to Lieutenant Sands, dated

FEBRUARY 24, 1817.

• The charge given me by Colonel Clinch and yourself, and other officers of the United States, induces me to believe there is a confidence placed in me which I ought not to deceive. I therefore think it my duty, as well as my inclination, to give you the following information: There was a friend of mine not long since in the Fowl-town, on Flint, and he saw many horses, cattle, and hogs, that had come immediately from the State of Georgia; and they are bringing them away continually. They speak in the most contemptuous manner of the Americans, and threaten to have satisfaction for what has been done—meaning the destruction of the negro fort. There is another of my acquaintances returned immediately from the Seminole towns, and saw the negroes on parade there: he counted about six hundred that bore arms. They have chosen officers of every description, and endeavor to keep up a regular discipline, and are very strict in punishing violators of their military rules. There is said to be about the same number of Indians belonging to their party; and there are both negroes and Indians daily going to their standard. They say they are in complete fix for fighting, and wish an engagement with the Americans, or McIntosh's troops; they would let them know they had something more to do than they had at Appalachicola. They have chosen Bowlegs for their head, and nominated him king, and pay him all kind of monarchical respect, almost to idolatry, keeping a picket guard at the distance of five miles. They have a number of the likeliest American horses; but there are one or two chiefs who are not of the choir. Kenhijah, the Mickasuky chief, is one that is an exception.

Copy of a letter from Archibald Clarke, Intendant of St. Mary's, Georgia, to General Gaines, dated

SIR:

FEBRUARY 26, 1817.

In consequence of a recent and most obnoxious act perpetrated by a party of Indians (supposed to be of the Lower Creeks) in this county, in the murder of an unfortunate white woman and her two infant children, by which the defenceless inhabitants on our frontier have been thrown into a distressing state of alarm, I avail myself of the earliest opportunity in giving information that may be relied on, under the fullest assurance that immediate measures will be adopted to guard and prevent a repetition of such cruel and barbarous acts.

On the 24th instant, the house of a Mr. Garrett, residing in the upper part of this county, near the boundary of Wayne county, was attacked during his absence, near the middle of the day, by this party, consisting of about fifteen, who shot Mrs. Garrett in two places, and then despatched her by stabbing and scalping. Her two children, one about three years, the other two months old, were also murdered, and the eldest scalped; the house was then plundered of every article of value, and set on fire. A young man in this neighborhood, hearing the report of guns, went immediately towards the house, where he discovered the murdered family. The flames having only commenced, they were extinguished, and he spread the alarm. The workmen from my mills, and a few others, assembled to pursue; but, having but few arms, and not otherwise equipped, their pursuit proved fruitless. The Indians were tracked as far as the men dared venture. Their course was parallel with the western branch of Spanish creek, which induces the belief of their being Indians of the lower tribes.

On this open, extensive, and entirely unprotected frontier, the poor and innocent inhabitants have ever been exposed to these calamities. Representation after representation to the several Governors of this State, of cruel and unprovoked murders in this quarter by the Indians, have been made. A momentary disposition was manifested to afford relief; but little time, however, would elapse before the alarm would subside, and the subject never more thought of until again revived by an occurrence such as I have just related.

To you, sir, therefore, the inhabitants on the frontier, as well as others, through me, appeal for some protection. A small detachment of troops upon the head of the St. Mary's would answer a most valuable purpose, by at once checking the inroads of the savages, and preventing our abandoned and unprotected citizens from adventuring into the Indian country, and driving in herds of cattle.

Copy of a letter from R. Arbuthnot to the officer commanding at Fort Gaines, dated

SIR:

OCHLOCHNEE SOUND, March 3, 1817.

I am desired by Peter McQueen, an unfortunate Indian chief, who was some years since obliged to fly from the town of Tucky Bathe, on the Tallapoohatch river, to claim of your friendship the delivery of a negro man, named Joe, (taken away from him since the peace,) whom he states to be in Fort Gaines. When McQueen left Tucky Bathe, his property was considerable, both in negroes and cattle: of the former, ten grown negroes were taken by a half-breed man, named Barney, nine of which, he learns, were sold; and one (a girl) is still in possession of said Barney. Twenty able negroes were taken by a chief named Colonel, or Auchi Hache, who acts also as an interpreter; and as he never had possession of any of those persons' property, nor ever did them an injury, to his knowledge, he claims as a further proof of your friendship that you will use your influence in procuring those negroes for him; and should they be given up by the persons holding them, there is one faithful negro among them, named Charles, who will bring them to him at Ochlochnee river.

The American headmen and officers that were accustomed to live near him can testify to his civility and good fellowship with them; and there are none of them, he is convinced, that would not serve him, if in their power. As he owes nothing, nor ever took any person's property, none have a right to retain his; and he hopes that, through your influence, those persons now holding his negroes will be induced to give them up.

While I am thus advocating the cause of an unfortunate individual, allow me to claim an extension of your philanthropy to all the Indians within your circle, by your representing to them the folly of their quarrels, and that they ought to live quietly and peaceably with each other.

The Lower Creeks seem to wish to live peaceably and quietly, and in good friendship with the others; but there are some designing and evil-minded persons, self-interested, who are endeavoring to create quarrels between the Upper and Lower Creek Indians, contrary to their interest, their happiness, and welfare. Such people belong to no nation, and ought not to be countenanced by any Government. The head chiefs request I will inquire of you why American settlers are descending the Chatahoochee, driving the poor Indian from his habitation, and taking possession of his home and cultivated fields.

Without authority, I can claim nothing of you; but a humane and philanthropic principle guiding me, I hope the same will influence you; and, if such is really the case, and that the line marked out by the treaty between Great Britain and the United States respecting the Indian nations has been infringed upon by the subjects of the latter, that you will represent to them their improper conduct, and prevent its continuance.

I hold in my possession a letter received from the Governor of New Providence, addressed to him by His Britannic Majesty's chief secretary, informing him of the orders given to the British ambassador at Washington to watch over the interests of the Indian nations, and see that their rights are faithfully attended to and protected, agreeably to the treaty of peace made between the British and Americans.

I am in hopes that ere this there is arrived at New Providence a person from Great Britain with authority to act as agent for the Indian nations; and, if so, it will devolve on him to see that the boundary lines, as marked out by the treaty, are not infringed upon.

I hope you will not think these observations, made by desire of the chiefs, any improper interference; and, requesting the favor of an answer,

I am, respectfully, &c.

R. ARBUTHNOT.

P. S. McQueen states that the offspring of the negroes, when he left Tucky Bathe, were seven of those taken by Barney, and none of those taken by Auchi Hache; and he supposes they have increased.

SIR:

MARCH 15, 1817.

I enclose for your information two letters which I received a few days since. Yesterday, William Perry man, accompanied by two of the lower chiefs, arrived here. He informs me that McQueen, the chief mentioned in one of the enclosed letters, is at present one of the heads of the hostiles; that they are anxious for war, and have lately murdered a woman and two children.

He likewise says that he expects the news in George Perryman's letter is true; for there are talks going through the towns that the English are to be at Ochlochnee river in three months.

I have sent an Indian runner to Ochlochnee to ascertain what preparations the hostiles are making.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. M. SANDS.

Extract of a letter from David B. Mitchell, Indian Agent, to the Secretary of War, dated MILLEDGEVILLE, GEORGIA, March 30, 1817.

By yesterday's mail I received a letter from Mr. Timothy Barnard, who resides on Flint river, in the Indian country, a considerable distance below the agency, in which he observes: "I have been informed two days past from below, where the Red Stick class reside, that a party have been down near St. Mary's, and murdered a woman and two children, and brought off some horses. I have heard, for some time past, that the Red Stick party have commenced their Red Stick dancings again, which is a proof that they mean to commence hostilities. Our Forts Crawford and Gaines having been evacuated, I believe, has been the cause of this Red Stick class beginning again to commence hostilities. They think that our troops were afraid to continue there."

The murder of the woman and two children, spoken of by Mr. Barnard, had been previously communicated to me by the magistrates of Camden county; and I have no doubt but it was perpetrated in retaliation for the killing of an Indian, about three or four weeks previous, on the Florida side of St. Mary's river, by some worthless white men who reside on the frontiers of East Florida, and who live by plunder. They have, for some time past, been a perfect nuisance to the frontier of Georgia in that quarter; and, although repeated complaints of their bad conduct have been made to the Governor of the province, yet, from the want of either ability or inclination, they have not been suppressed; but I believe their impunity is attributable to the first, viz: inability on his part to apprehend and punish them.

The single fact of this murder being easily accounted for on the Indian principle of retaliation, I should dread no further bad consequences from it; but the other facts stated by Mr. Barnard can only be attributed to a settled plan of hostility on the part of the Indians, and that such a disposition has been encouraged by the removal of the troops from Camp Crawford. And I have the more reliance upon the intelligence as coming from Mr. Barnard, who has resided nearly fifty years in the Indian country, and is perfectly well acquainted with their habits and customs, and whose family connexion gives him the best and surest means of correct information.

As an additional inducement to this measure, I will further state that I have received information from other persons at and near Fort Gaines that a British agent is now among these hostile Indians, and that he has been sending insolent messages to the friendly Indians and white men settled above the Spanish line: he is also charged with stimulating the Indians to their present hostile aspect; but whether he is an acknowledged agent of any foreign Power, or a mere adventurer, I do not pretend to determine, but am disposed to believe him the latter; but, be that as it may, and let the hostile disposition of the Indians proceed from what it may, a moderate regular force stationed at Camp Crawford, or any other suitable position in that quarter, will, I am confident, keep all quiet; and, without it, some serious mischief will result.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T., April 3, 1817.

I received, by the last mail, a letter from Archibald Clarke, Esq., intendant of the town of St. Mary's, by which it appears that another outrage of uncommon cruelty has recently been perpetrated by a party of Indians upon the southern frontier, near the boundary of Wayne county. They have massacred a woman (Mrs. Garrett) and two of her children; the mother and eldest child were scalped; the house plundered and burnt.

SIR:

MONTGOMERY, April 3, 1817.

The enclosed letter contains some additional information upon the subject of my communication of this date. Most respectfully, &c.

EDM. P. GAINES.

Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

FORT GAINES.

I am requested by all the citizens to inform you of our situation, believing that no communication has been forwarded, giving a detail of the information received, our distress, and the prospect of approaching destruction.

We are hourly told, by every source of information, by the friendly Indians, by letters from William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, who reside low down on the Appalachicola, that all the lower tribes of Indians are embodied, and are drying their meats to come on to the attack of this post. The British agent at Ochlochnee Sound is giving presents to the Indians. We have among us Indians who have been down and received powder, lead, tomahawks, knives, and a drum for each town, with the royal coat-of-arms painted on it. We have, at this time, at least five hundred Indians skulking in this neighborhood, within three or four miles of us, who will not act for themselves, and who are evidently waiting the signal to strike an effectual blow. They have stolen almost every horse belonging to the citizens. They have scared them from the fields which they have cleared, and have taken possession of their houses. They are now stealing horses, cattle, and hogs from the Georgia lines, and have killed one or two families on the Satilla.

The citizens have all assembled near the fort, not able to return to the States, nor any prospect of making crops. The Indians have all returned to their towns below the line, and this post is unable to remove them. The troops are scarce of provisions, and no prospect of the early arrival of more.

Nothing but speedy relief by troops can quiet the people, or save this country from destruction.

Respectfully, your most obedient, humble servant,

A. CULLOH.

General GAINES.

SIR:

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T., July 28, 1817.

Agreeably to your instructions of the 26th instant, I proceeded to the Burnt Corn Spring, near the place where the recent murder was committed by an Indian; and, from the best information received, I have the honor to make the following report:

1st. It does not appear that any misunderstanding existed between the Indians and the citizen killed, (Mr. Glass.)

2d. It appears that the Indians made the first assault, and that without any provocation on the part of the citizens.

3d. From the information received, it appears that Mr. Glass heard four or five guns fire some short distance from his house. He was under the impression that the Indians were doing some mischief, and went out for the purpose of ascertaining what the firing was at. He had proceeded but a short distance when he discovered an Indian woman. He went towards her, and asked her if she knew who it was that was shooting. She made him no answer. He asked her several times, and received no answer. She said something, and an Indian that was concealed in the bushes not more than fifteen steps from Mr. Glass, rose up, and shot him through the body. He snapped his gun at the Indian, who immediately ran off. He then fired at the woman as she was running after the man, but does not know whether he killed her or not. His wound being very painful, he dropped his gun and shot-bag, and attempted to return home. He had not proceeded more than three hundred yards when he fainted, and remained until found by a traveller. This was on a Saturday, and he died on Sunday morning, leaving a widow and eight children to lament his untimely death. He was a man who supported a good character in his neighborhood, though in limited circumstances. On the following day there was a cow found near the place where Mr. Glass was shot, with four balls shot through her.

4th. There was only one Indian man seen by Mr. Glass; but, the circumstances of his hearing four guns, and the cow being found near that place with four balls shot through her, induce a belief that he had several companions with him, although they were not seen by Mr. Glass. From the report of the friendly Indians, it is believed they are fifty or sixty in number, and that they have returned to the camp on Pine Barren creek, occupied by them at the time they murdered Johnson and Magasky, as a part of them were met by several persons near the Pine Barren spring a few days after the murder was committed.

Colonel Dales's party pursued them to their camp on the Sapelo Sound, but found it deserted, apparently several days. They have several small fields of corn growing at that place; from the sign left, it is believed they have a number of horses, and some of the largest description. The Indian who acted as a guide states they have at this time a negro boy and a horse belonging to Johnson and Magasky. It appears to be the prevailing opinion among the inhabitants that they may be found on Pine Barren creek.

I have the honor to be, &c.

General GAINES.

G. LEFTWICH, Adjutant 7th infantry.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T., August 25, 1817.

Having received several communications from persons settled upon the public land within the tract acquired by the treaty of Fort Jackson, containing general accusations against the Indians that they had killed cattle and hogs, and stolen corn, &c. from the inhabitants, and requesting the interposition of military authority, I have uniformly referred them to the civil magistrate, because I have in no case during the present year heard of any thing like an assemblage of force among the Indians in this quarter of the Territory. Nor could I see any reason why persons who had obtruded themselves upon the public land, contrary to law, should be allowed military protection against the petty offences of which these people complained, especially as it did not appear that the civil authority had been opposed, nor even resorted to by the complainants.

The enclosure (marked A) contains a copy of my reply to the inhabitants of Murder creek, and in this you will find the substance of my other replies, both written and verbal. Since the date of this reply, and as I have reason to believe some days after it reached the settlement of Murder creek, a Mr. Glass, near that place, was killed by an Indian, who was said to be accompanied by three others.

On receiving this information, I immediately despatched a discreet officer, Lieutenant Leftwich, to ascertain the particulars of the outrage, with a view to send a party in pursuit of the offenders, in case they should not have been arrested by the civil authority.

A.

GENTLEMEN:

HEAD-QUARTERS, CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T., July 12, 1817.

I have received your communication of the 21st of last month, stating that the Indians residing upon the Conecuh had killed cattle and hogs belonging to the inhabitants of Murder creek, and had broken into their houses, and taken from them some provisions, corn, &c.

In reply, I have to observe that all Indians within the lately acquired territory are amenable to our laws, and may be prosecuted for the offences of which you complain, in the same manner as if they were white inhabitants.

The lands cultivated by friendly Indians within the ceded territory have been reserved and guaranteed to them by treaty; and, by a late act of Congress, the agent of Indian affairs has been authorized to settle the respective claims to such reservations. Until this is effected, there exists nowhere any sort of authority to drive off such Indians settled upon the public land.

Governor Mitchell, the agent, will in a short time enter upon the examination and adjustment of those claims.

The disposition which you have manifested to abstain from "rash measures"* towards those Indians affords ground to hope that, viewing them as a part of the human family, possessing the right of residing among us, you will make allowance for their ignorance and their wants, which are calculated rather to awaken our commiseration than to excite in us a spirit of hostility towards them.

That you may have peace and prosperity throughout your settlement is the sincere wish of

Your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES.

The INHABITANTS of Murder Creek, Alabama Territory.

Extract of a letter from Major Twiggs to General Gaines, dated

FORT SCOTT, September 17, 1817.

Your communication to the Indians on the east side of the Flint river was read and explained to the principal chief of the Mickasukies the 6th of this month. He promised to give an answer in ten days, at farthest. I have detained the express until this time in expectation of sending it on by him, but have been disappointed. I have not heard from them since. The interpreter informed me the principal warriors were absent when he was there, but those who were present said they had never heard of Indians being given up to be punished by the whites; that they had heard of their being sometimes killed by themselves for offences committed, but seemed to think that giving them up was out of the question, but said they would have a meeting, and would answer the letter in a few days. As they have not done so, I think but one construction can be put on their conduct. The young man seemed to dislike the communication very much, and when Gregory was about leaving the town he offered his hand to an Indian, who held out his with a knife in it, and refused to shake hands with him; he staid so short a time among them that it was impossible for him to give much information respecting them. Captain Donoho has returned; he has been sick in Hartford, which was the cause of his delay. On his return, the Indians were very rude to him, and frequently threatened his guide, and once caught hold of the captain's bridle in a threatening manner.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T., October 1, 1817.

I have the honor to lay before you a copy of a letter which I have received from the chiefs of ten of the Seminole towns in reply to my demand for the delivery of the murderers of our citizens.

By this communication it appears that, instead of a compliance with my demand, the chiefs have set up a claim against us for the lives of three Indians, for whom they allege they have not yet taken satisfaction. They charge us with having killed ten of their warriors, and claim a balance of three to be due to them; they admit, by necessary implication, that they have killed seven of our citizens.

They acknowledge the murder of a woman (Mrs. Garrett) and her two children; but the chiefs attempt to justify this act upon the ground that the warriors who committed the outrage had just before lost some friends, had entered our settlements to take satisfaction, found at the house of Garrett a kettle belonging to the Indian that had been killed, and, from that circumstance, supposed the murder had been committed by the husband of the woman; they, therefore, killed her and her two children.

By a letter from Major Twiggs, the commandant of Fort Scott, I learn that he had been warned some weeks past by the principal chiefs of the Fowltown (fifteen miles above the fort, and twenty above the national boundary) not to cut another stick on the east side of Flint river; adding that the land was his, and he was directed by the Powers above to protect and defend it, and should do so; and it would be seen that talking could not frighten him. Major Twigg adds, he had not seen the chief nor any of his people since he made this threat. The major states in another letter that this town had been detected in stealing one hundred head of cattle in one drove, all of which they had killed.

From Major Twiggs to General Gaines, dated

FORT SCOTT, September 18, 1817.

Since I started the express this morning, the Indians have delivered the enclosed letter to me.

I have the honor to be, &c.

DEAR SIR:

SEPTEMBER 11, 1817.

Since the last war, after you sent word we must quit the war, we, the red people, have come over on this side. The white people have carried all the red people's cattle off. After the war I sent to all my people to let the white people alone, and stay on this side of the river, and they did so; but the white people still continue to carry off their cattle. Barnard's son was here, and I inquired of him what was to be done, and he said we must go to the headman of the white people and complain. I did so, and there was no white headman, and there was no law in this case. The whites first began, and there is nothing said about that, but great complaint made about what the Indians do. This is now three years since the white people killed three Indians; since that they have killed three other Indians, and taken their horses and what they had; and this summer they killed three more, and very lately they killed one more. We sent word to the white people that these murders were done, and the answer was that they were people that were outlaws, and we ought to go and kill them. The white people killed our people first, and the Indians then took satisfaction. There are yet three men that the red people have never taken satisfaction for. You have written that there were houses burnt, but we know of no such thing being done; the truth in such cases ought to be told, but this appears otherwise. On that side of the river the white people have killed five Indians, but there is nothing said about that; and all that the Indians have done is brought up. All the mischief the white people have done ought to be told to their headman. When there is any thing done, you write to us, but never write to your headman what the white people do. When the red people send talks, or write, they always send the truth. You have sent to us for your horses, and we send all that we could find; but there were some dead. It appears that all the mischief is laid on this town; but all the mischief that has been done by this town is two horses—one of them is dead, and the other was sent back. The cattle that we are accused of taking were cattle that the white people took from us. Our young men went and brought them back, with the same marks and brands. There were some of our young men out hunting, and they were killed. Others went to take satisfaction, and the kettle of one of the men that were killed was found in the house where the woman and two children were killed; and they supposed it had been her husband who had killed the Indians, and took their satisfaction there. We are accused of killing up Americans, and so on; but since the word was sent to us that peace was made, we stay steady at home and meddle with no person. You have sent to us respecting the black people on the Suwanee river. We have nothing to do with them; they were put there by the English, and to them you ought to apply for any thing about them. We do not wish our country desolated by an army passing through it for the concern of other people. The Indians have slaves there, also—a great many of them. When we have an opportunity, we shall apply to the English for them, but we cannot get them now.

This is what we have to say at present.

Sir, I conclude by subscribing myself your humble servant, &c.

N. B. There are ten towns that have read this letter, and this is the answer.

To the COMMANDING OFFICER at Fort Hawkins.

Extract of a letter from George Graham, Acting Secretary of War, to Brevet Major General Edmund P. Gaines, Fort Hawkins, Georgia, dated

OCTOBER 30, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, covering a copy of the reply which was made by ten of the Seminole towns to the demand made by you on them for the surrender of the murderers of some of our citizens.

These papers have been submitted to the President, and I am instructed by him to inform you that he approves of the movement of the troops from Fort Montgomery to Fort Scott. The appearance of this additional force, he flatters himself, will at least have the effect of restraining the Seminoles from committing further depredations, and, perhaps, of inducing them to make reparation for the murders which they have committed. Should they, however, persevere in their refusal to make such reparation, it is the wish of the President that you should not on that account pass the line and make an attack upon them within the limits of Florida, until you shall have received instructions from this Department.

You are authorized to remove the Indians still remaining on the lands ceded by the treaty made by General Jackson with the Creeks; and, in doing so, it may be proper to retain some of them as hostages until reparation may have been made for the depredations which have been committed. On this subject, however, as well as to the manner of removing them, you will exercise your discretion. McIntosh and the other chiefs of the Creek nation, who were here some time since, expressed then, decidedly, their unwillingness to permit any of the hostile Indians to return to their nation.

P. S. The authority to remove the Indians will, of course, not extend to those Indians and their families who have claims to reservations of lands under the treaty.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

CHATAHOOCHEE, November 9, 1817.

From various reports from the Seminole Indians, I can only learn that they are determined to deliver up none of their offenders, nor will they restore stolen property, except one town, (the Mickasukies,) the chief of which professes to be friendly. By the enclosed letter from Major Twiggs, it appears they are determined to attack us as soon as we cross Flint river, and that they have 2,700 warriors. Although I feel little faith in their threats, and believe their numbers to be overrated, yet I deem it proper to be provided with additional force. I have therefore requested of his excellency the Governor of Georgia a regiment of infantry and a squadron of cavalry, which he has informed me are held in readiness to march.

Extract of a letter from General Edmund P. Gaines to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT GAINES, GEORGIA, November 9, 1817.

Previous to my leaving the Conecuh, I ascertained that the accounts I had received respecting the Seminole Indians being at Pensacola were incorrect, and that the number of Indians of different tribes there did not exceed what has been usual at this season of the year. This statement was soon after confirmed by Mr. Denson and the interpreter, (Cornels;) the latter, however, states that he had seen and conversed with the hostile party of Uchee warriors, part of whom killed Johnson and Magasky, and Mr. Glass. They now consist of about thirty warriors, or thirty-five. They were, a few days past, at the mouth of Yellow Water; had several stolen horses, which they offered for sale; and declared their determination to be always hostile towards our citizens.

From Major Twiggs I learn that he has received information, upon which he places reliance, that the Indians have recently had a meeting at the Mickasuky town of near 2,700 warriors, when it was determined they would attack us as soon as we should cross the Flint river. Although I put little faith in these threats, and believe their numbers to be overrated, yet I deem it proper, keeping an eye to the safe side, to be provided with additional force; and have, therefore, desired the Governor of Georgia to send me the regiment of infantry and squadron of cavalry held in readiness for that purpose; for, in a war with savages, I think little should be hazarded, as every little advantage which we suffer them to acquire tends to add, in an extraordinary degree, to their strength and confidence.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA, November 21, 1817.

The first brigade arrived at this place on the 19th instant. I had previously sent an Indian runner to notify the first town chief, E-me-he-maut-by, of my arrival, and, with a view to ascertain whether his hostile temper had abated, requested him to visit me. He replied that he had already said to the commanding officer here all he had to say, and he would not come.

He had warned Major Twiggs not to cross or cut a stick of wood on the east side of Flint river, alleging that the land was his; that he was directed by the Powers above and below to protect and defend it, and should do so. This being the talk referred to, and his town having continued to be hostile ever since the last war, (having participated, as the friendly Indians assert, in the predatory war carried on for some time past against the Georgia frontier,) I yesterday detached two hundred and fifty men, (supposed to be about the strength of the town,) under the command of Major Twiggs, with orders to bring to me the chief and warriors, and, in the event of resistance, to treat them as enemies.

The detachment arrived at the town early this morning, and was instantly fired upon, but without effect. The fire was briskly returned by the detachment, and the Indians put to flight, with the loss of four warriors slain, and, as there is reason to believe, many wounded.

It is with deep regret I have to add that a woman was accidentally shot with some warriors in the act of forcing their way through our line, formed for the purpose of arresting their flight. The unfortunate woman had a blanket fastened round her, as many of the warriors had, which, amidst the smoke in which they were enveloped, rendered it impossible, as I am assured by the officers present, to distinguish her from the warriors.

Among the articles found in the house of the chief was a British uniform coat, (scarlet,) with a pair of gold epaulettes, and a certificate signed by a British captain of marines, "Robert White, in the absence of Colonel Nichols," stating that the chief had always been a true and faithful friend to the British.

Major Twiggs reports that the officers and men of the detachment, generally, performed their duty with zeal and propriety.

The reports of friendly Indians concur in estimating the number of hostile warriors, including the Red Sticks and Seminoles, at more than two thousand, besides the blacks, amounting to near four hundred men, and increasing by runaways from Georgia. They have been promised, as several Indians inform me, assistance from the British at New Providence. This promise, though made by Woodbine, is relied on by most of the Seminole Indians. I have not a doubt but they will sue for peace as soon as they find their hopes of British aid to be without foundation.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA, November 26, 1817.

With a view to ascertain the strength of the hostile Indians in the vicinity of Fowltown, and to reconnoitre the adjacent country, I a few days past detached Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle with three hundred officers and men. The colonel reports that the Indians had placed themselves in a swamp, out of which about sixty warriors made their appearance near the town, and, with the war-whoop, commenced a brisk fire upon our troops, which they returned in a spirited manner. The fire continued but fifteen or twenty minutes, when the Indians were silenced, and retired into the swamp with a loss which the colonel estimates at six or eight killed, and a greater number wounded. We had one man killed and two wounded.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 2, 1817.

Your letter of the 9th ultimo, advising of the call on the Governor of Georgia to assemble the auxiliary force which had been previously required by you at Fort Hawkins on the 25th ultimo, has been received.

It is hoped that the letter addressed to you from this Department on the 30th of October will have been received, and that you will confine your operations to the objects stated in that communication, and to such a disposition of the regular force under your command as will deter the Seminole Indians from making further depredations on the frontiers of Georgia.

The state of our negotiations with Spain, and the temper manifested by the principal European Powers, make it impolitic, in the opinion of the President, to move a force at this time into the Spanish possessions for the mere purpose of chastising the Seminoles for depredations which have heretofore been committed by them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Major General EDMUND P. GAINES.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA, December 4, 1817.

I would much more willingly devote my time and humble faculties in the delightful occupation of bringing over savage man to the walks of civil life, where this is practicable, without force, than to contribute to the destruction of any one of the human race. But every effort in the work of civilization, to be effectual, must accord with the immutable principles of justice. The savage must be taught and compelled to do that which is right, and to abstain from doing that which is wrong. The poisonous cup of barbarism cannot be taken from the lips of the savage by the mild voice of reason alone; the strong mandate of justice must be resorted to, and enforced.

After all that the wisdom and philanthropy of our country and Government, aided by millions of money, have yet been able to effect, it is a melancholy truth that, in no Indian nation within my knowledge, (the Chickasaws excepted,) has the scalping-knife been laid aside for any considerable length of time, until their every hope of using it with impunity had been defeated.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 9, 1817.

Your letter bearing date the 21st ultimo, advising of the arrival of the first brigade at Fort Scott on the 19th ultimo, and of the subsequent affair with the Indians at Fowltown, has been received. Although the necessity of this attack, and the consequent effusion of blood, is exceedingly to be regretted, yet it is hoped that the prompt measures which were taken by you on your arrival at Fort Scott, and the display of such an efficient force in that quarter, will induce the Indians to abstain from further depredations, and sue for peace.

Referring to the letters addressed to you from this Department on the 30th of October and 2d of December, as manifesting the views of the President, I have to request that you conform to the instructions therein given. Should the Indians, however, assemble in force on the Spanish side of the line, and persevere in committing hostilities within the limits of the United States, you will, in that event, exercise a sound discretion as to the propriety of crossing the line for the purpose of attacking them and breaking up their town.

I have the honor, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Major General EDMUND P. GAINES.

Extract of a letter from David B. Mitchell, Indian Agent, to George Graham, Acting Secretary of War, dated CREEK AGENCY, December 14, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your two letters of the 31st of October and 3d November last. Before the receipt of those letters, a meeting of the principal chiefs had been called by the Little Prince, at the town of Thla-cotch-cau, on the Chatahoochee river, near Fort Mitchell, at which I attended; the object of which was to take into consideration the state of the nation, and particularly the measures which it would be proper for them to take in relation to those Indians residing between Fort Gaines and the Spanish line; and, also, the conduct they should pursue with regard to the war with the Seminoles. They unanimously expressed much regret that hostilities should have commenced between the troops under General Gaines and the Fowltown Indians, who reside within our boundary, because those Indians, although they did not unite with the friendly ones during the late war, neither did they join the Red Sticks, and had recently expressed a great desire to become decidedly friendly. They were, however, perfectly willing that their warriors should join General Gaines against the Seminoles. I stated to them that it was not the desire of the President to go to war with the Seminoles, if he could honorably avoid it; and at the present moment he would not consent to their going against the Seminoles, within the Spanish territory, under authority of the United States; that they must wait, therefore, until I gave them the order to march: at the same time, I advised them to send a confidential and trusty chief down to the Indians living between Fort Gaines and the Spanish line, and desire them immediately to remove above the line of Jackson's treaty, and that the same chief should then proceed directly to the Mickasuky town, the head-quarters of the Seminoles and Red Sticks of the late war, and propose to them certain terms of peace and a junction of their force to go against the negro camp. The objects which this chief was instructed to hold out to those Indians, as attainable by adopting this course, were various, and of sufficient importance, in the view of those making the proposition, to induce a belief that they would be favorably received; in which event, I should proceed to Fort Scott to adjust their differences. This course of proceeding was immediately adopted, and the headman of the Osoochees, Hoppie Hajjo, set out on the same day, charged with the mission. To afford time to ascertain the result of this plan, and that I might be able to communicate with the War Department, another meeting was assigned for the 11th of next month, at this place, when all the friendly warriors, with McIntosh at their head, will attend to receive their final orders. But, on my return to this place, I fortunately fell in with General Gaines on his way to Fort Hawkins, from whom I learned the fatal disaster which had befallen a detachment of his troops under Lieutenant Scott, on the 30th of last month; the particulars of which he informed me he had communicated, which renders a detail from me unnecessary.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT HAWKINS, GEORGIA, December 15, 1817.

I arrived at this place the day before yesterday morning. In the afternoon of the same day, I received the detachment of Georgia militia, under the command of Brigadier General Glasscock. They look well, and are ready to march; but, the inattention on the part of the contractor's agent to the requisitions for a supply of rations will, I apprehend, according to custom, delay the movement of the militia until some part of the frontier settlements suffer by the Indians, who, I have no doubt, will detach considerable parties for this purpose as soon as they find themselves unable to succeed in any attempt against the regular troops at Fort Scott; and I think it cannot be long before they are convinced of this. But, although I consider the regular troops secure in the positions they occupy, yet I am satisfied their numbers will not warrant their being detached, or leaving their places of defence, except to a very small extent.

I have just now received Mr. Graham's letter of the 2d instant. The views of the President, so far as may depend on me, shall be scrupulously observed. I should instantly discharge the Georgia militia, were I not strongly impressed with a belief that such a step would hazard the safety of the frontier settlements.

The Seminole Indians, however strange and absurd it may appear to those who understand little of their real character and extreme ignorance, entertain a notion that they cannot be beaten by our troops. They confidently assert that we never have beaten them, or any of their people, except when we have been assisted by red people. This will appear the less extraordinary when it is recollected that they have little or no means of knowing the strength and resources of our country; they have not travelled through it; they read neither books nor newspapers; nor have they opportunities of conversing with persons able to inform them. I feel warranted, from all I know of these savages, in saying they do not believe we can beat them.

This error of theirs has led them, from time to time, for many years past, to massacre our frontier citizens—often the unoffending and helpless mother and babes.

I felt myself fully authorized to adopt the only measures which long experience has proven to be adequate to put a stop to these outrages. I was pleased with the prospect of being instrumental in effecting an object of so much importance to our exposed frontier settlements, and which I felt, and still feel, persuaded would, in the end, benefit the Indians.

Extract of a letter from Major General Andrew Jackson to George Graham, Acting Secretary of War, dated

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

NASHVILLE, December 16, 1817.

I am in hopes that this check to the savages may incline them to peace. Should it not, and their hostility continue, the protection of our citizens will require that the wolf be struck in his den; for, rest assured, if ever the Indians find out that the territorial boundary of Spain is to be a sanctuary, their murders will be multiplied to a degree that our citizens on the southern frontier cannot bear. Spain is bound by treaties to keep the Indians within her territory at peace with us; having failed to do this, necessity will justify the measure, after giving her due notice, to follow the marauders, and punish them in their retreat. The war hatchet having been raised, unless the Indians sue for peace, your frontier cannot be protected, without entering their country. From long experience, this result has been fully established.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 16, 1817.

On the receipt of this letter, should the Seminole Indians still refuse to make reparation for their outrages and depredations on the citizens of the United States, it is the wish of the President that you consider yourself at liberty to march across the Florida line, and to attack them within its limits, should it be found necessary, unless they should shelter themselves under a Spanish post. In the last event, you will immediately notify this Department. I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Gen. EDMUND P. GAINES, Fort Scott, Georgia.Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Andrew Jackson, at Nashville, Tennessee, dated

DECEMBER 26, 1817.

You will repair, with as little delay as practicable, to Fort Scott, and assume the immediate command of the forces in that quarter of the southern division.

The increasing display of hostile intentions by the Seminole Indians may render it necessary to concentrate all the contiguous disposable force of your division upon that quarter. The regular force now there is about eight hundred strong, and one thousand militia of the State of Georgia are called into service. General Gaines estimates the strength of the Indians at two thousand seven hundred. Should you be of opinion that our numbers are too small to beat the enemy, you will call on the Executives of the adjacent States for such an additional militia force as you may deem requisite.

TREATIES WITH SEVERAL TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 30, 1818.

To the Senate of the United States:

NOVEMBER 30, 1818.

I lay before the Senate, for their advice and consent, the several treaties which have recently been made with the Chickasaws, Quapaws, Wyandots, Senecas, Delawares, Shawanees, Pattawatamies, Ottawas, Chippewas, Peorias, Kaskaskias, Michigamias, Cahokias, Tamarois, Great and Little Osages, Weas, Pattawatamies, Delawares, Miamies, Wyandots, and the four Pawnee tribes of Indians.

By reference to the journal of the commissioners, it appears that George and Levi Colbert have bargained and sold to the United States the reservations made to them by the treaty of September, 1816, and that a deed of trust of the same has been made by them to James Jackson, of Nashville. I would, therefore, suggest, in case the Chickasaw treaty be approved by the Senate, the propriety of providing, by law, for the payment of the sum stipulated to be given to them for their reservations.

JAMES MONROE.

TREATY WITH THE CHICKASAWS.

To settle all territorial controversies, and to remove all ground of complaint or dissatisfaction that might arise to interrupt the peace and harmony which has so long and so happily existed between the United States of America and the Chickasaw nation of Indians, James Monroe, President of the said United States, by Isaac Shelby and Andrew Jackson, of the one part, and the whole Chickasaw nation, by their chiefs, headmen, and warriors, in full council assembled, of the other part, have agreed on the following articles, which, when ratified by the President and Senate of the United States of America, shall form a treaty binding on all parties:

ARTICLE 1. Peace and friendship are hereby firmly established and made perpetual between the United States of America and the Chickasaw nation of Indians.

ART. 2. To obtain the object of the foregoing article, the Chickasaw nation of Indians cede to the United States of America (with the exception of such reservation as shall be hereafter mentioned) all claim or title which the said nation have to the land lying north of the south boundary of the State of Tennessee, which is bounded south by the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude, and which land hereby ceded lies within the following boundary, viz: Beginning on the Tennessee river, about thirty-five miles, by water, below Colonel George Colbert's ferry, where the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude strikes the same; thence, due west, with said degree of north latitude, to where it cuts the Mississippi river, at or near the Chickasaw Bluffs; thence, up the said Mississippi river, to the mouth of the Ohio; thence, up the Ohio river, to the mouth of the Tennessee river; thence, up the Tennessee, to the place of beginning.

ART. 3. In consideration of the relinquishment of claim and cession of lands in the preceding article, and to perpetuate the happiness of the Chickasaw nation of Indians, the commissioners of the United States before named agree to allow the said nation the sum of twenty thousand dollars per annum, for fifteen successive years, to be paid annually; and, as a further consideration for the objects aforesaid, and at the request of the chiefs of the said nation, the commissioners agree to pay to Captain John Gordon, of Tennessee, the sum of one thousand one hundred and fifteen dollars, it being a debt due by General William Colbert, of the said nation, to the aforesaid Gordon; and the further sum of two thousand dollars due by the said nation of Indians to Captain David Smith, now of Kentucky, for that sum by him expended in supplying himself and forty-five soldiers from Tennessee, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, when assisting them (at their request and invitation) in defending their towns against the invasion of the Creek Indians; both which sums (on the application of the said nation) are to be paid, within sixty days after the ratification of this treaty, to the aforesaid Gordon and Smith.

ART. 4. The commissioners agree, on the further and particular application of the chiefs, and for the benefit of the poor and warriors of the said nation, that a tract of land, containing four miles square, to include a salt-lick or springs, on or near the river Sandy, a branch of the Tennessee river, and within the land hereby ceded, be reserved, and to be laid off in a square or oblong, so as to include the best timber, at the option of their beloved chief, Levi Colbert, and Major James Brown, or either of them, who are hereby made agents and trustees for the nation to lease the said salt-lick or springs on the following express conditions, viz: for the benefit of this reservation as before recited, the trustees or agents are bound to lease the said reservation to some citizen or citizens of the United States, for a reasonable quantity of salt, to be paid annually to the said nation for the use thereof; and that from and after two years after the ratification of this treaty, no salt made at the works to be erected on this reservation shall be sold within the limits of the same for a higher price than one dollar per bushel of fifty pounds weight; on failure of which, the lease shall be forfeited, and the reservation revert to the United States.

ART. 5. The commissioners agree that there shall be paid to Oppassantubby, a principal chief of the Chickasaw nation, within sixty days after the ratification of this treaty, the sum of five hundred dollars, as a full compensation for the reservation of two miles square, on the north side of Tennessee river, secured to him and his heirs by the treaty held with the said Chickasaw nation on the twentieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen; and the further sum of twenty-five dollars to John Lewis, a half-breed, for a saddle he lost while in the service of the United States. And, to show the regard the President of the United States has for the said Chickasaw nation, at the request of the chiefs of the said nation, the commissioners agree that the sum of one thousand and eighty-nine dollars shall be paid to Major James Colbert, interpreter, within the period stated in the first part of this article; it being the amount of a sum of money taken from his pocket in the month of June, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, at the theatre in Baltimore. And the said commissioners, as a further regard for said nation, do agree that the reservations made to George Colbert and Levi Colbert, in the treaty held at the council-house of said nation on the twenty-sixth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, the first to Colonel George Colbert, on the north side of Tennessee river, and those to Major Levi Colbert, on the east side of the Tombigbee river, shall inure to the sole use of the said Colonel George Colbert and Major Levi Colbert, their heirs and assigns, forever, with their butts and bounds as defined by said treaty, and agreeably to the marks and boundaries as laid off and marked by the surveyor of the United States, where that is the case; and where the reservations have not been laid off and marked by the surveyor of the United States, the same shall be so done as soon after the ratification of this treaty as practicable, on the application of the reservees, or their legally appointed agent under them, and agreeably to the definition in the before-recited treaty. This agreement is made on the following express conditions: that the said land, and those living on it, shall be subject to the laws of the United States, and all legal taxation that may be imposed on the land, or citizens of the United States inhabiting the territory where the said land is situate. The commissioners further agree that the reservation secured to John McCleish, on the north side of Tennessee river, by the before-recited treaty, in consequence of his having been raised in the State of Tennessee and marrying a white woman, shall inure to the sole use of the said John McCleish, his heirs and assigns, forever, on the same conditions as are attached to the lands of Colonel George Colbert and Major Levi Colbert, in this article.

ART. 6. The two contracting parties covenant and agree that the line of the south boundary of the State of Tennessee, as described in the second article of this treaty, shall be ascertained and marked by commissioners appointed by the President of the United States; that the marks shall be bold, the trees to be blazed on both sides of the line, and the fore and aft trees marked U. S.; and that the commissioners shall be attended by two persons, to be designated by the Chickasaw nation; and the said nation shall have due and reasonable notice when said operation is to be commenced. It is further agreed by the commissioners, that all improvements actually made by individuals of the Chickasaw nation, which shall be found within the lands ceded by this treaty, that a fair and reasonable compensation shall be paid therefor to the respective individuals having made or owning the same.

ART. 7. In consideration of the friendly and conciliatory disposition evinced during the negotiation of this treaty by the Chickasaw chiefs and warriors, but more particularly as a manifestation of the friendship and liberality of the President of the United States, the commissioners agree to give, on the ratification of this treaty, to Chennubby, king of the Chickasaw nation, to Teshuamingo, William McGilvery, Anpassantubby, Samuel Seely, James Brown, Levi Colbert, Ickaryoucuttaha, George Pettygrove, Immartarharmicco, Chickasaw chiefs, and to Malcolm McGee, interpreter to this treaty, each, one hundred and fifty dollars in cash; and to Major William Glover, Colonel George Colbert, Hopoyeahaumar, Immauklusharhopoyea, Tushkarhopoyea, Hopoyeahaumar, jun., Immauklusharhopoyea, James Colbert, Coweamarlar, Illachouwarhopoyea, military leaders, one hundred dollars each; and do further agree that any annuity heretofore secured to the Chickasaw nation of Indians, by treaty, to be paid in goods, shall hereafter be paid in cash.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioners and undersigned chiefs and warriors have set their hands and seals. Done at the treaty ground, east of Old Town, this nineteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

ISAAC SHELBY,
ANDREW JACKSON.

[Signed, also, by a number of Indian chiefs.]

TREATY WITH THE QUAPAWS.

A treaty of friendship, cession, and limits, made and entered into this twenty-fourth day of August, eighteen hundred and eighteen, by and between William Clark and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners on the part and behalf of the United States, of the one part, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the Quapaw tribe or nation, on the part and behalf of their said tribe or nation, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and their said tribe or nation, do hereby acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other state, power, or sovereignty whatsoever.

ART. 2. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and their said tribe or nation, do hereby, for and in consideration of the promises and stipulations hereinafter named, cede and relinquish to the United States, forever, all the lands within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning at the mouth of the Arkansas river; thence, extending up the Arkansas, to the Canadian fork, and up the Canadian fork to its source; thence, south, to Big Red river, and, down the middle of that river, to the Big Raft; thence, a direct line, so as to strike the Mississippi river thirty leagues in a straight line below the mouth of Arkansas; together with all their claims to land east of the Mississippi, and north of the Arkansas river, included within the colored lines 1, 2, and 3, on the above map, with the exception and reservation following, that is to say, the tract of country bounded as follows: Beginning at a point on the Arkansas river, opposite the present post of Arkansas, and running thence a due southwest course to the Washita river; thence, up that river, to the Saline fork, and up the Saline fork, to a point from whence a due northeast course would strike the Arkansas river at the Little Rock; and thence, down the right bank of the Arkansas, to the place of beginning; which said tract of land last above designated and reserved shall be surveyed and marked off, at the expense of the United States, as soon as the same can be done with convenience; and shall not be sold or disposed of by the said Quapaw tribe or nation, to any individual whatever, nor to any state or nation, without the approbation of the United States first had and obtained.

ART. 3. It is agreed between the United States and the said tribe or nation, that the individuals of the said tribe or nation shall be at liberty to hunt within the territory by them ceded to the United States, without hindrance or molestation, so long as they demean themselves peaceably, and offer no injury or annoyance to any of the citizens of the United States, or until the said United States may think proper to assign the same, or any portion thereof, as hunting grounds, to other friendly Indians.

ART. 4. No citizen of the United States, or any other person, shall be permitted to settle on any of the lands hereby allotted to and reserved for the said Quapaw tribe or nation to live and hunt on; yet it is expressly understood and agreed on by and between the parties aforesaid, that, at all times, the citizens of the United States shall have the right to travel and pass freely, without toll or exaction, through the Quapaw reservation, by such roads or routes as now are, or hereafter may be, established.

ART. 5. In consideration of the cession and stipulations aforesaid, the United States do hereby promise and bind themselves to pay and deliver to the said Quapaw tribe or nation, immediately upon the execution of this treaty, goods and merchandise to the value of four thousand dollars; and to deliver, or cause to be delivered, to them yearly, and every year, goods and merchandise to the value of one thousand dollars, to be estimated in the city or place in the United States where the same are procured or purchased.

ART. 6. And it shall be the duty of the said tribe or nation, upon complaint being made as aforesaid, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished agreeably to the laws of the State or Territory where the offence may have been committed; and, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder shall be committed on any Indian or Indians belonging to the said tribe or nation, the person or persons so offending shall be tried, and, if found guilty, punished in like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is further agreed that the chiefs of the said tribe or nation shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses or other property which may be stolen from any citizen or citizens of the United States by any individual or individuals of the said tribe or nation; and the property so recovered shall be forthwith delivered to the Governor, superintendent, or other person authorized to receive the same, that it may be restored to the proper owner. And in cases where the exertions of the chiefs shall be ineffectual in recovering the property stolen as aforesaid, if sufficient proof can be obtained that such property was actually stolen by an Indian or Indians belonging to the said tribe or nation, a sum equal to the value of the property which has been stolen may be deducted by the United States from the annuity of the said tribe or nation. And the United States hereby guaranty to the individuals of the said tribe or nation a full indemnification for any horse or horses, or other property, which may be taken from them by any of their citizens: Provided, The property so stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen or citizens of the United States.

But it is further agreed that the tracts thus reserved shall be reserved for the use of the Indians named in the schedule to the said treaty, and held by them and their heirs forever, unless ceded to the United States.

TREATY WITH THE PEORIA, KASKASKIA, MICHIGAMIA, CAHOKIA, AND TAMAROIS TRIBES.

A treaty made and concluded by and between Ninian Edwards and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners on the part and behalf of the United States of America, of the one part, and the undersigned principal chiefs and warriors of the Peoria, Kaskaskia, Michigamia, Cahokia, and Tamarois tribes of the Illinois nation of Indians, on the part and behalf of the said tribes, of the other part.

Whereas by the treaty made at Vincennes on the thirteenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States, of the one part, and the head chiefs and warriors of the tribe of Indians commonly called the Kaskaskia tribe, (but which was composed of, and rightfully represented, the Kaskaskia, Michigamia, Cahokia, and Tamarois tribes of the Illinois nation of Indians,) of the other part, a certain tract of land was ceded to the United States, which was supposed to include all the land claimed by those respective tribes, but which did not include, and was not intended to include, the land which was rightfully claimed by the Peoria Indians, a tribe of the Illinois nation, who then did, and still do, live separate and apart from the tribes above mentioned, and who were not represented in the treaty referred to above, nor ever received any part of the consideration given for the cession of land therein mentioned: and whereas the said tribe of Peorias are now also disposed to cede all their land to the United States, and, for the purpose of avoiding any dispute with regard to the boundary of their claim, are willing to unite with the Kaskaskia, Michigamia, Cahokia, and Tamarois tribes, in confirming the cession of land to the United States which was made by the treaty above referred to, and in extending the cession so as to include all the land claimed by those tribes and themselves, respectively:

ARTICLE 1. For which purpose, the undersigned head chiefs and warriors of the Peoria, Kaskaskia, Michigamia, Cahokia, and Tamarois tribes of the Illinois nation of Indians, for the considerations hereinafter mentioned, do hereby relinquish, cede, and confirm to the United States all the land included within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning at the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; thence, up the Ohio, to the mouth of Saline creek, about twelve miles below the mouth of the Wabash; thence, along the dividing ridge between the waters of said creek and the Wabash, to the general dividing ridge between the waters which fall into the Wabash and those which fall into the Kaskaskia river; thence, along the said ridge, until it reaches the waters which fall into the Illinois river; thence, a direct line, to the confluence of the Kankakee and Maple rivers; thence, down the Illinois river, to its confluence with the Mississippi river; and down the latter to the beginning.

ART. 2. It is mutually agreed by the parties hereto that all the stipulations contained in the treaty above referred to shall continue binding and obligatory on both parties.

ART. 3. The United States will take the Peoria tribe, as well as the other tribes herein above mentioned, under their immediate care and patronage, and will afford them a protection as effectual against any other Indian tribes, and against all other persons whatever, as is enjoyed by the citizens of the United States. And the said Peoria tribe do hereby engage to refrain from making war, or giving any insult or offence to any other Indian tribe, or to any foreign nation, without first having obtained the approbation and consent of the United States.

ART. 4. In addition to two thousand dollars worth of merchandise this day paid to the above-mentioned tribes of Indians, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the United States promise to pay to the said Peoria tribe, for the term of twelve years, an annuity of three hundred dollars, in money, merchandise, or domestic animals, at the option of the said tribe, to be delivered at the village of St. Genevieve, in the Territory of Missouri.

ART. 5. The United States agree to cede to the said Peoria tribe six hundred and forty acres of land, including their village on Blackwater river, in the Territory of Missouri, provided that the said tract is not included within a private claim; but, should that be the case, then some other tract of equal quantity and value shall be designated for said tribe, at such place as the President of the United States may direct. And the said Peoria tribe hereby agree to accept the same, together with the presents now given them, and the annuity hereby promised them, as a full equivalent for all and every tract of land to which they have any pretence of right or title.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners aforesaid, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors as aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals. Done at Edwardsville, in the State of Illinois, this twenty-fifth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and of the independence of the United States the forty-third.

TREATY WITH THE OSAGES.

A treaty made and concluded by and between William Clark, Governor of the Missouri Territory, superintendent of Indian affairs, and commissioner in behalf of the United States, of the one part, and a full and complete deputation of considerate men, chiefs, and warriors of all the several bands of the Great and Little Osage nations, assembled in behalf of their said nations, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. Whereas the Osage nations have been embarrassed by the frequent demands for property taken from the citizens of the United States, by war parties, and other thoughtless men of their several bands, (both before and since their war with the Cherokees;) and as the exertions of their chiefs have been ineffectual in recovering and delivering such property, conformably with the condition of the ninth article of a treaty entered into with the United States at Fort Clarke, the tenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eight; and as the deductions from their annuities, in conformity to the said article, would deprive them of any for several years; and being destitute of funds to do that justice to the citizens of the United States which is calculated to promote a friendly intercourse, they have agreed, and do hereby agree, to cede to the United States, and forever quit claim to, the tract of country included within the following bounds, to wit: Beginning at the Arkansas river, where the present Osage boundary line strikes the river, at Frog Bayou; thence, up the Arkansas and Verdigris, to the falls of Verdigris river; thence, eastwardly, to the said Osage boundary line, at a point twenty leagues north from the Arkansas river, and with that line, to the place of beginning.

ART. 2. The United States, on their part, and in consideration of the above cession, agree, in addition to the amount which the Osages do now receive in money and goods, to pay their own citizens the full value of such property as they can legally prove to have been stolen or destroyed by the said Osages since the year one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, provided the same does not exceed the sum of four thousand dollars.

ART. 3. The articles now stipulated will be considered as permanent additions to the treaties now in force between the contracting parties, as soon as they shall have been ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said United States.

In witness whereof, the said William Clark, commissioner as aforesaid, and the considerate men and chiefs aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals at St. Louis, this twenty-fifth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and of the independence of the United States the forty-third.

Articles of a treaty made and concluded at St. Mary's, in the State of Ohio, between Lewis Cass, commissioner of the United States, thereto especially authorized by the President of the United States, and the chiefs and warriors of the Wyandot tribe of Indians.

ARTICLE 1. The Wyandot tribe of Indians hereby cede to the United States all the right reserved to them in two tracts of land in the Territory of Michigan; one including the village called Brownstown, and the other the village called Maguagua, formerly in the possession of the Wyandot tribe of Indians, containing in the whole not more than five thousand acres of land; which two tracts of land were reserved for the use of the said Wyandot tribe of Indians and their descendants, for the term of fifty years, agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress passed February 28, 1809, and entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama and Wyandot Indians."

ART. 2. In consideration of the preceding cession, the United States will reserve, for the use of the said Wyandot Indians, sections numbered twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five, twenty-six, thirty-four, thirty-five, thirty-six, twenty-seven, and that part of section numbered twenty-two which contains eight acres, and lies on the south side of the river Huron, being in the fourth township, south of the base line, and in the ninth range, east of the first meridian, in the Territory of Michigan, and containing four thousand nine hundred and ninety-six acres; and the said tract of land shall be reserved for the use of the said Wyandot Indians and their descendants, and be secured to them in the same manner, and on the same terms and conditions, as is provided in relation to the Alabama Indians by the first section of the before-mentioned act of Congress, except that the said Wyandot Indians and their descendants shall hold the said land so long as they or their descendants shall occupy the same.

In testimony whereof, the said Lewis Cass, commissioner as aforesaid, and the chiefs and warriors of the said Wyandot tribe of Indians, have hereunto set their hands, at St. Mary's, in the State of Ohio, this twentieth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

A treaty of amity and friendship made and concluded at St. Louis, this 6th day of October, A. D. 1818, in presence of his excellency William Clark, Governor of Missouri Territory, commander-in-chief of the militia thereof, and superintendent of Indian affairs for the same, between the tribe of Cherokees residing on the Arkansas, and their allies the Shawanees and Delawares, of the one part, and the several bands composing the Big and Little Osage nations, of the other part.

Whereas the parties are anxious that the war which has existed between them shall cease and determine, and that the most perfect harmony and friendship should exist, they have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the Cherokees of Arkansas, and their allies, and all the bands of the Big and Little Osage nations.

ART. 2. The Cherokees and their allies shall deliver to the Osages, as early as possible in the ensuing spring, all the prisoners which they or their allies may have in their possession; and the Osages, in like manner, agree to deliver to the Cherokees such persons as may be in their possession.

ART. 3. The Osages do hereby grant to the Cherokees and their allies an undisturbed passage to the hunting country, with permission to occupy and hunt on all the lands which they claim south of the Arkansas river.

ART. 4. It is agreed by the parties that no private revenge shall be taken for property stolen, but that complaint shall be made to the agents of the different nations, who shall have full power to return such property.

In witness whereof, we, the chiefs and considerate men of the Cherokees and Great and Little Osage tribes, do sign our names.

[Signed by forty-six chiefs and principal men of the Big and Little Osages, twelve Cherokee chiefs, &c., and one Shawanee chief.]

[This treaty is not signed.]

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR:

NASHVILLE, December 1, 1817.

On the 27th of October last I left this to visit a friend and nephew of mine, who was lying dangerously ill, of which you have been advised by the adjutant general already; and, having performed the last duty to him, who expired on the 20th ultimo, I reached this on the 30th.

On my return journey I received your letter of the 25th October, marked "private;" also a copy of the adjutant general's to you of the 19th ultimo.

I perfectly coincide with Colonel Butler, and for the reasons he has assigned, that nothing can be done with the Chickasaws on the subject named until the arrearages due them are paid; as it would, in my opinion, completely jeopardize the objects in view, which, I fully agree with you, are of the greatest importance. Indeed, it is my opinion that, until their arrearages are paid, even to name the subject would tend to frustrate the object of the Government.

So soon as the money arrives, I will proceed to the Chickasaw nation, and use my best exertions to obtain a relinquishment to their title to the lands proposed; of which, although not sanguine, I do not despair of effecting so soon as they are made friendly disposed, by the change of their agent and the receipt of their annuities.

I sincerely hope that General Platt will accept of the agency, as the chiefs of that nation have expressed their wish to General Meriwether and myself that their agent should be taken from the eastward. Should General Platt not accept, and you will forward the amount due the Chickasaw nation to Colonel Robert Butler, (who has been for a long time doing the extra duty of quartermaster general from real necessity,) and furnish him with particular instructions for its appropriation, I will undertake to see the faithful distribution thereof, and take that moment to obtain their relinquishment to the lands proposed.

Your several communications of the 11th and 30th October and the 6th and 13th of November, with their respective enclosures, have been received and attended to. Notification has been made, and proposals will be received, for the repair of the old Natchez road, from where the Reynoldsburg road intersects it, to the Mississippi line.

The adjutant general has been directed to order Lieutenant Colonel Lindsay to form the recruits of the 4th battalion into two companies, and have them marched to Mobile without delay.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General Commanding.

To the ACTING SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 6, 1818.

In the event of its being thought necessary to extinguish the Quapaw claim to the lands south of the Arkansas river, I must beg leave to suggest the necessity of the commissioners having specific instructions on the following points:

1st. A conference to be held with a deputation of that tribe for the purchase of all or such part of their claim as it may be thought necessary to extinguish at this time; the western line, at least, to include the white settlements.

2d. Or whether it would be better to extinguish all their claim, with a view to exchange that part lying north-west and west of the settlements with the Cherokees for lands east of the Mississippi, reserving to the Quapaws for their own use a sufficient quantity, including their villages, &c.

3d. The terms on which the purchase should be made, either by an amount in goods and an annuity, or by a fixed sum paid in hand, or by instalments.

4th. The terms on which the quantity reserved by them shall be held—whether as tenants in common, or shall they have power to divide it amongst themselves, and the right to dispose thereof, afterwards, separately?

5th. They have expressed an unwillingness to sell the noted hot spring and a valuable salt-lick now worked to advantage. Shall they be allowed to reserve them? If so, on what terms? or what shall be proposed to induce them to give them up?

6th. If it is thought best to confer with them at St. Louis, (which is believed to be the cheapest way,) then I would suggest the propriety of Colonel Auguste Chouteau being associated.

I have, &c.

WILLIAM CLARK.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 7, 1818.

I have the honor to inform you that Auguste Chouteau, Esq. has been appointed a commissioner, to be associated with you, in making a treaty or treaties with the several tribes of Indians named in your commission transmitted by this Department on the 1st of November last. Mr. Chouteau is appointed in the place of Governor Clark, who has declined acting.

The placing that gentleman's name before yours in the instructions addressed to you for holding the treaty was wholly accidental, and therefore should not be placed to an intention of giving him a precedence in the commission. It is hoped this explanation will be satisfactory, and that your excellency will consent to act as commissioner, as the President is desirous to avail himself of your talents and experience in concluding the treaty.

The objects of holding a treaty are explained in the letter of the Acting Secretary of War to you and Governor Clark, dated the 1st November last. Mr. Chouteau is directed to apply to you for information as to the time and place of holding the treaty.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Governor NINIAN EDWARDS, Kaskaskia.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 2, 1818.

I have the honor to enclose to you a commission to treat with the Chickasaw Indians for that portion of their country which lies in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. The object and importance of extinguishing their title to that tract of country are so obvious as to require no comment; and the President anticipates, from your weight of character and knowledge of the Indians, that the object in view will be effected. The President is very anxious to remove the Indians on this side to the west of the Mississippi; and if the Chickasaws could be brought to an exchange of territory, it would be preferred. It is intended to acquire from the Quapaws a large tract of country, in order to make the exchange with the Indians on this side; and if the Chickasaws will agree to the exchange, they may have it for lands in that quarter; but the terms of the cession, as well as the time and place of holding the treaty, are left to your judgment and discretion.

Congress have appropriated $53,000 for the expenses incidental to holding treaties with the Indians; and Colonel McKenney, the superintendent of Indian trade, has been directed to purchase and forward to the Chickasaw Bluffs $6,500 worth of goods, suitable to the taste of the southern Indians, to be distributed under your orders, in presents, to effect the objects of the treaty. He will furnish you with an invoice, and advise you of the goods being forwarded. Should moneyed presents be necessary to the chiefs, you are authorized to make them, and to draw on the Department, provided the whole amount drawn for, including your compensation and that to your secretary and interpreters, does not exceed $4,500.

The contractor will furnish, on the requisition of either of you, the rations which it may be necessary to issue to the Indians while attending the treaty. Notice should be given to him, in order that he may be prepared to furnish the rations.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars a day while actually engaged; and that of the secretary, whom you are authorized to appoint, will be at the rate of five dollars per day.

You will render to this Department the usual accounts and vouchers for settlement.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

General ISAAC SHELBY and
General ANDREW JACKSON,
Commissioners, &c.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 2, 1818.

I have the honor to enclose you a commission to treat with the Miamies, Delawares, and other tribes of Indians who have claims to the tract of land in the State of Indiana watered by the White river and the Wabash. By a reference to a map of Indiana, it will be seen that the part of it to which Indian title is extinguished is of an inconvenient form; and the object of the present negotiation is to acquire from the tribes interested such additional cession as, being added to the present, will render it more convenient and compact.

You will designate the time and place the most suitable, in your opinion, for holding the treaty. The terms to be offered depend so much on the whims and tempers of the tribes interested in the land, that no particular instructions can be given to you; but the President, reposing full confidence in your judgment and discretion, expects that you will acquire it on terms as advantageous to the United States as is practicable.

Congress have appropriated ($53,000) fifty-three thousand dollars for the purpose of holding Indian treaties; ($21,000) twenty-one thousand dollars of which will be applied to the treaty with which you are charged.

Colonel McKenney, superintendent of Indian trade, has been directed to vest $15,000 in such goods as are most agreeable to the taste of the Indians, to be distributed as presents to them under your orders. He will send the goods to Cincinnati, and you will be furnished with an invoice as soon as the purchases are effected. On their arriving at Cincinnati, they will be subject to your orders. The residue ($6,000) is intended for your pay and that of a secretary to the commission, interpreters, &c., and such moneyed presents as you may judge proper to make to the chiefs. You are authorized to draw on the Department for that amount.

The contractor will issue, on your requisition, such rations as may be necessary for a supply of the Indians while attending the treaty. You will give him notice of the time and place of holding the treaty, so that he may be prepared to make the issues.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars a day while actually engaged; and that of your secretary, whom you are authorized to employ, five dollars a day.

You will render this Department the usual accounts and vouchers for settlement at the Treasury.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency JONATHAN JENNINGS,
His Excellency LEWIS CASS, and Honorable BENJAMIN PARKE.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 8, 1818.

I have the honor to enclose a commission to you to treat with the Quapaws. A principal object of the negotiation is to acquire lands on the west of the Mississippi, in order to exchange with such of the Indians on this side as may choose to emigrate to the west. The time and place of holding the treaty are subject to your discretion. The terms of the cession must, of course, depend on the temper and wishes of the Indians; after ascertaining which, you will propose such terms to them as, in your opinion, will be the most advantageous to the United States. The lands reserved for the Quapaws must be held by the tenure by which the Indians usually hold their lands, as the Senate would probably ratify no treaty which recognises in the Indians the right of acquiring individual property, with the power of selling, except to the United States.

You will be allowed at the rate of eight dollars a day while actually engaged in performing the duties of your commission; and the secretary, whom you are authorized to appoint, at the rate of five dollars a day.

You are authorized to draw on this Department for a sum not exceeding $3,000, to defray the expenses of the commission, and to make such presents to the Indians as are usual or necessary. You will render the usual vouchers for settlement, for such sums as may be disbursed under your directions.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Governor WILLIAM CLARK and
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU, Esq.
Commissioners, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 8, 1818.

His excellency Jonathan Jennings, his excellency Lewis Cass, and the honorable Benjamin Parke, having been appointed commissioners to hold a treaty with the Indians in the State of Indiana; Colonel John McKee, General William Carroll, and David Burnett, Esq. commissioners to hold a treaty with the Choctaws; and his excellency Isaac Shelby and General Andrew Jackson, commissioners to hold a treaty with the Chickasaw nation of Indians, it becomes necessary to place at the disposition of these commissioners merchandise suitable for Indian presents, to be distributed by them in such manner as they may think best calculated to promote the views of the Government in the proposed negotiations.

You are, therefore, requested to purchase $15,000 worth of goods, properly assorted, to suit the tastes and habits of the northern Indians, and forward them to Cincinnati, consigned to such person as you may judge proper, and in whom you can place confidence, to be held subject to the orders of the commissioners to treat with the Indians in Indiana; and $13,000 worth of such goods as are in your judgment adapted to the fancy and climate of the southern Indians; to be put up in two parcels of $6,500 worth each; one to be forwarded to the Chickasaw Bluffs, consigned to some discreet person on whom you can rely, to be held subject to the orders of the commissioners to treat with the Chickasaw Indians; and the other to be forwarded to New Orleans, to be consigned in like manner, and subject to the orders of the commissioners to treat with the Choctaws.

You will furnish the commissioners, in each case, with an invoice of the goods, and advise them of their being forwarded, to whom consigned, and of the probable time of their arrival at the place of their destination.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

THOS. L. MCKENNEY.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 11, 1818.

I have the honor to enclose you a commission to renew the negotiation with the Shawanees, Delawares, Pattawatamies, Ottawas, and Chippewas. I also enclose a copy of the resolution of the Senate, by which you will perceive that the consideration of the treaty has been postponed, and that it has been recommended to the President to renew the negotiation. The resolution itself will best explain the views of the Senate, and you will consider it as a part of your instructions. You will determine the time and place of renewing the negotiation, of which you will give due notice to the contractor. On the requisition of either of you, he will make the necessary issue of rations to the Indians while attending the treaty.

I am fearful that the change of tenure proposed by the Senate will indispose the Indians to renew the negotiation, and that they will expect not only a great increase of their annuity, but a great increase of lands to be reserved for their use. No particular instructions can be given to you on these points, as they depend on the disposition of the Indians. The President reposes entire confidence in your judgment and discretion, and expects that the land will be obtained on as favorable terms as possible.

The Wyandot and Seneca delegates expressed a desire that their relations in Canada, not exceeding one hundred and fifty persons, might be permitted to join them, and might be taken into the estimate in the lands to be reserved for their use. The President thinks the request reasonable, and I now state it to apprise you of his opinion in case they should mention it at the treaty.

You will be allowed at the rate of eight dollars a day while performing the duties of your commission, and your secretary at the rate of five dollars per day. You will appoint your secretary.

To defray the expenses attending the commission, and make the usual and necessary presents, you are authorized to draw on the Department for a sum not exceeding $7,000. You will render the usual vouchers for the sums which may be disbursed under your directions.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency LEWIS CASS and
General DUNCAN MCARTHUR,
Commissioners, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 29, 1818.

In the absence of the Secretary of War, I have had the honor to submit your letter to the President of the United States, and have it in charge to communicate his sentiments on the subject in reply.

The great object is to remove, altogether, these tribes beyond the Mississippi. If that be accomplished, every difficulty is removed; there then ceases to be any question about the tenure by which the Indians shall hold lands. To effect this removal, you are aware that great exertion and address must be used on the part of the commissioners, and some sacrifices be made by the United States.

To achieve this plan, other lands, equal in quantity to what the Indians may wish to retain in Ohio, will be granted to them west of the Mississippi; and you are authorized to give them, in cash, on the spot, from 20,000 to 50,000 dollars, and an equal sum in goods, if the object cannot be effected by a less sum. You are also authorized to grant a liberal annuity—say double the amount which you granted to the several tribes by the treaty of the Rapids of the Miami. The United States will pay the expense of removal, giving permission, if necessary, to remain on certain lands, with limits defined, for three years; or until lands which may suit them can be procured west of the Mississippi.

The interests of the Government demand that the cession should be obtained at the least expense. If the removal of the tribes can be effected, permanent annuities to a reasonable amount will indubitably contribute much to the advantage of the United States, in restraining the Indians from engaging in wars on their own account, or as allies of any foreign hostile Power.

The measure of removal is important in a national point of view, and especially to that section of country advanced, of which a settlement of these Indians, who have already made a considerable progress in civilization, and evinced a fidelity to our institutions, will be formed. If joined by the Six Nations of Indians, whose friendship and steady adherence to our Government have been well tried, they would form a defence for our settlements, formidable for the quality of its force, and important from its relative position to us and to the hostile Indians. These considerations induce the President to desire that they should be removed beyond the Mississippi. But it is impossible to determine here to what particular part of country the Indians should be removed; so much depends on the preference which they themselves may give to one portion over another, and the impossibility, perhaps, of granting the spot which they may select. Therefore, in indicating the portion of country to which they may be willing to remove, you will exercise your judgment. It is evident, however, that the location must be beyond the Mississippi, or west of Lake Michigan. It is understood that it will not be difficult to procure a cession from the Indians west of the Mississippi. Governor Clark will be instructed on this point, and I am directed to request you to correspond with him on this subject. The confidence reposed in the zeal and knowledge of the commissioners precludes the necessity of more enlarged instructions on this point, and, at the same time, affords the best hopes that, in the progress of the negotiation, every exertion will be made "to conduct it to a successful issue, upon terms as advantageous to the United States as practicable." Secondly, if a treaty cannot be obtained upon the above terms, make the best contract you can for the territory, granting small reservations to families or to individuals, with the right of pre-emption to the United States. If indispensably necessary to abandon this principle, let the deviation be restricted as much as possible. Let the title to the lands reserved, for example, be to the present incumbent for life, and the fee to their offspring, making the assent of the President to any sale by the immediate or future descendants indispensable.

Should it be found indispensable to the formation of a treaty, on satisfactory conditions, that some lands should be ceded in fee to some few persons in the tribe, half-breeds, or others of great influence, it may be done, guarding the sales in the manner above stated. This, however, should be avoided, if possible, as it would be to sacrifice the interest of the tribe to the accommodation of individuals—perhaps of the innocent and ignorant to the artful and unprincipled. If reservations are made to the Indians in any form whatever, the precise number of acres should be stipulated in preference to “miles square or square miles.”

In these views you will perceive the great importance which the President attaches to the successful termination of the negotiation, on principles of justice and liberality to the Indian tribes. The best interests of the western community will be greatly advanced by the removal of these tribes to a more remote part of the country. An efficient white population will supply the place of their feeble society, and will give strength and vigor to our frontier, as well as develop, by the progress of improvement, many resources which will largely contribute to the power and safety of our institutions.

You are authorized to draw bills on this Department, payable after the ratification of the treaty, for such sums as you may require, after the sum of $7,000, already set apart, shall be expended.

A copy of this letter will be sent to General McArthur for his instruction.

I have the honor to be, &c.

C. VANDEVENTER, Chief Clerk.

His Excellency LEWIS CASS, Detroit.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 29, 1818.

I have the honor to transmit to you, by order of the President of the United States, an extract of a letter of instructions to his excellency Governor Cass, respecting the negotiation which he, in conjunction with General McArthur, is about to open with the Wyandots, Delawares, &c.

The President requests that you will take proper measures, as early as practicable, to ascertain what tribes of Indians west of the Mississippi may be disposed to relinquish their lands, or a suitable portion of them, to the United States, and the probable terms upon which they will make the cession.

He desires your excellency to communicate the result, as well as your views of the subject generally, to Governor Cass and General McArthur, or to either of them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

C. VANDEVENTER, Chief Clerk.

His Excellency WILLIAM CLARK, St. Louis, Missouri Territory.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, July 9, 1818.

A very full and respectable deputation of the principal chiefs and warriors from the four Pawnee tribes having arrived here a short time since, (in compliance with the general views of the Government, and the instructions received from your Department of the 9th June, 1817,) we entered into negotiations with them, and concluded treaties which we have the honor herewith to transmit for the President's approbation.

The Pawnee tribes are warlike and powerful, and inhabit the country about the river Platte, stretching immediately between us and the Spanish settlements, with whom they are now at war. Their numbers and warlike character, the commanding position they occupy in relation to the Missouri trade, and the contemplated establishment at the mouth of Yellow Stone river, coupled to the facility with which (in the event of hostilities between us and the Spanish provinces) they might be sent down in force upon our extended western frontier, evince the wisdom and propriety of cultivating industriously their friendship, in conformity with the general policy of the Government.

Since the conclusion of the late war with England, and the general pacification with the Indians of the Mississippi and Missouri, the Pawnees have committed several wanton and unprovoked murders; and did not, perhaps, in strictness, deserve to have been dealt with so favorably. But they were strangers to the whites—that is, to the Americans; had never visited our settlements, and knew nothing of the character or strength of our Government. They had met with hunting parties occasionally, and, finding them weak and contemptible in their estimation, they had learned (with the help of a few lessons from the Spaniards) to look upon the Government in the same light. Believing, as we did, that their conduct had grown out of these misconceptions, and perceiving the most clear and unequivocal proofs of their humiliation and repentance, we deemed it best to forgive their injuries, and grant them the protection and friendship of the United States; and no Indians with whom we have treated have ever discovered such entire satisfaction, pride, and pleasure at the event.

These people travel principally on horseback, are but little used to marching, and know nothing of canoes. In consequence, we have thought it most advisable to send them home with a handsome present, in order to impress them still more strongly and favorably towards us, and to operate thereby (in some measure) upon the neighboring tribes of the Missouri above them.

To further the views of the Government in relation to the Quapaws, we have despatched an agent (Mr. Benjamin O'Fallon) to them, to communicate our wishes, and make the necessary arrangements for a treaty with them at this place as soon as possible. As yet, we have received no information as to the probable result of his mission.

Our colleague, Governor Edwards, being absent in Kentucky, we have been compelled to proceed in these matters without his counsel or co-operation.

We have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servants,

WM. CLARK,
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU.

To the Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 19, 1818.

I enclose an extract of a letter from Mr. Ogden, of New York, in relation to the removal of the Six Nations of Indians, and request your attention to the subject when you meet the Indians for the purpose of entering into negotiations with them, agreeably to the instructions from this Department; and ascertain whether the Indians on Fox river and its vicinity, or any of the tribes inhabiting the country north of the State of Indiana and Illinois Territory are disposed to make a grant of lands to the Six Nations, and permit them to reside among them. In the event of any of them assenting to the proposal, you will report it to this Department, when you will be instructed to make any arrangements that may be necessary to facilitate the removal of the Six Nations to the country thus selected for their future residence, provided it meets their approbation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Governor LEWIS CASS, Detroit.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, September 6, 1818.

We have the honor herewith to transmit the treaty concluded with the Quapaws on the 24th ultimo; by which it will be seen that a large tract of valuable country (which at all times heretofore has been considered their property, as well by the former governments as by the Osages, their neighbors,) has been ceded to the United States, embracing all the white settlements in that quarter, and extending far to the west of them. The current of emigration is setting with considerable force to the Red river and Washita; and, unless early measures are taken to limit and circumscribe those settlements, by assigning to the Cherokees and other Indians the lands intended for them, (which seems to have been intended by the Government,) the whole country purchased will probably be soon occupied by the white settlers, thinly scattered in every direction.

Within the purchase are several very valuable salines, one of which has been worked by individuals for some time past, and several medicinal springs which are much resorted to from the lower country. These are objects of great public interest, and are thought to be well worth the attention of Government. Whatever disposition it is proposed to make of that country in general, it would perhaps be good policy, and very essential, to reserve the warm springs, with a small portion of the adjoining lands, which are poor and broken.

The land reserved by the Quapaws is quite sufficient for their purposes, and, in truth, is perhaps more than they actually need. It fronts on the Arkansas river more than a hundred miles, including all their villages, and extending to the Washita, being a tract of level, low, rich land, interspersed with swamps, and a great portion of which is subject to annual inundation. This tribe is anxious to have an agent, and we are inclined to think the Government would do well to indulge them. Mr. Charles de Villemont, a native of Louisiana, the old Spanish commandant of the post at Arkansas, who now resides near their villages, was mentioned by them as the person whom they would wish appointed.

We would beg leave also to suggest the propriety of having the boundary lines of the reserve run and marked out as soon as it may be found convenient, in compliance with the stipulations of the treaty.

Our accounts of expenses incurred in negotiating the purchase of the Quapaws are likewise forwarded herewith.

We have, &c.

WM. CLARK,
AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

ST. MARY'S, September 18, 1818.

Accompanying this, we have the honor to transmit to you a treaty, yesterday concluded by us with the Wyandot, Shawanee, Seneca, and Ottawa tribes of Indians.

The proposition to remove to the west of the Mississippi was made to the three former tribes, and enforced as far as we believed it politic to enforce it. It was received by them with such strong symptoms of disapprobation, that we did not think it proper to urge them too far upon the subject. The time has not yet arrived for them voluntarily to abandon the land of their fathers, and seek a new residence in a country with which they are unacquainted, and among powerful and hostile Indians. As our settlements gradually surround them, their minds will be better prepared to receive this proposition, and we do not doubt but that a few years will accomplish what could not now be accomplished except at an expense greatly disproportioned to the object.

The treaty now concluded requires few observations from us. We trust all its stipulations will be found in strict conformity with our instructions.

The Chippewa, Pattawatamie, and Delaware tribes of Indians are not parties to this treaty. None of the provisions in the treaty to which this is supplementary, which related to them, has now been affected, and their participation was therefore unnecessary, and might have been injurious.

We have promised to the tribes, parties hereunto, that they shall receive a quantity of goods equal in value to $12,000. These goods cannot now be distributed, because such distribution would provoke the jealousies of the other tribes, who are waiting the result of the treaty to be negotiated for a cession of land in Indiana. It is thought politic to make a general distribution to all the tribes at the same time, and it is certainly proper that these tribes should receive as much, in proportion to their numbers, as any others.

At the conclusion, therefore, of that treaty, bills will be drawn upon the War Department for the amount of goods which we think it correct to purchase, payable after the ratification of the treaty; and we trust they will be duly honored.

We transmit an extract from the speech of the Ottawas in relation to the grant made by them to Doctor William Brown by the treaty concluded last year at the foot of the Rapids. We cannot but hope that the claim will be confirmed. Doctor Brown's professional services to these Indians have been long continued and gratuitous, equally uncommon in their occurrences and honorable to him.

Very respectfully, sir, we have the honor to be your obedient servants,

LEWIS CASS,
DUNCAN McARTHUR.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

Extract from a speech of the Ottawas in council to the commissioners of the United States.

FATHERS: You last year promised us that you would grant to our friend Dr. William Brown two sections of land at Macon, but we do not find that he has received them. He has rendered us many services, for which we have never paid him. It is owing to him that some of us are now here. It is fortunate for us that he came here, as many of us are sick, and he has attended us. We wish he may get the land.

SIR:

ST. MARY'S, September 21, 1818.

I have the honor to transmit you a treaty concluded by me with the chiefs of the Wyandot tribe of Indians, in conformity with the instructions from the War Department of May 19, 1817.

The delay in concluding this treaty has arisen from the difficulty of effecting the exchange until the land in the Territory of Michigan was surveyed. It could not be located prior to that time without unnecessarily interrupting the continuity of the surveys, and the time which would have been gained was not of sufficient importance to justify this measure. The surveys were not returned until the beginning of last July, and I have embraced the first opportunity which the meeting of the Wyandot chiefs afforded since that time to effect the object.

My letter to the Secretary of War of the 30th July, 1816, contains all the information which it is in my power to give upon this subject; and it renders it unnecessary for me to trouble you with any of the details connected with it.

Very respectfully, sir, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

LEWIS CASS.

To the Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

NASHVILLE, July 13, 1818.

SIR:

I shall proceed to-morrow to the Tennessee river, to meet, under an appointment, James Colbert, interpreter to the Chickasaw nation, preparatory to holding a treaty with that nation. It is my duty, however, to state to you my impression that no negotiation can be carried on, with any possibility of success, until Government have fulfilled their engagements with the Chickasaw nation. The annuities due for lands purchased more than two years ago still remain unpaid; I hope, therefore, that early remittances will be made to liquidate all claims against the United States, previous to any propositions being made for further purchases from the Chickasaw nation.

With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON, Maj. Gen. Commanding.

The remittance to Colonel Butler in January last, subject to my direction, was redeposited in the Nashville Bank, to the credit of the United States, previous to my moving southwardly.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

CHICKASAW AGENCY, July 29, 1818.

Yesterday I received a letter from General Jackson, dated the 24th instant, at Cypress, Tennessee river, relative to the time and place it will suit this nation to meet the United States commissioners to confer on the subject of selling or exchanging land. Major Colbert, on the 17th instant, wrote General Jackson, in answer to a letter he had received from him, that they would meet him at Cypress on the 5th August, which letter the general unfortunately did not receive before he left home for Cypress; if he had, it would have prevented his setting out as early as he did to meet the chiefs from the nation. Major Colbert is now with me, and says that himself and some others will set out to-morrow to meet the United States commissioners at Cypress, and endeavor to agree upon the time and place of holding the treaty; but, from the disposition I now discover in the leading men of the nation, it is not probable they are willing to sell or exchange any more land. From the ill health of Governor Shelby, General Jackson is desirous of having the treaty held as near Nashville as the chiefs can be got to assemble. This proposition for accommodating the comfort of Governor Shelby I sincerely hope may be agreed to; but I much doubt their acquiescence, as, on its being suggested to them, they replied "that all treaties heretofore made with them had been holden in their own nation, and no other place was proper."

I am, respectfully, &c.

H. SHERBURNE, Agent for the Chickasaw Nation.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 30, 1818.

I regret exceedingly the delay which has taken place in the payment of the annuity to the Chickasaw Indians. It has arisen from the long delay of the arrival of their agent. The former agent being dismissed, it was not thought proper to make the payment through him. The annuity of this year was transmitted in goods, through the superintendent of Indian trade, as it was understood that goods, in lieu of money, would be acceptable to the Indians. They have, I presume, been received. The annuity for 1817, and a sum of about $7,000 to be paid under their late treaty, have been transmitted to their agent this day. He has been directed to pay the whole immediately, unless directed otherwise by you or Governor Shelby. It is possible that the payment of so large an amount at the time of negotiating the treaty might be turned to some account. If you judge it advisable to have it then paid, you will direct the agent accordingly.

I enclose a copy of a letter to Governor Shelby of the date of this, which will point out the extent of power intended by the instructions accompanying the commission to be given to you, in regard to which he appears to labor under a mistake.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 30, 1818.

Your letter of the 16th July, relating to the proposed negotiation with the Chickasaw Indians, was received this morning.

In the instruction which was given to you, it was not intended to place any limitations on the powers of the commissioners as to the terms on which the land should be acquired. The goods sent to the Chickasaw Bluffs, and the sum for which you were authorized to draw, were intended to be used at your discretion in bringing about the treaty, by presents to the principal chiefs, or otherwise. Should a larger sum be necessary in that way, you are authorized to draw for it, provided it does not exceed $5,000. The treaty itself you will, of course, make on such terms as you may judge proper. The goods sent to the Bluffs were ordered to be selected with great care; and I think you will find them useful to put the Indians in a good temper to negotiate. You are authorized to take such measures, and to incur such expense, to have the goods brought to the place of the treaty, as you may judge proper. About $30,000 (two years' annuity, and a sum due under the late treaty with the Chickasaws,) will be shortly paid to the nation. I have directed the agent, Colonel Sherburne, to pay it immediately, unless you or General Jackson should direct the suspension of the payment. It is possible that the payment at the time of making the treaty might be turned to advantage. It is submitted, however, to your discretion.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency ISAAC SHELBY, Shelbyville, Kentucky.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

NASHVILLE, August 18, 1818.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ult., with its enclosure. The 1st day of October has been fixed upon by the chiefs of the Chickasaw nation for holding the treaty; and Colonel Sherburne, their agent, will be instructed to withhold the payment of the sums which may be due the Indians until that time, as the payment of so large an amount at the time of negotiation will, no doubt, have considerable effect in forwarding the objects of the treaty, and will also be a saving of considerable expense.

There being no contractor's agent for the State of Mississippi, it will be necessary that a contract should be made with some individual for furnishing the necessary supplies for the Indians. I have, however, directed the adjutant general of this division to make a requisition on the contractor for 75,000 rations, to be delivered at the time and place of holding the treaty.

Your letters of the 27th and 28th ult. have been received, and shall receive, in due time, that attention which they merit.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON, *Maj. Gen. commanding.*Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

ST. MARY'S, October 6, 1818.

We have the honor to forward to you treaties concluded at this place with the Pattawatamies, Delawares, Weas, and Miamies, for the purchase of lands in the State of Indiana. Owing to the peculiar circumstances under which we are placed, a detailed communication is deferred, and which you will receive from Governor Jennings, together with a statement of the disbursements incident to the negotiation.

We have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

JONATHAN JENNINGS,
LEWIS CASS,
B. PARKE.The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, October —, 1818.

In compliance with the wishes of Government, as expressed in your letter of the 8th of May, I have, with much difficulty, succeeded in bringing about a peace between the Osages and Cherokees.

As it was thought by both parties that no treaty they could make would be considered as reciprocally binding upon them, unless it should be ratified and confirmed in my presence, I invited both tribes to send a deputation of eight or ten of their principal men to meet in council at this place. The Osage chiefs and considerate men (to the number of about sixty) arrived early last month, and have waited the coming of the Cherokees, which was not until last week.

Their conferences resulted in a solemn treaty, a copy of which I have the honor herewith to forward.

Finding the Osages willing to pay for the property which they have taken, to a very considerable amount, from the citizens of this Territory; and knowing the views of the Government on the subject of Indian emigration to the west of the Mississippi; finding, too, that it was the intention of the Cherokees to demand of the Osages the country west of their settlements on the Arkansas, which the Osages were determined not to cede to them; and believing the Shawanees may be induced to exchange their lands in Cape Girardeau for the lands on the Arkansas and White rivers, I thought it advisable to enter into a treaty, by which the Osages have ceded to the United States the country north of Arkansas, from their old boundary line to the Three Forks, with a width of sixty miles, which will include a large body of very fine land. The treaty is likewise herewith enclosed.

The Osages have determined to unite themselves in one village, and have requested that Mr. Peter Chouteau may be re-appointed their agent. Mr. Chouteau has certainly more influence with that nation than any other person; and if the agency should be re-established, (which I would strongly recommend,) it would perhaps be well to gratify their wishes. They complain of the mode in which they have received their annuities from the factor at Fort Osage, and desire that they may for the future be delivered to them, unopened, at their village on the Osage river. The request is certainly a reasonable one; and if they unite themselves into one village, (which I have advised, from a wish to bring them more under the eye and superintendence of the agent, and the control of the Government,) it perhaps would be well to remove their blacksmiths to the spot they select for their village, which will tend to unite them as much as any other indulgence that could be extended.

Mr. O'Fallon, the agent for the Missouri tribes, has been instructed to sound them on the subject of ceding a portion of their lands, in conformity with the wishes of the Government, communicated in a letter received from Major Vandeventer, of the 20th June, 1818. On this subject I have written to Governor Cass, who is authorized to treat with the Indians of Ohio and Michigan, and have informed him of the late treaty with the Quapaws, from whom a cession has been obtained of nearly thirty millions of acres. This, together with the cession now made by the Osages, places an immense country at the disposal of the United States.

It is the wish of the Indians that the lines of the late cession, as also those of the Cherokee lands on the Arkansas, may be run and marked as soon as possible, and the whites moved off, and prevented from settling upon the lands set apart for them.

The Osage deputation left this yesterday, and the Cherokees will follow in a few days, both parties apparently much pleased with the arrangements that have been entered into.

Enclosed, I send you a communication from the Shawanees and Delawares who reside within our settlements near the Mississippi, by which you will be apprized of their wishes in regard to an exchange of country, &c.

I have, &c.

WM. CLARK.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 27, 1819.

I have the honor to enclose you a commission to act as commissioner to survey and mark off the tract of land reserved by the Quapaw tribe of Indians under the second article of the treaty concluded with said tribe on the 24th August, 1818, of which an extract is enclosed for your instruction.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars per day, including your pay as agent, during the time you are actually engaged in ascertaining and surveying said boundary lines, you providing for your own expenses.

To aid you in the performance of this duty, and insure as speedy a completion of it as practicable, you are authorized to employ a skilful surveyor, who will be allowed five dollars per day, and the necessary number of chainmen and axemen, who will be allowed at the rate of two dollars per day in full for their services.

So soon as the survey is completed, you will make your report of it, accompanied by a plat of the land, to this Department. You will, also, immediately after the completion of the survey, give due notice to all intruders on the land surveyed to depart therefrom within a definite period of time; and, should it be found necessary, you will make a requisition on the commanding officer at Belle Point for that purpose.

Your Indian agency comprises the performance of the necessary duties as well to the Quapaws as the Cheerokees.

I am, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

[2d SESSION.]

EMIGRATION OF THE CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 1, 1818.

Mr. POINDEXTER made the following report:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a resolution instructing said committee "to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the emigration and settlement of the Choctaw tribe of Indians on the lands of the United States west of the river Mississippi, until they shall have acquired that right by treaty with the United States, founded on a cession of lands inhabited by said tribe of Indians east of the river Mississippi," have had that subject under consideration, and submit the following report:

That, by the third article of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Choctaw tribe of Indians, bearing date the 3d day of January, 1786, commonly called the treaty of Hopewell, it was stipulated between the contracting parties that the lands allotted to said Indians to live and hunt on, within the limits of the United States, should be limited by the following boundaries, to wit: "Beginning at a point on the thirty-first degree of north latitude, where the eastern boundary of the Natchez district shall touch the same; thence, east, along the said thirty-first degree of north latitude, being the southern boundary of the United States of America, until it shall strike the eastern boundary of the lands on which the Indians of the said nation did live and hunt on on the 29th day of November, 1782, while they were under the protection of the King of Great Britain; thence, northwardly, along the said eastern boundary, until it shall meet the northern boundary of the said lands; thence, westwardly, along the said northern boundary, until it shall meet the western boundary thereof; thence, southwardly, along the same, to the beginning." That, of the above-described tract of country, a very small portion has, since the date of said treaty, been ceded to the United States for a valuable consideration, and the residue thereof remains in the possession of said Indians, for the purposes set forth in the above-recited article. It further appears to your committee that, since the cession of Louisiana to the United States by France, Congress, by an act passed on the 26th of March, 1804, did authorize the President of the United States "to stipulate with any Indian tribes owning lands on the east side of the Mississippi, and residing thereon, for an exchange of lands the property of the United States on the west side of the Mississippi, in case the said tribes shall remove and settle thereon; but in such stipulation the said tribes shall acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and shall agree that they will not hold any treaty with any foreign Power, individual State, or with the individuals of any State or Power; and that they will not sell or dispose of the said lands, or any part thereof, to any sovereign Power, except the United States, nor to the subjects or citizens of any other sovereign Power, nor to the citizens of the United States." The obvious intention of this act was to enable the Government, as soon as practicable, to transfer to the extensive uninhabited territories of the United States west of the Mississippi the several Indian tribes, who, by their local situation east of that river, retard the progress of population in that section of country, and prevent the facilities which ought to be afforded to the commercial intercourse between the western States and Territories and the city of New Orleans. The accomplishment of this object would be productive of incalculable advantages to a large and respectable portion of the Union, who depend solely on the Mississippi as an outlet to the rich productions which annually float down that river in search of a suitable and profitable market. But your committee are informed, from sources entitled to their entire confidence, that for several years past the Choctaw tribe of Indians, to whom has been allotted a vast and fertile territory east of the Mississippi to live and hunt on, finding their favorite pursuit there unprofitable, and, in consequence of the scarcity of game, not capable of yielding them an ordinary support, have gradually emigrated to the west, and formed considerable settlements for hunting, and even for agricultural purposes, on the lands of the United States within the territories acquired by the purchase of Louisiana, in direct violation of the treaty of Hopewell, and of the spirit and meaning of the act of Congress to which your committee have referred. In consequence of a representation of these facts, and of the probable disposition of this tribe of Indians to exchange lands which had become of no value to them for an equal quantity west of the Mississippi, to which their young men and hunters are accustomed annually to resort, the President of the United States, during the last session of Congress, appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, who were instructed to propose to these Indians an exchange of lands, which seemed to be called for as well by their own wants and necessities as by a due regard to justice and the rights and interests of the United States. The proposition was accordingly made by our commissioners, on fair and equitable principles, which resulted in a total refusal on the part of the chiefs of the aforesaid tribe to relinquish their right of possession to the lands designated for them to live and hunt on, although they at this time occupy those lands on the west of the Mississippi which have been offered as an equivalent for such relinquishment.

Your committee are of opinion that these unwarrantable proceedings ought no longer to be tolerated. The power vested in the President of the United States by the act of the 26th of March, 1804, will become obsolete if the tribes of Indians east of the Mississippi are permitted to emigrate and form settlements west of that river, without the previous sanction of the Government. The Cherokee tribe, whose hunters had removed to the Arkansas, were compelled to indemnify the United States by a cession of their lands on the Chatahoochee and Tennessee rivers; the same rule ought to be adopted in relation to every other tribe. The Choctaws possess the east bank of the Mississippi for a distance of near three hundred miles, which will remain an uninhabited wilderness for centuries to come, unless their claim is extinguished, and the country populated by the United States. A variety of important considerations urge the expediency of effecting this object at an early period. The defence of the southern frontier of the United States from foreign invasion imperiously requires a strong physical force on the Mississippi, from the mouth of the Ohio to New Orleans. The navigation of that river, also, by means of steamboats, so essential to the welfare of the western country, cannot be prosecuted with safety and convenience without the aid of a population adequate to the supply of fuel, and other necessary articles, in a long and dangerous voyage against the rapid current of the river. Your committee are satisfied that, so long as the Choctaw tribe of Indians are permitted to live and hunt on the lands of the United States west of the Mississippi, they will never cede to the United States any part of the valuable country which they occupy by treaty east of said river. Justice and policy, therefore, combine in recommending the necessity of confining them to the boundaries heretofore appropriated for their use, until they shall acquire the right to other lands by treaty with the United States. Your committee report a bill for that purpose.

[2d SESSION.

ALTERATION OF THE SYSTEM FOR TRADING WITH THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 8, 1818.

Sir:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 5, 1818.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of April, 1818, directing the Secretary of War to prepare and report, at their next session, "a system providing for the abolition of the existing Indian trade establishments of the United States, and providing for the opening of the trade with the Indians to individuals, under suitable regulations," I have the honor to make the following report:

The nations of Indians who inhabit this portion of our continent were, on its first discovery, in a state of the most perfect commercial independence. Their knowledge of the useful arts was, indeed, very limited, but it was commensurate with their wants and desires. With their rude implements of husbandry, their hook and bow, in the construction of which they were well instructed, they drew a scanty but (for them) a sufficient supply from the soil, the water, and the forest. A great change has since taken place, such as appears to be inevitable by a fixed law of nature, in the intercourse between a civilized and savage people. Helplessness has succeeded independence. While their wants have been greatly multiplied and enlarged by their intercourse with their more civilized neighbors, their knowledge even of their former rude arts has been lost, without acquiring those which are necessary in their new condition. The manufacture of the axe and the hoe, by which they now clear and cultivate the soil, and the gun and ammunition, by which they take their game, are far above their skill; and, with the exhaustion of their present stock, without a new supply, they would be reduced to extreme want. On trade, then, with those from whom they can draw these and other supplies, they are wholly dependant. We have the exclusive right to trade with those within our limits; and cut off, as the southern tribes are, by our acquisition in the late war, from intercourse with foreigners on the side of the Gulf of Mexico, we have the means, by a proper extension of our posts on the lakes, the Mississippi, and the Missouri, (to effect which measures have already been taken,) to enforce effectually, without much additional expense, this important right. The period seems, then, to have arrived to give to our control over the Indians, through an exclusive supply of their wants, the greatest efficiency, and to promote their and our interest, by a judicious system of trade fairly and justly directed.

A similar view of this branch of our trade seems to have been taken at an early period by our Government. It directed its attention to this interesting and important subject as early as the year 1775, when a committee was appointed by Congress to devise a plan for carrying on trade with the Indians. In the next year a very considerable purchase of goods was directed to be made for the Indian trade; and trade with them, except under license and bond, was strictly prohibited. The subject was frequently acted on during the confederation, but no systematic effort was made to regulate it till 1786, when an ordinance was passed dividing the Indian department into two districts, and appointing a superintendent with a deputy to each. It was made their duty to execute such regulations as Congress might establish in relation to Indian affairs; to correspond with the Secretary of War, through whom their communications were directed to be made to Congress; to obey the instructions of the War Department; and to grant licenses to trade with Indians. This ordinance directed that no license should be granted to foreigners, and only to citizens whose good moral character should be certified by the Governor of a State, under the seal of the State; and that bonds should be given to conform to established regulations. Licenses were granted to continue in force for one year only, and upon the payment of $50. To trade without license incurred a penalty of $500 and forfeiture of goods. The superintendents and their deputies were prohibited from engaging in trade.

The change in the form of the government a few years after the passing of this ordinance, and the debility into which public affairs fell about the termination of the confederation, prevented this judicious system from being carried into effect.

Under the present constitution, the subject of Indian trade attracted the attention of Congress as early as the year 1790. The system of trade by licenses was retained, which were directed to be granted for two years, by persons to be appointed by the President, to applicants of good character, who gave bonds to conform to regulations; and to trade without license was subjected to a forfeiture of merchandise. The act contains no prohibitions of foreigners, and requires nothing to be paid for the licenses. In the years 1793 and 1796, acts were passed very similar in their provisions to the one just recited; and in the year 1802, an act repealing former acts, and which still continues in force, was passed. It inflicts a fine of $100, and imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, in addition to the forfeiture of goods, for trading without license; and directs licenses to be granted on bond, with sufficient security, to conform to law and regulations, without making a good character or citizenship a requisite.

By an act of 1816, (the last passed on this subject,) foreigners are prohibited from trading with the Indians, except permitted by the President, and under such regulations as he should establish. Instructions have been given under this act to prohibit foreigners from passing into the Indian country, except as boatmen, and, under certain conditions, as interpreters.

The system of trade by public factors, now proposed to be abolished, commenced in the year 1796, but without superseding the original mode of carrying on the trade by license. The President was authorized to establish trading-houses, and to appoint an agent to each house, to carry on, as the act states, "a liberal trade with the Indians." The act appropriated $150,000 as the capital of this trade, and the additional sum of $8,000 annually, for the payment of agents and clerks; and directed the trade to be carried on so as not to diminish the capital. It was limited to two years; but was, by a subsequent act, continued in force till 1806. A superintendent of Indians was then appointed, and the capital increased to $260,000, and $13,000 was annually appropriated for the payment of superintendent, agents, and clerks. This act was limited to three years, but afterwards continued in force till 1811. The capital was then increased to $300,000, with an annual appropriation of $19,250 for the payment of superintendent, agents, and clerks. It was limited to three years, but has been extended by subsequent acts to the 1st of March next.

The capital at present is distributed among eight trading-houses, or factories, established at the following places: Fort Mitchell; the Chickasaw Bluffs; Fort Confederation, on the Tombigbee; Fort Osage, on the Missouri; Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi; Sulphur Fork, on Red river; Green bay; and Chicago.

Such is the rise, progress, and present condition of our Indian trade. It was commenced, and has been continued, from motives both of prudence and humanity; and though it may not have fully realized the expectations of its friends, it has no doubt produced beneficial effects. If wars have not been entirely prevented by it, they probably, without it, would have been more frequent; and if the Indians have made but little advances in civilization, they probably, without it, would have made less. If greater effects have not resulted, it is to be attributed not to a want of dependence on the part of the Indians on commercial supplies, but to defects in the system itself, or in its administration. Scarcely any attempt has been made till lately to exclude foreigners, and the granting of licenses has not been subject to those checks which are necessary to give it the most salutary effects.

Should it be thought unadvisable to continue the present trading system by factories, by permitting the act to expire by its limitation on the 1st of March next, it will then, of course, terminate. In winding up its concerns, two points are to be regarded: to sustain as little loss as possible; and to withdraw from the trade gradually, in order that the capital employed may be supplied from other sources. To effect both of these objects, I would suggest that so much of the act of 1811 as authorizes the appointment of a superintendent and factors be continued in force for one year; and that they be authorized to make sales, as heretofore, of the goods and effects on hand, and those which may be acquired from the Indians.

The superintendent of Indian trade should also be authorized and directed to exhibit at his office, for inspection, an inventory of the stock in trade, with the property attached to the respective factories; and he should be directed to sell the same on the best terms offered, provided the sales can be effected at cost and charges. It would be proper to allow considerable credit, upon approved bonds and security; and the President ought to be empowered to annex, as the condition of the sale, if he should think it advisable, to sell the goods to the Indians at the place at which the factory is established, provided the sales can be effected within the period of one year. The factory at Fort Clarke, being established by a treaty with the Great and Little Osages in the year 1808, must be continued by the Government, or sold out, subject to the condition of being continued so long as the Indians may desire it. It would, perhaps, be advisable to direct a new treaty, rescinding, on suitable compensation, the stipulation referred to.

The establishment would, by these means, terminate gradually, without the hazard of any considerable losses.

To provide for opening the trade to individuals, under suitable regulations, is a task of much greater difficulty. The vast extent of the country inhabited by the Indians, and the numbers and variety of the tribes, render it impossible to apply, with propriety, any one uniform system to the whole. The various tribes, for the purpose of trade, may, however, be comprehended in two classes: those in our immediate neighborhood, surrounded by our settlements and our military posts, and who, from long intercourse with us, have become partially civilized; and those more remote, who still retain their original character and customs. In the former are comprehended the four southern tribes; the Osages, and the small tribes immediately west of the Mississippi; those within the limits of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and that part of the Michigan Territory east of Lake Michigan. The latter comprehends all of the tribes without those limits. I propose to consider the system of trade best calculated for each division, beginning with the former.

After giving the subject that full consideration which its importance merits, it appears to me that the provisions of the ordinance of 1786, with a few additions and modifications, particularly in the administrative part, so as to adjust it to our present form of government, are, for this division of our Indian trade, the best that can be devised. The provisions of the acts now in force in relation to licenses are not as well guarded or as efficient as those of the ordinance referred to. The introduction of the factories seems to have relaxed the attention of Government to the system of trade under license. I would then propose to assume the provisions of the ordinance referred to, as the basis of a system to open the trade with the contiguous tribes of Indians to individual enterprise. Instead, however, of appointing two superintendents, I would propose a superintendent of Indian affairs, to be attached to the War Department, with a salary of $3,000 per annum; the superintendent to be under the control of the Secretary of War, and to be charged, subject to such regulations as the President may prescribe, with the correspondence, superintendence, and general management of Indian affairs; and to be authorized, with the approbation of the Secretary of War, to grant licenses to trade with the Indians. Licenses to be granted to citizens of good moral character, and to continue in force till revoked. A sum not less than $100, nor more than $500, to be determined under regulations to be prescribed by the President, to be paid for the privilege of using it at the time of granting the license, and annually during its continuance; and bonds, with sufficient security, to be taken to conform to law and regulations. Licenses to be revoked by the President whenever he may judge proper. To trade without license, to subject to a fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment not to exceed six months, with a forfeiture of the goods. Licenses to be granted to trade at specified places, to be selected by the applicants, and not to be changed without the consent of the superintendent. All peddling and sales of spirituous liquors to be strictly prohibited. Each trading-house, or establishment, to require a separate license; and books to be kept at the establishment, in which the prices of the goods sold and the articles purchased should be regularly and fairly entered; and to be subject at all times to the inspection of the Indian agent, or such persons as the superintendent may appoint.

The reasons for most of these provisions are so obvious as to require no illustration. They will all be passed over, accordingly, without observation, except the provision which requires the payment of an annual sum for the use of a license, and that which requires the trading establishment to be fixed. The former provision is taken from the ordinance of 1786, which directed licenses to be granted for one year only, and on payment of $50 to the superintendent, for the use of the United States; a sum nearly equal to that now proposed, if the value of money at that time be taken into consideration.

But it will probably be objected that it is our interest, and, as we propose to monopolize their trade, our duty, too, to furnish the Indians with goods on as moderate terms as possible; and that the sum to be paid for a license, by acting as a duty on the goods sold under it, will tend to enhance their price. In answer to which it may be justly observed, that it is not a matter of so much importance that they should obtain their supplies for a few cents more or less, as that the trade should, as far as practicable, be put effectually under the control of the Government, in order that they may be protected against the fraud and the violence to which their ignorance and weakness would, without such protection, expose them. It is this very ignorance and weakness which render it necessary for the Government to interfere; and, if such interference is proper at all, it ought to be rendered effectual. Such will be the tendency of this provision. Its first and obvious effects will be to diminish more certainly, and with less injurious effect than any other provision which can be devised, the number of traders, and to increase the amount of capital which each would employ. The profit of a small capital of a few hundred dollars would scarcely pay for the license; while that on a large one would not be much diminished by it. Both of these effects—the diminution of the number of traders, and the increase of the capital—would add greatly to the control of the Government over the trade. It would be almost impossible to inspect the conduct, and consequently control the actions, of the multitude of traders with small capitals, diffused over the Indian country, and settled at remote and obscure places. The greatest vigilance on the part of the superintendent and his agents would be unequal to the task. By diminishing the number, and bringing each more permanently before the view of the Government, a due inspection and superintendence becomes practicable. Again: what control can the Government have over the conduct of a trader, with a capital of a few hundred dollars only? Suppose he should violate the express injunctions of law and regulations; what serious loss would he sustain by revoking his license, or by putting his bond in suit? To him it would be nothing to wind up his business, and give his capital another direction; and as to the bond, in such distant and obscure transactions, he might pretty safely calculate on escaping its penalty. Very different would be the case with the trader of a large capital. To revoke his license would be a serious evil, which must subject him to certain loss; and, should he break the conditions of his bond, he would be much more in danger of feeling its penalty. The control of the Government would not only be greater over such traders, but (what is of equal importance) their influence with the Indians would have a more salutary direction. A war between them and us would, in all cases, be injurious, and in many cases would be ruinous to the trader of a large capital; but not so with one of small capital. A single profitable speculation may be of more importance to him than the continuance of peace. From the effects of war he can as easily escape as from the revocation of his license or the penalty of his bond. Let the character of the former be what it may, he must, from interest, be the advocate of peace and the influence of his own Government; while the latter, unless influenced by virtuous motives, would feel in either but little interest.

From the nature of the trade, the more it can be concentrated, provided there is reasonable competition, the better it will be for the Indians and ourselves. The very opposite, it is true, would be the fact if they had the capacity and intelligence to take care of their own interest without our protection; but, situated as they are, indefinite competition would be no less injurious to them than to our citizens; and such appear to be their sentiments. The Chickasaws, in a late treaty, complained of the injury which they had sustained from peddlers and small traders; and they had a stipulation inserted against the granting of any license to trade with their nation, as the only effectual means which suggested itself to prevent it.

The reasons for fixing the trading establishments are no less strong. By rendering them stationary, and compelling the proprietor to keep books, containing regular entries of all their sales and purchases, important checks will be presented to prevent fraud and exorbitant charges. It will also strongly tend to prevent collision between the traders, and, consequently, the creation of parties among the Indians for or against particular traders—a state of things unfriendly to their interest, and dangerous to the peace of the frontier. Besides, the trading establishments, being fixed, as they will be, in the most advantageous positions, will, in time, become the nucleus of Indian settlements, which, by giving greater density and steadiness to their population, will tend to introduce a division of real property, and thus hasten their ultimate civilization.

Such are the provisions under which the trade with those tribes of Indians in our immediate neighborhood may, with safety and advantage, be opened to individual enterprise. With a vigilant administration, it will produce results equally salutary to the Indians and ourselves. In fact, the knowledge of the use of money, and the prices of most of the ordinary articles of trade, is so far advanced among them, as to guard them, to a considerable extent, against mere fraud and imposition; and, with the control which the Government may exercise over the trade with them, they would generally receive their supplies on fair and moderate terms. The system is not less calculated to secure peace. The regular traders, who have paid for the use of their licenses, will be the most active to prevent vexatious peddling and retailing of spirituous liquors, which are the bane of the frontier. They will, besides, become the most active promoters of industry; for the almost total destruction of game has rendered the amount of peltries and furs of little value in this branch of Indian trade; and their capacity of paying for the goods purchased must consequently, in a great measure, depend on the proceeds of the soil. In fact, the neighboring tribes are becoming daily less warlike, and more helpless and dependant on us, through their numerous wants; and they are rendered still more pacific by the fear of forfeiting their lands and annuities. They have, in a great measure, ceased to be an object of terror, and have become that of commiseration. The time seems to have arrived when our policy towards them should undergo an important change. They neither are, in fact, nor ought to be, considered as independent nations. Our views of their interest, and not their own, ought to govern them. By a proper combination of force and persuasion, of punishments and rewards, they ought to be brought within the pales of law and civilization. Left to themselves, they will never reach that desirable condition. Before the slow operation of reason and experience can convince them of its superior advantages, they must be overwhelmed by the mighty torrent of our population. Such small bodies, with savage customs and character, cannot, and ought not, to be permitted to exist in an independent condition in the midst of civilized society. Our laws and manners ought to supersede their present savage manners and customs. Beginning with those most advanced in civilization, and surrounded by our people, they ought to be made to contract their settlements within reasonable bounds, with a distinct understanding that the United States intend to make no further acquisition of land from them, and that the settlements reserved are intended for their permanent home. The land ought to be divided among families; and the idea of individual property in the soil carefully inculcated. Their annuities would constitute an ample school fund; and education, comprehending as well the common arts of life, as reading, writing, and arithmetic, ought not to be left discretionary with the parents. Those who might not choose to submit, ought to be permitted and aided in forming new settlements at a distance from ours. When sufficiently advanced in civilization, they would be permitted to participate in such civil and political rights as the respective States within whose limits they are situated might safely extend to them. It is only by causing our opinion of their interest to prevail, that they can be civilized and saved from extinction. Under the present policy, they are continually decreasing and degenerating, notwithstanding the Government has, under all of its administrations, been actuated by the most sincere desire to promote their happiness and civilization. The fault has been, not in the want of zeal, but in the mode by which it has been attempted to effect these desirable objects. The Indians are not so situated as to leave it to time and experience to effect their civilization. By selecting prudently the occasion for the change, by establishing a few essential regulations, and by appointing persons to administer them fairly and honestly, our efforts could scarcely fail of success. Nor ought it to be feared that the power would be abused on our part; for, in addition to the dictates of benevolence, we have a strong interest in their civilization. The enmity even of the frontier settlers towards them is caused principally by the imperfection of the present system; and under the one which I have suggested, it will greatly abate, if not entirely subside. The natural humanity and generosity of the American character would no longer be weakened by the disorders and savage cruelty to which our frontiers are now exposed. A deep conviction of the importance of the subject, and a strong desire to arrest the current of events, which, if permitted to flow in their present channel, must end in the annihilation of those who were once the proprietors of this prosperous country, must be my apology for this digression.

It remains to consider in what manner our trade can be the most successfully prosecuted with the numerous Indian tribes who occupy the vast region extending west to the Pacific ocean. It is obvious that the system proposed for the partially civilized tribes bordering on our settlements would prove altogether inadequate to this branch of our Indian trade. It will require a system of far more energy to effect the great objects which ought to be pursued through it. To establish a decided control over the numerous and savage tribes within these vast limits, and to give to our trade with them its utmost extension, are deemed to be objects of great national importance. It is believed that, within our limits, along the range of the Rocky Mountains, quite to the Mexican frontier is the best region for fur and peltries on this continent. With proper efforts, the whole of this valuable trade, extending quite across to the great western ocean, would, in a few years, be exclusively in our possession. To produce these desirable results, foreign adventurers, whose influence must at all times be hostile to our interest, and dangerous to our peace, must be excluded. With this view, and to protect our own trade, means have been taken to extend our military posts on the Mississippi and Missouri. Whatever character our trade in that quarter may assume, the extension of our posts, as contemplated, will be indispensable to its enlarged and successful prosecution; but it is believed that, with all of the advantages which they will afford, unless the trade be properly and efficiently organized, we shall not be able to compete with entire success with the British companies on the north, nor to acquire that decided control over the Indians which is indispensable to its complete success.

In order to have just ideas on this subject, it is necessary to take into consideration not only the vast extent and remoteness of the region over which it is proposed to extend our trade, but the character of the numerous tribes who inhabit it. They are all more or less migratory; in the summer moving towards the north, and in the winter to the south, in pursuit of the buffalo and other game. They are thus, in the summer, brought into the neighborhood of the British establishments to the north of our limits, where, notwithstanding our military posts and the advantage of our position, much of the trade and influence over these fierce and warlike tribes will centre, unless our means of carrying it on should be as well organized and as efficient as theirs. The difficulty, though of an opposite kind, is no less considerable on the southern frontier of this portion of our country. The line between us and the Spanish possessions in Mexico is, in its whole extent, a subject of discussion; and, even should it be adjusted, will probably, to a considerable extent, be without natural and visible boundaries. To a trade thus situated, extending over so vast a region, inhabited by numerous tribes not less warlike than savage, with the competition of powerful and long established companies on one side, and danger of collision on the other, the unorganized efforts of individuals, always with jarring, and frequently with opposing interests, appear to be wholly inadequate to its successful or safe prosecution. The rivalry of trade, which, in well-regulated communities, gives the greatest prosperity to commerce, would, in these distant regions, beyond the control of law or superior authority, amongst fierce and ignorant savages, lead to the most fatal consequences. Each trader, or association of traders, would endeavor to monopolize the trade within certain limits, and would exert their cunning and influence to render the savages their partisans, and the enemy of their rivals in trade. Among a people at once so fierce and so easily duped, the result may be readily anticipated. A state of disorder and violence would universally prevail, equally unfortunate to the Indians and ourselves; and which would strongly tend to turn the trade, and with it the influence over the Indians, to the well-organized foreign fur companies near our limits.

If these observations are correct; if the uncombined efforts of individuals are inadequate to a successful competition with the British fur companies; if they will endanger our peace with our southern neighbors, and lead to fierce and dangerous rivalry among themselves, it only remains to consider whether a mode can be devised of carrying on this branch of our Indian trade which will obviate these evils, and accomplish the desirable objects of giving the greatest extension to it, accompanied with the most efficient control over the Indians themselves.

The united influence and combined efforts of the fur companies referred to can be met successfully, it is believed, only by an equal concentration of influence and efforts on our part; the jealous rivalry of independent traders, with its fatal consequences, can be obviated only by removing the diversity of interest by which it would be excited, and the danger of collision on our southern limits, by subjecting the trade completely to the will and control of the Government. The mode, then, which I would propose, would be to vest the trade in a company with sufficient capital, to be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, and to be limited to the term of twenty years; to pay an annual tax on its subscribed capital, for the privilege of exclusive trade; and to be subject, in like manner as private traders, to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed. It is thus that most of the evils to be apprehended, by leaving the trade open to the competition of private adventurers, would, it is believed, be avoided. The efforts of the company, undisturbed by rival interests, would be directed to establish its control over the various tribes of Indians, to exclude foreign adventurers, and to give the greatest degree of profits to its trade. The success of such a company, properly conducted, scarcely admits of a doubt. Our position in regard to this trade, the facility which the navigation of our great and numerous rivers in that quarter would afford, and the protection from our military posts, would speedily destroy all foreign competition, and would in a few years push our trade to the Pacific ocean. The most profitable fur and peltry trade in the world would be ours, accompanied with a decided influence over the numerous and warlike tribes inhabiting those extensive regions. The mere objection that it would create a monopoly ought not to outweigh so many advantages. The trade with the Indians has never been opened, without restrictions, to our citizens. Licenses from the Government have at all times been required; and the Government has, itself, through its factories, to a considerable extent, monopolized the trade; and, by an extension of its capital only, might engross the whole of it. All of these provisions, however necessary in the Indian trade, would be absurd in any other branch of our commerce. Besides, the profit of the trade with the Indians has, at all times, been confined to a few individuals; and it is highly probable that a greater portion of the community would participate in it, by carrying it on in the manner proposed, than in any other mode. In fact, absurd as commercial monopoly would be, where law and authority exist to repress the mischievous effects which might spring from unbounded rivalry, and to give to such rivalry salutary consequences, just in the same degree would it be wise and advantageous to carry on the trade under consideration by an incorporated company. A nation discovers its wisdom no less in departing from general maxims, where it is no longer wise to adhere to them, than in its adherence to them in ordinary circumstances. In fact, it evinces a greater effort of reason. The first advance of a nation is marked by the establishment of maxims which are deemed universal, but which further experience and reflection teach to be only general, admitting of occasional modifications and exceptions.

Should the House, however, not adopt these views, but prefer to open the trade to the enterprise of single individuals, or such associations as might be formed for the purpose, I would suggest the provisions already proposed for the trade with the neighboring tribes of Indians as the most advisable, with the exception of the provisions which require the trader to be located, and that regular books of sales and purchases should be kept. In lieu of which provisions, I would propose that the goods intended for this branch of Indian trade, and the articles acquired by purchase from the Indians, should be entered under oath, (the former with a copy of the invoice, and the latter with a statement of prices,) with the Indian agent at Mackinaw, St. Louis, Belle Point, on the Arkansas river, or Natchitoches on Red river, or such other places as the President may designate.

The entry can be made without much inconvenience to the trader, as the geography of the country is such as to make it necessary for the trade to pass by one or the other of the points proposed, at each of which there is now an agent.

It is believed that these provisions would be as effectual as any that can be devised, short of a company incorporated for the purpose; but it is proper to observe that they are open to the objections which have already been stated. In fact, they equally apply to any system, so long as the trade is exposed to the effects which must flow from the jealous rivalry of independent traders, where law and authority cannot step in to restrain its consequences within proper bounds. The Indians themselves are not the proper judges of their own interests, and, so far from restraining the effects of such rivalry, they would become the instruments of the most cunning and vicious of the traders, to wreak their vengeance on such as might stand in the way of their profits.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

[2d SESSION.]

ALTERATION OF THE SYSTEM FOR TRADING WITH THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 15, 1819.

Mr. HENRY SOUTHARD, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to Indian affairs, reported:

That they have considered the subject to them referred with that attention and solicitude which the importance of it demands, both with regard to the peace and future happiness of those savage tribes, and the safety and permanent security of the citizens of the United States.

Your committee have examined the several laws of the United States, from the commencement of the Government to this time; the primary object of which appears to have been to cultivate peace and amity with the Indian tribes on our frontiers, by establishing trading-houses or posts convenient to their settlements, so as to supply them with such articles of trade as their necessities required in exchange for their peltry and furs.

This trade has been carried on for more than forty years, with alternate loss and gain. The sums of money that have been appropriated by the several acts of Congress, as a fund for carrying on said commerce, have amounted, in the whole, to $300,000, exclusive of the sum of $20,000 annually drawn from the treasury of the United States for the payment of superintendent, agents, clerks, &c.

It is deemed unnecessary to exhibit a detailed and particular statement of the increase or diminution of the capital of this establishment at the respective periods at which they have taken place; it is sufficient to state that, previous to and during the late war with Great Britain, at the respective agencies, in the whole we sustained a loss, by the destruction and ravages of the enemy, to the amount of $44,538 36. After the ratification of the treaty of peace with England, on the 1st of April, 1815, the value of the capital in stock, fur, and property on hand, was stated to amount to $273,989 03. On the 30th of June, 1818, it is estimated at $308,536 37. The gain arising from the prosecution of the trade from 1st of April, 1815, to 30th of June, 1818, is $34,547 34.

Although these establishments have been a pecuniary loss to the United States, in some respects, yet no doubt is entertained that, on the whole, they have been of great advantage, not only on the score of humanity to the Indian tribes, but also in preserving the lives and property of our frontier inhabitants, which would otherwise, under the influence of foreign traders, have been in hostile array against us; and, no doubt, this policy has much weakened the power and force of those nations that have been at war with us.

Notwithstanding the committee are sensible that much good has been done by the partial system now in operation, they are induced to believe that it is susceptible of great improvement on the present plan; but, from the importance of the subject in its various bearings and consequences, they believe that more extensive and energetic measures ought to be adopted by Government to effect the humane and benevolent purposes of Congress, and meet the ardent wishes of the people of the United States, as manifested by the various memorials presented to the National Legislature, and which have been referred to the committee.

From these sources of information, which have been drawn from the experimental knowledge of several religious societies and associations of friends, who, at their own expense, and by their unwearied exertions, have done much to ameliorate the distressed condition of those wretched inhabitants of the forest, little or no doubt remains of the policy and practicability of improving the friendly Indians in agriculture, manufacture, education, and all the arts of civilized life; and, at the same time, of teaching the hostile tribes that their safety, interest, and happiness will be promoted by cultivating peace and amity with us.

Under the existing regulations, the United States have sustained great injury by foreigners and improper characters having been licensed to trade on their own account, with little or no responsibility to any Government; and a kind of peddling traders, without license, vending their wares and ardent spirits, to the great injury not only of the savages, but to the peace and safety of our frontier inhabitants.

Your committee have paid due attention to the report of the Secretary of War, made the 8th day of December, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th day of April last, [see No. 157;] and, having considered the system now in force, and compared it with the principles contained in said report, are of opinion that a more energetic and extensive system is necessary to improve the various Indian tribes in agriculture, education, and civilization, and, at the same time, secure the interest and safety of the citizens of the United States. In order to promote these desirable objects, the committee beg leave to report several bills.

[2d SESSION.

CLAIM OF THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 18, 1819.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 16, 1819.

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, directing the Secretary of War "to lay before the House such information as he may possess respecting the adjustment of the claims of the friendly Creek Indians, made in consideration of their treaty with the United States of the 9th August, 1814," I have the honor to transmit a copy of a letter addressed by General D. B. Mitchell, agent to the Creek Indians, to this Department, accompanied by a statement of the sums paid by him to satisfy the claims of the friendly Creek Indians for the property destroyed by the hostile Creek Indians during the war which was terminated by the treaty of the 9th of August, 1814; and an extract of a letter addressed by the War Department to General Mitchell; which contain all the information in possession of the Department on that subject.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

SIR:

CREEK AGENCY, March 18, 1818.

I have now the honor to enclose a concise statement of the accounts presented by the friendly Indians for losses during the late war, and of the application of the sum appropriated by Congress for their payment, by which it appears that a little upwards of $100,000 is still due.

The gross amount of claims presented, including the abstract made by Colonel Hawkins, is very little over or under $300,000; but they were reduced by the chiefs to $195,417 90. A general abstract of the whole will be forwarded as soon as completed.

Eighty-three thousand dollars of the amount appropriated having been remitted in drafts upon the United States Bank in Philadelphia, I went to Savannah, and presented them to the officers of the branch of that bank established there, but they refused to take them up. I then returned and consulted the chiefs, and they agreed to allow two and a half per cent., that being the lowest rate of exchange between Philadelphia and Savannah, or Augusta, at that time, rather than be delayed, or risk the conveyance of so large a sum by an agent. The remaining $2,000 was paid to McIntosh in Washington.

I am yours, &c.

D. B. MITCHELL, Agent for Indian Affairs.

TREATY WITH THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 2, 1819.

*To the Senate of the United States:*WASHINGTON, March 2, 1819.

A convention having been concluded between John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, especially authorized therefor by me, and the chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation of Indians, likewise duly authorized and empowered by said nation, I now lay the original instrument before the Senate for the exercise of its constitutional power respecting the ratification thereof.

JAMES MONROE.

TREATY WITH THE CHEROKEES.

Articles of a convention made between John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, being especially authorized therefor by the President of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation of Indians, duly authorized and empowered by said nation, at the city of Washington, on the twenty-seventh day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nineteen.

Whereas, a greater part of the Cherokee nation have expressed an earnest desire to remain on this side of the Mississippi, and being desirous, in order to commence those measures which they deem necessary to the civilization and preservation of their nation, that the treaty between the United States and them, signed the eighth of July, eighteen hundred and seventeen, might, without further delay, or the trouble or expense of taking the census, as stipulated in the said treaty, be finally adjusted, have offered to cede to the United States a tract of country at least as extensive as that which they probably are entitled to under its provisions, the contracting parties have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The Cherokee nation cedes to the United States all of their lands lying north and east of the following line, viz: Beginning on the Tennessee river, at the point where the Cherokee boundary with Madison county, in the Alabama Territory, joins the same; thence, along the main channel of said river, to the mouth of the Hiwassee; thence, along its main channel, to the first hill which closes in on said river, about two miles above Hiwassee Old Town; thence, along the ridge which divides the waters of the Hiwassee and Little Tellico, to the Tennessee river, at Tallassee; thence, along the main channel, to the junction of the Cowee and Nantagulee; thence, along the ridge in the fork of said river, to the top of the Blue Ridge; thence, along the Blue Ridge, to the

* Eighty-three thousand dollars of the money having been remitted in drafts upon the United States Bank in Philadelphia, and the branch of that bank in Savannah refusing to pay them, this charge arose from the difference of exchange between Savannah and Augusta and Philadelphia at that time, and has been allowed by the chiefs, rather than be delayed, or run the risk of conveyance by an agent.

† When the first payments were made, it was necessary, as the claims were not all received at that time, and the amount was much greater than the sum appropriated, to adopt some rule of proportion in making the payment; two-fifths was finally determined upon; and this sum is the balance, after paying two-fifths of the whole claims liquidated; and, as some cases have occurred which merit attention, but were excluded in consequence of the limitation, this amount has been set apart to relieve them by general consent.

Unicoy turnpike road; thence, by a straight line, to the nearest main source of the Chestatee; thence, along its main channel, to the Chatahoochee; and thence to the Creek boundary: it being understood that all the islands in the Chestatee, and the parts of the Tennessee and Hiwassee (with the exception of Jolly's island, in the Tennessee, near the mouth of the Hiwassee,) which constitute a portion of the present boundary, belong to the Cherokee nation: and it is also understood that the reservations contained in the second article of the treaty of Tellico, signed the twenty-fifth day of October, eighteen hundred and five, and a tract equal to twelve miles square, to be located by commencing at the point formed by the intersection of the boundary line of Madison county already mentioned, and the north bank of the Tennessee river; thence, along the said line, and up the said river twelve miles, are ceded to the United States in trust for the Cherokee nation as a school fund; to be sold by the United States, and the proceeds vested as is hereafter provided in the fourth article of this treaty; and, also, that the rights vested in the Unicoy turnpike company by the Cherokee nation, according to certified copies of the instruments securing the rights, and herewith annexed, are not to be affected by this treaty. And it is further understood and agreed by the said parties that the lands hereby ceded by the Cherokee nation, are in full satisfaction of all claims which the United States have on them, on account of the cession to a part of their nation who have or may hereafter emigrate to the Arkansas; and this treaty is a final adjustment of that of the eighth of July, eighteen hundred and seventeen.

ART. 2. The United States agree to pay, according to the stipulations contained in the treaty of the eighth of July, eighteen hundred and seventeen, for all improvements on land lying within the country ceded by the Cherokees which add real value to the land; and do agree to allow a reservation of six hundred and forty acres to each head of any Indian family residing within the ceded territory (those enrolled for the Arkansas excepted) who choose to become citizens of the United States in the manner stipulated in said treaty.

ART. 3. It is also understood and agreed by the contracting parties, that a reservation, in fee-simple, of six hundred and forty acres square, (with the exception of Major Walker's, which is to be located as is hereafter provided,) to include their improvements, and which are to be as near the centre thereof as possible, shall be made to each of the persons whose names are inscribed on the certified list annexed to this treaty, all of whom are believed to be persons of industry, and capable of managing their property with discretion, and have, with few exceptions, made considerable improvements on the tracts reserved. The reservations are made on the condition that those for whom they are intended shall notify, in writing, to the agent for the Cherokee nation, within six months after the ratification of this treaty, that it is their intention to continue to reside permanently on the land reserved.

The reservation for Lewis Ross so to be laid off as to include his house, and out-buildings, and ferry adjoining the Cherokee agency, reserving to the United States all the public property there, and the continuance of the said agency where it now is, during the pleasure of the Government; and Major Walker's, so as to include his dwelling-house and ferry: for Major Walker an additional reservation is made of six hundred and forty acres square, to include his grist and saw-mill: the land is poor, and principally valuable for its timber. In addition to the above reservations, the following are made, in fee-simple; the persons for whom they are intended not residing on the same: To Cabbin Smith, six hundred and forty acres, to be laid off in equal parts, on both sides of his ferry on Tellico, commonly called Blair's ferry; to John Ross, six hundred and forty acres, to be laid off so as to include the Big island, in Tennessee river, being the first below Tellico—which tracts of land were given, many years since, by the Cherokee nation to them; to Mrs. Eliza Ross, step-daughter of Major Walker, six hundred and forty acres square, to be located on the river below and adjoining Major Walker's; to Margaret Morgan, six hundred and forty acres square, to be located on the west of, and adjoining, James Riley's reservation; to George Harlin, six hundred and forty acres square, to be located west of, and adjoining, the reservation of Margaret Morgan; to James Lowry, six hundred and forty acres square, to be located at Crow Mocker's old place, at the foot of Cumberland mountain; to Susannah Lowry, six hundred and forty acres, to be located at the toll bridge on Battle creek; to Nicholas Byers, six hundred and forty acres, including the Toqua island, to be located on the north bank of the Tennessee, opposite to said island.

ART. 4. The United States stipulate that the reservations, and the tract reserved for a school fund, in the first article of this treaty, shall be surveyed and sold in the same manner, and on the same terms, with the public lands of the United States, and the proceeds vested, under the direction of the President of the United States, in the stock of the United States, or such other stock as he may deem most advantageous to the Cherokee nation. The interest or dividend on said stock shall be applied, under his direction, in the manner which he shall judge best calculated to diffuse the benefits of education among the Cherokee nation on this side of the Mississippi.

ART. 5. It is agreed that such boundary lines as may be necessary to designate the lands ceded by the first article of this treaty may be run by a commissioner or commissioners, to be appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be accompanied by such commissioners as the Cherokees may appoint, due notice thereof to be given to the nation; and that the leases which have been made under the treaty of the eighth of July, eighteen hundred and seventeen, of land lying within the portion of country reserved to the Cherokees, to be void; and that all white people who have intruded, or may hereafter intrude, on the lands reserved for the Cherokees, shall be removed by the United States, and proceeded against according to the provisions of the act passed thirtieth of March, eighteen hundred and two, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers."

ART. 6. The contracting parties agree that the annuity to the Cherokee nation shall be paid, two-thirds to the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, and one-third to the Cherokees west of that river, as it is estimated that those who have emigrated, and who have enrolled for emigration, constitute one-third of the whole nation; but, if the Cherokees west of the Mississippi object to this distribution, of which due notice shall be given them before the expiration of one year after the ratification of this treaty, then the census, solely for distributing the annuity, shall be taken at such times and in such manner as the President of the United States may designate.

ART. 7. The United States, in order to afford the Cherokees who reside on the lands ceded by this treaty time to cultivate their crop next summer, and for those who do not choose to take reservations to remove, bind themselves to prevent the intrusion of their citizens on the ceded land before the first of January next.

ART. 8. This treaty to be binding on the contracting parties so soon as it is ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Done at the place and on the day and year above written.

J. C. CALHOUN.

CHARLES HICKS.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 11, 1819.

In order to avoid mistakes, and to present my views more fully on some of the points which were touched on at our last interview, I have judged it proper to make the following written communication.

The Cherokees to make a cession in proportion to the estimated number of their nation on the Arkansas and the emigrants who are enrolled to go there. The United States prefer the cession to be made in the States of Tennessee and Georgia; and, in the latter State, it would be desirable that it should be made as near and convenient to the present settlements in Georgia as possible.

The reservation which the Cherokees wish to make of a portion of their land for a school fund, must be in the Alabama Territory, as the cession which will be made in Georgia will belong to that State, and that which may be made in Tennessee will be subject to the location of the warrants granted by the State of North Carolina. It is also understood that the reservation so to be made is not to constitute any part of that portion of land which the Cherokees may cede in conformity to the principle which is contained in the preceding paragraph, but is to be made in addition to such cession, as it will be wholly for the benefit of the Cherokee nation.

The United States will extend its kindness and protection to both branches of the Cherokee nation—to that which is west as well as that which may choose to continue to the east of the Mississippi; but as the Cherokees on the Arkansas are unrepresented, no particular stipulation in regard to them can be binding, and therefore must be waived. The land which has been granted to them on the Arkansas they will hold in the same manner, and by the same title, by which the Cherokees now hold theirs.

It is understood that the delegation, in behalf of their nation, wish to strengthen the guaranty of that portion of the land which may be left to them after making the proposed cessions, so that it may be to them a permanent and lasting home, without further cessions. To secure such great benefits, it is indispensable that the cessions which they may make should be ample, and the part reserved to themselves should not be larger than is necessary for their wants and convenience. Should a larger quantity be retained, it will not be possible, by any stipulation in the treaty, to prevent future cessions. So long as you may retain more land than what is necessary or convenient to yourselves, you will feel inclined to sell, and the United States to purchase. The truth of what I say you know cannot be doubted, as your own experience, and that of all Indian nations, proves it to be true. If, on the contrary, you only retain a suitable quantity, no more cessions will be asked for or made, and they will be settled down permanently. You are now becoming like the white people; you can no longer live by hunting, but must work for your subsistence. In your new condition, far less land is necessary for you. Your great object ought to be to hold your land separate among yourselves, as your white neighbors; and to live and bring up your children in the same way as they do, and gradually to adopt their laws and manners. It is thus only that you can be prosperous and happy. Without this, you will find you will have to emigrate, or become extinct as a people. You see that the Great Spirit has made our form of society stronger than yours, and you must submit to adopt ours, if you wish to be happy by pleasing him. I believe you know what is right, and feel disposed to do it; and it is our wish that you should be happy and prosperous. We take an interest in your fate, as you were the first proprietors of this happy country, and are our near neighbors; but it is proper you should put confidence in our Government, and take the advice which is offered sincerely for your good.

I am, respectfully, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the CHEROKEE DELEGATION.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 22, 1819.

I transmit you propositions on which I am willing to close the treaty of the 8th July, 1817. The session of Congress is drawing to a close, and it is desirable that the treaty should be formed as soon as practicable, so as to have it ratified by the Senate before the adjournment of Congress. If you are willing to adopt the terms proposed, they can be reduced to form immediately, and the treaty be signed to-morrow or next day.

I am, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

The CHEROKEE DELEGATION.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 6, 1819.

I have the pleasure to inform you that a treaty has been concluded with the Cherokee delegation, which it is hoped will be satisfactory to all parties; and you are requested, as no further encouragement will be given to the emigrations to the Arkansas, to take immediate measures to wind up the business in which you have been engaged under the former treaty, in the most economical manner.

Your communications, which were intended to be here before the delegation, did not reach the Department until after the arrangement was made; but it is believed that it has been made on the best terms that could be effected. So soon as the treaty is printed, you will be furnished with a copy.

I will thank you to furnish a statement of your expenditures, in order that I may know the state of the appropriation to carry into effect the Cherokee treaty; and you will also furnish an estimate of the sums necessary to close the business.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Governor JOSEPH McMINN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 9, 1819.

I enclose a copy of a letter written by Captain Hicks, of the Cherokee nation on the Tennessee, to Colonel Meigs, their agent, who has submitted it to this Department. It is not the wish of the Department to interfere with the Cherokees on the east and west of the Mississippi, on the subject to which this communication refers; but as it is probable the former will make a representation to the latter, with a view to procure an arrangement on this point, I have to request that you will use your endeavors to induce them to make such a one as may be just and equitable.

A treaty has been concluded with the Cherokee delegation at the seat of Government, and I enclose you a copy of the sixth article, which relates to a division of the annuity, of which you are requested to give them notice; and, if objections are made, to enter into such explanations on the subject as you may think necessary to satisfy them as to the justice of the distribution; and inform this Department of their decision.

A copy of the treaty will be sent to you after it is published.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

REUBEN LEWIS, Indian Agent on the Arkansas.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 11, 1819.

The President has thought it best to suspend the running of the line between East Florida and the State of Georgia, of which you were informed on the 2d instant; and I now enclose a copy of a letter to the Governor of that State, which details the reasons for this order.

A treaty has been made with the Cherokee nation, which requires the lines necessary to designate the lands thereby ceded to be run by a commissioner; and for the purpose of running that part of said line which is within the State of Georgia, commencing at the point where the Unicoy turnpike road crosses the Blue Ridge, to the nearest main source of the Chestatee, and to lay off the reservations which are within the limits of that State, you are hereby vested with the same power and authority as were given to you by your commission and instructions of the 4th of August last to run the lines under the treaty with the Creek nation.

You will be allowed at the rate of eight dollars a day, while engaged in running the line; and, as a compensation in full for your services in locating the reservations, an allowance equal to the usual surveying fees will be made.

With respect to the reservations, you will correspond with Colonel Meigs, the Cherokee agent, as it will be necessary to lay off those only which are accepted by the persons for whom they are intended. Should it be inconvenient for you to attend to this part of the duty assigned you, you are authorized to employ a surveyor to locate the reservations, who will be allowed the customary fees of surveyors.

I enclose a National Intelligencer, containing the treaty, which more particularly designates the duties required of you.

The sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) will be remitted to you, on account, by the Treasurer. The usual accounts and vouchers must be rendered for settlement.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILSON LUMPKIN, Commissioner, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 12, 1819.

I have the honor to enclose you a commission from the President of the United States, appointing you a commissioner "to run that part of the line described in the first article of the treaty concluded with the Cherokee nation on the 27th ultimo which is within the State of Tennessee, commencing on the Hiwassee, about two miles above Hiwassee Old Town; thence, to the Tennessee, and from between the forks of the Nantagulee, to the top of the Blue Ridge; and to lay off the tracts reserved within the limits of that State." It is thought unnecessary to make the line along the Blue Ridge.

In addition to the duties required of you by the commission, you are requested to lay off, also, the tracts reserved in North Carolina and the Alabama Territory.

You will be allowed at the rate of eight dollars a day, while engaged in running the line; and, as a full compensation for your services in locating the reservations, an allowance equal to the usual surveying fees will be made.

On the subject of the reservations, you are requested to correspond with Colonel Meigs, the Cherokee agent, as it will be necessary to lay off those only which are accepted by the persons for whom they are intended. Should it be inconvenient for you to attend to this part of the duty assigned you, you are authorized to employ a surveyor to locate the reservations as well within the limits of the Alabama Territory and North Carolina, as within those of Tennessee, who will be allowed the customary fees of surveyors.

I enclose a National Intelligencer, containing the treaty, which more particularly designates the duties required of you.

The sum of $1,000 will be remitted to you, on account, by the Treasurer. The usual accounts and vouchers will be rendered for settlement.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

P. S. Should the assistance of a surveyor in running the line be necessary, you are authorized to employ one, and as many chain and axemen as may be required, at a rate of compensation not exceeding five dollars a day for the former, and two dollars a day for each of the latter, in full for their services.

ROBERT HOUSTON, Commissioner, &c., Knoxville, Tennessee.

SIR:

KNOXVILLE, May 4, 1819.

I am appointed by the President of the United States to run part of the lines described in the late treaty made with the Cherokee nation, to wit: From the first hill which closes in on Hiwassee river, about two miles above Hiwassee Old Town; thence, along the ridge which divides the waters of the Hiwassee and Little Tellico, to the Tennessee river at Tallassee; and from the junction of the Cowee and Nantagulee, along the ridge in the fork of said river, to the top of the Blue Ridge.

I am very desirous that the nation appoint commissioners, agreeably to the terms of said treaty, on their part, to accompany me in the running and designating those lines above mentioned; which appointment I hope you will cause to be made immediately—the sooner the better, so that we may proceed before the weather grows too warm. I would name the 25th of this instant as a proper time to meet at some point as near the place of beginning (Hiwassee Old Town) as would be convenient. You will appoint some good pilot, well acquainted with the ridges, hills, mountains, watercourses, &c.

You will also furnish two good packhorses, to carry provisions and baggage, and a packhorse man to attend the commissioners.

The bearer of this letter (Colonel John McNair) is employed as an express, and will wait for your answer. I hope that he will not be detained, but his business despatched as soon as possible, so that he can return with your letter to me on this subject in time to fix for the trip. All expenses will be paid by the United States.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

R. HOUSTON.

Captain CHARLES HICKS, Cherokee Council.

SIR:

NEAR FORTVILLE, CHEROKEE NATION, May 10, 1819.

Your letter by Colonel McNair, notifying me that you have been appointed by the President to run part of the lines described in the late treaty, I have received. Agreeably to your request, the chiefs in council have appointed commissioners on the part of the nation to accompany you in running the lines, also two packhorses and a packhorse man, together with pilots. James McIntosh and Tesguice are the commissioners appointed to accompany you from the place of beginning, on Hiwassee, to Tallassee. The Crow is appointed as a pilot for that line, and Tallascasee as a packhorse man. Tesguice and the pilot will return from Tallassee, and McIntosh and the packhorse man will continue with you the balance of the road. On your arrival at the fork of the Cowee and Nantagulee, Willie and Choonstoolee, will join you—the former as a commissioner, and the latter as a pilot. The 25th of this month (the time chosen by yourself) the commissioners will meet you at Hiwassee Old Town, in readiness for the expedition.

I am, sir, your very obedient servant,

CHARLES HICKS.
PATH KILLER, his × mark.

ROBERT HOUSTON, Esq., Knox County, Tennessee.

It appears from the statement of James McIntosh, the commissioner, that, after Colonel McNair had left the council with the foregoing letter, a new arrangement was made, to wit: Crow appointed commissioner from Hiwassee to the forks of the river at Cowee, who acted as such to that place. Tesguice, alias Squire, for the same. James McIntosh interpreter as well as commissioner. Choonstoolee as a pilot from the place of beginning to the top of the Blue Ridge, who acted as such for the whole line. Seterwahr assistant pilot, who acted as such from near the Tellico plains to the said forks of the river. Willie, alias William Jones, from the forks of the river aforesaid to the top of the Blue Ridge. I gave to each of them a certificate of their performance of duty, naming the capacity that they acted in, with the number of days they were employed, and the number of days necessary for their travel home, stating in said certificate that the usual allowance would be paid to them for their services.

Squire,	commissioner,	24 days,	dismissed 12th June, 1819.
Crow,	do.	24 days,	12th do.
William Jones,	do.	9 days,	18th do.
James McIntosh,	commissioner and interpreter,	33 days,	22d do.

R. HOUSTON, Commissioner.

We, the undersigned, commissioners duly authorized on behalf of the United States and the Cherokee nation to run part of the lines described in the late treaty concluded at Washington City with said nation upon the 27th day of February, 1819, have, pursuant to our authority, and conformably to the terms of said treaty, designated the line from the first hill which closes on Hiwassee river, about two miles and one-half above Hiwassee Old Town, to Tennessee river at Tallassee, as was practicable, (there being no ridge or mountain to be found dividing the waters of Tellico from those of Hiwassee to Tennessee river at Tallassee, as mentioned in said treaty,) in the following manner, measuring the distance, notching the sight trees with two notches fore and aft, side lines well blazed, and the mile trees marked in progressive order:

Beginning at a large white oak on the river bank, about two and one-half miles above Hiwassee Old Town, where the first hill closes in on Hiwassee river, north, four degrees west, from the upper point of a small island in said river, marked on the northwest side U. S., on the southeast C. SIR:

KNOXVILLE, July 30, 1819.

Herewith you will find enclosed to you a map of the late Cherokee treaty, as run from Hiwassee to Tennessee river, at Tallassee, and from the junction of the Cowee and Nantagulee to the top of the Blue Ridge, with a description of each line; also, an abstract and vouchers of the expenses incurred.

The lines are accurately laid down as run and designated. We travelled from Tallassee up the Tennessee river, took the general bearings of said river to the forks, (where the upper line commences,) computed the distance by the time it took us to travel the same, which I presume is nearly correct. The other parts of the map are drawn from our own knowledge of the country, and the best information we could get from the natives. The lands, exclusive of the mountains within the State of Tennessee, and between the Hiwassee and Tennessee rivers, are represented to be about second quality. The lands north of the line dividing the Cowee and Nantagulee waters, and within the chartered limits of North Carolina, are considered poor, and almost a perfect bed of mountains. It is supposed that there are now residing on those lands nearly two thousand Indians, great and small.

Upon the settlement of my account there will be due to the United States $23 67, which sum may be placed to my debit on account of outstanding claims against the quartermaster's department in East Tennessee, or otherwise.

There being no quartermaster's store at this place to deposite our camp equipage, what must be done with it?

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. HOUSTON.

J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War, Washington.

No. 161.

For the use of the children of Bowkowitz, six hundred and forty acres, on the Kawkawling river.

ART. 4. In consideration of the cession aforesaid, the United States agree to pay to the Chippewa nation of Indians, annually, forever, the sum of one thousand dollars in silver; and do also agree that all annuities due by any former treaty to the said tribe shall be hereafter paid in silver.

ART. 5. The stipulation contained in the treaty of Greenville, relative to the right of the Indians to hunt upon the land ceded, while it continues the property of the United States, shall apply to this treaty; and the Indians shall for the same term enjoy the privilege of making sugar upon the same land, committing no unnecessary waste upon the trees.

ART. 8. The United States engage to provide and support a blacksmith for the Indians at Saginaw, so long as the President of the United States may think proper, and to furnish the Chippewa Indians with such farming utensils and cattle, and to employ such persons to aid them in their agriculture, as the President may deem expedient.

ART. 9. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the said Lewis Cass, commissioner as aforesaid, and the chiefs and warriors of the Chippewa nation of Indians, have hereunto set their hands, at Saginaw, in the Territory of Michigan, this twenty-fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nineteen.

LEWIS CASS.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and warriors of the Chippewa nation.]

SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.

The Chippewa Indians, being desirous to reward Dr. William Brown, of Detroit, for the professional services which he has rendered to them for twenty years past, request that three sections of land may be granted to him and his heirs in the tract of country hereby ceded.

The same request was urged at the treaty of Detroit, in the year 1807; at the treaty concluded at the foot of the Rapids of the Miami, in the year 1817; and at the treaty of St. Mary's, in the year 1818; and is now renewed by them, in the confident hope that the land herein granted will be confirmed to him.

The Chippewa Indians do also grant to Henry Conner and to James Conner, who were taken prisoners by them in early life, and lived with them many years, and to their heirs, twelve hundred and eighty acres of land.

The said Indians do also grant to Peter W. Knaggs, George Knaggs, and Jacques Godfroy, who have been adopted by them, and to their heirs, six hundred and forty acres of land, each.

The said Indians have further requested that twelve sections of land be sold in the same manner and upon the same terms as the lands of the United States are sold, and the proceeds appropriated, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the purpose of making roads to and through their reservations.

The said Indians have also requested that the sum of $1,600 be paid, in five equal annual instalments, to Barnabas Campeau, out of the annuities which may hereafter be due to them.

The Chippewa Indians have also requested that the sum of $1,298 20 be paid to Conrad Ten Eyck, as a compensation for property taken by them at Saginaw, in the year 1812.

The commissioner of the United States has admitted these grants and requests into this article; but, not being authorized to accede to them on the part of the United States, he refers the same to the President of the United States, and to the Senate thereof, for their decision. But it is hereby expressly understood and declared, that the ratification or rejection of this article, or any part thereof, is not to affect any other article of this treaty.

LEWIS CASS.

ARTICLE 1. The chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the said tribe agree to cede, and hereby relinquish, to the United States, all the lands which the said tribe have heretofore possessed, or which they may rightfully claim, on the Wabash river, or any of its waters.

ART. 2. And, to the end that the United States may be enabled to fix with the other Indian tribes a boundary between their respective claims, the chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the said tribe do hereby declare that their rightful claim is as follows, viz: Beginning at the northwest corner of the Vincennes tract; thence, westwardly, by the boundary established by a treaty with the Piankeshaws on the thirtieth day of December, eighteen hundred and five, to the dividing ridge between the waters of the Embarras and the Little Wabash; thence, by the said ridge, to the source of the Vermilion river; thence, by the same ridge, to the head of Pine creek; thence, by the said creek, to the Wabash river; thence, by the said river, to the mouth of the Vermilion river; and thence, by the Vermilion, and the boundary heretofore established, to the place of beginning.

ART. 3. The said chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the said tribe agree to relinquish, and they do hereby exonerate and discharge the United States from, the annuity of one thousand dollars to which they are now entitled. In consideration whereof, and of the cession hereby made, the United States agree to pay the said tribe two thousand dollars, annually, in specie, for ten years; which, together with three thousand dollars now delivered, is to be considered a full compensation for the cession hereby made, as also of all annuities, or other claims, of the said tribe against the United States, by virtue of any treaty with the said United States.

ART. 4. As the said tribe contemplate removing from the country they now occupy, the annuity herein provided for shall be paid at such place as may be hereafter agreed upon between the United States and said tribe.

ART. 5. This treaty, after the same shall be ratified by the President and Senate of the United States, shall be binding on the contracting parties.

In testimony whereof, the said Benjamin Parke, commissioner as aforesaid, and the chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the said tribe, have hereunto set their hands, at Fort Harrison, the thirtieth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen.

All their land on the southeast side of the Wabash river, including the principal village in which their ancestors formerly resided, consisting of a large tract, to which they have had, from time immemorial, and now have, a just right, that they have never heretofore ceded, or otherwise disposed of, in any manner whatever.

Also, all the land within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning on the Wabash river, at the upper point of their cession, made by the second article of their treaty at Vincennes, on the ninth of December, one thousand eight hundred and nine; running thence, northwestwardly, to the dividing line between the States of Illinois and Indiana; thence, along said line, to the Kankakee river; thence, with said river, to the Illinois river; thence, down the latter, to its mouth; thence, with a direct line, to the northwest corner of the Vincennes tract, as recognised in the treaty with the Piankeshaw tribe of Indians, at Vincennes, on the thirtieth of December, one thousand eight hundred and five; and thence, with the western and northern boundaries of the cessions heretofore made by the said Kickapoo tribe of Indians, to the beginning. ART. 2. The said tribe hereby confirm all their former treaties with the United States, and relinquish to them all claim to every portion of their lands which may have been ceded by any other tribe or tribes, and all and every demand which they might have had in consequence of the second article of the treaty made with the Pattawatamic nation of Indians, at St. Mary's, on the second of October, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

ART. 3. The said tribe acknowledge themselves now to be, and promise to continue, under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other nation, power, or sovereign whatever.

mitted to pass and repass through the said tract, and to navigate the waters thereof, without any hindrance, toll, or exaction from the said tribe.

ART. 8. For the purpose of facilitating the removal of the said tribe to the tract of land hereby ceded to them, the United States will furnish them with two boats, well manned, to transport their property from any point they may designate on the Illinois river; and some judicious citizen shall be selected to accompany them in their passage through the white settlements to their intended residence.

ART. 9. The United States will take the said Kickapoo tribe under their care and patronage, and will afford them protection against all persons whatever, provided they conform to the laws of the United States, and refrain from making war, or giving any insult or offence to any other Indian tribe, or to any foreign nation, without first obtaining the approbation and consent of the United States.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and warriors of the Kickapoo tribe.]

Sir:

VINCENNES, April 15, 1819.

Understanding, from a communication made to me by Judge Parke some short time since, that it was desirable that the Indian title to the country inhabited by the Vermilion Kickapoos should be extinguished, I have lately paid them a visit to ascertain the probable success, should a proposition of the kind be made to them; and, from every thing I have been able to discover, I think there is but little doubt of a successful negotiation being made with them in the course of this summer. I have, in order to secure this object, expended, in a few horses and other presents to the most influential men of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, between two and three hundred dollars, and which is included in the account of James B. McCall of the 11th instant.

I have also had in the employ of the Indian department a half-blood for two months past, at $1 per day. My object in employing this man has been to discover the situation of some copper and lead mines upon the Vermilion river and Pine creek; the former is found in great abundance, and of good quality; the latter is to be found, but in what quantity is not ascertained. Some time since, three Indians of the Delawares killed a Mr. McCall, a resident of the State of Illinois. The Indians are now in confinement, and will be tried in two or three weeks; and, from all the circumstances which I have been enabled to collect, I fear there is but little chance of their acquittal—at least two of them. One of their principal chiefs is now with me, and will attend their trial. Your favors of the 19th and 25th ult. were brought me by the last mail. It appears that from General Wayne's treaty of 1795, the Kickapoos are entitled to an annuity of $500; by General Harrison's treaty at Fort Wayne, 30th September, 1809, it was stipulated that they should be entitled to a further sum of $400 when that article in the treaty which related to the Kickapoos, for a portion of the Vermilion country, should be acceded to; and by the accession of said treaty, on the 9th December, 1809, an additional sum of $100 was allowed them, making a sum total of $1,000; and as I am authorized to draw upon you for $500 only, and as in the late treaty of St. Mary's there is no stipulation that their annuity should be paid in silver, I shall make up the $1,000 out of the United States goods at Fort Harrison, and, at the time I shall deliver the Wea annuity of $3,000 to them, will also obtain the Kickapoos' receipt for their annuity of $1,000. With respect to the issues to the Indian department at Fort Harrison for the years 1816, 1817, and for part of 1818, I am not yet prepared to make a report; I shall complete that investigation in a few days.

I, however, risk nothing when I say that perhaps not more than one-half the provisions contained on the abstracts (of that quantity) were really issued. I shall use all the economy possible, as well in the distribution of the Indian annuities, as at other times, in this agency; but, from the extravagance of this agency heretofore, it will require some little time to bring it to a proper medium.

I have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM PRINCE.

Sir:

EDWARDSVILLE, ILLINOIS, June 7, 1819.

In compliance with your instructions, we have held a council at this place with the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, upon whose minds impressions very favorable to the propositions we were authorized to make to them, had been produced by the artful, insidious representations of certain traders, who were amongst them last winter, and whose object evidently was, from interested motives, to prevent their removal to the west side of the Mississippi. We, however, have been so fortunate in removing those impressions, as to render them not only willing but anxious to make the proposed exchange. And, for the purpose of consummating the arrangement, they have promised to meet us at this place in eight or ten weeks.

But we feel it our duty to apprise you of a difficulty that probably will occur, which will be much more within your than our control, and which may, indeed, require efficient interposition on the part of the Government.

The Pattawatamies, who are neighbors to the Kickapoos, instigated, no doubt, by white men, and unwilling to see our settlements approximate to theirs, (as they think they will soon do if the latter cede their land,) have, by every kind of menace, endeavored to deter the Kickapoos from entering into any agreement with us; and they openly declare that, the moment the Kickapoos commence their removal to the west side of the Mississippi, they will waylay, attack, plunder, and murder them; and we are not without some apprehensions that they may attempt to carry their threat into execution. We shall, however, endeavor to conciliate them, and earnestly warn them of the danger of opposing the views of our Government in this particular. But if all this should prove insufficient, what next is to be done is for you to decide.

We are, &c.

AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU,
BENJAMIN STEPHENSON.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 16, 1819.

I have received your letter of the 7th ult. It is gratifying that you have so far succeeded in accomplishing the object of your commission as to obtain the consent of the Kickapoos to remove west of the Mississippi.

It is to be hoped that the Pattawatamies will not be so indiscreet as to attempt to execute their threats upon the Kickapoos, on their removal across the Mississippi. Should they, however, oppose the movement in that way, it will be considered an act highly unfriendly to the United States, and will be noticed accordingly.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU and } BENJAMIN STEPHENSON, } Commissioners, &c., St. Louis.

SIR:

VINCENNES, August 10, 1819.

There is now every reason to believe that the Vermilion Kickapoos will accede to the Pattawatamie cession of the 2d of October last, and also cede all the lands to which they have any claim in this and the adjoining State. Our Governor has had a surfeit of Indian treaties, and Governor Cass is too distant for him to attend without great inconvenience. I shall, therefore, enter upon the negotiation myself, and meet the Indians at or near Fort Harrison on the 27th instant.

I have seen a copy of the depositions procured in justification of Major Chunn and the issuing commissary at Fort Harrison. Browlet may have acted improperly; but the misconduct imputed to him affords no justification to Chunn and Lambert and Dixon. The major's correspondence with me in 1816 and 1818 overturns the whole fabric, a copy of which I shall furnish Captain Prince, to be forwarded to you. It seems this was forgotten; and, what is more extraordinary, the major threw the provision orders into the fire when he signed the abstracts. Emison, too, burnt his accounts.

I have, &c.

B. PARKE.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

VINCENNES, August 12, 1819.

The Vermilion Kickapoos have determined to cede to the United States their country west of the Wabash river, without reserve; and Judge Parke has appointed the 27th instant to meet them in the neighborhood of Fort Harrison. A few pounds of meat and bread will necessarily be wanted at that point; and I have contracted for its delivery at the fort—flour at seven dollars and fifty cents per barrel, and meat at five dollars per hundredweight. This was the best contract which could be made at this season of the year. Such an understanding has been had with the Indians, that but few days will be necessary to complete the negotiation; and, consequently, the expenses attendant but trifling. I have no doubt but that an advantageous contract will be made with them. The reluctance of those persons who have had an opportunity of knowing the probable issues made the Indians at Fort Harrison, in the years 1817 and 1818, in coming forward and giving the information wanted, has prevented me from completing the report directed by you; it will, however, be shortly done, and forwarded, together with some letters written by Major Chunn to the agent, during those periods, which will show that the issues were made by his orders alone.

I have understood that depositions have been taken, (secretly,) tending to show the innocence of the commanding officer at that post, and attaching the blame entirely to the late General Posey and his interpreter. Had I a copy of them, I have no doubt but that such rebutting testimony could be procured as would destroy their credibility entirely; indeed, all acknowledge that a gross fraud has been practised. Should it be desirable with the Government to give to the Weas a sum in hand for their perpetual annuity, such an arrangement might be made with them more advantageous than the one which now exists; and they, as well as the Kickapoos, induced to migrate to the country west of the Mississippi; and such arrangement would supersede the necessity of keeping up this agency.

I have, &c.

WILLIAM PRINCE.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 28, 1819.

Your communication of the 20th ultimo was received by the Secretary of War the day before he left the seat of Government for South Carolina; and, by his direction, I have the honor to acknowledge its receipt, and to express to you his approbation of your proceedings, and of the treaty which you have concluded with the Kickapoos.

I am, &c., by order,

SAM. S. HAMILTON.

Messrs. A. CHOUTEAU, and }

SIR:

DETROIT, September 11, 1819.

I shall leave here on Monday next to meet the Indians at Saginaw, and to endeavor, agreeably to your instructions, to procure a cession of that valuable country.

I had the honor some time since to communicate to you the circumstances respecting the protest of the draft transmitted for the payment of the Indian annuities. I had hoped that, before leaving here, I should have received from you further instructions upon this subject.

It would be hopeless to expect a favorable result to the proposed treaty, unless the annuities previously due are discharged. Under these circumstances, I have felt myself embarrassed, and no course has been left me but to procure the amount of the Chippewa annuity upon my own private responsibility.

By the liberal conduct of the directors of the bank at this place, I have succeeded in procuring that annuity in silver, and shall thus be able to comply with past engagements before I call upon the Indians to form others.

I trust the receipt of a draft will soon relieve me from the situation in which I am placed, and enable me to perform my promise to the bank.

Very respectfully, &c.

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DETROIT, September 30, 1819.

Accompanying this, I have the honor to transmit to you a treaty concluded by me, on the part of the United States, with the Chippewa Indians, for the cession of a considerable portion of their country within this Territory. I trust the general provisions of the treaty will meet with your approbation.

The boundaries of the tract ceded may be easily traced upon any good map of the United States; but, owing to our ignorance of the topography of the interior of this Territory, it may be eventually found, when the lines are run, that the southeastern corner of the tract ceded is in the possession of the Grand River Indians. If so, there will be no difficulty, and very little expense, in quieting their claims.

That portion of the Chippewa Indians which owned this land have not made the necessary advances in civilization to appreciate the importance of education for their youth. It was, therefore, hopeless to expect from them any reservations for this object, or to offer it as an inducement for a cession of their country. Some consideration more obvious in its effects, and more congenial to their habits, was necessary to insure a successful termination to the negotiation.

In acceding to the propositions which they made upon this subject, I endeavored to give such form to the stipulations on the part of the United States, for the payment of annuities, as would be permanently useful, and, at the same time, satisfactory to them.

Their own wishes unquestionably were, that the whole sum stipulated to be annually paid to them should be paid in specie. With the habitual improvidence of savages, they were anxious to receive what they could speedily dissipate in childish and useless purchases, at the expense of stipulations which would be permanently useful to them.

The opinions advanced in your letter of instructions of March 27, 1819, respecting the injurious tendency of large annuities to the Indians, are correct; and the effect of these annuities upon the Indians is stated with as much precision as they could be were they the result of daily intercourse with these unfortunate people.

Viewing the subject in this manner, I finally concluded to admit a stipulation, conformably to their wishes, for an annuity of one thousand dollars, but to secure the payment of whatever additional sum the Government of the United States might think they ought to receive, in such a manner as would be most useful to them.

A stipulation, therefore, was inserted that the United States should provide and support a blacksmith for them, and should furnish them with cattle, farming utensils, and persons to aid them in their agriculture.

The amount which shall be expended for these objects by the United States, the term during which this expense shall continue, and the mode in which it shall be applied, are left discretionary with the President.

In taking this course, I was influenced by the consideration that the negotiator of an Indian treaty is not always the best judge of the value of the purchase, or of the amount which should be paid for it. Sometimes too much has been allowed, and at other times too little. He is not sent upon such a negotiation to ascertain the lowest possible sum for which the miserable remnant of those who once occupied our country are willing to treat, and to seize with avidity the occasion to purchase. Certain I am that both you and the President would censure me, (and justly, too,) were I governed in my intercourse with the Indians by such principles. The great moral debt which we owe them can only be discharged by patient forbearance, and by a rigid adherence to that system of improvement which we have adopted, and the effects of which are already felt in this quarter.

It is due to the Indians and to myself to say, that the sum which it was expected by us would be expended for the objects which I have mentioned is from fifteen hundred to two thousand five hundred dollars annually. But they distinctly understand that the amount of this expenditure is entirely discretionary with the President. Of course, the Government can now apply such a sum to these objects, as the value of the cession and the wants and population of the Indians may justify. Although I am firmly persuaded that it would be better for us and for these Indians that they should migrate to the country west of the Mississippi, or, at any rate, west of Lake Michigan, yet it was impossible to give effect to that part of your instructions which relates to this subject, without hazarding the success of the negotiation. An indisposition to abandon the country so long occupied by their tribe, an hereditary enmity to many of the western Indians, and a suspicion of our motives, are the prominent causes which, for the present, defeat this plan. When they are surrounded by our settlements, and brought into contact with our people, they will be more disposed to migrate.

In the mean time, we may teach them those useful arts which are connected with agriculture, and which will prepare them, by gradual progress, for the reception of such institutions as may be fitted for their character, customs, and situation.

Reservations have been made for them to occupy; and I indulge the hope that they will appreciate the advantages which are now offered to them, and will aid, by their own efforts, the plans of improvement which have been adopted by the Government. Reservations have also been made for a few half-breeds. It was absolutely necessary to our success that these should be admitted into the treaty. Being only reservations, and the fee of the land remaining in the United States, I trust it will not be thought improper that I admitted them.

In a supplemental article several provisions are inserted, which were urged by the Indians, but which I did not feel authorized to accede to in the body of the treaty. The first is a grant of three sections of land to Dr. Brown, of this place, for the professional services which he has rendered, and the medicine he has furnished them during a period of more than twenty years. This claim to remunerate Dr. Brown has been urged by the Indians with great zeal at every treaty which I have attended. Its rejection has always been difficult, and I am satisfied it is a dear object with them. His attention and services to them have been unremitting and gratuitous, and of the most exemplary character. I cannot but hope that it may be deemed proper to admit this grant, either in this manner, or by special legislative provision.

Of the five grants, in the same article, to white persons, it is only necessary to say they were admitted at the particular request of the Indians, and their confirmation would be gratifying to them.

Had I not been a resident of the country affected by it, I should have admitted an unconditional stipulation respecting the land appropriated for the making of roads. But the principle being new in Indian treaties, I thought it most advisable to leave the stipulation upon this subject discretionary with the President and Senate. I do not perceive, however, that the admission of this principle generally, or that its application in this particular case, can be injurious to the United States.

The private debts conditionally assumed are bona fide due by the Indians, and they appeared solicitous to discharge them. Two worthy men are interested in the result. It was my object to insert in the supplementary article every provision which was demanded by the Indians respecting the principle of which I felt doubtful, so that the President and Senate might avoid the establishment of a precedent, the effect of which may be dangerous.

A large portion of the country ceded is of the first character for soil and situation; it will vie with any land I have seen north of the Ohio river. The cession probably contains more than six millions of acres.

I shall be anxious to learn that you approve the result of this negotiation.

Very respectfully, &c.

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War, Washington City.

SIR:

DETROIT, October 1, 1819.

I have the satisfaction to state that the expense of the treaty recently concluded with the Chippewa Indian for the Saginaw country will be defrayed from the sum appropriated for Indian expenditures within my superintendency.

I required of the commissioners at this place twenty-five thousand rations of fresh beef, salt provisions being unfit for the Indians. Little more than half of this has been issued. The residue will be issued to the troops here. I presume the bills drawn by the commissary for these provisions, together with the amount of the flour and other articles received from the public store here, will be charged to the sum of forty-five thousand dollars assigned to the agencies upon this frontier.

Whatever has not been issued will, I trust, be credited to the same appropriation.

I am perfectly aware of the necessity of economy in Indian expenditures, and I claim no merit, except for an earnest wish strictly to carry into effect all your instructions.

Very respectfully, &c.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 21, 1819.

Your letters of the 30th ultimo and of the 1st and 2d instant, accompanied by the treaty with the Chippewa Indians, have been received.

The President and Secretary for the Department of War are absent from the seat of Government. So soon as they return, the treaty and your communications will be laid before them; and I have no doubt you will then be made acquainted with the satisfaction they will have derived from the result of your negotiations, as well as with their entire approbation of the measures you have pursued to obtain that result.

[1st SESSION.]

PROGRESS MADE IN CIVILIZING THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 17, 1820.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 15, 1820.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th instant, "that the Secretary of War be directed to report whether any and, if any, what progress has been made in the civilization of the Indian tribes, and the sums of money, if any, which have been expended on that object, under the act of the last session," I have the honor to make the following statement:

No part of the appropriation of $10,000 annually, made at the last session, for the civilization of the Indians, has yet been applied. The President was of opinion that the object of the act would be more certainly effected by applying the sum appropriated in aid of the efforts of societies, or individuals, who might feel disposed to bestow their time and resources to effect the object contemplated by it; and a circular (of which the enclosed is a copy) was addressed to those individuals and societies, who have directed their attention to the civilization of the Indians. The objects of the circular were to obtain information, and disclose the views of the President, in order to concentrate and unite the efforts of individuals and societies in the mode contemplated by the act of the last session. The information collected will enable the President to apply, early in this year, the sum appropriated. The economy and intelligence with which it will be applied, under the superintendence of zealous and disinterested individuals, will, it is hoped, carry into effect, as far as practicable, the views of Congress.

While many of the Indian tribes have acquired only the vices with which a savage people usually become tainted, by their intercourse with those who are civilized, others appear to be making gradual advances in industry and civilization. Among the latter description may be placed the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and perhaps the Creeks, most of the remnants of the Six Nations in the State of New York, the Wyandots, Senecas, and Shawnees at Upper Sandusky and Wapaghkonetta. The Cherokees exhibit a more favorable appearance than any other tribe of Indians. There are already established two flourishing schools among them: one at Brainard, under the superintendence of the American Board for Foreign Missions; at which there are at present about 100 youths of both sexes. The institution is on the Lancasterian plan, and is in a very flourishing condition. Besides reading, writing, and arithmetic, the boys are taught agriculture and the ordinary mechanic arts; and the girls, sewing, knitting, and weaving. At Spring Place, in the same nation, there is a school on a more limited scale, under the superintendence of the United Brethren, or Moravians. Two other schools are projected in the same nation: one by the American, and the other by the Baptist Board for Foreign Missions; and arrangements are making to establish two other schools among that portion of the Cherokee nation which reside on the Arkansas. The Choctaws and Chickasaws have recently evinced a strong desire to have schools established among them, and measures have been taken by the American Board for Foreign Missions for that purpose. A part of the former nation have appropriated $2,000 annually, out of their annuity, for seventeen years, as a school fund. A part of the Six Nations in New York have, of late, made considerable improvements; and the Wyandots, Senecas, and Shawnees at Upper Sandusky and Wapaghkonetta, have, under the superintendence of the Society of Friends, made considerable advances in civilization.

Although partial advances may be made under the present system to civilize the Indians, I am of an opinion that, until there is a radical change in the system, any efforts which may be made must fall short of complete success. They must be brought gradually under our authority and laws, or they will insensibly waste away in vice and misery. It is impossible, with their customs, that they should exist as independent communities in the midst of civilized society. They are not, in fact, an independent people, (I speak of those surrounded by our population,) nor ought they to be so considered. They should be taken under our guardianship; and our opinion, and not theirs, ought to prevail, in measures intended for their civilization and happiness. A system less vigorous may protract, but cannot arrest their fate.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. H. CLAY, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

[CIRCULAR.]

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 3, 1819.

In order to render the sum of $10,000, annually appropriated at the last session of Congress for the civilization of the Indians, as extensively beneficial as possible, the President is of opinion that it ought to be applied in co-operation with the exertions of benevolent associations, or individuals, who may choose to devote their time or means to effect the object contemplated by the act of Congress. But it will be indispensable, in order to apply any portion of the sum appropriated in the manner proposed, that the plan of education, in addition to reading, writing, and arithmetic, should, in the instruction of the boys, extend to the practical knowledge of the mode of agriculture, and of such of the mechanic arts as are suited to the condition of the Indians; and in that of the girls, to spinning, weaving, and sewing. It is also indispensable that the establishment should be fixed within the limits of those Indian nations who border on our settlements. Such associations or individuals who are already actually engaged in educating the Indians, and who may desire the co-operation of the Government, will report to the Department of War, to be laid before the President, the location of the institutions under their superintendence, their funds, the number and kind of teachers, the number of youths of both sexes, the objects which are actually embraced in their plan of education, and the extent of the aid which they require; and such institutions as are formed, but have not gone into actual operation, will report the extent of their funds, the places at which they intend to make their establishments, the whole number of youths of both sexes which they intend to educate, the number and kind of teachers to be employed, the plan of education adopted, and the extent of the aid required.

This information will be necessary to enable the President to determine whether the appropriation of Congress ought to be applied in co-operation with the institutions which may request it, and to make a just distribution of the sum appropriated.

In proportion to the means of the Government, co-operation will be extended to such institutions as may be approved, as well in erecting necessary buildings, as in their current expenses.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

TRADE AND INTERCOURSE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 16, 1820.

MR. LEAKE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate respecting the trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, made the following report:

The committee have had that subject under consideration, and have discovered that the trade, as it is at present conducted with the Indian tribes, has been productive of serious injuries, as well to the interests of the Indians as to the interests of the United States in their intercourse with them; that, instead of being calculated to aid in the civilization, and add to the comfort and happiness of that unfortunate portion of the human family, and to promote the beneficial influence of the United States over them, the course pursued by those who carry on the Indian trade has in most instances produced the contrary effect, as will be seen by referring to the documents herewith presented, and marked A and B, which have been received in a communication from the Secretary of War, made to the committee at their request, which they beg leave to make a part of this report, and which are as follows:

A.

SIR:

CAMP MISSOURI, MISSOURI RIVER, October 29, 1819.

Agreeably to your request, I lay before you my views on the subject of Indian trade on this river, the result of personal observation among the Osage, Kansas, Otoe, Missouri, Iowa, Pawnee, and Maha nations, and what I have collected from persons acquainted with the more remote tribes.

The history of this trade under the Spanish and French colonial governments would be the recital of the expeditions of vagrant hunters and traders, who never ventured up the river beyond a few miles of this place. The return of Captains Lewis and Clarke, and the favorable account they brought with them of the rich furs to be obtained on the upper branches of the Missouri, and the respectful reception which their admirable deportment towards the natives had gained for them, encouraged Manuel Lisa, one of the most enterprising of these traders, to venture up the Missouri with a small trading equipment as far as the Yellow Stone river.

He passed the winter of 1807-'08 at the mouth of the Yellow Stone and Big Horn rivers. It is an act of justice due to the memory of the late Captain Lewis, to state that the Blackfeet Indians (in whose vicinity Lisa now lives) were so convinced of the propriety of his conduct in the rencounter which took place between him and a party of their people, in which two of them were killed, that they did not consider it as cause of war or hostility on their part: this is proved, inasmuch as the first party of Lisa's men that were met by the Blackfeet were treated civilly. This circumstance induced Lisa to despatch one of his men (Coulter) to the forks of the Missouri, to endeavor to find the Blackfeet nation, and bring them to his establishment to trade. This messenger unfortunately fell in with a party of the Crow nation, with whom he staid several days. While with them, they were attacked by their enemies the Blackfeet. Coulter, in self-defence, took part with the Crows. He distinguished himself very much in the combat; and the Blackfeet were defeated, having plainly observed a white man fighting in the ranks of their enemy. Coulter returned to the trading-house. In traversing the same country, a short time after, in company with another man, a party of the Blackfeet attempted to stop them, without, however, evincing any hostile intentions; a rencounter ensued, in which the companion of Coulter and two Indians were killed, and Coulter made his escape. The next time whites were met by the Blackfeet, the latter attacked without any parley. Thus originated the hostility which has prevented American traders from penetrating the fur country of the Missouri. Lisa returned in 1808 to St. Louis, and in 1809 the Missouri Fur Company was formed. The objects of this company appear to have been to monopolize the trade among the lower tribes of the Missouri, who understand the art of trapping, and to send a large party to the head waters of the Missouri river capable of defending and trapping beaver themselves. To the latter object, however, the attention of the company was more particularly directed. In the spring of 1809, the principal partners of this company ascended the Missouri at the head of about 150 men. They left small trading establishments at the Arickara, Mandan, and Gros Ventres villages, and the main body of the party wintered in 1809-'10 at the old trading position of Manuel Lisa, at the junction of the Yellow Stone and Big Horn rivers. In the spring of 1810, they proceeded to the Three Forks of the Missouri, where they erected a fort, and commenced trapping. They had every prospect of being successful, until their operations were interrupted by the hostility of the Blackfeet Indians. With these people they had several very severe conflicts, in which upwards of 30 of their men were killed; and the whole party were finally compelled to leave that part of the country. They proceeded in a southwardly direction, crossed the mountains near the source of the Yellow Stone river, and wintered in 1810-'11 on the waters of the Columbia. At this position they suffered much for provisions, and were compelled to live for some months entirely upon their horses. The party by this time had become dispirited, and began to separate: some returned into the United States by the way of the Missouri, and others made their way south, into the Spanish settlements, by the way of the Rio del Norte. The company languished through 1812, 1813, and 1814, and finally expired. Equally unfortunate, in a commercial point of view, was another company, which embarked the year preceding the one I have described, having in view the same objects. It left St. Louis in 1808, headed by two traders, Messrs. McClinnon and Crooks, and consisted of near eighty men. They met returning, near this place, the boat sent by the United States to carry back the Mandan chief brought into this country by Captains Lewis and Clarke. You undoubtedly recollect that this boat was attacked by the Arickaras, and compelled to make a precipitate retreat. This act of hostility discouraged Messrs. McClinnon and Crooks, and they thought it prudent to decline going on. Encouraged, however, by the attempt of the Missouri Fur Company, they followed their boats in the spring of 1809. They were met, however, by the Sconi band of the Sioux, who refused to permit them to pass, and compelled them to remain among them. By affecting to submit, and commencing to erect houses, the Indians were thrown off their guard; and the party, taking advantage of their absence on a hunting excursion, embarked with their goods, and descended the river to the Ottoo village, where they passed the winter of 1809-'10. They have always attributed their detention by the Sioux to the Missouri Fur Company, or some of its members, who, to procure themselves a passage, informed the Sioux that the boat coming up was intended to trade, and that they must not permit her to pass. Considering the character of Indian traders, when in competition, the fact is very far from being improbable. In 1811, the views of these traders appear to have changed: they added to their association Mr. Wilson P. Hunt, and appear to have acted under the direction of Mr. Astor, of New York. They ascended the river again in 1811, and reached the mouth of the Columbia; but they carried no goods, nor made any attempts to trade or trap on the Missouri: whatever might have been their intentions, they were probably frustrated by the war of 1812. The dissolution of the Missouri Fur Company, the disaster that befel the United States' boat, and the difficulties encountered by Messrs. McClinnon and Crooks, extinguished the spirit of enterprise that had promised to carry our trade into the valuable fur country of the Missouri. Since that period, two companies have been formed, both of which dissolved unsuccessfully; and a third is now in operation, independent of several individual traders; but no attempts have since been made to carry on trade beyond the Arickaras; nor, in fact, do traders often venture beyond the upper band of the Sioux.

The following statement exhibits the trade of this river, viz:

The company consists of Messrs. Lisa, Pilcher, Perkins, Wood, Carson, Williams, and Tenonee. They bought out the company of 1817 and 1818 for $10,000, and bought about $7,000 worth of goods. They trade with the Ottoes, Missouriias, Ioways, the Mahas, Pawnees, Piankeshaws, and Sioux; their principal trading establishment is near this place; capital	$17,000
Seres and Francis Chouteau trade with the Kansas and Osage nations. They have a trading-house not far from the mouth of the river Kansas, and their capital is about	$4,000
Legarc, Chouteau, and Brothers, trade with the Osage and Kansas nations, near their village on the Osage river; their capital	$6,000
The United States factory also trade with the Osages and Kansas. This factory is at Fort Osage. Roberdeau and Pepin, in partnership with Chouteau and Butholl, of St. Louis, trade with the Ottoes, Ioways, Missouriias, Pawnees, Mahas, Piankeshaws, and Sioux. Their principal establishment is at Nshanotollona; capital	$12,000
Pratt and Vasquer trade with the same nations. Their principal establishment is near the Mahas village; capital	$7,000
Broseau and De Lorion trade occasionally with the Sioux and Arickaras: they do not trade this year; capital	$7,000

It is evident, from this statement, that the trade is of little importance in a pecuniary point of view, and that various individuals having opposite interests trade with the same Indians. These traders are continually endeavoring to lessen each other in the eyes of the Indians, not only by abusive words, but by all sorts of low tricks and manœuvres. If a trader trusts an Indian, his opponent uses all his endeavors to purchase the furs he may take, or prevent in any way his being paid. Each trader supports his favorite chief, which produces not only intestine commotions and divisions in the tribe, but destroys the influence of the principal chief, who should always be under the control of the Government. The introduction of ardent spirits is one of the unhappy consequences of this opposition among traders. So violent is the attachment of Indians for it, that he who gives most is sure to obtain furs; while, should any one attempt to trade without it, he is sure of losing ground with his antagonist; no bargain is ever concluded without it, and the law on that subject is evaded by their saying they give, not sell it. The traders being afraid to trust the Indians, they cannot make distant hunts: this, and their attachment to whiskey, induce them to hang about in the vicinities of trading establishments. As they take furs, they sell them for whiskey; the consequence is, that but few furs are taken, as much of the hunting season is lost in intoxication and indolence. The Indians witnessing the efforts of these people to cheat and injure each other, and knowing no other or no more important white men, they readily imbibe the idea that all white men are alike bad. The imposing appearance of arms and equipments of white men, and the novelty and convenience of their merchandise, had impressed the Indians with a high idea of their power and importance; but the avidity with which beaver skins are sought after, the tricks and wrangling made use of, and the degradation submitted to in obtaining them, have induced a belief that the whites cannot exist without them, and made a great change in their opinion of our importance, our justice, and our power.

Under the plea of trading with the Indians, white trappers and hunters obtain a footing in their country. The old man and his son whipped and robbed this summer by the Pawnees, and the three men killed about the same time by the Sioux, were persons of this description; the trouble these sorts of transactions may occasion the Government cannot be readily calculated. It will illustrate what I have said to narrate what happened on my visit to the Maha nation, from which I yesterday returned. The nation were preparing to start on their winter hunt, and endeavoring to obtain guns, powder, and lead, to subsist themselves while trapping: they complained bitterly that they could not procure enough of these articles; the traders were afraid to trust them; there were two traders in the camp, both jealous and apprehensive of each other; (in conversation with the Indians, they invariably abused the traders, and the traders abused each other.) The tribe separated into small hunting bands, very much dissatisfied, and the traders would send round occasionally to their hands to purchase their furs. A keg of whiskey was considered an indispensable equipment for such an undertaking. I had found, on my arrival, most of the principal men drunk. The Big Elk, who is so much our friend, and who formerly possessed unlimited power in his nation, was so drunk for two days that I could not deliver your letter to him; when I gave it, I requested the interpreter to inform him that I had been two days waiting to deliver a letter from you, but that, very much to my surprise, I had found him too drunk to transact business. He appeared affected at what I said, acknowledged how unworthy it was in him to be in that situation, and admitted he had lost much power by it. He blamed the whites for bringing liquor into the country; said that when he knew it was not to be had, he felt no inclination for it; but that when it was near and attainable, his attachment for it was irresistible. Besides, said he, your traders come among my nation, give metals, and make chiefs of every man who can obtain a party to trap beaver. It is the ambition of these chiefs that opposes me and makes me powerless. I know there are Mahas now alive as brave and as wise as I am. It was fortune or chance that placed me at the head of the nation, and I cannot control my tribe while the whites assist those who oppose me. Thus is the influence of this valuable and sensible Indian lost to his tribe and the Government, and thus is a man who possesses some traits that do honor to human nature debased and made a beast of; he had not influence enough to lead a hunting band. By the establishment of military posts, the Government expect to secure the trade to American citizens, to obtain such an ascendancy over them as will secure their assistance or prevent their being employed against us, and thereby to civilize them. The facility with which any man may become nominally a citizen of the United States gives but little advantage to those who have really claims to that character; and I appeal to your personal knowledge of the present traders to say if they are likely to instil among the Indians favorable opinions of the Government, or if the establishment of an isolated military post among the Indians is likely to obtain such an ascendancy over them as will secure their assistance, or prevent their being employed against us, while the real influence is in the hands of the description of men who now trade on the Missouri. Those traders who reside near the military posts, or who are willing to lend their influence to the Government, will be the objects of jealousy to their rivals, whose establishments may be farther off. The readiest way of destroying the trade of their rival will be to create such disturbances between the tribe and the troops as will prevent the Indians frequenting the post. This is not an imaginary apprehension. Recollect that our difficulty last year with the Kansas nation arose from the intrigues of a trader, who, finding that the Kansas were trading at an establishment near the cantonment, induced some of their young men to commit such outrages, (stopping our men, whipping them, &c.) as had nearly produced a war, and which ended in whipping the Indians and expelling them from camp. The fact cannot be legally proved, but I sincerely believe it.

The impossibility of civilizing the Indians, when exposed to the temptations and delusions of interested traders, needs no comment.

The establishment of a company capable of monopolizing the trade would be attended in this country with innumerable difficulties. I will not detail them, but submit with great deference to your better judgment my own opinion. Let the Government take the trade into their own hands; let their agents be honest, capable, and zealous; let their factories be established, not only where the troops may be stationed, but at all points convenient for trading with the Indians; let certain prices be fixed, and let the compensation of the factors depend upon the value of the furs they obtain; and let their accounts be rigidly inspected.

The Indians would then be completely within the influence of the Government; there would then be no difficulty in giving credit; because, if the Indian did not pay, he would find no one else to trust him; neither would it be necessary to debauch the Indians with whiskey. With credits to obtain the means of subsistence, and without the incitement of whiskey to indolence, they would make more furs than when surrounded by a host of traders.

In short, sir, to my humble judgment, it appears that in the present state of affairs, at an enormous expense, we obtain nothing. By placing the trade in the hands of the Government, we can, without the expense of one cent, obtain every thing they appear to desire.

With sentiments of the greatest respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

THOMAS BIDDLE.

To Col. H. ATKINSON, Commanding 9th Military Department.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Henry Atkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

St. Louis, November 23, 1819.

I have no doubt, however, but all the posts can be established, and the objects of Government attained, without hostility with the Indians, should the Indian trade be properly regulated by law. But, under the present system, which is miserably defective, and most shamefully abused by the traders, much trouble and difficulty may be apprehended.

B.

SIR:

Sr. Louis, November 26, 1819.

I take the liberty of submitting to you a report made by Major Biddle, of whom I required a particular attention to Indian affairs whilst prosecuting the expedition up the Missouri in the summer and autumn. His opportunities were such as to enable him to form a very correct idea of the manner the Indian trade has been carried on, and of the character of those engaged in it. Much has fallen under my own observation, and agrees with his statements.

The conduct of the traders, generally, tends more to distract and corrupt the Indians than to effect the objects contemplated by the laws establishing the intercourse. Instead of carrying on a liberal, open, and fair trade with the Indians, and impressing them with a proper sense and respect for the character and views of Government, every thing is made to bend to an underhand, backbiting policy. Each trader endeavors to impress the Indians with a belief that all other traders have no object but to cheat and deceive them, and that Government intend taking away their lands by sending troops into their country. Hence the jealousy and distrust of the Indians towards Government, and the bad opinion they have of the whites for truth and honesty. So illiberal are the traders in their conduct towards each other, that, when one of them gives a credit to a tribe to enable it to send out hunting and trapping parties, another despatches an agent, or agents, with a supply of goods and whiskey to dog the parties on their excursions, and, by the lure of a little whiskey and some trifling articles, rob them of their peltries and furs as soon as they are taken from the animal's back, and the just creditor of his pay. This sort of conduct has very injurious consequences; for, as it is so generally practised, every trader is afraid to give such credits as are necessary to enable the Indians to provide such articles as their women and children stand in need of; and the dogging gentry leave little or nothing in their hands at the end of their hunts to purchase with. However, notwithstanding the arts and wiles practised by the traders on the Indians, they have unbounded influence over them; for trade is the strong cord by which they are all bound. Withhold their trade, and you bring them to any terms; afford it, and you make them do any thing. If this be the fact, (and I assure you it is,) is it just or proper that the influence over the Indians should be left in such corrupt hands? Their friendship, at no time, while this state of things exists, can be calculated on. It appears to be an easy matter for Congress to remedy the evil; and it would seem that they will, if they can believe those who are personally acquainted with the facts. To do it, all intercourse by individual traders with the Indians should be prohibited; and let Government take the whole trade into their own hands, or confide it to a single company with a sufficient capital. The first, in my opinion, would be preferable, as all the influence desirable might be acquired by Government over the Indians. Besides, if the factories were well managed, the profits arising from them would, probably, defray all the expenses of the military that might be necessary to establish the posts and protect the trade in the Indian country. If the latter should be thought preferable, the individuals of a single company, having but one interest, would find their account in impressing the Indians with a proper regard and respect for the character and views of Government.

The foregoing subject being so intimately connected with your views relative to the Missouri expedition, and deeming a change in the system so essential to the interests and views of Government in that quarter, I have thought proper to order Major Biddle to report in person to you, for the purpose of giving any further information on the subject that might be thought necessary.

With the greatest respect, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

H. ATKINSON, Col. 6th Inf. com'g 9th Mil. Dep.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

To remedy the evils detailed in those documents, the committee herewith report a bill.

But the committee are sensible that the provisions of this bill are calculated only for the trade of those tribes of Indians in our immediate neighborhood which may with safety and advantage be opened to individual enterprise, and, with a vigilant administration, will produce results equally salutary to the Indians and ourselves.

But the committee conceive that those provisions are insufficient for the successful prosecution of our trade with the numerous Indian tribes who occupy the vast region extending to the Pacific ocean. It will require a system of much greater energy to effect the great objects which ought to be pursued through it. The committee, therefore, beg leave to reserve to themselves the privilege of reporting more fully hereafter on this subject.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF THE INDIAN TITLE TO LAND IN GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 20, 1820.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1820.

It being stipulated by the fourth article of the articles of agreement and cession entered into on the 24th of April, 1802, with the State of Georgia, that the United States should, at their own expense, extinguish for the use of that State, as soon as it might be done on reasonable terms, the Indian title to all lands within its limits; and the Legislature of Georgia being desirous of making a further acquisition of said lands at this time, presuming that it may be done on reasonable terms; and it being, also, represented that property of considerable value had been taken by the Creek and Cherokee Indians from citizens of Georgia, the restoration of which had been provided for by different treaties, but which has never been made: it is proposed to hold a treaty with those nations, and more particularly with the Creeks, in the course of this summer, for the attainment of these objects. I submit the subject to the consideration of Congress, that a sum adequate to the expense attending such treaty may be appropriated, should Congress deem it expedient.

TRADE AND INTERCOURSE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 5TH OF APRIL, 1820.

Mr. LEAKE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were "instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the abolition of the system of Indian trade established by a law of the 2d of March, 1811, which has been continued in force until the 3d of March, 1821, and for the disposition of the goods and property of the United States, and for the payment of the proceeds thereof, and of the funds vested in this trade, into the treasury," made the following report:

That, from the year 1775 to August, 1786, our Indian relations were regulated by the agencies of commissioners, who executed, under the direction of the Congress, such arrangements as were from time to time deemed best by that body to be adopted, and pursued such a course of policy as was thought best calculated to promote the peace of the frontiers and the welfare of the Indians. The Indians, under the first system, were divided into three departments—the northern, middle, and southern. Five commissioners were appointed for the southern department, and two for the middle and northern.

Among the first arrangements which your committee find to have been adopted, were those which embraced a system of trade with the Indians; and the privilege of prosecuting it was confined to those who should first provide a license from one or more of the commissioners of each respective department; and no person was permitted to trade, except at such posts and places as the commissioners for each department should respectively appoint. On the 29th of April, 1776, it was resolved by the Congress that no traders ought to go into the Indian country without license from the agent in the department, and that care be taken by him to prevent exorbitant prices for goods being exacted from the Indians. Measures were adopted, also, in the same year, though on a limited scale, for the introduction amongst some of the tribes of civilization and Christianity; and the acts of those earlier times are characterized with kindness and a solicitude for the welfare of the Indians.

On the 7th of August, 1786, the Congress passed an ordinance for the regulation of Indian affairs, when the Indian department was divided into two districts—the northern and southern; to each of which was attached a superintendent. It was made the duty of these two superintendents to attend to the execution of such regulations as the Congress should from time to time adopt; to correspond with each other, and with the Secretary of War, in all matters relating to these trusts.

Under this ordinance, none but citizens of the United States were suffered to reside among the Indian nations, or were allowed to trade with any nation of Indians within the territory of the United States. No person, citizen or other, under the penalty of $500, was permitted to reside among or trade with any Indian or Indian nation, within the territory of the United States, without a license for that purpose first obtained from the superintendent of the district, or one of his deputies. No person could entitle himself to a license who should not first produce a certificate from the Supreme Executive of one of the States, under the seal of the State, certifying to the applicant's good moral character, and that he was suitably qualified and provided for the employment of trader; for which license he was to pay to the superintendent, for the use of the United States, $50. The term of a license was not to exceed one year. No person obtained a license under this ordinance without first giving bond in $3,000 for his adherence to and observance of such rules and regulations for the government of the trade as the Congress might from time to time adopt.

It would appear that, notwithstanding all this precaution, the systems were not suited to the humane designs of the Government. The plan of holding intercourse with the Indian tribes by the agency of private traders, notwithstanding the regulations with which it was attempted to control them, was unsuited to the promotion of those relations which it was, and is yet, so desirable to sustain with the aborigines of our country—a people over whose welfare the Government should feel itself particularly bound to exercise the most liberal and parent-like agency. Hence, in 1796, an act was passed under which the existing system of the United States trade and intercourse was organized, and an appropriation of $150,000 was made to carry it into effect. This system provides for the supplying the Indians with all necessary and useful articles at such rates as shall preserve the capital from diminution. This act also provides an additional sum of $8,000 annually, for the payment of agents and clerks, denominated factors and assistant factors, &c. In 1806, a superintendent of Indian trade was authorized to be appointed, and the capital increased to $260,000, and the sum of $13,000 was annually appropriated for the payment of the superintendent, factors, &c. In the year 1811, the capital was increased to $300,000, and $19,250 was annually appropriated for the payment of the superintendent, factors, &c.

From a report made by the superintendent of Indian trade to the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House of Representatives on the 7th of January last, it appears that, of the $300,000 appropriated in the year 1811, not more than $290,000 has been drawn from the treasury; from which it is proper to deduct $10,000 on account of debts contracted by the Indians in their intercourse with the factory then at Fort Wilkinson, and which was secured to the United States by the treaty of Fort Wilkinson, but has not as yet been paid over to the office of superintendent; also, $43,369 61 for property destroyed by the enemy during the late war. This would reduce the capital actually employed in the Indian trade to $236,630 39. The gain appears to be the difference between this amount and $308,855 45, which is $72,225 06.

The several acts now in force require that the factors and assistant factors shall engage in their duties upon fixed salaries, and be debarred from the prosecution of any trade, directly or indirectly, except on the public account, under bond and security, and an oath of office. They also require that semi-annual returns be made of all the transactions of each factory, respectively, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and duplicate accounts to be rendered quarter-yearly; one copy to be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other to be sent to the superintendent of Indian trade.

It appears, therefore, that this system is as little liable to abuse as any system could be which is conducted by public agents and carried on upon the public account. And, notwithstanding the losses occasioned by the enemy in the late war, and the great embarrassment under which this trade has labored, occasioned by the opposing influence of a great many unprincipled private traders, it has still sustained itself, unless it be proper to tax the trade with the annual disbursements made out of the specific annual appropriation for the pay of the superintendent and agents attached to the factory system. Your committee do not conceive it was intended to be so; for, whether the factory system be abolished or not, agents must still be employed and paid, in order to keep up a friendly intercourse with the Indians, and to carry into effect that policy which the United States have so long since adopted for the benevolent purpose of civilizing the Indians, and relieving their wants, and rendering their condition more comfortable, by directing their attention to agriculture and domestic manufactures.

Notwithstanding the situation of the Indians upon our borders has been greatly ameliorated by the present system, yet, owing to the imperfection of the mode of granting licenses to private traders, the beneficial effects of the system have not been so extensive as they might have been had the mode of granting those licenses been better regulated. With a view to this end, your committee prepared and presented a bill for the better regulation of the private intercourse with the Indians, which bill has passed the Senate, and is now before the House of Representatives. Should this bill eventually become a law, it is believed that the trade with the Indians will be placed on a footing better calculated to promote the benevolent intentions of the Government towards the Indians than any other system which is likely to be effected, inasmuch as it will be in the power of the President of the United States to confine the licenses to those only who can procure recommendations, from sources entitled to the highest credit, of their good moral conduct, of their suitable qualifications, and of their ability to carry on a trade calculated to supply the wants of the Indians, and render their situation more comfortable. And the power to revoke the license of such traders as shall not conform to the regulations prescribed by the President gives to the Government such an entire control over the trade carried on by private traders as to make it subservient to the views of the Government in promoting harmony and tranquillity among the Indians, and gradually improving them in the arts of civilization; and, at the same time, preventing collisions between the traders themselves, as well as between them and the factories of the United States; and, above all, to prevent the introduction of ardent spirits among the Indians.

The evils resulting from selling or giving whiskey to the Indians are incalculable. A reference to the documents contained in a report which your committee recently made to the Senate, on the subject of Indian affairs, furnishes abundant evidence of this lamentable fact.

Adopting the experience of the past, relying on the beneficial effects which it is believed will result from the contemplated law just alluded to, and judging from the nature of the factory system, your committee are of opinion that it ought not now to be abandoned. It was commenced, and has been continued, from motives both of prudence and humanity; and though it may not have fully realized the expectations of its friends, it has no doubt produced beneficial effects. If wars have not been entirely prevented by it, they probably, without it, would have been more frequent; and if the Indians have made but little advances in civilization, they probably, without it, would have made less. If greater effects have not resulted, it is to be attributed not to a want of dependence on the part of the Indians on commercial supplies, but to defects in our system of intercourse with them. Scarcely any attempts have been made till lately to exclude foreigners; and the granting licenses has not been subject to those checks which are necessary to give it the most salutary effects. Your committee, therefore, beg leave to recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to abolish the present system of Indian trade as it is now established by law.

CLAIM OF THE STOCKBRIDGE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 13, 1820.

Mr. LEAKE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Konkopot and others, of the nation of Stockbridge Indians, residing in the State of New York," made the following report:

That the petitioners state that, in the year 1813, in consequence of an invitation from the Secretary of War, accompanied with a promise that they should be fed, paid, and supplied as the troops of the United States, they entered into the service of the United States some time in September of that year, and served about two months under the command of General Wilkinson; that they have never received any compensation for said service, except forty dollars; they, therefore, pray relief.

The evidence in support of this claim is a contract entered into between J. W. Jacobs, on the part of the petitioners, and General Wilkinson, on the part of the United States, by which it was stipulated that the petitioners, consisting of John W. Jacobs, who was made captain, Jacob Konkopot, lieutenant, and thirty-five warriors, should serve in the army of the United States for the term of two months.

In consideration of which, the said Captain John W. Jacobs was to receive thirty dollars per month, Lieutenant Jacob Konkopot was to receive twenty, and each of the other thirty-five Indians was to receive eight dollars per month; exclusive of which, they were to be furnished with certain articles of clothing mentioned in the said contract, which contract is signed by John W. Jacobs and Jacob Konkopot only, and attested by Major R. C. Nicholas, 12th regiment infantry, and H. Lee, jun. In addition to this contract, there is an affidavit of Jacob Konkopot, one of the petitioners, which states that the petitioners served, agreeably to their contract, from the 30th of September till about the 30th of November, 1813, and for which they have received no consideration except the sum of forty dollars. This affidavit further states that all the papers that have been in his possession, in relation to this transaction, have been sent to the War Office.

Your committee discover, from a letter written by the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee of Claims in the House of Representatives, to whom this petition was then referred, that the contract made with General Wilkinson is the only document ever sent to that office; no muster-roll or other voucher of any kind is there to be found; and the contract which is alleged to have been made between the petitioners and General Wilkinson is not signed by General Wilkinson, but only has the signature of two of the petitioners, and is not authenticated in any manner whatever; so that it may be fairly said that there is no evidence that the service was actually rendered, except the affidavit of Jacob Konkopot, one of the petitioners.

But, as Indians are ignorant of the rules of proceedings in entering and leaving the army, it may be fairly presumed that they were not mustered either into or out of the service; and that, as soon as they had served the time agreed on, they left the army without the performance of these ceremonies; and, as the bill which has been referred to your committee only authorizes the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle, upon the principles of justice and equity, the claim of the petitioners, your committee, therefore, recommend its passage.

NOTE.—The foregoing statement has been formed from the preserved records of the revolutionary Government, and is deemed essentially correct. At the commencement of the Revolution, large importations of goods were ordered by Congress to be imported by the Secret Committee of that honorable body, (Journal, page 41, January 27, 1776,) and were to be placed at the disposition of the commissioners of the Northern Department, including Canada, also the commissioners of the Middle Department and the commissioners of the Southern Department. This amount is assumed as an expenditure from the Treasury, because the moneys were advanced to the committee, and expended in the purchase of articles of domestic produce for exportation. Of the actual arrival of the articles, and their distribution by the commissioners who were appointed for the management of Indian affairs, we have not any existing records; it was, however, an object to which the Government of the United States paid great attention, as expressed by their resolution of the 5th of February following: "That a friendly commerce between the people of the United Colonies and the Indians, and the propagation of the Gospel and the cultivation of the civil arts among the latter, may produce many and inestimable advantages to both; and that the commissioners for Indian affairs be desired to consider of proper places in their respective departments for the residence of ministers and schoolmasters."

The annual expenditures subsequently to the year 1777 were comparatively to a small amount, from circumstances incident to the operations of war, whereby the efforts of the Government were overruled. The nominal amount of expenditures is reduced to specie medium by the scale of depreciation.

TRADE AND INTERCOURSE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 13, 1820.

SIR:

INDIAN TRADE OFFICE, December 6, 1820.

I have the honor, in conformity with the request contained in your letter of yesterday, to enclose, herewith, a copy of my report in relation to Indian trade, made on the 30th ultimo to the chairman of the committee on this subject of the House of Representatives.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

THO. L. MCKENNEY, Sup. Indian Trade.

To the HON. DAVID HOLMES,
Chairman of the Committee of Senate on Indian Affairs.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, November 30, 1820.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 29th instant, conveying the request of the Committee on Indian Affairs to have "communicated to it such information respecting the Indian trade as I may deem necessary and proper in relation to that business."

In the communication which I had the honor to make to the committee in January last, the stock and property belonging to the trading establishment, estimating the merchandise on hand at its original cost prices, was reported to be worth $308,855 45 including $43,369 61 for property destroyed by the enemy during the late war, and $10,000 which was provided for by the treaty of Fort Wilkinson, on account of debts due the factory there, and which has been absorbed in the surplus fund. These items it is thought proper to add, because their absence from the stock is not chargeable to any defect either in the principle or operations of the trade system. The gain of the trade, as reported, was $72,225 06.

The average increase which produced this gain has had no accession made to it by the operations of the last year, nor has there been any loss. An unusual depression in the prices of bear and deer skins, together with a destruction by the worms, at New Orleans, of a considerable quantity of the latter, arrested the slow but gradual increase of profit, (and the profit, it will be recollected, is dependant for its increase upon the demand which may exist at home for the articles taken in barter from the Indians.) But these losses have been about balanced by the gains arising out of the sales of furs and other articles. Gain, however, is not one of the characteristics of this system. The law is definite upon this point in excluding from the system all considerations of gain. It fixes the advance at such a per centum only as shall save the capital from diminution. The expense of transportation, of incidental disbursements, and the probable damage to which the supplies are liable in passing over such an extent of country, form the items of advance on the original cost of the articles. The salaries allowed to the agents who conduct the trade have been otherwise provided for; these are paid direct from the treasury. The articles bar-tered to the Indians are, therefore, not taxed (nor should they be) with the salary of agents, because this is paid them in support of our own policy; and the demand upon the treasury would be no less necessary, in the absence of the factory system, for the pay of at least an equal number of agents, whose services would be required in some other branches of our Indian relations. Such, doubtless, was the view taken of the subject by those who originated the scheme; otherwise, it were difficult to find a reason why the trade was not taxed with it from the beginning. If this be so, the profits which have been realized are so much clear gain to the Government. Should it be thought proper, however, to charge against the gain of the trade the compensation allowed to the agents for conducting it, the result will be an annual disbursement from the treasury of about five thousand dollars more than has been realized in the profits of the trade.

But if, as has been suggested, our Indian relations would have required, in the absence of the trade system, an equal number of agents, it follows that the profits which have arisen out of a prosecution of the trade are so much clear gain. This view, however it may serve to show the capacity of the trade to sustain itself, is considered to embrace a consideration of but minor importance. A few thousand dollars, either way, will not, it is presumed, furnish reasons for either the continuance or abandonment of the system. Greater objects than such as are included in making gains out of an impoverished people were in the view of those who originated this intercourse with our Indians; nor has the time that has elapsed since its commencement diminished any of their importance. The same justice is to be consulted, the same humanity exercised, and the same political influence is to be sustained, now, as then; and the civilization and preservation of these helpless people are to be accomplished. A well-organized commercial intercourse, it is confidently believed, must form the basis of all these important objects.

It is true a commercial intercourse has been long established; but it is also true that to its defects, and to counteracting influences, and not to the principle, are to be attributed whatever failures it may stand charged with. There is no power more influential than trade; nor is there any agent which the United States can more conveniently command, or at so little expense, for the proper control and regulation of our Indians. It is a lever, against the power of which, whenever it shall be brought properly to bear upon them, they will not make even a show of resistance. Indians are like other people in this, as in other things—they will make large sacrifices rather than be shut out from commercial privileges. But to this hour the experiment (in relation to our Indians) remains to be tried, on which the theory relies for its demonstration. Our having had a trade, or being engaged in trade now, and realizing but few of the advantages which are attributed to it, cannot be admitted as an argument against the principle, unless it were shown that the system was in all respects such as it ought to be—by being, first, commensurate, in the extent of its means, to the objects contemplated by it; and, secondly, not oppressed in its operations by opposing influences.

A slight examination of its history will satisfy any inquirer that it has been deficient in the former, and beset, from its commencement, by the latter. There can be no question but a million of dollars could be employed in our Indian trade profitably to the Government, usefully to the Indians, and affording to our manufacturers and dealers in furs, &c. great advantages. Instead of this capacity, only 300,000 dollars have been assigned to it; twenty thousand of which have reverted to the treasury, and forty-three thousand and odd dollars have been destroyed by the ravages of war; thus reducing the actual amount employed to a little over 236,000 dollars. But even this amount could have been made to subserve, more extensively, the designs of the Government, had it not been assailed, in its application to the objects contemplated by it, by counter influences. These owe their origin to the law under the provisions of which private traders have been admitted into the Indian country: not so much to their admission, as to the manner of it. It has literally turned them loose into the forests, with scarcely any stipulations as to qualifications or character, and without retaining a single efficient check to their proceedings. If this law had made this trading privilege to turn upon qualifications satisfactorily established, and enforced upon adventurers, after an approval of their fitness, an obligation to conduct their intercourse from previously recognized and permanent locations, other results might have been expected. The influences which it was intended should result from the pacific, humane, and improving designs of the Government, and the influences which must, of necessity, proceed from roving bands of private adventurers, cannot be otherwise than adverse to each other. Nor is it reasonable to look for any of these efficient results of policy which a well-organized trade would produce, whilst, by the side of it, are arranged such a multitude of interests, all of them aiming, by separate plans of policy, and with scarcely any control being had by the Government over any of them, to overcome and put down each other, and whatever else opposes the realization of their separate and clashing interests.

I deem it unnecessary to enumerate the evils which arise out of the intercourse carried on by individual traders with our Indians. But I beg leave respectfully to refer the committee to my report of the 7th January last, barely remarking that the experience of another year has been added, demonstrating the pernicious effects which continue to result from it.

A system established on principles securing to it, upon the one hand, a controlling power over those who might resort to it for their trade, and, on the other, from opposing and counteracting influences, would be productive of every consequence which it could be desirable to derive from it. The treasury would be secure, not only in its advances, but returns might be made to it, and with perfect justice to the Indians, if to no greater extent, yet so far as to insure a just equivalent for the use of the capital employed. It would be easy to provide for its security in the persons of the Indians themselves. Only make them to depend on our trade, and thus identify their interests with the security of the property located amongst them, and they would soon see that a destruction of the latter would be followed by an afflicting involvement of the former. A control being thus obtained, it would be only necessary then to place the designs of the Government before this power to insure their accomplishment. These designs being kind in their tendency, and having reference to the enlightening and preservation of these people, the happiest consequences might be justly expected to flow from them. Out of the prosecution of this trade would come large supplies of the finest furs for our manufacturers, whilst the commercial branches of our population might resort to the depot for supplies for exportation. It is much to be desired, in all the points of view which I have been able to take of this subject, that such a trade were established. But, if the system cannot be so enlarged as to fit the dimensions which a capital of a million of dollars would mark out, it is respectfully recommended to reinvest the capital with the $20,000 which have been passed to the surplus fund, and the $43,369 61, the amount of property destroyed during the late war. The accession to the capital of these items, amounting to $63,369 61, all of which it might not be necessary to apply for a year to come, will make a capital from the treasury of $300,000, which is the sum hitherto recognised by Congress, and which was provided by the several acts passed on the subject. But even this addition, or any other addition, would be unavailing, unless the law authorizing the admission of private traders into the Indian country (to the unsuitable provisions of which has been superadded much abuse) be so altered as to fix the right of appointing in the President of the United States, and to impose an obligation on such as may be thus appointed to locate, and at such points as may be approved by the President of the United States. Thus strengthened and thus defended, results may be calculated upon at once gratifying to the Government, beneficial to our merchants and manufacturers, and friendly in their consequences both to the Indians and our civilized border population.

It were easy to multiply reasons in support of these views; but I will barely remark that great reliance is placed on a well-devised system of trade as an auxiliary in promoting the benevolent scheme of civilization which appears to have met the approbation, and secured the co-operation, of so many thousands of our most respectable citizens.

It is believed that whatever assistance the Congress can provide in aid of this interesting design will be most cheerfully granted. Without the co-operation of that body, the work must make a comparatively slow progress; with it, its accomplishment appears now to be certain.

All which is respectfully submitted.

THO. L. MCKENNEY, Sup. Indian Trade.

TREATY WITH THE CHOCTAWS.

A treaty of friendship, limits, and accommodation, between the United States of America and the Choctaw nation of Indians, begun and concluded at the treaty ground in said nation, near Doak's Stand, on the Natchez road.

Whereas it is an important object with the President of the United States to promote the civilization of the Choctaw Indians, by the establishment of schools amongst them, and to perpetuate them as a nation, by exchanging for a small part of their land here a country beyond the Mississippi river, where all who live by hunting and will not work may be collected and settled together: and whereas it is desirable to the State of Mississippi to obtain a small part of the land belonging to said nation: for the mutual accommodation of the parties, and for securing the happiness and protection of the whole Choctaw nation, as well as preserving that harmony and friendship which so happily subsists between them and the United States, James Monroe, President of the United States of America, by Andrew Jackson, of the State of Tennessee, major general in the army of the United States, and General Thomas Hinds, of the State of Mississippi, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States, on the one part, and the mingoes, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, in full council assembled, on the other part, have freely and voluntarily entered into the following articles, viz:

ARTICLE 1. To enable the President of the United States to carry into effect the above grand and humane objects, the mingoes, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, in full council assembled, in behalf of themselves and the said nation, do, by these presents, cede to the United States of America all the land lying and being within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning on the Choctaw boundary east of Pearl river, at a point due south of the White Oak spring, on the old Indian path; thence, north, to said spring; thence, northwardly, to a black oak, standing on the Natchez road, about forty poles eastwardly from Doak's fence, marked A. J., and blazed, with two large pines and a black oak standing near thereto, and marked as pointers; thence, a straight line, to the head of Black creek, or Bouge Loosa; thence, down Black creek, or Bouge Loosa, to a small lake; thence, a direct course, so as to strike the Mississippi one mile below the mouth of the Arkansas river; thence, down the Mississippi, to our boundary; thence, round and along the same, to the beginning.

ART. 2. For and in consideration of the foregoing cession on the part of the Choctaw nation, and in part satisfaction for the same, the commissioners of the United States, in behalf of said States, do hereby cede to said nation a tract of country west of the Mississippi river, situate between the Arkansas and Red rivers, and bounded as follows: Beginning on the Arkansas river, where the lower boundary line of the Cherokees strikes the same; thence, up the Arkansas, to the Canadian Fork, and up the same to its source; thence, due south, to the Red river; thence, down Red river, three miles below the mouth of Little river, which empties itself into Red river, on the north side; thence, a direct line, to the beginning.

ART. 3. To prevent any dispute upon the subject of the boundaries mentioned in the first and second articles, it is hereby stipulated between the parties that the same shall be ascertained and distinctly marked by a commissioner or commissioners, to be appointed by the United States, accompanied by such person as the Choctaw nation may select; said nation having thirty days' previous notice of the time and place at which the operation will commence. The person so chosen by the Choctaws shall act as a pilot or guide, for which the United States will pay him two dollars per day whilst actually engaged in the performance of that duty.

ART. 4. The boundaries hereby established between the Choctaw Indians and the United States, on this side of the Mississippi river, shall remain without alteration, until the period at which said nation shall become so civilized and enlightened as to be made citizens of the United States; and Congress shall lay off a limited parcel of land for the benefit of each family or individual in the nation.

ART. 5. For the purpose of aiding and assisting the poor Indians who wish to remove to the country hereby ceded on the part of the United States, and to enable them to do well and support their families, the commissioners of the United States engage, in behalf of said States, to give to each warrior a blanket, kettle, rifle gun, bullet moulds and wipers, and ammunition sufficient for hunting and defence for one year; said warrior shall also be supplied with corn, to support him and his family for the same period, and whilst travelling to the country above ceded to the Choctaw nation.

ART. 6. The commissioners of the United States further covenant and agree, on the part of said States, that an agent shall be appointed, in due time, for the benefit of the Choctaw Indians who may be permanently settled in the country ceded to them beyond the Mississippi river; and, at a convenient period, a factor shall be sent there, with goods to supply their wants. A blacksmith shall also be settled amongst them, at a point most convenient to the population; and a faithful person appointed, whose duty it shall be to use every reasonable exertion to collect all the wandering Indians belonging to the Choctaw nation upon the land hereby provided for their permanent settlement.

ART. 7. Out of the lands ceded by the Choctaw nation to the United States, the commissioners aforesaid, in behalf of said States, further covenant and agree that fifty-four sections of one mile square shall be laid out, in good land, by the President of the United States, and sold, for the purpose of raising a fund, to be applied to the support of the Choctaw schools on both sides of the Mississippi river: three-fourths of said fund shall be appropriated for the benefit of the schools here, and the remaining fourth for the establishment of one or more beyond the Mississippi; the whole to be placed in the hands of the President of the United States, and to be applied by him, expressly and exclusively, to this valuable object.

ART. 8. To remove any discontent which may have arisen in the Choctaw nation, in consequence of six thousand dollars of their annuity having been appropriated annually, for sixteen years, by some of the chiefs, for the support of their schools, the commissioners of the United States oblige themselves, on the part of said States, to set apart an additional tract of good land, for raising a fund equal to that given by the said chiefs, so that the whole of the annuity may remain in the nation, and be divided amongst them. And, in order that exact justice may be done to the poor and distressed of said nation, it shall be the duty of the agent to see that the wants of every deaf, dumb, blind, and distressed Indian shall be first supplied out of said annuity, and the balance equally distributed amongst every individual of said nation.

ART. 9. All those who have separate settlements, and fall within the limits of the land ceded by the Choctaw nation to the United States, and who desire to remain where they now reside, shall be secured in a tract or parcel of land one mile square, to include their improvements. Any one who prefers removing, if he does so within one year from the date of this treaty, shall be paid their full value, to be ascertained by two persons to be appointed by the President of the United States.

ART. 10. As there are some who have valuable buildings, on the roads and elsewhere, upon the lands hereby ceded, should they remove, it is further agreed, by the aforesaid commissioners, in behalf of the United States, that the inconvenience of doing so shall be considered, and such allowance made as will amount to an equivalent. For this purpose, there shall be paid to the mingo Puckshenubbee, five hundred dollars; to Harrison, two hundred dollars; to Captain Cobb, two hundred dollars; to William Hays, two hundred dollars; to Ogleno, two hundred dollars; and to all others who have comfortable houses, a compensation in the same proportion.

ART. 11. It is also provided by the commissioners of the United States, and they agree, in behalf of said States, that those Choctaw chiefs and warriors who have not received compensation for their services during the campaign to Pensacola, in the late war, shall be paid whatever is due them over and above the value of the blanket, shirt, flap, and leggings which have been delivered to them.

ART. 12. In order to promote industry and sobriety amongst all classes of the red people in this nation, but particularly the poor, it is further provided by the parties, that the agent appointed to reside there shall be, and he is hereby, vested with full power to seize and confiscate all the whiskey which may be introduced into said nation, except that used at public stands, or brought in by the permit of the agent or the principal chiefs of the three districts.

ART. 13. To enable the mingoes, chiefs, and headmen of the Choctaw nation to raise and organize a corps of light horse, consisting of ten in each district, so that good order may be maintained, and that all men, both white and red, may be compelled to pay their just debts, it is stipulated and agreed that the sum of two hundred dollars shall be appropriated by the United States, for each district, annually, and placed in the hands of the agent, to pay the expenses incurred in raising and establishing said corps, which is to act as executive officers, in maintaining good order, and compelling bad men to remove from the nation, who are not authorized to live in it by a regular permit from the agent.

ART. 14. Whereas the father of the beloved chief Mushulatubbee, of the Lower Towns, for and during his life, did receive from the United States the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, annually, it is hereby stipulated that his son and successor, Mushulatubbee, shall annually be paid the same amount during his natural life, to commence from the ratification of this treaty.

ART. 15. The peace and harmony subsisting between the Choctaw nation of Indians and the United States is hereby renewed, continued, and declared to be perpetual.

ART. 16. These articles shall take effect and become obligatory on the contracting parties so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States, and the mingoes, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals at the place above written, this eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty, and of the independence of the United States the forty-fifth.

ART. 2. The said Henry Atkinson, brigadier general of United States army, and Benjamin O'Fallon, Indian agent for the tribes on the Missouri, on the part of the United States, hereby stipulate and agree that, in consideration of the relinquishment of title by the Maha nation, as stated in the preceding article, the United States will pay to the Maha nation thirty smooth-bored guns, one nest of brass kettles, sixty-three point Mackinaw blankets, two hundred and twenty-five yards of strouding, two hundred pounds of powder, four hundred pounds of lead, in balls, one thousand flints, forty-eight dozen belt knives, and two hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, in or before the month of June next, at this place, provided this convention is duly ratified by the Government of the United States.

ART. 3. The United States grant to the Maha nation the privilege of hunting on such parts of the aforesaid ceded tract as may not be used for military purposes, trading establishments, farming, and range for stock.

Done at the place and on the day and year first above written.

H. ATKINSON, Brig. Gen. U. S. Army.

B. O'FALLON, U. S. Indian Agent.

TREATY WITH THE KICKAPOOS.

A treaty made and concluded at Edwardsville, in the State of Illinois, between Auguste Chouteau and Benjamin Stephenson, commissioners on the part and behalf of the United States of America, of the one part, and the undersigned principal chiefs and warriors of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, on the part and behalf of said tribe, of the other part.

ARTICLE 1. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and their said tribe, for and in consideration of the promises and stipulations hereinafter made, do hereby cede and relinquish to the United States, forever, all their right, interest, and title, of, in, and to the following tracts of land, viz:

All their land on the southeast side of the Wabash river, including the principal village in which their ancestors formerly resided, consisting of a large tract, to which they have had from time immemorial, and now have, a just right, that they have never heretofore ceded, or otherwise disposed of, in any manner whatever.

Also, all the land within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning on the Wabash river, at the upper point of their cession made by the second article of their treaty at Vincennes, on the ninth December, one thousand eight hundred and nine; running thence, northwestwardly, to the dividing line between the States of Illinois and Indiana; thence, along said line, to the Kankakee river; thence, with said river, to the Illinois river; thence, down the latter, to its mouth; thence, with a direct line, to the northwest corner of the Vincennes tract, as recognised in the treaty with the Piankeshaw tribe of Indians, at Vincennes, on the thirtieth December, one thousand eight hundred and five; and thence, with the western and northern boundaries of the cessions heretofore made by the said Kickapoo tribe of Indians, to the beginning: of which last-described tract of land the said Kickapoo tribe claim a large portion by descent from their ancestors, and the balance by conquest from the Illinois nation, and uninterrupted possession for more than half a century.

ART. 2. The said tribe hereby confirm all their former treaties with the United States, and relinquish to them all claim to every portion of their lands which may have been ceded by any other tribe or tribes, and all and every demand which they might have had in consequence of the second article of the treaty made with the Pattawatamie nation of Indians, at St. Mary's, on the second October, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

ART. 3. The said tribe acknowledge themselves now to be, and promise to continue, under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other nation, power, or sovereign whatever.

ART. 4. The said tribe release the United States from all obligations imposed by any treaties heretofore made with them.

ART. 5. The United States, in lieu of all former stipulations, and in consideration of cessions of land heretofore made by the said tribe, promise to pay them, at their town on the waters of the Osage river, two thousand dollars, in silver, annually, for fifteen successive years.

ART. 6. In consideration of the cession made by the aforesaid tribe, in the first article of this treaty, the United States, in addition to three thousand dollars worth of merchandise this day paid to the said tribe, hereby cede to them and their heirs, forever, a certain tract of land lying in the Territory of Missouri, and included within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning at the confluence of the rivers Pomme de Terre and Osage; thence, up said river Pomme de Terre, to the dividing ridge which separates the waters of Osage and White rivers; thence, with said ridge, and westwardly, to the Osage line; thence, due north, with said line, to Nerve creek; thence, down the same, to a point due south of the mouth of White Clay or Richard creek; thence, north, to the Osage river; thence, down said river, to the beginning: Provided, nevertheless, That the said tribe shall never sell the said land without the consent of the President of the United States.

ART. 7. The United States promise to guaranty to the said tribe the peaceable possession of the tract of land hereby ceded to them, and to restrain and prevent all white persons from hunting, settling, or otherwise intruding upon it. But any citizen or citizens of the United States, being lawfully authorized for that purpose, shall be permitted to pass and repass through the said tract, and to navigate the waters thereof, without any hindrance, toll, or exaction from the said tribe.

ART. 8. For the purpose of facilitating the removal of the said tribe to the tract of land hereby ceded to them, the United States will furnish them with two boats, well manned, to transport their property from any point they may designate on the Illinois river; and some judicious citizen shall be selected to accompany them in their passage through the white settlements to their intended residence.

ART. 9. The United States will take the said Kickapoo tribe under their care and patronage, and will afford them protection against all persons whatever, provided they conform to the laws of the United States, and refrain from making war, or giving any insult or offence to any other Indian tribe, or to any foreign nation, without first obtaining the approbation and consent of the United States.

ART. 10. The said tribe, in addition to their above-described cessions, do hereby cede and relinquish to the United States, generally, and without reservation, all other tracts of land to which they have any right or title on the left side of the Illinois and Mississippi rivers.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners aforesaid, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors, as aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals. Done at Edwardsville, in the State of Illinois, this thirtieth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, and of the independence of the United States the forty-fourth.

TREATY WITH THE KICKAPOOS.

A treaty made and concluded by and between Auguste Chouteau and Benjamin Stephenson, commissioners of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said States, of the one part, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, on the part and behalf of their said nation, of the other part; the same being supplementary to, and amendatory of, the treaty made and concluded at Edwardsville, on the thirtieth July, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, between the United States and the said Kickapoo nation.

ARTICLE I. It is agreed between the United States and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians that the sixth article of the treaty to which this is supplementary shall be, and the same is hereby, altered and amended so as to read as follows, viz:

In consideration of, and exchange for, the cession made by the aforesaid tribe, in the first article of this treaty, the United States, in addition to three thousand dollars worth of merchandise, this day paid to the said tribe, hereby cede to the said tribe, to be by them possessed, in like manner as the lands ceded by the first article of this treaty by them to the United States were possessed, a certain tract of land in the Territory of Missouri, and included within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning at the confluence of the rivers Pomme de Terre and Osage; thence, up said river Pomme de Terre, to the dividing ridge which separates the waters of Osage and White rivers; thence, with said ridge, and westwardly, to the Osage line; thence, due north, with said line, to Nerve creek; thence, down the same, to a point due south of the mouth of White Clay or Richard creek; thence, north, to the Osage river; thence, down said river, to the beginning.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners aforesaid, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors, as aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals. AUGUSTE CHOUTEAU,
BENJAMIN STEPHENSON.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and warriors of the Kickapoo nation.]

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 8, 1819.

Your letter of the 19th ultimo has been received. The plan you propose for extinguishing the title of the Weas to the reserve of the Raccoon creek, and removing them from their present residence, is approved; and you are at liberty to offer them a sum in gross, or payable in annual instalments, as may be most agreeable to them, in lieu of their present annuity.

It is desirable that the Weas, as well as the Kickapoos, in case treaties are concluded with them, should be removed to the country west of the Mississippi, where a more extended scope is afforded for the indulgence of their barbarous propensities and habits.

It is important, in an economical point of view, that the meetings which you are about to hold with these tribes of Indians should be terminated in as short a time as possible. The agent has been instructed as to the rations it may be necessary to issue at them.

I have the honor, &c.

BENJAMIN PARKE, Vincennes.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 5, 1820.

I have received your letters of the 10th, 11th, and 17th ultimo. In relation to procuring cessions of land from the Indians, the Government has decided that it would be inexpedient to obtain any further extinguishment of Indian title except at the Sault de St. Marie, where it is the wish of the Department that an inconsiderable cession, not exceeding ten miles square, (unless strong reasons for a greater cession should present themselves from an actual inspection of the country,) should be acquired upon the most reasonable terms, so as to comprehend the proposed military position there.

Herewith you will receive a plat of the country about the Sault de St. Marie, on which is indicated the military site intended to be occupied for defence. You will also procure the cession of the islands containing plaster, provided these islands are clearly within the boundary of the United States, and can be obtained without any considerable expense. A commission authorizing you to hold these treaties will be forwarded to you in a few days. The reason, in part, for the decision not to procure other cessions, is the dissatisfaction manifested in Congress at a too rapid extinguishment of Indian title. By extinguishing at remote points, this dissatisfaction will probably be increased, and may tend to prevent our obtaining other cessions at more important points.

As it is desirable to know by what title the people at Green Bay and Prairie du Chien hold their lands, and whether or not the Indian titles to those lands were extinguished by the French, at any period subsequent to their possession of the country, (which is the impression of this Department,) you will communicate such information as you possess, or may obtain during your tour, on this subject.

In addition to Mr. Schoolcraft, Captain Douglass of the engineer corps has been ordered to join you; and Mr. Whitney, in whose behalf application has been made for that purpose, may accompany you, if you can accommodate him. Should he accompany you, he will be allowed the same compensation made to Mr. Schoolcraft, who will be allowed one dollar and fifty cents a day for the time actually employed.

Upon your report upon Judge Riley's claim, it was decided that the Government was under no obligation to assume the payment of the Indian debt due to him; but, in consideration of his zeal and exertions, and of the influence of these upon your negotiations with the Indians, he has been allowed a compensation in full, which is satisfactory to him.

The money due on last year's estimate, and $20,000 on account of this year's expenses of your superintendency, will be immediately remitted to you; in conformity with your suggestions, in future, funds for your superintendency will be remitted to you semi-annually. In order to ascertain the amount which ought to be remitted, and to keep the Department apprized of the nature of the disbursements in your superintendency, you will furnish semi-annual estimates, under the several heads, of disbursements of the several agencies under your control.

I send, herewith, a copy of a letter, with its enclosures, from Colonel Smith of the 3d regiment, to which I call your particular attention. You will see in the transactions alluded to that certain individuals of the Winnebagoes, Chippewas, and Menomonies have evinced a hostile spirit, which must be repressed. On your arrival in the country of these tribes, you will represent to them the desire of the Government to cultivate friendly dispositions towards them, but which cannot be continued unless they effectually restrain the hostile conduct of their people.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor LEWIS CASS, Detroit.

J. C. CALHOUN.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 1, 1820.

I enclose you a commission to treat with the Indians of the Michigan Territory. The sum of $20,000 has been appropriated to defray the expense of the proposed treaty. The time, place, and mode of conducting the treaty are left discretionary with you, taking care that the whole expenses of the treaty, including the expenses of your commission, presents, and rations, do not exceed the sum appropriated. Requisition will be made on the issuing commissary at Detroit for the provisions which may be required.

It is the wish of the President that the whole of the Indian titles within the peninsula of Michigan should be extinguished, in order to strengthen our population and resources in that heretofore feeble portion of our country. Any suitable arrangement by which the tribes who now inhabit it can be induced to change their residence to the west of Lake Michigan, or even to the west of the Mississippi, will meet with his approbation.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars per diem for the time you are actually engaged, and that of your secretary, whom you are authorized to appoint, at the rate of five dollars per diem for the time actually engaged. Your certificate of honor as to the time will be a sufficient voucher. Similar certificates as to the amount and kind of presents authorized by you, and to whom distributed, will be required.

The issue of provisions will be made according to the enclosed circular.

The expense which may be incurred will be paid by your draft on the receiver of public money, except the expense of furnishing the provisions, which will be adjusted here, by giving the appropriation for the commissary's department a credit to the amount of the value of the provisions issued.

I have the honor to be, &c.

LEWIS CASS and }
SOLOMON SIBLEY, } Commissioners, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 10, 1820.

You will see by the enclosed copy of a resolution that the Senate have refused to ratify the treaty with the Kickapoo Indians, concluded with them the 30th of July, 1819, for the reasons therein stated.

The President requests you to take measures to amend the treaty conformably to the resolution of the Senate. It is hoped no objections will be made to this alteration by the Indians, as it is of but little importance to them whether they hold their lands according to the tenure of the present treaty, or conformably to the terms of the resolution of the Senate, especially as it is believed the present treaty may be susceptible of the interpretation required by the Senate in the proposed alterations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 1, 1820.

Your letter of the 25th August has been received. The annuity to be paid to the Kickapoos by the treaty which you had concluded with them cannot be paid until the treaty is finally ratified by the Senate, and an appropriation made to carry it into effect. I am glad to find you have succeeded in obtaining the alteration in the treaty, for which it was returned to you, by order of the Senate; and will take the earliest opportunity, after you have transmitted it to this Department, to lay it before that body. When the treaty is ratified, and the necessary appropriations made, (which will, no doubt, be done early in the ensuing session of Congress,) its stipulations will be promptly and faithfully complied with. The Department is satisfied as to the economy with which the negotiation has been conducted.

I have, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 5, 1820.

I enclose extracts of letters received from Mr. Graham, Indian agent for Illinois, relative to a claim on the part of the Pattawatamies to the country which has been ceded by the treaty concluded with the Kaskaskias and other tribes of Indians, by Messrs. Edwards and Chouteau, in September, 1818, and by the treaty concluded with the Kickapoos, in the course of the last year, by Messrs. Chouteau and Stephenson.

As this Department does not possess sufficient information to decide upon the claim of the Pattawatamies, I have to request you will furnish me with all the information you possess, or can obtain, upon the subject, as early as practicable.

I have, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency WILLIAM CLARK, St. Louis.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 11, 1820.

I have received your letter of the 11th ultimo. The treaty which was made last year with the Kickapoos not having been ratified by the Senate, no appropriation was made by Congress for the payment of the annuity.

Until the treaty, as recently amended, be approved by the Senate, no remittance on account of annuities can be made. So soon as Congress meet, the President will submit the treaty to the Senate; and, if ratified, the annuities will be immediately sent to the Kickapoos, through the proper agent, who will be instructed to use all suitable means to preserve peace between them and the Osages.

But, in the mean time, as I have no doubt but the tribe will be in great want of their annuity, I have instructed Governor Clark to draw on the Department for the amount payable on the passage of the appropriation. If the Governor can negotiate a bill on this condition, the Indians will receive the annuity of the last year immediately.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

DEAR SIR:

CHOCTAW NATION, March 18, 1819.

I take this pleasure to inform you I have got several families of the Choctaws who are willing to move west of the Mississippi; and, I believe, if there was a treaty held in the nation, there would be one-third or half of the nation would move in the fall. I find all the rich white people living in the nation; they give bad talks to the Indians; they tell them not to exchange lands, and some public men in the nation. Some of the Indians has threatened to knock me in the head on this account. I have never heard from you nor the President of the United States about my business. You wrote for me at your house. I hope you will write to me soon as you receive answer. Excuse my bad writing, as I told you I never went to school but six months.

I am your friend,

JAMES PITCHLYNN.

SIR:

HERMITAGE, NEAR NASHVILLE, April 22, 1819.

I have received a commission from the President to hold, in conjunction with yourself and Colonel Burnett, a treaty with the Choctaws. It appears, from the communication I have received, that you are instructed to obtain the sense of the nation whether or not they are disposed to treat, and that the treaty is not to be ordered unless there is a probability of success.

Permit me to suggest the propriety of making the following statement to the chiefs of the nation, by way of preparing them for the cession, so important to themselves, to the people of the State of Mississippi, and desirable to their friend and father the President of the United States. It is a fact, and ought not to be withheld from them, as it will bring to their view their true situation, and open their eyes to their own benefit and happiness; it is this: that a bill was reported at the last session of Congress, the object of which was to enforce the return of that part of the nation which had settled west of the river Mississippi; which bill is suspended until the next meeting of Congress, for the purpose of obtaining the sense of the nation whether a part or the whole of the nation would agree to exchange the land where they now live, and cross and settle with them. What is meant by the whole is, the great body of the nation who are not inclined to come under the immediate laws of the United States. All that are ripe for society, and wish it, would be indulged with a reservation, should it appear that the nation are opposed to the exchange of their present situation. The next Congress will pass a law, as I believe, to bring back those now settled west of the Mississippi river. This will place the nation in an unpleasant situation; for, as soon as it is made known that the Choctaw nation have declined removing to this country, procured for them by the United States, the whites will immediately settle on it, and the United States will be compelled to make sale of it. What, then, will be the situation of the nation? A vast portion of them will not labor, and they cannot support themselves east of the river by hunting. The Six Towns cannot exist where they now are; and the consequence will be, that necessity will compel them to separate, and some join one tribe and some another; by which they will become extinct and lost as a nation. Every friend to the welfare of that nation ought to advise them against a conduct which will lead to that event. Now is the time, and the only time, the Government will have it in its power to make them happy, by holding the land west of the Mississippi for them; and this can only be done by their consent to an exchange, in whole or in part. Now the Government has it in its power to act liberally with them; this is its wish.

The instructions given me are ample; and, if I act at all, it will be with a view to the happiness of the nation, and the convenience of the State of Mississippi. Every friend of the nation must see the road to the perpetuation and happiness of the whole nation in the plan proposed, and the happiness of those who wish to remain, by being secured in a reservation of land where they now are, and protected by the laws, and becoming citizens of the United States.

If they exchange, provision will be made for their comfort until they are settled in their new country; and if a treaty is held, you may say to the chiefs that we are instructed not only to be liberal to the nation, but to them individually.

I would recommend, should this meet your approbation, that you send it round to the chiefs by Young Pitchlynn, eldest son of the interpreter to the nation, that he may explain it to the chiefs and warriors; for which service, if a treaty is made, he will be amply rewarded. If the nation do not treat, you will have to stipulate, as agent, that he will be paid for his trouble and expenses. He has written to me that he would be willing to undertake the service. On the receipt of this, please write me.

I am, respectfully, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Colonel JOHN MCKEE, Choctaw Agent.

MUSHULATUBBEE:

IN GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHOCTAW NATION, August 12, 1819.

We have heard the request of our father the President to exchange our country; but we are informed by some of our people who are acquainted with the situation intended for us that it is not so good as the one we live in. We have made arrangements, in respect to civilization, to do better in our country than we have heretofore done. We return thanks for the school established in our nation, which has been directed by our father; we have made up our minds not to leave the country of our fathers. We are sorry that we cannot comply with our father's request; a man cannot make up his mind at once to suit every object; but we have made up ours to remain where we have always lived.

POOSHAMATAHA:

This day we have made up our minds deliberately to answer our great father's talk. Children, even after they have grown to be men, ought to regard the advice of their father, as when they were small. I am sorry I cannot comply with the request of my father; I hope he will not be displeased. We wish to remain here, where we have grown up as the herbs of the woods; and do not wish to be transplanted into another soil. Those of our people who are over the Mississippi did not go there with the consent of the nation; they are considered as strangers; they have no houses or places of residence; they are like wolves; it is the wish of the council that the President would direct his agents to the west to order these stragglers home, and, if they will not come, to direct them where he pleases. I am well acquainted with the country contemplated for us. I have often had my feet sorely bruised there by the roughness of its surface.

We have always considered the proposition to purchase some of our lands; we have decided that we have none to spare. If a man should give one-half of his garment, the remainder would be of no use; and take two fingers from the hand, the remainder would be of little use. When we had land to spare, we gave it, with very little talk, to the commissioners you sent to us at Tombigbee, as children ought to do to a father. We hope our father will not be displeased; he has made us [happy] from our infancy; we hope the same protection will be found in the arms of our father as formerly. When a child wakes in the night, he feels for the arm of his father to shield him from danger.

The foregoing address to the President of the United States, through the honorable Secretary of War, was delivered by the two great medal chiefs whose names are prefixed to the parts delivered, by each, and subscribed in presence and on behalf of the council.

SIR:

FRENCH CAMP, CHOCTAW NATION, August 13, 1819.

I have the honor to enclose a copy of an address from the council of the nation to the President, which speaks for itself.

I had the fullest confidence, before the council convened, that the Six Towns, at least, would accede to the wishes of the Government. At a council in their own district, at which Messrs. Pitchlynn, E. Folsom, and Mackey were present, they expressed an unequivocal desire to cross the Mississippi; but a few half-breeds, with but little claim to distinction, have, by their exertions and misrepresentations of the country on Red river, alarmed many of the Indians who were disposed to migrate into an opinion that the country affords neither soil, water, nor game. These men are now exerting themselves to raise a party to go on to Washington. The chiefs asked pecuniary aid from me, which I refused, on the ground of a letter from the Department of War, directing me to inform the chiefs that such a visit was deemed useless and expensive, and, therefore, to be discouraged. They are now endeavoring to raise the means amongst themselves for the journey. The party, as far as I can learn, will consist of the three great medal chiefs, (if Puckshenubbee can be prevailed on to go,) Jesse Brashears, Abe Hamilton, Benjamin James, Levi Perry, and David Folsom—and, perhaps, some others; of these, the two latter only have any weight in the nation. If they go, I will also be there, if possible. They speak of starting about the last of September, and I can scarcely expect to obtain permission by that time. It is due to J. Pitchlynn, sen., E. Folsom, and M. Mackey, to say that they have exerted themselves with zeal and industry to accomplish the objects of the Government, and are sorely mortified at the failure.

I have, &c.

JOHN MCKEE.

Maj. Gen. ANDREW JACKSON.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 23, 1820.

During the late session of Congress, an appropriation of $20,000 was made to defray the expenses of holding a treaty for the extinguishment of Indian title to lands within the State of Mississippi; and the delegation in Congress from that State have proposed that you and General Thomas Hinds of Mississippi be appointed the commissioners to hold the treaty.

The President is very desirous to employ you upon this duty, and it will afford him great satisfaction if it should be agreeable to you to accept of the appointment. I take pleasure in communicating his wishes upon the subject, and request the favor of an early answer.

If it should suit you to accept the appointment, a commission will be immediately forwarded to you as the first named commissioner, vesting you, in conjunction with General Hinds, with full powers to exercise your own judgment and discretion as to the time, place, and manner of commencing and conducting the negotiation, (of which he will be duly notified;) and the Choctaw agent will be instructed to prepare the chiefs to give you a friendly reception.

It is contemplated to place the whole appropriation at your disposal, which is intended to cover all the expenses of the negotiation, including the pay of the commissioners and of the secretary, (whom, should you agree to serve, you will be authorized to appoint,) except the sums that may be stipulated to be paid to the Indians in the treaty which shall be concluded with them.

General A. JACKSON, Nashville.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR:

NASHVILLE, June 19, 1820.

On last evening I reached this place, where I received your letter of the 24th of May last, and one from the delegation of the State of Mississippi of the 16th of May, requesting that I should accept the appointment of commissioner to aid in holding a treaty with the Choctaw Indians.

I had determined never to have any thing to do again in Indian treaties; but, finding "that the President of the United States is desirous that I should engage in this duty"—this, added to the solicitations of the delegation of that State, has determined me to depart from the resolution I had formed, and to accept of the appointment. I never can withhold my services when required by Mr. Monroe; and I owe a debt of gratitude to the people of Mississippi and their late Governor for their support in our late struggle with Great Britain; by him and them I was well supported. I feel it a duty, therefore, to endeavor to serve them, when they, by their representations, believe I have it in my power. There is no man I would rather be associated with than General Hinds, nor none in whom I have more confidence.

In making out the instructions, permit me to suggest the propriety of pointing out the bounds west of the Mississippi out of which the land to be given the Choctaws, in exchange for their land whereon they now live, is to be laid out. The wish of the real Indian chiefs is (as I am advised) to perpetuate the existence of their nation, by concentrating the whole in a country that will support them as a nation. At present, they are scattered and wandering over a great space of country, and, if not shortly united, will be lost to their nation in other tribes. The pride of a real Indian is in the strength of his nation; and this is a chord I mean to touch, to obtain the object in view. I therefore wish to have it in my power to point to the land, and describe its bounds where their father the President of the United States means to settle his red children, concentrate and perpetuate them as a nation, and thereby make his children happy.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

To the Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

OAKTIBEEHA, June 22, 1819.

I have the honor to inform you that I have received instructions from Colonel John McKee, on 7th instant, to take the sense of the nation on the contemplated treaty. Agreeably to instructions, I proceeded on the 10th to the Lower and Six Towns. I have conversed with all the chiefs and principal men of two districts, and find them entirely willing to meet your excellency, and hear the talk of their father the President of the United States. The chiefs with whom I have had talks are mingo Mushulatubbee, General Turner, Little Leader, Pooshamataha, and Red Fort, who are all highly gratified that their father the President has appointed General Jackson to treat with them.

I must, in justice to Captain Edmund Folsom, mention him to your excellency as one of your warmest friends. He in his district has effected what but few could. He has been of infinite service to me in my mission, and will be yet more useful with the lower class of people. I beg you will consider him the friend of the Government.

I have some things to communicate, which I cannot commit to the discretion of vagrant mail carriers. When we meet, I can then communicate freely.

On the receipt of this, you will please to write me when and where the treaty will be held. I could, by that means, inform those with whom I have talked of the particulars. My father is now in Puckshenubbee's district, exerting himself to the utmost in favor of the Government. What success he may have, I am not able positively to say; but, judging from circumstances, and the influence he has in the nation, I think he will effect the object of his mission.

Accept the assurance of my zeal for the cause in which you are engaged, and thanks for favors conferred on

Your most obedient servant,

JAMES PITCHLYNN.

P. S.—Address yours to the Chickasaw Agency, care of General Sherburne, to James Pitchlynn.
Major Gen. A. JACKSON.

DEAR SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 12, 1820.

I have received your letter of the 19th ultimo, and am happy to find that you have consented to serve as a commissioner to hold a treaty with the Choctaw Indians; and I herewith enclose your commission and instructions.

I cannot designate particularly the lands which it would be desirable to give to the Choctaws in exchange for theirs, not being sufficiently acquainted with the localities of the country west of the Mississippi belonging to the United States. In my general letter of instructions to the commissioners, you will observe I have said that they may be located any where on the Quapaw purchase, and I should suppose the farther to the south and west the better.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 12, 1820.

I have the honor to enclose a commission for you to hold a treaty with the Choctaw nation of Indians.

The whole sum appropriated by Congress will be remitted to you from the treasury. The time, place, and mode of commencing and conducting the negotiation, will be determined by yourselves, taking care so to make your arrangements that the whole amount to be spent at it, including the expenses of your commission, issues of provisions to the Indians under your orders, presents to them, and such preliminary expenses as the agent may be authorized to incur, shall not exceed $20,000, the amount of the appropriation.

The principal article of expense will probably be the issue of provisions to the Indians, while treating with them, as it is usual for the greater part of the nation to assemble on such occasions. The probable amount of provision which will be required, and the price at which it can be obtained, may be ascertained by a correspondence with the agent, Colonel John McKee, who has been instructed to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, and to take such steps as he may judge best calculated to prepare them for it. The enclosed circular will be complied with in contracting for the provisions and issuing them; to which, as there have in some instances been great irregularities, I particularly call your attention.

The terms on which a cession or exchange of territory will be made must be left entirely to your sound discretion. In negotiating for an exchange of lands, you can offer them a portion of the Quapaw cession in the Arkansas Territory, (the boundaries of which, copied from the treaty, are enclosed,) to be located any where you may judge proper, so as not to include the lands of the Cherokees, the Quapaw reservations, or lands actually settled.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars per diem, and that of the secretary to the commission, whom you are authorized to appoint, at the rate of five dollars per diem, for the time actually engaged. The payment will be made on your certificate of honor, specifying the time that you have been actually engaged. You will also certify the time that the secretary may be actually engaged. Your certificate, in like manner, will be a necessary voucher for the presents distributed under your authority.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

ANDREW JACKSON and }
THOMAS HINDS, } Commissioners, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 21, 1820.

Your letters of the 2d and 5th instant have been received. Agreeably to your request, I have directed the $20,000 appropriated for holding the treaty with the Choctaw nation to be remitted to you, by a draft on the bank at Natchez. In making the contract for supplies, as well as the other arrangements for the treaty, the commissioners are left entirely to their own discretion and judgment; and no doubt is entertained but that the limited sum placed at their disposal will be made to accomplish, as fully as possible, the object for which it was appropriated.

In answer to that part of your letter of the 2d instant which relates to the reservations, which you think will have to be made to some of the half-breeds, and in which you request instructions upon the subject, I have to state that it is very desirable that the treaty should be made without any provision for reservations, if it can be done. But if you should find such a provision necessary to the success of the negotiation, the right of the reserves ought to be restricted as you propose, or in the manner in which it has been restricted in similar cases in Indian treaties, to wit: "that the reserves and their descendants shall not convey or transfer the reservations granted to them by the treaty, but with the consent of the President of the United States."

Reservations in fee-simple will not be admitted by the Senate; but, if made in the manner proposed by you, or as above suggested, they would not probably be objected to; and you are at liberty to adopt that which you judge best for the interest of the United States. The Secretary of War has left the seat of Government on a short excursion to the north.

I have, &c.

C. VANDEVENTER, Chief Clerk.

Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Nashville, Tennessee.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1820.

General Commissioners of the United States, who are appointed to treat with the Choctaw Indians:

I take this opportunity to inform you that I have just held a talk with the Six Towns, concerning said treaty, and they generally appear to be in complete opposition towards selling or making any exchange of their land, (as they suppose that is the intention of said meeting,) although they appear to be willing to meet you at the place appointed for council. I will inform you of the contents of a letter that was written at the Pigeon Roost, by David Folsom, sent to Joel Nail, to be published to the Six Towns and Chickasawha Town Indians; the advice in this letter to the above-mentioned towns was to pay no regard to any thing relative to an exchange of land; not to believe the land the United States has in view to exchange for theirs is of any consequence, neither is the hunting ground of any value. Also, he inserts in said letter that he wishes the Indians to be of one mind till they come together, and then they will have a general talk.

Your obedient servant,

EDMUND FOLSOM, Interpreter.

General ANDREW JACKSON.

OCTOBER, the 6th day, 1820, in the woods.

Gentlemen Commissioners, at the Treaty Ground:

When we left you, we went on to the Six Towns, where we collected fifty-two warriors, and a few in another place; they were all friendly, and said they would have all gone to the treaty, but their chiefs, by the influence of bad men, neglected their duty and told them they did not want any but the leaders and captains to go; in consequence whereof, they had staid at home, and some had gone to the woods a hunting and gathering chestnuts, but they despatched runners in pursuit of them to collect, and said they would start as quick as possible. From there we sent your talks to Quanny's, and we went on to the Chickasawhas and Coonshas, where we found them all friendly, and would have gone to the treaty, but they were neglected in the same way and for the same reason that the Six Towns were; but they all promise to be on as quick as possible.—No more.

EDMUND FOLSOM,
M. MACKEY.

N. B. We met with one opposer; said he was a Spanish subject; he was very insolent, and I had a notion to give him my horse-whip.

M. MACKEY.

GENTLEMEN:

TREATY GROUND, CHOCTAW NATION, October 18, 1820.

For carrying into effect the benevolent wishes of the President relative to the civilization and general improvement of the Choctaws, the following plan is respectfully submitted, with an estimate of the expenses for each year.

That the advantages of education may be furnished as extensively and speedily as possible to the rising generation, it is proposed that there be established four large schools, and thirty-two small ones, viz: three large and twenty-four small schools on the east side of the Mississippi, and one large and eight small ones west of the Mississippi. It is further proposed that one large school and five small ones be established in each year, until the number is complete.

In the estimate $15,000 are allowed for buildings, clearing and fencing plantations, stock, teams, wagons, farming tools, mechanical tools, &c. for each of the large establishments, and $2,000 for the same purpose for each of the small ones; $5,000 are allowed for the annual support of each of the large schools, and $1,000 for the annual support of each of the small ones.

The large schools are calculated to contain from 80 to 100 scholars, most of whom are to be fed and clothed. The smaller ones to contain from 20 to 40 scholars, most of whom are supposed to board at home, and be clothed by their parents. Should a surplus remain after defraying the expenses of each school, it may be appropriated to the support of poor children in the family of the teacher.

Estimate of expenses.
1821. For support of the school now in operation at Elliot, - - $5,000 For completing the large establishment at Oaktibbeha, - - 12,000 Establishing five small schools, - 10,000 <hr/> $27,000	1825. Support of four large schools, - $20,000 Support of twenty small schools, - 20,000 Establishing five small schools, - 10,000 <hr/> $50,000
1822. Support of two large schools, - 10,000 Support of five small schools, - 5,000 Establishing one large school, - 15,000 Establishing five small schools, - 10,000 <hr/> $40,000	1826. Support of four large schools, - 20,000 Support of twenty-five small schools, 25,000 Establishing five small schools, - 10,000 <hr/> $55,000
1823. Support of three large schools, - 15,000 Support of ten small schools, - 10,000 Establishing one large school, - 15,000 Establishing five small schools, - 10,000 <hr/> $50,000	1827. Support of four large schools, - 20,000 Support of thirty small schools, - 30,000 Establishing two small schools, - 4,000 <hr/> $54,000
1824. Support of four large schools, - 20,000 Support of fifteen small schools, - 15,000 Establishing five small schools, - 10,000 <hr/> $45,000	1828. When all the schools are supposed to be in operation: Support of four large schools, - 20,000 Support of thirty-two small schools, - 32,000 <hr/> $52,000

It is believed that a selected portion of the ceded country, equal to what was granted to the Cherokees for the same purposes on this side of the Mississippi, will be sufficient to carry the above plan into operation among the Choctaws, on both sides of the river; and, whether we consider the extent of country ceded, or the importance of the object to be accomplished, will it be thought too large an appropriation?

The fund will be placed in the hands of the President, to be appropriated under the eye of the agent, and will not, therefore, be liable to misapplication.

A large number of the children must be fed and clothed; all must be initiated in habits of industry, and a portion taught the mechanic arts.

The above is respectfully submitted by

Your obedient and humble servant,

CYRUS KINGSBURY,

Superintending Missionary to the Choctaws.

To Major General ANDREW JACKSON and General THOMAS HINDS,

Major General Jackson and suite arrived at this place on to-day.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1820.

This day General Thomas Hinds, one of the commissioners, and Colonel McKee, agent, arrived at Mr. Doak's Stand; also Lieutenant Graham, with a command of about seventeen men.

TREATY GROUND, October 2, 1820.

The commissioners having made some progress in their encampment, removed to the treaty ground, about half a mile below Mr. Doak's. None of the headmen and warriors of the Choctaw nation had convened until late in the evening, when the Little Leader, about nine or ten of his men, and a boy, arrived, and drew their rations.

A few of Puck-she-nub-bee's men also arrived this evening, and refused to draw provisions, upon the ground that it was agreeable to an order given them by their chief. They were only about seven or eight in number. They, however, consented to receive their rations, after a short conversation with the commissioners, in which their interests and the views of the United States were explained to them.

TREATY GROUND, October 3, 1820.

Puck-she-nub-bee and Poos-ha-ma-ta-ha, two principal chiefs of the Choctaw nation, arrived at this place, with about 70 or 80 men. Those commanded by the latter only drew their rations. When the commissioners called upon Puck-she-nub-bee to know why he had given his headmen and warriors an order not to receive the provisions provided for them by the United States, he replied that it was not his intention to grant any thing which might be asked by his father the President, and did not wish to subject him to any expense. He was interrogated whether he knew what the United States wanted, and he acknowledged he did not. It was stated to him by the commissioners that they had been sent here to deliver a talk to the nation relative to their common good; that his conduct was such as was disrespectful, and would be so considered by his father the President of the United States. They also informed him that they understood many wicked efforts had been made to prevent a full council of the nation, and thereby defeat the attempt to treat with them. They had, therefore, determined to remain upon the ground forty days and nights, until the fact could be ascertained, and for the purpose of notifying all the headmen and warriors who were absent to attend at the treaty, and hear the friendly talk of their father the President of the United States.

The commissioners received a communication from Mr. Edmund Folsom, informing them that David Folsom had written a letter to the Indians of the Six Towns, recommending to them to disregard the talks of the President their father, and stating to them that the country which he proposed to exchange with them was not desirable to the nation. This letter was considered by Mr. Edmund Folsom as intended to oppose the treaty, by preventing a general meeting of the headmen and warriors of the nation. A letter was also received, which had been some time since written to Mr. James Pitchlynn, by General A. Jackson, with an insulting endorsement upon it. It related to the treaty, and was broken open before it reached the person to whom it was addressed. It was delivered to David Folsom, who states he left it with the Reverend Cyrus Kingsbury, by whom it was conveyed to Mr. Pitchlynn. From these and other circumstances, added to the verbal communications, and the backwardness of the arrival of the headmen and warriors of the nation, the commissioners were induced to believe that a combination had been formed by some of the white men and half-breeds to prevent a general and full council, and, if possible, to render an effort at negotiation abortive. Under these impressions, they despatched, this evening, to the Six Towns, Edmund Folsom and Middleton Mackey, as the bearers of the following talk:

CHOCTAW TREATY GROUND, October 3, 1820.

Friends and Brothers of the Choctaw Nation:

Your father the President of the United States has been informed that many of your nation have crossed the Mississippi, and that a number of others desire to remove. He has, therefore, appointed the undersigned commissioners to convene the headmen and warriors of his Choctaw children, and, when assembled in a general council, to deliver to them a friendly talk. He also desires to hear the wishes of your nation, and, in treaty, to do such things as will most promote the happiness and prosperity of all his Choctaw children.

With these instructions, we made known to the nation, through your agent, Colonel John McKee, that a general meeting of the chiefs, headmen, and warriors was requested and expected at Doak's Stand, in said nation, on the 1st day of October, 1820. On that day, the undersigned attended at this place, and expected that the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation were on the road to the treaty ground, to meet us in council, and listen to the talk of their father the President of the United States. This is the third day we have waited to see you; only about sixty chiefs and warriors have attended, and we are informed that not more than one hundred are expected. We are told that the chiefs and warriors have been advised by some bad men to stay away from the council, and not come forward to hear the talk of your father the President of the United States. We have also learned, with much pain, that many threats have been made, declaring that any one should be put to death who attends the treaty, and consents to sell or exchange any part of the Choctaw lands. Fear not those threats. The arm of your father the President is strong, and will protect the poor Indian from the threats of the white man and half-breed, who are growing rich by their labor. They make slaves of the poor Indians, and are indifferent to their happiness. They care not whether the poor perish, or are lost to the nation, if they can grow rich by their labor, and by living on the main roads through the country.

Many of your poor Indian brothers have gone over the Mississippi. It is represented to your father the President that a number more wish to go to that country. He has, at much expense, purchased it for you. He invites you to come forward, and tell him your mind freely, and without fear. You shall not be injured. He will protect you. Those who choose to remove beyond the Mississippi will receive there a good country for a small part of their lands here. Those who wish to stay and cultivate the earth, your father the President wants to remain here. He, therefore, desires to see you all at this place, so that each may make a choice freely, and all be happy. You are all interested, and must be heard. As the friends and brothers of the white people, you cannot refuse to listen to the counsel and advice of your father the President of the United States. As soon as you all assemble at this place, we will deliver his friendly talk to his Choctaw children. If you will not come and hear it, he may never speak to you again.

This talk is sent to you by your friends and our friends, Edmund Folsom and Middleton Mackey, by whom you will send us an answer, informing us whether you will, or will not, attend at the treaty, and hear the talk of your father the President of the United States.

We are your friends and brothers,

ANDREW JACKSON,
THO. HINDS.

TREATY GROUND, October 4, 1820.

About eighty headmen and warriors of the nation arrived at this place on to-day, and received their rations.

OCTOBER 5, 1820.

The Red Foot, a chief and warrior of the Six Towns, came in to-day, bringing with him about eighty of his men, all of whom drew their provisions.

The Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury visited the commissioners, and, in a conversation with one of them relative to the letter written by General Jackson to James Pritchlynn, and which was left in his possession, stated that he had never seen it, and was altogether ignorant of the insulting endorsement made upon it. Upon an explanation of the views of the United States relative to the Choctaw nation, he gave them his approbation.

In consequence of the headmen and warriors of Puck-she-nub-bee not having received any provision, about sixty in number left the treaty ground, to return home. The commissioners explained to him the disrespect and insult which was thereby offered to his father the President of the United States. They told him that his father the President was disposed to treat with them as friends and brothers, and that, if they refused to hear his friendly talk, he might determine never to speak to them again. He had Choctaw children beyond the Mississippi, who are our friends and brothers, and he might treat with them in future, if his talk was refused to be heard, or insultingly neglected. After this explanation, and others, relative to the views of the United States, he stated that they had departed with his permission; that they would return, with the whole of his warriors; and he hoped all would be well yet.

TREATY GROUND, October 6, 1820.

This day Mushulatubbee, a principal chief, arrived with only two of the headmen and warriors of the district under his command. He stated that a number were on the road, and would be here in a short time; that some were already here, and that he would make a report of them on to-morrow.

OCTOBER 7, 1820.

Puck-she-nub-bee and the other chiefs appeared to be in a better humor, and gave us a ball-play. In the evening Puck-she-nub-bee made known to the commissioners that he was desirous to hear the talk of the President, intended to be delivered to the Choctaw nation. The commissioners informed him that it should be delivered to them as soon as his headmen and warriors arrived upon the treaty ground. He observed that there was to be a great ball-play on Monday, at which all those belonging to his district would be present. In that event, the commissioners stated to him that the talk would be delivered to them on Tuesday succeeding.

OCTOBER 8, 1820.

On this day, our confidential agent reported that the prospect of a treaty was becoming more flattering. Some of the headmen and warriors belonging to the district of Puck-she-nub-bee arrived at the treaty ground, and received their rations.

OCTOBER 9, 1820.

Agreeably to promise, the principal chiefs of the nation gave us a ball-play on to-day, which was closed with a dance in the evening. All the Indians seemed to be in a good humor, and, as far as we could judge from appearances, in a favorable temper for negotiation.

OCTOBER 10, 1820.

In conformity with an appointment made by the commissioners, they met the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation in council this day. They informed them that although their runners had not returned, yet they had determined to deliver a talk to those now present. They also observed that the same talk would be given to those who were absent, as soon as they arrived. It was as follows:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

CHOCTAW TREATY GROUND, October 10, 1820.

Your father the President of the United States has been informed that a number of his Choctaw children are gone and settled on the west side of the Mississippi river. He has also been told that many more of the chiefs and warriors of your nation are anxious to remove. They wish to obtain a new country there, in exchange for a small part of their lands here.

It is stated to your father the President that a large proportion of his Choctaw children are in a distressed condition, and require his friendly assistance. They live upon poor land, and are not willing to cultivate it. The game is destroyed, and many of them are often reduced almost to starvation. A few are to be found in Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi. A number are scattered over the country from Tennessee to New Orleans. Many have become beggars and drunkards, and are dying in wretchedness and want. Humanity requires that something should be done for them. Your father the President entreats you to assist him in providing for your friends and brothers. You cannot refuse it. Some of your nation work and live well; but a great number would be much benefited by removing to a new country, where the means of supporting their squaws and children are more easy and abundant.

Your father the President of the United States is anxious to make all his Choctaw children happy. He has sent General Hinds and myself, as his confidential friends, to shake you by the hand, and assure you of his friendship and regard. The Choctaws have always been the friends of his white children, and your father the President wishes them to continue to be so. As your father and friend, he wants you to listen to the talks delivered to you as coming from himself. He has directed us to point out to you a country beyond the Mississippi, where his Choctaw children who have removed may settle, and where those who wish to go ever may live and be happy. Those who choose to stay here, may do so, and be happy likewise. Then all the Choctaw children of your father the President will be satisfied.

The greater part of your country here is very poor. Those who will not be industrious, and plough the ground, cannot live on it long. For farming, you have more land than is necessary. As a hunting ground, it has not sufficient game. Without a change in your situation, the Choctaw nation must dwindle to nothing. This is what every good and wise chief will endeavor to prevent. Your father the President foresees it, and has chosen you a larger and better country, where all those who will not cultivate the ground may live by hunting. The land is rich, and water good. The fish, fowl, and game are plenty. He has, at much expense, procured this new country for his Choctaw children, where he will protect and defend them. Unless you make an exchange, and a part of your nation will go and settle upon it, and have a line marked, your father the President cannot keep it for them. His white children are anxious to live upon it. He looks forward to the time when the great body of your nation will be compelled by necessity to remove. This friendly offer of a new country is now made to you, where you can either plough the ground or hunt the deer, the bear, and the buffalo. If this timely proposal is refused, it may never be offered again. The wide and rapid settlements of his white children may put it out of the power of your father the President hereafter to make the exchange. When that time arrives, your land will be more poor, and the necessity of your moving greatly increased. Your nation will then be in a situation truly distressing. The poor chiefs and warriors will be compelled to cultivate the soil like their white brothers, or straggle about as a lost and miserable people.

Your father the President of the United States does not wish to drive you from your land by force; nor does he ask you to sell it, or give it away. He has not sent us here to cheat or to threaten you. All these things have been told you by mischievous persons, who are enemies of both his Choctaw and white children. They have been busy in circulating falsehoods amongst you, and you should hate them. We have come to show you that what your father the President wishes you to do, is as much for your good as for that of his white children.

As your game is destroyed, if you all remain here, you must cultivate the earth like your white brothers. You must also, in time, become citizens of the United States, and subject to their laws. Your father the President gives you your choice. If you agree to make an exchange of a small part of your land, it will be for the benefit of the poor and helpless Indians, who will not plough the ground, and whom you cannot support. He wishes it made upon terms that are just and honorable, and such as will best promote the interest and happiness of all his Choctaw children. Your father the President has no desire to deprive you of a home, but to provide for one part of your nation a better country, where they can enjoy more comfort and contentment. Many of your headmen and warriors have already settled upon it. For this new country you can exchange a small part of your land here. The State of Mississippi has not land enough to support and protect themselves. They want a small part of your country to cultivate and build their Government-house upon. It must be fixed upon Choctaw land in a short time, and you can now exchange it to advantage. The people of Mississippi are five times as many as your people; you have three times as much land as they have. They have not land enough to live upon. You have more land than you can cultivate; it is useless to yourselves and to the white people; you can let your white brothers have a small part, and there will be still enough for you. We do not wish to obtain land from you that you want, but only what you can spare. With so large a country without settlements, the people of Mississippi are much exposed to the invasion of foreign enemies. The Choctaw nation is equally exposed. A cession of part of your country is necessary for your defence. As many of your headmen and warriors are gone and settled over the Mississippi, your father the President must strengthen the hands of his white children and supply their place. He will then be able to protect his white children, and the whole of his Choctaw brothers on this and the other side of the Mississippi river.

Your father the President expects no difficulty with his Choctaw children, if they will attend to those who tell them the truth, and frown upon those who tell them lies. Those who fall within the bounds of the ceded lands, and wish to remain on this side of the Mississippi, let them do so. They shall have suitable reservations, to include their improvements, and be protected by our laws. If they prefer removing, they shall be paid for their improvements. Those who are poor and unwilling to become farmers like their white brothers, let them go; they also demand the care and protection of their affectionate father the President of the United States. They are his children, and he will not neglect them: He has directed us to make provision for them, by ceding them a new country; there they can live in abundance, and acquire riches and independence, like some of those now residing in this nation. As all parties are accommodated, and the interest and happiness of all consulted, there cannot be any honest opposition made to the friendly proposals of your father the President of the United States.

Upon the subject of your schools, no difficulty can arise; your father the President will do every thing in his power to accomplish the object of your nation. He has every wish to educate and civilize his Choctaw children. He will secure to the school now established here the funds and property belonging to it. Additional funds shall be raised out of the ceded land, to establish one beyond the Mississippi. The fund to be applied to this purpose, shall be so divided as to extend its support to both schools. Then all the Choctaw children of your father the President will enjoy its benefits. No loss or injury shall be suffered by the change; but additional aid given to them. They shall also be so regulated, that their funds cannot be misapplied. The advantages of these schools will thus be secured to the poor, as well as the rich, on both sides of the Mississippi.

Many of your nation are already beyond the Mississippi, and others are every year removing. At least one-third of your headmen and warriors are gone over. Your father the President is disposed to cede you the country where they are settling. He is desirous of collecting all those who are straggling about in every direction into one settlement; and, by keeping his Choctaw children together, to perpetuate them as a nation. Those beyond the Mississippi wish it, so that they may not be lost to their white and red brothers. Now is the time to accept of this friendly proposal. You will then preserve that strength and respectability which have always been the boast and pride of the Choctaw nation. If you refuse it, you will be divided amongst yourselves, and must be easily conquered by your enemies. Numbers of you will be scattered over a country not your own. They will be without a home, or the protection of their white friends and brothers. The greater part of the nation will be destroyed. It will be mixed with different tribes, as are many others of the red children of your father the President of the United States.

Should this kind offer of your father the President be rejected, it must proceed from the false statements of some of the white men and half-breeds living amongst you. There are a few who have poisoned your minds, and endeavored to make you unfriendly to the treaty. They are anxious to keep you in a state of poverty and servitude. You ought not to take their counsel and advice in opposition to your father the President of the United States. They ought to be contented with their reservations. They should be more just to you, and not wish to make the poor Indians any longer slaves to them and their children. This your father the President will prevent, if you desire it. Tell him your mind freely, and you shall be relieved from your oppressors. Their object must be riches and power, which you are bound to resist. Your father the President feels every friendship for all his Choctaw children, and is willing to do every thing in his power to prevent this imposition. One part of the nation is as dear to him as the other. He is determined to see justice done to the whole of his Choctaw children, and not let one part make fortunes unjustly out of the other. It is his desire that all should be treated honestly and fairly, and provided with a country where they can live in peace and plenty.

This is an important subject to the Choctaw nation; it is your duty to consider well before you decide. Your existence as a nation may depend upon it. The peace, power, and happiness of the Choctaws may be destroyed by a hasty and rash decision. Your father the President entreats you to be cool and cautious, and to study your true and lasting interests. He has always been your friend, and is desirous to promote these valuable objects: if you neglect them, you alone must feel the consequences. Your welfare is very near the heart of your father the President of the United States. It is his duty to give his children counsel and advice; it is theirs to determine whether they will accept them.

Your father the President has directed us to speak freely to the whole of his Choctaw children upon these subjects; he desires every one of them to express his wishes and feelings also, without fear or restraint. When he talks to you, he tells you the truth, and expects you to be equally candid. He has heard with much pain that threats have been used to prevent the poor chiefs and warriors from expressing their opinion upon the subject of a treaty. We are therefore directed by him to say to you, in full council, that no threats shall be used; if any one attempt it, he shall be severely punished, as he deserves. The voice of the poor Indian shall be heard, as well as that of the half-breed and white man. They shall not be imposed on by the few who have gotten rich by the industry of the poor, who occupy some of the valuable stands on the main roads, and wish to keep the poor Indians here, to enrich themselves by their labor. The whole of the nation are deeply concerned, and all must be heard. Your father the President will protect the poor as well as the rich, and expects that every one will speak out with boldness. His arm is strong, and he will not allow you to be injured; your rights shall be respected. Express your wishes with freedom and candor, and make such a choice as will most promote your safety and happiness.

As children of the same family, we entreat you to do justice to one another. Let every one act and judge for himself. Those who want to stay here, let them do so. If any wish to remove beyond the Mississippi, let them go. Here, they have a country that is old and poor; there, they will settle one that is new and rich. Here, they have no game; there, they will have a plenty. Here, they are separated from their friends and relations beyond the Mississippi; there, they will be collected together as one people. Here, they cannot support their squaws and children; there, they will live in peace and abundance. Will the real Indian chief and warrior consent that these people shall be cut off and lost to the nation? They are our friends and brothers. They have fought by our sides, and assisted to make us chiefs and great men. Will you desert them, and suffer them to be destroyed; or compel them to mix with other tribes, who may be our and your enemies? We may be then under the necessity of raising the hatchet against our own friends and children. Your father the President of the United States wishes to avoid this unnatural state of things. He wants to send an agent and establish a school amongst those who have gone over the Mississippi, and take you all by the hand as friends and brothers. Will you do less for your Choctaw friends and relations than your father the President of the United States? Will you not unite with him, and assist to make them happy? By removing beyond the Mississippi, they receive no annuity. They have also left their land and schools behind them. For the country here, they ought to have land where they live. It is your duty to provide for them, and preserve them as a part of your nation; you can do so, by exchanging a small part of your country. This land belongs to your brothers beyond the Mississippi as well as to you. It is out of your power to deprive them of it. You should not permit a few designing white men and half-breeds to make the attempt. It would be robbing your brothers beyond the Mississippi. It would be ungrateful to those who have shed their blood in our battles, and helped to make us chiefs and headmen of our nations. It would be injustice to yourselves and your children. Your father the President will not desert this part of your nation, which has assisted to fight his battles. You should not desert them. By preserving them, they will give you strength, and hereafter assist in your defence. If you withdraw your brotherly protection from them, your nation can never prosper by such conduct. Every wise and good chief will condemn it; and the Great Spirit above will look down upon it with displeasure.

This is the second time the confidential friends of your father the President have met you in council. If you refuse to listen to his talk, it may be the last he will ever send to the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of this nation. He has Choctaw children beyond the Mississippi, who desire his protection, and who will attend to what he has to say. The next attempt to treat may be made with them, instead of those on this side of the Mississippi. If you will refuse to be governed by his counsel and advice, he will give you up to the influence of those who are unfriendly to both his white and Choctaw children. He can no longer look upon you as friends and brothers, and as deserving his fatherly protection. Think seriously upon these matters. Pause and reflect before you decide. If you suffer any injury, none but yourselves will be to blame. If you will be advised by your enemies instead of your friends, you must feel the effects of your folly.

To the CHIEFS AND WARRIORS of the Choctaw Nation.

ANDREW JACKSON,
THOMAS HINDS.

At the close of the above talk, Puck-she-nub-bee, a principal chief, observed that the white people had the advantage of the Indians, in being enabled to commit their talks to writing. He said that the commissioners were better informed than the Indian chiefs, and knew already as well as he did the strength of the Choctaw nation. It was his wish that all he had to say, as well as the talks of all his chiefs and headmen, should be taken down in writing. He also requested that his half-breeds, who could read and write, might be permitted to perform this duty, to see that there were no mistakes, and that every thing was well done.

The commissioners, in reply, informed this chief that they wished all the proceedings conducted in writing, and that they would willingly comply with his request. They stated to him that his father the President of the United States had not sent them here to impose upon his people, but to promote their interests, by doing every thing in their power to preserve and protect the whole of his Choctaw children; that they had committed the talk to writing which had been delivered to them; so that they might read it over frequently, and understand its contents. It could not then be misrepresented by designing and mischievous persons who were hostile to the best interests of the white people, as well as those of the Choctaw nation.

One of the commissioners remarked that he had once known the strength of the Choctaw nation, at a former period, when they followed him to battle. He said he felt like a friend and father to their chiefs, headmen, and warriors, and entreated them to deliberate well upon the talk just delivered to them, before they decided upon the course to be adopted. They promised to do so, and gave each other the hand of friendship before their separation.

OCTOBER 11, 1820.

The chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation were convened at their council-house on to-day; but the commissioners received no communication from them as to the result. They were, however, informed by their confidential agent that the prospect of a treaty still continued to promise a successful issue.

OCTOBER 12, 1820.

The chiefs, headmen, and warriors were again convened at their council-house this day; but nothing definitive as to their determination was communicated to the commissioners. Appearances continued to be favorable.

Middleton Mackey and Edmund Folsom, who had been despatched as runners with a talk to the Indians who were absent, and who, it was believed, were either not notified, or prevented by threats from attending the treaty, returned this evening. They reported that eighty or ninety warriors would be here in a short time. All they saw promised to come in, and stated to the runners that they had not been notified by their chiefs of the pending negotiation.

OCTOBER 13, 1820.

Puck-she-nub-bee, a principal chief of the nation, informed the commissioners that some of his headmen and warriors were disposed to go into council, and it was the wish of others to have a ball-play. He stated that he did not wish to mix his business, but to do one thing at a time. The commissioners replied to him that his view of the duty set was a correct one; that if his headmen and warriors were disposed to indulge themselves in amusement, it might be proper to gratify them, as they had no disposition to hurry them in their determinations. This chief then remarked that they would proceed on to-day with the ball-play, and on to-morrow go into council. In the mean time, he expressed a wish that the commissioners would furnish their definitive propositions; which were accordingly submitted to them, in manuscript, late this evening. The following is a copy:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

CHOCTAW TREATY GROUND, October 13, 1820.

In order to carry into effect the grand and friendly object which your father the President of the United States has in view for securing the happiness and protection of all his Choctaw children, he proposes to give you a large country west of the Mississippi river. It will be laid off adjoining your Cherokee brothers, so that each can protect and befriend the other. The limits will extend from the Arkansas river, where the Cherokee line begins, south to the Red river, and west to the head source of the Arkansas river. There your father the President wishes to collect all his Choctaw children who have already gone over the Mississippi, as well as those who are straggling about in every direction. It is also intended as a home for all those who will not cultivate the ground here, and wish to go over and settle upon it.

For the purpose of enabling those who desire to remove to that country to do well and support their families, your father the President, who is the true friend of the poor Indian, will give each warrior a blanket, kettle, rifle gun, bullet moulds and wipers, and ammunition, sufficient for hunting and defence. He will also furnish him with corn to support him and his family for the first year, and whilst travelling to that new country. It is his further intention to appoint an agent for them, and send his factor there with goods to supply their wants. A blacksmith shall be settled amongst them, as has been done here; and your father the President will provide for your schools both on this and the other side of the Mississippi. The fund for their support shall be raised out of part of the land he asks you to cede here, and which he wants to get where it will not injure your nation. Its proposed boundaries are as follows: Beginning on the Choctaw boundary, east of Pearl river, at a point due south of the White Oak spring, on the old Indian path; thence, north, to said spring; thence, northwardly, to a point on the main road from Nashville to Natchez, so as to include Doak's Stand; thence, westwardly, to Black creek; thence, down Black creek, to the lake into which it flows; thence, a direct line, to strike the Mississippi one mile below the mouth of the Arkansas river; thence, down the Mississippi river, to our boundary, and round and along the same to the beginning.

Out of this cession your father the President of the United States will set apart one township, that is, thirty-six sections of one mile square, (and, if necessary, more,) to be sold for the purpose of raising a fund to be applied to the support of your schools. We are told that there is some discontent in the nation about part of their annuity having been applied for the benefit of those now established here. Your father the President was much pleased to learn that this appropriation was made, and it is such a one as all wise men must approve. The education of your children is an important object with the Choctaw nation, and they cannot apply their funds to a more valuable purpose. To remove any discontent, if it exists, we will set apart more land in this cession, for raising an equal fund with that given by your chiefs to these schools, should it be desirable to the headmen and warriors of your nation. Then your chiefs will be exonerated from all censure, if any exists, and the whole of the annuity shall remain in your nation and be divided amongst them.

Your father the President loves you as his children; he wishes to have your children educated, and will provide the means out of the ceded land. We are sent here by him to make provision for all, and to endeavor to make the whole of the Choctaw nation happy. Any individual who falls within the bounds ceded will be paid a full value for his improvements, if he does not wish to live on them; should he prefer remaining on them, he shall be secured in a mile square, to include his improvements. There are some who have valuable improvements on the different roads through the country; if they remove, the inconvenience of doing so will be considered, and, in addition to the real value of their improvements, something shall be allowed that may be equal to the inconvenience.

Your father the President has sent us here to make you happy; the land he wants for his Mississippi children, and which they cannot do without, he has selected in a place where it does not interfere with your schools, or the great body of your nation. He must also provide a home for his wandering Choctaw children, and for those in your nation who will not work, and wish to remove. There can be no great and good chief, warrior, or leader, who can refuse to comply with the friendly and humane propositions of your father the President of the United States. Listen to them, and adopt them, and you are a happy people forever. Attend to his counsel and advice, and he will place your nation and its happiness upon a lasting foundation.

ANDREW JACKSON,
THOMAS HINDS.

To the CHIEFS AND WARRIORS of the Choctaw Nation.

OCTOBER 14, 1820.

The preceding talk was interpreted to the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation this morning. The commissioners represented to them the importance of the subject to which it related, and wished them all to hear it. It was a matter of deep concern, and they recommended them to listen and deliberate with great attention. They observed that it was put in writing, in order that it might be read in council, and that they might understand it well. The commissioners explained the views of the President to be, to obtain such a part of the Choctaw country as was absolutely necessary to the State of Mississippi, and as would permanently fix the boundary lines between the red and white people; they would be made to run in such a direction as not to interfere with their schools, or infringe upon the great body of their population. A poor country would be the limit on the east, which would answer all the purposes of grazing to the Indians, and which the white people could never wish to obtain; neither would it interrupt their settlements on the north; and, by exchanging it, they would discharge an imperative duty, by providing for all their Choctaw friends and brothers, and acquire a new country much larger than the part ceded here. Their white brethren could not then ask them for any more land; nor could those of the nation who had gone over and settled beyond the Mississippi. The consequence would be, that the whole of the Choctaws would be happy, and live in plenty, peace, and harmony.

The commissioners remarked to the chiefs, headmen, and warriors, that it was the last time they ever expected to meet them in council, and that they now wished to fix the boundary between the Choctaws and white people, so as to carry into effect the grand object of the President in relation to their welfare and happiness. If they wished any explanation of the talk delivered to them, they were informed that it could be obtained by application to the commissioners. They were advised to deliberate maturely upon the subject, and to take their own time in forming a decision. The commissioners stated that they were not in a hurry, and that, whenever the council were ready to give them an answer to their talks, they would be ready to receive it; they then gave each other the hand of friendship, and separated.

Immediately after hearing the above talk, the chiefs, headmen, and warriors went into council, and were for some time engaged in discussing the propositions submitted to them as the basis of a treaty. The commissioners received no report from them as to the result. The chiefs, headmen, and warriors asked to be indulged with further time to deliberate, as it was a subject of uncommon magnitude to the nation. The commissioners replied, that the course which they proposed was a prudent one, and that they would wait on them with patience; it was not their wish that they should be precipitate, but that their determination should be the result of mature reflection; then all the Choctaw nation would be satisfied, and their true and lasting interests successfully promoted.

OCTOBER 15, 1820.

The commissioners had an interview with Puckshenubbee, one of the principal chiefs of the Choctaw nation, this morning; he stated that he would consent to an exchange of a small part of his country, but not as much as his father the President of the United States had proposed in the last talk, which he had delivered on the day preceding. He said he did not know how the President could accomplish all he had promised to his Choctaw children; and, until he understood more about it, and could visit his friends and brothers beyond the Mississippi, he could not agree to so large a cession as the one proposed.

The commissioners, in reply, told this chief that his father the President had requested an exchange with the Choctaw nation of a part of their land that was useless to them, and no more than was absolutely necessary for the cultivation and defence of the State of Mississippi; they had made such a selection as would not interfere with their schools, or the great body of the nation. They further observed that the cession proposed was equally necessary for the security of the Choctaws here, and to provide for those beyond the Mississippi.

The commissioners represented the President of the United States as having in view two grand objects in the present treaty. One was, the education and civilization of his Choctaw children; and the other, to perpetuate them as a nation, by collecting all those who had emigrated abroad, as well as those who wished to do so, and settle them together upon land of their own, beyond the Mississippi river. Provision would be made for all; and then they would be enabled to live in peace and harmony. By separating the idle and vicious from those who are disposed to be moral and industrious, they would derive every advantage promised by the establishment of their schools; their children would make gradual progress in letters and improvement, and contract the habits and character of the white people. If those who would not work remained here, when their children returned from school they would be poisoned by their vicious examples, and relapse into all their former savage habits; the advantages of education would then be forfeited, and, ultimately, the schools would be altogether abandoned.

The commissioners further remarked to this chief, that if the headmen and warriors of the nation would co-operate with the President in this friendly and humane project for their civilization and defence, he would be compelled to treat with those who had gone and settled over the Mississippi, and whom he was resolved to protect and preserve. They remarked, that if this chief chose to treat on the other side of the Mississippi, they would set out with him for this purpose, in the course of a day or two. They preferred treating here, for the purpose of giving this part of the nation the power of making a cession that would not interrupt their views and interests. They could run the line, so as to include the land they could best spare, and by which they would sustain the least injury. If a treaty were held with those beyond the Mississippi, they might be found to be a majority of the nation, and would make an exchange that might not suit those living here. They would probably give acre for acre, and might agree upon a cession which would cut up this country, so as to infringe upon its population and destroy its schools. This chief, and, through him, all the other chiefs, headmen, and warriors, were recommended to listen with attention to the talks delivered to them, and they would be enabled to see their true and lasting interests.

All the other chiefs, headmen, and warriors concurred in the opinion that the treaty should be held and concluded at this place, and that it was not the interest of the Choctaw nation to negotiate on the other side of the Mississippi river. They then separated and went into council, where they were some time engaged, but came to no conclusion as to the propositions which had been submitted to their consideration. They determined, however, to appoint the principal chiefs, commanding the three districts in the nation, together with six white men and half-breeds from each district, to act as a committee for the more speedy and effectual transaction of the business relative to the treaty.

OCTOBER 16, 1820.

The chiefs, headmen, and warriors again went into council to-day, and, after some discussion, appointed a committee, composed of three principal chiefs of the nation, and six white men and half-breeds from each of the three districts, for the purpose of taking into consideration the proposed terms of a treaty, and to make a report upon the same. There appeared to be a considerable want of harmony in council, in relation to the business before them, which some of the chiefs likened to a twisted grape-vine.

About forty or fifty Indians came in from the Six Towns. They were a part of those who had been notified by our runners to attend at the treaty, and who stated that their chiefs had neglected to give them that information.

The project of a treaty was submitted to the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, to be read in council, and an answer requested to be returned, at a convenient time, to the commissioners.

OCTOBER 17, 1820.

The commissioners again met the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, in council, and delivered to them the following talk:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

CHOCTAW TREATY GROUND, October 17, 1820.

Your father the President of the United States has already delivered two talks to your nation; he has endeavored to explain to you your interests, and induce you to promote them. Your welfare and happiness are his grand objects. To advance your civilization, and to preserve and perpetuate you as a nation, are considerations

dear to his heart. The first he is desirous to accomplish, by establishing and fostering your schools. The second, by ceding you a country beyond the Mississippi, where all who have gone over and wish to remove may be collected together, upon land of their own. Here, also, he wishes to settle all those who will not work, but are straggling about in every direction, so as to preserve them as a part of your nation. These are the friendly and humane views of your father the President of the United States, and he is determined to effect them. If the nation here are so lost to humanity as to abandon those who have gone and settled over the Mississippi, it is a circumstance of great regret. Your father the President will not permit them to be lost. He could not have anticipated that any great and good chief and warrior would consent to consign his friends and brothers to misery and destruction, when they might preserve them, by exchanging a small part of their land, which they can conveniently spare. The friend of such a measure is the enemy of your happiness, and unworthy of the Indian character. He must be destitute of all magnanimity and virtue, and should not preside over the councils of your nation. It is the duty of every good and wise chief and warrior to make individual sacrifices for the benefit of all his people. He should not be governed by his own private convenience, or that of a small part of his nation. No other course can promote the welfare and happiness of any people. If the Choctaw children of your father the President will adopt the measures here recommended, they will be happy; if they should not, they may be lost forever.

We have been sent here by your father the President to explain these things to the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of this nation. These are the valuable objects which Mr. Jefferson promised you, and was desirous to accomplish. You have been requested to listen well, and avoid the counsel of bad men. All we wish is, that you should secure your own happiness. If you will not hear, and be advised by your father the President of the United States, you must suffer the consequences. He is resolved to preserve and protect his Choctaw children beyond the Mississippi. If you reject his friendly proposals, he will treat with them for the accomplishment of this humane object. They are ready to negotiate with us, and will receive us with open arms. If you will permit the obstinacy and folly of a few amongst you to work your own destruction, you cannot hereafter complain.

Such conduct on your part will force your father the President to adopt the course above mentioned; or Congress, at their approaching session, will take the business into their own hands. By the treaty of Hopewell, they have a right to manage the affairs of this nation; and they will do so, if compelled by the obstinacy of your chiefs and the wickedness of your advisers. It will be the last time a talk will ever be delivered by your father the President to his Choctaw children on this side of this Mississippi. You are advised to beware. This is the second time we have met you in council, and the patience of your father the President may be exhausted. He has heretofore treated you as friends and brothers. He has protected you, and more than once saved your nation. During the late war he took you by the hand as beloved children, and defended you from your and his enemies. Had he failed at New Orleans, your nation would have been destroyed. Be careful you do not forfeit his friendship and regard. He does not ask you for favors, but only for what is just and reasonable, and for your good. If you refuse it, you must submit to the consequences. Your evil advisers may rely upon it that they will suffer for their folly. They are now offered reservations and other advantages; but, hereafter, their interest will not be consulted, only as they are connected with that of the great body of the nation. This is the last attempt, we repeat it, that will be made to treat on this side of the Mississippi. When so many advantages are offered you, and they are rejected, it will be hereafter useless. If evil counsel is permitted to prevail amongst you, your nation must be discarded from the friendship and protection of their white brothers. It is painful to your father the President to do so; but necessity will compel him, and that, too, at a time when your people are weakened by emigration, and more than ever require his fatherly advice and assistance.

Your father the President offers you every advantage, and again wishes to preserve and perpetuate you as a nation. The chain which unites his white and Choctaw children will then be brightened. He wishes to treat with you upon terms that will accommodate those living here. He obliges himself to endow your schools, and to provide for the happiness of all. If he is compelled to treat with those beyond the Mississippi in an exchange of land, he will insist upon acre for acre; and the country here may be cut up so as to interfere with your schools as well as the great body of the nation. All the advantages now proposed may be lost forever. We may no longer be friends and brothers, and the Choctaw name here be irrecoverably lost.

Let us entreat you to avoid bad counsellors. Remember that your nation was in great danger of being governed by the advice of wicked men on two former occasions. When two of your Choctaw brothers were taken prisoners by the British, during the late war, they were sent amongst you with a talk, which you heard. They also brought with them, as presents, twelve bundles of goods and war hatchets, which were distributed in this nation. Your father the President then interposed. He destroyed the enemy, and saved your people. When General Jackson was at Mobile, he sent you a talk as his friends and brothers. Afterwards a Spanish agent paid you a visit, and, as he was informed, spoiled his talk. As soon as he received this intelligence, General Jackson immediately despatched the bearer back again, and directed him to say to the Red Foot, a chief of the Six Towns, that, unless he and his warriors joined him within a given time, he should find him and his army in his town in a few days. This chief was told that he must take sides either for or against us. He heard General Jackson's talk; and joined him within the time mentioned. He held his father the President fast by the hand, and, by our united efforts, the enemy was conquered, and your nation saved a second time. General Jackson has come a third time to preserve you, and he will do so, if you will listen to the talk of your father the President of the United States. Are you unmindful of all these things, and of what your father the President has done for you? Pause before you decide. Frown upon evil counsellors, and consult your best interests, and all will be well; otherwise, no foresight can calculate your distresses. Your father the President will not be trifled with and put at defiance. A heavy cloud may burst upon you, and you may be without friends to counsel or protect you. The chain which has hitherto united us may be broken. Listen well, and then determine. Your existence as a nation is in your own hands.

The project of a treaty delivered to you on yesterday contains the basis of every thing necessary for the permanent happiness of your nation. It is such a treaty as all real friends to your nation will say it is your interest to make, and by which your welfare and prosperity will be secured forever. Have the pegs driven down, and the lines distinctly marked as proposed, so that they never can be altered until you request it yourselves, or until you are advanced to that state of civilization when the land will be apportioned out to each family or individual in the nation. Hear and listen well. Decide for the happiness of all your people, and let not a few obstinate and wicked men destroy your welfare and security. We have labored hard to convince you of your real interests. We hope you will see them as we do, and adopt the treaty proposed, (an outline of which has been submitted to you,) in order that it may be frequently read to you, and that you may understand its objects. Should you reject it, it will be a source of great regret, as it may be a measure fatal to your nation.

ANDREW JACKSON,
THOMAS HINDS.

To the CHIEFS AND WARRIORS of the Choctaw Nation.

The chiefs, headmen, and warriors then went into council, but, for the want of harmony, separated without doing any thing. The committee appointed for the transaction of business was dissolved before they made a report by Puckshenubbee, a principal chief of the nation. After insulting many of the headmen and warriors, he abruptly left the council, declaring that he would not consent to an exchange of land as proposed in the project of a treaty submitted to them, and that he would have no further agency in the transaction.

In consequence of the insulting conduct of this chief, the commissioners called all the chiefs, headmen, and warriors together, and informed them that they were sent here to treat with the whole nation, and not with an individual chief. They said they felt themselves bound to consult their welfare and happiness, and they were determined that the obstinacy of one or more individuals should not defeat so important an object. The commissioners desired to know the wish of a majority; and if they were in favor of a treaty, it should be signed, independent of the voice of any one chief, or of his corrupt advisers. They had a right to adopt this course, and it was their imperative duty to do so. They were told that they should not suffer one or more men to sacrifice their dearest interests; if they did so, they were lost forever. The commissioners also informed them that if a majority of the nation believed this chief to be unfit to preside over them, they had the power to elect another; and, should they select an individual as his successor, he would be presented with a medal, and recognised as a principal chief. They further stated to the chiefs, headmen, and warriors, that on to-morrow the treaty would be presented for signature; and, if it met the wishes of a majority of the nation, the business should be concluded.

About forty or fifty headmen and warriors came in to-day, who had been notified to attend by the runners sent out on the 3d instant.

OCTOBER 18, 1820.

Agreeably to appointment, the commissioners met the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, in full council, this day; and, after having read and explained to them the different articles of the treaty, submitted it to them for signature.

CHOCTAW TREATY GROUND, October 19, 1820.

This day the following request, with the names subscribed, was presented to the commissioners of the United States, which they promised to enclose to the President, to be laid before the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, respectfully request the commissioners plenipotentiary, appointed by the President of the United States to hold and conclude a treaty with said nation, to annex to the treaty already signed an additional article, giving Alexander Hamilton, one-fourth Indian, the privilege of selecting one section of land within the country ceded to the United States, which he is to hold as a reservation in fee-simple.

The undersigned chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation also respectfully request the commissioners aforesaid to annex to said treaty another article, securing to Noble Osborne, who keeps a public house on the road leading from Nashville to Natchez, the privilege of entering, at Congress price, one section of land where he now lives, making the gate posts in front of his house the centre of the tract.

The petition, of which the following is a copy, was this day laid before the commissioners. They ordered it to be entered upon the journal, and promised to transmit it with the treaty, to be laid before the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned chiefs of the Choctaw nation, request that our father the President of the United States will order to be sold two tracts of land: one lying on Chickasawhay river, including the Hiyoowannee village; and the other on Tombigbee river, including a village called the Little Turkey; being two tracts reserved by the treaty of Mount Dexter; and that the money arising from the sales be appropriated to the use of the nation; and that, out of the sales aforesaid, there may be paid to Mrs. Mitchell, the wife of Edward Mitchell, for her services in instructing the Indians to weave and spin, for two years and three months, at the rate of thirty dollars per month.

OCTOBER 21, 1820.

The commissioners, having concluded the treaty with the Choctaw nation this day, made the following communication to the Secretary of War:

SIR: CHOCTAW TREATY GROUND,
Commenced October 19, and continued to October 21, 1820.

We have the pleasure to inform you that on yesterday we concluded and signed a treaty with the Choctaw nation of Indians, by which the United States have obtained a cession of about six millions of acres of land, in exchange for the country between the Arkansas and Red rivers: beginning on the Arkansas, where the lower line of the Cherokee boundary strikes the same; thence, up the Arkansas river, to the Canadian fork; thence, up the same, to its source; thence, due south, to Red river; thence, down Red river, to a point three miles below the mouth of Little river, which empties itself into Red river on the north side; thence, a direct line, to the beginning. From an examination of the map, you will find that Little river is about sixty miles above the Great Raft on Red river, and that we have located the Choctaws as high up the same as practicable.

Upon our first arrival in the nation, we found the Indians generally very much opposed either to ceding or exchanging any land. Those who had been in favor of a treaty were compelled to be silent, and every chief threatened with death if he consented to sell or exchange an acre. Upon inquiry, we discovered that their minds had been poisoned by white men and half-breeds living amongst them, and who had been uncommonly busy in the circulation of falsehoods, and misrepresenting the views of the American Government. From these and other causes, Puckshenubbee, a principal chief of the nation, was so averse to a treaty of any kind, that he gave an order to the headmen and warriors of the district under his command to bring with them only four days' provisions, and not to draw a single pound of public beef. When he arrived at the treaty ground, he was interrogated by the commissioners as to the reason of his order; to which he replied, that it was not his intention to grant any thing proposed by the United States, and did not, therefore, wish to subject them to any expense. At this time there were not more than one hundred and fifty headmen and warriors convened to meet in council; and, from every thing that could be learned, the commissioners entertained no doubt but that an organized opposition had been formed to prevent the attendance of those who were in favor of the treaty, and thereby render the effort abortive. Their arrangement seemed to be, to have a partial meeting of the nation, composed principally of those opposed to negotiation, to remain upon the ground a few days, and then return home.

As soon as we distinctly ascertained the views of these malecontents, we informed the chiefs and warriors present that we had been sent here to treat with the whole nation, and not with a small part of it; that all were interested, and a majority must be heard; and that we should remain upon the ground forty days and nights, in order to collect them together, and deliver to them the talk of the President of the United States. We immediately despatched two interpreters, Mr. Mackey and Edmund Folsom, with a talk addressed to those who had not been notified, or prevented by threats from attending at the treaty. This measure had the desired effect, as a considerable number arrived at this place in a few days afterwards, and in time to give their signatures to the treaty. For further information upon these subjects, we respectfully refer you to the letter of the Red Foot, (herewith transmitted,) which he acknowledged in council to be his, but not his language. For the same purpose, we submit to your examination the report of the interpreters, marked A, and that of Edmund Folsom, marked D.

When a majority of the nation had collected, we met them in council, and delivered them the talk of the President of the United States. The views and wishes of the Government were fully explained to them, and the benefits which would result to the Choctaws, if they would hear and adopt the counsel and advice which had been sent them. You will find this talk recorded on the journal, to which you are referred for further particulars.

After the return of our runners, and the great body of the nation were assembled, we gave them a second talk, which appeared to meet the wishes of all the chiefs and headmen, except Puckshenubbee and one of his captains, who still continued obstinately arrayed in the opposition. On the 17th October we addressed them a third time, and on the 18th laid before them the treaty for signature, which had been previously read and explained to them in council. It met the approbation of the whole nation, and all the mingoes, headmen, and warriors present subscribed their names. For a full history of our proceedings, we refer you to our journal accompanying the treaty, both of which will be forwarded from Nashville by Samuel R. Overton, Esq., secretary to the commission, or some other trusty and special messenger.

When the treaty reaches you, we believe it will be found as advantageous in its provisions as, under existing circumstances, we had a right to expect. We have amply provided for their schools on both sides of the Mississippi. This was an object truly desirable to the nation, and duly appreciated by the commissioners. Without providing for them, we were satisfied that we could not obtain the signature of the treaty, securing an exchange as therein proposed. We enclose with the treaty a plan of the missionary, Mr. Cyrus Kingsbury, for establishing schools in the Choctaw nation, on both sides of the Mississippi river; to which we beg leave to call your attention, and hope it will be adopted, as far as the funds will permit, when raised.

We must here remark that we found some dissatisfaction in the nation in consequence of their principal chiefs having made a donation of part of the annuity for the support of their schools. For the purpose of producing harmony amongst them, by which alone our success could be secured, we proposed the article raising an equal fund, and $1,000 more, as an annuity for sixteen years. This produced all the good effects which were anticipated. For the effectuation of a similar purpose, and to bring over the old chief Puckshenubbee, the deserter mentioned in General Jackson's last letter was liberated, upon his producing an able-bodied substitute to serve for five years. It is believed to have had some influence.

The treaty provides that the lines to be run and marked as the boundary between the Choctaw nation and the United States on this side of the Mississippi river shall continue without alteration until the period when said nation shall become so civilized as to be made citizens of our Government, or remove across the Mississippi river. It also contains an article securing to those who have separate settlements within the ceded limits the value of their improvements, should they remove in one year from the date of the treaty. To run the boundary lines on both sides of the Mississippi, we would respectfully recommend for appointment Hinsey D. Downs and Eden Brashears, both of the State of Mississippi, as well qualified for the performance of that duty. For the appraisalment of the improvements of those who remove from the lands ceded to the United States, we also suggest the propriety of selecting Mr. Garrard E. Nelson, a white man who resides in the nation, and Major Benjamin Smith, of Kentucky. They are qualified to do justice to all parties, and will give entire satisfaction to those concerned.

Agreeably to an article in the treaty, it is suggested that Congress should make an appropriation, as soon as convenient, to provide for the warriors who served in the campaign to Pensacola. They have been importunate upon the subject, and should be paid the amount due them as early as possible. A number of papers with which we have been furnished relative to this subject will be communicated with the treaty.

You will receive, accompanying the treaty, a request from the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation in favor of Noble Osborne and Alexander Hamilton, which it is our desire should be laid before Congress, and the object of the petition granted. Should a law be passed in favor of Hamilton, it is suggested that he ought to be restricted so as to be prevented from locating his section on a town site, or on any portion of land set apart for the support of schools in the Choctaw nation. Hamilton is three-fourths white man, and a native of the country. He has been a soldier, and at one time appointed an officer in the army of the United States. He is poor, and we have promised to use our endeavors to secure to him this grant of land, and that he be made a citizen, and subject to our laws. Mr. Osborne has for many years kept a United States stand on the public road running through the nation. His treatment to both Indians and white men has given general satisfaction, and all have interceded in his behalf.

We are also requested by the chiefs, headmen, and warriors to lay before you the petition in favor of Mr. Traion. We consented to comply with their wish; but have to observe that he is a white man, who has married a second time in the nation, and who we cannot say is more entitled to exclusive privileges or advantages than many other white men who live among the Choctaw Indians. The application of Greenwood Leflore to become a citizen of the United States, and have his section of land, to include his improvement, secured to him in fee, is believed to be just and reasonable, and ought to be granted. It will, it is presumed, have a good effect, and in a short time induce all those who remain on this side of the Mississippi to petition for the same privilege. The applications of George Turnbull and Alexander McKee are reasonable, and should also be granted by Congress.

Upon the subject of the petition of the chiefs, headmen, and warriors, for the sale of certain reservations, the proceeds of which are to be applied to the benefit of the nation, after deducting the expense of surveying, the commissioners have approved of the same, and pledged themselves to use their influence to have it effected. The paper with the signatures obtained by Mr. Silas Dinsmore we disapprove as unjust, undeserving, and as a bad precedent. It proposes an appropriation of part of Turkeytown for his benefit. It is not the wish of the nation, and, in our opinion, ought not to be granted.

For the purpose of carrying into effect the fourth article of the treaty, it is important that a confidential person should be appointed, who speaks the Choctaw language, whose duty it shall be to collect all those who wish to remove beyond the Mississippi, and conduct them thither. The blankets, kettles, guns, bullet-moulds, &c., ammunition, and provisions given in said article, in order to facilitate their removal, should be forwarded to the agent at as early a period as possible after the ratification of the treaty. The confidential person appointed to collect and conduct them beyond the Mississippi should, from time to time, report the number to the agent by whom they are to be supplied with the articles above mentioned.

It is also important that the agency should be removed to a point which may now be considered the centre of the nation. We have no doubt, from the information which has reached us since the treaty was signed, that at least two-thirds of the nation here will remove to the country ceded to them, if the intended facilities are afforded them. The remainder of this nation will then be prepared to have the laws of the United States extended over them; and it is hoped we shall no longer witness the farce and absurdity of holding treaties with the Indians residing within our territorial limits.

We have the gratification to state to you that the funds placed in our hands to meet the expenses incurred by the treaty have not been exceeded. The manner in which they have been expended is spread upon our journal, with the receipts accompanying it, as far as they could be procured. In justice to the public spirit of the late Governor Holmes, and other gentlemen of the State of Mississippi, we must inform you that $10,000 were placed in our hands as an auxiliary fund in obtaining this treaty, so desirable to that State. It has not been found necessary to use it, and has consequently been returned.

By this treaty, the State of Mississippi has obtained a tract of country sufficient for ten additional counties. It will open a country within her limits capable of embracing a population double her present numbers. With regard to the Indians, the country ceded to them beyond the Mississippi will have the happy effect of gradually draining the nation of all those whose habits and dispositions are inimical to industry and improvement, and whose absence will greatly facilitate the views of the Government in the civilization of those who remain.

Enclosed with the treaty you will receive a letter signed "John Everett," relative to some goods said to have been stolen from Joel H. Nail, a half-breed of the nation. Upon this statement of Everett has Nail predicated the petition accompanying the letter. We cannot certainly determine upon the justice of the claim, but were informed by John Pitchlynn, United States interpreter, that the provision for his benefit which Nail has solicited ought not to be made. From these impressions of Mr. Pitchlynn, he refused to sign the petition. We, however, felt it our duty, in compliance with the wishes of those by whom it is subscribed, to communicate it, so that justice may be done.

The petition of the half-breeds, herewith enclosed, praying that a law may pass conferring upon them the privileges of citizens of the United States, is reasonable, and properly demands the attention of Congress. There are a number of other decorous and intelligent men of the same description in the nation, who we have understood are desirous of obtaining the same privileges. This we have encouraged, and hope the applications to that effect may be granted by the Government. It may have the happy effect of inspiring a similar disposition amongst that class throughout the nation. They will be enabled to make more rapid progress in education, by which alone they can be prepared to become citizens of the United States. Those whose habits are opposed to civilization will also be induced to remove; and if this idea be properly encouraged, in the course of ten years all on this side of the Mississippi will be made citizens of the Government. Even the old mingo Puckshenubbee has expressed to us his intention of remaining on his plantation, within the ceded limits, and be protected by the laws of the United States.

As soon as the objects of the Government in relation to the Choctaw nation on the other side of the Mississippi are in a state of progression, we would suggest the necessity of appointing an interpreter to reside amongst them. We would respectfully recommend for this purpose Mr. Edmund Folsom, now interpreter of the Six Towns in this nation. He has consented to go over. He speaks both languages well, and may be relied on as a faithful friend of the United States.

You will also receive, herewith, a petition, with a number of names subscribed, the object of which is to displace the old chief Puckshenubbee, and elect a successor. Owing to his obstinate opposition to the treaty until the last moment, he excited the displeasure of almost all his headmen and warriors present. They proposed electing a successor before the treaty was signed, but afterwards determined to pursue the course adopted. When the petition was presented to us, and whilst it was in circulation, we informed its friends that the commissioners would have no agency in the transaction; that it was a concern which belonged to the nation; and that they must dispose of it as they thought proper. From their importunities, however, we consented to communicate the paper enclosed as an expression of their wishes upon the subject.

For the satisfaction of the President of the United States, we transmit an aggregate of the expenses incurred during the treaty, save those necessary for the return of General Jackson and suite, which cannot at this time be estimated with certainty. All the vouchers will be forwarded with the treaty.

We are, with the highest consideration and respect, your most obedient servants,

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES IN THE INDIAN DEPARTMENT, AND THE CONTRACTS
MADE SINCE MARCH, 1811.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 5, 1821.

To the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1821.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th of December last, requesting "the President of the United States to cause to be laid before that House a statement of expenditures and receipts in the Indian department; also, the nature and extent of the contracts entered into, and with whom, from the 2d of March, 1811, to the present period," I now transmit a letter from the Secretary of War, with a report of the superintendent of Indian trade, which contain the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 3, 1821.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th ultimo, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be laid before this House a statement of expenditures and receipts in the Indian department; also, the nature and extent of the contracts entered into, and with whom, from the 2d of March, 1811, to the present period," has the honor to transmit, herewith, a report of the superintendent of Indian trade, which comprehends all the information that can be furnished by the Department of War.

J. C. CALHOUN.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, December 26, 1820.

I have the honor, in compliance with your note of the 19th instant, submitting to me the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th instant, requiring "a statement of expenditures and receipts in the Indian Department; also, the nature and extent of the contracts entered into, and with whom, from the 2d of March, 1811, to the present period," with a "request to be furnished with the information required," herewith to enclose abstract A, showing the amount of receipts and expenditures from April 1, 1811, to 31st December, 1820, for each year, inclusive, with their respective headings. The 1st of April is recognised as it begins a quarter; and the difference in time, it is presumed, will not be considered important, especially as the previous month is in the same order, and embraces no new items. The 31st of December has been reached, so as to take in the period required by the resolution, and make out the last quarter of this year, by resorting to estimates for a part of the quarter.

In reply to the second division of the resolution, embracing a call for "the nature and extent of the contracts entered into, and with whom," for the same period, I have the honor to subjoin a copy of my letter to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, marked B, furnished at his request, under a similar call of the House of Representatives of the 10th April last. This copy is given because it refers to papers which accompanied this letter, and are, therefore, not now in my possession, but which, it is presumed, are in the hands of the Committee on Indian Affairs of last year. The committee, having this copy, can more easily recognise the said papers by the corresponding letters of reference which they bear. There has been no contract entered into with any person since the date of this letter.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THO. L. MCKENNEY, *Superintendent Indian Trade.*To the Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, December 26, 1820.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Superintendent.

B.

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, April 14, 1820.

SIR:

In reply to your request of the 12th instant, to be furnished, as soon as possible, with the information required by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, "in relation to so much of said resolution as embraces the nature and extent of the contracts entered into by this office; also, the amount of debts due, and by whom," I have the honor to submit the accompanying papers, marked A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, and K. These being copies of the original contracts, (although those marked G and H are all that are entitled to be so called,) will show their "nature and extent," and with whom made. Papers marked L and M will show the amount of moneys due to this office, and by whom.

It may not be deemed irrelevant to this inquiry to remark, that contracts are seldom resorted to. A knowledge of the existence of a demand for any description of articles generally implies a correspondent ability to supply it. This office has always, in addition to the employment of agents in our principal commercial cities, whose correspondence furnishes a knowledge of the state of the markets, given information to all persons who have requested it as to the particular articles in which it usually deals; furnishing, when required, samples of the same. Hence, but little difficulty has existed in realizing the necessary supplies by the arrival of the season in which it is proper to transport them. Any interruption or failure to provide the suitable supplies, by the arrival of the season for transportation, would involve, not only great disappointment, but much suffering and excitement amongst the Indians for whom they are destined. This is one of the reasons why it is deemed necessary to avoid, as much as possible, any mode of providing the articles necessary for the supplies that should involve the slightest contingency. The forfeiture and recovery of the penalty usually affixed to contracts for failure to comply with their conditions furnishes no equivalent in such a case. Hence, merchandise suited to the wants and tastes of the Indians is procured wherever, whenever, and of whomsoever it can be had; and the storehouses of the superintendent are generally furnished with the necessary supplies by the arrival of the period at which it is usual to transport them. The route being over mountains and up rivers, the season which brings with it the best roads and the best navigation is resorted to; and it being usually of short duration, is another reason why the contingency implied in contracts is as much as possible avoided, and the markets resorted to in preference. Sometimes, when supplies are offered particularly suited to the demands of this office, if there be means to purchase them in anticipation, they are realized; it being considered safer to realize suitable goods, and goods for which it is known a demand will arise a few months in advance, than to leave them in the market, subject to be bought up, and thus removed from the control of the superintendent.

Nor is it the practice of this office to make advances. This is seldom done; indeed, never, except to mechanics of known probity, to purchase the raw materials for the manufacture of particular articles, and then only on security; and in a few instances to manufacturers, as the contracts will show. Consequently, there are no debtors except those who become so by purchasing at the public sales of furs and peltries, on the time usually given. Such are the cases reported in paper marked L.

In the quarterly returns made to the Treasury, if they shall embrace, as they often do, payments made for merchandise purchased, advances will appear to have been made, until the subsequent quarter's returns are sent in with the invoices and vouchers, on account of which such payments were made; and which cannot always be got up and examined, and transmitted, with the returns, and in the same quarter.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

TREATY WITH THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 26, 1821.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1821.

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration and advice as to a ratification, a treaty concluded between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians.

JAMES MONROE.

TREATY WITH THE CREEKS.

Articles of a treaty entered into at the Indian Spring, in the Creek nation, by Daniel M. Forney, of the State of North Carolina, and David Meriwether, of the State of Georgia, specially appointed for that purpose, on the part of the United States, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Creek nation, in council assembled.

ARTICLE 1. The chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Creek nation, in behalf of the said nation, do, by these presents, cede to the United States all that tract or parcel of land situate, lying, and being east of the following bounds and limits, viz: Beginning on the east bank of Flint river, where Jackson's line crosses; running thence up the eastern bank of the same, along the water's edge, to the head of the principal western branch; from thence, the nearest and a direct line to the Chatahoochee river; up the eastern bank of the said river, along the water's edge, to the Shallow Ford, where the present boundary line between the State of Georgia and the Creek nation touches the said river: Provided, however, That if the said line should strike the Chatahoochee river below the Creek village Buzzard-roost, there shall be a setoff made, so as to leave the said village one mile within the Creek nation; excepting and reserving to the Creek nation the title and possession, in the manner and form specified, to all the land hereafter excepted, viz: one thousand acres to be laid off in a square so as to include the Indian spring in the centre thereof; as also six hundred and forty acres on the western bank of the Oakmulgee river, so as to include the improvements at present in the possession of the Indian chief General McIntosh.

ART. 2. It is hereby stipulated, by the contracting parties, that the title and possession of the following tracts of land shall continue in the Creek nation, so long as the present occupants shall remain in the personal possession thereof, viz: one mile square, each, to include, as near as may be, in the centre thereof, the improvements of Michey Barnard, James Barnard, Buckey Barnard, Cussena Barnard, and Efaumathlaw, on the east side of Flint river; which reservations shall constitute a part of the cession made by the first article, so soon as they shall be abandoned by the present occupants.

ART. 3. It is hereby stipulated by the contracting parties, that, so long as the United States continue the Creek agency at its present situation on Flint river, the land included within the following boundary, viz: beginning on the east bank of Flint river, at the mouth of the Boggy branch, and running out, at right angles from the river, one mile and a half; thence up, and parallel with the river, three miles; thence, parallel with the first line, to the river; and thence, down the river, to the place of beginning, shall be reserved to the Creek nation for the use of the United States agency, and shall constitute a part of the cession made by the first article whenever the agency shall be removed.

ART. 4. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, on the part of the United States, as a consideration for the land ceded by the Creek nation by the first article, that there shall be paid to the Creek nation, by the United States, ten thousand dollars in hand, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged; forty thousand dollars as soon as practicable after the ratification of this convention; five thousand dollars, annually, for two years thereafter; sixteen thousand dollars, annually, for five years thereafter; and ten thousand dollars, annually, for six years thereafter; making, in the whole, fourteen payments in fourteen successive years, without interest, in money or goods and implements of husbandry, at the option of the Creek nation, seasonably signified, from time to time, through the agent of the United States residing with the said nation, to the Department of War. And, as a further consideration for said cession, the United States do hereby agree to pay to the State of Georgia whatever balance may be found due by the Creek nation to the citizens of the said State, whenever the same shall be ascertained, in conformity with the reference made by the commissioners of Georgia, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Creek nation, to be paid in five annual instalments, without interest, provided the same shall not exceed the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; the commissioners of Georgia executing to the Creek nation a full and final relinquishment of all the claims of the citizens of Georgia against the Creek nation, for property taken or destroyed prior to the act of Congress of one thousand eight hundred and two, regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes.

ART. 5. The President of the United States shall cause the line to be run from the head of Flint river to the Chatahoochee river, and the reservations made to the Creek nation, to be laid off in the manner specified in the first, second, and third articles of this treaty, at such time and in such manner as he may deem proper, giving timely notice to the Creek nation; and this convention shall be obligatory on the contracting parties as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the Government of the United States.

Done at the Indian Spring, this eighth day of January, A. D. eighteen hundred and twenty-one.

D. M. FORNEY,
D. MERIWETHER

[Signed, also, by the headmen, chiefs, and warriors of the Creek nation.]

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 8, 1820.

I enclose you a commission to treat with the Creek Indians, and the sum of $30,000 has been appropriated to defray the expense of the treaty with them and the Cherokees; but, from a belief that this sum would not be adequate to treat with success with both nations, it has been determined, after consulting the delegation from Georgia, to make the first efforts with the former nation; and to expend, should it be found necessary to success, the whole sum appropriated in treating with them. You will, therefore, consider that amount as subject to your control in your treaty with the Creeks, taking care so to make your arrangements that the whole amount spent in the negotiation (including the expenses of your commission, issues of provisions to the Indians under your orders, presents to them, and such preliminary expenses as the agent may be authorized to incur,) shall not exceed $30,000. The principal articles of expense will probably be the issue of provisions to the Indians while treating with them, as it is usual for the greater part of the nation to assemble on such occasions. The probable amount of provision which will be required, and the price at which it can be obtained, can be ascertained by a correspondence with the agent, General D. B. Mitchell, who has been instructed to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, and to take such steps as he may judge best calculated to prepare them for it. The enclosed circular will be complied with in contracting for the provisions, and in issuing them; to which, as there has, in some instances, been great irregularity, I particularly call your attention. On consulting with the members from Georgia, I am of the impression that a cession from the Creeks of the northern portion of their territory, so as to admit of a white population between them and the Cherokees, would be preferred, which you will accordingly first propose and urge on them. In the event of their agreeing to such a proposition, it may be proper to observe that there is some uncertainty as to the true line between the Creeks and the Cherokees; and that, after investigating the subject two years ago in the presence of a delegation from both nations, it is believed that the claims of the Creeks do not justly extend north of a line drawn due west from the high shoal of the Appalachee. Should they refuse the cession proposed, it would be next most desirable to obtain a cession to extend from the northern limits of the Creek territory, south, along the line between Georgia and the Creek Indians, to be extended as far south and west as can be obtained.

The sum to be stipulated for any cession which may be made must be left very much to your sound discretion, taking into consideration the extent and quality of the country to be ceded; but, rather than the treaty should fail, the price ought to be liberal. In no event, however, ought a price to be given which, on comparison with that usually given for Indian cessions, might be considered extravagant. The price given for the last cession, made in a treaty held by the present agent on the 22d of January, 1818, is considered (taking into calculation the extent of country acquired and the quality of soil) as very high, and ought not to form a precedent to be followed on the present occasion. An annuity for a term of years would be preferred to a permanent one; or, if an exchange of territory for lands beyond the Mississippi can be agreed on, it would be preferred to an annuity in any shape.

Commissioners have been appointed by the State of Georgia to claim property of the citizens of that State, under the provisions of the treaties of New York and Coleraine.

You will correspond with them, and inform them of the time and place of holding the proposed treaty. You will render them every aid which may tend to effect the object of their commission.

For the expense of negotiating the treaty, you will draw on the United States Branch Bank at Savannah; of which you will give the Department information. The bank will be authorized by the Treasury Department to accept your drafts, provided they do not exceed $30,000.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars per diem for the time actually engaged, and the secretary to the commissioners (whom you are authorized to appoint) at the rate of five dollars per diem for the time actually engaged. The payment will be made on your certificate of honor, specifying the time that you have been actually engaged. You will also certify the time that the secretary may be actually engaged. Your certificate, in like manner, will be a necessary voucher for the presents distributed under your authority.

The treaty, when made, will be forwarded to this Department.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Colonel ANDREW PICKENS, }
General THOMAS FLOURNOY, } Commissioners.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 19, 1820.

I have laid your letter of the 13th instant before the President, and I am directed by him to say that he regrets much that any difference of opinion should exist between you and the commissioners on the part of the State of Georgia, which might, in its consequences, endanger the successful termination of the contemplated treaty.

The treaty contemplated to be held with the Creek Indians being at the request of that State, and intended for her benefit, it is desirable that the treaty should be conducted in a manner which may be perfectly satisfactory to her; and, for that purpose, as well as to insure success, the intercourse between the commissioners of the United States and hers should be of the freest character. You will, accordingly, co-operate with them in the fullest manner, in promoting, to the extent of your powers, the interests and views of the State, consistently with the instructions you have received from this Department. Yet there can be no doubt that the commissioners on the part of the United States have alone the power to conclude and sign the treaty. The State commissioners cannot, without holding a commission also from the United States, have any such power; and the Governor of Georgia will, through the proper Department, be accordingly so informed; which I hope may remove the difficulty between you and the commissioners, as I infer from your letter that is the sole difficulty. But it is proper to observe, that, by a letter from the Governor of Georgia, enclosing a copy of one from you to General Adams, which has been received at the State Department, it would seem that the sole difficulty was not the one which I have inferred from your letter. I do not understand from Governor Clark's letter that he insists on the right of the commissioners of Georgia to conclude and sign the treaty, but that he is of an opinion that you are not disposed to co-operate with their commissioners to the extent that he was led to believe, from his correspondence with the Executive Government here, that you would be instructed to do, and which, regarding the successful termination of the treaty, he thinks you ought. It is probable that he has received his impression from that portion of your letter to General Adams of the 7th September, in which you decline to furnish him with certain details which he requested. Not having a copy of General Adams's letter to you, I can form no opinion as to the propriety of his inquiries; but I cannot think there can be the least impropriety in communicating freely with them on all points, in order to a full co-operation. Their character, and the commission which they hold, are a full guarantee that the confidence reposed in them will not be betrayed; but, on the contrary, a full and reciprocal confidence may contribute much to the successful negotiation of a treaty in which the State has so deep an interest.

In order to apprise Governor Clark of the views of the Government in this business, extracts of that part of this letter, and of the original instructions to you, which relate to a co-operation with the commissioners of Georgia, will be communicated to him through the State Department.

Colonel Pickens, by his letter of the 11th September, has transmitted his resignation, which has been accepted, and the honorable D. M. Forney of Lincolnton, North Carolina, has been appointed in his place, who is instructed to correspond with you on all points connected with the proposed negotiation.

I am not sufficiently acquainted with the localities of the country beyond the Mississippi to which the Indian title has been extinguished to designate a particular tract to be offered to the Creek Indians in exchange for theirs, should they be inclined to make an exchange. But, in that event, a tract may be offered to them on the Quapaw cession, to be laid off any where upon it (the farther to the south and west the better) that the deputies whom the Creek nation may send out to explore the country may choose; provided the tract chosen does not interfere with any previous grants, or with the Quapaw reservation. The United States to furnish an agent to accompany the deputies in exploring the country. The enclosed extract from the treaty with the Quapaw nation designates the boundaries of the cession, which may be easily traced upon Mellish's map, and also those of the reservation above mentioned.

In relation to the transfer of funds, I cannot conveniently comply with your request, as the Treasury Department has no funds in Augusta; but the commercial intercourse between that place and Savannah is believed to be so intimate, as to render the difference of exchange between the two places so unimportant that you will experience little or no inconvenience from it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To Gen. THOMAS FLOURNOY, Commissioner, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 19, 1820.

I have the honor to inform you that the President of the United States has appointed you a commissioner, in conjunction with General Thomas Flournoy, of Augusta, Georgia, to negotiate a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians. Your commission will be forwarded to you as soon as it is prepared.

I enclose, for your information, a copy of my instructions to the commissioners. General Flournoy has been informed of your appointment, and that you would be requested to correspond with him upon all points connected with the negotiation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. DANIEL M. FORNEY, Commissioner, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 21, 1820.

I am instructed by the President to inform you that General Thomas Flournoy having resigned his commission to treat with the Creek Indians, he has appointed General David Meriwether to act in his place as one of the commissioners of the United States; and I herewith enclose his instructions, which I will thank you to forward without delay. It is hoped and believed that his appointment will entirely remove the difficulty which had occurred between General Flournoy and the commissioners from Georgia, and that the negotiation will be conducted with perfect harmony between the commissioners of the United States and those of Georgia. The President deems it in some degree incompatible that General Meriwether should act in the double capacity of commissioner on the part of the State and the United States, and has appointed him in the confidence that he will resign his former appointment; to which it is hoped there will be no difficulty. He will be informed of the views of the President on that point. Should he decline to act, it is feared that there would be great embarrassment, as the time appointed for holding the treaty is too near at hand to make another appointment. Major Forney, of North Carolina, is joined to the commission with General Meriwether.

I have, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency Governor CLARK, Milledgeville, Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 21, 1820.

I have received your letter of the 4th instant, and have laid it before the President for his direction in relation to it. In conformity with the determination which you expressed in your letter, the President has directed that your resignation should be accepted; and General Meriwether has been appointed as a commissioner in your place. The President regrets that you should have taken such a view of your instructions of the 8th of August and 19th of October as to induce you to tender your resignation. When the former instructions were given, the difficulty which has since taken place between the commissioners of the United States and those of the State of Georgia was not anticipated. The latter instructions grew out of that difficulty, which it was their object to remove. They were intended to be in addition to the former, being more full, and containing some particulars which they did not; but it was not thought that they contradicted them in any essential point. They had the same common object, so to conduct the negotiation as to give satisfaction to the State of Georgia. In fact, as the negotiation was commenced wholly for the benefit of that State, the President was solicitous to conduct it in perfect harmony with its local authority. He was of the opinion that a full and free intercourse would best promote the object; retaining, however, exclusively to our commissioners the right of making and signing the treaty.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

General THOMAS FLOURNOY, Augusta, Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 22, 1820.

The President of the United States has nominated you to the Senate as a commissioner to treat with the Creek Indians; and, in selecting you for this purpose, he has indulged the expectation that you would resign the appointment of commissioner of the State of Georgia, as he considers it incompatible with that of commissioner of the United States, which he hopes you will accept; for, should you decline it, there would be great embarrassment, as the time fixed for holding the treaty is so near that another commissioner could not be named in time to act. So soon as the Senate confirms the nomination, a commission will be forthwith transmitted to you; and, in the mean time, I send herewith copies of my letters to General Flournoy, which you will consider as your instructions to guide you in holding the treaty.

The honorable Daniel Forney, of North Carolina, has been appointed a commissioner to act with you, and has been instructed to confer with you on the subject.

I enclose, also, a regulation for the government of the issue of provisions to the Indians, which I request may be exactly observed. General Flournoy had, previous to declining to act on the commission, given orders to General Mitchell, Creek agent, to make a contract for the necessary supply of rations, and to request the Indians to meet the commissioners on the 20th of next month at the Indian Spring, (near Monticello.)

General Mitchell will be informed of your appointment, and will be instructed to communicate with you on the subject of the supplies, and the time and place of holding the treaty.

I have the honor &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

General DAVID MERIWETHER, Athens, Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 23, 1820.

Since writing my letter to you of yesterday, informing you of your appointment by the President as a commissioner to treat with the Creek Indians, I find that a treaty has been concluded with the Choctaw nation, which renders it necessary to modify my instructions to General Flournoy, so far as they relate to an exchange of territory. I enclose an extract from the treaty with the Choctaw nation, by which you will see the tract of country which has been ceded to the Choctaws on the Quapaw reservation, in exchange for theirs, which might be chosen by the Creek nation; and you will consider the instructions as modified accordingly.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

General DAVID MERIWETHER, Commissioner, &c., Athens, Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 23, 1820.

Your letter of the 7th instant is received. The measures which you have taken preparatory to the negotiation are entirely satisfactory; and it is hoped your colleague will meet you at the time specified for holding the treaty, and that it will be speedily terminated to the satisfaction of all the parties concerned.

I regret to state that, on examination, it is found that the order was omitted to be given by the Treasury Department on the Branch Bank of the United States at Savannah, as was arranged with that Department, and communicated to the commissioners on the 8th August last; but it is hoped that no inconvenience will result from the delay.

Thirty thousand dollars have this day been forwarded to the cashier of the Branch Bank at Savannah, for which the commissioners are accountable. Your drafts on him will be good on the receipt of this letter, should he not have accepted the draft of six thousand dollars, contrary to your reasonable expectation.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

D. MERIWETHER, Esq. Commissioner, &c., Milledgeville, Georgia.

Copy of a talk delivered by the United States commissioners.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

General Meriwether and myself have been directed by your father the President to meet you here, to shake you by the hand, and renew to you the assurances of his friendship and protection.

Friends and brothers: The people of Georgia have complained to your father the President that you have not done them justice; that you have not given up the property which your people took from them, and which you promised to restore by the treaties which you have made with him at New York and Coleraine.

Friends and brothers: Your father the President is very sorry to hear of any difference between his white and his red children; he loves them both, and wishes them to love each other, and has sent us to hear what each has to say. The Governor of Georgia has sent commissioners to talk with you on the subject, and your father the President wishes you to listen to them. Your father the President wishes you to do justice to all his children, and has instructed us to endeavor to settle the differences between his children, like friends and brothers.

Brothers: Listen to the talk of your brothers from Georgia: think on it, and make your answer; when this is done, we will tell you what further business your father the President has directed us to lay before you.

Copy of a talk delivered by the Georgia commissioners to the Creek Indians.

BROTHERS:

INDIAN SPRING, December 27, 1820.

Our headman, the Governor of Georgia, under the authority of our father the President, has sent myself, General Adams, and General Newman to meet you here, to draw closer the bonds of friendship which our father the President hopes will always exist between his white and red children.

Brothers: In order that the chain of friendship may remain bright between the white and red people, it is necessary that they should do justice to each other. This the white people are always willing to do, and expect to meet the same friendly disposition amongst the red people, their brethren.

Brothers: Long before our father the President made a treaty with you, the headmen of Georgia and your nation talked together and agreed to bury all differences, and to have perpetual friendship. We wish these agreements to be fully and fairly complied with on the part of the red people, as they have been, and will be, on the part of the white people.

Brothers: Your headmen and warriors, at a treaty held at Augusta, a long while ago, then at a place called Galphinton, then at Shoulderbone, then at New York, then at Coleraine, promised to restore all the property which had been taken from us by your people, and to make good the damage they had done us.

Brothers: Your friend the Governor of Georgia has now sent us here to lay this business before you, and to listen to what you have to say on the subject. The white people wish to be friends to the red people, and hope that, as good men, on both sides, they can agree upon what is right.

Copy of a talk delivered by the Georgia commissioners to the Creek chiefs.

BROTHERS:

DECEMBER 28, 1820.

We now, agreeably to our promise of yesterday, lay before you a statement of the claims of the people of Georgia against your nation. These claims you have promised to adjust and settle, in all the several treaties which were mentioned to you yesterday.

This business has remained so long unsettled, that an adjustment of it now is necessary for the preservation of friendship between the white and red people.

Look at the accounts; they are proved according to the laws of our country, and we wish to hear what you have to say about them.

The President of the United States and the Governor of Georgia expect the red people to do justice to the white people. They ask no more.

Copy of the answer of the chiefs to the talk of the Georgia commissioners, delivered by General McIntosh.

He said he was glad to hear of the friendly disposition of the commissioners on the part of the State of Georgia; that he feels the same friendly disposition himself, and will now proceed to answer them. He then observed that two commissioners, on the part of the President of the United States, had delivered him the talk of the President; and he hoped the commissioners of Georgia and himself would be able to settle amicably all the differences between them. That he did not know he was called here to answer for the claims of the State of Georgia until he heard the talk of the State commissioners on yesterday; that he had looked over the statement of claims exhibited by the commissioners of the State; that many items in the account he knew nothing about; that, thirty years ago, after General McGilvery held the treaty of New York, on his return to the nation, he informed the people that he had promised to deliver up all the prisoners and negroes of the whites then in the nation, but they were not to be liable for any that were dead or removed, and nothing was said about any other claims; that, shortly after the treaty of New York, another was held at Coleraine, before which some of the white and black prisoners were collected, principally from the Upper Towns, and delivered to Major Seagrove, then the United States agent. At the treaty of Coleraine, a similar account with that now exhibited was presented by General James Jackson, and the chiefs then refused to acknowledge it, except so far as the items therein contained were embraced in the provisions of the treaty of New York, in which no other property is promised to be restored than negroes and prisoners. At the treaty of Coleraine they agreed to restore the stolen property in the nation. That, in conformity with the treaty of New York, they have collected and delivered to Colonel Hawkins a number of the negroes alluded to; that Colonel Hawkins, in all his talks, reminded them of the provisions of the treaty of New York, but never brought forward such a claim as the present one, nor did he insist for any compensation for damage done before the treaty of New York; that Colonel Hawkins once informed them that he had an account, in favor of the people of Georgia, against the nation; that he never laid it before the nation, but said he had sent it to the President of the United States. These things all passed before he was a chief; since that, he has himself collected some and delivered them up. During the late war, the British collected many of the negroes of the nation, and carried them off, but left some of them in a fort, with a large quantity of arms and ammunition, and many of the negroes of the country joined them; he took his warriors and joined the American army under Colonel Clinch, attacked the fort and blew it up; many of the negroes were destroyed in it; those which remained were taken and delivered to Colonel Clinch, for their owners. Some of the negroes yet remained in Florida among the Seminoles. He joined General Jackson's army, went down and took some of them, which were reported to the United States agent, and some of them delivered. Some of them remained there yet. If the President admits that country to belong to the Creek nation, he will take his warriors, go down, and bring all he can get, and deliver them up. He thinks the Creeks have complied with the treaties of New York and Coleraine. If, however, any of the negroes remain in the nation, he will hunt them out and deliver them up, or pay for them.

On looking over the account, he finds many trifling things which he did not expect would be presented. The Indians have also many claims against the white people. He does not think this is the right way to settle them, but is willing to refer all the claims, on both sides, to his father and protector the President of the United States. He observes that no credit is given upon the accounts exhibited for the property which has been returned. When all the claims are exhibited and examined, he does not think there will be much difference between the Georgians and the Creeks. He will not say there is no property in the nation belonging to the Georgians, but he does not know of any; if there is any, he is willing to restore it, or pay its value. This is all he has to say. If two friends, one owe to the other, even individuals, they should not be too hasty in calling for pay, when the debtor is unable to pay. He is willing to pay whatever is just.

Copy of a talk delivered by the Georgia commissioners to the Creek Indians.

BROTHERS:

DECEMBER 29, 1820.

We have heard your talk of yesterday, and considered it over. The friendly disposition which it shows leaves little doubt but that the friendship which is so necessary to the prosperity of the white and red people may be long preserved by a mutual disposition to do justice. We are, however, sorry to find that you do not consider yourselves bound to restore to us the property as well as the negroes taken or destroyed by your nation before the treaty of New York.

Brothers: We are sorry and surprised to hear that you were not fully informed of the object of this meeting. It has been so long known, that we had no doubt but you were fully informed as to the business which we had with you.

Brothers: We, your friends, want nothing but what is right; but that we must insist upon. You were bound to restore all property taken from us, even by the common rules of justice, if you had not agreed to do so by treaty; but, in the treaty of Augusta, thirty-seven years ago, you agreed to restore "all negroes, horses, cattle, or other property, taken since the late war." By the treaty of Galphinton, thirty-five years ago, you agreed to restore "all the negroes, horses, or other property, that might be among you, belonging to any citizen of this State." In the treaty of Shoulderbone, thirty-four years ago, you made the same promise, in nearly the same words; and none of these promises have been fulfilled with good faith. By the treaty of New York, you promised to restore "all the negroes then in the nation, belonging to the Georgians, to the commanding officer at the Rock Landing;" and that has not been done. But even that treaty, although it mentioned nothing but negroes, could not discharge you from the obligations you were under to restore "all property" in the previous treaties. By the treaty of Coleraine you entered into the same obligation, and renewed the same promises, which you made at Augusta, Shoulderbone, and Galphinton.

Brothers: Knowing that some bad men live on our frontiers, who are disposed to do mischief, we are not surprised to hear that you have claims against the white people which have not been exhibited. We, too, have claims which have not been exhibited to you, but which we have always intended to exhibit, when a proper mode should be agreed on by which these respective claims should be adjusted. These claims have not been brought against you during the time of your troubles; but the people of Georgia have waited so long now to have these things settled, that a speedy adjustment is absolutely necessary.

Brothers: We know or have heard of very few negroes having been returned or paid for, except runaways; whilst a number, which have been plundered, and have otherwise got into your nation, never have been accounted for. This state of things has already existed too long. As to the negroes which have been carried away by the British, or have been destroyed in any manner, during the late war, we consider you responsible for such of them as belonged to the people of Georgia. If they had remained here, they would have been safe; and it was your act, and not ours, which carried them to the scene of war; and our headman, the Governor of Georgia, has directed us to insist, according to the laws of our country, upon the restoration of, or payment for, the increase of all such negroes belonging to the people of Georgia as have increased, and an adequate reward for the use of such negroes and property as may not have increased.

Brothers: As to the negroes now remaining among the Seminoles, belonging to the white people, we consider those people (the Seminoles) a part of the Creek nation; and we look to the chiefs of the Creek nation to cause the people there, as well as the people of the Upper Towns, to do justice.

Brothers: We know that a final adjustment of these things is extremely difficult; and, for the purpose of avoiding all causes of animosity between us, who are neighbors and friends, we agree to your proposition to submit all our claims on both sides to our common father, the President, whose decision we will conform to on our part, and hope there may never more be any cause for difference between us.

Brothers: It only now remains for us to repeat that we assent to the mode proposed by you for settling these differences; and, accordingly, will now present an agreement to be entered into between us, which will put an end, we hope, to all discontents.

Copy of a letter from D. M. Forney and D. Meriwether, enclosing a treaty with the Creeks, concluded on the 8th of January, 1821; also, talks in relation thereto.

SIR:

INDIAN SPRING, CREEK NATION, January 9, 1821.

We have the honor, herewith, to enclose a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians. In conformity with our instructions, we proposed to them a cession of country adjoining the Cherokee boundary, but found it impracticable to obtain such a cession at this time.

As an inducement to a cession, we also proposed an exchange of territory; but were informed that they were rather disposed to remain where they now are, and gradually turn their attention to husbandry, than cross the Mississippi in search of game; that they had made a law, by which those who abandoned their country, in the pursuit of game, were deprived of all their rights in the Creek nation; but that, in the event of any town or towns wishing to cross the Mississippi, the nation would be willing to give up their lands to the United States for lands there. With regard to the cession now made, so far as the wishes of the people of Georgia were to influence our conduct, (for whose benefit we were instructed this treaty was to be held,) we must believe that no tract of country, of equal extent, within the Indian boundary, is as fertile or as desirable as the one now ceded. The only difficulty that has presented itself to our minds in the execution of this business is the sum stipulated for the cession. We have endeavored to make this as easy as possible for the Government, by the extension of the time of payment.

The quantity of land embraced in the cession, by the most accurate calculations we have been able to make, falls but little, if any, short of 5,000,000 of acres; for which you will perceive, by the treaty, we have engaged the Government to pay $450,000. But it is necessary to state that the sum of $250,000, set apart as a fund for the payment in full of the claims of the citizens of Georgia against the Creek nation of Indians, must be considered more in the light of a nominal sum than an actual debt; for, from the partial investigation we have given this subject, we cannot believe these claims, on a fair settlement, will exceed $100,000; and if they should be restricted to the stipulations of the treaties of New York and Coleraine, for which the Indians contend, the amount will be much lessened. Upon this point we forbear to express an opinion, as, under the articles of reference, which accompany this, it is left with the President to decide upon matters touching these claims, in such manner, and under such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as he may prescribe. To enable you to judge more correctly on this subject, we enclose the substance of the communications between the commissioners of Georgia and the Indian chiefs; and, for more particular information, we beg leave to refer you to General Mitchell, the agent, in whose possession the Indians will deposite a copy of a schedule containing nearly the whole of these claims, collected and embodied under an act of the Legislature of Georgia. But, independent of this consideration, we believe the whole amount would only be a fair and reasonable consideration for the cession. The annuities were arranged so as to meet the wishes of the nation, communicated to us through the agent, General Mitchell. In order, in some measure, to comply with the expectations of the chiefs, which had been improperly and unreasonably excited, we found ourselves compelled to make a payment in hand, or to swell another item in the account of expenditures, which, to us, was extremely odious and objectionable.

We have been considerably embarrassed in negotiating this treaty, by the claims of the citizens of Georgia, and conflicting instructions, emanating, as was pretended, from the same source. But, however unpleasant this may have been to us, it will afford us great pleasure to have been able to accomplish the views of the Government. Owing to the inclemency of the weather, and other causes, there have been but few Indians attending the treaty, and the issues during the whole period have not exceeded 1,600 rations. General Meriwether, in compliance with a previous promise of General Flournoy, advanced $3,000 to the contractor. The issues having fallen so far short of what was contemplated in the contract, the contractor thinks an allowance should be made him for losses sustained on the provisions purchased. Not feeling ourselves warranted in making him the allowance he wished, we forward you his receipt for $3,000, and have left the account open. Enclosed also is an account of all expenditures. It would be doing injustice to our own feelings to close this communication without acknowledging the great obligations we are under to the agent for his promptness in affording us every assistance, to the extent of his influence, in bringing this negotiation to a successful termination.

Very respectfully, &c.

CLAIMS OF THE CITIZENS OF GEORGIA AGAINST THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 10, 1821.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1821.

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 1st instant, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be laid before the Senate any information he may have in relation to the claims of citizens of Georgia against the Creek nation of Indians; and why these claims, if any exist, have not been heretofore adjusted and settled, under the provisions of the treaties of 1790 and 1796," I now transmit a report from the Secretary of War, with accompanying documents,* which contain all the information on this subject in the possession of the Executive.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 7, 1821.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 1st instant, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be laid before the Senate any information he may have in relation to the claims of citizens of Georgia against the Creek nation of Indians; and why these claims, if any exist, have not been heretofore adjusted and settled, under the provisions of the treaties of 1790 and 1796," has the honor to report:

* Some of the documents here referred to are those which accompanied the Creek treaty. See preceding No. 174.

That, upon an examination of the records of the Department of War, it appears that letters of the following dates, viz. 19th May, 1803, 17th May, 1804, and 22d August, 1805, relating to the claims referred to by the resolution of the Senate, were received from his excellency John Milledge, the Governor of Georgia; but, upon searching the files of those years (which are very incomplete) for the originals of these letters, from which to furnish copies for the information of the Senate, they could not be found. The enclosed abstract, therefore, taken from the record of "letters received," as giving the best view the Department is enabled to give of them, is transmitted, accompanied with copies of the answers of this Department to Governor Milledge, and of instructions to Colonel Hawkins, upon the same subject.

The records and papers of the Department of War having been destroyed by fire in 1800, consequently no information, (if it possessed any,) with respect to the claims of Georgia against the Creek nation, previous to that time, can be given; and the abstract and copies of letters now transmitted, it is believed, contain all the correspondence of the Department since that period touching the subject, except that which has grown out of the treaty authorized by Congress at the last session to be held with the Creek nation; copies of which have already been communicated to the Senate through the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The records of the Department furnish no information "why these claims, if any exist, have not been heretofore adjusted and settled under the provisions of the treaties of 1790 and 1796."

J. C. CALHOUN.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Abstract of letters, taken from the record of letters received in the Department from the Governor of Georgia.

From John Milledge, 19th May, 1803, giving notice that he shall appoint commissioners to repair to the Creek nation for the purpose of demanding negroes detained by it, and requesting directions from the President of the United States upon the subject.

From the same, 17th May, 1804, relative to the claim of Georgia upon the Creeks, appointment of commissioners, &c.

From the same, 22d August, 1805, relative to a deputation of Creeks, and claims of the citizens of Georgia.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to his excellency John Milledge, Governor of Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 14, 1803.

Colonel Benjamin Hawkins has been instructed to accompany and aid, by all the means in his power, the commissioners appointed by the Governor of Georgia, for the purpose of carrying into effect the third article of the treaty of the 7th August, 1790, with the Creek nation of Indians, which provides for the recovery of any citizens or negroes, their prisoners, in the Creek nation.

As soon as the running and marking the boundary shall be completed, I presume that Colonel Hawkins will be able to attend to the object above mentioned.

Your excellency will undoubtedly see the necessity of selecting such characters, and of giving them such instructions, as will insure the most discreet and prudent execution of the mission.

I am, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to his excellency John Milledge, Governor of Georgia.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 4, 1804.

Your excellency's letter of the 17th ultimo has been duly received; and, for fear that any want of attention may have prevented as explicit instructions to Colonel Hawkins on the subject of the claims of the citizens of Georgia on the Creeks, by virtue of the treaty of Coleraine, &c., as might have been wished, I have written again to Colonel Hawkins on the subject, a copy of which is herewith enclosed.

I am, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to his excellency John Milledge, Governor of Georgia.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 24, 1805.

Your letter under date of the 22d ultimo, giving notice of the claims of the citizens of Georgia against the Creek Indians, was duly received in my absence. The General Government, in its negotiations with them, will, no doubt, pay that attention to these claims which justice requires.

I have the honor, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to Colonel Benjamin Hawkins, Indian Agent, &c.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 14, 1803.

By the third article of the treaty of the 7th of August, 1790, between the United States and the Creek nation, it was stipulated as follows: "The Creek nation shall deliver, as soon as practicable, to the commanding officer of the troops of the United States stationed at the Rock Landing, on the Oconee river, all citizens of the United States, white inhabitants or negroes, who are now prisoners in any part of the said nation; and if any such prisoners or negroes should not be so delivered on or before the first day of June ensuing, the Governor of Georgia may empower three persons to repair to the said nation in order to claim and receive such prisoners and negroes."

Governor Milledge has recently applied to the President of the United States for authority to carry the latter part of said treaty into effect, on the presumption that the aforesaid stipulation has not been complied with by the Creeks. You are therefore requested to accompany such agents as the Governor of Georgia shall duly appoint for the purpose, in making proper inquiries, and in taking suitable measures for the discovery and recovery of any such prisoners or negroes; and you will please to afford all the aid in your power for obtaining justice in the premises.

I presume that this object must necessarily be postponed, until the running and marking the boundary line shall be completed.
I am, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to Colonel Benjamin Hawkins, Indian Agent, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 4, 1804.

Three commissioners having been appointed by the Executive of Georgia for the purpose of obtaining from the Creeks compensation for negroes and other property not returned by the Creeks in conformity to the stipulation of the treaty of Coleraine, and the treaty of August, 1790, you will please to afford every aid in your power for obtaining such compensation to the citizens of Georgia as they ought to receive by virtue of said treaties, and for a final adjustment of any existing demands between the citizens of Georgia and the Creeks, respectively.

Your letter of the 8th ultimo has been duly received. It is most ardently to be hoped that such arrangements may be effected at the council in the present month as will be perfectly satisfactory to all concerned.

I am, &c.

Articles of agreement entered into between the undersigned commissioners, appointed by the Governor of the State of Georgia, for and on behalf of the citizens of the said State, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Creek nation of Indians.

Whereas, at a conference opened and held at the Indian Spring, in the Creek nation, the citizens of Georgia, by the aforesaid commissioners, have represented that they have claims to a large amount against the said Creek nation of Indians: Now, in order to adjust and bring the same to a speedy and final settlement, it is hereby agreed by the aforesaid commissioners, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the said nation, that all the talks had upon the subject of these claims at this place, together with all claims on either side, of whatever nature or kind, prior to the act of Congress of 1802, regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes, with the documents in support of them, shall be referred to the decision of the President of the United States, by him to be decided upon, adjusted, liquidated, and settled, in such manner, and under such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as he shall prescribe: Provided, however, If it should meet the views of the President of the United States, it is the wish of the contracting parties that the liquidation and settlement of the aforesaid claims shall be made in the State of Georgia, at such place as he may deem most convenient for the parties interested; and the decision and award thus made and rendered shall be binding and obligatory upon the contracting parties.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this eighth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 3, 1821.

I have the honor to transmit, in compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 31st ultimo, copies of the instructions given to the commissioners of the United States appointed to treat with the Creek Indians. No instructions were given through this Department to the Governor of Georgia, in relation to the treaty; nor has a copy of the instructions, given by the Governor to the commissioners from that State, upon the subject been transmitted to this Department. Upon application to the Department of State, the enclosed note, communicating copies of the correspondence of that Department with the Governor of Georgia, was received, and is herewith transmitted for the information of the committee.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

P. S. The ceded tract is computed to contain within the given boundaries 6,748 square miles, or 4,318,720 acres, as nearly as can be from the meandering of the streams, taken from the best map we have of the State of Georgia.

Hon. DAVID HOLMES, Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 1, 1821.

The Secretary of State has the honor of enclosing to the Secretary of War copies of the communications from this Department to the Governor of Georgia, relating to the treaty with the Creek Indians, supposed to be referred to by the chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs. No instructions on this subject have ever issued from this Department to the Governor of Georgia, nor has any copy been received of the instructions from him to the commissioners of the State.

The Secretary of State to the Governor of Georgia, dated

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, October 23, 1820.

I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 6th instant, enclosing a copy of a letter from General Flournoy to General Adams.

Although the President thinks that the proposed treaty with the Creek Indians can be held only by commissioners appointed under the authority of the United States, and subject to the concurring sanction of the Senate, yet, as it is to be held at the request of the Legislature of Georgia, and as that State has a peculiar interest, super-added to that of the Union, in the result, it has been and is his wish and intention that the freest and fullest co-operation between the commissioners of the United States and those of Georgia should be maintained; and that the most unreserved communications in relation to the treaty should be made to the commissioners of Georgia by those of the United States. He regrets that any misconceptions of this intention should have occurred, and hopes that they will be obviated for the future. I have the honor, by his direction, of enclosing herewith copies of extracts from the instructions which have been transmitted to the commissioners of the United States from the Department of War on the 8th of August last, and on the 9th instant to General Flournoy.

I am, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Governor of Georgia, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 1, 1820.

I have the honor of informing you that General John Taylor, of South Carolina, and General John Floyd, of Georgia, have been appointed by the President commissioners on the part of the United States for treating with the Creek Indians, conformably to the appropriation made at the last session of Congress. They will be instructed to give notice of their appointment to the commissioners of the State of Georgia, and to co-operate with them in promoting, to the extent of their powers, the interests and views of the State. The whole appropriation has been made subject to their disposal, in case of necessity, for the object of treating only with the Creeks.

The name of General Andrew Jackson having been mentioned by your excellency as a person whose appointment, as one of the commissioners, would be very acceptable to the people of Georgia, I am directed to inform you that he would have been readily selected by the President but for two considerations: one, a very strong and earnest request of General Jackson himself to the President that he might, in future, be exempted from this species of service; and the other, that a similar wish for the appointment of General Jackson, having been manifested from the State of Mississippi, had already been overlooked, from the same motive of acquiescence in the general's wishes. The President hopes and trusts that the appointments, as made, will be satisfactory to you, and to the citizens of Georgia.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 24, 1821.

To the Senate of the United States:

DECEMBER 24, 1821.

I transmit to the Senate a treaty recently concluded with the Indian tribes at Chicago, with the papers relating thereto, which is submitted for consideration as to its ratification.

JAMES MONROE.

TREATY WITH THE OTTAWAS, CHIPPEWAS, AND PATTAWATAMIES.

Articles of a treaty made and concluded at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, between Lewis Cass and Solomon Sibley, commissioners of the United States, and the Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie nations of Indians.

ARTICLE 1. The Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie nations of Indians cede to the United States all the land comprehended within the following boundaries: Beginning at a point on the south bank of the river St. Joseph of Lake Michigan, near the Parc aux Vaches, due north from Reaum's village; and running thence, south, to a line drawn due east from the southern extreme of Lake Michigan; thence, with the said line, east, to the tract ceded by the Pattawatamies to the United States by the treaty of Fort Meigs in one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, if the said line should strike the said tract; but, if the said line should pass north of the said tract, then such line shall be continued until it strikes the western boundary of the tract ceded to the United States by the treaty of Detroit in one thousand eight hundred and seven; and from the termination of the said line, following the boundaries of former cessions, to the main branch of the Grand river of Lake Michigan, should any of the said lines cross the said river; but if none of the said lines should cross the said river, then to a point due east of the source of the said main branch of the said river, and from such point, due west, to the source of the said principal branch, and from the crossing of the said river, or from the source thereof, as the case may be, down the said river, on the north bank thereof, to the mouth; thence, following the shore of Lake Michigan, to the south bank of the said river St. Joseph, at the mouth thereof; and thence, with the said south bank, to the place of beginning.

And

the United States also engage to pay to the Pattawatamie nation five thousand dollars, in specie, annually, for the term of twenty years; and also to appropriate, annually, for the term of fifteen years, the sum of one thousand dollars, to be expended as the President may direct, in the support of a blacksmith and a teacher. And one mile square shall be selected, under the direction of the President, on the north side of the Grand river, and one mile square on the south side of the St. Joseph, and within the Indian lands not ceded, upon which the blacksmiths and teachers employed for the said tribes, respectively, shall reside.

In testimony whereof, the said Lewis Cass and Solomon Sibley, commissioners as aforesaid, and the chiefs and warriors of the said Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie nations, have hereunto set their hands, at Chicago aforesaid, this twenty-ninth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one.

[1st Session.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF THE INDIAN TITLE TO LAND IN GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 7, 1822.

Mr. GILMER, from the select committee appointed to take into consideration the treaties made by the United States with the Creek nation of Indians, on the 9th of August, 1814, and those with the Cherokee nation of Indians, on the 8th of July, 1817, and on the 29th of February, 1819; and also the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, entered into on the 24th of April, 1802, and to report whether the said articles have been executed according to the terms thereof, and the best means of executing the same, reported:

That, on the 24th of April, 1802, the State of Georgia ceded to the United States all that portion of its territory which now forms the States of Mississippi and Alabama. That the consideration given therefor, on the part of the United States, was $1,250,000, and an obligation to extinguish the Indian title to all the lands within the limits of Georgia, whenever the same could be peaceably done, and on reasonable terms. The committee are of opinion that this agreement might have been more satisfactorily complied with than it was at the treaty made with the Creek nation of Indians on the 9th day of August, 1814; that the terms of that treaty were imposed upon the Indians, and they were compelled to yield up to the United States a large portion of their lands; that the United States demanded that the best part of those lands should be within what was at that time the Territory of Alabama; that, by this means, the Indians have been driven within the limits of Georgia, instead of being withdrawn; that lands could have been as easily procured of the Indians within the limits of Georgia as the Territory of Alabama, and that good faith required rather a punctual performance of a fair and bona fide agreement, than a bargain, by which the treasury of the United States might be filled. The United States, also, in the same treaty, guaranty to the Indians the integrity of the remaining part of their territory. Whether this guaranty was consistent with the previous agreement made by the United States with Georgia, is respectfully referred to the consideration of the House. The committee cannot but express the opinion, however, that this guaranty and that contract appear to them to create very opposite and conflicting obligations.

On the 8th day of July, 1817, a treaty was made by the United States with the Cherokee nation of Indians. It appears that, some time previous to the making of that treaty, the Cherokees had represented to the President of the United States that their upper and lower tribes wished to separate; that the Upper Cherokees desired to be confined to a smaller section of country, and to engage in the pursuits of agriculture and civilized life, and to begin the establishment of fixed laws and regular government; that the Lower Cherokees preferred continuing the hunter's life; and, as game had become scarce in the country which they occupied, they proposed exchanging it for one on the western side of the Mississippi river, which would be better suited to their habits of life. To carry into effect these wishes of the Indians, the above treaty was held. The United States had it now in their power to have so far complied with their contract with Georgia as to have extinguished the title of the Cherokee nation of Indians to most of its lands within the limits of that State; for the Upper Cherokees resided beyond the limits of Georgia, and had expressed a desire to retain the lands on the Hiwassee river, which are also beyond those limits. The Lower Cherokees, who wished to exchange their lands, resided mostly within that State; yet, favorable as this opportunity seems to have been for a faithful compliance with their contract, the United States neglected to take advantage of it. They purchased an inconsiderable tract of country within the limits of Georgia and the bounds of the Lower Cherokees, and a considerable tract within the State of Tennessee and the Upper Cherokees, apparently in opposition to the wishes of the Indians, the interests of Georgia, and good faith in themselves.

By the eighth article of the last-mentioned treaty, the United States granted to each head of any Indian family who should choose to remain on the eastern side of the Mississippi river 640 acres of land, for life, to the possessor, with a "reversion," in fee-simple, to his children.

The committee cannot but view this attempt on the part of the United States to grant lands in fee-simple within the limits of Georgia as a direct violation of the rights of that State. The United States have no jurisdiction over the country, or interest in the soil of the lands belonging to the Indians within the limits of Georgia. If there ever was any doubt of the truth of this assertion, it ceased to exist after the articles of agreement and cession made in 1802; by the second article of which the United States cede to that State all claim, right, or title which they may have had to the jurisdiction or soil of any lands within its limits: yet, in direct opposition to the terms of their own agreement, the United States have, in numerous instances, in pursuance of the said eighth article of the treaty last referred to, granted lands belonging to Georgia to the Indians, and have also given to the Indian nation the right of changing their title of occupancy to that of fee-simple to all the lands which they held in that State. But it is not the rights of Georgia alone that are violated by this treaty; the rights of Congress are equally disregarded. By the same eighth article of the said treaty, all the Cherokee Indians, who may choose to do so, are authorized to become citizens of the United States. The committee are not aware of the existence of a power of conferring the rights of citizenship in any other branch of the Government than Congress. They think it unnecessary to make further comment on this part of the subject. The State of Georgia would, however, have had less reason to complain than at present, notwithstanding all these causes, if the remaining terms of this treaty had been executed as agreed upon. The Indians contracted that they would, in addition to the lands which they had ceded absolutely, convey an additional quantity, which should bear the same proportion to the whole quantity of lands belonging to them as the Indians on the western side of the Mississippi river bore to their whole nation. The number of all the Indians was to be ascertained by the month of June, 1818, and commissioners were then to be appointed to divide the lands according to the proportion just named. The State of Georgia had a right to expect that those lands would be laid off within its boundary. But the United States make another treaty with the same Indians, to wit, on the 27th day of February, 1819, by which they yield up to the Indians all the advantages derived from the former, upon certain conditions. The committee are of opinion that the United States had no such power. It has already been shown that they have no jurisdiction over, or right to, the soil of the lands belonging to the Indians within the limits of Georgia. They exercise the power of treating with the Indians for those lands by virtue of the obligation they are under to that State by their contract, and their general duty to treat with the Indians for the benefit of the States. They act as commissioners appointed by the constitution; and whenever their duty has been performed, by purchasing lands for the benefit of any State, and the terms accepted by that State, all power over the lands acquired ceases to exist. The treaty of the 8th July, 1817, had been so far accepted on the part of Georgia, previous to the treaty of the 27th of February, 1819, that most of the lands acquired thereby had been disposed of to its citizens by an act of its Legislature. The treaty, therefore, of the 27th February, 1819, so far as it affects any rights acquired by Georgia under the previous treaty, is void. The United States are bound to carry the first treaty into effect.

It appears, from the last treaty, that the United States are endeavoring to fix the Cherokee Indians upon the soil of Georgia, and thereby render it impossible for them ever to comply with their contract with that State. By this treaty, fee-simple titles to lands within the State of Georgia are granted in a still more objectionable manner than in the former, and all the Indians who choose are to be made citizens in the same manner as in the former treaty. Leases made in pursuance of the former treaty are made void by the latter.

There is one other feature in the last treaty which the committee think too objectionable to pass over in silence. It is agreed, on the part of the United States, that twelve miles square of the lands ceded by the Indians shall be disposed of, and the proceeds vested, under the direction of the President of the United States, in such stock as he may think proper; and the interest arising therefrom to be applied by him for the benefit of the Indians. They, however, can take no further notice of it than to bring the subject before the House for their consideration.

As to so much of the resolutions as directs the committee to report the best manner of executing the articles of agreement and cession therein referred to, they suggest that it will be necessary for the United States to relinquish the policy which they seem to have adopted with regard to civilizing the Indians, and rendering them permanent upon their lands, and changing their title by occupancy into a fee-simple title, at least in respect to the Creek and Cherokee Indians. Their contract with Georgia must remain forever unperformed so long as this policy is pursued. They would further recommend appropriations of money to be made, sufficiently large to enable the Government, from time to time, to hold treaties with those Indians who possess lands within the limits of Georgia, for the purpose of extinguishing their title thereto.

From the view which the committee have thus taken of the subject-matter referred to them, they recommend the following resolutions for adoption by the House:

1. Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the above treaties as pretends to grant to the Indians fee-simple titles to lands within the limits of Georgia is a violation of the sovereign rights of that State.
2. Resolved, That so much of the said treaties as purports to grant to the Indians the rights of citizenship is a violation of the rights of Congress.
3. Resolved, That the sum of ——— be appropriated, for the purpose of holding treaties with the Creek and Cherokee Indians, for the extinguishment of their title to lands within the limits of Georgia.
4. Resolved, That so much of the treaty made the 27th of February, 1819, as directs a large portion of the public lands to be sold, and the proceeds to be vested in some public stock by the President of the United States, and to be disposed of by him for the benefit of the Cherokee Indians, does not accord with the general policy of this Government, and the power of Congress over the public property of the United States.

TRADE AND INTERCOURSE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 14TH OF JANUARY, 1822.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, December 27, 1821.

I have had the honor of receiving your communication of the 24th instant, in which you convey the request of the Committee on Indian Affairs to be informed, first, of the number of trading posts now in operation amongst the Indian tribes, and where located; second, of the amount of the several appropriations for carrying on trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; third, the present value, according to the last returns from each trading post, of the property on hand, estimated at the original cost prices of the articles: to which I am requested to add my opinion of the advantages of the United States' commercial intercourse with the Indians over such other kinds as could be organized to take the place of it; and such amendments in the present system of the two kinds of intercourse which now obtain, (viz: that carried on by the Government, and that conducted under the license system by individuals,) as I may suppose best adapted to preserve the Indians from the speculations of the unprincipled, and secure justice to them; and such other views as I may think proper to add illustrative of the present state of our Indian relations, and the best methods to preserve the peace with them, tribe with tribe, and between the Indians and our civilized border population.

The abstract which I have the honor to enclose, herewith, contains the information requested under the three enumerated heads of the call; which shows a gain of $59,001 99.

There are four kinds of commerce which could be established among and with our Indians; from a review of which some tolerable conception may be formed of the advantages of the United States' intercourse over the rest. These are: first, to leave the Indians to their own resources; second, to abandon them to the necessity of carrying on their traffic with individuals; third, to subject them to the regulations of a chartered or privileged company; or, fourth, for the Government to assume the intercourse with them direct.

Before the quiet of the aboriginal solitude was disturbed, and the habits with which nature had invested its natives were torn off by the hands of a more enlightened, but, perhaps, less humane race of men, there were no demands to satisfy other than the forests furnished; and no necessity existed, therefore, for commerce, save only that which was implied in the exchanges of bows and arrows, and stone axes; and these, again, for skins or meat, which might have been taken in extra quantities by some more fortunate hunter. But the advance of civilization upon this simple state has changed these easily adjusted relations; and its blessings, however highly to be appreciated, have, in reference to our Indians, been less numerous than its curses. New wants have been originated by it, but the corresponding supplies have not been furnished. Disease, physical and moral, has been communicated, without being accompanied by the appropriate remedies. New relations have been created, in which the civilized man has been more than a match for his less enlightened brother. The consequences to the Indians are notorious; and these involve bereavement, and suffering, and death! Considerations arising very naturally out of this view may not be considered as forming part of the request of the committee. I shall waive them, therefore, with the single remark, that, however consistent the extinction of the aboriginal race may be with the designs of Providence, in peopling this new world with a more enlightened and polished society, it is not so clear that some additional efforts were not required of the first settlers, and the generations which have succeeded them, to meliorate the condition and recover from barbarism those whose domain they invaded, and in the occupancy of which we have so completely succeeded.

Reduced as are our Indians to a state of such absolute dependence, keenly assailed by wants, artificial as well as real, and between which they find it no less difficult to decide than do their white brothers, it would be to perish them en masse to decree their exclusion from the commerce which has grown out of their new relations with the civilized world. Their wants must, therefore, be met; and for nothing do they clamor more than for commercial privileges; hence, so many stipulations with the Government for trading-houses, and the means to sharpen and keep in order their spears, and traps, and rifles, and, of late, among several tribes, their ploughs and axes; and these facilities are held by most of the tribes with which we have intercourse at all in the highest possible estimation.

It should seem that to a people thus circumstanced, the Government, which is their only protector, and which holds their destiny in its hands, would be solicitous to provide the most ample system for their improvement and preservation; a system embracing, not only a bare supply of the ordinary demands of nature, but the more ennobling gifts of intellectual and moral improvement. It is gratifying to believe that such is the feeling of the natural guardians of this unfortunate people; and additionally so, when to this good will in the Government is perceived to be superadded the sympathies and exertions of so many thousands of our citizens.

It is not doubted that individual enterprise is competent to supply all the demands which the wants of our Indians could levy upon it; nor that capital could be commanded even more than adequate to the supply of all these wants. But it is not so certain that such an intercourse would be characterized by the traits with which justice and humanity, or policy, would feel it incumbent on them to stipulate for; or, that laws could be enacted adequate in their provisions to secure them. It is one thing to enact laws, and another to enforce their violated provisions. It is not questioned but laws could be framed containing all the requisite severity, and embracing every variety of threatening for a breach, even in the wilderness, of their authority; but it is not so much to what the law threatens that offenders look, as to the probable chances which promise their safety from its punishment. In regions wild and wild, like those inhabited by our Indians, laws are of little more importance in regulating the conduct of the avaricious, who go there for the purposes of trade, than would be the testimony of the Indian for the security of whose person and property they might be enacted.

If in civilized society, where the means of detection are so numerous, and where the laws apply so universally to the security of rights, so many escape with impunity, and so many, again, elude the punishment which the laws denounce, what can we expect from the efficacy of a law which is to operate in the wilderness, and where those whose practices it was made to punish are the only legal witnesses?

Commercial intercourse ceases to reciprocate its advantages whenever either party shall yield to the other in intelligence or power. The keen and adventurous trader, skilled in the arts of deception and speculation, and who is bent on making gains, will be found oftentimes an overmatch for his less keen, and less intelligent, though civilized brother; but how entirely at the mercy of such must be an ignorant and powerless community of dependant savages!

Such is the theory of an intercourse between civilized and savage communities, or between our traders and our Indians; and the theory might be considered sufficiently demonstrative, were experience and facts not at hand on which to rest it. The system of a private intercourse has been tried; its provisions, though apparently so well contrived to screen the Indians from the fire of avarice, and protect them from its fangs, proved useless, and it was abandoned. I refer to the regulations of 1786. By these, the country was divided into two districts, northern and southern. To the northern district was attached a superintendent and two assistants; to the southern, a superintendent. The whole of the Indian relations were referred to these two divisions; and the following rules governed them: No person, citizen or other, was permitted to reside among, or trade with, any Indian, or Indian nation, within the territories of the United States, without a license for that purpose first obtained from one of the aforesaid superintendents; but no license was granted to any person who did not first present, from the Supreme Executive of a State, a certificate, under the seal of the State, testifying to his good character, and to his qualifications and fitness for the employment of Indian trade. For each license thus granted, and which was limited to a year, the person receiving it paid $50 for the use of the United States, accompanying with this license money a bond in the penalty of $3,000, which provided for a strict adherence to, and observance of, such rules and regulations as the Congress might from time to time impose. But, guarded as was this system, and well adapted as it certainly promised to be to the objects contemplated by it, the cunning of the traders was an overmatch for its provisions; and the Indians, thus given into the hands of "the unprincipled," (for it would be an affectation of respect for the calling to doubt that three-fourths, at least, are of this class,) were subjected to all the sufferings which avarice could inflict; and their peace and welfare involved in the scheme, involved, in their turn, the shedding of much blood, and the waste of many lives. I am aware that, in those times, the afflicting apprehensions which arose on the part of the Indians, on witnessing the rapid and pressing march upon their settlements, carried with it a portion of this spirit of revenge; and, unyielding as yet, cherishing lordly notions of their prowess, and convinced of their right to the soil which was made thus to crumble from beneath their feet, they often resolved to abandon it only with their lives. But, however many of the conflicts of those times owed their origin to feelings of this sort, yet it has long ceased to be doubted that to the shameful practices of fraud, and the bereavement inflicted on them under it, are to be attributed the larger portion of the strifes of those days, and the blood and murder which resulted from them.

On the abandonment of the system of 1786, an intercourse was opened, (partial at first, as it yet is, and, by consequence, proportionally inoperative,) out of which grew the present Government system of trade and intercourse, and which I shall explain presently. The system of a private intercourse under a license system has, therefore, been tried, and it has been abandoned. An intercourse under the directions of a chartered company would, in the light in which I have been considering this subject, result in the same consequences. Gain would be the object, and the sole object, on the part of the stockholders and all concerned, under a company regulation, as it is under the plan of individual enterprise. The same difficulty would exist in enforcing upon the avarice of the company, as upon the avarice of individuals, those observances which involve humanity and justice in their application to the Indians. The terms would be all on one side, and the cunning and the power also; and as to the equipoise which law might be instructed to furnish, it could not be realized. But then, connected with this view of the subject, is another, which applies to our civilized population; and it is one which has not the same extent of application to the individual prosecution of Indian trade. It is the certainty that our fur market would be raised to the prices of the China market, freight, &c. deducted; or to any other market where the most could be commanded for the article. What though the company should consist of its thousands, yet its management would be turned over to a single head, or, at most, to a board of directors. The furs, being collected, would be so disposed of as to insure the highest price of a foreign demand. Our manufacturers, or rather consumers, would come in, by consequence, for the tax which this state of things implies; and should the prices of the China market be an advance of 100 per cent. upon the prices of our own market, the price of our hats, and other articles of which fur is an ingredient, would be doubled upon us, and the gains would go from the pockets of our citizens into the coffers of the fur company. In this view, a company treating the Indians, by their agents, no better than they are treated by the agents of individual capitalists, would superadd, in its application to our civilized community, the consequence to which I have referred. Individuals are less able to collect the furs in sufficient quantities to ship them, and, generally, they are not so well informed as a company would be in all the relations of a foreign commerce; hence, a large portion of them are disposed of at home. But a company is preferable in other respects. It would be more tangible; and, hardly possible as it would be to detect their wilderness agents in their violations of law, yet, if detected, their property could be come at, and some better chance for the operation of law might exist. The private adventurer goes with his pack on his own back, or his horses; and should he be detected violating the law, and convicted, his all (at least all that could be come at) would not remunerate the witness for his expense and trouble in conveying him for trial to the settlements. But shocking as is the practice of injustice and inhumanity, and additionally revolting as it must always be in proportion as its victims are impoverished, and helpless, and uninformed, it comes home to the feelings with a shock less afflictive than does the sight of that intellectual and moral degradation to which such a traffic necessarily dooms this unfortunate race of men.

The advantages of commerce are admitted to be vast. From the interchanges of a neighborly intercourse to the intercourse between nations, the social compact derives its advantages, and strength, and beauty. Expanding in its nature, it throws open the world of mind as well as matter, and the view kindles into all that is agreeable and lovely. But whoever witnessed any of these results from an intercourse between men, professedly traders, with a savage community; and to whose very prosperity, as traders, a deathblow would be struck by the improvement of this community in the arts and conveniences of cultivated life? So far from this, it is essentially degrading in its character, and disastrous in its consequences; for it is the principal business of such traders to oppose every thing like improvement. Such is the likeness which is stamped deep upon our Indians, and which may be traced out in all the poverty and misery which invests so large a portion of their population. History details the causes; and these are to be found in the superior intelligence and keen avarice of the one party, and their disregard to political and moral order, and the unenlightened and dependant condition of the other. It was natural, and entirely in conformity with the principles which actuate the Government of this country, and which give to it so much lustre in the eyes of the world, for it to devise, in its general plan of liberty, and rights, and justice, and humanity, some scheme which should act as a shield to screen an unfortunate and noble race of men, who were solely dependant upon it for aid, from an avarice so intense, and, if possible, to redeem a remnant of their race from the destiny which has swallowed up their progenitors. It is to be lamented, however, that this plan should have been so contracted. It ought to have been ample, and commensurate with the wants of our aboriginal population over the whole extent of their domain. But what is this plan? It embraces: First. A disinterested commercial intercourse. Merchandise, and whatever else is ascertained to make up the wants of the Indians, is bought, (so far as the capital will extend,) and transported to their settlements, with no view to gain; the law limiting the profits to the advances which may be necessary to secure the capital from diminution. Second. There being no object to realize but the advantage of the Indians, they are not only not encouraged to neglect the soil and other important matters connected with their civilization, but every inducement is held out to them, and every instruction given, to facilitate this great object, to the extent of the means which are furnished. Third. The agents intrusted with the execution of this benevolent scheme are separated, by law, by their bond and oath of office, from all interest in the affairs committed to their trust. They bond to the United States, with adequate security, in the sum of $10,000, for the faithful discharge of their trust, in properly accounting for all the items connected with their factorship, and confirm these legal obligations by the solemnity of an oath.

Thus the Indians are guarded, so far as guards can be constituted by legislation, from imposition; and the means of detection, should frauds be attempted, are provided by the regulations which demand quarter-annual returns, in detail, by duplicate; one copy of which to be transmitted to the Treasury Department, the other to the superintendent of Indian trade.

Such, in brief, are the outlines of the United States' commercial intercourse with the Indian tribes. Its advantages "over such other kinds of intercourse as could be organized to take the place of it" may be thus summarily stated: First. In the disinterestedness which characterizes it, and the superior advantages which it holds out in the way of trade to the impoverished race for whose benefit it has been established, over any other system originating in plans of gain. Second. In the harmony which is the natural consequence of such a system. Third. In the tranquillity and peace which are the fruits of this harmony. Fourth. In the consequently easy access, under its benevolent operations, to the confidence and friendship of the Indians; and in the state of preparation which it secures for the introduction of those intellectual and moral lessons which, in the presence of any other system of commercial intercourse, it were useless to attempt to enforce upon them.

And is it thought a thing incredible to impress an Indian with designs of kindness, and get from him in return a corresponding attachment and fidelity? It cannot be admitted as a just view of the Indian character and manners to pronounce upon his treachery and cruelty as the characteristics of his moral constitution. These wily acts are rather the results of his best conceptions of defence, and of preserving himself from the treachery which is practised upon him; and the displays of his vengeance are but the ebullitions of a provoked temper. We see the Indian goaded into desperation by injustice and fraud, and we infer that he can never become the master of his passions, or a subject over whom the milder virtues can have any control. As well might it be thought by him who never saw the ocean, except when lashed by the storm into billows and foam, that it was incapable of rest.

But I have omitted to remark that the advantages which the United States' intercourse has been stated to possess over other kinds cannot be qualified by the objection which is so frequently made against it. This objection is, that the Government is depriving its citizens of advantages which they could derive from the fur trade, by the part which it takes in its prosecution. But, admitting this to be reason good enough to authorize a surrender of the Indians into the hands of the trading parts of our community, yet it can have no application to the trade in question, unless, indeed, it could be shown that the Government, by receiving the furs and peltries from the Indians, deprived its citizens from participating in the buying and selling of those articles. But this does not happen to be the case. A comparatively small portion, it is true, of the furs and peltries which are taken and disposed of by our Indians, are thrown into our markets by the Government sales; but all that come into the Government possession are thus disposed of; and were the means adequate to embrace the entire trade, and should a law of exclusion be enacted to keep out every trader save those in the employ of the Government, the same disposition would be made of them. They would then, as now, be thrown into our markets for the use of the manufacturer and merchant. The controversy is one, therefore, which resolves itself into a single point, and that embraces a struggle on the part of those who clamor for the abolition of the Government system to hold personal intercourse with the Indians. And wherefore? For the reason, doubtless, that the Indians being incompetent to measure skill and cunning with them, they can command, of course, these articles for trifles. But can this be considered a sufficient reason for the abolition of a system which, whilst it receives with one hand, on fair terms, whatever articles the Indians may have collected for barter, gives them out with the other to those who are interested as dealers? Or does it not rather bring the subject to its fairest illustration, and require it to be determined whether it is more consistent with the principles which distinguish our Government to place the Indians in a relation so unequal, and in which they must be necessarily subject to such imposition and suffering, or to occupy an intermediate place itself between them and the traders, and thus save them from those consequences?

If, in the wisdom of Congress, it be thought best to continue the two kinds of intercourse which now obtain, (viz: that carried on by the Government, and that conducted by individuals under the license system,) the regulations which I respectfully submit are the following:

First. To deny the privilege to trade with the Indians to all persons whomsoever, except from points located and built upon for the purpose, to be previously approved by the President of the United States; and then only on a license to be issued by the President of the United States, to be renewed annually, for which $200 shall be paid. A bond should be required in the penal sum of $10,000, obliging the trader to conform, in all respects, to the laws and regulations which may be from time to time adopted for the regulation of Indian trade.

Second. The license money to constitute a fund, to be employed, under the direction of the President of the United States, in the civilization and improvement of the Indians.

Third. An obligation should be enforced on all persons thus licensed to make quarter-annual returns, on oath, to the officer in charge of the Indian relations, of the amount and kinds of articles sold, at what prices, and of the kinds received, and the profits realized. Spirituous liquors should be excluded under the severest penalties. These regulations for the government of the license system would doubtless lessen some of the evils which prevail under it in its present state. A reimbursement to the trade fund of the $63,369 61, embraced in the three items on the abstract, under its first division, marked A, B, and C, which may be very fairly said to be due to it by the Government, would enable this office to multiply its establishments, and thus extend the advantages which its policy implies to several tribes who could be now benefited by this extension. It is essential to the advantageous operations of the United States' intercourse that the period of its extension be made to embrace more than a year at a time; as out of this arrangement, which has obtained for the last three or four years, considerable relaxation has resulted, on account of the doubts which it implied as to the continuance of the system; and which, being circulated through the Indian country, has led many of the tribes to seek for the only resort which they supposed to be left, and make their exchanges in the best way they could with the private traders. Many instructions, also, which it was found necessary from time to time to give, some of them implying an expenditure of money in repairs, &c., have been from time to time suspended, lest the system should cease by its limitation, and the progress of the orders arrested, and the cost be therefore lost, before the instructions could be complied with. The great distance of some of the points with which the intercourse is carried on by this office, united with other causes, often consumes a considerable part of the year before an exchange of correspondence can be realized.

The restoring the capital which may be considered as properly due to the fund by the Government, amounting to the sum stated, and fixing the period for the continuance of the system to embrace not less than three years, (five would be better,) would include what appears to me all the necessary helps. But should the Congress determine that the Government shall occupy the place between the Indians and the traders, "more effectually to guard the former from the speculations of the unprincipled, and insure justice to them," then a capital will be required to take the place of that which would be withdrawn under such a regulation. A capital of half a million of dollars, under this arrangement, would not be more than could be employed beneficially to the Indians, and advantageously to the manufacturers and merchants of the country. Out of a trade thus enlarged, reasonable advances might be added to the present limits, which, if so directed, would constitute a fund for the improvement of those out of whose toils it had been extracted. And to what could profits thus realized, I respectfully ask, be more legitimately or humanely applied? Is it objected against this suggestion that the capital is too large an allotment of the public money for such an object? This may lose some of its weight, perhaps, when it is recollected that all the charges which can be brought together as expenditures on Indian account, including the present capital employed in the trade with them, bring the cost of the territory which has been acquired of them since the formation of our Government to about two cents an acre; and it may not be considered an irrelevant estimate, in this view of the subject, nor too large a one, to put down half a million of dollars as the cost of the preparations which the United States may have to make to enforce submission to laws, which, in the present state of Indian improvement, it is impossible for them to comprehend before this unfortunate race shall have become extinct. Nor is the waste of life, which must continue to be deplored whilst the Indian is left to adhere to his present habits, unworthy of an estimate in this account.

The trade carried on by the Government, by what is called "The American Fur Company," and by individuals, makes up our commercial relations with the Indians; except, indeed, that the lines are occasionally crossed by the American Indians on the one side, and the Canadian traders on the other, very much to the injury of our relations, political as well as commercial, with the tribes included in this kind of intercourse.

Our political relations are intrusted to agents, whose duty it is made to reside in the Indian settlements, and discharge the treaty stipulations on the part of the Government, by delivering over to the tribes to whom they are due their respective annuities; and these agents are also the organs of communication between the authorities of the United States and the Indians. They are not connected, in any manner, with the factory system; nor has the superintendent of Indian trade any intercourse with them, except so far as he may be directed by the War Department, under the provisions of the act of 1811, to forward the supplies stipulated for by treaty, or presents, whenever these are to be made.

To the commercial and political may be added our moral relations. These are supported by an annual appropriation by the Congress of $10,000, which is applied, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the intellectual and moral improvement of the Indians, so far as this sum can be made to embrace it. Its application has been intrusted to benevolent associations of citizens, who superadd, I should judge, three times this amount, annually, from their own voluntary contributions; all which, however, falls short of the demand which exists for a participation in this noble bounty.

But notwithstanding the frame-work of all this contrivance, of commerce, and politics, and morals, which it should seem contained within it every accommodation for the comfort and improvement of those over whom it has been placed, yet there are evils existing in some of these which require to be remedied, and new regulations to be made, before the most efficient of them can work out their appropriate results.

First, as I have endeavored to illustrate, our commercial relations as they now exist have their blessings overbalanced by their curses. For the want of a controlling power over the licentious, they riot in every sort of enormity which human depravity can contrive, and the Indians are the perpetual victims of their speculations and frauds. Poverty and wretchedness follow in their train; and war and bloodshed crown the whole. I have had the honor to suggest what, in my opinion, constitutes the remedy: it is to be found only in some such regulations as I have suggested for the government of the private traders; or, in their entire exclusion from any participation in the traffic, so far as this relates to a personal intercourse with the Indians; and, if this be adopted, in the addition of the adequate capital to enable the Government to supply the wants of its entire Indian population. Or, if the two-fold system of public and private intercourse be continued, it is considered essential that some other regulations than those which now obtain be adopted for the government of the private intercourse; that the term of the United States' intercourse be continued beyond twelve months; and important that the fund be reimbursed in the sum of $63,369 61.

The political agencies have great power over the councils and acts of the Indians, especially in all matters that have relation to their accountability to the power of the United States. Most of the tribes with whom we have any direct intercourse are now sensible of the disparity of their force; and, in proportion to their estimation of their comparative weakness, do they submit to the restraints which it may be thought proper to impose. But these agencies are not respected in their interference with the policy of the Indians, for settling matters of difference among themselves. Hence, however strongly they may appeal to them in illustrating the impolicy of their wars with one another, and express the solicitude of their father the President of the United States that they would settle their disputes by appeals to less bloody means, they will, nevertheless, in the general, have their own way, and settle their matters of difference by an appeal to arms.

It is respectfully recommended that, to save these unfortunate people from the calamity of such appeals, the President of the United States be authorized to employ the military to enforce an observance of his fatherly counsels. Our Indians stand pretty much in the relation to the Government as do our children to us. They are equally dependant; and need, not infrequently, the exercise of parental authority to detach them from those ways which might involve both their peace and their lives. It would not be considered just for our children to be let alone to settle their quarrels in their own way; but rather that superior power be interposed for the adjustment of their differences for them. This authority given by the Congress, it is presumed that little more than an array of power would be necessary; so that no blood would be shed upon the one hand, whilst much of it would be spared on the other.

Those agents, honorable as they are presumed to be, and highly as some of them who are known to me deserve to be respected, yet their calling should be confined, under severe penalties, and by the strongest moral restraints, to its legitimate object. They should not be permitted to trade, directly or indirectly, nor transact business of any description except on the public account. And it should be made their duty to counsel the Indians to receive for their annuities those articles which are most useful, and on no account to countenance them in stipulating for a payment of them in specie. Nothing impoverishes the Indians so much as cash annuities. The specie is seldom seen by them after its first appearance on their annuity grounds; and, on awaking from their intoxication, in which it is taken care by the interested to steep them, they wreak an indiscriminate vengeance on such as may chance to fall in their way.

The strifes occasioned by the confusion in which their commercial relations are involved being allayed by a system which shall be free from them, their wars among themselves restrained, and the full exercise of disinterested agencies established, it were no difficult matter to realize the hopes of the most sanguine in whatever relates to their improvement and civilization. This remark is intended to apply to the young; and not, to any considerable extent, to the adult Indians. The experiment has been made. It is no longer a matter of speculation and theory. And it may not be considered as unworthy of remark, that the tribe, viz: the Cherokees, among whom such extraordinary advances in civilization and Christianity have been made, are freer than any others from the vexatious and demoralizing intercourse of trade. There seems to be a mutual dependence in those relations which I have referred to for the production of what seems to be, at last, so almost universally desired, viz: the security, and preservation, and improvement of the Indians. Trade, properly regulated, and a well-adjusted political intercourse, are essential; and, without these, all attempts to save the generations to come of our Indian population, it is humbly conceived, will prove useless. But, these properly, and, in reference to their extent, adequately adjusted, the present plan, as recognised by the President of the United States, for the introduction of letters, and the arts, and morals, will, if the latter also be made co-extensive with the numbers to be benefited by it, tend more effectually to "preserve peace with the Indians, tribe with tribe, and between them and our civilized border population," than any other means, it is not unreasonable to believe, which it is in the power of the Government to apply. Nor will such a policy, properly regulated, stop, after it shall have accomplished the peace of the Indians, tribe with tribe, and secured our border population from the consequences of bloody and frequent irruptions into their settlements; but, under its influence, the best hopes of humanity may reasonably be expected to be realized, by the introduction of the rising generation of the children of our Indians into the blessings of the civilized state.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Gain,					$ 59,001 98

The above statement shows a gain of less by $13,223 07 than what was reported for the year 1818. This arises from the following causes: First, The disposition which it has been judged proper to make, at reduced rates, of the merchandise purchased during the last war; and which, though the best that could then be had, was not suited to the wants or tastes of the Indians, and especially in times when other kinds can be obtained. Second, By the estimate at cost of the deer skins on hand at that time, of $51,812 46, many of which perished in New Orleans by the worms; and the state of the market was such as not to make up the deficiency by profits in the sale of the remainder. Third, By loss in the Mississippi and in Mobile bay, by the sinking of boats, of two supplies of merchandise, amounting to $3,700; to which may be added, Fourth, The relaxation of business referred to in the accompanying report, arising out of the uncertainty of the continuance of the system. It may be proper to add, however, that, by including the profits realized on sales made subsequent to the 30th September last, (the period at which this statement is made up,) the gain, according to the report of 1818, would stand now at about what it did then. Fluctuations in such an intercourse, dealing, as it is essential to do, in perishable articles, which cannot be kept for better markets, is one of the characteristics of the trade. It is one year more, and another less; depending always upon the markets for the articles taken in barter with the Indians.

EXPENDITURES FOR THE INDIAN DEPARTMENT FOR 1820 AND 1821.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 16, 1822.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 15, 1822.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, "directing that the Secretary of War communicate to that House a statement (so far as the same may be in his power to make) of the items of all expenditures made, and expenses incurred, in the Indian Department, during the years 1820 and 1821, together with abstracts of the estimates furnished for said years by the Indian agents, upon which funds have been advanced, or expenses incurred; and, also, a statement of the several amounts to which their respective expenditures were limited by the instructions of said Secretary," has the honor to enclose, herewith, a statement of the Second Auditor, marked A, showing "the expenditures made, and expenses incurred, in the Indian Department, for the years 1820 and 1821," as far as the actual expenditures can be ascertained from the vouchers received; statement marked B, containing "abstracts of the estimates furnished for said years by the Indian agents, upon which funds were advanced, or expenses incurred;" and documents marked C, containing a circular of the 19th of March, 1821, to the superintendents and agents, by which will be seen "the several amounts to which their respective expenditures were limited," together with an estimate of the arrearages of the Indian Department at the termination of the last year, and the general regulations which have been adopted to control the expenditures of that department.

The estimates on which advances were made are necessarily imperfect for the year 1820, as the regulation changing the mode of making advances to agents and superintendents was adopted on the 19th February of that year. Before that period, the disbursements of the Indian Department were made without estimates, principally on drafts drawn on this Department by the agents and superintendents, care being taken in accepting the drafts not to exceed the sum allotted to each, without satisfactory explanation. This mode of covering the disbursements of the Indian Department was, however, found to be defective, as it gave no previous check over the disbursements, and exposed the Government to fraud in disposing of drafts on it, by the agents, without accounting for the premium which they might obtain. It is not, however, known that any fraud of the kind has been committed; but it was a strong objection to the mode of making disbursements that it was liable to abuse. Under the system adopted, if rigidly enforced, the possibility of such frauds is excluded.

Believing it to be within the intention of the resolution, I have annexed to the copy of the circular to the superintendents and agents of the 19th March last, which contains the amount to which their respective expenditures were limited, copies of various other circulars which had been at different times adopted in order to introduce economy and accountability, and thereby diminish the expenditure of the Indian Department. In addition to these, special instructions, applicable to the peculiar state of each agency, have, with the same view, at various times, been given to the different agents. On account of its amount, and liability to abuse, the expenditure which particularly claimed the attention of this Department was that on account of rations issued to Indians. Not long after the commencement of the present administration of this Department, the circulars in relation to issuing rations (copies of which accompany this report) were issued to the agents and superintendents. It is believed that the regulations which they contain, have had a very happy effect in preventing impositions on the Government, and in diminishing the disbursements of the Indian Department.

By referring to the accompanying documents, it will appear that the aggregate amount allotted to the agents and superintendents, under the circular of March last, is $79,500, leaving $20,500 to meet such general charges against the appropriation as belonged to no particular agency, such as the debits which might be brought against it in the settlement of former accounts of expenditures for the expenses of rations issued to the Indians through the commissary of provisions, of visits of Indians to the seat of Government, general expense under the Indian intercourse act of 1802, transportation of annuities, &c. The sum allotted to these various objects has proved insufficient. Even with the addition of the balance of the appropriation of the last year, it has not been sufficient to meet the debits arising from the settlement of old accounts. It was believed, when the estimates of the last year were made, that the balance of the appropriation of the preceding year, with such credits as might be brought to the Indian appropriation from the settlement of old accounts, would be sufficient to cover the debits. Such, however, has not proved to be the fact, as will appear by reference to the statement of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, which accompanies this report. It is proper to remark, that the debits which have been brought against the Indian appropriation in the last and preceding years have arisen principally out of the settlement of the accounts of army contractors, under contracts made before the establishment of the present system of supplying the army with provisions, which commenced on the 1st of June, 1819. The amount of rations issued to Indians could not, under the old system, be ascertained till the contractor rendered his accounts for settlement, on which the provisions issued to Indians were charged to the proper appropriation; and the appropriation for the Indian Department for the year was thus liable to be affected by the disbursements of former years. As the accounts of the former army contractors have been all audited, and as the prompt settlement of accounts under the present system of supplying the army with provisions prevents the accumulation of outstanding claims, it is believed that the appropriations for the Indian Department will not hereafter be affected materially by the settlement of outstanding accounts; but as balances remain due the United States, in several cases, on account of subsistence, for the recovery of which suits have been instituted against the contractors, it may occur that awards may be made in their favor on items chargeable to the Indian Department, which, on settlement by the accounting officers, have been decided to be inadmissible. In such cases, the appropriation for the Indian Department will be charged, and the subsistence credited with the amount.

In conclusion, it may not be improper to state, that, although $200,000 has been the amount of the annual current appropriations for the Indian Department, from the termination of the late war till last year, yet the disbursements considerably exceeded that sum previous to the year 1820, the difference being made up from time to time by appropriations for arrearages. The acting Secretary of War, Mr. Graham, estimated the disbursements of the Indian Department at $250,000, in the year 1817. In his letter to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the 4th of January of that year, he states: "The expenses of the Indian Department have been estimated at $200,000; it is, however, recommended that this estimate should be increased, so as to make a permanent annual appropriation for this object of $250,000, at least. The circumscribed limits of most of the Indian tribes east of the Mississippi and Illinois rivers, having rendered their dependence upon the chase for subsistence more precarious, has produced a more frequent intercourse between those Indians and the agents of the United States, and a consequent increase of the issue of rations and of presents to them." In addition to these causes, the number and importance of the treaties which have been held with the Indians since the late war, the great increase of the annuities, and extension of the frontier, have tended very much to increase the disbursements of the Indian Department. Believing it, however, to be the intention of Congress that the expenditure should not exceed $200,000 per annum, efficient measures were adopted, shortly after the commencement of the present administration of this Department, to reduce the amount of the expenditure within that sum.

Acting on the same principle, after the reduction of the appropriation of the last session to $100,000 for the expenses of the Department, every effort was made to reduce the disbursements within the amount appropriated, which could be made without deranging the system established under existing laws. The consequence has been a very considerable reduction in the disbursements; but it has not been practicable to bring the expenditure within the appropriation. Though measures were taken immediately after the passage of the act making the appropriation, yet, at points so remote as those at which most of the agencies are fixed, nearly one-half of the year had elapsed before any considerable diminution could be effected in the rate of expenditure authorized by previous appropriations, by which time (the previous expenditure being at the rate of $200,000 per annum) the appropriation was nearly exhausted, and the expenses of the Department have been accumulating against the Government, without the means of meeting them.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. PHILIP P. BARBOUR, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, January 15, 1822.

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, under date of the 10th instant, calling for a statement of "the items of all expenditures made, and expenses incurred, in the Indian Department, during the years 1820 and 1821," I have the honor to transmit you, herewith, a statement exhibiting the expenditures in each of those years.

Believing it would comply substantially with the intention of the House of Representatives, in their call for information, the statement which is furnished presents the amount of actual disbursements for the years 1820 and 1821, under general heads, instead of furnishing each item, which could not be done without causing a delay of several weeks, as those items are very numerous as well as various; the contingent disbursements, for the most part, being composed of small sums.

It is proper to observe, that the expenditure of 1820, as ascertained from accounts which have been actually rendered, amounts to the sum of $142,385 27, while the amount of warrants issued that year amounts to that of $191,735 19; making a difference of $49,349 92, which is to be accounted for in the following manner:

Amount appropriated for 1820,	-	-	-	-	$200,000 00
Balance of amount refunded by annuities, after deducting $62,984 81 overdrawn by Indian Department on the 1st January, 1820,	-	-	-	-	15,448 16
					$215,448 16
Amount available for 1820,	-	-	-	-	$215,448 16
Disbursements made for 1820, exclusively, per statement A,	-	-	-	$142,385 27
Amount charged to the appropriation, by transfer from Third Auditor's office, for rations issued in 1818,	-	-	-	-	9,667 23
This amount advanced by warrant to subsistence, on account of larger sums claimed by that department for rations issued in 1818, 1819, and 1820,	-	-	-	-	15,000 00
This amount arising out of disbursements made in 1819, and paid by warrants in 1820; also, of advances made in 1820, which have only been accounted for in the first quarter of the ensuing year,	-	-	-	-	34,349 92
Balance of appropriation on 1st January, 1821,	-	-	-	-	14,045 74
					$215,448 16

Thus accounting for the difference of $49,349 92, by the $15,000 advanced to subsistence, and $34,349 92 arising out of disbursements or advances not immediately relating to the year 1820.

The accounts for 1821 have been rendered but partially for the third quarter, and none have yet been received for the fourth. The appropriation for that year has been charged, on the settlement of a contract under date of 6th December, 1817, of Turk and Henderson, for supplies of provisions to the army, with the sum of $43,604 27; and there remains to be brought to the debit of the Indian Department, as soon as there are sufficient funds, the sum of $18,803 37, under the contract, dated 26th January, 1816, of James Thomas, for issues of provisions in 1816 and 1817, which account has been audited in the course of last year.

The sum of $130,205 44, appropriated for arrearages in 1821, has been absorbed in the settlement of the contracts of Ward and Johnson, of 20th January, 1815, and William P. Rathbone, of the 1st November, 1816.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM LEE.

Copy of a circular to Superintendents and Agents for Indian Affairs.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 5, 1818.

The Fifth Auditor of the Treasury Department has been charged to adjust the claims which Indians may have, under existing treaties, or the fourth section of the act "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," passed 30th March, 1802; and similar claims on the part of our citizens, embraced by the fourteenth section of the same act, or any existing treaty with the Indian tribes.

* Such as buildings and repairs, tools, and general expenses of smith-shops, removal of Indian emigrants, presents, rations issued by the agents, and all contingent expenses incurred at the agency.

† The estimates for 1820 are imperfect, the regulations requiring them having been adopted on the 19th of February of that year. Believing that it would better effect the intention of the call for information, the estimates of the whole year have been made out principally by those of the two last quarters, on the supposition that the expenses of the two first quarters were similar to those of the two last, which, it is believed, would be found to correspond substantially with the fact.

In case of injury to our citizens, after making the demand for a redress of the injury, as pointed out by the act, you will, if it is not redressed in the time specified, forward the claim, properly testified, stating the time, place, and circumstance of the injury complained of, to the Fifth Auditor, for his examination. Your opinion on the truth of the claim, and the amount of damage, will accompany your report.

In case of injury done to the Indians, you will make a similar report, accompanied with your opinion, to this Department, and to the district attorney where the person who has done the injury resides; so that proper legal steps may be taken against the wrong-doer, in order to make the reparation at his expense, and not at the expense of the public, which should, if possible, be avoided. No payment, except through the order of this Department, will be allowed.

I observe that, in most of the applications made for reparation of injury, no care is taken to comply with the requisitions of the act; but it is hoped that, in future, they will be made more regular, as none will be admitted but such as the law or treaties provide for, and in which the provisions of the act have been complied with.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

A circular to the Commissioners to hold treaties.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 11, 1818.

The number and importance of the treaties to be held this year, and the great amount of rations which must necessarily be issued to the Indians while attending at the treaties, render it necessary that some system should be adopted to govern such large disbursements. I have therefore to request that you will designate the Indian agent, if he should be present, or, in case he is not, some suitable person, who shall ascertain the number and component parts of rations daily issued. The manner of issuing and certifying to conform, as near as may be, to the mode which prevails in issuing the rations to soldiers, and, at the conclusion of the treaty, to be presented to you for your approval. Where the rations have not been issued by the contractor for the district, the contract, or the condition on which the rations were furnished, must be certified to this Department for settlement.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

A circular to Indian Agents.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 15, 1818.

The disbursements on account of rations issued to the Indians have become so great as to require the most rigid rules and economy. If consistent with your other duties, you will in all cases attend treaties to be held with the Indians among whom you are agent, and will cause an exact enumeration to be made of those present to be furnished with rations, and will make a daily requisition, accompanied with a certificate of the number to be furnished with rations. The contractor, or deputy commissary, as the case may be, can obtain a credit at the office of the Fifth Auditor on such requisition and certificate only.

You will avoid, as much as possible, the causing such an assemblage of Indians as will render it necessary to issue rations to them; but when it becomes necessary, on account of distributing annuities, or any other sufficient cause, you will make your arrangements to do it with the greatest despatch, and in the most economical manner. If the meeting should be held at or near a place at which there may be a deputy commissary, after the 1st of June next, due notice will be given him of the time, place, and probable number of rations which may be required, in order that he may make his arrangements accordingly. The commissary will issue on your daily requisition, in which requisition you will state the number of Indians present who are to be furnished with rations. Should there be no deputy commissary at or near the place, you will cause a written contract for the supply of the rations to be made upon the most advantageous terms which you can for the Government; a duplicate of which you will certify to the Fifth Auditor, stating in your certificate, particularly, that the contract was made on terms the most advantageous to the Government which could be obtained.

In all cases where rations have been issued to an assemblage of Indians, except in holding a treaty, or for the purpose of distributing annuities or presents, you will immediately notify this Department of the cause; for neglect of which you will be liable to be charged with the rations issued.

Indiscriminate issues of rations to straggling Indians who may visit the agency having the most pernicious effect on them, by encouraging idleness, no allowance for such will be made.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Circular to Indian Agents.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 17, 1819.

The enclosed extract of a letter from the Second Auditor of the Treasury will show you the necessity of punctuality in rendering quarterly statements of your expenditures; and it is expected that every Indian agent, after the receipt of this circular, will prepare and forward immediately, after the 31st December next, statements of all their expenditures up to that period, and thereafter regularly every quarter. The irregular manner in which they have heretofore been transmitted renders it impossible to settle up the accounts of the Indian Department, which is very desirable; and any omission to comply with this order will be viewed by the Department as evidence of neglect of duty, and inattention to the public interest.

I am, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Extract of a letter to the Secretary of War.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, September 10, 1819.

It appears, upon the examination of the accounts relating to Indian affairs, which have been transmitted to this office since the passage of the law of the 24th February, 1819, on that subject, that Messrs. Henry Sherburne, John McKee, John Johnson, and N. Boilvin, have been regular in rendering statements of their expenditures. Many of the agents have made no communication since the passage of the act aforesaid; and, as it frequently occurs that the transactions of one agency are connected with those of some other, it is very desirable that a uniformity in rendering their statements should be kept up, so that the examining clerk may be enabled to refer from one to the other, as circumstances may require.

I have, &c.

WILLIAM LEE.

A circular to Indian Agents.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 19 1820.

It is required that, in future, no drafts be drawn by Indian agents on receivers of public moneys, or on this Department, for the current expenses of their agencies; but that quarterly estimates of the sums necessary for that purpose be furnished in advance by each agent, in order that the money may be remitted from the Treasury. This estimate to include the expenses of the sub-agent, if any, under your control.

Punctuality in rendering such estimates, for one quarter in advance, will be rigidly exacted; in default of which no funds will be furnished.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

A circular to Indian Agents.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 19, 1820.

The practice of the Indian chiefs in visiting the seat of Government during the session of Congress is attended with great inconvenience, as it is impossible to spare any time to devote to them or their affairs, from the more important and pressing business of the nation. In future, the chiefs of the several Indian tribes must not be permitted to visit the seat of Government, unless the Department is first notified through their agent of their desire to do so, and its sanction is obtained to the measure. You will inform the chiefs of the nation to which you are agent of this order on the subject, and that, if they visit the seat of Government without complying with it, they will have to bear their own expenses.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Governor Cass, dated

NOVEMBER 24, 1820.

Your letter of the 28th ultimo, enclosing an estimate of the expenses at the different Indian agencies under your superintendence, for the half-year ending the 31st December next, has been received.

I am satisfied that the estimate has been formed from the best information in your possession, and is as low as the great expenditures in your superintendency the past season, arising out of various treaties, would permit it to be made. But it appears to me that in the estimates for the next year a considerable reduction may be made in the items of "presents and contingencies;" which, I presume, from the circumstance above mentioned, have been put in the present estimate at the highest probable amount. It is, in my opinion, formed from experience, the best policy to endeavor to make the Indians feel the necessity of laboring for themselves, by gradually withdrawing the supplies which they have usually received from the Government. While they depend upon the Government for such supplies, they can never be made to understand what is their true interest; and all our efforts to improve their condition will be unavailing.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 19, 1821.

Congress having, at the last session, reduced the appropriation for the Indian Department from $200,000 to $100,000, it necessarily follows that a proportionate reduction should be made in the expenses of the department.

This cannot be done without confining the disbursements of the department exclusively to objects which cannot be dispensed with, to wit: pay of agents, sub-agents, interpreters, blacksmiths, transportation and distribution of annuities, farming and manufacturing utensils, &c., and avoiding all others, as far as it can be done without injury to the public interest, or violation of the laws or treaties; otherwise, it will be impossible to make the appropriation adequate to meet even the positive and necessary expenditures of the department for the year.

The disbursements at your agency, in future, for the pay of yourself, sub-agent, and interpreter, and all other expenses, must not exceed _____ dollars; and you will endeavor, by rigid economy, to make it as much less as possible.

If the number of persons in the public employment at the agency can be reduced with propriety, it ought to be done immediately.

Funds will be remitted to you from the Treasury, upon your quarterly estimates, as heretofore.

I am, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

[NOTE.—A similar letter with the above was addressed to the superintendents.]

The following distribution of funds was made under the appropriation for the Indian Department for 1821.

EXPENDITURES FOR THE CIVILIZATION OF THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 22, 1822.

To the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1822.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be laid before this House an account of the expenditures made under the act to provide for the civilization of the Indian tribes, specifying the times when, the persons to whom, and the particular purpose for which such expenditures have been made," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 19, 1822.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st ultimo, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House an account of the expenditures made under the act to provide for the civilization of the Indian tribes, specifying the times when, the persons to whom, and the particular purpose for which, such expenditures have been made," has the honor to transmit the enclosed statement, which contains the information required by the resolution.

The Secretary of War would respectfully refer to the report made by this Department to the House of Representatives on the 15th of January, 1820, in compliance with a resolution of that House, of the progress that had been made in the civilization of the Indians, which, with the regulations, a copy of which accompanies this report, will indicate the principles upon which the several allowances for buildings and tuition, referred to in the statement, have been made.

It may be proper to observe that, by a rigid construction of the rules adopted for the expenditure of the appropriation, the schools at Cornwall, in Connecticut, and Great Crossings, in Kentucky, would appear to be excluded from any benefit from it. It was believed, however, as there was not a sufficient number of schools in the Indian country, at the time the allowances were made, to absorb the whole appropriation, that it would advance the object of Congress in passing the act to include them in the distribution. All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 29, 1820.

The following regulations, in addition to those prescribed in the circular of the 3d of September, 1819, have been adopted, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to govern the future distribution of the sum appropriated by Congress for the civilization of the Indians, among individuals or societies who have established, or contemplate establishing, schools for the education of Indian children, in conformity to the above-mentioned circular, and who desire the co-operation of the Government:

The position selected for the establishment, a plan of the buildings contemplated, with an estimate of the cost, to be submitted to the Secretary of War, to be laid before the President.

Government will, if it has the means and approves the arrangement, pay two-thirds of the expense of erecting the necessary buildings.

No part of the money to be advanced until after the buildings are commenced, and one-fourth to be reserved until they are completed. The payment to be made on the certificate of the agent of Indian affairs for the tribe or nation in which the establishment is located, as to the facts of the commencement and completion of the buildings.

The President of the United States will contribute out of the annual appropriation, to each institution which may be approved of by him, a sum proportionate to the number of pupils belonging to each, regard being had to the necessary expense of the establishment and the degree of success which has attended it.

No advance to be made, except for the buildings, till the school is in actual operation; of which fact, and the number of pupils belonging to it, the certificate of the superintendent, or person having the principal control of the institution, will be sufficient evidence.

A report will be annually made for each establishment on the 1st of October of the number and names of the teachers and other persons belonging to it; the number of students; the number which have completed their course and left the institution since the 1st day of October of the preceding year; the number entered; the amount of disbursements for the same period; and the value and description of property on hand: which report will be certified by the superintendent, or person having the principal control of the establishment.

It is considered to be the duty of all persons who may be employed or attached to any institution, not only to set a good example of sobriety, industry, and honesty, but, as far as practicable, to impress on the minds of the Indians the friendly and benevolent views of the Government towards them, and the advantage to them in yielding to the policy of Government, and co-operating with it in such measures as it may deem necessary for their civilization and happiness. A contrary course of conduct cannot fail to incur the displeasure of Government, as it is impossible that the object which it has in view can be effected, and peace be habitually preserved, if the distrust of the Indians as to its benevolent views should be excited.

SIR:

FEBRUARY 7, 1820.

I have laid before the President your proposition to make a visit of observation and inspection to the various Indian tribes in our immediate neighborhood, in order to acquire a more accurate knowledge of their actual condition, and to devise the most suitable plan to advance their civilization and happiness. The President approves of the proposed arrangement, and has directed me to allow you the sum of $500 towards the expense of your contemplated journey; and he further authorizes me to state to you, that, should your actual expenses exceed that sum, the excess will be allowed you, provided the appropriation will, at the end of the year, justify the allowance.

It is desirable that you should make your visit to the northern tribes the next spring and summer, and to the southern the next autumn and winter, as it is the wish of the Department to have your report as early as practicable, in order to avail itself of it in the future application of the funds for the civilization of the Indians.

I enclose a general letter of introduction to the superintendents and agents for Indian affairs, with a list of their names and residence, who will afford you all the information and facilities in their power.

Your attention will be directed to ascertain the actual condition of the various tribes which you may visit, in a religious, moral, and political point of view; and your report to the Department, which you will make at such times as will be convenient, will comprehend all such facts, with your reflections on them, as will go to illustrate this interesting subject. You will particularly ascertain, as far as practicable, the numbers of the various tribes you may visit, and those adjacent; the extent of territory, with the nature of the soil and climate of the country occupied by them; their mode of life, customs, laws, and political institutions; and the character and disposition of their most influential men. You will also particularly report on the number of schools, their position, the number and character of the teachers, the number of scholars of each sex, the plan of education, with the degree of success which appears to attend the respective schools, and the disposition which exists in the tribes and with their chief men to promote among them education and civilization. You will also report your opinion as to improvements which may be made, and the new establishments, to promote the object of the Government in civilizing the Indians, which can be advantageously formed.

The moral condition of the Indians must necessarily be very dependant on the character of the trade with them, and a subject so important will, of course, claim your attention. You will report such facts as may come within your knowledge as will go to show the state of the trade with them, and the character of the traders, as, in your opinion, will render it better calculated to secure peace between them and us, and will contribute more effectually to advance their moral condition.

You are so fully apprized of the views of the President in your intended visit to the Indian tribes, that a further enumeration of the objects which are thought interesting is deemed unnecessary, satisfied as I am that your zeal and intelligence will permit nothing to escape your observation which may be useful to be known to the Government.

After you have collected your materials, you will digest the whole into one body, and present it in such form, and accompany it with such reflections and suggestions, as you may deem necessary to accomplish the interesting objects which it is intended to promote by your tour.

I have, &c.

CIVILIZATION OF THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 28, 1822.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned beg leave to approach your honorable body on a subject which deeply affects, in their apprehension, the cause of humanity and the honor of their country.

They will not dwell before the representatives of the nation on the state of the population of this country at its first settlement. It is well known that, when our fathers landed on these shores, they found the whole seaboard washed by the Atlantic inhabited by a race of intelligent and brave men, living in the state of uncivilized hunters and warriors. By purchase or by conquest, we now inherit the soil of these red men.

Wasted and wasting by their wars with the whites, or with each other, and still more by the baneful effects of an intoxicating poison industriously introduced among them by unprincipled traders, they have been driven before the tide of our rapidly increasing population, until they are found standing, even in their own apprehension, upon the very verge of political, and even of physical annihilation.

Attempts have been made, from time to time, by high and noble-minded individuals, to enlighten their red brethren, and not without effect.

The Indian mind has shown itself capable of culture, and their instructors have merited and received the only enviable title amongst freemen—that of benefactors of mankind.

The labors of these insulated individuals, however, when brought to bear upon our whole aboriginal population, could produce but a feeble and transient impression; like inscriptions on sand, they were seen, they were read, they were admired, and were then obliterated forever. Never, till the Government had acquired a powerful influence over Indian councils, could any feasible plan be devised for ameliorating their condition on a large scale. That time, however, has at length arrived. To the everlasting honor of the Government, it has projected a plan to save the scattered tribes from extinction, and eventually to incorporate them in the great American family. By occupying an intermediate space in the fur trade between them and men whose private interest has ever been at war with Indian happiness, and even with their very existence, they have thrown a shield over them worthy of the Government; a shield which, in preventing war and bloodshed, in advancing their moral culture, and in obviously promoting, in many other respects, the interests of these United States, is, in the view of your memorialists, of incalculable advantage. This plan of the Government, combining in itself much practical wisdom and sound philanthropy, has partially been carried into effect.

Under the auspices of Heaven, and patronized by Government, societies have been organized in various parts of the United States, to send the Gospel, together with the arts of civilized life, to the impoverished children of the forest.

Missionary families, invited by the Indians themselves, and composed of artificers, agriculturists, and teachers of various descriptions, have left their firesides, with all the enjoyments of civilized society, and, with their lives in their hands, and surrendering up all hope of temporal advantage, have bent their steps towards, and are now located in, the wilderness. The efforts of these missionaries and their friends, connected with other wise arrangements of the Government, are now in the full tide of successful experiment.

In confirmation of the above, we refer to the Cherokees. That tribe have recently divided their country into several districts; have laid a tax on their people to build a court-house in each; have appointed four circuit judges; and in other respects are rapidly adopting the laws and manners of civilized life. Like the plan now in operation, nothing has ever before been attempted in the country; and the rapidly growing popularity of the measures pursued in it clearly and strongly evinces a firm decision in its favor of a very large part of the American community.

Under these circumstances, the undersigned have learned with regret that attempts have recently been made to arrest this whole business in its course, and that, too, before even time has been given to test its advantages, or to bring its fruits to maturity.

Your memorialists cannot but view any resolution that should effect such an object as a deep wound to our country's honor, as grievously militating against its best interests, and as sealing in one death-warrant the fate of its whole Indian population. With these views of the subject, and earnestly deprecating such an act, as well as the awful consequences that must ensue, the undersigned respectfully approach the bar of the national representatives, and pray that they will not suffer a plan which has commenced with such fair prospects of success to be ruined in the morning of its increase; that the Indians may be saved from the cruel destiny which avarice stands ready to inflict; and that enough of the governmental funds may be appropriated to embrace the entire wants of these people in their commercial operations, that they may be thus freed from the necessity of having a destructive intercourse with their worst enemies.

If, in addition to the above, efficient measures can be taken by Congress to prevent the Indian wars with each other, it will save from interruption, and very much facilitate, the whole governmental plan.

In submitting these things, your memorialists beg leave respectfully to observe, that, if Congress shall continue to pursue and to cherish its present course of policy towards the Indians, they will receive the cordial thanks of all good men; and these, connected with the heart-cheering reflection that they have added to the moral and physical strength of their country, and saved thousands, perhaps millions, of their fellow beings from irredeemable destruction.

CONDITION OF THE SEVERAL INDIAN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 11, 1822.

To the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1822.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House any information which he may have of the condition of the several Indian tribes within the United States, and the progress of the measures hitherto devised and pursued for their civilization," I now transmit a report from the Secretary of War.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 8, 1822.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House any information which he may have of the condition of the several Indian tribes within the United States, and the progress of the measures hitherto devised and pursued for their civilization," has the honor to transmit the enclosed table, (marked A,) containing the number of schools established under the patronage of the Government within the Indian country; the number of scholars at each; the time of their commencement, where fixed, and by whom established; with remarks on their progress, present condition, &c. By reference to the table, it will appear that there are eleven principal schools, with three subordinate ones, in actual operation; and that three are in a state of preparation; and that the number of scholars at the last return at the principal and subordinate schools amounted to five hundred and eight. On these schools there has been expended $15,827 56, of which $7,447 56 has been on account of buildings, and the balance, $8,380, on account of the expense of tuition. It is made a condition of the subscription on the part of the Government that the schools should be established within the Indian country, and that the system of education, in addition to reading, writing, and arithmetic, should, for the boys, embrace instruction in agriculture and the ordinary mechanic arts, and, for the girls, the common domestic industry of that sex.

It was thought advisable, at the commencement of the system, to proceed with caution, and to enlarge the sphere of operation as experience should indicate the proper measures to be adopted, by which a useless expenditure of public money would be avoided, and the system adopted for the civilization of the Indians have the fairest trial. Experience has thus far justified those which have been adopted; and it is accordingly intended to give this year a greater activity to the funds, of which a much larger portion may be applied to tuition; the necessary buildings at so many points having already been erected.

Whether the system which has been adopted by the Government, if persevered in, will ultimately bring the Indians within the pale of civilization, can only be determined by time. It has been in operation too short a period to pronounce with certainty on the result. The present generation, which cannot be greatly affected by it, must pass away, and those who have been reared under the present system of education must succeed them, before its effects can be fully tested. As far, however, as civilization may depend on education only, without taking into consideration the force of circumstances, it would seem that there is no insuperable difficulty in effecting the benevolent intention of the Government. It may be affirmed, almost without qualification, that all of the tribes within our settlements and near our borders are even solicitous for the education of their children. With the exception of the Creeks, they have every where freely and cheerfully assented to the establishment of schools, to which, in some instances, they have contributed. The Choctaws, in this respect, have evinced the most liberal spirit, having set aside $6,000 of their annuity in aid of the schools established among them. The reports of the teachers are almost uniformly favorable, both as to the capacity and docility of their youths. Their progress appears to be quite equal to that of white children of the same age, and they appear to be equally susceptible of acquiring habits of industry. At some of the establishments a considerable portion of the supplies are raised by the labor of the scholars and teachers.

With these indications, it would seem that there is little hazard in pronouncing that, with proper and vigorous efforts, they may receive an education equal to that of the laboring portion of our community. Still, however, the interesting inquiry remains to be solved, whether such an education would lead them to that state of morality, civilization, and happiness, to which it is the desire of the Government to bring them; or whether there is not something in their situation which presents insuperable obstacles to such a state? To answer this inquiry, we have but little experience. There is certainly much encouragement to hope for the best, from the fact that the Cherokee nation, which has made the greatest progress in education, has also made the greatest towards this desirable state; but the experience which it affords is yet imperfect. They have adopted some written provisions for their government, to a copy of which, with an extract of a letter from the Rev. Mr. Steiner, a respectable Moravian, who has visited the nation at the interval of twenty years, and states the progress which they have made in that time, and which accompanies this report, (marked B,) I would respectfully refer the House, as furnishing the best testimony of the actual progress which that nation has made towards civilization. The zeal of the Cherokees for improvement, and the progress which they have made, are further evinced from the liberal provision for a school fund, for which the last treaty with them, ratified on the 10th of March, 1819, stipulates; and the fact that there are now established in the nation six schools, (two of which are upon the Lancasterian system,) containing in the aggregate about two hundred and thirty scholars. Notwithstanding these favorable appearances, many obstacles, difficult to be surmounted, will impede the progress of the Indians to a state of complete civilization.

Without adverting to others, the political relation which they bear to us is, of itself, of sufficient magnitude, if not removed, to prevent so desirable a state from being attained. We have always treated them as an independent people; and, however insignificant a tribe may become, and however surrounded by a dense white population, so long as there are any remains, it continues independent of our laws and authority. To tribes thus surrounded, nothing can be conceived more opposed to their happiness and civilization than this state of nominal independence. It has not one of the advantages of real independence, while it has nearly all the disadvantages of a state of complete subjugation. The consequence is inevitable. They lose the lofty spirit and heroic courage of the savage state, without acquiring the virtues which belong to the civilized. Depressed in spirit, and debauched in morals, they dwindle away through a wretched existence, a nuisance to the surrounding country. Unless some system can be devised gradually to change this relation, and with the progress of education to extend over them our laws and authority, it is feared that all efforts to civilize them, whatever flattering appearances they may for a time exhibit, must ultimately fail. Tribe after tribe will sink, with the progress of our settlements and the pressure of our population, into wretchedness and oblivion. Such has been their past history, and such, without this change of political relation, it must probably continue to be. To effect it, many difficulties present themselves. It will require the co-operation of the General Government and the States within which the Indians may reside. With a zealous and enlightened co-operation, it is, however, believed that all difficulties may be surmounted, and this wretched, but in many respects noble race, be ultimately brought within the pale of civilization. Preparatory to so radical a change in our relation towards them, the system of education which has been adopted ought to be put into extensive and active operation. This is the foundation of all other improvements. It ought gradually to be followed with a plain and simple system of laws and government, such as has been adopted by the Cherokees, a proper compression of their settlements, and a division of landed property. By introducing gradually and judiciously these improvements, they will ultimately attain such a state of intelligence, industry, and civilization as to prepare the way for a complete extension of our laws and authority over them.

Before I conclude, I would respectfully refer the House of Representatives, for more full and detailed information in relation to the progress made by the Indians in civilization, to the report of the Rev. Doctor Morse, which was laid before the House in pursuance of a resolution of the 22d January last.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

When commenced.	Where located.	By whom established.	No. of scholars.	Remarks.
	In the Seneca nation, N. York, on the Buffalo reservation.	By the Missionary Society of New York.	45	* This school appears to have been in existence about eight or nine years, but not of much advantage until lately; for the last two or three years, it has been more prosperous, and is becoming very useful; the number of scholars is said to be increasing. In addition to reading, writing, and arithmetic, the Indians are instructed in the mechanic arts and the use of agricultural implements. The consent of the Indians to the establishment of the above-mentioned schools in their country has in every instance been first obtained by the society by which they have been respectively made, with the approbation of the Department of War.

* These two schools, by an arrangement made early in the year 1821, between the Missionary Society of New York and the United Foreign Missionary Society of New York, were placed under the direction of the latter; since which, measures have been taken to render them more extensively useful.

Extract from the report of the superintendent of the establishment made by the American Board of Commissioners &c., at Brainard, in the Cherokee nation, dated

OCTOBER 1, 1821.

There are belonging to the two schools taught in this place ninety-six Cherokee children of both sexes, about two-thirds males; all of whom are boarded, and many of them clothed, at the expense of the establishment. Many promising children we have been obliged to reject or put by, until those now in school should be prepared to go out and make room for them, as we cannot accommodate and profitably teach more than we have had. Of those who attended last year, three have finished their course and left the institution, and six others have left the institution who could read and write. Twenty-four have entered the past year.

At the local schools we board but few scholars, not to exceed eight or ten at each school, and at present not more than four or five at Taloney. As some of the scholars who board at home have a great distance to walk, they are not all constant attendants, and the number of those who attend at all is not so great as when the schools first commenced. The average number attending the two local schools the year past has been between forty and fifty. Public worship is attended at each of these schools on the Sabbath, at which numbers of the parents as well as children attend, and some have made a public profession of the Christian religion.

The children of the schools continue to manifest an aptness to learn, a willingness to labor, and a readiness to submit to all the rules of the school. The Cherokees, we think, are fast advancing towards civilized life. They generally manifest an ardent desire for literary and religious instruction.

Extract from the report of the superintendent of the establishment made by the American Board of Commissioners, &c., at Elliot, in the Choctaw nation, dated

DECEMBER 21, 1820.

Since the last report, thirty-eight scholars have been admitted to the school. Ten have left, and one has been dismissed for misconduct. The number now in school is seventy-four. Six more are considered as belonging to it, but are at home on a visit. Of the whole number, sixty are males and twenty females. All these board in our family, and are entirely under our direction; excepting that ten, who live in the neighborhood, go home on Saturday, and return generally on the Sabbath morning.

Fifty of the scholars now belonging to the school could not speak our language when they entered. These have all made progress in proportion to the time they have been here, and several of them now speak English fluently. Others, who have not advanced so far, can read correctly, and will soon acquire the spoken language. Sixty-five now in the school began with the alphabet. Twenty-eight of these can read with facility in the Testament. All the scholars have been accustomed, from the first, to write their lessons on slates; and, when advanced, to write on paper. Thirty-nine write a plain hand without a copy. Nineteen others can form letters with tolerable accuracy. Ten have made some progress in arithmetic; and two, who were considerably advanced when they entered school, have attended to grammar and geography.

The boys, when out of school, are employed, as circumstances may require, in the various business of the farm and family. Each one, who is of sufficient size, is furnished with an axe and a hoe. We cultivated the past season about fifty acres of corn and potatoes, most of which was planted and hoed by the boys.

The girls are in two divisions, and are employed alternately in the kitchen, and in sewing, spinning, knitting, and other domestic labors.

We acknowledge with gratitude the kind providence of God in raising up patrons by whose generous aid, in co-operation with the Government, we have been enabled to extend to so many children of the forest the blessings of civilization, and to lay a foundation for more enlarged operations. An increasing desire is manifested by the natives to have these advantages more widely extended. Many full-blooded Indians have made applications of late to have children admitted to the school. They are willing to submit them entirely to our direction. Strong desires are expressed to have other schools opened.

Extract of a letter from the Rev. Abraham Steiner to the Secretary of War, dated

HONORED SIR:

SALEM, N. C., January 25, 1822.

I would not willingly intrude on your time, but, observing the agitation in Congress concerning the Indian affairs, and fearing the benevolent and humane plan of Government for civilizing the Indians to be at stake, I cannot forbear to say a few words on the subject.

I have been, many years ago, somewhat among the northern Indians. Twice I have been among the Creek nation of Indians; but am chiefly acquainted with the Cherokees, among whom I have been seven times, for a longer or shorter period. The last time I was among the Cherokees is two years ago. Just twenty years ago I first saw and visited them; and I can assure you, sir, though I had expected to see some signs of civilization among them, that it far surpassed my expectation, comparing the people with the state I first saw them in. There were, and are now, established respectable schools in that nation, and well supported with scholars, of both sexes; and it is only to be regretted that the several establishments must be limited in the number of scholars, for want of means, since the natives are highly in favor of schools, and offer more children than the several establishments are able to receive. Many of their youths can read and write; and I found among them, more especially half-breeds, as much knowledge as is commonly met with in persons of the same grade in civilized life. Besides the more public school institutions, some of them support private schools in their neighborhoods.

What interested me much was, their advancement in agriculture, and their comfortable and decent mode of living, compared with former times. Surely we cannot say that it is uniformly so, but it is among them nearly as it is among their white neighbors: some are industrious, and advance in wealth and decency; whilst others go on careless, in the way of their fathers, and remain poor beings. I have been with some who live altogether like our substantial farmers, in a very comfortable, nay, decent way, and their houses and furniture correspond with their advanced situation. In short, as far as I know, the Cherokees are advanced in civilization the farthest of the several tribes. This has been brought about, not only by means of benevolent associations, who have instituted and continue the good work, but greatly by the friendly countenance, the aid, and the measures pursued by the Government, which have contributed so richly towards rescuing our red brethren, the aborigines of the land, from their degradation. There is now a fair prospect of success, and the time is hailed with pleasing emotions, as not far distant, when these sons of the forest will be useful citizens. Why not let the plan be fully tested? And why destroy the fruit of the plant before it has come to maturity, or nip it in the bud? The Government being so much interested, I think it not irrelevant to say, that the institution at Brainard is a very useful one, which is supported by the Board of Foreign Missions, together with two other schools, on a smaller scale, at Taloney and at the Creek Path. The Baptists have also an establishment in the mountains, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Posey.

The Moravian Society at Salem, in North Carolina, have long since had, and now have, a mission establishment at Spring Place, not far from the Conesaga river, near Joseph Vann's, on the great road leading from Georgia to Tennessee, where a post office is established. According to the latest accounts from thence, from fifteen to twenty children are there educated at the cost of the society. They learn to read, to write, and to cipher, and are also instructed in husbandry and useful arts. Many have gone forth from that institution evincing the usefulness of their instruction in their improvement. The Rev. John R. Smith is the missionary and teacher at that place; and last year we paid a hand, a very moral character, to cultivate the land around the establishment, and to afford the youths an opportunity to be instructed therein; and, for the present year, we have engaged another such character for the same purpose. About thirty miles farther south, not far from the Coosa river, we have made, a year ago, another establishment, where the Rev. John Gambold now resides as missionary. We expect to have an assistant for him soon, as teacher. At that place is a close settlement of Indians, with fine plantations, on which are wagons and teams, ploughs, and all implements of husbandry, and some good buildings of hewn logs. Permit me also to notice that a good portion of Indians have embraced Christianity, and walk worthy of their high calling.

Whereas the Big Ratling Gourd, William Gremit, Betsey Broom, the Bark, Daniel Griffin, and Mrs. Lesley have lodged a complaint before the chiefs of a certain company of persons having formed a combination, and established a turnpike arbitrarily, in opposition to the interests of the above-named persons, proprietors of a privileged turnpike on the same road:

Be it now therefore known, That said complaint having been submitted by the council to the national committee for discussion, and after maturely investigating into the case, they have decreed that the said new company of the disputed turnpike shall be abolished, and that the above-named persons are the only legal proprietors and privileged company to establish a turnpike on the road leading from widow Foal's, at the forks of Hightower and Oostinahle rivers to Wills creek, by way of Turkeytown; and the said company shall be bound to keep in repair said road, to commence from the first creek east of John Fields, Sen., known by the name of "Where Vann was shot," and to continue westward to the extent of their limits. And the widow Foal shall also keep in repair, for the benefit of her ferry at the fork, the road, to commence from the creek above named to where Ridge's road now intersects said road east of his ferry; and that the said Ridge shall also keep in repair the road, to commence at the two runs east of his ferry, and to continue by way of his ferry as far as where his road now intersects the old road leading from the fork west of his ferry; and that the Hightower turnpike company shall keep in repair the road from the two runs to where it intersects the federal road near Blackburn's.

And be it hereby resolved, That no person or persons whatsoever shall be permitted to cut out any road or roads now in existence so as to intersect the same again, and to the injury of the interest of any person or persons residing on the said road, without first getting an order from the national council for the opening of such road or roads. ACCOUNTS OF THE SUPERINTENDENTS OF INDIAN AFFAIRS IN MICHIGAN AND MISSOURI.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 11, 1822.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 9, 1822.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 18th ultimo, directing the Secretary of War "to lay before that House a copy of the account current of the Governor of the Michigan Territory, which shall exhibit a perfect view of his superintendency of Indian affairs for the year 1820, and, as far as in his power, the account of said superintendency for the year 1821, specifying the particular items of expenditure, and to whom paid; and, also, a similar account for said years of the superintendency of the Governor of the late Territory of Missouri," I have the honor to enclose the report of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, which contains the information requested.

It is proper to observe that the amount of presents made to the Indians by the superintendent for the year 1820 was very considerably increased by the treaty of Saginaw, which acquired for the Government a very extensive and valuable tract of country around the bay of that name. No appropriation having been made for the expenses of holding the treaty, they were paid out of the ordinary appropriation for the Indian Department, of which a very considerable portion is blended with the current account of the expenditure of the year, under the head of "contingent services or presents," of which some of the considerable items, particularly for horses as presents to the Indians, are connected with the treaty, the presents being given either to prepare the way for a successful issue of the treaty, or to fulfil promises which were made while holding it. The objects of the tour of Governor Cass, in 1820, which constitutes a portion of the expenditure for that year, will appear by a reference to the correspondence with him in relation to it, a copy of which accompanies the report of the Second Auditor, as part of the vouchers for the settlement of his account. The various tribes of Indians within his superintendency between the lakes and the Mississippi, and the country itself, were but imperfectly known, and the principal objects of the tour were to obtain a more thorough knowledge of the character of both, and to make known to those tribes the policy and feelings of the Government towards them, in order to improve the ordinary administration of the department, and to carry into effect the system of measures which had been adopted in relation to the intercourse between them and the adjoining province of Canada. The measures which were then contemplated are particularly stated in my letter to the chairman of the Military Committee, dated 29th December, 1819, contained in a report of the Military Committee of the 3d January, 1820, to which I would respectfully refer the House. In addition to these, there were other objects, which, though of minor consequence, were not without interest. It was thought to be expedient to extinguish the Indian title to the islands in the vicinity of Michilimackinac, containing extensive quarries of plaster of Paris, and to a military site on the Sault de St. Marie, and to ascertain whether the Indian title had been extinguished to the country in and about the settlements at Green Bay and Prairie du Chien. These objects were considered of sufficient importance to authorize the tour; and, in order to obtain as full information as was practicable of a region so little known, two officers of the army and an enterprising and enlightened mineralogist were attached to the party. The expenses of the tour were charged to the appropriation for the Indian department, as its objects were connected with our relations with the Indians, and were taken principally out of the sum which, in the general distribution of the appropriation, had been allotted to that superintendency. Governor Cass received no additional compensation, and the officers of the army were allowed only the usual compensation of officers of their grade while engaged in the performance of topographical duties. The mineralogist was allowed $1 50 per diem for the time actually engaged, comprehending that employed in completing his report. The whole expenses of the tour, including presents, and the expenses of holding the treaties to which I have referred, and by which important cessions were obtained, amount to $6,318 02.

It became necessary, while Governor Cass was at the seat of Government last autumn, in settling his account as superintendent, to adjust his personal account against the Government, which had remained open from the date of his appointment. In 1814 and 1815, shortly after he received his appointment, he made application for the allowance of a specific sum to cover the various personal expenses to which he was liable in the performance of his duty as superintendent. Without objecting to the amount which he thought necessary for that purpose, he was informed that a specific amount could not be allowed; but at the same time it was stated that, on presenting his account, what was reasonable would be allowed. The claim, from its nature, could only be adjusted on equitable principles, it being impossible to state the items of expense to which, situated as he was, he was exposed from his intercourse with the Indians. The facts and statement on which the decision was made, with the decision itself, accompany his accounts and will be found in the abstract of the vouchers in the report of the Second Auditor. The duties which Governor Cass performed as superintendent, being similar to those of Governor Clark, but more extensive, and, in their performance, attended with greater expense, in the adjustment of his account reference was had to the allowance which had been made to the latter, making such additional allowance as the difference in the two cases and a regard to equity required.

The Governors of Territories are, by law, superintendents of Indian affairs within the Territory, whose duties extend to a general control over the agents and other officers of the Indian Department within the Territory, but do not extend to the performance of the duties assigned to agents, nor to the disbursements on account of the expenses of the department within the superintendency. These latter duties, as well as the former, having been assigned to Governor Clark, he was allowed, by the direction of General Armstrong, 1,500 dollars per annum for their performance, and the expense attending the same. The duties of Governor Cass have been equally extended beyond those belonging to him as superintendent. There being no agent within the peninsula of Michigan, the duties of an agent to the tribes residing within its limits necessarily devolved on him; and the disbursements of his superintendency (to which the agencies in Ohio and Indiana, with the exception of that at Vincennes, were annexed, as it was found to be inconvenient to separate them from the same general control which, as superintendent, he had over the Indians in that quarter) were made through him. Under these circumstances, it was thought just to extend the decision which had been made in the case of Governor Clark to Governor Cass; to which was added an allowance, supposed to be equal to the expense necessarily attending the intercourse with the Indians at a point to which there is so great a resort of Indians as Detroit, and where, from the neighborhood of the adjoining province of Canada, it is necessary to extend to them greater liberality and attention than at any other place.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. PHILIP P. BARBOUR, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

L. C. No. 3.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, October 17, 1821.

Some time since I submitted to the War Department the peculiarity of my situation as superintendent of Indian affairs, and the increased expense to which I was rendered liable by my local position and by the circumstances of the times. The letters which I had the honor to submit, of October 25th, 1814, and of October 21st, 1815, were in answer to these representations.

It becomes my duty now, when requesting a definite allowance under these instructions, to state the circumstances which render this measure proper, that you may be the better enabled to determine what sums shall be allowed.

During the whole period of the war, and for more than two years succeeding its termination, the Territory of Michigan was in a state of absolute exhaustion. The events there were at first so disastrous, and the contest for the possession of the country was so long and severe, that its resources were soon destroyed. Its reduced population, totally inadequate to the production of its own supplies, were dispirited, and their exertions paralyzed by the insecurity of their situation, and by the atrocious scenes of which they were the daily witnesses. Under these circumstances, it can excite no surprise to learn that every article of life was dearer than in any other section of the United States. The most extravagant prices were asked and given.

I take the liberty of enclosing, herewith, a schedule of the prices, made out in 1815, while Governor Harrison, General McArthur, and Mr. Graham, commissioners for treating with the Indians, were at Detroit. The original was formed in the presence of Mr. Graham, and transmitted by him to the War Department.

It may be readily presumed that, upon such a frontier, and in such times, my expenses must have far exceeded the stated salary of the office. I can solemnly aver that I expended much more than the whole sum received as salary. After the communications before referred to, I considered myself justifiable in incurring these expenses, to which I was rendered liable, and from which I could not extricate myself without a sacrifice, in some degree, of the public interest. It is impossible to attain absolute precision upon such a subject. I have charged in my accounts with the United States $2,000 per annum, during the years 1814, 1815, and 1816; and certain I am that this sum will not compensate me for the peculiar circumstances in which I was placed, and for the additional expense I was compelled to encounter. These three years comprehend the period to which I am willing that this allowance should be restricted, and within which the prices of every article were most extravagant.

The expenditure of the appropriation for the Indian Department is entirely discretionary with the Government. It is applied to such objects, and in such manner, as the Government may deem most conducive to the public interest. There is no limitation but the discretion of the Executive—a discretion founded on a full consideration of the circumstances in every particular case, and restrained by the public interest on one side, and by the just rights of individuals on the other. I do not ask the sum which I have stated as a fixed annual allowance, but as a fair estimate of my claim under the authority of the Government. I do not ask it to be paid to me; I request it may be allowed in my account current as an item of expenditure to which I was liable.

During the three years I have specified, Detroit was, emphatically, the Indian head-quarters. The eyes of all the Indians north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, together with many of those west of that river, were fixed upon that place. Either as actors or as anxious spectators, their attention was directed to Detroit and to Malden. All who could come—men, women, and children—remained as near there as the circumstances of the times permitted. During a part of that time we had no agent at Michilimackinac, Green Bay, Prairie du Chien, St.

Peter's, Rocky river, Chicago, Fort Wayne, and Upper Sandusky; and, during the whole of it, we had agents but at two or three of those places.

The Governors of Territories are ex officio superintendents of Indian affairs within their respective local jurisdictions. But almost the whole duties of Indian agent for that immense extent of country, and for those numerous tribes of Indians, devolved upon me. Three-fourths of them were not within my local jurisdiction, and, consequently, I was not bound to discharge the duties of agent without compensation. In an estimate submitted to the War Department in 1816, it was computed that the average daily number of Indians in the town of Detroit was 400. My family has been driven from one extremity of the house to the other by them.

There is another consideration, too, which ought not to be omitted. I was, by the execution of these duties, subjected to great personal responsibility. The money for the public expenditures of the department was procured by me in the interior of the country, and brought through that dangerous and exposed frontier, at my risk, to Detroit. An accident, by which the sum of $475 was lost, might easily have happened to a much larger amount, and would have occasioned my inevitable ruin.

More than $200,000 were, within this period, thus expended by me, not one cent of which was it my legal duty to disburse. My claim, then, rests upon these facts: Upon the assurances of the War Department, contained in the letters I have before mentioned; upon services rendered by me in cases not within the legal scope of my duties; upon the disbursements of public money under the circumstances which I have stated.

I reserve for your subsequent consideration any claim which I may have to an allowance for the discharge of duties since 1816, similar in their character to those alluded to by Mr. Graham, in his letter respecting the settlement of the accounts of General Hull. The sum of $2,000 per annum includes all allowances in whatever form which I claim for the years 1814, '15, and '16, and all that I ever expect to claim at any time under the letters of the War Department to which I have referred.

The estimate upon this subject should be judged by the circumstances of the times when the facts occurred, and not by our present views of things. It was a period of war, of a peace which immediately succeeded to it. Every thing was upon the war scale. We have reached our present situation slowly and gradually. We must stop and look back before we can correctly appreciate the changes which have taken place.

There are in town two gentlemen, Colonel Hunt and General Macomb, one of whom was at Detroit during the whole period to which I have referred, and the other during a part of it. I have not exchanged a word with either of them upon the subject of this letter. I beg leave to refer you to them for such facts as may be material in enabling you to form your opinion upon the estimate which I have submitted.

I can only add, that I have incurred heavy expenses necessarily incident to my station; and I do trust that I shall receive credit for the assertion when I say, which I do most solemnly, that my pecuniary circumstances would have been better had I never accepted the office which I now hold.

Very respectfully, sir, I have the honor to be, &c.

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

P. S. I find, on examination, that the schedule referred to cannot now be found in the department. Another shall be made out, should you deem it important.

L. C. No. 4.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, October 29, 1821.

In the letter which I had the honor to address you a few days since, I stated the nature of the claim which I had to compensation for the execution of duties connected with Indian affairs, and which I was not required by law to execute. In addition to the facts and principles therein stated, I take the liberty of presenting the following view of the subject.

I am ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs within the Territory of Michigan. As such, it is my duty to superintend the agencies therein. Further than this, the law does not require me to go. Whenever, therefore, other duties are executed, they are to be paid out of the general fund appropriated for Indian affairs.

Since 1813, and including part of that year, I have been the superintendent of Indian affairs upon the north-western frontier of the United States. The agency of Michilimackinac is the only agency that was originally within the Territory of Michigan. That of Green Bay was attached to the Territory at the close of 1818, or the commencement of 1819. All the others under my superintendency are without the Territory, and the supervising power exercised by me over them is consequently not within the pale of my official duties. I have, then, superintended the following agencies, for which I have a just claim to compensation: the agency of Green Bay, till 1819; the agency at Chicago, Fort Wayne, Piqua, and the sub-agencies at Upper Sandusky and Blanchard's Fork, since their establishment.

In the settlement of the accounts of Governor Hull, in 1811, he was allowed $250 per annum for superintending the Indians at Upper Sandusky. The Indians superintended by me are, I presume, more than ten times in number those included in his account. Besides, the business then was comparatively trifling to what it now is. The correspondence of the War Department with the agencies is now carried on through the superintendent. Every doubtful point is submitted to him by the different agents. If the question can be decided by him, a decision is made; if not, it is referred to the War Department. All the funds received by him are transmitted to the different agents. The estimates are forwarded by him, and every voucher for expenditure by an agent is examined, certified, and transmitted by him, and an account kept with each agent in his office. Previous to the war, no such system prevailed; and the consequence was, a general laxity in the state of our Indian affairs. Scarcely any correspondence was carried on between the superintendent and the agents, except with relation to the issuing of licenses, for each of which the superintendent received $5. All the forms, also, are devised by me, and forwarded to the agents. I have no hesitation in saying that my duties, in this respect, are three-fold greater than those which I am required to execute in the civil administration of the government of the Territory.

I have before stated that I am ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs within the Territory, and that it is my duty as such to "oversee and overlook," in the words of the definition, others in the department.

But for eight years I have executed the duty of Indian agent at Detroit. There was no agent "to oversee and overlook." I came directly in contact with the Indians, and every question and every application respecting them came directly to me. In fact, I have been surrounded by them. Some conception of their number may be formed, when it is recollected that the great body of the Indians north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi annually visit Malden, and pass through, or in the vicinity of, Detroit, on their journeys.

That place has, for more than a century, been the head-quarters of Indian affairs, under the French, British, and American Governments. The Ottawas, Chippewas, and a large portion of the Pattawatamies, belong to that agency, considered as such; and of these tribes I am in fact the agent. All the provisions and presents are issued by me: the annuities are paid by me. Applications with respect to losses sustained, either by the Indians or by our own citizens, are made to me, heard, determined, and satisfied or rejected, or forwarded to the Second Auditor of the Treasury. Licenses both to our own citizens in the ordinary manner, and also under the act of 1816, are granted by me; and the latter is a troublesome and laborious duty, for the discharge of which Major Puthuff considered himself entitled to $3,000 in one year; in short, the daily and hourly duties devolving upon an ordinary Indian agent, and resulting from the visits and applications of an importunate, hungry, wretched, and generally drunken people, are performed by me, not only for the Indians living within the peninsula, and considered as belonging to the Detroit agency, and computed at 8,000, but also for every Indian without those limits who is brought to Malden and Detroit by business, interest, or poverty.

Considered with reference to its business and importance, and taking into view its relation to the British and Indians, there is certainly no agency in the Union which can compare with that of Detroit; none which is visited by the same number of Indians, none which is importuned with the same number of applications, none which requires the same ceaseless attention, and none which renders necessary the same caution and vigilance to secure the Indians from the effect of British presents and promises. The duties of this agency I have performed for upwards of eight years, without any legal obligation, without one cent of compensation, and with as much zeal and fidelity as in my power.

I have not the means of ascertaining, with precision, the sums that have passed through my hands in the period above alluded to; they must, however, equal $400,000. No law requires me to receive or disburse one cent of this money. During a considerable part of the time it was procured at the banks in Ohio, and brought at my risk to Detroit.

The risk attending these transactions was of two kinds: 1st, That of transportation; two hundred miles of the whole distance being unsettled. War prevailed during part of the time, and at no time was the country considered safe. The road traversed the Black swamp, perhaps the most dreary portion of the Union. I have already stated the loss of $475, and the same accident might have happened to almost any amount. A sudden fall of rain might cause a creek to rise, and might lead to the death of the messenger.

2d. Another risk was occasioned by the state of the currency and the uncertain condition of the banks. These institutions are in a critical situation, fluctuating with every report; solvent to-day, and bankrupt to-morrow. To procure the money, I gave drafts on the Treasury. These drafts were, of course, debited to me; but, between the time of receiving and of paying the money, the bank might shut its vaults, and the paper thus become useless; in such an event, the loss must fall upon me. Even in better and safer times, the Bank of Michigan considered it worth $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to bring money from New York at the expense of the United States, and, in fact, refused to do it.

The mode of expending this money renders the business very hazardous to the officer. A voucher may be lost or mislaid, or a payment may be made not authorized by law or by the instructions; and, in these cases, certain loss is the consequence. The payments, too, are of the most troublesome kind. A thousand little articles are required by the Indians, and the accounts must be multiplied in proportion. A portion of this amount consisted in goods sent for distribution to the Indians—the most perplexing business which ever fell to the lot of any man to execute. Day after day, month after month, and year after year, to hear their demands, their complaints of partialities, and to divide and satisfy, require a greater share of patience than is usually found. I cannot add any thing to my former statement on the subject of expense; but I take the liberty of subjoining the certificates of General Macomb and Colonel Hunt, two gentlemen who have observed at all times my official duties, and who well know the situation in which I have been placed. I trust their statement will be satisfactory. I take the liberty of transmitting, also, a condensed exhibit of my claim, certified by myself.

Yours, &c.

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, November 2, 1821.

I do hereby certify that Whitmore Knaggs has been a deputy superintendent of Indian affairs, or sub-agent and interpreter, as I have been informed, since General Wayne took possession of the fort of Detroit; Gabriel Godfroy was appointed to the same office in 1813, by General Harrison. Knaggs is the sub-agent for the Chippewas and Ottawas, and Godfroy for the Pattawatamies. Both of them speak all the Indian languages of that country fluently. They are men above the common sphere of interpreters, but can scarcely read or write; of course, they can render me no service in the execution of any of the duties which require the most limited education. It is their duty to attend all the Indian treaties, which they do, without compensation. They have attended the treaties of Spring Wells, in 1815; of Fort Meigs, in 1817; the three treaties of St. Mary's, in 1818; the treaty of Saginaw, in 1819; and the treaty of Chicago, in 1821.

It is their duty, also, to repair to any part of the Indian country where difficulties may arise, to pursue and reclaim from marauding parties of Indians any property they may have stolen; to take the annuity to such part of the country as may be directed for the payment of Indians; to receive at their houses, which are never empty, all Indians who may arrive; to ascertain their business, feelings, &c.; and to attend to the drawing of provisions, and an immense variety of business, the details of which it would be tedious to enumerate, and which employs their time, attention, and means. There has been no other sub-agent in the Territory since the period of my residence there, and both the persons I have mentioned have been zealous public servants, overloaded with duties, and not supported during any one year by their official emoluments:

Charles Larned, John Stockton, and Robert A. Forsyth, have, since September, 1814, executed those duties which, at other places, are performed by sub-agents, and two of them the duties of interpreters. The first speaks French, and acted as French interpreter; and the last speaks that language, and also that of the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pattawatamies, and acted as interpreter for their languages. All three of them aided me in the ordinary duties of the office, and without them it would have been impossible for me to discharge its duties. No other interpreter is now constantly employed except Forsyth and the two sub-agents. Without the assistance of one of the persons last mentioned, a sub-agent or interpreter would have been necessary at all times in my office.

LEWIS CASS.

L. C. No. 5.

WASHINGTON, October 30, 1821.

I certify that I have lived at Detroit during the whole time that Governor Cass has administered the Government there. I have read with attention two letters addressed by him to the Secretary of War, one of October 17th, and the other of October 29th, 1821, and there is not one fact stated in either which I do not fully believe. It is only necessary for me to add, that his office is most troublesome and perplexing, and that the applications made to him by the Indians are almost hourly.

Detroit has, since the commencement of the war, and until within two years, been the dearest place in the United States. Every article of life has been enormous. The average price of flour has been twelve dollars per barrel, pork thirty-five per barrel, whiskey two dollars per gallon, butter fifty cents per pound by the firkin, eggs fifty cents per dozen by the average, and frequently a dollar has been paid per dozen for them; three dollars for a turkey, wine eight dollars per gallon, corn two dollars per bushel—I have paid that price for five hundred bushels at a time; oats seventy-five cents per bushel, hay thirty dollars per ton, loaf sugar fifty cents per pound, coffee sixty-two and a half cents per pound, hyson tea three dollars per pound, and every other article in proportion. The contract price of wood was, upon the average, five dollars and fifty cents per cord. Having been in the mercantile business during the whole time, I can speak of these subjects from my own knowledge. My expenditures during the period of Governor Cass's administration have exceeded, upon an average, $2,000 per annum. From the frontier situation of Detroit, the necessary disbursements of an executive officer must be great, and I believe Governor Cass's to have far exceeded that of any other citizen in the Territory.

I am a director of the Bank of Michigan, and it is within my knowledge that the bank this summer refused to bring specie from New York to Detroit at the expense of the United States, but at their own, although the transaction would have been worth one and a half per cent. They considered the risk much greater. During most of the time stated by Governor Cass, I think it was very hazardous to bring money from almost any point, and I am satisfied that any insurance company in the world would have asked four per cent. for the hazard of bringing money to that place.

I have attended every treaty which he has concluded with the Indians, and have observed, in common with other individuals there, his constant anxiety of mind, his unwearied exertions to bring the negotiations to a favorable issue, and his peculiar talent in effecting that object.

L. C. No. 6.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, October 30, 1821.

I have attentively read the statements of Governor Cass, as set forth in his two letters addressed to the honorable Secretary of War, dated October 17 and 29, 1821, and do unhesitatingly say that it is my opinion and belief that every fact and circumstance therein set forth is fair and not exaggerated; because, from my own experience, I found that my pay and emoluments as a major general commanding barely met the necessary expenses to which I was exposed while commanding at Detroit in 1815, 1816, 1817, and 1818. It was more like a foreign station than one within the limits of our own territory, where every article of living was exceedingly scarce, and, consequently, very dear. That it was also the rendezvous of the troops for the western lakes and for the Indians of the west, and, indeed, of almost every quarter; that to manage the savages with address, to secure their interest and friendship, it required more than ordinary attention, particularly as it was at the close of a war in which the Indians suffered a good deal. These unfortunate people, pressed to the greatest extremities, were calling constantly on the American and British authorities in the immediate vicinity of Detroit, the natural and ancient places of their resort. During this period, Governor Cass was surrounded with deputations and chiefs from all the tribes, both far and near; and to show them some of the civilities to which they were accustomed from the whites, required not only great pecuniary means, but a knowledge of their habits and manners, which the Governor appeared perfectly to understand. The zeal with which the Department of Indian Affairs was executed under the administration of Governor Cass, not only by his personal exertion, but the faculty he possessed of causing every one attached to his department to aid him, produced the most happy consequences. The Indians became daily more tractable, felt a higher respect and consideration for the American Government, and already began to contrast its character with that of the British, to whom they had been so warmly attached during the late war. But, to bring about this happy and good understanding, many feasts were given to the chiefs, and presents to their wives and children, from the hands of the Governor and his family; many acts of kindness, such as feeding them within the enclosure of his domestic establishment, supplying the sick and relieving the needy, could not be accomplished without considerable expense—an expense which I was sure would be more than double his salary as Governor of the Territory of Michigan. To these facts I am perfectly knowing, because I often counselled with the Governor on the state of the Indians and of the Indian affairs, and was absolutely obliged to send a guard to the Governor's quarters, in order to enable the Governor to prevent the Indians from pressing too hard upon him, so that he might be, in some degree, free from their incessant demands, and have time enough to attend to his public concerns, which were otherwise very urgent at that time. The manner in which the affairs of the civil department of his administration were conducted is publicly and well known; and here it may not be improper to remark, that this branch of his duty called around him many officers and others, both civil and military, and, consequently, a corresponding expense.

The Indian Department was the most arduous and incessant concern of Governor Cass, because on the faithful administration of all its branches depended not only the peace and prosperity of the Territory over which he was appointed Governor, but the tranquillity and protection of all the frontier settlements of the west, from beyond the Mississippi to the frontier of Ohio.

The result of his administration is well known to the War Department and to the nation at large, and is now felt and approved by many thousands who feel the influence of his useful exertions. I am, therefore, satisfied that his demand on the Government for some compensation for his extra duties in the Indian Department is not only reasonable and proper, but that his situation demands the relief which such extraordinary duties and expense entitle him to; and that I consider the sum asked for, viz. 2,000 dollars per annum, as nothing more than a reasonable compensation.

ALEXANDER MACOMB, Major General.

L. C. No. 7.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Governor Cass, dated

OCTOBER 24, 1814.

The President, to whom your letter of the 15th September was submitted, is fully aware of the additional expense which you must necessarily incur by those attentions to the Indian chiefs and principal men which the existing state of affairs make indispensably necessary; but the mode pointed out by you, by which they might be covered, is such, he thinks, as neither the usage of the Government nor the law would justify. He, however, is of opinion that you should be remunerated for these additional expenses, either by a special appropriation, or out of the contingent fund of the Indian Department.

L. C. No. 8.

Extract of a letter from George Graham, chief clerk of the War Department, to Governor Cass, dated

OCTOBER 21, 1815.

Your letter of the 8th September has been submitted to the President, who has lately returned from a visit to his family residence. He has requested me to inform you that he considers the existing laws as presenting great obstacles to granting any fixed annual allowance, in addition to your salary as Governor and Indian agent, ex officio, of the Michigan Territory; but, aware of the additional expenses which you have been subjected to, from the peculiar state of the Territory since you have been acting as Governor, and desirous that you should be remunerated for them, he requests that you will submit an estimate of these additional expenses in the form of an account against the Government, which, in that shape, will be acted upon, and passed (if deemed reasonable) to the proper appropriation.

On the last settlement made by Governor Hull with this Department, I find that an allowance was made to him of $750 for superintending, for the years 1809, '10, '11, Indian agents not within the limits of the Michigan Territory.

The agents for Green Bay and Chicago have both been directed to report to you.

L. C. No. 9.

NOVEMBER 2, 1821.

In addition to the ten rations a day which have been allowed Governor Cass, on account of the great expense which has attended his intercourse with the Indians as superintendent, he will be allowed, in full of all expenses and charges for extra duty as superintendent, the same compensation as that which was made to Governor Clark; his expenses as superintendent and claims for extra services being considered equal to the amount allowed.

C. Larned, John Stockton, and R. A. Forsyth, will be allowed at the rate of five hundred dollars per annum for performing the duties of sub-agents, and the last two hundred and twenty dollars per annum as interpreter, deducting the payments made to them above that sum from the allowance to Governor Cass as superintendent.

The ration undrawn will be estimated at twenty cents per ration.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

L. C. No. 10.

Governor Cass's general certificate.

NOVEMBER 9, 1821.

I do hereby certify that the account of Mack & Conant was for various articles furnished for the use of the Indian Department, and which were employed for mechanical work, and for distribution to the Indians.

The sum of $500, voucher 23, was paid upon the order of Major Puthuff, Indian agent at Michilimackinac, and was for articles furnished to that agency.

Voucher 51. This was the expense of transporting to Detroit the specie designed for annuities. The horses were generally purchased and given to the Indians in consequence of promises made to them at treaties. All that are charged in this account were so disposed of, or have strayed or perished in the public service.

Voucher 48. This charge is for the sum of $500 paid Jacob Smith, an influential man among the Indians, for his services in the summer of 1819, in relation to the Saginaw treaty.

Voucher 74. This charge is of the same nature.

The charge of $800, for the charter of the schooner Decatur, was in consequence of the necessity of detaining that vessel at Saginaw, both as a storeship and to retransport to Detroit persons employed at the treaty, and such provisions and other articles as were not wanted there.

From 12 to —. These charges are on account of the expedition to the sources of the Mississippi under my command, in 1820.

So far as respects the other items in the abstracts, I certify that the money has been faithfully expended according to the best of my discretion, and that the articles purchased have been applied to the public service according to their nature and to the statements of their respective vouchers.

LEWIS CASS, Governor of Michigan Territory.

L. C. No. 11.

DETROIT, November 18, 1819.

SIR:

The country upon the southern shore of Lake Superior, and upon the water communication between that lake and the Mississippi, has been but little explored, and its natural features are imperfectly known. We have no correct topographical delineation of it, and the little information we possess relating to it has been derived from the reports of the Indian traders.

It has occurred to me that a tour through that country, with a view to examine the productions of its animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, to explore its facilities for water communication, to delineate its natural objects, and to ascertain its present and future probable value, would not be uninteresting in itself, nor useless to the Government. Such an expedition would not be wholly unimportant in the public opinion, and would well accord with that zeal for inquiries of this nature which has recently marked the administration of the War Department.

But, however interesting such a tour might be in itself, or however important in its result, either in a political or geographical point of view, I should not have ventured to suggest the subject, nor to solicit your permission to carry it into effect, were it not, in other respects, intimately connected with the discharge of my official duties.

Mr. Woodbridge, the Delegate from this Territory, at my request, takes charge of this letter; and he is so intimately acquainted with the subject, and every way so competent to enter into any explanations you may require, that I shall not be compelled to go as much into detail as, under other circumstances, might be necessary.

The route which I propose to take is from here to Michilimackinac, and from thence, by the Straits of St. Mary's, to the river which contains the body of copper ore, (specimens of which have been transmitted to the Government,) and to the extremity of Lake Superior.

From that point, up the river which forms the water communication between that lake and the Mississippi, to the latter river; and by the way of Prairie du Chien and Green Bay, to Lake Michigan.

The political objects which require attention upon this route are:

1st. A personal examination of the different Indian tribes who occupy the country; of their moral and social condition; of their feelings towards the United States; of their numerical strength; and of the various objects connected with them, of which humanity and sound policy require that the Government should possess an intimate knowledge. We are very little acquainted with these Indians, and I indulge the expectation that such a visit would be productive of beneficial effects.

The extract from the letter of Colonel Leavenworth, herewith enclosed, and the speech of the Winnebago Indians, transmitted to the War Department by Mr. Graham, from Rock Island, February 24, 1819, will show how much we have yet to learn respecting these tribes, which are comparatively near to us.

2d. Another important object is to procure the extinction of Indian titles to the land in the vicinity of the Straits of St. Mary's, Prairie du Chien, Green Bay, and upon the communication between the two latter places.

I will not trouble you with any observations respecting the necessity of procuring these cessions. They are the prominent points of the country, the avenues of communication by which alone it can be approached.

Two of them, Prairie du Chien and Green Bay, are occupied by a considerable population, and the Straits of St. Mary's by a few families. The undefined nature of their rights and duties, and the uncertain tenure by which they hold their lands, render it important that some step should be taken by the Government to relieve them. I think, too, that a cession of territory, with a view to immediate sale and settlement, would be highly important in the event of any difficulties with the Indians.

My experience at Indian treaties convinces me that reasonable cessions, upon proper terms, may at any time be procured. At the treaty recently concluded at Saginaw, the Indians were willing to cede the country in the vicinity of Michilimackinac, but I did not feel authorized to treat with them for it.

Upon this subject, I transmit extracts from the letters of Mr. Boyd and Colonel Bowyer, by which it will be seen that these gentlemen anticipate no difficulty in procuring these cessions.

3d. Another important object is the examination of the body of copper in the vicinity of Lake Superior. As early as the year 1800, Mr. Tracy, then a Senator from Connecticut, was despatched to make a similar examination. He, however, proceeded no farther than Michilimackinac. Since then, several attempts have been made, which have proved abortive. The specimens of virgin copper which have been sent to the seat of Government have been procured by the Indians, or by the half-breeds, from a large mass represented to weigh many tons, which has fallen from the brow of a hill.

I anticipate no difficulty in reaching the spot, and it may be highly important to the Government to divide this mass, and to transport it to the seaboard for naval purposes.

It is also important to examine the neighboring country, which is said to be rich in its mineral productions.

I should propose that the land in the vicinity of this river be purchased of the Indians. It could doubtless be done upon reasonable terms, and the United States could then cause a complete examination of it to be made.

Such a cession is not unimportant in another point of view. Some persons have already begun to indulge in speculations upon this subject. The place is remote, and the means of communicating with it are few. By timely presents to the Indians, illegal possession might be gained, and much injury might be done, much time might elapse, and much difficulty be experienced, before such trespassers could be removed.

4th. To ascertain the views of the Indians in the vicinity of Chicago respecting the removal of the Six Nations to that district of country, an extract from the letter of Mr. Kenzie, sub-agent at Chicago, upon this subject, will show the situation in which this business stands.

5th. To explain to the Indians the views of the Government respecting their intercourse with the British authorities at Malden, and distinctly to announce to them that their visits must be discontinued.

It is probable that the announcement of the new system which you have directed to be pursued upon this subject, and the explanations connected with it, can be made with more effect by me than by ordinary messengers.

6th. To ascertain the state of the British fur trade within that part of our jurisdiction. Our information upon this subject is very limited, while its importance requires that it should be fully known.

In addition to these objects, I think it very important to carry the flag of the United States into those remote regions, where it has never been borne by any person in a public station.

The means by which I propose to accomplish this tour are simple and economical. All that will be required is an ordinary birch canoe, and permission to employ a competent number of Canadian boatmen. The whole expense will be confined within narrow limits, and no appropriation will be necessary to defray it. I only request permission to assign to this object a small part of the sum apportioned for Indian expenditures at this place, say from 1,000 to 1,500 dollars.

If, however, the Government should think that a small display of force might be proper, an additional canoe, to be manned with active soldiers, and commanded by an intelligent officer, would not increase the expense, and would give greater effect to any representations which might be made to the Indians.

An intelligent officer of engineers, to make a correct chart for the information of the Government, would add to the value of the expedition.

I am not competent to speculate upon the natural history of the country through which we may pass. Should this object be deemed important, I request that some person acquainted with zoology, botany, and mineralogy may be sent to join me.

It is almost useless to add that I do not expect any compensation for my own services, except the ordinary allowance for negotiating Indian treaties, should you think proper to direct any to be held, and intrust the charge of them to me.

I request that you will communicate to me, as early as convenient, your determination upon this subject, as it will be necessary to prepare a canoe during the winter, to be ready to enter upon the tour as soon as the navigation of the lakes is open, should you think proper to approve the plan.

Very respectfully, &c.

LEWIS CASS.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 14, 1820.

I have received your letters of the 18th and 21st November last. The exploring tour you propose has the sanction of the Government, provided the expenditure can be made out of the sum allotted to your superintendency for Indian affairs, adding thereto one thousand dollars for that special purpose.

The objects of this expedition are comprised under the six heads stated in your letter of the 18th November last, and which you will consider (with the exception of that part which relates to holding Indian treaties, upon which you will be fully instructed hereafter,) as forming a part of the instructions which may be given you by this Department.

Should your reconnaissance extend to the western extremity of Lake Superior, you will ascertain the practicability of a communication between the Bad or Burntwood river, which empties into the lake, and the Copper or St. Croix, which empties into the Mississippi, and the facility they present for a communication with our post on the St. Peter's. The Montreal rivers will also claim your attention, with a view of establishing through them a communication between Green Bay and the west end of Lake Superior.

To aid you in the accomplishment of these important objects, some officers of the topographical engineers will be ordered to join you. Perhaps Major Long, now here, will be directed to take that route to join the expedition which he commands up the Missouri. In that event, a person acquainted with zoology, and botany, and mineralogy, will be selected to accompany him. Feeling, as I do, great interest in obtaining a correct topographical, geographical, and military survey of our country, every encouragement, consistent with the means in my power, will be given by this Department.

To this end General Macomb will be ordered to afford you every facility you may require.

I have, &c.

His Excellency LEWIS CASS, Detroit.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February, 25, 1820.

Mr. Schoolcraft, a gentleman of science and observation, and particularly skilled in mineralogy, has applied to me to be permitted to accompany you on your exploring tour on Lake Superior. I have directed him to report to you for that duty, under the belief that he will be highly useful to you, as well as serviceable to the Government and to the promotion of science.

You will furnish him with the necessary supplies and accommodation while employed, and every facility necessary to enable him to obtain a knowledge of the mineralogy of the country, as far as practicable.

I have, &c.

His Excellency LEWIS CASS, Detroit.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Governor Lewis Cass, dated

SIR:

APRIL 5, 1820.

I have received your letters of the 10th, 11th, and 17th ultimo. In relation to procuring cessions of land from the Indians, the Government has decided that it would be inexpedient to obtain any further extinguishment of Indian title, except at the Sault de St. Marie, where it is the wish of the Department that an inconsiderable cession, not exceeding ten miles square, (unless strong reasons for a greater cession should present themselves from an actual inspection of the country,) should be acquired upon the most reasonable terms, so as to comprehend the proposed military position there.

Herewith you will receive a plat of the country about the Sault de St. Marie, on which is indicated the military site intended to be occupied for defence. You will also procure the cession of the islands containing plaster, provided these islands are clearly within the boundary of the United States, and can be obtained without any considerable expense.

A commission authorizing you to hold these treaties will be forwarded to you in a few days.

As it is desirable to know by what title the people at Green Bay and Prairie du Chien hold their lands, and whether or not the Indian titles to those lands were extinguished by the French, at any period subsequent to their possession of the country, (which is the impression of this Department,) you will communicate such information as you possess, or may obtain during your tour, on this subject.

In addition to Mr. Schoolcraft, Captain Douglass, of the engineer corps, has been ordered to join you, and Mr. Whitney (in whose behalf application has been made for that purpose) may accompany you, if you can accommodate him. Should he accompany you, he will be allowed the same compensation made to Mr. Schoolcraft, who will be allowed one dollar and fifty cents a day for the time actually employed.

[1st SESSION.]

EXTINGUISHMENT OF THE INDIAN TITLE TO LANDS IN FAVOR OF CERTAIN STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 25, 1822.

To the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1822.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be reported to this House whether the Indian title has been extinguished by the United States to any lands, the right of soil in which has been, or is, claimed by any particular State; and, if so, the conditions upon which the same has been extinguished," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War, furnishing all the information in the possession of that Department embraced by the resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 22, 1822.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be reported to this House whether the Indian title has been extinguished by the United States to any lands, the right of soil in which has been, or is, claimed by any particular State; and, if so, the conditions upon which the same has been extinguished," has the honor to transmit to the President the enclosed statement, prepared by the Second Auditor, accompanied by a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which contain all the information that can be furnished by this Department upon the several points embraced by the resolution.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 20, 1822.

The draughtsman of this office having carefully examined the enclosed, informs me that it is impossible to make any estimate of the quantity of land embraced by the cessions alluded to, on account of the uncertainty of their boundaries, except in the case of the cession under treaty with the Chickasaws of the 19th day of October, 1818, where it is estimated that the total quantity embraced by the limits of that cession, agreeably to a calculation from Melish's map of the United States, is 6,675,840 acres, of which 1,120,000 are situated in Kentucky, and 5,555,840 in Tennessee. If the boundaries of the cessions could be ascertained with any degree of precision, the information sought for would be afforded with pleasure.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOSIAH MEIGS.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

A list of treaties entered into by the United States, and those concluded under the sanction of the United States, by certain States and individuals, with various tribes of Indians, for the purpose of extinguishing the titles of said tribes to certain lands belonging to, and lying within, the limits of particular States.

Between the United States and the Six Nations, concluded at Fort Stanwix, on the 22d of October, 1784.

By the 4th article of this treaty, the United States engage to "order goods to be delivered to the Six Nations;" but to what amount is not stipulated.

[Note at the foot of this treaty, page 385, vol. 1, of the Laws of the United States.—At a treaty held with the Oneidas, at their village, in the State of New York, on the 1st June, 1798, Joseph Hopkinson attending as commissioner of the United States, there was purchased from the Oneida nation, for the use of the people of New York, a part of the lands reserved for the benefit of the said nation, for which there were paid $500 in hand, and an annuity allowed of $700. The treaty was ratified on the 21st February, 1799.]

Consideration.—The United States consent to make peace with the Creeks, giving up all claims on them for the expenses incurred in prosecuting the war against them, on the Creeks ceding to the United States all the territory belonging to them and lying within certain limits specified in the treaty.

Between the United States and the Creek nation, concluded on the 22d January, 1818.

Consideration.—The United States to pay within the year $20,000, and $10,000 annually, for the term of ten succeeding years; making, in the whole, eleven payments in the course of eleven years, the present (1818) inclusive; the whole amount to be paid $120,000; and, in lieu of all former stipulations for blacksmiths, the United States engage to furnish the Creek nation, for three years, with two blacksmiths and strikers, for the relinquishment of two tracts of land therein stipulated.

Between the United States and the Creek nation, concluded on the 8th January, 1821.

Consideration.—The United States to pay $10,000 in hand; $40,000 as soon as practicable after the ratification; $5,000 annually for two years thereafter; $16,000 annually for five years thereafter; and $10,000 annually for six years thereafter; making, in the whole, fourteen payments in fourteen successive years, without interest, in money or goods, and implements of husbandry, at the option of the Creek nation. As a further consideration, the United States agree to pay to the State of Georgia whatever balance may be found due to the Creek nation, provided the same shall not exceed $250,000 for the cessions therein specified.

Between the United States and the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, and that portion of said nation residing on the Arkansas, 8th July, 1817.

Condition.—Exchange of lands. The United States bound to give to all the poor warriors who may remove, &c. one rifle-gun and ammunition, one blanket, and one brass kettle, and to furnish boats and provisions for the emigrants to remove to the Arkansas; and the United States to make compensation for all improvements on the lands left by the emigrants.

Between the United States and the Cherokees, at the city of Washington, 27th February, 1819.

To carry into effect the foregoing treaty.

By the 4th article of the articles of agreement and cession concluded between the United States and the State of Georgia, on 24th April, 1802, the United States, at their own expense, were to extinguish, for the use of Georgia, on reasonable terms, the Indian title to all the other lands within the State of Georgia. But it is proper to observe, that this is one of the conditions on which, by this agreement between the United States and Georgia, the latter ceded all right, title, and claim to the jurisdiction and soil of certain lands therein mentioned, to be formed into a Territory or State. The United States were therefore indemnified, in advance, for all expenses incurred in extinguishing the Indian title to all lands within the State of Georgia, in certain treaties made and concluded with the Indians for that purpose.—See the conditions of the treaty of 16th June, 1802, with the Creeks, and those which follow.

IN TENNESSEE.

Between the United States and the Cherokees, concluded 2d October, 1798.

Consideration.—Goods, wares, and merchandise, to the amount of $5,000; and annually other goods to the amount of $1,000, in addition to the annuities already provided for.* Sufficient supplies and provisions to be furnished by the United States to subsist such a reasonable number as shall attend to receive them, or for carrying into effect former treaties or new cessions of lands.

Between the United States and the Cherokees, concluded 25th October, 1805.

Consideration.—The United States to pay, immediately, $3,000 in merchandise, and $11,000 within ninety days after the ratification of the treaty; and, also, an annuity of $3,000, to commence on the date of the treaty.

Between the United States and the Cherokees, concluded on the 27th October, 1805.

Consideration.—The United States to pay $1,600 in money for a cession of that section of land on which the garrison of Southwest Point then stood, and which extends to Kingston, as a place for the assembly of Tennessee to convene at; together with an island, and a free road leading from Tellico to Tombigbee.

Between the United States and the Cherokees, concluded 8th July, 1817.

See the stipulations of the said treaty, under the head of Georgia.

Between the United States and the Cherokees, concluded 27th February, 1819.

See the stipulations contained in the said treaty, under the head of Georgia.

Between the United States and the Chickasaws, concluded 23d July, 1805.

Consideration.—The United States to pay $20,000 for the use of the nation at large, and for the payment of their debts; to George Colbert and O. Key, $2,000; to the king of the nation, an annuity of $100 during his life; and the United States to pay $2 per day to the person appointed on the part of the Chickasaws to ascertain and mark the boundaries fixed by the treaty.

* By the 3d article of the treaty of Philadelphia, the United States agree to furnish the Cherokees with goods suitable for their use, to the amount of $5,000 yearly, in lieu of all former sums to be paid annually. The above addition of $1,000 makes the annuity of $5,000 of 2d October, 1798, amount to $6,000.

Between the United States and the Chickasaws, concluded 19th October, 1818.

Consideration.—The United States to pay $20,000 annually, for fifteen successive years; to Captain Gordon, $1,115; to Captain Smith, $2,000, for debts due to them by the nation; to the principal chief, $500; to John Lewis, $25; and to Major John Colbert, $1,089, further, on the ratification of the treaty, the United States to pay to ten chiefs and an interpreter, each, $150; and to ten military leaders $100 each; and they also agree that any annuity heretofore paid in goods shall in future be paid in money.

IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Between the United States and the Cherokees, concluded 22d March, 1816.

Consideration.—The United States promise and engage that the State of South Carolina shall pay $5,000 after the ratification, provided the Cherokees in council, and the Executive of the State of South Carolina, shall approve the stipulations.

PROVISION FOR TREATING WITH THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 1, 1822.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, February 25, 1822.

Under the appropriation made by the act of Congress of the 11th of April, 1820, for holding treaties with the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within the State of Georgia, pursuant to the fourth condition of the first article of the articles of agreement and cession concluded between the United States and the State of Georgia on the 24th day of April, 1802, a treaty was held with the Creek nation, the expense of which, upon the settlement of the accounts of the commissioners who were appointed to conduct the negotiation, was ascertained to amount to the sum of $24,695, leaving an unexpended balance of the sum appropriated of $5,305—a sum too small to negotiate a treaty with the Cherokees, as was contemplated by the act making the appropriation. The Legislature of Georgia being still desirous that a treaty should be held for further extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within that State, and to obtain an indemnity to the citizens of that State for property of considerable value which has been taken from them by the Cherokee Indians, I submit the subject to the consideration of Congress, that a further sum, which, in addition to the balance of the former appropriation, will be adequate to the expenses attending a treaty with them, may be appropriated, should Congress deem it expedient.

CIVILIZATION OF THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 1, 1822.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1822.

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, requesting the President of the United States “to make known to the Senate the annual disposition which has been made of the sum of $15,000, appropriated by an act of Congress of the year 1802, to promote civilization among friendly Indian tribes; showing to what tribes that evidence of the national bounty has been extended; the names of the agents who have been intrusted with the application of the money; the several amounts by them received; and the manner in which they have severally applied it to accomplish the objects of the act,” I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War, furnishing all the information upon this subject in the possession of that Department.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 21, 1822.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, requesting the President of the United States "to make known to the Senate the annual disposition which has been made of the sum of $15,000, appropriated by an act of Congress of the year 1802, to promote civilization among friendly Indian tribes; showing to what tribes that evidence of the national bounty has been extended; the names of the agents who have been intrusted with the application of the money; the several amounts by them received; and the manner in which they have severally applied it to accomplish the objects of the act," has the honor to transmit to the President the enclosed report of the Second Auditor, and to state that no additional information in relation to the several points embraced by the resolution can be furnished by this Department. It is believed, however, that the principal expenditure authorized by the act has been made through the Cherokee, Creek, Chickasaw, and Choctaw agents, for spinning-wheels, looms, implements of husbandry, domestic animals, &c.; but the particular amount annually cannot be stated, as no distinct account of it has been kept in the offices of the Treasury Department.

All which is respectfully submitted:

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 19, 1822.

In obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 14th instant, referred to this office, "requesting the President of the United States to make known to them the annual disposition which has been made of the sum of $15,000, appropriated by an act of Congress of the year 1802, to promote civilization among friendly Indian tribes; showing to what tribes that evidence of the national bounty has been extended; the names of the agents who have been intrusted with the application of the money; and the manner in which they have severally applied it to accomplish the objects of the act," I have the honor to state that no separate account appears ever to have been kept by the accounting officers of the War Department of presents made to the Indians, or salaries granted to Indian agents under the act of 30th March, 1802; which arose, I presume, from its having been considered rather as an act limiting the extent of the expenditure than as making an appropriation, as I find no special appropriations (under which heads, only, accounts are kept in the books of this office) were ever made for those objects.

In relation to presents, they are so interwoven with the expenses of holding treaties, visiting the seat of Government, and other purposes, that it would be impracticable to distinguish them apart, except by dissecting all the files of accounts settled for years back, many of which were destroyed in the conflagration by the enemy in 1814.

In the exhibit furnished last year by the Treasury Department, in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 3d April, 1820, (printed in the 11th volume of congressional documents,) will be found a statement (No. 15) showing the amount of presents made to the Indians in money and goods, from the formation of the Government, as full and particular as can be ascertained from the books of the Treasury Department.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM LEE.

OPERATIONS OF THE FACTORY SYSTEM.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 8, 1822.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, January 19, 1822.

I have the honor to communicate to you such information as I possess in relation to the subject of the inquiries addressed to me.

Question 1. Have you had opportunities of becoming acquainted with the operation of the factory system? If so, at what points, and since how long?

Answer. During the past summer, I had an opportunity of observing the operation of the factory system at Green Bay, where I am a United States Indian agent. Information gained on the spot, during a visit to Chicago in August last, confirmed the results of most of my observations at the former place.

Question 2. What is the quality of the goods usually found in those factories?

Answer. The quality of the goods in the factory at Green Bay is generally bad; the blankets, and other articles of wool, particularly so.

Question 3. Have they been furnished with any of a kind not suited to Indians?

Answer. The articles, as far as I know, are suited to the Indian market.

Question 4. Have the factory goods, within your knowledge or belief, been sold to any persons except Indians? and, if so, to what description of persons? and were any of those persons fur-traders, with or without licenses?

Answer. My impression has always been that the factories were as open to every applicant as any other store, having seen various persons purchase small articles there. An outfit of goods was furnished by Mr. Irwin, factor at Green Bay, to William Morrill, who was licensed by me in September last to trade on the Fox river.

Question 5. Have the factors, within your knowledge or belief, in their traffic with Indians, or others, limited their prices to the cost and carriage of the goods? If not, at what advance have they sold?

Answer. In the bills for articles bought by me as agent, the original price is stated, to which 50 per cent. is added. The cost on the transportation of one hundredweight from New York to Green Bay does not exceed five dollars. This rate would produce a charge of less, certainly, than 10 per cent. on the original cost of an invoice of goods for the Indian trade, taking the articles together. How an additional expense of 40 per cent. accrues, when there, I am at a loss to conjecture. The quarters and storehouses occupied by the factor at Green Bay, (and the same is believed to be the case generally,) were built, and are kept in repair, by the troops. Details have, within my own knowledge, been made from them to beat the peltries, &c.; and I have reason to believe that every kind of labor necessary to these establishments is performed by soldiers. If, as I never heard to be the fact, any thing is given to the soldiers for these labors, it must be a discretionary gratuity on the part of the factors or the superintendent. In sales to individuals, I have reason to believe that the factor is as much regulated in his prices by the state of the market as any other trader.

Question 6. Have the factors sold on credit?

Answer. I am unable to say what is the practice with respect to Indians. From conversations had with the factor within my agency on the subject of debts due the establishment, it appears to have been his practice to sell to traders on credit.

Question 7. Have they sold for any thing except furs and peltries?

Answer. Sugar is taken in barter with Indians, and money from any one who is capable of paying it.

Question 8. Have they equipped persons with goods, and sent them into the woods to trade, on account of the factories?

Answer. I will take this opportunity to remark, that, though familiar with Indians, from having been stationed as a military officer at posts frequented by them, I had no knowledge of the trade carried on with them until last spring, when I was appointed an agent. In September or October last, the factor consulted me as to the necessity of obtaining a license for a person whom he intended to send to trade with the Indians at a place called Milwauky, on Lake Michigan, about two hundred miles from Green Bay. The factor stated to me that my predecessor considered a license in such case superfluous. Deeming the same checks proper as in any other case, bonds were required, as usual, of the individual, and the license was granted.

Question 9. Have the factors purchased furs and peltries with money?

Answer. Not to my knowledge.

Question 10. Have they furnished goods to the United States agents? and, if so, for what purpose? at what advance upon cost and carriage? of what quality? and how have the factors been paid for them?

Answer. The purpose for which the few articles purchased by me at the factory were bought, was, to make such presents as the funds appropriated to the agency would admit to Indians who visited me as an officer of the Government, which immemorial custom leads them to expect. The advance upon the cost and carriage I have stated. I have also stated that the quality was bad. Convinced of this, and of the high price, I sent to the agent of the American Fur Company, at Mackinac, for a small invoice of goods to the amount of the balance left in my hands after deducting the expenses of the agency; and I have no hesitation in saying that they formed a more acceptable present to the Indians than double the sum paid for them would have procured from the factory. Whether this proceeds from the extraordinary cheapness of the one, or the unreasonable dearness of the other, I am not able to say, positively; but my impression is, that it proceeds from the latter. The articles bought of the factor, on public account, are paid for in money.

Question 11. Are the Indians attached to the factory system? Is there reason to apprehend hostilities from them, if they are withdrawn?

Answer. I believe it is admitted, on all hands, that the factories, at those points where alone my opportunities of observation have extended, are altogether useless. I have it from the best authority, that the factor at Chicago has been for years soliciting from the superintendent to be removed from his present position, as his remaining there was wholly useless, and that no notice whatever has been taken of his representations. As to any attachment to the system, the Indians probably understand nothing of the motives which led to its adoption; and, of course, if it does not tend to give them their supplies on better terms, are indifferent to its continuance.

Question 12. If the factories are withdrawn, will the Indians suffer for want of the customary supplies, or be exposed to greater or less impositions from traders?

Answer. Within the sphere of my observations, so small a part of the wants of the Indians is supplied from the public trading-houses, that their withdrawal would not be felt. The competition among private traders is sufficient to prevent exactions on the Indians.

Question 13. Are the Indians judges of the quality of the goods in which they trade, of the reasonableness of prices, and of the value of their own furs and peltries?

Answer. The Indians are very observant, and reputed to be very good judges of the articles which they are accustomed to buy. Their capacity for the petty traffic which they carry on is believed to be much greater than is generally apprehended. The principal fraud practised upon them is believed to be in the article of spirituous liquors, to which the seller attaches a price in proportion to the penalty he would incur from detection.

Question 14. What effect, if any, has the factory system in conciliating the good-will of the Indians towards the United States, in reclaiming them from savage habits, and in converting them to Christianity?

Answer. The factor has no other relation to the Indian whatever than that of a trader. He is invested with no other character by the Government; and, unless I have been strangely misled by those possessing a more intimate knowledge of Indian prejudices than I can pretend to, it would be highly impolitic to combine, in the same person, the functions of trade with those which might result from any measures which should be adopted for ameliorating the condition of the Indian tribes, in which the personal influence of the agent is important. How, then, is the factor to have influence in conciliating the Indians, in reclaiming them from savage habits, or in converting them to Christianity? Certainly in no other way than by supplying them on better terms than others with the articles they are accustomed to use. If the Indian received benefit in this way, he could appreciate it, and it would be a means of conciliation; if the private trader were undersold, any unfavorable influence which he may be supposed to hold would be removed; and if an addition were made to the comforts of the Indians, it might tend to humanize them, and lead them to Christianity. But admit, as can readily be proven, that the factor sells his goods at no lower rates than other traders, and more need not be said as to the influence of his establishment.

Question 15. State, particularly, any instances of fraud or improper conduct, on the part of the factors or sub-factors, (if any such have come within your knowledge,) and their characters as faithful agents of Government, or otherwise?

Answer. I have stated that no instances of gross fraud on the part of factors came within my knowledge. I have reason to believe that there is no uniformity whatever in the prices of goods at the factory of Green Bay; if goods sold are accounted for at a uniform rate, there is certainly some ground for suspicion. With regard to the character of the factors, I know nothing disadvantageous. The inefficiency of the system appears to have arisen from the wretched character of the supplies, the high prices at which they have been purchased, and the unreasonable advance which has been put upon them. I feel confident that some of the persons interested in the maintenance of this establishment have greatly exaggerated the misconduct of the private traders; have misrepresented the causes why the factories have not been able to keep up a successful competition with them; and made statements of the results which would attend the withdrawal of the factories, the absurdity and hardihood of which are amazing to those having any knowledge of the facts.

When the factories were first established, they were probably useful at some points where they were located, in spite of mismanagement; and, though competition in the trade has much increased, the gratuitous use of $300,000, with persons paid for managing it, would now be most important to the Indians, but for the most glaring perversion of the charitable purposes of Government. As it has been conducted, a useless institution has been kept up for years, by plausible statements on paper, and by general declamations about atrocities which never were committed, and horrors to be apprehended, which must have excited the smile of the orator himself.

After all, a close examination of the sales made at the factories would be the best means of judging of their importance. The factors have been aware that their existence was in jeopardy, and have not been idle. If any expenses were paid from the fund in trade, the asserted integrity or the small increase of the capital would be an evidence of some trade; but, as no demands are made upon it, it might remain whole ad infinitum, without a particle of business being done.

Your obedient servant,

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JOHN BIDDLE.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 21, 1822.

In conformity with a request of the Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs, I have the honor to state, (in answer to their several queries,) that I have been, in a great measure, acquainted with the operations of the factory system on the Missouri and Mississippi since 1807. With the factory on the Mississippi, first at Fort Madison, and now at Prairie du Chien, I have been more particularly acquainted. Until the conclusion of the late war, as well as I can recollect, the goods in those factories were inferior to such as the individual traders made use of; and, except the blankets, which have improved since then, those factories or trading-houses have continued to be furnished with goods of a very inferior quality, and much less adapted to the Indian trade than those in the hands of individuals.

I know very well that they have been in the habit of selling to officers, soldiers, citizens, and, in fact, to any body, without reserve. Mr. Johnson, factor at Prairie du Chien, has been in the habit of equipping traders without license, and sending them to trade with the Indians on hunting excursions, unrestrained; and did, in one instance, furnish goods to a Canadian, who was an experienced trader, but at that time considered a most exceptionable character, from the circumstance of his having borne arms against us by the side of the Indians during the late war, and being charged with exciting them to the massacre of the inhabitants of our frontiers, and who could not have obtained license from proper authority.

The factors were not in the habit of limiting their prices to the cost and carriage of their goods; and I am sure never did, except on unsaleable articles. I am not positive as to the advance placed on their goods, but am under the impression that it was estimated at sixty per centum on prime cost. But I know very well that when I was stationed at Prairie du Chien, about four years since, the officers, soldiers, and citizens, in the village and vicinity, in their intercourse with the factory, were charged from forty to sixty per centum advance on the rates at which similar articles are sold in St. Louis, which induced us to believe at the time that there was some mismanagement in the factory department. The factors have sold on credit, but I think not extensively.

The factories take in exchange for their goods every thing the individual trader does—money as soon as furs and peltries; and I believe the factory sustained some loss on the failure of the St. Louis Bank, in the year 1817, in notes received from soldiers stationed there. I will not be positive, but I believe that on one or two occasions the factor on the Mississippi purchased furs and peltries with money taken in trade at his post.

I do not recollect to have been furnished with any thing by the factories on the account of Government; but they have sometimes furnished other Indian agents with annuities, and Indian presents; and, a few years since, when they were permitted to act in the capacity of Indian sub-agents, they gave presents out of the factory goods themselves, which were charged to, and paid by, the Indian Department.

The Indians cannot be attached to the factories, when they have almost abandoned them. To withdraw the factories, and secure the trade to individual enterprise, under proper regulations, would, in my opinion, be a pleasing circumstance to the Indians of my acquaintance, and lead to no evil, but to happy consequences. They will not suffer for want of supplies, or be subject to greater impositions than they are now. They are generally good judges of the quality of the goods in which they trade, of the reasonableness of prices, and of the value of their own furs and peltries.

The factory system has no good effect in conciliating the good-will of the Indians towards us; on the contrary, it is calculated to give them unfavorable impressions, and alienate them from us, by exhibiting the Government of the United States in the light of a common trader.

In reclaiming them from savage habits, and in converting them to Christianity, these establishments have the same effect as the individual traders. About four years since, when I was stationed at Prairie du Chien, the factor received what was called soldier or citizen goods, to the amount of several thousand dollars; none of which were intended for the Indian trade, and it was said, and generally believed, to be a private concern. I have seen, in factories, goods evidently the remnants of old stores; and, a few years since, I received of General Clark, who was then superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis, a few goods for Indian presents, (furnished him by the factory department,) the most of which were of such inferior quality that I was ashamed to offer them to the Indians, and have them still on hand.

I will not charge the factors with a dishonest act, as I do not know what instructions they may have received from the superintendent of Indian trade; but I know they are not above suspicion.

It is generally believed in Missouri, Illinois, and, I believe, in Michigan, and by almost every officer with whom I have been stationed on the frontiers, that the superintendent and factors are growing rich in the service.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

B. O'FALLON,

To the Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON.

United States Agent for Indian Affairs on the Missouri.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 23, 1822.

In answer to the queries proposed to me, and enclosed in your communication, as one of the Committee of the Senate of the United States on Indian Affairs, under date of the 21st instant, relative to the factory system of trade and intercourse with the Indians as at present established and conducted, I have the honor to state, in general, such facts as came immediately under my observation in the year 1820, while I was attached to a scientific and exploring expedition, as journalist, under the command of Major Long. That, at the engineer cantonment, a few miles below the Council Bluffs, on the Missouri, I saw a party of chiefs and warriors of the Ottoo tribe, on their way to visit Major O'Fallon, their agent. A gentleman of our party had with him what is termed by the Indians and traders a Mackinac blanket, which is of a superior quality of blankets, and such as are generally furnished by the British traders at Mackinac to the Indians. Several of the Indian party noticed this blanket, and each proposed to exchange his blanket, which was of the description of those supplied by the United States, or their traders, offering, at the same time, something very considerable in addition, as an inducement to effect an exchange. On inquiry, I found that the Indians were under the impression that the blankets, arms, vermilion, &c., furnished to the Indians at Mackinac, were of a superior quality to any they received from the American Government, or procured from its traders.

In the course of the expedition, I was at a Cherokee settlement, on the north side of the Arkansas river. At the house of Webber, a chief, there was a store, at which I observed a number of the Indians making considerable purchases preparatory to going on the hunt; and, understanding that the United States had a factory established not far distant from this store, for the accommodation of trade with this nation, I inquired of the Indians why they did not trade at the factory. The reply was, that they could procure all the articles they wanted at this store, at a less price and of a better quality than they could at the factory, and were allowed the same prices for their furs and peltries; they particularly instanced that of blankets, for which there was a difference of a dollar in the price of each in their favor, by trading at this store. A half-breed, by the name of Rogers, was my interpreter on this occasion.

At the mouth of the Verdigris river, (Arkansas,) there was a trading-house, for the accommodation of the Osage Indians, owned by Mr. Glenn; this store, in its supplies to the Indians, gave general satisfaction, as I understood from the chiefs and others of the nation.

The foregoing embraces the whole of my observations on the trade with the Indians, during my intercourse with them, which has been most with those nations where no regular traders have yet been established.

It is my impression that the Indians are not particularly attached to the factory system, and that no great inconvenience would result to them if the factories were withdrawn, as their places would, no doubt, be supplied by traders better calculated to satisfy the Indians. It would be their interest to do so, and it would relieve the Indians from a course of trade which they cannot comprehend, in this: that the United States, or rather the Government, should be a party in competition with traders for the sale of goods, and purchase of furs and peltries. The factory system, used as a means of conciliating the good-will of the Indians towards the United States, or in reclaiming them from savage habits, cannot, in my opinion, have any better effect than if the trade were altogether in the hands of licensed traders, subject to proper regulations. I would here remark, that it is not the interest of the trader or factor to encourage civilization in the Indian population; for, as they advance in that, they recede in the hunt, and the trade becomes less valuable. But few would countenance a system which went to destroy their own interest. Persons capable of instructing the Indian children in the nation in all the first steps to civilization, would be more likely to succeed in that desirable object than the traders.

Respectfully submitted by, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN R. BELL.

HON. THOMAS H. BENTON, Senator United States.

GENTLEMEN:

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1822.

I have had the honor to receive your queries, relative to the public Indian trading-houses, to which I return the following answers:

1st. My "opportunities of becoming acquainted with the factory system" have been frequent, ever since the year 1806, and apply to the houses which, at different periods, were located at Belle Fontaine, Fort Madison, Chicago, Michilimackinac, Fort Osage, Prairie du Chien, Fort Edwards, and Green Bay.

2d. "The quality of the goods usually found in these factories," so far as applies to the greater part of what may be properly called "Indian goods," has always been much inferior to the same description of articles furnished by the private traders, excepting, perhaps, during the late war, when recourse could not be had to European manufactories for supplies of the proper kind. Gunpowder, ball, shot, and the like, were found at the factories of as good a quality as at any private establishment; but the blankets and other dry goods, generally, have been uniformly from twenty-five to fifty per cent. inferior to the corresponding articles supplied by individual adventurers. And the factor at Chicago is also of opinion that remnants, or cut pieces of goods, do not answer quite so well as if they had never been unfolded, or subjected to retail operations, before they reached him.

3d. The factories have been furnished with goods "of a kind not suitable to the Indians," unless the committee should be of opinion that men and women's coarse and fine shoes, worsted and cotton hose, tea, glauber salts, alum, and antibilious pills, are necessary to promote the comfort or restore the health of the aborigines; or that green silk, fancy ribands, and morocco slippers are indispensable to eke out the dress of our "red sisters." I have it also from a gentleman now in Congress, that the factory at Detroit, in 1800, contained a large assortment of goods so well adapted to the wants of the white population, that the merchants of the place felt and complained of its competition.

4th. It is "within my knowledge" that goods have been sold to persons engaged in the fur trade by the United States factories at Fort Osage, Fort Edwards, Prairie du Chien, Chicago, and Green Bay, more particularly at the first, third, and last of the places just mentioned. And I have every reason to believe that it is the constant practice of all the factors to sell the Government goods to the officers and soldiers of the posts where they are located, and, generally, to the white and mixed population around them.

In 1816, Mr. Johnson, the factor at Prairie du Chien, furnished goods to a Mr. Antoine Brisbois, whom he well knew had but a few days before been refused a license by the proper officer; and he continued to supply him during 1817 and 1818. In 1818, a Mr. Michael Brisbois, brother of the former, also received goods of the same factor to trade. In 1820, a Mr. Schell, or Shull, became a trader for the same house, and I believe still continues so. A Mr. Scott Campbell was also supplied in 1820; and the rear is closed by a Mr. Duncan Campbell, who now trades on the Upper Mississippi with an assortment from the same factory, although he is at this moment in the service (and I presume in the pay) of the United States, as interpreter to the Indian agency at the military post near the Falls of St. Anthony.

Mr. Irwin, the factor at Green Bay, in 1817 supplied goods to a Mr. Rouse, amounting to upwards of $3,000. He has also sold to various other traders at different times, and has now one trader on the Fox river, and another at Milwaukee, on Lake Michigan.

At the Fort Osage factory, Mr. Sibley furnished, in 1819, goods to a Mr. Noel Mongrain, who, I am informed, was at the time in the Government employ as interpreter for the Osages.

All these persons traded with the Indians, in different sections of the country, at a distance from the factories, and their rates of sale had no regard whatever to the injunctions of the laws regulating the Government trading-houses, which decree that the goods shall be disposed of on terms "merely to preserve the capital from diminution."

Antoine Brisbois, in 1816, was not licensed. Noel Mongrain was not licensed. During the agency of the late Colonel John Bowyer at Green Bay, licenses to whomsoever dealt with the factory at that place were deemed superfluous. And I have good ground to believe that the law in respect to licenses has been but seldom complied with by those who receive their goods from the public trading-houses.

5th. "The factors, in their traffic with Indians or others," do not limit "their prices to the cost and carriage of the goods." Their rates of sale are capricious, in the same ratio as competition is weak or vigorous, at hand or afar off. They charge on wholesale operations from 25 to 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. on the invoice cost of the articles, and sometimes even a greater advance; the retail prices are considerably higher still.

6th. To at least a majority of the persons enumerated in the reply to the 4th query, the factors have sold on a credit, and I rather think no one of them paid at the time he purchased. Part of an outfit made at Green Bay, in 1817, I know remains unpaid, and I am led to believe that a balance could still be found against Mongrain on the books of the Fort Osage factory.

7th. A communication from the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, "read and ordered to lie on the table," 13th of April, 1820, will show that from 1815 to 1819, inclusive, the receipts in cash at the factories, collectively, amounted to $84,622 17; and the same document tells us that lead, bees' wax, tallow, Indian mats, feathers, sugar, cotton, and hides, were also received in payment for goods at the public trading-houses.

8th. In 1818, a Mr. Michael Brisbois was furnished by the factor at Prairie du Chien with goods amounting to $1,808 69, to be traded on account of the Government. In some instances, the persons supplied were on their individual risks; but they might as well have been on public account, for, if their trade failed to realize enough, they possessed no means of liquidating the claims of the factor.

9th. I am not aware that the factors have purchased furs or peltries with money; but Mr. Irwin, at Green Bay, sold furs to a Mr. Laird, of Erie, Pennsylvania, some years ago. In what the payment consisted, I do not now recollect.

10th. The factories have furnished goods to the Indian agents of the United States on, I believe, pretty much the same terms as to the traders; but I am not sufficiently acquainted with such transactions to speak positively on the subject.

11th. Perhaps the most satisfactory reply to this query is to be found in the proportion of business the Indians transact at these national establishments, compared with the amount they barter to the private traders; which is, speaking within bounds, nine-tenths in favor of the latter. Did the factories really confer advantages, the natives would undoubtedly be attached to the system, and a much larger portion of their furs and peltries would unquestionably be traded there. But when we see Indians, who have been familiar for years with the goods and prices of the factor, quietly pass the door of the public trading-houses, and dispose of their stock to the private traders in the immediate neighborhood, it seems reasonable to conclude that they do not cherish any thing resembling a strong partiality for those intended representatives of the national bounty.

The amount of trade at the factories has been decreasing for several years, and with its diminution has of course declined the intercourse between the factors and the Indians, until the connexion is, in some instances, nearly destroyed. With the habits of trade the exercise of friendship is almost inseparably connected; and when the common wants or convenience which originally led to an interchange of commodities have either ceased to operate, or are turned into another channel, the feelings of mutual regard which commerce produces are soon blunted, and sickly indifference insensibly supplants vigorous friendship. Such a catastrophe has been latterly witnessed at Chicago, where the factor, conscious of the futility of his establishment, solicited for years to be removed, but his solicitations were not deemed worthy of acknowledgment.

The factor rarely meets the Indians except during the process of barter, and, protected as he is by a garrison, he has nothing to apprehend from their dislike or resentment. He has, therefore, no inducement to cultivate an intimacy, which only promises to interrupt his ease, or break in upon his retirement; and his knowledge of the natives around him is proportioned to an intercourse so limited and unsocial. The situation of the private trader is very different, for he is constantly in the power of the aborigines, and, from his habits of trade, he necessarily becomes identified with the tribe he commonly visits. On the other hand, their dependance on him periodically for relief, (which they cannot obtain of the factor,) promotes an attachment that is strengthened with every return of their annual supply, which affords support, and secures comfort to their families throughout the inclemency of the succeeding winter.

It is not, in my opinion, necessary to travel further in quest of reasons for the partiality which the Indians evince for the private traders, since their situation relative to the natives, when contrasted with that of the factor, will alone account for the preference. And when to the very opposite deportment of the two characters you add the still more important difference in the quality and price of their goods, we ought no longer to wonder that there exists such a disparity of trade between the private establishments and public trading-houses. However benevolent the motives may have been which devised the factory system, there is no doubt that the Indians have failed to appreciate the benefits they were meant to confer, and the protection they were intended to afford; since it is very well known that, sell your goods to an Indian as low as you please, he always considers every obligation cancelled when he pays the price demanded. The natives consider the factories of so very little consequence to them, that their removal from the country would scarcely be remarked; and, so far from their abolition involving the frontiers in war, I am confident that parting with these ostensible blessings will not create a murmur loud enough to disturb the primeval stillness of the forest.

12th. There are now annually more goods carried into the Indian country by the private traders than can be disposed of; and, admitting the factories have all the influence for which they are so much extolled by those interested in their continuance, the sphere of their operations has not, even at this day, any control whatever over three-fourths of our present Indian trade. Since, therefore, they can, at most, only effect so small a portion of the trade, and as nothing can be more unfounded than the existence of extortion or imposition where their influence cannot possibly reach, I confess I am at a loss to imagine what foundation there can be for any well-grounded apprehension. Independent of the many new adventurers which the abolition of the public system of traffic would in all probability tempt into the trade, the present annual surplus of goods will alone be equal to any deficit which may be feared on withdrawing the factories; and those who are acquainted with the present state of our Indian trade will readily admit that competition is sufficiently active and extensive, among the private traders, to secure to the natives, every where, ample supplies on reasonable terms.

13th. It may be safely asserted that all our Indians, accustomed to trade, are competent judges of the goods they purchase of the whites. Using always the very same articles of merchandise, and uniformly the same description of goods, the intercourse of long-established trade, sometimes with associations of private traders, but most frequently with contending adventurers, has, by affording them constant opportunities of contrasting prices, enabled them to decide with great accuracy on the quality, and consequent value, not only of every thing they buy, but of every article they sell. And I am positive the Indians are generally quite as capable of judging correctly, in regard to both the quality and price of the goods they deal in, as a large majority of the civilized community are of deciding on the rates of our retail shopkeepers.

14th. The detailed answer to query 11th has shown how very limited the factor's influence over the natives must necessarily be, from the peculiarity of his situation; and thence may be gathered the probable effect of the system he represents "in conciliating the good-will of the Indians." But there are other reasons for the failure of the system in producing this conciliation.

Along the chain of great lakes, from Ontario to Superior, the Indians within our lines have been, ever since the conquest of Canada, in habits of intimacy with the Canadian Indian authorities; and this intercourse, it is well known, continues with our Indians to the present day. At the British frontier posts, all the public or Government Indian goods have, for the same period, been annually bestowed gratuitously upon the natives; and when our factories were carried to the country approaching Canada, the Indians were so firmly of opinion that the goods deposited there were to be disposed of after the manner of the British, that they frequently charged the factors with selling for their own emolument what their Great Father intended as presents. In the course of time, the undeviating practice of the factor convinced them how much they were mistaken; and when no longer at liberty to doubt, the impression became universal that their American Father must be poor indeed, since he sent his goods into their country to be sold for skins, as by the common trader, who depended on his traffic as the means of subsistence. The marked difference between the American factors and the British Indian agents gave rise to comparisons but little favorable to the character of our country; and while England's King, by unanimous consent, received from the Indians the appellation of Father, the President of the United States was degraded to the level of a common adventurer.

It is also worthy of remark here, that the Indians, during the late war, exhibited a more settled inveteracy against us in the districts having the benefit of public trade, (say, for instance, Fort Wayne, Chicago, and Fort Madison,) than they evinced in other sections, equally exposed, but without factories; and, however true it may be that causes other than the mere location of a public trading-house produced this vindictive spirit, yet it cannot be denied by those conversant with the subject, that if, instead of the trafficking disposition we exhibited to the natives for fifteen years before the war, we had adopted a more dignified policy in our Indian relations, it is hardly to be believed that nations, who for many years had only met each other as enemies, would have at once, by common consent, buried their animosities, united as members of the same family, and raised the tomahawk against us with such unparelled unanimity.

The foregoing facts and observations attest most fully the positive inefficiency of the system in conciliating the Indians; for, at Fort Wayne, Chicago, and Fort Madison, previous to the war, public trade was in full operation, and flourished, I believe, beyond any thing we have seen in these latter days; and yet, so far from "reclaiming them from savage habits," they did not in a single instance, during the whole contest, avert the dreadful effects of an irruption into our defenceless frontier; nor did they even disarm the savage of one particle of his natural ferocity.

Little as I value the factory system, so far as it is considered a means of attaching the Indians to the United States, I do think they are, if possible, still less capable of producing religious reformation in either the Indians or anybody else. The factories have now degenerated into mere places of trade, to which all colors, descriptions, and denominations of people resort for barter; and bear a much more striking resemblance to common country stores, than to the public establishments of a benevolent Government. The desperate efforts which the factors make to secure individually their reputations as traders, and jointly to prop the questionable pecuniary credit of the whole system, are, in my opinion, but little favorable to that serenity of mind, mildness of disposition, and undeviating conformity to a strictly moral deportment, which we, in civilized society, consider essential qualities in those we trust as our guides "to another and a better world." Even we value example as high as precept; with savages, the former is most likely to be efficacious. And believing these gentlemen to be equally fallible with the generality of their brethren in trade, I should imagine they were selected by the superintendent of Indian trade more for their trafficking than apostolic abilities, as the head of that department is too intimately acquainted with the nature of missions among a rude people to have appointed the present incumbents to teach repentance and remission of sins to the children of the wilderness. It is hardly necessary to add, that I do not believe either factories or factors are likely to enlarge the jurisdiction of the church.

15th. I have no knowledge whatever that there is a want of probity in any of the factors. It is, nevertheless, true that they have, in some cases, furnished goods to men whose characters were not above suspicion, and, without giving bond for their correct deportment in the Indian country, have sent them to ramble (unrestrained by any pecuniary penalty) over that part of the forest they chose to select for the theatre of their operations; and that, in these vagrant excursions, they frequently met the debtors of the private traders, and induced them to part with the means of paying what they in the autumn had obtained on credit from the trader, in clothing, to protect their families against the rigors of the following winter, and wherewith to pursue the chase advantageously. Now this might not legally be called dishonesty, but sure I am it is hardly fair.

It is no less true that the factory system pays no interest for the fund which supports it; that all the officers, whether superintendent, factors, or others, are paid their salaries out of an appropriation totally distinct from the trade fund; that the transportation from any of the Atlantic cities, or even Georgetown, in this District, to any of the northwestern factories, does not cost ten per cent. on the invoice of a regular assortment of Indian goods, and still less on such mixed supplies as are found at the public trading-houses; and that, notwithstanding the factors usually sell at a rate to yield an average advance of at least fifty per cent. on the cost of their goods, and possess, besides, all these other extraordinary advantages, the original fund is in danger of diminishing.

I confess that, to me, it appears inexplicable how any trade can possibly fail to maintain itself, when it maintains all its means of operation, both fiscal and executive, free of every charge; and the wonder increases when we recollect that the sales are at an average of forty per cent. clear gain. I, however, trust that the committee will succeed in giving to this commercial phenomenon a tangible form, although I much fear they will find it the unprofitable labor of "chasing a shadow." I cannot close the answer to this query without stating my conviction that the factors are every where industrious, persevering, and as much devoted to their business as any men ought to be.

For my own part, I believe these public trading-houses of a character completely negative for the purpose of controlling the propensities of the Indians, and attaching them to the United States; and I am confident, from my own knowledge, acquired by sixteen years of actual experience and observation, backed by information which I deem unquestionable, that the factories can never conciliate the good-will of the Indians, reclaim them from savage habits, convert them to Christianity, confer any real advantage in trade, or for an hour preserve peace on the frontiers.

In illustration of several of the statements I have made, I transmit, herewith, some invoices and accounts from some of the factories, which may be relied on as genuine. And I have to request that the papers in question be returned to me, when no longer required by the committee.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, January 28, 1822.

I have the honor, in answer to your communication of the 24th instant, to reply to it in the order in which the several queries are put.

1st. "In what towns or cities have you usually purchased goods, including hardware, powder, lead, and tobacco, for the Indian trading-houses?"

It is a principle in commerce, that, at whatever point a demand exists, there will exist a corresponding ability to supply it. When this office was in Philadelphia, the principal part of the articles bought by it was procured in that city; when the office was removed to the District of Columbia, the demand in Philadelphia became gradually less and less; and for the reason that our merchants, having the office and its wants always in view, laid themselves out to provide the articles to supply them; whilst the Philadelphians, losing sight of it, were, in the same ratio, unprepared to meet them: and especially does the principle apply to articles used in Indian supplies, they being of but little value except for Indian purposes. Purchases, however, have been, and still are, made in our principal cities of many articles; but our best supplies, and the principal bulk of them, for several years past, have been furnished at the door of this office.

Tobacco, for five years past, has been bought at Pittsburg and St. Louis; powder, chiefly from Dupont's factory at Wilmington, in Delaware, or from his agent, Mr. Cazenove, in Alexandria. I have bought powder in Kentucky, but the factors expressing the disapprobation of the Indians with it, Dupont's has been generally sent, and at less price.

2d. "How much have you paid per pound for these last enumerated articles, for the last year?"

For tobacco last year was paid, at St. Louis, (the only place at which the article was bought,) eight cents for inferior, and sixteen and two-thirds cents for superior.

No occasion has arisen to make it necessary to buy lead, nor has any been purchased.* Our stock at St. Louis is generally considerable, received from the Sac and Fox Indians, &c.; and from St. Louis it is distributed to the points of our intercourse where it is required.

3d. "What is the cost per pound of carrying Indian goods from Georgetown, District of Columbia, to St. Louis?"

The cost of transportation varies according to circumstances. If the demand for transportation be great, the price is high in that proportion. Last year it cost, at an average, to St. Louis, four and a quarter cents per pound. This year it will be about the same. It has been as high as nine cents per pound, but this is unusual. It ranges between four and six cents per pound.

4th. "At what places have the furs and peltries usually been sold which you have received from the factories?"

At this town; where, when it can be so arranged, an annual sale is held. Furs and peltries which cannot be got here in time, but which would arrive after the period generally allotted for the public sale, and which, if kept over till another year, would be eaten up by the expenses and by worms, are sold at New Orleans, Mobile, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and sometimes at St. Louis, as it is found most convenient.

5th. "What price have beaver fur and deer skins commanded, by the pound, at the sales made by you in the year 1821, for cash or credit?"

In 1821, first quality beaver sold from $3 to $4 90 per pound; inferior or southern, $1 30 to $2 50 per pound. Red deer skins sold from 30 to 33 cents, gray at 22 cents, and shaved from 40 to 41 cents per pound. These were the prices obtained at the annual public auction held in this town in November last. The skins were northern skins, and these always command much higher prices than the southern. In Philadelphia, at public auction, in July last, best quality southern deer skins sold at 27 cents per pound. In New York, shaved skins sold at 30 cents, red at 24 cents, and gray at 20 cents; damaged, as usual, half-price. Southern beaver sold in New York, at the same time, from 56 cents to $1 12½ per pound. These sales are generally on a credit of from three to five months.

In illustration of the principle to which I have had the honor to refer, respecting the demand and the ability to supply it, I herewith enclose sundry letters and copies of letters, which may go to show that, although the chief reliance is upon our own merchants for our Indian supplies, yet the state of the markets in our principal cities is inquired into. With what success, the answers to the letters herewith enclosed may serve to illustrate. It will be borne in mind that the agents written to have their interest in their commissions in finding and buying the goods, if they could be procured.

Letter marked A, dated 8th May, 1818, contains a request to the agents in New York and Philadelphia to be informed of the state of the markets for the articles named in them. B is the answer from the New York agent. Letter C is the answer from the Philadelphia agent. On comparison of the weights, &c. of the lot he offered to sell, with those called for in my letter, it will be seen that they were not of the proper kinds; but being better than any that could then be had, I proposed afterwards to buy them, when the price had risen 25 per cent.

Such is an epitome of the markets of New York and Philadelphia in relation to their ability to furnish Indian supplies. The reasons are to be found in the absence of the demand from the view of the merchants of those places, and in the fact that Indian goods, if not of the proper kinds, are articles in which the importers are sure to lose, they being generally unsuited to other purposes.

It is the practice of this office to give to merchants samples and descriptions of all articles in which it deals, reserving the right of selection, and purchasing nothing till it arrives and is inspected, and compared, and approved. This market has become, therefore, the best in the Union for Indian articles.

With great respect, sir,

T. L. MCKENNEY,
Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

Hon. HENRY JOHNSON, Chairman of the Committee of Indian Affairs.

A.

SIR:

INDIAN TRADE OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, May 8, 1818.

I will thank you if you will take the trouble to make inquiries in your city after the following articles, and of the following descriptions:

Northwest Company blankets, so called: three points, to measure six feet six inches long, and five feet six inches wide; to weigh, per pair, eight and a half pounds.

* One only exception in ———, which was for the lake factories, and therefore bought at Pittsburg.

Two and a half points to measure six feet three inches long, and five feet two inches wide; to weigh, per pair, seven and a half pounds. Strouds from six to seven quarters wide, to weigh per yard one and a half to one and three-fourths pound.

If those goods can be had, please to inform me at what prices.

Respectfully, &c.

T. L. MCKENNEY, Sup't Indian Affairs.

To JOSEPH L. DIAS, Esq. Agent for Indian Factories, New York.

[Copy of the above sent to Henry Simpson, of Philadelphia, at same time.]

SIR:

B.

NEW YORK, June 18, 1818.

Your most esteemed favors of the 8th and 14th ultimo are now before me. Relying on your indulgence, I hope you will forgive my having delayed till now answering them, which has been partly occasioned by a hurry of business, and partly by my absence from this city.

I have placed to your credit the check for \$1,628, enclosed in your said favor of the 14th, and I have since charged you \$122 25, for the cost of a parcel of wampum, (say 29,000 white, 1,250 blue,) which I had the honor to forward to you on the 22d May. I was induced to make this purchase in consideration of the price being one dollar lower per 1,000 than what I have been obliged to pay before, and the seller promising me before long an equal quantity of blue ones. As to the inquiries contained in your favor of the 8th, I regret to have to inform you that I have not been able to find out any blankets of the description therein stated, nor do I believe it possible to meet with any. At foot of this, you will find copies of some memoranda I took of some parcels which I was offered, and stating the dimensions, weight, prices, and advances. You will find also some memoranda respecting the strouds. The common credit on those articles is six months; but I expect that I could obtain for the cash a discount of from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $5\frac{1}{2}$. I apprehend that blankets of the weight mentioned in your aforesaid favor of the 8th are very seldom imported into this market, for the dealers in this article with whom I conversed on the subject appear to be unacquainted with blankets of that description. In 1813, I purchased, by order of General Mason, and forwarded to some of the factories, some $2\frac{1}{2}$ and 3 point blankets; but I believe they were of the ordinary sizes and weight, for I remember that I had previously endeavored in vain to procure such ones as you describe.

I have the honor, &c.

J. LOPES DIAS.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Esq., Superintendent United States Indian Trade.

The foregoing is a true copy from the original.

W. FITZHUGH.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, March 14, 1818.

Your favor of the 12th instant was duly received, and I now have the pleasure to reply thereto. The three-point blankets, of which there are 38 bales, 60 pairs in a bale, weighing each $6\frac{3}{4}$ pounds, measuring $1\frac{3}{4}$ yard wide and 2 yards long, real indigo stripes, dressed downwards with the points, and of the very best quality, and which were originally bought by Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co. of London, for cash, on account of their being the same kind, in every particular, as the Montreal blanket, or Northwest Company blanket, being ordered of that kind; the price \$4 75 per pair, cash; also 5 bales $2\frac{1}{2}$ points, 60 pairs per bale, weighing 5 pounds per pair, measure $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard wide, 2 yards long, the same quality, price \$3 75 per pair; also 10 bales $3\frac{1}{2}$ points, weighing $7\frac{1}{2}$ pounds per pair, measure $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard wide, 60 pairs in each bale, $2\frac{1}{8}$ yards long, same quality, \$6 25 per pair; also 7 bales blue and red strouds, 7 pieces blue, 3 pieces red, each bale, as per sample sent, full $\frac{5}{8}$ wide, well filled and milled, cost 4 shillings sterling per yard, weight 1 pound per yard; also 2 bales 8 pieces blue, 2 pieces scarlet, each bale blue as per sample, of the scarlet no pattern, but cost 5s. 6d. sterling per yard, each piece 31 to 34 yards, price 90 cents per yard, (too low, but must be sold.)

500 dozen butcher knives, as per sample, of light wood handles, at $1 75 per dozen, very cheap.

100 dozen red handled scalping-knives, at $2 per dozen.

10 pairs $\frac{7}{8}$ green saved list cloths, at \$1 75 per yard, (as per sample.)

50 cards of beads, as per sample, at $1 75 per card.

300 pounds of beads, at 90 cents per pound, mostly green, as per sample, but assorted with a few other colors.

10,000 Indian brass bells, at 1 cent per bell.

20 gross Indian awls, at $1 50 per gross.

100 dozen toilet, pocket, and red covered looking-glasses, at $1 per dozen.

I have purchased the 120 pounds of three strand yarn, agreeably to order.

I have given the weight of the blankets and strouds according to actual weight; also the measurement; and can say they are as described from conviction, not mere belief; and that I have no doubt they are of the very kind you name: however, all, or any of these articles, I shall be glad to sell you. I name cash for the blankets, because I am ordered to sell them for cash. The strouds are put down also for cash; but, if it makes any difference, some time on them will be given. The butcher knives are very good and very low, and I hope will answer.

It will give me great pleasure to execute any orders for you in this city, which I will endeavor to do to your entire satisfaction.

Waiting your reply, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. SIMPSON.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Esq.,

Superintendent Indian Trade U. S., Georgetown, D. C.

C.

PHILADELPHIA, May 11, 1818.

SIR:

In reply to your favor of the 8th instant, I beg leave to state, that there are no blankets in this market of the precise quality and dimensions as those you ask for. For the particulars of the quality of mine, which are the best in this market, I refer you to my letter to you of the 14th March last, and should be glad to sell them to you. With regard to the strouds, I must also state that nine are the best in this market, and of the highest sterling cost. Of these last I have only four bales, which are a consignment, and I must sell them; please make me an offer for them. They are the same as those last sold you, containing the blues and reds; not like those with the scarlets, but much stouter and better.

Very respectfully, &c.

H. SIMPSON.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Esq.,

Superintendent Indian Trade, Georgetown, D. C.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, May 28, 1818.

Not being able to see the owner of the point blankets until to-day, has deferred my reply to your favor of the 25th instant until this time, which I regret very much, as he declines selling the blankets at the prices I offered them at in March last. He now asks 25 per cent. more, and will sell them for cash only. Blanket wool has risen very high in England.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

H. SIMPSON.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Esq.,
Superintendent Indian Trade U. S., Georgetown, D. C.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 26, 1822.

The Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs request you to answer, as soon as convenient, the inquiries which will be found on the following page of this letter.

On the part of the committee:

THOMAS H. BENTON.

Mr. MCKENNEY, Superintendent of Indian Trade, Georgetown.Queries addressed to Mr. McKenney, Superintendent of Indian Trade.

1. What has been the aggregate quantity of each description of articles purchased by you for the Indian trade in the year 1820; the aggregate amount given for each aggregate quantity; the place or places where they were bought; the name or names of the sellers, and the amount bought of each?

2. What has been the aggregate quantity of each description of articles received by you from each of the factories in the year 1821; the aggregate amount for which each description of articles sold; the place or places at which they were sold; the names of the purchasers; the nature of the sales, (whether public or private;) and the terms of payment, whether for ready money or credit?

SIR:

INDIAN TRADE OFFICE, February 5, 1822.

I have the honor, herewith, to forward sundry abstracts, in compliance with the request of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, as contained in your communication of the 26th ult., and which furnish answers to the inquiries which accompanied that communication.

Abstract marked A shows the aggregate quantity of each description of articles purchased by me for the Indian trade in the year 1820; the aggregate amount given for each aggregate quantity; the place or places where they were bought; the names of the sellers; and the amount bought of each.

Abstracts marked B, C, D, E, F, G, show (each abstract containing the receipts and sales from each factory) what has been the aggregate quantity of each description of articles received by me from each factory in the year 1821; the aggregate amount for which each description of articles was sold, and the place or places at which they were sold; the names of the purchasers; the nature of the sales, whether public or private; the terms of payment, whether for ready money or on credit. Abstract B embraces the call as it applies to the factory at Prairie du Chien; C, the factory at Fort Confederation, on the Tombigbee; D, the factory on the Arkansas; E, Fort Clark, or Osage factory; F, Chicago; G, Fort Edwards. The Marie Decine factory having been just organized, no returns have been received from it; nor were any returns received from the factory on Red river in 1821, owing to delays arising out of the death of the factor. From Green Bay no supplies have been received.

From the Fort Edwards factory sundry articles have been received within the present year, and also from the factory on Red river, and from that at Fort Confederation, embracing an estimate of eighty thousand pounds of deer skins, which were sold just within the present year to Geisse and Korckhauss of Philadelphia. For the nature of this sale, see copy of agreement, marked H.

It may be proper to remark, that, as the prices of this sale are lower than those realized at the public auction in this town, the skins sold under the contract are southern skins, and are taken, as the contract shows, at a saving of freight and commissions, &c., and the expenses which would have occurred, besides the risk and damage arising out of their voyage here. The letter from New Orleans, marked I, will show the prices of deer skins in that market, as reported by my agents there. Letters K, No. 1, and K, No. 2, will show the correspondence with Geisse and Korckhauss leading to this sale; and letter K, No. 3, contains an offer for the skins by another house in Philadelphia.

To save trouble to the committee, I have added a general abstract, which embodies the kinds and amounts of the skins sold, and the total amount received for them.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THOS. L. MCKENNEY, S. I. T.

The Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON.
