☞ If the sale made under the contract with Geisse and Korckhaus, of the 2d day of January, 1822, be included, of 80,000 pounds deer skins, amounting to about $20,000, the amount will stand at $53,452 74.

H.

It is this day, the 2d of January, 1822, agreed between Thomas L. McKenney, superintendent of Indian trade, and Messrs. Geisse & Korckhauss, of Philadelphia, that, for all the peltries which may be at Mobile and Orleans between this date and the 1st day of April next, the aforesaid Geisse & Korckhauss are to receive and settle for, at the following rates, viz: for all merchantable shaved skins, they agree to pay thirty and a half cents per pound; for all merchantable red skins, twenty-five and a half cents; and for all gray and blue, twenty and a half cents per pound; and for the next grade of quality, two-thirds of the above prices; and for the next grade, half of the above prices.

For the deer skins now on hand at this office, from the Fort Edwards factory, they agree to pay for shaved skins, thirty-five cents per pound; for red, thirty cents; and for gray and blue, twenty-five cents; two-thirds of the above prices for the first grade of unmerchantable, and half price for the second grade of unmerchantable. This lot of skins from Fort Edwards, it is agreed, shall go on to Philadelphia, and be there assorted and weighed; and it is agreed that an agent shall be provided there, by any person Thomas L. McKenney may select; and that agent shall be sworn to do justice in selecting and sorting and weighing the said skins, according to the intent and meaning of the parties, and at the expense of the said Geisse & Korckhauss.

It is furthermore agreed, between the aforesaid T. L. McKenney, superintendent of Indian trade, and Geisse & Korckhauss, that the skins at, and which may arrive as stated at New Orleans and Mobile, shall be received at those places free of expense to the said Thomas L. McKenney, superintendent of Indian trade, any further than that shall embrace pay and compensation to his (the said McKenney's) agent for assorting, weighing, and delivering; and, moreover, that, should said skins have left Mobile and New Orleans before the said Geisse & Korckhauss shall reach there, or Thomas L. McKenney's letter directing them to be retained and delivered as aforesaid, then the said skins are to be received in whatever port they may arrive, at the risk and cost of the said Geisse & Korckhauss; they paying freight and all other charges for the same.

GEISSE & KORCKHAUSS.
THOMAS L. MCKENNEY,
Superintendent Indian Trade.

Attest: JERE. W. BRONAUGH.

SIR:

NEW ORLEANS, November 22, 1821.

Referring to ours of the 17th instant, we have to observe, we are lucky enough to meet a mercantile house who have cashed the annexed draft on you, at twenty days' sight, for $1,800, of this day's date. We annex a memorandum of sundry cash expenditures made by us for your department, which this draft is intended to meet part of, and we request it will find due honor.

In making the purchase for old Fort Confederation, we could find but one vender who would take a draft on Washington. That was for the coffee, which draft was forwarded some time since. We are anxious to receive a statement of the value of the several goods forwarded from Georgetown, Alexandria, and Philadelphia, in order to complete our quarterly account on the 31st of December next, in which your department will be credited with the amount of this draft.

You will observe that the annexed memorandum does not include commissions, neither does it include sundry disbursements for drayages, and labor, storage, &c., not yet posted with us.

Respectfully, your obedient servants,

McCOY & SCALLAN, Agents Indian Factories.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Esq., Superintendent Indian Trade, Georgetown, D. C.

Memorandum of sundry cash disbursements made by McCoy & Scallan for United States Indian Department.

SIR:

NEW ORLEANS, November 24, 1821.

The foregoing is a copy of a letter of advice accompanying a set of drafts made by us on you, in favor of Messrs. Vincent, Nolte, & Co., at twenty days' sight, for $1,800. From a wish to serve us, those gentlemen took the draft at four per cent. discount, for which we have taken their voucher. Drafts on New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore are selling at a discount of one and a half to two per cent.; but no remittances being made to Washington, added to causes before referred to, make drafts on Government authorities at Washington unsaleable. Messrs. Vincent, Nolte, & Co. have forwarded the draft for collection, and have promised, if the nett charges attending it do not amount to four per cent., (including the present discount on ordinary drafts,) they will refund the difference.

In a conversation which the writer had yesterday with General Jesup, (quartermaster general,) he was informed that the quartermaster's department here was supplied with funds by an arrangement which the general had made with the Treasury Department, who had instructed the collector here on the subject; from whom, the writer understands, supplies are had on proper vouchers.

We merely present this subject, as it may, perhaps, induce you to make a similar arrangement. We are at all times ready to give ample security for means placed within our control.

The steamboat Beaver has just arrived, and will leave for Natchitoches in eight or ten days; by her, the articles for Sulphur Fork will be shipped.

We request leave to annex the price of a few articles in the fur line. Every thing in that way is much in demand. The present quotation is merely nominal, as there is none in market; but we have no doubt the highest quotation might be obtained. We send this, that, by comparing it with northern prices, you might find it advisable to order sales to be made here on the arrival of any from the factories above.

Most respectfully, your obedient servants,

MCCOY & SCALLAN, Agents Indian Factories.

RESPECTED SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, November 24, 1821.

Your esteemed favor of the 21st instant is before us, and we perceive that you have written to your different agents in order to ascertain the value of those kinds of deer skins. We should be glad to become the purchasers; but, at the same time, we should wish to save the coasting freight, insurance, and damage done to the skins in these small coasting vessels. If, on the receipt of your offers, you will have the goodness to fix your lowest price for each kind of skins which you may have between this and the 1st day of April next, deliverable at New Orleans and Mobile, then we shall be able to say whether we can afford to give such prices or not. We are willing to give as much as any person who will take the risk of the fall or rise of the market between now and April. For the performance of our engagements, we are willing to give you satisfactory security. At foot, we quote the prices of deer skins now in this market.

We remain, very respectfully, your most obedient and humble servants,

GEISSE & KORCKHAUSS.

Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana skins—shaved, 33 to 35 cents; red, 24 to 27 cents; gray and blue, 22 to 24. Southern deer skins—shaved, 25 to 28 cents; red, 22 to 24 cents; gray and blue, 18 to 21 cents per pound.

K, No. 2.

RESPECTED SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, December 20, 1821.

Your favor of the 17th instant is before us; in answer to which we beg leave to reply, that we shall be glad to become the purchasers of the mentioned deer skins at their full and fair value, and we are willing to give as much as any person in the States. We paid you last year for those skins in Orleans, for shaved 25 cents, for red 22 cents, and for gray and blue 18 cents per pound, and half price for all kinds of unmerchantable skins. On these skins we have lost upwards of two thousand dollars: this was occasioned by the worms, but we are still liable to the same risk. There has no alteration taken place in Europe respecting the prices, since last year, that will warrant to give such prices as those you demand. You are, no doubt, aware that the skins at your last sale would not have brought those extravagant prices, if it had not been for our bidding them up so high. We will give you for those skins from Fort Edwards factory, for the shaved 35 cents, for the red 30 cents, and for gray and blue 25 cents per pound, and half price for damaged and unmerchantable skins. For those southern skins from or at Mobile and New Orleans, we will pay you for the shaved skins 30 cents, for the red 25 cents, and for the gray and blue 20 cents per pound, and for all damaged and unmerchantable skins half price. The prices which we offer are, in our opinion, considerably above the present market prices, and more than we really intended to give. We refer to the prices current from our different seaports, respecting the prices. If any skins should have been shipped in the mean time from Orleans or Mobile, we are willing to pay freight for the same, and are satisfied with the credit you offer.

We remain, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

GEISSE & KORCKHAUSS.

K, N

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, November 25, 1821.

Your favor of November 21 has been duly received, and, in answer, we offer you the following prices for deer skins, viz:

For shaved deer skins, sound quality, per pound,	-	-	-	27 cents.
Summer, or red skins, do.	-	-	-	23
Fall or winter do. do.	-	-	-	18

Damaged skins, half price for each kind, to be delivered at Mobile, and to be paid for by a draft on us in this city, at thirty days' sight after delivery; security to be given by us to comply with the above agreement; and to take all the deer skins you can deliver at Mobile, they being of the quality and prices as above mentioned, until the 1st of April, 1822. If you should deliver any of them in Baltimore, New York, or Philadelphia, we are willing to give you a half cent more per pound for each of the different qualities.

We remain yours, respectfully,

R. & J. PHILLIPS.

N. B. Should the above prices meet your approbation, we should wish to be informed as early as possible, as one of the firm might be at Mobile to receive them.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Esq., Georgetown, D. C.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, February 27, 1822.

I have had the honor of receiving your communication of the 25th instant, informing me of the decision of the Senate to print the documents transmitted by me to the committee, also the statements of the gentlemen who were examined before the committee in relation to Indian affairs; and proposing, if I had any other papers in relation to the subject which I would wish printed, that I should prepare and transmit them to you as early as possible.

On looking over the statements of Messrs. Biddle, O'Fallon, and Crooks, I have considered it might be well to submit a few brief remarks on some parts of the several statements made by them, with which I propose to accompany sundry letters and extracts of letters, more fully to illustrate the subject-matter of those statements. I may, perhaps, travel over parts of some of the grounds which have been explored in my other communications; but as the following remarks are intended to apply especially to the statements of those gentlemen, I hope I may be excused for such repetition.

I will proceed in the order in which the statements are numbered, beginning with Major Biddle's.

Remarks on Major Biddle's answer to the fifth question.

Major Biddle seems to think that the advance on the cost of an article should be confined to the cost of its transportation. A little additional knowledge of the nature of a distant and wilderness trade, embracing damage and loss, and erection and repairs of factory buildings, (as it necessarily must,) would require some other calculations besides the mere cost of transportation, if the capital is to be preserved. The soldiers have done but a very small part of the work in erecting factories, &c.; and, when they did labor, they were paid for it out of the factory funds.

Remarks on his answer to the sixth question.

The accompanying extract of my letters to Mr. Johnson, of Prairie du Chien, marked No. 1, will explain why merchandise is sometimes sent from the factories to the Indians. Further remarks upon this practice are deemed unnecessary.

Remarks on his answer to the tenth question.

It has been considered proper, always, when presents were to be made to Indians in the vicinity of the factories, that a service would be rendered by the Government agent to another branch of the Government operations for him to take for that purpose the unsaleable articles of the United States factory, which, under any circumstances, must, in the course of time, and in any mercantile establishment, accumulate in a greater or less degree. The sense of the Governor of the Michigan Territory has been very recently expressed on this subject by his agreeing to receive, for the purposes of his agency, whatever articles are in the Green Bay and Chicago factories that should not be considered suitable for a trade at the St. Peter's. The presumption is, it never entered into the Governor's conceptions of duty to confine his operations to his own agency, and expend the public money in trade with the agents of the American Fur Company, or any other agency, when, by an interchange of intercourse with another branch of the Government designs, he could promote its prosperity, without at all infringing upon the interests of his own charge.

Remarks on his answer to the eleventh question.

Reasons will be found, in the extracts of letters in illustration of Mr. Crooks's statement, for the decline of the business of the Chicago and Green Bay factories; as also a reply to the reputed inattention to the representations said to have been made by Mr. Varnum.

Although the Government operations at Green Bay and Chicago were suspended by the artifice of individuals, (as will be more fully shown in the remarks I have to make on parts of Mr. Crooks's statement,) yet it cannot be questioned that the mere presence of the factories has been serviceable to the Indians, by acting as guards, at least indirectly, in regulating the prices of goods and furs. The Indians, it is admitted, are good judges of the articles in which they deal, and, generally, when they are permitted to be sober, they can detect attempts to practise frauds upon them. The traders, knowing this, (however few of the Indians are ever permitted to trade without a previous preparation in the way of liquor,) would not be so apt to demand exorbitant prices, when the Indians could have the option to give them, or go to the factories. This may be illustrated by the fact, as reported to this office by Matthew Irwin, that, previous to the establishment of the Green Bay factory, as much as one dollar and fifty cents had been demanded by the traders of the Indians, and received, for a brass thimble, and eighteen dollars for one pound of tobacco!

Remarks on his answer to the twelfth question.

The competition and advantages which Major Biddle supposed would result to the Indians from it are certainly illusory. Compacts, and not competition, would be the consequence, provided the power of the American Fur Company, as it is denominated, would permit it.

Remarks on part of his answer to the fourteenth question.

Suppose it were admitted that the factory prices are actually higher than the prices asked for similar articles by the traders, would this prove that the Indians were not advantaged by it? Is it not easy to ask a dollar for an article which is known, in a regular trade, to be worth two dollars, and yet for a deception to be practised, by so qualifying the articles received for it, especially from drunken Indians, as to secure, instead of one dollar or two dollars, four or five, and thus impoverish men under the show of liberality and guise of cheapness?

Remarks on his answer to the fifteenth question.

I enclose a copy of a letter, marked No. 2, from Major Thomas Biddle. Colonel Atkinson wrote at the same time to the honorable the Secretary of War. This letter has been published by the Senate. These letters may serve to show the views of those gentlemen of the practices of the private intercourse with the Indians. Volumes might be compiled from history, beginning with the earliest settlements of this country, taking in the Dutch traders of the New England States of the sixteenth century, and coming to our times, to prove how essentially at war their practices have always been with the peace and welfare, and even the lives of the Indians.

I shall reserve the remarks I have to make on the charge of Mr. Varnum's having so frequently written to this office, without getting a reply, for a place in the division which will be allotted for Mr. Crooks.

It remains for Major Biddle to reconcile to the good sense of the country his answers to the third and fifteenth questions. In answer to the third question, he says "the articles, as far as he knows, are suited to the Indian trade." In his answer to the fifteenth question, he attributes the failure of Mr. Varnum's business, as one of three causes, "to the wretched character of the supplies."

Remarks on Major O'Fallon's statements.

I find but little to notice in the statements of this gentleman. There are a few things, however, which it may be well to refer to. I have already explained the grounds upon which it is considered proper to sell to other persons besides Indians. It is presumed this is understood. I have furnished, with the remarks made on Major Biddle's statements, the reasons and principles which govern the factors in sending outfits to Indians. If Mr. Johnson engaged the services of such a person as the one referred to by Major O'Fallon, he must have been under a deception as to his character; he did it, certainly, in disobedience of his instructions.

Four years ago Mr. Johnson called for some lighter articles "to be traded with half-breeds;" and, as is the practice of this office, the articles called for by the factor were sent. In this supply was the article of women's morocco shoes, which cost about 75 and 87½ cents per pair. If Indians, emerging from their rougher coverings, are desirous of imitating the whites in their exterior appearances, there seems no reason why they should be refused the privilege. The insinuation respecting the object of this supply, and also that which is reported by Major O'Fallon, on the grounds of the reports in Missouri, Illinois, and Michigan, that the "superintendent and factors are growing rich in the service," cannot be considered as entitled to any notice. The conduct and concerns of this office are at all times in readiness to be accounted for to the proper authorities.

It just occurs to me that I have a letter from Major O'Fallon, addressed to Governor Clark, dated May 10, 1817, extracts of which accompany this, marked No. 3, from which may be gathered the opinions of Major O'Fallon, in 1817, of the conduct of the British and Mackinac traders; and who those British and Mackinac traders are, may be ascertained from letters, and extracts of letters, which will accompany my remarks on the statement of Mr. Ramsay Crooks.

Remarks on Mr. Crooks's statement.

I have reserved for the remarks I have to make on this gentleman's report to the committee the information I have, which I beg leave to annex, in extracts of sundry letters received from Mr. Irwin, of Green Bay, marked Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, because Mr. Crooks is himself frequently referred to in them; and because he has borne a distinguished part in producing the interruption of the intercourse on the part of the Indians with the factory at that place; and because he, being agent for the American Fur Company, now so called, had a good deal at stake in overturning these establishments, and has much more at stake in the overthrow of the entire system.

These letters speak for themselves. As to what was done twenty-two years ago at Detroit, no person now living, it is presumed, will be held accountable for.

It is not a little surprising that, in the haste which is made to grasp the trade with our Indians, the agent of the American Fur Company, as its title denotes it, should not know that it is within the limits of the acknowledged duty of one branch of the Government operations of this country to furnish any and every facility which it may be in the power of another to afford. If officers and soldiers, therefore, at the factory establishments, want clothing, or any other article which the factor can supply, it is within his instructions to furnish it. The taking of tallow and feathers, and sugar, and hides, and even wild oats, from Indians, in exchange for what they want, is countenanced and considered proper; and it illustrates that a market may be had at the factories for these things, which would not be within reach of the Indians but for the factories—the traders taking nothing but furs and peltries.

The explanations have been given why the trade, especially at Green Bay and Chicago, has declined; and no man knows better than Mr. Crooks the causes of this decline, and the means which it is necessary to adopt at any time to produce the same results elsewhere. No man, as an Indian trader, has equal power with him, so far as money and experience are concerned.

I now come to remark upon the assertions of both Major Biddle and Mr. Crooks, (taking the language of the latter,) respecting Mr. Varnum's soliciting for years to be removed, but his solicitations were not deemed worthy of acknowledgment. I enclose, in reply to this, an extract from my letter dated December, 1820, marked No. 14; also, a letter from Mr. Varnum of June, 1817, with my reply, marked No. 13, in which he proposes an extension of the operations of the factory. The factory at Chicago, in charge of Mr. Varnum, did not go into operation till 1816; soon after which, the excellence of the furs taken there made it an object with the traders to destroy the Government intercourse. The measures adopted for this purpose are set forth in the letters and extracts already submitted. The compact, by 1818, had completely succeeded. I was informed of these proceedings, and in 1818 my mind was made up, and I knew the power of these "British and Mackinac" traders, and others, to be competent to put down the Green Bay and Chicago factories; and there being no efficient regulations under the license system to sustain them, or indeed any others, I felt it my duty first to suggest to the chairman of the Committee of the House of Representatives, under a call of his, what I considered important to a preservation of the system, and recommended in 1818, about two years after the Chicago factory had been in operation, under a full view of what was going on, and a conviction of the design on the part of the traders to overthrow the system, and there being no checks to restrain them, that, unless the system were strengthened, there could be no better time for its abandonment than that. See extract of my letter to the chairman of the Committee of the House of Representatives, herewith sent, marked No. 11.

The system was continued, however, in its manacled state, one year after another, and only one year at a time, making it uncertain whether it would be finally continued or abandoned.

Meanwhile, under the hope, year after year, that something would be done, and being unwilling to recommend a removal until the matter should be finally decided, leaving the Indians in that quarter without any guard in the event of a continuance of the system, I delayed moving in the subject till July last, when, perceiving that the capital was likely to be entrenched upon by the continuance of both the Green Bay and Chicago factories, I recommended their abandonment and removal to the St. Peter's, as per my letter to the honorable the Secretary of War. See copy herewith, marked No. 12.

I enclose three letters from Mr. Sibley, of Missouri, illustrative of the nature of the trade, as prosecuted by individuals, &c., marked Nos. 15, 16, and 17.

All which is respectfully submitted.

THOS. L. MCKENNEY, S. I. T.

The Hon. HENRY JOHNSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs.

No. 1.

Extract of a letter from the Superintendent of Indian Trade to J. W. Johnson, United States Factor at Prairie du Chien, dated

SEPTEMBER 2, 1816.

I have considered what remains, and particularly the desire of the Sac Indians, near the Lead Mines, to be supplied with merchandise. It is entirely within the scope of our policy to extend every reasonable assistance to all the Indians within our limits, so far as that may be practicable, and consistent with the amount of our trading capital. At present, however, I am unable to see how this can be done to any considerable extent, or at all, unless you could send supplies from Prairie du Chien, and out of your stock now in trade, which might be augmented somewhat for this purpose. To make a depot at St. Louis, and supply individuals from it at cost and charges, however valuable the results might be, in putting down British traders, and in attaching the Indians to us, cannot be done at this time. This, however, may be done, if Congress shall accede to the plan of the Secretary of War, in augmenting the capital of this establishment; and, under judicious regulations, much good would no doubt result from it. Meanwhile, you can exercise your discretion in pushing on occasional supplies from the factory at Prairie du Chien, which, as I have said, shall be occasionally and additionally replenished.

It is hardly necessary for me to call your attention to the risk that is involved in sending out traders. I am sure that you will have an eye upon their honesty and fair dealings, and, in case you shall be deceived, have in your possession sufficient security, as a reserve, to bring up their arrears. This point well guarded, and which must, of course, be left to you, I shall be gratified if those Indians, on the river St. Peter's and at the Lead Mines, could have their wants supplied, if but partially.

Extract from the same to the same, dated

MARCH 11, 1819.

I beg leave to call your attention to the privilege granted you to issue supplies of merchandise to American traders of good character, and, generally, under the instructions which that permission embraced.

It appears to me that the plan is liable to abuse; and, however the effects may go to lessen the evils growing out of the peddling system, carried on by foreigners, and all sorts of characters, to the injury of the Indians and the disgrace of human nature, yet a danger appears to be apprehended on the other hand. It is that which implies exorbitant charges, which those to whom you furnish supplies have it in their power to make; and, by this means, the relief which it was intended, through them, to carry in amongst the Indians, may be converted into an evil.

I suggest, therefore, and beg that you will have the goodness to attend to it with all the punctuality which its importance merits, that you be particular, first, in the sort of men (especially in their just and moral character) to whom you may intrust this liberty; secondly, require of them prompt and frequent settlements; thirdly, trust to no man another supply till he pays for the preceding; fourthly, to his invoice add a column, and affix to each article the price he is to ask the Indians, and regulate the advance upon a scale of equal justice, which implies a just compensation to him for his trouble, and the distance of the tribe or tribes with whom he may trade, and a fair demand upon the Indians. Direct, also, what he is to allow for the various skins he may take in barter. Of all this you will be the best judge. I refer it to your discretion, with but one additional remark: the Indians must be justly treated and dealt by, and we must, so far as we have the power to control the trade, do by them accordingly. No trader, who goes out from the factory, being aided with supplies by it, will be permitted to violate the rules which relate to it. He must do his business with the natives without the intervention of whiskey or any spirituous liquors. It is the curse of these people. We should use all proper and lawful means to save them from its baleful effects.

Take such testimony against a trader who may violate your instructions as you may think ought to condemn him, and trust him no more. He must consent to dispense with legal requirements, and let his good conduct keep him free from even slight imputations.

In relation to the suitability of the supplies which go from this office, I beg leave to subjoin an extract from a letter received from Governor Cass, dated in August, 1816; and to add, that out of forty odd thousand dollars worth of this very stock, which was sent out in that year, only about $800 worth was bought outside of this District.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Superintendent Indian Trade.

Extract.

I have been much gratified to find the goods sent here for the Indians are very well selected. Perfect justice has been done. I am informed by persons in the Indian Department that such a selection was never sent to this country. In fact, I cannot conceive that they could be better suited to the objects for which they are sent.

No. 2.

Extract of a letter from Major Thomas Biddle to Colonel H. Atkinson, dated at CAMP MISSOURI, MISSOURI RIVER, October 29, 1819.

These traders are continually endeavoring to lessen each other in the eyes of the Indians, not only by abusive words, but by all sorts of low tricks and manœuvres. If a trader trusts an Indian, his opponent uses all his endeavors to purchase the furs he may take, or prevent in any way his being paid. Each trader supports his favorite chief, which produces not only intestine commotions and divisions in the tribe, but destroys the influence of the principal chief, who should always be under the control of the Government. The introduction of ardent spirits is one of the unhappy consequences of this opposition among traders; so violent is the attachment of Indians for it, that he who gives most is sure to obtain furs; while, should any one attempt to trade without it, he is sure of losing ground with his antagonist. No bargain is ever concluded without it, and the law on that subject is evaded by their saying they give, not sell it. The traders being afraid to trust the Indians, they cannot make distant hunts: this, and their attachment to whiskey, induce them to hang about in the vicinities of trading establishments, and as they take furs sell them for whiskey; the consequence is, that but few furs are taken, as much of the hunting season is lost in intoxication and indolence. The Indians witnessing the efforts of these people to cheat and injure each other, and knowing no other or no more important white men, they readily imbibe the idea that all white men are alike bad. The imposing appearance of the army equipments of white men, and the novelty and convenience of their merchandise, had impressed the Indians with a high idea of their power and importance; but the avidity with which beaver skins are sought after, the tricks and wrangling made use of, and the degradations submitted to in obtaining them, have induced a belief that the whites cannot exist without them, and have made a great change in their opinion of our importance, our justice, and our power.

Under the plea of trading with the Indians, white trappers and hunters obtain a footing in their country. The old man and his son whipped and robbed this summer by the Pawnees, and the three men killed about the same time by the Sioux, were persons of this description; the trouble these sorts of transactions may occasion the Government cannot be readily calculated. It will illustrate what I have said to narrate what happened on my visit to the Maha nation, from which I yesterday returned. The nation were preparing to start on their winter's hunt, and endeavoring to obtain guns, powder, and lead, to subsist themselves while trapping. They complained bitterly that they could not procure enough of these articles. The traders were afraid to trust them. There were two traders in the camp, both jealous and apprehensive of each other; in conversation with the Indians, they invariably abused the traders, and the traders abused each other. The tribe separated into small hunting bands, very much dissatisfied, and the traders would send round occasionally to these bands to purchase their furs: a keg of whiskey was considered an indispensable equipment for such an undertaking. I had found on my arrival most of the principal men drunk. The Big Elk, who is so much our friend, and who formerly possessed unlimited power in his nation, was so drunk for two days, that I could not deliver your letter to him; when I gave it, I requested the interpreter to inform him that I had been two days waiting to deliver a letter from you, but that, very much to my surprise, I had found him too drunk to transact business. He appeared affected at what I said, acknowledged how unworthy it was in him to be in that situation, and admitted he had lost much power by it. He blamed the whites for bringing liquor into the country; said that when he knew it was not to be had, he felt no inclination for it; but that when it was near and attainable, his attachment for it was irresistible. Besides, said he, your traders come among my nation, give medals, and make chiefs of every man who can obtain a party to trap beaver. It is the ambition of these chiefs that opposes me and makes me powerless. I know that there are Malias now alive as brave and as wise as I am; it was fortune or chance that placed me at the head of the nation, and I cannot control my tribe while the whites assist those who oppose me. Thus is the influence of this valuable and sensible Indian lost to his tribe and the Government; and thus is a man, who possesses some traits that do honor to human nature, debased and made a beast of.

No. 3.

Extracts from B. O'Fallon's letter to Governor Clark, dated

MAY 10, 1817.

On reaching Prairie du Chien, my surprise and disappointment were on the extreme, in meeting with numerous British traders (equipped with licenses under the authority of my Government) whose conduct during the late Indian war was the most unprincipled, the most inhuman, and disgraceful to civilized man.

Suspicious characters, the very men who had been instrumental in the destruction of many of the women and children of our frontiers, I found were licensed traders, and ready to take a dishonorable part in distressing and checking the progress of American enterprise.

Be assured that I complied strictly with your request, by keeping a watchful eye over the feelings of the Indians, and the disposition and conduct of the faithless Mackinac traders. From appearances and Indian reports, the Mackinac traders left no measure unturned in endeavoring to make the minds of the Indians more corrupt, destroy the little influence the Americans had acquired over some few, and have me, the only American in that country, destroyed. No doubt exists in my mind but that the forty-five Chippewas, (who visited me during the winter,) between whom and the Sioux I effected a peace, were sent by some of the villanous British traders of the northwest to massacre or rob me; they, during a stay of three days, showed every disposition to commit murder or robbery, which I am induced to believe was prevented by the unexpected arrival of the Sioux.

No. 4.

Extract of a letter from the Factor at Green Bay to the Superintendent of Indian Trade, dated

MARCH 10, 1817.

The opportunity of conveying this being immediate, leaves me little time to state why so little business has been done at this factory during the winter; and, without going into a detail of minor reasons, I believe the principal ones will be found to be these: 1st. The admission of many British traders, who have been accustomed to do business in this quarter, and who placed themselves in the most advantageous places for business within fifty, seventy, and one hundred miles of this; 2dly. The hints given the Indians by these traders to follow them, lest the Americans might punish them for their recent bad conduct during the late war; 3dly. The practice (conducted secretly) of vending whiskey; and 4thly. The prejudices excited by the traders against our factories.

I recognise among them many who were openly and highly instrumental in exciting the Indians of our territory to rise in arms against us during the late war. I think, if British traders are to be admitted to trade with Indians, regard should be had to their past, or, at least, a guaranty given for their future conduct.

The Indian agents* in this quarter, contrary to custom, exact $50 from each private trader, British or American, for each annual license, which is considered as a perquisite of office, notwithstanding they are salary officers.

No. 5.

Extract of a letter from Matthew Irwin, United States Factor at Green Bay, to the Superintendent of Indian Trade, dated

GREEN BAY, September 29, 1817.

I have more than once given you my opinion in relation to the state of this factory, and what it might probably accomplish; and I recollect I stated that it could supply the wants of all the Indians comprised in this district. In compliance with this belief, I made corresponding arrangements, after the receipt of your letter of the 28th [a copy of which is enclosed, marked No. 18,] of May last. Several applications were made by American citizens to obtain merchandise, for the purpose of supplying the wants of the Indians; and presuming it to be the intention of the Government to have the Indians supplied by them, I encouraged, after the receipt of your said letter, the applications of Lewis Rouse and Thomas P. James, who incurred considerable expense in making the preparatory arrangements for that purpose.

They had, too, an assurance from the Indian agent here that he would not license British subjects to trade where they intended to establish themselves. Mr. Rouse was to supply the Indians at and near the Ouisconsin, and Mr. James those at Menomonie river, and intended to send a person to Winnebago lake. A few days previous to their departure for those places, information was received that a number of British traders, licensed by the Indian agent at Mackinac, were on their way to trade with the Indians at the places to which Mr. Rouse and Mr. James intended going; and a confirmation of it soon after came in a letter from the Governor of Michigan Territory to the Indian agent at Mackinac, informing him that he had received a letter from the Secretary of War, stating that Mr. John Jacob Astor had purchased the whole of the interest in the late Southwest Company, and wishing every facility to be given him in carrying on his trade with the Indians; in consequence of which, the Governor directed the said agent to license all persons that the agent of Mr. Astor should name to him. Mr. Astor's agent is a Mr. Crooks, a known and professed British subject, who named to the agent at Mackinac a number of persons, (all British subjects,) whom the agent licensed. Several of them came to this place for the purpose of trading with the Indians at the Ouisconsin, and other places.

This at once would have determined Mr. Rouse and Mr. James to abandon their undertaking, but they had engaged the necessary number of persons for the usual period, (six months,) and incurred other expenses. They therefore determined not to abandon their undertaking, although they feel persuaded it will eventually be a bad business, as they think they are not able to cope in business with old and experienced persons, personally acquainted with the Indians, &c.

Should they be correct, I fear it will be difficult to persuade other American citizens to undertake to supply the Indians in this quarter. Besides the British traders licensed to trade at the Ouisconsin, others were licensed by the agent at Mackinac to trade at the Upper Mississippi and this place, at which, in the village alone, six are licensed; and all of them, with one exception, held commissions during the late war, are influential with the Indians, and were named by me in my letter of the 24th of July last to the Indian agent here, a copy of which I transmitted you.

The persons engaged by the American house of David Stone & Co. were British subjects, and they were, I understand, licensed by the agent at Mackinac. Governor Clark last year directed the stoppage of British subjects entering the Mississippi; Governor Edwards requested the agent at Chicago to prevent them from entering the Illinois. What reasons exist for allowing them to trade with the Indians in this quarter, I am at a loss to imagine.

It is well known it is not necessary to license British subjects to trade at Mackinac, as very little business is done there by the Indians; and if it were greater, the American storekeepers could attend to it. At Chicago, the factory used to supply all the Indians in that quarter; and it can be well established that it is wholly unnecessary to license a single person at this place; for last year a British trader (Peter Grignon) supplied all the Indians at or near the Ouisconsin, and another (Peter Powell) those at Menomonie river; and the trade in this village was attended to by two or three British subjects, who, altogether, did not make twenty packs.

There appears a palpable incongruity in the manner of conducting the Indian trade: the factors are sent to supply the wants of the Indians, and the Indian agents can adopt such measures as to defeat all their plans to that end. It is very certain that the authority vested in them to issue licenses is well calculated to destroy all the benefits that might be expected from the factories; particularly, too, when they interfere with each other's districts, as is the case with the agent at Mackinac, who is in the constant practice of licensing persons to trade here and on the Mississippi. I can promise nothing from this factory whilst these irregularities exist. It was not expected that Mr. Astor would engage to do business with the Indians none but British subjects, and those, too, so exceptionable in every particular.

Considering, then, that the plans which I might adopt next year for supplying the Indians are liable to be frustrated by the impediments which seem to be put in the way of the prosperity of the factory, and the consequent injury it would do to the individuals I might engage for that purpose, I must beg you to decline sending any more merchandise here, unless the Secretary of War can correct the irregularities which I have alluded to. The truth is, the factories require to be well supported before they can be of any utility; one of the first measures to which should be, the prohibition to grant licenses where the factory can supply the necessities of the Indians.

Extract of a letter from Matthew Irwin, United States Factor at Green Bay, to the Superintendent of Indian Trade, dated

GREEN BAY, June 18, 1818.

Your letter of the 6th of March requires that I should notice it in a particular manner, though I fear I shall not do justice to the subject. You say, from the refusal on the part of the Government to let foreigners into a participation of our trade, that you think I may calculate on success in future, and that you look to a revival of the trade. There can be nothing more certain than that, if foreigners were kept out of the country, a good business might be done here. It appears that the Government has been under an impression that the Southwest Company, of which Mr. John Jacob Astor is the head, is strictly an American company; and, in consequence, some privileges in relation to trade have been granted to that company, and of such a nature as to put it out of the power of any persons concerned in fur companies, who, if they consulted their interest, would, whilst the British possess influence over the Indians, employ none but British subjects. The circumstance I allude to is this: A short time previous to the declaration of war, Mr. Astor obtained from the then Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Gallatin) an order directing the collector of the customs at Mackinac to suffer Mr. Astor to have his furs (which were at the British post St. Joseph's) landed at Mackinac. The agent employed on that business was a British subject. On his way to St. Joseph's, he communicated to the British at Malden that war had been, or would be, declared. The British made corresponding arrangements, and landed on the island of Mackinac with regulars, Canadians, and Indians, before the commanding officer there had notice that war had been declared. The same course was about to be pursued at Detroit, before the arrival of troops with General Hull, who, having been on the march there, frustrated it. The giving Mr. Astor the order to suffer his furs to be landed at and shipped from Mackinac, had, it was believed, for its object, to secure them from capture or detention, should they have been shipped from St. Joseph's after the declaration of war should be known. The collector read the order in the presence of several persons. Mr. Astor's agent brought the furs to Mackinac in company with the British troops, and the whole transaction is well known at Mackinac and Detroit.

AUGUST 10, 1818.

Seeing that the business of this factory must, in some measure, be regulated by the various fluctuations which occur in the Indian trade, I reduced the prices of many of the goods on hand, particularly those first received, as I discovered that if I did not do it I should do little or no business, in consequence of a determination on the part of British traders to undersell the goods in the factory. They put in practice a plan (suggested by Joseph Rolette) for preventing the factory from doing any business. It was this: each trader to advance a piece of strouds, with the usual assortment of other articles, (termed by them an assorted piece of stroud,) to be sold at first cost, and keeping a person employed to watch the arrival of the Indians, and take them to the house where those goods were kept. It proved as they desired—successful; and will account, in some measure, for the little business I have done with Indians.

No. 8.

Extract of a letter from the United States Factor at Green Bay to the Superintendent of Indian Trade.

The fact can be established, that, in almost every case, the persons engaged by Mr. Astor's principal agent, (Mr. Crooks, who is a British subject,) were known British subjects; many of them having held commissions under the British Government, and headed Indians during the late war. For example: at this place Mr. Astor sent goods to the following persons last fall, to be traded alongside the factory, viz: To John Lowe, Lewis Grignon, Augustine Grignon, and Peter Powell, British subjects, and holding commissions from the British Government, in the Indian department, during the late war.

And the following persons were sent by Mr. Astor in the neighborhood of Mr. Rouse, whom I sent to do business with the Indians at the Ouisconsin, viz: Peter Grignon, Mr. Jacobs, Mr. Chaperaux, and J. B. Grignon, British subjects belonging to this place, and holding commissions during the late war from the British Government, in the Indian department.

And Mr. Lusienaux, a British subject, was sent by Mr. Astor to trade with the Indians at Winnebago lake. At Menomonic river, where I sent Mr. Thomas P. James to trade, he was opposed by a Canadian sent by Mr. Astor; and, in an underhand manner, by Peter Powell, a British subject, who held a commission in the Indian department during the late war.

It appears that the persons sent by Mr. Astor to other places to trade with Indians were British subjects; and, when it happened that the principal person having charge of the goods was culpable in his conduct during the late war, in that case a discharged soldier was procured at Mackinac to accompany the goods, who would affect to have the agency of them, whilst all the others, even the boatmen, were British subjects. Similar conduct has been observed by the house of David Stone & Co. at Mackinac; one of the partners of which (Michael Dousman) piloted the British armament to Mackinac during the late war. Stone's house opposes that of Astor's in trade. Added to these irregularities, must be noticed the traffic carried on secretly in whiskey at this place.

The Indians are frequently kept in a state of intoxication, giving their furs, &c. at great sacrifices for whiskey. A return to reason will induce many of them to mention who sold them the whiskey, but it is deemed illegal to accept Indian testimony; so that the British and American traders (of the latter several have arrived here) may deal in whiskey without the smallest chance of detection. The agents of Mr. Astor hold out an idea that they will, ere long, be able to break down the factories; and they menace the Indian agents, and others who may interfere with them, with dismissal from office, through Mr. Astor. They say that a representation from Messrs. Crooks and Stewart (Mr. Astor's agents) led to the dismissal of the Indian agent at Mackinac, and they also say that the Indian agent here is to be dismissed. It appears that the commanding officer at Prairie du Chien undertook, at the instigation of the Indian agent, to stop and send to St. Louis some of Mr. Astor's British trading subjects. For this act it is said the agent will be dismissed from the public service; and we have now the novel spectacle before us of a British subject (Mr. Crooks) travelling to the prairie, with a passport from Governor Cass, said to have been given by authority of the War Department, to inquire into the conduct of the Indian agent and commanding officer.

Extract of a letter from the United States Factor at Green Bay to the Superintendent of Indian Trade, dated

FEBRUARY 15, 1820.

Since the receipt of your letter of the 10th of September last, (which I acknowledged on the 1st of December,) nothing has been done by the Indian agent to restrain the British traders residing in the village from having intercourse with the Indians in the way of trade. In fact, from the prejudices they have excited against American traders, the Indian trade is confined to the British traders, who, from selling whiskey privately, and from the ties of relationship, &c. with the Indians, will continue to enjoy it so long as the orders relative to the subject are unattended to by the agent.

The Indian trade is virtually surrendered to those persons, and no efforts on my part can prevent it; the remedy must come from another quarter. The Indians are altogether led away by the British traders; and, whilst the American traders and officers are insulted by the Indians at a distance from the fort, those traders are cherished and caressed. The proof of which I will give you.

1st. Some time last summer, a boat loaded with goods, and owned by an American trader, (Mr. Armitinger,) was fired upon by some Indians near Winnebago lake.

2d. Captain Whistler, of the army, wrote from Winnebago lake that the Indians had fired upon his boat, while on his way to St. Louis in August last.

3d. Doctor Madison, of the army, informed his correspondent here that some Indians plundered him at Winnebago lake last fall.

4th. Lewis Grignon, James Porlier & Son, and Augustus, (British subjects,) proceeded to the Ouisconsin last fall with their boats loaded with goods, without experiencing insult or obstruction. On the contrary, the Indians in that direction accompanied them for the purpose of hunting for them, during the fall, winter, and spring.

I am confident that nothing but an unqualified expulsion of those traders from this place, for the due observance of the orders received, will produce a favorable change in the minds of the Indians.

The village contains from forty-five to forty-eight families, who all profess to be the subjects of Britain, and from ten to twelve British traders rule them. This state of things has existed for many years, without any present prospect of alteration.

Mr. Kenzie, son to the Indian sub-agent at Chicago, and agent for the American Fur Company, has been detected in selling large quantities of whiskey to the Indians, at and near Milwalky of Lake Michigan; in consequence of which, the Indian agent at Chicago directed him to close his concerns at Milwalky in sixty days, and then leave the place. Some Indians from that place represented to me that they would be badly off for a trader, should Mr. Kenzie leave them; in consequence of which, I engaged Mr. Vieau, a citizen of the United States, and a professed Indian trader, to repair there for the purpose of supplying the wants of the Indians. I have supplied him with $2,228 25 worth of goods, and have agreed to allow him $200 from the time of his departure till his return next spring, with an allowance of some coarse clothing and subsistence. Two boatmen and two boys will receive, altogether, $200, with some coarse clothing and subsistence. Mr. Vieau is well known here for his integrity, and possesses property enough here to cover the whole amount with which I have intrusted him.

I cannot, therefore, forego the obligations I feel to urge the necessity of giving to the existing Government intercourse that support and protection which the generosity of its design, and the nobleness of its object, appear to me to merit; and this implies a better regulated license system, so as to restrict such individuals as may hereafter go amongst our home Indians; to cancel the licenses of such as are now acting under such authority, (and this may be done by a law, forbidding their removal except through particular channels, and under other restrictions;) and an augmentation of the trade fund: a close investigation of the state of which warrants me in saying, that, rid of the private traders, except such as would be really useful, the trade could be made to embrace our home Indians, if, to its present capital, which is shown to be only $236,630 39, were added as much as would bring it up to $300,000.

These two things being done, results alike favorable to the Indians, and to the peace and security of our borders, would no doubt be realized; and these would be no less gratifying to the Government, than to those humane and benevolent men who are coming in with so much ardor in aid of the Government design. But, unless these two things can be realized, I feel it to be no less my duty to assure you that, in my opinion, no future period could so well answer to wind up the business of the Government trade as the present.

SIR:

INDIAN TRADE OFFICE, July 5, 1821.

I have the honor respectfully to represent, that for three years last past the two factories on the lakes, one at Chicago, the other at Green Bay, have been in a measure useless to the Indians, and, in a pecuniary point of view, to the Government also. This state of things is owing entirely to the unsuitable provisions which exist for the regulation of the trade. Hordes of private adventurers, availing themselves of the looseness of the system, have crowded into those parts on account of the superiority of the furs which are taken there, and level all sorts of policy but their own, by the powerful agency which they derive from the free use of spirituous liquors as an article of their commerce, and after which the Indians, however afflicting they know the consequences to be, will go.

This view of the state of these two factories should have been given thus formally before, had I not waited in the hope that Congress would have placed this trade under the guidance of suitable regulations, which, if done, would insure to the Government the harmony and attachment of these lake Indians, and to the Indians all the consequences which the Government contemplated in the adoption of this just and humane branch of its policy. This hope, and the apprehension that a removal of the factories (which, although they do but little in the way of trade, operate as a check to the traders,) might expose the Indians to oppression, seemed to authorize me in waiting for the final judgment of Congress in this matter. I am unable, however, on a review of this subject, to realize in the proceedings of the last Congress any additional disposition to place this item upon what I conceive its proper basis; and the continuation of the same inactivity which has hitherto characterized the business done at these two factories promising to make inroads upon the fund allotted for the trade, I do not feel myself authorized further to delay a decision on the subject, and recommend it accordingly for the Executive approval: it is, to break up and discontinue the two factories located at Chicago and Green Bay. In making this decision, however, I am led to it entirely from considerations growing out of the duty which my trust imposes on me, and which embraces an obligation binding on me to keep the capital from diminution, and not from considerations of policy. My opinion is, that an abandonment of these posts must tend to much excitement, and a corresponding alienation of feelings on the part of the Indians from the Government, as well as to bloodshed. This, however, is a part of the case at which I feel myself authorized but incidentally to glance.

I propose, on breaking up the trading-houses at Chicago and Green Bay, to unite the stocks, so far as they may furnish suitable materials, and follow the military post with a factory to the St. Peter's. The Government is not yet known in the exercise of its parental capacity in supplying the wants of the Indians in that region. In addition to the advantages which the Indians will derive from a factory located at or near the military post, will be the active and abundant returns which will be received from it.

If this recommendation be approved, I will have to dispose of, at Chicago, the items enumerated in the enclosed invoice, which are unsuited to a trade at St. Peter's, and which, supposing they may be useful in the event of a treaty with any tribes of Indians in that region, I propose to turn over to the Indian Department at cost and charges, and pass the amount to the debit of the Indian Department account with this office.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY,
Superintendent Indian Trade.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

UNITED STATES FACTORY, CHICAGO, June 20, 1817.

The exclusion of foreigners from participating in the Indian trade will, it is believed, justify the extension of the operations of this establishment. This, together with the consideration of the large supply of blankets and cloths now on hand, induces me to recommend a distribution of the goods of this factory among the adjacent villages, for trade, to such an extent as will insure the sale of nearly all by the expiration of the trading season. Such a measure, I am well convinced, will be highly gratifying to the Indians, as a great number, by this means, will be enabled to supply themselves with goods on more reasonable terms than could otherwise be done; nor do I apprehend any difficulty in effecting it to the advantage of the Government, as gentlemen of unquestionable integrity have already applied for such outfits. An answer on this subject, as early as convenient, will be highly gratifying.

I am, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

JACOB B. VARNUM,
United States Factor.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Esq.

From the Superintendent of Indian Trade to the United States Factor at Chicago, dated

SIR:

SEPTEMBER 10, 1817.

Your letter of the 20th June is before me. The subject of distributing the merchandise of the factory, and settling in other agencies, with a view to augment the sales and serve the Indians, is one which has had my consideration. There can be no objection to the measure but on account of the risk it involves. It is true the discretion of the factor is of importance to regulate this point, but experience has proved that he may sometimes be mistaken.

From the possibility of losing, I have discountenanced this kind of extension of the trade, except under circumstances of particular restriction and security; and, in general, it has been hard to procure the latter.

If, however, you can place in separate hands—say from two to four—an amount of goods, in the whole, amounting to fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars at the most, without injury to the assortment of the stock of the factory, and under terms of security satisfactory to yourself, I can have no objection, provided that in no case any additional supply be furnished to either of the sub-traders until the previous one be settled for; having out, at no time, an amount exceeding two thousand dollars.

Without some alleviating circumstances of better business, or a new framing of laws, under which so much abuse of the system has got in by the agency of private traders, it will become necessary to discontinue the factory in your charge. I have waited thus long, hoping that Congress would act in relation to this matter.

SIR:

FORT OSAGE, April 16, 1819.

I am yet ignorant what alterations have been made by Congress, at their last session, in our Indian trade system, though I have accidentally learned that the trading-houses are continued for another year. I said "Indian trade system;" so it is called; but it is no more like a system, than the yells of an Indian are like music; and yet it is complained that "the Government system has not effected much, if any, good; that it has not realized the public expectations; has not civilized and Christianized the savages, or extended and strengthened the influence of the Government among the Indians."

Little, indeed, has this "system" effected, and that little is more than ought reasonably to have been expected, if it is considered how very defective our laws are on the subject of Indian trade and intercourse, and how little support this system, as it is called, has ever received from Government. True, it has received its existence from Government, and has, by sufferance, from year to year, been kept in a miserable languishing state to this time. Like a wretch under sentence of death, it has been reprieved from year to year, still under sentence, growing weaker and weaker; while its enemies are acquiring fresh vigor from new hopes; and, in the mean time, this poor skeleton of a wretched system is tortured with upbraidings, abuse, and reproaches, because blood still flows on the frontiers, and the tomahawk and scalping-knife are not exchanged for the Bible and the plough. Let our legislators look fairly into this subject. If it is a subject worthy to be considered, why is it so neglected? If unworthy, dismiss it, and let loose the hungry traders. If the lives and property of our frontier people are in the safe-keeping of their Government, it would seem proper that Government should control those whose irregular commerce places those lives and that property in jeopardy. If we (I rank myself among the frontier settlers) are not entitled to that protection, keep us no longer in suspense; give up the Indian trade (and with it, of course, all influence over the Indians) to "individual enterprise," and let this be proclaimed along the frontiers: "Americans, farmers! you who may emphatically be called the pioneers of civilization; you have been induced to remove your families to the borders, you have purchased lands there from the Government, and have been led to believe that your Government possessed and meant to retain the power to control your only enemies, the savages and the traders, and thus afford you protection; and such truly was the intention of Government. But, it is now different; the clamorous cupidity of the traders will no longer be restrained; the Indian trade must be given up to 'individual enterprise,' to merciless men, who feel not for your sufferings, and care not for your wrongs; to intriguing foreigners, who thirst for the blood of your wives and little ones; to the unprincipled pioneers of commerce of every shade and hue. We will instruct these people to conduct their trade honestly, to abstain from every practice that may have a tendency to endanger your peace and safety, and we shall compel them to give bonds, with securities, for the faithful observance of our instructions. Further, we cannot protect you, for these enterprising people must be left free to pursue the trade with the Indians; they are entitled to the benefits of the fur trade, and have assured us, on their honor, that they cannot prosecute it to their liking under the present checks and restrictions.

"Your property will be sacrificed, your families murdered, and your farms desolated; but these men insist upon their rights, and the fur trade must be left open to them. Your Indian neighbors must also be given up to the moral and political schooling of this worthy class of citizens; they will be kept in darkness, and their natural pursuits of war and hunting protracted as long as there remains a beaver or a bear in these extensive forests. If they sometimes break in upon you, and commit robberies and murders, you know it is the nature of a savage so to act. Perhaps these traders might, if they thought proper, divest them of those propensities, and induce them to adopt the arts and the habits of civilization, and your example would greatly encourage them; but, alas! this would not accord with the traders' interest, nor can they look upon your example with a friendly eye. What is the bleeding scalp of an infant, compared with the rich fur of a beaver skin?

"You are numerous, peaceful, and industrious; many of you have borne arms in the defence of your country; many are settled on that very land given to you by your Government for military services, to which you once fondly hoped to retire in safety, to pass the remnant of your lives in happiness. But you have deceived yourselves; you are still doomed to a life of toil and danger; your little property, the fruits of many years' labor, must be left exposed to savage depredations; your arms must defend the frontiers, and the blood of your wives and children appease the savage propensities of your Indian neighbors, who must be left in their present unhappy state, a scourge to our frontiers, a reproach to the Government; but profitable to those few highly favored, because highly meritorious citizens, the Indian traders."

But I hope for better things; and, although we are left for another year powerless and unprotected from the malice and the galling insults of every renegade trader; although the agents of the Government are still subjected to the derision and the open opposition of the traders, without any official power to compel those people to treat the institutions of the Government with a becoming respect; still I look forward, confidently, to the next Congress, for better regulations. Under that hope, I shall content myself as well as I can to serve out another year; still using personal influence instead of that which ought to belong, but does not, to my official station, to support the character of Government, and cause its policy to be respected among the Indians. I will conclude these remarks, sir, with this assurance, that, under present circumstances, the United States trading-houses in this quarter are very little better than useless to the Government as respects any political influence they have over the Indians, (though they are certainly great conveniences, and some protection to those people;) and, in my opinion, had better be abolished, unless they are regenerated, better protected, and continued in operation for a longer term, instead of from year to year, as heretofore.

Very respectfully, sir, &c.

G. C. SIBLEY.

Extract of a letter from George C. Sibley, United States Factor at Fort Osage, to the Superintendent of Indian Trade, dated

MAY 16, 1820.

About half of the Little Osages were here a few days ago; they brought little or nothing to trade. They came to ask for their annuity for 1820, which I, of course, refused to pay them, having received no order to do so, it not being yet due, and the tribe not being fairly represented.

They had been sent by the traders, in order to excite a spirit of hostility against the Government, knowing full well that their application must fail. They affected to be very angry; left me hastily; declared the treaty between them and the United States at an end, and said they never would come here again. I made no attempt to stay them, knowing that they were merely playing the fool, and that it was better to let them discover their folly themselves.

But if those peddlers are not kept from among the Indians, they will, most inevitably, all be totally ruined; cruel wars will be excited; our frontiers will again bleed; and the wretched Indians crushed. Mark me, sir; these things are near at hand.

FEBRUARY 3, 1818.

A prejudice has already gone forth among the Indians that the Americans cannot make goods of a good quality. They believe that all the blankets, cloths, &c. of common quality, are of American manufacture, and that the British only make the best kinds. The traders tell them that there are none but American goods for sale at the factory, and that, although they are sold at low prices, they are, nevertheless, very dear, considering the quality; but that their goods are of the real British kind—a little dearer, to be sure, but also a great deal better and handsomer. This is an argument that operates most powerfully against the factories, and not a little, I assure you, in favor of British politics. This present season I have had the good fortune to check, in some degree, this prejudice, as it relates to this trading-house. My goods are of better quality than I have generally been supplied with, and, although inferior to the British northwest goods, will still bear some comparison with them, and have given rise to an opinion among the Indians that the Americans are improving in the important art of making blankets and cloth; which opinion I desire to strengthen and confirm by means of the excellence of next year's supplies.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, May 28, 1817.

Your letters of the 10th of March are before me: one covering an inventory of goods, furs, and cash on hand, and debts due the factory; the other, two sets of salary and subsistence accounts for the last quarter of 1816; also, your letter of advice to Zadock Walker, Esq., which I have transmitted by this day's mail.

You have not stated what goods were exchanged or sold for the debts, and furs, and cash; no outgoings being specified, except the goods sold Colonel Chambers, in whose bill there is an error of eight dollars; thirty yards of blue cloth, at four dollars, being entered $112 instead of $120.

When you furnish goods to an Indian agent for the use of the Indians, it would be proper to take a draft for the amount, and remit it to this office. Two hundred and eighty-nine dollars and forty-four cents appear to have been furnished the Indian agent, and no draft accompanied your invoice.

You state that 200 barrels of salt, a quantity of iron, brushes, turpentine, &c. were purchased by Major Woolley, at Pittsburg, and there is no invoice of them. There has been no account rendered of a purchase of iron. Invoices of the other articles are enclosed. I must beg the favor of you to adhere, in all respects, to the forms required by this office, and which, if you have never had them, shall be sent you. Errors, no matter how small, cause delays and give trouble. I must request your particular attention to the subject of your quarterly accounts, not only to render them punctually, but also to have them faultless and errorless; as far so, at least, as practicable.

I should like to hear of your prospects for trade; whether the factory promises to increase in its operations. I am averse to a credit business, except so far as your letter of instructions warrants. I mention this to guard you. Great caution is required. Quick returns are all-essential to a vigorous prosecution of the trade, and I look for them from each establishment. If factories are not well supported, it is evidence the Indians do not require them; and, it being a plan for their benefit, when they cease to require them it becomes a duty to send the means of administering comforts amongst other tribes who need help. I hope you will do well at Green Bay. I feel the force of your remarks on British traders, and hope they will soon be expelled. I am aware of their pertinacious adherence to a system, which nothing but exertions active and constant on your part can check; and if they cannot be controlled, their influence can be lessened. Are there no means to detect those who sell whiskey? If so, why not make examples of a few of them?

Such of the British traders as you recognise as having been hostile to us during the war, report to the agent, and transmit me copies of your remonstrance, which I will take care, in case he should omit or forget to act, to hand in to the War Department. Specify in your statement that the agent receives fifty dollars for issuing a license, and I will report upon it.

There is much risk in crediting goods to be carried amongst the Indians; the plan is a good one, if the risk were less. I have no objection to authorize you to send small parcels out to serve the Indians, never to amount to more than $2,000, and this sum to be in sundry hands; not to repeat an advance to any one till the previous one is fully adjusted. But issue none except on security.

NAMES AND PAY OF ALL THE PERSONS EMPLOYED IN THE INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 12, 1822.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 11, 1822.

Pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives, directing the Secretary of War to communicate to that House "the number of persons employed in the Indian Department as superintendents, factors, agents, sub-agents, interpreters, missionaries, teachers, mechanics, agriculturists, explorers, surveyors, messengers or expresses, with their names; what number of said persons hold appointments directly from the Government; what number from Governors of Territories, superintendents, and agents, with the pay and emoluments of each; also, the amount of moneys put into the hands of each Governor, superintendent, and agent, since the 1st of January, 1820, to defray the expenses of that department, and how it has been applied;" I have the honor to transmit, herewith, reports of the Second Auditor and of the Superintendent of Indian Trade.

In relation to the salaries of blacksmiths, it is proper to remark, that, although, in many instances, they appear to be high, yet it has been found impracticable to reduce them. I enclose a correspondence with General Mitchell, in relation to the smith and striker employed by him at the Creek agency, whose salary is higher than at any other place, which states his reasons for believing it could not be reduced. It is also proper to remark, that the sum of $10,000, appropriated for the civilization of the Indians, has been applied, by subscriptions, to such establishments as have been formed by benevolent societies or individuals for the purpose of their instruction; and in no instance have teachers or agriculturists been employed by this Department. For the details of the mode of the application of this sum, I would respectfully refer the House to the report of this Department to the President of the United States, communicated by him to Congress this session. [See No. 182.]

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Blacksmiths are employed, with the approbation of the Department of War, by the superintendents or agents for Indian affairs, in pursuance of stipulations contained in Indian treaties, or at the special request of the Indians, upon the best terms that can be obtained. The wages have, in several instances, been reduced during the last year, and also the number of persons employed, where it could be done with propriety. Besides the interpreters and blacksmiths mentioned in the preceding statement, who may be considered as regularly employed, there are others, particularly interpreters, temporarily employed in the Indian Department, in cases of emergency, or at Indian treaties, where no regular interpreter is at hand.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, April 8, 1822.

WILLIAM LEE, Auditor.

SIR:

CREEK AGENCY, October 24, 1820.

Enclosed, herewith, I have the honor to transmit an abstract of expenditure at this agency for the quarter ending on the 18th instant.

In your letter acknowledging the receipt of my abstract for the quarter ending the 18th July last, you intimate a desire that something might be deducted from the item for a "blacksmith and striker;" and, on a minute inquiry and estimate of the different items composing that charge, the result is unfavorable to any reduction. The following statement of particulars will the better enable you to decide on the propriety of this charge, viz:

Blacksmith, per quarter, -	-	-	-	-	$100 00
Board, washing, and lodging, $12 per month, -	-	-	-	-	36 00
						$136 00
Striker, per quarter, -	-	-	-	-	62 50
Board, washing, and lodging, $10 per month, -	-	-	-	-	30 00
						92 50
Shop and coal, per quarter, -	-	-	-	-	-	20 00
						$248 50

The present smith is a young man from the north, and has intimated his intention of not continuing at his present wages; and I am very confident that, if he withdraws, I cannot hire a white man in Georgia for less, if I can for that. I have a smith and striker of my own, (two black men,) employed at my place in Georgia; but I could not take less for them than the estimate. If, however, you think the charge too high, you will please to alter it to any amount you may deem reasonable, and I will endeavor to procure the men for that sum; and, if I fail, will then report the facts as they may exist.

I am, &c.

D. B. MITCHELL, Agent for Indian Affairs.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, January 19, 1822.

In compliance with your request of the 16th instant, I have the honor to enclose a statement showing the number of persons employed in our Indian relations, as far as relates to the trade department, &c. The amount stated to be drawn from the Treasury (viz: $20,050) overreaches the appropriation $350, which, if not provided for by law, will be paid out of the trade fund, and will therefore reduce the demand upon the Treasury to $19,700.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Superintendent of Indian Trade.

To the Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

17th CONGRESS.]

No. 189.

[2d Session.]

PROGRESS OF THE SOCIETY OF UNITED BRETHREN IN PROPAGATING THE GOSPEL
AMONG THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 10, 1822.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 9, 1822.

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 22d February last, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be collected, and communicated to the Senate at the commencement of the next session of Congress, the best information which he may be able to obtain relative to certain Christian Indians, and the lands intended for their benefit, on the Muskingum, in the State of Ohio, granted under an act of Congress of June 1, 1796, to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen; showing, as correctly as possible, the advance or decline of said Indians in numbers, morals, and intellectual endowments; whether the said lands have enured to their sole benefit; and, if not, to whom, in whole or in part, have such benefits accrued;" I transmit a report from the Secretary of War, with the accompanying documents.

JAMES MONROE.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of the 22d February last, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be collected, and communicated to the Senate at the commencement of the next session of Congress, the best information which he may be able to obtain relative to certain Christian Indians, and the lands intended for their benefit, on the Muskingum, in the State of Ohio, granted under an act of Congress of June 1, 1796, to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen; showing, as correctly as possible, the advance or decline of said Indians in numbers, morals, and intellectual endowments; whether the said lands have enured to their sole benefit; and, if not, to whom, in whole or in part, have such benefits accrued;" has the honor to lay before the President the accompanying documents, which have been prepared and transmitted to him, in compliance with a letter from this Department, of the 4th of March last, by the Rev. Lewis D. de Schweinitz, by order of the president and directors of the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen. These documents, it is believed, contain all the information required by the resolution of the Senate through this Department.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

BETHLEHEM, September, 1822.

The president and directors of the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, established at Bethlehem, Northampton county, Pennsylvania, beg leave most respectfully to represent:

That, in obedience to certain resolutions of the honorable the Senate of the United States, dated February 22, current year, transmitted to this society, under address of the president thereof, by the Secretary of the Senate, agreeably to the third resolution; and in due compliance with requisitions from the honorable Secretary of the War Department, directed severally to the Rev. John Heckewelder, and the Rev. Lewis D. de Schweinitz, both of them members of the board of directors of this society, the following statement of facts, concerning the subject-matter of the aforesaid resolutions of the honorable the Senate of the United States, together with the accompanying documents, is most respectfully submitted, with an humble request to lay the same before the President of the United States.

In order to meet the object of the second resolution of the honorable Senate aforesaid, requiring the best information relative to the Christian Indians formerly settled on the Muskingum, in the State of Ohio, and the lands intended for their benefit, in a certain grant referred to in the first resolution, which issued under an act of Congress dated June 1, 1796, conveying to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen three tracts of land, of four thousand acres each, to include the towns of Gnadenuhuten, Schoenbrunn, and Salem, on the Muskingum, in trust to said society, for the sole use of the Christian Indians formerly settled there, we beg leave, in the first place, to state, that the "summary of facts relating to the Indian missions of the United Brethren," drawn up by the Rev. John Heckewelder for the president and directors of this society, and herewith respectfully submitted, conveys a detailed view of the degree of success which, from the year 1742, to the year 1782, and since, had attended the endeavors of the United Brethren, not only to convert the Indian savages to Christianity, but likewise to introduce among the converts the arts and comforts of civilized life.

It, however, becomes proper to remark, in the outset, that this success of the United Brethren was, at all times, a limited one; and that they never attempted to convert or civilize whole nations. The inadequacy of their means, depending exclusively on the voluntary contributions of the members of their church, and such other friends as, without solicitation, thought proper to render them aid; and the tenor of their principles, which require a vital conversion from heathenism, not unto a professed belief in the Christian doctrine alone, but chiefly unto a practically moral Christian life and demeanor, at all times forbade extensive attempts, and necessarily confined their endeavors to planting and preserving one or more select communities of Christian Indians.

Hence, it is evident that they never pretended to such an extension of missions as some have been induced to represent, from overlooking the circumstance that the numerous stations of which their missionary histories make mention were not contemporary establishments, but successive abodes of one and the same community of persons.

It appears, from Mr. Heckewelder's statement, that a thriving establishment of Mohicans and Wampanoags was first formed under the auspices of the United Brethren, in the year 1742, about twenty-seven miles north of Bethlehem, in Pennsylvania; the various fates of which, augmented by an additional number of converts from the Delaware nation, are pointed out in the summary just cited, and at length in the printed histories of the United Brethren's Missions among the Indians, published by Loskiel and by John Heckewelder, to which we beg leave to refer.

Three times had this select community of Christian Indians, as will appear from the accounts just cited, successively attained an eminent degree of advancement in morals and mental endowments, as well as outward prosperity; and three times, successively, viz: in the year 1755, at Gnadenhutten, on the Lehigh; in the year 1763, at Nain and Wequetank, near Bethlehem; and in the year 1772, at Wyalusing, on the Susquehannah, were their flourishing settlements forcibly broken up, and they constrained to leave all their improvements, to fly from their acquired comforts, and to recommence in the wilderness. Such repeated and fatal checks, it might well have been expected, could not but entirely extinguish, in the minds of Indians recently inspired with a taste for civilization, all further desire of improvement.

This, however, was not the case. Neither the missionaries active among them, nor the Christian Indians themselves, whose number continued gradually to increase, suffered themselves to be deterred from again erecting three very flourishing colonies; when, after having been forced to leave Wyalusing, they were at length, as they believed, permanently settled by the great council of the Delaware nation, in the year 1772, on the banks of the Muskingum, and that land given to them and their successors forever. Here it was that, in a short time, this community of Christian Indians attained a most hopeful degree of prosperity; the reality and degree of which, as described and attested by Mr. Heckewelder, was a matter of general notoriety at the time.

The number of Christian Indians belonging to the three establishments, at Gnadenhutten, Schoenbrunn, and Salem, on the Muskingum, when in their most flourishing condition, (which may be assumed as the most successful period of the labors of the United Brethren,) somewhat exceeded 400 souls, including women and children; it is, consequently, upon this number that the effects become observable of that almost unexampled succession of disasters which befel them, and which, following in the train of the revolutionary war, have in a measure not yet ceased, whereby a reduction of their number to less than one-half has been brought about, together with that manifest deterioration in their external and internal situation which we so deeply deplore.

Confiding in the solemn declaration of Congress, at the commencement of the war, "that all such Indians, whether nations, or communities forming parts of a nation, that would sit still and not take up the hatchet against the Americans, should have all the lands they held confirmed and secured to them after peace," the Christian Indians on Muskingum, whose convictions forbade their taking any share whatever in the contest, continued peaceably to pursue their agricultural occupations, (having almost entirely abandoned the chase,) and to improve in every respect.

This conduct of theirs greatly exasperated the hostile tribes, and more especially that part of the Delawares opposed to the United States; and was not much less displeasing to the British Government. Both the Christian Indians and their missionaries thus became objects of suspicion and harassing persecutions; until, after six years of difficulties and sufferings, which, however, only partially hindered their advancement, although they diminished their number, by inducing such as were not firmly rooted in their devotion to Christianity to fall off, the British and hostile Indians came upon them in August, 1781, and entirely broke up their flourishing settlements, by forcibly removing them and their missionaries to Sandusky, where they were nearly left to perish with hunger, having been obliged to leave their promising crops on Muskingum on the fields; and at length deprived them of their teachers, who, under pretence of being spies in the service of Congress, were carried prisoners to Detroit.

This, together with the horrid transaction on the Muskingum—whither want of provisions had induced about one-third of the Christian Indians to repair, in order to collect some from their fields in the spring of 1782, who were there surprised by a lawless band of Americans under the guise of friendship, and upwards of ninety of them murdered in cold blood—produced a total dispersion of the unhappy remnants, and would have put a final period to the mission of the United Brethren, had they not succeeded, by the permission of the British Government, which had acknowledged the innocence of the missionaries, in collecting a considerable number of their dispersed flock near Detroit, and establishing themselves, for a time, on the river Huron; whence, after peace had taken place, they emigrated to Cayuga, attempting to regain their former advantageous position. From this shock, however, the mission never fully recovered, and not a few never returned from their dispersion.

As soon as peace had been concluded, the agents of the Brethren's missions at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, exerted themselves to secure to these unhappy remnants of the Christian Indians their undisputed title to the lands occupied by them on Muskingum, previous to their forcible removal by the British Indians; and accordingly prayed Congress, in a memorial signed 28th October, 1783, to reserve unto them the three towns and circumjacent land given them by the great council of the Delaware nation in 1772. This memorial was favorably reported upon in March, 1784, and, in consequence, in an ordinance of Congress passed 20th of May 1785, a clause was inserted, "that the said towns, and so much of the adjoining lands as, in the judgment of the geographer of the United States, may be sufficient for them, together with the buildings, &c., shall be reserved for the sole use of the Christian Indians formerly settled there."

In pursuance hereof, the agents for the Brethren's missions began to exert themselves to effect the return of the Christian Indians, or that remnant of them which their missionaries had been able to collect, to their favorite former seats on the Muskingum. The necessary permission of the British Government having been obtained, they were carried over Lake Erie to Cayuga, in April, 1786, as before related, where they were obliged to remain, both on account of a total want of provision for proceeding, and of renewed rumors of an approaching savage war.

On a representation of their distressed state, laid before Congress by Bishop Ettwein, through the instrumentality of Charles Thompson, Esq., Secretary of Congress, that honorable body passed a resolution, directing Lieutenant Colonel Harmar to furnish the Christian Indians at Fort McIntosh with five hundred bushels of Indian corn, one hundred blankets, and other necessaries. Unfortunately, this benevolence of Congress could not be carried into effect, notwithstanding the active friendship of the gentlemen concerned, as it proved impossible to bring on the Christian Indians far enough; the reports which reached them of the threats of the murderers of their friends intending to complete their destruction filling their minds with the utmost apprehension. It was believed that these threats were uttered in hopes of thereby preventing the return of the Christian Indians upon their land, and thus extinguishing the reservation thereof in the ordinance of May 20, 1785, as by this time these lands began to be an object of cupidity.

Representations of these impediments thrown into the way of the Christian Indians having again been submitted to Congress, together with an exposition of the nature of the fears operating upon these persecuted sufferers, that honorable body, in order at once to cut off all hopes of the aforementioned unprincipled persons of ever acquiring the lands, even if they should succeed, by their threats, in preventing the return of the Christian Indians, determined, by an ordinance dated 27th July, 1787, "that the property of ten thousand acres, adjoining to the former settlements of the Christian Indians, should be vested in the Moravian Brethren at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, or a society of the said Brethren, for civilizing the Indians and promoting Christianity, in trust, and for the uses expressed in the ordinance of May 20, 1785, including Killbuck and his descendants, and the nephew and descendants of the late Captain White-eyes, Delaware chiefs, who have distinguished themselves as friends of the cause of America."

The summary of facts hereunto subjoined fully explains the manner in which the latter clause respecting Killbuck and White-eyes, and their families, came to be attached to the above ordinance; and it will be proper here to remark, that Killbuck, previous to the new settlement on the Muskingum, joined the community of the Christian

Indians; that the nephew of Captain White-eyes never appeared to claim any participation; that one of the sons of Captain White-eyes was killed before the ordinance was carried into effect; and that the family of Killbuck, and the widow of the other son of White-eyes, and her children, are, to the present moment, among those Christian Indians now living on the land.

Agreeably to the suggestion contained in the aforesaid ordinance of Congress, and with a particular view of thus facilitating a legal tenure of the lands intended for the Christian Indians, a society was formed at Bethlehem, by members of the United Brethren, by the title of "Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," which met for the first time September 21, 1787, and was afterwards duly incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, by an act dated February 27, 1788, and, in like manner, subsequently, by the States of New Jersey, Ohio, and New York.

Bishop John Ettwein, who for many years successively was elected president of this society, together with Rev. John Heckewelder, who had resided for a long time as a missionary among the Christian Indians, immediately after the formation of the aforementioned society, applied to the Board of Treasury of the United States, as they had been advised, for further information concerning the survey of said lands, and the other necessary steps. In a conference of that honorable board with them, as appears from minutes thereof taken down by Bishop Ettwein, and by a relation of Mr. Heckewelder's, in a memorial herewith further submitted, concerning the origin of the Indian claim to the land, these gentlemen had an opportunity of fully explaining to the members of the honorable Board of Treasury the manner in which the society contemplated executing the trust to be conferred upon them; all which met the full approbation of the board. And it was agreed that, besides the six hundred and sixty-six and two-thirds acres allotted to the plat of each town, a quantity of ten thousand acres, making in the whole twelve thousand acres, should be surveyed for the society, under the ordinance of 27th July, 1787, and the manner of running the lines likewise determined upon.

It appears, by the correspondence between Bishop Ettwein and Mr. Hutchins, the geographer of the United States, that subsequently difficulties arose from another ordinance of Congress, relating to the army lands, as to the manner of survey agreed upon with the Board of Treasury. This occasioned the president and directors of the Society for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen to present a new memorial to Congress, praying "that the geographer be directed, without loss of time, to proceed to survey the three tracts as he shall find most convenient for the society; and that the said society may have the preference in purchasing the intermediate spaces between the tracts, they paying therefor at the same rate with other persons."

This memorial effected the ordinance of the United States in Congress assembled, dated September 3, 1788, herewith submitted, confirming the "former ordinances of May 20, 1785, and July 27, 1787, determining the quantity and manner of survey; accepting the offer of the society to advance the expenses of surveying the three tracts, on condition that they be repaid either in money or land; and granting the prayer of the memorial, by ordering the survey as speedily as possible, and the return of plats, that deeds may be issued for the same to the society; and authorizing the Board of Treasury to convey to the said society such intermediate spaces between the three tracts (not infringing prior contracts) as they may desire, upon their paying therefor at the usual rate."

All the attempts of this society to effect the actual survey of the lands thus solemnly confirmed to them, and the consequent resettlement thereof by the Christian Indians, were completely frustrated by the threatening prospect of a new Indian war, which, as appears from the correspondence and the statement of Mr. Heckewelder, (marked B,) heretofore referred to, (that gentleman being employed on the part of the society for the purpose,) totally prevented any surveys being made at that time.

Meanwhile, the hostile Indians, desirous of preventing the return of the Christian Indians to the Muskingum, made use of all manner of persuasions and threats to deter them from proceeding thither; filled their minds with new reports of the intention of the white settlers on the Ohio to murder them; and, finally, forbade their proceeding, absolutely, and forced them to retreat to the north side of Lake Erie, where they were glad to find protection from the British Government, and were furnished with land to settle upon.

The Society for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, understanding that an apparent misapprehension of this untoward state of things had caused the honorable Secretary of State, under the new constitution of these United States, which had in the mean time taken place, in his report to the President of the United States, read in the House of Representatives November 10, 1791, to consider the reservation made for the Christian Indians by the ordinance aforesaid avoided, on account of their assumed emigration beyond the limits of the United States, proper representations of the real state of the case were immediately forwarded in writing to Hon. Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State, by Bishop Ettwein, accompanied by a distinct exposition of the views of the society of the manner in which they still hoped to render the grant of Congress available to the Christian Indians; and an humble petition was at the same time presented to Congress, setting forth the same case, and humbly praying for the confirmation of the ordinance of September 3, 1788, and the issue of the necessary warrants for surveying the lands as soon as practicable.

This petition was referred to the committee appointed to bring in a land office bill, consisting of Messrs. Boudinot, White, and Williamson. Bishop Ettwein appeared before this committee to give the required information, and presented a memorial explaining both the circumstances heretofore stated, and the views of the society of the manner in which they intended to render the land of use to the Christian Indians. These views, thus distinctly stated, were the same which had before been submitted to the Board of Treasury in the year 1787, as related by Mr. Heckewelder in his statement B, and are chiefly the following:

1. That as many of the Christian Indians as could be induced to come and live on the land, together with Captain Killbuck and his descendants, and the family of Captain White-eyes, as mentioned in the ordinance, should be furnished with as much land as they chose for cultivation, as long as they chose to live there, and conform to the rules of the Christian community made by themselves.

2. That the land not wanted by the Indians should be settled upon leases by white tenants, and the proceeds thereof faithfully applied by the society for the good of these Indians or their successors, in providing them, and also other believers, with missionaries, schools, books, &c.

The report of the aforesaid committee upon these representations, in December, 1791, was, "that the land in question shall be further reserved for the occupation of the Christian Indians."

A general Indian war intervening, all further proceedings were necessarily suspended until December, 1795, when, a new land office bill committee having been appointed by the honorable House of Representatives, consisting of Messrs. Sitgreaves, Hartly, and Swanwick, Bishop Ettwein did not delay to offer a new petition in the name of the society, dated January 8, 1796, which was referred to the committee aforesaid.

In a brief account of the state of the case, submitted to this committee by Bishop Ettwein, he most explicitly repeats the statement of the intentions of the society as to the manner of administering the lands for the benefit of the Christian Indians as above. Being struck by the expression in the report of the former committee, (1791,) that the land be reserved for the occupation of the Christian Indians; the experience of the mean time, and the increasing mistrust of the Indians, together with their well-known horror for the spot where their relations have been murdered, having by this time rendered it extremely problematical whether it would be possible to induce many of them to return to the Muskingum, particularly as the British Government had, during these negotiations, granted them a considerable tract of land for permanent seats; Bishop Ettwein took the liberty to state expressly to the present committee, as Mr. Heckewelder testifies had always been previously stated, that it would be precarious in the extreme to hold the land, if the possession must rest upon the occupancy by the Christian Indians. He represented the great reduction of their number, in consequence of which but a small portion of the tracts could, in the most favorable event, be occupied by them, as well as the possibility that, after all, they would not be persuaded, generally, to remove thither; moreover, that they might not be able to maintain themselves there against the private enmity of the whites, especially if these could hope to get the land by their removal: considerations which, as was generally understood by the society, had mainly suggested to Congress, in 1787, the plan of vesting the land in a legally established society, as the only means of securing to the Christian Indians, permanently, the advantages intended to be conferred.

These representations appear to have met the approbation of the committee; for, in consequence, that committee reported favorably; and an act of Congress, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," was passed, and approved by the President of the United States on the 1st June, 1796, directing "the surveyor general to cause to be surveyed the three tracts set apart by the ordinance of Congress of 3d September, 1788, and that patent be issued to the society mentioned in the caption for the said three tracts, in trust, for the uses and purposes in the said ordinance set forth."

Great exertions, and at a very great expense of this society, for which they never received any reimbursement, were now made, early in the spring of 1797, and most cordially assisted by General Rufus Putnam, the surveyor general, to effect the actual survey; of which Mr. Heckewelder, who acted as the agent of this society, gives a detailed account in his statement B; and after the plats thereof had been properly returned, the grant or patent (being the one called for by the first resolution of the honorable Senate) issued, under the hand and seal of the President of the United States, dated 4th February, 1798, and was transmitted to the president and directors of this society.

Measures were now instantly taken, in accordance with the plans submitted to the different committees of Congress, to carry the grant confirmed by this act into effect, and to render it available for the objects of the trust; both in using every effort to induce at least a part of the Christian Indians to settle on the land, and in rendering the surplus of use to them in the manner originally contemplated, by settling the same with white tenants of good character, and applying the proceeds for the advantage of the objects of the trust, as had been agreed upon. In fact, no other way could have been well devised, as the nature of the grant was understood to be such as to put any appropriation of the land to individuals, much less any partial alienation, entirely out of the question.

The difficulties and expenses resulting from the latter part of the plan are detailed in the statement of Mr. Heckewelder. We shall beg leave to recur to this part of the subject after we have rendered an account of the exertions used to induce the Christian Indians to return on the land now secured to their use.

During the course of the bloody war which terminated in 1796, the community of Christian Indians, who, without exception, took no manner of share in that war, had gratefully accepted the protection afforded them against the persecution and threats of the hostile tribes, by the British Government, on the north side of the lakes; and, as has been before related, after having found a temporary refuge at the mouth of the river Detroit, emptying into Lake Erie, they were at length induced, in the year 1792, permanently to settle on an extensive grant offered to them on the river Thames, which was formally surveyed for them in January, 1794. They here built the town of Fairfield, which, after some time, assumed a very promising aspect, although the effects of the incredible disasters that had befallen them, and especially of the repeated utter destruction of all the fruits of their former industry, began to appear in a diminution of their zeal for advancing in civilization.

Mr. Heckewelder, in his statement of facts heretofore referred to, testifies to both these circumstances, and recites the prominent causes which began to operate deleteriously on the minds of a number among them; causes which had become more operative in the year 1798, when he again visited them.

Nor is it to be wondered at that such an unexampled succession of untoward events, almost sufficient to make a colony of civilized whites despair of ultimate success, should have finally operated in a discouraging way upon Indians but recently reclaimed from the forest. In addition, the vicinity of immoral whites, in their present situation, and the utter want of authority in the missionaries to prevent seductions of the young people, especially as regards liquor, could not fail to produce bad effects.

It was therefore highly acceptable to the missionaries when Mr. Heckewelder appeared in 1798, and made them and the Christian Indians acquainted with the final success of this society in securing to their use the lands on Muskingum. The senior missionary, Zeisberger, greatly respected by the Indians, immediately resolved to remove thither, in hopes of being followed by a considerable number. But the great majority of them, nevertheless, decidedly preferred remaining on the land granted to them by the British Government. This was most especially the case with the majority of the old stock and their descendants; that is to say, the true remnants of the Christian Indians formerly settled on Muskingum, in whose breasts mistrust on account of the murder of their relatives continued to rankle, and had increased during the ten years of unsuccessful attempts to re-establish them there, as it was impossible to make them fully comprehend the nature of the difficulties that had intervened. In consequence, only a few families of these could be induced to follow the missionaries Zeisberger and Mortimer, when actually, in the fall of 1798, removing to Muskingum; and two of the most respectable of these afterwards went with other missionaries to Wabash, where Joshua, the most distinguished man of the whole community of Christian Indians, was inhumanly murdered, at the instigation of the noted Prophet, and others returned to Fairfield. The rest of those who moved to Muskingum were such as had joined the Christian Indians subsequently to their forcible removal from thence in 1781, who formed a new stock, which, generally speaking, had never attained that degree of firmness in Christian principles, and that attachment to civilized life, which had distinguished the older stock. Among them, however, were, as before mentioned, Captain Killbuck and his sons, and part of the family of White-eyes. The former maintained the most respectable standing to the close of his life, in 1811.

It must therefore be observed, that the main part of the remnant of the Christian Indians, for whose benefit the land was intended, remained at Fairfield, in Canada, where they still are, to the number of about one hundred and fifty persons, under the care of two pious missionaries.

Inasmuch as it may justly come within the scope of the information required by the honorable Senate of the United States to state the present condition of this major part of the Christian Indians under the care of the United Brethren, we conceive it due to truth to say, that, in addition to the facts already adduced, various unhappy circumstances have, since the year 1802 or 1803, combined to weaken the influence of the missionaries on the younger part of them. Besides the fatal shock their advance in civilization received by the murder on Muskingum, and their subsequent unsettled abode, together with the operation of the same causes which have proved so detrimental to those on Muskingum, the Christian Indians at Fairfield have suffered mainly by the bad consequences of the system pursued by the British Government, of supplying them with certain necessaries, in a manner which requires their personal attendance, together with the savages, at a distance from their teachers; by the influx of whites, whose seductions to intoxication cannot be duly resisted; and, above all, by the deplorable circumstance that a number of their young people were partly induced, partly forced, under the pretext of being considered British subjects, to participate in the late war, all the endeavors of the missionaries to the contrary notwithstanding; (although none did so who were not previously excluded from the Christian fellowship of the rest;) which eventuated in the total destruction of Fairfield by the American army in 1814. It is true they are now recovering from this severe shock, and have built a new town, at some distance from the former, and more out of the way of temptations, which they have named New Fairfield; nevertheless, they have not yet regained their former prosperity, and, we are constrained to add, their former character; a deterioration of morals being still observable, though by no means general among them.

We beg leave now to return to that part of the Christian Indians who actually came to reside on the Muskingum in the year 1798, consisting of seven families, (together, thirty souls.) They were furnished with the means of effecting their removal by this society, and with provisions and other necessaries, until their plantations of the spring of 1799 yielded them abundant harvests.

Pursuant to the plan of the society, one of the three tracts was entirely placed at their disposal; and they chose the northern or Schoenbrunn tract, upon which they established themselves, and built a small town called Goshen. The commencement of this establishment was auspicious: for a year or two the Christian Indians here, under the care of their respected teachers, appeared to embrace with renewed zeal the advantages afforded them; they began to recultivate the fields, were assiduous in their duties, and attentive scholars in the schools. Their number was augmented by some new converts from among the neighboring heathen, and a family or two joined them from Fairfield; so that, at the close of the year 1800, they amounted to about sixty souls. In the following year, the Brethren there were induced, by the pressing solicitations of the Delawares on the Wabash, to send a missionary thither, accompanied by some of the best of their flock from Goshen, who hoped thus to gain their relations there; and it was not till after some time that it became apparent that these solicitations were part of a plan to draw all the Christian Indians thither for their destruction.

This removal caused a diminution of the number at Goshen, never replenished; a number which, from 1801 to the close of 1810, continued vacillating between forty-five and thirty-five souls; some returning to Fairfield, as before observed, and several of the most respectable completing their course here below by a happy death. From that year to the end of the year 1820, their number was still further reduced by deaths and removals; so that, at the close of this year, there were but twenty-six persons left.

Mr. John Heckewelder, who resided on the spot, as the agent of this society, from the commencement of the settlement to the fall of 1810, and consequently had the best opportunity of observation, dates the causes which in a particular manner combined to produce a deplorable decline of morality, and a consequent indifference towards an advance in civilization, among the small community at Goshen, from the spring of 1802.

The whole idea of planting the Christian Indian community upon the lands in question was predicated upon a hope that they would there be perfectly secluded from all connexion with other white persons, except such whose own state of morality, industry, and piety would be a good example; at least, it was confidently expected that such would be the case for a sufficient length of time to render the attachment of the Indians to an agricultural and perfectly civilized life altogether habitual; for experience had taught the United Brethren that no Indian community can durably maintain its morality and standing, if exposed to the bad example, and to the temptations and incitements, which unprincipled whites may conceive it their interest to hold out to them.

On this account, it had, from the beginning, been the plan of this society to rent out that part of the land not occupied by the Indians to such persons only as, from being members of the United Brethren's church, were sufficiently known to them, or to other approved characters. It was, however, found but partially practicable to procure such tenants; and the society had the misfortune to be grossly deceived in this respect, in several instances; while the unexampled rapidity with which, after the year 1800, the State of Ohio was settled by an incredible influx from all parts, baffling every calculation which possibly could have been made during the period of negotiation with Congress concerning the land, rendered abortive the hope of keeping this Indian settlement properly secluded. On the contrary, Goshen had scarcely been established before the Christian Indians there found themselves thickly surrounded by white people, (more especially as this society could not muster the necessary funds to purchase the intermediate spaces between the three tracts, as had been intended,) and soon began to feel the deleterious effects of their vicinity.

No endeavors of the missionaries to restrain the attempts to bring that certain banè of all improvement, spirituous liquors, among them, proved successful, though for a time backed by an express law of the State of Ohio forbidding it.

The energetic measures of Zeisberger to carry this law into effect, on the contrary, rendered it so offensive, that it was soon repealed. In consequence, from that time, instances of intoxication began to be frequent, and the church discipline by which they were punished less regarded than heretofore; although Mr. Heckewelder testifies that, up to the fall of 1810, nothing like a general prevalence of that destructive vice was observable—a statement corroborated by the reverend Benjamin Mortimer, in a letter herewith submitted. According to the account of the missionaries in the latest times, the evil seems, however, to have increased since that period.

But, unhappily, another powerful cause of ruin now became operative, and greatly weakened the influence of the missionaries upon the minds of the deluded members of their flock, by undermining that perfect confidence which they had hitherto enjoyed; while, pursuant to the testimonies of Messrs. Heckewelder and Mortimer, it greatly tended to augment their proneness to indulge in intoxication.

This cause unfortunately emanated from the very benefit intended them by the grant of land. Interested and unprincipled people, taking advantage of the impossibility of satisfactorily explaining to Indians the nature of the tenure by which this society held the land, did not cease to infect their minds with insinuations that the United Brethren were cheating them out of its enjoyment. In addition to the lamentable effect such false representations could scarcely fail of in weakening their confidence in their best friends, who, in the most disinterested manner, and at an enormous loss to themselves, were striving to render the land useful to them, in the only manner in which they conceived it practicable, the idea insidiously and continually held out to the Indians by these men that they were rich, and need not work if it were not for the United Brethren, who withheld from them their due, necessarily repressed that spirit of industry which the missionaries zealously strove to excite, and rendered them more or less discontented.

The consonant representations of Messrs. Heckewelder and Mortimer will prove to what a degree these insinuations, and the other causes recited, operated to bring about a decline; and to these, and the other checks of their industry, alluded to by Mr. Heckewelder, must be ascribed the failure of the hopes of this society concerning them.

Thus it happened, that, with the exception of a few individuals, who, to this day, as far as we know, continue to conduct themselves as true Christians, the small community left at Goshen lost that character which made it possible for the United Brethren to continue their labors among them; and some of them having, in the summer of last year (1821) removed to Fairfield, the last missionaries were constrained to return to Bethlehem in October, 1821. There now remain upon the land only nineteen or twenty persons, chiefly the sons of Killbuck and their families, who are, however, still attended to by the minister of a small congregation of United Brethren settled in that vicinity.

It now remains for us, in obedience to the latter part of the second resolution of the honorable the Senate of the United States, to set forth the manner in which this society have hitherto actually endeavored to discharge the trust devolved upon them by Congress, and the results thereof, in order to furnish the necessary information "whether the said lands have enured to the sole benefit of the Christian Indians, &c.; and, if not, to whom, in whole or in part, have such benefits accrued."

Agreeably to the plan submitted to Congress, before the act of 1796 passed, of rendering that part of the land not occupied by the Indians available to them, (as, among the rest, appears from the subjoined letter of Bishop John Ettwein to General St. Clair,) the directors of this society exerted themselves, as soon as the survey, &c. had been completed, to procure tenants of good character to settle thereon, after the Indians had chosen the northern tract of 4,000 acres for their own exclusive use. Before this society, however, could hope to see their plan put in execution, it became necessary (that whole neighborhood being then an unsettled wilderness) to cut out roads to the nearest settlements; to throw causeways over the morasses, in order to render the approach with wagons practicable; and to erect temporary mills, &c., to meet the first necessities of the expected settlers. Buildings of different kinds, for the residence and convenience of the agent, who was to superintend and direct the whole, and for general purposes, had to be erected; and all those difficulties and expenses to be encountered which attend a new settlement in the wilderness. It became necessary to procure workmen from a great distance, and provisions were to be brought seventy miles, on pack-horses: all which caused immense expenses to this society.

In the year 1799, however, a number of white colonists began to move upon the lands, and to settle upon the two tracts Guadenhutten and Salem, chiefly on the former, or middlemost of the three, establishing two settlements—one on the east, the other on the west side of the Muskingum. Farms, of from fifty to a hundred acres, and upwards, were laid out for each tenant, and leases agreed upon between the society and the tenants, such as were conceived most advantageous for the purposes of the trust. These were universally given for a term of twenty-one years, without rent for the first year, and a stipulated rent of eight dollars per hundred acres for the next six years; of sixteen dollars per hundred acres for the next seven years; and of twenty-four dollars per hundred acres for the last seven years of the term. By a particular clause in each lease, the tenants were prohibited keeping shops, taverns, and distilleries, and from selling liquors; and were further bound to pursue no means of support but such as could not interfere with or injure the principal objects of the society in civilization of the Indians; and to demean themselves, in every respect, as friends to these objects.

It was conceived that such terms, on so long a lease, made renewable to the tenant in preference, in case his conduct corresponded with the views of the society, would induce such persons only to engage in the business who were friendly to the purpose, and who would calculate upon a permanent stay; on which account it was further stipulated that the tenants be bound to erect good and durable dwelling-houses, barns, stables, and out-houses, and plant an orchard of at least sixty apple-trees, of the best kinds, near them; which improvements the society bound itself to purchase from the tenants, agreeably to an equitable valuation thereof, on expiration of the term, or any previous determination of the lease.

It will appear, by a reference to Mr. Heckewelder's statement, how it happened that the expectations of the society, of thus creating an efficient revenue, were in a great measure frustrated by the unfaithfulness of a number among the tenants; the agent having been under the necessity, for want of better, in some instances, to admit persons whose characters were not sufficiently ascertained; not to mention that, after all, it was found impracticable to procure tenants for more than a small proportion of the land, the rest lying untenanted to this day; and, in fact, that a considerable portion was not of a tenantable nature. Not a few of the tenants procured, after having occupied their farms for a number of years, suffering large arrears to accumulate, found it their interest to quit them without paying their debts, and to seek their fortune elsewhere. The society thus lost large sums, and was obliged to re-tenant the forsaken farms, without much choice; while it is notorious, as experience has since demonstrated, that no considerable revenue can be expected from rented lands in the western countries, as is apparent, among the rest, from the testimony adduced by Mr. Heckewelder concerning the school land reservations in the State of Ohio. At the present moment, the society, as before hinted, has not been able to rent out more than one-fifth part of the land, the residue being still altogether unproductive.

Until the year 1814, the whole of these lands, granted for the benefit of the Christian Indians by Congress, was considered free from taxation. In that year, however, the Legislature of the State of Ohio thought proper to lay a tax thereon, as on other land, which has since been yearly continued upon the whole 12,000 acres; including, likewise, the Goshen or Schoenbrunn tract, set apart for the sole use and occupation of the Indians, and no tenant admitted thereon, accordingly.

This society had been led to believe that the nature of their tenure involved freedom from taxation, or that at least only such parts of the land as were under lease would be subjected thereto; and had accordingly provided for this, by making it a condition of the leases that the tenants should be held to pay all taxes possibly to be levied on the farms.

Finding, however, in the aforesaid year 1814, that taxes were levied upon the whole, and demanded from them, even for the Goshen tract, which, with the accruing interest of the moneys borrowed by the society to render the grant available, rendered the hope of an efficient revenue from this trust estate applicable to the purposes of the trust altogether desperate, they conceived themselves authorized (especially after their petition for relief had been rejected by the Legislature of Ohio) to alleviate their burden by granting some leases upon the Goshen tract likewise, taking care to keep at a sufficient distance from the parts actually occupied by the reduced number of Indians.

The new leases thus granted were upon new terms, viz: after an equitable valuation of the land to be leased, as in a state of nature, a yearly rent, for the term of thirty-three years, was stipulated, equal to the interest at six per centum of this valuation sum, and the society no longer under obligation to purchase the improvements at the expiration of the term.

It will surely not appear strange, upon due consideration of the circumstances just stated, that this society at no time received any thing from the land to enable them to fulfil the purposes of the trust, further than was effected by affording the Indians on the land the free use of as much of the land as they wanted. The interest of the moneys borrowed, together with the taxes, far exceeded any revenue that has hitherto been attainable.

The abstracts of the receipts and disbursements of this society for the lands on Muskingum, herewith respectfully submitted, together with the vouchers, will, we trust, afford a most convincing proof of this assertion.

The sum of all receipts, as appears from this account, which the society has had from the land, from the 21st August, 1801, to the 21st August, 1822, together with simple interest, accounted upon each year's receipts, amounts to $9,998 58½. In this sum are included all the rents which have become due, with interest upon them, as actual receipts; although it appears from the exhibit that, on the said 21st August, 1822, there was still due, and unpaid, no less a sum than $1,978 of such rents; and it is feared no small proportion thereof will never be recovered. On the other hand, the disbursements incurred by this society, (as per the same account,) in originally obtaining and securing the land, in effecting the survey thereof, (which the honorable Congress, by its ordinance of September 3, 1788, had agreed to repay,) and completing its settlement and improvement; and further, the direct allowances of provision, clothing, agricultural and other implements, medicines, school books, &c. to the Indians at Goshen; together, thirdly, with the expenses incurred in providing them with missionaries and schooling, and the simple interest on each year's disbursement, amounted, on the 21st of August, 1822, to the sum of $43,556, exceeding the receipts in the sum of $32,587 50¾.

We beg leave to remark, in addition, that only such disbursements have been entered into the account here referred to as can be proved by subjoined vouchers, such as the nature of the case admits of; while we aver, from the books, that a much greater sum appears to have been actually disbursed. It must be further observed, that, among the yearly necessities, stated in the account as for the use and support of the missionaries, are included a great variety of articles furnished by them to the Indians, which could not be separated from those consumed by the missionaries themselves, because they were given to them as the occasion demanded, and not separately accounted; and further, that in the account referred to, no other expenses are included besides those incurred for the missionaries and school at Goshen only, without taking into account the far greater disbursements of the United Brethren, and this society, for the remnant of the Christian Indians formerly settled on Muskingum, who continued to reside at Fairfield, and who, as has been shown, were objects of the trust as well as the others. Nay, further: to show how very far any part of the revenue of these lands granted by Congress is from having accrued to any person or persons other than the objects of the trust, we beg leave to refer to the exhibit, which, compared with the abstracted account before submitted, proves that the disbursements of this society for the land only, and for direct allowances afforded the Indians at Goshen, altogether exclusive of the expense of providing them with missionaries and schools, exceed the total sum of receipts had from the land in the sum of $15,840 10½, accounting simple interest both on receipts and disbursements from year to year.

The expiration of the original leases, which were granted from the year 1800 to the year 1806, each for the term of twenty-one years, now beginning to take place since 1821, this involves, according to the condition of those leases, the annual payment of the awards to the lessees for the improvements they have made; and, as it appears that these awards, compared with the actual state of the improvements, are by no means in favor of the society, the annual disbursements, until the year 1827, threaten to be increased to an appalling amount, as those of the two last years have already been unreasonably swelled by this circumstance.

We further beg leave to remark, that we humbly conceive that neither the salaries of the agents employed by the society, (if any,) nor the allowances of necessaries to the missionaries and their families, as stated in the account, can be considered exorbitant. As long as the Rev. John Heckewelder acted in the capacity of agent, he never required a salary, and was supplied with necessaries only, as is invariably the case with the missionaries. After his age induced him to return from his post, his successors in the agency received at first a salary of $160 per annum, which was afterwards reduced to $60.

In conclusion, we now beg leave to sum up the information attempted to be conveyed by the preceding statement of facts under the following heads, as direct answers to the inquiries ordered by the resolutions of the honorable Senate of the United States; and most respectfully to represent:

1. That the lands in question were not originally a gift of Congress, but a reservation of the property of the Christian Indians, who had been forcibly constrained to leave them by the enemy during the revolutionary war.
2. That the title thereof was vested legally in the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, with a view to destroy the hopes of those who desired to prevent the return of the Christian Indians by threats, and thus render void the reservation made to them, in order to possess themselves thereof; and with an express understanding that this society should endeavor to render the land of use to the Indians, by enabling it to furnish them with teachers, schools, books, and other means of civilization.
3. That the Christian Indians formerly settled there had, previous to their forcible removal in 1781, attained a very great degree of prosperity; had nearly become an agricultural people; had made the most flattering advancements in mental and moral endowments; and bore a character for piety and good behavior equal to the most sanguine expectations; forming a Christian community of somewhat more than four hundred souls.
4. That a series of unexampled disasters; the horrid murder of nearly one-third of their before reduced number; their subsequent total dispersion for a time; the death of some leading and prominent characters among them, together with the want of a fixed abode for nearly six years, while vainly striving to regain their former position, gradually undermined the fruits of their previous advances, and imperceptibly led on a decline.
5. That, notwithstanding the exertions of the United Brethren, the majority of the remnant of them could not be brought to return to the Muskingum after the land had been finally secured in 1798, but remained in Canada, upon lands in the mean time granted them by the British Government.
6. That at no time a greater number than from sixty to sixty-five souls, and among them but few of the old stock of Christian Indians formerly settled there, ever came to live upon the land after it was given to this society in trust.
7. That, among these, to the time of his death, in 1811, was Captain Killbuck, (christened William Henry,) and to this day are his sons and their families.
8. That the nephew of Captain White-eyes, mentioned in the patent, never appeared to participate in the grant; that one of his sons was killed before it took effect; that the other actually, for a time, lived with the Christian Indians at Goshen, but voluntarily left them; that his widow and children afterwards returned, and continue to reside there, enjoying the assistance of this society with the rest.
9. That the rapid and unforeseen increase of white settlements around them; the want of authority in the missionaries to prevent the introduction of spirituous liquors; and, above all, the mistrust instilled into the minds of the Indians against their missionaries on account of the lands; together with the idea, disseminated by designing men, of their being rich enough, and, consequently, not standing in need of industry, wrought upon the greater part of the remaining Indians in such a manner, in conjunction with the other causes before recited, as to bring about a decided decline in their moral and mental endowments, while their number dwindled down to twenty souls now only remaining at Goshen.
10. That this society, agreeably to the plans previously submitted to different committees of Congress, and the former Board of Treasury, and approved by them, placed the northernmost tract of 4,000 acres, selected by themselves, entirely at the disposal of the Indians settling at Goshen; and that their missionaries exerted themselves to the utmost to bring them back to those habits of industry and morality which had distinguished the Christian Indians before their dispersion.

11. That as great a part of the two other tracts as was practicable was, agreeably to the aforesaid plans, tenanted with white settlers, on long leases.

12. That the receipts of rent from these tenants, at no time, in any measure sufficed to pay the interest of the moneys borrowed by this society to defray the expenses of surveying and improving the lands, in order to render them productive; much less additionally to pay the taxes levied thereon, since 1814, by the State of Ohio.

13. That this society, notwithstanding, did, without intermission, fulfil all the purposes of the trust, by its own means and exertions; that it, and the United Brethren generally, did, unto the close of last year, furnish the Indians at Goshen with teachers, schools, books, implements of agriculture, provisions, medicines, and other necessaries of every kind, of which they stood in need, in such a manner, that, from the beginning to the 21st August, 1822, the disbursements for their benefit exceeded the sum of all receipts from the land in the sum of \$32,587 50 $\frac{3}{4}$.

14. That, inasmuch as the majority of the remnant of the Christian Indians, objects of the trust, remained in Canada, this society, and the United Brethren in general, have, during the same period, expended upon these a far greater sum than the one just mentioned, in providing them likewise with missionaries and schools, as well as ministering to their external necessities; and that they still continue so to do.

15. That no part of the benefit resulting from the grant (if any there was) ever accrued, or could accrue, to any person or persons other than the objects of said trust.

Nothing but the zeal of this society, and of the United Brethren in general, to promote the best interests of the Christian Indians under their care, and faithfully to discharge the obligations of the trust confided to them, agreeably to their idea of its duties, and in the manner previously submitted to Congress, could possibly have induced them to expend sums upon the land and the Indians which have nearly swallowed up the scanty resources of the society, deeply involved them in debt, and acted as a most heavy drawback upon their endeavors for the good of the Indians elsewhere.

But, discouraging as the results of the exertions of this society were rendered by a train of difficulties not often encountered, they have hitherto thought it their duty to persevere, until the recent gloomy prospects have caused them to despair of the possibility of maintaining an establishment of Christian Indians at Goshen.

Unacquainted with the proper proceeding in order to divest the society of the ruinous burden which the grant of these lands in trust has devolved on their shoulders, so as to secure at least a partial indemnification for their enormous expenses, and hitherto unsuccessful in repeated endeavors to obtain the necessary information on the subject, this society hailed with the greatest satisfaction the opportunity now afforded by the investigation set on foot in the honorable Senate of the United States to lay before his excellency the President of the United States, through the honorable Secretary of the War Department, the true state of their case; most confidently trusting that the integrity of their administration of the trust reposed in them will thereby be proved to the satisfaction of all concerned; and as confidently hoping that thus a way will be pointed out for the relief of this society from a burden which otherwise appears most seriously to threaten all their benevolent objects with unavoidable frustration.

Under an humble confidence that the President of the United States will be pleased to accept of the present representation, together with the accompanying documents, as a satisfactory answer to the inquiries ordered by the honorable Senate, we have the honor to subscribe ourselves, most respectfully,

The President and Directors of the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania.

By order of the Board:

C. G. HUEFFEL, President.

A.

To the president and directors of the Society for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, the following summary of facts, drawn up from personal knowledge, is respectfully submitted, both for their own information, as also to lay the same, or as much thereof as they may deem proper, before the President of the United States, to meet the resolutions passed in the Senate of the United States on the 22d February last, of which due notice had been given them and to the undersigned by the proper authority; to the latter, however, with a particular request to furnish "all the information in his power upon the several points embraced in the latter resolution."

JOHN HECKEWELDER.

The summary of facts, events, occurrences, and transactions, faithfully drawn up by the undersigned, it is supposed will more fully meet the objects which had induced the Senate of the United States to pass the resolutions of the 22d of February last, relative to the Christian Indians under the care of the United Brethren, as it exhibits the state and condition of those Indians; their moral and intellectual endowments, from the time of the first Christian Indian establishment in Pennsylvania down to the present time; the changes that have taken place, and cause of such changes; and, likewise, the cause of their emigration to the west, and settling on the Muskingum, &c.

The first Christian Indian settlement in Pennsylvania, under the care of the United Brethren, was made in the year 1742, by emigrants (both Mohicans and Wampanoags) from New England and the then province of New York, who settled on Mahony creek, about twenty-seven miles to the northwest of Bethlehem, on lands which the Brethren had bought for the purpose; but, as the spot on which they had settled did not suit them, the soil being of a stiff, clayey nature, the Brethren, who had begun to build houses on the northeast side of the river Lehigh, where the land was of a sandy soil, exchanged with them; so that the Indians had the easy lands to work, and the Brethren the heavy and stiff, which, as they had ploughs, they could better work. These two settlements were but a short half mile apart, yet separated by the river, and a ridge on its southwest side. The Indians called their village Gnadenhutten, and had their ministers and schoolmasters living with them. At the other place, which retained its original Indian name, Mahony, which signifies a deer lick, the Brethren built mills; and farmers, as well as the most useful mechanics, established themselves there, both to do their own work, and to teach the Indians the arts of husbandry, and their young people, if they should choose it, different trades.

On my arrival from Europe, in the year 1754, there were also two young single Indian men, named Joachim and Nathan, placed in the single men's house at Bethlehem, for the purpose of receiving school education and instruction with regard to religion. So, likewise, were four young female Indians placed in the single women's house, for the same purposes, and that of learning the work of females: they were Martha, Mary, Christina, and Gawshes, all of the Mohican tribe. Both of the young men had within a few years made such progress in learning, that they now could be useful to their countrymen; and, of the four young women, Martha, who had been put to the mantua-making business, had made such proficiency, that she was made mistress, and had, for a number of years together, all the hands engaged in that line of business working under her; while the three others were good spinners, knitters, sewers, &c., and had also learned to dress flax. Martha died at Litz, near Lancaster, after living between thirty and forty years in the single women's houses, both here and at Litz. Christina was among the slain on the Muskingum, in 1782. All the others had been useful members of society, and died happy; Joachim at the age of about seventy years. In November, 1755, the white settlement on the Mahony creek being destroyed by the French Indians, the whole Indian congregation at Gnadenhutten fled to Bethlehem for protection, being sensible that their lives were in danger, both on account of those Indians combined with the French, as also by enraged white people. They were well received by the Brethren, and directed to build themselves temporary dwellings on the opposite side of Manake's creek, near the mills, dyehouse, and tanyards, where I had the pleasure of seeing them for the first time.

These Indians were then called by all sensible and impartial men, who, from curiosity, had been led to come to Bethlehem for the purpose of seeing them, "an orderly, civil, and industrious people; and better deserving the name of Christians than many of the white people were." They had already, in a great measure, become husbandmen; since those who had strength and ability devoted their time to manual labor at home; and when they had no work there, they would join the Brethren in their field and barn labors: while their aged men would make wooden bowls and ladles, barn and grain shovels for millers; and their women, brooms, sieves, &c.; for all which they found a ready market, as the storekeeper took all that was not wanted by the country people in exchange for wearing apparel, or any other article which they stood in need of; sending these manufactured articles in wagons to Brunswick and New York, where they found a ready sale.

While this division of the Christian Indians, who were all of the Mohican tribe, resided at Bethlehem, it was a pleasing sight to behold, occasionally, and especially on Sabbath days, this Indian congregation, united with the white congregation of the place, attend divine service together in the chapel. It was the same with the other division of these Indians, who were Delawares and Munsees, but who had been stationed at Gnadenhthal, near Nazareth; at which latter place divine service was performed on the same day.

Those Indians settled at Bethlehem, being desirous of living on a spot of land by themselves, where they could have the advantage of keeping a small stock of cattle, &c., the Brethren willingly granted them permission to settle on a convenient spot of their land, something better than a mile from Bethlehem, which place was afterwards called Nain. The village formed one large square; three sides were closed with buildings, and the south side left open for the convenience of fetching water from the fine spring run which flowed by. The place was neat, and kept clean, with a well in the middle of the square; the houses of squared timbers and shingle roofed, with fine gardens at the back of them, under good paled fences; their fields around them in the best order. Besides public buildings, as school and meeting-house, they had built a convenient house for poor widows, whom they supported.

For the other division of Christian Indians, who were settled at Gnadenhthal during the war, the Brethren bought a partly cultivated spot of ground, called Wequetank, on the north side of the Blue Mountains, about twenty-five miles from Bethlehem, where these also built themselves a village, and were supplied by the Brethren with a minister and a schoolmaster. These Indians, although not so far advanced in husbandry as the former, who had been the first converts, were not deficient to them as to their moral character.

Scarcely had the Christian Indians enjoyed themselves five years at these two places, when a fresh Indian war broke out again, (1763,) and which occasioned the breaking up of both of these settlements. The same persecuting spirit which had seized the minds of a certain class of people in Dauphin county, and who in their frenzy had murdered the Conestago Indians, had roused a similar class in Northampton county for committing similar acts on the Christian Indians near them; which caused the evacuation of their villages, and speedy removal to Philadelphia, for protection under Government.

It is strange what an effect bigotry can have on the mind of man. While one class of people, and who lived the most distant from these Indians, cried them down as thieves, savages, and barbarians, those white people who lived in their immediate neighborhood deplored their departure, saying they were an upright, honest, moral people, and good Christians. But, be this as it may, so much is certain, that, during the whole of their stay in this part of the country, (in all, twenty years,) not one single complaint had been brought against them, or any one of them, for any crime committed, that would have come under the cognizance of a magistrate, and punishable by law. There is nothing of the kind to be found on the docket of the magistrate who officiated during that period, as can be seen, it being yet extant, and in the hands of his venerable son, Joseph Horsfield, Esq., now upwards of seventy years of age.

The case of Renatus, who had been tried for murder, but acquitted, (as related by Loskiel, and may be seen in my narrative of the mission,) did not in the least tend to diminish or destroy the character those Indians bore among all upright and impartial men. Their character stood afterwards rather higher than before, since it was now manifest that, from a hatred to the Indians generally, many falsehoods were propagated against those nearest to them.

On their arrival at Nain, after a seventeen months' detention at Philadelphia, on account of the war, they found every thing as they had left it, since the Brethren had immediately placed a family there to take care of their effects. Their cattle had been sold, at their request, and they received the money; and, as they had to remove to the Indian country, (for reasons already assigned by historians,) the Brethren gave them permission to sell, with other articles that were too bulky to take along, their houses; of which the steward of Bethlehem purchased several, to remain on the land for a tenant hereafter to make use of. There are, at this present time, in the town of Bethlehem, six dwelling-houses of hewn timber, built by those Indians at Nain, and purchased by individuals of this place from them, and afterwards removed here, besides smaller buildings, to serve as stables and out-houses. All their plough-irons, farming utensils, and tools, they took with them.

Scarcely had these Indians, together with those who had lived at Wequetank, arrived at Wyalusing, on the Susquehannah, when their ploughs were again going on the prairie grounds they found there. They could make their own ploughs, harrows, &c., and, besides, do any common carpenter's and cooper's work with despatch, so that very soon there was a village standing; and by the time they had to leave the place, which was in 1772, just eight years from their first arrival at it, their village and improvements commanded a beautiful prospect to the eye, denoting that its inhabitants must be an orderly and industrious people. During their stay, I had been four times at the place, helped to make the beginning, and was there the year before they moved off. They were very unwilling to go, but the Six Nations had sold that whole country, including the lands they lived on, to the English.

Such had been their situation, when they received, by the Indian preacher Wangemend, a message from the great Delaware council on the Muskingum inviting them to come to them, and they would give them land enough both for themselves and their cattle to live and feed on.

On the council's learning that their message had been listened to by the Christian Indians with indifference, they sent one of their head chiefs (Killbuck, sen.) to them, with a renewal of the same offer, and to assure them that they were in earnest; that they would not only give them as much of their land as they stood in need of, or wanted, but that they would also promise them that what they gave them should ever remain theirs, and never be taken back again by them, as long as the sun should shine and the rivers flow with water; that they never would serve them as the Mingoes had done, by selling the ground under their feet; and that no nation whatever should be suffered to take the land they gave them away from them, &c. Still these Indians could not determine to leave a place on which they had expended so much labor and expense, and where they had such fine prospects for the future, provided they could remain on the land; they therefore couched their answer to be sent by this chief in such terms that the great council was left in suspense as regarded their acceptance of the offer. They merely told this chief "to look well on their improvements, and tell the great council what he had seen."

The council, anxious to relieve their kindred friends from the dilemma they were in, while these, on the other hand, appeared to them as though they mistrusted their sincerity, next sent a messenger to the missionary Zeisberger, then residing with his congregation on Big Beaver, requesting him to use his influence in advising their relatives (the Christian Indians on the Susquehannah) to accept the offer made them by the great council of the nation, assuring them at the same time of their sincerity; which being done by the missionary, by a letter to them, directed to the directors of the society at Bethlehem, one of these, accompanied by two of the directors of the Unity from Europe, who happened to be here at the time, repaired forthwith to Wyalusing for the purpose, and were so far successful as to be able to report to their missionary on Beaver creek, for the notice of the great council, "that they thanked them for their kind offer; would give it a due consideration, which required time, they being, at present, too heavy to rise; yet that, should any of their number who were not so heavy feel an inclination to proceed on immediately, they should be at full liberty to do so."

As the directors of the society, in conjunction with the Christian Indians, had already, previous to these messages being sent on, laid their grievances before the Governor of Pennsylvania, stating that their land had been sold by the Six Nations, with a prayer that he would see justice done, and their lands secured to them: to which petition, the Governor having returned them a favorable answer, they could not well attend to the speeches and wishes of the great Delaware council in the west, until the result of this negotiation was first known, and which time would only show. However, finally finding that, notwithstanding the assurance given them by the Governor, in writing, in which he promised (see Loskiel, part iii. chap. 3; page 41,) "that, as a quiet and peaceable people, they should not be disturbed in their possessions, and that he had ordered the surveyors not to survey any land within five miles of Friedenshutzen, (Wyalusing,) they therefore should consider all reports of taking away their land to be without foundation," &c., they soon saw, to their mortification, surveyors running lines, not only within the limits named by the Governor, but even across their fields, in sight of their villages; so that they now saw no other alternative than that of complying, at once, with the offer made them by the great council in the west, and move away from this favorite spot, the sooner the better; especially since disorderly and immoral white people, who had come into the country, and were settling near them, disturbed their peace, and never more than when they were met together in the chapel for divine service.

It is not to be wondered at that these Indians had become attached to this place, where buildings, fields, gardens, fruit trees, &c. were in such fine order, that it was a delight to take a view of it. Even the very streets were kept clean, and, during the summer months, when the ground was dry, swept on Saturday with wooden brooms, and the rubbish removed; the situation of the ground being level, and the soil a mixture of sand and clay, it was entirely performed by the women; and the whole village being enclosed by a post and rail fence, so as to keep cattle and hogs out, gave it a fine appearance. As idleness leads to poverty, beggarliness, and immorality, &c., so, on the other hand, does property, acquired by industry, cause an attachment to it, from which flow care, cleanliness, order, economy, and a taste for virtue, &c., all which are traits in the character of a civilized people. The Christian Indians had already borne this character while they were settled in Northampton county. Morality had become habitual to them, and since increased; and the more they found opportunities of putting those mental endowments which had lain dormant within them into action, the greater were the advances they made therein.

On the arrival of these Indians at the Muskingum, in the year 1772, they were made satisfied, by the great council of the nation, that what these had promised them would be fulfilled, since the limits of the land they had given them were particularly described, namely, to extend from the mouth of One Legged creek to the great bend in the river below Gakalamukpeking old town, a distance of about thirty miles on the river; and from which tract they immediately removed two small villages of Indians, besides single families, so as to open the country at once to the Christian Indians entirely. Strings and belts of wampum were given in token and as lasting vouchers of the grant, and the Wyandots declared themselves witnesses to the act and deed.

Soon two fine villages were built on this tract, which were called Schoenbrunn and Gnadenuhuten. On the uppermost were settled those consisting of the Delaware nation, and on the other the Mohicans; and, after a lapse of years, a third town, named Salem, was built on the same grant. The two latter settlements, Gnadenuhuten and Salem, were made on the very spots from which the great council had removed the then settlers, for the purpose of making room for the Christian Indians.

These Christian Indians had been in a flourishing state at the commencement of the American revolution. Being for the greater part husbandmen, hunting was, with them, no more a primary object; since, from the great quantities of grain they raised, and the large stocks of cattle they held, (every family having more or less milch cows and hogs in great numbers feeding in the woods, and plenty of poultry at home,) they suffered not in the provision way. But, for the purpose of purchasing articles of clothing, kettles, pewterware, salt, tea, chocolate, &c. from the traders, they were obliged to hunt some in the season. And as Congress, at the beginning of the war, by commissioners appointed for the purpose, at a treaty held with the Indian nations and tribes, had proclaimed to these "that all such as should sit still, whether nation or association, or communities belonging to a nation, and had not taken up the hatchet against them during the contest, should, if they became the conquerors, have all the lands they held confirmed and secured to them," &c., these Indians saw no cause of relaxing with regard to their agricultural pursuits, nor in that of enlarging their improvements—they having one and all declared that they, on their part, would not take up arms against their American brethren, nor against any other Power, but mind their business at home; and which they stuck to, to the last. If it cannot be admitted that a people leading such a life as these Christian Indians had done whilst they resided at those places named in this summary, and until they were forcibly taken away from their towns on the Muskingum, had a claim to the word which expresses civilization, then I am at a loss for a name that would suit them better. True, they had no courts of judicature established among them; no magistrates appointed; but there was no necessity for that in a community in which no one disorderly person was permitted to dwell. Neither could a magistrate, if ever one had been placed among them, have lived by the fees of his office, as no crimes were committed that would have come under his cognizance.

I never felt a disposition of bringing to public view all the professions, declarations, and applauses, which, in my hearing, had, from time to time; been made by respectable, judicious, and impartial men, in consequence of what they themselves had seen and witnessed at our Christian Indian towns, while these resided on the Muskingum; and shall continue to be as sparing as possible on this delicate point, only referring to the testimony of such when I believe myself pressed to it, as it appears to me to be the case in the present instance. While, in the year 1774, two gentlemen (one of whom, some years afterwards, came to be a distinguished American general) were in conversation on what they had seen and witnessed during a stay of a few days at the village of Schoenbrunn, one of them put this question to the other: "What comparison might be drawn between the hundreds of white people among us, going under the name of Christians, and these people we are so apt to call savages?" "Why, sir," replied the other, "we need only change characters and names; call these Christians and those savages; for these are Christians in reality, while those are undeserving of the name they bear." So should I, likewise, have no hesitation in calling these a civilized people, and those uncivilized; in doing which, I think, I could make no mistake. When Col. George Morgan, of Princeton, in New Jersey, who had by the Congress of the United States been appointed Indian agent for the western district, came out to the Indian towns on the Muskingum, he, after spending some days there, delivered himself to this effect: "That he was quite astonished at what he had seen and witnessed at our three towns; that the improvements these Indians had made on their lands bespoke their industry; and that the cleanliness, order, and regularity, which were every where observable, added to their devotion, gave them a claim to be ranked among the civilized part of mankind; that they deserved to be set up as an example to many of the whites; that, to him, it was now evident that the Indians, when living by themselves, and out of connexion with the white people, except such as gave them instruction, thereby setting them a good example, could easily be brought to a state of civilization, and become good citizens of the United States; and that he considered the good example set them by us as the surest, if not the only successful, method of making converts, in bringing them over from paganism, idleness, and debauchery, to a state of Christianity; that he, since being with us, could account for the Indians in New Jersey continuing to be such a miserable and depraved people; that this was all owing to their connexion with immoral white people." Such as these Christian Indians were when Colonel Morgan saw them, such were they at the time when they were distressed and forcibly taken from their peaceful habitations on the Muskingum by the enemy. But their improvements had been much enlarged, and put into the best order; their loss, therefore, was the greater.

It could not be expected that, after such disasters as had befallen the Christian Indians on the Muskingum, they one and all would have borne their sufferings alike. Had these ended with the loss of their property alone, their feelings would have been quite different from what they were when, six months after, such a number of their kindred Christian friends were murdered, when some of them had come from Sandusky to their habitations for corn. Only those of the number that were at the time at the upper town (Schoenbrunn) escaped; those in the other two towns were murdered. In the first case, they in a manner suffered alike, and no lives were lost; whereas, in the following case, much of their best blood was spilt; besides, in some instances, children lost their parents, parents their children, and nearest and dearest relatives.

We all know that the feelings and passions of men are not alike. While one feels himself disposed to forgive, another may meditate on taking revenge. Nor do all fly to the same method for dispelling grief and trouble from their minds. A change of mind may be effected in a moment, but this change is not alike with all. With some, indeed, it may be for the better, while with others for the worse; and while children, who, as infants, had lost their parents in so barbarous a manner, are growing up, it is quite natural to suppose that even their reflecting on the cruelties inflicted on their parents may agitate their minds; nay, even rouse their passions to such a pitch, that they wish themselves able forthwith to take revenge; and the more so, when they are told by others that they ought to do it whenever an opportunity should offer.

On such occasions, the Indian, who is as capable of reflection as the white man, sets his mind to work, always reasoning in this way, viz: "The white people tell us that they possess the book in which the word and commandments of God to man are written, and where God expressly forbids mankind to murder one another, by the words 'Thou shalt not kill.' These commandments," say they, "are also held up to us by the teachers with us; nay, even our children read them to us out of their school books,* into which they are inserted for our instruction. Now," say they, "how do the acts of the white people agree with their profession? They, themselves, do the very things which they tell us are forbidden by God. If murder is forbidden by God, as they tell us it is, why do they do it? If not forbidden, why do they tell us that it is? Can they change this commandment of God, so that their committing murder on us is no crime, but a great crime when an Indian kills a white man?" &c. Being once introduced by an Indian interpreter, named Nicholson, to an Indian chief of the Six Nations, as a teacher of the Delawares, the chief replied: "Then I ought to consider him a good man, and, if he really is such, he will set them a good example by his own conduct; not tell the Indians such and such things are forbidden by God, and yet do them himself, as many of the white people do; but show them that, himself believing what is written down of God and his commandments to be true, he abhors all that is forbidden by him, and strives to do his will, and what is pleasing to him. Such a teacher may do much good among my cousins; whereas, one that acts the contrary part is doing great mischief." Having finished his remark, which was interpreted to me, he reached his hand to me, saying, "I rejoice in having the opportunity of seeing and shaking hands with you this day. Do all the good you can to my cousins," (Delawares.)

The Christian Indians being left entirely to themselves, on their missionaries being taken away from them at Upper Sandusky, and brought to Detroit, did not, however, return to heathenism, but kept together as much as their circumstances would permit; admonishing one another to await the time when they again might be with their teachers. Two venerable old men, David and Joachim, dwelt as hermits together for some years, and until they found a way to the Indian congregation then in Upper Canada, where they both ended their days happily. Both were of those who had joined the congregation between the years 1740 and 1750. A few of these Indians only had suffered themselves to be misled by their relatives, in being persuaded by these that nothing would sooner relieve them from the grief and trouble they felt on the loss of their murdered relatives than the drinking of spirituous liquor; urging them to make the experiment; and, having once begun, their relatives kept them at it, whenever the article was to be had; when, of course, they suffered in their morals.

Those who had kept together until they again could join their ministers in Canada had not suffered visibly in their morals; and of these there were already, in November, 1782, about fifty-three persons at the new settlement, thirty miles to the north of Detroit, where they, and those who had joined them since, formed a fine congregation, after the same manner, and under the same regulations and order, as at their former settlements; so that many gentlemen from Detroit, and among these the commandant, Major Ancrum, came to visit the place, when they freely declared, that the industry, order, and cleanliness of those people surpassed their expectations, and far exceeded any thing of the kind they had hitherto witnessed of Indians. And when this Indian congregation had, after a four years' stay at this place, again to move off, on account of the Chippewas wanting the land for their own use, and were passing through the street of Detroit, to embark in a vessel for Cayuga, the merchants of the place hailed them in these words: "We are sorry to see such an industrious, orderly, and honest people leave the country; yet, we wish you well, and God bless you!"

* Zeisberger's Delaware Spelling Book, first edition, was printed in the year 1776.

It being unknown to these Indians and their ministers, at the time they crossed Lake Erie, that, as yet, a firm peace had not been established between the Indians and the United States, they soon found themselves again involved in difficulties. They were not permitted to go and settle where they pleased, but, on the other hand, were ordered back to Sandusky; which, however, they would not do, but settled themselves at Petquoting; from whence, however, they had to flee for protection to the north side of the lake, near the outlet of Detroit river, where they planted corn for the season, which was in the spring of 1790.

Finding, after a stay of a year at this place, that it was impossible for them to stay longer, both on account of their wicked and depraved white neighbors, who daily disturbed them, and also by those Indians who were at open war with the United States, and had made their settlement their thoroughfare in going to and returning from Detroit, they applied to the British Government for an asylum, and were, at once, directed to look for a place that would suit them on the Thames river, beyond where the white people were already settled, which they did; and the British Government afterwards made them a grant of this land, running six miles along the river, and more than that back towards the lake. This place they called Fairfield.

I had visited these Indians in 1789, while they yet lived on the Huron river, south side of Lake Erie; and when, in the employ of the Government of the United States, I went with the commissioners to Detroit, in 1793, I again visited them. They were then the same industrious people, and had fine crops of wheat and Indian corn in the ground, and were building barns to house it; but some of their immoral white neighbors had already set to work in leading the weaker among them to debauchery, by offering them liquor for the work they did for them, instead of the money they had promised them.

When I again, in the year 1798, was at their village, I perceived in a few a decline as to their morals, and was told by their missionary, Zeisberger, that this was all owing to their connexion with their debauched white neighbors, who imposed liquor upon them instead of money, for labor, as for reaping and helping them to get in their harvest. The missionary had his doubts whether his congregation would be able to stay here much longer on that very account, and was glad that I had brought him an invitation from the directors of the society to remove with a part of the congregation on the lands Congress had granted them on the Muskingum; and he accordingly did move in the fall of that year, with about thirty souls, to the land, where they chose a spot on the Schoenbrunn tract for their village, which afterwards was called Goshen. In the year 1800, this congregation consisted of sixty-five souls; but two families of them, Joshua's and Thomas's (all of the old stock) moved with the missionaries to the White river, to begin a new missionary settlement there; while several other families, also of the original stock, finding themselves afterwards disappointed in their expectations, returned back again to Upper Canada. They were soon joined by several families of Indians from near Sandusky, one of whom was Joseph White-eyes, second son of the late Captain White-eyes, with his family; another, Pemaholend, who was married to the widow of White-eyes; and a third, Gashatis, a man who was nearly related to some of those Indians who had been murdered on the Muskingum, with his family. The first two families were justly entitled to a share of the benefit arising from this grant. Soon after these Indians were settled at Goshen, the Sandusky Indian traders came on to trade with them for their peltry, yet always bringing liquor with them, for the purpose of making better bargains, or, in other words, cheating them. They even sometimes would have a Sandusky Indian with them, or following them, either for the purpose of enticing these Indians to drink, or to have a share in the liquor himself. While these traders were coming from the west, others of the lowest class brought on liquor from the Ohio settlements, to see what bargains they would be able to make in trade. The missionaries, dreading the consequences, applied to me, as agent for the society, to join with them in petition to the Legislature of the State, praying that a law be passed prohibiting any liquor to be brought on that tract of land (Schoenbrunn) on which the Indian congregation was settled; and, in the winter of 1799 and 1800, the Assembly did pass a law, not only forbidding any liquor being brought there, but on none of the tracts included in the grant; putting it in the power both of the missionaries and the agent to seize any and all liquor which hereafter should, in opposition to this law, be brought on the premises for sale, and do with it as they should think proper.

While these missionaries were flattering themselves with the hopes that this law would have the wished-for effect, a Sandusky trader, well informed that such an act had been passed, arrived with liquor at the Goshen village, and, in defiance of the law, and the warnings given him by the missionaries, offered his liquors to these Indians for sale, or in exchange for their peltries, insisting they should now drink of it. The missionary Zeisberger, although then in his eightieth year, in his zeal for the cause in which he was engaged, took up an axe, and stove the kegs, so that the liquor ran in the river. Although this act of the missionary served as a check on some other disorderly people, from their making similar attempts of bringing liquor to the town, yet, upon the whole, this act of the Assembly became highly offensive, and was termed an infringement on the rights and liberties of a free and independent people, and, consequently, soon repealed. Some individuals in the neighborhood did not even wait for its repeal, but brought out and sold to whom they pleased, setting a bad example to these Indians by their immoral acts and deeds. Neither could any thing be done towards putting a stop to intoxication, and the effects of it, as lying, swearing, fighting, &c., even on the Sabbath days, as there was but one magistrate within sixty miles, and he was threatened with having his brains knocked out if he interfered.

To this time (the spring of 1802) we must look for the original cause which led those Indians settled at Goshen to a decline with regard to morality. They could not, when attending to their daily lawful pursuits, avoid seeing and hearing that which was injurious to them; and not only this, but the temptations and snares laid for them by the most immoral and degraded white people, to draw them into the same state in which they were, being numerous, it was impossible for their ministers to guard against all and every temptation that had a tendency to lead them to commit immoral acts, especially that of intoxication; yet I can say, with truth, that, during the time of my residing in that country, which lasted to the fall of 1810, not one single instance had occurred of any thing like a general intoxication with the Goshen Indians. Whenever any thing of the kind existed, it was only with one or the other, or a few individuals joined together with Sandusky Indians. Besides all this, these Indians had other temptations to encounter, which tended to make them unhappy at times. They were told, by unprincipled and self-interested people of their neighborhood, that the three tracts of land which the society held had been granted to them, and that they could do with the land as they pleased, rent it to any person, and have the rents paid to them in hand; that the Brethren were cheating them out of the rents, and would also soon cheat them out of their lands; that their ministers, the agent, and others, drew their salaries from the rent of their land, the agent from three to four dollars a day, &c.; that each of them should insist on having his share of the land laid off, and then they would pay them the yearly rents honestly; which would fill their pockets with money, so that, although they worked nothing, they always would have money enough, &c.

Such abominable tales, though one and all falsehoods, could not fail of creating at least a jealousy with some against their ministers and the agent; and, therefore, from trouble of mind, mixed with a little anger, they resorted to where liquor was to be had, in order to be relieved from the pain it gave them.

Now, the missionaries had no salaries at all, nor was ever a salary offered to the agent; and, if it had, I should not have accepted of it. I served the society and Indian congregation a dozen of years, without making a charge of a single dollar. The provision, indeed, for myself and family, consisting of four persons, and a house to live in, I accepted from the society, whom we all were serving in one way or the other; but we kept a plain table, of such articles as the country afforded, except tea and coffee. I fed, out of this, every Indian who came on hungry to the place, without making such any charge whatever; and these were many. We furnished ourselves with clothing by raising flax, and keeping a few sheep, on account of the wool, which my family, all females, spun, &c. Besides, I made two journeys to Bethlehem, on business of the society, for which I did not charge a cent for expenses. So much for the slander. Could all the cases be brought to view which had contributed towards a decline in the morals of those Indians at Goshen, (and which decline, of course, would operate as a check to the advancement of their mental endowments,) it would fully satisfy every reflecting mind that it would be unjust to throw a greater share of the blame on these Indians than they deserved.

Can it be ascribed to them that they spent much of their time in idleness? I say, no! It was from a want of occupation at home, or where they could get work and pay for it honestly, and without falling into the hands of those who took the work, and would pay in nothing but liquor or trash. One of the Goshen Indians (since deceased) had built my dwelling-house in Gnadenhutten, and another house at the same place, for a family which came there. Both these houses were of squared timber, shingle roofed, and with neat floors below and above, laid with split and hewn puncheons. He could hew more square feet from the stump, in a day, than any of the white carpenters I had in my employ at that place. He did all his work, even the building of the chimney, in the best manner, and was paid for it honestly by us. The same Indian had, twenty years before, built me a spacious dwelling-house at Salem, on the Muskingum; and once, at my request, enumerated all the houses he had built for other people, both whites and Indians, since he had joined the Christian Indians, and which amounted to between twenty and thirty. Of the three sons of the chief Killbuck, who had been of so much service to the United States during the American revolution, and had died at the beginning of the year 1811, the eldest (John Henry) had been some time at Princeton college, or at a school, where he received a good education; but, being rather of a slow or easy habit, he could do without great bodily exertions, and served as chapel interpreter; while his two younger brothers, Charles and Christian G. Henry, were smart, active, and industrious young men, wanting in nothing but continual employment, but which they could not, under present circumstances, find at this place, (Goshen.)

Wherever the Christian Indians had hitherto lived, they could find work enough, when they had none of their own to do, to give them continual employ. While living in Northampton county, they worked at day labor for wages, as I have already stated. While at Wyalusing, on the Susquehannah, they sold large quantities of corn, sugar, butter, pork, &c. to those Indians living high up the river, who would rather hunt, and exchange their peltry for such articles, than labor in the fields at home. For these, and also for white people living above a hundred miles below them, on the same river, they would make neat white pine canoes, of any sizes wanted, for which they received ready pay. The same was the case when they were on the Muskingum, before the commencement of the American revolution, and until those Indians living in these parts moved back to the Sandusky. For several years, the northern traders had bought up large quantities of Indian corn from the Christian Indians at Schoenbrunn and Gnadenhutten, which they transported by way of the rivers Muskingum and Cayuga, in canoes, to Lake Erie; thence, across this lake in batteaux, to Detroit, for the northwest trade; and bacon, butter, cheese, sugar, &c. they could sell to traders, or exchange for articles they stood in need of. In latter times they could not even calculate on property they had acquired by their industry at this place, (Goshen;) of which I will only give a few instances, namely: The society had given them ploughs, harnesses, &c. to plough their grounds; they had themselves purchased horses to work with; but scarcely had they made a beginning, when their horses, five or six in number, were missing; when, after having spent much time, first by searching in the woods for them, and then making inquiry all around among the neighbors, and at the places they had purchased the horses, they learned that these had been taken off by horse thieves from the Ohio settlement, and either sold or made away with. After being for some time put to great expenses in hiring white people, who were their friends, to use their endeavors in searching out the persons and places where their horses had been taken and disposed of, and seeking advice how they were to proceed in the business, either in having their horses restored to them again, or, if not, an indemnification, so that they could purchase other working horses in their stead, they were informed by a magistrate, who wished that justice might be done to them, that the principal thief having run off, all his property had been seized to pay the cost and charges of the court with regard to his trial; but, as a surplus would be left, they, by petitioning the Legislature, might have it given to them: which advice being attended to, the Legislature passed an act, or resolution, accordingly, so that they received in money a part of their loss, but not sufficient to carry on their agricultural pursuits as they had intended; which were, therefore, only continued as far as necessity required, they dreading similar disasters in case they procured other horses.

Again, and that but within the last year or two: One of the Goshen Indians having made a fine large trough for collecting and preserving his sugar sap for boiling, on missing the trough one day, he went to a good friend of his for advice, who soon found out that the trough was neatly fixed in a new stable of one of the tenants on the land as a feeding trough for his cattle. The Indian, taking further advice for the recovery of his trough, was assisted in taking out a search warrant; but the thief, hearing what was going on, hastily removed the trough from his stable, and stood prepared with his gun to shoot the Indian the moment he saw him draw near the house to prove his property. Thus the thief came off victoriously, while the poor Indian was left in the lurch, and was ever after afraid of going near him.

Again: The missionary Zeisberger had a fine young cherry tree on his enclosure adjoining his dwelling-house; and a little back of this tree the meeting-house for his congregation had been built. When, after some years, this tree was loaded with cherries, and these to be taken off in a day or two, to share with his friends, the tree was stripped of its fruit by white people from the neighborhood, during the time his congregation were attending divine service on the Sabbath day.

Were it not that some people hold up the doctrine that the Indians are not susceptible of being civilized or becoming a civilized people, &c., and which, from the inference drawn from Goshen by the Senator from Ohio, who had succeeded the mover of the resolutions taken in the Senate of the United States on the 22d of February last, would in a manner seem to support that doctrine, I should not have thought of bringing any of these facts herein stated to public view. Neither can I have any other object in doing it now, than that of laying the truth before that authority which has officially applied to me to furnish them answers to certain questions, but which I found myself unable to do in any other manner that would be clear and effective, so that a fair conclusion might be drawn, than by laying all sides open to view.

If a missionary establishment in the neighborhood of white people shall in anywise succeed, it is necessary that good and wholesome laws be made, tending to their temporal welfare and prosperity, and that these also be carried into effect. If the Indians see that justice is done them to the same degree that it is done to the whites, they will be satisfied, knowing where to flee for relief when maliciously treated or unjustly dealt with. The confidence they would place in such a Government would be a great inducement towards improving their morals and encouraging them to industry, especially when they saw the magistrates near them act in concord with their superiors in fulfilling such laws.

While I am always free to admit that the Society of United Brethren, with all the care they may take, are as liable to err and commit mistakes as any other of the human race, yet I will venture to defend them both from knowingly and wilfully committing unjust acts, and that of accusing and laying to the charge of others crimes or misconduct which have no foundation, and are done with a view to make such appear odious in the eyes of the public. I have already, in a separate statement of facts respecting the land which the Society of United Brethren held in trust for the use of the Christian Indians and some other individuals, taken notice of a few of the hints and suggestions thrown out by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) tending to show that the Brethren had not dealt fairly with those Indians in discharge of their duty as trustees—I allude to the words where he said, "It would have been idle in him to undertake to put the Senate upon the inquiry, without being able to suggest a failure of the use;" and now have the unpleasant task before me of exposing and correcting a material error into which also the Senator from Ohio (Mr. Brown) had fallen, by stating in his speech that "a large congregation of Indians, whom they (the United Brethren) had, through fifty years' labor, converted to Christianity, had now become nearly extinct, and dwindled to a few families; and that the ostensible object of that mission in which Mr. Heckewelder spent above forty years had totally failed."

To this statement of Mr. Brown I beg to reply, first, that the Christian Indians, among whom the Brethren had labored so many years, or the survivors of them, together with their descendants, are, notwithstanding all the disasters which had befallen them, owing to massacres, wars, and dispersion, (and let me add, natural deaths, of which there had been many,) and were at the time the words were uttered by the Senator just quoted, in number at least one hundred and fifty souls, settled on Thames river, in Upper Canada, and forming a fine congregation, and, as far as my information goes, at present in a flourishing state; chiefly employing themselves in agricultural pursuits, and instructed by the two pious missionaries, Luckenbach and Haman. These Indians, to speak correctly, are the remnants of those Christian Indians who were once so flourishing, and with whom I had resided.

As the president of the Society for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen keeps up a continual correspondence with the missionaries stationed with those Indians, and had, likewise, the resolution of the Senate of 22d February forwarded to him, he will, of course, comply with the request made to him, and give a more particular account respecting the state of this mission, the morals of those Indians, and the advance or decline of their mental endowments, than I could do, who am no more in a regular correspondence with them.

Secondly. The Indians at present at Goshen, whom the Senator from Ohio mistook for the remnant of that large and flourishing congregation among which the Brethren had labored so long, were, with the exception of one elderly woman, daughter of the carpenter Ignatius, (of whom I have taken notice in this summary,) all of a new stock, gathered a number of years after the revolutionary war had terminated. Some had come from the Sanduskies, and Killbuck's family from Pittsburg, where they had resided for a number of years, and several of his sons had been taught to read and write; together with the youngest son of the late Captain White-eyes, his wife, and two or three children.

As the history of the last-mentioned families, and the manner they came in for a share of the benefit out of the land granted to the society, in trust, may not be generally known, I will briefly relate the circumstances which occasioned it. The heads of both these families, being chieftains of the Delaware nation, had striven, as long as it had been in their power, to keep the nation at peace with the United States; and had been the means of saving many lives of these during the contest between Great Britain and the United States; but, finally, after several years' exertions, finding their object defeated by their opponent, Captain Pipe, who had joined the enemy, thereby causing a division in the nation, they both took the field as captains, and marched out against the enemy, with American commanders at their head. Captain White-eyes fell a victim to the small-pox while marching out with General McIntosh to Tuscarawas; and Killbuck, who, a year or two later, went out with Colonel Brodhead against the enemy, had thereby drawn such hatred and revenge upon himself by his inimical countrymen, that they publicly declared him an outlaw, to be shot or murdered wherever he should be met with. And, in fact, he had many narrow escapes, even after the war was over; nay, after he had joined himself to the Christian Indians, his life had at one time to be purchased by these and his sons, the enemy being already at his door to murder him. Both these great men (White-eyes and Killbuck) had, also, previous to the commencement of that war, and for some years during its continuance, most strenuously exerted themselves in drawing their nation gradually into a state of civilization; for which purpose they had kept up a continual correspondence with the then Indian agent, Colonel George Morgan, and other American officers; all which was to be laid before the American Congress, and the important step of civilization to take place at the termination of the war.

The scheme, however desirable, and, to appearance, practicable, was totally defeated by the horrid murders committed, both on the Christian Indians on the Muskingum, and the peaceable Indians under the protection of the American Government at or near Pittsburg, where Killbuck so narrowly escaped with his life, while the promising young chief of the nation was killed, together with other respectable men of the nation.

Killbuck learning that the Congress of the United States, agreeably to promises made to the Indians at the commencement of the war, had reserved and would secure to the Moravian Indians all the land they claimed and had in occupation on the Muskingum, (being the three tracts, Schoenbrunn, Gnadenhutten, and Salem;) and he having also the promise made him by the Congress, that both he and Captain White-eyes should be considered and rewarded the same as other officers of the United States, and, finally, each receive his due proportion of donation lands; he, for himself and the heirs of his late friend, Captain White-eyes, requested that Congress would give them their lands adjoining those of the Moravian or Christian Indians; for that, since the prospect of civilizing the nation had been destroyed, and himself no more daring to live among his bad countrymen, he had come to the resolution of joining the Christian Indians, where he should consider himself out of danger, as these always settled by themselves and were his friends: all which meeting the approbation of Congress, they included Killbuck and the descendants of White-eyes in the grant.

The Government of the United States at that time considered it their bounden duty to fulfil all the promises which they had made to the Indians, both at the commencement of the American war, and from time to time afterwards; and the least they could do, and which they agreed to do, for the Christian Indians, was that of indemnifying them for their loss, which, at a low valuation, was set at ten thousand dollars; but there being at that time no money in the United States treasury, their land should in the first place be secured to them, and, whenever they returned from Canada to settle on this land, they should be furnished with one hundred blankets and five hundred bushels of Indian corn.

On my return to the United States in the fall of 1786, I was congratulated at every town and place through which I passed, from Pittsburg to Bethlehem, where I met with American officers who had at any time been stationed on frontier posts, on what the Congress had already done, and further would do, for the Christian Indians, who had suffered so much on account of their friendly conduct to the United States, and the services they had rendered them in so manifest a manner, by striving to keep the nation at peace with the United States, and by keeping war parties back from falling on them; adding that both they and the chiefs, Killbuck and White-eyes, would be well rewarded for all this. I name the generals Butler, Hand, Brodhead, Gibson, Irwin, and Neville, as having particularly distinguished themselves by speaking those sentiments in public, always adding that Congress could not do too much for the Moravian Indians, nor for Killbuck's and White-eyes's families. And General Richard Butler told me, at two different times between the years 1786 and 1791, that he would procure land warrants both for Killbuck's and White-eyes's heirs, which they might lay where they pleased, and sell the land if they chose for cash, and go and live with the Christian Indians, with something in their hands to begin with; for that he did not consider, by the Congress naming these chiefs in the gift to the Moravian Indians, that this was to be the reward for their services, but merely that of attaching them to the community of the Christian Indians, whom they were so anxious to join. But this general losing his life at St. Clair's defeat, nothing further was done for them.

The same officer further observed to me, that "had the chiefs of the Delaware nation, together with the Christian Indians, pursued a different course than what they had done, and all joined the enemy and taken up the hatchet against the American people, it would have cost the United States much blood and treasure to have withstood them and checked their progress into the country, besides weakening our already feeble armies on the seaboard, by draining them of troops for the western service, which might have proved fatal to the cause."

Such had been the language of an intelligent officer; of one who had, previous to the revolution, for a number of years, transacted business among the western nations, knew their strength and abilities, could speak several Indian languages, and had also been frequently at the Moravian settlements in that country. It was likewise the language of other officers who had served on the frontiers.

But in what did finally all the good wishes and fair promises of the Congress and its officers at that time result? An unavoidable delay in not being able to do at that time what had been intended and resolved upon should be done for the Christian Indians and those named chieftains, together with a change in the Government of the United States, (the new constitution soon after taking place,) the whole business had to be done over again, and that by new hands, apparently not sufficiently acquainted with the matter and merits of the case, and in part not friendly to Indians of any description; and who, in newly modelling it, clogged the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen by a grant to them of the land, in trust, for the sole use and benefit of the Christian Indians, Killbuck, and the descendants of Captain White-eyes, in such a manner that could not fail of placing them under a number of difficulties, besides involving them deeply in debt; and that, too, without the prospect of raising for a great number of years to come from the land a revenue sufficient to meet the prescribed conditions of the trust, setting aside entirely the manner and means by and through which the society were to recover those sums, necessarily advanced in attempting to make the lands productive. To make the matter short, this trust land may be considered as the seed of much evil, and had as early as the year 1798, even before the society had commenced a settlement on the land, nearly become a bone of contention, thereby throwing the society into law-suits, as will be seen by the following, viz:

The sons of the late Captain White-eyes, not being put into possession of the donation lands promised to their father for the services he had rendered to the United States, now, in 1797, applied to law characters in the western country for advice how they were to come at their land; and, being told that they had no longer to look to the American Government for this, but to the Moravian Society, unto whom both the lands belonging to the Christian Indians and to them and Killbuck had been confided, (as the deed for this land will sufficiently show,) George, the elder son of the family, had a power of attorney drawn, authorizing and empowering an attorney at law in Washington, Pennsylvania, to get the land for him surveyed out of the grant in trust, which the Moravian Society were possessed of, in whatever manner he could, as also a deed in fee-simple therefor; but while he, (George,) in the spring of 1798, was on his way to Washington with this power, to put it into his agent's hands, while in a state of intoxication near Georgetown, he was shot dead by a white lad of the neighborhood.

And here I put the question a second time: in what did, finally, all the fair promises of the Congress and its officers result, with regard to indemnification for losses sustained, and reward for services both by the Christian Indians and the two named chiefs, White-eyes and Killbuck? With reluctance I have to reply, in nothing that could have been of real service to them; for, to have barely the occupation of a tract of land, which an Indian can have any where in his own country without asking for it, is of no account to them; and as to conveying by deed to such Indians as were entitled to a benefit out of the land, as his particular share of it, it was put quite out of the power of the trustees by the nature of the grant: thus the poor Indians received nothing at all from that quarter of what had been promised them—neither lands, blankets, nor the five hundred bushels of corn.

But what has the Society of United Brethren done for, and in behalf of, those very people? I freely answer, that, notwithstanding the suspicion, censures, and, I may add, reviling language passed on them by some individuals, they have at all times supplied these Indians to the best of their abilities; and that not only by furnishing them with gospel and school instructors, but they have otherwise expended large sums of money in supplying them with necessities, and such articles as could be of benefit to them. They had even been as a parent to the venerable William Henry Killbuck while he lived, and did, in a manner, make amends to him for the failings of the Congress with regard to their promises. Yes, they supported him for more than a dozen of years successively, gave him provisions when he stood in need of them, clothed him comfortably from time to time, and administered medicines to him in sickness; in short, were his real benefactors to the end.

It is to me a gratification that, while I am writing on this subject, my recollection serves me in bringing to view two noble acts of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which, in my opinion, are in some measure connected with the same subject. The first is, that, on my representing to that honorable body (in December, 1810,) of what service that chief (William Henry Killbuck) had been to this State during the revolutionary war, and the situation in which he now was, this body at once settled a pension on him of $40 a year as long as he should live; and, besides, ordered that three rifles be made in the best possible manner, to present to each of his three sons, that they likewise might see that an enlightened Pennsylvania Legislature were not wanting in acknowledging the services rendered to the State by their father. The good old man, however, took sick and died before the first pension had come to his hands. The rifles to his sons were faithfully delivered to them, and for which they returned their best thanks to that body by a polite letter.

The second is, that, at the time (about the year 1794) when this State was about satisfying their officers and soldiers with donation lands, promised them for services during the war, the Legislature of the State also granted to the Society of United Brethren five thousand acres of excellent land in fee-simple, as an acknowledgment for their faithful labors among the Indians while these had resided in Pennsylvania, and to reimburse them in some measure for expenses they had been at, and losses sustained, while engaged in this laudable undertaking. Their noble-hearted Governor (Thomas Mifflin, Esq.) stood foremost in this matter. After suggesting it first to members of the Legislature, and with whose approbation it met, he next urged the reverend John Ettwein, Bishop of the United Brethren, to make application to the Legislature for the purpose; and the land was granted.

Although the society has been at considerable expense, also, with this land, in attempting to make it productive, (which, however, they as yet have not effected,) yet, they being in nowise shackled with conditions, or put under conditions altogether unattainable for years to come, they can, in the end, lose nothing; since, if their calculation in raising a revenue from the land should fail, they will be able to indemnify themselves for the moneys they had expended thereon by selling a part of it, they holding this land in fee-simple.

JOHN HECKEWELDER.

Statement of Mr. Heckewelder concerning the lands on the Muskingum.

Origin of the Christian Indians' claim to that tract of land on the Muskingum on which the three towns (Schoenbrunn, Gnadenhutten, and Salem) were built; together with a brief relation of subsequent transactions respecting the same, both prior to the grant of twelve thousand acres out of it being made by the Congress of the United States to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, in trust, for the use and benefit of the Christian Indians, including the families of Captains White-eyes and Killbuck, and their descendants, in the number, &c., and afterwards, until the society were put in possession of the said grant; the measures they had taken to get settlers on the land, for the purpose of raising a revenue from it for the purposes intended; as, also, what the fate of this their undertaking had been.

When (about the year 1769) the great council of the Delaware nation, residing on the Muskingum river, had heard that the Six Nations had sold to the white people the lands on the Susquehanna on which the Christian Indian settlements (Wyalusing and Sheshequon) were, they took the distressed state of their kindred friends into serious consideration, and finally granted them a tract out of their land on this river (boundaries described) of nearly thirty miles in length, and which they promised they would neither ever take back again, nor sell to any Power whatever, but that it should remain theirs so long as the sun should shine and the rivers flow with water; and which act of theirs had not only been confirmed in form, by a large belt of wampum being given to the Christian Indians by the great council at the time, but also by another belt being given them by the Wyandot chiefs, in token of their having been witnesses to the act, and under a promise that they would guard and defend these Christian Indians in their right to the land hereby given them against any and all invaders, &c.

And when, in the year 1775, commissioners appointed by the Congress held the first treaty with the western Indians, at Pittsburg, under this authority, they, among other promises made to such nations and tribes who, during the contest, should not take up the hatchet against them, firmly declared that, not only at the end of the contest such nations should have their lands secured to them forever, but that "even this promise now made to them by order of Congress is not alone confined to nations and tribes, but that even detached bodies from such as do not take up the hatchet against them—who have separated themselves from those who do strike them—all such bodies, associations, or communities, as remain at peace with them, shall, if they (the American people) succeed, have, at the termination of the contest, the lands they claim secured to them forever," &c.

When, again, it became known to the hostile Indians that a peace had been concluded between America and Great Britain, and that they, in consequence, might be soon invited by the American people to a treaty, at which they, of course, would have to sacrifice some of their lands for the purpose of burying what was past, and of being again taken by the hand by their American brethren, they, in their deliberations on the subject, agreed not to sell or part with the land they had given to the Christian Indians, but inform the commissioners how this matter stood, and that these Indians had never struck them, but remained their true friends; wherefore they hoped they would confirm their right to them; and when, not long after, a peace had taken place, the United Brethren, by and with the advice of gentlemen of high respectability, (some of whom were members of Congress,) made application to the Congress of the United States for the purpose of having the said lands secured to the Christian Indians, their just claim to these lands had never, that I heard of, been contested; nor could it have been proven, even had it been attempted, that these Indians had forfeited this their land by any one single act they had committed, as being repugnant to the interests of the United States, while they resided on the Muskingum. The sufferings they endured by the enemy were by them ascribed to the attachment they had to the Americans. Even some gentlemen, whose knowledge of the conduct of the Christian Indians was more extensive than others, believed it but justice that, not only all the land they had a claim to should be secured to them, but that they ought to receive an indemnification besides, for all their losses.

Various proposals respecting this matter were sent to the missionaries in Upper Canada, either for their approbation or their rejection. The first were meant to ask of Congress both for an indemnification for our private losses, as also to lay a claim to the improvements which we had made on the Muskingum; the latter, on the usual custom of holding lands by "improvement right," (which had been common before the war, even if such improvement was scarcely visible.)

The missionaries, one and all, rejected for their part both these propositions, on the grounds that it did not become a missionary to serve with a view of being here rewarded for it, nor that of crying down the earthly losses which may fall on him; that doing this would or might lead to a bad precedent; while, on the other hand, they considered the Indians under their care as justly entitled to it; and that the more Congress should be disposed to do for them, the more they should be rejoiced; and as to the lands they had lived on, these were theirs already, by a grant from the nation. A statement of their losses on the Muskingum was, as had been requested, made out, and sent on with our answer. It amounted to the sum of $10,000.

The year 1785 brought us both letters and newspapers, all of which announced that Congress had reserved the three towns, Schoenbrunn, Gnadenhutten, and Salem, in which they formerly had lived, for the Christian Indians, together with a sufficient quantity of land adjoining thereto for use and cultivation; and further, had ordered General Harmar to furnish them with 100 blankets and 500 bushels of Indian corn, on their arrival from Canada in that country; but this (I believe) never was drawn, as unforeseen circumstances prevented them, when, in 1786, they had arrived on the south side of Lake Erie, from going further on than Cayuga; neither had they any way of fetching the corn, &c., they having no horses, and the distance being so great.

On my way from the Indian country to Bethlehem, with my family, in the fall of the year 1786, I was, in every place where I had fallen in with general officers who during the war had, from time to time, been stationed at Pittsburg, congratulated on the pleasing act which Congress had done in securing to the Christian Indians the lands they had formerly lived on; adding that "these Indians were well deserving of it, and that it was the least Congress could do for them, since hundreds of lives had been saved through them," &c. And after my arrival at Bethlehem, I was made fully acquainted with all the transactions which had occurred between the directors of the society and the Congress on that subject. And when, after some time, the Congress were desirous of having an interview with one or more members of the society respecting the state and condition of the Christian Indians, and the land granted to them, I was called upon to accompany the bishop, John Ettwein, to New York, for that purpose.

To meet the object, the Congress had appointed on their part "the Board of Treasury." The questions put to us by the board were answered to their full satisfaction—were entirely directed to missions among the Indians of this country. Mr. Ettwein gave a brief statement of the Brethren's missionary labors among these people, to the time he had visited them on the Muskingum, in the year 1772; when, desiring me to go on with it to the present time, (1787,) I did so. From the tenor of what we had related, the board were satisfied that the Indians might both be civilized and Christianized, if proper measures were taken for the purpose; namely, by sending none but men of piety and good moral character among them as teachers, and to set them a good example; and keeping them out of the way of immoral and debauched white people, whatever they may profess to be, living entirely by themselves, with no more white people about them than were necessary to instruct them in reading, writing, &c., as also in husbandry and the mechanical arts, was accounted as most preferable.

The other point on which the board were desirous of having information, being directed to the three grants of land on the Muskingum, Mr. Ettwein laid his whole plan before them; and which they thought a very good one, if it could be carried into effect. The greatest difficulty that occurred to them appeared to be the getting of good and industrious tenants on the land; and one gentleman of the board observed, "that if we did not go to the expense of cutting out good roads and building mills in the outset, we need not calculate on getting one single tenant that would be worth any thing. Neither could a tenant live, and yet less pay rent, where no mills were, where he could have his grain manufactured into flour, to sell to new comers and travellers for money to pay his rent with," &c. Mr. Ettwein replied, that the Brethren had learned all this by experience: that in making their first settlements in Pennsylvania and North Carolina, which were also in the wilderness, the first thing they did was the opening of roads to the land, and, after having built one or two small log dwellings, they immediately set about building both saw and grist mills; and that, where they found no stream of water on the tract, (as had been the case at Nazareth,) they purchased the nearest tract to it on which a stream fit for mills was: that, even at Gnadenhutten, on the Mahony, (their first Indian settlement, about twenty-seven miles from Bethlehem,) they had built mills, both for the use of themselves and that of the Indians: that his plan with the lands granted was that of forming just such another settlement on one of those tracts as that at Gnadenhutten on the Mahony had been, where those Indians had every advantage of being taught, not only in reading, writing, &c., but agriculture, and some of the most necessary mechanical arts; since a few such mechanics had been settled near them, that they, also, might have an opportunity of learning trades: finally, that those Indians who chose to settle on the land should have their choice out of the three for settling on; and that such tract be left them altogether, for their own use and benefit, but that the other two tracts should be settled by tenants, on lease; and the whole of the rents accruing from these should inure to the sole benefit of the Christian Indians and their descendants, (Killbuck's and White-eyes's families included,) wherever these were settled, provided they were in the congregation; and that, so soon as the society shall have sufficient funds, by means of the rents, a free school for any and all Indian children should be established at the former place, and always remain open for the parents to put their children to for education, if they chose.

From this time forward the society were put to considerable expenses, merely for the purpose of getting the land laid off by a surveyor. In the first instance, I was notified by a district surveyor, at Carlisle, (Major Alexander,) that, as he was going out to survey the military lands, in which the reserved lands for the Christian Indians lay, I should come on and go out with him, that he might first lay off these lands, that he then might know how to run the other lines: but scarcely had I arrived at Carlisle, when he received a letter from Governor St. Clair, forbidding any surveys to be made in that country at this present time, as it would be unsafe, on account of the Indians.

The next call upon the society was by a letter from Captain Hutchins, geographer of the United States, directing me to proceed without delay to New York, and procure a warrant of survey for him for running the three reserved tracts; then to proceed with the same to Pittsburg, where I would find him, and go with him to the lands, which he would survey for us. Although we had gone on as far as Marietta, where he had a small job of surveying to do first, his surveying party down the river were attacked by the Indians, and lost all their instruments, together with their baggage; yet, as the Indians were daily expected to come into a treaty to which they had been invited, I was persuaded to await the result. Being kept for two months in suspense, and it being the dead of winter, I returned again to Bethlehem.

Three months after this, I was again, by a very pressing letter from Colonel Winthrop Sargent, secretary to the Governor of the Western Territory, prevailed on to repair to Marietta, from whence he would go out with me and survey the lands for the society at once. Again, as I had done in the first two instances, I took with me a helping hand. However, on my arrival at Pittsburg, I found matters quite different from what I had expected. No surveyor thought himself safe in the woods; but, to satisfy myself of this, I resolved first to go out to Petquoting, (Haron river,) where at that time the Christian Indians were living, to learn of them the true disposition of the Indians, and whether it would be safe for a surveyor to go out, &c.; and my travelling companion, Mr. Abraham Steiner, being willing to accompany me thither, we entered on the journey; yet not before I had informed Colonel Sargent by letter of my intention, and that, should I find it safe for a surveyor to go out, I would immediately proceed with some of the Christian Indians to the old Moravian towns, and, leaving them there, go on to Marietta, to accompany him up the river to them.

The result of my inquiries among those Indians I had met with was to this effect: that no surveying business could at this present time be done in the Indian country; that orders had been given by the chiefs of the warlike nations that every white man seen with chain and compass on their lands should be considered as an enemy, and treated as such; and that all such Indians who should be found with surveyors should be looked upon as accomplices of these, and equally punished. Thus, the laying off of these granted lands was put to rest for the present; and the war, which immediately commenced in that country, forbade any thing of the kind being done until, after some years, General Wayne had held and concluded a treaty of peace with these hostile nations.

The expenses alone in attempting to have the land laid off to the society, (always the first act to be done on such occasions,) had already by this time become considerable. The society had in nowise been urgent in having the lands surveyed to them; at a time, too, when there was not the smallest prospect that either they or their Indians could go on them. It was, therefore, more to meet the wish of Congress that they obeyed the calls made upon them by officers under their direction, for that purpose, than to gratify their own wishes. The lands adjoining the three grants could not well be laid off for the purposes intended by Congress until the lines of these grants were first ascertained; and as the Congress, at that time, were suffering by a want of money in their treasury, so that they were unable to pay for the surveying of this land, including other contingent expenses appertaining thereto, the Board of Treasury entered into an agreement with the directors of the society, whereby they, (the society,) in the first instance, were to pay all such costs and charges, which, however, should be remitted to them so soon as they should find sufficient funds in their treasury to do it; or, if they then should prefer an equivalent in lands, they should be rewarded in that way. The society did, out of their private funds, defray all the expenses of these unsuccessful attempts to get the lands surveyed, as their books will show.

As the land alluded to had not been surveyed under the warrant which had issued under the authority of the old Congress; and since, by means of the new constitution of the United States, new departments had been established, with officers to superintend these offices; it was thought proper to renew the application for this land, by a petition to the present Congress: which being done, some new difficulties presented themselves; when, however, the matter terminated in granting to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen the three tracts of land called for, &c.

The causes from whence those new difficulties had arisen appeared to flow more from diversity of opinion than from a disposition unfavorable to the cause, or to the case of the Christian Indians. It was alleged that it was to no purpose to grant them land; for, if even they should settle on it, their stay would be of short duration: the Indians, generally, being a wandering people, &c., it would be better to give them the land for occupation only. To which suggestion, Mr. Eitwein, president of the society, replied, that he could not consent to this, as it could not be of any benefit to those Indians, who could get land enough in their own country for that use, without asking for it. Another proposal was, to give to these Indians, instead of the land, a sum of money, as an indemnification for their losses on the Muskingum, and let them settle in their own country, where they pleased, &c. This proposition had been made under an apprehension that they would not be safe in their lives were they to settle on that land, since the frontier settlers might rise upon them a second time, and destroy them altogether. A member from North Carolina, however, and who had been lately Governor of that State, preferred the granting to the society the land in question to make settlements on it; adding, "I would rather see a Moravian settlement on the frontiers than a fortification, since such settlement would afford the country more protection in time of war."

Early in the spring of the year 1797, I received a letter from General Rufus Putnam, at Marietta, who, having been appointed surveyor general in the place of Colonel Thomas Hutchins, deceased, informed me of his intention of surveying the lands on the Muskingum, which had been granted to the society by the Congress to them, early in the ensuing summer; and wishing me to come on prepared with any such further instructions as might be necessary for him to know, so that he might finally meet the wishes of the society with regard to the business he was about to do for them.

Being both acquainted with the situation of the three tracts of land to be laid off for the society, as also with the manner in which the township and range lines in the military tract (within which these lands lay) were to run, I considered it necessary to consult some of the heads of Departments thereon, and learn their opinion; and, having done this, I proceeded on my journey, with their despatches, to the surveyor general. Yet, as I had with me some hands, who were to be employed in laying off farming lots, after the exterior lines being first run, I took these at once on to the ground, and, leaving them there, proceeded on my journey through the woods to Marietta; where, waiting until the general was ready, we, together with his hands, baggage, &c., proceeded up the river to the place of our destination; where the surveying business was done by him with accuracy and despatch, and to the satisfaction of the society.

This job being finished by the general, and the district surveyors under his direction already at work in the military tract—yet, without knowing exactly how far to the north they were to run the range lines, as the east and west boundary line, which was, by treaty, to be the division line between the United States and Indian lands, had not yet been run out; neither, indeed, the exact point (going under the name of "the crossing-place above Fort Lawrence") where this line was to strike generally known—I accompanied the general with some of his hands, to show him this place, about twenty miles up the river; when, after marking a tree, and placing written directions, under a cover of bark, to this tree, for the surveyor who was running this line, and coming on from the western end, or point, we returned together to Marietta; where, after he had finished the returns and plats of his surveys, I took these on to the persons to whom they were directed; when, not long afterwards, a patent for the land, signed by the President of the United States, &c. was, by the Executive, forwarded to the president of the society, &c.

The settling on these lands, for the good purposes intended, became now, with the directors of the society, a matter of importance, and deserving of a due consideration. The question was, whether any of the Christian Indians at Fairfield, in Upper Canada, would be willing to settle on the granted lands; and, if so, which of the three tracts they would choose for themselves to settle on? and in what manner shall the society proceed, both in making a beginning on such tracts as would fall under their especial charge, and, withal, be their duty, to make the best they could out of such lands, for the benefit of those for whom they were intended? from whence were these farmers to come? &c. As I had to accompany a young missionary to Fairfield, in Upper Canada, in the spring of 1798, I was sure of learning, while with them, their determination and decision on all such matters as referred to them; but the prospect of getting good and industrious tenants on that part of the land which was to be leased out was gloomy.

I had learned, at the first place, that a number would come on in the fall, and settle on the northernmost tract, (Schoenbrunn;) and these did come on with the missionaries Zeisberger and Mortimer, and began to build winter huts on the spot since called Goshen.

From Fairfield, I proceeded with the old missionary Edwards, and two smart young Indians I had taken with me, first to Detroit, then round the head of Lake Erie to Gnadenhutzen on the Muskingum, where I arrived on the — of June; and, we having erected on the river bank a bark canoe, I proceeded on to Pittsburg, to take out a couple of good hands that I expected were waiting for me; but, being disappointed, I took the best I could get, since, without help, I could not get along with my work in this new country. Out of four hands that I took in my employ during the summer and fall months, three turned out to be lazy, worthless people. Added to this, I had the misfortune, while in the act of making an axletree for hanging a grindstone, to hit my hand with the axe, so that two of my fingers were nearly cut off close to the hand, and one corner of the axe went quite through the hand; and had not, at that time, an aged Indian been at hand, who daily dressed the wound with the root of the sarsaparilla simmered up in a little water, which kept it fresh and free from mortification, until, after ten days, I was able to go to Pittsburg for the benefit of a surgeon, I probably might have shared the same fate which two men, from cuts not equal to mine, had shared in that excessively hot month, (August,) who, though under the surgeon's care, died in consequence of a mortification taking place.

Such had been my troubles and sufferings already in the first year; and that, too, without seeing anything worth speaking of done. The second and third years were better, but vastly expensive, as I had to bring both workmen and their tools with me from the Atlantic States; and the provisions for these, flour, bacon, &c. having to be brought seventy miles on packhorses, added greatly to this expense.

There are many lessons to learn in making new settlements in a wilderness; and especially at the great distance of four hundred miles, as this was, from Bethlehem, and seventy miles, as the path then went, from the settlement on the Ohio where the nearest mechanics and mills could be met with. Exclusive of expenses which the nature of the case makes indispensable, as that of cutting out wagon roads, and throwing bridges over morasses, so that farmers with teams can get into the country; and the building of a mill so as to serve for temporary use, and until the country be thicklier settled, there are many unforeseen difficulties to encounter—accidents to repair—disappointments, which had occasioned losses, to endure—and, occasionally, extra expenses to be borne with: all which are best known to such who had already, or at the time, engaged in similar enterprises.

A gift of twelve thousand acres of land may appear to some as something extraordinary, and lead to high calculations with regard to the income of rents from such a number of acres of land; while the better informed will confine their calculations within narrower limits, by taking into view situation, nature of the soil throughout, disadvantages the country or district is subjected to with regard to a market for raising money to pay rents with, exclusive of the certainty of losing a part of the rent, both by bad pay and desertion of some of the tenants: all which has to be learned by experience.

Independent of all this, I may add that enterprises of the kind have a tendency of leading to the making of experiments, which do not always answer the intended purposes. Thus the society, in the beginning, granted leases to such tenants as came on the land, which they now find highly detrimental to their interests. With the view of encouraging good, honest, and industrious farmers to take leases of them for twenty-one years, they promised such that, at the expiration of the term, they should be reimbursed for their labors and expenses as regards the buildings they may have erected on the premises, as dwelling-houses, out-houses, barns, &c., according to a fair or just valuation thereof; and which clause had been inserted in the lease under the impression that these should be spacious, comfortable, and durable, especially the dwelling-house, and with a good walled cellar under it, and the barn also of proper dimensions, so as to invite the best of farmers to go on them hereafter, if the tenant himself did not wish to take a new lease. This generous offer of the society, it was supposed, would be of benefit to both parties: to the first tenants, in having a comfortable dwelling for themselves while they dwelt on the premises, besides receiving a sum of money in hand paid them at the end of the term, and besides having the advantage of cutting the timber from the land they lived on, and were clearing off for cultivation; while the new tenant, about entering on such farm, would sooner choose to pay a good rent, where every thing was in order as it ought to be, than a low rent, or perhaps none at all, where only cabins were to be seen on the premises, and those in a state of decay. It is true that the tenant under this long lease was, after the expiration of the first year, bound to pay a yearly rent, divided into three terms, for the first six years, at the rate of — dollars per hundred acres; for the next term of seven years, at the rate of — dollars per year for a hundred acres; and for the last seven years of the term, yearly, — dollars for one hundred acres; but, considering his having the first choice of the land, and in part cleared by the Indians, and fit for the plough, besides the advantage of selling grain to new comers, he could, if he would, pay up his rent without feeling it much, as the land yielded so well, and grain, especially for horse feed, always wanted.

Some few of these tenants did, indeed, pay their rents every year punctually; while others, again, pretended that they had endeavored to do it, but were not able, and these would always hang back; others, again, finding themselves deeper in debt than they believed themselves able to pay, absconded, and went to some other part of the State; their improvements being bad like themselves.

But to come to the point: there were among those who had gone off the premises some who, though they could not find money to pay their rents while on the land, found it easy to enter lands of Congress elsewhere, where they had to pay one-fourth of the purchase money down, and the remainder in three yearly instalments, &c.; and, among those that did stay to the end of the term of their lease, there are some that strive to turn this benevolent act of the society, in rewarding them for their improvements, agreeably to the appraisement, to their interest alone, by taking every advantage of defrauding the society; they, namely, contrive to procure men to raise the valuation on their premises as high as they can, without bringing into consideration in how far they had complied with the stipulations as inserted in their lease, especially as respects the planting of an orchard within the limited time; the dimensions, workmanship, and real value of their buildings; and whether or not they had each paid up their rents, as stipulated in their lease; or even not caring what sums they are in arrears of rent to the society at the time they are making the valuation for them.

And while the society is suffering by means of the causes here stated, they find themselves charged with a heavy tax on the whole of the twelve thousand acres granted them in trust, for the benefit of the Christian Indians, by the Congress of the United States. Yes! they have had to pay, now seven years successively, every year, this tax; a tax which, in my opinion, exceeds the sum actually received for rents of the same year, and that for lands, too, whereof a considerable part (probably some thousand acres) are, and ever will remain untenable, partly on account of their barrenness, but principally by the higher lands being cut up by hills, steep ridges, and gullies; while, again, a great part of the bottom lands cannot be leased out so as to bring a rent, on account of stagnated ponds, some of which, being half a mile and more in length, are not easily drained.

Thus the society, while struggling to remit the sums borrowed at the commencement of their settlement on Musingum, and since, for the purpose of getting tenants on the lands, in order to raise a revenue from them to meet the object for which they were granted, are taught by sad experience that this very land is becoming an insupportable burden to them.

Under such discouraging and distressing circumstances, it cannot be expected that any thing bearing the name of revenue could have arisen from these lands; nor that the society could have the smallest desire of holding them any longer; so that, if the Congress of the United States should consider it expedient, or be disposed to reclaim them, the society, I presume, will have no objection to it; expecting, however, that the moneys they had necessarily expended, both towards obtaining these lands, and for the purpose of raising a revenue from them for the benefit of those Indians concerned, would be refunded to them, and they also be relieved from any and all bargains they had made with tenants, as regards a reimbursement for their buildings by appraisement.

Although the society found themselves disappointed in the calculations they had made of a revenue arising out of the rents, &c., sufficient to supply the wants, &c. of those Indians concerned, yet they did not let these suffer on that account. Nay, these Indians were supplied with all they stood in need of, either by moneys raised among themselves for missionary purposes, or by money borrowed at the time it was wanted.

Neither do the United Brethren, as a body, amass to themselves any thing that belongs to others, or is intended for the benefit of others; nor beguile their consciences, or bring a reproach upon themselves, by appropriating gifts of benevolence intrusted to them for others, to themselves, or for their interest or use. All acts of this kind are held sacred with them.

Their missions, wherever they may be, are principally supported by means of voluntary contributions and collections, made up among themselves, and by the aid they from time to time receive from religious and charitable societies, as also from pious individuals and friends of missions. They (the United Brethren) have never, to my knowledge, been the trumpeters of their doings among the heathen; never sought for applause for the purpose of drawing sums of money from the public, or from private societies. Whenever it has so happened that a collection has been made after the preaching of a mission sermon by one or the other of our city ministers, I always understood that such sermon had been delivered at the pressing request of friends and well-wishers to the cause.

So, likewise, have the very few histories of the Brethren's missions among the Heathen, that have been published by themselves, been brought before the public; not by their own choice, but at the pressing instigation of worthy and pious characters—a number of whom being without the pale of the society.

The society who hold the lands granted to them, in trust, for the Christian Indians, had been led to believe, that, as the intention of Congress had been that a revenue be raised from the lands, by means of rents, sufficient to provide these Indians with ministers to instruct them in religion, and schoolmasters to teach them the arts of reading, writing, &c., as also to answer other good purposes tending to their welfare and happiness, they would be exempt from taxation; the same as was supposed the school lands in the State of Ohio would be. They were further led to believe that, if ever any part of it should be taxed, it would only be such land as was held under a lease, and subject to a yearly rent, whether such be farm lots, town in and out lots, &c.; all which the tenants are, by a clause inserted in their lease, bound to pay, according to the number of acres each held under his lease; but, it was not supposed that on the Schoenbrunn tract, which the Indians entirely possessed, and on which no leases to white farmers could be granted, (it being considered as Indian lands, and these always exempt from taxation while the Indians lived in Pennsylvania,) any taxes would be laid while they resided thereon.

The society, however, finding that the whole of these lands were taxed, and they being unable to bear this burden, as the yearly tax amount exceeded the sum they actually received from the rents, they had no other alternative than that of granting leases to white settlers on the Schoenbrunn tract, on which the Indians were settled; thereby, however, keeping in view the main object, namely: that all the rents, or moneys accruing from rents, on this tract, should be applied to the sole benefit of those Indians who were living on the land; while the tenant would, besides the rents, have to pay the taxes, according to the number of acres he held.

Withal, the society being sensible that, while the whole of these 12,000 acres should be subject to a yearly tax, as they had been for the last — years, it would be impossible for them to calculate on any thing of a revenue arising from them, for the purposes intended—when, of course, the object which the donors (Congress) had in view at the granting of these lands would be totally destroyed—they sought redress by petitioning the Legislature of the State of Ohio for an exemption of taxes, &c.; to which petition, the committee of the Senate, to which the petition had been referred, made the following report, viz:

“On the 30th January, 1821, &c., ——— That they have examined the subject referred to them, and find that the object of the memorialists is to obtain from the State an exemption of taxes on the lands which they hold by grant from the United States, for the purposes as expressed in the caption. The committee find, that the land which has been granted to the society is of very fine quality, and at present in a very good state of improvement, yielding, as they must believe, a considerable revenue; but, as they have no means of ascertaining whether that revenue is faithfully disbursed in effecting the original object of the grant, they do not think it expedient to recommend, at this time, the exemption which is asked for, and therefore submit the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialists be not granted.

“The Senate then took up the report aforesaid, and the same was agreed to.” [From the Journal of the Senate.]

Remark.—Whilst I resided in the State of Ohio, until the fall of the year 1810, being agent of the society, I was in the habit of inquiring of intelligent characters, living in different counties where school lands were let out on rent, what the amount of the rents were from these per year? To which question I universally received the answer, “nothing,” or, sometimes, “next to nothing.” And when I sought counsel of both intelligent and experienced men how to manage with the tenants, so as to make myself sure of rents, &c., these would reply: “This is just what we wish to learn of you!” When, but a fortnight since, I inquired of a very intelligent gentleman, residing in the Ohio purchase, and who was one of the first settlers that came into that country in the fall of the year 1778, to what amount the rents from their school lands came per year? his reply was, “Not half as much as the legislating thereon came to!” And this is the oldest settlement in the State of Ohio.

The society can have no objection in rendering an account of their transactions with regard to the lands granted to them, in trust, for the benefit of the Christian Indians, to the proper authority. They had, from the beginning, been led to consider this as a matter of course, by their late worthy president, the reverend John Ettwein; and who had advised them always to be prepared for it. And I doubt not but that the accounts accompanying the papers (or report) to the President of the United States, to be laid before the Senate, will satisfy that body that the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, on their part, have been faithful to the trust enjoined on them.

[2d SESSION.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF THE INDIAN TITLE TO LAND IN GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 6, 1823.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed, by a resolution of the 30th December last, to “inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation adequate to the purchase of the reservations made in favor of the Creek and Cherokee Indians, within the territory ceded to Georgia,” reported:

That, by articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, the United States became bound “to extinguish, at their own expense, for the use of Georgia, as early as the same can be peaceably obtained on reasonable terms, the Indian title to certain lands, particularly described in the said articles, for which purpose a treaty had been directed to be held with the Creeks;” and, in the same article, it was further stipulated “that the United States shall, in the same manner, also extinguish the Indian title to all the other lands within the State of Georgia.”

That, subsequent to the date of this article, the United States, by two several treaties with the Creek Indians, dated the 9th of August, 1814, and 8th of January, 1821; and several treaties with the Cherokees, dated, respectively, the 8th of July, 1817, and 27th of February, 1819, reserved, for the use of such Indian families as should choose to settle within the State of Georgia, six hundred and forty acres of land, and to their heirs, in fee-simple.

It is the title to these reservations which the State of Georgia now desires to have extinguished. They do not lie contiguous to each other, but are dispersed over and in different parts of the State.

Over these reserves the Indians have formally abandoned their national jurisdiction; the United States, it is presumed, never had any, and none can be exercised by the State of Georgia, without a recognition of the fee-simple title claimed by the Indians, which she supposes inconsistent with her rights under the article of cession.

Under these circumstances, for a more full development whereof they refer to the report of a select committee made on the 7th January, 1822, [See No. 177,] the Committee of Ways and Means suppose the United States are under an obligation to interpose and extinguish the Indian title to these reserves, whenever it can be done on reasonable terms, pursuant to the articles of cession heretofore referred to.

The committee are also led to believe, from the peculiar difficulties in which the possessions of these lands are now involved, with respect to their title, that the present would be a favorable period for the interference of the United States for their extinguishment.

From the best information which the committee have been able to obtain, it is probable that about twenty-one Indian families have availed themselves of the articles of the treaty of 1817, each of whom being entitled to 640 acres of land, would make the number of 13,440 acres to be extinguished under that treaty; that, under the treaty of 1819, there are six families, making 3,840 acres; and under the treaty of 1821, the reservations amount to 5,480 acres; making, in the whole, 22,760 acres to be extinguished by the United States.

It has been supposed, by a public agent appointed by the Governor of Georgia to inquire into this subject, and from whose official report the foregoing estimate is derived, that much of this land may be purchased for less than two dollars per acre, though for another portion a larger sum will be required. It is presumed, however, that the whole quantity may be extinguished for a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars; and the committee, therefore, report a bill accordingly.

TREATIES WITH THE OSAGE, SAC, AND FOX TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 6, 1823.

WASHINGTON, January 6, 1823.

I transmit to the Senate, for their advice and consent as to the ratification, treaties which have been made with the Osage and Sac and Fox tribes of Indians, in execution of the provision contained in the act of the last session entitled "An act to abolish the Indian trading establishments."

JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 4, 1823.

I transmit, herewith, for the consideration of the President, treaties concluded with the Osage and Sac and Fox tribes of Indians since the last session of Congress, for the extinguishment of the treaty obligations on the part of the United States to keep up trading-houses for their benefit.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Articles of a treaty entered into and concluded at the United States factory on the Marie Decine Agency, by and between Richard Graham, agent of Indian affairs, authorized on the part of the United States for that purpose, and the chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the tribes of Great and Little Osage Indians, for themselves and their respective tribes, of the other part.

Whereas, by the second article of the treaty made and entered into between the United States and the Great and Little Osage nation of Indians, concluded and signed at Fort Clark, on the Missouri, on the tenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eight, it is stipulated that the United States shall establish at that place, and permanently continue at all seasons of the year, a well-assorted store of goods, for the purpose of bartering with them on moderate terms for their peltries and furs: Now we, the said chiefs, warriors, and headmen, in behalf of our said tribes, for and in consideration of two thousand three hundred and twenty-nine dollars and forty cents, to us now paid in merchandise out of the United States factory by said Richard Graham, on behalf of the United States, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do exonerate, release, and forever discharge the United States from the obligation contained in the said second article above mentioned; and the aforesaid second article is from the date hereof abrogated and of no effect.

In witness whereof, the said Richard Graham, and the chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the Great and Little Osage tribes, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals this thirty-first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

R. GRAHAM.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the Great and Little Osage tribes.]

Articles of a treaty entered into and concluded at Fort Armstrong, by and between Thomas Forsyth, agent of Indian affairs, authorized on the part of the United States for that purpose, of the one part, and the chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the united Sac and Fox tribes, for themselves and their said tribes, of the other part.

Whereas, by the ninth article of the treaty made and entered into between the United States and the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians, concluded and signed at St. Louis, in the district of Louisiana, on the third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and four, it is stipulated, in order to put a stop to the abuses and impositions which are practised upon the said tribes by the private traders, the United States will, at a convenient time, establish a trading-house or factory, where the individuals of the said tribes can be supplied with goods at a more reasonable rate than they have been accustomed to procure them: Now we, the said chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the said tribes, for and in consideration of the sum of one thousand dollars, to us now paid in merchandise out of the United States factory by said Thomas Forsyth, on behalf of the United States, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do exonerate, release, and forever discharge the United States from the obligation contained in the said ninth article above recited; and the aforesaid ninth article is, from the date hereof, abrogated and of no effect.

In witness whereof, the said Thomas Forsyth and the chiefs, warriors, and headmen of the Sac and Fox tribes, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals this third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

THOMAS FORSYTH, United States Indian Agent.

[2d SESSION.]

EXECUTION OF THE TREATY WITH THE CHOCTAWS, OF THE 18TH OCTOBER, 1820.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 6, 1823.

To the House of Representatives:

FEBRUARY 6, 1823.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th of January last, requesting information "whether the treaty concluded with the Choctaw nation of Indians on the 18th of October, 1820, has been executed, so far as respects the cession of certain lands to said nation west of the Mississippi river, and if possession has been given of the lands ceded to them; if not, that he assign the reasons which prevented the immediate execution of the stipulations of said treaty; and whether the difficulties have diminished or increased by the delay in its execution," I communicate a report from the Secretary of War, with the documents referred to in it.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 4, 1823.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th ultimo, requesting the President of the United States "to inform this House if the treaty concluded with the Choctaw nation of Indians on the 18th day of October, 1820, has been executed, so far as respects the cession of certain lands to said nation west of the Mississippi river, and if possession has been given of the lands ceded to them; if not, that he assign the reasons which prevented the immediate execution of the stipulations of said treaty; and whether the difficulties have diminished or increased by the delay in its execution," has the honor to state that, soon after the ratification of the treaty referred to, the necessary measures were adopted by this Department for the execution of the stipulations mentioned in the foregoing resolution of the House of Representatives, and in pursuance of which the boundary line of the land ceded to the Choctaws west of the Mississippi was ascertained and marked by the commissioner appointed for that purpose; a copy of which report is herewith enclosed. And considerable efforts were made, through a special agent appointed for the purpose, in virtue of a stipulation in said treaty, upon the recommendations of Generals Jackson and Hinds, the commissioners who negotiated it, to induce the Choctaws to remove and settle there, (a copy of the instructions to this agent are enclosed,) but without success, as will be seen by the accompanying extracts of letters from the special agent (here referred to,) and the agent to the Choctaw nation to this Department on the subject. These extracts will also explain the causes of the failure, the principal one of which, it is believed, is to be found in the number of white settlements in the country ceded to the Choctaws. The Department has no information that will enable it to say whether the difficulties have diminished or increased by the delay in the execution of the treaty.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 27, 1821.

The sum of $65,000 was appropriated by Congress to carry into effect the treaty concluded with the Choctaw nation on the 18th of October last, a copy of which is herewith enclosed.

You are charged with the superintendence of the execution of that part of the treaty which provides for the migration of the Choctaws to the country which has been ceded to them beyond the Mississippi, which it is desirable should be done upon the most economical terms, and with as little delay as possible.

The superintendent of Indian trade will be instructed to forward to Natchez, as soon as practicable, subject to your order, 500 blankets, 500 kettles, 500 rifle guns, with bullet moulds and wipers for each, 1,000 pounds rifle powder, and a proportionate quantity of lead. Should a greater number of these articles, in your opinion, be required, you will immediately inform this Department, and state the probable number that will be required: it will be forwarded without delay.

The quantity of corn which may be necessary to supply the number of Indians that may be disposed to emigrate on their journey, you will purchase on the best terms you can; a further supply, if it should be required, will be furnished after their arrival in their new country, agreeably to the treaty, by Captain George Gray, the Indian agent on Red river, who is instructed to perform the duties of agent to them.

In order that Captain Gray may be prepared to meet the Indians, and make the necessary provision for them, you will correspond with him, and advise him of the probable time of their arrival, and of their number.

Mr. Folsom, who was recommended by Generals Jackson and Hinds as a suitable person for the purpose, has been appointed agent, (the appointment is herewith enclosed, to be forwarded to him,) under your direction, to collect all the Choctaws who are desirous of removing beyond the Mississippi, and to conduct them thither.

Mr. Folsom will correspond with you relative to his duty, and report to you, from time to time, the number of the Indians who declare their intention to emigrate, distinguishing the number of men, women, and children; from which you will regularly register them in a book to be kept for that purpose at the agency, until the 22d day of December next, being one year from the ratification of the treaty. All who intend to emigrate, and wish to avail themselves of the provisions of the treaty, must do so before the period just mentioned, as after that time the provision for emigrants made by the treaty will cease, and no corn or other articles will be issued by the United States.

When any number of Indians are collected, and ready to start on their journey, the agent will inform you of the fact, and make a return to you of the precise number, particularly distinguishing the number of warriors; upon which returns, duly certified by him, you will issue a sufficient quantity of corn to each family or individual, for their support on the way. The articles to be given to the warriors will not be delivered to them until they are about to cross the Mississippi; and you will select some point on the river, convenient to the place where the emigrants shall cross, to which the articles can be transported for delivery.

You will take the receipt of the agent on all such returns, specifying the quantity of corn and number of articles delivered to the Indians by you, and transmit the same to this Department, with your accounts as vouchers. These returns will be also registered in the book to be kept at the agency.

All those who have separate settlements, which fall within the limits of the land ceded by the Choctaw nation to the United States, and who desire to remain where they now reside, in order to avail themselves of the privilege secured to them by the ninth article of the treaty, must make known their intention to remain within one year from the ratification of the treaty, and enrol their names upon the register which you are required to keep open at the agency until that time for the purpose; otherwise, they will lose the benefit of the privilege. This register will be closed at the period mentioned, certified by you, and transmitted to this Department, with the register of the emigrants, certified in like manner.

You will be particular in ascertaining, yourself, or by the agent, the number and names of those who prefer removing from the land ceded to the United States to taking reservations, and actually do so within the time limited; as all such are to be paid by the United States for their improvements, agreeably to a valuation to be made by commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States.

The lines of the land ceded by the Choctaw nation to the United States will be run out immediately by the public surveyor, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; those of the land ceded to the Choctaw nation will be run out by a commissioner; and Henry D. Downs, of Mississippi, has been appointed. His commission and instructions are herewith enclosed to you, to be forwarded to him.

Elder Brashears, Esq., of Mississippi, was also recommended for this duty by Generals Jackson and Hinds; but, as one would be sufficient, Mr. Downs, being the first named, was selected. Lest, however, he should be unwilling to serve, I have also enclosed a commission and instructions for Mr. Brashears, which you will forward only in case of Mr. Downs declining the appointment. The remaining stipulations of the treaty will claim the attention of the Government in due time.

You will transmit an estimate of the probable amount of funds which will be required for the purchase of corn and for other expenses which may necessarily arise on account of emigration from the Choctaw nation, and it will be remitted to you from the Treasury. The disbursement of these funds will be accounted for separately from those disbursed for your agency, as they are furnished from a distinct appropriation.

I have, &c.

WILLIAM WARD, Esq., Choctaw Agent.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 27, 1821.

I enclose you a regular appointment as agent to collect all the Choctaws who may be disposed to emigrate, agreeably to the late treaty, to the country ceded to them beyond the Mississippi, and to conduct them thither.

Mr. Ward, the Choctaw agent, has been instructed to take immediate measures for the emigration of the Choctaws; and you will correspond with him and take his instructions upon all points connected with your duty. You will, in conjunction with Mr. Ward, fix upon the best and speediest mode of ascertaining the number of those that may be disposed to emigrate, and of making your reports to him, from which he is required to keep a register of the whole number of emigrants, distinguishing men, women, and children, at the agency. When all that intend to emigrate are collected together and about to commence their journey, provisions will be issued to them by Mr. Ward, on your return of the number, in which you will be particular in distinguishing the number of warriors. The articles for the warriors will be delivered to them when they are about to cross the Mississippi.

Since the conclusion of the treaty, the Department has learned that the boundary line of the land ceded to the Choctaw nation, from Red river to the Arkansas, as fixed by the treaty, will probably materially affect the white population in the Arkansas Territory; and it is the intention of the President, if that should be the case, as soon as the line is run out by the commissioner who has been appointed for the purpose, and his report is received, (in which he is instructed to state the number of white inhabitants, and the position of the settlements that will be materially affected by it, and at what point a line could be drawn, deviating as little as possible from that called for by the treaty, which would the least interfere with them,) to propose to the Indians to alter the line accordingly, making to them a suitable compensation for the portion of territory they will give up by the alteration. With a view to this arrangement, it is the wish of the President that the Choctaws should not settle in the neighborhood of the whites, but that they should settle sufficiently far west to prevent collisions between them.

You will apprise the Indians of the difficulty that exists with respect to the line as it is fixed by the treaty, and of the intention of the President to propose an alteration of it; and endeavor to prepare them for a favorable result, and, in the mean time, to locate them so far west as will not interfere with the intention of the Government.

You will be allowed $1,000 in full for the service which is required of you by the appointment that has been conferred upon you, which will be paid upon the joint certificate of Mr. Ward and Captain Gray that it has been faithfully performed.

I have, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

Mr. EDMUND FOLSOM, Agent, &c., Mississippi.

SIR:

CHOCTAW AGENCY, November 24, 1821.

I have the honor to inform you that I received your appointment on the 7th of last April as agent to conduct the Choctaw emigrants beyond the Mississippi, if any should choose to go; at which time I commenced on that business of travelling to and fro through the nation, collecting and talking to the Indians, and making all efforts in my power to start them; but, in consequence of the great opposition of the headmen of the Indians, and the white people that live amongst them, my efforts have all proved in vain; but still I have hopes that there will go a great many of them next year, such as half-breeds and their connexions. I have gained the ill-will of the Choctaw Indians, and made my friends my foes. They have threatened to drive me out of the nation, and some of their leaders have called me a liar and a carrier of lying talks; and some of them have gone so far as to threaten my life, in consequence of my exertions to take them beyond the Mississippi. Since I commenced my operations, I have not been furnished any money to bear my expenses, except twenty dollars the agent lent me. I want you to furnish me money quarterly to carry this business into effect, as I cannot do any thing without money; but, if you furnish me with funds, I will make use of all exertions in my power. I have been engaged in this business almost eight months, but I have not given up the business as yet. I think, after the Indians move off the ceded lands, and get satisfied with the treaty, many will go off with me; but, as yet, I am opposed in every part of the country by the Indians and every white man in it, except the agent and Mr. Mackey, the interpreter, both of whom have got much ill-will for encouraging this matter.

I have the honor to be, sir, yours, most respectfully,

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN.

EDMUND FOLSOM.

DEAR SIR:

ARKANSAS, June 25, 1821.

I take the liberty to suggest to you the propriety of remitting me money to pay the incidental charges of running the line of the land ceded by the United States to the Choctaw nation west of the Mississippi. Provisions and other necessary supplies cannot be purchased at a reasonable price on a credit. Should you think proper to send me money by mail, you will please write to the Little Rock, Arkansas Territory.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient, humble servant,

HENRY D. DOWNS, Commissioner and Agent.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

WARRENTON, MISSISSIPPI, December 24, 1821.

In obedience to your instructions to me, I have run, according to the treaty, the eastern line of the land ceded by the United States to the Choctaw nation west of the Mississippi; beginning at the mouth of the Little river; running thence down Red river, to a point three miles below the mouth of Little river; running thence north, twenty-nine degrees and fifteen minutes east, one hundred and fifteen miles ten chains and fifty links, to a post on the south bank of the Arkansas river, where the lower boundary line of the Cherokees strikes the same; running thence, with the course of the Arkansas river, to the mouth of the Canadian fork; a plat of which survey is herewith enclosed, and a map subjoined thereto of the country west of the eastern boundary, which is settled by the whites, designating the position of the settlements; which map, and the field notes accompanying the same, you will please consider as a part of this report, to which I refer you for a more particular description of the line, and for some other information not herein detailed. The connexions of surveys marked in the map were surveys made prior to the Choctaw treaty. The settlements in the Arkansas are immediately on the river, extending from the eastern boundary nearly as far west as the mouth of the Canadian fork. The settlements in Red river also extend from the eastern boundary, westerly, as far as the Kiamicia, and are more widely spread than they are in the Arkansas. A direct line from the mouth of the Potcau to the mouth of Kiamicia would not relieve the white settlers, as was expected; therefore, the line that I have considered it best to suggest to you for that purpose will be a direct line from the junction of the Canadian with the Arkansas to the mouth of Jack's fork of the Kiamicia; thence down Kiamicia river to Red river. This contemplated line would include about three hundred and seventy-five families, averaging about seven persons to a family, and about six million five hundred thousand acres of land, which would be, from the best information which I have been able to obtain, only a very small part of the Choctaw cession.

I have the honor to be, with regard, your obedient, humble servant,

HENRY D. DOWNS, Commissioner, &c.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

Sunday, August 19, 1821.—From the mouth of Little river, run down Red river, north, 71 degrees east, 15 chains; north, 84 degrees east, 10 chains; south, 80 degrees east, 10 chains; south, 70 degrees east, 40 chains; north, 70 degrees east, 25 chains; north, 25 degrees east, 20 chains; north, 70 degrees east, 10 chains; east, 20 chains; south, 70 degrees east, 10 chains; south, 62 degrees east, 40 chains; south, 46 degrees east, 20 chains; south, 20 degrees east, 10 chains; south, 4 degrees east, 10 chains, to a dogwood on the banks of the Red river, three miles below Little river, marked U. S. on the southeast side, C. N. on the northwest side; a sweet gum tree, north, 27 degrees west, distance 123 links, for a pointer; also, a hickory, south, 81 degrees east, distance 1 chain 13 links; distance across Red river 181½ yards.

Tuesday, 21st—Beginning at a dogwood three miles below Little river; thence, north, 20 degrees 15 minutes east, on the line between the United States and the Choctaw nation, run six miles; land a great proportion fit for cultivation.

Wednesday, 22d—At 7 miles, crossed a creek called Bodeark, waters of Red river; camped that night 14 miles from Red river; hills and flats; some part fit for cultivation.

Thursday, 23d—Run 5 miles; camped at 19 miles from Red river; passed some farms; land rich, full of oyster and clam shells; waters of Ozan.

Friday, 24th—At 20 miles 40 chains, crossed Ozan, a large creek, waters of Little Missouri; camped a week, in order to make arrangements for crossing the mountains between us and the Arkansas.

Sunday, 2d September—Continued the line, and camped 26 miles from Red river; timber, pine and white oak; flats and small hills; soil of inferior quality.

Monday, 3d—Crossed Little Missouri at 27 miles and 43 chains; some cane on both sides, but too wet for cultivation; camped at 30 miles from Red river; last three miles, poor pine hills.

Tuesday, 4th—Waited to get corn ground.

Wednesday, 5th—At 33 miles, crossed Wolf creek; at 36 miles and 54 chains, crossed a small creek; at 37 miles, camped; rocks and mountain land, unfit for cultivation.

Thursday, 6th—At 39 miles and 72 chains, crossed Aulevine, a large creek, waters of Washita; at 41 miles and 7 chains, crossed again; at 41 miles and 22 chains, crossed again; at 43 miles, camped; rocky hills and mountains, unfit for cultivation.

Friday, 7th—Run 6 miles; camped at 49 miles from Red river; land level, chiefly unfit for cultivation.

Saturday, 8th—Crossed Fourche au Caddo at 50 miles and 30 chains; camped at 56 miles; land poor and hilly.

Sunday, 9th—At 60 miles and 30 chains, crossed a large creek; land unfit for cultivation; camped.

Monday, 10th—At 65 miles and 75 chains, crossed Basset's creek; at 66 miles, crossed another creek; timber, pine; hills and flats, unfit for cultivation.

Tuesday, 11th—At 70 miles and 3 chains, the northeast bank of the Washita; at 71 miles and 40 chains, crossed a large creek running northwest; camped here.

Wednesday, 12th—At 72 miles, crossed said creek; at 73 miles, crossed again to west side; bottoms caney.

Saturday evening, 15th—Run 3 miles on the line over a high rocky mountain; camped here.

Sunday, 16th—Run 7 miles; camped at 84 miles from Red river; crossed the Dardinelle trace at 83 miles and 75 chains; hills and flat land; inferior quality of soil.

Monday, 17th—Run 5 miles; crossed a high rocky mountain 3 miles over, and camped on the north side, at 89 miles from Red river.

Tuesday, 18th—Run 5 miles, and camped at 94 miles from Red river; rocky mountains; land unfit for cultivation.

Wednesday, 19th—Run 3 miles over rocky mountains, and camped at 97 miles from Red river; unfit for cultivation.

Thursday, 20th—Run 4 miles, and camped on the south side of Fourche la Five, 101 miles from Red river.

Friday, 21st—Crossed Fourche la Five, run 4 miles, and camped on the south side of Cypress mountain, at 105 miles from Red river; land flat and wet, chiefly unfit for cultivation.

Saturday, 22d—At 109 miles, the north side of Cypress creek mountain; at 109 miles and 70 chains, crossed Cypress creek; at 110 miles, flat oak land; at 111 miles, camped.

Sunday, 23d—At 115 miles 10 chains and 50 links, the south bank of the Arkansas river. The corner, a post marked on the south side 115 miles 10 chains 50 links; on the west side C. N.; on the east side U. S.; distance from the Cherokee corner, on the north bank of the river, 1 mile and 30 chains; Arkansas river 630 yards wide.

October 4th—Started from a post on the south side of the Arkansas, opposite the lower boundary of the Cherokees, to meander the Arkansas; the river, downwards, bearing north, 40 degrees east; Petit John mountain bearing south, 80 degrees west.

No. 193.

[2d Session.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF INDIAN TITLE TO LANDS IN FAVOR OF CERTAIN STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 13, 1823.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States, in relation to the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands in any State where the right of soil is claimed by any individual State, &c., [vide No. 184,] reported:

Previous to the 18th December, 1789, the right of soil in the public domain, in the then district of Kentucky, was vested in the State of Virginia; at which time the Legislature of Virginia assented to the formation of a free, independent, and sovereign State from said district, now constituting the State of Kentucky. In the act authorizing the formation of said State, which contains a compact between the parent State and that to be formed, among other things it was stipulated that the unlocated lands, appropriated by the State of Virginia, on account of military or other services, should be subject to location, and to be disposed of by said State, until the 1st day of May, 1792; after which time, the residue of unlocated lands should be subject to the disposition of the proposed State of Kentucky. From the unquestionable right of Virginia, and from the act authorizing Kentucky to form a constitution, and by her admission into the Union, the right of soil in the unlocated lands within her limits became vested in the State of Kentucky.

On the — day of December, 1789, the State of North Carolina gratuitously ceded to the United States the territory now formed into the State of Tennessee; and this cession was accepted, subject to certain conditions contained in the deed of cession, ratified by Congress on the 2d of April, 1790. It was expressly agreed that all grants belonging to the soldiers of the continental line, their heirs and assigns, should be satisfied out of any lands in the ceded territory, after the lands previously set apart for that purpose, fit for cultivation, had been located; and that all lands granted by, or claimed by entry, occupancy, and pre-emption from, the State of North Carolina, should be as valid as though the country had not been ceded to the United States. The right of soil, if any had remained, (which it is believed will not,) after providing for the claims recognised as valid by the cession, is in the United States. Nothing is said in the act of cession as to the extinguishment of Indian title for the exclusive benefit of the citizens of North Carolina and Tennessee, who held the right of locating the land so soon as the Indian title was extinguished. The practice elsewhere under the Government, and the circumstance that the United States can scarcely hope, in any event, for the least remuneration for expenditures of money in holding the treaties and the purchase of the land, are far from leading to a belief that the United States were under any obligation to extinguish Indian title in Tennessee. The only circumstance on which any such obligation can be predicated is, the promise to hold valid all claims derived from North Carolina; which stipulation could unquestionably be carried into effect without imposing on the United States a new and independent obligation—that of purchasing the claim of others, or extinguishing the Indian claim.

The States of New York and North Carolina, having achieved their independence in the revolutionary war, established their right to the public domain within their chartered limits, on the extinguishment of the Indian title within those limits.

The States of New York, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee are the only States where the Indian title has been extinguished, so far as known to your committee, by the United States, without the consideration having been paid by the State within which the lands have been acquired, except within the State of Georgia, where the United States are bound by compact to extinguish the Indian title. After the formation of the constitution of the United States, the first article of the tenth section was supposed to have prohibited any State from holding a treaty with the Indians; and the twelfth section of the act of 30th March, 1802, expressly prohibited them. After the latter period, and in some instances previously, when any State desired a treaty for lands within its limits, commissioners were appointed by the United States, who held the treaty in presence of an agent of the State, and the payment of the purchase money was promised to be made by the State for whose benefit the treaty was made. All these treaties have undergone the usual formalities of ratification directed by the constitution of the United States.

The committee find that, on the 9th day of January, 1789, a treaty was held at Fort Harmar, recognising the treaty held at Fort Stanwix on the 22d of October, 1784, with the Six Nations of Indians, by which New York procured an extinguishment of Indian title. The consideration to be paid by the United States was three thousand dollars, in goods.

On the 11th of November, 1794, by treaty held at Canandaigua, a further extinguishment of Indian title was procured in the State of New York. The consideration for that purchase was the sum of three thousand dollars, which had been promised the Six Nations of Indians by a treaty of the 23d of April, 1792, and the additional sum of fifteen hundred dollars, to be expended annually in purchasing clothing, domestic animals, and implements of husbandry, and in encouraging useful artificers to reside in their villages. Your committee do not know that the United States were bound to make these expenditures, or that they have ever been reimbursed.

On the 2d of October, 1798, by a treaty with the Cherokee nation of Indians, held at or near Tellico, the United States acquired lands within the State of Tennessee. The consideration for this purchase was five thousand dollars, paid at the time of the treaty, and an annuity of one thousand dollars to be added to the former annuity, making an annuity of six thousand dollars. On the 25th of October, 1805, by a treaty held at Tellico with the Cherokee nation of Indians, the United States procured a further extinguishment of title to lands within the State of Tennessee, for which there was paid, at the time of the treaty, and within ninety days thereafter, fourteen thousand dollars, and an annuity of three thousand dollars promised. At the same place, and between the same parties, on the 27th of October, 1805, the United States paid the sum of sixteen hundred dollars for the further extinguishment of Indian title in Tennessee.

At a treaty held at the Cherokee agency, on the 8th day of July, 1817, with the Cherokee Indians, which was altered, and the provisions enlarged, by a treaty held at the city of Washington on the 27th of February, 1818, a portion of territory was acquired within the limits of Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina; but the quantity in each your committee have no means of ascertaining. The consideration of this treaty consisted of a tract of country west of the Mississippi river reservations; pay for the improvements on the ceded land; a rifle gun, blanket, &c. to those who chose to emigrate, the value or amount of which your committee do not know.

On the 23d day of July, 1805, a treaty was concluded between the United States and the Chickasaw nation of Indians, in the Chickasaw nation, by which lands in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee were acquired, and for which the United States paid twenty-two thousand dollars, and an annuity of one hundred dollars to the king of the nation, exclusive of expenses incident to running the lines of the tract ceded, &c. On the 19th of October, 1818, a treaty was concluded by the United States with the Chickasaw Indians, by which the residue of the Indian title in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee was extinguished, and for which the United States promised to pay twenty thousand dollars annually, for fifteen years, amounting to three hundred thousand dollars, and other sums to individuals, to the amount of seven thousand two hundred and twenty dollars.

These several sums, expended and to be paid for the extinguishment of Indian title in the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky, have not, or any portion of them, as your committee believe, been refunded to the United States; in all other cases, so far as your committee have been able to ascertain, the commissioners on the part of the United States have promised a consideration, to be paid by the State which desired the extinguishment, or whose citizens claim the right of soil.

Your committee, not being directed to bring their inquiries to any act of legislation, have reported the facts, which was all they conceived it was their duty to do. We, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the President's message, in relation to the extinguishment of Indian title to lands, the right of soil in which is claimed by any individual State.

ACCOUNTS OF SUPERINTENDENTS AND AGENTS FOR INDIAN AFFAIRS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 19, 1823.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 18, 1823.

I have the honor to transmit, herewith, for the information of the House of Representatives, a report of the Second Auditor, accompanied by copies of the accounts of superintendents and agents for Indian affairs, prepared in pursuance of the third section of the act of Congress, passed 6th May, 1822, "to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers,' approved 30th March, 1802."

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. P. P. BARBOUR, Speaker of the House of Representatives U. S.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 18, 1823.

In obedience to the provisions of the act of the 6th May, 1822, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers,' approved the 30th March, 1802," I have the honor to transmit you, herewith, copies of all such accounts as have been rendered to this office by persons charged or intrusted with the disbursement or application of money, goods, or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, from the 1st January to the 1st September, 1822, as per schedule of the same, (marked S. No. 2,) together with a list of the names (marked S. No. 1) of all persons to whom money, goods, or effects have been delivered within the same period, specifying the amount and object for which they were intended, and showing who have been delinquent in forwarding their accounts.

The delay in rendering these statements has been unavoidable, from the retard in many of the returns, owing to the distance of some of the agents, and the pressure of business in the office.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM LEE.

Hon J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

REMARKS.

Of the issues in April, 867 complete rations were on account of the blacksmith at Saginaw; his allowance of provisions is terminated. No officer in the department at Detroit draws provisions.

Of the issues in June, 578 pounds of flour and 400 pounds of pork were sent to St. Joseph's, to be issued by the sub-agent.

140 complete rations were issued by the commissary upon the return of Solomon W. Hendricks, a Seneca Indian, by virtue of special authority from the War Department, and are included in the issues for August.

NOTE.—The payments to expresses and for the transportation of annuities are not included in this abstract. The amount allowed for services in these cases cannot be separated from the expenses; and the insertion of the whole sum would exhibit an erroneous result in a return purporting to be for services only. The same remark will apply to a few charges in which the materials as well as the mechanical labor made part of the charge; but a statement of all these disbursements will be found in the quarterly abstracts of expenditures, transmitted herewith.

No. 195.

[2d SESSION.]

FLORIDA INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 21, 1823.

Mr. METCALFE made the following report:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the Indians in Florida, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

Deeply impressed with the importance and high responsibility of the duties assigned them, and reflecting upon the ineffectual and generous efforts of the Christian, the philosopher, and the statesman, to promote the civilization and happiness of those children of nature, your committee commenced their investigations with feelings of doubt and hesitancy, though not without a strong hope that their inquiries might lead to the adoption of a system of measures by which the condition of the Florida Indians might be ameliorated, and an opportunity afforded to the few who remain within that territory to advance in the acquirements of civilized societies, by which alone they are likely to be saved from total extinction.

As the original proprietors of all the territory in question, those Indians may appeal, not only to all the best feelings of our nature, to the sympathy and benevolence of the Christian and the philanthropist, but to the justice and clemency of the statesman, upon whose fiat their future happiness and prosperity so materially depend. Confidently believing that one common feeling, favorable and friendly towards the red children in question, pervades the bosom, not only of every representative of the National Legislature, but of every enlightened citizen in the Union, the committee deem it unnecessary to urge the right of those Indians to our protection, or the moral obligation upon this Government to extend that protection, without which the whole race must inevitably perish, as they are now cut off from, and cannot retreat to, the wilderness, where, if we could send them, it would be at a vast expense, and contrary to their will, and where they could disappear but for a short time, before they would again be overtaken and borne down by that wave of white population which is rolling onward with such rapid and resistless pressure. How are we to render their condition more comfortable and happy? What plan shall we devise and pursue for the promotion and final success of an object so desirable? The committee acknowledge the difficulties presented, but in proportion to those difficulties will be the honor due to those who may devise and adopt a system of measures at once so laudable, just, and benevolent.

A broad field for tried and untried experiment now lies before us, and, in the selection of measures upon which it may be said that the rights of human nature so materially depend, your committee believe that the plan which is most simple and the most natural is likely to be the most effectual, and that a departure from those principles was the great error in the regulations heretofore adopted with the various remnants of tribes, who, surrounded by our settlements, remain upon their respective reservations of land, which they hold in common, and not individually, in fee simple. Encompassed about by such a power as this, what can they do? They do not form independent communities, but are dependant upon our will, and yet without the pale of our laws. The total failure of this system to produce any beneficial effect has proven, as far as the test of actual experience can go to prove, the inexpediency of continuing and extending a similar system of measures to those with whom we are now about to commence our operations. Here we cannot come into conflict with State sovereignties. Aided by all the lights of experience which have been shed upon this interesting subject, we are at liberty to pursue the dictates of our own feelings and judgments.

It would be useless and improper to tax the time and attention of members who are already well acquainted with the history of the several remnants of tribes who, from time to time, have been cut off from their hunting grounds, and confined within certain limits in the different States, with a detailed account of the regulations which have been devised and pursued for the improvement of their condition. The regulations which have been adopted in the United States and in Canada are not materially different. They have not only been unsuccessful, but we know that the objects of our solicitude, daily sinking in vice and immorality, are exceedingly degraded, and gradually wasting away. The causes that contribute to this effect among the Indians within the several States it may be difficult to remove; but in Florida it is believed they may be avoided at the commencement. Hitherto, the policy of this Government has been at war with its own professions. The Indian is called by the endearing name of brother, and he is told that we are religiously bound, by the most sacred injunction, to do unto others as we would that others should do unto us; at the same time we exclude them from any participation in the benefits of our civil and social institutions. We treat the whole race as if they were not the descendants of Adam; and thus we baffle and tantalize the Christian, who labors for their moral and religious instruction; and hence the delusions of many wise and pious clergymen, whose efforts in their behalf, though unavailing, reflect upon them the highest honor.

The Indian, at a loss how to reconcile the friendly professions of the Christian, who labors for their moral and religious improvement, with the cruel treatment inflicted upon them by the Government, doubts the sincerity of the Christian; his jealousies and suspicions are excited, and the most bitter enmity to the whites rankles in his bosom. In Canada, also, this system of embodying them together, and confining them within the narrow limits of small reservations of land, has been adopted; and here, too, after centuries of trial under the guidance and care of the priesthood, no beneficial effect is perceptible. It appears, from the history of all the experiments which have been made in this way, either in the United States or in Canada, that, instead of the favorable results which were anticulated, those Indians are exceedingly degraded; and that, depopulating, they dwindle into insignificance, and must soon disappear entirely. It appears that, under European domination, the Indians of New Spain (now of the provinces of Mexico) were shut up in a narrow space of 600 varas (500 metres) of radius, equal to 1,640 feet, assigned, by an ancient law, to the natives, where they may be said to have no individual property, and are bound to cultivate the common property. And we are informed by that wise and respectable man who was formerly bishop and chapter of Mechoacan, that the law prohibited the mixture of castes: it prohibited the whites from taking up their residence in the Indian villages, and prevented the natives from establishing themselves among the Spaniards. And the bishop informs us that this state of insulation opposes obstacles to civilization. After the conquest of this country by the Spaniards, the conquered people were shared out, and the Indians, divided into tribes of several hundreds of families, had masters named to them in Spain from among the soldiers who had acquired distinction. From that period they have been oppressed and enslaved by the Europeans generally, and especially by the generals, the magistrates, the monks, and clergymen; many of the latter of whom, it is said, possess greater revenues than some of the sovereign princes of Germany. No validity being given to their contracts, they have been doomed to a perpetual minority. On account of their color, they have been degraded by law, as well as by the force of opinion. The effect of such oppression is always a corruption of morals. It must be acknowledged that such oppression and degradation is calculated to weaken the moral energies of the man, and to discourage and paralyze his exertions to honorable action; and yet it appears that, in Mexico, there are examples of talents among the Indians, natural and acquired, even in the fine arts and belles-lettres; that scintillations of genius sometimes break forth from among those sons of oppression, that would do honor to any age or nation. The committee concur in the opinion that man, in all parts of the world, where he has had opportunities of improvement, no matter where born, or of whom descended, is always the master-piece of nature's works, and the only master of arts.

In the first volume of the executive papers communicated to the second session of the fifteenth Congress will be found, in a letter written by the honorable J. R. Poinsett, a very instructive account of the various regulations and changes in the mode of treating the Indians of New Spain. This letter corroborates the historical account given by Humboldt, and reflects additional light upon the subject.

On the first conquest of the country, the Indians were sold into captivity, and thousands perished under the hard treatment of their cruel masters. The first attempt at amelioration was the repartimientos de Indios, by which they were divided among the Spaniards, who had the profits of their labor, without a right of property in their persons. Next, the encomiendas, by which they were placed under the superintendence of the Spaniards. An encomiendero was appointed, and bound to live in the district which contained the Indians of his encomienda, to watch over their conduct, instruct, and civilize them, &c. They were next confided to the care of missionaries and doctrinal curates. Thousands of these unfortunate people were marched every year to Potosi, to labor in the mines. Under the variety of changes and modifications in their civil and political relations, they experienced but little amelioration of condition. Besides the exactions of the Spanish Government, the corregidor, the alcaldes, the encomiendero, the missionaries, and other officers, at the same time, or alternately, became their avaricious and cruel oppressors. They were prohibited the use of fire-arms, and, consequently, were the victims of oppression to comparatively few in numbers. But the revolutionary Government, immediately on its installation, released them from the service of the mita, (personal service in the mines,) which was the most obnoxious to them. The tribute was continued from necessity, as it afforded a revenue which could not be relinquished at that period. In 1814, they were relieved from the payment of the tribute, and took an active part in favor of the creoles. The first step of the independent Government of Mexico was to remove all the restrictive regulations by which the Indians were kept in the state of minority and pupillage; and, to the honor of that Government, they now enjoy all the rights and immunities of other citizens. About nine-tenths of the inhabitants of those provinces are said to be Indians and castes; and it appears that, within the last fifty years, instead of diminishing, they have increased in numbers, notwithstanding the injuries they have sustained. In the interior of the United States, their numbers are not more than a unit among thousands. No danger to the whites can be apprehended under any system that may be adopted. Shall we turn our backs upon and refuse to cherish and protect the few apparently dying embers of the aboriginal Americans? In carrying into effect the views suggested by the committee, a due regard can and ought to be had to the rights and interests of the white citizens, and to the increasing prosperity of the Territory.

By referring to the documents which were communicated to the committee by the honorable Secretary of War, it will be found that, previous to the cession of Florida to the United States, the Indians were incorporated among the subjects of His Catholic Majesty; and that each Indian had a right to land, as well as, and on the same footing with, white, free black, and colored subjects, in any part of the province; a right to lands individually, but none nationally, as the full and complete jurisdiction and sovereignty was vested in, and exercised by, the Spanish Government.

It must be admitted that this system combined benevolence in its leading principles, and that, in practice, it exhibited a perpetual reciprocity of interest. Under it, the Seminole Indians had attained, and were in the enjoyment of, no inconsiderable portion of prosperity and happiness. It is stated by Captain Bell, that this nation was, before the destruction of their settlements in 1812, numerous, proud, and wealthy; possessing great numbers of cattle, horses, and slaves. And it appears from the statement of George J. F. Clarke, that "since the death of King Payne, who died in the field, with Roman dignity, at the destruction of their settlements in Alachua, during the troubles of this province in 1812, and that of his brother Bowleg, who died of grief shortly after, they have had little or no order among them; and their defeats in 1818 have completely broken them up, and dispersed them in small squads or families over the country;" that "many of them now live by cultivation and fishing among the rivers on the eastern side of the peninsula; and others, emaciated and naked, supply wood to the city of St. Augustine, carried in bundles on their backs;" and it is believed that their numbers do not exceed eight hundred souls, in Florida, who are humbled in the dust, and willing to submit to any system that will tolerate their life and living.

Under such circumstances, if we regard our national character; if we love mercy, and desire to do justice; if we consider it our duty to do unto others as we would that others should do unto us, we cannot for a moment hesitate to extend to them the fostering care and protection of this Government, and to make their situation relatively equal to that in which they stood towards the Government of Spain.

The sixth article of the treaty of cession of East and West Florida to the United States is as follows: "The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the federal constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States." Hence, it appears that, by treaty, we have solemnly bound ourselves to incorporate the inhabitants of the territories of Florida into the Union, and to extend to them all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States. The obligatory force of this treaty upon the Government, it is believed, is clear and conclusive; and derives additional strength, if it be possible to give it, from the fact that those Indians were incorporated among, and were a part of, the subjects of His Catholic Majesty.

The committee are of opinion that sound policy, justice, humanity, and religion, combined with the preceding solemn obligation in favor of this incorporating system—human nature itself, appeals to us, in silent but eloquent language, for the establishment of its rights. We cannot withhold our sympathies, and, as we cannot refuse to act upon the ground of necessity, or of self-preservation, the committee are at a loss to perceive any rational objection to the measure. They are few in numbers, dispersed over an immense region of country; they will shortly have among them a very numerous white population, which, it is believed, will soon effect a material change or modification of their habits. If this policy be not pursued, what are we to do with those Indians? We cannot remove them within the limits of any of the States; we cannot remove them to perish upon the northern borders of our settlements; and shall we continue to pursue the same unprofitable and unavailing policy of embodying them together, and confining them within the narrow limits of such reservation as we may think proper to allow them?

As an additional proof of the fallacy of such a system, the committee respectfully refer the House to the President's message, and the letter accompanying it from the Rev. John Heckewelder, who, after having devoted the greater portion of a long and pious life as a Christian missionary among the Indians, at their settlements on the Muskingum, as their moral and religious instructor, attributes his failure of success to the want of good and wholesome laws, tending to their temporal welfare and happiness. He tells us, "if the Indians see that justice is done them to the same degree as it is done to the whites, they will be satisfied, knowing where to flee for relief when maliciously treated." He also informs us that the confidence they would place in such a Government would be a great inducement towards improving their morals, and would encourage them to industry.

This is the language of experience, supported by reason and common sense. To secure to each member of society, in his individual capacity, the fruits of his own labor, and authorize him to pass the same to those who are most near and dear to him, is believed to be one of the first steps in promoting the civilization, prosperity, and happiness of all nations. Without such security, it is believed that the energies of every people, of every creed, and clime, and color in the universe, will remain stationary and inactive, or turn to the most vicious purposes. Without such security, the "hand of dispirited man will move but sluggishly to the task." Without such security, who would toil and labor to remove the timbers of the forest, to plant orchards, to erect comfortable buildings, or perform any other work, for the purpose of extending and perpetuating the enjoyments, comforts, and happiness of the human family? Then, whatever may be the various opinions as to the practicability of the plan suggested by the committee, it may be respectfully asked, if we do not owe it to ourselves and to the Indians to make the experiment? It may be asked if this humane and benevolent policy is not due to the character of this nation? and whether such a measure is not in accordance with the precepts of the holy religion we profess?

The committee recommend that each family, or the heads of families, respectively, provided they will settle upon, cultivate, and improve it, receive a title in fee simple (without the power of alienating it, until otherwise directed) to a reasonable and generous portion of land; and that, in making the locations, the interest and wishes of the said families, or heads of families, be consulted, having due regard to their improvements, and endeavoring to contract their settlements within reasonable limits, so as to promote the interest and prosperity of the white citizens, and encourage the settlement of emigrants in the Territory.

To impose a tax upon the community, or in any other manner to compel the white population of these States to contribute sums of money for the benefit of the Indians, is neither desirable nor proper. It would be an imposition upon our own citizens; and, admitting the most faithful application of the public treasure to the objects intended, (which it is presumed would but seldom happen,) still its only effect might be to lull the Indians into a fatal security, causing them to indulge in the most slothful and demoralizing habits. If we commence the system of supporting them upon the national bounty, it will be difficult to abandon it; and whenever that support is withdrawn, it will be offensive to those who have been in the habit of receiving it. Besides, in principle, it may not be right to enslave or oppress the whites for the benefit and support of the copper-colored race. And it would be equally unrighteous to oppress, degrade, or indirectly to enslave the latter for the benefit of the former. But, as men and Christians, we should encourage and stimulate them to the exertion of their own energies and faculties. It is believed that the history of all ages and nations, Christian or heathen, will confirm the fact, that none of the sons and daughters of men ever did become extensively civilized, virtuous, or happy, except they were stimulated to industry and enterprise as before stated; that is, by giving them an idea of separate property, and securing to each individual the fruits of his own labor, industry, and enterprise, with the power of transmitting the same to those who are most near and dear to him.

The committee are, therefore, of opinion that the plans herein suggested are worthy of trial, and, if carried into effect, will, to a considerable extent, be crowned with success.

But, whether successful or not, it will be doing all that we are legally or morally bound to do, or that they have a right to ask. We shall then have the approbation of an approving conscience; and we hope and trust that our faithful and disinterested exertions will receive the smiles and meet the sanction of approving Heaven.

With these views and sentiments, the committee, with great deference and respect, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized and requested to commence a system of operations for the gradual and ultimate effectuation of the objects contemplated, allowing him to exercise and pursue his own judgment as to the manner or mode of doing it, and to communicate to this House, as soon as may be, after the commencement of the next session, the progress and result of his proceedings therein.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 19, 1823.

Having examined the report which you did me the honor to place into my hands relative to the Indians of the Territory which I have the honor to represent, I beg leave respectfully to observe, that it would be much to the interest of that Territory if they could be removed to some other part of the United States. But, if such a measure is not practicable, it is very probable that the benevolent system proposed in that report will, eventually, be attended with the best results.

At present, those Indians are dispersed in different parts of the Territory, and ought to be concentrated as soon as possible. They ought also to be allowed the benefit of our laws, through the medium of their Indian agents, whose duty it ought to be to represent them, and to warn them from committing depredations on any of the settlements. To effect this purpose, very ample powers ought to be vested in the President of the United States, who will doubtless receive, from time to time, all the information necessary to enable him to fix upon such a system, or adopt such measures, as may be most appropriate to promote the interest of the Territory and their welfare.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your most obedient servant,

JOSEPH M. HERNANDEZ.

HON. THOMAS METCALFE,
Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 28, 1823.

In answer to the inquiries contained in your letter of the 15th instant, relative to the Indians in Florida, I have the honor to transmit the enclosed papers, which contain all the information in relation to the points embraced by said inquiries in the possession of this Department.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

HON. THOS. METCALFE,

Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives U. S.

Copy of a letter from Joseph M. White, secretary to the commissioners for land titles in Florida, to the Secretary of War.

SIR:

PENSACOLA, December 1, 1822.

As a citizen of the Territory of Florida, feeling a deep interest in its prosperity, I would beg leave respectfully to invite your attention to a subject of important consideration to the General Government, and peculiar solicitude to the inhabitants of this Territory. The situation of the Indians within the limits of Florida most imperiously demands the attention of Congress at its present session, as will be fully shown from the following statement. Their numbers, from the best estimate which has been made, probably amount to three thousand souls, consisting of men, women, and children. Since the destruction of their towns, during the late Creek war, many of them appear to have no locality, or permanency of habitation. They are distinguished for their insolence and predisposition to habits of intoxication, and are frequently found infesting our towns and settlements. The principal bodies, you are aware, are located in the Alachua and Appalachie, or Appalachicola; and, on more than one occasion, have been reduced to great extremities for the want of the ordinary articles of subsistence. They have almost entirely abandoned the chase, in consideration of the scarcity of game; and their fondness for idle habits presents an insuperable obstacle to the cultivation of the soil. All the information I have been able to collect represents their condition as singularly distressing, and requiring the interposition of the United States.

Situated as they are, it seems to be the better opinion of the most intelligent men in this country that the most advisable measure for adoption by the General Government would be, to subject this wretched people to their absolute control and direction. The Upper Creeks, of whom they are a remnant, and to whom they properly belong, should be compelled to receive and incorporate them with their nation; or, if deemed more proper, a particular tract of country should be marked out within the interior, where they all ought to be collected, and compelled to make a permanent settlement. That the United States are authorized to exercise such a power, I humbly conceive but little doubt can be entertained. It is distinctly understood, and is incontestably proved by the official acts of all the Spanish functionaries, that, by an act of the Spanish Government, the Indians residing in Florida were incorporated with her subjects, whilst she reserved to herself, as one of the attributes of sovereignty, the absolute disposal of the soil; and the Spanish authorities have uniformly acted upon this principle; and, although many reports were made by the ministerial officers that lands solicited were within the Indian boundary, the governors, sub-delegates, and the intendand granted the lands, not recognising any title or sovereignty in the Indians. The Indians were, therefore, placed on the same ground occupied by other inhabitants of the country, having no other title to real property save that conferred by actual occupation of the land; which constituted no right, without a grant from the proper authorities. The Territory having been ceded by His Catholic Majesty, without a recognition of their sovereignty, there can be no moral or political obligation upon our Government to treat with them on the subject, or to surrender to them the fairest portion of Florida. Another consideration which imperatively urges their removal into the interior is, that, in case of invasion, they would be cut off from all intercourse with an enemy, and the avenue would be closed against foreign influence. In their present situation, no confidence could be reposed in their fidelity; they would, either from choice or necessity, unite with a more formidable invader, officiate as his pioneers through our country, and ravage our defenceless frontiers.

The strong repugnance that Americans will always feel at settling in their vicinity, and the consequent injury to the sale of public lands, will operate as an auxiliary motive for their removal. For the above reasons, I solemnly believe that the General Government not only have the right, but are required by the strong convictions of justice, policy, and humanity, to pursue one or the other of the courses above mentioned.

Pardon the liberty I have taken in the frank expression of my opinion, and be assured that it arises from a perfect knowledge that it is the sentiment of the people of this Territory, and from a lively interest I feel for its welfare, and that of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOS. M. WHITE.

Extract of a communication from Mr. Penieres, late Sub-agent for Indian Affairs in Florida, to General Jackson, Governor, &c. dated

JULY 15, 1821.

It appears that the Floridas have never been well peopled. Some deserted plantations and ruined villages are visible; but, according to the information I have been able to procure, this country has never contained ten thousand souls, white population; and, at present, does not contain more than five thousand.

You are doubtless, general, acquainted with the population of the Indian tribes known under the collective name of Creeks. It appears that this tribe is composed of six others, which have been designated to me by the names of Mickasuky, Suhane, Moskoky, Santa Fé, Red Sticks, and Echitos. I am informed that these tribes have furnished one thousand two hundred warriors, which gives reason to suppose their population to be three thousand souls.

The nation known by the name of Seminoles is composed of seven tribes, which bear the names of Latchioue, Oklèouaha, Chocheckhiatta, Pyadèkuha, Tatchonyana, and Topkèlakè.* There are, besides, some remains of ancient tribes, known by the name of Outchis, Chiaas, Cana-acké, &c.; but they consist of only a few straggling families. There is, also, on the frontiers of Georgia, another tribe, called Lahouita, which raised one hundred or one hundred and fifty warriors under McIntosh. Seven years ago they waged a barbarous warfare against the whites and Seminoles, who detest them.

* Only six tribes' names mentioned.

We must add to this enumeration, which will make the Indian population amount to more than five thousand of each sex and of every age, fifty or sixty negroes, or mulattoes, who are maroons, or half slaves to the Indians. These negroes appeared to me far more intelligent than those who are in absolute slavery; and they have great influence over the minds of the Indians.

I have had several conferences with these chiefs, &c. &c. They are very mistrustful, very poor, very lazy, and very great beggars. They love the English and Americans very little.

It will be difficult to form a prudent determination with respect to the maroon negroes who live among the Indians on the other side of the little mountains of Latchioue. Their number is said to be upwards of three hundred. They fear being again made slaves under the American Government, and will omit nothing to increase or keep alive mistrust among the Indians, whom they, in fact, govern. If it should become necessary to use force with them, it is to be feared that the Indians would take their part. It will, however, be necessary to remove from the Floridas this group of lawless freebooters, among whom runaway negroes will always find refuge. It would, perhaps, be possible to have them received at St. Domingo, or to furnish them the means of withdrawing themselves from the United States.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Penieres, late Sub-agent for Indian Affairs in Florida, to the Secretary of War, dated

JULY 19, 1821.

Previous to my excursion on the St. John's, I paid a traveller's visit to the Spanish Governor, who gave me a written permission to pass beyond the military post of Bonavista. As he received me with great kindness, I made him acquainted with my intentions, and he evinced the most lively interest towards the Indians, who were deceived in every way. I have neglected nothing to quiet their minds; but the numerous maroon negroes who live among them, the speculators, and other ill-disposed persons, keep up and increase among those unfortunate people a mistrust which it will be difficult to do away.

It will, no doubt, be necessary to collect all the tribes (thirteen or fourteen in number) into one district, to remove them from the seashore, and to give them good lands, in order that they may take a liking to agriculture. Those Indians appear to me to be more lazy, more ignorant, and greater beggars, than those of the other States. They have seen nothing but bad examples, and it will require much time and much patience to make them better. When I shall be more acquainted with them, I will have the honor to lay before you my observations and my opinion.

AUGUST 27, 1821.

There exists no deed, no transaction, nor any treaty with the Indians. The English had, as it is said, abandoned to them all the lands situated west of the St. John's, and I have been told that this grant had been sanctioned about thirty years ago by the Spanish Government. Others, and more credible persons, attest that the usage of the Spanish Kings was to incorporate the Indians in the countries in which they were located. If this unequal incorporation has taken place in the Floridas, the Indians possess no lands; for the Government, which has granted, by written deeds, the greater part of the valuable lands, has made no concession of such nature to the Indians.

By an inconsistency worthy of despotism, His Most Catholic Majesty has legalized, it is said, a sale made by the Indians to a Mr. Forbes of one million two hundred thousand acres of land, situated between the Appalachicola and St. Mark's rivers. If this sale has been actually thus confirmed, the Indian tribes were not incorporated in the mode above described, which would only have entitled them to the same rights of citizenship as are enjoyed by Europeans; but with this difference, that the latter have written titles, which the unfortunate aborigines have not.

Immense concessions of land have been made on the territory of the Latchioue Indians; six hundred thousand acres of which, to my knowledge, have never been surveyed or cultivated.

A great number of deeds, vague, informal, and unlimited, are in the hands of speculators; but no one purchases, for want of a guaranty, and the lands will remain uncultivated.

Other considerable grants have been made to individuals, on conditions that have never been fulfilled: the interest of the State, in such cases, demands a very scrupulous investigation.

I have been assured that all the records and titles, which relate to the Indians in the Floridas, are deposited in the archives of the Captain General of Cuba. Should you think it necessary to authorize me, or any other person, to go and examine them, I am led to believe that the search of those documents would be of no avail, for the holders of grants have a great interest in destroying every thing which might prejudice their title; but it is urgent that Congress, at its next session, should come to some determination to clear up this confusion, else this country will never prosper.

If the pretended purchasers of two or three millions of acres are maintained in their Indian possessions, nothing but swamps will be left for them [the Indians] and the States.

Extract of a letter from General Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated

SEPTEMBER 20, 1821.

Since I closed my letter of the 17th instant to you, Nea-moth-la, one of the chiefs of the Florida Indians, accompanied by the Mulatto Chief and John Blount, with an interpreter, Stephen Richards, has visited me. From the enclosed talk held with them, (marked A,) you will discover the object of their visit, their disposition, and wishes. They have left me well pleased, and happy to hear that a country will be given them somewhere, by the President of the United States, in which they will be collected and settled, and receive the protection of the United States. They acknowledge that it is just that those who rejected peace when it was offered to them, and fled from their own country, continuing the war, ought to return to their own nation; that they believe all those are willing to return, but are afraid that they will not be protected.

I have no doubt, it being made known to them that they must return, and that on their return they will be protected, that the whole would immediately move up; and as these Indians can have no claims to lands in the Floridas, humanity and justice are sufficiently extended to them by such permission to return and live in peace with their own nation; and their nation cannot complain or object to this.

There is but one point at which the natives of Florida can be concentrated, without weakening the borders of Florida too much; and that is, on the banks of the Appalachicola, adjoining the southern boundary of Alabama and Georgia, and running down the river on both sides so as to include a sufficient area for the real natives of that country. This might infringe a little upon the large grant to Forbes & Co.; but it would be better thus, than to leave St. Augustine and Pensacola exposed. There, a whole settlement would be interposed between them and the seashore, and the Georgia and Alabama settlements in the rear would insure peace with them. I have thought proper to make this suggestion for the consideration of the President; and I am sure it will give general satisfaction to the Indians if Congress will lay off a boundary for them where I have suggested; but still, I am of opinion, from the smallness of their numbers, and the shape of the Floridas, that it would be much better policy to move them all up, and amply provide for them by an annuity.

A.

Extract of a talk held by General Jackson with three chiefs of the Florida Indians, at Pensacola.

On the 18th September, 1821, I was visited in the Executive Chamber by three chiefs of the Florida Indians, viz: Blount, Nea-moth-la, and Mulatto King, who, through their interpreter, made known to me that the object of their visit was to be informed what their father the President intended to do with them; that various reports had reached them, and that Nea-moth-la had been up to see the headmen of the Creek nation; and that General McIntosh told them that I would deprive them of all their lands, only giving to each six hundred and forty acres of land for themselves and their families to live on; upon which I gave them the following talk:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I am glad to see you, and to shake you by the hand in friendship, and to assure you that the hatchet has been buried; your father the President never wishes to see it again raised. Your nation was once led astray by the advice and counsel of wicked and bad men; the Creek nation had listened to the same bad counsel, and, in consequence, had brought destruction upon themselves. Your father the President gave them peace. McQueen and Francis, with a number of warriors, would not regard this peace, but fled from their country, and came here, where they adhered to the false counsel of British agents and Spanish incendiaries; and your nation, having pursued the same course, compelled your father the President to send his white children to chastise and subdue you, and thereby give peace to his children, both red and white. This was four years ago; and all those Indians who had raised the bloody hatchet were ordered to return to the Creek nation, and there live in peace, where they would again be taken by the hand in friendship by their father the President, and by him be protected. I repeat that I am glad to see you in friendship, and to give you assurance that your father the President has no other wish than to be in friendship with you, and that, having buried the hatchet with his red children, he is anxious to have them collected together at some one point, where he can protect them, either within the limits of your old nation the Creeks, or at such other point where they can be altogether, and within his power to protect and make them happy. I give to you a plain, straight talk, and do not speak with a forked tongue. It is necessary that you be brought together, either within the bounds of your old nation, or at some other point, where your father the President may be enabled to extend to you his fatherly care and assistance. Those who fled from their nation, and joined in the war against us, must return to their country, where their chiefs are willing to receive them, where they will be protected by their father the President; for they cannot be permitted to settle all over the Floridas, and on her seacoast. Your white brethren must be settled there, to keep from you bad men and bad talks. I will gladly meet you to-morrow in this room, and listen to your talks and wishes, and give you such information as you may require and I possess; and I wish to be informed where the red people in the Floridas are settled, that I may make it known to your father the President, that he may be enabled to judge of your situation, and point out where you are to be collected, to insure your protection, and that you may be treated as the rest of his beloved children. Your former disobedience is forgotten, and he again receives you as his children.

The chief replied, that he had heard many rumors; that he had received no satisfaction until he came to see me; that he was very glad to hear this talk from me, and that he believed it to be a straight talk.

On the 19th they met, agreeably to appointment, when I addressed them in the following manner:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

I am glad to see you this morning, and to shake you by the hand again, and to assure you of the kind feelings of your father the President, and of his love for his red children. I desire to know where the red people are settled in the Floridas, and also their numbers.

Nea-moth-la answered, that he liked the talk he had received, and would carry it to his nation, assemble the chiefs, and give it to them; and, also, that he would give me an account of the towns, as near as possible, which he did as follows; saying that he knew of about fifteen towns, viz: Red Town, at Tampa Bay; does not know the number of souls: Ac-lock-o-na-yake, above Tampa Bay; a number of souls: O-pony's Town, back of Tampa Bay: Tats-ta-la-hoats-ka, or Watermelon Town, on the seaboard, this side of Tampa Bay; the greater part of all these fled from the Upper Creeks when peace was given to that nation: A-ha-pop-ka, situate back of Musquito: Sow-walla village, composed of those who fled from Coosa, and followed McQueen and Francis, their prophets: Peter McQueen's village, the other side of Tampa Bay: A-lack-a-way-ta-lofa, in the Alackaway plains; a great many souls; Took-o-sa-math-la the chief: Santa-fee-ta-lo-fa, at the east fork of the Suwanee; Lock-taw-me-coochy the chief: Waw-ka-saw-sa, on the east side of the mouth of Suwanee, on the seaboard; these are from the Coosa river: Old Suwanee town, (burnt in 1818), on the Suwanee river; these are from the Talapoosa towns, and followers of McQueen and Francis: A-la-pa-ha-ta-lofa, west of Suwanee, and east of Mickasuky; the chief (Ockmulgee) is lately dead; these are from the Upper Creeks: Wa-cissa-ta-lofa, at the head of the St. Mark's river; these are from Chhattahoochee, Upper Creeks: Willa-nou-chee-ta-lofa, near the head of St. Mark's river, west of Wa-cissa-ta-lofa; natives of Florida: Tal-la-has-see, on the waters of the Mickasuky Pond; these have lived there a long time; have about one hundred warriors, and I suppose about ten souls to a warrior—say one thousand souls: Top-ke-gal-ga, on the east side of the Ochlochne, near to the Tallahassee village: Wethoc-ou-chy-ta-lofa, between the St. Mark's and Ochlochne rivers, in the fork of the latter; very few of these are natives of the land: O-cheese-ulga, east of the Appalachicola, where Hambly and Blount live; about two hundred souls; Cothrin the chief: Choco-nick-la village; the chief is Nea-thock-o-motla; second chief is Mulatto King; were raised there; have about sixty warriors; on the west side of the Appalachicola: Top-hul-ga; this village and Choco-nick-la join each other; raised in East Florida, and removed there: Tock-to-eth-la, west of Fort Scott and the Chhattahoochee, ten miles above the forks; forty or fifty warriors; were raised at the Econ-cha-ta, or Red Ground, and moved down: another town in Florida, Echee-po-crassa; these moved from the Upper Creeks; about thirty warriors, and a great many women and children settled there.

I asked the chiefs their opinion of the number of souls in Florida; they replied, that they supposed about two thousand souls, but were not certain. I inquired at what point those who had been raised there would wish to be concentrated; they replied, that they have not yet consulted together; but, when they returned, would assemble all the chiefs, and deliver the talk they had with me, (which was a straight talk,) and inform me of the result.

Extract of a letter from General Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated

SEPTEMBER 2, 1821.

I have to observe that Mr. Penieres is incorrect as to the number of the Indians mentioned, and particularly so as it regards the number of inhabitants at Pensacola. The population of Pensacola and its vicinity is estimated at 3,000. I have no doubt but a garrison would be useful at Picolata, provided the Indians are not concentrated together, and embodied on the lands reserved for the Creek nation. But this must be done, or the frontier will be much weakened by the Indian settlements, and be a perpetual harbor for our slaves. These runaway negroes, spoken of by Mr. Penieres, must be removed from the Floridas, or scenes of murder and confusion will exist, and lead to unhappy consequences that cannot be controlled. With a little trouble and expense, all the Indians in the Floridas could be removed up into the Creek nation, and at once be consolidated with them; but, if not done at first, disagreeable consequences will grow out of their remaining in the Floridas that the arm of Government will find it difficult to control. You are fully advised of my opinion on this subject heretofore, to which I refer you and the administration.

Until I hear from you positively what course the Government means to adopt with regard to the Indians in the Floridas, and where it means to locate them, I shall hold no talk with them; for I cannot suppose that the Government will permit these Indians to settle all over the Floridas, as they are at present, but that it means to consolidate them at some one point: both their safety, and the safety of the Georgia frontier, and, moreover, the best policy, require it.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1821.

The exposed situation of the Floridas imperiously demands that its frontier upon the coast (if it may be so expressed) should be immediately inhabited by our white citizens. The Indians at present are scattered from Florida Point to the Choctawhatchy. If you attempt to concentrate or consolidate them at the Mickasuky Pond or Old Towns, you offend those that are situated on the Suwanee, on the Alachua plains, or on the peninsula. As they have been continually at war with the United States, until conquered in the spring of 1818, when they were ordered up above the Florida line, where the nation to which they originally belonged was willing to receive them, such a measure would reconcile all. This is what they expected, and what good policy and the safety of the Georgia frontier required.

If the Indians be removed within the limits of the country assigned to the Creek nation, (of which the Seminoles are a part,) this object, on which the security of the southern border so much depends, will be speedily attained. With what pretence of justice can those who fled from the Creek nation, and kept up an exterminating war on our frontier, until crushed by the arm of our Government in 1818, set up such claims?

The greater part of the Indians now in the Floridas consist of those who fled in the manner above mentioned; and why should we hesitate to order them up at once, when the Executive Government, with the aid of Congress, can do ample justice, by law, if necessary, to those who deserve it, by giving such equivalent as will enable them to settle their families in the upper country, and to cultivate their farms? Unless the Indians be consolidated at one point, where is the country that can be brought into market from which the five millions are to be raised to meet the claims of our citizens under the late treaty with Spain?

Extract of a letter from Captain J. R. Bell, acting Agent for Indian Affairs in Florida, to the Secretary of War, dated

ST. AUGUSTINE, September 3, 1821.

Agreeably to promise on the 28th ultimo, I have the honor to enclose, herewith, a copy of a letter from George J. F. Clarke, Esq., a native of this province, late Surveyor General and Lieutenant Governor of East Florida, on the subject of the Indians of the Floridas.

Copy of a letter from George J. F. Clarke to Captain John R. Bell, commanding in the province of East Florida.

SIR:

ST. MARY'S, EAST FLORIDA, August 15, 1821.

I promised, on my departure from St. Augustine, to employ the first moments at my disposal in answering your inquiries respecting the Indians of this province.

Foreigners insist, and on no better ground than inference, that a line of demarcation between what they please to term Indian and Spanish lands has always existed during the former and late Spanish possessions of East Florida, and during the intermediate occupancy of the same by the British. This I believe to be erroneous as relates to the time of the British possession, for I have been twenty odd years inquiring in vain for a date to such a distinction, and have only met with but few persons who gave credit to the assertion at a second or third hand hearsay, and those had given the matter a passive credence, merely because it assimilated to the customs they had been used to. But, be that as it may, I am sure that no such, or any other, line of demarcation of territory has ever existed between the Spanish Government and the Indians; nor could it have been the case; for the treaties entered into in the Floridas, and the system generally set up in the Spanish provinces on the American continent, go to preclude such a distinction.

It is a remarkable fact, an effect of habit, that the people of all countries are prone to suppose their method of managing in most cases to be the best, if not the only means, whereby a desired end might be effected. But an impartial view beyond home will find evidence to the contrary; that there are at least two ways to any end. Should two persons depart back to back under the zenith, they will meet face to face under the nadir.

The Spanish relation with the aborigines of America has been very different in their possessions, generally, to those of most other nations. They obtained rights to territory by treaties of incorporation, while others resorted to purchase and conquest. Having obtained a grant from His Holiness the Pope to all those parts of the western hemisphere which they should discover, they made a lodgment on a spot of a province or kingdom, and, having fortified it, entered into treaties of incorporation with the nearest tribes, (I mean on the continent,) and thus gradually progressed to those more remote. Cortes varied in Mexico a part of this mode of process, but not the principle. He went straight to the capital, but, after becoming firm-footed there, carried on the system of incorporation.

However this incorporating system may have been abused in practice, as very many of the intentions of most Governments are, when acted on afar from home, it must be allowed that it ultimately combined benevolence in its leading principles; that, in practice, it exhibits a perpetual reciprocity of interests; and that the depopulation of the aborigines under the incorporating system has been much less rapid than in other parts, even where the purchasing system has been preferred. Witness Humboldt's History of New Spain, recollecting, at the same time, that a great part of the comparatively small defalcation of the aborigines in that quarter will be found in the amalgamation. But where, alas! are the tribes that did inhabit the territory lying between the Floridas and the St. Lawrence? I have reference only to the Spanish settlements on the continent; for on the islands it would appear that extermination had been the order of the day, and that the afterplan of incorporation had generally grown out of the horrors of those.

In 1784 the Spanish Government of East and West Florida met the Talapoosa and Seminole nations in a body, who held those districts, with their celebrated McGilveray at their head, and formed and executed a treaty of incorporation, (or rather re-formed and re-executed the treaty that the British occupancy had rendered obsolete,) which completely made the Indians subjects of Spain, co-equal with the whites, and put the sovereignty in the hands of His Catholic Majesty. That treaty stipulates that the sovereignty, rights, and jurisdiction of His Majesty go alike through all parts of these provinces. And this the United States virtually acknowledged, in treating with Spain, and Spain only, on the boundary line between the Floridas and Georgia; and which line was, moreover, run under a military force, expressly to guard against interference with the Indians. The same treaty says, should the Indians be dispossessed of their lands, (for they had a right to lands individually, but none nationally,) His Majesty will remunerate them in other parts of his territory. Each Indian had a right to land, as well as, and on the same footing with, white, free black, and colored subjects in any part of the province.

The fact that the firm of John Forbes & Co. hold a territory of forty miles square, lying between the rivers Appalachie and Appalichicola, which descended to it from the firm of Panton, Leslie, & Co., who, it is said, purchased that tract from the Indians, will, until it is explained, militate against this relation of the Spaniards and Indians. But this is a solitary case, growing out of very extraordinary circumstances, with which I am acquainted, having been a servant of the latter firm eleven years, including a seven years' apprenticeship, and which I will candidly explain to the best of my knowledge; premising that I have nothing to be individually grateful to them for, nor have I a hope or a fear connected with them.

The house of Panton, Leslie, & Co. stands respectfully identified with the history of the Floridas. Spain, having received the Floridas from Great Britain, neglected no step to assuage the regret of the Indians at parting with their friends the British, and to conciliate their good-will. In the earliest meetings the Indians requested to be supplied with English goods, and by English merchants; and, having been desired to point out the commercial house most to their satisfaction, among the many with whom they had traded, they chose that of Panton, Leslie, & Co. This advantage gained, and carefully improved by the principals of that house, men of the first rate talents, information, and address, it soon became the monitor of the Indians, the guardian of the tranquillity of the province, and a favorite with the court of Spain. They had several commercial establishments in each province, and were allowed to import articles of commerce of every description free of duties, when foreign goods were so strictly forbidden that to be found introducing a single piece of linen would have subjected, by the laws of Spain, any other person to the penalty of working in the mines for life. They became the sole suppliers of all articles wanted by the Government, garrison, inhabitants, and Indians of both provinces.

During this lucrative range of political and civil importance, that firm had credited, generally and largely, the Indians of both provinces, at that time a numerous body; for tribes, afterwards shut into Georgia by the boundary line between that Government and the Floridas, traded to their stores. And preferring, as a matter of accommodation to all concerned, to receive a body of land as a general extinction of those debts than urge individual payments, they obtained permission of the Spanish court to treat with the Indians on that head. A total extinction of debts so easily obtained was, of course, pleasing on the part of the Indians, and not injurious to Spain, who held lands only to give to the meritorious; a treaty was concluded between the house and their debtors, and Spain ratified the treaty, virtually ceding to the house of Panton, Leslie, & Co. a territory of forty miles square, to pay the debts of her Indian subjects.

Permit me, sir, to add here, through feelings of philanthropy only, a few observations in behalf of those poor children of nature, reduced to a handful of dejected, wretched beings. They will, no doubt, find a protecting hand in the United States. They will participate in the endeavor towards civilization, already so beneficial to the more western sons of the forest, so grateful to humanity, and so exalting to a nation's character. Since the death of King Payne, who died in the field, with Roman dignity, at the destruction of their settlements in Alachua, during the troubles of this province in 1812, and that of his brother Bowleg, who died of grief shortly after, they have had little or no order among them; and their defeats in 1818 have completely broken them up and dispersed them in small squads or families over the country. Many of them now live by cultivation and fishing among the rivers on the eastern side of the peninsula; and others, emaciated and naked, supply wood to the city of St. Augustine, carried in bundles on their backs. The whole of them, not exceeding eight hundred souls,* I suppose, will, no doubt, submit to any system that will tolerate their life and living.

They are humbled to the dust, and no more can be required by a magnanimous people, admitting their sins to have been ever so great. The hand of aid and instruction, properly extended, will make them serviceable; they will learn to labor, and our good examples will wear out their former propensities.

I know there are some who will smile in contempt at the idea of taming Indians; but I trust that their number and influence are very small. How limited must be the conception, how illiberal the mind, to the contrary; how little or how partially true they have studied human nature! Are we not all the children of habit, the mere reflection of education and manners? And why should those be incorrigible? It is evident that the only difference in man, laying aside his color, is the difference in opinion; and that difference of opinion arises from the difference of education. Let the sceptical in this part of the philosophy of human nature turn his eyes to the city of Mexico, and see there the examples of talents, natural and acquired, in the fine arts and belles-lettres, manifest among Indians; let him look into the Havana, and see the many finished workmen in the useful and elegant crafts to be found there among the Africans; nay, let him look at man in all parts of the world, where he has had opportunities of improvement, no matter where born or by whom begot, and say if he is not always the master-piece of nature's works, and the only master of arts. And after seeing what he has acquired, will he attempt to say that bounds have been prescribed to his acquirements by his country or his color?

So small a number of Indians located among the large population that Florida will shortly exhibit must change their habits generally, or, at least, so immediately and materially modify them, as to become very useful; and, even should the adults prefer indigence to industry, the laws will compel them to prefer labor to theft; for they must live by one or the other when surrounded by and interspersed among a better community, and the young must grow up in our habits.

Allow me, sir, to repeat my assurance of respect and esteem.

Your obedient servant,

GEO. J. F. CLARKE.

Extract of a letter from Captain Bell to the Secretary of War, dated

JANUARY 22, 1822.

The Seminole nation, natives of Florida, is so far reduced in its numbers that it does not exceed more than one-third of the whole number of the Indian population now in the provinces. The other two-thirds are from the Upper Creeks, and other bands of the Creek nation. Many of these left their country as followers of McQueen and Francis, their prophets; others are those who refused the peace offered to their nation by the United States; and others, again, who for bad conduct in the nation fled to Florida for safety. Some of the Creeks in Florida may be induced to return to their nation, but the great body of them will prefer joining the Seminole nation, who cannot be prevailed upon to quit their country, the land of their nativity. This nation was, before the destruction of their settlements in 1812, numerous, proud, and wealthy, possessing great numbers of cattle, horses, and slaves; they are now weak and poor, yet their native spirit is not so much broken as to humble them to the dust. They appear sensible of their reduced situation; that they are too weak to make much resistance in war; and that the presumptive right to their lands has passed into the hands of the American Government. To that Government they now look for that liberality, justice, and protection, which it has extended to other nations of Indians.

It now remains for the Government to extend its fostering care and liberality to them. The question is, how is this best to be done? Permit me to state, that, from all the information I have collected on the subject, it appears that the Seminole nation are the proprietors of that part of the country of Florida bounded on the west by a grant in favor of Panton, Leslie, & Co.; south and west, by the Gulf of Mexico; north, by the Georgia line; and east, by a boundary agreed upon between the English and Indians, 18th November, 1765, at a congress held at Picolata, and since recognised by the Spanish authorities.

Extracts from a treaty between the Spanish authorities in Florida and the Indians, concluded at Pensacola, on 31st May and 1st June, 1784. (Referred to in the letter of George J. F. Clarke.)

"ARTICLE I. We, the above-mentioned chiefs of the nation of Talapuche, for ourselves, and in the name of all the chiefs, captains, warriors, and all other individuals, of whatever quality or condition, do promise and pledge ourselves, by the Supreme God, Creator of heaven and earth, and all things visible and invisible, to keep and maintain inviolable peace and fidelity with His Catholic Majesty, his provinces, subjects, and vassals, and to afford all the reciprocal advantages that can contribute to the interest and glory of the two contracting parties. We offer to expose our lives and properties for the royal service of His Catholic Majesty, and we promise cheerfully to obey his orders, communicated to us by the Captain General of Louisiana and the Floridas, and, in his name, by the respective particular governors or commanders of the said provinces; and we will always live in harmony, union, and good friendship; promising, from this moment, and of our own free will, to obey the laws of the great King of Spain, in every point that is compatible with our character and circumstances, conforming ourselves with the municipal customs and regulations which now do, or may hereafter, exist in the provinces of Louisiana and the Floridas; and regulating, with common consent, and in good faith, whatever difficulties may arise in the application of this treaty."

"ART. 13. As the generous feelings of His Catholic Majesty do not permit him to exact of the Indian nations any lands to form establishments, to the prejudice of those who reap advantage therefrom, these motives, and a conviction of his paternal love for his people, induce us to offer you, in his royal name, the security and guaranty of those lands you actually hold, according to the rights of legitimacy with which you possess them: that is to say, those lands comprised within the lines and limits belonging to His Catholic Majesty, our sovereign; and, as an additional proof of his royal clemency, should the Talapuche nation, by war or other circumstances, be dispossessed of their lands by the enemies of the Crown, he will grant them other lands that are vacant, as an equivalent, to settle thereon, without any pretensions or claims for the same than that of their constant fidelity."

[2d Session.

ABOLITION OF THE INDIAN TRADING-HOUSES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 1, 1823.

Mr. METCALFE made the following report:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the President's communication, and accompanying documents, relative to the execution of an act of the last session abolishing the Indian trading establishment, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

In executing the act referred to, it appears that George Graham, Esq. received the appointment of superintendent, in the place of Colonel Thomas L. McKenney; and an agent has also been appointed, and sent to each of the trading-houses, with instructions to receive from the former agents all the goods, and other property on hand, and to dispose of the same, as soon as it can be done, having a due regard to the public interest.

The superintendent and agents so appointed, it is believed, are active, intelligent gentlemen, of unexceptionable character, and suitable qualifications. In turning over the merchandise and other property on hand, at the several trading-houses, into the hands of the new agents, the original invoice prices are charged to the Government. Much of the merchandise so charged consists of unsaleable, damaged, and worthless remnants, and articles now of little or no value. All the debts due to the factories, which have been created and not collected by the former agents, and also the factory buildings, are charged to the Government.

A. B. Lindsley, the agent appointed to settle up the business of the trading-house at Fort Chicago, has performed that duty with fidelity, and has returned an account thereof; which is herewith presented to the House.

It will be seen that the whole amount of all the goods and other property at this establishment, at the rates at which the same has been charged to the Government, is $15,637 62. A great portion of those goods were old, unsaleable, and damaged; and, consequently, when sold, there was an average loss to the Government of about fifty-four cents to the dollar.

The whole amount of loss upon the merchandise at that factory is $6,968 37½. An additional loss will be sustained upon debts due the establishment, which are not likely to be collected. This is the only trading-house from which complete returns have been received. Persons who are desirous of purchasing the goods at the Red river factory offer to pay the original cost and carriage. It is, therefore, believed that no loss upon the goods received at that trading-house will be sustained by the Government.

In winding up the business at the Choctaw trading-house, a very considerable loss will certainly fall upon the Government. (See Mr. Randall's return, and remarks upon the inventory.) From the testimony of Mr. Hersey, the former agent at that place, it appears that not more than one-third of the debts due to that establishment are likely to be collected. The whole amount of debts exceeds $12,000; and, from the description given of the wretched condition of the merchandise on hand, a great loss upon the sales thereof may be readily anticipated.

The committee do not bring into question the propriety of stating the original invoice prices of the goods, as per inventory, on the delivery thereof into the hands of the new agents; but they believe that, in a final settlement of the accounts between the Government and the former conductors of the trade, the amount actually realized from the sales of goods and property of every description will be the only fair and proper charge in favor of the latter against the former, except for property (if any) destroyed by Indians during the late war, and debts due from the Indians to the factories, and assumed by the Government.

In 1806, the amount of capital stock actually drawn from the treasury, including former appropriations, was $260,000. On the 3d of March, 1809, an act passed allowing an additional appropriation of $40,000; making, in all, $300,000: ten thousand of which, the late superintendent states, was never drawn from the treasury. The whole amount, therefore, of capital stock, thus vested in the Indian trade, must have been $290,000.

The law positively requires that the "prices of goods supplied to, and to be purchased by, the Indians, shall be regulated in such manner that the capital stock shall not be diminished."

The superintendent and his clerks, the agents and sub-agents, received annually for their services, not out of the trading fund, but directly from the treasury, about $20,000. This sum, with the interest thereupon, and the interest upon the capital stock, which, it is believed, will be equal, in all, to between thirty and forty thousand dollars annually, is entirely lost to the Government.

The ninth section of an act of 1811, to regulate the Indian trade, provides that the superintendent shall purchase such goods as may be required for Indian annuities, for treaties, and for presents, and transmit the same to the proper places. And it appears that goods furnished by the factories to Indian agents, for the purposes aforesaid, were not limited at cost and carriage, but charged to the Government at the same rates as if they had been sold to the Indians; say at an advance (according to instructions given at the factory) of sixty-six and two-thirds to one hundred per cent., and as high as fifty per cent. for goods of inferior quality; and the whole amount so charged actually drawn from the treasury. This appears to be a considerable advance paid by Government for merchandise purchased with its own capital.* It is said that the conductors of the Indian trade were generally men of integrity and honor, not deficient in talent or enterprise, or any of the requisite qualifications for discharging the duties of their respective stations. And how it does happen that, under circumstances so advantageous to the traders, the Government should not now be able to realize a sum equal to the original capital stock, appears to be inexplicable. It is not possible for the committee to trace the conductors of this trade through all their various operations; the manner of exchanging merchandise for furs and peltries, their purchases and sales, &c., for the purpose of ascertaining where the evil lies; an evil, the existence of which is presented to them in a tangible form, while the cause that produced it remains undiscovered. Private traders, without salaries, or any other support from the Government, have, for many years, carried on a successful and profitable trade with the Indians; and, like the factors, it is believed, they sold for such prices as could be had; generally regulating the prices according to the competition. Perhaps the fault may be found to exist in the system itself; and, therefore, it may be useful, not only as a matter of curious history, but for the lesson it teaches to succeeding legislators. From the accompanying documents, it appears that Mr. Graham has instructed the several agents to sell off and settle up the whole business by the — day of May next; and it is believed that the public interest required such delay. Beyond that date, however, it is to be hoped that the Government will have to expend but little in settling up the accounts of the Indian trading establishment.

Examination of John Cox.

1. Has Mr. McKenney participated, directly or indirectly, in any gains made by you on any merchandise applied for the Indian trade, annuities, or presents?

Ans. No, he has not.

2. Have you at any time made presents to him, or to any member of his family; and, if so, when, and to what extent?

Ans. Not to my recollection.

3. Have you lent, or advanced to, or paid for him, any moneys, or for any of his family; and, if so, when, and to what amount?

Ans. No.

4. Do you know any other person who has furnished supplies for the Indian trade, &c., with whom Mr. McKenney has participated in any manner in any gain therefrom; or who has lent or paid for him, or any of his family, moneys; or who has made presents to him, or any of his family?

Ans. I do not.

5. Do you know of any store, or mercantile establishment, in which Mr. McKenney was concerned, at the time of, or at any time subsequent to, his appointment as superintendent; if so, state what you know of the same.

Ans. I believe, but am not positive, that he was in partnership with a Mr. Hall, who had been living with him in Washington city before he received the appointment of superintendent; but not to my knowledge afterwards.

I have been an importing merchant during the time Colonel McKenney has been superintendent. My importations generally have been (since 1817) with a view to the Indian trade. I have supplied Colonel McKenney with goods to the amount of about $50,000 annually. I sold the goods in currency, without reference to sterling cost. Considered I sold them as low as they could be purchased at fair sale. I have not made Mr. McKenney any compensation, in any way, with a view to obtain the trade. I have endorsed some notes for Mr. McKenney, and Mr. McKenney has likewise endorsed for me. I am now on Mr. McKenney's paper as endorser, but am secured by his property.

Fifty per cent. on the sterling is equal to 150 per cent. Maryland currency; that is, suppose £100 sterling sells in this country for £150 sterling, that is equal to £250 Maryland currency.

JOHN COX.

Second examination of Colonel Cox by Colonel McKenney.

Question 1. How long have you been a merchant in Georgetown?

Answer. Since June, 1798.

Ques. 2. When did you first turn your attention to the nature of the demand for Indian supplies, occasioned by the removal of the office from Philadelphia to Georgetown?

Ans. I think it was in the year 1809.

Ques. 3. Did you not sell, especially during the two or three years before I was appointed, large amounts to my predecessor?

Ans. I did.

Ques. 4. Did not your increasing ability to meet the demands of this office grow out of your increasing knowledge of the peculiar articles in which it dealt?

Ans. It did.

Ques. 5. Was there ever and even the least evidence of partiality shown you?

Ans. Not that I know of.

Ques. 6. On the contrary, did you not think the rigor of the inspection, and the closeness of the comparisons I made, were sometimes too pointed?

Ans. I did.

Ques. 7. Did there not, on at least one occasion, words pass between us, by reason of my strictness, in which you conceived I questioned too closely your statements?

Ans. There was one occasion, within my perfect recollection, in which Mr. McKenney and myself differed as to the relative value of some goods, in which I thought that Mr. McKenney was too tenacious of his own opinion and judgment.

Examination of J. W. Bronaugh.

J. W. Bronaugh, chief clerk in the store of the superintendent at Georgetown, says: That, when Colonel McKenney took the store as superintendent, an inventory was taken of all the goods on hand, agreeably to the original invoices. That the goods purchased since Colonel McKenney has been superintendent have been generally bought at Georgetown, of Colonel Cox, and of Mr. Wright, who were importers. Besides these, goods to the amount of from two to three thousand dollars per year have been bought at each of the stores of Messrs. J. & J. Cockran, W. Corcoran & Co., R. H. Fitzhugh, G. Gaither, and some others occasionally. That, besides those, goods were purchased for the trade at New York and in Philadelphia. That, when Mr. McKenney was appointed superintendent, he was in partnership with a Mr. Hall, on Pennsylvania Avenue; that, on his appointment, Mr. McKenney dissolved partnership with Mr. Hall. Does not know that Mr. McKenney has, since his appointment, had any interest with Mr. Hall in trade, or with any other person. That, since the dissolution, Mr. McKenney purchased from Mr. Hall an invoice of from ten to twelve thousand dollars worth of goods, which were bought by Hall at Baltimore, on memorandum of Mr. McKenney. Knows of no other goods being bought of Hall by superintendent. The goods from Mr. Cox, importer, were bought without reference to sterling cost. Those from Wright were generally bought by the original invoice. Thinks the goods of Wright cheaper than those purchased from Cox, but not so good in quality. Thinks the goods purchased from the merchants in Georgetown, who were not importers, but who bought their goods in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York, as cheap as those bought of Cox and Wright. Understood that Mr. Cox was the endorser of Mr. McKenney on notes to be discounted at the banks. Has seen such notes, but does not know that this induced Mr. McKenney to purchase from him more than from others.

JER. W. BRONAUGH.

Second examination of J. W. Bronaugh, by Colonel McKenney.

Question 1. Were not due pains taken, by correspondence and intercourse with merchants, to ascertain yearly the state of the markets, before I decided to buy the annual supplies?

Answer. I think all necessary pains were taken.

Ques. 2. Was there ever, according to your judgment, an article bought of any man, when, after taking the pains to ascertain it, that article could have been bought, combining its suitability and cheapness, for a less price of another?

Ans. I have no recollection that any article was purchased when it was known it could be had cheaper from another.

Ques. 3. Do you not believe that the Georgetown market was the best, for several years past, (say since 1815 and 1816,) for Indian goods, of any other market in the United States, especially for the great and leading articles?

Ans. I believe it was the best for blankets and strouds.

Ques. 4. Was it not the practice of the office to encourage competition, by giving samples to merchants, and every information touching the kind of goods in which we dealt?

Ans. It was.

Ques. 5. Was it not the business of the office to provide, as near as it was possible, and transport, the articles enumerated in the annual calls of the factors?

Ans. It was.

Ques. 6. Did you not, whilst packing in the spring of 1816, make out the list of articles enumerated in my letter to Mr. Edward Hall, of the 23d April, 1816, and report it to me as being then wanted? And were not the articles, including the blankets, which he offered, in all respects suitable and valuable goods, and wanted at the time?

Ans. I think I made out the list, and I know the articles were very suitable, and as cheap as others.

Ques. 7. When the articles arrived, did you not inspect them, and report on all of them that were bought that they were within the limits, were good goods, and suitable?

Ans. I did.

Ques. 8. Have not invoices been sent, year after year, from some of the older factories, containing the same quantity of the same articles, which, from their having been bought so long, and being unsuited to the trade, remained on hand?

Ans. I believe nearly so.

Ques. 9. Was not the advance of from sixty-six and two-thirds to one hundred per cent., the tested advance which had been adopted by my predecessor, essential, in the general operations of the establishment, to sustain the capital from diminution?

Ans. I think sixty-six and two-thirds per cent. was the maximum authorized by General Mason.

Ques. 10. Did not Colonel Cox show a good deal of feeling, and often declare, upon his honor, that he was not dealt as fairly by as he should be, by reason of the scrutiny which was exercised in buying goods of him?

Ans. He did.

Ques. 11. Was there not one occasion in which he told you he and I had had some words because of my exceptions to his goods, and perhaps questioning too closely his statements?

Ans. He did.

Ques. 12. Did you not, by my instructions, weigh, and examine, and adjust the parcel of goods referred to in my letter to Colonel Cox of the 10th April, 1821, and graduate the prices to a former purchase, to which this purchase referred?

Ans. I did.

Ques. 13. Was not the Georgetown market for furs and peltries considered by General Mason, and did you not believe it to be the best in the United States?

Ans. It has always been considered by me the best; and I have heard many dealers in the articles from New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, express the same opinion. I know General Mason believed it to be one of the best.

Ques. 14. Did we not uniformly realize more in Georgetown, for the sales made there, than was given at the same periods in any market in the United States?

Ans. I believe so.

Ques. 15. Did not the purchasers attending, from Boston to Richmond, unite in this declaration?

Ans. They did.

Ques. 16. Did not Mr. Kennerly, agent at St. Louis, in violation of my instructions, sell furs and other articles at St. Louis, in the year 1821, to wit: 625 raccoon skins, contained in packs Nos. 56, 57, 58, 64, and 65, from the Prairie du Chien factory; 2,500 muskrat skins, in packs Nos. 68, 69, 70, 72, and 73, also from Prairie du Chien; 80 wolf skins; 2,360 pounds feathers; 214 mats; 81 pounds beaver fur; 66 pounds deer skins; which, after deducting transportation from St. Louis to this place, would have sold for $3,597 11, according to the sale in Georgetown, to which they were destined?

Ans. Mr. Kennerly did sell the furs at St. Louis, in violation of his instructions, and at lower prices than were obtained for them in Georgetown.

Ques. 17. And does not the said Kennerly now stand charged with said amount on the books of the Indian Office?

Ans. He does.

Ques. 18. Did I ever, to the best of your knowledge and belief, apply a single cent, more or less, of the public money in my charge, to my own private affairs?

Ans. Not to my knowledge.

Ques. 19. If I had so applied it, were not the checks and rules in the accounting system, which had been established, such as would have detected it?

Ans. They would.

Ques. 20. Did I not make it one of these rules never to fill up or number a check; but, when payment was to be made, was it not made the duty, and did not you, or the book-keeper, or copying clerk, fill up the check, number it, and hand it to me for my signature, and then yourselves retire with it and apply it?

Ans. We did.

Ques. 21. Was it not the rule of the office to write in the body of each check, and on the margin of the check book, what each check was for, and to whom paid?

Ans. It was.

Ques. 22. Were ever any payments made, except by checks thus prepared?

Ans. Never, to my knowledge or belief.

Ques. 23. Were any moneys ever kept, except in bank, more than from ten to twenty dollars? And did not the messenger receive this by a check? and was he not held accountable for its disbursement in paying of dray and cart hire, and other incidental expenses?

Ans. There never was.

A. B. Lindsley's statement.

A. B. Lindsley, agent to close the factory concern at Chicago, says: The samples exhibited were taken by him from the goods received from Mr. Varnum; and the prices affixed to them were those charged in the inventory. That the goods received from Governor Woodbridge, at Detroit, were equally high charged, and worse goods than received from Mr. Varnum, and worse damaged. Is of opinion that the goods received by him were generally charged from thirty to one hundred per cent. higher than they were worth in the Atlantic cities in 1822. This opinion is confirmed by comparison with goods bought by Indian traders in New York, in the spring of 1822, as well as by his previous knowledge of the market. A penknife, now shown to the committee, was charged at seven dollars per dozen, which was purchased in 1820, by the invoice, as recognised by Mr. Varnum, and which was not worth more than four dollars at private sale in Philadelphia in 1816.

A. B. LINDSLEY.

Second examination of Mr. Lindsley, by Colonel McKenney.

Question 1. Were you ever engaged in Indian trade?

Answer. Never, except in settling the United States' factory business.

Ques. 2. How much should a three point northwest blanket weigh, to be good? and how long and how wide should it be?

Ans. I do not know.

Ques. 3. Do you know how long the goods you have reported so unfavorably of were in the factory, the business of which you went to close; and by whom they were sent—whether by me or by my predecessor?

Ans. I do not.

Ques. 4. Did you not assign as a reason why the goods were sacrificed at Detroit, that of a combination among the purchasers?

Ans. It is probable; but I consider they generally brought their present value. But combinations existed, I believe, among the merchants, which I resisted all I could.

Ques. 5. Do you know whether the samples you have exhibited to the committee, of calicoes and bafias, were, or were not, from the flag ends of these goods?

Ans. I do not know that they were.

Ques. 6. Did you not sell some of the goods at cost? And how much more than cost? Of what articles?

Ans. I do not now recollect the articles, but some of the goods sold at Chicago brought more than cost, and others brought the cost. Some of them were not goods; the flag handkerchiefs, for instance.

J. B. Varnum's statement.

Jacob B. Varnum produced several invoices received from Mr. McKenney. The first for merchandise forwarded from Philadelphia, in May, 1816, amounting to £315 1s. 9½d. sterling, on which an advance of 33½ per cent. was charged. Second, for merchandise forwarded from Pittsburg, in 1816, being heavy articles, amounting to $495 33. Third, for merchandise forwarded by J. W. Bronaugh, by order of the superintendent, to Mr. Wooley, at Pittsburg, to be forwarded to Chicago, amounting to $4,464 53; one per cent. advance charged as usual. Several other invoices were produced, none of which state from whence the goods were purchased.

Several samples of cloth, calico, &c., taken from the goods at Chicago by A. B. Lindsley, were shown Mr. Varnum. He could not recognise the samples, but is of opinion that the green cloth, from which the sample is said to be taken, was purchased in 1815, by General Mason; the calicoes in 1818, and the blue cloth in 1820, by Mr. McKenney. He was instructed, generally, to sell goods from 66½ to 100 per cent. advance, but much was left to his discretion. Finding he could not get that advance on the old stock of goods, he applied to Mr. McKenney for other instructions, who stated, in return, that his (Varnum's) situation would best enable him to judge of the propriety of reducing the prices, and gave discretionary power to sell at such prices as the nature of the case required, or to that effect. Mr. Varnum was not bred a merchant; was factor at Sandusky a short time before the war, and since the war had been at Chicago; has had no other practical knowledge of mercantile transactions than was acquired in those capacities; was in the habit of supplying Indian agents with goods from the factory; same profit as to Indian purchasers. Furnished Mr. Jouett, in one quarter, he thinks, about $1,800 worth, but usually not more than from $75 to $150 in a quarter; sold to officers and soldiers such articles as were not in immediate demand for the Indians. The powder received from the superintendent at $15 70 was accompanied by a letter from him, dated October 29, 1817, now produced, which shows it was purchased during the war.

JACOB B. VARNUM.

Second examination of Mr. Varnum, by Col. McKenney.

Question 1. Were not the goods sent you by me, in general, good and valuable goods?

Answer. They were.

Ques. 2. After you selected the old and damaged goods for General Cass, were not those which remained on hand good and valuable goods, and suited to Indian trade?

Ans. They were.

Ques. 3. Were they not, generally, those sent by me?

Ans. They were, generally.

JACOB B. VARNUM.

John Hersey's statement.

I, John Hersey, resident at Georgetown, late factor at the Choctaw trading-house, in the State of Alabama, testify and say: That in October, 1819, I was appointed factor at said trading-house, and continued to act in that capacity to October, 1822; that, on entering on the business at said house, as near as I now recollect, the amount of goods delivered over to me by my predecessor was about $14,000; many of which goods were so much damaged, or so unsaleable, as to render it impossible to sell more than $2,000 or $3,000, probably, of them during the time I was factor.

During the time I was factor, I received, as near as I now recollect, about \$12,000 by the year, all which came to me through the medium of Mr. T. L. McKenney; about one-sixth of which came from New Orleans and Mobile, such as coffee, sugar, lead, and salt; the residue were from Columbia District and New York. When we received the goods at said house, we generally received accompanying invoices. I then thought most of the articles were of a fair price, and certainly of a good quality; except, in a few instances, some were damaged on their passage. From Colonel McKenney I received instructions to add from 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ to 100 per cent. to the invoice prices; and the sales, on an average for the whole three years, were above 80 per cent. advance on the invoice prices. In payment of these things sold, I received deer skins, furs, beeswax, tallow, and cash. The nett gains to Government during the whole three years were between \$8,000 and \$9,000, after paying freight on such articles as were received from Mobile, and besides a remuneration of myself and all others employed there.

When I took charge of the house, I think, as near as I now can recollect, the amount of outstanding debts due the Government was upwards of $13,000, not more than $1,000 of which were probably collected while I was there; and I now am of opinion that one-third of the remaining $12,000 may be collected.

I presume a majority of the debtors to Government, when I went there, afterwards traded with me, many of whom might deliver me peltry and other things to an amount as great as the debts then due from them severally; each one, however, took other goods to an equal, and sometimes greater amount; so that, in most instances, the old debts remained on the books, uncanceled and unliquidated.

JOHN HERSEY, Late Factor C. T. H.

Mr. Hersey's second examination, by Colonel McKenney.

Question 1. Was there not in the Choctaw factory, when you took charge of it, a large quantity of old and unsuitable goods?

Answer. There was.

Ques. 2. Did I not, in my letters, direct that they should be disposed of at reduced prices, and on long credit, provided you could get unexceptionable security?

Ans. I was requested by you to dispose of the old and damaged goods, I think, at reduced prices, and on long credits, provided such security could be obtained.

Ques. 3. Were not the goods which you received of me in general suitable and fairly charged? and did you not do out of them your principal business?

Ans. To the best of my knowledge, they were charged at fair prices; they were of good quality; and out of them I did the principal business while there.

James Kennerly's statement.

I, James Kennerly, of St. Louis, do testify and say: That, about nine years ago, I was appointed transportation agent for the United States at St. Louis, and have transported all articles from said St. Louis to Fort Edwards, and to Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi; Fort Osage, on the Missouri; and, within the last year or two, to Marie De-cine. Among the articles transported were large quantities of powder and tobacco. In November, 1820, Colonel T. L. McKenney ordered into my hands forty packages of goods, supposed for the Indian trade, and the same are still in my possession unopened; and last spring I received the amount of $1,100, or thereabouts, in goods sent to me by Robert B. Belt, United States factor, from Fort Armstrong. Colonel McKenney never gave me any directions as to the disposal of these forty packages; but he told me they were purchased for the Indian annuities of the Chickasaw tribe; however, as they preferred specie, he agreed to take them again to the trade department. Four years ago, or thereabouts, I received several packages of goods sent to me by J. W. Johnston, United States factor at Prairie du Chien, which he considered as unsaleable in the Indian trade. I, by direction of Colonel McKenney, sold them at auction at St. Louis, and they went off at a great sacrifice, bringing, from the best of my recollection, not more than half invoice cost or price. Among the said articles sold were coarse strouding, a large quantity of printed cotton shawls and of Madras handkerchiefs, a few pairs of morocco shoes, and a large number of gun screws. All the furs and peltries which I sold at St. Louis were sold at a profit, without selection; but Colonel McKenney was dissatisfied at the sales made by me at St. Louis, and directed that the said furs and peltries might be sent by me to Georgetown. Accordingly, I sold only a small quantity at St. Louis, and forwarded the residue to Georgetown, which I could, without selection, have sold at a handsome profit at St. Louis. As to the goods at factories, Messrs. Johnston, Belt, and Sibley told me they sold at sixteen per cent. advance on the cost and carriage. Three or four years the fall supplies, intended for the Indian trade, did arrive so late in the season at St. Louis, that, in consequence of it, they could not be made to reach their place of destination till spring; by reason of which, the goods sustained damage, and the advantages of the trade with the Indians were not realized; though Colonel McKenney, on being informed of it, expressed his surprise, and said the goods were sent in season, and requested me to ascertain the reasons of the delay, in order that a prosecution might be commenced against the freighter.

JAMES KENNERLY.

Examination of Mr. Fitzhugh.

Question 1. How long have you been clerk and assistant packer in the Indian Office?

Answer. Between fourteen and fifteen years.

Ques. 2. Were not the heavy articles generally purchased at St. Louis and Pittsburg? or, when here, were they not always put in with light loads, which weighed less than the weight for which payment must have been made, whether they had been sent or not?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. 3. Were not the supplies always sent off from the office, by the way of St. Louis, in season?

Ans. They were.

Ques. 4. Have you not copied many severe letters from me to Mr. Kennerly, complaining of his inattention to their transportation, with assurances that I could not, with all my good opinion of his integrity, permit the Indian supplies to be so delayed?

Ans. I have.

Ques. 5. Did not Mr. Kennerly reply, on one occasion, that he had not been as attentive as he ought to have been, and that he had trusted to others, but would in future be more vigilant?

Ans. I think he did.

Ques. 6. Did you help to pack the calicoes and cotton, samples of which Mr. Lindsley has produced?

Ans. I recollect having packed the knives and calicoes.

Ques. 7. Are they fair samples?

Ans. I do not know.

Ques. 8. Would you consent either to buy or sell by such samples?

Ans. I think the samples are rather too small to judge of the quality of the goods.

Ques. 9. Have you examined the invoices in regard to these goods?

Ans. I have. The calicoes sent to Chicago in 1818, at forty-five cents, were purchased in Philadelphia; and the knives in Georgetown, of Wharton & Grindage. Mr. W. stated that the knives he sold Mr. McKenney at seven dollars a dozen he had retailed at eighty-seven and a half cents each.

M. FITZHUGH.

After the examination of the witnesses, Colonel McKenney addressed the chairman thus:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have, by your permission, looked over the several depositions of the gentlemen examined by the committee the other day, under the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th instant, "instructing the committee to inquire whether any, and, if any, what abuses have been committed by the late superintendent of Indian trade, (Colonel Thomas L. McKenney,) in the purchase or sale of goods under the several laws formerly regulating the Indian trade, with power to send for persons and papers;" and I have submitted to the same gentlemen, to-day, such interrogatories as appeared to me to have a bearing upon the subject of the present inquiry.

I beg leave to trouble the committee with a few remarks, not because I have discovered any thing in any of the statements going to sanction, in the smallest degree, the imputations which led to this inquiry, but because the occasion having been furnished by others, (I do not mean the committee,) in the expectation of detecting something in my official transactions which would tarnish my reputation, I cannot consent to let it pass without exhibiting such proofs as shall not only establish my claims to the confidence of the Government under which, for six years, I was in the exercise of an important and responsible trust, (at least so far as the duties connected with that trust are concerned;) but, by disclosing the principles which governed me in the discharge of my duties as a public officer, place my integrity before the eyes of the committee, of the Congress, and the world, in the same light in which I have always had the happiness to contemplate it myself.

It is certainly very unpleasant even to appear to be one's own eulogist, but I trust to the nature of this inquiry to furnish the apology.

It may be proper for me to premise a few things.

1st. I was bred a merchant, and had all the advantages of information arising out of a large business, and frequent intercourse with our principal cities, as well since as during my initiatory progress in the counting-house of my father. From this, the committee may infer my competency to conduct a business entirely mercantile, as was the Indian trade; and not to conduct it only, but to judge of the suitability or unsuitability of the supplies required in its prosecution, and of their comparative cheapness.

2d. The calls for the articles constituting those supplies were furnished, annually, by the factors stationed at the several trading posts in the Indian country, and who, it is but reasonable to suppose, enumerated such articles only as were required in the prosecution of the trade. These calls, as far as it was practicable, were always complied with. From this the committee may infer whether the articles forwarded were suitable or not.

3d. It was my good fortune to succeed to the superintendency of this trade a gentleman whose character for mercantile intelligence, and system, and integrity, needs no commendation of mine to give it weight. I found in the office the evidences of the most perfect system. I found in the several branches of it, among the agents, (so far as it was possible for me to judge of them,) intelligence and integrity, and, in the nature of their returns, the most perfect system of accountability. They were all, except the clerks in my office, strangers to me. I had never seen but one of them. I judged of them by their works. I supplanted none of them, neither those who were attached to the system, nor the purchasing agents in our cities, by others of my own selecting. When removals occurred, they were produced by death and resignations; when, with a view to the public interests, I recommended to the President such as I believed were "capable and honest." In doing this I consulted, as far as I was able, my own actual knowledge of the ability and integrity of the applicants. This was due to myself, for the responsibility was mine. From this the committee may infer whether my trust was made the instrument of "abuse" in conferring, so far as it relates to appointments to office, favors on my friends.

I have thought proper thus to premise; but I intend to show, before I have done, by something more than inference, what were the principles which governed me in the discharge of my duty as superintendent of Indian trade. My commission bears date the 2d day of April, 1816. I entered upon the duties of my office on the 12th of the same month. I had for some time, nearly two years before, disposed of my mercantile establishments, of which I was owner of two in Georgetown, and held an interest, till about the period of my appointment, in a store in Washington, under the firm of J. C. Hall & Co. The obligations of my oath of office, which forbade me to participate, directly or indirectly, in any trade or barter, except on the public account, made it necessary for me to give up my interest in that concern. I did so; and, in adjusting the preliminaries to that sale, I was kept from entering upon the duties of my office from the 2d to the 12th day of April, having solicited and obtained the superintendency of my predecessor, General Mason, till that concern was disposed of.

I had not been long in office before I heard the buzz of those insects whose business it is, according to Dr. Johnson, "to sting one and fly away;" a kind of invisible agency of the prince of darkness sent to annoy, and, if possible, to wound and destroy. They multiply in the atmosphere of public agencies, especially if they be disbursing agencies; and we have illustrated their activity and venom from their attacks upon the hero who first broke the charm of British invincibility, and who had established such claims upon the confidence and gratitude of his country, as one might suppose would have guarded him from such annoyances as these, even down to your door-keeper in a public office, who has intrusted to him no more of the public money than will suffice to purchase a straw broom and a mat. It was not for me, in the discharge of the trust with which I was honored, involving as it did disbursements of such various applications, to expect to live free from this kind of annoyance. I did not expect it. It was my duty, and I made it my business, therefore, to begin by providing such guards as should, at least, preserve me from any fatal consequences.

The first of these slanders was one which identified me, after my entrance upon the duties of my office, as a party in the concern of J. C. Hall & Co.; and again, if not a party, yet as deriving an indirect emolument in the purchases which it was circulated I was constantly making of that concern. And these slanders, after having remained in their elementary state for six years, have at last been embodied and made (and I thank the committee for bringing them within my reach) part of the subject-matter of this inquiry.

So soon as I had ascertained that those insinuations were in circulation, I requested Mr. Edward Hall, through whom I had negotiated the sale, and who was interested, as he told me, in it, to embody the entire affair, down to the purchase of the only parcel of goods I ever made of him, (for although there was a small invoice in addition to the first, yet it is believed to have been part of the principal purchase,) in a certificate, giving to it the solemnity and sanction of an oath. This was accordingly done and signed in Georgetown, as the original, which I now submit, and which is the paper marked A, shows, on the 12th of November, 1817, and witnessed by John W. Rich, then bookkeeper in my office. Mr. Hall being, as I learn, in Virginia, and Mr. Rich dead, I have procured the certificate of the brother of the latter, now in Washington, certifying to his brother's handwriting; and the oath of Mr. Richard Thompson, of Georgetown, identifying the signature of Mr. Hall. I have procured these, that no cavil may arise. I also beg leave to read the following letter (B) from my letter-book D, page 13, which will explain the test to which the goods he proposed to procure would be subjected, viz: an inspection and approval after they should arrive at the warehouses in Georgetown. They were subjected to this test, like all other goods which were ever bought in Georgetown, as Mr. Bronaugh has deposed; and, having passed it, were bought: and, because I had been connected with the firm of J. C. Hall & Co., it has been insinuated that I participated in the profits of that transaction. I refer to paper A, just submitted, and ask if there be any thing in it which would authorize such an insinuation? And I ask whether I must not have been constituted of more than degraded baseness to have placed myself before Mr. Hall, who knew the binding obligations of my oath of office, as a perjured man? But I repel the insinuation; and, under the solemnities of the oath which kept the way to my passage to the office to which I was appointed, till I had "washed my hands" of all connexion with that concern, do I now swear that I never participated one cent, either by profit or by present, more or less, in that purchase; nor, from the hour when the terms of sale were agreed upon, which separated me from that concern, in any transaction connected, either directly or indirectly, with the agency of either J. C. Hall or Edward Hall, or with any other individual who ever had transactions with the office of Indian trade during the period of my superintendency: and I challenge the worst enemy I have upon earth to convict me in this matter.

Let it be recollected that it was made my duty, by virtue of my commission, which constituted me sole judge of the purchases, to provide the best and the cheapest goods for the prosecution of this trade. For my attention to the state of the markets, I refer to my letter-books, and to the testimony of Mr. Bronaugh, in answer to questions touching this part of his examination. I never bought of any one without first satisfying myself that I was making the best purchases which the markets enabled me to make, taking the range of the New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other markets, and bringing the prices and kinds of goods into a just comparison with the prices and kinds which were offered in our home market, and purchasing accordingly.

I beg leave to read to the committee a few letters, and the answers to them: say one to New York, to my agent in that city, J. L. Dias, (C,) with his answer, (D;) and another to Henry Simpson, agent at Philadelphia, (E,) with his answer, (F;) and to these I add a general reference to my letter-books now in possession of the committee.

From the letters which I have read, and the replies to them, the committee may infer the state of those markets for Indian goods; I say Indian goods, because he who judges of the high or low cost of leading Indian articles, blankets and strouds, by a comparison, the blankets with any other kinds of blankets, no matter though the points be the same, or the strouding with any other kinds of cloth, and makes up his judgment from an external inspection, and not by weighing and measuring them, betrays at once his ignorance of the comparative value of these goods: and I appeal for the truth of this to the whole mercantile community.

Yet those goods, although, as these letters show, not to be had in either the New York or Philadelphia market, were to be had in Georgetown. My object in writing was to ascertain their value. The reason why the Georgetown market was the best is plain: it was the place where the demand existed; and he must be a novice, indeed, in mercantile matters, who does not know the first principle of trade, "that where a demand is, there will be also a corresponding ability to supply it." The progress towards this ability in the Georgetown market was gradual; and, by referring to the invoices, as did the committee of Congress, in 1817, of which the Hon. J. Pickens was chairman, it will be seen that, during the first years of the removal of the office to Georgetown, but few articles were purchased except in Philadelphia, where the office had been; but every succeeding year lessened the ability where the demand had ceased to exist, and increased it where it did exist.

I have one evidence in point, which I will submit to the committee, as to the ability of the Georgetown market to supply (when the demand existed there, I mean,) the calls for Indian supplies. The arrearages of annuities occasioned by the war brought together, in 1816, the very first year of my agency, several of them; that is, for the years 1813, 1814, 1815, and 1816, all to be purchased and transported in one season, besides $20,000 worth of presents. Of these annuities and presents, forty odd thousand dollars worth were purchased and transported to Governor Cass at Detroit, for the purposes of his agency; but only about eight hundred dollars worth were purchased outside of the District of Columbia. And what did Governor Cass say of those supplies? I will read an extract from the letter-book D, page 251, (G,) which I find incorporated in a report to the Hon. J. Pickens. Here, then, is prima facie evidence that it was not an "abuse" or corruption of office which led me to make purchases to so large an amount in Georgetown, but the capacity in that market to supply the demand. It may be well to remark, that a two-fold advantage was realized, which a purchase by agency, in other places, did not embrace: first, the selections were made under my own eye; and, second, the commissions were saved.

It may be asked, "Why, if I had such means of forwarding goods of such good quality, and upon such good terms, are there so many bad and high-charged goods at the factories?" The answer is plain. The factories contain goods which have been on hand from seven to twenty years. But for these goods, it is to be presumed, I am not accountable. I am, however, far from pretending that there never went, among the vast amount of purchases which I made in the six years of my superintendency, any high-charged and unsuitable goods. It would be preposterous: for where, let me ask, is the merchant, who, with all his care in supplying his single store, never gets, with his good and valuable goods, some which are not so?

But a short time before I received my appointment, the state of the markets throughout the United States was such as almost to forbid those who were of the mercantile community from purchasing at all. And as to the articles suited to Indian purposes, these were nearly out of the market. Powder, in those days, cost three times the price at which it has sold for since; and as to blankets, these were, of the proper kinds, entirely out of the question. Many of those which were sent among the Indian supplies were manufactured with a texture like that of a hat, rolled out like a pelt; and cloth had to be bought, in some instances, made, in part, of hair! Yet this was the best that could be done; and no person will think of censuring my predecessor for sending those goods, because none better could be procured. We all remember to what a height, at about the period I refer to, all articles of merchandise had attained—from one to three hundred per cent. above what they have ever been since. But no one will think of laying the weight of such portions of these goods as are to this hour on hand at the factories, in the shape of censure, at my door.

It is asked, "Why I did not get rid of those old goods?" I appeal to my letter-book for the proofs that I made efforts to do so. But the difficulty in the way of accomplishing such an end is great—indeed, next to insurmountable. The merchants in our cities can, and do, disemboague their remnants and bad goods, through auctions, at any sacrifices. But there are no such facilities, let it be remembered, in the wilderness. Parts of the old stock at Prairie du Chien I did order to St. Louis, where they were sold at great sacrifices. (See my letter-book D, bottom of page 411.) The old goods at Chicago and Green Bay were sold to Governor Cass, for the Indian Department, at a sacrifice on the cost, (see letter-book G G, page 271;) and efforts were made at other points, as my letter-books will demonstrate.

But implications are made, and suspicion has been busy, because the great body of the leading articles for Indian supplies were bought at Georgetown; and because two persons, Colonel Cox and Thomas C. Wright, and not two hundred, had greater means, were better provided, and of course sold more to the Indian Office, than others. It is known to at least the citizens of this District that these gentlemen have been at particular pains to provide themselves with the best supplies for Indian purposes; and Colonel Cox, in particular, for years (as the testimony before the committee establishes) before I had any thing to do with these purchases, was a dealer with the office, and to very large amounts.

I have said, and I repeat it, and under the solemnities of the same oath under which I discharged my general duties as superintendent, that my purchases were made wherever and of whomsoever they could be best made. Nor did it become me to consider how little or how much was purchased of any man; but only whether what was bought of him was the best, the cheapest, and most suitable, which, at the time of buying, the markets could furnish. For the scrutiny that was exercised in my purchases of Colonel Cox, (and it was not peculiar to him,) I refer to the testimony of Mr. Bronaugh, and to a letter which I find in my letter-book G G, page 176, (H,) which I addressed to him on the subject of a supply of leading articles, which had been bought in the expectation, and with the understanding, that they were of the same quality and weight of the goods of the previous year. My terms in this letter were complied with. (See Mr. Bronaugh's testimony.)

I know no man, in my official relations, as a friend, to be favored at the public expense; and what my view of this subject is, and the principles which governed me, I have the evidence, and shall presently disclose it, to demonstrate. I will call the attention of the committee to another of the whispers which seldom fail to be made in relation to disbursing public officers: I mean those which embrace imputations of applying the public money to private uses. However this abuse may have sometimes occurred, yet, as the examination of Mr. Bronaugh has tested, it has no application to me. I never did (and I add the awful sanction of my own appeal to the Deity in truth of it to that of Mr. Bronaugh) apply, during the whole term of my superintendence of the Indian Trade Department, one cent of the public moneys, more or less, (save those only which were allowed me for my salary,) to my private uses. No; it was around this branch of my duty that I placed the most inflexible guards. And I defy the closest scrutiny into every transaction of the moneyed sort, (and hundreds of thousands passed through my hands,) to detect a single departure from the inflexible rule, to keep the public moneys separate from what I might have of my own, and apply them ONLY to the purposes for which they had been intrusted to me.

I will now, in conclusion, proceed to illustrate before the committee what the estimate was, which, as a public officer, I attached to my integrity; and how scrupulous I was in providing against the attacks of even the veriest veterans in the art of detraction and slander. I certainly feel how unpleasant it is to be compelled to speak of one's self; but, as I have said already, the occasion must furnish the apology.

I submit the oaths of two brothers; and I appeal for the testimony of their integrity and good name to General Reed, of the House of Representatives, who has known us all from our infancy, and who is himself known to be an honorable man; and also to the principal families of this District, among whom I will venture to take the liberty of naming General Mason, and Doctor Worthington, and General Walter Smith and his family, and the Rev. Mr. Addison, and the Rev. Henry Foxall; and I make these references, because the testimony I am going to submit is the testimony of my brothers. For these brothers I have the warmest and most affectionate attachment; nor did I ever decline, in a single instance, when it was in my power, and when my sense of duty authorized it, to do them any favor they asked. I submit their statements on oath, (marked I, J,) and ask that judgment be pronounced, whether, if I could be inflexible to an appeal like this—be driven from a compliance with the proposition, so reasonable in itself, by an instinctive dread of slander, and the imputations which I knew well enough would attach to, and perhaps tarnish my integrity—I could be influenced by corrupt motives to deal with others who, although acquaintances and friends, are, in the comparison of a brotherly relation, strangers? and whether, with these feelings on my part, I could consent, by participating, as has been insinuated, in the purchase made of Mr. Hall, to stand before him, he knowing the nature of my oath of office, a perjured man? No, sir: my good name was, and yet is, my all. Money is not the god of my idolatry, as those who know me will attest. It had been better for me to-day, perhaps, had I worshipped a little more devotionally at this shrine. My good name I have labored hard to preserve. I received it as a legacy from parents who died and left me little else with which to combat the roughnesses of this bleak and cheerless world; and the business of my life has been, and I trust will ever be to its close, to preserve that legacy, and to hand it over untarnished to an only son, to whom, although I may have little more to give, it may constitute a source of the most agreeable reflections; and, by a reference to the example which this very inquiry furnishes, he may be induced the more vigilantly to guard it, and hand it over in perfect purity to his posterity. I am concerned for its preservation. I will not, I could not, disguise it; but I shall expect it to be protected, on this occasion, only on the grounds of my having demonstrated that it has been unrighteously assailed.

A.

I do hereby certify, that, at or about the time Thomas L. McKenney was appointed superintendent of Indian trade, he was engaged in a mercantile business in Washington city with my brother, J. C. Hall; and that, of the term of said partnership, which was five years, about one only had elapsed when the appointment above named was made; that Mr. McKenney aforesaid stated to my brother his necessity, under his oath of office, to relinquish all mercantile affairs on his own account, and proposed to sell out to my brother. His terms were, for his interest in the concern for the four years then to come, (the profits having been about $1,000 for the first year,) five annual payments of $1,000, to include the proportion of profits that had arisen on the first year's sales; he (the said McKenney) to afford his endorsement on paper running in bank for Mr. Hall's accommodation, to the amount of $5,000. My brother declined giving as much as the sum required; but, through me, proposed to give a less amount, in similar payments, and on the same privilege of endorsement as referred to.

It was here I suggested to Mr. McKenney that my brother could be essentially served by any dealings he might have with him as a merchant for the public supplies, and that any promise of countenance to this effect would enable my brother to give more for the interest in the establishment about to be bought out; when Mr. McKenney replied, "I can make no stipulations on such a subject. I can hold out no inducements of the sort: if your brother have goods, such as my official duty requires me to procure, and his terms be as good as others, his chance will be equal. I cannot say any thing to justify any expectations of the sort."

Such was the manner and feeling of the said McKenney on the subject, that I feared he supposed me inclined to induce him, by an additional offer, to commit himself to deal with my brother upon terms which might include his own interests, apart from his official duty and obligations; whereupon I explained that my intention was not to insinuate that I thought he could be tempted to barter away his honor; far from it; but I only wished to get as much information as I could for my brother, as to the probable amount of purchases he might be able to make, as that would enable him to form a more correct estimate of the annual worth of the business he was in; to which Mr. McKenney replied, "It is a point on which I cannot converse."

The bargain was at last concluded, by and through me, for my brother, and the sum agreed upon to be given was $2,000, in full of his proportion of the first year's profits, and for his interest in it for the four following years of the term of the partnership, in annual notes of $400 each; he (Mr. McKenney) agreeing to continue his endorsement on my brother's paper for $5,000.

Thus ended the purchase on the part of my brother, and the sale on the part of Mr. McKenney.

I do further certify and swear, that the notes above specified were all that were given, and that they were given solely as compensation for the said McKenney's proportion of profits that were then made, and for his interest in the business for four years then to come.

I do further swear, that Mr. McKenney urged me to come to some conclusion, (I having undertaken to be the organ for my brother to Mr. McKenney,) as he felt himself incapable to engage in the duties of his office until he had washed his hands of his own personal mercantile concerns; and further, that he (the said McKenney) always, during the negotiation, manifested the utmost repugnance to listen to the conversation which I had with him about selling to the Indian Department; nor did he ever justify the least expectations that any countenance, of any sort, would be shown to my brother or myself; and, finally, he "begged that no more might be said upon that subject."

Now, in justice to myself, it becomes me to say, that my whole motive in asking for information was to obtain, not any commitment from Mr. McKenney, but only to enable my brother to make his arrangements, by providing such goods as might be in demand, and to get some information of their kinds, and to place ourselves (my brother, Joseph C. Hall, and myself, I mean) before Mr. McKenney's view as sellers of goods, and to express a hope for a suitable patronage.

Finally, Mr. McKenney, some time after the sale, and when I called to offer him some goods, declined even to look at them himself; and then stated that "his having been in business with my brother would prevent him from ever making any purchases; that, whatever goods we might have to offer, we must present to Mr. Bronaugh," which we did.

I further swear, that I never in my life witnessed more circumspect caution, or apprehensions of suspicion, in any man, than I did in Mr. McKenney; nor did my brother ever sell but one parcel of goods to the Indian Department, and these were inspected and approved of by Mr. Bronaugh.

SIR:

INDIAN OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, April 23, 1816.

You mentioned to me the other evening that your brother was then in Baltimore, and that he would be glad to attend to the purchase of any articles of merchandise I might want for this office. I respectfully avail myself of this tender of services, which you will be pleased to understand as being accepted only upon the condition that the articles I am about to name be, if purchased, entirely acceptable in price and quality, and in such other respects as shall render them entirely proper for the purpose for which they are intended. With this condition, you may write to your brother to procure and send on, with as little delay as possible, twenty pieces of dark purple and chocolate brown cloth, (that is to say, ten pieces of each,) to be three-quarters of a yard wide, good quality, to cost here not more than seventy-five cents per yard; one hundred pieces of strouds, (about twenty yards in a piece.) Strouds are a blue cloth, six quarters wide, with a narrow cord about one inch from the selvage. For these, I will allow (if good) one dollar and twenty-five cents per yard. Six pieces of green cloth, (nearly grass green,) six quarters wide, not to exceed in price one dollar and twenty-five cents per yard.

If these goods can be procured, and can be furnished to this office in fifteen or twenty days, (sooner would be desirable,) and under the conditions named, I will buy them.

I am, &c.

Mr. EDWARD HALL, Georgetown.

NOTE.—Mr. Hall bought, also, a parcel of blankets, at his own risk, which, on arriving, were inspected; and, being then wanted, were bought for the supplies then making up.

C.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, May 8, 1818.

I will thank you if you will take the trouble to make inquiries in your city after the following articles, and of the following descriptions: Northwest Company blankets, (so called,) three points, to measure six feet six inches long, and five feet six inches wide; to weigh, per pair, eight pounds and a half. Two and a half points, to measure six feet three inches long, and five feet two inches wide; to weigh, per pair, seven pounds and a half. Strouds, from six to seven quarters wide, to weigh, per yard, from one and a half to one pound and three-quarters.

If these goods can be had, please inform me at what prices.

Respectfully, &c.

Extract from so much of J. L. Dias's letter as relates to the call on him for information of prices, as per letter C.

As to the inquiries contained in your favor of the 8th, I regret to inform you that I have not been able to find out any blankets of the description therein stated, nor do I believe it possible to meet with any.

In 1813, I purchased, by order of General Mason, and forwarded to some of the factories, some two and a half and three point blankets, but I believe they were of the ordinary sizes and weights, for I remember that I had previously endeavored, in vain, to procure such ones as you describe.

Note by Colonel McKenney.—It will be recollected that both Mr. Dias and Mr. Simpson had the inducements of a commission for buying.

In reply to your favor of the 8th instant, I beg leave to state, that there are no blankets in this market of the precise quality and dimensions as those you ask for. Extract of a letter from General Cass to the Superintendent of Indian Trade.

I have been much gratified to find the goods sent here for the Indians are very well selected. Perfect justice has been done. I am informed, by persons in the Indian Department, that such a selection was never sent to this country. In fact, I cannot conceive that they could be better suited to the objects for which they are sent.

I refer to my letter-book D, page 348, to a letter of 24th June, 1817, in reply, in part, to one which I had received from J. W. Johnston, of Prairie du Chien. From the following paragraph, (although his letter to me is not at hand, but may be found by referring to the records of the Indian Office,) an inference may be made of the tenor of his letter to me from the following reply:

"It affords me pleasure (I say to him in reply) to learn that those goods are so very acceptable. It is surely a high commendation you bestow; and it is the more welcome, because you certainly know how to estimate an entire suitability of the articles to the tastes of the Indians in your quarter. I notice with pleasure that you are attracting, by means of those goods, the attention of the Indians."

T. L. MCKENNEY, S. I. T.

Letter to Colonel Cox.

SIR:

OFFICE OF INDIAN TRADE, April 10, 1821.

Understanding that you are in Baltimore, I think proper to write to you on the subject of the merchandise conditionally purchased of you. The blankets, on being opened, turn out to be so inferior as to be almost unsuited to the trade. Besides the appearance and poorness of covering, which shows the twill on both sides, the wrong side almost uncovered, and having a black narrow stripe instead of an indigo-blue and wide one, the three points are charged to weigh eight pounds and a quarter, and weigh only seven pounds and a half. The smaller blankets are of a similar quality.

The strouding, charged as being the same with the best of last year's purchase, weighs four pounds less, and is narrower and thinner, of course.

It will be difficult to use these goods at all, and impossible to do so at the prices charged in the memorandum left by you. Nothing can authorize the admission of any part of them into the stock except a reduction of prices, governing the depreciation by the falling short of the weights.

I wish you to write me immediately, and say whether you are willing to let these articles be used at the rates embraced by the unlikeness of their quality to those that they have been called equal to in your invoice. If not, it is proper I should say, they cannot be used at all. I regret this the more, as there will be an interruption in the packing until I hear from you. Write definitively and conclusively; and this you can do, because I can have no interest in misrepresenting these goods, and I wish to receive them only on fair terms.

Respectfully, &c.

To Col. JOHN COX.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, S. I. T.

I.

DEAR BROTHER:

GEORGETOWN, D. C., February 21, 1823.

I received, late this evening, your letter of yesterday, in which you request me to "embody the offer I had made me by a gentleman of New York, to engage with me in a mercantile establishment in Georgetown; stating the amount in cash which he proposed to furnish; the chief object of that proposition; and the conversation that passed between you and myself when I made it known to you."

In accordance with said request, I now make the following statement:

Not long after you had received the appointment of superintendent of Indian trade, a gentleman (Mr. William Floyd) from New York, then trading under the firm of Floyd, Smith, & Co., proposed to me to engage with him in a large dry goods establishment in this town, which should have for one of its objects, or its principal object, a reference to sales to your office, and, of course, to keep the most abundant and suitable supplies of Indian goods. He proposed to furnish the means to carry it on extensively.

I communicated to you information of this offer, and stated its principal object, expressing my belief that we should be able to sell to you upon as good terms as any other merchants, and that the offer was one of importance to me. You instantly, with some degree of excitement, rejected the plan; and, as well as I can recollect, replied, "tell or write the gentleman that I can consider his proposition in no other light than an indirect attempt upon my honor and reputation." You further said, that no disbursing officer could, with every possible precaution, keep himself free from the suspicions of the evil-disposed, the disappointed, and the malicious, deal with whomsoever he might; and that for me, however fair and honorable were my views, and would or might be your purchases, were you to make any, yet, as I was your brother, the public would never be satisfied but that corruptions and frauds were practised; that you had set out to avoid, as far as might be in your power, any just grounds of suspicion against any act of yours in the discharge of the trust which had been committed to you; and you never would, no matter how advantageous it might be to me, sanction the offer that had been made me, so far as it looked to your office to purchase goods of us. I recollect perfectly well that I endeavored to remonstrate with you, and begged you to consider that we never should ask you or expect you to buy a single article that should not be at a fair price, as low as it could be had elsewhere, and suitable to your wants or the Indian trade; and that I could not see why it must follow, because I was your brother, and you made purchases of me, that therefore you must be corrupt. I assured you that it was not expected by Mr. Floyd, when he made me the offer, that you should or would, in any instance, depart from the strict line of your duty, for we would only expect you to purchase of us when our offers were good and as cheap as others. You replied to me, with some sharpness: "Hush it. I never will sanction it. I am a better judge of this matter than you can be;" or words to that import. Seeing me considerably hurt at your manner, and refusal of what I considered a perfectly fair and honorable offer, which might be of great advantage to me, you stated that it was your duty to yourself and reputation that forbade you to sanction the contemplated business between Mr. Floyd and myself, and that I knew you had the best and most affectionate feelings towards me; but, nevertheless, you reiterated your refusal, and declared most solemnly that you would not countenance the offer, nor buy of us, directly or indirectly, no matter how superior and cheap our goods might be. Not seeing the justice of your resolution, after I had repeatedly told you we could only expect or desire you to purchase when our goods were suitable to your wants, and as cheap as they could be had elsewhere, I made known to my brother Samuel what had passed, and requested him, as he thought you were fastidious, to call and see you on the subject. He did so, but without being able to change your views or purpose; and I abandoned the contemplated establishment.

Your affectionate brother,

WM. MCKENNEY.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, District of Columbia, ss:

On the 22d day of February, 1823, came William McKenney before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for the said county, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God that the foregoing statement is true, to the best of his knowledge.

DANIEL BUSSARD.

J.

DEAR BROTHER:

GEORGETOWN, February 22, 1823.

I received your letter of the 20th instant, in which you request me "to state, on oath, the conversation you had with me on the subject of the proposition which our brother William had made to him by a gentleman from New York."

I recollect that our brother William, I think in 1817 or 1818, (I forget which,) came to me, and represented that he thought you had taken a very unjustifiable stand in relation to an offer he had made to him by a gentleman of New York, of a considerable capital, to open a dry goods store in Georgetown, by refusing, if he did commence the business, to buy an article from him, at no matter what rates he might offer it. Thinking that you had not duly weighed the subject, and knowing that it was not necessary for a purchaser, because he dealt with his brother, to be a rogue, I went to your house, and found you in the fields. I represented my views to you, and urged you to think differently; and that, if William sold as cheap as any one else, and dealt in the right kind of goods, I could not see any reason why you should not deal with him. Your answer was, in substance, that you were a public officer; suspicion would attach to you, deal with him as fairly as you might; and that your reputation was worth more to you than any moneyed advantage, arising under his proposed establishment, would be to him. You rejected my entreaties, and with fervor declared you never would deal with him while you remained a public officer, thereby subjecting yourself to the slanders of the suspicious, which you might never have it in your power to put down. This I believe to be the substance of our conversation; and I am now constrained to acknowledge the propriety of your decision.

I remain, your affectionate brother,

SAML. MCKENNEY.

SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, November 29, 1823.

WILLIAM LEE.

Copy of the license granted to General William H. Ashley to trade with the Indians up the Missouri, dated April 11, 1822.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Whereas William H. Ashley, of the State of Missouri, having made application to the Department of War for license to carry on trade with the Indians up the Missouri, and hath given bond, according to law, for the true and faithful observance, by him and his agents, of all and singular the regulations and restrictions as are, or shall be, made for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes: Now, therefore, be it known that the said William H. Ashley is hereby licensed to carry on trade with the Indians up the Missouri accordingly, for the term of one year from the date hereof, unless the license hereby granted should be sooner revoked.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the War Office of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 11th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1822.

By order of the President of the United States:

J. C. CALHOUN.

NOTE.—A license of precisely the same tenor and date was also granted to Major Andrew Henry.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to General William Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis, dated

JULY 1, 1822.

I have received a letter from Major O'Fallon, in which he states that he understands a license has been granted to General Ashley and Major Henry to trade, trap, and hunt on the Upper Missouri, and expresses a hope that limits have been prescribed to their trapping and hunting on Indian lands, as, he says, nothing is better calculated to alarm and disturb the harmony so happily existing between us and the Indians in the vicinity of the Council Bluffs.

The license which has been granted by this Department, by order of the President, to General Ashley and Major Henry, confers the privilege of trading with the Indians only, as the laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes do not contain any authority to issue licenses for any other purpose. The privilege thus granted to them they are to exercise conformably to the laws and regulations that are, or shall be, made for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indians: for the true and faithful performance of which they have given bonds, with sufficient security; consequently, it is presumed they will do no act, not authorized by such laws and regulations, which would disturb the peace and harmony existing between the Government and the Indians on the Missouri, but rather endeavor, by their regular and conciliatory conduct, to strengthen and confirm them.

TREATY WITH THE FLORIDA INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 15, 1823.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1823.

I transmit to the Senate, for its advice and consent as to the ratification, a treaty lately concluded with the Seminole Indians in Florida, whereby a cession of territory is made to the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

ARTICLE 1. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and their tribes, have appealed to the humanity, and thrown themselves on, and have promised to continue under, the protection of the United States, and of no other nation, power, or sovereign; and, in consideration of the promises and stipulations hereinafter made, do cede and relinquish all claim or title which they may have to the whole territory of Florida, with the exception of such district of country as shall herein be allotted to them.

ART. 2. The Florida tribes of Indians will hereafter be concentrated and confined to the following metes and boundaries: commencing five miles north of Okehumke, running in a direct line to a point five miles west of Setarky's settlement, on the waters of Amazura, (or Withlachuche river,) leaving said settlement two miles south of the line; from thence, in a direct line, to the south end of the Big Hammock, to include Chickuchate, continuing in the same direction for five miles beyond the said Hammock, provided said point does not approach nearer than fifteen miles the seacoast of the Gulf of Mexico: if it does, the said line will terminate at that distance from the seacoast; thence south, twelve miles; thence in a south thirty degrees east direction, until the same shall strike within five miles of the main branch of Charlotte river; thence, in a due east direction, to within twenty miles of the Atlantic coast; thence north, fifteen degrees west, for fifty miles; and from this last to the beginning point.

ART. 3. The United States will take the Florida Indians under their care and patronage, and will afford them protection against all persons whatsoever, provided they conform to the laws of the United States, and refrain from making war or giving any insult to any foreign nation without having first obtained the permission and consent of the United States. And in consideration of the appeal and cession made in the first article of this treaty by the aforesaid chiefs and warriors, the United States promise to distribute among the tribes, as soon as concentrated, under the direction of their agent, implements of husbandry, and stock of cattle and hogs, to the amount of six thousand dollars, and an annual sum of five thousand dollars a year for twenty successive years, to be distributed as the President of the United States shall direct, through the Secretary of War, or his superintendents and agent of Indian affairs.

ART. 4. The United States promise to guaranty to the said tribes the peaceable possession of the district of country herein assigned them, reserving the right of opening through it such roads as may from time to time be deemed necessary; and to restrain and prevent all white persons from hunting, settling, or otherwise intruding upon it. But any citizen of the United States, being lawfully authorized for that purpose, shall be permitted to pass and repass through the said district, and to navigate the waters thereof, without any hindrance, toll, or exaction from said tribes.

ART. 5. For the purpose of facilitating the removal of the said tribes to the district of country allotted them, and as a compensation for the losses sustained, or the inconveniences to which they may be exposed by said removal, the United States will furnish them with rations of corn, meat, and salt for twelve months, commencing on the first day of February next; and they further agree to compensate those individuals who have been compelled to abandon improvements on lands not embraced within the limits allotted, to the amount of four thousand five hundred dollars, to be distributed among the sufferers in a ratio to each proportional to the value of the improvements abandoned. The United States further agree to furnish a sum, not exceeding two thousand dollars, to be expended by their agent, to facilitate the transportation of the different tribes to the point of concentration designated.

ART. 6. An agent, sub-agent, and interpreter shall be appointed, to reside in the Indian boundary aforesaid, to watch over the interests of said tribes; and the United States further stipulate, as an evidence of their humane policy towards said tribes, who have appealed to their liberality, to allow, for the establishment of a school at the agency, one thousand dollars per year for twenty successive years; and one thousand dollars per year, for the same period, for the support of a gun and blacksmith, with the expenses incidental to his shop.

ART. 7. The chiefs and warriors aforesaid, for themselves and tribes, stipulate to be active and vigilant in the preventing the retreating to, or passing through, of the district of country assigned them, of any absconding slaves or fugitives from justice; and further agree to use all necessary exertions to apprehend and deliver the same to the agent, who shall receive orders to compensate them agreeably to the trouble and expense incurred.

ART. 8. A commissioner or commissioners, with a surveyor, shall be appointed by the President of the United States to run and mark (blazing fore and aft the trees) the line as defined in the second article of this treaty, who shall be attended by a chief or warrior, to be designated by a council of their own tribes, and who shall receive, while so employed, a daily compensation of three dollars.

ART. 9. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and tribes, having objected to their concentration within the limits described in the second article of this treaty, under the impression that the said limits did not contain a sufficient quantity of good land to subsist them, and for no other reason, it is therefore expressly understood between the United States and the aforesaid chiefs and warriors, that, should the country embraced in the said limits, upon examination by the Indian agent and the commissioner or commissioners to be appointed under the eighth article of this treaty, be by them considered insufficient for the support of the said Indian tribes, then the north line, as defined in the second article of this treaty, shall be removed so far north as to embrace a sufficient quantity of good tillable land.

ART. 10. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and tribes, have expressed to the commissioners their unlimited confidence in their agent, Colonel Gad Humphreys, and their interpreter, Stephen Richards; and, as evidence of their gratitude for their services and humane treatment and brotherly attentions to their wants, request that one mile square, embracing the improvements of Neamothla at Tallahassee, (said improvements to be considered as the centre,) be conveyed in fee simple as a present to Colonel Gad Humphreys. And they further request that one mile square at the Ocheese Bluffs, embracing Stephen Richards's field on said bluffs, be conveyed in fee simple as a present to said Stephen Richards. The commissioners accord in sentiment with the undersigned chiefs and warriors, and recommend a compliance with their wishes to the President and Senate of the United States; but the disapproval on the part of the said authorities of this article shall in nowise affect the other articles and stipulations concluded on in this treaty.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners, William P. Duval, James Gadsden, and Bernardo Segui, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals. Done at camp on Moultrie creek, in the Territory of Florida, this eighteenth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, and of the independence of the United States the forty-eighth.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL,
JAMES GADSDEN,
BERNARDO SEGUI.

[Signed, also, by certain chiefs and warriors of the Florida tribes of Indians.]

ADDITIONAL ARTICLE.

Whereas Neamothla, John Blount, Tuski-Hajo, Mulatto King, Emathlochee, and Econchatimico, six of the principal chiefs of the Florida Indians, and parties to the treaty to which this article has been annexed, have warmly appealed to the commissioners for permission to remain in the district of country now inhabited by them; and in consideration of their friendly disposition and past services to the United States, it is therefore stipulated between the United States and the aforesaid chiefs that the following reservations shall be surveyed and marked by the commissioner or commissioners to be appointed under the eighth article of this treaty: For the use of Neamothla and his connexions, two miles square, embracing the Tuphulga village, on the waters of Rocky Comfort creek. For Blount and Tuski-Hajo, a reservation, commencing on the Appalachianola, one mile below Tuski-Hajo's improvements, running up said river four miles; thence west, two miles; thence southerly, to a point two miles due west of the beginning; thence east, to the beginning point. For Mulatto King and Emathlochee, a reservation, commencing on the Appalachianola, at a point to include Yellow Hair's improvements; thence up said river, for four miles; thence west, one mile; thence southerly, to a point one mile west of the beginning; and thence east, to the beginning point. For Econchatimico, a reservation, commencing on the Chattahoochee, one mile below Econchatimico's house; thence up said river, for four miles; thence one mile west; thence southerly, to a point one mile west of the beginning; thence east, to the beginning point. The United States promise to guaranty the peaceable possession of the said reservations, as defined, to the aforesaid chiefs and their descendants, only so long as they shall continue to occupy, improve, or cultivate the same; but, in the event of the abandonment of all or either of the reservations by the chief or chiefs to whom they have been allotted, the reservation or reservations so abandoned shall revert to the United States, as included in the cession made in the first article of this treaty. It is further understood that the names of the individuals remaining on the reservations aforesaid shall be furnished by the chiefs, in whose favor the reservations have been made, to the superintendent or agent of Indian affairs in the Territory of Florida; and that no other individuals shall be received or permitted to remain within said reservations without the previous consent of the superintendent or agent aforesaid. And as the aforesaid chiefs are authorized to select the individuals remaining with them, so they shall each be separately held responsible for the peaceable conduct of their towns, or the individuals residing on the reservations allotted them. It is further understood between the parties that this agreement is not intended to prohibit the voluntary removal, at any future period, of all or either of the aforesaid chiefs and their connexions to the district of country south, allotted to the Florida Indians by the second article of this treaty, whenever either or all may think proper to make such an election; the United States reserving the right of ordering, for any outrage or misconduct, the aforesaid chiefs, or either of them, with their connexions, within the district of country south, aforesaid. It is further stipulated by the United States that, of the six thousand dollars appropriated for implements of husbandry, stock, &c. in the third article of this treaty, eight hundred dollars shall be distributed in the same manner among the aforesaid chiefs and their towns; and it is understood that, of the annual sum of five thousand dollars, to be distributed by the President of the United States, they will receive their proportion. It is further stipulated that, of the four thousand five hundred dollars, and two thousand dollars, provided for by the fifth article of this treaty, for the payment for improvements and transportation, five hundred dollars shall be awarded to Neamothla, as a compensation for the improvements abandoned by him, as well as to meet the expenses he will unavoidably be exposed to by his own removal and that of his connexions.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners, William P. Duval, James Gadsden, and Bernardo Segui, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals. Done at camp on Moultrie creek, in the Territory of Florida, this eighteenth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, and of the independence of the United States the forty-eighth.

Minutes of proceedings of James Gadsden and Bernardo Segui, appointed by the President of the United States to hold a treaty with the Florida Indians.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 7, 1823.

I have the honor to enclose you a commission from the President of the United States, appointing you commissioners to hold a treaty with the Florida Indians.

The object to be accomplished by the proposed treaty is the concentration of all the Florida Indians at some suitable point within that Territory; and the country south of Charlotte harbor, and the river of that name which empties into it, has been designated for the purpose. Your efforts, therefore, will be directed to the attainment of this object. Should there not be a sufficiency of good lands for the accommodation of the Indians in that part of the peninsula designated, you are authorized to fix the boundary north of Charlotte harbor and river, so as to take in as much of the country between them and Tampa Bay as, in your judgment, may be necessary to give the Indians enough of good lands, and sufficient space, considering their habits of life; leaving the conditions to your sound discretion. As it is desirable that the treaty should be held as soon as practicable, you will, as early as convenient, make your arrangements for that purpose.

Confiding in your prudence that the treaty will be held with the least possible expense, it is deemed unnecessary to give you any particular instructions on that point. The principal article of expense will probably be the issue of provisions to the Indians while treating with them. To avoid the delay which a correspondence between the commissioners for the purpose would occasion, Mr. Segui, being most convenient to the Indians, will fix on the time and place of holding the treaty, after consulting Mr. Hernandez, the delegate from the Territory, and notify Colonel Gadsden, the other commissioner, thereof. Mr. Segui will also ascertain the quantity of provisions that will probably be required, and issue his requisitions for the same on the commissary of subsistence at St. Mark's, if the treaty should be held at that place, or contiguous to it; or on the commissary at St. Augustine, if the treaty should be held there, or near it; who will be ordered to obey such requisitions, and charge the amount to the Indian Department. The enclosed circular will be complied with in issuing the provisions, to which (as there has, in some instances, been great irregularity) I particularly call your attention.

The Indian agent, Colonel Gad Humphreys, who is stationed for the present at St. Mark's, is instructed to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, and to prepare the Indians to meet the commissioners at the time and place which may be fixed upon for holding it. For the funds which you may find necessary to defray the expenses attending the negotiation, you will draw on this Department. Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars, ($8,) and that of the secretary to the commission (whom you are authorized to appoint) at the rate of five dollars ($5) per diem for the time actually engaged. The payment will be made on your certificate of honor, specifying the time that you and the secretary have been actually engaged. Your certificate, in like manner, will be a necessary voucher for the presents, should there be any distributed under your authority. The treaty, when made, will be forwarded to this Department.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

Col. JAMES GADSDEN,
BERNARDO SEGUI,

Commissioners to hold a treaty with the Florida Indians.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Copy of a circular to commissioners to hold Indian treaties.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 11, 1818.

The number and importance of the treaties to be held this year, and the great amount of rations which must necessarily be issued to the Indians while attending at the treaties, render it necessary that some system should be adopted to govern such large disbursements. I have therefore to request that you will designate the Indian agent, if he should be present, (or, in case he is not, some suitable person,) who shall ascertain the number and component parts of rations daily issued. The manner of issuing and certifying to conform, as near as may be, to the mode which prevails in issuing the rations to soldiers, and at the conclusion of the treaty to be presented to you for your approval. Where the rations have not been issued by the contractor for the district, (now commissary,) the contract, and the conditions on which the rations were furnished, must be certified to this Department.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 8, 1823.

Colonel James Gadsden, of Charleston, South Carolina, and yourself, have been appointed by the President commissioners to hold a treaty with the Indians; and I herewith enclose your instructions.

Since writing the instructions, Colonel Gadsden has arrived in Washington, and a copy of them, with the commission, has been delivered to him. He will write to you, and inform you where you may address him.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

BERNARDO SEGUI, Esq.

Commissioner, &c. St. Augustine, Florida.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, April 9, 1823.

I have this day accepted of an appointment as commissioner, associated with you, to negotiate with the Florida Indians. I shall leave this in a few days for Charleston, South Carolina, where I shall await your notification as to the time and place fixed for holding the treaty contemplated. I take the liberty of expressing a preference for St. Augustine, should that place, in your opinion, be considered equally eligible for the objects to be accomplished with the other points suggested. At all events, I should be in favor of assembling in the vicinity of a military post, as the expenses of the mission, to say nothing of convenience otherwise, would necessarily be less, from the supplies being on the spot, than they would be at an interior position.

Yours, &c.

BERNARDO SEGUI, Esq., *St. Augustine.*J. GADSDEN, Commissioner, &c.

DEAR SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, EAST FLORIDA, May 1, 1823.

I have received your favor of the 9th ultimo, informing me that you have accepted the appointment, in conjunction with me, respecting a treaty to be made with the Indians of this Territory. I have also accepted the appointment; and, as you desire to know the time and place when we ought to meet, I think that, at this time, it would be most convenient to meet in this city, where I expect to see you shortly, for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements.

I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BERNARDO SEGUI.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Charleston, South Carolina.

MAY 17.—James Gadsden and Bernardo Segui met, agreeably to appointment, when it was determined that it would be necessary to consult with some of the chiefs of the Florida tribes of Indians, before the time and place of meeting could be judiciously designated. Expresses were despatched to Miconope and others, inviting them to an interview with the commissioners in St. Augustine as early as practicable.

[EXTRACT.]

ST. AUGUSTINE, May 26, 1823.

I arrived here a few days since, and have consulted with Mr. Segui as to the preliminary measures necessary to accomplish the objects of our mission. The absence of the Indian agent, who is in Pensacola, and the difficulty of communicating speedily with him, have necessarily compelled the commissioners to open a direct intercourse with the chiefs and warriors of the Florida Indians. We have, therefore, despatched a messenger for Miconope, one of the chiefs of the Seminole tribe, and on his arrival will determine the proper time and place of assembling the Indians. I apprehend it will be inconvenient for them to meet us in council before their crops, indispensable to their subsistence, are gathered; and the delay, if necessary, cannot result in any inconvenience to the country at large, as, at all events, the objects of the mission may be accomplished before the meeting, and in full time to obtain the ratification, of the Senate. I will thank you, however, to transmit me, from the records of the War Department, a copy of General Jackson's communication on the views of the Indians, as derived from their talk held at Pensacola; and particularly the document containing his report of the Indian population in the Territory: these may be important to us.

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN, Commissioner, &c.

HON. J. C. CALHOUN.

JUNE 4.—Miconope and some of the chiefs and warriors of the Florida tribe of Indians met the commissioners, J. Gadsden and B. Segui, at the Governor's office in St. Augustine, at which meeting the views of the National Government, with regard to the Indians of Florida, were generally explained, and the chiefs present were requested to designate the most convenient spot and the earliest period when they could meet the commissioners in council, to listen to the talk from the President of the United States, as to the disposition to be made of their nation.

The 5th September, and the crossing place on Moultrie creek, in the vicinity of St. Augustine, were concluded on; and the chiefs present obligated themselves to meet with the other chiefs and warriors of their nation at the time and place appointed.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 4, 1823.

We, the undersigned, chiefs and warriors of the Seminole tribe of Indians, obligate ourselves, with our tribes, and as many chiefs and warriors as the Seminole tribe may delegate, to meet James Gadsden and Bernardo Segui, commissioners appointed on the part of the United States, to listen to a talk from the President of the United States, on the 5th day of September next, with a view to the establishing perpetual peace between the white and red men of Florida.

In witness whereof, we have subscribed our names and affixed our marks.

MICONOPE, or POND GOVERNOR, his × mark.
ONSELMATCHE, or JUMPER, his × mark.Witnesses: HORATIO S. DEXTER, SAMUEL FRY.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 6, 1823.

Bernardo Segui and myself, commissioners for holding a treaty with the Florida Indians, have, after consultation with some of the principal chiefs of the Seminole tribe, fixed on the vicinity of St. Augustine, and the 5th day of September next, as the time and place for the proposed meeting. The Seminole tribe will be advised of this determination by the commissioners, direct; and, in obedience to instructions transmitted to you from the War Department, we have to request that you will make the necessary arrangements, and prepare the Indians living in Florida, west of the Suwanee river, to meet the commissioners at the time and place before mentioned.

The assistant commissary of subsistence at St. Mark's will issue, on your requisition, such quantity of provisions as may be necessary to supply the Indians on their journey to this place.

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN, *Commissioner, &c.*Colonel G. HUMPHREYS, Indian Agent, St. Mark's.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 7, 1823.

B. Segui and myself, commissioners for holding a treaty with the Florida Indians, have been instructed by the Department of War to make requisitions upon yourself, or the assistant commissary at this place, for such provisions as may be wanted on the occasion. We have designated the vicinity of St. Augustine as the place, and the 5th of September next as the time of meeting. The Indians in the vicinity of St. Mark's, and west of the Appalachicola river, may, therefore, need provisions on their journey to this place, which you will be good enough to issue upon the requisition of the agent, Colonel Humphreys; or, in his absence at the time, on that of the interpreter, Mr. Richards. A supply merely sufficient to subsist the Indians to St. Augustine will alone be necessary; they will be provided for otherwise from the subsistence department at this place. Will you be good enough to supply the expresses with rations sufficient to subsist them on their return to St. Augustine?

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN, *Commissioner, &c.*The ASSISTANT COMMISSARY OF SUBSISTENCE, St. Mark's:

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 7, 1823.

Enclosed is a copy of a communication addressed to Colonel Humphreys at St. Mark's. Should he be absent from that post or the nation, you will be good enough to attend to its contents. The commissioners will depend upon Colonel Humphreys and yourself for having the Indians west of the Suwanee river assembled at the time and place concluded on. You will acknowledge, by the bearer, the receipt of this letter.

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN, *Commissioner, &c.*S. RICHARDS, Indian Interpreter, Appalachicola.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 8, 1823.

Enclosed are letters to Colonel Humphreys, the assistant commissary of subsistence at St. Mark's, and Mr. Richards, Indian interpreter. You will oblige me by having that addressed to Mr. Richards sent to the place of his residence on the Appalachicola, or in the nation, as it relates to public business of considerable interest to this country. The express, with his companion, could not be engaged to go beyond St. Mark's; you will, therefore, dismiss them with a receipt for the despatches delivered, and will confer a favor on me by any facilities afforded them on their return. The letters addressed to Pensacola I will thank you to have transmitted by the first opportunity which may offer.

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN, *Commissioner, &c.*The COMMANDING OFFICER, St. Mark's.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 9, 1823.

Enclosed are copies of communications from Governor Duval, Colonel Walton, and myself, to Colonel Humphreys, Indian agent, which you will be good enough to have transmitted to him at St. Mark's. Should Colonel Humphreys be absent from that post, you will open the letters addressed to him, and be governed by the instructions they contain.

I send you, likewise, copies of letters addressed to you direct from Governor Duval and Colonel Walton, the originals of which have been transmitted through a different channel.

The commissioners appointed to treat with the Florida Indians depend upon Colonel Humphreys and yourself assembling those residing west of the Suwanee river at the time and place appointed, and expect every assistance will be afforded by both of you to accomplish the objects of the mission.

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN, *Commissioner, &c.*STEPHEN RICHARDS, Esq., Indian Interpreter, Appulachicola.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 10, 1823.

Mr. Segui and myself have been commissioned to treat with the Florida Indians as to their future location in this Territory. Understanding that the agent, Colonel Humphreys, is absent from St. Mark's, we are somewhat apprehensive that he will not receive the instructions from the War Department in time to assemble the Indians at the period and place designated.

Doubting in some degree, likewise, the certainty of the conveyance to St. Mark's, by the only express we could employ in this place, we have taken the liberty, as a precautionary measure, of enclosing a communication through you to Mr. Richards, with a request that it may be transmitted to him as early as possible by some Indian runner. Mr. Richards resides on the Appalachicola river, and I believe at the Ochesee Bluffs. You will excuse the imposition on your goodness; but we feel assured it will afford you pleasure in attending to a request, the accomplishment of which is so intimately connected with business of no ordinary interest.

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN, *Commissioner, &c.*JOHN CROWELL, Esq., Indian Agent, Creek Agency.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 11, 1823.

Since writing you on the 26th ultimo, Mr. Segui and myself have had a consultation with several of the principal chiefs of the Seminole tribe, and have fixed on the vicinity of St. Augustine, and the 5th of September next, as the place and time of holding the treaty. An earlier period could not have been selected, without serious injury to the Indians, by trespassing on the harvest season, and without precluding the possibility of a general attendance, from the dispersed condition of the Florida Indians, occupying a territory of more than five hundred miles in extent.

The absence of the agent from St. Mark's, and the uncertainty of letters addressed to Pensacola being received by him in time to accomplish the views of the commissioners, have necessarily forced us to communicate direct with the different tribes, notifying them to attend at the time and place designated. Expresses have been despatched in every direction, and the Indians generally have been distinctly impressed with the idea that a treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, conformable to the views of the American Government, would be concluded; and that those tribes who neglect the invitation, or obstinately refuse to attend, will be considered as embraced within the compact formed, and forced to comply with its provisions. You have probably been advised, or may collect from the various reports made to the War Department on Indian affairs in Florida, that there is not the most friendly disposition prevailing between the different tribes, and that there is quite a division of opinion among them as to their concentration and location. The Indians occupying the peninsula, it is believed, are pleased with the selection (south) made by the Executive; while those west of the Suwanee river, and particularly within the Appalachicola district, are most attached to their own country, and would prefer, it is said, even an emigration west of the Mississippi to a concentration south of Tampa Bay, as contemplated. At the head of the discontented is Encomatta, an enterprising, daring savage, and, if not the only, among the principal instigators of the Seminole war. These conflicting interests and opinions will be the chief difficulties the commissioners will have to encounter in effecting a treaty. And, although there is no doubt as to the ability of the National Government of dictating and enforcing the terms desired, a resort to that alternative as a matter of policy may be questionable, when the views of the Executive may be effected otherwise amicably. Magnanimity would dictate the latter course, however necessary an exercise of power may be in extreme cases. It has been thought proper to present these facts to your consideration, suggesting the policy of additional instructions to the commissioners, conditionally authorizing them to provide for those tribes that may be disposed to emigrate west. It is possible that all the Florida Indians might be induced to remove, and, if so, an object so vitally important in a national or territorial point of view will be gained. Florida, as a maritime district of the American Union, is peculiarly exposed, possessing more than nine hundred miles of seacoast, with capacious bays or estuaries easy of access, and her good to her inferior lands bearing but a small proportion, and consequently unsusceptible of a dense population. She must ever be as internally weak as she is externally assailable. An Indian population, under these circumstances, connected with another class of population, which will inevitably predominate in Florida, must necessarily add to her natural weakness, and endanger the security of one of the most exposed but most important sections of the Union. It is useless to enlarge on the policy of removing a class of savages from where they may prove dangerous to where they would be comparatively harmless. Should the Executive approve of the view taken on this subject, it will be necessary for the guidance of the commissioners minutely to designate the district of country west which may be offered in exchange for the territory abandoned. In connexion with the concentration of the Indians south of Tampa Bay, there are many subjects to which your early attention may with propriety be invited. The Indians, hitherto, have been formidable in Florida, and the change of flags has not removed from the citizens all apprehensions or all recollections of former impressions. The location (south) is thought by some injudicious; and, though a large majority concur with the Executive in the views taken on the subject, all agree that a military post within or near the limits of the nation will be indispensable. The Indians have long been in the habit of keeping up an intercourse and active trade with the Cuba fishermen; and to this cause, principally, have been ascribed the encouragement hitherto given to absconding negroes, and the savage depredations committed on cattle, estates, &c. There is no difficulty in correcting the evil hereafter; but the presence of a military force will be necessary to the result; and the sooner the position is selected and occupied, the sooner will the incitements to an illicit traffic be removed. The first impressions are, with the savage, the most permanent; and a judicious location of an adequate force, simultaneous with the concentration of the Indians, cannot but have the happy effect of obtaining such an entire control, as to render them perfectly subservient to the views of Government. From conversations held with many who have explored partially the western coast of Florida, I am inclined to think that the Bay of Tampa presents the most eligible site for a military post, and offers many favorable and healthful positions. More ample information on the subject, however, shall be collected previous to the accomplishment of the object of our mission, and furnished the War Department in time to be acted on, should the occupation of the position suggested be approved.

Will you be good enough to issue orders to the commanding officer at St. Augustine to furnish the commissioners a military guard, issue lead and powder, and afford such other facilities as may be thought calculated to promote the objects of the mission? As the want of appropriations for holding a treaty must necessarily limit the presents, (always expected on such occasions,) the propriety of sending eight or ten rifles, to be distributed as a particular mark of distinction to some of the principal chiefs, is suggested to your consideration.

Yours, &c.

J. GADSDEN.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 14, 1823.

I embrace the earliest opportunity of informing you that the commissioners appointed to conclude a treaty with the Florida tribes of Indians have fixed on the crossing place on Moultrie creek, about three or four miles from St. Augustine, and on the 5th of September next, as the place and time of holding the meeting. It is impossible, for the want of estimates of population to be confided on, to state with certainty the number of individuals who may assemble. Should you, however, have in deposit thirty days' rations for fifteen hundred persons, you will be amply prepared, in my opinion, to meet all contingencies. I am informed that the Indians generally prefer the fresh to the salt meats usually issued; it would, therefore, be desirable to have as large a proportion of the former as would, under your instructions, be admissible. Moultrie creek is navigable for boats to a Mr. Garey's, where the provisions may be deposited, being within half a mile of the encamping ground selected. I will at any day, however, previous to that appointed for our meeting, (should you be so disposed,) accompany you to the spot, and with pleasure afford you any facilities in my power to the accomplishment of the duties of furnishing the Indians devolving on you.

Your obedient, &c.

J. GADSDEN, Commissioner.

Lieut. H. BROWN, Assistant Commissary of Subsistence United States Army.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 30, 1823.

Your letter of the 11th instant has been received. I agree with you as to the importance to the Territory of Florida of removing the Indians west of the Mississippi; but there are no lands which the Government can assign to them in lieu of those they may abandon, as all the public lands in that direction, that could be so disposed of, are occupied by the Choctaws or Cherokees. The Government is, however, willing to encourage the removal of the Florida Indians, as far as it can; and if all or any part of them should be disposed to emigrate, and join the Cherokees or Choctaws, or any other tribes farther west that may be willing to receive them, you are authorized to include a stipulation in the proposed treaty on the subject; allowing them, in the event of their emigration, what may be deemed by the commissioners a fair consideration for the lands relinquished by them in Florida, and agreeing, on the part of the United States, to pay the expenses attending their removal. Your suggestions relative to the establishment of a military post will receive due attention. Orders will be given, agreeably to your request, through the adjutant general, to the commanding officer at St. Augustine, to furnish the commissioners with a military guard.

The rifles required for presents at the treaty will be furnished through the Ordnance Department. The President has directed that the Governor of the Territory, as is usual, be associated with the commissioners at the proposed treaty; and he will join you accordingly, and aid in the negotiation. He was not put upon the commission originally, on account of his absence from the Territory. The Indian agent has been ordered to repair to St. Augustine, where he will be stationed until further orders, which will enable the commissioners to avail themselves of his services.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Commissioner, &c.

SIR:

FORT ST. MARK'S, July 2, 1823.

The express with letters for Col. Humphreys, Indian agent, the assistant commissary of subsistence, and Mr. Richards, Indian interpreter, has arrived. Col. Humphreys is here, and immediately took his letter. I gave him also Mr. Richards's, which he sent off this morning by express. The letters for Pensacola will be forwarded to-morrow morning.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. C. HUTTER, Lieutenant Commanding.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Commissioner, St. Augustine, E. F.

SIR:

FORT ST. MARK'S, FLORIDA, July 3, 1823.

Your letter of the 6th ultimo, notifying me of the time and place appointed for holding the treaty with the Florida Indians, reached me by express on the 1st instant. I have called upon the chiefs west of the Suwanee to assemble here on the 15th, at which time I shall communicate to them this information, and make the necessary arrangements for their meeting the commissioners at the time and place you have mentioned.

Your obedient servant,

G. HUMPHREYS, Indian Agent.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Commissioner, &c.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 29, 1823.

Your letters of the 14th and 30th June, with the accompanying public documents, have been received. Our express to the western part of the Territory of Florida has just returned. He communicates to the commissioners the intelligence of the arrival of the Indian agent, Colonel Humphreys, at St Mark's, who will use all exertions to assemble the Indians at the time and place designated. No efforts will be wanting on our part to promote the views of the Executive as to the concentration of the Florida Indians.

Your obedient servant,

J. GADSDEN, Commissioner.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

Continuation of proceedings of Wm. P. Duval, James Gadsden, and Bernardo Segui, appointed by the President of the United States to hold a treaty with the Florida Indians.

JULY 15.—Wm. P. Duval, as Governor of the Territory of Florida, associated, by order of the President of the United States, with J. Gadsden and Bernardo Segui, to hold a treaty with the Indians, accepts of his appointment, and takes his seat as presiding commissioner.

JULY 29.—Commissioners met at the Governor's office, when George Murray was proposed as secretary to the commission, and elected accordingly. The presiding commissioner was requested to notify him of his appointment.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 29, 1823.

The commissioners appointed to treat with the Seminole Indians have directed me to inform you that they have appointed you their secretary, and that they expect you will attend not only to the duties, as such, connected with the contemplated treaty to be held near this city on the 5th September next, but that you will go to the place selected for the Indians to assemble, and mark out the spot for the commissioners, and attend to the necessary arrangements for the convenience of transacting their business, &c. &c.

Your compensation will be five dollars per day, until the business of the commission shall be completed.

Yours, with high respect,

WM. P. DUVAL, President of the Board of Commissioners.

GEORGE MURRAY, Esq.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 31, 1823.

As the component parts of the soldier's ration would not be altogether acceptable to the Indians, it is the opinion of the commissioners that the smaller parts, such as soap, candles, whiskey, &c., may, in a degree, be dispensed with; and that corn and rice, in the proportion of one-fourth of the former to the latter, may be advantageously substituted for fifty barrels of the flour contained in your estimate. One-fourth of the meat part of the ration ought to be in good salt pork; and a barrel of prime pork, a barrel of beef, thirty good hams, and one hundred pounds of good lard, will be wanted for the use of the commissioners.

The bean part of the ration, on reconsideration, we would prefer retaining. The salt to be increased to fifty bushels, and the other items of your estimate reduced thus: five hundred gallons of whiskey, two hundred pounds of soap, one hundred pounds of candles, ten gallons of vinegar, and the value of the balance of the vinegar (290 gallons) to be appropriated to the purchase of molasses. The commissioners will require five officers' tents, with flies and poles complete, six camp kettles, and as many tin pans, which you will be good enough to procure, if not to be had from the depot at St. Augustine.

With respect, your servant,

WM. P. DUVAL, Commissioner, &c.

Lieutenant BROWN, United States Army.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 31, 1823.

I have received a letter from General Jackson, in which he states that there will probably be some difficulty in concentrating the Indians south, as contemplated by your instructions; and suggests that they may be advantageously located "on both sides of the Appalachian, extending west ten miles, east to Ochlochne river, and south within five miles of the Ocheese Bluffs, so as to leave a free communication between East and West Florida, crossing the Appalachian at the Ocheese Bluffs." The position suggested by General Jackson is believed to be the next most advantageous to the one selected; and if the Indians cannot be concentrated on the latter, rather than the treaty should fail, it would be advisable to concentrate them on the point suggested by the general; and you are accordingly authorized to do so, if it should be found impossible to carry the first instructions into effect. The general also suggests the propriety of a movement of troops to Tampa Bay. It is possible such a movement would have a favorable influence on the negotiation; but, as it is now too late to make it with that view, I hope you will experience no inconvenience from it.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN,

BERNARDO SEGUI, Esq.,

His Excellency WM. P. DUVAL,

Commissioners to treat with the Florida Indians.

AUGUST 26.—The commissioners met at the Governor's quarters, when the following letter was addressed to Captain John Erwing, commanding the troops of the United States at this post:

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, August 26, 1823.

The commissioners appointed to treat with the Indians in this Territory have been authorized by the Secretary of War to make requisitions upon the commanding officer at St. Augustine for a military guard, and any other facilities that they may require from the command. I have therefore to request that a guard, to be composed of an officer and twenty-five men, furnished with the necessary camp equipage for themselves, may be ordered to proceed on Friday next to the situation selected for holding the treaty on Moultrie creek. It is desirable that two of the men detailed for this service should be carpenters. You are also requested to furnish the following articles, if in your power to do so, viz: one boat, with oars and awning; four spades; four axes; one inch and a quarter, one one inch, and one half-inch auger; two hatchets; two handsaws; one cross-cut saw; one jackplane; two hammers; five wall tents, poles and pins; two common tents, poles and pins. These articles you will please to deliver to the officer detailed for this service, who will be requested to communicate with the president of the board before he proceeds to the encampment.

Yours, respectfully,

WM. P. DUVAL, President of Commissioners.

Captain JOHN ERWING,

Commanding officer, St. Francis Barracks, St. Augustine.

SIR:

ST. FRANCIS BARRACKS, August 27, 1823.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 26th instant.

On reference to the annexed copy of my instructions from the general commanding the army, you will perceive that I am only directed to furnish, upon the requisition of the commissioners, a guard to attend them at the place of meeting. In obedience to that order, and in compliance with your requisition, so far as the strength of this garrison will permit, a subaltern, with one sergeant, one corporal, and twelve privates, will be ordered to proceed on Friday next to the situation selected on Moultrie creek. I regret, sir, that the number of men under my command fit for duty is so small as to prevent me from furnishing the complement you require. With regard to the tools, &c. mentioned in your communication, I beg leave to state that those belonging to the post are under the immediate charge of the quartermaster, (Lieutenant Brown,) who has received instructions from the chief of his department to answer the requisitions of the commissioners.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

J. ERWING, Captain, &c.

To His Excellency WM. P. DUVAL,

Governor of Florida, and President of the Commissioners.

AUGUST 27.—The commissioners met at the Governor's quarters, when the following letter was addressed to Captain Erwing, and his reply received:

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, August 27, 1823.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of [this] date. In the requisitions made on you in my letter of the 26th, the commissioners were guided by what they deemed necessary "facilities to their operations," and did not apprehend that the liberal construction of your orders could, at this late period, throw any obstacles in the way of a compliance with their wishes. As the proper judges of what was necessary, they have mentioned to you the most reduced guard which would answer their purposes; and they have again, through me, to repeat their request that the number of men, including carpenters, &c., may be furnished. The requisition for tents, boats, tools,

&c., was made on you in consequence of an intimation from Lieutenant Brown, as understood at the time, that those articles were in your possession, and that to you must application be made. I have to request, as the period of meeting is approaching, that you will inform me as early as possible this evening whether our requisition, as contained in my letter of the 26th, can be complied with.

Respectfully,

WM. P. DUVAL, President of Commissioners.

Captain J. ERWING,
Commanding officer, St. Francis Barracks, St. Augustine.

SIR:

ST. FRANCIS BARRACKS, August 27, 1823.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date. It was far from my intention, in the letter I addressed to you this morning, to throw any unnecessary "obstacle in the way of a compliance with the commissioners' wishes," or to put any other than a liberal construction on the orders I have received. Taking into consideration the situation of the post committed to my charge, the number and disposition of its garrison, and the expected assemblage of a large body of Indians in its neighborhood, I stated to you the largest number of men that in my honest opinion could be spared from this command, in accordance with the spirit of my orders. In order, however, to prevent any delay in the operations of the commissioners, and to convince them of my desire to afford them all the facilities required by the most liberal construction of my orders, the guard, including carpenters, mentioned in your letter of the 26th, will be sent to its destination at the time appointed. I send with this, for your information, a morning report of the garrison, with an explanatory statement.

All the camp equipage, tools, and quartermaster's stores at the post, are under charge of the quartermaster, and reported by him to the chief of his department. It did not occur to me, when I last wrote, that my order would be necessary to authorize their delivery on your requisition. I shall therefore give an order to Lieutenant Brown early in the morning to furnish, out of the public stores at this post, the articles required in your letter of the 26th instant, and, in the event of any being deficient, to report the same to you.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

J. ERWING, Captain, commanding fourth artillery.

To His Excellency W. P. DUVAL, President Board Commissioners.

AUGUST 28.—Colonel Humphreys, the Indian agent, arrived in St. Augustine, and reported to the commissioners that the western chiefs and warriors, to the number of three hundred and fifty, with Neamothla at their head, would arrive at the encamping ground on Moultrie creek in the course of the next day. In consequence of which, the following letter was addressed to Lieutenant H. Brown, assistant commissary of subsistence:

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, August 28, 1823.

I have the honor of informing you that Colonel Humphreys, the Indian agent of this Territory, has arrived in St. Augustine, and brings intelligence that the Indians from the west will arrive at the camping ground to-morrow evening. The board of commissioners appointed to treat with the Indians, therefore, wish you to forward the provisions to the camp as early as possible in the morning, and issue such rations as Colonel Humphreys may direct.

With respect,

W. P. DUVAL, President Board Commissioners.

Lieutenant BROWN, United States Army.

On Saturday, the 30th of August, Colonel Gadsden repaired to the encampment on Moultrie creek, where the guard required had previously arrived. Neamothla, with the western tribes, had arrived the day before. On the 2d of September, Miconope and Jumper, with the southern tribes, reached the encampment.

Friday, the 5th, the commissioners all present; but as the Indians had some preliminary matters to settle among themselves, the talk was postponed until the 6th.

Saturday, 6th.—At 11 o'clock the chiefs Neamothla, John Blount, Tuski-Hajo, Econchatimico, Hicks, Mulatto King, and other chiefs and warriors to the number of more than seventy, met the commissioners in council; when, after Neamothla had been declared by Jumper to be the head of the Florida Indians, which was assented to by the Indians present, Colonel Gadsden delivered the following talk:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

General Jackson told Enehemothla, two years ago, that the Americans had purchased Florida from Spain, and that the President of the United States would send commissioners to speak his mind to the Seminoles. The President has now appointed Governor Duval, Mr. Segui, and myself, these commissioners; listen, then, to the talk of your great father the President of the United States. Listen to what he has commanded us to say to you.

Many years ago, false prophets and evil-disposed men from across the water deluded the Creek nation. The young warriors became mad, and the old men forgetful. They raised the Red Sticks in war, and inhumanly massacred women and children. General Jackson with his warriors marched into the nation, subdued the deluded, and made friends with those who buried the tomahawk and sued for peace. Your father the President of the United States, like a kind parent, forgot their disobedience, and, placing his Creek brothers by themselves, they are now a rich, happy, and friendly people. Some of the Red Sticks, however, fled into Florida, and, uniting with absconding negroes, built a fort on Appalachicola. The fort was destroyed by the Americans, and with it hundreds of red men and negroes were slain. Four years ago, these same Red Sticks, with the false prophets, McQueen and Francis, and bad men from across the water, poisoned the minds of some of your warriors. Fort Hughes, on the Flint river, was attacked; and a boat with sick men, women, and infants, taken on the Appalachicola, and their scalps borne away in triumph. General Jackson was again ordered to march into your country, and you all know that he burnt your towns, destroyed your crops, and at Mickasuky and Suwanee punished the madness of your men. He could have pursued the fugitives this side of the Suwanee, and have driven you into the ocean; but, having taken the prophets and white men who deluded you, he punished the guilty and spared the innocent.

Friends and brothers: Your father the President is willing to forget all that has passed. He is willing to bury the tomakawk, and extend to you the arm of friendship. He would that his red and white children should live in peace. To secure this, he will do for you what he has done for the Creeks; he will not permit you to be scattered all over Florida; he will place you by yourselves, mark your boundaries, protect your property, prevent his white men and the Creeks from disturbing you, separate you from false prophets and bad men from across the water, place an agent among you to let him know your wants, educate your children, and give you those articles of clothing, iron, lead, powder, &c. of which you stand in need. We hear that there are among you some of the old Red Sticks that belong to the Creek nation. They have lands given them above, and must return to their nation, unless you who were born in and belong to Florida will receive them. If so, they must live on the same lands with the Florida Indians. You will think on this subject, and when you next meet the commissioners let them know your wishes. You must likewise come prepared to give us the names of the different chiefs, the names and numbers of the different towns, where those towns are situated, and the population of each; that your father the President may know how much land you may require, and the quantity of merchandise that will be necessary for you.

Friends and brothers: More than three hundred years ago the white men lived across the great deep east. The Seminoles, then a tribe of the Creek nation, hunted a long way to the west, across the great water where the sun sets. The Yemassee then inhabited Florida. Some two hundred years ago, more than one hundred years before the Seminoles ever saw Florida, the Spaniards conquered and made peace with the Yemassee. They divided the country between them, and lived like friends and brothers. The Spaniards then had forts, towns, and cultivated fields at St. Augustine, Suwanee, St. Pedro, or Chattahoochee, Tallahassee, and St. Mark's. Ferdinand de Soto, a Spanish chief, long before the Seminoles ever saw Florida, landed at the Bay of Tampa, and marched through and conquered all that land where now stand Hikki-puck, Sasychienchaty, Pelaklekaha, and Okihuidky.

Some one hundred years ago you (the Seminoles) left the Creek nation, where you had lands enough, and where the game was plenty. You were then strong; the Spaniards and Yemassee were weak. You drove the Spaniards into St. Augustine; you burnt their forts, destroyed their fields, and exterminated the Yemassee nation. You made slaves of their women, and killed and scalped their warriors. The white men are now strong, and the Seminoles are weak. The white men are like the fruit and leaves on the trees, which blossom and increase annually; the Seminoles, like the deer of the forest, that might be hunted to their destruction. The whites might take vengeance for what you did the Spaniards and Yemassee, but we will not; we will forget what has passed. Like a kind father, the President says to you, there are lands enough for both his white and red children. His whites are strong, and might exterminate his red, but he will not permit them. He will protect his red children. He will place them by themselves, and mark their boundaries, so that there shall be no more disputes between his children—no more wars, but all live like friends and brothers.

Friends and brothers: The hatchet is buried; the muskets, the white men's arms, are stacked in peace. Do you wish them to remain so? Listen, then, to the talk of your father the President. He wishes the red stick eternally buried; he drinks with you the black drink; he exchanges with you the white feather; he unites with you in the feather dance and eagle tail song. He smokes with you the pipe of eternal peace.

Return to your camp. Think well on what your father, through us, has said to you. Meet the commissioners in council again on Monday next, and let us know where you are now settled, the names of your chiefs and towns, your population, and then listen to another talk from your father the President of the United States.

At the conclusion of this talk the council broke up, the chiefs promising to reply to it on Monday.

MONDAY, 8th.—In consequence of bad weather, there was no business done this day.

TUESDAY, 9th.—The chiefs and warriors met the commissioners at 10 o'clock. Neamothla replied to the talk delivered on Saturday, and stated that the Florida Indians had determined to incorporate with their tribes the fugitive Creeks and the Red Sticks who were among them.

WEDNESDAY, 10th.—This morning the chiefs and warriors met the commissioners at 8 o'clock, and Colonel Gadsden delivered the talk which follows:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

We are happy you have received as brothers those of the Creek nation among you. We are glad to learn that the red men are united. May they long continue so! We repeat to you what was said at our first meeting: that it is the will of your father, the President of the United States, that his white and red children should live like friends and brothers. To secure this, he will do for you what he has done for the Creeks. He will place you by yourselves, protect your property, and supply your wants. He wishes you to go south, where you can have lands enough to plant, and for the grazing of cattle. You are now scattered all over Florida—some north, some south. At the north his white men have already come into the country; and already he hears complaints from both his white and red men. To prevent any disturbances, he must remove his red children from that quarter, and unite them with those at the south. At the north, he cannot separate them without driving white men away. He cannot guard you against the Creeks, who live too near, and may trespass on your lands and property before we know it. At the south, where lands are plenty and good, and where your hunting grounds are, your father can do for you all that he promises.

Friends and brothers: The game is scarce, if not destroyed. The buffalo, the deer, and the bear have disappeared; you have hunted them from the face of the earth. The same Great Spirit, however, who gave and has taken away the buffalo, the bear, and the deer, has likewise given you the cow, the sheep, and the hog. He has pointed to the land which will yield the corn, the potato, the sugar cane, and the cotton; he commands you to follow the example of your white brethren, to live at peace with them, to cultivate the earth, and teach your squaws to spin. You will then have food enough, clothing enough. Your great father will enable you to do these things. He will give you good lands enough to the south to cultivate; he will furnish you with cattle to stock your farms, and ploughs, hoes, and such articles as you may require. Think well on what has been said to you.

Friends and brothers: Beware of false prophets; listen not to those who pretend to be your friends, who speak with forked tongues. Like the bad men from across the water, they will delude you to your ruin. Are you not tired of wars? have you not suffered enough, innocent victims of the folly of others? Brave warriors, though they despise death, do not madly contend with the strong. Your nation stands alone; if the peace and friendship now offered is refused, the poison of bad men will ruin you. Follow, then, the advice of your great father. He is your friend, and will do all in his power to make you happy. Go, then, to the south, where he directs; live in peace and friendship with the white men, and you will become a rich and a happy people.

THURSDAY, 11th.—This day, at 11 o'clock, the chiefs and warriors met the commissioners, and Neamothla replied at length to the talk delivered yesterday by Colonel Gadsden. He "objected to the location of the Indians south, because the soil was poor, and not capable of supporting them. The sea, too, being on each side of them, bad men from over the big water would see his young men, and give them bad advice, without his having power to prevent it. We are (he said) poor and needy; we do not come here to murmur or complain; we want advice and assistance; we rely upon your justice and humanity; we hope that you will not send us south, to a country where neither the hickorynut, the acorn, nor the persimmon grows; we depend much upon these productions of the forest for food: in the south they are not to be found. For me, (he said,) I am old and poor; too poor to move from my village to the south. My cabins have been built with my own hands; my fields cultivated by only myself. I am attached to the spot improved by my own labor, and cannot believe that my friends will drive me from it."

The commissioners advised the chiefs to return to their camp, and take time to consider upon what they had heard.

MONDAY, 15th.—This day the outlines of a treaty were read by the commissioners to the chiefs and warriors. They asked leave for time to consider on it.

THURSDAY, 18th.—The chiefs and warriors, having had under consideration the treaty read to them on Monday last, met the commissioners in council; and, without hesitation, signed the treaty of this date. The number of chiefs who signed was thirty-one.

FRIDAY, 19th.—An additional article was added to the treaty, and signed by the chiefs whose names are now mentioned in it.

SATURDAY, 20th.—Presents of homespun, calicoes, lead, powder, &c., were distributed to the Indians; and on Sunday, the 21st, they departed for their homes, perfectly satisfied.

TUESDAY, September 16.—Neamothla, with the other headmen and chiefs, met the commissioners in council. A return of the Indian population in Florida was handed in, from which it appears that the total amount is 4,888 souls. Neamothla objected to stating the number of negroes in the nation. The chiefs then, at the request of the commissioners, gave in the names of the different towns, their situations, and the names of chiefs who rule them; which are as follows:

Towns.	Chiefs.	Situations.

SIR:

CAMP, MOULTRIE CREEK, September 21, 1823.

We have to inform you that on the 18th we concluded a treaty with the Florida tribes of Indians, and on terms, as we believe, calculated to promote their future comfort and welfare, as well as the interests of the Territory in which they reside.

The Florida Indians will be concentrated south. The location an interior one, not approaching the seacoast at any one point nearer than fifteen miles. Some few reservations on the Appalachicola, of limited extent, have been made in favor of Blount, Tuski-Hajo, Econchatimico, and others, men of industrious habits, and who have made some advances in cultivation. Blount and Tuski-Hajo have been long friendly to the Americans, and rendered essential services to General Jackson during the military operations in Florida.

The treaty, with other documents, will be forwarded you by Colonel Humphreys, who leaves this in a few days for Washington.

WM. P. DUVAL,
JAMES GADSDEN,
B. SEGUI.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 30, 1823.

By a letter, recently received from one of the commissioners, it appears that the Florida Indians cannot, from their dispersed situation, and without injury to them, be assembled earlier than the 5th September next, which will enable the President to avail himself of your services at the proposed treaty; and, for which purpose, he has directed that you be associated with the commissioners in the negotiation. You will, accordingly, join them, and unite your efforts with theirs to accomplish the object intended to be effected by it. A copy of the instructions to the commissioners, and that of a letter of this date to Colonel Gadsden, are enclosed for your information. The same allowance will be made to you, while actually engaged in this business, as is made to the commissioners, which will be paid on a similar certificate from you as is required of them.

The continued severity of the sickness of the sub-agent, from whom I have lately heard, will prevent him from resuming his duties before, perhaps, late in the fall. You will make the best arrangement you can for the management of the Indian Department at St. Augustine in the mean time; it is presumed, however, that the presence of the Indian agent there, in pursuance of the order which has been given to him, will supersede the necessity of any arrangement on the subject. A copy of the order is enclosed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency WM. P. DUVAL, St. Augustine, Florida.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 15, 1823.

I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the 30th of June last, together with a letter of instructions, dated the 7th of April last, directed to Colonel James Gadsden and Bernardo Segui, Esq., commissioners appointed to hold a treaty with the Florida Indians; also, copies of two letters from your Department, dated the 30th of June last: one addressed to Colonel Gadsden, and the other to Colonel Humphreys, Indian agent. I accept, with pleasure, the appointment which the President has conferred on me as commissioner, to be associated with Colonel Gadsden and Mr. Segui, for the purpose of holding a treaty with the Florida Indians, and I beg you will assure the President that every effort on my part shall be made to accomplish this desirable object.

With respect, I remain, &c. &c.

WM. P. DUVAL.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, September 26, 1823.

On the 21st instant, you were advised by mail of our having concluded a treaty with the Florida tribes of Indians. The second article of the treaty, accompanying this, will inform you of the boundaries assigned them, which, with the other articles agreed on, will be found, in our opinion, to correspond with the spirit of our instructions, as well as with the humane policy of our Government. The want of a knowledge of the country south of Charlotte harbor, and the impossibility of inducing competent individuals to explore, or obtaining any satisfactory information relative to that region, necessarily prohibited the commissioners from confining the Indians to that quarter, agreeably to the views of the Executive, as first expressed in our instructions. A northern location, though desired by a majority of the Indians, was violently opposed, within the limits recommended by General Jackson; to have extended beyond those limits would have been injurious to the best interests of Florida. A southern location was objected to by the Indians, on the ground that the country south of Tampa did not contain a sufficient quantity of good land to furnish the subsistence of life; that force only could drive them into those limits; and that they were well convinced that the Americans possessed the power, and they not the ability to resist. The Indians, therefore, threw themselves on the protection of the United States, and appealed feelingly to the humanity of the commissioners not to locate them in a country in which they must inevitably starve. We know nothing of the country but from vague and contradictory representations; the appeal, therefore, was listened to, so far as to embrace within the limits assigned the Indians a small tract of country, about thirty miles north of Tampa Bay, containing within its boundaries many of the settlements of the southern chiefs. Even this extension north was not considered as removing the objections urged; to satisfy, therefore, all parties, and convince even the Indians of the humane disposition of the American Government towards them, an article was inserted, that if, on examination by the commissioners, &c. appointed to run the line, it should appear that there was not a sufficient quantity of good land within the limits allotted them, then the north line should be extended so as to give satisfaction on this point.

The reservations made on the Appalachian district were in favor of six influential chiefs, whose assent to the treaty would not have been obtained without this equitable provision for them and their connexions. They are all represented to be men of industrious habits, and who have made some advances in civilization. Blount and Tuski-Hajo have been long friendly to the Americans, and rendered essential services to General Jackson during the operations in Florida; on the termination of which they were permitted to reside where they now do, under the protection of the United States; with a promise that, when the Indians in Florida were disposed of, the provisions now made for them should be taken into consideration. We view these reservations as among the most favorable terms of the treaty. The lands allotted each chief and his connexions are so limited as to force the occupants into civil habits and pursuits; while so large a subtraction is made from the Indian population to be concentrated, as to render that population more easily manageable.

The treaty, however, was the best we could effect; and we are inclined to the opinion that the boundaries to which the Indians have been limited will be found, on reflection, to be the most judicious, in a national as well as territorial point of view. Justice has been done to the Indians, by assigning to them a sufficient quantity of tillable land, with the addition of an extent of territory alike favorable as hunting grounds and for grazing cattle; while the position is so central as to admit of being encircled by a white population, capable of overawing and controlling their uncivilized propensities.

We deem it our duty, before closing our mission, to invite your attention to some important subjects, as intimately connected with the accomplishment of the views which have dictated the policy pursued by the United States towards the Indians.

It was a misfortune to Florida, as a frontier Territory, and with her maritime exposure, to have any tribes of Indians within her boundaries. It would have been a national benefit to have removed them to a more interior position; but, as this seems to have been impracticable, the only course left was that which has been adopted—the confining the Indians within certain limits, and in that part of the Territory least objectionable. This being accomplished, it is indispensable, for the benefit of the Indians as well as the future security of Florida, that all intercourse with foreign countries or individuals exercising an influence over them be cut off, and that an exclusive control be obtained and maintained by the American Government.

This is only to be effected by the immediate establishment of military posts at the Bay of Tampa, Charlotte Harbor, and at some other point near Cape Florida, on the eastern coast; with such other salutary laws regulating the trade with them as your own sound judgment may dictate. It is scarcely necessary to state to you, that a majority of the Indians now inhabiting the Territory of Florida, and included as parties to the treaty just effected, are warriors, if not refugees from the southern Indians. Many of them are of the old Red Stick party, whose feelings of hostility have only been suppressed, not eradicated; and even the native Seminoles have ever been of a most erratic disposition. These Indians are now scattered over the whole face of Florida; but a small portion of them having any settled residence, a majority wandering about for such a precarious subsistence as the esculent roots of the woods, or the misfortunes of our navigators on the Florida Keys, may afford. To bring together these discordant and fermenting materials, to embody such a population within prescribed limits, and to conquer their erratic habits, will require, in some degree, the exercise of authority, with the presence of a military establishment adequate to enforce it. These posts, therefore, in our opinion, should be established before the boundary line is run and marked. Such a military disposition, if an adequate force, would produce an impression upon the Indians most favorable to an immediate concentration within the limits allotted.

The military establishments recommended, from the protection they would afford, will further induce an early settlement of the country, now open to the enterprise of emigrants, the presence of which population will assist materially in forcing the Indians within the limits allotted them, and in obtaining that control so much desired. As an act of justice to Lieutenant Ripley, who commanded the detachment of troops on the treaty ground, and to Lieutenant H. Brown, the assistant commissary of subsistence, we most cheerfully testify to the zealous, active, and faithful discharge of the various duties assigned them. Colonel Humphreys, Indian agent, and Mr. Richards, the interpreter, likewise rendered us essential services during the complicated difficulties we had to encounter. In assembling and marching the western Indians, through a wilderness of two hundred and fifty miles in extent, to the treaty ground, they have been exposed to privations and expenses, giving them strong claims on the Department of War for extra compensation; the equitable adjustment of which is submitted to your consideration by

Your most obedient servants,

W. P. DUVAL,
JAMES GADSDEN,
BERNARDO SEGUI.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SEPTEMBER 26.—The commissioners met this day at the quarters of Governor Duval; and, having signed the abstracts of provisions and vouchers for expenditures, they adjourned sine die.

Test:

GEORGE MURRAY, Secretary to the Commission.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 29, 1823.

The President not having returned to the city, as I expected, I have transmitted to him the treaty with the Florida Indians, and all the papers which accompanied it, with the letter of Governor Duval, requesting that you may be immediately appointed the commissioner, and that Lieutenant Ripley be associated with you, to run the lines of the land assigned to the Indians by the treaty. I have recommended that the request of the Governor be acceded to, and, as soon as I hear from the President, will inform you of his decision.

By a provision of the treaty, it appears that rations of bread and meat are to be furnished for the Indians, whose numbers, by an estimate which accompanied the treaty, is represented to be about 4,800. The views of the commissioners in making the provision are not stated sufficiently distinct to understand whether it was their intention that the rations of bread and meat are to be furnished indiscriminately for the whole number, or to those merely who may move on the lands assigned to them by the treaty, and in such quantities only as may be absolutely necessary for their subsistence. If the former be the intention of the commissioners, it will involve a very considerable expense, which may present some impediment to the ratification of the treaty. But, as I am not aware of any reason why rations should be furnished to so great an extent, I am inclined to think that the latter was their intention, and I am confirmed in this impression by the opinion of Colonel Humphreys. It is desirable, however, to have distinctly the views of the commissioners on the subject, and I will thank you for as full an explanation of them as you may be able to give, accompanied by an estimate of the probable number of Indians for which, in your opinion, rations will be required.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Charleston, S. C.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 4, 1823.

I have to inform you that the President has acceded to the request of Governor Duval, for your immediate appointment as the commissioner to run the lines of the land assigned to the Florida Indians by the late treaty with them, and for Lieut. Ripley to be associated with you in the performance of that duty. You are accordingly authorized to make your arrangements to commence the survey as soon as practicable, associating Lieutenant Ripley with you as your assistant. As the immediate survey of the individual reservations is not material, and it is important that all information that can be obtained in relation to the tract assigned to the Indians should accompany the treaty, when it is submitted to the Senate for ratification, I would, for this reason, prefer that this survey should first claim your attention. The reservations, if confirmed by the Senate, can be surveyed at any time thereafter.

If, in making the survey of the tract assigned to the Indians, you should find that the northern line, as defined in the treaty, does not embrace a sufficiency of good land for the accommodation of the Indians, you are authorized to exercise a sound discretion, and remove it farther north, so as to include the necessary quantity.

The commanding officer at St. Augustine will be directed to afford you every facility in his power, in accomplishing the object of your commission.

You will be allowed at the rate of eight dollars per day, while actually engaged in the duties of your commission, with your necessary expenses; and Lieutenant Ripley will be allowed the same additional compensation to his pay in the line as is allowed to topographical engineers while engaged on surveys, (which is one dollar and fifty cents a day,) with his necessary expenses. The payment will be made on your certificates of honor as to the time actually engaged.

The President has also acceded to the proposition for the establishment of a military post near Tampa Bay, and immediate measures will be taken, through the proper officer, to that effect. In the mean time, the commanding officer of the post to be established will be directed to correspond with you, in relation to a proper site for such post.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Commissioner &c., Charleston, S. C.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 12, 1823.

Your letter of the 23d ultimo was duly received. I enclose for your information an extract from the treaty recently concluded with the Florida Indians, which contains the metes and boundaries of the land assigned to them by said treaty.

Colonel Gadsden is appointed the commissioner to run out the Indian tract as soon as practicable, so as to have his report on the subject before the treaty is submitted to the Senate for ratification. It is hoped the line, when properly ascertained, will not include the lands in which you are interested.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

D. T. OGDEN, JOSEPH DELESPINE, ENOCH WISWALL, JAMES B. MURREY, and PERSEUS NICKOLLS, Esqs., New York.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 9, 1823.

Your letter of the 20th ultimo has been received. Confiding in your sound discretion that the survey would be made on the most economical terms, nothing was said about compensation to surveyors, chainmen, &c. Should these duties be discharged, as you propose, by details from the army, the persons employed may be allowed a reasonable extra compensation.

Your recommendation in relation to the compensation of Lieutenant Ripley will receive attention when your report of the survey is received.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Commissioner, &c., St. Augustine.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 23, 1823.

Your letters of the 26th and 29th ultimo and the 1st instant have been received. The order for the movement of the troops detailed for the occupation of Tampa Bay was given immediately after the receipt of your first letter on the subject; and it is hoped they will arrive at their destination in time to afford you any aid that may be necessary to facilitate the performance of your duty.

The letter which you enclosed for Colonel Humphreys has been delivered to him.

The treaty has been ratified by the Senate, and Colonel Humphreys has been ordered to repair forthwith to his post, to attend to its execution. A copy of the order is enclosed for your information. It is impossible to give specific instructions here for the execution of the treaty; and the agent is, therefore, directed to consult with the Governor and yourself on the measures to be taken for that purpose. You will accordingly afford your advice, and take the course which may, in your judgment, be necessary and proper, having the most rigid regard to economy.

Your request "that some of the smaller armed vessels on the West India station may be directed to enter occasionally the Bay of Tampa and Charlotte Harbor," has been submitted to the Secretary of the Navy, who has replied that he would order commanders to comply with your wish.

The bill which you have drawn on this Department for $125 will be paid when presented, and charged as requested.

Lieutenant Ripley and yourself will proceed to run out the reservations, after you have completed the survey of the principal tract assigned to the Indians. It is desirable that the whole should be completed as soon as practicable.

In a former letter I stated that the additional compensation which you propose should be allowed to Lieutenant Ripley would be fixed after your report of the survey is received.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Colonel JAMES GADSDEN, Commissioner, &c., St. Augustine.

[1st Session.]

APPLICATION OF THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS FOR PECUNIARY AID IN CIVILIZING THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 3, 1824.

Memorial of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions: To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

GENTLEMEN:

At the annual meeting of this board, at Boston, in September last, the subscribers* were appointed a committee "to prepare and present a memorial to the Government of the United States, on the general subject of the civilization and moral improvement of the Indian tribes within the limits of our national territory; stating, summarily, what this board, and other boards for similar purposes, of different denominations, have done, and are doing, for the benefit of the said Indians; the success of their efforts hitherto, and the encouraging prospects as to the future, provided means are furnished adequate to the support of their contemplated operations; and soliciting such pecuniary aid from the Government as, in their wisdom, they shall see fit to grant."

In fulfilment of our commission, we beg leave respectfully to state to your honorable body, that a prominent object of the board we represent is to extend the blessings of civilization and Christianity, in all their variety, to the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States. In carrying on this work of benevolence and charity, we are happy to acknowledge, with much gratitude, the aid received from the Government, in making and supporting the several establishments made for accomplishing their purpose. The object of the Government and of the board is one, and, indeed, is common to the whole community. We trust, therefore, that the measure adopted by our board will not be deemed an improper interference with the concerns of the Government—a thing at which our feelings would revolt, but only as a proper act of co-operation of a portion of the citizens in effecting a great and interesting national object.

The history of our intercourse with the Indians, from the first settlement of this country, contains many facts honorable to the character of our ancestors and of our nation; many, also—too many—which are blots on this character; and which, in reflecting on them, cannot fail to fill us with regret and with concern, lest the Lord of nations, who holds in his hand the scales of equal and everlasting justice, should in his wrath say to us, As ye have done unto these Indians, so will I requite you. We here allude to the neglect with which these aboriginal tribes have been treated in regard to their civil, moral, and religious improvement; to the manner in which we have, in many, if not most instances, come into possession of their lands and of their peltry; also, to the provocations we have given, in so many instances, to those cruel, desolating, and exterminating wars, which have been successively waged against them; and to the corrupting vices and fatal diseases which have been introduced among them by wicked and unprincipled white people. These acts can be viewed in no other light than as national sins, aggravated by our knowledge and their ignorance, our strength and skill in war and their weakness; by our treacherous abuse of their unsuspecting simplicity, and especially by the light and privileges of Christianity, which we enjoy, and of which they are destitute. In these things we are, as a nation, verily guilty, and exposed to the judgments of that just Being, to whom it belongs to avenge the wrongs of the oppressed; under whose perfect government the guilty, who remain impenitent, can never escape just punishment. The only way, we humbly conceive, to avert these judgments, which now hang, with threatening aspect, over our country; to secure the forgiveness and favor of Him whom we have offended; and to elevate our national character, and render it exemplary in the view of the world, is, happily, that which has been already successfully commenced, and which the Government of our nation, and Christians of nearly all denominations, are pursuing with one consent, and with their combined influence and energies. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions view these facts as highly encouraging; and it is their earnest desire that the God of nations would speed the course so auspiciously commenced, and give direction and his blessing to our joint efforts; add numbers and strength to those already engaged in this good work; convince, and reconcile to the object, those who are now opposed to it; and, ultimately, crown our labors with the desired success.

The work in which we are engaged, we are sensible, is not only noble and godlike, and worthy to command the best energies of our nature, but it is also a great, arduous, and difficult work, requiring patience, forbearance, perseverance, and unremitting and long-continued efforts. Here is scope enough to employ the wisdom, the means, and the power of the nation; and the object is of sufficient magnitude and interest to command the employment of them all.

We are aware of the great and only objection, deserving notice, that is made to our project, and which has been made by some men of distinction and influence in our country, whose opinion on other subjects is entitled to respect; and this is, that "it is impracticable; that Indians, like some species of birds and beasts, their fellow inhabitants of the forest, are untameable; and that no means which we can employ will prepare them to enjoy with us the blessings of civilization." In answer to this objection, we appeal to facts; facts not distant from us—not of a doubtful nature; but which exist, and are fast multiplying among us, under our own eyes and observation; to facts which cannot be doubted, and in such number and variety as furnish indubitable evidence of the practicability of educating Indians in such manner, as to prepare them to enjoy all the blessings, and to fulfil all the duties, of civilized life. A visit to the Cornwall school for educating heathen youth, and to the several establishments among the Cherokees and Choctaws, (to say nothing of many others to which we might refer,) begun by indefatigable and exemplary Moravian missionaries, and pursued by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, would be sufficient to satisfy any candid inquirer on this subject of the truth of what we have asserted. In these establishments the experiment, as to the practicability of imparting to Indians an education suited to the enjoyments and duties of civilized life has been fairly made; and made, too, by the acknowledgment of hundreds of our most respectable citizens, (and among these we are happy to refer to the present respected President of the United States, who has been an eye-witness in the case,) with complete success. More evidence on this subject is deemed by your memorialists unnecessary, as the evidence of facts is paramount to all reasonings which can be urged against them.

It being admitted, then, that the Indians within our jurisdiction are capable of receiving an education which will prepare them to participate with us in all the blessings which we enjoy, these questions will naturally arise: Is it desirable that they should receive such an education? Are they willing to receive it? Have we the means of imparting it to them? These questions, your memorialists conceive, may, with confidence, be answered in the affirmative. It is desirable that our Indians should receive such an education as has been mentioned, we conceive, because the civilized is preferable to the savage state; because the Bible, and the religion therein revealed to us, with its ordinances, are blessings of infinite and everlasting value, and which the Indians do not now enjoy. It is also desirable as an act of common humanity. The progress of the white population in the territories which were lately the hunting grounds of the Indians is rapid, and probably will continue and increase. Their game, on which they principally depend for subsistence, is diminishing, and is already gone from those tribes who remain among us. In the natural course of things, therefore, they will be compelled to obtain their support in the manner we do ours. They are, to a considerable extent, sensible of this already; but they cannot thus live and obtain their support till they receive the education for which we plead. There is no place on the earth to which they can migrate and live in the savage and hunter state. The Indian tribes must, therefore, be progressively civilized, or successively perish.

The only objection to their civilization which has been seriously made is, that it would destroy our now profitable fur trade. But will it not be destroyed if the white population is suffered to spread unchecked over the hunting grounds of these Indians, to destroy their game, and to leave them to starve and perish? But, these consequences aside, can a Christian, who knows the present state of these tribes, their ignorance, and increasing miseries, and who duly estimates his own superior blessings, make this objection? Will any man, claiming to possess a common share of humanity and benevolence, say, Though these poor Indians, if we were so disposed, might be made happy, and we have the means of making them so, yet, as the doing of this would deprive a small portion of our citizens of a gainful commerce, it must not be done? No man, we believe, would utter such language as this, and avow a sentiment so revolting to all the good feelings which belong to our nature.

Are, then, the Indians willing to be civilized? The explicit declarations on this point of large numbers of their chiefs and most influential men, and the earnest entreaties received from many of them, sufficiently show that they are willing. Our education families are every where gladly and gratefully received, and kindly treated; and from many other places the cry for new establishments is heard. Judging from past experience, we have reason to expect that the objections now made by some of the pagan chiefs and interior tribes, whose game is yet plenty, will be gradually removed, and that this cry for instruction will be extended among them as their civilization advances. Admitting, then, that it is desirable that the Indians should be civilized, and that they are willing and anxious to be educated for this purpose, have we the means of satisfying these desires, and of giving them the education necessary to their becoming our fellow-citizens, and sharing with us our privileges? We cannot hesitate how to answer this question. We undoubtedly possess, in abundance, all the means necessary to give all the Indians, as fast as they shall desire it, the most complete education they are capable of receiving. A very small part of the profits on the many millions of acres of most valuable lands purchased by the Government of these Indians would furnish ample pecuniary means for the support of as many education establishments as would be competent to the purpose; and the religious associations of the different denominations of Christians, already formed and forming, stand ready faithfully to apply these means, when put at their disposal, to the accomplishment of this desirable object.

Your memorialists beg leave respectfully to invite the particular attention of your honorable body to the plans heretofore suggested of colonizing the Indians, and of founding and endowing a college among them, for the higher education of Indian youths of promising character and talents, to act as missionaries among their brethren. The former seems to be peculiarly applicable to the state of our Indians, and the only method by which those who remain can be preserved from extinction. This plan consists in collecting, on some well located and inviting territories in the north and in the south, (one for the northern, the other for the southern Indians,) the remnants of tribes now scattered and dwindling away among the white settlements, and, from time to time, such others along our borders as are willing to be civilized, and planting among them, at favorable points, education families, under the protection of a small, well-selected military garrison. These will form the rudiments of future towns and cities, and even States, and ultimately entire civilization. "It is, in short," to borrow the language and sentiments of a late sensible foreign writer on this subject, "merely to follow the method by which civilization has begun and proceeded in all countries and times: villages rising into towns, and towns into cities," and these, we may add, into large communities, "having been the origin and medium of all improvements."* The hunter, roving state is not adapted to the establishment and support of the institutions which pertain to Christianity and civilized life; these require the aids which can be furnished only in the congregated and agricultural state.

The establishment of a college for the education of Indian youth appears to be an indispensable mean of successfully carrying forward the civilization of their tribes, which must be done, as it ever has been done in like cases, by native missionaries. Indians must be civilized and converted to the faith of the Gospel by Indians, who themselves have been first civilized and converted. †

Another topic of great moment, which we beg leave to submit to the consideration of your honorable body, is that of conducting trade with the Indians. They complain, and not without cause, that they are wronged out of their hard-earned property in various ways, but most commonly through the intemperate use of intoxicating liquors. This, as is well known, is the bane of Indians; and, together with their association with the worst and lowest white people, those who are familiar with crime, and have fled from justice, are the great and almost insuperable obstacles in the way of benefiting the Indians. It is necessary, therefore, that these obstacles be first removed, by laws and regulations wisely framed, and effectual to this purpose. We beg leave here to refer again to the report we have mentioned, (page 92,) and to the plan there suggested for conducting Indian trade.

From these views of the important subject which we have thought it our duty respectfully to lay before your honorable body, your memorialists can perceive no serious obstacle in the way of completely effecting one of the noblest works, the most honorable to our character both at home and abroad, and the most godlike, in which, as a nation, we can engage. If this be done, a debt we owe to the injured ancestors of the present and future generations of our Indians will be paid, as far as we can now do it; and the judgments of Heaven, which impend over us for these injuries, will be averted. We and our children will have satisfaction in reflecting that we have been honored as the instruments of rescuing from destruction, of raising from ignorance and wretchedness, and of imparting comfort and blessings of immense and interminable value to many thousands of our fellow-beings, who are now "ready to perish." Your memorialists, therefore, deeply impressed themselves with the magnitude and importance of the subject, beg leave, with all dutifulness and earnestness, to request and to entreat your honorable body to take it under your particular consideration, and to act thereon as, in your wisdom, you shall think fit. They particularly ask that some further pecuniary aid may be provided and furnished for the support of the establishments already made by the board they represent, and for forming new establishments of the like kind, which are loudly called for by other tribes, and in stations of much importance, whence an extensive good influence might be exerted on our northern borders, among many numerous and powerful tribes dwelling upon them.

Having made the foregoing representations and remarks, your memorialists, with confidence and good hope, now leave the business committed to them to the consideration of your honorable body, who have the power to act efficiently in its accomplishment; praying that you may be endued with that integrity and uprightness which will preserve you from error in your deliberations, and give you plenteously of the wisdom which is from above, which is profitable to direct, and will infallibly lead you to all right results.

[1st SESSION.

PROPOSITION TO HOLD TREATIES WITH THE TRIBES BEYOND THE MISSISSIPPI FOR PRESERVING THE FUR TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 18, 1824.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, communicated the following documents:

SIR:

SENATE CHAMBER, February 11, 1824.

I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire—

1. What would be the probable expense of moving a military force, of competent strength, to some point between the mouth of the Yellow Stone river and the falls of Missouri?
2. What would be the probable amount of appropriation necessary to hold treaties for the purpose of establishing relations of trade and friendship with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi?
3. Whether additional agencies are necessary among these tribes? and, if so, how many?

The committee would likewise wish to know the plan which the Government would prefer for maintaining peace with these Indians, and preserving the fur trade within the United States to American citizens.

Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. BENTON, Chairman Com. Indian Affairs.

Hon. Mr. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 23, 1824.

I have received your letter of the 11th instant, written by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, inquiring—

- “1. What would be the probable expense of moving a military force, of competent strength, to some point between the mouth of the Yellow Stone river and the falls of Missouri?”
- “2. What would be the probable amount of appropriation necessary to hold treaties for the purpose of establishing relations of trade and friendship with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi?”
- “3. Whether additional agencies are necessary among these tribes? and, if so, how many?”

Also requesting to be informed of “the plan which the Government would prefer for maintaining peace with these Indians, and preserving the fur trade within the United States to American citizens.”

In answer to the first inquiry, I transmit, herewith, a report of the quartermaster general.

The second inquiry it is difficult to answer with any precision; but, as treaties with the Indians, for the purpose merely of establishing relations of trade and friendship, are usually attended with but little expense, it is presumed that an appropriation of $10,000 would be sufficient for holding such treaties with the Indians referred to.

For the information required by the third inquiry, I would respectfully refer the committee to a letter of this Department, of the 12th ultimo, to General Cocke, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, in answer to a similar inquiry, a copy of which is enclosed. It is proper to observe, however, that, if Congress should deem it expedient to extend our military posts on the Missouri, other agencies, in addition to the two referred to in that letter, will be necessary; and, in that event, I would respectfully propose that authority be given to employ not exceeding two additional sub-agents, with an annual compensation of $800, and to be under the control of the Indian agent now on the Missouri. It is believed that suitable characters can be procured for the salary mentioned. This proposition is made under the conviction that the views of the Government would be better promoted by the employment of two active sub-agents, than they could possibly be by one principal agent, and with less additional expense: the compensation of the present agent at Council Bluffs being $1,800, which, it is presumed, would be that of any other that might be authorized higher up the Missouri.

In reply to the fourth and last inquiry, relative to “the plan which the Government would prefer for maintaining peace with these Indians, and preserving the fur trade within the United States to American citizens;” I have to state, that the opinion of the Government on this subject remains unchanged. The exclusion of foreign traders from our territory is deemed to be indispensable to the security of our traders, and the establishing and maintaining relations of amity and peace with the numerous tribes of Indians on the Mississippi and Missouri; and it is believed that the extension of our posts, as formerly proposed, or occasional movements of our troops up the Missouri, as far as the Mandan villages, or the mouth of the Yellow Stone, present the only effectual mode of attaining these desirable objects. For more particular information of the views of the Department on this subject, and in relation to the trade with the Indians, the committee are respectfully referred to my letter of the 29th December, 1819, to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, and report on the Indian trade, made to the House of Representatives the 5th December, 1818: [for the first of which, see Military Affairs, No. 177; and for the latter, see No. 157 of this series.]

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, Senate U. S.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 12, 1824.

I have received your letter of the 19th ultimo, enclosing, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, "a letter of Mr. Conway, the delegate from Arkansas Territory, for my consideration and report;" also inquiring "the number of Indian agents and sub-agents now in the employ of the United States; to what tribe they are agents; the full amount of compensation paid to each; the number of each tribe to which agents are appointed, and their locality; and whether it is necessary to appoint additional agents; if so, to what tribes, and their numbers."

In reply, I have to state, that, upon mature consideration, it is the opinion of this Department that two additional agencies west of the Mississippi will be necessary: one for the Delawares, Kickapoos, Shawanees, Weas, Piankeshaws, and Peorias, who are settled on the waters of White river, and confines of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas. The aggregate number of these Indians is now estimated at about eight thousand, and is constantly increasing by emigrations from the remnants of their respective tribes which yet remain on this side of the Mississippi. They are now at peace with their neighbors, the Osages and Cherokees, and friendly towards our citizens. To preserve this desirable state of things, and to attend in person to the payment of the respective annuities, would require all the attention, and great industry and accuracy on the part of the agent. It is believed that no person of sufficient weight of character and talents would be willing to undertake so responsible duties, and give his whole time to them, for the very moderate compensation allowed by law to a sub-agent; and, therefore, that the appointment of an agent should be authorized by law.

An additional agent will be required for the Osages upon the Arkansas, provided they are to remain in their present situation. The Osage Indians reside principally on the Osage river; but there is a very considerable portion of the tribe that reside on the Arkansas, west of the Cherokee settlement on that river. They are so far removed from the other portion of the tribe as to render it impracticable to place them, with advantage, under the same agent; whilst their position is such as to bring them into collision with the Cherokees on the Arkansas, to the great disturbance of our settlements in that quarter. The Cherokee hunting ground lies high up the Arkansas, and, in order to reach it, they are compelled to pass by the settlements of the Osages, which is the principal cause of the collision between the two nations. It is the intention of the Department to take measures, during the next summer, to induce, if possible, this band of the Osages to join the other upon the Osage river. Should it succeed, the evil, and the necessity for a separate agent, will be removed. It is doubtful, however, whether they can be induced to change their residence, as they are said to be very much attached to the present settlement. If the committee should deem it advisable, under these circumstances, to authorize a separate agency, in the event of the removal of the Osages on the Arkansas to Osage river, the agent to be appointed might be transferred, under the act of the 3d of March, 1819, to the Choctaws west of the Mississippi. The last treaty with the Choctaws, in fact, stipulates for the appointment of such an agent, and, so soon as a sufficient number of that tribe emigrate west of the Mississippi to justify the appointment of an agent, the Government will be bound to provide for the appointment of one.

Accompanying this, is a list which shows "the number of Indian agents and sub-agents now in service; to what tribes they are agents; the full amount of compensation paid to each, and their locality." For "the number of each tribe to which agents are appointed," I must refer you to the report of Dr. Morse, (a copy of which is herewith transmitted,) which has been compiled from authentic materials, and contains the most accurate information on this subject in the possession of the Department. When the report is no longer wanted for the use of the committee, I will thank you to return it.

All the Indian agents have been ordered to fix their agencies among or near the tribe or tribes attached to them, respectively; and they all are permanently located accordingly, with the exception of Major Graham. A site, however, has been fixed on for his agency, and, as soon as the necessary buildings can be erected, he will reside there. At present, his residence is at St. Louis; but it is understood that he is among the Indians of his agency twice a year, at those periods when they are at their villages, and continues with them until they leave them on their hunting excursions, in which they are represented to be, for the greater part of their time, engaged.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. JOHN COCKE,
Chair. Com. on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives United States.

List of Indian agents now in service under the authority of the acts of Congress of the 20th of April, 1818, 3d March, 1819, (two acts of this date,) and 6th of May, 1822; which last act also authorizes a superintendent at St. Louis; showing to what tribes they are agents, and the amount of compensation (which is fixed by law) paid to each.

No.	Names and stations.	For what tribe or tribes.	Compensation.
1	John Crowell, Creek agency, Georgia,*	Creeks, - - - - -	$1,800 00
2	William Ward, Choctaw agency,*	Choctaws, - - - - -	1,800 00
3	Joseph McMinn, Cherokee agency, Tennessee,*	Cherokees, east of Mississippi, - - - - -	1,300 00
4	Edward W. Duval, Cherokee agency, on Arkansas, -	Cherokees, west of Mississippi, - - - - -	1,500 00
5	Benjamin F. Smith, Chickasaw agency,*	Chickasaws, - - - - -	1,300 00
6	George Gray, Sulphur Forks, Red river, -	Caddoes, and the various tribes on Red river, - - - - -	1,200 00
7	Benjamin O'Fallon, Council Bluffs, Missouri,*	The various tribes on the Missouri, - - - - -	1,800 00
8	Richard Graham, St. Louis,*	Osages, Delawares, &c., in Missouri, - - - - -	1,300 00
9	Lawrence Taliaferro, St. Peter's, Upper Mississippi,*	Sioux, Chippewas, &c., on the Upper Mississippi and the St. Peter's, - - - - -	1,300 00
10	Thomas Forsyth, Fort Armstrong, Rock river, -	Sacs and Foxes, &c. of Rock river, and in the vicinity of Fort Armstrong, - - - - -	1,200 00
11	Nicholas Boilvin, Prairie du Chien, -	Sacs and Foxes, &c. on the Mississippi, and in the vicinity of Prairie du Chien, - - - - -	1,200 00
12	John Johnston, Piqua, Ohio, -	Wyandots, Shawanees, Senecas, &c. in Ohio, - - - - -	1,200 00
13	Henry B. Brevoort, Green Bay, -	Winnebagoes, Menomonies, &c., in the vicinity of Green Bay, - - - - -	1,500 00
14	Alexander Wolcott, jun., Chicago,*	Chippewas, Ottawas, Pattawatamies, &c., in the vicinity of Chicago, - - - - -	1,300 00
15	George Boyd, Mackinack, -	Chippewas, &c., in the vicinity of Mackinack, - - - - -	1,400 00
16	John Tipton, Fort Wayne,*	Miamies, Weas, and Bel rivers, &c., in Indiana, - - - - -	1,200 00
17	Henry R. Schoolcraft, Sault de St. Marie,*	Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, &c., in the vicinity of the Sault de St. Marie, - - - - -	1,200 00
18	Gad Humphreys, now in St. Augustine; but will be located among the Indians as soon as they can be concentrated on the lands assigned them by the late treaty,*	Seminoles and other tribes in Florida, - - - - -	1,500 00

The number of sub-agents now in service is twenty-two, of which there is one attached to each of the agencies marked thus (*), to aid the respective agents in the performance of their duties. There is also one attached to the superintendency at St. Louis, and one to the superintendency of Governor Cass, at Detroit, to aid the superintendents. The remainder are employed as follows, to wit:

Jasper Parrish, Six Nations, New York.
 Pierre Menard, Kaskaskias, &c., in Illinois.
 James Latham, tribes of Indians in the vicinity of Peoria, and on the Illinois river.
 James McPherson, Shawanees and Senecas, of Lewistown, Ohio.
 John Shaw, Wyandots, Upper Sandusky, Ohio.
 James Montgomery, Senecas, Senecatown, on Sandusky river.
 Benjamin Stickney, Ottawas, on the Miami and Blanchard's Fork, Ohio.
 Whitmore Knaggs, Ottawas and Chippewas, Michigan.
 Gabriel Godfroy, Pattawatamies, Michigan.
 Nathaniel Philbrook, Osages, on the Arkansas.

The compensation paid to sub-agents is $500 per annum; and is fixed at that rate by the act of 20th April, 1818.

SIR:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON CITY, February 18, 1824.

In reply to the inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, requesting to know "what would be the probable expense of moving a military force, of competent strength, to some point between the mouth of Yellow Stone river and the falls of Missouri?" I have the honor to state, that the expense will depend upon the number of the troops to be moved, and the distance they shall be required to move. Believing that the post at the Council Bluffs was contemplated as the point of departure, I shall consider it so, and present an estimate of the amount necessary to remove from thence, to the point intended to be occupied, a force of four companies, which I should consider amply sufficient to sustain itself against all the Indians on the Missouri, unless they be aided by some European Power.

The necessary expense of the movement will consist of an outfit of boats to transport the detachment to its destination; the hire of about fifty boatmen to assist in navigating the boats; and the tools necessary to enable the detachment to construct barracks, store-houses, defences, &c.

For four companies, eight boats would be sufficient; they might be built by the troops at about $400 each, or be purchased at $700 each.

Say eight boats, at $700,	-	-	-	-	$5,600
Fifty boatmen, for 120 days, at $1 each per day,	-	-	-	-	6,000
Amount for tools,	-	-	-	-	1,500
				Total,	$13,100

The whole expense of moving the detachment, and making its establishment, would not exceed $13,100; and if boatmen should not be employed, (and it is probable they might be dispensed with,) the expense would not exceed $7,100. It is believed that the movement directed by Colonel Leavenworth cost the public less than $4,000, and, without any additional expense, the colonel could have occupied any position below the falls of Missouri.

The estimate which I now submit is made for the transportation of provisions and stores sufficient for the detachment for twelve months.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP, Quartermaster General.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War, Washington City.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 10, 1824.

I have the honor to enclose to you the answers to the questions put to me by the Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs. A part of these answers are made from my own knowledge and observation, and a part from the recollection of conversations with persons conversant with Indian affairs on the Missouri, and on whose opinions and judgment I have great reliance.

Respectfully, yours,

R. GRAHAM, United States Indian Agent.

Hon. THOS. H. BENTON, Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Question 1. Have you had opportunities of becoming acquainted personally, or by information to be relied upon, with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi?

Answer. I became acquainted with several tribes residing on the west side of the Mississippi, personally; and with the character of other tribes residing high up the Missouri, by information from persons on whom I could rely.

Ques. 2. Have you known or heard of any hostilities between the citizens of the United States and the Blackfoot Indians? If so, state the instances.

Ans. I have. About the year 1809 or 1810, a company was formed in St. Louis, for the purpose of trading with, and trapping among, the Indians residing on the waters of the Missouri river. A party from this company were sent to the mountains to trap; they built their post, I believe, on the Yellow Stone, and commenced their trapping in that country over which the Blackfoot Indians range. A party of these Indians discovered one of the trapping parties, waylaid, and killed some of them; reinforcements were obtained from the post, or some of the trappers near at hand; they pursued, overtook, and had a battle with the Indians, in which several Indians were killed, and I believe one or two white men. The hostility of these Indians presented such obstacles to the party, that, after several losses, by robbery of their traps, &c., they were compelled to retire from the country.

Ques. 3. Are the Blackfeet a wandering or stationary tribe?

Ans. They are a wandering tribe, and have no fixed habitation; raising no corn, and depending entirely upon the chase.

Ques. 4. Over what district of country do they range?

Ans. Over that country which lies between the Yellow Stone river, the Rocky Mountains, and as far north as the Saska-tche-wine river; seldom or never wandering on the Missouri below the mouth of the Yellow Stone river, but sometimes crossing that river, and extending their war or hunting parties as far as the Arkansas. The Arrepahas, who inhabit the country south of the Yellow Stone, and who are also erratic, and depend entirely upon the chase, are a band of the tribe of Blackfoot Indians; making the range of these Indians along the base of the Rocky Mountains, from the Rio del Norte to the Saska-tche-wine.

Ques. 5. Do you know, or have you heard, of any citizens of the United States hunting or trapping in this district? If so, state the particulars.

Ans. The answer to the second query furnishes the first instance that I have heard of. Some time after this, a party hunting south of the Yellow Stone were taken prisoners by the Spaniards, and carried into Santa Fé. The party of Ashley and Henry, of recent date, and some of the Missouri Fur Company, furnish the only instances of parties hunting or trapping within that district of country. The traders from Missouri to Sante Fé occasionally trap on the waters of the Arkansas and head waters of the Rio del Norte: these traders meet with the Arrepahas, but, as yet, I have not heard of any mischief done by them, though I hear of their threats.

Ques. 6. With whom do the Blackfeet trade?

Ans. Formerly, I believe, through the Assinaboins, with the British establishments on Moose river; at present, with that establishment, and others of the Hudson's Bay Company, extending on as far as the waters of the Columbia river.

Ques. 7. Have you known or heard of any hostilities between the Arickara Indians and citizens of the United States? If so, state the circumstances of each case.

Ans. The first instance was in the case of the Mandan chief, who was returning home, under the protection of the United States; for the particulars of which, I refer to the official reports.

Within the last twelve months, after inviting, as I understood, the Missouri Fur Company to send traders among them with such articles as they wanted, they treacherously attacked the company's post, in which attack the Indians lost two men; they also attacked General Ashley, with his party of trappers, on their way to the mountains in June last, and killed and wounded twenty-six men. For the particulars, I refer to the official report.

Ques. 8. Are the Arickaras a stationary or wandering tribe?

Ans. Stationary. They raise abundance of corn, pumpkins, peas, and beans; live in two villages, on the banks of the Missouri, about one hundred and fifty miles below the Mandans, and which they have fortified; they seldom or never extend their hunting excursions beyond forty or fifty miles from their village. Buffaloes, on which they principally depend, are found in immense herds within that distance.

Ques. 9. Do you know, or have you heard, that any American citizens have hunted or trapped on the grounds belonging to the Arickaras? Do you know of a letter, purporting to be written by an Indian agent at St. Louis, and published in the Atlantic papers, ascribing their hostility to this cause?

Ans. Never. I have always understood that beaver and otter are found but in small quantities in this country. American citizens, who go into the Indian country for the purpose of trapping, always go where they believe the most beaver is to be taken; distance and difficulties present no obstacles to them. In passing through the Arickara country, they kill of the buffalo a sufficiency for their daily subsistence. I know nothing of the letter written by an Indian agent at St. Louis, ascribing their hostility to the trapping on the Arickaras' ground; nor do I believe such a letter could be written by an Indian agent.

Ques. 10. Do you know of any cause which led to the attack upon General Ashley's party?

Ans. I have understood the cause which led to General Ashley's attack was a demand made on him for compensation for the two Arickaras killed by the Missouri Fur Company, which was refused by General Ashley. After failing in their various efforts to induce him to pay for the Indians who were killed by the Missouri Fur Company, they consented to open a trade for some of their horses, which General Ashley was much in want of; the trade progressed, and finished satisfactorily to both parties. In the course of the evening, General Ashley was notified, by a chief, of the intention of the villages to attack him that night, or very early the next morning, and advised him to take his horses on the opposite bank of the river. Circumstances that then looked suspicious induced General Ashley to believe it was rather the intention of this chief to steal the horses, by his urging him to remove them across the river, as small parties of Indians were occasionally seen on the opposite side. He, however, strengthened his guard, and paid no further attention to the chief, who continued urging him to move to the opposite side. Early in the morning, the party were alarmed by the firing which they heard, and soon discovered that their guard had not only been attacked, but nearly all killed and wounded.

Ques. 11. Have you any reason to believe that the Hudson's Bay Company excited the Arickaras to that attack?

Ans. I have no reason to believe they did.

Ques. 12. Do you know, or have you heard, of any hostilities between the Assinaboins and citizens of the United States?

Ans. I have not heard of any.

Ques. 13. Are the Assinaboins stationary or wandering?

Ans. I know very little of the habits of those Indians. I know of no traders, other than British, who go among them. They are numerous, and are the nearest Indians to the Hudson's Bay establishment on Red river and its waters.

Ques. 14. Where is the richest fur region beyond the Mississippi?

Ans. I have always understood the northern branches of the Missouri, above the junction of the Yellow Stone, contained more beaver than any known country.

Ques. 15. Can the fur trade of this region be secured to the citizens of the United States, without the aid of a military post at or beyond the Mandan villages?

Ans. I think it cannot. If the hand of Government were extended to the protection of the fur trade of this country, it would be a source of immense wealth to the nation; but, without the protection of a military post above the Mandans, our traders will be compelled to withdraw themselves, and the whole of that rich fur region will be occupied by those from the Hudson's Bay Company, and our traders cut off from any participation of it above the Mandans; below this point, the fur trade will be of no value or profit in a few years.

Ques. 16. Can corn, for the supply of a post, be raised or purchased?

Ans. Corn can be raised at the most northern points of the Missouri. The Mandans and Arickaras raise large supplies; but I would suppose a dependance upon an Indian supply would be precarious.

Ques. 17. Is there a trade carried on between Missouri and New Mexico? And what articles are carried out, and brought back in return?

Ans. There is a small trade at present, the continuance of which will very much depend upon the capacity of the Spaniards at Santa Fé to support it. They are miserably poor, and give in exchange, for British and domestic goods, which our traders take to them, jacks and mules, which they get from St. Antoine, and some little silver and furs caught by the Indians in that quarter. Combined with this trade is the trapping carried on by our citizens, who, for that purpose, spend some time on the waters of the Rio del Norte and Arkansas. Though I have generally been informed by the parties returning from that trade that it was not worth carrying on, yet they continue the trade. If these parties, trading to Santa Fé, were less liable to interruption in their trade by the depredations of the different Indian tribes through which they are compelled to pass, I believe the trade would be carried on to a greater extent, and the enterprise of our hardy citizens would push it to the more wealthy city of Mexico.

Ques. 18. Is it subject to be interrupted by Indians on the waters of the Arkansas?

Ans. It is. The Camanches, Arrepahas, Pawnees, and Osages, all cross the Santa Fé trail in their hunting or war parties; consequently, are liable to fall in with parties going to or coming from Santa Fé, and are very apt to steal their horses. A part of their route runs through the Osage country. One of the articles of a treaty with that nation provides that no white man shall pass through their country without their permission. They complain of the violation of this article of the treaty. The chiefs say it is impossible for them to keep their young men from stealing from those parties. The assent of the different Indian tribes, through whose country our traders pass, would, I think, facilitate the trade.

Ques. 19. Would a military post, some distance higher up the Arkansas than Fort Smith, contribute to protect the citizens engaged in this trade?

Ans. I am of opinion that a post established at or near the mouth of the Little Arkansas would greatly contribute to the protection of the trade to Santa Fé. Any position below that point would be so far from the track travelled, that but little protection could be extended to those who carried on the trade.

Ques. 20. What is the temper of the tribes which have an intercourse with the British towards the citizens of the United States?

Ans. Generally unfriendly. I have always found those Indians within our territories who visit British posts more unfriendly to us, and more difficult to control.

Ques. 21. What is the temper of the tribes which have no intercourse with the British traders towards the citizens of the United States?

Ans. With those tribes within my own knowledge, very friendly; and generally so, so far as I have understood of others.

Ques. 22. How near do the British trading establishments approach the territories of the United States?

Ans. Those on Red river border immediately on our territories, and some of them, I believe, are within it. There are some situated within one hundred and fifty miles of the Great North Bend of Missouri.

Ques. 23. Is it to the benefit, or injury, of the fur traders, to have hostilities with the Indians?

Ans. By no means to the benefit, but to the great injury of the traders. The very existence of the trade depends upon peace with the different Indians, both with the white people and among themselves.

Ques. 24. Has the abolition of the factory system been the cause of any Indian hostilities beyond the Mississippi?

Ans. In no one instance, within my knowledge.

Ques. 25. What is your opinion of the good or bad effects of hunting and trapping on Indian lands by American citizens?

Ans. I am decidedly of opinion that the hunting and trapping on Indian lands by American citizens produces the most unhappy effects upon the mind of the Indians. They look upon their game as we do upon our domestic animals, and hold them in the same estimation. It is their means of support: they have nothing else to depend upon for subsistence. It is not, therefore, unreasonable to suppose that they will not only steal from, but murder, those who are depriving them of their only means of subsistence. One of the means of putting a stop to this would be, to locate the traders at suitable positions within the Indian countries, and not to permit them to attend the Indians on their hunting parties, as they at present do, many of them carrying with them their traps. They should be placed at such points as the agent might designate; and the Indian would then know that every white man found on his lands, at any other place than the trading establishment, was a trespasser, and might be taken up and brought to the agent.

Mr. Pilcher's answers to questions put to him by the Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs.

Question 1. Have you had an opportunity of becoming acquainted personally, or by information to be relied upon, with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi?

Answer. Having been engaged in the Indian trade for the last four years on the Missouri river and its tributary waters, I have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted personally, and by information to be relied upon, with most of the Indian tribes in all that region beyond the State of Missouri as far as the Rocky Mountains. The tribes personally known to me, and with most of whom an extensive trade has been carried on, as well by the Missouri Fur Company (to which I belong) as other companies of St. Louis, are the following: The Kansas, whose permanent residence is on the Kansas river; the Ottoes and Missourias, two small tribes who have villages on the river Platte, a short distance from the Council Bluffs; the Pawnees, a very numerous tribe, whose villages are also on the river Platte, about one hundred and fifty miles from the Council Bluffs; the Mahas, residing a little west of the Council Bluffs, on the Elk Horn, a branch of the river Platte—say from four to five hundred men; the Poncas, a small, and, at present, a wandering tribe, who generally ranged through the country on the l'Eau-qui-cours, as far west as the mountains in which that river takes its rise; and with the different bands of Sioux, neither of which have any fixed residence, but wander over a vast section of country on the right and left banks of the Missouri river—on the right, from the Big Sioux river to the sources of Jacques river, the St. Peter's, and Red river; and on the opposite side, they range through all the country watered by the l'Eau-qui-cours, White river, and the river Cheyenne, as far as the Black Mountains, in which some of those streams rise, and frequently as far north as the heads of the Little Missouri, above the Mandans.

At or near the Big Bend of Missouri, a trade is carried on with these several tribes, which are as follows: The Yanctons, Teetons, Siouones, Ogallallas, Hunkapas, and Yanctonas; amounting in all, I should judge, from their own accounts, and from my own observation, to ten or twelve thousand souls, and perhaps more. A small band of the Cheyenne Indians, another wandering tribe, sometimes visit those establishments for the purpose of trading.

I have also a personal knowledge of the Arickaras, Mandans, and Minatares, (sometimes called Gros Ventres;) these tribes reside permanently on the banks of the Missouri. The Arickaras are from four hundred and fifty to six hundred warriors strong; the Mandans and Minatares, about two hundred and fifty each, from their own accounts, and reside near the same point, in different villages. These are the only three tribes of Indians above the Council Bluffs, east of the Rocky Mountains, who have any fixed residence, or depend on any thing but the chase for subsistence.

The foregoing tribes are the only Indians of whom I have any personal knowledge. There are several wandering tribes south of the Yellow Stone river, known only by the information of persons on whom I can rely, who have been sent into that country with a view of ascertaining the prospect of opening a trade with those tribes, and for the purpose of trapping beaver. The Cheyennes, Rappahos, (supposed to be a band of the Blackfeet,) Kay-awas, and Crows, are separate tribes, who range through the country south of the Yellow Stone river, from its confluence with the Missouri, through the Rocky Mountains, on the waters of the rivers Platte and Arkansas, and as far as the Spanish settlements. I have no accurate information respecting the numbers of the three former tribes. The Crows, by their own accounts, have about one thousand five hundred men; but, from the information of persons who have spent several winters amongst them, and taken some pains to ascertain their actual strength, I should judge they fall short of that number. The Blackfeet, numerous and powerful; and the Assinaboins, also numerous.

Ques. 2. Have you heard of any hostilities between the Blackfoot Indians and citizens of the United States?

Ans. The Blackfoot Indians have uniformly manifested a hostile disposition to all American citizens who have visited their country, from the time of its discovery by Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, up to the present day. It will be recollected that Captain Lewis, when returning from the Columbia, met with a party of those Indians on Maria's river, or with a party called Minatares, of Fort de Prairie, who were the associates of the Blackfoot Indians, and probably a band of that nation. This party, after the most liberal and friendly treatment on the part of Captain Lewis, attempted to rob him and his men, which produced a skirmish, and some two or three of the Indians were killed. Between the years 1808 and 1810, a company was formed in St. Louis, by a number of respectable citizens, as well for the purpose of hunting and trapping beaver, as to open a friendly intercourse and trade with those and other Indians in that country. Several members of this company headed an expedition, and penetrated as far as the Three Forks of the Missouri. I believe nothing was omitted which it was thought would tend to bring about a friendly interview with those Indians, as a friendly understanding with them could alone insure a successful result to the adventure. This object could not be accomplished; the Indians attacked them at all points; and, in a short time, they were compelled to abandon the country, with the loss of many men and some property. Since that time, no American citizens have visited the country, until the spring of 1823. In the summer of 1822, our company fitted out an expedition, under the direction of Messrs. Immell and Jones, the object of which was to extend our business to the sources of the Missouri, as well for the purpose of trapping beaver, as to ascertain the prospect of introducing our trade among the Blackfoot Indians, and any other tribes in that country. This party wintered on the Yellow Stone river, near the mouth of the Big Horn, at Fort Benton, a post established in the winter of 1821, for the trade of the Crow Indians, and as a depot for a party of trappers. In the spring of 1823, the party (then consisting of thirty men) left this post, and penetrated as far as the Three Forks of the Missouri. I had instructed the heads of this party to use every effort to obtain a friendly interview with the Blackfoot Indians, and to incur any reasonable expense for the accomplishment of that object; and to impress them with the friendly disposition of American citizens towards them, and with the true object of their visiting the country. The party continued in the country, without meeting with any Blackfoot Indians, until about the middle of May; having extended their operations to the sources of Jefferson's Fork, when they concluded to return to the Yellow Stone. While descending the Jefferson river, on their return, they met, for the first time, with a party of Blackfoot Indians, consisting of thirty-eight men. Aware of the hostile spirit formerly manifested by them, they were not permitted to approach without some precaution on the part of the whites; finally, one of the Indians exhibited a letter, when they were immediately invited to approach. The bearer presented the letter to Mr. Immell, which was not directed to any person, but was superscribed, in the English language, "God save the King." The paper contained a recommendation of the Indian, stating that he was one of the principal chiefs of his nation, well disposed towards whites, and had a large quantity of furs, &c. The letter was not signed; it was written on the leaf of an account book, which seems to have been headed, before it was taken from the book, "Mountain Post, 1823;" it was dated at the bottom, "1820." The Indians were invited to remain with the party for the night, and did so, making many professions of friendship, and appeared much gratified at the proposition to establish trading-houses in the country; and pointed out the mouth of Maria's river, seventy or eighty miles below the falls of Missouri, as the most desirable spot; stating that they had understood such to be the objects of the company, &c. This was the fact, but how they got the information I am unable to divine. They were also in possession of all the information relative to an establishment at the mouth of the Yellow Stone, made the preceding fall by Messrs. Ashley and Henry; their views respecting trapping, hunting, &c. In the morning, the Indians received a number of articles as presents, and left the party apparently well satisfied.

The suspicious appearances of the above-mentioned letter, a good knowledge of the Indian character, and particularly of the treacherous disposition of that nation, induced the heads of the party to move with all possible expedition, and to use every precaution. They succeeded in reaching the Yellow Stone river, and had descended it for some distance below the mountains, and began to consider themselves secure, having met with several hunting parties of Crow Indians, who were known to them, and well disposed. But the Blackfeet had assembled, to the number of three or four hundred warriors, intercepted the party, and selected a favorable position, where they attacked and defeated them. The result was, the loss of Messrs. Immell and Jones, and five other men, and the entire loss of all the property in their possession, amounting to $15,000 or $16,000. The chief who bore the letter before mentioned was recognised amongst the party as one of the leaders. About the time these circumstances occurred, a party of Blackfoot Indians attacked a party of trappers headed by Major Henry, at some point between the Missouri and Yellow Stone, killed four or five of his men, and drove them from the country.

Ques. 3. Are the Blackfoot Indians wandering or stationary?

Ans. The Blackfoot Indians are a wandering tribe.

Ques. 4. Over what section of country do they range?

Ans. They range through the country north of the Missouri, from the Saska-tche-wine to Maria's river, over all the country watered by that river; through the Rocky Mountains, on the different tributaries of the Missouri, to the heads of Gallatin's Fork, and to the sources of the Yellow Stone, Platte, and Arkansas rivers; and, from all the information I have been able to collect, the mouth of Maria's river is the most central point of the country through which they wander. But it is difficult to point out the exact limits of any of those wandering tribes, because they observe none themselves. Both the Crow Indians and Blackfeet (particularly the latter) frequently range west of the mountains, particularly on war excursions against the Shoshones, Snakes, Flatheads, and other tribes on the Columbia river.

Ques. 5. Do you know, or have you heard, of any citizens of the United States having hunted or trapped in this district? If so, state the particulars.

Ans. The committee will find an answer to this interrogatory in my reply to those preceding it.

Ques. 6. With whom do the Blackfoot Indians trade?

Ans. There is no doubt but the Blackfoot Indians trade with the Hudson's Bay Company. They are well supplied with arms, ammunition, traps, blankets, stroudings, chiefs' coats, hats, and all other articles of merchandise, used by the different tribes of Indians, who trade in British manufactured goods; and at all the old Indian encampments about the Three Forks of the Missouri are to be found small rum kegs, and the heads of kegs, branded with the marks of the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Companies. The Indians themselves say they procure those articles from the British living to the north. It is well known that they derive nothing of the kind from the Spanish settlements, and that there never has been any trade between them and American citizens. It is known that those Indians were in the habit of trading with those companies many years ago; and all the circumstances combined can leave no doubt that that intercourse is continued.

Ques. 7. Have you known or heard of any hostilities between the Arickara Indians, and citizens of the United States? If so, state the circumstances of each case.

Ans. In relation to the hostile disposition of the Arickara Indians towards American citizens, I would observe, that a minute detail of each case would occupy more time than can be spared to its recital. I will therefore only state some of the most prominent cases which have come to my knowledge. It is known to some of the committee, that the Arickara nation attacked and defeated Lieutenants Chouteau and Pryor, about the year 1808, while ascending the Missouri river, under the American flag, with one of the Mandan chiefs and his family, who accompanied Messrs. Lewis and Clarke to the United States on their return from the Columbia. I know that the Arickaras killed a man about the year 1816 or 1817, a little above the Big Bend of the Missouri river, in the Sioux country, who was in the employment of some one of the fur traders of St. Louis. I know that a war party of Arickaras, amounting to eighty or ninety men, came down to that country (Sioux country) in the month of April, 1820, and robbed two trading-houses established by the Missouri Fur Company for the trade of the Sioux Indians—one above, and the other below, the Big Bend of Missouri; beat and abused the men in charge of the houses; and that the same party continued down the Missouri still further, to the trading-houses of another company, and robbed them of a considerable amount of merchandise—from the owners' account, not less than $1,600 or $1,700.

In September, 1822, I visited the Arickara villages myself, for the first time. I was going to the Mandans and Minatares, for the purpose of establishing trading-houses for these Indians. I was deceived in the Arickaras in different ways. From their former disposition, I had anticipated difficulties with them. But they received me well; and their conduct was so different from what I had expected, that I made them large presents, and received, in return, many professions of friendship, and promises to commit no further depredations. I left, by their own request, a clerk in their villages, with merchandise amply sufficient for their trade. I was then acting as special sub-agent, having received that appointment from Major O'Fallon, United States agent for the Missouri river; and, from the peculiar good conduct of those Indians on that occasion, I wrote him a very favorable letter respecting them, and the prospect of their future good behavior. The friendly disposition manifested on that occasion, however, was not of long duration. I know that one of the principal and leading chiefs of that nation, after visiting me at the Mandans, and ascertaining the time I intended to descend the river, returned home, raised a party, and waylaid the river, for the purpose of attacking my boat. I know that some of the principal braves of that nation attempted, during the last winter, to rob my clerk, while in their own villages, and committed violence upon him. In the month of March last, after this clerk left their villages, and descended the Missouri, to one of our principal Sioux trading-houses, about two hundred miles below the Arickaras, a party of that nation, consisting of about eighty men, came down to the neighborhood of this house, met six of our voyagers a few miles from it, who were employed in collecting the furs and peltries traded from the Sioux Indians at different points in the vicinity of the house, stripped them naked in the prairie, robbed them of their clothes, stole two or three horses or mules, beat each of the men severely, and left them naked in the prairie. The same party came that night and fired on the house, stole another horse, and went off.

A day or two subsequent to these outrages, another party, amounting to about one hundred and fifteen men, came, in daylight, and attacked this house. Mr. McDonald, one of my partners, his clerks, and eight or ten voyagers, defended themselves and the house, which contained a large amount of property. In this affair, the Arickaras lost two men killed, and probably three or four wounded.

Ques. 8. Are the Arickara Indians a stationary or wandering tribe?

Ans. It will be seen, from my answer to preceding questions, that they are stationary.

Ques. 9. Do you know, or have you heard, that any American citizens have hunted or trapped on the grounds belonging to the Arickaras? Do you know of a letter written by an Indian agent at St. Louis, and printed in the Atlantic papers, attributing their hostility to this cause?

Ans. No party of American citizens, authorized to pass through the Indian country, have ever been in the habit of trapping on the Arickara grounds, to my knowledge. The country affords but very little fur; nor do I know of any hunting in the Arickara country, other than what is necessary for the subsistence of persons passing through.

The letter referred to by the committee, purporting to have been written by an Indian agent at St. Louis, attributing the attack upon General Ashley to this cause, accidentally fell into my hands a day or two before I left St. Louis, in December last. It was published in some one of the Atlantic papers. I have no knowledge of the author of said letter. I am personally acquainted with the different Indian agents and officers of the Indian Department on that station, and feel satisfied that it is not the production of either of them. Major O'Fallon, with whom I conversed about it, was indignant at its contents, and concurred with me in the opinion that it was a fabrication. Major Graham, whom I have seen at this place, is ignorant of the writer of this letter; and he and Major O'Fallon are the only agents on the Missouri river.

Ques. 10. Do you know of any cause which led to the attack upon General Ashley's party?

Ans. I do not positively know the cause of attack upon General Ashley. I think the remote causes may very readily be traced to their uniform hostility to Americans, and disposition to commit all sorts of depredations; but, from my views and knowledge of the Indian character, I think it highly probable that the immediate cause originated in a spirit of revenge for the loss sustained in the attack upon our house. Indians are not governed by the principles of right and wrong in such cases, or in the habit of inquiring where the fault lies. When the blood of an Indian is spilt, his relations are apt to revenge it the first opportunity. But, as so many contradictory statements have been made in relation to the commencement of this war, I hope the honorable committee will not think it amiss in me to remark, that an investigation upon that particular point would be met with some satisfaction.

Ques. 11. Have you any reason to believe that the Hudson's Bay Company excited the Arickaras to that attack?

Ans. I have no reason to believe that the Hudson's Bay Company excited the Arickaras to that attack. On the contrary, I am convinced they did not. The influence of that company does not extend as low as the Arickaras; nor do I believe they have any intercourse with them at present. The Arickaras make nothing, to induce a wish on the part of that company to acquire influence amongst them.

Ques. 12. Do you know, or have you heard, of any hostilities between the Assinaboin Indians and citizens of the United States?

Ans. The only late hostilities, of which I have any knowledge, on the part of the Assinaboins towards American citizens, are the following: They committed a robbery upon Major Henry, in the month of August, 1822, a little above the Mandan villages. He was ascending the Missouri at the head of an expedition, fitted out by Messrs. Ashley and Henry, for the purpose of trapping beaver. Major Henry was on board his boat, and had a party of men going by land, with some forty or fifty horses. They met a large party of those Indians, who, by their address, got possession of the horses, and rode them off. Another party of those Indians came to our fort at the Mandan villages, in the month of January last, and, I think I understood from Mr. Vanderburgh, fired on the fort; after which, they stole one or two mules, and retired. This was done in the night.

Ques. 13. Are the Assinaboins stationary or wandering?

Ans. The Assinaboins are a wandering tribe; and, I believe, are a band of the Sioux Indians. They speak the same language; and, from the vast region through which they range, must be very numerous. The principal hunting grounds and country most frequented by such of those Indians as I have any correct knowledge of lies on the Assinaboin river, and left of the Missouri, above the Mandans, on the different streams coming in from the north, as high as Milk river; and I believe they range as far as Maria's river. They are frequently found on the Missouri, between the Mandans and Yellow Stone river; and I believe their principal trade is carried on at those British establishments on the Assinaboin river, about one hundred and seventy miles from the Mandans. American citizens have had no friendly intercourse with them in that section of the country, to my knowledge.

Ques. 14. Where is the richest fur region beyond the Mississippi?

Ans. The richest fur region, of which I have any knowledge, is that through which the Blackfoot Indians range.

Ques. 15. Can the fur trade of this region be secured to citizens of the United States without the aid of a military post at or beyond the Mandan villages?

Ans. The fur trade of that country, and the country lying north of the Missouri river, below, as far as the Mandans, cannot be secured to American citizens until the causes which now and have ever prevented them from participating in it are removed; unless they are protected in extending their business into these remote regions, until such time as they acquire an influence sufficient to counteract that of British trading companies. The committee will observe, that those companies have no intercourse or influence with any of the tribes heretofore mentioned, with the exception of those which range through the country in question. If all trade and intercourse between those tribes and British traders can be cut off, and the American trade introduced, it would very soon protect itself. Most Indians, who have long been accustomed to intercourse with whites, become dependant on them for the supply of particular articles, without which they cannot well live, once having acquired a knowledge of their use. It is not my opinion that the Mandans are sufficiently near the Rocky Mountains to make it a point for protecting the trade on the upper waters of the Missouri river. The falls of Missouri, or Maria's, or the Yellow Stone river, would each be preferable to it; particularly either of the former points, and in the order in which they are named. A large post is not now necessary at the Council Bluffs. A small garrison there, one at or near the Big Bend, one at the Mandans, and the principal one at or beyond the Yellow Stone, are, in my opinion, so indispensably necessary for the preservation of the fur trade on the Upper Missouri, that, without them, the most valuable part of that trade may be considered as lost to American citizens, and surrendered to the British.

Ques. 16. Can corn for the supply of a post be raised or purchased from the Indians at or beyond the Mandan villages?

Ans. The Mandans and Minatares raise considerable quantities of corn, and frequently supply traders and wandering tribes of Indians who visit them. In the fall season, a good deal may be purchased from them; but still I think it would be a precarious dependence for the supply of a post. The article, however, can as well be raised by whites as Indians. From the same soil, and with sufficient inducements, the Indians would doubtless raise much more than they now do.

Ques. 17. Is there a trade carried on between Missouri and New Mexico? and what articles are carried out, and brought back in return?

Ans. I know there is a trade carried on between the citizens of Missouri and New Mexico, but I am not sufficiently informed upon the subject to enable me fully to answer the question. I believe, however, the only articles brought back, in return for those taken out, are mules, specie, and furs.

Ques. 18. Is it subject to be interrupted by Indians on the Arkansas?

Ans. I have understood that some of those trading parties have been interfered with by Indians on the Arkansas, and several robberies committed, and some murders.

Ques. 19. Would a military post, some distance higher up the Arkansas than Fort Smith, contribute to protect the citizens engaged in that trade?

Ans. I am not sufficiently acquainted with that country to justify me in giving information respecting the effect of a military post above Fort Smith, on the Arkansas; but think it obviously true that such a post would be a great protection to the trade between Missouri and Mexico.

Ques. 20. What is the temper of the tribes who have no intercourse with British traders towards the citizens of the United States?

Ans. The disposition of such of the Indian tribes on the Missouri as are personally known to me, which have no intercourse with British traders, (excepting the Arickaras) has generally been friendly, since I acquired a knowledge of them. But where there are so many different tribes and bands of Indians, it is almost impossible to keep them all at peace with each other. Parties of war are continually roving through all sections of the country, and, while on these excursions, have frequently committed some slight depredations, which come within my knowledge; but such things do not originate in a general spirit of hostility on the part of their nation. Amongst those who are ignorant of the character of whites, having but little intercourse with them, such depredations are more frequent, because there is a greater spirit of hostility existing amongst those remote tribes towards each other, than those who have long had intercourse with the whites, and such parties are more numerous.

Ques. 21. What is the temper of the tribes which have an intercourse with British traders towards American citizens?

Ans. It will be seen, from my answer to preceding questions, that the disposition of such tribes of Indians as have intercourse with British traders, particularly the Blackfeet, has been uniformly hostile towards American citizens, in so much that they have had no intercourse with any of those tribes, with the exception of the Mandans and Minatares. It has not been long since British traders had intercourse with these tribes; but they have been so reduced by war and pestilence, the quantity of furs obtained from them at present is so small, and the American trade having been introduced amongst them, that there has been no intercourse, to my knowledge, for the last two or three years.

Ques. 22. How near do the British trading establishments approach the territory of the United States?

Ans. The establishments of the Hudson's Bay Company now stretch entirely across the continent, bordering upon the American territory, and at some places, perhaps, are within it. If the country beyond the Rocky Mountains, in the latitude of the Columbia, belongs to the United States, they have four establishments on American territory; one at the mouth of that river, one near its junction with Lewis's river, one near the mountains convenient to the Flathead Indians, and one other higher up. Fort de Prairie is a very celebrated establishment, and I think it is situated high up on the Assinaboin river. This river is lined with establishments; one very large at the mouth of Moose river, one hundred and seventy miles from the Mandan villages; another on the river Capel, a southern branch of the Assinaboin: both of which must be either within the American boundary, or near to it. The Saska-tche-wine river, which runs parallel to the Missouri, and but a short distance from it, rising in the same chain of mountains, and flowing into Lake Winnipeg, is also lined with British establishments; and, from Indian information, I have reason to believe that they have an establishment on Maria's river, a branch of the Missouri. It is from these establishments, on the Assinaboin and Saska-tche-wine rivers, that the Blackfeet and Assinaboins, both numerous and powerful nations, get their supplies of merchandise, arms, and ammunition, and come across to attack the American traders on the upper waters of the Missouri; and the furs robbed from American citizens are doubtless carried to these establishments to trade.

Ques. 23. Is it to the benefit, or injury, of fur traders, to have hostilities with the Indians?

Ans. So far from being to the benefit of persons engaged in the fur trade to have hostilities with the Indians, the very existence of such a trade depends on their pacific disposition; and both the interest and safety of persons engaged in that business require that they should not only preserve a friendly understanding with the Indians themselves, but, so far as possible, keep the different Indian tribes at peace with each other, in order that their property and men may not be exposed to roving war parties, who, particularly amongst those remote wandering tribes, are always disposed to mischief when on such excursions.

Ques. 24. Has the abolition of the factory system been the cause of any Indian hostilities beyond the Mississippi?

Ans. I know of no hostilities on the part of the Indians originating in the abolition of the factory system. I know but little of the operation or influence of these establishments, having been removed far beyond them. It is hardly probable that the abolition of this system excited the Arickaras and Blackfoot Indians to hostilities, neither of those tribes ever having heard of a factory or a factor, removed, as they were, from twelve hundred to three thousand miles from the range of their operations.

Ques. 25. What is your opinion of the good or bad effects of hunting or trapping on Indian lands by American citizens?

Ans. The tribes in the neighborhood of the Council Bluffs have complained of it, and are greatly opposed to it. The Crow Indians have never objected to it, although they have seen it with their own eyes, by parties in the employment of the Missouri Fur Company for two years. These parties have carried it on during all that time, without the least interruption of friendly intercourse, probably because they also traded with the Indians for all they could take. But I consider the case of the Crows an exception, and that the practice must lead to bad consequences. But no Indians, that I have heard of, ever objected to traders, travellers, or others, killing what was necessary for their subsistence. That comes under the notion of hospitality. The trapping done by the men of our company was in conformity with the practice, and not under any license; the one which we receive from the Government is to trade.

Ques. 26. Have any other companies, besides General Ashley's and the Missouri Fur Company, hunted or trapped in the Indian country?

Ans. Messrs. Berthold, Chouteau, and Pratte, of St. Louis, who have been largely engaged in the Indian trade, and the principal competitors of the Missouri Fur Company in that business, have also been, and are still, largely engaged in the trapping business.

The numerous inquiries of the committee being answered, I must beg to be indulged in a few observations relative to the system of trade and intercourse with the Indians; which are most respectfully submitted to the consideration of the committee.

It is now, and has long been my opinion, that the present system of trade and intercourse with the Indians, so far as it applies to the Missouri river, is defective in several particulars. I believe that certain points should be fixed for trading establishments, and that every person engaged in that business should be strictly prohibited from carrying on any trade out of those trading-houses, either in a direct or indirect manner, or accompanying Indians on their hunting excursions for any purpose whatsoever; and that no white man or half-breed, who has been raised amongst whites, and is considered a citizen, and who is not authorized by license or otherwise, or in the employ of some licensed person, should be permitted to live in the Indian country, or among the Indians, under any manner of excuse or pretence whatsoever; that the points for the trading establishments should be selected by the Indian agent or agents, or the person exercising their duties; and that it should be the duty of said agents frequently to visit each and every of such establishments in their agency, provided they can be furnished with a competent escort to make themselves respected as the representatives of their Government, particularly when visiting such tribes within their agency as are far removed from civilization.

It would not be proper in me to trouble the committee with any reasoning upon this subject. Suffice it to say, that these were my original views upon the subject, and that every day's experience has impressed me more fully with their correctness, and convinced me that such a system, while it contributed much to the benefit of the Indians in a pecuniary way, would have a tendency to impress them with something like a regular system of business; teach them the true character of the whites, and impress them with a degree of respect for American citizens, which the present mode of roving about is not calculated to do; and, at the same time, would contribute greatly to the safety and convenience of those engaged in the business, without depriving either of any single benefit derived from the present system.

I would further beg to be indulged in making a few statements, to impress the committee with an idea of the value of the Indian trade to the United States. The returns of licenses show that upwards of $600,000 was embarked last year in the trade; and, if extended into the Rocky Mountains, I should suppose that it would employ a capital of three times the amount now employed in that trade, for an indefinite term of years to come. Almost the whole of the articles necessary for this trade can be made in the United States. They consist of hardware, comprehending light guns, knives, hatchets, axes, hoes, lances, battle-axes, and beaver traps; cottons, comprehending checks, stripes, coarse calicoes, handkerchiefs, &c.; woollens, comprehending coarse cloths, blankets, and bannels; to which may be added, tobacco, powder, lead, and many other articles of smaller value. The company of which I am a member has always kept several blacksmiths' shops in operation on the Missouri, for the manufacture of some of the above-mentioned articles; and, at the time of the commencement of the late hostilities, had one at the Mandans, one at the Big Bend of the Missouri, and two forges in the neighborhood of the Council Bluffs. The woollen and cotton goods, particularly, can be made by American manufacturers of a quality equally as well suited to the Indian trade as British goods, with which the Indians are at present supplied.

With much respect, I am your obedient servant,

JOSHUA PILCHER.

CIVILIZATION OF THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 23, 1824.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the 6th of January, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act entitled "An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements," passed on the 3d of March, 1819, reported:

That they have examined the subject embraced by the resolution, and beg leave to submit the following statement:

The committee have carefully examined the measures which have been adopted for the disbursement of the annual allowance made by this law, and find them very judicious, and such as are best calculated to effectuate the benevolent designs of the Government. Although the reports heretofore made by the Secretary of War contained the rules by which the sum granted was to be apportioned and paid, the committee annex them to this report, and wish them to be referred to as a part of it. The committee also submit a statement showing the different sums paid to the Indian schools which have been organized, and the number of scholars taught at each school.

From this statement, it will appear that twenty-one schools have been established; all, except three, since the passage of the above law, and principally by the means which it affords. At these schools there are taught more than eight hundred scholars, whose progress in the acquisition of an English education exceeds the most sanguine expectations that had been formed.

Very comfortable school-houses have been erected for the accommodation of the different schools, and, in most cases, convenient dwellings for the teachers.

So far as the committee have been able to ascertain, the plan of education has been very judicious, and no pains seem to have been spared to extend to the Indians the full benefit of the law.

All the schools are increasing; and so urgent is the wish of the Indians to have their children educated, that numerous applications are refused, from the limited means which the schools possess. The time of the children is not wholly devoted to their books while at school; the girls are instructed in such arts as are suited to female industry in civilized life, and the boys are required to devote a part of their time in acquiring a knowledge of husbandry. The advances of males and females in these branches are most satisfactory, and have already had no small influence in inducing their parents to become less fond of an erratic life, and more inclined to have fixed residences, and rely for their support on the cultivation of the ground. Such has been the effect of the above circumstances, combined with some others not more influential, that, at many of the places where schools have been established, the Indians have already constructed comfortable dwellings, and now cultivate farms of considerable extent. They have become the owners of property necessary to agricultural pursuits, and for the conveniences of life.

The committee are aware that very considerable aids have been given by different Christian denominations, all of whom feel a deep interest in the paternal views of the Government. But the committee are well persuaded that, had the Government afforded no pecuniary aid, very few, if any, of the benefits which have been conferred, would have been experienced by the Indians. The annual appropriation of ten thousand dollars has encouraged the benevolent and pious, in many parts of the country, to form associations and collect donations, with the view of aiding the humane purposes of the Government. Hundreds of such associations are now in active operation; and they are much cheered in their exertions by the rapid advances to civilization which the Indians have made.

It requires but little research to convince every candid mind that the prospect of civilizing our Indians was never so promising as at this time. Never were means for the accomplishment of this object so judiciously devised, and so faithfully applied, as provided in the above act, and the auxiliary aids which it has encouraged. It is believed to be an essential part of any plan for Indian civilization, that, with the rudiments of education, the males should be taught the arts of husbandry, and the females to perform those domestic duties which peculiarly belong to their stations in civilized life. The attempts which have heretofore been made, many of which have failed, omitted this essential part. Many zealous but enthusiastic persons, who have been most conspicuous in endeavoring to reclaim the Indians, persuaded themselves to believe that, to secure this object, it was only necessary to send missionaries among them to instruct them in the Christian religion. Some of their exertions failed, without producing any salutary effect, because the agents employed were wholly unfitted for the task. Others, though productive of some good effect at first, eventually failed, because to their missionary labors were not added the institutes of education and instruction in agriculture. These are combined in the exertions now making; and, from the good which has been done, the most pleasing anticipations of success are confidently cherished. There are many Indian nations within our boundaries who have experienced no aid from these efforts; being restricted in the means, the benefits are, consequently, limited. But the committee are assured that the continuation of the appropriation, seconded by the liberal and increasing aids which are afforded by voluntary contributions, will gradually, and most effectually, extend the benefits of the law to the remotest tribes who inhabit our extensive domain. This will be a work of time; and, for its accomplishment, great labor and perseverance will be necessary. The progress, however, of this work may be more rapid than any can now venture to anticipate. The instruction and civilization of a few enterprising youths will have an immense influence on the tribes to which they belong. As the means are constantly applied, the numbers reclaimed will increase, and an increase of numbers will insure, in a geometrical proportion, success for the future. It is difficult to say what may not be accomplished under such circumstances. No one will be bold enough to denounce him as a visionary enthusiast, who, under such auspices, will look with great confidence to the entire accomplishment of the object.

The civilization of the Indians has been viewed as a work of great national importance by many whose talents and public services have rendered illustrious the annals of our country. This was an object of great solicitude with Washington, and to all who have succeeded him. Prior to the passage of the above law, the attention of Congress was invited to the subject, in almost every annual message from the Executive. If the policy of this measure were considered merely as a question of pecuniary interest, it is believed that but few would hesitate to sanction it. That it inculcates the most friendly disposition on the part of the Indians, no one, well informed on the subject, will venture to deny.

They understand the motive of the Government, and properly appreciate it. So far as the benefits of this policy are extended, will this feeling be cherished; and it affords the safest guaranty against future wars. To say nothing of the valuable lives which have been lost in the Indian conflicts we have had, how much treasure has been expended in our defence! More money was expended, in protecting the exposed parts of our country from Indian depredations, during the late war, than would be required, if judiciously applied, to secure the great plan of Indian civilization.

Shall we, from recent injuries, indulge a spirit of hostility against these unfortunate people? The principles of humanity and the dignity of our Government forbid it. There is much in their condition to excite our sympathies as men, and our protection as legislators. They have been driven from this wide domain, to a territory far less desirable, and of limited extent. They are constantly receding, as we are advancing.

The Indians are not now what they once were. They have partaken of our vices more than our virtues. Such is their condition, at present, that they must be civilized or exterminated; no other alternative exists. He must be worse than savage who can view, with cold indifference, an exterminating policy. All desire their prosperity, and wish to see them brought within the pale of civilization. The means which have been adopted, and of which the law in question is the foundation, seem the most likely to obtain the desired result. They should not, therefore, be abandoned. The passage of this law was called for by many of the people in the most populous and influential sections of our country. Their wishes were made known in language that evinced a deep interest—an interest not produced by a momentary excitement, but the result of much reflection and a high sense of moral duty. It may be said, emphatically, that the passage of this law was called for by a religious community. They were convinced of the correctness of the policy in a political point of view, and, as Christians, they felt the full force of the obligations which duty enjoined. Their zeal was tempered by reason. No fanciful schemes of proselytism seem to have been indulged. They formed a correct estimate of the importance of their undertaking, and pointed to the most judicious means for the accomplishment of their wishes. Since the passage of the law, hundreds and thousands have been encouraged to contribute their mite in aid of the wise policy of the Government. However the various denominations of professing Christians may differ in their creeds and general doctrines, they all unite in their wishes that our Indians may become civilized. That this feeling almost universally prevails, has been declared in language too unequivocal to admit of doubt. It has been seen in their words and in their actions.

The committee believe that such demonstrations are not to be regarded lightly; that the National Legislature will treat them with the highest respect. If a sectarian zeal had had any agency to produce this general interest, it would be less entitled to serious consideration. But such a contracted feeling seems to have had no influence; a more noble and Christian motive has been cherished. All unite to second the views of the Government, by ameliorating the condition of our Indians. They are taught the first rudiments of education, the duties which appertain to man as a member of civil society, and his accountability as a moral agent. Repeat this law, and these exertions are not only paralyzed, but destroyed. The Indians will see, in such an act, that we feel less for their prosperity than our professions have encouraged them to believe; and such an impression cannot fail to produce the most injurious consequences.

From the various lights in which the committee have viewed the policy of this law, they are convinced that it is founded in justice, and should not be repealed. They therefore submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to repeal the law making an annual appropriation of ten thousand dollars for the civilization of the Indians.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to the Hon. John McKee.

In answer to the first part of the inquiry, "how the appropriation for civilizing the Indians has been applied, and with what effect; and whether, in my opinion, the fund can be withdrawn without injury?" I would respectfully refer you to the reports of this Department to the House of Representatives of the 15th January, 1820, 8th February, 1822, and 24th January last. The first of these reports may be found in State Papers, 1st session 16th Congress, vol. 3, No. 46; the second, in State Papers, 1st session 17th Congress, vol. 6, No. 59; and the latter, having been made during the present session, and printed, it is presumed is in the possession of each member of the committee. In answer to the latter part of the inquiry, I have to state, that the societies, in co-operation with whose benevolent efforts the fund referred to has been applied, have made considerable establishments in the Indian country, for the purpose of effecting the object of the appropriation, and incurred heavy expenses, under the expectation of a continuance of the aid which they have received from the Government. The Indians also have become much interested in these establishments, and would, no doubt, feel greatly disappointed if they are not continued. Should the fund, therefore, be withdrawn, it is my opinion that the measure would not only be productive of serious loss to these societies, but of the most injurious effects to our Indian relations; and that, both as it regards policy and justice, it would not be advisable to adopt it at this time.

I enclose, for your information, a statement relative to the establishments in the Indian country for the purposes of civilization, which has been prepared from official documents.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

No. 204.

[1st Session.]

EXTINGUISHMENT OF INDIAN TITLE TO LANDS IN GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 2, 1824.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1824.

I transmit to Congress certain papers enumerated in a report from the Secretary of War, relating to the compact between the United States and the State of Georgia entered into in 1802, whereby the latter ceded to the former a portion of the territory then within its limits, on the conditions therein specified. By the fourth article of that compact, it was stipulated that the United States should, at their own expense, extinguish, for the use of Georgia, the Indian title to all the lands within the State, as soon as it might be done peaceably and on reasonable conditions. These papers show the measures adopted by the Executive of the United States, in fulfilment of the several conditions of the compact, from its date to the present time, and particularly the negotiations and treaties with the Indian tribes for the extinguishment of their title, with an estimate of the number of acres purchased, and sums paid for the lands they acquired. They show, also, the state in which this interesting concern now rests with the Cherokees, one of the tribes within the State, and the inability of the Executive to make any further movement with this tribe, without the special sanction of Congress.

I have full confidence that my predecessors exerted their best endeavors to execute this compact in all its parts; of which, indeed, the sums paid and the lands acquired during their respective terms, in fulfilment of its several stipulations, are a full proof. I have also been animated, since I came into this office, with the same zeal, from an anxious desire to meet the wishes of the State, and in the hope that, by the establishment of these tribes beyond the Mississippi, their improvement in civilization, their security, and their happiness would be promoted. By the paper bearing date on the 30th of January last, which was communicated to the chiefs of the Cherokee nation in this city, who came to protest against any further appropriations of money for holding treaties with them, the obligation imposed on the United States, by the compact with Georgia, to extinguish the Indian title to the right of soil within the State, and the incompatibility with our system of their existence as a distinct community within any State, were pressed with the utmost earnestness. It was proposed to them, at the same time, to procure and convey to them territory beyond the Mississippi, in exchange for that which they hold within the limits of Georgia, or to pay them for it its value in money. To this proposal, their answer, which bears date 11th of February following, gives an unqualified refusal. By this, it is manifest that, at the present time, and in their present temper, they can be removed only by force; to which, should it be deemed proper, the power of the Executive is incompetent.

I have no hesitation, however, to declare it as my opinion, that the Indian title was not affected in the slightest circumstance by the compact with Georgia, and that there is no obligation on the United States to remove the Indians by force. The express stipulation of the compact, that their title should be extinguished at the expense of the United States, when it may be done peaceably and on reasonable conditions, is a full proof that it was the clear and distinct understanding of both parties to it that the Indians had a right to the territory, in the disposal of which they were to be regarded as free agents. An attempt to remove them by force would, in my opinion, be unjust. In the future measures to be adopted in regard to the Indians within our limits, and, in consequence, within the limits of any State, the United States have duties to perform, and a character to sustain, to which they ought not to be indifferent. At an early period, their improvement in the arts of civilized life was made an object with the Government, and that has since been persevered in. This policy was dictated by motives of humanity to the aborigines of the country, and under a firm conviction that the right to adopt and pursue it was equally applicable to all the tribes within our limits.

My impression is equally strong that it would promote essentially the security and happiness of the tribes within our limits if they could be prevailed on to retire west and north of our States and Territories, on lands to be procured for them by the United States, in exchange for those on which they now reside. Surrounded as they are, and pressed as they will be on every side, by the white population, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for them, with their kind of government, to sustain order among them. Their interior will be exposed to frequent disturbances, to remedy which the interposition of the United States will be indispensable; and thus their government will gradually lose its authority, until it is annihilated. In this process, the moral character of the tribes will also be lost, since the change will be too rapid to admit their improvement in civilization; to enable them to institute and sustain a government founded on our principles, if such a change were compatible either with the compact with Georgia, or with our general system; or to become members of a State, should any State be willing to adopt them in such numbers, regarding the good order, peace, and tranquillity of such State. But all these evils may be avoided, if these tribes will consent to remove beyond the limits of our present States and Territories. Lands equally good, and perhaps more fertile, may be procured for them in those quarters; the relations between the United States and such Indians would still be the same. Considerations of humanity and benevolence, which have now great weight, would operate, in that event, with an augmented force; since we should feel sensibly the obligation imposed on us by the accommodation which they thereby afforded us. Placed at ease, as the United States would then be, the improvement of those tribes in civilization, and in all the arts and usages of civilized life, would become the part of a general system, which might be adopted on great consideration, and in which every portion of our Union would then take an equal interest. These views have steadily been pursued by the Executive; and the moneys which have been placed at its disposal have been so applied, in the manner best calculated, according to its judgment, to produce this desirable result, as will appear by the documents which accompany the report of the Secretary of War.

I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, under a high sense of its importance, and of the propriety of an early decision on it. This compact gives a claim to the State which ought to be executed, in all its conditions, with perfect good faith. In doing this, however, it is the duty of the United States to regard its strict import, and to make no sacrifice of their interest not called for by the compact, nor contemplated by either of the parties when it was entered into; nor to commit any breach of right or of humanity, in regard to the Indians, repugnant to the judgment and revolting to the feelings of the whole American people. I submit the subject to your consideration, in full confidence that you will duly weigh the obligations of the compact with Georgia, its import in all its parts, and the extent to which the United States are bound to go under it. I submit it with equal confidence that you will also weigh the nature of the Indian title to territory within the limits of any State, with the stipulations in the several treaties with this tribe, respecting territory held by it within the State of Georgia, and decide whether any measure on the part of Congress is called for at the present time, and what such measure shall be, if any is deemed expedient.

JAMES MONROE.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 29, 1824.

In obedience to your order, directing me to furnish a statement of the facts and circumstances connected with the execution of the fourth article of the convention between the United States and Georgia of the 24th of April, 1802, in which the former stipulate "to extinguish, at their own expense, for the use of Georgia, as early as the same can be peaceably obtained, upon reasonable terms, the Indian title to the lands lying within the limits of that State," I have the honor to make the following report:

By the convention above referred to, Georgia ceded to the United States all the lands lying south of the State of Tennessee, and west of the Chattahoochie river, and a line drawn from the mouth of Uchee creek direct to the Nicojack, on the Tennessee river. In consideration of this cession, the United States stipulated to pay the State of Georgia $1,250,000, and obligated themselves, in the manner above stated, to extinguish the Indian title within the limits of the State. The convention also provides for the adjustment of the Yazoo claims, which were afterwards provided for by the act of Congress approved March 31, 1814.

At the date of the convention, the Indians owned, within the limits of Georgia, twenty-five million nine hundred and eighty-four thousand acres, of which eighteen million eight hundred and thirty-one thousand eight hundred and ninety belonged to the Creeks, and seven million one hundred and fifty-two thousand one hundred and ten acres to the Cherokees; which tribes owned, besides, a considerable extent of country in the States of Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina. Between both of those tribes and the United States there were subsisting treaties at the time of the date of the convention, which, among other things, fixed the limits of their respective territories, and guaranteed to them the lands within those limits. (See 1st vol. United States Laws, treaty with the Creek Indians, page 361, art. 5; treaty with the Creeks, ratified 7th August, 1790; same, page 327, treaty of Holston, 1791, art. 7; same, page 332, treaty of 1798, near Tellico, articles 1 and 2.)

In fulfilment of the stipulation of the fourth article with Georgia, there have been held seven treaties with the Creeks and Cherokees; of which five were with the former: two of which were previous to the late war with Great Britain, in 1812, and three since. By the two preceding the declaration of war, there were ceded to Georgia two million seven hundred and thirteen thousand eight hundred and ninety acres, and by the three latter twelve million thirty-four thousand eight hundred acres; making, together, fourteen million seven hundred and forty-eight thousand six hundred and ninety acres. With the Cherokees there have been held two treaties, both since the late war, by which Georgia has acquired nine hundred and ninety-five thousand three hundred and ten acres, which, added to that acquired by treaties with the Creek nation, makes fifteen million seven hundred and forty-four thousand acres that have been ceded to Georgia since the date of the convention, in fulfilment of its stipulations. (See statement A.)

In acquiring these cessions for the State of Georgia, the United States have expended $958,954 90; to which should be added the value of nine hundred and ninety-five thousand three hundred and ten acres, which were given in exchange with the Cherokees on the Arkansas river for a similar quantity ceded by the Cherokees to Georgia, by the treaties of 1817 and 1819; which lands, estimated at the minimum price of the public lands, would make $1,244,137 50. If to these we add the sum of $1,250,000, paid to Georgia under the convention, and $4,282,151 12½, paid to the Yazoo claimants, it will be found that the United States have already paid, under the convention, $7,735,243 52½, which does not include any portion of the expense of the Creek war, by which upwards of seven millions of acres were acquired to the State of Georgia. (See statement marked B.)

The United States have ever been solicitous to fulfil, at the earliest period, the obligation of the convention, by the extinguishment of the Indian titles within the limits of Georgia; a most satisfactory proof of which may be found in the number of treaties which have been held for that purpose, the quantity of lands which have been acquired, and the price paid. In fact, such has been the solicitude of the Government, that but little regard has been had to the price, whenever it has been found possible to obtain a cession of lands to the State. The price given has far exceeded that which has ever been given in other purchases from the Indians.

I feel satisfied that it may be asserted, with confidence, that no opportunity of extinguishing the Indian titles, "on reasonable terms," has been neglected to be embraced by the United States.

It may be proper to notice more particularly the treaty of Fort Jackson, of 1814, with the Creek Indians, and those of 1817 and 1819 with the Cherokees; as, under those treaties, lands were ceded not only within the limits of Georgia, but also in the neighboring States of Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina, which may require some explanation.

It may be proper to premise, that, previous to the late war, the four most powerful and numerous tribes of Indians, the Creeks, Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, lay contiguous to one another, and were situated on the weakest portion of our frontier. They contained, at the period referred to, a population of between sixty and seventy thousand, and could raise at least fifteen thousand warriors. During the late war with Great Britain, great anxiety was felt in relation to those numerous and powerful tribes; and although all, except the Creeks, remained at peace, it is believed there was a strong tendency towards hostility among some of the other tribes. The Creeks commenced hostility at a critical period of the war, and created a powerful diversion of our resources, both of men and money; but, by a vigorous prosecution of the war, they were reduced, after many and severe losses. The treaty of Fort Jackson followed. They were a conquered people, and treated as such; and such terms were imposed as considerations of public policy dictated.

The advantages that would result by separating those powerful southern tribes from one another, and from the Territory of Florida, at that time a foreign province, were among the most obvious dictates of policy; as it would effectually guard against the possible future combination of those tribes, and prevent the liability to hostility, which almost invariably results from the intercourse of Indian tribes with a foreign territory. The Creek Indians were required to make the cession of lands to the United States in such a manner as to effect those important objects; and, accordingly, the United States acquired a large cession in what is now the State of Alabama, which separated the Creeks and Cherokees from the Chickasaws and Choctaws; and a cession in the southern part of Georgia, which separated the Creeks from the province of Florida.

It was not conceived that there was any thing in the stipulation of the convention with Georgia which prevented the United States from pursuing those views of national policy. The obligation of the United States extends only to the purchase of lands within the limits of Georgia, so soon as it could be done upon "peaceable and reasonable terms." The lands were acquired by conquest, and not by purchase, which left the nation at liberty to pursue those views of policy which have been stated, and which, it is believed, have tended strongly to give security and strength to the most vulnerable portion of the country.

In noticing the treaties of 1817 and 1819, it may be proper to premise, that, as far back as the year 1804, a delegation from the Cherokee nation, then at the seat of Government, were informed by Mr. Jefferson, that, if the Cherokees, or any portion of them, thought proper to emigrate to the Arkansas, they should receive as much land as they were entitled to, in proportion to their numbers, on the east of the Mississippi. Under the sanction of this promise, and tempted by the abundance of game, emigration continued from the Cherokee nation, in small parties, to the Arkansas, until 1817. The number being then considerable, a commission was constituted to treat with the Cherokee nation, on the basis of the arrangement made by Mr. Jefferson, which was followed by the treaty of the 8th of July, 1817, which, among other things, stipulated that a census of the Cherokee nation should be taken in June following; and that a portion of the country should be ceded to the United States, equal to that which those who emigrated to the Arkansas were entitled to; that is to say, if it was found that one-third had emigrated, one-third of the territory should be ceded; and so in any other proportion, according to the number that should emigrate. To carry the treaty into effect, Congress appropriated, by the act of the 20th of April, 1818, the sum of $80,000, in order to defray the expenses that might be attendant on the emigration of the Cherokees to the Arkansas; and Joseph McMinn, Esq., then Governor of Tennessee, was appointed agent to carry the treaty into effect. It was found, however, impossible to take the census, as proposed by the treaty, in June; and various causes delayed its final execution till the beginning of the year 1819. In the mean time, the emigration of the Cherokees was incessantly urged by all the means in possession of the Government.

It was the desire of the Government that the whole nation should emigrate, under the belief that it would be better for the Indians as well as ourselves; and no effort, on the part of the Government, was left untried to induce them to emigrate. A large portion of the nation, however, were so decidedly opposed to it, that it was found impossible to carry this policy of the Government into effect. (See statement marked C, containing a copy of this correspondence between the Department and Governor McMinn.)

The appropriation being finally exhausted, a delegation of the Cherokee nation was permitted to visit the seat of Government in 1819, in order to close the treaty of 1817. It was ascertained that about one-third part of the nation had emigrated, or enrolled to emigrate, to the Arkansas; and the delegation proposed to treat upon that basis, which was acceded to. It only remained to fix on the portion of territory to be ceded. With the view of throwing the land to be ceded within the limits of Georgia, and to separate the Creek and Cherokee nations, the Government proposed that all the lands lying south and east of Etowah, one of the main branches of the Coosa river, should be ceded by the Cherokees; but it was found impossible to induce the delegation to yield to that proposition, or to any other more favorable to Georgia than that which was adopted. They were fixed in their determination, particularly, not to be separated from the Creek nation by an intervening white population, and to cover their northern boundary by the Tennessee river, which necessarily threw the cession made by the treaty into Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina, as well as Georgia. Since the treaty of 1819, two attempts have been made, under appropriations of Congress, to open a negotiation with the Cherokee nation for further cessions; both of which have proved abortive. (See statement marked D, containing a correspondence between our commissioners and the Cherokee council, with a copy of the instructions to our commissioners.)

During the present winter, a delegation of the principal chiefs of the Cherokee nation visited the seat of Government, and the opportunity was seized to make known to them the sentiments of the Government upon the subject of additional cessions, in order to fulfil the stipulation of the convention with Georgia. (See statement marked E, containing a copy of an address from the delegation to the President of the United States, and the answer of this Department thereto; and a copy of a letter to the Governor of Georgia, with his reply; and also a copy of a letter to the Georgia delegation, and their answer to the same.)

It cannot be doubted that much of the difficulty of acquiring additional cessions from the Cherokee nation, and the other southern tribes, results from their growing civilization and knowledge, by which they have learned to place a higher value upon their lands than more rude and savage tribes. Many causes have contributed to place them higher in the scale of civilization than other Indians within our limits. Lying in large masses, they do not feel that depression which is invariably felt by small and detached tribes in the neighborhood of the whites; in addition to which, we may add the genial nature of their climate, which enables them to pass more readily from the hunter to the herdsman state; and the fertility of their soil, and the value of their staple articles, particularly cotton. To these, however, must be added the humane and benevolent policy of the Government, which has ever directed a fostering care to the Indians within our limits. This policy is as old as the Government itself, and has been habitually and strongly extended to the Cherokee nation.

By the fourteenth article of the treaty of Holston, in the year 1791, it is stipulated: "That the Cherokee nation may be led to a greater degree of civilization, and to become herdsmen and cultivators, instead of remaining in a state of hunters, the United States will, from time to time, furnish gratuitously the said nation with useful implements of husbandry; and, further to assist the said nation in so desirable a pursuit, and, at the same time, to establish a certain mode of communication, the United States will send such and so many persons to reside in said nation as they may judge proper, not exceeding four in number, who shall qualify themselves to act as interpreters. These persons shall have lands, assigned by the Cherokees, for cultivation for themselves and their successors in office; but they shall be precluded from exercising any kind of traffic."

In conformity to the provisions of this article, the various utensils of husbandry have been abundantly and constantly distributed to the Cherokee nation, which has resulted in creating a taste for farming and the comforts of civilized life. This humane policy of the Government, since the termination of the late war, has taken, in some degree, a new direction. Certain benevolent societies, in the year 1816, applied for permission to make establishments among the Cherokees and other southern tribes, for the purpose of educating and instructing them in the arts of civilized life; their application was favorably received. (See document marked F, containing a copy of their letter, and a copy of the answer of the then Secretary of War.) The experiment proved so favorable, that Congress, by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, appropriated $10,000 annually, as a civilization fund; which has been applied in such a manner as very considerably to increase the extent and usefulness of the efforts of benevolent individuals, and to advance the work of Indian civilization.

In performing the high duties of humanity to the wretched aborigines of our country, it has never been conceived that the stipulation of the convention with Georgia, to extinguish the Indian title within her limits, was contravened. The Government has been actuated solely by a desire to perform the obligation which considerations of humanity imposed on us, in relation to these unfortunate people. Their situation, at best, is wretched, and can only be rendered tolerable by the perpetual exercise of that humanity, kindness, and justice which has ever characterized the acts of the Government towards them.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

NOTE.—It is understood that, from the surveys which have been made by Georgia, the quantity of land ceded by the Cherokees in that State, under the treaties of 1817 and 1819, is ascertained to be 1,349,907 acres, instead of the amount computed from the map; making a difference of 354,597 acres. Should this be correct, the difference must be made up to the Cherokees in the Arkansas, which will increase the expense of the purchase to the Government (estimating the difference at the minimum price of the public lands) $443,246 25.

Copy of a letter from George Graham, Esq., acting Secretary of War, dated November 29th, 1817, to Joseph McMinn, Esq.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 29, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your two letters of the 13th instant. I regret exceedingly that the gentleman whom Colonel Meigs had left in charge of the agency should have abandoned his public duties, in pursuit of his private business, at a period when his services were so essentially necessary, and when every exertion of the agent was required to prepare for and encourage the Indians to remove to the Arkansas.

The intention expressed by you to go into the Cherokee nation, for the purpose of removing the prejudices which have been excited by designing and interested people, in relation to the treaty, evinces your zeal for the public good, and is highly gratifying to the President. Your presence among them will, no doubt, have a very happy effect; but I hope the necessity of your remaining any time with them will be obviated by the presence of Lieutenant Houston, who, on the very warm recommendation of General Jackson, has been appointed an assistant agent, and whom, I presume, you will have met with on your arrival at the agency. Mr. Riley, and the rest of the delegation, are yet here; they have been informed that the different treaties that have been made by the Cherokees must be strictly adhered to, and carried into effect; that, on other subjects, their complaints will be listened to; and that they will always be treated by the Government with kindness and liberality.

I have, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

His Excellency JOSEPH McMINN, Knoxville, Tennessee.

Extract of a letter from Duncan G. Campbell, Esq., Commissioner, &c., to the Secretary of War, dated 28th November, 1823.

SIR:

AUGUSTA, November 28, 1823.

The result of our late visit to the Cherokees would have been made known to you sooner, but for the necessity which I felt of seeing Major Meriwether, at Milledgeville, after his resignation. Without an interview with him, I was not prepared to report our accounts. I now send you a copy of the correspondence which was held with the Cherokee council, in the month of October. A correspondence in writing, conducted with a government regularly organized, composed of Indians, is probably a novel procedure. This method of negotiating, however, was preferred on both sides; and, by reference to the journal, you will discover the manner in which it was sustained. Finding, on the part of the council, such a determined resistance to a cession, arising, as we believe, from their imagined approach to independence, we took occasion to refer them to the nature of their connexion with the General Government. In doing this, we may have submitted sentiments and schemes not warranted by our instructions, or the views and policy of the Government; of this, however, we are not aware. Since our adjournment, I have been informed that a deputation will visit you this winter. No intimation was given at Newtown of such a movement, neither do I know its object.

Upon the subject of further proceedings, I shall wait the direction of the Department. Unless some new feelings are disclosed by the deputation this winter, I should consider a further attempt at negotiation with the Cherokees unnecessary. Their determination not to dispose of a part of their territory seems to have been deliberately formed. Any future operation, to be successful, must be pursued upon a larger scale, or in a different tone. I have thought that a board, composed of a member from each of the States interested, with a competent appropriation and authority to offer territory in exchange, might effect all that could be desired. While at Newtown, the seat of Government of the Cherokees, we were visited by a deputation from the Creeks—General McIntosh at the head. Upon the subject of a cession, the Creeks hold a very different language. From information derived from McIntosh, and since confirmed by the Creek agent, the prospect in that quarter is much more favorable. The present appropriation is probably inadequate. If it could be increased to $50,000, and diverted to the purpose of holding a treaty with that tribe, the expectation of extinguishing the title to the whole territory would be well founded. I regard the present period as auspicious for a compliance with the articles of agreement and cession of 1802, as far as relates to the territory occupied by the Creeks. That expense and difficulty will increase by delay, I have no doubt. Even without an increase of the appropriation, I should regard a different application of the present sum as inexpedient.

I have the honor, &c.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to the commissioners appointed to hold a treaty with the Cherokee Indians, dated

JUNE 15, 1822.

I enclose you a commission to treat with the Cherokee Indians. The sum of $30,000 has been appropriated for the purpose of holding treaties with the Cherokee and Creek Indians, for the extinguishment of their title to lands within the State of Georgia; but, as it is believed that this sum would not be adequate to treat with success with both nations, and as a former appropriation for the same object was nearly all expended in holding a treaty with the Creek nation, it has been determined by the President to apply the present appropriation, in the first instance, to holding a treaty with the Cherokee nation. The President, confiding in your prudence that not more will be spent than what is absolutely necessary to effect the object of the appropriation, has placed the whole amount of it, with the unexpended balance of the former appropriation above referred to, (which, together, will make a sum of $34,989 57,) subject to your control in treating with the Cherokees; and you will take care so to make your arrangements, that the whole amount to be spent in the negotiation, including the expenses of your commission, issues of provisions to the Indians under your orders, presents to them, and such preliminary expenses as the agent may be authorized to incur, shall not exceed, in any event, that sum. The principal article of expense will probably be the issue of provisions to the Indians while treating with them, as it is usual for the greater part of the nation to assemble on such occasions. The probable amount of provisions which will be required, and the price at which it can be obtained, can be ascertained by a correspondence with the agent, Colonel R. J. Meigs, who has been instructed to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, and to take such steps as he may judge best calculated to prepare the Cherokees for it. The enclosed circular will be complied with in contracting for the provisions and in issuing them; to which, as there has, in some instances, been great irregularity, I particularly call your attention. The sum to be stipulated for any cession that may be made must be left very much to your sound discretion, taking into consideration the extent and quality of the country to be ceded; but in no event is the sum to be given as the purchase money to exceed $200,000, to be paid in instalments precisely in the same manner as in the late Creek treaty; nor must the price exceed that given in that purchase, taking into consideration the quantity and quality of the land to be purchased. The quantity of land ceded by the Creeks, in the late treaty, may be ascertained from the archives of Georgia, as it is understood it has been surveyed by the State. To ascertain the quantity of land which may be proposed to be ceded by the Cherokees, reference must be had to the best sources of information that can be obtained, particularly to such maps as are deemed most authentic. The particular portion of country to be treated for is left to your sound discretion.

If commissioners should be appointed by the State of Georgia, (as appears by the resolution of the Legislature to be the intention,) to claim property of the citizens of that State, under the provisions of the treaties of Augusta, Hopewell, Holston, and Philadelphia, the Governor will be requested to inform you of their names and residence, and you will correspond with them, and notify them of the time and place of holding the proposed treaty. You will co-operate with them in the fullest manner, in promoting, to the extent of your powers, the interests and views of the State. If the commissioners of Georgia should be able to effect an arrangement with the Cherokees, in relation to the claims above referred to, similar to that effected with the Creeks at the late treaty with them for like claims, you may insert in the treaty which you may conclude with the Cherokees a provision upon the subject, to the same effect with that inserted in the treaty with the Creeks; the amount, however, to be stipulated to be paid by the United States, on account of the claims of Georgia against the Cherokees, is not, in any event, to exceed $89,000, to be paid in five annual instalments, as in the Creek treaty before mentioned.

You will observe, by the enclosed papers, that it is the desire of Georgia that the title to the reservations of land within that State, under the treaties with the Cherokee Indians of 1817 and 1819, should be extinguished; and that the Governor has been informed that, in case an appropriation should be made by Congress for holding a treaty with the Cherokees, the commissioners would be charged to attend to the subject. You will, accordingly, take such steps as you may deem proper, either by yourselves, or by the appointment of a special agent for the purpose, to procure from the present owners a conveyance of their title to all such reservations, a list of which is enclosed. The price to be given for such conveyance not to exceed two dollars per acre, with a reasonable allowance for the improvements that may have been made on the lands. The conveyances to be made to the State of Georgia.

Copy of a correspondence between Commissioners on the part of the United States, and the Council of the Cherokee nation.

CHEROKEE NATION, NEW TOWN, October 4, 1823.

The commissioners on the part of the United States, commissioned to hold a treaty with the Cherokee nation of Indians, arrived at this place, where they found the National Council in session. The board organized, but found it impracticable to proceed to business, without first making some improvements for their accommodation, which they determined to do with as little delay as possible.

Monday, October 6, 1823.—On this day, the board were notified by the agent of the nation that the Grand Council were disposed to receive and be introduced to the board, according to the "custom and ceremonial" of the nation. Whereupon, the board, accompanied by the agent and State commissioners, attended at the council-house, and were presented to the king, council, and committee. The Speaker, Major Ridge, addressed the board in terms of congratulation and friendship, and was answered by one of the board, Mr. Campbell, in like terms.

The board addressed to the agent, Governor McMinn, the following note:

SIR:

NEW TOWN, October 6, 1823.

We take this, the earliest convenient occasion which has offered since our arrival, to inform you that we have proceeded hither for the purpose of submitting to the Cherokee nation subjects of interest to the General Government.

The commissions under which [we] propose to act, and the instructions subjoined by the War Department, we deem proper to be submitted to you, having been led to expect your co-operation in all matters relating to our mission. Permit us to request that you will designate an hour, most convenient for yourself, for us to submit our commissions and instructions to your perusal.

The absence of our secretary, at present, we hope will be accepted as an apology for not furnishing you copies.

With sentiments of consideration and esteem, we are your obedient servants,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERIWETHER,
United States Commissioners.

JOSEPH McMINN, Esq., Agent, &c.

The Agent's reply.

GENTLEMEN:

NEW TOWN, October 7, 1823.

Your polite note of yesterday morning is before me, and would have been answered without loss of time, had not the ceremonies of yesterday occupied public attention. I will do myself the honor to attend at my office at any time after early candlelight.

With sentiments of great esteem, &c., your obedient servant,

JOSEPH McMINN.

Hon. D. G. CAMPBELL and JAMES MERIWETHER,
United States Commissioners.

Governor McMinn to the Board.

GENTLEMEN: .

OCTOBER 8, 1823.

I enclose you the copy of an order from the National Committee, agreeably to request.
Your obedient servant,

JOSEPH McMINN.

SIR:

COMMITTEE CHAMBER, October 8, 1823.

I am directed by the committee and council to request you to inform the United States commissioners that the General Council, when convened to-morrow morning, will be in readiness to receive the commissioners touching the objects of their mission hither, under instructions from the President of the United States. It is desired that the communications should embrace fully all the instructions they may have received from the President relative thereto.

I am, sir, respectfully,

JOSEPH McMINN, Agent, &c.

JOHN ROSS.

The Board's reply to the Council.

OCTOBER 8, 1823.

The undersigned, commissioners on the part of the United States, have received, through the agent, a communication by which they are notified "that the General Council, when convened to-morrow morning, will be in readiness to receive their [the commissioners'] communications touching the objects of their mission;" to which we reply, that we will do ourselves the pleasure to appear before the General Council to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock, for the purpose of exhibiting the commission under which we propose to commence negotiations. The want of suitable accommodations since our arrival will place it beyond our power to submit a communication as early as suggested by the committee and council in their note to the agent.

With sentiments of due consideration, we are yours, &c.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERIWETHER.

To the NATIONAL COUNCIL.

October 9, 1823.—The board attended the council, pursuant to appointment, and submitted their commission, which was read and interpreted; and they then retired.

October 10, 1823.—The board convened, and notified the council that they would lay a communication before them to-day, at 2 o'clock.

The following is a copy of the communication:

To the Grand Council of the Cherokee nation:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: By the commission which we laid before you yesterday, under the hand of your father the President, you discover that we have authority to hold conferences with you of and concerning all matters interesting to the United States and the Cherokee nation. From the powers conveyed to us, it becomes our duty to bring to your notice the commissioners on the part of the State of Georgia. These gentlemen have accompanied us to-day for the purpose of showing their credentials. They are commissioned by the Governor of Georgia, but their business has been made known to our father the President, and he has directed us to co-operate with them, and give them our aid. In some of the writings which have passed between us, we are sorry to discover that the business of these commissioners is treated lightly, and but little attention given to the subject. For the sake of good understanding and justice, we ask you to listen with patience to what these commissioners may have to say. After taking a deliberate view of all the treaties heretofore made, you will be able to make up a decision. It is better they should be closed in one way or another. As soon as this part of our joint business is settled and adjusted, the United States commissioners will take occasion to submit matters of interest and importance to the Government and to the nation.

We renew our wishes that all our negotiations may be calm and friendly.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERIWETHER,
United States Commissioners.

Ordered, That a copy of the foregoing be handed to the Georgia commissioners, and that they be requested to attend this board this day at 2 o'clock, for the purpose of appearing before the council, jointly.

October 13, 1823.—The board accompanied the State commissioners to the council-house, where a talk was delivered to the council by that board, setting forth the grounds of the Georgia claims, as arising under the different treaties with this nation.

October 14, 1823.—On this day the council returned an answer to the communication of yesterday, and the board were called on by the State commissioners to co-operate with them in pursuing the negotiation; and did so, in the preparation of a further address.

October 15, 1823.—The board again accompanied the Georgia commissioners to the council, where a talk was delivered.

October 16, 1823.—The following note was received from the council:

IN GENERAL COUNCIL:

NEW TOWN, October 16, 1823.

Friends and Brothers: The General Council now embrace the opportunity of informing you that their correspondence with the commissioners on the part of Georgia is brought to a close; and that the General Council, now convened, is ready to receive your communications on all subjects relating to your instructions from the President of the United States.

With considerations of respect and esteem, we take you by the right hand as friends and brothers.

PATH KILLER, his \times mark, Principal Chief.
MAJOR RIDGE, Speaker of the Council.
JOHN ROSS, *President of National Committee.*A. McCoy, *Clerk of the National Committee.*ELIJAH HICKS, Clerk of the National Council.

Copy of a note received from the Georgia Commissioners.

GENTLEMEN:

NEW TOWN, October 16, 1823.

We have this moment received a communication from the National Council of the Cherokee nation, in answer to ours to them of yesterday's date; a copy of their communication to us of this day's date you herewith receive. We solicit a conference with you upon this subject, as soon as it may comport with your convenience.

We remain, gentlemen, with great respect and esteem, your obedient servants,

JOHNSON WELLBORN,
JAMES BLAIR,
Georgia Commissioners.

Reply to the Georgia Commissioners.

GENTLEMEN:

NEW TOWN, October 16, 1823.

In reply to your note of this day's date, we answer, that we will be prepared to have an interview with you this evening at candlelight, for the purpose of having a conference upon the subject of the communication received this day by you from the Cherokee chiefs.

With sentiments of esteem and respect, we are your obedient servants,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERIWETHER.

To Messrs. WELLBORN and BLAIR, Georgia Commissioners.

The following communication was this day made to the Council of the Cherokee nation.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

NEW TOWN, October 16, 1823.

We are happy that a short time has been consumed in the correspondence between you and the State commissioners.

This has afforded us an opportunity of becoming partially acquainted with several members of this council. For the whole body we entertain a high respect; and we trust that, with some of you, we have contracted individual friendship. In saying this, we do no violence to our own feelings, neither do we lower the elevated character of the United States. People who have never seen you know but little of your progress in the arts of civilized life, and of the regular and becoming manner in which your affairs are conducted.

Your improvement reflects the greatest credit upon yourselves, and upon the Government by which you have been preserved and fostered. Other Governments would have triumphed in your downfall, and held you down by cruelty and oppression. Such has not been the conduct of the United States; she has set an example which the whole civilized world ought to feel proud to follow. It has been your unhappy lot to be shut out from the advantages which many others enjoy. It has been the constant study and exertion of the Government to relieve you from your unfortunate condition. The struggle has been long, but not in vain. What was promised you by your first father, (Washington,) has been fully performed by those great friends of mankind who have followed him. Under the kind protection of these earthly fathers, you have been taught that you have a Father above, to whom you are accountable. It should be your pride to act up to the near relationship which exists between you and the United States. If the President practises towards you the kind treatment of a father, it becomes your duty to return the obedience and gratitude of children. You have received this kindness from Government, from the close of the revolutionary war up to the present time.

The President acknowledges that you deserved it by the steadiness of your fidelity. Your conduct as a nation has been peaceable and harmless, although some of your citizens have been, at times, restless and troublesome.

We doubt not but that some of our citizens are liable to the same charge. You have embraced the only opportunity which has occurred of showing that you are warriors, and that you are faithful to the country.

In the last war you were found bravely fighting by the side of the white man, your brother, against the enemies of liberty. These enemies would have seduced you, if they could; and, after making you traitors to your father the President, they would have become traitors to you. Here would have followed a scene of desolation, at which every good man and Christian would weep. It was your fidelity which prevented it; and the hands of the red man and the white man were not raised against each other. The red man and the white man now are brothers, and long may they so continue.

Brothers, these remarks have grown out of feelings which have been inspired by our acquaintance with you.

Coming as we do, clothed in the high authority of the United States, we are left to speak the undisguised sentiments of sincerity. We have done so, and hope and expect to be met in the same spirit of conciliation and friendship.

Having made these remarks, we now proceed to lay before you the subject of our mission. We know that it is one which you have anticipated, and upon which you have already expressed yourselves with some earnestness. We must ask you to suspend any conclusion until we have carried the matter through a calm and deliberate discussion. The whole of the authorities of the nation are now around their great council fire, with power to do any act they may think proper. The authority of the United States is also present. Any contract which may be now concluded will be binding on both parties.

We propose to purchase of the Cherokee nation the whole, or a part, of the territory now occupied by them, and lying within the chartered limits of the State of Georgia. We do not confine ourselves to Georgia limits, because we are Georgians, but because the President has appointed us at the instance of Georgia, and instructed us accordingly. We will give you the reasons why a purchase is pressed by the General Government, for the use of Georgia. Previous to the 24th day of April, 1802, Georgia held the right of sovereignty over an immense space of country, extending even out to the Mississippi river. The General Government, seeing that the territory was too large to be contained within the limits of one State, made application to Georgia for the purchase of a part of it. This was for the purpose of organizing new States, and having them settled and populated, for the better defence of the country in case of war. Georgia listened to the application of her father the President, and sold all the land which now lies in the States of Mississippi and Alabama: this happened on the day above stated. At the same time, in consideration of this sale, the United States bound herself, "at her own expense, to extinguish, for the use of Georgia, as early as the same could be peaceably obtained, and on reasonable terms, the Indian title to all lands within the State of Georgia." The limits of Georgia are known to you; and the amount of territory occupied by you, within those limits, is also known to you.

For greater certainty, however, concerning those limits, and the obligations of the United States to the State of Georgia, we refer you to the articles of agreement and cession, entered into on the day and year aforesaid, between James Jackson, Abraham Baldwin, and John Milledge, on the part of the State of Georgia, and James Madison, Albert Gallatin, and Levi Lincoln, on the part of the United States. (See Laws of the United States, vol. 1, page 488.)

By these articles you discover the rights of Georgia and the obligations of the United States. That these rights may be fulfilled, and these obligations discharged, is the important object of the present mission. The sovereignty of the country which you occupy is in the United States alone; no State or foreign Power can enter into a treaty or compact with you. These privileges have passed away, and your intercourse is restricted exclusively to the United States. In matters of cession of territory, you are recognised as a contracting party.

The United States possessing the sovereignty, and the Cherokee nation being in possession, your consent is asked for the extinction of your title to the soil within the Georgia lines. We concede that the terms must be "peaceable" and "reasonable." Our offer to purchase establishes the first; and the consideration which may be agreed on, we trust, will be satisfactory as to the second.

Beyond the Mississippi the United States possess large domains of unsettled territory, embracing great variety of soil and climate. A portion of this nation is already there. If those with whom we are now treating are disposed to emigrate, then we offer territory in exchange of such extent, and accompanied by such other advantages, as may be agreed on. If this offer is not acceptable, then we submit another, equally "peaceable" and equally "reasonable." It is, that you cede to the United States, for the use of Georgia, such part of the territory within her limits as can be easily spared. Many reasons might be given which have induced Georgia to urge her claim for land upon the General Government.

The reasons have appeared satisfactory to the Legislature and Governor of Georgia, and to the President and Congress of the United States. Some of these reasons grow out of the political connexion of the States, and others out of the crowded settlements of the people.

It is not necessary to detail the first; they are urgent, and must, at some time, have their weight. The last are plain to the view of every one who travels through that part of the President's dominions. His white people are becoming so much crowded, that they are driven from friends and connexions to foreign lands. Others are confined to a scanty piece of soil, without timber for fencing or fuel. To prove these statements, we need only refer to the amount of our population, and the rapidity of its increase. In the county in which one of us resides there are eighteen thousand inhabitants.

The State of Georgia, in 1810, contained 252,433 inhabitants; in 1820, 344,773; showing an increase in ten years of 92,340; and yet the present settlements of Georgia do not very greatly exceed the Cherokee nation in extent, which contains about 12,000 inhabitants. This difference is too great ever to have been intended by the Great Father of the Universe, who must have given the earth equally to be the inheritance of his white and red children.

Whether you dispose of all we ask for by exchange, or of a part by sale, still you have enough and to spare. For each man, woman, and child of the nation, a large allowance will be left, even enough for thousands yet unborn. Surely, under this view of the subject, when so much good is to result on one side, and so little, in fact no evil, on the other, you will yield to our applications.

Brothers: We have thus made known to you the subject of our mission, and some of the reasons in support of it. In a matter of so much consequence to the United States, it certainly becomes you to deliberate; to look well to this matter in all its bearings; to do unto us as you would have us to do unto you under like circumstances.

In such time as will best suit your convenience we shall expect an answer. We believe that we shall receive one which shall comport with the calmness and friendly disposition of the council. It is not to be supposed that an affair which involves so much weight and importance is easily to be disposed of. We shall therefore beg leave to reserve to ourselves the privilege of reply, as often as we may consider it necessary.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERIWETHER,
United States Commissioners.

The following is an answer from the Cherokee Council.

IN GENERAL COUNCIL:

NEW TOWN, October 20, 1823.

Friends and Brothers: The very friendly manner in which you have expressed yourselves towards the members of the council, and those of them with whom you have contracted individual friendships, and the liberal view which you have taken of the progress of our improvement in the arts of civilized life, and the regular and becoming manner in which the affairs of the nation are conducted, are respectively flattering; and we beg leave to return you our grateful acknowledgments for the compliment. The many favors which have been bestowed on us by the fostering hands of our father the President are always fresh in our recollection, and we are ever ready to acknowledge our gratitude. The co-operation of the red man and the white man in subduing the common enemy during the late war, and the blood which was lost on that occasion at Tallasseehatchie, Talledega, Hillabees, Enoticopea, Emucsaws, and Tehopha, (Horse Shoe,) we conceive to be no more than what might have been expected from our hands as children and true friends to our father the President. Those acts performed are a demonstrative proof of the sincerity of our affection and fidelity, and show the firm hold by which the hand of our father is grasped, and speak more forcibly than volumes of promises.

Brothers: We have fully deliberated on your communication. The application which you have made, under the authority of your mission from the President of the United States, for the extinguishment of the Cherokee title to the whole or a part of the lands now occupied by them, and lying within the chartered limits of Georgia, either by exchange for lands west of the Mississippi river, or by purchase, we have to state, that the unfortunate part of our nation who have emigrated to the west have suffered severely since their separation from this nation and settlement in their new country. Sickness, wars, and other fatalities have visited them and lessened their numbers; and many of them, no doubt, would willingly return to the land of their nativity, if it were practicable for them to do so, without undergoing various difficulties, which would be almost insurmountable in so fatiguing and so long a journey by men, women, and children, without friends and without money to perform it. When we call to recollection the period which separated our countrymen, acquaintances, friends, and relatives from us, and look to the circumstances and means which caused our separation, we are grieved; the tears flow in our eyes, and we weep. Had it been the desire of the remaining part of this nation to have left this country, they would have embraced the opportunity, and emigrated with their fellow-countrymen; but this was not their desire. They loved the soil which gave them birth, and they have continued thereon. The limits of this nation are small, and embrace mountains, hills, and poor lands, which can never be settled. The Cherokees once possessed an extensive country, and they have made cession after cession to our father the President, to gratify the wishes of our neighboring brethren, until our limits have become circumscribed; and it appears, from the eager desire of our brethren to obtain our lands, that it would be unreasonable for us to presume that a small cession at any time would ever satisfy them.

Brothers: The improving situation of this nation is visible, and has been acknowledged; and it would be reproachful and degrading to our character did we not look to its interest, prosperity, and future happiness. You give us one reason why a cession is urged: that is, "from the crowded settlements of the people of Georgia." We presume, if Georgia were in possession of the whole extent of her chartered limits, that it would not remedy the inconvenience complained of.

Brothers: From the comparative view which you have taken of the population of Georgia and the Cherokee nation, you say "that the difference is too great ever to have been intended by the Great Father of the Universe, who must have given the earth equally as the inheritance of his white and red children." We do not know the intention of the Supreme Father in this particular, but it is evident that this principle has never been observed or respected by nations or by individuals. If your assertion be a correct idea of His intention, why do the laws of civilized and enlightened nations allow a man to monopolize more land than he can cultivate, to the exclusion of others?

Brothers: We cannot accede to your application for a cession. It is the fixed and unalterable determination of this nation never again to cede one foot more of land. We will make known to you, as coming from our father the President, that the boundary line from the Unicoy turnpike, on the Blue Ridge, to the source of the Chestatee, has not been run by the United States surveyor, agreeably to the stipulation or intention of the treaty of 1819; but it has been run so as to include a larger tract of land than was admitted by said treaty, to the great inconvenience and injury of this nation, particularly those of our citizens who lived in that quarter, and have been compelled to remove. As this fact has been reported to the President, we trust that he has given you some instructions relative to the investigation of the subject.

With the brightness of the sun, we renew our assurances of respect and brotherly friendship.

PATH KILLER, his \times mark, Principal Chief.

MAJOR RIDGE, his \times mark, Speaker of Council.

JOHN ROSS, President of National Committee.

A. McCoy, Clerk of National Committee.

ELIJAH HICKS, Clerk of National Council.

The following is a reply from the Commissioners to the Council.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

NEW TOWN, October 21, 1823.

Your communication of yesterday was handed us by your messenger. We feel constrained by duty and instruction to reply, and to reserve to ourselves the privilege of reply as often as we may consider it necessary. In doing this, we violate no sentiment which we have heretofore expressed with regard to this nation. Nothing would give us a deeper regret than to find that our confidence had been misplaced, and our encomiums improperly bestowed. Of this we have no apprehension at present, and shall pursue the negotiation under the hope that it will yet be closed in a manner which shall comport with the just expectations of the General Government.

Brothers: The relation in which this nation stands to the Government of the United States is somewhat peculiar. The original title to this soil is acknowledged to have been in you.

There was a time when most of the territory now composing the United States belonged to various tribes of Indians. The people of Europe were the first white men who landed upon these shores. As soon as they established colonies, they claimed the sovereignty of the soil by the right of discovery. For a long period of time, this sovereignty was exercised without resistance. At length, the colonies grew to a size which enabled them to take the management of their own affairs. A war ensued, which lasted seven years, and then ended in the complete success of the colonies. What Europe claimed by discovery, was then vested in the people of the colonies by conquest. All the country which was conquered belonged to the conquerors. The Cherokees, the Creeks, and almost every other Indian tribe, powerful and numerous as they were, took sides against us. All shared the same fate. All became subject to the Government afterwards established, under the title of the "United States of America."

This subordination and loss of power would have followed conquest, as a matter of course; but, in order that it might be reduced to a certainty, and made plain, and recorded, treaties were entered into, in every instance, with the Indian tribes who were parties to the war.

The Delawares surrendered their sovereignty at the treaty of Fort Pitt; the Six Nations at Fort Stanwix; the Creeks at New York; the Chickasaws at Hopewell; and the Cherokees at Hopewell, in 1785, and so on. By these, and by a great many other nations, a complete surrender is made, and protection claimed. The language of the United States, in the treaty of Hopewell, gives peace to the Cherokees, and receives them into favor and protection. The language of the Cherokees is submissive, and accepts the offer. So complete was the authority acquired by these memorable operations, that the territory of all those tribes was made the subject of "allotment." All the lands which they now hold have been "allotted" to them; their original title is forever gone—first, by discovery; secondly, by conquest; and thirdly, by treaty. But the surrenders which have been made from time to time by the Cherokees go still further, and authorize the United States to "manage the trade of the Cherokees as they may think proper."

Brothers: We have reference to these matters of history and compact, not to show your humiliation, but to show your dependence. On the contrary, it does not degrade you to give you the evidence of your dependence; it is a matter of distinction to be connected with, and dependant upon, the Government of the United States. There are twenty-four States and three Territories, which are found to acknowledge this connexion and dependence. The advantage is mutual. The United States give laws, stability, and protection to the States; and the States give obedience, support, and taxes to the Government. By this union, the Government becomes powerful; by a division, it would be feeble. As relating to the different tribes of Indians who have settlements within the States, the Government is prepared to speak with candor and decision. If they cherish the idea of independence and self-government, the sooner they are corrected the better. The United States will not permit the existence of a separate, distinct, and independent Government within her limits. All the people on her soil must be hers, and her laws must, sooner or later, pervade the whole. To qualify you for citizenship, the Government has, within the last twenty years, expended upon you upwards of half a million of dollars. You have been told that you are the President's favorite children. You are indeed so. He seeks not to destroy, but to preserve you. There is nothing annihilating in his scheme. When he qualifies you as citizens, you must become so. The process of qualification will follow you, wherever you go; and as fast as you become citizens, you become subject to our laws. Whether this subjection to our laws is to be individually or collectively, depends in a great degree upon yourselves. As long ago as at the treaty of Hopewell, in 1785, the idea is suggested of your becoming a Territory of the United States, with the right of representation in Congress. If this nation would preserve a compact form, not within the limits of the States, no obstacle would remain to the organization of a Territorial Government composed of themselves. While they are within the limits of the States, the State sovereignty must prevail, and they must become merged in the white population, and take the standing of individual citizens.

Brothers: Let your choice be as it may, your condition will be bettered. The government which you have lately formed for yourselves, although it is greatly to your credit, yet is objectionable in many of its important features. A territorial organization under the United States would be greatly preferable. Such changes are common among nations, and often to the advantage of both parties. But, if this scheme is not yet sufficiently matured to meet your acceptance, then a cession of a part will quiet the solicitude of Georgia and of the United States, for the present, and give time for further deliberation. The cession of a part need not affect the wishes or interest of any individual, with respect to citizenship. If those who live upon the part ceded are not disposed to become citizens, they can be indemnified for their losses in removing, and retire within your lines. If they are disposed to become members of the States, they can be secured in a residence, and let into all privileges of ordinary citizens.

Brothers: We have thus laid before you some new topics for discussion. These involve considerations of vast importance to yourselves and to posterity. Listen to them, and answer with calmness and deliberation.

You are not engaged in light disputes or trifling considerations. Nations are parties to this correspondence. If we know our Government and ourselves, we design you no harm. Our object is the good of the whole American family.

We shall now proceed to notice some of the remarks in your communication of yesterday, and close for the present.

The picture which you have drawn of the separation of friends and relatives at the emigration to Arkansas is honorable to the sympathies of your hearts. But the heart often bleeds at what the judgment approves. Among ourselves, these separations occur almost daily. You advert with some emphasis to the "circumstances and means which caused the separation."

Brothers: We understand that it was wholly voluntary, and that your citizens projected the scheme themselves, as long ago as 1808. At that time the President was aware that the season was unpropitious for so serious an operation. His land beyond the Mississippi had not been explored. The distresses of the people and Government were great, and the prospect of a war was in view. The President acted as a great and good father to you, and advised you not to go. Since that time, it has been ascertained that the country admits of eligible settlement and organization, and the most advantageous terms have been allowed you for removal. In all this, we discover nothing but the characteristic magnanimity of the American Government.

Brothers: You state that you "once possessed an extensive country, but that you have made cession after cession, until your limits have become circumscribed." Would you, if you could, repossess yourselves of all the soil which you once held, and allow it to be peopled only by yourselves? Would you demolish temples raised to science and dedicated to God, that beasts might have a wider range, or game a broader play? Would you lay waste a city, that a wigwam might rise upon its ruins? No, brothers: you are now drinking of the streams of civilization, and leaving far behind you the tide and vulgar prejudices of untutored barbarism. These are giving place to just and liberal conceptions of the rights of man, and the bounty of man's Creator.

You suggest that the eagerness of your neighboring brethren to obtain lands is so strong, that a small cession would not satisfy them. It is true that self-interest is a strong principle of action, and in its operations often requires restraint. In this case, however, this eagerness is considered reasonable, and your father the President gives it his sanction.

We assure you that a small cession will have a much greater quieting influence than no cession at all. It is not altogether fair to set bounds to eagerness, when it is founded upon right.

Your allusion to the subject of the line run under the treaty of 1819 will receive due attention before we close our correspondence.

With great respect for the council, and increasing regard for its members, we again subscribe ourselves,
Your friends and brothers,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERIWETHER.

To the COUNCIL of the Cherokee Nation.

The Council to the Commissioners.

IN GENERAL COUNCIL:

NEW TOWN, CHEROKEE NATION, October 24, 1823.

Friends and Brothers: Your communication of the 21st instant has been deliberated on by the General Council, and it seems that you anticipate a hope that your application for a cession might yet be granted. We assure you, in the strongest terms, that our rejection is founded upon a mature and deliberate determination, which cannot be changed. The title of the Cherokees to the land in their possession is indisputable; and the United States, by the treaty of Holston in 1791, in the seventh article, fully declare it to be so, by solemnly guaranteeing it to them.

Brothers: We are fully sensible that we are dependant upon the Government of the United States for protection, and have ever manifested a disposition to conduct ourselves in such a manner as to comport with our duty in that respect; and we are surprised and at a loss to know what has given grounds to harbor a contrary opinion of our disposition in that respect. There must be a source from whence a misrepresentation of our disposition has been communicated to our father the President. The remark that we made, "that the Cherokees once possessed an extensive country, and made cession after cession to our father the President, to gratify the wishes of our neighboring brethren, until our limits had become circumscribed," was not intended to mean that we would wish to repossess what we had surrendered, (as would seem from your eloquent remarks on that point;) but to show, if we continued to yield to our father's application in behalf of our neighboring brethren, as we had heretofore done, that the whole of our lands would be gone. It is not our wish to "demolish temples raised to science and dedicated to God, so that beasts might have a wider range, or game a broader play;" nor to "lay waste a city, that a wigwam might rise upon its ruins;" but it is our desire that monuments of science may be raised, by our hands, on the dust of our progenitors, from which the beasts of the field have receded, and the wigwam is tottering into ruins.

The bow and the quiver are laid aside, and the pursuits of the chase are forgotten. The axe, the hoe, the plough, and the shuttle are introduced, and progressing like a consuming fire, and it is hoped that a mist will not arise to dampen its progress. You suggest an idea that, if this nation would preserve a compact form of a Territorial Government of the United States, not within the limits of the States, no obstacle would remain to the organization; but while they are within the limits of the States, the State sovereignty must prevail, and they must become merged in the white population, and take the standing of individual citizens. And you further remark, that, in case of a cession of a part, all those who do not choose to become citizens would be indemnified for their losses; and those that choose to become members of the States can be secured in a residence, and let into all the privileges of ordinary citizens.

Brothers: The suggestion of the organization of a Territorial Government is a subject of too great weight for the nation to take up in their present situation; therefore, the suggestion cannot meet our acceptance. As respects being secured with indemnification and residence, and privileges of citizenship in the States, we beg leave to ask you to look to the treaty of 1819. What were the provisions made for the Cherokees in the second article of that treaty? And what has been the course pursued by the States of Tennessee and Georgia, and some of their citizens, relative to the sacred obligations contained in that article? We find that opposition, fraud, and every species of injustice were raised against the interests of the poor inexperienced Cherokees by them; and before the aid and assistance of the magnanimous hand of the General Government could be extended to their relief, an entire ruin and loss of property has been sustained by many of them; and many of them who are entitled to compensation for improvements under that treaty have never received one cent. A very small portion of the improvements left have been valued and paid for.

Brothers: We cannot curtail the present limits which have been reserved to this nation in the treaty of 1819. The prosperity and future happiness of our posterity cannot be lost sight of, when their destiny is placed in our hands; and should we act as an honest father, and preserve their interest and their right, they will rejoice and be happy in commemorating our names when we are no more. Under these circumstances, our brethren of Georgia cannot, or ought not, to desire us to destroy ourselves, so that they may aggrandize themselves and raise temples upon our ruins. Their State is respectable in wealth and in population, as well as in liberal sentiments of honorable men, and the extent of its bounds not small, but considerably larger than many of the other States of the Union.

Brothers: We beg leave to present this communication as a positive and unchangeable refusal to dispose of one foot more of land, so that no further application or anticipation of success may be encouraged on your part, and that a final close of the correspondence on this subject should herewith take place, as the council will very soon rise, having already continued four days over the time allowed by the authorities of the nation for its sitting.

With calmness and cordiality, we subscribe ourselves, as friends and brothers,

PATH KILLER, his x mark, Head Chief.

MAJOR RIDGE, Speaker of Council.

JOHN ROSS, President of National Committee.

A. MCCOY, Clerk of National Committee.

ELIJAH HICKS, Clerk of National Council.

The Commissioners to the Council.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

NEW TOWN, October 25, 1823.

Your communication of yesterday has been under consideration, and we regret to see the very wide difference which exists between us as to the material point of negotiation.

The anticipations of success which we had indulged were founded upon confidence in your judgment. We believed that we were in the right, and hoped that we should succeed in convincing you. Your rejection of our application does not at all inpair our views of the propriety of what we have laid before you. We have endeavored, by a reference to the history of this nation, to satisfy you of the nature of your title to the soil which you occupy. The doctrine, to be sure, is not very consoling, but it is nevertheless true. You attempt to rebut it by an article in the treaty of Holston in 1791. It is true that the seventh article "guaranties to the Cherokee nation all their lands not thereby ceded." And what does this guaranty amount to? You greatly mistake yourselves if you construe it into a conveyance, or even quit-claim, on the part of the United States. Notice the terms used in the fourth article of the same treaty, which conveys the lands ceded at that time. It is there said that "the chiefs and warriors, for themselves and the whole Cherokee nation, their heirs and descendants, release, quit claim, relinquish, and cede" the lands therein described. If the word "guaranty" would have expressed all this, then that word would have been used. Your title under this treaty of Holston is no better than under the treaty of Hopewell; and under neither does it amount to any thing more than possession at the will of the United States. You acknowledge that you are "dependant upon the United States for protection." Brothers, such acknowledgment is very empty, unless accompanied by some signs that you feel the obligation. Your father the President has asked you, in terms the most peaceable and reasonable, for what he might have demanded; you might have granted the application, without injury or inconvenience to yourselves. It will rest with him to judge whether your conduct comports with your duty. You state that it is your desire to raise monuments of science with your own hands upon the soil of your "progenitors." No lover of the human race would controvert the sentiment. No friend of mankind would bring into use "the bow and the quiver," which you say have been laid aside. The "axe, the hoe, plough, and shuttle" were given you by the President, and he will never withdraw them. But it is his desire, and it ought to be your pride, to forward the general interests of all the American people. This never can be done by your monopoly of such extent of territory.

Brothers: It would seem, from your pointed and determined rejection of what we have asked, that it would be wholly unnecessary to pursue the investigation further. We commenced with a simple proposition to purchase your claim to the whole or a part of the soil within the limits of Georgia. In the course of the correspondence, we have evinced the grounds of negotiation, and discussed topics interesting to the Government and to you. If no good results to either, we must be content with the consciousness of having done our duty. Your allusion to the proceedings under the treaty of 1819 does not require a detailed answer. Our knowledge upon that subject would not, we presume, rescue the Tennesseans or Georgians from the aspersions which you have thrown upon them. We take leave, however, to observe, that, wherever the laws have been appealed to, they have been righteously enforced, and that vast profits have been realized by the persons named in that treaty. As messengers of the United States, it does not become us to indulge local feelings. The General Government is bound to Georgia, and we doubt not but that she will fulfil her engagements.

Brothers: We will not detain the council, if they are impatient and wish to rise. We understand that they have sat much longer upon business of less importance heretofore. This is the third visit that we have made to the country, and we had a right to expect a patient hearing. We shall say but little more. Justice to our Government and good wishes to you require that we should add a few words more; we ask you to receive them as they are intended—in feelings free from excitement.

According to the usage of many years, we exercised the right of appointing the place of meeting you. We solicited your agency, and invited you to attend last January, and you refused. We selected another place more central, and a time more genial, and invited you to come, and you refused. You were then indulged in appointing time and place yourselves. We attended, and you did not. We have now come to your own time and your own place, and you have rejected a reasonable application. We told you on our arrival that we were directed to co-operate with the Georgia commissioners in negotiating the settlement of long standing claims. We have stood by and seen you reject a settlement of claims which occurred at a time and under circumstances powerfully imposing. When treaties lose their obligation, what shall bind nations? We have stood by, also, and witnessed a correspondence of serious import between yourselves and your agent. We have seen his application rejected, and heard his dissatisfaction expressed. Our appointments to meet you were under the President's authority. The application of the Georgia commissioners was under the President's authority. The application of the agent was under the President's authority. Where is the virtue of calling the President "father," of acknowledging "his protection," and then refusing obedience to his wishes? We might go further, and remind you of the uniform disposition of the Government to attend to your requests and redress your grievances. Even at this moment, while these things are passing before us, troops are on their march, with the sword and torch, removing intruders from your limits, and burning their dwellings.

Brothers: Ingratitude approaches to crime; a grateful return for a favor is the best evidence that the favor is felt. You cannot suppose that all these things, taken together, are to pass away and produce no effect. What the effect may be, we are not exactly prepared to say. Time will disclose it.

Brothers: We had rather see and feel a different prospect. In the sincerity of our hearts, we wish this nation well. We should be happy to see the ties which bind you to the Government drawn closer. We should like to see the chain grow brighter and stronger. We fear that the very reverse is the fact. The ties are loosening, and the chain is becoming weaker. There is a danger of your losing connexion with the Government, and having the agency abolished. We might enumerate other consequences which are not improbable, but which should be prevented if possible. The course is plain by which the evils may be averted. It is no mark of manliness and magnanimity to persist, merely for the sake of consistency. After the judgment is convinced, it is often better to yield, than to resist even a doubtful right.

Brothers: We shall now close. We are not conscious of having said any thing not warranted by the authority of our Government and the rules of fair and open negotiation. We cannot take our leave without submitting a further and distinct proposition. So well are we satisfied of its healing tendency, that it would be criminal in us to withhold it. We submit the following:

The United States propose to purchase of the Cherokee nation their claim to all the land east and north of the following boundaries: Beginning at a marked corner, at the head of Chestatee; thence, along the ridge, to the mouth of Long Swamp creek; thence, down the Etowah river, to the line which is to be run between Alabama and Georgia; thence, with said line, to the dividing line between the Creeks and Cherokees; thence, with said line, to the Chattahoochie. In consideration of said cession, the United States will pay to the Cherokee nation the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, in suitable instalments, and will also indemnify the nation against the Georgia claims; and, as a gratuity to the nation, the commissioners will pay into their treasury, at this time, for the use of the nation, the further sum of ten thousand dollars.

We are, as usual, your friends and brothers,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERIWETHER,
United States Commissioners.

The Council to the Commissioners.

IN GENERAL COUNCIL:

NEW TOWN, October 27, 1823.

Friends and Brothers: You say that your anticipations of success were founded upon confidence in our judgment, and that you believed and hoped you would have succeeded in convincing us that you were right, and would also satisfy us of the nature of our title to the soil which we now occupy. The doctrine which you have laid for a foundation can never convince our judgment that you are correct. We did not refer to the seventh article of Holston treaty, 1791, as a foundation of our title to the soil upon which we stand. Our title has emanated from a Supreme source, which cannot be impaired by the mere circumstance of discovery by foreigners; neither has this title been impaired by conquest or by treaty. If it was intended that our original title should be forever lost, why did not the treaties of peace declare it in plain terms; and why should the United States purchase, time after time, by treaties, lands to which you would wish to convince us we have no title? And when such purchases were made, why did they require such a right and title of conveyance as given in the fourth article of Holston treaty, 1791, to which you have had occasion to refer? We noticed the seventh article of Holston treaty to show that the United States do acknowledge our right and title, and have guaranteed to respect the same. This being the case, and the Cherokees possessing the right and title, it would have been superfluous and useless for the United States to convey to the Cherokees a right and title which was already vested in the Cherokees themselves, and not in the United States. You say our possession is at the will of the United States, and that our rejections to the several propositions which have been made cannot be expected to pass away and produce no effect; and that the ties which bind us to the United States are loosening, and the chain is becoming weaker. What, brothers! do you wish to impair the high confidence which we entertain in the magnanimity of your Government? and to harbor an opinion that, because the United States are great and powerful, and the Cherokees small and dependant upon her for protection, she will trample justice under foot, and compel us to yield what we have peaceably and respectfully refused to let the United States have, for the benefit of the State of Georgia? Have you not told us that the President has the same love towards us as his white children? and would not such a treatment of us, as you seem to be apprehensive of, be partial and wrong? Brothers, we have rejected your propositions because we love our lands, and have none to dispose of. We rejected the claims of Georgia, because we know that the nation owes her nothing under the treaties cited. We rejected the proposition of the agent, because we think that it is not expedient to grant it, inasmuch as we have given him all the privileges granted him by treaty, and are ever disposed to support his authority as an agent, so far as our citizens may be implicated with transgressions. Thus far we have not acted with ingratitude towards the General Government, in rejecting these several propositions; it is a privilege and a right which belongs to us, to use our pleasure in complying or rejecting. Therefore, your charge of ingratitude, we conceive, is not consistent with liberality. Your proposition for a special cession of a tract of land cannot be acceded to. The offer of money is not a consideration which can effect to alter the rejection which has already been made. You have been told, in positive terms, that one foot more of land cannot be sold. You state that you are informed that the council had, on a former occasion, sat much longer than the present session. Your informant is mistaken. Twenty-five days is the longest session we have ever had at this place, and the present session has now entered the twenty-seventh day. You have no grounds to complain of a sudden close of our negotiations; the subject has been fully discussed. We now consider this a final close of our negotiation, and beg leave to take you by the right hands, as we met, in brotherly friendship; and as such may we ever continue.

Extract of a letter from the Cherokee Delegation to the President of the United States, dated

CITY OF WASHINGTON, January 19, 1824.

The Cherokee nation labor under a peculiar inconvenience, from the repeated appropriations which are made for the purpose of holding treaties with them for lands. This circumstance has been productive of much evil to the improvement of the nation in the arts of civilized life, as it cannot be denied that it has retarded its progress, by unsettling the prospects of individuals. The Cherokee nation have now come to a decisive and unalterable conclusion not to cede away any more lands; the limits reserved under the treaty of 1819 are not more than sufficient for their comfort and convenience, taking into consideration the great body of mountains and poor lands which can never be settled. It is a gratifying truth, that the Cherokees are rapidly increasing in population; therefore, it is an incumbent duty on the nation to preserve, unimpaired, the rights of posterity to the lands of their ancestors. We have told you of the decisive and unalterable disposition of the nation, in regard to their lands. Father, we would now beg your interposition with Congress, on behalf of your red children, the Cherokees, so that provision may be made, by law, to authorize an adjustment between the United States and the State of Georgia, so that the former may be released from the existing compact, so far as it respects the extinguishment of the Cherokee title to lands within the chartered limits of Georgia.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 30, 1824.

The President has received your letter of the 19th instant, and, after giving to it that mature consideration which the importance of the subject to which it refers demands, he has directed me to communicate to you the following answer:

By the compact with Georgia, the United States are bound to extinguish, for the use of the State, the Indian title to lands within the State, as soon as it can be done peaceably, and on reasonable conditions; and the Legislature and Executive of Georgia now press the fulfilment of that stipulation, with the utmost possible earnestness. This Government is anxious to fulfil the agreement, provided it can be done on conditions which accord with the import of the compact, and which will also be satisfactory to the Indians. With a view to this object, we wish to have a free communication with you, the chiefs of the Cherokees; and to appeal to the good sense and to the interest of the nation, as pointed out by their own experience, and by that of their ancestors, for two centuries back.

You must be sensible that it will be impossible for you to remain, for any length of time, in your present situation, as a distinct society or nation, within the limits of Georgia, or any other State. Such a community is incompatible with our system, and must yield to it. This truth is too striking and obvious not to be seen by all of you. Surrounded, as you are, by the people of the several States, you must either cease to be a distinct community, and become, at no distant period, a part of the State within whose limits you are, or remove beyond the limits of any State. For the United States to fulfil the compact with Georgia, the title which you hold to lands, as a distinct community, must be extinguished; and the State objects to the extinguishment of it, by vesting in you, or in any of you, in lieu thereof, the right of individual ownership. If any of you acquire that right to land, and remain there after the bond which holds you together as a distinct community is dissolved, and your present title is extinguished, it must be by purchasing the property, and acquiring the title from the State within which it is.

It remains for the Cherokee nation to decide for itself, whether it will contribute most to their own welfare and happiness for them to retain their present title to their lands, and remain where they are, exposed to the discontent of Georgia and the pressure of her citizens; or to cede it to the United States, for Georgia, at a fair price, to be paid either in other lands beyond the Mississippi, or in money, to be vested in lands to be purchased for them as individuals, within that or any other State. Should the nation decide to relinquish its present title, and to adopt either of the alternatives suggested, this Government is disposed to act generously with them. If they prefer to move in a body westward of the Mississippi, measures will be taken to acquire lands for them there, in sufficient amount, and in the quarter most agreeable to them. Facilities will also be afforded for their removal. Should they prefer to receive the value of their title in money, with a view to purchase lands in any of the States, and become citizens thereof, in that case a fair price will be given, and proper aid afforded them for the accomplishment of their object. Should the nation divide, and a portion of it pass the Mississippi, and the residue remain on this side, measures will be taken to give effect to their wishes, by the compact to be entered into, in both respects.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Messrs. JOHN ROSS, GEO. LOWREY, MAJOR RIDGE, and ELIJAH HICKS, Cherokee Delegation.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, February 11, 1824.

We have received your letter of the 30th ultimo, containing the answer which the President directed you to communicate to us, in reply to a particular subject embraced in the letter which we had the honor of laying before him on the 19th ultimo.

60 E

In this answer we discover new propositions for the extinguishment of Cherokee titles to lands for the benefit of Georgia. We beg leave to say to the President, through you, the Cherokee nation are sensible that the United States are bound, by their compact with Georgia, to extinguish, for the use of that State, the Indian title to lands within the limits claimed by the State, "as soon as it can be done peaceably and on reasonable conditions;" and are also sensible that this compact is no more than a conditional one, and, without the free and voluntary consent of the Cherokee nation, can never be complied with on the part of the United States. And, having been duly authorized to make known to the Government of the United States the true sentiments and disposition of the nation on this subject, the President has been informed that the Cherokees have come to a decisive and unalterable conclusion never to cede away any more lands. And as the extinguishment of the Cherokee title to lands can never be obtained on conditions which will accord with the import of the compact between the United States and Georgia, it is desirable that the Government should adopt some other means to satisfy Georgia, than to remain any longer under anticipation of being enabled to accomplish the object of purchasing the Cherokee title. The United States now possess an extensive territory in the Floridas; why not extend the limits of Georgia in that section of country, if her present bounds be considered too small? The Cherokee nation have never promised to surrender, at any future period, to the United States, for Georgia, their title to lands; but, on the contrary, the United States have, by treaties, solemnly guaranteed to secure to the Cherokees forever their title to lands which have been reserved by them: therefore, the State of Georgia can have no reasonable plea against the Cherokees for refusing to yield their little all to the United States, so that her own aggrandizement may be raised upon their ruins.

You express a wish "to have a free communication with us on this subject, and to appeal to the good sense and to the interest of the nation, as pointed out by their own experience, and by that of their ancestors, for near two centuries back." In accordance with your wishes, we will speak frankly, and with all the good sense we may possess, and, keeping strictly in view the interest of our nation, look back to circumstances which have transpired, and endeavor to trace the causes which produced them; and also to observe the present state of things, and look forward to such objects as may be practically attainable for the best interests of the Cherokee people.

By tracing the situation of our ancestors for two hundred years back, we see nothing desirable, but much to deplore. The happiness which the Indians once enjoyed, by a quiet and undisturbed ease, in their primitive situation, before the face of the white man was seen on this continent, was now poisoned by the bad fruits of the civilized tree which was planted around them. Tumultuous wars arose, and the mountains and plains were covered with carnage, and the Elysian valleys drenched with blood; and many noble tribes, whose unfortunate doom it was to have been overshadowed by the expanded branches of this tree, drooped, withered, and are no more. Such are the scenes brought to our view by looking back to the situation of our ancestors at the period to which you have called our attention. Let us now, for a moment, seriously reflect on the true causes which have universally produced the extinction of Indian tribes, when they became merged into the white population; and we doubt not that it will be admitted at once that, by ambition, pride, and avariciousness of the civilized man, the untutored sons of nature became a prey. Defrauded out of their lands; treated as inferior beings, on account of their poverty and ignorance, they became associated with the lowest grade of society, from whom the habits of intemperance, debauchery, and all the vices of degradation peculiar to that class, were by them soon imbibed. Their lands having been swept from under their feet by the ingenuity of the white man, and being left destitute of a home, ignorant of the arts and sciences, and possessing no experience in the employment of a laborious and industrious life to obtain a living, they became straggling wanderers among strangers; and, by oppressions, their spirits were depressed, and, considering themselves degraded, they were induced to hurry away their troublesome existence by inhaling the noxious vapors of intemperance (a fatal remedy) to settle their doom of extinction. Such have been the circumstances and causes which have swept into oblivion the names of many tribes of Indians that once possessed and inhabited the soil of these United States; and such must be the fate of those tribes now in existence, should they be merged into the white population before they become completely civilized and shall have learned the arts and sciences; and such would be the fate of a large portion of the Cherokee nation, were they to cede away all their lands, and now become incorporated with the whites.

You say that "we must be sensible that it will be impossible for us to remain, for any length of time, in our present situation, as a distinct society or nation, within the limits of Georgia, or of any other State; and that such a community is incompatible with your system, and must yield to it; and that we must either cease to be a distinct community, and become, at no distant period, a part of the State within whose limits we are, or remove without the limits of any State;" and that "it remains for the Cherokee nation to decide for itself, whether it will contribute most to their own welfare and happiness for them to retain their present title to their lands, and remain where they are exposed to the discontent of Georgia and the pressure of her citizens; or to cede it to the United States, for Georgia, at a fair price, to be paid either in other lands beyond the Mississippi, or in money." Sir, to these remarks we beg leave to observe, and to remind you, that the Cherokees are not foreigners, but original inhabitants of America; and that they now inhabit and stand on the soil of their own territory; and that the limits of their territory are defined by the treaties which they have made with the Government of the United States; and that the States by which they are now surrounded have been created out of lands which were once theirs; and that they cannot recognize the sovereignty of any State within the limits of their territory. Confiding in the good faith of the United States to respect their treaty stipulations with the Cherokee nation, we have no hesitation in saying that the true interest, prosperity, and happiness of our nation demand their permanency where they are, and to retain their present title to their lands. In doing so, we cannot see, in the spirit of liberality, honor, magnanimity, equity, and justice, how they can be exposed to the discontent of Georgia or the pressure of her citizens. An extent of territory twice as large, west of the Mississippi, as the one now occupied by the Cherokees east of that river, or all the money now in the coffers of your treasury, would be no inducement for the nation to exchange or to sell their country. It rests with the interest, the disposition, and the free consent of the nation to remain as a separate community, or to enter into a treaty with the United States for admission as citizens, under the form of a Territorial or State Government; and we can only say, that the situation of the nation is not sufficiently improved in the arts of civilized life to warrant any change at present: therefore, the subject must be left for our posterity to determine for themselves, whenever the whole nation shall have been completely and fully civilized, and shall have possessed the arts and sciences.

With considerations of high respect and esteem, we have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient, humble servants,

JOHN ROSS,
GEORGE LOWREY,
MAJOR RIDGE, his \times mark.
ELIJAH HICKS.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 17, 1824.

I am directed by the President of the United States to enclose, for your information, copies of a communication from the Cherokee delegation now at this place, the answer to their communication, and their reply; by which you will perceive that the nation is very adverse to making any additional cessions to the United States.

I avail myself of the opportunity to assure you that it will afford the President much pleasure to adopt any measure in his power which may tend to the fulfilment of the convention with the State of Georgia, with the least possible delay. With this view, he would be gratified to receive the aid of your opinion on a subject so interesting to the State over which you preside.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency GEORGE M. TROUP, Milledgeville, Georgia.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, MILLEDGEVILLE, GEORGIA, February 28, 1824.

I received this day your letter of the 17th instant. Be pleased to present to the President my acknowledgments for the attention which he has given to the requisition of Georgia, and especially for the manifestation of his sincere desire to adopt any measure in his power which may tend to the fulfilment of the convention with the State of Georgia, with the least possible delay.

In compliance with his wishes, I hasten to lay before him my views and expectations, as connected with this fulfilment. In your effort to open a negotiation with the Cherokee deputation for extinguishment of claims, you are met by a flat negative to two fair and liberal propositions: the first, to purchase for valuable consideration in money; the second, to accommodate them with equivalent territory, in favorable situations beyond the Mississippi. Unreasonable as the answer has been, my mind was fully prepared for such a one. It had been made known to me, some time before, that a council had been formed in the nation, for the special purpose of coming to the resolution that the State of Georgia should never acquire, for any consideration, another acre of Cherokee land, either through the agency of the United States, or otherwise; and, in conformity with this resolution, all the measures were preconcerted, to enable the chiefs to present themselves before the President, with a boldness bordering on effrontery, and to receive this first advance to negotiation with the emphatic No!—a word easily pronounced, but, in this instance, most unadvisedly; not the spontaneous offspring of Indian feeling and sentiment, but a word put into his mouth by white men, who are nourished and protected by the power of the United States; who have no common interest or sympathies with those whom they instigate to use it; and who, fixed upon the soil almost without metes or bounds, regard it as a goodly heritage for their descendants, which no power can take away.

From the day of the signature of the articles of agreement and cession, this word ceased to be available to the Indians for any permanent interest of their own. From that day, the power of protestation, which they have so recently interposed, departed from them, and could never be used, but for a little delay or for a better bargain. On that day, the fee-simple passed from the rightful proprietors to Georgia; and Georgia, after a lapse of twenty years, demands nothing of the competent authority but a motion of the tenants in possession; the answer is not only No! but Never! and is this a fit and proper one to be given to the people of Georgia, who have endured so long and so patiently; who have parted with an empire for a song; who have waited to see the United States reimbursed all their expenses, and a nett revenue flowing into their coffers, from the land which was their birth-right? a people who, having made a little reservation for themselves by compact, are now told, in answer to their just and reasonable demands, that this compact is only conditional, depending for its fulfilment on the will and pleasure of the Indians; that the primitive aboriginal rights are such now, as they were before the discovery of the country; and that, if Georgia wants land, the United States have enough in Florida, or elsewhere, to give her? How is this insult to be repelled, proceeding, as it does, from the polluted lips of outcasts and vagabonds, who make the chiefs the instruments of reiterating it at Washington? No, sir; this trick of vulgar cunning is only to be met by the firmness and dignity which become the United States Government; which it has never failed to manifest on every occasion calling for it; and which he who is the special depository of these sacred qualities has always displayed with so much advantage to his high office and to the country. The Indians must be made to understand that no talks will be listened to, but such as proceed from councils strictly Indian in character and composition; that the compact with Georgia is a very different instrument from that which it has been represented to them; that, by it, the word of the United States is passed, and that nothing can redeem it but the cession of all the lands within her limits; that the time has come, when, to postpone this redemption, would be essentially a breach of faith, of which the United States will never permit herself to be suspected; that, consulting the comfort and happiness of the Indians alone, the United States have omitted to press this measure upon them, until the very last hour; that the United States have made sacrifices for Indian interest, and will expect some small ones from the Indians in return; that, if they desired civilization, nothing is more consistent with it than concentration; and that, without regard to acquisition of territory for her own benefit, the United States have acted on this principle from the beginning, as a fundamental one in their system of improvement; that, beyond the limits of Georgia, and within the territory proper of the United States, there are lands enough for the Cherokees and all their generations to come, of which the United States possess the full and absolute dominion, where they may sit down in quiet and peaceful enjoyment, and where none can come to make them afraid; that, on the other hand, if, tired of the arts of civilization, they will betake themselves to their old pursuits, you have made a fair and liberal offer of wilderness enough, abounding in game, where the white man will not speedily come to trespass or annoy; that, in presenting these honorable overtures, you are actuated by a sincere regard to Indian interest; that, in the rejection of both, you can perceive nothing but an unfriendly spirit; and that, finally, if they persevere in this rejection, the consequences are inevitable: 1st, that you must assist the Georgians in occupying the country which is their own, and which is unjustly withheld from them; or, 2dly, in resisting the occupation, to make war upon, and shed the blood of your brothers and friends.

Having said so much, it remains only to advert to the other topics contained in your letter to the Indian delegation; and for these, a word will suffice. 1st. The reservation of a part of our territory for the settlement of the Indians. 2dly. Their incorporation into, and amalgamation with, our society. As to the first, the answer is, the articles of agreement having made no provision for such reservation, none can be made without the consent of Georgia; and that Georgia will never give her assent to any, without an equivalent, (if she would with one,) is absolutely certain. With regard to the second proposition, the answer is, that if such a scheme were practicable at all, the utmost of rights and privileges which public opinion would concede to Indians, would fix them in a middle station, between the negro and the white man; and that, as long as they survived this degradation, without the possibility of attaining the elevation of the latter, they would gradually sink to the condition of the former—a point of degeneracy below which they could not fall; it is likely, before they reached this, their wretchedness would find relief in broken hearts. Most assuredly, nothing will contribute so essentially to that scanty share of human happiness which is left them, as their concentration and insulation, where, having enough for the wants of agriculture, they will, in their seclusion, afford no pretext for the intrusive or annoyances of the white man.

Thus frankly, in compliance with the request of the President, I submit to him my general views on this interesting subject. Thus frankly I will deem it my duty to submit them to the Legislature of the State. They are such, no doubt, as have already suggested themselves; they seem to me the only ones which the attitude assumed by the Indians will suffer us to entertain. I am sorry I cannot support them by matter of fact information of official character; to me, this is impossible. I can only say, generally, that, among men best informed on Cherokee affairs, the minds of a majority of the nation are well prepared to receive your proposition for removal.

In conclusion, I must state, not only my hope, but my conviction, that the President will perceive, in every movement on our part, in relation to this business, a sincere desire to harmonize with the Union; to maintain peace and tranquillity with the Indians, until longer forbearance will cease to be a virtue; in fact, to lend ourselves, as we have always done, heart and hand, to the support of every wise and virtuous administration of the General Government. But the President will, at the same time consider, that Georgia has a deep stake in the prompt decision of the present question. Of all the old States, Georgia is the only one whose political organization is incomplete; her civil polity is deranged; her military force cannot be reduced to systematic order and subordination; the extent of her actual resources cannot be counted; the great work of internal improvement is suspended; and all because Georgia is not in the possession of her vacant territory—a territory waste and profitless to the Indians, profitless to the United States; but, in possession of the rightful owner, a resource of strength, of revenue, and of union.

Whilst you present to the President my respects, be pleased to accept for yourself the offer of my high consideration for the part you have taken in this transaction.

G. M. TROUP.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 19, 1824.

I transmit, by direction of the President of the United States, for the information of the Georgia delegation in Congress, copies of a communication from the Cherokee delegation now at this place, the answer of the Department to their communication, and their reply.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the Hon. JOHN ELLIOTT and JOHN FORSYTH, and the other gentlemen composing the Georgia Delegation in Congress.

Copy of a letter from the Georgia Delegation in Congress.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, March 10, 1824.

The Secretary of War has addressed to the gentlemen composing the Georgia delegation to Congress copies of the extraordinary documents furnished by persons who are called the Cherokee delegation. As this is believed to be the first instance in which a diplomatic correspondence has been held with Indian chiefs, and in which they have been addressed by the Department of War in the same terms with those used to the representation of a State, it becomes a subject of inquiry in what light the Cherokees are at present viewed by the Government of the United States. If as an independent nation, to be treated with by all the forms of diplomatic respect, the negotiation with them should be transferred to the Department of State, and will, no doubt, be preceded by a proper examination into their authority to speak for the Cherokee tribe on matters affecting its prosperity and existence. If to be viewed as other Indians, as persons suffered to reside within the territorial limits of the United States, and subject to every restraint which the policy and power of the General Government require to be imposed upon them, for the interest of the Union, the interest of a particular State, and their own preservation, it is necessary that these misguided men should be taught by the General Government that there is no alternative between their removal beyond the limits of the State of Georgia and their extinction. The Government of the United States will deceive them grossly, if they are led to believe that, at this day, their consent is necessary to the fulfilment of its obligations to the State of Georgia. Their will must yield to the paramount duties of the General Government to itself, and to each member of the confederacy. The Cherokees allege (if, indeed, the representation made is made with their authority) that they are resolved neither to leave nor sell the lands on which they reside—lands which belong to the State of Georgia, over which Georgia did claim sovereignty until the adoption of the federal constitution, and over which she will exercise her powers, whenever any administration of the General Government resolves to fix permanently upon them any persons who are not, and whom she will never suffer to become, her citizens. The doctrines of the General Government, sanctioned by the highest tribunals, vindicate the claim of Georgia to the ownership of the soil. The Indians are simply occupants, tenants at will, incapable of transferring even their naked possession, except through the instrumentality of the United States, to the State of Georgia. Aware of the tenure by which their temporary possession is held, their headmen have sought in many instances to secure from the United States a title to the soil itself. Stipulations have been entered into by the General Government, equally contradictory to the rights of Georgia and the obligations of the United States—stipulations, however, which show that the General Government has the acknowledged right to transfer the possession of the Cherokee lands to the State of Georgia. The power which takes from the Cherokee tribe a portion of soil, to confer it on a Cherokee chief, under a different tenure, can rightfully take from the Cherokee nation for the benefit of a State.

It is with deep concern that the necessity is felt of pressing upon the General Government the considerations that are due to its character for good faith in its contracts with a member of the Union. Since the year 1802, implicit reliance has been placed in the General Government; and the just expectation has been indulged that, in the execution of its high duties, the Executive administration would carefully and steadily pursue the object for which the faith of the Union was pledged—the peaceable extinguishment, on reasonable terms, of the Indian title to all the lands within the territorial limits of Georgia. In 1817, the public declaration of the President to Congress, that an arrangement had been made, by which, in exchange for lands beyond the Mississippi, a great part, if not the whole, of the lands possessed by the Cherokee tribe eastward of that river, in the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, and Georgia, and in the Territory of Alabama, would be soon acquired, gave a just expectation that the national pledge given to Georgia would be redeemed. In the eight years which have succeeded, these anticipations of the President have been realized every where but in Georgia. The successive purchases made since that period have crowded the Cherokees out of Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina, almost altogether into Georgia; and the terms upon which they have been made, have created all the difficulties now encountered in the peaceful acquisition, on reasonable terms, of the lands upon which the Cherokees are now permitted to remain; difficulties which are every hour increasing, from the policy pursued by the General Government. It is, with all due respect, a subject of serious inquiry, what produced the extraordinary change in the wishes of the Cherokee tribe, as expressed in the treaty of 1817? how it happened that the Cherokees of the Upper Towns, most of whom were without the limits of Georgia, and who desired to be permanently fixed on the lands upon which they then lived, were induced, in 1819, to abandon their designs, and many of them to become inhabitants of the region beyond the Mississippi; while the Cherokees of the Lower Towns, (most of them within the State of Georgia,) anxiously desiring to remove in 1817, were, in 1819, tempted to remain, and filled with a desire of a permanent establishment there? The same exertions which produced this, can effect another change; can induce the remnant still in the limits of Georgia to follow their brethren to the West, to a territory which the General Government can rightfully bestow upon them as a temporary or permanent property, without interfering with the right, or encroaching upon the sovereignty, of any State. Argument is not necessary to show that a power which interposes obstacles to the accomplishment of its own promises violates its faith; and that, to plead the impossibility to perform an engagement, when that impossibility is produced by those who engaged to perform it, would be equally dishonorable and hypocritical. The President is probably not aware that the United States will be liable to such accusations, if the present moment is suffered to pass without a full compliance on their part with the obligation of the treaty of cession of 1802. What has created the strong desire of the Cherokee Indians to remain where they are? The policy of the General Government; the pretended guaranties of their possessions; the attempted changes in the nature of their titles to them; the lessons received from their masters in the arts of civilized life; the acquisition of property, and the desire of extending and securing it: a policy just and generous to the Indians, but solely at the expense of a member of the Union; at war not less with the rights of that member of the Union than with the solemn promises of the General Government. The United States have the same right to colonize a tribe of Indians from the Columbia or Red river in Georgia, as they have to pursue a system of policy whose aim or end shall be the permanency of the Cherokees within that State.

If the Cherokees are unwilling to remove, the causes of that unwillingness are to be traced to the United States. If a peaceable purchase cannot be made in the ordinary mode, nothing remains to be done but to order their removal to a designated territory, beyond the limits of Georgia, and giving an ample equivalent for the territory left by them, and an ample support to the territory granted to them. An order of this kind will not be disregarded by the Cherokee tribe, whose interest will be essentially promoted by a compliance with it, (whatever may be the effect of it upon a few chief men, who seem to consider their own interest as separate and distinct from that of their brethren,) as it must be obvious that a tranquil and undisturbed possession of a permanent property can alone enable them to acquire the arts of civilized life, and to secure to them its benefits.

Our duty is performed by remonstrating against the policy heretofore pursued, by which the interests of Georgia have been disregarded, to the accomplishment of other objects of general interest, and a compliance with a solemn promise postponed, for the acquisition of territory for the General Government; and by insisting, as we do, most earnestly, upon an immediate fulfilment of the obligations of the articles of cession concluded in 1802, as the only means by which justice can be done to the State we represent, and the character of the General Government be vindicated.

Copy of a letter from C. Kingsbury to the Secretary of War.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2, 1816.

Perhaps I have already intruded too much upon your time. The probability that I shall not see the Secretary before the sum to be placed at the disposal of Colonel Meigs is specified is my apology for this communication. If it were an application for a favor merely personal, I should be inexcusable for troubling you in this way.

I have no doubt of the disposition of the Secretary of War, or of the President, to favor my object, so far as their acquaintance with it will enable them to confide in the wisdom of the design, and in the skill and fidelity with which it will be executed. I only regret that I have not been able to state more fully the motives which influenced the very respectable society, in whose employ I have the honor to serve, to adopt measures for the instruction of the Indians, and which influenced my own mind to engage in their service. It was my design to have stated them while at the President's, but a suitable opportunity did not appear to be presented.

The settlement of this country by our forefathers has, in various ways, proved disastrous to the natives, notwithstanding the laudable exertions, both by the Government and by individuals, to counteract such a result. Very different have been the consequences to ourselves.

Considering the relation in which we now stand to these people, it has appeared to be not only a dictate of humanity, and a duty enjoined by the Gospel, but an act of justice, to adopt efficient measures for extending to them the distinguished blessings which we enjoy; and that this is a duty binding on individuals as well as on the Government. To accomplish this object, no measure appeared so likely to succeed, as to begin with the instruction of the rising generation. It was believed that the exertions which the Government are making to civilize the Indians could not be better aided than by establishing schools.

The subject has also been viewed in its connexion with national interest and national happiness. It is equally the dictate of sound reason, and the result of past experience, that kind and benevolent exertions to instruct the Indians have a most powerful influence to gain their confidence and secure their friendship. Probably no other means could be so successfully employed to prevent the recurrence of expensive and bloody Indian wars, and to give permanent security to our frontier settlements.

These are some of the considerations which formed the ground of the present application to Government. It was believed that, when the design was understood, it would receive the cordial approbation of the Executive, and a liberal patronage, so far as it could be conveniently granted.

It is not requested that any appropriation should be made for my support, or for the support of any person who may be employed in the school; but that it should be appropriated to the erection of suitable buildings, and to the purchase of such mechanical instruments and implements of husbandry as may render the establishment respectable and useful. The appropriations to be made through the hands, and at the discretion, of the Government agent.

Whether it will be best to have one or two large schools, or a number of small ones, must be determined by circumstances. It is only wished that that mode may be adopted which will be most useful.

I observed that this was not an application for a favor merely personal. Mr. Crawford will not suppose that I can have any pecuniary interest to promote by the object. But, as it is an object in which I have embarked with every thing that is dear to me in this life, I must be supposed to feel a peculiar solicitude for its success. I hope the plan that will be adopted and pursued will meet the approbation of every enlightened and benevolent man.

With these brief and hasty remarks, I cheerfully submit the result to your decision.

With sentiments of high respect and esteem, your humble servant,

C. KINGSBURY.

To the Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 14, 1816.

Your letter of the 2d instant, upon the subject of establishing schools in the Cherokee nation, has been received.

The President approves of the undertaking, and will direct such aid to be given as the laws will permit.

In the first instance, the agent will be directed to erect a comfortable school-house, and another for the teacher and such as may board with him, in such part of the nation as shall be selected for that purpose. He will also be directed to furnish two ploughs, six hoes, and as many axes, for the purpose of introducing the art of cultivation among the pupils. Whenever he is informed that female children are received and taught in the school, and that a female teacher has been engaged, capable of teaching them to spin, weave, and sew, a loom and half a dozen spinning-wheels, and as many pair of cards, will be furnished. He will be directed, from time to time, to cause other school-houses to be erected, as they shall become necessary, and as the expectation of ultimate success shall justify the expenditure.

The houses thus erected, and the implements of husbandry and of the mechanical arts which shall be furnished, will remain public property, to be occupied and employed for the benefit of the nation. If the persons who are about to engage in this enterprise should abandon it, the buildings and utensils which shall have been furnished may be occupied by any other teachers of good moral character.

The only return which is expected by the President is an annual report of the state of the school, its progress, and future prospects. This report should present the mode of teaching, and the deviations from that practised in civilized life, which experience will render necessary. Should you succeed according to your expectations, it is probable that the attention of Congress will be attracted to the subject, and that the means of forwarding your beneficent views will be more directly and liberally bestowed by that enlightened body.

I have, &c.

Rev. CYRUS KINGSBURY.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The Secretary of War to Governor Joseph McMinn.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 2, 1817.

On the further consideration of your communication of the 13th instant, the President has instructed me to request that you would remain in the Cherokee nation, at least until the return of Mr. Meigs, provided it may be compatible with your other avocations; and that you would take the entire control and direction of all matters in relation to the late treaty, and in particular as it relates to the removal of the Indians to the Arkansas, and the delivery of the articles promised to such of them as do remove. If the instructions which have been given by Mr. Meigs to the sub-agents, in relation to these objects, are inadequate or defective, you will give such additional ones as you may deem proper.

The great importance which is attached to the removal of the Cherokees to the Arkansas must be the apology for making this request of you.

I have the honor, &c.

Gov. JOSEPH McMINN, Knoxville, Tennessee.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 16, 1818.

This day the Arkansas delegation propose to leave Washington, on their return. I trust that the reception which they have met with will be found calculated to have a most favorable effect on the great object which the Government has in view—that of moving the Cherokee nation to the west of the Mississippi; which, in its probable effects, will lead ultimately to the removal of the Creeks, Chickasaws, and Choctaws. The delegation have been gratified in all of their wishes. By the President's speech, (a copy of which will be presented to you by Mr. Houston,) you will see that he has expressed the kindest wishes towards the emigrants, and has determined to extend to them a supply of corn, to prevent any distress by so many emigrating at once. He leaves the distribution of rifles to your discretion. He has promised to Colonel Glass his island in Tennessee river, which is reported to be very inconsiderable in size—say eighteen or twenty acres. It is the desire of the President that you should obtain such information as may be in your power, as to its position, extent, and value, and report it to this Department. By the direction of the President, very considerable presents were distributed to the delegation: to Tonlontousky, $1,000; and to each of the others, $500. This will, no doubt, have important effects in aiding the operations now going on. In fact, I trust that your excellency will see in all that has been done the zeal with which this Department, under the direction of the President, has entered into the execution of the late treaty, which contains stipulations so important to Tennessee and the rest of the Union.

A few days since I received your excellency's two letters of the 12th and 13th of last month, and I am much gratified to see with what spirit the emigration has commenced. The necessity of supplying the emigrants with food, you will see by the President's speech, has been anticipated. The amount to be supplied, and the mode, are left to your judgment, as the President feels the greatest confidence in your zeal and discretion. It is possible that the advance in corn or corn meal might, in many instances, be made a set-off against improvements which are to be ascertained under the treaty. If any arrangement can be made of that kind, without giving offence, it would be desirable, as it will cause the appropriation to be made by Congress to go much farther. Congress will be asked to appropriate $——; and it is the wish of the President that you should have the whole under your discretion, and that you give it such a direction as you may judge most advisable. Your excellency will, as soon as the appropriation is made, be notified of the amount, and vested with full powers to make any arrangement that you may judge best to effect the object in view.

The meeting of the Cherokees, according to your suggestion, is thought to be important, and Mr. Meigs will be instructed to call them together at such times as you may deem best. It is important that the Arkansas delegation should be present. The address of the President to the delegation (of which a number of copies have been printed) will evince to the nation, when assembled, the wishes and intentions of the President.

The two questions which your excellency proposes in your letter of the 13th have both been considered, and I entirely concur with you in respect to both. The Cherokee who may take a reservation, and should afterwards surrender it, will have a common right with his brethren on the Arkansas. The reservation of six hundred and forty acres will be in full compensation of all his claims, and the United States will not be bound to pay him for the remainder, or permit him to claim it as his right.

The President will nominate to the Senate Brown and Young to take the census of the Cherokees. Mr. Gillespie will be appointed to appraise the improvements. I send a copy of the treaty, and a copy of the claim of Colonel Brown; in relation to which you will favor this Department with your opinion.

You will continue to draw on this Department for such expenditures as your measures may require.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Gov. JOSEPH McMINN, Cherokee Agency.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 11, 1818.

I have received your excellency's letter of the 24th ultimo. I have directed that the account of Robert Bell be admitted to your credit.

As the President has manifested a great desire that you should have the entire control of the execution of the late treaty with the Cherokees, I would prefer that you continue to make the disbursements, unless it should prove very inconvenient to your executive duties. Should it be inconvenient for you, I hope your accounts may be settled without requiring your presence at the seat of Government; every aid to effect which will be afforded by this Department.

Eighty thousand dollars was appropriated to carry the treaty into execution. The expenditures already made for that object, such as for boats, rifles, and the expense of the visit of the Arkansas delegation to this place, amounting, in the whole, to about $21,255, together with what you may have drawn for and disbursed yourself, being deducted, the balance will be applicable to the completion of such other arrangements as you may think necessary to give effect to the treaty.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

His Excellency JOSEPH McMINN, Knoxville, Tennessee.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 29, 1818.

By the last western mail, I received your excellency's two letters of the 4th and 7th instant, with the accompanying documents. They exhibit a full view of the measures to which you have resorted to carry into full effect the treaty with the Cherokees, as well as the obstacles which you have encountered. The zeal and discretion which you have exhibited throughout the whole transaction entitle you to the thanks of the Government, and fully justify the confidence which the President reposed in you.

The conduct of part of the Cherokee nation merits the severest censure. After the ratification of the treaty, resistance to its fair execution can be considered little short of hostility. The menaces offered to those who choose to emigrate or take reservations cannot be tolerated. It is an open violation of the treaty, and will, in its final result, not avail them any thing. The United States will not permit the treaty to be defeated by such means. Those who choose to remain, are permitted to do so in quiet; and those who choose to emigrate, must be equally free. If any can benefit themselves and families by emigration, why not permit them to depart? Such are the principles which govern the United States in relation to its own citizens. Nor can I suppose that those who make such violent opposition to the execution of the treaty are governed by a regard to the good of the nation. Surrounded, as the Cherokees are, by the white population, they are in danger of perpetual collision with them; or, even if disputes can be avoided, to fall under all that train of vice and misery to which a savage people are doomed when they come into contact with enlightened and civilized nations. It is in vain for the Cherokees to hold the high tone which they do, as to their independence as a nation; for daily proof is exhibited that, were it not for the protecting arm of the United States, they would become the victims of fraud and violence. If the opposers of the treaty are really the champions of the independence of their nation, they ought to be the advocates of emigration to the Arkansas. There, their claim to independence would be much better founded; and there, at a distance from us, they might, before the white population would crowd on them, acquire the arts of civilized life, and become proper subjects of regular Government.

The President, in order to add as much as possible to the permanent prosperity of the Cherokees on the Arkansas, has given them an indefinite outlet to the west, which will continue their independence as long as is practicable. I do not see what an intelligent Cherokee has to hope, situated as his nation is, except in emigrating to the west, or taking reservations, and settling down under the fostering protection of our laws. As our population grows dense around them, it will be out of the power of the Government itself to protect them in their present condition. The President, in the proposed change of territory, consulted both their and our interest. On the Arkansas every effort will be made to render their condition happy, and to lead them to the arts of civilized life. Their prospect there, in every respect, is much brighter than it would be on this side of the Mississippi; of which fact they ought to be fully satisfied.

Your construction in relation to the reservations is correct. I have examined with care the project of an arrangement which you propose, to carry the treaty into effect. Such an arrangement accords entirely with the views of the Government, if the assent of the Cherokees can be had to it. My fear would be, that, by presenting so bold a scheme at once, you would augment the violence of the opposition, and might endanger the final success of the measures which you have been pursuing. This I merely suggest, for you must be much more competent to judge, being on the spot, and being individually acquainted with their leading characters, than myself. You will, therefore, continue to exercise your discretion, as you have heretofore done, on this as well as on all other points. If you think they can be brought into the plan which you propose, the Government would not hesitate to make the most liberal advance to the nation. I should think the terms you propose moderate.

In compliance with your request, I have directed your project of an arrangement to be copied, and will transmit it to you in the form of instructions, to be used if you should judge it expedient; but would not advise the bringing it forward from the Government, unless you should be confident of success. I have varied it as to the amount proposed, which I have fixed at $100,000; but even that sum might be considerably enlarged, if necessary to effect the arrangement. As to the time of taking the census, you are the best judge. The longer it can be fairly postponed, the better for us; but I would not delay it, in the hopes of effecting all our objects, provided they will desist from menaces and an improper opposition. I would state to them, expressly, that, until they withdrew their improper opposition, the census would not be taken.

I have, &c.

His Excellency JOSEPH McMINN, Murfreesborough, Tenn.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 29, 1818.

Mature reflection having convinced me that it would add greatly to the interest of the United States, as well as to the Cherokee nation, if the late treaty with them could be carried into full effect, by inducing that nation either to take reservations, and become citizens of the United States, or to emigrate to the Arkansas, and enjoy that life which is so agreeable to many of them, I have thought proper, through you, to propose the enclosed arrangement, which, if it should be adopted, will render the execution of the treaty simple and easy. It is to be hoped that the more intelligent part of the Cherokee nation will be convinced that, surrounded as they are by the white population, it will be impossible that they can continue long in their present condition, without sustaining the greatest inconvenience; but they may still be happy, by taking reservations, and putting themselves and their posterity under the protection of our laws, or by emigrating to a greater distance from our settlements. Both of these means are held out to them. Those who are fond of their present state of society may emigrate with advantage to a country which, in every respect, will suit them much better; and those who wish for property and protection may take reservations. Universal experience proves that a people still in a savage state cannot reside in the immediate neighborhood of a civilized nation, without falling into a state of vice and misery. By removing to the west, the Cherokee nation will obtain time, before they can be crowded by the whites, to become civilized, and capable of enjoying the advantage of equal laws. The Government of the United States will be still mindful of them in their new homes, and afford them every means to render themselves happy. Reflection ought to teach them that the arrangement would add much to their prosperity. Let them reflect how nation after nation have sunk before the United States, and they will see the necessity of coming into our views. You will present these ideas to them in the manner you may judge best to cause them to be fully comprehended.

I have, &c.

His Excellency JOSEPH McMINN.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 29, 1818.

I have received your two letters of the 29th November, together with the papers detailing the proceedings at the last council of the Cherokee nation.

The tone of the nation has greatly altered. That high spirit of independence which they assumed some months since has subsided into an acknowledgment of their dependance on the Government of the United States; and, whatever may have been their former opposition to the fair execution of the treaty, they appear now disposed to act correctly. I do not now see any sufficient reason to delay the taking of the census for which the treaty provides, and for the taking of which commissioners have already been appointed on our part. You will, therefore, notify the Cherokees (in order that they may appoint a commissioner) that the census will be taken in June next; or, if you should judge an earlier period practicable, at such time as you may designate. The information must also be given to the Cherokees on the Arkansas immediately, that they may have their commissioner appointed in time.

The rifles and other articles mentioned in your letters will be forwarded immediately. The state of the Indian fund, and particularly that for carrying the Cherokee treaty into effect, will not permit arrangements so extensive as the establishment of the stores which you suggest. If the President had acceded to the proposition, he would have availed himself of your zeal and experience to carry it into effect. The means of preserving the public stores, and preventing the intrusion of the white people, are left to your discretion, which I doubt not you will effect in the most judicious and economical manner.

It is to be hoped that the effects of the measures which have been pursued will, in a few years, accomplish the object of the Government. The number of the Cherokees on the Arkansas will be annually increasing by emigration; and those who remain behind will be compelled, from circumstances, to take reservations and become citizens.

I transmit a statement of the state of the appropriation to carry the Cherokee treaty into effect. The balance that remains is small, but I hope there will be no considerable deficit.

I have, &c.

Governor JOSEPH McMINN.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Extract of a letter from Joseph McMinn, Esq., to George Graham, acting Secretary of War, dated

CHEROKEE AGENCY, December 29, 1817.

In consequence of indisposition, I was compelled to request Mr. Houston, sub-agent, to acknowledge the receipt of your several favors of the 29th November and 2d instant; and, for the very honorable trust conferred, I beg leave to tender my sincere acknowledgments, with a promise that nothing within my power shall be wanting to promote the best interests of my country.

I arrived at Highwassee garrison on the 6th instant; on the 8th, I was notified that the Indians expressed a wish to hold a talk with me on the 10th, at that place. In the course of which, I endeavored to impress upon their minds the certainty of the ratification of the late treaty, and urged, as a reason, that every article stipulated to be given the emigrants was then at that place, and ready for delivery; and invited them to take a view of the property, as well those who had made their election to stay as those about to migrate. The superior quality of the rifles, blankets, &c. had a very pleasing effect upon all present, each of whom was invited to give publicity to what they had heard and seen.

I then recommended a meeting at the agency on the 19th, for the purpose of issuing rifles, blankets, kettles, &c.; and I received your instructions on the 16th, which were so perfectly adapted to suit the occasion as to dispel every appearance of opposition, although two very formidable plans had been laid to defeat the object. The first was, that the Cherokee light horse should wrest the property from the emigrants, which was to be given by the United States, and apply it to the satisfaction of debts contracted by the emigrants in the year past. So soon as this project was communicated, I issued an order forbidding all such attempts, and declaring that I would view it in the light of hostility against the United States, and would punish its perpetrators accordingly. Mr. Houston carried this order into effect, with a promptitude not less characteristic of his integrity than zeal for his country, by arresting the first offender, who returned the property without a moment's hesitation. The course taken on this occasion had the happy effect of dispersing this band of legal robbers. In the second place, a plan was laid to deprive me of the United States' interpreter, for his friendly disposition towards the emigrants, by not only threatening his removal from office, but his life also.

Extract of a letter from Joseph McMinn, Esq., to the Secretary of War, dated

KNOXVILLE, January 18, 1818.

The Arkansas delegation left here on the 16th instant, in good health, and comfortably clothed against the winter. I have received an official letter from the Cherokee agency, dated the 12th instant; every thing has been conducted entirely to my expectations. Sixteen rifles, &c. have been issued in my absence, up to the date referred to; and I have this moment received a verbal message from Colonel Meigs, since his arrival at the agency, stating that he was not more pleased than astonished to find the natives so harmoniously engaged in preparing to remove, and that he was about furnishing provisions for the emigrants spoken of in my last to you, who were on the verge of setting out.

Extract of a letter from Joseph McMinn, Esq., to the Secretary of War, dated

JUNE 8, 1818.

I will now proceed to give you an outline of passing events since the date of my last. Colonel Meigs and myself notified the whole Cherokee nation in due time, and in a manner expressive of every mark of attention on behalf of the Government, by each of us addressing a letter to the king (Path Killer) and Charles Hicks, which were forwarded by the sub-agent; and the shameful abuse they have made of those civilities demand an explicit disclosure. On the receipt of these letters, they summoned the chiefs of fourteen towns, who, in council, resolved that your communication should pass without giving it further notice; and, with a view further to stamp their enmity against the Government, they actually employed runners, with orders to threaten the lives of those who would attend at the agency; and, I am sorry to add, that their efforts were marked with only too great success. Indeed, the course could not fail to produce that effect, as their means were applied to the hostile and ignorant band spoken of in my letter on the subject of calling them together; though, out of the very few who attended from that quarter, I was able to give a very good account; and, out of the whole who attended, I enrolled two hundred and twenty-three families for emigration, and fifty-six for reservations, during our talk; in fact, my anticipations were realized in that. Nearly all who attended evinced a strong disposition to promote the views of the Government.

Extract of a letter from Joseph McMinn, Esq., to the Secretary of War, dated

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 13, 1818.

Although I only intended this letter to exemplify, in some degree, the course which led to those late demands on the treasury, I will, nevertheless, state that the most numerous and respectable council that has been assembled for many years in this nation is now sitting, with the king at their head; and on yesterday I occupied their attention by reading sundry extracts from your letters, the object of which was to exhibit the powers with which I am vested, as well as to show that you had approved of the measures I had adopted; and, in conclusion, read the new plan for carrying the treaty into effect, which had been previously copied, except the clause which you added, fixing the sum to be given on the part of the United States, which will be kept entirely out of view until they agree to enter into the arrangement.

[Extract.]

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 29, 1818.

The meeting of the Cherokees here, which I mentioned to you in my letter of the 13th instant, was adjourned last evening; and at present I have only time to give you a hasty sketch of the proceedings; the balance will be forwarded by next mail, which will exhibit the precise course taken on the part of the United States, as well as that of the Cherokees.

I proposed the sum you named ($100,000) as indemnity for their removal; that was roundly objected to by the council. I then proposed $200,000: $50,000 payable in three months, the balance to be paid in fifteen annual instalments of $10,000 each; which was rejected by the council in like manner. I then, with a view to foreclose them from making any charges against the Government on the subject of the enumeration, proposed that, upon their passing a vote of public censure, in open council, against such of their officers as had violated the treaty by threatening or using violence against the Arkansas emigrants, and by issuing a national proclamation, forbidding such measures in future, the United States would agree to take the census, in the manner stipulated by treaty, without further delay.

This proposition was founded on the last clause of your letter of the 29th of July last; and, although in itself so very reasonable, was nevertheless rejected; and to that they added a public declaration, stating, in the most positive manner, that their conduct towards the United States had not been such as to warrant the slightest charge of opposition to the execution of the treaty, or unfriendly treatment towards the emigrants.

Upon these declarations we joined issue, and my first defence was bottomed upon their official acts; and, secondly, I exhibited charges against one of the members of the National Committee for violence used against Captain Starr, who was then in the employment of the United States. Many attempts were made to palliate the charge; and, ultimately, the council seemed determined to avoid coming to a decision, which compelled me to demand, in the name of the President of the United States, an avowal or disavowal of the charges; and that step alone produced the removal of the officer, and, consequently, placed the United States upon quite eligible ground, which I occupied with the utmost energies of my mind, and succeeded, to a very great extent, in satisfying those present that all restrictions of every denomination against the Arkansas people and friends of Government had entirely subsided. And I called upon the king, and all his warriors in council, to bear witness of the friendly disposition manifested by the council on this occasion, and to use their best endeavors to satisfy the minds of their people who were not present of all that had taken place.

Having disclosed the most unfriendly features in the late negotiation, I will proceed to state the progress we have made in bringing about an exchange of countries, from the 20th of December, 1817, up to this date, which, I flatter myself, will evince not only the practicability, but the certainty of its completion, in a much shorter period than the most sanguine could have anticipated when the treaty was entered into; though it certainly will require great attention on the part of the Government, and considerable expenditure of treasure.

I have the pleasure to state that seven hundred and eighteen families have been enrolled for emigration since the above date; and, astonishing as it may appear, two hundred and eighty-nine of that number have been enrolled since the 20th of last month. These, with one hundred and forty-six families who have made reservations, make an aggregate of eight hundred and sixty-four families who have relinquished their claim to land east of the Mississippi. When we add these to the population settled on the Arkansas previous to the date of the treaty, I believe we may safely conclude that we have one-half of the Cherokee population on our side.

I am, &c.

JOS. McMINN.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

Extract of a letter from Joseph McMinn, Esq., to the Secretary of War, dated

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 29, 1818.

In my farewell address to my Cherokee brothers, I brought to their view the steady course of opposition which they had pursued against the measures of the administration, and added to that their declaration of independence; from which I concluded by saying, that they had forfeited their right to protection from the United States; and, in consequence of which, I would discharge the troops, and leave their future movements to the President of the United States.

This course was adopted to convince them of the impropriety of their conduct in opposing the recommendations which the President and yourself had made, and with the expectation that little or no injury would result until the pleasure of the President could be known.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, December 8, 1818.

Agreeably to the promise contained in my last letter, I do myself the honor to forward copies of the correspondence between the Cherokee council and myself at our last meeting. In addition to the reasoning set forth in those papers, I spent much time, and employed every energy of my mind, in placing their true situation before them. And to prove how far I have succeeded, I will state that the king, who tarried three days after his warriors had separated, assured me that (in a private interview between him and myself, to use his own words,) the light which I had communicated to him was so strong that he could very easily see the path in which his father wished him to go; and that he would have a talk with his own people in ten nights, for the purpose of sending a deputation to see his father, who should possess full power to settle every thing according to his father's wishes.

That talk takes place to-morrow, at the house of the prince regent, (Charles Hicks;) and, to convince them further of their folly in endeavoring to retain their savage customs, circumstanced as they now are, I have forwarded a copy of the President's communication to Congress, which I have no doubt will have a good effect. It is confidently believed, here, that a deputation will be forwarded; and, with me, it is not less certain they will put a final period to an exchange of countries upon the terms proposed.

In fact, there is none amongst them so ignorant as not to see clearly that the views of Government are every day gaining strength, and cannot longer be resisted with effect. Withholding protection, as stated in my last, connected with an expected establishment of public stores, have produced more conviction than almost every thing else. I have set on foot a speculation of great interest to the United States, in relation to paying for improvements, which is considered equally so to the emigrants, amongst whom the greatest friendship exists, not only with themselves, but towards the Government, who they most ardently wish may continue to superintend the entire execution of the treaty.

I will do myself the pleasure to write you by the next mail, which will not pass for eight days.

With sentiments of sincere esteem, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH McMINN.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

MURFREESBOROUGH, TENNESSEE, January 26, 1819.

As it has become impracticable for me to attend at the city with the Cherokees, I trust it will not be unacceptable for me to transmit to you some of the views which I expected to have explained in a personal interview.

Hicks may justly be ranked as the standard of opposition to the execution of the treaty; in fact, he is their principal legislator and sole judge, and, in every measure, commands the esteem and confidence of all that part of the nation. His mind has, however, undergone a considerable change, insomuch as to be visible to many who attended the last conferences; and this change is to be accounted for, in a great degree, by the loss which the nation sustained in the selection I made of those persons named in my report of the 24th instant. The remark will particularly apply to Walker, Adair, and Taylor; the latter having been in the employment of the United States for some time in attending to the delivery of corn to the Arkansas settlers, and more particularly in exploring the Arkansas country, with which he professes to be greatly pleased, and has given his friends every reason to believe that he will remove. The understanding connected with his withdrawing, together with Walker and Adair, from the National Council, has been of the most signal service to the United States; and the selection of Walker and Taylor as two of their chiefs, on the present occasion, can be accounted for in no other way than as a measure calculated to reconcile them to the General Government in the distribution of its favors.

With me they have always urged, as I presume they will with you, a division of their country, by which those who did not choose to remove should be permitted to remain in the full exercise of all their savage customs during their pleasure. But all applications of this kind being entirely inadmissible, I have met every advance with the most positive refusal; alleging that, by the most clear and explicit terms of the treaty, it would be kept open until an entire extinguishment of their claim, by reservation and migration, would take place. To this construction of the treaty the whole council gave their silent assent, although they were frequently invited to bring forward arguments in support of their former opinions. I was then asked if the limits of the reservation could not be enlarged, and titles made to each in fee-simple; and, in support of their position, they urged that each soul was entitled to nine thousand acres of land. I corrected this error with little difficulty, and convinced them that the claim of each was not more than one thousand acres; and added, that I had no authority to change the character of their title in the smallest degree, though, I observed, I had always been of opinion that, so soon as an entire extinguishment of their claim took place, the Government would not hesitate to place on the best footing those who might take reserves, and could be well recommended; but not until that event could any change be effected relative to their titles.

The discussion of these points immediately before our separation, and the reading and explaining of your letter, which went to the vindication of the course which I had taken, did, in my opinion, give rise to the expected negotiation, which I sincerely hope may result in furthering the interests of all concerned, as far as relates to the benefit of the United States, and the different States of Georgia and Tennessee.

The Cherokee country east of the Mississippi is estimated, by the best calculators, to contain upwards of (14,000,000) fourteen millions of acres; a great proportion of which is rich land, and well watered, particularly in the Alabama Territory, which certainly contains the most valuable part of the Cherokee country. Should a failure ensue in the anticipated negotiations at the city, (which we trust is not probable,) I think I can venture to state, that $300,000, including all former expenditures, will cover every necessary expense attending their removal, on the terms stipulated by the treaty, which would be but little more than two cents per acre; but this calculation is predicated solely upon an expectation that the Government will pursue her measures with an unabating ardor. Indeed, to relax now, (unless by entering into a general agreement with them,) would be attended with the most serious consequences, as it would not only check the progress of enrolling, but would certainly prevent those from removing who have enrolled. Now is the auspicious moment; the most violent opposition is silenced, and the friends of an exchange have at last assumed an air of independence, and an unalterable determination to acquiesce in the views of the Government. This spirit of conformity will certainly increase from this circumstance, if from no other, that at present we claim one-half of the whole population; hence, (says one of our Cherokee friends,) we see with great pleasure that the name of Cherokee nation is fast migrating towards our western settlements, and those who have hitherto been inimical to the views of the Government (say our friends) are gone; and, to retain our present standing as to wealth and power, we must follow. But, independent of this, they possess a degree of national attachment for each other, not surpassed by the population of any country; and although you may hear much about reservations, yet I hope I feel authorized in saying, their object, for the greater part, is to secure them for purposes of speculation; as few, if any, will remain east of the Mississippi.

I have the honor, &c..

JOSEPH McMINN.

Copies of correspondence between Joseph McMinn and the Cherokee Council, in November, 1818.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

CHEROKEE NATION, November 15, 1818.

I found myself inclined, this morning, to renew, in behalf of your father the President of the United States, and to place on paper, what I spoke to you yesterday evening, when we held each other by the hand.

You have been invited here by your father's authority, to perform the solemn duties that devolve on you, as the father and chief of his red children, the Cherokees; and it follows, as a matter of course, that you, and your chiefs with their wives and children, must all be made partakers of the comforts of life, in common with his white children who are present on this occasion. But, sir, you will please consider, that your age and standing, taken in connexion with the very delicate state of your health, not only entitle you to a full share of the ordinary support, but to such other supplies of sugar, coffee, spirit, &c. as may be necessary for the comfort of your own person, and those aged friends who attend upon you; please, therefore, call on me from time to time, as your wants may require, and I will make a brotherly division of my stores with you, during our stay together, which I hope will continue until we come to a perfect harmony of sentiments, as well amongst yourselves as between you and the United States: for I feel myself bound to say, that nothing short of such arrangement as the honorable Secretary of War has proposed will be sufficient to continue your people as a nation, especially on this side of the Mississippi, and to prove which I send you the number of families that have already enrolled. What their average number may be, I do not know, though I must believe between three and four persons to each family: when those are added to about two thousand nine hundred souls who were settled on the Arkansas previous to the treaty, I will leave you to judge for yourselves how the matter stands. Out of the whole number enrolled for the Arkansas country, there appear to have been one hundred and ninety-six families enrolled since 20th of last month, the expected time of meeting here; and I do assure you, my friend, that the preparations are making daily for the removal of very many of the most respectable of your nation, of whom, perhaps, the rulers have never contemplated such an event. As this statement of facts had escaped my memory when we were in council yesterday, I could not but view it important in the highest degree to lay it before you. I presume, on this day, or at some future one, you will form a decision for your nation; and, as you have the sentiments of your father, plainly and candidly expressed on the paper which I did myself the honor to place in the hands of the king; and by adding to that the division which is already made of your people between the east and west of the Mississippi, and also taking into view the immense extent and fertility of the soil, and the great advantages which will result from the game and range of the Arkansas country—I say, having such ample means whereon to form a choice, that is, whether to go west of the Mississippi, or stay and become citizens of the United States, will, I hope, render the task of deciding quite simple and easy; and, so soon as the council resolves to enter into the proposed arrangement, and notifies me of their decision, I will, without a moment's loss of time, present them with the amount which I am directed by the honorable Secretary of War to give, and will then enter into all the details of the plan, in a manner to suit the mutual interest and convenience of all parties; but, as I stated to you in council, nothing can be further done, on the part of the United States, until I receive your determination to go into the measures proposed; and as I know how natural it is for you to desire to be apprized of the consideration to be given in money, I will say thus far, that it is in perfect and full accordance with the former generosity of the Government towards your nation.

Brother: Although this letter is addressed to you, it is designed for the council also; I must, therefore, ask you to be good enough to make its contents known in open council.

Your friend and brother,

JOSEPH McMINN, Acting Agent for the United States.

To the PATH KILLER, King of the Cherokee Nation.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

IN COUNCIL, NEAR THE CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 17, 1818.

We have, with the most profound attention, examined the communications and propositions which your excellency thought proper to place in our hands, the object of which points to a close of the late treaty of the 8th of July, 1817; or, in other words, an entire surrender of all the lands held by the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi river.

Brother: This question is to us, of all others, the most important. Warmly attached to the soil which gave us birth and sustenance, we cannot touch the subject without a reverential awe, lest the Great Spirit frown upon us with disdain. Your excellency can justly appreciate our feelings on the occasion; in fact, we have not words to express them. In making up our answer, we shall confine ourselves to facts, and temper our language, as heretofore, with respect. Having, however, but an imperfect knowledge of the English language, your excellency will make allowances for inaccuracies, and attribute our errors, if you find any, to their proper origin.

The third article of the late treaty stipulates that the census of the whole Cherokee nation shall be taken in the month of June, 1818, viz: that that part of the Cherokee nation desirous of remaining shall be taken by a commissioner appointed by the President of the United States, and a commissioner to be appointed by the Cherokees on the Arkansas; and those who have removed, and those wishing to remove, shall be taken by a commissioner appointed by the United States, and a Cherokee east of the Mississippi. The fourth article of the treaty, in making a dividend of the annuities between the parties, stipulates that it shall be divided agreeably to their numbers, on—say the 30th of June, 1818, or prior to that date. The division of lands between the parties is founded also on the same principle. The eighth article of the treaty stipulates that those wishing to take reservations shall register their names in the office of the Cherokee agent, which shall be kept open until the census is taken, agreeably to the stipulations contained in the third article of that treaty, (meaning the 30th June, 1818, or sooner.) From a close and attentive examination of the treaty, we cannot see any provision for any other time, for its final execution, but the 30th of June last, or during that month. We are at a loss to know why (as it has always been our anxious wish to close the treaty) it was not done on that day, or sooner. The Cherokees, ever faithful to their stipulations, are not less anxious than your excellency to bring the treaty to a final close as early as possible. That some individuals have been opposed to those emigrants to the west of the Mississippi, may be correct, but never in a national capacity. It certainly was, and is still, the wish of all to see the treaty closed agreeably to the stipulations contained in it.

The Cherokees, after the late war, in which they fought by the side of their white brethren, and lost much blood in the cause, had hoped to have been indulged in the possession of their lands. Taking all the circumstances together, we feel ourselves constrained to object to your excellency's propositions, and request that you will name an early day for the final close of the late treaty as stipulated. To avoid errors and misunderstanding, we request that our future negotiations may be confined to a written correspondence. By this, we do not mean that we will have no further verbal intercourse; this is necessary to understand our different views.

We take the present opportunity of renewing to our father the President, and our white brothers, his children, our firm and unalterable attachment.

We are, with consideration of great personal respect, your excellency's friends and brothers,

CHIEF PATH KILLER, his \times mark.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 18, 1818.

Your communication of yesterday's date was duly handed me by Major Ridge, and its contents read with that respectful attention which it so justly merits.

Brothers: Your remark respecting your attachment to the soil which gave birth even to your fathers is no doubt true; and no man, I presume, in the nation, who is not a native, can appreciate with more sympathy and feeling for you than myself; and this, in some degree, arises from my being so very intimately acquainted with your interest, and the bonds of connexion which ought to bind your nation to the United States, and which I hope will always have its influence on your minds and actions. But, my brothers, I cannot concur with you when you express your fears that the Supreme Spirit will mark your agreement to the proposition made by the United States with any signal stroke of displeasure. He is never known to frown upon the rulers of any nation whose sole object is to promote the best interests of their people; and that this proposition, which you have objected to, is pre-eminently calculated to suit your temporal interest, as well as your everlasting happiness, can very easily be proven to every enlightened and disinterested mind.

First, it has its foundation upon your own solicitations, made to Mr. Jefferson in 1809, at which time a part of your nation complained of the scarcity of game where you now live, and asked the President's permission to search for a country where game was plenty, and where they could support themselves and families by pursuing the hunter's life. That request was in itself so very reasonable, that President Jefferson, without hesitation, gave them leave to explore the country west of the Mississippi; and when (said he) you find a country to which there is no other Indian claim, the United States will give you equally as much land there as you leave where you now reside, according to your numbers; and, to add still more to your comfort and the promotion of your interest, we will furnish you with provisions, and the means of removing to your newly acquired country, where we will carry on our usual intercourse with you, and always hold you firmly by the hand as a part of our red children.

These promises were not only literally complied with in the formation of the treaty, as respects giving an equal quantity of land, but I am authorized in saying that the country ceded by the treaty contains five times the quantity held here by your whole nation; and, in addition to this, Governor Clark has obtained from the Osage and Quapaw nations of Indians (to use his own language, which I will read to you,) a country quite sufficient for the whole Cherokee nation, with all their Shawanee and Delaware allies. You also have your father's promise that these lands shall be added to those which you hold by Jackson's treaty; with a further promise, which you will find contained in the papers submitted to you, that the Arkansas claims shall have no western boundary.

When I last had the pleasure of addressing you, I promised to exhibit a map of the Arkansas country, with the lands lately attached to it by Governor Clark's treaties, to which I now invite your candid and serious attention, and ask you, my brothers, to view it, and to listen well to the description which will be given of the country, and of the advantages which will inevitably result from your people taking possession of the land given to you by the promise of your father, whose generosity has been displayed in the most unexampled manner. He has instructed his agent to clothe the aged widow and her children; to furnish arms to the youths of your nation; and, in a word, to supply all the reasonable wants of every description of your people who choose to remove to the land of promise; and all these without the variation of a single article contained in the treaty.

I have now, my brothers, as I conceive, given you the most ample proof that all who choose to remove west of the Mississippi will find their interest promoted beyond any calculation which I am able to make. Even those who choose to follow agricultural pursuits must acknowledge that a great part of the country is at least one hundred per cent. superior to this: nay, it is more than that, in relation to commercial advantages; for in these it is not surpassed by any section of the United States. Nor are its advantages less in respect to raising stock. And let me ask the question, Is there any chief or other citizen of this nation who will say that the advantages to those who choose to follow the gun and chase are not equal to those enjoyed by their fathers in the land where we now are, even at the most ancient period?

Brothers: I will now return, and show, according to my promise, that the views contained in the proposition, about which I am now treating, is calculated to promote your everlasting happiness, provided you practise what you avowed to be your object in the presence of President Jefferson, viz: that you were anxious to engage in the pursuits of agriculture and civilized life, to promote which you asked Mr. Jefferson to narrow the limits of the country in which you lived, by which means you proposed to begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular government. I am now addressing myself to the party which was in the year 1809 willing to exchange the hunter's life for the one just above described.

Brothers: To pursue the plough and tread in the path of civilized life is worthy of the best of Christians; and rest assured that your proposition to do so was one of god-like character, and the Government of the United States, as though to promote your laudible views, now invites you to take reservations, which perfectly accords with the principle you proposed to Mr. Jefferson, and which your father and your white brothers would rejoice to see and hear. And, brothers, you may rest certain, as I humbly conceive, that, so far from the Great Spirit frowning on you for permitting your people who incline to live by the gun to remove west of the Mississippi, and yourselves to follow agriculture and civilized life here, he would bless all your honest endeavors to become not only members of the great American family, but much more for your religious exertions in forming a part of his great society of saints. These are considerations, my brothers, of the greatest importance; and, if we believe the holy book to be true, every heathen shall know the Great Spirit, and shall bow his knee before him; and this knowledge can only be acquired, in the first instance, by turning your attention as I have described, and by procuring a competent education for your children, and raising them to understand industry and their moral obligations towards one another.

Here, then, my brothers, is your true situation; this immense newly discovered country will form sufficient inducements to all who wish to follow the hunter's life to remove thither, where they will have schools established for the education of their youths; whilst you, who have seen the folly and felt the toils of the gun and the chase, can stay with us here, entirely undisturbed by the bad examples which seem to accompany the hunter's life, as well with white as with red people; here you will enjoy the advantage of equal and just laws; here you will find morality and religion respected, and vice punished to the full extent.

But, brothers, it is not my duty, nor is it my wish, to persuade you either to go or stay, but to exhibit the advantages on both sides, which I have faithfully done, according to my views; and now I leave you to judge whether it is better to go west of the Mississippi, or stay on reservations here. You have the promise of your father's friendship on both sides, and choose for yourselves; but remember, you who are rulers here this day, that you hold the future destiny of thousands yet unborn, as it were, in your hands; and I call upon you to act from disinterested principles. If you conceive that a portion of your people's happiness would be promoted by a removal, you are bound, as honest men, to say so, and bid them go in peace and prosper; and to such as you think ought to stay on reservations, say so; and in the name of every principle that is good, let us have peace at home and abroad, and let the liberties and freedom of your people be marked in every transaction of your public duties.

Brothers: I must ask you to reconsider the proposition which I proposed to you on the 14th instant, and to give it and the accompanying papers a careful, friendly, and attentive reading: in them you will discover the precise views of the Government towards your people, which cannot be altered by any power which I possess; as the course which you ask me to take, if adopted, would only be calculated to continue a small portion of your people in their present unhappy state and distracted condition, which is in direct opposition to their best interests, as also to the course your father has laid down in which you are to go. This language may at first appear strange; but, upon examination of the treaty of Hopewell, as well as others, you will find that the United States possess the sole right of governing your nation upon all matters and occasions where the subject is one of general character, and involving principles of individual and general policy; they act as your immediate guardians and agents; and is it not perfectly consistent that they should, since they are compelled to protect you, as well within as without the limits of your nation, and as well against internal as foreign enemies? Here, for example, are troops assembled for the purpose of removing our people from amongst yours, who will take up their march on the rise of this meeting. I ask you to examine and see from whence this necessity: does it not arise from the want of fixed laws and a regular administration of the Government? It certainly does. I ask again, does not the experience of you and myself for twenty-five years past prove as clear as can be that the necessity, instead of diminishing, is every day increasing? And is not the list of murders and robberies pretty near as great within the last twelve months as the whole period since your nation and ours entered into a state of peace?

This being the state of facts, it becomes the indispensable duty of those who possess the guardian power over you to say as at present they have done. We have provided a country suited to the interest and wishes of a great part of your nation, and for those remaining we invite them to enter into the pursuits of husbandry and civilized life; by these means, and these alone, you will be emancipated from a state of things already insupportable, and against which religion and morality must revolt.

Friends and brothers: On recurring to the third article of the treaty of Hopewell, you will find that the United States are bound to afford you protection, as well against foreign as neighboring enemies. Does it not then follow, as a matter of course, that they have the right to choose the means to be employed in protecting you?

If you answer yes, you can be told that the President of the United States informed Congress, at the opening of the last session, that the posts of New Orleans and Mobile were very much exposed to foreign enemies; that, although these places were of the utmost importance to every section of the United States, they never could be protected, but by having the eastern side of the Mississippi settled compactly, from the northern lakes to the Floridas; and, to effect which, treaties would have to be formed with all the native nations residing east of the last mentioned river, by which to obtain a relinquishment of their title, by taking reservations of six hundred and forty acres each, or by removing west of the Mississippi.

In consequence of this recommendation being made by the President, Congress entered into an arrangement for holding treaties with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians; and, as we are advised, the latter nation have sold to the United States above seven millions of acres. From the Choctaws we have not heard, though no doubt exists as to their disposition to acquiesce with the Government.

From this statement, it must appear that one of the grand leading objects in bringing about an extinguishment of native claim to their lands, is, to place the southwestern country in a state of defence, thereby to afford ample protection to the liberties, lives, and property of its citizens, of whom the Cherokee nation forms a part, but who protest against the measure, as operating contrary to their wishes and interest.

To place this subject in a situation in which you can see how far you are under obligations to agree to the proposition before you, I will give a short detail of the ties or obligations between the citizens composing the United States and the Government itself. The citizens, by compact, are to adhere, with cheerfulness, to all existing treaties, laws, rules, and regulations entered into by the United States; and, in return, the Government stands bound to protect the citizens, individually and collectively, against all violence offered either by internal or external enemies. These, my brothers, are the ties by which the citizens and Government stand bound to each other; and the penalty on the part of the citizens, or any portion of them, who will refuse to yield obedience to the treaties, laws, and authority of the United States, is, that they shall be considered as enemies of the United States, and unworthy of its protection in any case. And again: with regard to the powers of the Government, on the subject of providing for the general defence of any city or country, the constitution of the United States gives the rulers the right to take private property for public purposes, at any time when the public good requires it to be done; but they are bound, in every instance, to give a fair equivalent or price for the same.

To prove this to be true, Jackson's army took your property in the late war, for which the United States have since paid you. If General Jackson, as a private man, had ordered your property to be taken, he, and all others concerned, would have been viewed as robbers, and punished accordingly; and to this statement may be added, that many very valuable houses were taken possession of by our army in the late war, and the inhabitants and property thrown out of doors, and, in some instances, the houses ruined; yet all have been paid for by the United States.

Having gone thus far, little more need be said to prove to you that, as the demand has been made of your country, you are bound to make a surrender of it, as good citizens, who are worthy of protection; and, at the same time, I hold that the United States are solemnly bound to pay you an honest fair price, and to indemnify you for such losses as you have a just right to claim under the provisions of the treaty.

Brothers: You express a wish to know why the census had not been taken in June last; to which I reply, that, having been instructed by the honorable Secretary of War to propose a suspension of the time fixed on by the treaty, I had prepared a talk, to propose to you, on that subject, at our meeting at this place in May last, to which the whole nation was invited to attend.

To your non-attendance, my brothers, it is owing that the subject was not acted on at that time; and, when I proposed to the Arkansas delegation the propriety of their making an appointment, General Tonlontusky replied, that you had been invited to attend the council as well as himself; that, as you did not meet at his father's request, and make an appointment of a commissioner on your part, and as he was in a country which he did not claim as his own, he would also decline making one on the part of the Arkansas tribe; and further, from an examination of my journal of the Oostannally proceedings, I find that I was not officially notified of your having made an appointment of a commissioner until the 30th June, which was the last day contemplated for closing the treaty, as the council seem to urge. Now, brothers, it is very easy to perceive that there are faults on all sides; and, as I conceive neither side can be interested, nor, in fact, acquitted of neglect by any defence they can make, I am willing to let the subject go to rest on my part.

JOSEPH McMINN, Acting Agent for the United States.

Cherokee Chiefs, in Council, to Joseph McMinn, Esquire.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

IN COUNCIL, NEAR CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 21, 1818.

Your communication of the 18th instant was this day read in open council, explained, and interpreted to the chiefs assembled. After deliberating with that attention which its contents justly merited, we have prepared the following sentiments from the centre of our hearts. Though expressed through the organs of unrefined sense, in all the simplicity of nature, incapable of polished words, you will at once see the sentiments of your red brothers in their true colors.

Brother: We know that we are under the protection of the Government of the United States; therefore, are not insensible that we are also dependant on the humanity, generosity, and friendship of that magnanimous Government. We feel ourselves bound, by the strongest bands of brotherly and friendly attachment, to observe all our obligations with the United States, in the most inviolable manner.

Brother: You seem to express a desire that we ought to keep friendship at home as well as abroad, and to permit all those who wish to emigrate to the Arkansas to exercise their own free will and choice, as well as those who would choose to remain. That principle is so consistent with our sentiments, in all our actions, that we are not a little surprised to hear such a recommendation made by your excellency, particularly when you have had such a fair opportunity of making yourself acquainted with the true sentiments and dispositions of the nation. The actions of bad individuals certainly ought not to be attached to the nation, in any country.

Brother: We perfectly agree with you in believing that the Great Spirit is incapable of frowning on the rulers of any nation whose sole object was to promote the best interest of their people. But, most beloved brothers, permit us to ask you, in the presence of that Great Spirit, whether we would be acting with that humane and honest principle, which is capable of producing blessings from that Supreme, if we were to accede to your propositions, to compel a whole nation of people, contrary to their free will and choice, to leave the land of their nativity, which mouldered the bones of their forefathers, and so much esteemed and revered by them; and at the same time withdraw from them the means of comfort and support, which all the solemnity of a treaty (and ratified by the highest authority of the Government of the United States) had provided, by accepting of a pittance which would not be more than one-tenth of competency of providing for a general removal!

Brother: The idea which you seem to convey respecting the late treaty appears that you are of opinion that the Cherokees of this country are bound to take reservations, or emigrate to the west of the Mississippi river, and no other alternative for their continuance here in common, as usual. Brother, we would ask you, as a candid man, why did the stipulations of that treaty provide for the taking the census of both nations, for an equal division of lands, agreeably to their respective numbers? It cannot be sound reason to believe that it was proper to take the census of both nations, when all those who took reservations were limited to but 640 acres to each and every head of a family, if it was not intended that the surplus of the lands were to remain in common, for the benefit of this nation. The theory upon which you have founded the principle of taking private property for public good, we are not fully capable of comprehending your excellency's ideas on that point; unless you mean that the public good requires the acquisition of this country, and that you are determined to seize it. On these points, beloved brother, how far the disposition of the Government of the United States are disposed to act towards your poor red brothers, you are the best judge; but yet we cannot, for a moment, withhold our sense of the humane benevolence and benignity of the United States, to believe that the country which has been solemnly guaranteed to the Cherokees by them will be viewed as private property, and the obligations of all their treaties with the Cherokee people trampled under foot. That there have been faults and neglect, agreeably to the admission of your excellency, respecting the not taking of the census, we will not deny; but, on our part, we are unable to discover any. We have too much respect for the honor of the United States to attribute it to them. No, brother; in them we have the most unbounded confidence. We have had too many proofs of their justice and magnanimity, of their liberality and friendship for us, to harbor, even for a moment, a suspicion that they would act unjustly towards us. No, brother, our confidence in the United States is so complete, that we believe, provided they have inadvertently injured us, by themselves or agents, that they would redress our wrongs when made known.

Brother: Reason and prudence are the monitors by which all prudent people and individuals ought to be guided. We know, however, that conscience is but the force of education. Religion is certainly commendable; but the force of our prejudices forbids that you should at once expect to see us embrace yours. We, like yourselves, found ours upon our prejudices, and follow the religion of our fathers. A different education would beget different prejudices, and, with your education, we should no doubt adopt your prejudices as well as religion. This, however, is not to be expected in the pursuit of game in the wilderness. We have here the advantages of adopting the virtues of our white brothers who surround us. Your excellency is not unacquainted with the progress which we have made in agriculture and civilized life. The benign influence of religion has opened the eyes of many, and we do not believe that the epithet of savage ought any longer to be applied to the Cherokee nation of people; but, with a removal to the west, all our flattering prospect of civilized life must vanish.

Brother: With deliberation, candor, and good nature, we again inform your excellency that we have decisively rejected your propositions for an entire extinguishment of all our claims to lands east of the Mississippi river; and must again solicit your excellency to cause the late treaty to be carried into full effect, agreeably to the stipulations therein contained, as early as practicable.

Brother: We solicit an interview with your excellency, at the agency office, on the 23d instant. On the acquiescence of your excellency to this solicitation, you will please to cause the cannon to be fired. We have the pleasure of subscribing ourselves, intrinsically,

Your brothers and friends,

Chiefs and Warriors.

To the King and Chiefs of the Cherokee Nation.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 23, 1818.

Few, if any occurrence in public life, has ever fallen in my way more unexpected, or better calculated to wound my feelings, than the receipt of your communication made to me this day. It must surely be, my brothers, that you view me as an impostor, acting upon my own authority, with a view to deceive your nation; or that you flatter yourselves with the empty expectation that the United States cannot execute a measure of general defence for the safety of her citizens, which shall, in the slightest degree, affect your interest or your wishes. You act as though you were insensible of trampling upon the highest authorities known to the constitution and laws of the United States. Has not the honorable Secretary of War told you that you deserve the severest censure; that, after the ratification of the treaty, resistance to its fair execution can be considered little short of hostility; that threats offered to those who choose to emigrate or take reservations cannot be allowed; that such measures are in open violation of the treaty, and will, in their final result, avail you nothing; that the United States will not permit the treaty to be defeated by such means? He tells you plainly he does not believe that those who make opposition to the execution of the treaty are governed by a regard for the good of the Cherokee nation. This he brings against you from your own language in council at Oostannally, which I forwarded at your request, in which you state, "We consider ourselves as a free and distinct nation, and that the Government of the United States have no police over us, further than a friendly intercourse in trade."

I now ask you, my brothers, to say if you are prepared to adhere to these declarations; and, if so, the protection intended to be afforded to you by the troops who are assembled here for removing the whites from your land is entirely unnecessary. Nay, it ought to be considered by you as an insult, to speak of protecting a nation equally as independent as you appear to be on paper. By a further examination of the remarks made by the Secretary of War, in reply to your declarations, you will see where he states that daily proof is exhibited that, were it not for the protecting arm of the United States, your nation would become the victims of fraud and violence. He states, explicitly, that the United States cannot protect you in your present condition; and concludes those highly important remarks by stating that the President, in the proposed change of countries, consulted both your and our interest. "On the Arkansas," says he, "every effort will be made to render their condition happy, and to lead them into the arts of civilized life." To this fatherly and friendly promise you appear to enter your protest, and, in support, urge that this measure is well calculated to place your nation in the back ground as to education and advances towards civilized life. Let us examine your plan, (which is to keep a part of your nation here,) and see how it will operate in practice. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that one-half of your nation will remain here, upon one-half the territory you now claim: I ask, what can you promise those people, provided you could keep them here? Is it not to keep them in their present savage state? If that be your policy, which I must believe is true, it is in direct opposition to the very humane course pursued and intended by your father, the President of the United States, to be continued towards your nation until the final accomplishment of the great design of your becoming a part of the American family. And a still greater objection exists against your plan. You oppose the principle, or the policy, or perhaps both, of taking reservations, which forms the only certain road to your becoming a religious, moral, and industrious people; but, so long as a population of about five thousand souls inhabit a district of country containing upwards of five millions of acres, there remains no hope that they ever will prosper as a select society; and this remark will apply equally as well to the white as the red population. Your people, as well as all others, must become industrious from necessity, for none ever will be so from choice; and the greater the space they have to occupy, the greater will be their inducements to idleness.

JOSEPH McMINN, Acting Agent for the U. S.

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 24, 1818.

To the King, Chiefs, Headmen, and Warriors of the Cherokee Nation:

In your second rejection of the proposition submitted to you under the authority of the United States, I discover that you object to the amount proposed as indemnity for your removal, &c.

I will, therefore, with a view to foreclose you from making any just and reasonable charges against the Government, propose that, upon your receding from the rejection contained in your communication, I will vary the sum proposed of $100,000 to $200,000, payable as follows: $50,000 will be paid by the United States, within three months from the date hereof, with an annuity of $10,000 per annum, for fifteen years, payable at the agency of the Arkansas people, agreeably to the preceding stipulations. In addition to the $50,000, you will receive, at the same time, the annuity due to your nation for the present year, which must be divided according to the provisions of the treaty entered into with you on the 8th July, 1817. And, to prevent any further misunderstanding on that point, I propose that it shall be equally divided for the present year, between both parts of the nation, and shall continue to be divided, in like manner, until the first day of the year 1822, that being the period at which I propose the possession of the Cherokee nation shall be surrendered, provided this proposition shall be agreed to on your part. It is, nevertheless, to be distinctly understood, that no part of the annuity which will fall due under this arrangement will be subject to a division as aforesaid. The public boats which are now on hand are reserved for the removal of the emigrants who have been enrolled previous to this date; but the balance of the public stores, except so much ammunition as the emigrants may require, will be surrendered as has heretofore been proposed.

JOSEPH McMINN, Acting Agent for the U. S.

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 25, 1818.

To the King, Chiefs, Headmen, and Warriors of the Cherokee Nation:

BROTHERS: After making three different attempts to get you to embrace the views of the United States, in relation to an exchange of countries, the result has been that you have given your unconditional rejection to each; and, as you still insist on the census being taken, I am willing to enter into an arrangement with you upon that point, provided you disavow, in suitable terms, the improper interference of all your officers in opposing the execution of the treaty, up to this date; and decree that, in future, it shall be deemed a crime for any of your officers or citizens to use violence or threats against the property or persons of those who either have, or wish to remove west of the Mississippi, or against any of your people who may take reservations, as all such are considered as being worthy of, and really under, the protection of the United States, to the full extent of white citizens; and to state, in your decree, that all who are found guilty of either of the aforesaid offences, or any other offences of like nature, shall suffer penalties, as the nature of their cases may justify. And I do further require, that proclamation be made by the authority of your national council, in writing, requiring all your people to conduct themselves in strict obedience to all existing treaties, and to conform to the aforesaid decrees, or such others as you may think proper to make, in support of peace and friendship between your nation and the citizens of the United States.

Brothers: So soon as I am officially notified that you have adopted these measures, and when I am also officially notified that the Arkansas tribe have appointed a commissioner on their part to act with the United States commissioner here, I will arrange with you and them for taking the census, in conformity with the provisions of the late treaty. But it must be distinctly understood, that we will commence taking the census of both parts of the nation at one and the same time.

JOS. McMINN,
Acting Agent for the United States.

IN COUNCIL ASSEMBLED, NEAR CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 25, 1818.

FRIEND AND BROTHER: We have received and considered your last proposition, together with all other communications; all of which urge the Cherokee nation to surrender to the United States all the lands held by them east of the Mississippi. After a long, candid, and deliberate consideration of all the points, after having acquainted ourselves with the sentiments of the nation, and after giving it that candid and respectful attention which is due to the high source from which it emanated, we are again under the necessity of objecting to your excellency's proposal. We must repeat to your excellency our anxious wish that you will assure our father the President of the United States, that, in making up this opinion, we are only actuated by a desire to promote the best interests of the nation; that we are now, and trust ever will remain, the firm friends and warm advocates of our white brothers, the people of the United States; of whom, together with our father the President, we now implore their mercy and protection.

Your friends and brothers, in behalf of the whole Cherokee nation,

A. McCoy, Clerk.

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 26, 1818.

To the King, Chiefs, Headmen, and Warriors of the Cherokee nation:

I learn, from your communication of yesterday's date, your desire to put a period to the present negotiation; on which point (for the first) we are agreed.

You state that, after a long, candid, and deliberate consideration of all the points, and after having made yourselves acquainted with the sentiments of your nation, you have rejected the proposition for an extinguishment of your territorial claim. Although I leave out of view the motives which influenced your council in forming this decision, I am unable to reconcile to my mind the following very extraordinary and singular facts, viz: of your having objected, first, to meeting here agreeably to your father's request; and, secondly, your rejection of every proposition which has been submitted to you, notwithstanding you were duly furnished with copies of all the letters and documents from the War Department in any manner connected with the negotiation; and these were seconded by such arguments in open council as you could not, or at least did not choose to, meet. You politely request me to assure your father, that, in forming your opinion, you have been actuated by a desire to promote the interest of your nation. But, my brothers, such an interference between you and your father attaches too much delicacy; and to prove to him that you are justified in your present course of opposition to every measure which he has proposed for the promotion of your interest, would, I presume, require greater force of reasoning than you and I possess. But I will transmit correct copies of your communications addressed to me, and leave your father to judge for himself whether there is that consistency between your actions towards the United States, and your declarations on paper, as he conceives there ought to be between those who govern and the governed.

For myself, I cannot resist expressing my astonishment at your determined opposition to the proposed measure; and from whence it should arise is equally mysterious, unless from a long train of unexampled friendship exhibited by the United States towards your nation, from which, perhaps, you have been taught to believe, as your council expressed at Oostannally, that "we consider ourselves as a free and distinct nation, and that the United States have no police over us further than a friendly intercourse in trade." Now, let me ask you, my brothers, have you a shadow of right to look for protection from the United States, after making that declaration, except so far as would become the reciprocal interest of both parties in carrying on commerce? Then, let me again ask, what advantage does the United States reap from your trade? or have you any? You must answer, no. Well, let me inquire, how are you furnished with the implements of husbandry, and those for manufacturing; which articles many of you have in such abundance, that you furnish your white neighbors with them at less than their original cost? Answer, from the fostering hand of the United States. And do you now believe that your conduct on the present occasion will be viewed by the President of the United States as corresponding with their generosity towards you? I apprehend it will not. Nor do I suppose he will applaud the contemptible epithet of "pittance," as expressed by you in speaking of the sum of $100,000 as indemnity for your removal to the west. But give me leave to tell you, however pitiful it may appear in your estimation, it is the precise sum that I was instructed to propose to you in the first instance.

Brothers: I have neither time nor disposition to trouble you with any further remarks, than barely to state, for the information of all your citizens who either wish to remove west of the Mississippi, or take reservations here, that the rolls will be kept open in both cases, as usual; that a constant stock of arms, ammunition, and every article stipulated by treaty to be given to those who choose to emigrate to the Arkansas country, will be kept open at all times; and every aid and protection will be given that reason and justice can require, as well in furnishing those with linen for tents who prefer travelling by land, as in furnishing those with boats who choose to remove by water.

Brothers: In taking my leave of you, I express my entire satisfaction of the peace and harmony which has prevailed, not only in our deliberations, but in every rank and class of the community on both sides; and, with respect to the troops that are now stationed here for your immediate protection, and removal of the intruders, they will be sent home on furlough, where they will await the pleasure of the President of the United States for their further movements.

Your friend and brother,

JOSEPH McMINN,
Acting Agent for the United States.

CHEROKEE AGENCY, November 26, 1818.

To the King and Chiefs of the Cherokee nation:

BROTHERS: From your last communications of yesterday, I believe you are disposed to place a period to the present negotiation.

Previous to which, I wish the council to attend at the firing of the cannon at this place, for the purpose of closing our business, as it has been conducted, in peace and friendship.

Your friend and brother,

JOSEPH McMINN,
Acting Agent for the United States.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

IN COUNCIL, November 27, 1818.

Your proposition of an arrangement to provide for the taking of the census has undergone the deliberation of the council.

We view it no less novel than strange, because we conceive the laws of our country, which provide for the security and protection of our lives and property, are equally extended to all and every person within the jurisdiction of our nation; they cannot be withdrawn from those of our fellow-citizens who may choose to emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, because they intend to leave this country. No, brother; our hearts are not of rock, as you seem to suppose; our friendship and attachment to those of our countrymen, relations, friends, and acquaintances, who take leave of us for a new country, are not to be withdrawn from them on that account; but, on the contrary, we wish them all the happiness that can be enjoyed from peace and quietness. Brother, we are fearful you have founded prejudices on suspicion, respecting our feelings and sentiments towards our country people who are separating from us; all differences of opinion relating to the true and literal meaning of the late treaty ought not to be imputed to hostility or opposition to it, as we assure you, in the most positive manner, nothing is more desirable to your red brothers than to observe with fidelity all our existing treaties. We do not conceive it necessary to make any national decrees in the substance you propose; the execution of our laws will not be withheld to render justice to our Arkansas brothers.

Your friends and brothers,

PATH KILLER,
CHARLES HICKS,
THE BOOT,
GOING SNAKE,
SU-WE-CUL-LAH.

18th CONGRESS.]

No. 205.

[1st SESSION.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF INDIAN TITLE TO LANDS IN GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 5, 1824.

IN SENATE, December 18, 1823.

The Committee on the state of the Republic, to whom was referred the communication of his excellency the Governor, on the subject of the extinguishment of Indian claims to the lands within the territorial limits of Georgia, beg leave to report:

That they have derived much gratification from the perusal of this interesting document. It presents to them an unequivocal manifestation of the disposition of the Executive to sustain the just rights of the State on the important subject of the extension of the jurisdictional limits, with a firmness which is tempered by discretion, and a zeal which is guided by intelligence; a disposition to which, in the unanimous opinion of this committee, every suggestion of duty, and every feeling of honorable pride, on the part of this Legislature, will be accordant and responsive.

The committee do not deem it necessary, in this report, to enter into a minute examination of the luminous exposition of the rights of this State which is contained in the communication of his excellency the Governor. Adopting it, as they do, unanimously, and in its whole extent, they believe they will best perform the duty which is assigned to them by recommending that an address be presented to the President of the United States, based on the principles and fortified by the arguments of this communication.

They ask leave, accordingly, to report the following memorial and resolution:

To the President of the United States of America: The memorial and remonstrance of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, in General Assembly met.

The Legislature of Georgia find themselves constrained once more to address the President of the United States on the subject of the extension of their territory by the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands situated within the limits of the State.

If the reiteration of their remonstrances on this subject shall seem to the Chief Magistrate of the Union to be importunate, their justification will be found in the deep interest which is felt in it by their constituents; in the unanswerable justice of their claim; in the long interval which has passed since they were reasonably entitled to expect the accomplishment of an object of such vital importance to Georgia, and in the accumulated and accumulating obstacles which time is interposing to its ultimate fulfilment.

In recurring to the articles of agreement and cession entered into between the commissioners of the United States and of Georgia, on the 24th day of April, 1802, these memorialists find a stipulation that the United States shall, as soon as may be, extinguish the Indian title to all the lands within the State of Georgia. This stipulation was not gratuitous on the part of the Government of the Union, but was in consideration of the surrender by the State of Georgia of a territory sufficiently valuable and extensive to constitute two independent and powerful members of the federal compact. The motive to this surrender cannot be misunderstood. In consenting thus to restrict her right of soil and her sovereignty, Georgia looked, with the confidence which she has always reposed in the plighted faith of the Union, to the prompt extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands within her remaining limits, and the speedy settlement of her then, and still, vacant territory. Limiting her ultimate views of extensive empire, she had hoped, by such limitation, to escape from the helplessness of a protracted infancy, and, marching in quick time to the accomplishment of her destinies, to have seen her laws and her sovereignty co-extensive with the limits of her territory within which she had consented to confine herself. Twenty-one years have passed away, and she is still destined to experience the disappointment of her hopes. She has witnessed, during this period, the extension of the Union, the multiplication of the members of the federal republic, by repeated acquisitions of territory, while she is still doomed to have a long line of frontier exposed to the predatory incursions of the savage, and the lives of her citizens who dwell there to his subtle and relentless vengeance.

Such, sir, is her claim to relief. It seems to these memorialists that it is too obvious to require further exposition. Do the United States possess the power to afford it? That the State of Georgia is vested with the ultimate title to all the lands within her territorial limits; that the claim of the Indians is, consequently, restricted to a mere temporary usufructuary right, are propositions which, it is believed, can neither be doubted nor denied. The existing state of things must, therefore, have a termination. The time must come when the soil of Georgia shall no longer be imprinted with the footstep of the savage; when the inhabitants of her border shall no longer be liable to be awakened from their slumbers by the war-whoop of an approaching foe, nor to witness the destruction of their dwellings in the blaze which illumines his retreat; when her sovereignty shall be co-extensive with her territory, and the authority and the protection of her laws shall pervade every portion of her empire. Such a state of things must come. It must be produced, too, by the act, and at the expense, of the Government of the Union, in the fulfilment of her obligation to Georgia. Will delay facilitate its ultimate accomplishment? Will it lessen the expense to be incurred by the United States? Is it required by any rational consideration of humanity towards the Indian tribes, who now roam through the wilderness of our State? It seems to these memorialists that delay can only serve to multiply obstacles to the fulfilment of the engagements of the Union. From causes too obvious to require detail, every day diminishes the disposition of the savage to abandon his accustomed haunts, and consequently increases the price which he will demand for their surrender. No principle of humanity forbids the enforcement of the claim. The exhausted state of the game affords a scanty and precarious subsistence to the hunter, and a dispersed and wandering population are not in a condition to become the objects of the benefits of civilization.

Their removal beyond the Mississippi would give to these sons of nature a wilderness congenial to their feelings and appropriate to their wants; while the region which they would relinquish would become the abode of civilization, and contribute to the happiness of thousands. These memorialists have seen with what facility the United States, "blending justice with authority," have been enabled to prescribe to the native tribes inhabiting the contiguous Territory of Florida the limits of their range; and they do not doubt that a similar exercise of a legitimate authority, equally tempered by justice, will suffice to obtain for Georgia all which she desires. They ask, therefore, from the Government of the Union, (certainly with the respect which they have always felt, and which they have omitted no proper occasion to manifest to the Government of their choice and of their confidence, but, at the same time, with the earnestness which is authorized by the justice of their claim, and demanded by the necessities of their constituents,) that a liberal appropriation may be made for the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the remaining lands within the limits of Georgia; and that commissioners may be appointed, with instructions, in every event, to effect this indispensable object by a proper representation to the Indian tribes of the just claims of Georgia, of the solemn obligations of the United States, and of the improvement in their own condition which will result from their acquiescence.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing memorial and remonstrance be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Georgia in the Congress of the United States, and that they be requested to use their exertions for the attainment of its object.

No. 206.

[1st Session.]

CLAIMS OF THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 15, 1824.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th February last, instructing them "to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to compensate the friendly Creek Indians for property lost and destroyed during the late Creek war," reported:

That the claim, on the part of the friendly Creek Indians, is to an indemnity for certain losses which they sustained from hostile Indians of their own tribe during the Creek war, and is founded upon an instrument delivered by them to General Jackson on the 9th of August, 1814; by which they complain that, in running the line to retain lands conquered from the hostile Indians, he run it in such a manner as to take a quantity of the lands of the friendly Indians, for which no equivalent was afforded; and express their reliance on the justice of the United States to do them justice. The subject was brought before Congress in the year 1817, and a report was at that time made by the Committee of Ways and Means, to which the committee beg leave now to refer for a more satisfactory illustration of the foundation of the claim.

That report recommended the appropriation of a definite sum, to be applied under the direction of the Secretary of War, as an indemnity to the friendly Creeks, in fair proportion to their losses; and, accordingly, the sum of eighty-five thousand dollars was appropriated.

These claims for losses were liquidated by the chiefs, in council, at Fort Hawkins, in July, 1817, and amounted to the sum of $110,417 90. Of this sum, $81,085 60 was paid to the individuals, in proportion to their respective claims; and the balance (of $3,914 40) was placed in the hands of the two principal chiefs, by general consent, to be applied to some cases of peculiar hardship otherwise unprovided for.

It is now represented to the committee that there are many claims not liquidated at the time aforesaid, on account of which no payment has been made; and to meet these, as well as the balance of all the other claims, an appropriation is now solicited.

It is the opinion of the committee that the sum of $85,000, appropriated by the law of 1817, was intended to be a full indemnity for all the losses of the friendly Indians, and was equal to any reasonable expectation. This appears to be manifest from the estimate, by Colonel Hawkins, that the chiefs would have been satisfied, at the date of the treaty, with the sum of $60,000; and, in the letter of the acting Secretary of War to D. B. Mitchell, the Indian agent, directing the application of the money, he is informed that, as the law is general in its terms, and predicated on Colonel Hawkins's estimate, "it will be proper to pay the claimants mentioned in the estimate only a portion of their claim at present, as it is probable that there may be other claimants entitled to the benefit of the law, who are not mentioned in the list of claims furnished by Colonel Hawkins; therefore, a final distribution of the money should not take place until the whole amount of the claims is ascertained."

The just and reasonable expectations of the Indians, at the date of the treaty, are the foundation of the claim of the friendly Creeks to indemnity; and there does not appear to be any obligation, on the part of the United States, to exceed those expectations further than they have done already.

The committee beg leave to submit to the House all the documents in their possession touching the subject; and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make any further appropriation to compensate the friendly Creek Indians for property lost and destroyed during the late Creek war.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 10, 1824.

I have received your letter of the 5th instant, requesting such information as it may be in my power to afford touching the manner in which the sum of $85,000, appropriated by an act of Congress, in 1817, for the relief of the friendly Creek Indians, has been paid and applied; whether that sum was intended, at the time, as a full indemnity for the losses of the friendly Creeks, or as a mere estimate of the amount of those losses; and whether, from any information in this Department, it is now expedient to make a further appropriation?

In reply, I have the honor to transmit the enclosed papers, which contain all the information in the possession of the Department on the subject.

Since the payment of the $85,000 above mentioned, repeated applications have been made by the Creek Indians for further indemnity; but the Department declined acting upon them, as there was no appropriation at its disposal that could be so applied. The Department has no information to enable it to say whether it would be expedient now to make an appropriation for that object or not.

I request that the original paper sent may be returned to the Department when the committee are done with it.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. LOUIS McLANE,

Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives, United States.

Copies of letters from the Secretary of War to Major General Thomas Pinckney.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1814.

The policy, dictated as well by the unprovoked and ungrateful conduct of the hostile Creeks, as by a due regard to the future safety of the southwestern frontier, may be brought under the following heads, viz:

1st. An indemnification (for the expenses incurred by the United States in prosecuting the war) by such cession or cessions of land as may be deemed an equivalent for said expenses.

2d. A stipulation, on their part, that they will cease all intercourse with any Spanish post, garrison, or town; and that they will not admit among them any agent or trader who does not derive his authority or license from the United States.

3d. An acknowledgment of a right in the United States to open roads through their country; to navigate all waters and streams within the same; and, also, to establish therein such military posts and trading-houses as may be deemed necessary or proper.

And 4th. A surrender of the prophets or other instigators of the war, who will be held subject to the orders of the President.

With these outlines as your guide, you are authorized, in conjunction with Colonel Hawkins, to open and conclude a treaty of peace with the hostile Creeks so soon as they shall express a desire to put an end to the war.

I have, &c.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 20, 1814.

Since the date of my last letter, it has occurred to me that the proposed treaty with the Creeks should take a form altogether military, and be in the nature of a capitulation; in which case, the whole authority of making and concluding the terms will rest in you, exclusively, as commanding general. In this transaction, (should it take place,) Colonel Hawkins, as agent, may be usefully employed.

I have, &c.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General A. Jackson, dated

MAY 24, 1814.

In the event of your acceptance of the appointment announced by my letter of the 22d instant, I have to suggest the wish of the President that you should proceed, without delay, to Fort Jackson, and consummate the arrangements committed to Major General Pinckney, in relation to the hostile Creeks. A copy of the instructions given to General Pinckney is enclosed.

Extract of a letter from George Graham, chief clerk of the Department of War, to Colonel Hawkins, agent to the Creek nation, dated

JULY 12, 1815.

I am directed by the President to request that you will report to this Department, as soon as practicable, your opinions on the following points:

1st. As to the nature and extent of the indemnity which the friendly chiefs claim, in consequence of the letter addressed by General Pinckney on the 23d April, 1814?

2d. How far the Government ought, from motives of justice or policy, to yield to their claims?

3d. Whether indemnity ought to be made to them by restoring a part of the ceded land, or by an additional annuity, or by giving them a certain fixed sum in money and goods?

4th. Whether these compensations (of whatever nature they may be) should be confined entirely to the friendly chiefs?

Extract of a letter from Colonel Hawkins to George Graham, chief clerk of the War Department, dated

CREEK AGENCY, August 1, 1815.

I have received your letters of the 12th and 15th July, with a copy of the agreement and capitulation between General Jackson and the Creek nation, as ratified, and sundry documents accompanying.

I regret the necessity of reporting on the points suggested for the elucidation of the terms of peace offered by General Pinckney, and the understanding between General Jackson and the chiefs; as I expected, from what passed in the conference between the parties, the general would have sent on such a statement as would have placed the subject, (aided by his secretary, sent on partly for the purpose,) in a just point of view before the Government. However, I am to suppose it has, from some cause, been omitted; and, as I am required, it is my duty to do it. That the first interrogatory may be clearly explained, I must go into detail as to the manner of negotiating with the chiefs on it.

"1st. As to the nature and extent of the indemnity which the friendly chiefs claim, in consequence of the letter addressed by General Pinckney of the 23d of April, 1814?"

As soon as the terms of peace were offered, as expressed in the letter referred to, I took measures to explain them literally to the friendly Indians, and, through them, and the prisoners in our possession, to the hostiles who had fled, or were flying, to Pensacola.

When General Jackson arrived as sole commissioner, he addressed a speech to the chiefs, among whom there was but a single hostile one; marked his line, which, he said, should not be altered; he altered it, notwithstanding, to accommodate Tookaubatche. The chiefs replied to him, which the general's secretary and the agent took in writing for him. They, in conference, repeatedly urged the justness of their claims to losses, as promised in the terms of peace offered; and the general as often denied having powers to act on it. Upon being asked, among other things, as his powers extended only to retaining as much land conquered from the hostiles as would indemnify the United States for the expenses of the war, upon what principles he took the lands eastwardly to Georgia, belonging obviously to the friendly Indians? the general answered, he did it from political motives—to prevent an intercourse between the Indians and the Spaniards and English in the Floridas; to have a border to know and separate his enemies from his friends, which was as beneficial to the friendly Indians as to the United States; and also gave the friendly Indians the lands in the fork of Tallapoosa and Coosa. The Speaker asked where the hostiles were to be placed, if he took all their land? His answer was, you have room enough to take them among you. The Speaker said the war was not yet settled, and they were called on for lands to pay the expense of it; and, before it was settled, he supposed there would be another call. The general replied, he would take upon himself to settle it, if it lasted twenty years, without calling on them for any more land.

It struck me forcibly, at the time, that the general, who was authorized only to retain lands conquered from the hostiles to indemnify the United States for the expenses of the war, should take nearly eight millions of acres from the friendly Indians, over and above all the hunting grounds of the friendly Upper Creeks, giving, without consulting them, what he called an equivalent, which they did not deem such, and did not feel himself authorized to adjust this equitable claim of theirs. I suggested to the general, upon extending the line eastwardly, for the motives assigned by him, if he could, for a reasonable equivalent, where that line touched Flint river, go up the same, it would be a great accommodation to Georgia. Upon which, after some reflection on the subject, and making inquiries as to how far up the line should go, and at what creek it should leave the river, he said his powers did not justify it, and he would adhere to his first line.

The Speaker, after conferring with the chiefs about him, told the general there were no hostile chiefs there, but the heads of the nation, masters of the land, were; they were friends, met to settle matters, and not to quarrel; they were talking for information; he would be ready in a day or two to do what was demanded of them; but, before he signed any papers with him, as he would not admit their claims in the treaty, he should make and sign a paper expressive of them, and who were the masters of the land.

On the 8th of August they sent for the agent and General Jackson, and expressed a determination, before they yielded up and signed away their lands, to grant, as a mark of national gratitude, a donation for his distinguished services, to the general; and to Colonel Hawkins and his family, to whom they owed much, and whose children were natives of their land; to the two interpreters, one of whom had all his property destroyed, (Mr. Cornells;) and, in the instrument which they would sign, to express their claims under the terms of peace offered. The general was very feelingly impressed with this unexpected mark of national gratitude, which he accepted, with the reserve—if approved of by the President; and that the President might, if he would, have it disposed of to clothe their poor naked women and children. Their motive for doing this being as expressed, they rejected this modification.

On the 9th, the instrument of conveyance having been drawn under the interpretation of Mr. Cornell and Major McIntosh, and read, the Speaker said, their claims being mentioned, the letters should go on as a part of it, as they contained what they demanded; whereupon, the instrument was signed, in the usual form, in the square of the council. After being signed, the Speaker urged it should be sent on with the treaty which they were about to sign; to which he annexed the letters of the 23d and 25th of April, between General Pinckney and Colonel Hawkins; and that some good man should take them up to the Government, and after this they would sign with the general.

Having signed, the general said he would send up his secretary with the treaty and documents mentioned; and such of the Indians there present who had claims might make them, and lodge them with him, and his secretary should take them with him; which was done accordingly. The document of the 9th is what the chiefs, in fact, call their part of the treaty. [The original paper, which accompanies this, contains the documents here referred to.]

As to the extent of the claims, I have no data to calculate from. Part of the vouchers were taken on by Mr. Cassedy, the general's secretary, and the remainder given in since to the assistant agent at Coweta, which I have ordered on here; whatever they may be, I will forward them as soon as received. I believe, at the time of drawing the lines for the treaty, $60,000 would have been received as an equivalent. The Indians of Tookaubatche were the most faithful, and the greatest sufferers; their town was besieged for eight days, and, when they had to retreat, it was destroyed, with all their property but what they could carry off when they retreated to Coweta. Some of Coosaude Tuskegee, Coweta, and Tallahassee had their houses burnt, their stock and provisions destroyed; some few to a considerable amount, but mostly to a trivial one. The losses sustained were by no means general, as many of the friendly towns did not lose any thing but what was taken by disorderly individuals of Floyd's army.

Question 2d. "How far the Government ought, from motives of justice or policy, to yield to their claims?"

From the statement on the first question, it is apparent, justice is on the side of the claimants, and policy requires a strict fulfilment of the expectations of the chiefs. From the unceasing efforts made to poison the minds of the Indians by British agents, who abound in the means of corruption, and the chiefs having already expressed, with much warmth, that their half of the treaty is lopped off, they may refuse their ratification, which they are advised to do by the British agents; and, from the singular manner the capitulation is worded—the parties "agree to ratify and confirm," &c.—it appears they have a right to do so.

Question 3d. "Whether indemnity ought to be made to them by restoring a part of the ceded land, or by an additional annuity, or by giving them a certain fixed sum in money or goods?"

I believe the correct way would be to liquidate the claims of individuals, some of which, I am told, are too high; reduce them to a just value, and pay them. If it were a national claim, a cession of land might be desirable; but to individuals, it is otherwise.

Question 4th. "Whether these compensations (of whatever nature they may be) should be confined entirely to the friendly chiefs?"

This question is, in fact, already answered. It should be confined to the individual claimants, for none other are in contemplation of the terms of peace offered, nor have I ever heard any such mentioned by any chief. The national question put to me on compensation is, "When is the annuity to arrive? or is it withdrawn from us without assigning a reason?"

Extract of a letter from General David B. Mitchell, Creek Agent, to the Secretary of War, dated

MARCH 18, 1818.

I have now the honor to enclose a concise statement of the accounts presented by the friendly Indians for losses during the late war, and of the application of the sum appropriated by Congress for their payment; by which it appears that a little upwards of $100,000 is still due.

The gross amount of the claims presented, including the abstract made by Colonel Hawkins, is very little over or under $300,000; but they were reduced by the chiefs to $195,417 90. A general abstract of the whole will be forwarded as soon as completed.

Statement of claims for losses by the friendly Creek Indians, during the late war, as liquidated and settled by the chiefs in council, at Fort Hawkins, in July, 1817, and at the agency, in January, 1818; also, showing the sums paid, and balance due.

(a) $83,000 of the money having been remitted in drafts upon the United States Bank in Philadelphia, and the branch of that bank in Savannah refusing to pay them, this charge arose from the difference of exchange between Savannah and Augusta, and Philadelphia, at that time, and has been allowed by the chiefs, rather than be delayed, or run the risk of conveyance by an agent.

(b) When the first payments were made, it was necessary, as the claims were not all received at that time, and the amount was much greater than the sum appropriated, to adopt some rule of proportion in making the payment. Two-fifths was finally determined upon; and this sum is the balance, after paying two-fifths of the whole claims liquidated. And as some cases have occurred which merit attention, but were excluded in consequence of the limitation, this amount has been set apart to relieve them, by general consent.

CREEK AGENCY, March 18, 1818.

Extract of a letter from George Graham, acting Secretary of War, to David B. Mitchell, Indian agent Creek nation, dated

MARCH 20, 1817.

I enclose you a copy of the law making an appropriation of eighty-five thousand dollars to indemnify individuals of the Creek nation for losses sustained during the late war, together with a copy of the correspondence with Colonel Hawkins, and his estimate of the damages sustained by them, respectively. These papers were laid before the Committee of Claims, and the law was predicated on them; but, as it is general in its terms, it will be proper to pay the claimants mentioned in the estimate only a portion of their claim at present, as it is probable that there may be other claimants entitled to the benefits of the law, who are not mentioned in the list of claims furnished by Colonel Hawkins; therefore, a final distribution of the money should not take place until the whole amount of the claims is ascertained. $2,000 of the amount appropriated have been paid to Major McIntosh, in part of his claim for losses, and the balance ($83,000) will be remitted to you by the Treasurer.

No. 207.

[1st SESSION.]

EXTINGUISHMENT OF INDIAN TITLE TO LANDS IN GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 15, 1824.

Mr. FORSYTH made the following report:

The select committee to whom was referred the President's message of the 30th of March, with the documents accompanying it, relating to the compact of 1802 between the United States and the State of Georgia, submit to the House, on that message, and on the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, also referred to them, [See Nos. 204 and 205.] the following report:

The State of Georgia claimed, on the establishment of the independence of the United States, all the lands now forming the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, with the exception of those portions of the two last States which formed a part of Florida and Louisiana.

This claim was founded upon the charter of incorporation of the proprietary government—on the royal commissions issued to the Governors of the State, after the proprietors had surrendered their charter to the Crown. The claim was disputed by South Carolina and by the United States. The conflicting claims of South Carolina and Georgia were adjusted by a convention between them, in 1787. The United States recognised, by the treaty with Spain of the year 1795, the claim of Georgia;* having refused, in 1788, a cession from the State, on account of the remoteness of the lands and of the terms proposed by Georgia.

In April, 1798, Congress passed a law† in relation to the western part of the territory of Georgia, with a reservation of the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil.

In May, 1800, another act‡ was passed, containing a similar reservation.

In December, 1800, Georgia remonstrated against these acts, as a violation of her right of sovereignty and soil.§ The compact of 1802 put an end to the disputes which were likely to arise out of this collision between the General and State Governments. By this compact, the United States obtained a surrender of the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of two States, containing, by estimate, 86,000,000 of acres of land, for the paltry consideration of the payment of $1,250,000, out of the proceeds of that land, and a promise to extinguish the Indian title to the land within the territorial limits not ceded to the United States, as soon as it could be done peaceably and on reasonable terms. The execution of this compact produced no change in the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of the land within her newly defined boundaries. Its only effect was to throw upon the United States the expense which might attend the extinguishment of the Indian title; an expense which, but for this compact, must have been borne by the State. Nor did this compact, in the slightest circumstance, add to the title of the Indians; it recognised only the claim which they, as Indians, were allowed to have, according to the usages of the States, and the liberal policy adopted towards them by the General Government.

† Laws of United States, vol. 3, p. 39.

‡ Laws of United States, vol. 3, p. 380.

§ Public Lands, vol. 1, No. 206.

In relation to the Cherokees, the principal topic of the President's message, it would appear that new doctrines are permitted to be entertained of them, in the opinion of the committee, neither consistent with the opinions heretofore entertained, with the practices of the Government, nor with the interests of the Union. The Cherokees claim to be an independent tribe. The President avows the belief that the articles of cession of 1802 are a full proof that the Indians had a right to the territory, in the disposal of which they were to be regarded as free agents.

The acts of the General Government, in 1814, in relation to the Creeks; the language of the President of the United States in 1817; the language of the Secretary of War in 1818; of the agent of the Government in that year, in treating with the Cherokees; and of the agent treating with them in 1823, do not correspond with the opinions now expressed.

In 1814, General Jackson, acting under the authority of the Government, took from the Creek Indians, for an equivalent, named by himself, all the land the United States chose to require, to effect a great object of national policy in regard to the Indian tribes. It cannot be alleged that this was done by virtue of conquest. The letter of the late Indian agent, Colonel Hawkins, of the 11th of August, 1815, laid before the House of Representatives* on the 5th of April, 1824, shows that nearly 8,000,000 of acres were taken from the friendly Indians, (our allies in the war,) over and above all the hunting grounds of the upper friendly Creeks, for what was called an equivalent, but which the Indians did not deem such.

In 1817, in his message at the opening of Congress, the President says: "The hunter state can exist only in the vast uncultivated desert. It yields to the more dense and compact form and greater force of civilized population; and, of right, it ought to yield, for the earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it is capable; and no tribe or people have a right to withhold from the wants of others more than is necessary for their own support and comfort."†

In a letter of the 29th July, 1818, the Secretary of War says to Mr. McMinn, (speaking of the attempts to prevent the Cherokees from going to Arkansas,) "the United States will not permit the treaty to be defeated by such means. Those who choose to remain, are permitted to do so in quiet; those who choose to emigrate, must be equally free." And further: "It is in vain for the Cherokees to hold the high tone which they do as to their independence as a nation; for daily proof is exhibited that, were it not for the protecting arm of the United States, they would become the victims of fraud and violence." Mr. McMinn tells the Cherokees, in conformity with this declaration, in his talk to the chiefs of the 23d November, 1818: "It must surely be, my brothers, that you view me as an impostor, acting upon my own authority, with a view to deceive your nation; or that you flatter yourselves with the empty expectation that the United States cannot execute a measure of general defence for the safety of her citizens which shall, in the slightest degree, affect your interest or your wishes." The agents of 1823 assert an unqualified right in the United States to take from the Indians any of their lands for public use. It is asserted, however, by the Secretary of War, that there were treaties existing with the Cherokees in 1802, which guaranteed their lands. These guaranties were only of the Indian title, as understood by all at the date of the execution of these treaties—a title of mere occupancy for the purposes of hunting. The idea of title to the soil was, until lately, unknown to the Indians. Their lands were overrun by them, not inhabited; their rights not transferred, but extinguished; dependant upon the will of the power to whom the sovereignty over them belongs. This sovereign power was Georgia prior to the adoption of the constitution of the United States. That constitution gave to the United States the authority to manage the affairs of the Indians, for the peace of the Union and the eventual benefit of Georgia. The Indians had mere occupation; the United States were the agents of Georgia for the extinguishment of this allowed possession. The compact of 1802 required this to be effected out of the general fund. No act of the United States, nor of the Indians, nor of both, could, without her consent, impair the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil of the territory in question, whenever the Indians should be removed from it by accident, by contract, or by force. This doctrine is confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which has declared sales made by States of Indian territory valid prior to the extinguishment of Indian title;‡ that there is a species of seisin in fee, which enables a State to grant to individuals. In fact, the compact of 1802 is the acknowledgment of the United States of this doctrine, as their only title to the soil of Alabama and Mississippi is founded upon it. The Secretary of War, in his attention to the treaties guarantying the Indian title, has entirely omitted to notice the first and most important document in relation to this subject—the treaty of Hopewell of 1785; a document sustaining the opinion of the committee, and giving to it what is now deemed important—the sanction of Indian acquiescence. The fourth article of the treaty of Hopewell§ says, "The boundary allotted to the Cherokees for their hunting grounds is, and shall be, the following." The Indians acknowledge by that treaty the United States as their sovereign; and by the ninth article Congress assume, for the interest and comfort of the Indians, the power to regulate their trade, and manage all their affairs as they may deem proper. This treaty existed at the adoption of the constitution of the United States; and Georgia, as a member of the Union, was vested with the sovereignty and soil of the Cherokee lands, subject only to the Indian right of hunting within the allotted limits; which right the General Government was bound to extinguish as early as the general convenience would permit.

The duty of the General Government was to do all acts which would accelerate this event; to refrain from all acts which would retard it. Over the territories of the United States the General Government could rightfully exercise unlimited power in relation to the Indian tribes. Within a particular State, the sole power was that of agency, for the preservation of peace, the regulation of trade, and the extinguishment of title. To this general obligation, imposed by the constitution on all the States, a special promise was added in favor of Georgia, in 1802, partially executed; but, to the complete execution of which, difficulties are alleged to exist which require the interposition of the power of Congress.

How far this promise has been complied with, is attempted to be shown by two documents (marked A and B) sent to Congress by the President. By the document A, it appears that the Indian title to 15,744,000 acres has been extinguished, and that there remain 10,240,000 acres yet in their possession as hunting grounds. The first quantity is alleged to be all that could be peaceably obtained on reasonable terms.

The document No. 1, accompanying this report, will show that since 1802 the United States have been able to obtain, for their own use, more than 30,000,000 of acres in Alabama and Mississippi, in addition to 7,633,400 obtained in 1801; to 5,006,880, obtained for Tennessee by treaty from the Chickasaw Indians, subsequently confirmed by a treaty with the Cherokees; 700,000 for North Carolina; and a quantity, an estimate of which is not in the hands of the committee, for South Carolina. No satisfactory explanation is afforded to show how this difference in the quantity of lands procured by the United States for their own account, and in compliance with their promise to Georgia, has occurred.

The document B is intended to show the expense incurred in the execution of the compact of 1802. It is defective and delusive. It contains no credit for the money received at the treasury of Georgia, viz: the Yazoo fund.* It is omitted to be stated that the $1,250,000 was paid out of the proceeds of the property acquired. It charges the Yazoo compromise as a benefit to Georgia, who had no interest in the settlement but a common interest with the other States. The land procured for the Cherokees on the Arkansas is charged at the minimum value of lands surveyed and offered for sale by the United States, and not at its trifling actual cost, about $25,000.

The committee are at a loss to know what bearing this defective document has on the question of the Cherokee lands. As, however, they presume it has a relation not well understood, they conceive it proper to show, by the statement No. 2, what pecuniary advantages have accrued, and will accrue to the United States, under the compact with Georgia. By this statement it appears that $4,512,850 23, exclusive of Mississippi stock, have been received into the public treasury; that $6,444,821 51 are due from sales made; that the land ceded by the Indians, and not yet sold, is 27,588,800 acres, which, at the minimum price, is $34,486,000. That there remain yet, as hunting grounds for the Indians, 22,977,576 acres.

The balance of profit is sufficiently with the United States to justify contracts for the extinguishment of Indian title for the benefit of Georgia, without great scrutiny as to the amount of expense incurred. The committee agree with the Secretary of War "that no opportunity of extinguishing the Indian title, on reasonable terms, has been neglected by the General Government," for its own use; but they do not perceive that the same zeal has been successfully exerted for the State of Georgia. The treaty of 1814, with the Creeks, was dictated by General Jackson to the Creeks, by order of the Department of War. As has been already seen, a large territory was taken from the Creeks.

The policy of the United States, as explained by the Secretary, required a separation of the tribes of Indians from each other, and from the ocean. To this policy a compliance with the promise to Georgia was sacrificed. It is alleged that the obligation to Georgia extends only to the purchase of lands, &c. The term "purchase" is an interpolation; it is not found in the articles of cession of 1802. It is alleged, also, that this land was obtained by conquest; and therefore the nation was at liberty, laying the contract with Georgia out of view, to pursue its plan of policy. Without entering into any considerations to show that the United States, having obtained by force, not used for that purpose, but defensively, the opportunity to extinguish the Indian title within the limits of Georgia, was bound in good faith to use it, it is deemed sufficient to refer the House to the facts disclosed by the extract from Colonel Hawkins's letter, already quoted, that this acquisition by conquest was an acquisition of lands from friends and allies, for an equivalent named by the United States.

The propriety of accommodating the State of Georgia was suggested to the commissioner of the United States by the Indian agent; but the answer was, that the instructions of the Government would not permit a compliance with this suggestion. (See Colonel Hawkins's letter p. 493.) The committee are of opinion that an acquisition of land to Georgia, to any extent, could have been obtained from the Creeks in 1814. The attention of Congress has been called to the arrangements made with the Cherokees in 1817 and 1819. The arrangement of 1817 was for the purpose of carrying into effect the wishes of the Cherokees, as declared to Mr. Jefferson in 1808, by a deputation from the upper and lower towns. According to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817, the upper towns desired to remain fixed above the Highwassee river, to contract their society within narrow limits, and begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular government. The lower towns desired to continue the hunter life, and for that purpose wished to remove across the Mississippi. The wishes of the upper and lower towns were granted, and arrangements made for the removal of the latter across the Mississippi. No line was drawn between the upper and lower towns, although a request was made of the Indians that it should be done by the United States. The arrangement of 1817 provides for the fulfilment of the wishes expressed in 1808, and the promises of the Government of 1809. The wish of the lower towns was a removal beyond the Mississippi; that of the upper, a contraction of their society within narrower limits. By the third and fourth articles, it was agreed that a census should be taken of the population beyond the Mississippi, and of those who chose to migrate thither; and a census of those who chose to remain in their present location. The territory occupied by them on this side of the Mississippi was to be divided according to the relative numbers of those who had migrated, and would migrate, to the remainder; and that portion which fell to the migrators was to be received by the United States, in place of the lands furnished to the Cherokees beyond the Mississippi. From this plan, the extinguishment of the title of the Cherokee Indians was anticipated, and would have taken place had it been executed in its spirit by the General Government. (See No. 3, extracts from Mr. McMinn's letter.) It appears, however, that the census was never taken, and that, in 1819, a deputation of Cherokees was permitted to come to Washington, to adjust, finally, the difficulties arising out of the treaty of 1817. The lower Cherokee towns, in the limits of Georgia, did not remove beyond the Mississippi. Most of the removals took place from the upper towns, out of the limits of Georgia. In place of the proportion of lands to be abandoned according to the treaty of 1817, a fixed quantity was accepted; a very small and worthless part of which is in Georgia.

It is alleged by the Secretary of War that the desire of Government was to have a cession in such form as would separate the Creeks and Cherokees; but that it was found impossible to induce the Cherokees to yield to that proposition, or to any other more favorable to Georgia than that which was adopted. He does not, however, state that any other was made, with a view to comply with the compact of 1802. The proposition made for the separation of the Creeks and Cherokees was not for the benefit of Georgia, had it been acceded to, although the interests of the State would have been more advanced than by the actual arrangement; yet, even in that case, the United States would have sacrificed the obligations of the compact to the policy of separating the Indian tribes, and to the consequent acquisition of lands for their own use in the State of Alabama. The committee cannot understand why a cession of the whole quantity of land in Georgia could not have been obtained. The obligation of the Indians was simple—a line, a boundary; and the United States had only to insist upon fixing that boundary, according to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817. The Secretary of War, however, states that the Indians would not yield, and it seems that the United States did yield. It is obvious to the committee that the interest of Georgia was considered a mere secondary object, from the terms of the arrangement of 1819. The preamble to that arrangement is a satisfactory evidence of the entire forgetfulness of the obligations of the compact of 1802.

The treaty is made in consequence of the earnest desire of a great part of the Cherokee nation to remain on this side of the Mississippi, to commence the measures necessary to the civilization and preservation of the nation. The committee are surprised that the occasion was not taken to satisfy the Indians that their continuance in Georgia was impossible, unless Georgia consented to it; and still more so, that the Indians should be encouraged, by this preamble of a treaty, made at the seat of Government, under the eyes of the President, to entertain that expectation. The treaty of 1817, and that of 1819, show a strange forgetfulness of the limited extent of the power of the United States over the land in question. The Secretary of War, acting under the direction of the Executive Magistrate, and pursuing the example set in 1817, seems to have imagined that the United States and the Indians could do, lawfully, whatever suited their mutual convenience, without regard to the State of Georgia; an error which had been previously committed, in treaties with the Creeks. No difference was made between Indian lands within the limits of the State claiming the eventual jurisdiction and soil, and the Indian lands where the soil is the property of the United States. Provisions are made, in both treaties, for vesting individuals with fee-simple titles to land, and to convert them, by a short process, into citizens. The right of the United States to do either is absolutely denied by the committee. The General Government can take the property of individuals for public use, but the constitution withholds the power even to prejudice the claims of any State. Congress can establish a uniform rule of naturalization: the Executive Magistrate cannot make, by an Indian treaty, special exceptions to the established rule. The effect of such acts on the part of the General Government was to be anticipated. The Indians were taught the value of separate property, and the advantages to be obtained by a continuance in their present position. The General Government authorized, also, the establishment of missionaries among the Cherokees, to instruct their children, and to give them a taste for the cultivation of the soil. The committee are not informed that the influence acquired by these missionaries has been exerted to induce the Indians to seek a residence beyond the Mississippi, nor are they informed that the Government has ever thought it necessary to impose upon them such a task. The committee are not to be understood as expressing any disapprobation of the policy of the United States for the civilization of the Indian tribes; they confine themselves to the policy, as it has affected the performance of the promises of the United States under the compact of 1802. As it relates to that compact, they express their decided conviction that the attempts which have been made to civilize and permanently fix the Cherokees in Georgia are in direct violation of the promise to extinguish their title, as soon as it could be done peaceably and on reasonable terms; nor do the committee perceive the necessity of holding out the idea of permanent settlement in Georgia as a prelude to the establishment of a regular government for the Indians. As it regards expense, it would certainly be, for the United States, the cheapest mode of effecting this object, as the cost would be paid by Georgia, and the United States would be saved from the onerous obligation of removing the Indians for the benefit of that State; a saving of expense which, however, the United States will not desire, as it involves a breach of their faith.

From the circumstances thus detailed, the House will not be surprised at the present pretensions of the Cherokees to be regarded as independent, or their declarations that they will neither sell nor quit the lands occupied by them. Some surprise cannot but be felt at the acquiescence of the United States in the substitution of diplomatic correspondence for Indian talks, and at the manner in which the subject of the Cherokees is presented to Congress. The Legislature of Georgia, at their last session, sent to the Chief Magistrate a memorial on the subject of the compact of 1802. The President of the United States has not laid that memorial before Congress, but has preferred to present to the legislative body a correspondence of the Secretary of War with certain Cherokee chiefs, which begins, on their part, by a declaration that they would sell no more land; contains a request that no more appropriations should be made for that purpose, and a suggestion that the United States should in some other way satisfy Georgia, as by a cession in Florida. To the formal answer of the Secretary of War a rejoinder is given, and, on this rejoinder, Congress are informed that its power must be exerted, as it is obvious that the Executive can do nothing further without the intervention of Congress. The President has given his opinion, that the use of force would be unjust, and that without force nothing can be done. What should be done by Congress, is a subject of the most serious and important concern. The parties to the compact of 1802 anticipated the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands in Georgia. The United States agreed to extinguish it, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms. The compact imposed upon the General Government the obligation to use all the means necessary to accomplish the end in view. It was especially their duty to refrain from doing any thing calculated even to retard, much less to render impracticable, the attainment of that end. If the committee have not deceived themselves, it must be apparent that the United States have omitted to embrace two occasions when a fuller performance of the conditions of the compact was in their power. It is equally apparent that the United States have not only omitted to express constantly, and with firmness, to the Cherokees, the necessity of their ultimate removal from Georgia, but have held out to them the idea of a permanent residence, as citizens, in that State; have taught them the value of their position, and intimated that it depended upon themselves to remain or to remove; and have attempted to vest in individuals a permanent property in the soil. From these causes, every day increasing in their effect upon the inclination of the Cherokees, has arisen the determination of the Cherokees, as made known to the President. It is the policy of the United States which has created the difficulties; if peaceable acquisition is impossible, that impossibility is the work of the General Government. In this state of things, encountering contradictory obligations, the course for the Government is plain and obvious. Justice should be done to Georgia. The Indian claim should be extinguished, even should force be required for that purpose; or the consent of the State must be obtained to some arrangement which will free the United States from the embarrassments arising from its regard to the unhappy condition of the Indians, from a respect to the expectations they have erroneously permitted this tribe to entertain, and from their formal and solemn obligation to a member of the Union.

The committee do not, however, believe that any serious difficulty now exists to the peaceable extinguishment of the Indian title, on reasonable terms. An order from the General Government for their removal would be cheerfully acquiesced in, if accompanied by the necessary preparation for the prosperity of the tribe, and a just equivalent for the temporary inconveniences they might suffer. The committee agree with the President, that it would promote essentially the security and happiness of the tribes of Indians if they could be prevailed on to retire beyond the limits of the States; but they cannot see the injustice of any measure, short of actual hostility, which would essentially promote the security and happiness of the Cherokees. There is another consideration which should be brought into view. The only plausible objection to the proposed order is its injustice and inhumanity to the Indians. That it is just to promote their essential security and happiness, even by means not agreeable to their wishes, cannot be denied; that it is humane to preserve them from dangers to which they will be exposed by an obstinate adherence to their own opinions, is equally true. Their present position is incompatible with the claims of the State of Georgia. The knowledge of the fact that the United States will not, in consequence of the perverseness of the Cherokees, comply with the obligations of the compact of 1802, will necessarily produce irritations and resentments, the consequences of which may be easily foreseen: the United States may be under the fatal necessity of seeing the Cherokees annihilated, or of defending them against their own citizens. The committee offer to the House the following resolutions, under a full conviction that the adoption of them will not be followed by any consequences injurious to the Cherokee tribe, or to the character of the General Government, for justice and humanity.

Resolved, That the United States are bound by their obligations to Georgia to take, immediately, the necessary measures for the removal of the Cherokee Indians beyond the limits of that State.

Resolved, That such an arrangement with the State of Georgia should be made as may lead to the final adjustment of the claims of that State, under the compact of 1802, with the least possible inconvenience to the Cherokee and Creek Indians within the boundaries of the State.

Resolved, That the sum of _____ dollars should be appropriated for the purposes expressed in the above resolutions.

DEAR SIR:

TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU, April 7, 1824.

There are no maps or other documents in this Department sufficiently accurate to form a correct estimate of the quantity of land ceded by the Indians to the States you mentioned. That of North Carolina is taken from an estimate of Governor Holmes; the others are computed from maps and other papers in the Land Office. The scale on which they are made is not such as to afford the means of very accurate calculation, but I hope it may answer your purpose. I have the honor, &c. I. ROBERDEAU, Maj. Top. Engineers.

To the Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c.

No. 2.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 8, 1824.

In reply to your note, requesting to be informed of the quantities of certain Indian cessions of lands to the United States, I have the honor to state as follows, viz:

1st inquiry. “Of the quantity of land, in acres, ceded by the Indians to the United States, in the State of Alabama, (exclusive of Florida,) since the articles of cession between the State of Georgia and the United States, in 1802.”

Answer. There has been ceded in Alabama, since the period alluded to, (viz: 24th April, 1802,) the quantity of 21,057,022 acres, north of 31° of latitude.

2d inquiry. “Of the quantity of land, in acres, ceded by the Indians to the United States, in the State of Mississippi, (Florida excluded,) since the same period.”

Answer. The following lands, viz:

		Acres.
1st. That part of the cession under the treaty of Fort Confederation, of October 17, 1802, situate in Mississippi,	- - - - -	133,000
2d. Quantity ceded by the treaty of Mount Dexter, of November 16, 1805,	- - - - -	4,142,720
3d. Quantity ceded by the Choctaws, treaty of October 18, 1820,	- - - - -	5,169,788
4th. That part of the cession under the treaty of Fort Jackson, of August 9, 1814, situate in Mississippi,	- - - - -	393,520
Total,		9,839,028

4th inquiry. “Of the quantity of land yet remaining in the possession of the Indians, in Alabama and Mississippi, respectively, (Florida excluded.)”

Answer. The quantity of land to which the Indian title has not been extinguished in the States above mentioned is estimated as follows, viz:

		Acres.
In Alabama, lands of the Cherokees and Creeks,	- - - - -	5,995,200
Do. do. Choctaws,	- - - - -	781,440
Do. do. Chickasaws,	- - - - -	495,936
Total,		7,272,576
In Mississippi, the quantity of lands yet remaining in the possession of the Indians is estimated at	- - - - -	15,705,000
Aggregate of both States,		22,977,576

5th inquiry. “Of the number of acres of land which have been sold, and which remain to be sold, of lands ceded by the Indians to the United States, since the same period, in the States of Alabama and Mississippi, respectively.”

Answered by the following statement:

Statement showing the number of acres of land sold, and the quantity which remains to be sold, in the now States of Mississippi and Alabama, north of 31° of latitude, since the articles of cession executed between the State of Georgia and the United States, (viz. 24th April, 1802,) after deducting the lands reverted; and, also, those relinquished to the United States, under the act of March 2, 1821, up to the 30th day of June, 1823.

		Acres.
Quantity of land sold,	- - - - -	4,649,816
Purchase money,	- - - - -	$14,348,748
Quantity of land remaining unsold, of land surveyed,	- - - - -	24,460,480
Add quantity of land unsurveyed,	- - - - -	3,128,320
Total quantity of land remaining to be sold,	- - - - -	27,588,800

6th inquiry. "A statement showing the amount of money received and receivable by the United States, for lands sold in Alabama and Mississippi since the same period, calculating the lands sold at the prices they brought, and also calculating the lands which remain to be sold at the minimum price fixed by law."

Answered by the following statement:

Mississippi and Alabama, north of 31° of latitude.

	Acres.
Money received into the treasury for lands sold up to June 30, 1823,	- $4,512,850 23
Balance due from individuals under credit system, September 30, 1822,	- 6,444,821 51
Estimated quantity of land remaining to be sold of what is now ceded,	- 27,588,800
Value of the remaining land to be sold, calculated at the minimum price,	- 34,486,000 00

In reply to your last inquiry, I have to state that the land contained in that part of Georgia which forms the counties of Early, Irwin, and Appling, is estimated (from Tanner's atlas) to contain 7,298,000 acres.

The means of complying with your request in the third inquiry, respecting the quantity of land ceded by the Cherokees in the States of Tennessee and North Carolina, are not in the possession of this office.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

G. GRAHAM.

P. S.—It should be remarked, that the quantity of the cessions in Mississippi has been calculated from Melish's map of the United States.

Extracts of Mr. McMinn's letter, dated

Sir:

JANUARY 26, 1819.

As it has become impracticable for me to attend at the city with the Cherokees, I trust it will not be unacceptable for me to transmit to you some of the views which I expected to have explained in a personal interview.

With me they have always urged, as I presume they will with you, a division of their country, by which those who did not choose to remove should be permitted to remain in the full exercise of all their savage customs during their pleasure. But all applications of this kind being entirely inadmissible, I have met every advance with the most positive refusal; alleging that, by the most clear and explicit terms of the treaty, it would be kept open until an entire extinguishment of their claim, by reservation and migration, would take place. To this construction of the treaty, the whole council gave their silent assent, although they were frequently invited to bring forward arguments in support of their former opinions.

The Cherokee country east of the Mississippi is estimated, by the best calculators, to contain upwards of (14,000,000) fourteen millions of acres; a great porportion of which is rich land, and well watered, particularly in the Alabama Territory, which certainly contains the most valuable part of the Cherokee country. Should a failure ensue in the anticipated negotiations at the city, (which we trust is not probable,) I think I can venture to state that $300,000, including all former expenditures, will cover every necessary expense attending their removal, on the terms stipulated by the treaty, which will be but little more than two cents per acre; but this calculation is predicated solely upon an expectation that the Government will pursue her measures with an unabating ardor. Indeed, to relax now, (unless by entering into a general agreement with them,) would be attended with the most serious consequences, as it would not only check the progress of enrolling, but would certainly prevent those from removing who have enrolled. Now is the auspicious moment; the most violent opposition is silenced, and the friends of an exchange have at last assumed an air of independence, and an unalterable determination to acquiesce in the views of Government. This spirit of conformity will certainly increase from this circumstance, if from no other—that at present we claim one-half of the whole population; hence, (says one of our Cherokee friends,) we see, with great pleasure, that the name of Cherokee nation is fast migrating towards our western settlements; and those who have hitherto been inimical to the views of Government (say our friends) are gone; and, to retain our present standing as to wealth and power, we must follow. But, independent of this, they possess a degree of national attachment for each other, not surpassed by the population of any country; and, although you may hear much about reservations, yet I hope I feel authorized in saying their object, for the greater part, is to secure them for purposes of speculation, as few, if any, will remain east of the Mississippi.

SIR:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 9, 1824.

On the back of the copy of your letter to Joseph McMinn, of the date of the 29th of July, 1818, sent to Congress by the President with his message of the 30th of March, there is a memorandum that no copy of the arrangement referred to in the letter is on file in the War Department, and that, consequently, no copy of it could be furnished.

I am instructed by the committee, to whom the message of the President has been referred, to ask for as accurate a statement of the contents of the lost document as your recollection of it will enable you to give.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH, Chairman of the Select Committee, &c.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 12, 1824.

I have received your letter of the 9th instant, and, in reply, have to state, that it is impossible, at this period, to state particularly "the contents of the lost document," referred to in the copy of my letter of the 29th of July, 1818, which accompanied the message of the President of the 30th ultimo to Congress; but my impressions are, (and of the correctness of which I have no doubt, from the correspondence of Governor McMinn and of this Department, copies of which are before the committee of which you are chairman,) that it contained propositions to be submitted to the Cherokee nation, having for their object the gradual, and ultimately the entire extinguishment of the Cherokee title east of the Mississippi.

I think it proper to observe, that the document in question accompanied the letter from Governor McMinn of the 4th or that of the 7th of July, 1818, the receipt of both of which is acknowledged in my letter of the 29th of the same month, and was submitted by him for the consideration of this Department, and was subsequently copied and returned to him in the form of instructions. These letters have been searched for in vain; and the memorandum to which you refer, endorsed on the copy of my letter of the 29th, was intended as information why copies of them, and of the documents which accompanied them, were not furnished. Since the receipt of your letter, another search has been made, but with no better success. I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. J. FORSYTH, Chairman, &c. &c.

SIR:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 13, 1824.

I have just received your answer to my letter. The object of the arrangement proposed through Colonel McMinn was understood. The committee desire to know what were the measures proposed to effect that object. If your recollection permits, I shall be obliged if you will satisfy the committee on that point.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH, Chairman of the Select Committee, &c.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 14, 1824.

I have received your letter of yesterday, and, in answer to the inquiry—What were the measures proposed to effect the object of the arrangement proposed to the Cherokee nation, through Governor McMinn, in 1818? I have to state, that it is impossible, at this distance of time, to give from recollection a more accurate view of the measures proposed to effect the object of that arrangement than may be inferred from the correspondence between Governor McMinn and the Department, and Governor McMinn and the Cherokee council.

I have written to Governor McMinn for a copy of the arrangement, and of his letters of the 4th and 7th of July, 1818, which have been mislaid; and it is hoped they may be received in time to furnish copies for the information of the committee.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, Chairman, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, AUDITOR'S OFFICE, January 13, 1818.

I have examined and adjusted an account between the United States and the State of Georgia, in relation to the Mississippi lands, and find that the said State is entitled to credit on said account:

By amount payable as a consideration for lands south of Tennessee, ceded by said State to the United States, agreeably to "articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia," bearing date the 24th of April, 1802,	$1,250,000 00
Deduct this sum, being the balance of the money deposited in the treasury of the State, on account of purchases previously made of said State by individuals, and which is set over in part payment, pursuant to a report made by the commissioners appointed under the act entitled "An act supplementary to the act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," and approved by the President on the 15th of March, 1817, as per copy herewith,	184,515 94
	$1,065,484 06

I also find that the said State is chargeable on said account—

To treasury warrants, for amount of the following, viz:

No. 6,821, dated 12th January, 1814,	$80,696 02
7,160, dated 13th April, 1814,	15,526 92
9,253, dated 30th September, 1815,	170,885 69
301, dated 27th February, 1817,	375,000 00
To State of Georgia, in relation to arms sold for amount of that account transferred to this, being the value of 4,000 muskets, with bayonets, &c. delivered by the superintendent of military stores at Philadelphia to their agent, William Robertson, on the 3d March, 1808, per report No. 23,609,	46,332 70
Leaving a balance of three hundred and seventy-seven thousand and forty-two dollars and seventy-three cents due from the United States unto the said State of Georgia,	377,042 73
	$1,065,484 06

As appears from the statement and vouchers herewith transmitted for the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury thereon.

No. 208.

[1st SESSION.]

IEWS OF THE CHEROKEES IN RELATION TO FURTHER CESSIONS OF THEIR LANDS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 16, 1824.

To the Senate of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned delegation from the Cherokee nation, now on a visit at the seat of Government of the United States, on matters of vast import, as will appear by the President's message of the 30th of March last, and its accompanying documents, humbly beg leave to submit before your honorable body a few remarks, which we are bound (as we believe) to make, under a sense of duty to our nation, as well as to ourselves. It is with unfeigned regret and pain we discover the sentiments which are expressed by the Governor of Georgia, in his letter to the Secretary of War of the 28th of February last; and, also, those expressed by the Georgia delegation in Congress to the President of the United States, on the 10th of March last. We cannot but view the design of those letters as an attempt, bordering on a hostile disposition towards the Cherokee nation, to arrest from them, by arbitrary means, their just rights and liberties, the security of which is solemnly guaranteed to them by these United States. As you have a full view of the subject before your honorable body, it is not our purpose to be superfluous: therefore, we will take occasion to assert, under the fullest authority, that all the sentiments expressed in relation to the disposition and determination of the nation never again to cede another foot of land, are positively the production and voice of the nation; and what has been uttered by us, in the communications which we have made to the Government, since our arrival in this city, is expressive of the true sentiments of the nation, agreeably to our instructions, and that not one word of which has been put into our mouth by a white man. Any surmises or statements to the contrary are ill-founded and ungenerous. We forbear to animadvert on the aspersion pointed at our chiefs by the pen of the Georgia delegation; it is but a subterfuge. The Cherokees are informed on the situation of the country west of the Mississippi river; and there is not a spot out of the limits of any of the States or Territories thereof, and within the limits of the United States, that they would ever consent to inhabit, because they have unequivocally determined never again to pursue the chase, as heretofore, or to engage in wars, unless by the special call of the Government, to defend the common rights of the United States; and as a removal to the barren waste bordering on the Rocky Mountains, where water and timber are scarcely to be seen, could be for no other object or inducement than to pursue the buffalo, and to wage wars with the uncultivated Indians in that hemisphere. Imposing facts! We speak from the experience which has been so repeatedly realized, that such a state of things would inevitably be the result, were the Cherokees to emigrate to that country. But such an event will never take place. The Cherokees have turned their attention to the pursuits of the civilized man; agriculture, manufactures, and the mechanic arts, and education, are all in successful operation in the nation at this time; and, whilst the Cherokees are peacefully endeavoring to enjoy the blessings of civilization and Christianity on the soil of their rightful inheritance; and whilst the exertions and labors of various religious societies of these United States are successfully engaged in promulgating to them the word of truth and life, from the sacred volume of holy writ, and under the patronage of the General Government, they are threatened with removal or extinction. This subject is now before your honorable body for a decision. We appeal to the magnanimity of the American Congress for justice, and the protection of the rights, liberties, and lives of the Cherokee people. We claim it from the United States, by the strongest obligation which imposes it upon them—by treaties; and we expect it from them under that memorable declaration, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

We, therefore, in behalf and under the highest authority of the Cherokee nation, have hereunto affixed our signatures, at Washington City, this 15th day of April, 1824.

JNO. ROSS,
GEO. LOWREY,
MAJOR RIDGE, his × mark,

[1st SESSION.]

PROPOSITION OF A PART OF THE CHEROKEES TO CEDE THEIR LANDS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 16, 1824.

To the House of Representatives:

APRIL 16, 1824.

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of War, which contains the information requested by the resolution of the 8th instant, respecting the proposals that were made by certain Indians therein described, of the Cherokee nation, for the cession of their lands to the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 12, 1824.

I have the honor to furnish, herewith, copies (marked A) of all the correspondence called for by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant, in relation to the proposals made by several Creek Path Indians of the Cherokee nation to make cession of their lands to the United States; also, a copy of a letter from this Department (marked B) to Colonel Meigs, on the subject of that proposition.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A.

DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, HEAD-QUARTERS,
NASHVILLE, January 18, 1821.

SIR:

On yesterday, a deputation of Cherokees from the Creek Path Town, consisting of George Fields, Wolfe, and Turtle Fields, handed me the letters marked Nos. 1, 2, and 3, herewith enclosed. The paper marked No. 4 contains the explanation and talk delivered to me by their confidential agent, Turtle Fields, and subscribed to by the others, which is also enclosed.

On my return from the Creek frontier last summer, and passing through the lower part of the Cherokee country, I found great dissatisfaction prevailed, arising from the jealousy of Hicks and others, which, I think, I communicated to you.

When I set out to hold a treaty with the Choctaws, I heard that the Path Killer had sent to me a deputation. They passed my house, and, finding me not at home, followed me to the Choctaw nation; that deputation consisted of part of the present, viz: George Fields and Wolfe. They remained with me during the negotiation with the Choctaws; said they had a talk for me when it was concluded; and appeared very desirous that the Choctaws should obtain a country adjoining their Cherokee brothers on the Arkansas, that they might aid each other in the day of danger. They did not, however, hint their business till I reached Russelville, Alabama, on my return, and on the morning when we were to part. They then informed me of their instructions to consult me whether their father the President of the United States would, upon the terms mentioned in their talk, (marked No. 4, and herewith enclosed,) give to them the reservation asked for; informing me, also, that they had no confidence in Hicks, &c.; that their people had not been heard in council, and for three years had not received any part of the annuities; that they were fearful that Hicks and others would, at some future day, cheat them out of their land: all of which they wished to make known to their father the President of the United States, and get him to secure them permanently in the lands they now ask for. I then told them that I could make no communication to their father the President until the chiefs of their town would, in writing, address me on that subject; when that was done, I would freely make it known, through you, to him, and I had no doubt but it would be granted.

I do believe it to be a reasonable request, and ought to be granted. It is a small demand, compared to what their population entitles them out of the whole country reserved to the Cherokee nation. The only good land on the reserve asked for is on Thompson's and Brown's creeks. The distance from the one to the other is about one mile and a half; and from Brown's to Skort creek is about the same. The whole reservation does not contain more than six thousand acres of good land; the balance is rock and mountain of the most rugged kind.

I do believe, in a political point of view, as well as in justice to these people, their prayer ought to be noticed. It is inviting Congress to take up the subject, and exercise its power, under the Hopewell treaty, of regulating all the Indian concerns as it pleases. This is a precedent much wanted; that the absurdity in politics may cease, of an independent sovereign nation holding treaties with people living within its territorial limits, acknowledging its sovereignty and laws, and who, although not citizens, cannot be viewed as aliens, but as the real subjects of the United States. If Congress, by law, will, on the terms proposed, take up the subject and give them the grant asked for, it will give to Georgia and Alabama all the Cherokee lands not settled upon by those who will petition Congress, at the next session, for the right of citizenship. In short, I believe, in a very short time, these people will offer this part of reserved land to the United States for lands on the Arkansas; and, as part of their nation is now there, good policy will dictate the propriety of sending all there, who do not wish to remain where they now are as citizens of the United States. This belief is bottomed on my mere opinion, and to be taken as such. These people wishing to go to the Arkansas, could not, unless they abandoned their improvements, go without compensation. They now fear the injustice of the upper part of the nation, and desire to become independent of them, and be in such a situation that they can remain where they now are forever; or, if they choose, offer theirs for other land in a country more beneficial to themselves.

If the real object of the Government is to send all over the Mississippi that are not disposed to be citizens, to consolidate our southern population, now is the proper time for Congress to take up the subject, allow the grant, and establish a happy precedent, that will hereafter establish the rule of legislating for, rather than treating with, the Indians within our territorial limits. This will secure to the nations of Indians more justice, and great saving to our nation. I have only to add, that I do hope their prayer may be granted, and the precedent established of Congress legislating for them.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

No. 1.

Address of the Chiefs and Warriors of Creek Path Town, in the Cherokee nation, to Major General Andrew Jackson.

DEAR SIR:

CREEK PATH TOWN, January 3, 1821.

Having learned by our messenger, George Fields, your friendly disposition towards us, your having told him to inform us that you would use your influence to see justice done to us with respect to the land we now live on, we address you with full confidence that you will not see us wronged out of what we consider our just right by any persons whatever. Unhappily, differences exist between us and the upper part of the nation; they claim the right of depriving us of our lands when they think fit to do so; they allow us no voice in the national councils; and, in fact, they treat us, in a manner, as intruders. We now appeal to you to use your influence to have us reinstated in the enjoyments and privileges we formerly possessed as a part of our nation; and to put it out of the power of the upper part of the nation to dispose of our lands against our consent. Owing to indisposition, the Path Killer is not with us while writing this, but has sent us, by a trustman, what he wishes inserted in this letter; (which is, as nearly as the writer can understand, to this effect:)

"My dear brother: My first acquaintance with you was at Fort Strother, in the Creek campaign. We went on and beat our enemies. The next time I saw you was at Turkey Town; then, after that, you were at Highwassee; but, from my indisposition at that time, I was deprived of the pleasure of seeing you; but was much pleased to hear of the good advice you gave my people, particularly to the women. We feel thankful to you for having the intruders removed from amongst us. We feel satisfied that you will keep them off from our lands, and from doing violence to us. We have been informed that some of them intend returning and planting corn again in the spring; but trust you will have them removed, if they should. Captain James Reed and his sons have been a protection to our property ever since they have lived amongst us. We hope that you will do what you think best, in order to give them power to suppress any bad practices of ill-disposed white men towards us. For further information, we refer you to our messenger, George Fields, who will give you a full account of our wishes with respect to boundaries, &c."

The Path Killer commenced a letter to you, but, for the want of a writer who could explain to you what he wished to communicate, he had to decline it. The scrap, as begun, we have sent, enclosed, by George Fields and others, whom we shall send; and, on their return, we request that you will be so good as to write us on the subject of this letter.

Accept, dear sir, assurances of our regard and good will.

SPEAKER, his × mark.
 WASAUCY, his × mark.
 ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, his × mark.

SIR:

JANUARY 8, 1821.

We, the chiefs of Creek Path, do send the two messengers that you saw before, with two more with them; and we would wish you to receive them as your real friends, as they are. We have chosen one man out of the four, that, if any thing should be omitted in writing to you, he shall tell you our wishes; and we wish you to receive what he tells you the same as if it was a letter. The one who will tell you is Turtle Fields, one of our young chiefs. If our messengers should fall short of money or provisions, by being detained, we would wish you to assist them.

We remain, with respect, your real friends and well wishers.

SPEAKER, his × mark.

MY DEAR WHITE BROTHER:

DECEMBER 11, 1820.

I understand, by our messengers, that you are resolved to do any thing for us respecting our petition; and, if that is the case, I want you to do every thing that is in your power for us.

PATH KILLER, his × mark,
King of the Cherokee Nation.

No. 4.

The following chiefs, as a delegation from the lower part of the Cherokee nation, viz: George Fields, Wolfe, and Turtle Fields, reached Nashville this 17th of January, 1821, and presented to me the following letters: first, an address of the chiefs and warriors of the Creek Path Town, in the Cherokee nation, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated the 3d of January, 1821, signed by the Speaker, Wasaucy, Archibald Campbell, Night Killer, James Spencer, and John Thompson; another from the same chiefs, dated the 8th of January, 1821; and one from the Path Killer, chief of the Cherokee nation, dated the 11th of December, 1820. On the 8th of January, 1821, I met this delegation, and had the following talk with them:

Friends and brothers: I am glad to see you and shake you by the hand, and greet you not only as friends and brothers, but as my trusty warriors; and to express to you the pleasure I feel on hearing that my old friend and brother the Path Killer still lives.

Friends and brothers: I have read the two letters from your chiefs, and the one from the principal chief of the Cherokee nation, Path Killer, with great attention; and can assure you, your chiefs and warriors, that I have no doubt but your father the President of the United States will do every thing he can do to secure you in possession of that tract of land you desire, upon your relinquishing to the United States all claim to any other part of the land reserved to the Cherokee nation.

But, before I can forward your letters and request to your father the President, you must state to me the precise bounds of the country your chiefs and warriors wish to have reserved for themselves; the number of families, and the number of the chiefs and warriors within your district, who wish to be included in the bounds of the reservation you ask for.

To which they answered: The reservation we wish is represented in the plan we hand you, and bounded as follows: Beginning on the south bank of the Tennessee river, above Ditto Landing, where the present Cherokee boundary is established; thence, with said line, round the head of Thompson's and Brown's creeks, to an acute point in said line, northeast to General Jackson's trace to Fort Strother; then, a due north line to Short creek; thence, down said creek, to the Tennessee river, to include the islands at the mouth of Short creek; and thence, down the Tennessee, to the beginning.

There are, and will be, settled within these bounds, about eighty families, and upwards of one hundred chiefs and warriors. Upon our father the President, and the Congress of the United States, securing to us, the chiefs and warriors of said district, a permanent right to said land, as above described, we will relinquish to the United States all claim to any other land within the limits reserved for the Cherokee nation by treaty. We are instructed to state to you, and to request you to lay the same before our father the President of the United States, that we are entitled to a proportionable part of the annuities granted to the Cherokee nation by treaty with the United States, that have become due, or may hereafter become due; none of which we have received for three years, nor have we been heard by our chiefs in council for that period. The council for the Cherokee nation last fall divided the nation into eight districts or counties; the one in which we live is bounded as follows: Beginning on the Tennessee river, at the mouth of Racoon creek; runs up that creek, to its source; thence, in a direct line, to the forks of Coosa river, at the mouth of Emuchy creek; thence, to the Creek line; with the Creek line to the Coosa river, with the Coosa river to the mouth of Well's creek; thence, with the Cherokee boundary, to the Tennessee river, and up that river to the beginning; which being considered one-eighth part of the nation, we are entitled to one-eighth part of the annuities, which we pray may be secured to us, and placed in the hands of our own chiefs, to be equally divided amongst us by them in whom we have confidence, under the conditions and stipulations of the treaty of 1817, which secured to all who wished to remove to Arkansas compensation for their improvements, transportation, and provisions. Many of us were prepared to remove, and incurred great expense; we were forbidden by our king and chief the Path Killer. Without the consent of any of the chiefs of our town, a delegation was sent on to the city of Washington, who made a treaty, securing to themselves and some others reserves and benefits, rescinding the stipulations of the treaty of 1817, which secured to the Cherokee pay for his improvement, and transportation and provision on his removal, which has prevented many who were prepared to remove to the Arkansas. From such acts as these we are fearful that the upper part of the nation may, at some future day, deprive us of our country without our consent; we therefore wish the President and Congress to take into consideration our prayer, and that, by a solemn act, we may be permanently secured in the title to the bounds herein set forth, and in the plan handed you; and that we may be protected from the intrusion of others, by wholesome regulations: all which we request, for ourselves, and as representatives of the chiefs and warriors of our district, you will lay before the President of the United States; and, looking to you as a friend and brother, that you will use your influence with our father the President of the United States that our prayers may be heard, and that we and our posterity may be secured in the peaceable enjoyment and permanent possession of the small spot of land we ask for.

GEORGE FIELDS,
TURTLE FIELDS, his X mark.
WOLFE, his X mark.

Test: ANDREW JACKSON.

DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, HEAD-QUARTERS,
NASHVILLE, January 18, 1821.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

By the hands of our brothers George Fields, Wolfe, and Turtle Fields, I received your letters—one from my old friend and brother the king of your nation, the Path Killer, dated the 11th December, 1820, and two from your chiefs, the Speaker, Wasaucy, Archibald Campbell, Night Killer, James Spencer, and John Thompson; which I have read and considered with great attention, and have received from the mouth of your faithful friend and agent, Turtle Fields, who has explained to me all your wishes, not expressed in your letters, as it respects the boundary you wish reserved, and the grievances you labor under, from the want of being heard in the councils of your nation by your chiefs, heretofore, and your apprehensions of being hereafter deprived of your country without your consent, as you have been of receiving your proportion of the annuities for the last three years: all of which I think reasonable, and I have no doubt will be heard and redressed by your father the President of the United States.

You have fought with me; I then told you I was your friend; that your father the President of the United States was not only your friend, but he loved you as children, and he would act always as your friend. You now ask him, through me, to have secured to you a tract of country, small in proportion to what you are entitled to, compared with your numbers, and compared with the whole country reserved by treaty for the use of the whole Cherokee nation; and to have this allotted to you and your posterity, permanently, so that your nation cannot sell, without your consent, to the United States—relinquishing all right to any other land you may be entitled to, which has been secured by treaty to the Cherokee nation, and which may of right belong to you as part of that nation. This is so reasonable, that I have no doubt but your father the President of the United States, and Congress assembled, will readily grant it. The chiefs of the upper part of your nation cannot complain of this. They can procure, by proper application, the same security. This done, you know that you will rest unmolested in possession of what is thus allotted to you, as long as you choose to possess it; and, if the upper part of the nation choose, it can obtain the same security you now ask for. I hope your request will be granted you; and I can assure you, as a friend and brother, and as a friend of your whole nation, that, as far as I have influence, it shall be exercised to obtain your request from the President and Congress of the United States; and for which purpose I have transmitted to your father the President the three letters received by your trusty friends and brothers addressed to me, as well as your trusty agent Turtle Field's explanation of all your wishes. So soon as I receive an answer from your father the President of the United States, I will forward it to you.

Friends and brothers: I never have flattered or deceived one of my red brothers. I never tell them lies. I have not the power to say positively that your request will be granted; but I will make a faithful recommendation of it to your father the President of the United States, and use my influence that the reserve you ask shall be made to you. Your happiness and permanent security require it; the interest of your white brethren urges it; from which I conclude it will be granted to you. I have directed your delegation to shake you all by the hand for me as friends and brothers, and to say to you that I wish the happiness of you and your whole nation.

I am your friend and brother,

ANDREW JACKSON.

To Path Killer, Speaker, Wasaucy, Archibald Campbell, Night Killer, James Spencer, and John Thompson.

SIR:

NASHVILLE, December 8, 1822.

A few days since I received the communication, herewith enclosed, from the Creek Path Cherokee Indians; and, in reply, gave it as my opinion that our Government would not be disposed to purchase any of their lands, unless with the approbation of at least a majority of the headmen of the nation.

But, as they were desirous to know the disposition of the President in relation to this matter, I have thought proper to forward their address, and to request that you will be pleased to communicate such decision as may be made thereon.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. CARROLL.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Washington City.

DEAR SIR:

CHEROKEE NATION, November 2, 1822.

We, the undersigned, chiefs of the Creek Path towns in the said Cherokee nation, beg your attention a short time to read a few lines addressed to you from your red brethren, the Creek Path people. You are no stranger to the services we rendered you in time of the Creek war, when we were under the command of General Jackson. At that time we had Colonel Richard Brown, our beloved chief, for our leader; but he is now no more, and it is we that feel the effects, to our sorrow. While he was yet alive, we had a representative in our national councils; but since his death we have none, and cannot be heard, and for no other reason than this. About the summer of 1817, General Jackson was appointed by the United States to hold a conference with the Cherokees, at Turkey Town, on Coosa river, for the purpose of extinguishing part or all of the Cherokee claim of land; but did not, at that time, get his ends accomplished. Some time after this, Governor McMinn was appointed commissioner to conclude said treaty at Highwássee, when we fully understood our country was to be given up as a part of said cession; but finally they did not treat with Governor McMinn, and appointed a delegation, altogether from the upper part of the nation, giving us no chance to be heard at all. These went on to the federal city, and made a treaty to please themselves, which made them and their friends all rich, by getting money and reservations of six hundred and forty acres of the best lands in all the country; in the mean time, getting rights in fee-simple for all their relations, (a great part boys and women,) that never had been of any service to their country, and leaving men out who have been of essential service to the United States—such as Captain John Thompson, for one, whom you were well acquainted with during the war. True it is, some of us did enrol our names as Arkansas emigrants, not knowing but our lands were sold at the same time; and finding, shortly after, they were not, we sat still on our farms that we had made, thinking no one had a better right than we who made them. Nevertheless, we plainly see there is no peace for us on this side the Mississippi; therefore, we have sent our long tried friend, Captain James Reed, to you, for the purpose of getting you to use your influence with the General Government, and your State members in Congress, for us, the Creek Path people, to have the privilege to sell our own part of the country, at a reasonable price, to the United States, and for us to reap the benefit of the proceeds of the sales, to enable us to move away in peace; well knowing the United States are not bound to furnish us with any thing, without an equivalent, to defray our expenses in removing away. We are not able to move without we can have that privilege. The upper chiefs are now in council, as we understand, for the purpose of selling all the Cherokee lands in the chartered limits of the State of Georgia. The next will be ours, if they can. Our request is a reasonable one. We only want from the mouth of Short creek, down, which is only eight miles above Deposit, on Tennessee river; thence, to Coffee's Bluff; thence, with the crooked line that General Coffee run, for the express purpose of favoring the Creek Path people; otherwise it would have been Government land before this time. The bearer can give you full information on the subject, having lived among us for several years. In confidence, we conclude, and remain your respectful brothers, so long as we live,

WASAUCY,
SPEAKER,
GEORGE FIELDS,
TURTLE FIELDS,
GEORGE GESS,
JAMES SPENCER,
YOUNG WOLFE,

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 30, 1822.

I have received your letters of the 20th and 22d ultimo, and the 4th instant.

The Department has been apprized of the proceedings of the National Committee and Council, by a communication from them, previous to the receipt of your letter of the 22d ultimo. Your remarks upon these proceedings are believed to be correct, and it is hoped, notwithstanding the declaration which they contain, a treaty will be effected with the Cherokee nation, by the commissioners appointed for that purpose. The enclosed extract of a letter from the Creek Path towns, addressed to Governor Carroll, and transmitted by him to this Department, will show that the nation are not unanimous in the declaration not to cede any more lands, above referred to; and you will use every proper exertion to dispose the nation generally to meet the commissioners at the time appointed by them for holding the purposed treaty.

You will lay the enclosed extract before the commissioners, for their information, on their arrival at the agency.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

No. 210.

[1st SESSION.]

TREATY WITH THE CHEROKEES IN 1804.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 30, 1824.

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate to the Senate a treaty entered into with the Cherokee nation as early as 1804, but which, owing to causes not now understood, has never been carried into effect. Of the authenticity of the transaction, a report from the Secretary of War, with the documents accompanying it, furnishes the most unquestionable proof. I submit it to the Senate, for its advice and consent as to the ratification.

JAMES MONROE.

Articles of a treaty between the United States of America and the Cherokee Indians.

Daniel Smith and Return J. Meigs, being commissioned by Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, with power of acting in behalf of the said United States in arranging certain matters with the Cherokee nation of Indians; and the underwritten principal chiefs, representing the said nation, having met the said commissioners in a conference at Tellico, and having taken into their consideration certain propositions made to them by the said commissioners of the United States, the parties aforesaid have unanimously agreed and stipulated as is definitely expressed in the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. For the considerations hereinafter expressed, the Cherokee nation relinquish and cede to the United States a tract of land, bounding southerly on the boundary line between the State of Georgia and the said Cherokee nation, beginning at a point on the said boundary line northeasterly of the most northeast plantation in the settlement known by the name of Wafford's settlement, and running at right angles with the said boundary line four miles into the Cherokee lands; thence, at right angles, southwesterly and parallel to the first mentioned boundary line, so far as that a line, to be run at right angles southerly to the said first mentioned boundary line, shall include in this cession all the plantations in Wafford's settlement, so called, as aforesaid.

ART. 2. For and in consideration of the relinquishment and cession, as expressed in the first article, the United States, upon signing the present treaty, shall cause to be delivered to the Cherokees useful goods, wares, and merchandise, to the amount of five thousand dollars, or that sum in money, at the option (timely signified) of the Cherokees, and shall also cause to be delivered, annually, to them, other useful goods, to the amount of one thousand dollars, or money to that amount, at the option of the Cherokees, (timely notice thereof being given,) in addition to the annuity heretofore stipulated, and to be delivered at the usual time of their receiving their annuity.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined between the United States and the Cherokee nation, the parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, in the garrison of Tellico, on Cherokee ground, within the United States, this twenty-fourth day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, and in the twenty-ninth year of the independence and sovereignty of the United States.

DANIEL SMITH,
RETURN J. MEIGS.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokee nation.]

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 29, 1824.

The delegation of Cherokees now in Washington called the attention of the Government, by their letter of the 19th of January last, to a treaty which they alleged had been concluded by commissioners on the part of the United States and their nation, on the 24th of October, 1804. It was ascertained, after diligent search, that no such treaty was to be found in this Department; and no evidence whatever could be obtained in confirmation of the existence of such a treaty. This being communicated to the delegation, they presented a duplicate of the treaty, together with other papers relating to it. With a view to ascertain, as far as it was practicable, the cause which had operated to prevent the ratification of this treaty, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Senate, and to Colonel McKee, of the House of Representatives, one of the subscribing witnesses to the treaty, whose replies are herewith submitted; and, lastly, the subject was referred to Mr. Jefferson, whose answer is enclosed. There can be no doubt of the genuineness of the treaty, or that its non-ratification by the Senate, at the time, was owing to some accidental circumstance. The delegation having furnished their duplicate of the treaty, accompanied by a request that it be laid before the Senate for its ratification, I have the honor herewith to enclose it, together with all the documents connected with it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Extract of a letter from the Cherokee Delegation, addressed to the President of the United States, dated

FATHER:

JANUARY 19, 1824.

Permit us to add and call your attention to a treaty which was entered into between the Cherokee nation and Daniel Smith and Return J. Meigs, commissioners duly authorized by the then President (Mr. Jefferson) of the United States, on the 24th of October, 1804, for a tract of land in the State of Georgia, known by the name of Wafford's settlement; for which cession the nation was to receive $1,000 annually. For reasons not fairly known to us, this treaty was not ratified; but the United States kept possession of the land, thereby depriving the nation from receiving the equivalent for which it was sold. As this treaty was duly authorized and solemnly entered into, and the United States received the land which they had treated for, we conceive it but just that the Cherokees should now receive the equivalent for which they sold the land. Therefore, we hope our present father the President, and the Senate of the United States, will reconsider the subject, and ratify the aforesaid treaty.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to the Cherokee Delegation, dated

FEBRUARY 6, 1824.

The records of this Department have been examined, and no information can be found in relation to the treaty to which you have called the attention of the President. Among the treaties with the Cherokee nation, there are two negotiated at Tellico, on the 25th and 27th October, 1805, by Colonel Meigs and Daniel Smith, as the commissioners of the United States; both of which were ratified during the succeeding session of Congress, and their stipulations have been faithfully fulfilled by the Government. Neither of these, therefore, can be the treaty to which you refer; and as no such treaty, nor any information respecting it, can be found, it is not in the power of the President to comply with your request on the subject.

[NOTE.—Some time after this letter was written, a copy of the treaty referred to by the Cherokee delegation, with the copy of the communication from Daniel Smith, one of the commissioners by whom it was concluded, was accidentally found in a bundle of old miscellaneous papers.]

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, April 15, 1824.

I have the honor, in obedience to your order directing me to lay before you the facts and circumstances connected with the treaty of Tellico, entered into on the part of the United States by Daniel Smith and R. J. Meigs, commissioners, and the Cherokee nation of Indians, to make the following report:

It appears that a commission was issued to the abovenamed commissioners, bearing date April 4, 1804, empowering them to treat with such of the chief men of the Cherokee nation of Indians as should be designated by the nation for that purpose; and to pursue such measures as, in their opinion, were best calculated to obtain such cession of lands claimed by said nation, within the limits of the State of Tennessee, Kentucky, or Georgia, as could be done on reasonable terms; more especially the land situated between East and West Tennessee, and the land near Currahee mountain, including the settlement of Colonel Wafford, and for such cession as they could obtain from said nation within the limits of Georgia, in the vicinity of Currahee mountain, including Colonel Wafford's settlement.

It further appears that a treaty was accordingly held by the commissioners aforesaid, and concluded by them on the part of the United States, and certain Cherokee chiefs in behalf of their nation, bearing date October 24, 1804; in which, in consideration of the relinquishment and cession, as expressed in the first article of said treaty, it was agreed by the commissioners to deliver to the Cherokees useful goods, wares, and merchandise, to the amount of $5,000, or that sum in money, at the option of the Cherokees; and, in addition to this sum, an annual payment thereafter of $1,000, in goods or money, at the option of the Cherokees. (See treaty, page 507.)

It moreover appears that the stipulation for the payment of the $5,000 was fulfilled, (see copy of a letter signed Daniel Smith to H. Dearborn;) but the annual payment of $1,000 does not appear to have been made.

The genuineness of the treaty is attested by Colonel John McKee, of the United States Congress. It appears not to have been ratified by the Senate, nor is there any evidence that it ever was submitted, (see Mr. Cutts's letter.) The treaty referred to by Mr. Cutts, bearing date 25th October, 1805, and which was ratified by the Senate in December, 1805, has no connexion with the one forming the subject of the present inquiry.

The Cherokee delegation now at Washington have called the attention of the Government to this subject, in their letter of the 13th February last, (herewith sent.) They ask for a ratification of the treaty, and a fulfilment of its stipulations.

All which is respectfully submitted:

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY.

To the Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

GENTLEMEN:

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 4, 1804.

The President of the United States having appointed you joint commissioners for holding a treaty or conference with such of the chief men of the Cherokee nation of Indians as may be designated by the nation for that purpose, you will please to take such measures for opening said conference, and at such time and place, as you shall judge expedient; and when a meeting of the parties shall have been effected, you will pursue such measures as, in your opinion, are best calculated to obtain such cessions of lands claimed by said nation, within the limits of the State of Tennessee, Kentucky, or Georgia, as can be done on reasonable terms; more especially the land situated between East and West Tennessee, and the land near Currahee mountain, including the settlement of Colonel Wafford and the other white inhabitants within his immediate neighborhood. You are authorized to stipulate to pay the said nation, in money or goods, for such lands, within the limits aforesaid, as the Cherokees shall agree to cede, such sum or sums as, in your opinion, shall be reasonable, not exceeding $14,000 for any cession which may be obtained within the limits of the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, together with a reasonable annual stipend, not exceeding $3,000; and for such cession as you may obtain from said nation within the limits of Georgia, in the vicinity of Currahee mountain, including Colonel Wafford's settlement and the other white inhabitants in his neighborhood, any sum you may think reasonable, not exceeding $5,000, with an annual stipend not exceeding $1,000. If one or two thousand dollars worth of goods will, in your opinion, be useful to be had at the place of holding the treaty, you are hereby authorized to call on Mr. Hooker, at Tellico factory, therefor. The sums stipulated to be paid as a consideration for cessions obtained will be forwarded in money or goods, at the time you shall agree on. For expenses in procuring provisions, &c., you will draw on this Department. Your compensation will be six dollars per day, while actually employed in the conference or treaty, and in travelling to and from the place of holding the same, together with your reasonable and necessary expenses.

I have the honor to be, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

P. S.—If you shall be of opinion that it will be useful for you to have five or six thousand dollars in money transmitted prior to the commencement of the treaty, you will please to give notice accordingly, and it will be transmitted.

R. J. MEIGS and DANIEL SMITH, Esqrs.

SIR:

SOUTHWEST POINT, October 31, 1804.

Having been previously assured that our meeting only a convention of the chiefs of the Cherokees would produce a disappointment in the prosecution of our endeavors to obtain a cession of the lands pointed out in our instructions on that head, it was thought best to meet them at Tellico, where they were to assemble on the 10th instant to receive their annuity for the current year. We met them at Tellico on the 10th instant, communicated our authority to treat, and made the propositions directed. We have only succeeded in obtaining a cession of the lands near the Currahee mountain, called Wafford's settlement. For this cession we stipulated to give them five thousand dollars in prompt pay, and one thousand dollars in addition to their former annuity. We drew on the United States factor at Tellico, Mr. Hooker, for goods to the amount of three thousand four hundred and sixty dollars and thirty-three and one-third cents; the balance, fifteen hundred and thirty-nine dollars and sixty-six and two-thirds cents, Mr. James Vann assumed to pay, which was very satisfactory to the Cherokees, and which sum we have engaged to refund to him within sixty days; and as one of the undersigned will in a few days go to Cumberland, the drafts will only be signed by one. As there would be no difficulty in ascertaining the boundary lines of the ceded tract, and as the persons who were lately removed off were anxious to return, and the cold weather was advancing, two persons, with two Cherokee chiefs, were empowered to run the lines, and report by a plat and remarks. From the particular circumstances of the case, we doubt not this will be agreeable to the Executive. The Cherokees were then urged on the propriety of making a cession of the lands lying between East and West Tennessee. Several days were taken up on this part of our business, and, as far as we could discover, there was a strong party in favor of the cession—probably a majority of the chiefs; but a majority, unless it amounts to nearly the whole, is not considered with them sufficient to determine on matters of great interest, particularly in making cessions of lands. The best informed among them, and who are in favor of their advancement in useful improvements, are in favor of the cession, as, by lessening the quantity of their wild lands, they will gradually be drawn from the hunting life. To oppose the selling of lands, and to make themselves popular, a party had concerted measures for the purpose of preventing a sale: this was principally among the young chiefs. The principal chiefs had apparently acquiesced, as they say, to let the young men know and see that they are not competent to conduct business without them, and request this may be mentioned to their father the President; and have pointedly told us that we must not consider the treaty at an end, and that they are concerting measures to resume their proper places, and have fixed on a mode of correspondence with us. They appear strongly induced to this, on account of the clashing of their claims with the Chickasaws. The Chickasaws claim the lands on Duck and Elk rivers, and from the Tennessee ridge to the Tennessee river, and down the Tennessee river, on the north side, under the ridge, to the Ohio. This tract may be estimated at about ten thousand square miles, and is esteemed by those most acquainted with it to be very valuable. They have informed General Robertson, who was with Governor Sevier at the conference, by the appointment of the Legislature of Tennessee, that they will sell this land to the United States. We beg leave to observe, that good policy seems to indicate that the present time should be embraced to make the purchase. The Cherokees claim nearly all the same lands, as being allotted to them by the treaty of Hopewell in 1785, and confirmed to them by the subsequent treaties with them, to and including the treaty of 1798 at Tellico. The Chickasaws say this was done in the first instance at Hopewell, where they had only a small representation, when their claims were not well understood. There had probably been some error, inevitable at that early period after the war. To remedy which, and for other causes, particularly their sending warriors to fight for the United States under Generals St. Clair and Wayne, they obtained from President Washington an acknowledgment of their right to the lands in question. This they have under his signature, dated in 1794 or 1795, which they hold with great care, and call it their parchment.

The titles of these two nations to the lands in question are questionable, and they are both conscious of it; each is afraid the other will sell. The Cherokees request that they may be first consulted on the business. If the lands should be purchased, a relinquishment must be had from each party. Steps are taking to sound the Chickasaws more fully on the subject. If these lands can be had of the Chickasaws, it is probable that it will facilitate the purchase of the lands between East and West Tennessee. Should it be thought proper to treat for these lands, we think it our duty to mention that it will be of importance that General Robertson be appointed a commissioner; he possesses the confidence of both parties, particularly so of the Chickasaws. The treaty for the lands ceded near the Currahee mountain will accompany this communication, together with the receipts for the sum agreed to be paid down.

At another conference it will not be necessary to assemble many of the Cherokees, besides the chiefs. As the matter has been so much discussed, they cannot expect to acquire more information on the subject. At the first meeting, it was necessary. The authority and influence of the chiefs is so limited, that they dare not conclude on any important business but in the presence of a considerable number of their people. We have strong expectations of succeeding in another conference.

We are, sir, with high respect, your obedient servants,

DANIEL SMITH.

HENRY DEARBORN, Esq., Secretary of War.

SIR:

HIGHWASSEE GARRISON, December 20, 1811.

I am requested by the Cherokee nation to state to the Government, that, in order to have the treaty ratified which was concluded at Tellico on the 24th day of October, 1804, which has been hitherto postponed on account of a misunderstanding respecting the limits of the ceded tract known by the name of Wafford's settlement, the Cherokee nation are now willing to have the limits extended; and have, at their own motion, and at their own expense, had a survey made of ten miles and twelve chains, and added to the temporary boundary lines which were run in 1804. With this addition, the tract is now thirty-three miles and seventy-six chains in length, by four miles in width, and will cover every plantation of every settler that can pretend to have any color of claim on account of occupancy before the boundary line was run by Colonel Hawkins, in 1797: on which last mentioned line the ceded tract is bounded in its whole length, as may be seen by its delineation on the enclosed map. The Cherokees conceive that by the extension of the lines, whereby 25,912 acres of land are added, every reasonable objection to the ratification of said treaty is now removed. The purchase money was paid at the signing of the treaty, but they claim a right to the stipulated annuity.

The first settlers on this tract were, perhaps, excusable at the time they went on; but after Hawkins's line was run, in 1797, they could be considered in no other light than in that of intruders, and from that time to the year 1804 had been cause of continual complaints from the Indians, and operated unfavorably in enhancing the expense of extinguishment of the Indian title; and to this cause it may be attributed that the price paid for this cession was higher than has been usually paid for cessions of Indian lands. But it ought not to be considered separately. The obtaining this small tract was only executing a part of our commission; the conferences were kept open by adjournments, until the land lying between East and West Tennessee was obtained. The two cessions acquired by the commissioners were estimated at about 5,000,000 acres, (say 4,500,000;) so that the price paid per acre will be found to be less than two cents. The principal paid as consideration for the two cessions, united, amounted to $19,000 00
The two annuities, amounting to $4,000, may be said to be derived from a sum producing the same at six per cent. per annum, and may, with propriety, be also called principal, and may be considered as equal to so much stock; that is,

These two sums, added, show the price of the two cessions,	-	-	-	-	\$85,666 66 $\frac{2}{3}$

and will evince, by calculation, that these cessions of land did not cost the United States two cents per acre.

I hope the treaty will now be ratified, that the Cherokees may realize every thing that was stipulated in it. They are as well disposed towards the United States and towards the administration as Indians can be. I have been informed this week, and it may be relied on, that a young chief, who is intelligent, rich, and ambitious, said that he could take with him a body of young Cherokees (warriors, as they call themselves,) to act against the northern Indians, their ancient enemies, whom the Cherokees and Chickasaws drove from the Tennessee and Cumberland waters many years ago. At least one-half the land claimed now by these two tribes was acquired by conquest. I do not mention these things because I think the United States need their aid at present: but if our country should be hard pressed by the English Indian auxiliaries, it may perhaps justify meeting them on their own ground; and, as I have before observed, it will be difficult to prevent them from taking a part; for, like all other Indians, they are as unstable as water, and are acted on from the impulse or pressure of the moment, without the pain of anticipating consequences. I think it my duty to apprise the Government of the disposition of the Indians in my agency. This has induced me to add these observations to the principal subject of my letter.

I am, &c.

RETURN J. MEIGS.

WILLIAM EUSTIS, Esq., Secretary of War.

P. S.—The enclosed letter of instructions will show that the commissioners were guided by it in every respect.
R. J. M.

SIR:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 15, 1824.

The enclosed treaty concluded with the Cherokees on the 24th October, 1804, has been transmitted to me, with the request that I would make such remarks as I may think proper, embracing its genuineness, and the reasons, if I know any, why it was never ratified by the Senate. I can state confidently, as well from an intimate knowledge of the handwriting of many of the signers to this instrument, as from a perfect recollection of the negotiating and signing the treaty, that it is genuine. I have never heard any reasons assigned why it has not been ratified.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

JOHN MCKEE.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Return J. Meigs to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

HIGHWASSEE GARRISON, August 25, 1812.

The Cherokee chiefs have requested me to state to you that the citizens on the frontier of the State of Georgia continue to extend their intrusions on the Indian lands; that they now have reached the margin of the Chattahoochie river, about ten miles above the Georgia boundary line, and extending along the frontier of Jackson and Franklin counties. Within the tract now intruded on lies the tract known by the name of Wafford's settlement, once laid out four miles wide and a little less than twenty-four miles long; but the settlers there having complained that Wafford's settlement ought to have been extended so far southwest along the line of the State as to cover a plantation early made by a man named Vickory, the Cherokees, in order to remove this complaint of their motion, extended the boundary lines ten miles, the same width, so as to cover the plantation of Vickory, making Wafford's settlement now thirty-four miles long by four in width.

I am, respectfully, &c.

RETURN J. MEIGS.

Copy of a letter from the Cherokee Delegation.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, February 13, 1824.

We are sorry to understand by your communication of the 6th instant that no information can be found, by examining the records of the Department, in relation to the treaty to which we have called the attention of the President. We would therefore beg leave to lay before the President, through you, the treaty; and the accompanying documents will show that, previous to the cession of this tract of land by this treaty, many white families had intruded on it, and, in consequence thereof, orders for their removal had been issued by the Government; and the officers to whom the orders were given interposed in behalf of the intruders so far as to appeal to the liberality and humanity of the Cherokees to suspend their removal until they should have secured their crops; and the agent, in like manner, introducing similar recommendations, the Cherokees hesitated not to grant the privilege, under assurances that they would be removed so soon as their crops were secured. Such was the course pursued time after time for the indulgence of those intruders, until the negotiation, which was brought about for the purchase of that tract of country, was effected by the treaty of 1804, which is herewith submitted. We have full assurance, from the justness of our application, that there will be no hesitation in the honorable body composing the Senate and the Executive chair in the ratification of the treaty. Colonel John McKee, one of the witnesses to this treaty, is now a representative in Congress from Alabama, who, no doubt, can testify to its authenticity. You will, moreover, discover from the extract of Colonel Meigs's letter to Mr. Eustis, the Secretary of War, that the Cherokees, in the spirit of conciliation, and in order to appease the minds of the intruders, actually permitted more land to be surveyed than was included under the cession of this treaty, so that their houses and farms might be covered, viz: a tract of land ten miles long and four miles wide, as a gratuity. Such are the facts in relation to this treaty. We forbear any comment on the liberality of the nation on this occasion, and the course which has been pursued towards them in return. Take up the subject, view it in its proper shape, and decide according to the merit of its character: this is all we desire in behalf of the unfortunate people we have the honor to represent.

With respect, &c.

JOHN ROSS,
GEORGE LOWREY,
MAJOR RIDGE,
ELIJAH HICKS.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE, April 13, 1824.

In answer to your letter of yesterday, respecting a treaty with the Cherokee Indians, I have to state that I have caused the executive journals to be examined, and find that no treaty with the Cherokees of the date of October 24, 1804, has ever been submitted to the Senate. A treaty answering to that mentioned in your letter, in every respect excepting the date, (which is October 25, 1805,) was ratified by the Senate in December, 1805.

With great respect, &c.

CHARLES CUTTS.

To the Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

DEAR SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 19, 1824.

It is with extreme reluctance that I subject you to any trouble with any portion of the business of this Department; but, as the information wanted cannot be obtained in this or any other of the Departments, I have taken the liberty to place the enclosed papers in your hands, in the hope that it may be in your power to furnish it.

The Cherokee Indians have claimed an annuity of $1,000, under a treaty which appears to have been negotiated in the year 1804, but of which there is no record in this or the State Department. They have furnished a duplicate, which, with other papers connected with it, I herewith enclose, accompanied by a statement of the case from Colonel McKenney, who has charge of the Indian bureau; to which it may be proper to add, that the land ceded under the treaty is in possession of the citizens of Georgia.

The President is desirous to know whether the treaty was disapproved by the Executive, and on that account not submitted for the ratification of the Senate; or whether its not having been submitted for ratification was accidental. If you have it in your power to furnish the above, or any other information in relation to it, I shall be happy to receive it, in order that it may be laid before the President.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To THOMAS JEFFERSON, late President of the United States.

SIR:

MONTICELLO, April 25, 1824.

I duly received your letter of the 19th instant, with the documents it covers, relative to the treaty of October 24, 1804, with the Cherokees, for the purchase of lands. Recurring to memory alone, I can affirm that the treaty enclosed to me, and now returned, is genuine. It is well remembered, because no case of intruders ever occurred, which excited more anxiety or commiseration with us than that of Wafford's settlement, which it covered. On the complaint of the Cherokees, we endeavored to purchase the lands from them; but, on their refusal, we assured them the intruders should be removed; and orders were accordingly given. But the officers to whom they were given interceded with the Indians to let the settlers remain until they had gathered their crops; and this indulgence was, I believe, repeated, until at length they agreed to sell the lands. Recurring to my papers, I find the following passage in a letter to General Dearborn, of April 8, 1804, written from this place, where I was on a short visit at the time: "I think, before I left Washington, we had decided to take immediate measures for endeavoring to purchase of the Cherokees all their lands in Tennessee, or such, the most interesting to that State, as they would be willing to sell; and to name Meigs and Daniel Smith commissioners." To this General Dearborn answered by the letter of April 14, which I now enclose you, informing me that Smith and Meigs had accordingly been authorized to hold the treaty. This is the last trace of the transaction which I find in my papers. I have, for forty years back, kept a list of every letter or communication I wrote or received. A diligent examination of this list assures me that I never received this treaty. I have preserved press or polygraph copies of every message I ever sent to either House of Congress. A like examination of these proves I never laid this treaty before the Senate. Yet, that the treaty was entered into, is proved by the duplicate copy produced by the Indians, equally authentic with our own; by its actual execution; by the delivery of the lands on their part, and of the price in goods on ours; and by the testimony of Mr. McKee and others. How it has happened that this has been done without ratification by the Senate, I do not know. Two conjectures occur: either the treaty may have been lost by the way, or, if received by the War Office, it may have been mislaid there accidentally, and escaped subsequent recollection. In this case, it may still be in some unsuspected bundle, where nobody will ever think of looking for it. The execution of the treaty having taken place immediately, and on the spot where it was signed, nothing occurred here to recall our attention to it afterwards; and, in the mass of other business engrossing the mind, we have overlooked this, and a failure of duty has been incurred by a lapse of memory. I take to myself my share in this omission, and can only say, in excuse, "homo sum." The treaty had all my approbation. It is some consolation that the blot may yet be covered, if all parties are agreed. The Indians will, doubtless, consent that their duplicate shall be laid before the Senate, which, being equally an original with that which should have been laid before their predecessors, can receive their ratification, nunc pro tunc. This will sanction all that has been done, on the principle that the confirmation of a proceeding supplies preceding defects. In this way may be repaired a slip of the executive functionaries, unwittingly committed, and full justice be done to the other party.

With my regrets that an involuntary failure of recollection in myself, among the other officers of the Government participating in it, should have produced the present embarrassment, be pleased to accept the assurance of my high respect and consideration.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

Copy of a letter from General Dearborn, referred to in Mr. Jefferson's letter, dated

SIR:

WASHINGTON, April 14, 1804.

I have been duly honored with your letter of the 8th instant, and have presented a copy to each of the heads of Departments. I think there can be no doubt of the propriety of directing the commanding officers of the respective posts in Upper Louisiana to remove any persons who have set down on lands, without titles, since the 20th of December last, and to prevent, by all the means they respectively possess, any new settlements or surveys, except under titles derived from actual settlers, legally obtained, previous to the cession from Spain to France. I have doubts as to the propriety of vesting any considerable discretionary power in the present commanding officers for removing any actual settlers, except in very clear and indisputable cases. When the militia districts, as contemplated by the act of Congress, shall have been designated, and the commandants appointed, more ample powers may be confided to them than may be expedient to vest in the present commanders; and, in the mean time, new settlements may be prevented.

General Daniel Smith and Colonel Meigs have been appointed for holding a conference, or treaty, with the Cherokees, in conformity to your directions; and they are to hold the treaty at such time and place as will, in their opinion, be most expedient.

With respectful consideration, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 211.

[1st Session.]

PROPOSITION TO EXTINGUISH INDIAN TITLE TO LANDS IN MISSOURI.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 14, 1824.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the President's message, communicating the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, on the subject of Indians residing within that State, reported:

That the following Indians now live within the limits of Missouri:

1. A remnant of Shawanees and Delawares, on the Mississippi river, above Cape Girardeau.
2. A remnant of Shawanees and Delawares, on the head of Currant river.
3. A remnant of Delawares, on the head waters of White river.
4. A remnant of Piankeshaws, on the head waters of Black river.
5. A remnant of Peorias, on the head waters of St. Francis river.
6. A remnant of Kickapoos, on the Osage river.
7. A part of the Osages, on the Osage river.

That these remnants and parts of tribes are scattered across the State, from the Mississippi to its western boundary, occupying small districts of country, and surrounded or pressed upon by the white population.

The committee believe that such a position must be the effect of accident or inadvertence; and that it is pregnant with evil both to the Indians themselves, and to the people of the State of Missouri.

The experience of centuries has shown that Indian tribes, placed in small masses, in the midst of a white population, are constantly exposed to the influence of causes which operate to the degradation of their character, and to the diminution of their numbers. The contact of two races of people, differing in language and character, and each retaining a recollection of former wars and massacres, gives rise to collisions, both of persons and property, in which the weaker party are most usually the sufferers, both in the first wrong, and in the final punishment. To the State itself, the existence of separate communities within its bosom, and independent of its laws, is a palpable evil, an anomaly in government, and a direct inconsistency with the policy and jurisdiction of a sovereign State.

The committee believe that the Federal Government has adopted a system of policy to be observed towards the Indian tribes, the object of which is to perpetuate their existence, and to ameliorate their condition, by gradually turning them from the hunter to the farming state.

Approving this humane policy, the committee recommend its application to the remnants and parts of tribes now residing within the State of Missouri. They believe that these Indians are in a fit and proper state to admit of a fair experiment to change their habits. They have all acquired some knowledge of agriculture and of the useful arts. They cultivate corn and vegetables in the spring and summer, and hunt during the autumn and winter. They possess and appreciate the value of the common domestic animals, horses, hogs, cattle, &c. They are the remnants of once powerful nations. Their names are known to American history. They have retired before the wave of American population, and they are now again overtaken by it, and threatened to be swallowed up in it. The committee would present them as eminently fit subjects for the exercise of that generous policy which has been announced. But, to exercise it with any chance of success, they believe it to be indispensably requisite, first, to relieve them from the pressure and contact of a surrounding white population; and, secondly, to exchange their temporary residence, within the limits of the State of Missouri, to a fixed and permanent home beyond its boundaries.

To accomplish these two objects, it will be necessary, first, to acquire a suitable tract of country, which can be assigned to them in perpetuity; and, secondly, to obtain their consent to go to it.

It is believed that there will be no difficulty in accomplishing either of these objects.

The country immediately west of the State of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to the extent of several hundred thousand square miles, is owned by the Osages and Kansas. Their ownership is merely nominal. They occupy no more than four or five points, where their villages are situated; all the rest is idle, or only used for hunting; for which purpose, it is becoming daily less valuable with the daily decrease of game. The acquisition of a part of this ground for the specific purpose of being assigned to other friendly Indians, it is believed, would not be a difficult task. A tract binding on the western boundary of Missouri and Arkansas, stretching from the Red river to the Missouri, with a breadth of say one or two hundred miles, might be divided into portions suited to the numbers in each tribe, and a portion assigned to each. The Kansas and Osages would, of course, retain a division suitable to themselves.

The consent of the Indians in Missouri to go to these new homes can hardly be doubted. They are fully sensible of the disadvantages of their present position. They have suffered too much from the contact and pressure of a white population not to know its effect. They are too few in number to oppose any resistance to the moral and physical causes which must operate to their degradation, and to the further diminution of their numbers. They must know that their present position is temporary; that an effort to remove them is incessantly made; that the power of the State is against them; and that, sooner or later, they must go. Under these circumstances, they cannot be insensible to the advantages of changing, at once, an inconvenient and temporary residence, for a fixed and permanent home; nor can they fail to feel new inducements to cultivate the ground, to build houses, and to plant orchards, when they know that their posterity is to succeed to their possessions.

The committee believe it to be a further recommendation to the adoption of this plan, that thereby permanent homes may be acquired, not only for the Indians in Missouri, but for those also who are now in the Territory of Arkansas, and to as many others as may be induced to emigrate from the east side of the Mississippi. The tract of country proposed to be acquired is — miles in length, upon a depth of one or two hundred. It would form commodious settlements for all the Indians, wherever situated, whose present position is inconvenient to themselves and to the whites. The tracts assigned, and the back country towards the Rocky Mountains, would afford, for some years, game to the hunter. At their villages, the ground would be cultivated: the two pursuits of farming and hunting would be combined. As game disappears, the benefit of supplies from the earth and from domestic animals would be more sensibly felt; and the experience of domestic comforts and regular supplies, if any thing, would attach them to the soil, and work a permanent change in their mode of life. At all events, the day of their final extinction would be deferred, and humanity would have the consolation of an effort to avert their fate.

With these views, the committee report a bill, &c.

No. 212.

[1st Session.]

ABOLITION OF THE INDIAN TRADING-HOUSES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 25, 1824.

Mr. COCKE made the following report:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution on the 26th of March last, in the following words, viz: "Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to complete the inquiry which was commenced at the last session, and reported upon in part, [See No. 196,] into the execution of an act entitled 'An act to abolish the Indian trading establishment, approved on the ____ day of _____, 1822;' and also to inquire what general average per centum, over and above the prime cost and carriage, for which articles of merchandise were sold by the factory agents before the passage of the law aforesaid; the amount of money which ought to have been returned to the Government upon the abolition of the establishment; the amount which has actually been paid into the treasury, together with that which has been secured to be paid under the provisions of the law for abolishing said establishment; and if, by contrasting said sums, a balance shall be found due to the Government, what mode can be devised to recover the same from the person or persons withholding it;" report:

That, from the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, made at the last session of the seventeenth Congress, it appears that $290,000 were drawn from the treasury, for the purpose of carrying into effect the views of the Government in the establishment of the Indian trading-houses. This capital, being embarked in a trade in which private individuals make considerable profits, ought to have been returned undiminished upon the abolition of the establishment, if that trade had been conducted with ordinary good management. But, upon the passage of the law to abolish the Indian trading-houses, all the property, consisting of merchandise, cash, furs and peltries, Indian and other debts, and buildings, surrendered to the agents, amounted only to $269,673 92. The statement marked "General statement No 1" will give a view of the Indian trading establishment at the time of its abolition. The accounts which accompany that statement, marked from A to K, inclusive, show the amount and the various kinds of property at the several factories; the accounts from L to N, inclusive, the amount of salaries, balances, &c. up to the time of the surrender. The accounts marked from No. 1 to No. 8, inclusive, will show the proceeds of the sales of the property so received. The account marked No 9 will show the sales of the property deposited in Georgetown. The account marked No. 10 will show the amount of losses sustained in the sales of furs and peltries. The account marked No. 11 will show the receipts and expenditures by the agent who was appointed to close the business of the establishment. The account No. 12 is a consolidated statement, which exhibits a general view of the amount of the sales, and of the application of such part as has been received in cash. From this statement, it will be seen that the sum of $38,173 15 has been paid into the treasury; the sum of $52,951 41 in bills receivable, and said to be good, is secured to be paid. The sum of $17,367 27 has been paid in debts, salaries, and contingencies, &c., leaving the sum of $76,400 37 as the amount of Indian and other debts, and $69,862 70 as the amount of losses on the sales and of property yet to be accounted for.

The committee are unable to ascertain the average advance laid upon their goods by the late factors engaged in the Indian trade; but, from the extracts and copies of letters marked from No. 1 to No. 11, from the superintendent to them, it appears that sixty-eight per centum was to be considered the standard advance to cover all contingent expenses and losses, leaving to their prudence and discretion the power to increase or lessen it, as circumstances might require. If, therefore, the fund set apart by the Government for the purposes of Indian trade had been managed with such a regard for the public interests as individuals of ordinary prudence observe in their own affairs, it is not doubted but that the Indian trading establishment might have been maintained without any loss of its capital, if it did not yield a profit sufficient to reimburse the Government the expense of supporting it. But, upon looking into the accounts of the factors, sufficient evidence will be found to establish the belief that no business conducted upon such principles could be persevered in without a total loss of the whole capital. At the six factories from which complete returns have been received, the sum of $28,692 68 is reported as the amount of the Indian debts alone. But how long this debt has been accumulating—whether from the foundation of the establishment, or for a few years only—the committee have no means of determining. It is such a sum, however, as could not have arisen if the factors had had a due regard for the public interests, or if a proper watchfulness had been maintained by the superintendent. As complete returns have not been received from two of the factories, it is impossible, at this time, to state the precise amount of the loss of the Government upon closing the concerns of the establishment; but it is believed that the amount of the Indian and other debts, and the losses on the sales, &c., making, together, the sum of $146,263 07, may be stated as the probable amount. Upon this supposition, the sum of $123,410 85 will be returned to the Government; but this sum will be increased by the amount of debts or property hereafter received. The committee, however, have no means of ascertaining the sum which will probably be received from either of those sources. That the Indian debts are totally lost, is fully believed. But they are of opinion that the laws of the United States, if enforced, point out the means of recovering such debts as are due from the establishment. Without pretending to offer any resolution at this time, the committee content themselves with referring to the documents which accompany this report, and submit them to the House to take such measures as may be deemed most expedient.

Copy of a circular from John Mason, Superintendent of Indian Trade, to Agents, dated

SIR:

INDIAN OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, December 12, 1807.

Previous to the reception of this letter, you will have received from the Secretary of War your commission as agent of Indian trade at —. By his directions, I now transmit you the instructions which are to govern your conduct.

1st. The prices you put on the goods you have on sale must necessarily vary according to circumstances; but that which you will consider as the standard advance on the price charged in the invoices furnished from this office will be at the rate of sixty-eight per cent.; and this you will consider as the estimate to cover the cost of transportation, and to yield such profit only as will indemnify the establishment for the expenses at your trading-house, and on the returns made by you to bring round the sales of furs and peltries without loss.

As to the prices allowed to Indians for the skins, you will be governed generally by those to which they have been accustomed, and at which you can obtain them without giving them dissatisfaction; but, after all, much must be left to your discretion and prudence, so to reduce or raise your prices, as compared with the standard advance, and with the rate you may be obliged to allow for skins, as to enable us to pay all charges and to avoid sinking money. To enable you to judge of which, the rate of sales of the skins received from you will be occasionally furnished you.

2d. The goods to be sent you are intended for sale to the Indians, and it is the express direction of the Secretary of War "that no white persons are to be considered as having any right to be furnished with factory goods, and, except in very particular and pressing cases, no sales should be made to white persons of any description whatsoever, and in no case but for prompt pay and at an advance of ten per cent. on the Indian prices; and you will be held accountable for the payment of all articles sold to white people on credit. Credits may, however, be given, with caution, to principal chiefs of good character."

If a professed white trader wants goods, you are not to sell him, at any price, any article that you may possibly be in want of for the Indians. If you have a surplus of others, you may, using great caution, sell them; but then only at an advance of ten per cent. on the current prices.

3d. As before instructed, a suitable guard will, if necessary, be furnished you, (by order of the Secretary of War,) by the officer commanding the garrison near you. You will, however, be absent as little as possible from the store. An interpreter, when necessary, will be furnished; and it is of importance that he should be a person of sober, discreet, and temperate habits, and attached to the interest of the United States.

4th. You are restricted by law from carrying on any trade, commerce, or barter, on your own account, or any other, except for the United States, as you will observe by the sixth section of the law establishing Indian trading-houses, passed on the 21st April, 1806. You will on all occasions so demean yourself towards the Indians generally, and towards the chiefs in particular, as to obtain and preserve their friendship, to be conciliatory in all your intercourse with them, and, by every proper means in your power, to secure their attachment to the United States.

5th. The sale of ardent spirits is most strictly prohibited.

6th. You will furnish me with your list of articles wanted as early in the season as possible, it being of great advantage to have ample time to make purchases. Let your lists be full, clear, explicit in description as to each article, and always bear in mind that good supplies must depend on adequate remittances.

7th. You will take the greatest possible care to ascertain and examine the quality of the furs and peltries you receive, see that their quality is fairly proportioned to the prices allowed, and that their condition is good; to preserve them with attention while in your possession, and to send them off in good order, carefully and safely packed; and, particularly, you are to be watchful to avoid the imposition of private traders who may attempt to make instruments of the Indians, or otherwise to put off on you bad skins, and to get hold of your goods for the purposes of their trade. Take in as small a proportion of deer skins as you can with propriety do, and forward whatever you receive as returns (cash, notes, and drafts excepted,) to Joseph Saul, New Orleans,* and Governor Clark, St. Louis.† Forward to me the invoices, respectively, as you send off the articles.

8th. All remittances of bills, notes, or cash, must be made to me, and under my direction; and you are to correspond with, and take orders on all commercial operations from, and keep all accounts with me. If any communications of a civil or political nature be necessary, you will make them separately, and in direct correspondence with the Secretary of War. If any of the officers of Government, who are well known to you, want cash, you may take their drafts for it on any of the Departments at Washington.

9th. You will keep correct accounts of every transaction in a day-book, journal, leger, and cash-book; in the day-book, every thing must be recorded. You will also keep an invoice-book and a letter-book. You will render me

* For the southern factories.

† For the factories on the Upper Mississippi and Missouri.

"quarter-yearly accounts of all money, goods, and property whatsoever, which shall be transmitted you, or which shall come into your hands; and you shall transmit duplicates of your accounts to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States." These accounts you will make up to the last days (inclusively) of March, June, September, and December, in each year; they will comprise abstracts of your account books, balanced up to, and including, those days respectively, as to sales, receipts, expenditures, and stock on hand: the stock on hand detailed clearly and accurately by inventory. This point, as to making up to the given day and transmitting regularly your accounts and inventory, is so essential that it must not be dispensed with in any instance; and you must be as early as possible, after the time to which made up, in sending them off.

Assuring you of my prompt attention to all your communications, and with the best wishes for the success of your trading-house,

I am, &c.

No. 2.

Extract of a letter from General John Mason, Superintendent of Indian Trade, to Geo. S. Gaines, the Factor in the Choctaw nation, dated

MARCH 2, 1808.

I am sorry to see that, of $7,313 65, amount in cost of the two invoices, there is as much as $5,690 in deer skins. This article will inevitably destroy the fund of this establishment, unless we can take them in much smaller quantities, or at by far lower prices. I received, a few days since, account of sales of 30,894 lbs. deer skins, and 81 skins, whereof 23,270 lbs. and the 81 skins were from your trading-house; 7,624 lbs. from the Chickasaw factory, shipped by General Shee, last summer, to Bordeaux; they were invoiced by him at 26½ cents per lb., and the 81 skins at 2s. 3d. each; and, at this rate, amounted on board, including $26 shipping charges, to $8,246 91. The nett amount of sales 9,788 francs, equal to $1,835 25. Clear loss $6,411 60.

I remark the credit of about $1,400 you had given the chiefs, and the pacotilles of about equal amount to Dorion and Blundow: all which is approved; and I have no doubt but operations of this kind, conducted with prudence, will do good. But you should not send any trader into the interior without consulting Governor Lewis, as he will best know, from time to time, when it may not be politic to trade with certain tribes.

It will be proper for you to examine and settle all the books belonging to the trading-house, as they may stand when you take charge of it; also, to begin a new set of accounts with the stock with which you commence.

This factory has, for several years, been doing a losing business; in your hands, I trust, it will be revived.

AUGUST 23, 1816.

I hasten to communicate to you a reply to so much of your letter as relates to the description of goods now on hand at the factory, and respecting the prices at present allowed the Indians for their deer skins.

I am aware that the goods sent you, and which lie so inactively on hand, are not suited to the business in which you are engaged; but it so happened that, when my predecessor sent them, our country was unable to furnish better, or a kind more suited to the tastes of the Chickasaws. My instructions to you on this head are, to sell those goods, even if they bring no more than cost, in preference to keeping them on hand, subject as they will be to loss and damage. I have to request, also, that you engage actively in running them off, to make way for the very excellent supply now sent you.

I have received your letter of the 1st instant; also, Mr. Bowen's statement of certain evils of which he complains, and which he assigns as the cause of the unfortunate exhibit of another quarter's loss, larger than the former.

I apprehend, unless something can be done, there will be no remedy but a total breaking up of that factory. I cannot, consistently with my office, look on a repetition of losses without stopping them; and if intermediate means are not interposed, the last remedy must be applied.

I can readily conceive the necessity you have been under to sell off your stock at reduced prices.

INDIAN OFFICE, July 14, 1817.

I regret to learn the loss of the peltries, in their passage to Mr. Saul. I do not understand from your letter whether a part, or the whole, was lost. I could wish it had been otherwise, as every little drawback like this is discouraging in the view, when it is called for, of the prosperity of the trade. It was without your control, however, and is a case without remedy.

No. 9.

Extract of a letter from Thomas L. McKenney, Superintendent of Indian Trade, to Joseph Saul, Agent for Factories, New Orleans, dated INDIAN OFFICE, May 16, 1820.

I have received by your letter of the 10th ultimo your returns of the sale of deer skins made by me, through William Jones, Esq. of Philadelphia, to Geisse and Korkhauss. The result is, indeed, painful; painful in another sense, besides the extraordinary, and, I believe, hitherto unequalled loss, which has been sustained, and which may make it necessary for me to institute an inquiry into it.

I am fully aware of the importance of having the peltries at New Orleans by April; but I am also aware of the thousand obstacles which may put it out of the factor's power to get them there by that season. In the parcel out of which has resulted this uncommon loss, nearly all arrived in New Orleans in good time, save those from the Sulphur Fork factory; and even those, at no later period than you have often before received them, when no such loss as the present was experienced. But, when peltries do arrive out of time, the very object of the agency is to pay the greater attention to their preservation. This you may have done. I am sure you never designedly permitted the injury to happen; but your avocations, it is possible, might have led you to repose confidence in others, which might have been misplaced. However, I have this day notified Mr. Smith that I will adjust your account, and pay him, for you, the balance which may appear to be due.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1821.

On the subject of the merchandise in the factory which may not be suited to the purposes of trade, but which may answer all the purposes of presents, it would be well to say to these gentlemen, that the interests of the Government will be consulted in this branch of its operations by their relieving the factory of the goods in question, so far as their wants may go; and you will put the goods at cost and charges, or cost, or even loss, as their condition, &c. may require, so as to bring them within the limits of the Secretary's directions.

No. 11.

Extract of a letter from the Superintendent of Indian Trade to John W. Johnson, Factor at Prairie du Chien, dated INDIAN OFFICE, September 25, 1821.

I feel some anxiety about the accumulated amount of merchandise on hand at the factory in your charge; some of it having been for so many years on hand, and having been bought under unfavorable circumstances, puts it without the limits of a reasonable expectation of doing any thing with it to profit. I wish cost and charges could be got for it. You will make an invoice of every unsaleable or dead article, and remark upon the condition of each, so as to convey your opinion of its worth. And should opportunities occur by which you can dispose of this selection usefully to the establishment, you will do so.

I have communicated an offer to the Secretary of War of these goods, to be used as presents, in the event of their being wanted in that quarter.

[2d SESSION.

EXPENDITURES OF THE INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 7, 1824.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, November 24, 1824.

I have had the honor, in compliance with your order of the 1st instant, to report the amount (viz. $151,000) for which an appropriation by Congress will be required for the current expenses of the Indian Department for the year 1825; also, an estimate of the sums necessary to carry into effect certain Indian treaties, and to hold treaties of peace, &c. with certain Indian tribes, within the same period.

I now have the honor to report (in paper marked A) the sums which have been drawn from the several appropriations for expenditures in the Indian Department, and the amount of accounts which have been rendered to this office for disbursements for the three quarters ending the 31st August last, to which period they are made up, in conformity to the act of Congress of 6th May, 1822.

It will be seen from this statement that $282,654 13 have been drawn; and that returns have been received for $242,849 83, leaving a balance of $39,804 30 to be accounted for, which arises principally from disbursements made on account of objects which are not yet completed.

Statement marked B shows the number of schools, where established, by what society, the number of teachers to each, and the number of pupils, by the last returns.

Since the establishment of this office, in March last, the rules and regulations for the government of Indian affairs have been revised, and greatly enlarged. Among the measures first taken, were those which were deemed to be essential to secure a prompt rendition of accounts; and these, it is believed, will, in the course of the present year, result in insuring the utmost promptitude and accuracy. The necessary checks, it is believed, are provided.

Forms were also prepared and forwarded to the superintendents of the Indian schools, which have produced a system in their reports, out of which a general exhibit of all that relates to this branch of the Indian Department can be furnished with facility and accuracy, at the close of each year.

The returns show that thirty-two schools are now in operation, containing nine hundred and sixteen children. The reports of the superintendents are highly satisfactory. They certainly demonstrate that no insuperable difficulty is in the way of a complete reformation of the principles and pursuits of the American Indian. Judging from what has been accomplished since the adoption by the Government, in 1819, of the system upon which all the schools are now operating, and making due allowance for the tardy advancements of the first two or three years, which were for the most part consumed in the work of preparation, and in overcoming the prejudices and apprehensions of the Indians, there is good reason to believe that an entire reformation may be effected, (I mean among the tribes bordering on our settlements, and to whom those benefits have been extended,) in the course of the present generation; it being with the children of the Indians that those have to do who have undertaken this work of reformation.

Nothing appears to be required to effect so humane an object but the necessary means for the support of the system, as its enlargement may be required, and the continued application of the same zeal and intelligence which have, so far, characterized those who superintend and conduct it.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. L. MCKENNEY.

To the Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

[2d Session.]

TREATIES WITH THE IOWAY, SAC, AND FOX TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 15, 1824.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 13, 1824.

I transmit to the Senate, for its advice and consent as to the ratification, the treaties concluded and signed on the 4th day of August last, between the United States and the Ioway and Sac and Fox tribes of Indians.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 8, 1824.

I have the honor to lay before you the enclosed treaties, concluded since the last session of Congress, with the Ioway and the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

TREATY WITH THE IOWAYS.

Articles of a treaty made and concluded at the city of Washington, on the 4th day of August, 1824, between William Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, being specially authorized by the President of the United States thereto, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Ioway tribe or nation, duly authorized and empowered by the said nation.

ARTICLE 1. The Ioway tribe or nation of Indians, by their deputies, Mah-hos-kah, (or White Cloud,) and Mah-ne-hah-nah, (or Great Walker,) in council assembled, do hereby agree, in consideration of a certain sum of money, &c. to be paid to the said Ioway tribe by the Government of the United States, as hereinafter stipulated, to cede and forever quit claim, and do, in behalf of their said tribe, hereby cede, relinquish, and forever quit claim, unto the United States, all right, title, interest, and claim to the lands which the said Ioway tribe have or claim within the State of Missouri, and situated between the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and a line running from the Missouri, at the mouth or entrance of Kansas river, north one hundred miles, to the northwest corner of the limits of the State of Missouri, and from thence east to the Mississippi.

ART. 2. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, on the part of the United States, as a full compensation for the claims and lands ceded by the Ioway tribe in the preceding article, there shall be paid to the said Ioway tribe, within the present year, in cash or merchandise, the amount of five hundred dollars; and the United States do further agree to pay to the said Ioway tribe five hundred dollars annually, for the term of ten succeeding years.

ART. 3. The chiefs and headmen, who sign this treaty, for themselves, and in behalf of their tribe, do acknowledge the lands east and south of the lines described in the first article, (which have been run and marked by Colonel Sullivan,) so far as the Indians claimed the same, to belong to the United States; and that none of their tribe shall be permitted to settle or hunt upon any part of it, after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, without special permission from the superintendent of Indian affairs.

ART. 4. The undersigned chiefs, for themselves, and all parts of the Ioway tribe, do acknowledge themselves and the said Ioway tribe to be under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other sovereign whatsoever; and they also stipulate that the said Ioway tribe will not hold any treaty with any foreign Powers, individual State, or with individuals of any State.

ART. 5. The United States engage to provide and support a blacksmith for the Ioway tribe, so long as the President of the United States may think proper, and to furnish the said tribe with such farming utensils and cattle, and to employ such persons to aid them in their agriculture, as the President may deem expedient.

ART. 6. The annuities stipulated to be paid by the second article, to be paid either in money, merchandise, provisions, or domestic animals, at the option of the aforesaid tribe; and when the said annuities, or any part thereof, is paid in merchandise, it is to be delivered to them at the first cost of the goods at St. Louis, free from cost of transportation.

ART. 7. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the said William Clark, commissioner as aforesaid, and the chiefs and headmen of the Ioway tribe of Indians, as aforesaid, have hereunto set their hands, the day and year first before written.

WM. CLARK.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and headmen of the Ioway tribe.]

TREATY WITH THE SACS AND FOXES.

Treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded between William Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs and sole commissioner on the part of the United States, and the chiefs and headmen of the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians.

To perpetuate peace and friendship between the United States and the Sac and Fox tribes or nations of Indians, and to remove all future cause of dissensions which may arise from undefined territorial boundaries, the President of the United States of America, by William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, and sole commissioner specially appointed for that purpose, of the one part; and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Sac and Fox tribes or nations, fully deputed to act for and in behalf of their said nations, of the other part; have entered into the following articles and conditions, viz:

ARTICLE 1. The Sac and Fox tribes or nations of Indians, by their deputations in council assembled, do hereby agree, in consideration of certain sums of money, &c. to be paid to the said Sac and Fox tribes, by the Government of the United States, as hereinafter stipulated, to cede and forever quit claim, and do, in behalf of their said tribes or nations, hereby cede, relinquish, and forever quit claim, unto the United States, all right, title, interest, and claim to the lands which the said Sac and Fox tribes have or claim within the limits of the State of Missouri, which are situated, lying, and being between the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and a line running from the Missouri at the entrance of Kansas river, north one hundred miles, to the northwest corner of the State of Missouri, and from thence east to the Mississippi. It being understood that the small tract of land lying between the rivers Des Moines and the Mississippi, and the section of the above line between the Mississippi and the Des Moines, is intended for the use of the half-breeds belonging to the Sac and Fox nations; they holding it, however, by the same title, and in the same manner that other Indian titles are held.

ART. 2. The chiefs and headmen who sign this convention, for themselves, and in behalf of their tribes, do acknowledge the lands east and south of the lines described in the first article, so far as the Indians claim the same, to belong to the United States; and that none of their tribes shall be permitted to settle or hunt upon any part of it, after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, without special permission from the superintendent of Indian affairs.

ART. 3. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, on the part of the United States, as a full consideration for the claims and lands ceded by the Sac and Fox tribes in the first article, there shall be paid to the Sac and Fox nations, within the present year, one thousand dollars in cash, or merchandise; and, in addition to the annuities stipulated to be paid to the Sac and Fox tribes by a former treaty, the United States do agree to pay to the said Sac tribe five hundred dollars, and to the Fox tribe five hundred dollars, annually, for the term of ten succeeding years. And, at the request of the chiefs of the said Sac and Fox nations, the commissioner agrees to pay to Maurice Blondeau, a half Indian of the Fox tribe, the sum of five hundred dollars, it being a debt due by the said nation to the aforesaid Blondeau, for property taken from him during the late war.

ART. 4. The United States engage to provide and support a blacksmith for the Sac and Fox nations, so long as the President of the United States may think proper, and to furnish the said nations with such farming utensils and cattle, and to employ such persons to aid them in their agriculture, as the President may deem expedient.

ART. 5. The annuities stipulated to be paid by the third article are to be paid either in money, merchandise, provisions, or domestic animals, at the option of the aforesaid tribes; and when the said annuities, or any part thereof, is paid in merchandise, it is to be delivered to them at the first cost of the goods at St. Louis, free from cost of transportation.

ART. 6. This treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the said William Clark, commissioner as aforesaid, and the chiefs and headmen of the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians as aforesaid, have hereunto set their hands, at Washington City, this fourth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.

WM. CLARK.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and headmen of the Sac and Fox tribes.]

[2d SESSION

PLAN FOR EXTINGUISHING THE CHEROKEE CLAIM TO LAND IN GEORGIA, TENNESSEE, AND ALABAMA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 12, 1825.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 10, 1825.

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, directing the Secretary of War "to lay before the House copies of letters from Joseph McMinn, deceased, late agent of Indian affairs in the Cherokee nation, to the War Department, dated 4th July, 1818, and 7th July, 1818; together with a copy of the plan proposed by the direction of the Secretary of the War Department, for the complete extinguishment of the Cherokee claim to lands then occupied, by them in Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama, referred to in the Secretary's letter of 29th July, 1818;" I have the honor to transmit, herewith, the enclosed copies of all the papers required by said resolution, with the remark, that the blank in the copy of the plan proposed, (which Governor McMinn states to have been occasioned by the wearing of the paper,) it is believed, was filled with $100,000; and that directions were given to him to enlarge this sum, if necessary to effect the arrangement.

I think it proper further to remark, that the reason for the omission to send in these papers with the letter from this Department referred to in the resolution, was, that the originals were not to be found on the files of the Department at the time, nor have they since been found. The duplicates from which the enclosed copies are taken were transmitted to the Department, by the late agent, since the last session of Congress, in compliance with a letter addressed to him requiring him to do so, soon after it was discovered that the originals could not be found.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

Hon. HENRY CLAY,

Speaker House of Representatives of the United States.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, July 21, 1824.

In obedience to your instructions, I do myself the honor to forward the papers asked for in your letter of the 14th April last; and have to express my regret that they have been thus long delayed, which has taken place from the great difficulty in procuring a messenger.

I beg leave to remark, that the blank, near the close, in the arrangement, had become too much worn to enable me to make out distinctly the amount originally stated, although I believe it was fifty thousand dollars.

With due respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOSEPH McMINN.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, July 4, 1818.

I returned from the Oostannally talk last evening at 7 o'clock, where I had attended for eight days. Many attempts were made to prevent my attendance—some by threatening my life, and others by chastisements; neither of which was put into execution, though many of my friends anticipated one or the other would be realized. In fact, I did not myself know what disposition would be made of me, but had determined that nothing but indisposition should prevent my attendance. This meeting was composed of the Southern and Overhill Indians, (in all, upwards of two thousand warriors,) whose hostility I have mentioned some time ago, and which is much stronger than I had anticipated.

I beg leave to trouble you with something like a journal of the proceedings, from my arrival there until my departure. I arrived at the council-house on the evening of the first day's meeting, (24th June,) just as the council adjourned. Many of its members were very much intoxicated with spirits, and manifested great hostility to the treaty and to myself; one of whom told me, through Major Walker, that, if I mentioned the subject of exchanging countries, they had determined to chastise me with their light-horse as they did their bad men. Major Walker, and all who were with me, that were well disposed towards the views of Government, encamped the first night within their lines, without receiving insult or molestation.

JUNE 25th.—I attended at the council-house, where my arrival was announced; on which I was invited to take a seat, though previously the whole of the chiefs arose and shook me by the hand, and, after some desultory conversation, I was invited to give them a talk, which I promised to deliver next morning.

JUNE 26th.—Met the council agreeably to appointment, where I read the President's speech to the Arkansas delegation. The chiefs observed, that it was expected I would read a talk from their father addressed to them; that they were opposed to exchange of countries, and did not wish to hear any talks in favor of the Arkansas people.

I now found myself compelled to show them that the speech was made to the whole nation, by bringing to their view the different points where the word "nation" was introduced; after which, I entered into the views of the Government at very considerable length, and concluded by exhibiting a chequered plat on the ground, respecting the manner in which their father had told his council (the last Congress) the country must be laid off and settled, from the northern lakes to the Floridas. In support of the right to do so, I quoted the treaty of Hopewell, but took every possible care to assure and show them that so many of their nation as chose to become citizens of the United States would be furnished with reservations, as stipulated by the treaty, but that it must be understood the remaining part of the nation must remove west of the Mississippi. These points I stated in emphatical language, and frequently recapitulated in the course of the day, as it was for these declarations they had promised to chastise me. I felt determined to assert my country's rights in the commencement, let the consequence be what it might; and to their credit, I can say none pretended to speak during the time I occupied the floor, (which was nearly three hours,) except one, who, in broken English, observed, he could not stand that talk, and withdrew.

JUNE 27th.—After the council was opened, I proceeded to read the treaty, and to give it such constructions as I conceived just. I also recapitulated many of the circumstances which led to the treaty, to show that it had its origin in the application made by their deputies to President Jefferson, in 1809, and upon which the United States certainly stood justified in entering into the agreement, and that the late treaty was the consequence resulting therefrom.

JUNE 28th.—I communicated your wishes relative to a suspension of taking the enumeration in a written talk, a copy of which is herewith sent, (marked A;) the answer to which is contained in a written talk, addressed to me on the 30th ultimo, (marked B.) This document contains the only written talk delivered by them to me; a copy of which is forwarded.

JUNE 29th.—Was chiefly spent in transacting business of the nation.

JUNE 30th.—Was furnished with the document last mentioned, to which I made a verbal answer of considerable length; but, in conclusion, was asked to deliver one in writing, which I did accordingly, and which was made the order of the next day.

JULY 1st.—I laid my answer, above referred to, before the National Council, (marked C,) together with a written talk, (a copy of which is forwarded, marked D;) to which I received a verbal answer, stating that they were willing to hold a talk, but must refer the subject to the decision of their king as to the place of meeting, but promised to apprise me of the result in a very short time. Their opposition to this place arises from a fixed determination to keep their people at as great a distance from the public stores as possible. This was the true and only reason why their last meeting was held at Oostannally; there, they knew I could not furnish arms; and, in return, I would not agree to furnish one ration for their use. This day the council adjourned about two o'clock, P. M., neither party having gained a single specific point, though the conquest is claimed on the part of the United States, in consequence of the enemy being silenced at every onset, both written and verbal; and so obvious was this, that the Hon. Elias Earle, of South Carolina, and all other disinterested spectators, marked the progress of its decision as to external appearances; and I feel very certain that, if a national meeting takes place as proposed, it will give a deathblow to their enmity, even if a general extinguishment of title should not take place, as heretofore spoken of; though of that I entertain few doubts, if any, provided the President and yourself should agree to the plan, of which I will treat more at large in my next.

In the proposition submitted, I have unauthorizedly proposed the payment of the sum stipulated to be paid by General Jackson's treaty; though I flatter myself that, when all things are taken into view, (I mean the great distress they labor under for the want of money, and the immense advantage that would result to the United States from being acquitted of the trouble and charge of settling the Cherokees west of the Mississippi,) my conduct on this occasion will meet the approbation of the administrators of my country. A copy of my plan, which will be in addition to the one now forwarded, will form a part of my next.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH McMINN.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

A.

A copy of a proposition submitted to the honorable Secretary of War, in July, 1818, by Joseph McMinn.

The United States, by their agent, Joseph McMinn, will give to the whole Cherokee nation all the public stores now on hand at the agency, and all the boats and other property not disposed of previous to this date, and also such sums of money as may hereafter be agreed upon.

In consideration of the receipt of money and articles of property heretofore enumerated, which is hereby acknowledged to have been received, the whole Cherokee nation, by their chiefs in open council now assembled, do, of their own voluntary will and accord, agree to surrender to the United States, and forever quit claim and possession to, the whole extent of their nation on the east side of the Mississippi, upon the simple and plain terms contained in the late treaty, entered into on the 8th of July, 1817, by which all who choose to become citizens of the United States shall be received and considered as such in all respects; that is to say, the head of each Indian family may obtain a reservation of six hundred and forty acres of land, to be laid off and held agreeably to the eighth article of the treaty aforesaid. And the residue of the Cherokee people, who are not disposed to make reservations in manner aforesaid, shall, each and every of them, be entitled to lands on the Arkansas and White rivers, in common with all who have previously removed thither.

And in order to foreclose all misconstructions respecting this agreement, the parties each declare that it is only to be considered as a measure calculated to hasten the execution of the existing treaty, and will neither add to, nor diminish from, that instrument, but will be obligatory and binding on the parties, to wit:

The United States, by their agent, Joseph McMinn, Governor of the State of Tennessee, do stipulate that the United States shall surrender to the whole Cherokee nation all the aforesaid articles of property and one-half of the money (say in current bank notes) stipulated to be given, upon the parties aforesaid signing and sealing this agreement; and the remaining half of the money (say bank notes as aforesaid) shall be paid at the expiration of two years from the date hereof: which articles of property, and the several sums of money, shall be considered by the whole Cherokee nation as releasing the United States, in future, from all trouble and expense in purchasing all or any of the articles stipulated by the United States to be given to the Arkansas emigrants, in pursuance of the treaty of the 8th of July, 1817.

And the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the whole Cherokee nation do further stipulate, that, within two years from the signing and sealing of this agreement, the whole Cherokee nation shall surrender to the United States their possession and entire claim to all their land lying east of the Mississippi river, except those who may have taken reservations.

And the United States, by their agent, further stipulate, that, on the completion of this agreement, the annuities for the present year shall be paid to the whole Cherokee nation, including all those who are called Arkansas Cherokees, without unnecessary delay; and the annuities for the year 1819, and every succeeding year, shall be paid at the Cherokee agency on the Arkansas and White rivers, in the same manner, and to the same amount, as though the residence of the Cherokees had never been changed.

And the United States do further agree, upon the foregoing propositions being entered into, to pay to the whole Cherokee nation, within three months after the ratification of the treaty, $———; and within three months thereafter, the additional sum of $50,000.

Copy of a letter from Joseph McMinn to the Secretary of War.

SIR:

CHEROKEE AGENCY, July 7, 1818.

I promised you, in my last, to do myself the honor of enclosing you a copy of the plan which I took the liberty to propose to the council of the Cherokee nation as the most likely, in my estimation, to effect a sudden and entire abandonment of their claim; and although I am extremely anxious to see the treaty executed, yet it affords me great pleasure to find that they did not close the contract. I have now ample opportunity of submitting my entire views, which will enable the President and yourself to give me such instructions for my future guidance as will enable me to transact the business agreeably to your pleasure.

The views of the opposition party are now pretty clearly developed in the documents which I did myself the honor to enclose by the last mail; they will, however, appear infinitely less harmless to you than to those who can connect their individual actions and declarations with their official acts; their avowed object is, to take the enumeration as soon as possible, with the expectation that the greater portion of their people will be found here, when, by the terms of the treaty, a tract of country will be laid off for them, upon which they and their heirs will live in the full enjoyment of all their savage customs. These sentiments were expressed to me by Hicks, the head of the old nation, and reiterated in council. In fact, Hicks says publicly that if six chiefs (whom he has not named) remain with him, he will insure them and their friends rest in their present possessions, during his life at least.

The council, in answer to me, say they disavow the right of reservations being made, except on the lands ceded at the treaty; but to their countrymen, they openly pronounce the penalty to be death; the literal fulfilment of which many of them believe in with as much certainty as the Christian in his God: were it not for these declarations, I should be able to enrol for emigration nearly their whole nation. To obviate these restraints, I tell them every where that the United States stand pledged to protect the Arkansas emigrants against all their enemies; and notwithstanding this declaration was made repeatedly at the last talk, yet, so completely are they under the control of Hicks and others, that those who have given me assurances of their going to the West dare not even look at me nor speak to me, unless after night, and then they would keep themselves concealed in the grass and the bushes, as though in the land of their enemies; and since I have commenced writing this letter, two principal chiefs have come to this place, under a similar situation, with a view to enrol for migration, who have just notified me that they will stay all night, for the purpose of effecting their wishes.

Having endeavored, in some degree, to delineate the situation of affairs in this nation, I will now proceed to state my own views, and endeavor to show why I have assumed a much higher ground than had ever been taken here before; and, in doing this, I trust you will decide with me, when all things are taken together, from my first coming to this place to the present day, that it will require very little argument to show that the enemies of the treaty have evidently determined on its overthrow; though, as I very much desire to place the subject in its own garb, and to recite, as briefly as I can, the ground I took to counteract their views, I will bring to your recollection what I stated to you in January last, namely, that the light horse of the nation were assembled on the first day I had appointed for issuing arms, &c., for the express purpose of wresting the property out of the hands of the emigrants, under the pretext of old debts. This attempt to intimidate and rob the emigrants of the arms, &c. was met by a general order, declaring, in unequivocal terms, that, if they did not desist from the practice, (for they had commenced prior to notice given,) I would view it as an act of hostility against the United States, and would punish the perpetrators with an armed force; which order had the happy effect of putting a total stop to their designs. The next attempt to thwart the views of Government, of an official character, was refusing to meet here in council on the 20th May last; a copy of which refusal is herewith enclosed, (marked E.) This refusal was accompanied by an order of the council, (though not inserted in the papers above referred to,) by which runners were sent through every section of the nation, where the least hope of success was entertained, forbidding their attendance, under their accustomed penalties; the effect of which I stated to you immediately after the adjournment of our meeting. And further to express their enmity, they held their meeting above referred to on the same day, and within twenty miles of the place where the Arkansas chiefs held their talk on the 6th of May last. After the termination of the talk here, it was conceived most advisable to give them a second invitation, as was stated in my letter of the 8th of June last, by which to adjourn their meeting to this place, where they would have provisions furnished at their father's expense. To this request, which I thought a little humiliating to the Government, they gave for answer that which is contained in the enclosed paper, (marked F,) which cannot be considered more than barely respectful to the Government, but which was founded, as I remarked in my last, upon a determination to keep the public stores and their people separate. Upon the receipt of these papers, you will have before you all the written correspondence which I have received from the Cherokee chiefs, from which you will be enabled to judge how far I have acted consistent with my duty and the interest of my country. And here I repeat the solicitations contained in my letter of the 8th June, in which I expressed a wish to be instructed as to the precise course I must pursue, and for that purpose I have drawn up the articles proposed to be entered into with the Cherokees, for your inspection, a copy of which is enclosed, (marked G.) This paper has never been presented to them, nor did I deem it discreet, until they should express a wish to enter into the arrangement; you will, therefore, perceive that the Government is not bound, except to renew the propositions submitted and enclosed to you by last mail. At next meeting, (should one take place,) you therefore can take such course with that paper as you may think proper, without any violation of good faith; though I will take the liberty of suggesting that, if it may be thought advisable to keep it at rest, perhaps policy would dictate the propriety of attaching a condition which would amount to a rejection. However, should the principle be approved of, I would very much prefer that the whole should be written in your office, and signed with your own hand; and, in some part or other, let it be expressed that it emanated from the President, who is always esteemed their father and their only friend; and should you think proper to conclude with your accustomed liberality as to the extent of my power, and also to express your approval of such parts of my conduct as you may conceive to merit it, the favor will be acknowledged. I have taken the liberty of making these requests from motives of interest to my country, and to let the party opposing the Government discover their error in charging entirely to me what they conceive to be absolute oppression. In fact, they told me in council, at Oostannally, that they did not believe their father knew how much they were opposed to the treaty, nor how much it would, in its operation, disturb their peace, as he had always permitted them to do as they please.

If it should be deemed necessary to authorize me to vary the general propositions, would it not be proper to give those instructions in a private letter? as I have promised them I would ask their father to give me directions how he wished me to act with his red children, and that I would read his talk to them. And so far as it goes to second the course I have taken, I will underwrite for its being carried into effect, and with infinitely less trouble and risk than upon any other plan within my knowledge. When I take into view the stupendous plan of Government in opening the way to an entire extinguishment of native claim east of the Mississippi, and the immense importance of consolidating the settlements from the northern lakes to the Floridas, I cannot but suppose the declaration of independence, on the part of the Cherokees, as recently expressed, merits some attention; for, on its adoption, a similar declaration will issue in behalf of the neighboring nations. This principle once established, would be subversive of all order, peace, and happiness here, as well as to overthrow the present treaty.

I still hold the commissions of Brown and Young, and shall continue to do so until I receive your order to the contrary. In the application for a suspension of taking the census, I asked until the 1st of November. I was aware that that period would keep back a comparison of numbers until next spring; by which time, I trust, many more than the half will have gone to the West. The Cherokees agreed to suspend until 1st of September; to which I replied that, as they did not agree to the whole of the requests, I could not close with their proposal until advised by the Government, so that they will necessarily look for a considerably delay. I adopted this course by way of retaliation.

Colonel Meigs put a letter into my hands, a copy of which is herewith enclosed, (marked H,) which goes to show how much pains has been taken with them, in order to afford a thorough knowledge of the views of Government. But, sir, I am sorry to say that reason has very little influence on their minds, and justice seems to have still less; for, on the second night after my arrival, they stole two very valuable horses from me, which I have not heard of since.

I have ordered the commissioner for valuing improvements to proceed no further in the discharge of his duties, until he may be otherwise advised; in fact, those few valuations which he has made have never yet been known to any other person than myself. I still entertain the same opinion expressed in my letter of the 8th of June; and should we have the good fortune to hold a meeting in September, it is possible something may grow out of that in favor of the United States. At all events, I will not permit the commissioner to proceed, until I am advised by you.

I beg you to write me fully, as soon as your convenience will suit, and address to Murfreesborough, for which place I will leave here on the 10th instant, and, when there, will advise you of the time of my return, and of every necessary information. In the mean time, I am well aware that many things are mentioned in this letter which I have previously communicated, but my design was to bring the whole situation of this business before you in the smallest bounds I possibly could. After having done so, I subscribe myself, with very great respect and esteem,

Your obedient and very humble servant,

JOSEPH McMINN.

[2d Session.

TREATY WITH THE QUAPAW TRIBE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 19, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 17, 1825.

I transmit to the Senate, for its advice and consent as to the ratification, a treaty, which has been concluded by a commissioner duly authorized for the purpose, with the Quapaw Indians in Arkansas, for the cession of their claim to lands in that Territory. I transmit, also, a report from the Secretary of War, with other documents relating to this subject.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 6, 1825.

I have the honor to lay before you the enclosed treaty, which has been concluded with the Quapaw Indians, under the provisions of an act of Congress of the last session, for the extinguishment of their title to lands in the Territory of Arkansas, accompanied by a copy of the instructions of this Department to the commissioner, and of his letter transmitting the treaty.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Articles of a treaty between the United States of America and the Quapaw nation of Indians.

ARTICLE I. The Quapaw nation of Indians cede to the United States of America, in consideration of the promises and stipulations hereinafter made, all claim or title which they may have to lands in the Territory of Arkansas comprised in the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning at a point on the Arkansas river, opposite to the post of Arkansas, and running thence a due southwest course to the Ouachita river; and thence, up the same, to the Saline fork; and up the Saline fork, to a point from whence a due northeast course will strike the Arkansas river at Little Rock; and thence, down the right (or south) bank of the Arkansas river, to the place of beginning.

ART. 2. In consideration of the cession made in the first article of this treaty, by the aforesaid chiefs and warriors, the United States engage to pay to the four head chiefs of the Quapaw nation the sum of five hundred dollars each, in consideration of the losses they will sustain by removing from their farms and improvements; the payment to be made at the time they receive their annuity for the year eighteen hundred and twenty-five; and, also, to the said nation, the sum of four thousand dollars, to be paid in goods, at the signing of this treaty. And the United States also engage to pay to the Quapaw nation one thousand dollars in specie, annually, for the term of eleven years, in addition to their present annuity.

ART. 3. The United States hereby guaranty to the said nation of Indians the same right to hunt on the lands by them hereby ceded as was guarantied to them by a treaty concluded at St. Louis, on the twenty-fourth of August, eighteen hundred and eighteen, between the said Quapaw nation of Indians, and William Clark and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners on the part of the United States.

ART. 4. The Quapaw tribe of Indians will hereafter be concentrated and confined to the district of country inhabited by the Caddo Indians, and form a part of said tribe. The said nation of Indians are to commence removing to the district allotted them before the twentieth day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-six.

ART. 5. For the purpose of facilitating the removal of the said tribe to the district of country allotted them, and as a compensation for the losses sustained, and the inconveniences to which they may be exposed, by said removal, the United States will furnish them with corn, meat, and salt, for six months, from the first day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-six.

The United States further agree to furnish a sum, not exceeding one thousand dollars, to be expended by their agent, to facilitate the transportation of the said tribe to the district of country herein assigned them. An agent, sub-agent, or interpreter, shall be appointed to accompany said tribe, and to reside among them.

ART. 6. From the cession aforesaid, there shall be reserved to James Scull, in consideration of a debt of seven thousand five hundred dollars, due to him from the Quapaw nation, and recognised in open council, two sections of land, commencing on the Arkansas river, opposite to Mrs. Embree's, and running up and back from said river for quantity. And the United States guaranty to the Quapaw nation the payment of the said debt of seven thousand five hundred dollars, either by the ratification of the grant made in this article, or by the payment of said amount in money, exclusive of the amount stipulated to be paid to the said nation by this treaty.

ART. 7. There shall be granted by the United States to the following persons, being Indians by descent, the following tracts of land: To François Imbeau, one quarter-section of land, commencing at a point on the Arkansas river, opposite the upper end of Wright Daniel's farm, and thence up and back from said river for quantity. To Joseph Duchassin, one quarter-section of land, commencing at the lower corner of the quarter-section granted to François Imbeau, and running down and back from said river for quantity. To Saracen, a half-breed Quapaw, eighty acres of land, to be laid off so as to include his improvement, where he now resides, opposite Vaugines. To Baptiste Socie, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining Saracen's grant. To Joseph Bonne, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining Socie's grant. To Baptiste Bonne, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining Joseph Bonne's grant. To Lewis Bartelmi, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining Baptiste Bonne's grant. To Antoine Duchassin, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining Bartelmi's grant. To Baptiste Imbeau, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining A. Duchassin's grant. To François Coupot, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining Baptiste Imbeau's grant. To Joseph Valliere, eighty acres of land, lying above and adjoining François Coupot's grant. All the said tracts of land shall be laid off, so as to conform to the lines of the United States' surveys, and binding on the Arkansas river.

ART. 8. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, so soon as the same shall be ratified by the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the commissioner on the part of the United States, Robert Crittenden, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the said nation, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals.

Done at Harrington's, in the Territory of Arkansas, on the fifteenth day of November, A. D. eighteen hundred and twenty-four, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth.

ROBERT CRITTENDEN.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and warriors of the Quapaw nation of Indians.]

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 26, 1824.

By an act of Congress of the 26th ultimo, seven thousand dollars are appropriated towards the extinguishment of the right of the Quapaws to lands in the Territory of Arkansas; and I have the honor to enclose you a commission from the President of the United States, appointing you to treat with those Indians for the accomplishment of this object, and for the compensation to your secretary, the selection of whom is left with you.

It is desirable that this treaty be held as early as practicable. The disposition to be made of the Quapaws will engage your attention. That which is most desirable is, to incorporate them (if this can be done in the spirit of mutual friendship and good feelings) with the Caddoes; if this cannot be effected, with some other tribe; but if such a union cannot be accomplished, then you will make the best disposition of them which may be practicable.

Confiding in your prudence that the treaty will be held with the least possible expense, it is deemed unnecessary to give you any particular instructions on this point.

The provisions will be obtained on contract, on the most moderate terms, and the rations issued will be on account, and according to the number receiving them, which you will be particular in stating. As you are on the spot, and the Quapaws but few in number, it is expected that a short time only will be required to accomplish the objects of the commission, and at a reasonable expense. A warrant for the appropriation has issued in favor of the Hon. Henry W. Conway; but as it may not require the whole of it in making this treaty, you will, as soon as the treaty is completed, transmit your accounts and vouchers for settlement, so that the unexpended balance (if any) may be returned to the treasury. The sum appropriated is intended to cover all the expenses connected with the commission, as well your pay as commissioner, and the pay of your secretary, as the disbursements which you may make in holding the treaty.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars, and that of your secretary to the commission at the rate of five dollars per diem, for the time you are actually engaged. The payment will be made on your certificate of honor, specifying the time that you and the secretary have been actually engaged. Your certificate, also, will be a necessary voucher for the items of expenditure under the commission.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

ROBERT CRITTENDEN, Esq.,
Secretary and Acting Governor, &c. of the Arkansas Territory.

SIR:

LITTLE ROCK, November 24, 1824.

Mr. Thomas W. Newton, the secretary of the Quapaw treaty, will present to you the result of my negotiations on the subject.

I have deemed it improper to trust a paper of its importance to our precarious mails. I have stipulated nothing with him as to compensation; he carries it on, relying solely upon your adjudication of his claim.

I have the honor to inform you that the entire wishes of your Department have been met in the treaty which has been concluded. I regret the impracticability of a compliance with a part of your letter of instructions, as to a designation of the number of Indians rationed each day. The number upon the treaty ground fluctuated, hourly, from fifty to one hundred and fifty.

An Indian will eat two United States rations each day for ten days; and if I had limited them to one, I have no hesitation in saying they would have deserted the treaty ground. They were much averse to a cession of their entire claim, and I was constrained to resort to every honorable means to gain upon their feelings, and obtain their confidence. You will perceive by my accounts that, to effect this object, I was not only compelled to give them as much as they would eat, but that I presented them with one blanket each, and the chiefs each a uniform coat. I flatter myself, however, that if I have exceeded your estimate of the probable expenses of holding this treaty, it will, in your estimation, be more than counterbalanced by the reduced price for which I have obtained their land.

The Indians insisted, from the earliest stages of the treaty, on receiving as a prompt payment, in case of sale, the same amount as paid (by Governor Clark) to them on a similar occasion. I found it necessary to comply with this request, and obtained for them the articles they wished, to the amount of four thousand dollars; for which their receipts are forwarded, to be credited, as you will perceive by the treaty, as a payment of that amount out of the fifteen thousand dollars, the consideration money for the land ceded.

I have been constrained to allow them a few reserves or donations to half-breeds resident in the nation. You will find them few and very limited, with the exception of James Scull's: he is a white man. The treaty itself presents a fair statement of his case. I would barely remark, that he is poor, with a numerous family; that the benevolence of his disposition tempted him to credit them for the specified amount, and that almost abject poverty will be the consequence of his failure to obtain remuneration.

The Indians will join the Caddoes, for which purpose they will immediately set on foot negotiations; their allowance of provisions is estimated as barely sufficient to enable them to reach their new home.

I have been in much pain at my inability to comply sooner with your wishes in holding this treaty; but the want of the essential articles for doing so, my being compelled to send to the banks of the Ohio for them, and the indisposition of my family during the summer, will, I hope, be deemed sufficient apologies.

I have had no precedents to guide me in this treaty, never having been at one previously. I apprehend, therefore, inaccuracies in the accounts, and possibly in the treaty. I am conscious that I paid the four thousand dollars on my own responsibility; the residue of the disbursement I designed to be strictly within the limits of your instructions—in their spirit, at least, where an obedience to the letter was impossible. For any further information relative to the disbursements or to the accounts forwarded, I refer you to Mr. Newton.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT CRITTENDEN.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

N. B.—I omitted to remark, in the body of my communication, that, as I had received six thousand four hundred dollars only out of the seven thousand five hundred dollars appropriated, and as the surplus on the account rendered is a strain on my limited means, I would be much obliged to you to forward the money, if consistently you can, from the residuum of the contingent appropriation.

[2d SESSION.

ABOLITION OF INDIAN TRADING-HOUSES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 21ST OF JANUARY, 1825.

*To the House of Representatives:*WASHINGTON, January 20, 1825.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th December, 1822, requesting the President to communicate "what progress has been made in the execution of the act of last session entitled 'An act to abolish the Indian trading establishment,' with a report from the factories, respectively, as the same may be made to him," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, with documents which contain the information requested.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 10, 1825.

I have the honor to submit, herewith, a report from the late agent for settling the concerns of the United States trading establishment with the Indians; which report, with those heretofore transmitted, contains the information requested by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th December, 1822, referred by you to this Department.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

INDIAN OFFICE, WASHINGTON, October 25, 1824.

I have the honor to submit the following statements, which, with those submitted on the 1st December last, embrace all the information called for by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th December, 1822, in the following words: "Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House what progress has been made in the execution of the act of last session, entitled 'An act to abolish the Indian trading establishment,' with a report from the factories, respectively, as the same may be made to him." The general statement, with the abstracts referred to therein, marked from A to N, inclusive, exhibit the amount and description of the property received by the agents appointed to wind up the concerns of the United States Indian trading establishment, from the superintendent of Indian trade and the factors, respectively. The papers numbered from No. 1 to No. 11 exhibit the amount of property received by the several agents, and their respective returns as to the disposition of it. From these statements, it will be seen that the merchandise, of every description, which was turned over to the agents by the superintendent and factors, has been sold; that the agents have accounted for the property thus turned over, and adjusted their accounts; and that the nett proceeds, so far as they have come into the hands of the principal agent, have been paid into the treasury. The consolidated statement, numbered 12, exhibits the total amount of property received by the new agents from the superintendent and factors; the total amount of salaries, commissions, and other expenses incurred in winding up the concern; the amount of debts not collected; the amount of buildings unsold; the amount of loss on the sales of merchandise, &c.; and the ascertained loss in winding up the concern to the 1st of October, 1824.

The factory buildings on the Arkansas and Red rivers, and that at Chicago, have been sold. The others have been put into the possession of officers commanding posts near where they are situated, to be disposed of, under instructions from the Department of War. The Indian agents residing at or near the late factories have been furnished with lists of the Indian and other debts due to them, respectively; and have been instructed, from the Department of War, to use their best endeavors to collect them. Many of the notes taken for sales of property, made by the new agents, are lying over under protests. They have all been placed in the hands of the United States district attorneys for collection, who have found it necessary to put some of them in suit. There is good reason, however, to believe that there will, eventually, be little or no loss in the collection of these notes, which are designated in the consolidated statement as "bills receivable."

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Late Agent.

To the Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of the Treasury.

SIR:

INDIAN OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, January 22, 1823.

I enclose a copy of a letter addressed by me to William Clark, Esq., superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis, with his answer, and have to request your instructions as to the propriety of sending the goods on hand at this office to St. Louis, or as to such other disposition of them as you may deem most expedient. The absence of all demand for goods adapted to the Indian trade in this District, together with the embarrassed state of its commerce, and the consequent scarcity of money, make it certain that the goods cannot be sold here, either at private or public sale, except, at an immense sacrifice. I would therefore suggest the propriety of sending them to St. Louis, to be disposed of in conformity to the suggestions stated in the enclosed communications; or of shipping them to New York, under the charge of an agent, with instructions to sell them at vendue. The reasons for or against either of these modes of disposing of the goods will so readily suggest themselves to you, that it is unnecessary for me to recapitulate them.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Agent.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of the Treasury.

SIR:

INDIAN OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, November 7, 1822.

I enclose you an invoice of the goods on hand at this office. Since the abolition of the Indian trading establishment, there is no demand at this place for Indian goods, and they cannot be sold here. I have proposed to the Secretary of the Treasury that they should be forwarded to you, to be used for Indian purposes for the years 1823 and 1824, and to be sold to individuals engaged in the Indian trade, allowing you a per centage on the amount disposed of by you, in either way. The goods are generally of good quality, particularly the woollens, which are excellent. As goods of this description are now lower than when these were imported, a deduction of twenty per cent. would be made on the invoice prices.

I must request the favor of you to inform me whether you think it probable that the goods could be disposed of in St. Louis, for Indian purposes, or otherwise; and whether you would undertake to dispose of the whole, or any part of them.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Agent.

Gen. WM. CLARK, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, St. Louis.

SIR:

St. Louis, December 18, 1822.

By the last mail I received your letter of the 7th of November, accompanied by an invoice of Indian goods in the public store at Georgetown, which you have proposed to the Secretary of the Treasury should be forwarded to me, to be used for Indian presents for the years 1823 and 1824, and to be sold to individuals in the Indian trade, &c.

You express a wish to be informed whether it is probable that those goods can be disposed of in St. Louis for Indian presents or otherwise; and whether I would undertake to dispose of the whole, or any part of them, allowing me a per centage on the amount disposed of.

As the goods are believed to be generally of good quality, I have no doubt but a part of them would answer very well for Indian presents. I think it probable that a part may be sold to Indian traders, on a credit; but I much doubt if those goods can be sold for cash, at the prices you propose, as, by deducting twenty per cent. from the first cost, the price of the goods will not be less than the same articles are sold by Messrs. Berthold, Chouteau, & Pratte; Messrs. Stone, Bostwick, & Co.; and Messrs. Crooks & Co., merchants engaged in the Indian trade at this place, who import their goods, of an excellent quality, and credit the traders whom they furnish until they make their trade with the Indians, which is usually one year.

In making sales of Indian goods to individual traders, it is important to have all such articles as may be necessary to make (what they call) an equipment, &c. I observe by the invoice that all these articles are not embraced in it; there is a very great difference in the proportion of the several articles. The proportion of guns and blankets is too small, and red strouding, glass, &c. too large for other articles. However, many of the articles may be disposed of at private sale; and such as cannot be disposed of in that way, I can advise no better plan than their being sold at auction, or reserved as presents, to be delivered at some treaty, or to quiet Indian claims; in effecting which, they may be usefully disposed of, and on better terms than being sold at auction; and I think it not improbable that there will be some demand in the ensuing year. If it is thought advisable to order these goods, or any others, to me, they shall be attended to, and I will dispose of them in any way you may advise. It may not be amiss to observe, that there are, in the warehouse belonging to the Indian Department at this place, a quantity of factory goods, which, I have reason to believe, are of such inferior quality that they will not sell for much, and in no other way than at vendue, even at this place, which is considered, from its situation, to be the best calculated to sell Indian goods of any town on the continent; yet it has not been possible for the agent to dispose of them at private sale. Should you determine to send the goods mentioned in the invoice, or any part of them, to this place, to be disposed of, it will be important that they arrive here very early in the spring.

I remain, with sentiments of respect, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM CLARK.

Mr. GEORGE GRAHAM.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 5, 1823.

I am directed by the President to request that the Indian goods now in your possession be sent to New York, to the address of Hone & Towns, of the firm of which Mr. Hone is a partner, with directions that, after reasonable notice, they be disposed of at auction, for notes payable to you, as principal agent, at sixty and ninety days, negotiable in the office of discount and deposit in New York.

I have also to request that the notes may be deposited in that office for collection.

I remain, with respect, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Esq. Principal Agent.

GENTLEMEN:

INDIAN OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, March 11, 1823.

By direction of the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, I herewith enclose you invoice and bill of lading of ninety-seven packages of merchandise, the property of the United States, shipped on board the sloop Abeona, William H. Nicholls, master, to your address, amounting to $31,175 28.

These goods you will please sell at auction, on a credit of sixty and ninety days, for notes with unexceptionable endorsers, negotiable and payable at the office of discount and deposit, New York, first giving two or three weeks notice of the sale in the papers of your city.

The notes you will deposit in that office for collection, and forward to me the cashier's receipt for them. As I have no samples of the goods to send you, it will be necessary to have the packages opened previous to the sale. I do not wish it to be known that the goods are the property of the United States, as purchasers are more apt to form combinations at the United States' sales than at those of individuals. I wish the tierces to be kept out of sight, as they would be immediately recognised as United States' property by persons engaged in the Indian trade. A large portion of the goods being strouds and blankets of the heaviest kinds, and well suited for the Indian trade, it is hoped they will command good prices. You will please forward your accounts as soon after closing the sales as practicable.

Very respectfully, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Agent.

Per JERE. W. BRONAUGH.

Messrs. HONE & TOWNS, New York.

SIR:

NEW YORK, March 17, 1823.

We have received this morning your favor of the 11th instant, with invoice and bill of lading of ninety-seven packages, shipped on board the Abeona, to our address. The vessel has not yet arrived, but, as soon as she gets here, you may rely upon our paying every attention to your instructions with regard to the goods.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Esq.

J. & P. HONE, & Co.

GENTLEMEN:

INDIAN OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, May 3, 1823.

Your favor of the 17th March last I duly received; in which you acknowledge the receipt of my letter of the 11th of March, covering invoice and bill of lading of sundry packages of goods forwarded to you, per the sloop Abeona, for sale at auction. Not having since heard from you, I beg the favor of you to inform me whether the vessel arrived safe, and what progress you have made in disposing of the goods.

Respectfully,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Agent.
Per JERE. W. BRONAUGH.To Messrs. J. & P. HONE, & Co., New York.

SIR:

NEW YORK, May 5, 1823.

Herewith, we send account of sales of ninety-seven packages of merchandise, shipped by you to our address, by direction of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury. As you, doubtless, were aware of the depreciation of every description of merchandise since these goods were purchased, we presume you are prepared for the loss which our account exhibits.

We send certificate of deposit, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States,	-	-	$2,602 97
Sundry notes, as entered in bank book, (a loose receipt being refused,)	-	-	8,041 43
Which items, with discounts allowed for cash,	-	-	37 95
And cash paid for freight,	-	-	112 87
Make the nett amount of sales,	-	-	$10,795 22

At this season of the year, when the pressure of business employs every class of the mercantile community, we find considerable delay in making our collections. This has retarded our settlement with you longer than we wished, but we presume that no inconvenience has resulted to you.

We are, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

J. & P. HONE, & Co.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Esq., Agent Indian Office, Georgetown, D. C.

GENTLEMEN:

INDIAN OFFICE, GEORGETOWN, May 16, 1823.

Your letter of the 5th instant, covering your account of sales, was duly received. Although I was prepared to expect considerable loss on the sale of the goods, yet I must confess that the loss which has been incurred has very far exceeded any calculations which I had made upon the subject. The money and notes, the proceeds of the sales, should have been deposited in bank to my credit, as agent. I have written to the cashier, and forwarded the orders of the Treasurer on the subject, and will thank you to call at the bank and have the proper entries made.

With great respect, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

GEORGE GRAHAM, Agent.

Messrs. J. & P. HONE, & Co., New York.

No. 218.

[2d SESSION.

PLAN FOR REMOVING THE SEVERAL INDIAN TRIBES WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 27, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 27, 1825.

Being deeply impressed with the opinion that the removal of the Indian tribes from the lands which they now occupy, within the limits of the several States and Territories, to the country lying westward and northward thereof, within our acknowledged boundaries, is of very high importance to our Union, and may be accomplished on conditions and in a manner to promote the interest and happiness of those tribes, the attention of the Government has been long drawn with great solicitude to that object. For the removal of the tribes within the limits of the State of Georgia, the motive has been peculiarly strong, arising from the compact with that State, whereby the United States are bound to extinguish the Indian title to the lands within it, whenever it may be done peaceably and on reasonable conditions. In the fulfilment of this compact, I have thought that the United States should act with a generous spirit; that they should omit nothing which should comport with a liberal construction of the instrument, and likewise be in accordance with the just rights of those tribes. From the view which I have taken of the subject, I am satisfied that, in the discharge of these important duties, in regard to both the parties alluded to, the United States will have to encounter no conflicting interests with either; on the contrary, that the removal of the tribes from the territory which they now inhabit to that which was designated in the message at the commencement of the session, which would accomplish the object for Georgia, under a well-digested plan for their government and civilization which should be agreeable to themselves, would not only shield them from impending ruin, but promote their welfare and happiness. Experience has clearly demonstrated that, in their present state, it is impossible to incorporate them in such masses, in any form whatever, into our system. It has also demonstrated, with equal certainty, that, without a timely anticipation of, and provision against, the dangers to which they are exposed, under causes which it will be difficult, if not impossible, to control, their degradation and extermination will be inevitable.

The great object to be accomplished is, the removal of these tribes to the territory designated, on conditions which shall be satisfactory to themselves and honorable to the United States. This can be done only by conveying to each tribe a good title to an adequate portion of land to which it may consent to remove; and by providing for it there a system of internal government, which shall protect their property from invasion, and, by the regular progress of improvement and civilization, prevent that degeneracy which has generally marked the transition from the one to the other state.

I transmit, herewith, a report from the Secretary of War, which presents the best estimate which can be formed, from the documents in that Department, of the number of Indians within our States and Territories, and of the amount of lands held by the several tribes within each; of the state of the country lying northward and westward thereof, within our acknowledged boundaries; of the parts to which the Indian title has already been extinguished; and of the conditions on which other parts, in an amount which may be adequate to the object contemplated, may be obtained. By this report, it appears that the Indian title has already been extinguished to extensive tracts in that quarter, and that other portions may be acquired, to the extent desired, on very moderate conditions. Satisfied I also am that the removal proposed is not only practicable, but that the advantages attending it to the Indians may be made so apparent to them, that all the tribes, even those most opposed, may be induced to accede to it at no very distant day.

The digest of such a government, with the consent of the Indians, which should be endowed with sufficient power to meet all the objects contemplated; to connect the several tribes together in a bond of amity, and preserve order in each; to prevent intrusions on their property; to teach them, by regular instruction, the arts of civilized life, and make them a civilized people, is an object of very high importance. It is the powerful consideration which we have to offer to these tribes as an inducement to relinquish the lands on which they now reside, and to remove to those which are designated. It is not doubted that this arrangement will present considerations of sufficient force to surmount all their prejudices in favor of the soil of their nativity, however strong they may be. Their elders have sufficient intelligence to discern the certain progress of events in the present train, and sufficient virtue, by yielding to momentary sacrifices, to protect their families and posterity from inevitable destruction. They will also perceive that they may thus attain an elevation to which, as communities, they could not otherwise aspire.

To the United States, the proposed arrangement offers many important advantages, in addition to those which have been already enumerated. By the establishment of such a government over these tribes, with their consent, we become, in reality, their benefactors. The relation of conflicting interests, which has heretofore existed between them and our frontier settlements, will cease. There will be no more wars between them and the United States. Adopting such a government, their movement will be in harmony with us, and its good effect be felt throughout the whole extent of our territory, to the Pacific. It may fairly be presumed that, through the agency of such a government, the condition of all the tribes inhabiting that vast region may be essentially improved; that permanent peace may be preserved with them, and our commerce be much extended.

With a view to this important object, I recommend it to Congress to adopt, by solemn declarations, certain fundamental principles, in accord with those above suggested, as the basis of such arrangements as may be entered into with the several tribes; to the strict observance of which, the faith of the nation shall be pledged. I recommend it also to Congress to provide, by law, for the appointment of a suitable number of commissioners, who shall, under the direction of the President, be authorized to visit and explain to the several tribes the objects of the Government, and to make with them, according to their instructions, such arrangements as shall be best calculated to carry those objects into effect.

A negotiation is now depending with the Creek nation for the cession of lands held by it within the limits of Georgia, and with a reasonable prospect of success. It is presumed, however, that the result will not be known during the present session of Congress. To give effect to this negotiation, and to the negotiations which it is proposed to hold with all the other tribes within the limits of the several States and Territories, on the principles and for the purposes stated, it is recommended that an adequate appropriation be now made by Congress.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 24, 1825.

In obedience to your instructions, directing a statement of the names of the Indian tribes now remaining within the limits of the different States and Territories, the number of each tribe, and the quantity of land claimed by each; also, an estimate of the amount of appropriation necessary to commence the work of moving the Indians beyond the Mississippi, to be laid before you, I herewith enclose a report from Colonel McKenney, to whom is assigned the charge of the Office of Indian Affairs, which contains all of the information required, except the estimate of the sum that will be necessary to be appropriated to commence the removal.

In forming the estimate required, it will be necessary to take a summary view of the number and position of the several tribes to be removed, and to form a plan in detail for their removal.

It appears, by the report enclosed, that there are in the several States and Territories (not including the portion of Michigan Territory west of Lake Michigan and north of the State of Illinois (about 97,000 Indians, and that they occupy about 77,000,000 of acres of land.

The arrangement for the removal; it is presumed, is not intended to comprehend the small remnants of tribes in Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Virginia, and South Carolina, amounting to 3,023. To these also may be added the remnants of tribes remaining in Louisiana, amounting to 1,313, as they are each of them so few in number that it is believed very little expense or difficulty will be found in their removal; making, together, 4,336: which subtracted from the 97,000, the entire number in the States and Territories, will leave 92,664 to be removed. Of these, there are residing in the northern parts of the States of Indiana, Illinois, in the peninsula of Michigan, and New York, including the Ottawas in Ohio, about 13,150, which, I would respectfully suggest, might be removed, with advantage to the country, west of Lake Michigan and north of the State of Illinois. The climate and the nature of the country are much more favorable to their habits than that west of the Mississippi; to which may be added, that the Indians in New York have already commenced a settlement at Green Bay, and exhibit some disposition to make it a permanent one; and that the Indians referred to in Indiana, Illinois, in the peninsula of Michigan, and Ohio, will find in the country designated kindred tribes, with whom they may be readily associated. These considerations, with the greater facility with which they could be collected in that portion of the country, compared with that of collecting them west of the Mississippi, form a strong inducement to give it the preference. Should the proposition be adopted, the Indians in question might be gradually collected, as it became necessary, from time to time, to extinguish the Indian title in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, without incurring any additional expense other than what is usually incidental to such extinguishment. Deducting, then, the Indians residing in the northwestern parts of Indiana, Illinois, in Michigan, and New York, with the Ottawas in Ohio, amounting to 13,150, from 92,664, will leave but 79,514. It is proper to add, that a late treaty with the Quapaws stipulates and provides for their removal, and that they may also be deducted from the number for whose removal provision ought to be made. They are estimated at 700, which, deducted from 79,514, will leave 78,814 to be removed west of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, should the views of the Department be adopted.

Of these, there are estimated to reside in the States of North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, 53,625, consisting of Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and claiming about 33,573,176 acres, including the claim of the Cherokees, in North Carolina; 3,082 in Ohio, and in the southern and middle parts of Indiana and Illinois, consisting of Wyandots, Shawanees, Senecas, Delawares, Kaskaskias, Miamies, and Eel Rivers; 5,000 in Florida, consisting of Seminoles and remnants of other tribes; and the remainder in Missouri and Arkansas, consisting of Delawares, Kickapoos, Shawanees, Weas, Ioways, Piankeshaws, Cherokees, Quapaws, and Osages.

The next subject of consideration will be to acquire a sufficient tract of country west of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, in order to establish permanent settlements in that quarter of the tribes which are proposed to be removed. The country between the Red river and the Arkansas has already been allotted to the Choctaws, under the treaty of the 18th October, 1820. The country north of the river Arkansas, and immediately west of the State of Missouri, is held almost entirely by the Osages and the Kansas: the principal settlement of the former being on the Osage river, not far west of the western boundary of Missouri; and of the latter, on the Missouri river, near Cow Island. There is a band of the Osages situated on the Verdigris, a branch of the Arkansas. Governor Clark has been already instructed to take measures to remove them from the Verdigris, to join the other bands on the Osage river. To carry this object into effect, and to extinguish the title of the Osages upon the Arkansas and in the State of Missouri, and also to extinguish the title of the Kansas to whatever tract of country may be necessary to effect the views of the Government, will be the first object of expenditure, and would require an appropriation, it is believed, of not less than $30,000. After this is effected, the next will be to allot a portion of the country to each of the tribes, and to commence the work of removal. The former could be effected by vesting in the President discretionary power to make the location; and the latter, by commencing with the removal of the Cherokees, Piankeshaws, Weas, Shawanees, Kickapoos, and Delawares, who now occupy different tracts of country lying in the northwestern portion of the Arkansas Territory, and the southwestern portion of the State of Missouri. It is believed that the Cherokees, to whom has been allotted a country lying between the Arkansas and White rivers, will very readily agree to removing their eastern boundary farther west, on the consideration that, for the lands thereby ceded, they may have assigned to them an equal quantity farther west, as they have evinced a strong disposition to prevent the settlement of the whites to the west of them. It is probable that this arrangement could be effected by an appropriation of a few thousand dollars, (say five thousand,) for the expense of holding the treaty. Nor is it believed that there will be any difficulty in inducing the Piankeshaws, Weas, Shawanees, Kickapoos, and Delawares to occupy a position that may be assigned to them west of the State of Missouri, or that the operation will be attended with any great expense. The kindred tribes in the States of Ohio and Indiana, including the Wyandots, the Senecas, and the Miamies and Eel Rivers, in those States, and the Kaskaskias in Illinois, it is believed, might be induced, without much difficulty, to join them, after those now residing in Missouri are fixed in their new position west of that State. Of the sum that will be necessary for this purpose, it is difficult to form an estimate. These tribes amount to 3,082. The expense of extinguishing their title to the lands occupied by them will probably be high, in comparison with the price which has been usually given for lands in that quarter, as they (particularly the Indians in Ohio) have made some advances in civilization and considerable improvements on their lands. The better course would be to remove them gradually, commencing with those tribes which are most disposed to leave their present settlements; and if this arrangement should be adopted, an appropriation of $20,000 would be sufficient to commence with.

It may, however, be proper to remark, that these tribes, together with those in New York, have indicated a disposition to join the Cherokees on the Arkansas; and that a deputation of the former, with a deputation from those Cherokees, are now on their way to the seat of Government, in order to make some arrangement to carry the proposed union into effect. Should it be accomplished, it would vary the arrangement which has been suggested in relation to them, but will not probably materially vary the expense.

It only remains now to consider the removal of the Indians in Florida, and the four southern tribes residing in North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi.

It is believed that immediate measures need not be taken with regard to the Indians in Florida. By the treaty of the 18th September, 1823, they ceded the whole of the northern portion of Florida, with the exception of a few small reservations, and have had allotted to them the southern part of the peninsula; and it is probable that no inconvenience will be felt, for many years, either by the inhabitants of Florida, or the Indians, under the present arrangement.

Of the four southern tribes, two of them (the Cherokees and Choctaws) have already allotted to them a tract of country west of the Mississippi. That which has been allotted to the latter is believed to be sufficiently ample for the whole nation, should they emigrate; and if an arrangement, which is believed not to be impracticable, could be made between them and the Chickasaws, who are their neighbors, and of similar habits and dispositions, it would be sufficient for the accommodation of both. A sufficient country should be reserved to the west of the Cherokees on the Arkansas, as a means of exchange with those who remain on the east. To the Creeks might be allotted a country between the Arkansas and the Canadian river, which limits the northern boundary of the Choctaw possessions in that quarter. There is now pending with the Creeks a negotiation, under the appropriation of the last session, with a prospect that the portion of that nation which resides within the limits of Georgia may be induced, with the consent of the nation, to cede the country which they now occupy for a portion of the one which it is proposed to allot for the Creek nation on the west of the Mississippi. Should the treaty prove successful, its stipulations will provide for the means of carrying it into effect, which will render any additional provision, at present, unnecessary. It will be proper to open new communications with the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, for the purpose of explaining to them the views of the Government, and inducing them to remove beyond the Mississippi, on the principles and conditions which may be proposed to the other tribes. It is known that there are many individuals of each of the tribes who are desirous of settling west of the Mississippi, and, should it be thought advisable, there can be no doubt that (if, by an adequate appropriation, the means were afforded the Government of bearing their expense) they would emigrate. Should it be thought that the encouragement of such emigration is desirable, the sum of $40,000, at least, would be required to be appropriated for this object, to be applied under the discretion of the President of the United States. The several sums which have been recommended to be appropriated, if the proposed arrangement should be adopted, amount to $95,000. The appropriation may be made either general or specific, as may be considered most advisable.

I cannot, however, conclude without remarking, that no arrangement ought to be made which does not regard the interest of the Indians as well as our own; and that, to protect the interest of the former, decisive measures ought to be adopted to prevent the hostility which must almost necessarily take place, if left to themselves, among tribes hastily brought together, of discordant character, and many of which are actuated by feelings far from being friendly towards each other. But the preservation of peace between them will not alone be sufficient to render their condition as eligible in their new situation as it is in their present. Almost all of the tribes proposed to be affected by the arrangement are more or less advanced in the arts of civilized life, and there is scarcely one of them which has not the establishments of schools in the nation, affording, at once, the means of moral, religious, and intellectual improvement. These schools have been established, for the most part, by religious societies, with the countenance and aid of the Government; and, on every principle of humanity, the continuance of similar advantages of education ought to be extended to them in their new residence. There is another point which appears to be indispensable to be guarded, in order to render the condition of this race less afflicting. One of the greatest evils to which they are subject is that incessant pressure of our population, which forces them from seat to seat, without allowing time for that moral and intellectual improvement, for which they appear to be naturally eminently susceptible. To guard against this evil, so fatal to the race, there ought to be the strongest and the most solemn assurance that the country given them should be theirs, as a permanent home for themselves and their posterity, without being disturbed by the encroachments of our citizens. To such assurance, if there should be added a system, by which the Government, without destroying their independence, would gradually unite the several tribes under a simple but enlightened system of government and laws formed on the principles of our own, and to which, as their own people would partake in it, they would, under the influence of the contemplated improvement, at no distant day, become prepared, the arrangements which have been proposed would prove to the Indians and their posterity a permanent blessing. It is believed that, if they could be assured that peace and friendship would be maintained among the several tribes; that the advantages of education, which they now enjoy, would be extended to them; that they should have a permanent and solemn guaranty for their possessions, and receive the countenance and aid of the Government for the gradual extension of its privileges to them, there would be among all the tribes a disposition to accord with the views of the Government. There are now, in most of the tribes, well educated, sober, and reflecting individuals, who are afflicted at the present condition of the Indians, and despondent at their future prospects. Under the operation of existing causes, they behold the certain degradation, misery, and even the final annihilation of their race, and, no doubt, would gladly embrace any arrangement which would promise to elevate them in the scale of civilization, and arrest the destruction which now awaits them. It is conceived that one of the most cheap, certain, and desirable modes of effecting the object in view, would be for Congress to establish fixed principles, such as have been suggested, as the basis of the proposed arrangement; and to authorize the President to convene, at some suitable point, all of the well-informed, intelligent, and influential individuals of the tribes to be affected by it, in order to explain to them the views of the Government, and to pledge the faith of the nation to the arrangements that might be adopted. Should such principles be established by Congress, and the President be vested with suitable authority to convene the individuals as proposed, and suitable provision be made to meet the expense, great confidence is felt that a basis of a system might be laid, which, in a few years, would entirely effect the object in view, to the mutual benefit of the Government and the Indians; and which, in its operations, would effectually arrest the calamitous course of events to which they must be subject, without a radical change in the present system. Should it be thought advisable to call such a convention, as one of the means of effecting the object in view, an additional appropriation of $30,000 will be required; making, in the whole, $125,000 to be appropriated.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, January 10, 1825.

I have the honor herewith to submit, in compliance with your directions, a table containing a statement of the names of the Indian tribes now remaining within the limits of the different States and Territories, the number of each tribe, and the quantity of land claimed by each.

There is no land assigned (as will be seen on reference to the table) to the Indians in Louisiana; yet it is believed the Caddoes have a claim, (but to what extent is not known;) so also have the Cherokees, (whose numbers are not known,) to a tract in the northwest corner of the State of North Carolina, which, it is believed, does not exceed 200,000 acres. In New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and perhaps in Maryland, a few Indians are remaining; but how many, or what quantity of land is owned by them, (if any,) there are no means of ascertaining.

There are now remaining within the limits of the different States and Territories, (as is shown by the table,) sixty-four tribes and remnants of tribes of Indians, whose "names" and "numbers" are given; who number, in the aggregate, 129,266 souls, and who claim 77,402,318 acres of land.

It will be seen, by adverting to the table, that the Indians residing north of the State of Illinois, east of the Mississippi, and west of the lakes, are comprehended in the estimate of the number in Michigan Territory; although, in estimating the quantity of land held by Indians in that Territory, the portion only so held in the peninsula of Michigan is estimated. It was found impossible, from any documents in possession of this office, to distinguish the number of Chippewas and Ottawas residing in the peninsula of Michigan, from those residing on the west side of Lake Michigan. It is, however, believed that the whole number residing in the peninsula does not exceed 3,500; and these, as has been stated, are principally of the Chippewa and Ottawa tribes.

It may be proper also to remark, that of the 6,400 Sacs and Foxes, who are included in the estimate as part of the 129,266, and who occupy lands on both sides the Mississippi, not more than one-third of that number are supposed to reside on the east side; and of the 5,200 Osages, who by the table are assigned to Missouri and Arkansas, it is believed that not more than one-third of that number reside within the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas. If, therefore, the number assumed for the peninsula of Michigan be correct, and two-thirds of the Sacs and Foxes (as is believed to be the fact) reside on the west of the Mississippi, and two-thirds of the Osages west of Missouri and north of Arkansas, there will remain "within the limits of the different States and Territories" (confining the Michigan Territory to the peninsula) 97,384 Indians, possessing (if the 200,000 acres which are believed to be claimed by the Cherokees in North Carolina be added) 77,602,318 acres of land.

In obtaining this information, resort has been had for the "names" and "numbers" of the Indian tribes to the reports to this office, and to other sources of information which are deemed to be the most accurate; and for the quantity of land claimed by them, to the files of this office, to the General Land Office, and to computations carefully made from the best maps, by Colonel Roberdeau of the Topographical Bureau.

The 4,000,000 acres assumed as the quantity claimed by the Cherokees in Arkansas, although but an estimate, is believed to be nearly correct. The precise quantity, however, cannot be ascertained, until it is known how much they ceded on this side the Mississippi, for which, by the treaty of 1817, they are to receive an equal number of acres on the other.

I have the honor to accompany this with a note from Colonel Roberdeau in relation to the difference between his estimate of last year, of the lands claimed in Georgia, and his recent corrected computation of them.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

THOS. L. MCKENNEY.

To the Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU, January 10, 1825.

The quantity of land in the State of Georgia not ceded to the United States by Indians was, last year, reported at 10,240,000 square acres. Upon a review of the calculations, and having more correct documents than were then referred to, the whole quantity in the State appears to be 9,537,920 acres; of which 5,292,160 are of the Cherokees, and 4,245,760 of the Creeks, as nearly as can be computed.

I. ROBERDEAU,
Lieutenant Colonel Topographical Engineers.

Colonel THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Indian Department.

[2d SESSION.]

TREATY WITH THE CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 27TH JANUARY, 1825.

*To the Senate of the United States:*WASHINGTON, January 27, 1825.

I transmit to the Senate a treaty concluded in this city with a deputation from the Choctaw Indians, accompanied with a report from the Secretary of War, with a copy of the correspondence connected with the negotiation, for the advice and consent of the Senate.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 22, 1825.

I have the honor to lay before you the enclosed treaty, which has been concluded with the Choctaw delegation, together with the correspondence relating thereto.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

TREATY WITH THE CHOCTAWS.

Articles of a convention made between John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, being specially authorized therefor by the President of the United States; and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Choctaw nation of Indians, duly authorized and empowered by said nation, at the city of Washington, on the twentieth day of January, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-five.

Whereas a treaty of friendship, and limits, and accommodation, having been entered into at Doak's Stand, on the eighteenth of October, in the year eighteen hundred and twenty, between Andrew Jackson and Thomas Hinds, commissioners on the part of the United States, and the chiefs and warriors of the Choctaw nation of Indians: and whereas the second article of the treaty aforesaid provides for a cession of lands west of the Mississippi, to the Choctaw nation, in part satisfaction for lands ceded by said nation to the United States, according to the first article of said treaty: and whereas, it being ascertained that the cession aforesaid embraces a large number of settlers, citizens of the United States; and it being the desire of the President of the United States to obviate all difficulties resulting therefrom, and also to adjust other matters in which both the United States and the Choctaw nation are interested: the following articles have been agreed upon and concluded between John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, specially authorized therefor by the President of the United States, on the one part, and the undersigned delegates of the Choctaw nation, on the other part:

ARTICLE 1. The Choctaw nation do hereby cede to the United States all that portion of the land ceded to them by the second article of the treaty of Doak's Stand, as aforesaid, lying east of a line beginning on the Arkansas, one hundred paces east of Fort Smith, and running thence, due south, to Red river; it being understood that this line shall constitute and remain the permanent boundary between the United States and the Choctaws; and the United States agreeing to remove such citizens as may be settled on the west side to the east side of said line, and prevent future settlements from being made on the west thereof.

ART. 2. In consideration of the cession aforesaid, the United States do hereby agree to pay the said Choctaw nation the sum of six thousand dollars, annually, forever; it being agreed that the said sum of six thousand dollars shall be annually applied, for the term of twenty years, under the direction of the President of the United States, to the support of schools in said nation, and extending to it the benefits of instruction in the mechanic and ordinary arts of life; when, at the expiration of twenty years, it is agreed that the said annuity may be vested in stocks, or otherwise disposed of, or continued, at the option of the Choctaw nation.

ART. 3. The eighth article of the treaty aforesaid having provided that an appropriation of lands shall be made for the purpose of raising six thousand dollars a year, for sixteen years, for the use of the Choctaw nation; and it being desirable to avoid the delay and expense attending the survey and sale of said land; the United States do hereby agree to pay the Choctaw nation, in lieu thereof, the sum of six thousand dollars, annually, for sixteen years, to commence with the present year. And the United States further stipulate and agree to take immediate measures to survey, and bring into market, and sell the fifty-four sections of land set apart by the seventh article of the treaty aforesaid, and apply the proceeds in the manner provided by the said article.

ART. 4. It is provided by the ninth section of the treaty aforesaid that all those of the Choctaw nation who have separate settlements, and fall within the limits of the land ceded by said nation to the United States, and desire to remain where they now reside, shall be secured in a tract or parcel of land, one mile square, to include their improvements. It is, therefore, hereby agreed, that all who have reservations, in conformity to said stipulation, shall have power, with the consent of the President of the United States, to sell and convey the same in fee-simple. It is further agreed, on the part of the United States, that those Choctaws, not exceeding four in number, who applied for reservations, and received the recommendation of the commissioners, (as per annexed copy of said recommendation,) shall have the privilege, and the right is hereby given to them, to select, each of them, a portion of land, not exceeding a mile square, any where within the limits of the cession of eighteen hundred and twenty, where the land is not occupied or disposed of by the United States; and the right to sell and convey the same, with the consent of the President, in fee-simple, is hereby granted.

ART. 5. There being a debt due by individuals of the Choctaw nation to the late United States trading-house on the Tombigbee, the United States hereby agree to relinquish the same; the delegation, on the part of their nation, agreeing to relinquish their claim upon the United States to send a factor with goods to supply the wants of the Choctaws west of the Mississippi, as provided for by the sixth article of the treaty aforesaid.

ART. 6. The Choctaw nation having a claim upon the United States for services rendered in the Pensacola campaign, and for which it is stipulated, in the eleventh article of the treaty aforesaid, that payment shall be made, (but which has been delayed for want of the proper vouchers, which it has been found, as yet, impossible to obtain,) the United States, to obviate the inconvenience of further delay, and to render justice to the Choctaw warriors for their services in that campaign, do hereby agree upon an equitable settlement of the same, and fix the sum at fourteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-two dollars and fifty cents; which, from the muster rolls, and other evidence in the possession of the Third Auditor, appears to be about the probable amount due for the services aforesaid; and which sum shall be immediately paid to the delegation, to be distributed by them to the chiefs and warriors of their nation, who served in the campaign aforesaid, as may appear to them to be just.

ART. 7. It is further agreed, that the fourth article of the treaty aforesaid shall be so modified, as that the Congress of the United States shall not exercise the power of apportioning the lands, for the benefit of each family or individual of the Choctaw nation, and of bringing them under the laws of the United States, but with the consent of the Choctaw nation.

ART. 8. It appearing that the Choctaws have various claims against citizens of the United States for spoliations of various kinds, but which they have not been able to support by the testimony of white men, as they were led to believe was necessary, the United States, in order to a final settlement of all such claims, do hereby agree to pay to the Choctaw delegation the sum of two thousand dollars, to be distributed by them in such way, among the claimants, as they may deem equitable. It being understood that this provision is not to affect such claims as may be properly authenticated, according to the provision of the act of eighteen hundred and twenty.

ART. 9. It is further agreed, that, immediately upon the ratification of this treaty, or as soon thereafter as may be, an agent shall be appointed for the Choctaws west of the Mississippi, and a blacksmith be settled among them, in conformity with the stipulation contained in the sixth article of the treaty of eighteen hundred and twenty.

ART. 10. The chief Puck-she-nub-bee, one of the members of the delegation, having died on his journey to see the President, and Robert Cole being recommended by the delegation as his successor, it is hereby agreed that the said Robert Cole shall receive the medal which appertains to the office of chief; and, also, an annuity from the United States, of one hundred and fifty dollars a year, during his natural life, as was received by his predecessor.

ART. 11. The friendship heretofore existing between the United States and the Choctaw nation is hereby renewed and perpetuated.

ART. 12. These articles shall take effect and become obligatory on the contracting parties so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said John C. Calhoun, and the said delegates of the Choctaw nation, have hereunto set their hands, at the city of Washington, the twentieth day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-five.

WASHINGTON CITY, November 8, 1824.

The Choctaw delegation, in opening the business of their mission, submit the following remarks to the Secretary of War:

At a period about two years subsequent to the treaty which was made with our nation in the autumn of the year 1820, some of the chiefs were notified by Colonel William Ward, the United States agent, that it was the desire of the Government to procure a modification of that treaty; and that, for that purpose, commissioners had been, or would be, appointed to meet the Choctaws in council. We were at that time surprised at the proposition, especially when we understood that the contemplated treaty was with a view of repurchasing some of the lands which had been ceded to the Choctaws beyond the Mississippi river. Some of us had been beyond the Mississippi previous to the treaty of 1820, and knew that white settlers were on the land proposed to be ceded. General Jackson was informed of the fact. He stated that the arm of Government was strong, and that the settlers should be removed. They have not, however, been removed; nor have we learned that any efforts have been made to effect their removal.

We told the United States agent that we were not, at that time, willing to meet the commissioners. We wished to visit our great father the President of the United States, and hold a talk with him. We had often met commissioners. We had stated to them, at different times, some of the many grievances under which we labored; and we had asked for redress. They had uniformly stated, in reply, that they were unable to grant it; that their powers were limited.

We, therefore, on this occasion, wished to visit the President of the United States, (the fountain-head of power,) and have a full understanding with him on all the points of difference between our white brothers and ourselves. We have accordingly arrived here, (after an interval of more than twenty years since our last visit,) and have presented ourselves before you as the representative of the President. We wish now to hear from you what talk those commissioners had been authorized to deliver to our council, and what propositions they had been empowered to make.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 9, 1824.

Since my conversation with you yesterday, I have examined more fully the maps and communication in relation to the eastern boundary line, established by the treaty of the 18th October, 1820, of the cession made under the said treaty to the Choctaws, between Red river and the Arkansas. I find, by reference to the documents, that our surveys and settlement on Red river extend quite up to the mouth of the Kiamsha; and that a line, to comprehend our settlements, must run as far west as that point. From the mouth of the Kiamsha to the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, established by an act of the last session of Congress, is a distance of but a few miles; and as that Territory has expressed an anxious desire that that should be established as the eastern boundary of the Choctaw cession, the President instructs me to say that he will be much gratified if the delegation will agree to fix it as the boundary. It would certainly possess many advantages for a boundary; among which is not the least prominent, that it would be permanent. There is no probability that any State or Territory will be erected to the west of the Arkansas Territory, which would leave the Choctaws, who might choose to emigrate, a quiet and undisturbed possession of the immense country lying between the Arkansas and Red rivers, and the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, and the boundary between the United States and Mexico; being a country of not less than three hundred by one hundred and twenty miles, and amply sufficient for the wants of the whole Choctaw nation. Should the line, on the contrary, be drawn any where to the east of the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, so as to include within the cession to the Choctaws a part of that Territory, there is no likelihood that such a boundary would be permanent, as there is every reason to believe that the people of that Territory would never rest satisfied until the Indian title was extinguished to its western boundary.

In order that you may have a just idea of the country in question, I herewith enclose the latest and most accurate map of that portion of the United States, which may be relied upon as sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes. The line marked A and B, drawn in red ink, indicates the boundary, as established by the treaty of the 18th of October, 1820; a line, also drawn in red, marked C and D, indicates the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, the line proposed to be established by the Government; and the line marked E and F, the western boundary between the United States and Mexico.

I am authorized by the President to state, that, should the delegation agree to the line proposed to be established, he is willing to make a reasonable and adequate compensation to the Choctaws for the country which may be thereby ceded.

Should, however, the delegation not approve of the line proposed to be established, I should be glad if they would state their ideas upon what ought to be the boundary line, and their proposal as to where it should run.

I also suggested, yesterday, that it was the desire of the Government to extinguish part of the Choctaw title to lands joining the county of Monroe, in the State of Mississippi. In making this proposition, it is not the desire of the Government to acquire more land in that quarter; but that county lying detached from all the others in the State, and it being insufficient in itself, under the constitution of the State, to form a judicial district, subjects the people of the county to great inconvenience. Under these circumstances, the President would view in a very favorable light a cession contiguous to that county, sufficient to form two or three counties, in order to form a judicial district, and thereby remove the inconvenience now experienced.

If the delegation accede to the request, I am authorized by the President to state that a liberal and fair compensation will be made, not only for the land ceded, but to the individuals who may have improvements lying within such cession.

I shall be glad to hear from the delegation, either in writing or verbally, on both those points.

I am, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

To the CHOCTAW DELEGATION, now in Washington.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 12, 1824.

We have received and considered your proposal in relation to our lands beyond the Mississippi, and also in relation to a cession of land adjoining Monroe county. This latter proposition we will first dispose of.

After a full discussion among ourselves, we have come to the conclusion that we cannot sell any more of our lands bordering on the Tombigbee. The Government must be satisfied of our friendly disposition towards our white brothers. In war, we have given them our assistance; and in peace, we have endeavored to show our hospitality. Our determination, therefore, cannot be supposed to result from any unfriendly feeling. It is the result of a thorough conviction on our own minds that we act in conformity with the wishes of our countrymen. About eight years since, we held a treaty with certain commissioners, of whom General Coffee was one. At that time, we sold all our lands lying east of the Tombigbee. We had hoped that that would have been the last request to sell more lands in that quarter. We were induced to hope so from the assurances of the commissioners. We were told that, by selling our lands east of the Tombigbee, and confining ourselves entirely to the west side, we should establish a good boundary; having the Mississippi on one side, and the Tombigbee on the other, there was a reasonable prospect that our limits would be permanent. We cannot consent to change the line. We wish that the Tombigbee should continue to be our boundary on the east.

We now come to consider your proposition in relation to our lands between the Arkansas and Red rivers. You propose to purchase all our lands lying within the Arkansas Territory. We do not feel ourselves authorized to sell so much. We consider it a misfortune that our white brothers are settled on the lands which were ceded to us; and it is our earnest desire to effect an amicable and satisfactory arrangement, so as to accommodate our white brothers of the Arkansas, without injuring ourselves. We are willing to sell that portion which is most thickly populated, and not more. Take us to the western boundary of the Arkansas Territory, and you take all our valuable land. You bring us, also, in contact with Indian tribes who are in enmity with us. On the banks of the Red river, and below the Kiamsha, the lands are fertile. There, our people could settle; some might cultivate the land, and some would live by hunting. We do not wish that our people should always live by hunting. We wish them to live where there are inducements to agriculture. Beyond the Kiamsha we meet with nothing but prairies. That tract of country is by no means so valuable as that on which the white people are settled. We are not, therefore, willing to sell so much as you require, but we are willing to sell some.

That portion of country which we propose ceding, (provided we receive adequate compensation,) lies between the Washita and Red rivers, and is bounded as follows: Up the Washita, from the point where the Choctaw boundary line crosses the same, to its source; thence, south, to that point on Red river where the Spanish line strikes the same; thence, down Red river, to the present boundary line; thence, to the place of beginning.

This section of country we believe to be the most thickly populated. We know it to be valuable; but our white brothers are there, and we wish to live in peace and harmony with them. We make our proposition in the spirit of accommodation; and we trust you will regard it as proceeding from the most friendly feelings and motives.

Respectfully, your friends and brothers,

PUSHAMATAHAH,
MOOSHULATUBBEE,
ROBERT COLE,
DANIEL McCURTAIN,
TALKING WARRIOR,
RED FORT,
NITTUCKACHEE,
DAVID FOLSOM,
J. L. McDONALD.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 15, 1824.

I have laid your communication of the 12th instant before the President, who has given it due consideration.

The object of the Government, as stated in a former communication, in wishing to acquire additional territory adjoining the county of Monroe, in the State of Mississippi, was not for the desire of obtaining more lands, but for the accommodation of that State in the arrangement of its courts. The President regrets that you have made a final decision against the cession.

In proposing the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas as a limit between the United States and the Choctaws' possession beyond the Mississippi, it was the sincere wish of the President to fix upon a boundary that would be permanent between the United States and the Choctaws' possession in that quarter. The one proposed seemed to possess, in that point of view, great advantages. It is, however, by no means the desire of the President to obtain a cession of all the cultivatable lands which are now owned by the Choctaws on that side of the Mississippi, under the treaty of the 18th October, 1820. In wishing that the Choctaws would remove to the west of the Mississippi, the Government does not desire that they should change their agricultural habits for their former hunter's habits. While, therefore, the President respects the motive which the delegation assigns against extending the line of cession so far west, he cannot approve of that which the delegation proposes to fix. It is believed that the cession proposed would not fulfil any one of the desires of the Government. It would leave a large number of our population still on the Choctaw land; to avoid the trouble and the difficulty of removing them, constitutes one of the principal objects in proposing the present treaty. Nor would there be any likelihood that the boundary proposed would be permanent; for, by reference to the map, it will be seen that it leaves a narrow neck of land between the Arkansas and the upper branches of the Washita in possession of the Choctaws, which would be surrounded on two sides by our population, and which, having no strongly-defined natural boundaries, would be subjected to the perpetual intrusion of our citizens. This state of things could not fail to produce irritation on both sides; to remove which, a new treaty must be held, and more natural and permanent boundaries fixed. This had better be done at once. For which purpose I propose, by direction of the President, the extension of the western boundary of Louisiana, from the point where it strikes the Red river, due north, to the Arkansas; with the understanding that, if the line so extended should strike the Arkansas west of Fort Smith, then, in that case, the line to be from the point where the Louisiana line strikes Red river to Fort Smith. By inspecting the map, it will be seen that the line will pass, for the most part, through an elevated country, dividing the waters of Little river, Kiamsha, and the Poteau; and it is presumed will be both mountainous and poor, and will probably constitute a good natural boundary. It is believed that it would possess more advantages than any other that can be drawn, taking into view the mutual desire of the Choctaw nation and the United States. To the former, it will leave a sufficient tract of fertile woodland country, suitable for cultivation; while, to the latter, it would leave the most of our settlements in that quarter on the east side of the line, and afford a prospect to both of permanent limits.

If the delegation will accede to the proposition, (which I trust they will, for the reasons I have assigned,) I will be prepared to discuss the question of compensation.

I am, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the CHOCTAW DELEGATION, now at Tennison's Hotel, Washington City.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 17, 1824.

The Choctaw delegation yesterday received a communication from the War Department, on the subject of the mode in which the price for our lands beyond the Mississippi was to be appropriated. The delegation cannot, at this time, give a decisive answer on this subject. We are authorized to say, that the understanding among us is, to appropriate the money which we receive for our lands for the purpose of educating Choctaw youth; but we cannot say to what amount, nor in what particular manner.

The delegation wish you to tell them what price you are willing to pay for the land which they propose to cede; and they can then determine, with the less hesitation, on the manner in which the compensation for the cession shall be applied.

We are, respectfully, your obedient servants,

DAVID FOLSOM,
J. L. McDONALD.

To the Hon. J. C. CALHOUN.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 19, 1824.

Having agreed upon the limits of the cession which you propose to make of your lands west of the Mississippi, I now proceed to make you an offer for them. It being the wish of the Government to be liberal, and more especially so as you have intimated your intention of applying a part, at least, of their proceeds, to the improvement and education of your children, I have concluded to offer you five thousand dollars, to be paid immediately upon the ratification of the treaty, and the provision by the Congress for carrying it into effect; and six thousand dollars, annually, for ten years: it being understood that not less than three thousand dollars of the annual allowance be applied, under the direction of the Government, to the improvement of your children, by the agency of schools, and in making them acquainted with agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Considering the remoteness of the lands proposed to be ceded, and the price which has been usually given for those similarly situated, it is believed that the offer is a liberal one, and I hope the delegation will find no difficulty in acceding to it.

I am, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

To the CHOCTAW DELEGATION.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 20, 1824.

The compensation proposed to be given, in a communication from the War Department of yesterday, for a portion of the Choctaw lands west of the Mississippi, is considered by the delegation entirely inadequate. They can never consent to surrender their lands on such terms; and, unless the Government can bring itself to the conclusion to make a far more liberal offer, the negotiation must come to an immediate close, and the delegation return to their homes.

To show, however, their disposition to make a satisfactory adjustment on what they conceive to be just and liberal terms, the delegation will make a further communication to the War Department on Monday or Tuesday next, in which their views on the subject will be more fully expressed.

Respectfully, your obedient servants,

DAVID FOLSOM,
J. L. McDONALD,

On behalf of the Choctaw Delegation.

To the Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, November 22, 1824.

We propose, in this communication, to express our views on the subject of what we conceive to be a just and liberal compensation for our lands beyond the Mississippi. We shall speak with some freedom, but not without respect. We esteem you our friend and brother, and as the organ of our great father the President of the United States, who has shown himself the friend of the red man. We approach you, therefore, with respect; but, at the same time, it is not inconsistent with that respect to speak openly and frankly on the subject of our business.

The price you have offered us for the land which we propose to cede we consider altogether inadequate. The proposed cession contains at least five millions of acres, the greater part of it valuable land. You have considered your offer liberal, because the country is remote. It is remote, undoubtedly; but it is, nevertheless, valuable. To us, distance is nothing; nor can it be much to you. By means of the Arkansas and Red rivers, your citizens can have easy access to the Mississippi and to New Orleans. A large portion of the land embraced in the proposed limits is, we believe, fit for cultivation. Suppose you should not be able to sell more than one-third; that, at the minimum price of public lands, will bring you more than two millions of dollars. Is it not just and right that we should receive, in annuities, a reasonable portion of that sum?

We will advert to another consideration. A part of the country is in the highest degree fertile, (especially that bordering on Red river,) and in a fine state of cultivation. We have made no improvements ourselves, we admit; but they have been made for us. It is a well known fact, that there are fine farms, dwelling-houses, cotton-gins, and mills of various descriptions, on the land which was ceded to us by the treaty of the 18th of October, 1820; and are not these, in strict justice, our property? Those improvements which were made previous to the treaty of 1820 were sold to us by the commissioners of the United States. They were apprized of the fact of there being white settlers on that land; they, nevertheless, sold the land, and the improvements with it. Those improvements which have been made since the treaty, without any color of right, and contrary to the laws of Congress, which prohibit settlement on the Indian lands, are unquestionably ours. The labor has not been ours, we freely acknowledge; but who can say that the property is not? Suppose the Government, in compliance with its obligation, were forcibly to remove the settlers from our lands; (this would be, we are ready to believe, a severe and distressing task; we could not, ourselves, see it without a painful feeling; but we put the case fairly before you:) suppose the measure accomplished; what inducements would not then be presented to some of our people for a removal across the Mississippi? We should have good farms and dwelling-houses, for the reception of those who should choose to emigrate. Can we not, then, with propriety, demand compensation for those rights, and for that property of which we are deprived by the failure of the Government to comply with its obligation? We are informed that there are five or six thousand inhabitants on our land. Some of their improvements, especially on the Red river, are very valuable. We may, therefore, without entering into any nice calculation, venture to affirm that the value of improvements made by such a population amounts to several hundred thousand dollars.

We do not wish to embarrass our father the President by these considerations; nor do we mean to assume any thing like a threatening tone. When the arm of your Government is lifted, we are weak—we are powerless. We rely entirely upon your justice; and for that we shall patiently wait. We shall not attempt to remove those people by force; but, if you comply not with our request, we ask you to remove them.

Having presented these views to your consideration, we next proceed to state the terms which, in our opinion, present a fair and reasonable compensation, for the cession which we propose to make.

We wish, in the first instance, to have some points rectified in the last treaty—we mean that of the 18th October, 1820. We wish the fourth article abolished. It has excited fears and jealousies, on the part of the Choctaws, lest a premature incorporation should take place with the citizens of Mississippi.

We wish the annuity of $6,000, promised to be paid in the last treaty, immediately to commence.

Instead of fifty-four sections of land, which were to have been set apart as a school fund, we would rather take the money, at the minimum price of public lands; the interest, under the direction of the President, to go to the education of our children.

Those reserves which were taken under the ninth article of the treaty of 1820 we wish should be granted in fee-simple to the occupants. They are capable of managing for themselves, and there were but two reserves taken. A few, also, petitioned for reserves in 1820, and received the recommendation of the commissioners. These reserves, in justice, ought to be granted; and we request that they may be.

The foregoing points (in relation to the treaty of 1820) we are persuaded are a matter of indifference to the Government. We presume that it neither gains nor loses by a compliance with our request.

We now make a direct proposition for the proposed cession west of the Mississippi. After the views we gave in the beginning of this letter, you will not be surprised that we think our terms reasonable. We ask, first, that thirty thousand dollars worth of goods be distributed as presents to our nation—fifteen thousand dollars the first year; fifteen thousand dollars the second. Secondly, that nine thousand dollars a year, for twenty years, be appropriated for the support of mechanical institutions among the Choctaws. Thirdly, that the same sum be appropriated, annually, for twenty years, for the education of Choctaw children, in colleges or institutions out of the nation. Fourthly, that three thousand dollars a year, for twenty years, be appropriated for the education of Choctaws beyond the Mississippi, when they shall have settled there, and an agent appointed to live among them: these annuities to be applied for the purposes expressed, under the direction of the President of the United States.

The price we ask may be more than has been usually given for lands lying so remote; but it is not more than what we think to be their just value. We wish our children educated. We wish to derive lasting, and not transient, benefits from the sale of our lands. The proceeds of those sales we are desirous should be applied for the instruction of our young countrymen. It is for this important object that we may seem to you to be unreasonable in our proposition. We feel our ignorance, and we begin to see the benefits of education. We are, therefore, anxious that our rising generation should acquire a knowledge of literature and the arts, and learn to tread in those paths which have conducted your people, by regular gradations, to their present summit of wealth and greatness.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 27, 1824.

I have submitted for the consideration of the President the terms on which you propose to make the cession to the United States of lands west of the Mississippi, in conformity to the offer contained in your letter of the 22d instant, and I am instructed by him to say that they are wholly inadmissible.

It is believed that the lands could not be sold (as a body) for the price at which you propose to dispose of them, were they brought into the market, and the entire tract sold at once; and that they would not realize to the Government the sum at which you have offered them, on the final sales, even through the Land Office, after deducting the expense attending the survey and sales, and calculating the interest on the sum for which you propose to sell them. Unless, therefore, the Choctaw delegation are prepared to make a very great reduction in the terms on which they have offered to sell, it would be useless to attempt to conclude a treaty.

In the present stage, it is not deemed necessary to touch upon the several articles to which you have referred in the treaty of the 18th October, 1820, as the arrangements which you propose can only be considered in connexion with the sale of the lands west of the Mississippi.

I am, respectfully, your friend and brother,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the CHOCTAW DELEGATION.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 30, 1824.

We have received your letter in reply to our communication of the 22d instant. You state that the terms proposed by us are considered by the President wholly inadmissible, and that, unless the delegation shall determine to make a very great reduction in the price which they ask for their lands, it is useless to attempt to conclude a treaty.

Our determination is made: we cannot depart essentially from our original proposition. We may have erred in the estimate we made of the value of the land which we proposed to cede; but we cannot, consistently with the opinions we have formed, consent to make the reduction of price which you expect. Our situation is one of great responsibility. Our people are looking towards us with interest and anxiety. They expect that we shall either make an advantageous treaty, or none. We do not believe that your terms offer us the advantage we were prepared to expect. The negotiation, therefore, comes to a close, and we shall prepare to return to our homes.

Before we leave the city, (which we wish to do in a few days,) we shall present for your consideration a number of claims which our people have against the Government of the United States. Those are subjects on which commissioners have seldom given us satisfaction; and it was for that reason we were the more desirous to visit this city, and see the President. We hope to have a perfect understanding with you on those points.

Notwithstanding we have differed on the most important subject of our negotiation, we can still say, with the utmost sincerity of heart, that we are now, as we ever have been,

Your friends and brothers,

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 31, 1824.

Your two letters, of the 30th ultimo and 1st instant, were duly received, and laid before the President at the first opportunity. A press of business, both upon the President and myself, has prevented an earlier attention to them.

I now have to inform you, after full inquiry and deliberation, that the price asked by you for your lands west of the Mississippi cannot be given. The President is willing to give the full value, but cannot think of giving more than what the land is fairly worth; and is desirous, both on your account and that of the United States, to conclude a treaty of cession.

He trusts that you will reconsider your offer, and agree on one more reasonable. Should it be acceptable to you, I will include in the arrangement, upon an equitable settlement, an adjustment of your Pensacola claims, and also any other just claims which you may have upon the Government.

I am, respectfully, your friend and brother,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the CHOCTAW DELEGATION.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, January 3, 1825.

We have received your letter of the 31st December, in reply to a communication some time since made by us. You state that the price which we ask for our lands cannot be given; and you convey the wish of the President that we would reconsider our offer, and agree upon one more reasonable.

Notwithstanding we had believed the negotiation terminated, we are still animated with the desire of making an amicable adjustment of the differences between us. We can therefore assure you, that, although we thought our original offer reasonable, we are, nevertheless, willing to make a liberal reduction in our price. We have already assured you that we cannot take the price which you proposed to give. We expect that you will make a liberal advance. It will be unnecessary for us to make an offer. What we should consider more reasonable, you might still think too much. To avoid delay, therefore, we would respectfully suggest that the proposal come from you. Tell us, at once, the highest price you can give—the utmost extent to which you can go; and we can immediately determine whether to accept or reject your offer.

We would take this opportunity to request that you would communicate your views on the points presented for your consideration in our letter of the 1st December.

Respectfully, your friends and brothers,

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 5, 1825.

In reply to your letter of the 3d instant, and in compliance with your suggestion that the proposition of a price for your lands west of the Mississippi be made by me, I propose, as the highest price that can be given, the sum of $90,000, payable in ten annuities of $9,000 each; also, to relinquish the claim of the Government upon your nation for the sum due by it to the late Choctaw trading-house; it being understood that you relinquish your claim upon the Government for the establishment of a trading-house, as provided for by the sixth article of the treaty of the 18th October, 1820.

Should this proposition be accepted, I propose further to comprehend in the definitive arrangements a provision for an equitable allowance for your services rendered in the Pensacola campaign, and also to settle such other just claims as you may have to present.

The several other points referred to in your letter of the 1st ultimo will be considered, and replied to as soon as possible.

I am, respectfully, your friend and brother,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the CHOCTAW DELEGATION.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, January 14, 1825.

We have attentively considered the proposition contained in your letter of the 5th instant. We asked you to state the highest price which you were willing to give for our lands beyond the Mississippi. You have named $90,000, to be discharged in ten annual payments. This, as it stands, we cannot accept. After deliberate reflection, we have ourselves determined to make a final proposition. It will not vary much from yours; but it will be in a shape which holds forth the promise of more permanent benefit to our people. You will remark that we have made a very great reduction in our price. We have done so, not because our original opinion of the value of the land is changed, but because of the peculiar circumstances of the case, and on account of the views which you have given us in your communications, written and verbal.

The terms which we propose are the following:

1st. $6,000 a year, perpetual annuity; that annuity to be sold, or continued by the Choctaws, at their option, any time after twenty years.

2d. The annuity of $6,000 for sixteen years, promised in the treaty of 1820, to commence the present year.

3d. The relinquishment (as suggested by you) of all claims which you may have against individuals of the Choctaw nation, for debts due to the trading-house, in consideration that we relinquish our claim to have a trading-house established west of the Mississippi.

4th. An equitable settlement of the Pensacola claims, and of all other just claims which may be presented.

The foregoing are the principal conditions. There are others which we could wish granted, but upon which we would not insist with pertinacity. For instance: we would rather take money, and apply the interest to the purposes of education, than the fifty-four sections of land provided to be set apart under the treaty of 1820. We wish certain reserves (taken under the same treaty) to be confirmed in fee-simple; and we wish to sell you two small reserves (the one containing eight, the other two square miles,) which we have on the Pascagoula and Tombigbee rivers. They were retained under the treaty of 1805, and are valuable. Should you wish to make the purchase, we presume there would be no difficulty in agreeing on a price.

We hope that the terms we have proposed may be satisfactory, and that our business will be speedily closed.

Respectfully, your friends and brothers,

MOOSHULATUBBEE, his × mark.

ROBERT COLE, his × mark.

DANIEL McCURTAIN, his × mark.

TALKING WARRIOR, his × mark.

RED FORT, his × mark.

NITTUCKACHEE, his × mark.

DAVID FOLSOM.

J. L. McDONALD.

I certify that the foregoing is the correct talk of the chiefs.

JOHN PITCHLYNN.

To the Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 15, 1825.

I have received your letter of yesterday, in which you vary the proposition made by me in mine of the 5th instant for a cession of your lands west of the Mississippi; and offer, in lieu of it, another, which you state as follows:

"1st. Six thousand dollars a year, perpetual annuity; that annuity to be sold, or continued by the Choctaws, at their option, any time after twenty years.

"2d. The annuity of six thousand dollars for sixteen years, named in the treaty of 1820, to commence the present year.

"3d. The relinquishment (as suggested by you) of all claims which you may have against individuals of the Choctaw nation, for debts due to the trading-house, in consideration that we relinquish our claim to have a trading-house established west of the Mississippi.

"4th. An equitable settlement of the Pensacola claims, and of all other just claims which may be presented."

I have submitted the foregoing proposition to the President, who directs me to accept it, with the understanding that the annuity for six thousand dollars be applied to the support of schools in your nation, and to the improvement of your people in the mechanic arts.

The outlines of a treaty will be prepared for your signatures early in the coming week.

I am, respectfully, your friend and brother,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the CHOCTAW DELEGATION.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, January 22, 1825.

I have the honor to state, that only two persons of the Choctaw delegation have succeeded to reservations of one mile square, under the provisions of the ninth article of the treaty of 1820; their names, as reported by the Choctaw delegation now here, are Molly McDonald and Wesley Trahern; to whom the right to sell, in fee-simple, with the consent of the President of the United States, is ceded by the fourth article of the treaty concluded on the 20th instant.

The extract from the letter of General Jackson and Thomas Hinds, commissioners, which accompanied the treaty of October 18, 1820, recommending similar privileges of location, and the right to sell to certain individuals of the Choctaw nation, contains the information necessary to explain the remaining part of the provision of the fourth article of the treaty aforesaid.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. L. McKENNEY.

To the Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

Extract from the letter of General Andrew Jackson and Thomas Hinds, which accompanied the treaty concluded by them, as the commissioners on the part of the United States, with the Choctaw nation, on the 18th October, 1820, dated October 19th, 1820.

"You will receive, accompanying the treaty, a request from the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, in favor of Noble Osborne and Alexander Hamilton, which it is our desire should be laid before Congress, and the object of the petition granted. Should a law be passed in favor of Hamilton, it is suggested that he ought to be restricted, so as to be prevented from locating his section on a town site, or on any portion of land set apart for the support of schools in the Choctaw nation. Hamilton is three-fourths white man, and a native of the country. He has been a soldier, and at one time appointed an officer in the army of the United States. He is poor, and we have promised to use our endeavors to secure to him this grant of land, and that he be made a citizen, and subject to our laws. Mr. Osborne has for many years kept a United States stand on the public road running through the nation. His treatment to both Indians and white men has given general satisfaction, and all have interceded in his behalf.

"The application of Greenwood Leflore to become a citizen of the United States, and have his section of land, to include his improvements, secured to him in fee, is believed to be just and reasonable, and ought to be granted. It will, it is presumed, have a good effect, and in a short time induce all those who remain on this side of the Mississippi to petition for the same privilege. The applications of George Turnbull and Alexander McKee* are reasonable, and should also be granted by Congress."

NOTE.—The application in favor of Noble Osborne, referred to in the foregoing extract, being to secure to him "the privilege of entering, at Congress price, one section of land where he now lives," has been complied with. The cases, therefore, remaining to be complied with, and to which the provision made in the fourth article of the treaty to which this is annexed is particularly intended to apply, are those of Alexander Hamilton, Greenwood Leflore, George Turnbull, and Alexander McKee. It is proper to observe, that, since the application was first made, Hamilton has died; and it has been renewed, at the request of the Choctaw delegation, for the benefit of his legal representative or representatives.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, January, 1825.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, December 22, 1824.

In compliance with your verbal request of this morning, to communicate to you my views and opinions on the subject of the proposed treaty with the Choctaw Indians, for the purchase of a part of the lands which they claim west of the Mississippi river, by virtue of the treaty of 1820, I submit the following, after investigating the facts, and reflecting maturely on the subject.

It is known to your Department that the people of Arkansas have complained, with a common voice, of the unhappy influence of the treaty of 1820 upon their interests and prosperity; yet they have never imputed to the Government of the United States a desire to retard the growth of their Territory, or a disposition to injure their personal rights or happiness as citizens, but attributed the unfortunate treaty of 1820 to a want of correct information as to the extent of the injury which Arkansas and her citizens would receive from its fulfilment.

The complaints which they made on the subject proceeded not from a disposition on their part, under any circumstances, to oppose the authority of the Government, or to do injustice to the Choctaw Indians; but from a fixed confidence, which they have always entertained, in the justice and magnanimity of the Government, and a conviction that the Choctaws might be induced to yield, for an adequate consideration, the tract of country on which they were settled previous to the treaty; and that the Government, after knowing their situation, would lose no time in making the necessary arrangements for their relief.

Influenced by just considerations, Congress, on the representation of my predecessor, passed a law establishing as the western boundary of the Territory a line to be run due south from the southwest corner of the State of Missouri to Red river; and the appropriation which was previously made, by law, to carry the treaty into effect, was to be applied by the President, to secure a modification of the treaty, to relieve the settlers within the limits designated by the above-named act from the unhappy condition into which they were thrown by the treaty of 1820.

When this was made known to the people of Arkansas, the complaints which they had made were succeeded by a general burst of joy, and the most unqualified expressions of gratitude to their Government for its liberality and justice.

But, when an examination was made as to the course the line would run, it was ascertained that from twelve hundred to two thousand souls would fall west of it. With this knowledge, the General Assembly of Arkansas passed a memorial to Congress, praying for an extension of the line, to embrace all the settlements and counties that were formed previous to the treaty of 1820.

The same liberality and justice which dictated the first measure for their relief, influenced Congress, at the last session, to grant the request; and a law was passed, extending the boundary line forty miles west of the southwest corner of the State of Missouri, and thence, due south, to Red river.

With this boundary, the people are satisfied. It embraces the most, if not all, who were living in the country previous to the treaty, and gives to Arkansas sufficient territory to form a strong State on our frontier.

To give you a more correct knowledge of the importance which the people of Arkansas attach to the purchase of the country from the Indians, to our western line, as established by law, I herewith submit a copy of the memorial of the General Assembly of that Territory, (marked A,) which was presented the 23d of March last to the United States Senate, and referred to a select committee; and to show the view which that committee took of the subject, and the importance they allowed it to possess, I also submit a copy of the report made by the chairman, (marked B.)

I have said to you, in conversation, that the line proposed in the negotiation which is pending with the Choctaws will be east of that which the General Assembly of Arkansas remonstrated against; and that between two and three thousand souls, if that line should be established, will still be within the limits of the Choctaw claim.

To strengthen this position, I herewith submit, as evidence of the fact, a copy of a statement (marked C) which was made by Major Bradford, at the last session of Congress, to the select committee of the Senate, to which the memorial of the General Assembly of the Territory, on the subject of the western boundary, was referred.

It shows that two thousand persons were disfranchised by the law establishing a boundary from the southwest corner of Missouri, due south, to Red river.

Otherwise Alexander H. McKee.

The line proposed at present is east of that several miles, and, if established, will cut off a greater number of our citizens.

I am aware of the kind disposition of our Government towards Arkansas, and of the anxiety which the Executive and you, sir, have manifested, by your frequent expressions on the subject, to consult the views and wishes of the people, in relation to this important subject; and, also, of the difficulties which the Choctaws create by the slow and hesitating manner with which they consent to surrender even a part of the country inhabited by our citizens.

But I trust that difficulties of this character will not induce the Government to adopt any measure which will be destructive to the peace and interests of so large a proportion of the population of Arkansas.

That the establishment of the line proposed will be ruinous to thousands, is evident from the facts and evidence to which I have referred you.

As the Delegate of Arkansas, I can never consent to any measure which is calculated to check the prosperity of my Territory, or to destroy the interest of any portion of its inhabitants.

That the boundary suggested in the negotiation will do both, is, I presume, a point which will not be disputed.

If the whole of the Choctaw claim within the limits of Arkansas cannot be extinguished by treaty, I would suggest to you a line from the mouth of the Poteau to the mouth of the Kiamsha, as one which would save the most of the inhabitants. But it would only be after all hope had vanished of securing a treaty for the whole that I would consent to this line on the Kiamsha and Poteau rivers; and between the Poteau and Canadian fork there are very extensive tracts of the most fertile lands—much more, I presume, than can ever be cultivated by the Choctaws, independent of the vast region of country which they claim west of the limits of Arkansas.

In conclusion, I must ask of the Executive of the United States, in the event of a failure at this time to purchase from the Choctaws the tract of country which was inhabited by our citizens prior to the treaty of 1820, to suspend the operations of the treaty until a purchase can be made; and, in the mean time, to cause the Choctaws, who may and have moved west of the Mississippi, to be located west of the Kiamsha and Poteau, until some definitive arrangement can be made with them to our satisfaction.

With the greatest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
HENRY W. CONWAY.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

A.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Legislature of the Territory of Arkansas respectfully represent: That the citizens of this Territory have seen with astonishment, and no small degree of regret and concern, an act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, and for other purposes," (chap. 24, and sec. 3,) that a line due south from the southwest corner of the State of Missouri, to Red river, has been established as the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas.

To press this subject upon the consideration of the nation, it [is] deemed by your memorialists only necessary to advise the General Government that the line, as established, will forever blast the hopes and just expectations of the citizens of the Territory, as it will transfer to the Choctaw Indians a large portion of the counties of Miller and Crawford, a section of the country which, by the fertility of the soil and amenity of situation, has been justly considered as one of the most choice tracts of land in our Territory—the pride, the boast of Arkansas. Indeed, the line, as established, will transfer to the Choctaw Indians more than one-half of the most respectable inhabitants of the county of Miller, which is now a well-organized community, located upon the public lands already surveyed.

And the representatives of the people feel it a duty which they owe to themselves and their constituents to press the consideration of this subject upon the National Government, with that degree of solicitude and anxiety which the magnitude and importance of the subject so justly inspires.

Your petitioners represent the propriety of a modification or change in our western territorial line, so as to commence at the southwest corner of the State of Missouri, and running thence to the falls on the Verdigris river, and from thence to the mouth of the Kiamsha, on Red river. We believe that the establishment of the line above mentioned is equally as important to the General Government as to this Territory. Your petitioners would observe, that the line heretofore established is well calculated to keep Arkansas in a state of territorial bondage.

If such has been the object of the nation, it is well calculated to effect that object. This we cannot believe; but, if the General Government feel a disposition to see this Territory prosper, and increase in wealth, population, and respectability, the establishment of the line for which we ask will secure to us certain success.

Your petitioners would further observe, that, although the tract of country already included within the bounds of this Territory is large, yet a knowledge of the situation of our country is sufficient to convince all that it does not contain, within its present limits, a sufficient quantity of good land for a State Government.

The lands calculated to attract the attention and admiration of the emigrant are situate upon the margin of the navigable streams; and that part of them which is most navigable, and upon which our future prosperity greatly depends, is confined within the limits of that line to which your memorialists would invite your deliberate consideration.

T. FARRELLEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAM. C. ROANE,
President of the Legislative Council.

Approved October 18, 1823.

ROBERT CRITTENDEN, Acting Governor.

B.

Mr. BENTON, from the select committee to whom was referred the memorial from the General Assembly of the Territory of Arkansas, reported:

That the memorialists represent that the line prescribed, by an act of the last session of Congress, for the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, will pass through the counties of Miller and Crawford, and leave a proportion of the population of said counties on the outside of said line, and beyond the jurisdiction of said Territory; and they pray that the line may be altered, and fixed so far west as will include the residue of said counties and their inhabitants.

By information derived from the Delegate of said Territory, the committee are informed that the number of inhabitants thus cut off from the Government under which they had lived amounts to about twelve hundred souls; and the inquiries which present themselves are: 1st. Whether the said inhabitants shall be left as they are, without law to govern them? 2d. Or, whether they shall be compelled to come within the present limits of the Territory? 3d. Or, whether the western boundary shall be extended to include them?

The first alternative the committee reject, for reasons too obvious to require specification. To the second, many objections are found, arising from the organized state of the counties; the claim which many of the inhabitants set up for pre-emption rights, under the act of Congress of the 12th of April, 1814; and, above all, from the fact that, by an order issued from the War Department on the 15th December, 1818, a line drawn from the source of the Kiamsha to the source of the Poteau was fixed as the limit of western settlements in Arkansas, and settlers west of that line were ordered to be removed to the east of it; in the execution of which order, by the commanding officer of Fort Smith, on the Arkansas river, the settlers in the now counties of Miller and Crawford were not removed, because found to be on the eastern side of said line. The third alternative is, therefore, adopted by the committee, as well for the reasons growing out of the objections to the first and second, as because a line further west will divide into two equal parts the territory of the United States upon the Arkansas, east of the Mexican boundary, and will give to the future State of Arkansas that power and magnitude, to which, as a frontier State, in relation both to a foreign nation and numerous Indian tribes, it will be justly entitled.

The adjustment of the Indian boundary lines not being a subject of legislation, the committee do not make any report upon the existing boundary between the Choctaws and white settlers in the Territory of Arkansas. They leave that subject to the operation of treaties, made, or to be made; and report a bill solely for the extension of the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas.

C.

Upon the request of Mr. Conway, Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Arkansas, I make the following statement:

In the month of June, in the year 1819, being in command of the United States troops stationed at Fort Smith, on the Arkansas river, I received an order from the commanding officer of the southern division, (General Jackson,) commanding me to remove all the settlers who should be found west of a line drawn from the sources of the Kiamsha to the Poteau; (the former, a stream emptying into Red river; the latter, into the Arkansas river;) and to compel all such settlers to return to the east side of said line.

Upon the receipt of the order, I set out with some half a dozen soldiers on horseback, (a corporal's guard,) and proceeded to the tract of country on which the intruders had settled. I found about two hundred families, in the whole, on the west side of the line designated: some of them had crops growing; others, none. I read the order which I had received to the heads of the different families, requiring those who had no crops growing to obey it immediately; and to those who had, time was allowed till October. The order was immediately obeyed; and some of those to whom I had given leave to remain till their crops were gathered were driven in before that time by Captain Combs, commanding at Natchitoches, who had received a similar order, and executed it in the district of country next to Red river; in some instances, burning the houses and destroying the crops. Afterwards, Mr. Downs and Mr. Woodward, being authorized by Government to run certain lines in Arkansas, fixed upon a line from the mouth of Canadian Fork, southwardly, to the head of Jack's Fork of Kiamsha, and down it to its mouth.

This line was further west than the one designated in the order which I had received and executed; and, immediately after, many of those who had removed under the order of myself and Captain Combs re-occupied the ground from which they had been removed. Information of this having reached the Government of the United States, an order was sent to Colonel Arbuckle, commanding at Fort Smith, in the fall of the last year, commanding him to drive back all such intruders to the east side of the line from the sources of the Kiamsha and Poteau. This was accordingly done, and the people, thus twice removed back, settled in the counties of Miller and Crawford; and, I should suppose, that about two thousand souls were cut off from the Territory by the line fixed for the western boundary of Arkansas at the last session of Congress.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, this 25th day of March, 1824.

W. BRADFORD.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 18, 1825.

I have laid before the President your letter of the 22d December last, in which you object to the line which was proposed to be established between the Red river and the Arkansas, in the treaty now pending with the Choctaw delegation, on the ground that there would remain upwards of two thousand of the inhabitants of the Territory west of the proposed line; and I am directed by the President to inform you, that it has been his anxious desire, in the proposed arrangement with the Choctaws, to establish the line in a manner perfectly satisfactory to the Territory. With this view, it was first proposed to the delegation to establish the western boundary of the treaty as fixed by the act of 26th May, 1824, as the eastern boundary of the country to be retained by the Choctaws west of the Mississippi; but the proposition was decidedly and firmly rejected by the Choctaw delegation, on the ground that the country west of it is so destitute of timber, and of such sterile soil, as to render it unfit for agriculture. Actuated with the same desire, the President was anxious to fix the line of the Kiamsha and Poteau as the boundary of the proposed cession. But the deputation, governed by the same motives above stated, refused to go farther west than the western boundary of Louisiana; to which line you object. It is certainly to be deeply regretted that so large a number of the inhabitants of the Arkansas Territory should reside west of the proposed line; but the President is of the impression that, under all the circumstances of the case, the views you have presented against its establishment are not sufficient, and has accordingly directed the negotiation to proceed upon the basis of establishing that line.

Should the proposed treaty fail, there would be no other alternative left but to enforce the treaty of 18th October, 1820, which establishes a line far east of the one now proposed; and which, instead of the removal of two thousand, would, according to the best information, cause the removal of about five thousand. The reason why the treaty has not been heretofore enforced now no longer exists to justify its non-fulfilment. So soon as it was discovered, after the ratification of the treaty of 1820, that a large number of the inhabitants of the Territory resided west of the line which was thereby established as the eastern boundary of the Choctaw possessions, a proposition was made to modify the treaty, so as to prevent the disagreeable necessity of removing our citizens; which proposition has been the subject of correspondence and discussion to the present time. During its pendency, the President felt justified in omitting to take steps to fulfil the treaty in relation to the points under discussion. But, should the treaty now pending fail, and there should be no further hope (as would be the fact) that a modification of the former treaty could be obtained, there could be no good excuse for delaying the enforcement of its provisions, and, consequently, of removing those of our citizens who have unfortunately settled and made improvements on the Choctaw side of its eastern boundary. To avoid so disagreeable a consequence, and to mitigate the evil as far as practicable, when it cannot be wholly remedied, the President is of opinion that it would be preferable to establish the boundary now proposed, than to enforce the original. In fact, he considers the object so desirable, as to present strong inducements of acceding to what might otherwise be considered as a high price, than to be reduced to the necessity of subjecting so many families and individuals to the distress and losses which must necessarily be attendant on a removal. In coming to this decision, he is not of the impression that the settlements on the land in question have been lawfully made by those who now occupy it, or even that they have been under the implied sanction of the Government. The orders to which you allude, to prevent settlements west of the Kiamsha and Poteau, were not intended to encourage settlements east of those rivers, on lands belonging to the United States, and can, fairly considered, furnish no sanction for the settlements in question; and it is even very probable that those who made the settlements did so without knowledge of the order, most of them having made them, it is believed, before the order could have been made known in that quarter. But, though our citizens have no claim, in strict justice, against their removal, they still have claims upon the humanity of the Government. The settlements have probably been formed thoughtlessly, under the temptations of fine soil and a genial climate, without reflecting that the lands were not theirs, and that they rendered themselves liable, of course, to be removed as intruders, under the laws of the country.

The general mode of forming settlements in our country, no doubt, encouraged the settlements; and the settlers may be considered, under those circumstances, as having claims, not upon the justice, but humanity of the country. Their situation is thus viewed by the President; and, while he cannot yield to their desires upon the score of justice, he feels very solicitous to make such a modification of the treaty of 1820 as will subject as few as possible to the distress and losses which must be attendant on a rigid enforcement of its provisions.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

[2d SESSION.]

APPLICATION OF THE CHOCTAW TRIBE FOR AID FROM THE UNITED STATES IN IMPROVING THEIR CONDITION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 21, 1825.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, February 18, 1825.

The enclosed is an address from the Choctaw delegation now in this city to the Congress of the United States. Be pleased to present it to the Senate, and much oblige

Yours, very respectfully,

J. L. McDONALD, One of the Delegation.

Hon. JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tem. U. S. Senate.

To the Congress of the United States:

WASHINGTON, February 18, 1825.

As the representatives of the Choctaw nation and (in part) of the aborigines of this country, we feel ourselves impelled alike by duty and by inclination to address you at the present crisis. The Indians are becoming objects of increasing interest among your people. Sympathy is felt for their condition, and the most benevolent exertions have been, and continue to be, made to improve and civilize them. Under such circumstances, we cannot refrain from giving an expression of our feelings with regard to our condition and prospects. You are an assembly which we have been taught to consider the most august in the world, and into whose hands are committed the destinies of our people. To whom, then, could we more properly address ourselves on the great points connected with our happiness and prosperity?

Our good father the President has spoken to you, and requested you to adopt some measures to improve the condition of the Indian race. He has recommended that all the Indians east of the Mississippi be persuaded to remove and establish themselves to the west; that a certain form of government be provided for them; and that the land to which they may remove be secured to them forever.

Of the policy and practicability of the measure, we will not now express a decided opinion; time alone can determine. Of the motives which prompted the recommendation, we entertain no question. The opinion expressed by the President, that under no pretence should the Indians be forcibly removed from the lands which they occupy, gives us an assurance that his feelings are truly paternal towards us. That opinion accords with the sentiment entertained by all just and reflecting men, and cannot, therefore, fail to be responded to by your honorable body.

We have long been sensible of our weakness, and we know that, should the Government of the United States rise in hostility against us, we must inevitably be exterminated or driven to the west. We know that the extensive country which you now possess once belonged to our forefathers. We have heard that from a small beginning you have grown to be a great and powerful people; and that, as you advanced, we receded; as you flourished, we decayed. We have been tempted to ask, Why should this be so? Has the Great Spirit frowned upon his red children, that they should thus have withered in your presence? Yet we have been told from the good book that he loves all his children alike, and that his greatest attribute is that of infinite mercy. This we are most willing to believe, and, believing, we are led to the natural conclusion that for some great end, only known to himself, he has permitted us to melt before you; but that the time must come when his interposing hand will be outstretched in our behalf, and we be made to become like white men.

We rejoice to think that that period is approaching. The voice of the President, the sentiments of philanthropy which seem to pervade the people, the schools and religious institutions which have been established among us—all give us the consoling assurance that we are not doomed to extinction. We have become sensible that one great reason of the power and prosperity with which our white brothers are so eminently favored has been the general diffusion of literature and the arts of civilized life among them. You have institutions to promote and disseminate the knowledge of every branch of science; you have a government, and you have laws, all founded upon those principles of liberty and equality which have ever been dear to us; for, in all our vicissitudes of fortune, and notwithstanding the constant and gradual diminution of our numbers, we have never been the slaves of any Power, and we trust in the Great Spirit we never shall be. The theory of your Government is, justice and good faith to all men. You will not submit to injury from one party because it is powerful, nor will you oppress another because it is weak. Impressed with that persuasion, we are confident that our rights will be respected.

We have but small tracts of territory remaining, and our numbers are comparatively few. The majority of those east of the Mississippi are turning their attention to agriculture, are settling themselves, and would in time become useful citizens. We admit, at the same time, that a large number still continue a wandering life, are wretched and degraded. These it would give us pleasure to see settled west of the Mississippi. It would be better for them, and better for those who remained. But you cannot persuade all to remove. The gradual operation of the laws which you may enact with regard to this subject would probably effect much. But there are those whom the strongest inducements could scarcely persuade to leave the land which contains the bones of their fathers, and which has been rendered dear to them by the recollections of youth. The important question then presents itself, What will you do with those that remain? What measures will you adopt to improve their condition, to promote their happiness? It is this great point to which our address is intended principally to direct your attention.

As connected with the subject and with the question just proposed, we are constrained to say that in several of the southern States we are denied privileges to which, as members of the human family, we are of right entitled. However qualified by education we may be, we are neither permitted to hold offices, nor to give our testimony in courts of justice, although our dearest rights may be at stake. Can this be a correct policy? Is it just? is it humane? When schools are multiplying among us; when we have made liberal appropriations of money for the education of our children; when we are forsaking the chase, and turning our attention to agriculture, and are becoming an orderly and social people; does it comport with an enlightened and liberal policy to continue the imposition of those degrading restrictions upon us? Should not inducements be held forth to our young men to qualify themselves to become useful citizens of your republic? Should not the portals of honorable distinction be thrown open to them as well as to their white brothers? But the subject is a painful one, and we will dismiss it. The mist of prejudice is gradually vanishing before the light of reason, and enlarged sentiments of philanthropy begin to prevail. We leave the issue of the question to your wisdom and to the liberality of the South.

In conclusion, we would express the earnest hope that the result of your deliberations respecting our unfortunate race may be such as to insure durable benefits to them, and lasting credit, in the eyes of posterity, to yourselves.

Respectfully submitted by

[2d SESSION.]

DISBURSEMENTS BY INDIAN AGENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 25, 1825.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 24, 1825.

I transmit, herewith, a report of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, prepared in compliance with the third section of the act of the 6th of May, 1822, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, approved 30th March, 1802.'"

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 22, 1825.

In obedience to an act of 6th May, 1822, to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, approved the 30th March, 1802," I have the honor to transmit, herewith, duplicate copies of all such accounts as have been rendered to this office by persons charged or trusted with the disbursement or application of money, goods, or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, from the 1st September, 1823, to the 1st September, 1824, as per the accompanying statement (herewith submitted,) showing who have been delinquent in forwarding their accounts within the same period. These statements would have been transmitted earlier, but that some of the accounts had not been furnished to this office until within a short period; particularly that of General Clark, of St. Louis, who, in consequence of his detention at the seat of Government with a deputation of Indians, did not reach his superintendency until after the time required by the aforesaid act for rendering his accounts had expired.

It affords me pleasure to add, that all the superintendents and Indian agents have rendered their accounts, showing, in a satisfactory manner, the application of the money, goods, or effects, with which they have been charged on the books of this office, within the period above specified.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM LEE.

TREATY WITH THE CREEKS AT THE INDIAN SPRINGS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 28, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1825.

I transmit to the Senate, for the exercise of its constitutional power, a treaty lately concluded at the Indian Springs by commissioners of the United States, duly authorized, with the chiefs of the Creek nation assembled there in council, with the documents connected therewith.

JAMES MONROE.

TREATY WITH THE CREEKS.

Articles of a convention entered into and concluded at the Indian Springs, between Duncan G. Campbell and James Merriwether, commissioners on the part of the United States of America, duly authorized, and the chiefs of the Creek nation in council assembled.

Whereas, the said commissioners on the part of the United States have represented to the said Creek nation that it is the policy and earnest wish of the General Government that the several Indian tribes, within the limits of any of the States of the Union, should remove to territory to be designated on the west side of the Mississippi river, as well for the better protection and security of said tribes and their improvement in civilization, as for the purpose of enabling the United States, in this instance, to comply with the compact entered into with the State of Georgia, on the twenty-fourth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two; and the said commissioners having laid the late message of the President of the United States upon the subject before a General Council of said Creek nation, to the end that their removal might be effected upon terms advantageous to both parties:

And whereas the chiefs of the Creek towns have assented to the reasonableness of said proposition, and expressed a willingness to emigrate beyond the Mississippi, those of Tuckabatchee excepted: These presents, therefore, witness that the contracting parties have this day entered into the following convention:

ARTICLE 1. The Creek nation cede to the United States all the lands lying within the boundaries of the State of Georgia, as defined by the compact hereinbefore cited, now occupied by said nation, or to which said nation have title or claim; and, also, all other lands which they now occupy, or to which they have title or claim, lying north and west of a line to be run from the first principal falls upon the Chattahoochee river, above Coweta town, to Ocuskee Old Town, upon the Tallapoosa; thence to the falls of the Coosa river, at or near a place called the Hickory Ground.

ART. 2. It is further agreed between the contracting parties, that the United States will give, in exchange for the lands hereby acquired, the like quantity, acre for acre, westward of the Mississippi, on the Arkansas river, commencing at the mouth of the Canadian fork thereof, and running westward between the said rivers Arkansas and Canadian fork for quantity. But whereas said Creek nation have considerable improvements within the limits of the territory hereby ceded, and will, moreover, have to incur expenses in their removal, it is further stipulated that, for the purpose of rendering a fair equivalent for the losses and inconveniences which said nation will sustain by removal, and to enable them to obtain supplies in their new settlement, the United States agree to pay to the nation emigrating from the lands herein ceded the sum of four hundred thousand dollars; of which amount there shall be paid to said party of the second part, as soon as practicable after the ratification of this treaty, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars. And as soon as the said party of the second part shall notify the Government of the United States of their readiness to commence their removal, there shall be paid the further sum of one hundred thousand dollars. And the first year after said emigrating party shall have settled in their new country, they shall receive, of the amount first above named, the further sum of twenty-five thousand dollars; and the second year, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars; and annually thereafter, the sum of five thousand dollars, until the whole is paid.

ART. 3. And whereas the Creek nation are now entitled to annuities of thirty thousand dollars each, in consideration of cessions of territory heretofore made, it is further stipulated that said last mentioned annuities are to be hereafter divided in a just proportion between the party emigrating and those that may remain.

ART. 4. It is further stipulated that a deputation from the said parties of the second part may be sent out to explore the territory herein offered them in exchange; and if the same be not acceptable to them, then they may select any other territory west of the Mississippi on Red, Canadian, Arkansas, or Missouri rivers, the territory occupied by the Cherokees and Choctaws excepted; and if the territory so to be selected shall be in the occupancy of other Indian tribes, then the United States will extinguish the title of such occupants for the benefit of said emigrants.

ART. 5. It is further stipulated, at the particular request of the said parties of the second part, that the payment and disbursement of the first sum herein provided for shall be made by the present commissioners negotiating this treaty.

ART. 6. It is further stipulated, that the payments appointed to be made the first and second years after settlement in the west shall be either in money, merchandise, or provisions, at the option of the emigrating party.

ART. 7. The United States agree to provide and support a blacksmith and wheelwright for the said party of the second part, and give them instruction in agriculture, as long, and in such manner, as the President may think proper.

ART. 8. Whereas the said emigrating party cannot prepare for immediate removal, the United States stipulate for their protection against the encroachments, hostilities, and impositions of the whites and of all others; but the period of removal shall not extend beyond the first day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six.

ART. 9. This treaty shall be obligatory on the contracting parties so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the commissioners aforesaid, and the chiefs and headmen of the Creek nation, have hereunto set their hands and seals, this twelfth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL, [L. s.]

JAMES MERRIWETHER, [L. s.]

Commissioners on the part of the United States.

WILLIAM McINTOSH,

Head Chief of Cowetas.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and headmen of the Creek nation.]

Whereas the foregoing articles of convention have been concluded between the parties thereto: and whereas the Indian chief, General William McIntosh, claims title to the Indian Spring reservation (upon which there are very extensive buildings and improvements) by virtue of a relinquishment to said McIntosh, signed in full council of the nation: and whereas the said General William McIntosh hath claim to another reservation of land on the Ocmulgee river, and, by his lessee and tenant, is in possession thereof:

Now these presents further witness, that the said General William McIntosh, and also the chiefs of the Creek nation in council assembled, do quit claim, convey, and cede to the United States the reservations aforesaid, for and in consideration of the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, to be paid at the time and in the manner as stipulated for the first instalment provided for in the preceding treaty. Upon the ratification of these articles, the possession of said reservations shall be considered as passing to the United States, and the accruing rents of the present year shall pass also.

In testimony whereof, the said commissioners on the part of the United States, and the said William McIntosh and the chiefs of the Creek nation, have hereunto set their hands and seals, at the Indian Springs, this fourteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 16, 1824.

Major James Merriwether and yourself have been appointed by the President commissioners to treat with the Creek Indians, and I accordingly enclose herewith your commission and instructions.

Major Merriwether is notified of the appointment, and furnished with a copy of the instructions.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL, Commissioner, &c., Washington, Georgia.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, July 16, 1824.

Colonel Duncan G. Campbell and Major James Merriwether have been appointed by the President commissioners to treat with the Creek Indians for a further extinguishment of their title to lands within the limits of Georgia; and I am directed by the Secretary of War to notify you thereof, and to transmit to you the enclosed extract of his instructions to the commissioners, for your information and government.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

S. S. HAMILTON.

To Col. JOHN CROWELL, Indian Agent, Creek Agency, Georgia.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Colonel Duncan G. Campbell and Major James Merriwether, Commissioners, &c. dated

JULY 16, 1824.

The probable amount of provisions that will be required to be issued to the Indians while treating with them, and the price at which they can be obtained, can be ascertained by a correspondence with the agent, Colonel John Crowell, who is instructed to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, and to take such steps as may be necessary to prepare the Indians to meet the commissioners at the time and place which they may fix on for holding it, and of which he should be early apprized.

GENTLEMEN:

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 16, 1824.

I have the honor to enclose you a commission to treat with the Creek Indians. At the late session of Congress an appropriation was made, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore made for the same object, (which, together, make a sum of $50,000,) to enable the President of the United States to take the necessary measures for the extinguishment of the title of the Creek Indians to the land now occupied by them, lying within the limits of the State of Georgia. The President, desirous that the object of the appropriation should be accomplished as fully as practicable, has directed the whole amount of it to be placed subject to your control; and he anticipates, from your prudence and abilities, the most favorable termination to the proposed treaty. You will take care, however, that the whole expenses of negotiation, including those of your commission, issues of provisions and presents under your orders, and such preliminary expenses as the agent may be authorized to incur, shall, in no event, exceed the sum of $50,000. The probable amount of provisions that will be required to be issued to the Indians while treating with them, and the price at which they can be obtained, can be ascertained by a correspondence with the agent, Colonel John Crowell, who is instructed to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, and to take such steps as may be necessary to prepare the Indians to meet the commissioners at the time and place which they may fix on for holding it, and of which he should be early apprized. The enclosed circular will be strictly complied with in contracting for the provisions, and in issuing them.

It is the desire of the Government that the feelings and wishes of the State of Georgia should be particularly attended to in any treaty that may be made with the Creek nation. The particular tract and the extent of country, therefore, to be treated for, are left to your sound discretion. The sum to be stipulated for any cession that may be obtained must also be left very much to your discretion, taking into consideration its extent and the quality of the soil; but, rather than the treaty should fail, the price ought to be liberal, but, in no event, to exceed the price paid under the treaty of the 8th of January, 1821, with the Creek nation: the terms on which the land was then purchased were considered very high. For the purchase made by that treaty, the United States stipulated to pay $200,000 in specified instalments; and they assumed to pay, as a further consideration for said purchase, to the State of Georgia, in five annual instalments, whatever balance might be found due by the Creek nation to the citizens of said State; which balance has been ascertained to amount to $100,589; making, in the whole, as the consideration for that purchase, the sum of $300,589. You will, therefore, in fixing on a price for any cession which may be proposed to be made by the Creek nation, in no event exceed the price given by that treaty, taking into consideration the quantity of land ceded by it, and the quantity of that proposed to be ceded, but will, if possible, obtain it on more reasonable terms. The quantity of land ceded by the Creeks, in the treaty just mentioned, may be ascertained from the surveys which, it is presumed, have been made of it by the State of Georgia. To ascertain the quantity which they may now propose to cede, reference must be had to the best sources of information that can be obtained, particularly to the latest and most authentic maps of the State.

For the expenses of negotiating the treaty, you will draw on the Branch Bank at Savannah, of which you will give the Department notice. The bank will be authorized by the Treasury Department to accept your drafts, provided they do not exceed $50,000.

Your compensation will be at the rate of $8, and that of your secretary (whom you are authorized to appoint) at the rate of $5 per day, for the time actually engaged. The payment will be made on your certificate of honor, specifying the time that you and your secretary have been actually engaged. Your certificate, in like manner, will be a necessary voucher for presents distributed under your authority.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL and Major JAMES MERRIWETHER, Commissioners, &c.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 19, 1824.

Upon reflection, it is thought proper to defer transmitting the funds for the expense of negotiating with the Creeks, until you have apprized the Department of your acceptance, and of the time at which the funds will be required. On the receipt of such information, the funds will be forwarded.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL and Major JAMES MERRIWETHER, Commissioners, &c.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, July 27, 1824.

I had the honor of receiving yours of the 16th instant, accompanied by a commission to Major Merriwether and myself to hold a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians. The instructions under which our proceedings are to be conducted have also been received. I have this day written to the Creek agent, Colonel Crowell, upon the subject of the contemplated treaty, and have an expectation of seeing the other commissioner this week at Athens. The President and Department will please accept my acknowledgments for this additional mark of confidence, and the pledge of my best exertions to accomplish the business of the appointment.

With great consideration and esteem, I am, &c.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN.

DEAR SIR:

WASHINGTON, July 27, 1824.

By the last mail I received a communication from the Secretary of War, advising me of the appointment of commissioners to treat with the Creek nation of Indians for the acquisition of territory within the limits of Georgia. Before this reaches you, you will no doubt receive the like information. Being instructed to correspond with you upon the subject of the proposed treaty, I am happy that an acquaintance will authorize a free discussion of all matters connected with the subject. Having so recently heard of the appointment, I have not yet had an opportunity of seeing my colleague, Major Merriwether. We shall, no doubt, have an interview next week at Athens, where we shall probably digest some plan for our future operations. In the mean time, will you do me the favor to give me your views as to the most convenient time and place of having the convention? Say, also, what number of Indians may be expected to attend, what length of time we shall probably be engaged in the negotiation, and what will be the most advisable mode of supplying rations at the least expense.

I am, &c.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

Colonel JOHN CROWELL.

SIR:

AUGUSTA, August 6, 1824.

When on the eve of leaving home for Savannah, where I have to attend the district court on business of the United States, I received information from the Department of War of yourself and Major Merriwether being appointed to treat with the Creek Indians for lands within the limits of Georgia, as well as your letter on the same subject. As my presence at the court in Savannah is indispensably necessary, I cannot attend you till my return, which, I think, will be about the 15th, when I will do myself the honor to call on you at your residence, and make the necessary arrangements preparatory to the meeting of the Indians. I hope the few days delay, in consequence of my trip to Savannah, will not be material, or interfere with your arrangements in relation to it.

I have, &c.

JOHN CROWELL, *Agent for Indian Affairs.*Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL, Washington, Georgia.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, August 8, 1824.

Since writing you on the 27th, I have received yours of the 19th ult., relating to the transmission of the funds for negotiating with the Creeks. The Department will please consider us as having accepted the appointment of commissioners. I have lately seen Major Merriwether; but not having heard from the agent, Colonel Crowell, we were unable to fix definitively upon the time of holding the treaty. We spoke of the 1st of November as well suited for the occasion, and shall direct our arrangements to that period, unless the agent furnishes some satisfactory reason to the contrary. A young gentleman who resides at the agency reached here yesterday, and informs me that the agent received communications from the Department and myself at the same time, and at the moment of setting out for Savannah; that he will be here on the 15th instant, on his return. I shall avail myself of the opportunity of the interview to acquire in detail all the information necessary to our future operations. The agent is intelligent and communicative, and, I am certain, will afford us all the facilities within his control.

I have, &c.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN.

DEAR SIR:

WASHINGTON, September 5, 1824.

Having received Major Merriwether's views upon the subject of a contract for supplying rations for such Indians as may attend the contemplated treaty, I now forward the result. The major seems to be of opinion that advertising for proposals will be the most expedient plan which we can adopt. I have given you, on the other side, an extract from his letter, to which I ask your attention. Situated as you are, with more means of information on the subject than we possess, and having also had the benefit of experience upon the matter of contract, we must necessarily place much reliance upon your judgment and discretion. You will readily perceive that it is an object as well as a duty to be cautious as well as economical. Keeping these principles in view, we will request you to pursue such course as you may deem most expedient in procuring a favorable and efficient contract. I shall attend Baldwin court on the fourth Monday in this month, when I shall be glad to be informed of any matter affecting our negotiation. We are greatly concerned for the result of our mission, and must beg you to prepare the nation for the issue we desire.

I am, &c.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

Colonel JOHN CROWELL.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 13, 1824.

In drawing up your instructions, as commissioners to treat with the Creek Indians, the subject of exchange of territory did not escape the attention of the Department; but there is, at present, no tract of land on the west of the Mississippi, to which the Indian title is extinguished, that could be offered in exchange. Such being the fact, it was believed that no arrangement could take place, on the principle of exchange of territory, that would be satisfactory to the Creeks. If, however, you should find there is any likelihood of making the exchange, the Government would prefer that to any other arrangement. But such an arrangement would have to be conditional upon the extinguishing the Indian title to the tract that may be designated west of the Mississippi. Should any such tract be conditionally designated west of our settlements, the Government would immediately make arrangements for the extinguishment of the Indian title, in order to put the Creeks in possession of it. The enclosed sketch will show the present Indian boundaries in that quarter, which will regulate you in your location west, should an exchange of territory be adopted as the basis of the pending treaty with the Creeks.

I have, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

To Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

SIR:

PRINCETON, CREEK NATION, September 20, 1824.

In reply to your letter of the 5th instant, on the subject of a contract to be made for supplying rations for such Indians as may attend the contemplated treaty, I have to observe, that I did, while at Washington, give you the best information I possessed in relation to this subject. I will with pleasure close a contract for you, or do any thing you may require me to do in relation to the contract, or any other matter touching the business of the treaty, that I can consistently do. But it must be distinctly understood, that it is to be done under your special instructions. Should you determine to advertise for proposals, there is no time to spare; and if you wish me to close the contract, you will direct the proposals to be made to me at the Creek agency, on a given day, for rations to be issued to the Indians at Broken Arrow, near Fort Mitchell, to commence on the 25th of November, and to continue as long as the commissioners may require. Should the proposals be directed to me, it must be done on or before the 1st of November, as I shall be absent from that date to the 20th of November on business in Savannah.

From the best information I have been able to collect, I think we may reasonably calculate on about five thousand Indians attending the treaty.

I have, &c.

JOHN CROWELL, *Agent for Indian Affairs.*Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL, Milledgeville.

SIR:

PRINCETON, CREEK NATION, September 27, 1824.

Since I wrote you last, I have had an interview with a number of the head chiefs of the Creek nation at this place. I stated to them that commissioners had been appointed by the United States for the purpose of holding a treaty with them for the purchase of their lands within the limits of Georgia, and the commissioners and myself had appointed the 25th November for the meeting, and at this place; but, in consequence of the indisposition of several of the head chiefs, they were opposed to fixing upon that day. I then urged them to as early a day as possible, and we finally agreed upon the 6th of December as the earliest day they would consent to. You will, therefore, consider that as the day of the meeting, instead of the 25th of November, as agreed upon between us at Washington.

I have, &c.

JOHN CROWELL, *Agent for Indian Affairs.*Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL, Washington, Georgia.

SIR:

WATKINSVILLE, October 13, 1824.

I have declined answering yours of the 20th and 27th ultimo, knowing that I should have an interview with Major Merriwether at this place. Having had that interview, I now communicate the result. When we fixed on the 25th November as the day of commencing our negotiations with the Creeks, we felt that it was a more distant period than was well suited to our convenience. It is, therefore, with more reluctance that we obtain an assent to a postponement of the time. The 6th of December is an extension of the time which will result in such an interference with our engagements, as to be highly objectionable. We have, therefore, come to the conclusion of suggesting the 1st of December as better suited to ourselves, and which we hope will in nowise be exceptionable to the chiefs or yourself. We are of opinion that a contract for supplying rations can be most economically obtained by advertising for proposals. Your intended absence, as mentioned in yours of the 20th, will occur at a time when the proposals should be opened and a contract closed. We have, therefore, advertised for proposals to be delivered to ourselves at Milledgeville, on the 8th of November; at which time a contract will be reduced to form, and a requisition made. About that time, you will probably pass Milledgeville, on your way to Savannah. Should this be the case, we shall be very happy to have the benefit of your experience and judgment on the subject. We shall be obliged to you to issue a friendly invitation to the chiefs to meet us at Broken Arrow on the 1st of December. It will be matter of regret if the time is objected to, for we have seen no substantial reason given by the nation for the postponement.

I am, &c.

Colonel JOHN CROWELL.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

On the 8th day of November, the commissioners met at Milledgeville, for the purpose of receiving proposals for the supply of rations at the contemplated treaty, when the following contract was entered into:

STATE OF GEORGIA:

Memorandum of a contract this day entered into between James Merriwether and Duncan G. Campbell, commissioners on the part of the United States, of the one part, and John H. Brodnax, of the other part, witnesseth:

The said Brodnax agrees to furnish said commissioners with supplies for such of the Creek nation of Indians as may attend a treaty to commence with said nation on the 1st day of December next, at the Indian town called Broken Arrow, on the Chattahoochie river. A requisition is, by these presents, now made on said Brodnax for twenty thousand rations, to be ready for delivery on the day and at the place aforesaid. The ration to consist of twenty ounces of beef, twenty ounces of sifted corn meal, and the army quantity of salt. The beef part of the ration estimated at five cents; the meal part at three cents and three-fourths, and the salt part at one-fourth of a cent. In case of failure on the part of the said Brodnax to furnish the full supply of rations, having the component parts aforesaid, then he is to be liable for the deficiency, according to the above estimates.

It is further stipulated that the said Brodnax is to furnish any additional supply of rations, of the same component parts, at the same place and at the same prices, which the commissioners may require, pending the negotiation with the said nation; the said Brodnax being furnished with the earliest practicable notice of the requisition of further supplies after the commencement of the said negotiation on the day aforesaid. It is further stipulated, that the said Brodnax is to give the necessary attention of himself, agents, or laborers, in taking care of and issuing the rations aforesaid, from day to day, as the same may be demanded for use. The commissioners, on their part, agree to pay at the rate of nine cents per ration for each and every ration furnished by said Brodnax, under the requisitions of said commissioners. The sum of eighteen hundred dollars is now advanced to said Brodnax in consideration of the twenty thousand rations agreed to be furnished as aforesaid, but to be refunded in proportion to any deficiency which may occur in furnishing the amount of said first requisition.

Witness our hands and seals, this 9th November, 1824.

D. G. CAMPBELL, [L. s.]
JOHN H. BRODNAX. [L. s.]

Signed, sealed, and acknowledged in presence of SAMUEL D. ECHOLS.

STATE OF GEORGIA:

Know all men by these presents, that we, John H. Brodnax, Zachariah White, Magers Henderson, and Laird W. Harris, are held and firmly bound to James Merriwether and Duncan G. Campbell, commissioners acting on the part of the United States, in the sum of five thousand dollars; for which payment, well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, our executors, administrators, &c., jointly and severally, firmly by these presents. Witness our hands and seals, this 9th November, 1824.

The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas the abovenamed John H. Brodnax hath this day entered into a contract with the said commissioners, acting on the part of the United States, to furnish a supply of rations in the Creek nation, at the time, upon the terms, and in the quantities specified in a contract bearing even date herewith: Now, if the said Brodnax shall well and faithfully abide, fulfil, keep, and perform all and singular the covenants, undertakings, and agreements in said writing specified, and shall not violate, neglect, refuse, or fail to comply therewith, then the above obligation to be void, else to be and to remain in full force and virtue.

PRINCETON, NEAR BROKEN ARROW, November 30, 1824.

The commissioners arrived this day at this place, and, finding the Indians convening in considerable numbers, issued to the agent and the contractor the following instructions and orders:

SIR: PRINCETON, CREEK NATION, November 30, 1824.

Pursuant to instructions, and also to a circular from the Department of War, (copies of which are herewith furnished,) you are designated to ascertain the number and component parts of rations issued daily pending the present treaty. The manner of issuing and certifying to conform, as near as may be, to the mode which prevails in issuing rations to soldiers. At the close of the treaty, the account will be presented to us for approval.

Your obedient servants,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER,
U. S. Commissioners.

Col. JNO. CROWELL, Agent for Indian Affairs.

SIR: PRINCETON, CREEK NATION, November 30, 1824.

The issuing of rations to the Indians will commence on to-morrow morning. The agent of the nation, Colonel Crowell, has been designated to ascertain the number and component parts of rations issued daily. Rations will be issued daily, in the morning, at the old factory buildings, in such numbers as the agent may require.

Your obedient servants,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER,
U. S. Commissioners.

Major JOHN H. BRODNAX, Contractor, &c.

DECEMBER 4, 1824.

The commissioners having been this morning notified of the organization of the council, attended, with the nation's agent, at twelve o'clock, and were introduced. The council were informed that the commissioners held their authority under the United States, and had important business to transact, which would be disclosed in a talk on Monday.

On this day an additional requisition was made upon the contractor, as follows:

SIR: From the increasing number of Indians now convening at this place, an additional number of rations will be necessary. You are required forthwith to supply the further number of twenty thousand rations, to be issued according to the terms of your contract entered into with us.

D. G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER,
U. S. Commissioners.

JOHN H. BRODNAX, Contractor.

DECEMBER 7, 1824.

The inclemency of the weather prevented a meeting of the chiefs on yesterday. On this day, the following address was delivered to them in full council:

Friends and Brothers of the Creek nation:

We met you on Saturday last around your great council fire, and were received with the pipe and the right hand of friendship. We then informed you that we had the same feeling towards you, and that we were commissioned by our father the President of the United States. We also told you that on this day we would make known to you the object of our visit. We now tell you that, upwards of twenty years ago, a bargain was made between the United States and Georgia. The United States agreed to purchase for Georgia all the lands lying within certain limits. In this direction, the line runs from Florida, up the Chattahoochie, to the first big bend above the mouth of Uchee creek, and thence to Nicojack, on the Tennessee river. Georgia has made several requests of the United States to have this agreement carried into effect. The United States, feeling bound by her contract, has appointed commissioners, and they are now before you, on this business. The President finds you entirely surrounded by white people. He sees that there are frequent interruptions by encroachments on both sides. A great many complaints are sent to him. He has attended to all these things, as he wished to make them all quiet. He has extensive tracts of country under his dominion beyond the Mississippi, which he is willing to give you in exchange for the country you now occupy. We make you an offer, not only for your territory within the limits of Georgia, but for your whole country. The price which we are to give can be more fully stipulated hereafter. This can consist, in a great measure, of other lands, of such extent and value as may be agreed upon. But our Government would do something more, so as to make your removal easy, and your new settlement secure and comfortable. In a matter of this weight, we cannot say at once all we have to lay before you. We shall expect you to listen to us as long as we have any thing to say, and we will do the same by you. We want you to take time and consider, and deliberate well before you decide either way. We know that our Government has not directed us to make an unjust or improper offer to you. We cannot consent, therefore, that our propositions should be put aside in a hasty manner. After going fully into the subject on both sides, we shall be able to lay our proceedings before the President, and let him decide upon what has been done.

Whenever you are ready to answer us, we shall be ready to meet you. In all our intercourse, we desire good understanding.

Your friends and brothers.

DECEMBER 8, 1824.

The following reply was this day made by the chiefs to the address of yesterday:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

On Saturday last we received you as members of our father's family. The pipe, as a token of peace, was offered to you, and you received it; the right hand of friendship was extended to you, and you did not refuse. Your talk was, that you were sent to us by our father the President of the United States; that you would in two days repeat to us our father's talk. You have, in part, done so. You have told us that upwards of twenty years ago a bargain was made between the United States and Georgia; that the United States agreed to purchase for Georgia all its lands lying within certain limits, &c. The agreement between our father the President of the United States and our brothers of Georgia we have never before this time been acquainted with, nor are we now convinced that any agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia will have the effect of alienating the affections of a just parent from a part of his children, or aggrandizing the one by the downfall and ruin of the other. That ruin is almost the inevitable consequence of a removal beyond the Mississippi, we are convinced. It is true, very true, that we are "surrounded by white people;" and that there are encroachments made. What assurances have we that similar ones will not be made on us, should we deem it proper to accept your offer and remove beyond the Mississippi? and how do we know that we would not be encroaching on the people of other nations?

We will await your next communication, entertaining the hope that you will then acquaint us with the whole of your talk.

We have all confidence in our father the President, and in yourselves as commissioned by him, and are convinced that you will deal justly by us.

As we have met friends, we wish to continue so, let the result of our meeting be as it may.

Your friends and brothers,

LITTLE PRINCE, his + mark.

O. PORTHLE YOHOLO, his + mark,

Speaker of the Upper Creeks.

WM. McINTOSH, his + mark,

Speaker of the Nation.

HOPOY HADGO, his + mark.

WILLIAM HAMBLY, Principal Interpreter.

CHILLY McINTOSH, Clerk of the National Council.

The following requisition was this day made on the contractor:

SIR:

We perceive that an additional number of rations will be necessary; you will, therefore, have twenty thousand more in readiness immediately.

Major JOHN H. BRODNAX.

JAMES MERRIWETHER,
DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

The following address was this day made to the chiefs:

DECEMBER 9, 1824.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

We attended your council yesterday, and received your talk, which we are glad to find made in a spirit of good feeling and liberality. This was expected of you, on account of the kindness and protection which has always been extended to you by the United States. You have requested that the whole of our talk be delivered at this time. We have no objection to go fully into that subject; and, although the time allowed is very short, we believe we shall be able to comply with your request. Brothers, we now proceed to explain the nature of your connexion with the General Government, and, although it may not be very pleasing, it is nevertheless true.

We ask you, how did the Muscogee nation come by this country? You came from the west, and took the country from another people, who were in possession. After living here a great many years, the people from over the big waters came in large vessels, and took some of the country from you, and set up their own Government, and made laws, and made you obey them. Ninety-two years ago the British granted a charter to all the land between Savannah and Alatamaha rivers, up to their heads, and thence to the western ocean. Then, afterwards, sixty years ago, the same British Government extended the limits of Georgia to St. Mary's river; thence, along the Florida line, to Mississippi river.

All this was Georgia until 1802. We will now tell you how the country we have described happened to belong to the United States. About fifty years ago a war broke out between the British and their own people who were here. The war lasted seven years, and the British were conquered; you took part in that war, and were conquered also. All the country which was conquered belonged then to the conquerors. The British were all driven off, and you would have shared the same fate but for the humanity and goodness of the new Government which was established after the war. This new Government was called the United States of America; and directly after it was formed, it held treaties with you and all other Indian tribes. You are not the only tribe that fought on the side of the British; every other tribe did the same, and all were treated alike—all gave up, and claimed protection, and were received into favor. The Delawares made a treaty at Fort Pitt, and gave up their power; the Six Nations did the like at Fort Stanwix; the Cherokees at Hopewell; and the Creeks at New York.

Since the war of the Revolution, when General Washington fought, the Indian tribes have had no power in the United States. It was not your fault that your forefathers fought against their country, yet you have to be the sufferers by their rashness. Since this time, some of you have shown yourselves worthy of being the President's children, by fighting by the side of the white man against the foes of liberty. The President will always stand by you, and protect you against want and against your enemies. He has not sent us here to make offers or propose schemes for your injury or destruction. On the contrary, the most earnest wish of his heart is, that you should be preserved; that you should live and prosper; that you should advance in civilization; that you should have good laws, and obey them; that you should have schools, and learn; that you should have churches, and worship Him who made you. But the question is, how are we to attain these desirable ends? The President, in great goodness, has pointed out the way. Fifteen years ago he advised some of his red children to go beyond the Mississippi. Five thousand went, and are free from intrusion and disturbance from the whites. These limits are extended, and they are not surrounded and hemmed in on every side. If the young men wish to pursue the game, it is there found in abundance; if they wish to become herdsmen and cultivators, the soil is well-suited for these purposes. But, above all, if you wish to quit the chase, to free yourselves from barbarism, and settle down in the calm pursuits of civilization and good morals, and to raise up a generation of Christians, you had better go. The aid and protection of the Government will go with you. The good wishes of the best men alive will go with you; and the missionaries, with their schools and meeting-houses, and good examples and prayers, will be planted in the midst of you. Brothers, the talk which we now deliver to you is from the mouth of a great and good man, our father the President. In speaking to his Cherokee children, he says these words: "My impression is strong that it would promote essentially the security and happiness of the tribes within our limits, if they could be prevailed on to retire west and north of our States and Territories, on lands to be procured for them by the United States, in exchange for those on which they now reside. Surrounded as they are, and pressed as they will be on every side, by the white population, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for them, with their kind of government, to sustain order among them. Their interior will be exposed to frequent disturbances; to remedy which, the interposition of the United States will be indispensable: and thus their government will gradually lose its authority, until it is annihilated. In this process, the moral character of the tribes will also be lost, since the change will be too rapid to admit their improvement in civilization; to enable them to institute and sustain a government founded on our principles, if such a change were compatible either with the compact of Georgia or with our general system; or to become members of a State, should any State be willing to adopt them in such numbers. But all these evils may be avoided, if these tribes will move beyond the limits of our present States and Territories." These are the words of the President, used no longer ago than last March. We will now give you the talk of the Secretary of War (Mr. Calhoun) to the Cherokees, last January. He says: "You must be sensible that it will be impossible for you to remain for any length of time in your present situation, as a distinct society or nation, within the limits of Georgia, or any other State. Such a community is incompatible with our system, and must yield to it. This truth is too striking and obvious not to be seen by all of you, surrounded as you are by the people of the several States. You must either cease to be a distinct community, and become at no distant period a part of the State within whose limits you are, or remove beyond the limits of any State."

We have thus given you the talks of two of the highest authorities of the United States—the President and Secretary of War. These, to be sure, were delivered to the Cherokees; but they apply with equal force to you, for both are within the Georgia limits, and the United States are bound to extinguish your title. Brothers, we might add the talks of the members of Congress from Georgia to the President, and also the talk of our headman, the Governor of Georgia. We have these by us, and will explain them to you verbally. They are too long to be included in this writing. We can here say this much of them, that they set forth very strongly the rights of Georgia; that the President has listened to them, and sent us here for the purpose of settling matters which threaten to produce the greatest disturbances and serious consequences.

Brothers, before we came into your country, we read in the newspapers where some of you had held two meetings at Tuckabatchee and Pole Cat Springs, and signed a talk to "follow the pattern of the Cherokees, and never sell another foot of land." We fear you have suffered yourselves to be misled. You have made a hasty conclusion, which you are unable to support. Whether this was produced by the Cherokee talk that was sent to you, or by the intermeddling officiousness of interested individuals, or by both, we are not exactly prepared to say. But we warn you against the advice of intruders and false prophets. As lofty grounds as the Cherokees have taken, we have no doubt of seeing the time when they will come under the laws of the whites, or go to the west, where they can be to themselves. These two meetings which you have had are rash and premature. They are not binding even upon those who signed them, much less are they binding upon the nation. This is the place where laws are made—in full council; not at Tuckabatchee or Pole Cat Springs, where a mere handful are gathered together, not, perhaps, so much by their own consent as by designing individuals. This nation was once led into a dreadful war by bad advisers and false prophets. Take care how you listen to talks which come from such sources. No man, no nation, has a right to interfere with the affairs of this nation. We shall make our propositions open and fair to this council. If our talk is received, we doubt not but the good of yourselves and of the United States will be advanced. If it is rejected, it will be to the injury of both. There shall be no interference with us, and we shall be inclined to try the extent of our powers if we detect any interference with you.

Brothers, we have heard you say that you love the country you live in, and that you are opposed to a removal. This is not the first country which has been sold by its proprietors. The United States have lately bought Florida from Spain; and the Spaniards are gone, a part to Cuba, and others beyond the seas. The United States, some years ago, bought Louisiana from France, and many of the inhabitants removed thousands of miles from the place of their birth, and where their fathers were buried. The United States have lately made a treaty with the Seminoles, and have marked out a country for them, and told them to go to it. The United States have exchanged lands with the Choctaws, and that tribe have a flourishing settlement, with which they are very much pleased, on Red river, including the Warm Springs. Other instances might be given where countries have been sold, and people removed. We believe that, by an exchange and removal, this nation would secure a safe and permanent resting-place, where they would be free from interruption and disturbance. You would have some encouragement to clear fields and build good houses. They would be yours; and yours not for a short time, but for yourselves and generations afterwards. You flourish best when at a distance from the settlements. In going through your country, where do we find the most improvements? On the lines of the States, and even on the public roads, we hardly ever see a field or a house. You retire within, in order to get clear of the intrusions and encroachments of disorderly whites, who sometimes gather upon our frontiers. But even in the interior, the state of your improvements is such as to show that there is something wrong—that you do not consider yourselves at home. You told the commissioners at the Indian Springs that your people had quit hunting, and settled down to the industrious use of the axe, hoe, plough, and loom. The game is gone, but still we find you ranging in parties in all directions; some to Florida, some to the Cherokee and Choctaw nations, and some have gone even beyond the Mississippi. Brothers, we plainly see, and we know it to be true, from the talks of the President, the Secretary of War, the Governor of Georgia, the Georgia delegation in Congress, and the Legislature of Georgia, for years past, that one of two things must be done: you must come under the laws of the whites, or you must remove. Brothers, these are not hard propositions. If you intend to be industrious, and go to work in earnest, our laws will not be burdensome. But the difference will be so quick and so great, that at first it might make you restless and uneasy. But, let you go where you will, a change in your condition will be the study of Christians and the work of the Government. Brothers, we now tell you what we, in the name of your father the President, want you to do. We want the country you now occupy. It is within the limits of Georgia and Alabama. These States insist upon having their lines cleared. The President will do this by giving you a better country, and will aid you in removing; protect you where you may go, against whites and all others; and give you a solemn guaranty in the title and occupancy of the new country which you may select. We now leave you to pause, to examine, and decide. This talk comes to you full of friendship, yet it is of serious and important import. By deciding for yourselves, it may prevent others from deciding for you.

We want an answer as soon as it may be convenient to give it. The Congress of the United States and the Legislature of Georgia are both in session, and they will want to know what has been done. We again assure the nation of our friendly feeling.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER,
U. S. Commissioners.

DECEMBER 10, 1824.

The following requisition was this day made on the contractor:

SIR: Furnish forthwith twenty thousand rations, which we perceive will be requisite.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER,
U. S. Commissioners.

Major JNO. H. BRODNAK.

DECEMBER 11, 1824.

The following reply was this day received from the chiefs, in answer to the address delivered them on the 9th instant:

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

THE-CATCH-KA, December 11, 1824.

You have given us a very long talk, which we will now answer the most prominent parts of.

You tell us of things which we never heard before. You tell us that the Muscogees are not the original proprietors of this soil; that they came from the west, and obtained it by conquest. This we do not know. From all the traditions which have been handed down to us from our forefathers, we have been impressed with the belief that we are the original and sole proprietors of the soil. Brothers, the first white people that ever landed here found us here. The first red people that were known to visit the whites were from the Coweta town. We are therefore under the conviction that our people are the original proprietors of the soil, as an inheritance left to us by our forefathers. As proof of this, every sale of lands which has been made to the whites has been made by the Muscogees. But admit that we now hold our lands by right of occupancy only; admit the claim of Georgia to have been a good one to that part of country ceded to the United States by the treaty of cession of 1802; a stipulation in that agreement declares that the United States will extinguish for Georgia the Indian title to the lands within the ceded limits so soon only as it can be done on peaceable and reasonable terms. This certainly admits the claim of the Muscogees to the right of an occupancy, until they are willing to dispose of that occupancy. It is true that, in the war between Great Britain and her colonies, many of our people were deluded by the British, and persuaded to take the side against the colonies. But after the conclusion of that war, which terminated in favor of the colonies, a new, free, and independent Government was formed, and acknowledged by all or many of the European Powers.

After the establishment of the United States Government, they made treaties with the different tribes; and the first treaty entered into between the Muscogee nation and the United States, at New York, in August, 1790, the fifth article of which here follows, viz: "The United States solemnly guaranty to the Creek nation all their lands within the limits of the United States, to the westward and southward of the boundary line described by the preceding article," expressly guaranties to this nation all the lands within certain limits, and not ceded by that treaty; a part of which lands are the lands which Georgia now claims. The second article of the treaty of Fort Jackson, done in August, 1814, speaks this language: "The United States will guaranty to the Creek nation the integrity of all their territory, eastwardly and northwardly of the said line, to be run and described as mentioned in the first article." At the treaty of the Indian Springs, in January, 1821, in reply to a request made by the chiefs of the nation to the commissioners, for a guaranty to the remainder of their lands, the commissioners said verbally, "that we had already a sufficient guaranty in two former treaties;" alluding, undoubtedly, to the treaties of New York, in 1790, and Fort Jackson, in 1814. Taking into view words of the treaty of cession with Georgia, and the several guaranties in treaty stipulations between this nation and the United States, as well as the letter of the honorable George Graham, acting Secretary of War, to the Creek deputation, dated 17th March, 1817, an extract of which here follows, viz: "The land which was guarantied to you by the treaty signed by General Jackson and your chiefs and headmen, on the 9th of August, 1814, is your land; and your father the President, who holds you and your nation fast by the hand, will take care that no part of it is ever taken from you, except by the free consent of the chiefs and headmen, given in council, and for a valuable consideration;" it seems to have been distinctly understood by the contracting parties, and acknowledged by the Government of the United States, that no coercive measures were to be apprehended by us; nor can we believe that our father the President will act otherwise than in good faith, in the strict and faithful performance of treaty stipulations. Brothers, we have already parted with various tracts of our land, until we find our limits quite circumscribed; we have barely a sufficiency left us. The proposal to remove beyond the Mississippi, we cannot for a moment listen to. Brothers, we have among us aged and infirm men and women, and helpless children, who cannot bear the fatigues of even a single day's journey. Shall we, can we, leave them behind us? Shall we desert, in their old age, the parents that fostered us? The answer is in your own hearts. No! Again: we feel an affection for the land in which we were born; we wish our bones to rest by the side of our fathers. Considering, then, our now circumscribed limits, the attachments we have to our native soil, and the assurances which we have that our homes will never be forced from us, so long as the Government of the United States shall exist, we must positively decline the proposal of a removal beyond the Mississippi, or the sale of any more of our territory. Brothers, we feel gratified by the friendly disposition manifested towards us by you; and as we met friendly, so we hope to part.

Your friends and brothers,

[Signed as before.]

DECEMBER 14, 1824.

In conversation with Colonel Crowell, the agent, the commissioners were informed that the two publications dated at Tuckabatchee and Pole Cat Springs, signed by a number of the upper town chiefs, were written by the sub-agent, Captain Walker; that to the first, which was brought to this place in June last, no signatures were obtained, but the agent understood it to be consented to generally. It was then in the handwriting of Captain Walker. The last meeting where the Pole Cat proceedings occurred was at Walker's house. No communication was made to the Government of either of these proceedings.

The following communication was received from his excellency the Governor of Georgia:

GENTLEMEN:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, MILLEDGEVILLE, December 9, 1824.

The Legislature will probably adjourn about the 18th instant; and, as much anxiety is manifested to know whether you have any prospects of concluding a treaty, I have sent an express, that this letter may be safely delivered into your own hands. If there are no prospects of bringing your mission to a favorable termination, be so good as to apprise me of the obstacles you have had to encounter, and if you found yourselves anticipated and forestalled by the Indian council held in the spring, of which we received the first notice recently through an Alabama print. Inform me, if you please, by what authority that council was held; whether with the knowledge, countenance, or encouragement of the agent: was the agent present at that council, and what part did he take: who drew up their state paper: were the proceedings of that council made known by the agent to his Government, without delay; and was it with a knowledge of these proceedings that you were appointed: were any allusions made to them in your instructions. You will pardon the trouble I give you. There is no absolute right, on my part, to propound these questions; no obligation on yours to answer them. Nevertheless, you are citizens of Georgia; and if your negotiations fail, you will see how necessary it will be for me to receive true and correct answers to these questions, from such authority as will enable me to use them in vindication of our rights to the best advantage. You will not infer from any of them that hasty inferences have been indulged to the prejudice of the Government of the United States. Hope is still entertained that all will be right; and in no event will any thing be sought to inculpate the Government of the United States but strict matter of fact.

With great consideration and respect,

G. M. TROUP.

To which the following reply was returned:

SIR:

PRINCETON, NEAR BROKEN ARROW, December 14, 1824.

Your express arrived here on Sunday, and found us absent on a small excursion up the river on business most importantly connected with our mission. We did not return till yesterday, and then in excessive rain, which has greatly retarded our operations. We are not without our difficulties in determining what shall be our answer to the several inquiries which you have propounded. These do not arise, however, from any reluctance to make to you a full disclosure of our proceedings, and the obstacles which we have had to encounter; but from an apprehension that, by such communication, we might, for the present, weaken the means of which we hope successfully to avail ourselves. As agents of the General Government, and as citizens of Georgia, we cannot regard your efforts upon this subject in other than the most favorable light; and at a time more seasonable, in case of our failure, we shall be prepared most heartily to co-operate in your views, and upon the very points of your inquiries.

We commenced our negotiations in writing; as far as it has progressed in this way, we send you a copy. This method has been abandoned, as too formal, and liable to too many interruptions. Our discussions will be conducted orally for the future, and in this way we shall enjoy advantages which will probably lead to success.

The proceedings which you have seen published as occurring at Tuckabatchee and Pole Cat Springs were evidently intended to forestal us. They have, in a great measure, had the effect, by spreading alarm throughout the nation, by the miserable farrago of threats which they contain. For some time past, the Cherokees have exerted a steady and officious interference in the affairs of this tribe. That this has derived additional impulse, and that we are now encountering a daily interference most active and insidious, we have no doubt.

We decline a specification, in the hope that we may succeed without it, and thereby avoid its irritating consequences. Deeply sensible that a persevering zeal is indispensable in furtherance of the policy of the Government, and in vindicating the rights of Georgia, we will communicate again by express, to reach you in the forenoon of Saturday, if such step should appear to us to promise any advantage.

With sentiments of great consideration and respect, we are your obedient servants,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER.

His Excellency GEORGE M. TROUP, Milledgeville.

On this day (December the 14th) the commissioners attended the council, and found them engaged in the earnest discussion of the subject of the treaty. Eight or ten chiefs delivered their opinions at considerable length, and some with great earnestness and vehemence. After they had closed, the commissioners were invited in, and, having previously arranged with the council to conduct the negotiation, verbally delivered to them a talk, which insisted, in strong terms, upon the acquisition of the whole country by exchange, or of a part by exchange or purchase. The wishes of the General Government were urged. Efforts were used to convince the council that such arrangement was indispensable, whether considered in relation to the United States or themselves; that, for the safety and better means of defence of the United States, and to enable her to comply with the compact with Georgia, it was necessary that the States should lie together in a compact form; that, for the protection and improvement of the nation, it was necessary they should go out of the limits of the States. They were warned against the talks of any body except the General Government, and were told that they had been misled by the Cherokees and others, whose duty it was to have instructed them better.

Many other topics were also urged, and documents read, showing the rights of the United States and Georgia, and the opinions and wishes of the General Government.

At the close of the commissioners' remarks on the above subject, they proposed that the balance of the negotiation should be conducted by a number of chiefs, to be selected by the council; and that the mass who were standing round, and occasioning great expense in rations, should be discharged. They also proposed that the place of negotiation should be changed to some room, which should be more comfortable and convenient; and that the commissioners would pay the expense of such a room. To the whole of these last propositions a flat denial was received. It was answered, that they would discharge none of their people; that they would meet nowhere but in the square; and that the proceedings should be in the presence of all who were attending. Two chiefs then gave their answers to the main subject of the commissioners' talk. These were short, but pointed, consisting of but little more than the emphatic "No." The council were then informed that the commissioners could not take such answers as conclusive; that they should continue the negotiation as long as they thought proper, and would expect to meet the council again on to-morrow.

The following letter was addressed to the agent:

SIR:

Having been instructed by the War Department to call on you for any information or assistance which we might need, pending the present treaty, we have to request that you cause to be produced to us certain documents transmitted by the Cherokee nation, or some individual thereof, to this nation; also, a letter purporting to have been written by one Charles Casheda, of Tennessee, to the Big Warrior. We deem an inspection of the above documents material to us in furthering the just views and policy of the General Government. If they are in the custody, power, or control of yourself or sub-agent, we shall be thankful if you will cause them to be furnished as soon as practicable.

We are, sir, your obedient servants,

Colonel JOHN CROWELL, Agent, &c.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER.

To which the following reply was received:

GENTLEMEN:

In reply to your note of this date, in relation to certain documents said to have been transmitted to the nation by the Cherokees, I have to remark, that no such documents, or documents of any description from the Cherokees, are in my possession; but, on application to the sub-agent, he has delivered to me the enclosed papers, and states that they are all that are in his possession. He states that the letter of Casheda of Tennessee to the Big Warrior he believes to be in the possession of the Warrior.

Mr. Peck, who acted as secretary to the Creek council, informs me that he has in his possession the correspondence between the Cherokees and the United States commissioners at New Town, but that he does not feel himself authorized to give them up without the consent of the chiefs from whom he received them.

I have, &c.

JOHN CROWELL, Agent for Indian Affairs.

Messrs. CAMPBELL and MERRIWETHER,
United States Commissioners.

NOTE.—The papers furnished were, a letter from the Cherokee delegation to the President; letter from D. G. Campbell to the Secretary of War, dated 28th November, 1823; report of the Secretary of War to the President; Secretary of War to Cherokee delegation; the delegation to the Secretary of War; and President's message to Congress. The above papers were in manuscript, and, as we believe, in the handwriting of John Ross.

DECEMBER 16, 1824.

The commissioners met the council again on this day, and gave them a talk. Reference was had to the treaties of Augusta, Galphinton, and Shoulderbone, for the purpose of showing that, even before the Revolution, the lands which the nation occupied were not held by title, but were reserved to them simply for hunting-grounds. Subsequent treaties were also referred to, and many arguments urged in favor of an entire or partial cession of lands. A distinct proposition was then submitted, that the United States would give lands in exchange for the entire possessions of the Creek nation, acre for acre, and indemnify the nation for their improvements and the expenses of removal; would pay the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, or would make an exchange for the lands within the limits of Georgia, giving, as odds, the sum of three hundred thousand dollars. To these arguments and propositions the Little Prince replied, that he had directed his warriors several times to tell the commissioners that he had no land for sale, but that we would not believe them; therefore, he would answer himself. He said he should listen to no old treaties; that at New York the nation gave up land, and that General Washington gave them the balance, and told them it was theirs; and that they never intended to spare another foot. The commissioners then laid before them sundry documents, containing evidence of a claim in favor of Blackburn and Houston, of Tennessee, against the nation, forwarded by the War Department; and then retired.

DECEMBER 18, 1824.

The commissioners met in council, and asked whether they persisted in the determination which they had expressed, of ceding lands on no terms. The Big Warrior's deputy answered, that he would not take a housefull of money for his interest in the land, and that we might take this for a final answer.

In regard to the claim from Tennessee, the council insisted on delay, stating that papers were in the hands of the Big Warrior which were material. They said, further, that the arrest of the claimants, and the capture of their goods, were under the order of the agent, Colonel Hawkins; and that this order could not then be produced; and that they could not consider the claim any further at this time.

The commissioners then took their leave of the council, and retired.

On the evening of this day the commissioners consulted as to the course best to be pursued. Believing that they had been defeated by combination and preconcert, they resolved to pursue the subject by every means of which they could avail themselves. It appeared that the most active, industrious, and insidious means had been resorted to, for months, for the purpose of inspiring confidence, determination, prejudice, and obstinacy, in one part of the nation, (upper towns,) and of spreading fears and alarms in the other, by threats and menaces. These were frequently repeated in the course of the negotiation. The commissioners found themselves overreached in the selection of the place. The combination had every opportunity of exerting its devices, and the commissioners had but few facilities of counteraction. We satisfied ourselves that a treaty could be obtained from the chiefs within the limits of Georgia, and to the extent of the Georgia claim. The basis of such treaty would have been exchange of territory, and would have effected the removal of one-half of the nation, (ten thousand.) The commissioners, entertaining some doubts of the validity of a treaty signed by a dividual council, and fearing to expose such part of the chiefs to the resentment of the combination, resolved upon a temporary adjournment, for the purpose of obtaining the further instructions of the Government. The following communication was then addressed to the Secretary of War; but the commissioners, considering that the business of negotiation requires to be precipitated, and that the least delay would endanger success; and considering, further, that the subject admits of better explanation and greater detail by a personal interview with the Executive of the Union, determined that a member of the board should, with the least possible delay, proceed to Washington city, and that proceedings should rest until his return. D. G. Campbell being selected to make the visit to Washington, the board adjourned, and resolved to set out for Georgia the next day.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, January 8, 1825.

The commissioners appointed by the General Government to hold a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians for the acquisition of territory, met at the Broken Arrow, (an Indian town on the Chattahoochie,) on the 29th November last. The negotiation was commenced on the 1st December, with the chiefs of the nation, in number about two hundred. There were in attendance, however, from six to ten thousand of the inhabitants of the country. Our proceedings were necessarily protracted, on account of our exposed situation at an inclement season, and the obstacles which we had to encounter. Having continued in session from the 1st to the 18th of December, we resolved upon a temporary adjournment, that we might be enabled to communicate with the Government upon points materially affecting our future operations. For this purpose, I have visited this place, and now do myself the honor of submitting to the Department, as well the proceedings which have already occurred, as the prospective arrangements which we hope to effect.

From the discussions which have been had, great in number and variety, upon the subject of our relations with the Indian tribes within the limits of States, we are very certain that we do not err in concluding that it is the wish as well as the policy of the Government that the land claim of such tribes should be extinguished, and their removal effected. To produce such desired end, the commissioners have exerted every means which it was in their power to control. Had the authorities and people of the nation been left to the free and unrestrained exercise of their own inclinations and judgment, we believe that our success would have been commensurate with our wishes and propositions. From the outset, it was impossible not to perceive a very striking difference between the sentiments and deportment of the chiefs of the upper and lower towns. This local distinction applies itself to the settlers upon the Tallapoosa, and those upon the Chattahoochie. The former are principally under the control of the Big Warrior, and the latter of General McIntosh. The former were stubborn and unyielding, while the latter considered our proposition as reasonable, and were disposed to its acceptance. A treaty could have been obtained, signed by a large majority of the chiefs within the Georgia limits, ceding the territory which they occupy; and we doubt not but that there would have been a striking unanimity on the part of the population, but for the threats and intimidating language which had been industriously circulated. These are contained in the written proceedings of the two meetings held by a portion of the chiefs at Tuckabatchee in May, and at the Pole Cat Springs in November last. The first of these meetings seems to have been produced, in some measure, by a communication made by John Ross, a Cherokee chief, to the Big Warrior, immediately after his return from this place, in the spring of the last year. His communication was accompanied by manuscript copies of the whole proceedings which occurred shortly previous with that tribe. With the precise tenor of Ross's letter we could not inform ourselves, but understood that it proposed a concert of action between the two tribes; that it earnestly advised a resistance of the policy of the Government; and that its further aim was to depreciate McIntosh, and to destroy his standing and influence. The course prescribed seems to have been scrupulously pursued, for, at the meeting at Tuckabatchee, the resolution was to "follow the pattern of the Cherokees, and, on no account whatever, to consent to sell one-foot of land, either by exchange or otherwise." This meeting was attended exclusively by chiefs within the Alabama limits. The proceedings of this meeting were in the presence of, and reduced to writing by, Captain Walker, the sub-agent, and carried shortly after (in June) to the Broken Arrow by the Big Warrior, and submitted for sanction. No objection was made, except by McIntosh; neither do we understand that any direct sanction was obtained. The time which transpired between the period of this meeting and the subsequent meeting at the Pole Cat Springs, in November, seems to have been industriously employed in confirming the decision of the upper town chiefs, and in exciting and cherishing the fears and alarms of McIntosh and his adherents.

The second meeting at the Pole Cat Springs was at the house of the sub-agent, and, as on the previous occasion, he was the writer of the state paper, and immediately afterwards caused both to be published in the newspapers of Alabama. A paper containing these publications accompanies this statement. Of the existence of these proceedings, by which the question was prejudged and the commission forestalled, we had no knowledge until we obtained it casually on our way to the treaty. Under these disadvantages, the negotiation was commenced; and the journal of our proceedings, herewith furnished, will serve to show, to some extent, the manner in which it was pursued. The commissioners were dependant solely upon their own exertions. They derived no aid from the principal agent, and encountered the perfidious opposition of his assistant. I may not, sir, have a proper apprehension of the duties and obligations of the agent's department; but, according to my convictions, a furtherance of the views and policy of the Government should form its paramount consideration. The agent, however, entertains a different sentiment, and professes to pursue the course of strict neutrality. As against the agent, we make no charge of interference; but that Captain Walker has prostituted the duties of his office, and wantonly intermeddled, we have no hesitation in alleging. If these people are capable, they are not inclined to draw the distinction, and, therefore, give to the conduct of Captain Walker the sanction of the agent's department.

I have thus, sir, enumerated some of the causes which operated what our adversaries are pleased to regard an entire defeat. We are, however, far from considering that we have failed in laying the groundwork of the most pleasing and satisfactory success. The letter which I had the honor to address to the Department from Augusta, in November, 1823, in which allusion is made to the sentiments of General McIntosh, has been used as an instrument in the hands of his enemies, for the purpose of lessening his influence and of bringing him into contempt among his own people. Satisfied, as I am, that nothing which I then said, or which I shall now say, ought rightfully to have such tendency, I shall proceed to detail some further proceedings with which that individual is particularly connected. So long as the negotiation was conducted with the council generally, no answer was received other than a prompt rejection of every proposition which was submitted. We were aware that individuals sitting in council acquiesced in such refusal, who are heartily disposed to a cession, but were held in restraint by the intimidating language of the adverse party. We made access to a number of chiefs of this description, and received from them a full disclosure of their feelings, wishes, and difficulties. A treaty could have been obtained, signed by a full representation of chiefs from all the towns within the limits of Georgia. The population contained within those limits is represented by the agent to be about ten thousand, and also to be the one-half of the whole nation. Such treaty would have extinguished the Indian claim to all lands within the limits of Georgia, and would have effected the removal of that number of Indians beyond the Mississippi. To the conclusion of such a treaty, at the time, and under the circumstances, two difficulties presented themselves. We had commenced our negotiation with the entire nation, represented by a national council. After doing this, we were not fully satisfied that a treaty, obtained from a divided council, sitting at a different place, would have met the sanction of the Government. Its rejection would have reduced its signers to the grade of common Indians, and perhaps have exposed their persons to the severest vengeance of the opposing party. It was therefore thought most expedient to come to a temporary adjournment, and consult the Government in relation to the exigency. The authority of the Executive is asked to convene the chiefs within the limits of Georgia; to negotiate with them exclusively, if we think proper; or inclusive of a deputation of chiefs from the upper towns, if such deputation should present themselves, and evince a disposition to negotiate to further extent. The success of any future operation depends solely upon the decision to be made upon this proposition. The grant of such authority, with positive certainty, will result as I have stated. If it be considered as inconsistent or impolitic, then any further prospect of acquiring lands of the Creeks by the process of negotiation may be considered as closed. Much conversation was held with General McIntosh concerning the details and consequences of such an arrangement. He is the only Indian with whom I have ever conversed who seemed to comprehend rightly the connexion between the Indian tribes and the Government of the United States. If others have the like legal view of their condition, they have never had the candor or magnanimity to express it. He seems to appreciate very feelingly the manner in which the tribe has been cherished, and the very humane and advantageous policy suggested by the President and the Department of concentrating all the tribes in compact settlements beyond the Mississippi. In effecting this design, he will have it in his power to be eminently useful. Himself and his followers (ten thousand in number) would form the largest tribe in the west; and, by example and invitation, would induce others to join them. It is sanguinely believed that, even at the outset, if such arrangement were about to occur, the nation would not permit itself to be divided, but that the whole would come in, and that the removal would be general and entire. But if this desirable end could not be produced at once, the emigrating party would very speedily drain from our limits those who might remain. For considerations like these, I view it as matter of great moment to maintain McIntosh in his authority and influence, and in his estimation of himself. I beg to be pardoned for suggesting that I consider this much his due, from the important military services which he has rendered the United States. He stands very differently, in point of merit, from his principal opposer, (the Big Warrior;) and the like difference would be found in a comparison of the followers of the one with those of the other. He has been to the west himself, and has the judgment to discover, and the candor to acknowledge, the superior advantages of a location in that quarter. He would have preferred the territory selected by the Choctaws, but has no objection to a settlement still further west. The emigrating party are desirous that as little time should be lost as possible. They will send out an exploring committee, and wish to avail themselves of the spring and summer of this year for that purpose. They are desirous, also, that the period of their removal should not be beyond the next fall. Such promptness and expedition cannot be otherwise than acceptable to the Government. It will be particularly so to the States which are interested. It is proposed by the emigrants themselves to relieve the Government from the entire expense and detail of transportation. A particular sum, not unreasonable or excessive in amount, will be stipulated to be given, which they will receive and disburse themselves, considering it as a full indemnity for the improvements which they abandon, and the expenses which they may incur, either in transportation or the purchase of necessaries to sustain them in their new settlement.

Upon the subject of the government of the Creeks, we could not acquire information of a definite and satisfactory character. Their council is composed of a great number of chiefs, of various grades of authority. The Big Warrior is head chief of the upper towns, and McIntosh of the lower; he is also speaker of the nation. The Little Prince is highest in authority, being head chief of the nation; and has been uniformly the friend and adherent of McIntosh. In the present negotiation, he considered himself bound by the sanction he had given to the proceedings at Tuckabatchee and Pole Cat Springs. His attendance at those meetings we consider to have been insidiously procured.

The attendance of the head chief of the Coweta town was procured in like manner, at the last meeting at Pole Cat Springs. The name of this chief, as signed to the proceedings, is Tome Tuskumuggee. I received the statement from himself, that he had been taken in, and imposed upon, and that he should not hold himself bound by the supposed pledge. This Coweta town is the most extensive and numerous in the nation, and claims to be the original town of the whole tribe, and that all others are its branches. In proof of this priority of standing, I beg leave to refer you to our journal, which contains a communication from the council of the 11th of December, in which they say that "the first red people that ever visited the whites were from the Coweta town." The like proof was contained in an observation of the Little Prince during the negotiation. In argument, an old treaty was referred to, which had been concluded between the Creeks and the State of Georgia. Its authenticity was denied, on the ground that "no Coweta chief had signed it." Coweta is on both sides of the Chattahoochie; contains McIntosh, the Little Prince, Tome Tuskumuggee; and extends from Broken Arrow to the Cherokee boundary. It is worthy of remark, that the treaty of 1821, concluded at the Indian Springs, is signed by but two chiefs on the Alabama side of the nation. The fact is, that McIntosh maintains the right of the Coweta town alone to dispose of the whole country. It would seem that the upper towns conceded this authority, and dreaded its exercise; for the utmost consternation was discoverable whenever it was known that the commission [the commissioners] and the Coweta chiefs had had an interview.

Thus, sir, have I hastily detailed to you the obstacles which we had to encounter; the foundation which we laid; the prospective advantages which are held out to us; the manner of their attainment; and a very imperfect history of the relative powers of the Creek towns. I shall be gratified if the sketch shall be found to contain the information required. If it does not, its defects may probably be supplied by reference to myself; and [I] hope that such reference may be made, without reserve, as often as necessary.

I would add, very respectfully, that an early decision is desirable. It is in contemplation to return to the Creek country, re-assemble the chiefs by the 5th of February, and transmit the treaty in time for the adjudication of the present Senate.

With great consideration and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War, Washington City.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Duncan G. Campbell, Commissioner, &c., to the Secretary of War, dated

WASHINGTON, January 11, 1825.

Having understood from the Department this morning, in a verbal conversation, that the President, after consulting the cabinet, had declined granting to the commissioners the authority which was asked in my communication of the 8th instant, I take leave to propound another course, and to request that I may be instructed accordingly, as the decision may be made.

The facts heretofore disclosed show a willingness on the part of the Indians within the Georgia limits to cede their territory, and to emigrate; but insurmountable obstacles present themselves to the acceptance of a treaty thus concluded. It is now proposed to reassemble the chiefs of the whole nation; to renew the offers already made; to obtain the entire Creek country, if practicable; but if this cannot be effected, then to accept a treaty signed by the chiefs within the limits of Georgia, provided such treaty be accompanied by the assent of the other chiefs that the land to be abandoned by the emigrating party shall be immediately subject to the disposition of the Government. I am unable to perceive any objection to which this proposition may be liable. If the President entertains the like views, and we can receive specific instructions that the plan proposed coincides with the wishes and policy of the Government, I have a strong assurance that a treaty, highly favorable, may shortly be obtained. The special message of the President, which you mentioned as being about to be made, will no doubt be found an efficient auxiliary.

Copy of a letter from D. G. Campbell to Colonel John Crowell, Agent of Indian Affairs.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 12, 1825.

The commissioners on the part of the United States have come to the conclusion of assembling the chiefs of the Creek nation, for the purpose of submitting to them matters of importance to themselves and the Government. The day of convention will be the 7th of February next, (Monday,) at the Indian Springs. We are desirous that all the chiefs of the nation should attend who are in the habit of transacting public business and of signing treaties.

You will cause the enclosed invitation to be circulated forthwith amongst the chiefs, and broken days issued accordingly. On my return to Georgia, which will be in a few days, I shall probably have occasion to address you further upon the subject of the negotiation.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

Colonel JOHN CROWELL, Agent Indian Affairs.

Copy of the circular addressed to the chiefs.

To the Chiefs of the Creek nation:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 12, 1825.

By the authority of the President of the United States, you are requested to convene at the Indian Springs on Monday, the 7th day of February next. Matters of great consequence to the nation and the United States will be laid before you.

We shall expect all to be present on the day appointed who are in the habit of transacting the business of the nation, and of signing treaties.

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
in behalf of himself and
JAMES MERRIWETHER,
United States Commissioners.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to Colonel Duncan G. Campbell, Commissioner, &c. dated

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 13, 1825.

I am directed by the President to inform you that Captain Walker, the sub-agent of the Creek nation, has been discharged by his order. The reasons for his discharge will appear in the letter to Colonel Crowell, the agent, covering the discharge of the sub-agent, a copy of which is herewith enclosed.

The agent was instructed, by a letter from this Department of the 16th July last, covering an extract from the instructions to yourself and Major Merriwether, to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, as will appear by a copy of the letter and of the extract referred to, and herewith enclosed. It was not doubted by the Department but that he would zealously co-operate in effecting the object of the Government in authorizing the treaty to be held. It appears, however, by the report, that the agent neglected to inform you of the previous meetings and decision of the Creek chiefs at Tuckabatchee and the Pole Cat Springs, which had so material a bearing on the negotiation, and that the commissioners had to rely solely upon their own exertions, without aid from the agent, who assumed a neutral position. It also appears from the journal, that, in the opinion of the commissioners, the Creek Indians had been misled by the Cherokees, and others whose duty it was to have instructed them better. It is the desire of the President, before he makes any decision on the conduct of the agent, to be put in full possession of all the facts and circumstances, which may enable him to form a correct opinion as to his conduct and motives in withholding his co-operation; and, particularly, whether the agent received any instruction from the commissioners directing his general or particular co-operation, which he refused, or neglected to fulfil; and who are referred to in speaking of "others," in the extract from the journal of the proceedings of the commissioners above stated; and, particularly, whether the agent was, and, if so, by what particular acts of his were the Creeks misled.

It is doubtless the duty of the agent to watch over and to protect the Indians assigned to his agency, and to advance their interest in all cases under the treaties, laws, and instructions of the Department; but still he is the agent of the Government, and is bound in all cases to give his zealous co-operation in effecting its views. In addition to which, in this case he was particularly directed to obey the instructions of the commissioners, which ought to have excluded all doubt as to his duty of affording all the aid in his power to contribute to a successful termination of the treaty.

The commissioners, in their communication to the Governor of Georgia, speaking of the difficulties in answering his inquiries, remark that "these [difficulties] do not arise from any reluctance to make to you [the Governor] a full disclosure of our proceedings, and the obstacles which we have had to encounter; but from an apprehension that, by such communication, we might, for the present, weaken the means of which we hope successfully to avail ourselves. As agents of the General Government, and as citizens of Georgia, we cannot regard your efforts upon this subject in other than the most favorable light; and at a time more seasonable, in case of our failure, we shall be prepared most heartily to co-operate in your views, and upon the very points of your inquiries." Again: "That we are now encountering a daily interference, most active and insidious, we have no doubt. We decline a specification, in the hope that we may succeed without it, and thereby avoid its irritating consequences."

The President requests to be informed of the nature of the communication which was withheld from the Governor, and which, if it had been communicated, would, for the present, weaken the means of which the commissioners hoped successfully to have availed themselves; and which, at a time more seasonable, in the case of a failure, they proposed to make known, and to co-operate with his views on the points of his inquiries; and what was the nature of the means referred to; and, also, what was the nature of those active and insidious interferences which the commissioners encountered, but which they declined specifying in their answer to the Governor, in order to avoid irritating consequences; and from whence such interferences came.

The proposed renewal of the negotiation renders the explanation the more desirable. The President is very solicitous for its successful termination; and a full disclosure of the nature, extent, and source of the opposition at which the commissioners hint will enable him to adopt such measures as the facts disclosed may require.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To Col. DUNCAN G. CAMPELL, Commissioner, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to Colonel John Crowell, Indian Agent, &c., dated

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 13, 1825.

I herewith enclose a letter to Captain Walker, discharging him from the service of the United States as sub-agent, which you will cause to be delivered as speedily as practicable. The charges against Captain Walker are, generally, that he aided and countenanced the Indians in their opposition to the treaty, and particularly that he penned the publication of the Creek chiefs at Tuckabatchee and the Pole Cat Springs; and that their meeting at the latter was at his house, and with his sanction and countenance. In addition to the above, it appears, by verbal statements, that Captain Walker has married a daughter of one of the principal chiefs of the nation, which creates a relationship that is calculated to influence him improperly in the discharge of his duty. Captain Walker's place will be filled by the Department as soon as a suitable person can be selected.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To Col. JOHN CROWELL, Indian Agent, Creek Agency, Georgia.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to Mr. William Walker, Sub-agent, &c., dated

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 11, 1825.

It appearing by the journal and report of the commissioners appointed by the President to treat with the Creek Indians for a cession of territory, that, so far from contributing to effect the object of the Government, your influence has been used in defeating the successful termination of the treaty, I am directed by the President to inform you that you are, in consequence, discharged from the service of the United States as sub-agent; and your pay and duties will accordingly cease on the receipt of this communication.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

To Mr. WILLIAM WALKER, Sub-agent, Creek Agency.

Copy of a letter from Duncan G. Campbell to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 14, 1825.

I have received yours of yesterday, informing me of the removal of Captain Walker from the office of sub-agent of the Creek nation, and asking further information respecting the position assumed by the principal agent; and asking, also, an explanation of certain passages contained in the commissioners' journal.

I regard the impeachment of an individual of official delinquency as matter of delicate import. I did not, therefore, permit myself to become the accuser of Captain Walker, until, by actual observation, and from his own acknowledgment, I was possessed of direct and manifest proof of his guilt. Not possessing the like evidence against the agent, I cannot consent to be considered his accuser. My only allusion to this officer was upon the ground of his non-co-operation, and his omission to restrain his sub-agent in his adverse movements. This was in compliance with the course suggested by the Department, which required an enumeration of all the difficulties which we had encountered. As far as he has been brought into question by my report, on account of the negative course which he professed to pursue, and the neutrality which he assumed, the grounds taken have been fully sustained by the President and Department. In any proceeding beyond this, I decline an agency. It only remains for me, then, to give explanations to certain passages which you have cited in the journal, to limit or extend their bearings as the state of facts may require, and to answer certain questions which you have propounded.

I am asked "whether the agent received any instructions from the commissioners, directing his general or particular co-operation, which he refused or neglected to fulfil?" The power of the commissioners to control the agent was derived from their instructions; and the tenor of these instructions will show the extent of that power. The article connected with the subject is this:

"The probable amount of provisions that will be required to be issued to the Indians while treating with them, and the price at which they can be obtained, can be ascertained by a correspondence with the agent, Colonel John Crowell, who is instructed to obey your orders on all points connected with the proposed treaty, and to take such steps as may be necessary to prepare the Indians to meet the commissioners at the time and place which they may fix on for holding it, and of which he should be early apprized."

The construction given to this article was, that it limited itself to the provisions which might be needed at the treaty, and to the assemblage of the Indians. Our expectations that the agent would co-operate were formed from our convictions of his duty as the officer of the Government. If, as appears to be the fact, his convictions were otherwise, our order would have been an unavailing process. On reference to the journal, I find, in a letter which I addressed to the agent on the 5th September, this sentence:

"I shall attend Baldwin court on the fourth Monday in this month, when I shall be glad to be informed of any matter affecting our negotiation. We are greatly concerned for the result of our mission, and must beg you to prepare the nation for the issue we desire."

Whether this will be regarded as an "instruction," "directing his general or particular co-operation," I cannot undertake to say. It is most certain that the agent did not so regard it; or, if he did, then he failed to "fulfil" it; for neutrality was his avowed course from beginning to end.

I now proceed to an explanation of the allusions contained in the letter of the commissioners to Governor Troup, of Georgia. The Legislature of that State being in session, and near a close, the Governor communicated with the commissioners by express. This happened at what we considered the crisis of the negotiation. The very day on which the express arrived was spent by the commissioners at Coweta, a few miles distant from the treaty ground, on business connected with the treaty. The absence of the commissioners, the despatch of an express to Georgia, the arrival of the Governor's express from Georgia, and the communication had by the commissioners on that day with some of the chiefs, had the effect of producing great confusion and alarm in the ranks of those who considered themselves our adversaries. This was manifested by the hasty departure of two messengers to the Big Warrior; one on the night of the 13th, and the other on the morning of the 14th December. One of these messengers was sent at the instance of the sub-agent himself. The Big Warrior was not present at the treaty, but seemed to be represented by a committee of four. With these, the sub-agent had constant intercourse; and, in council, they were the organ of the opposition. For these acts of interference he was called to account by the commissioners, and given to understand the danger to which he had exposed himself. The withholding of these facts was intended to have its operation upon Walker, and to be made the price of his co-operation. These are some of the "insidious" and "daily interferences" to which we had allusion; and this is the individual whom we intended to designate. The business of negotiation, always intricate when applied to Indians and their advisers, becomes peculiar, and is often influenced, by circumstances seemingly unimportant.

Thus, sir, have I answered the several points upon which the President required further information. In doing this, I have had reference alone to facts of a positive character; to none others did I consider myself warranted in resorting. Impressions, circumstances incidentally occurring, public rumor, or newspaper speculations, I have not considered as topics proper to be embodied in this report.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 18, 1825.

The President has deliberately considered the proposition submitted by the commissioners to treat with the Creeks, of holding a separate treaty with General McIntosh for a cession of that portion of the Creek territory lying within the limits of Georgia; and, although he is very desirous of acquiring for the State of Georgia the land in question, he is of opinion that he cannot, with propriety, authorize the treating with General McIntosh alone, as proposed by the commissioners. There could be no objection to an arrangement with him to abandon the country which he now occupies, and to settle, with his followers, on such tract of country as might be assigned to him on the west of the Mississippi; but the President is of opinion that it is not in the power of General McIntosh to cede any portion of the land belonging to the Creek nation, without the assent of the nation itself. The principle on which such cession would be made, without such consent, would involve the idea that every individual in the nation would have a right to cede to the United States the particular portion of the country in which he might be in actual occupancy; and would, in effect, completely destroy that degree of independence which, under the laws, treaties, and usages of the Government, they have ever enjoyed.

Though a treaty cannot be made, for these reasons, with General McIntosh alone, for a cession of territory, yet the President can see no objection to a renewal of the negotiation, as proposed by your letter of the 11th instant, in order to obtain an arrangement with General McIntosh, with the consent of the nation, for the cession of the country in question; and you are accordingly, in conjunction with Major Merriwether, as commissioners, authorized to renew the negotiation. You will, however, distinctly perceive in the remarks which have been made, that whatever arrangement may be made with General McIntosh for a cession of territory must be made by the Creek nation, in the usual form, and upon the ordinary principles with which treaties are held with the Indian tribes.

In the renewed negotiation you will consider the instructions formerly given, of the 16th of July, as applying to the renewed negotiation, as far as they are, in their nature, applicable.

The agent has received instructions to give his hearty co-operation in the object of the negotiation, and to obey, in every respect, the orders which you may give under your instructions. A copy of the letter to the agent is herewith enclosed for your information.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL, Commissioner, &c.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 18, 1825.

I enclose, by direction of the President, a copy of a letter from this Department to Colonel Campbell, one of the commissioners to treat with the Creeks, and a copy of his answer to the same. The nature and object of the letter and the reply sufficiently explain themselves, and will require no particular remarks.

In communicating them, however, to you, I am directed by the President to state, that, although he sees nothing in the journal and report of the commissioners, or in the answers of Colonel Campbell, to impeach your motives, yet he does not approve of your conduct in relation to the late treaty. Though it is the duty of the agent to protect and cherish the Indians confided to his care, yet that duty never can be in conflict with the paramount one which he owes to the Government, and which, on all occasions, obligates him to give his hearty co-operation in effecting its views.

The Department did not suppose that any doubt was entertained on this point, and therefore did not particularly inculcate this duty in its instructions to you in relation to the Creek treaty. The extract, however, from the instructions to the commissioners, in which they are informed that you would obey their instructions on all points, which was communicated to you, is considered as sufficiently indicating the views of the Department in regard to your duties.

The President attributes the fact to a misconception of your duties that you did not report the meeting of the Indians at Tuckabatchee and the Pole Cat Springs, either to this Department or to the commissioners, and that you did not adopt decisive measures to control the conduct of the sub-agent in his opposition to the views of the Government.

The treaty is about to be renewed, and the President, feeling much interest in its successful termination, looks with confidence to your hearty co-operation with the commissioners. You will spare no pains in preparing the Indians for the meeting, and contributing to the successful termination of the negotiation; and it is also expected that you will cheerfully, and with alacrity, obey such instructions as you may receive from the commissioners in the fulfilment of their duties under the instructions of the Department; a copy of which is herewith enclosed.

I am, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

To Colonel JOHN CROWELL, Indian Agent, Creek Agency.

CREEK NATION, COWETA, January 25, 1825.

We, the chiefs of Coweta, Taladega, Cusseta, Broken Arrow, and Hitchita towns, in council met, do take this method to lay before our father the President of the United States the most distressing difficulties that are existing in our nation, and have been for some time past, owing entirely to the existence of two parties in the nation, known and designated by the red sticks, (or hostile party,) and the other party friendly to the United States, and who were the warm supporters of the American war against said party of Indians, and also against the British. For further particulars we most respectfully refer our father the President to General Jackson, who can test to the characters of the present bearers of this remonstrance. It is painful to us to acknowledge that there is an actual necessity of calling upon our father the President of the United States for protection, inasmuch as the Big Warrior, who is influenced by the hostile party, (with the exception of a few,) is calling his chiefs together, who consist of such Indians as were particularly opposed to the United States during the last American war, (one of the most conspicuous chiefs of this council is Gun Boy, whom we took prisoner before Fort Gaines, during Jackson's campaign against the Seminole Indians;) and passing orders and decrees, without the consent of any of our towns, apparently for the destruction of our people, who are the friendly party, inasmuch as it certainly will create an internal war amongst ourselves; and we hope our father, the President of the United States, will never admit that his red children, who took his white children by the hand in the defence of the United States in the late war with Great Britain, should be entirely excluded from having any voice in the nation, or, in other words, excluded from the benefits of their country, and for the Big Warrior and his party to have the entire prerogative of the nation. We are informed that the Big Warrior and his chiefs are now in council, and we expect are passing such decrees as are derogatory to the safety of McIntosh and the rest of his chiefs; for instance, it has been but a short time since when they met in the grand council square, and passed an order for the execution of McIntosh and any other of his chiefs who would make any propositions to the United States in favor of selling any part of the country which we now claim. This is not all; there is no doubt but that said council, at the present meeting, will pass an order for the dismissal of General McIntosh and many others of his adherents; and in all probability they have sent, or will send, on a delegation from the council to that amount; although knowing, at the same time, that McIntosh and his chiefs have the superiority in the grand council of the nation; for reasons why, they were the only supporters and defenders of the nation in the last war; and that a number of the Big Warrior's chiefs forfeited their rights to the country which they previously had, by their hostility to the United States during the last war.

We do, therefore, deny that the Warrior's party have any right to enter into any such arrangements; and we also deny that Gun Boy, and several others of the Warrior's chiefs, have any privilege in the National Council, although we have heretofore permitted them to do so; for they did not defend our country from the foreign or domestic foes, but used their utmost exertions against the United States, and in favor of their enemies. We, therefore, headmen of the nation, or of the aforesaid towns, assure our father the President that we have much trouble in our country, and much too in consequence of our agent's partiality to the Big Warrior's party, inasmuch as it appears to create a jealousy with us that the United States are failing to comply with what they once promised us—that is, protection. But we are conscious that it is unknown to our father the President.

But hoping that our father will make the necessary inquiries of our delegation, and advise accordingly for his red children's welfare, of which we ever pray, &c.

CREEK NATION, January 25, 1825.

We, the principal chiefs of Coweta, Taladega, Broken Arrow, and Hitcheta towns, in council met, agreeably to a previous notice by General William McIntosh, whom we acknowledge to be our principal protector and chief, having full confidence in his patriotism, integrity, and great regard for his people whom he represents, have unanimously nominated and appointed him, with seven others of the National Council, to wit: Tome Tuskunuggee, Oathle Tuskunuggee, Benjamin Derriso, Seah Gray, Arpifke Tuskunuggee, Tukuparchu Hayo, and Coweata

Emarlo, and Samuel Hawkins, interpreter, to meet the President of the United States, our father, and to make such arrangements as will be most conducive to the welfare of our people, and to receive such advice as our father the President may think proper to give; and should our father the President give it as his opinion that the claim of the State of Georgia to the land within her limits would prevent a fee-simple title from vesting in our people, then, in that event, General William McIntosh, with the other delegates of our chiefs, are duly authorized, in behalf of our people, to make such arrangements with our father the President, or his commissioners for that purpose, in an exchange for lands west of the Mississippi, as have been referred to by the United States commissioners lately at the Broken Arrow, assuring the President our father, at the same time, that any thing which the said delegates may do on the occasion will meet the approbation of the National Council in general, inasmuch as there are six of our principal council, with General William McIntosh, who are authorized to sign any treaty of that kind which our father the President and our delegates may make upon the subject.

Signed in open council the day and date above written.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, February 4, 1825.

We have received your communication of the 2d instant, and, in reply thereto, have the honor to state, that all the information which we have received, in relation to the causes which obstructed the treaty lately attempted between the United States and the Creek Indians, has been derived from conversations held by some of us with Colonel D. G. Campbell, one of the commissioners on the part of the United States, and who recently came to this place on business connected with the treaty. Of the ardent wish of the commissioners to procure an extinguishment of Indian title to lands in Georgia, we have no doubt. You will, doubtless, recollect that the grounds for the appropriation for holding a treaty with the Creek Indians were disclosed in a communication made by these same commissioners (then in treaty with the Cherokees) to the War Department, and last year laid before the House of Representatives. The causes of a failure to obtain a favorable treaty may be reduced to two.

1st. The indifference of the principal agent in affording his aid and co-operation to the commissioners. This indifference is discoverable from the following circumstances: As long ago as November, 1823, Colonel Campbell (then a commissioner to treat with the Cherokees) had a conversation with the agent at Milledgeville, in Georgia, soon after the election of the present Governor, Troup, in opposition to Captain Talbot. This conversation Colonel Campbell detailed to one of the undersigned, and is in substance as follows: Colonel Campbell inquired of the agent what prospect there was of obtaining a cession of land from the Creeks. The agent replied, that the time had been when he thought it very good; that he had had every thing arranged with the Indians, and their minds properly prepared to make a cession; but that then he was indifferent on the subject, and he should put himself to no trouble about it; that if their wishes had been accomplished, (alluding to the recent election of Governor,) he believed a treaty could have been made, but that it was then very doubtful; that he did not wish any friend of his to be injured by a failure of a treaty, and advised Colonel Campbell to resign, or to have nothing to do with it. His remarks were accompanied with various shrugs and allusions to the recent election, which left no doubt on Colonel Campbell's mind as to his meaning. Colonel Campbell very properly replied, that these considerations should have no influence on his mind; that, however favorable he had been to the election of Captain Talbot, he felt it his duty to promote the interests of the State, by every means in his power, without regard to such local political circumstances.

Colonel Campbell also detailed conversations held with the agent at or near Broken Arrow, the late treaty ground. They were, in substance, that, on inquiry as to the course which he should pursue in relation to the pending treaty, the agent replied that he should be neutral; that, although he would afford no special aid, he would throw no obstacles in the way; that he had collected the Indians, and the commissioners might then do the best they could; that he had not been instructed to co-operate with the commissioners; and that, without such instructions, he did not feel it his duty to take an active part. (It appears that this statement is true, and that he never had received any special instructions from the War Department on this subject.) Accordingly, he never did afford them any aid. On the contrary, Colonel Campbell stated, that, from a variety of circumstances that came under his own observation, he was impressed with the belief that the agent was not friendly to a treaty of cession.

2d. The interference of the Cherokee Indians and others dissuading the Creeks from making a treaty. How this interference was made, the committee can be more distinctly informed by calling for the journal kept by the commissioners, (now believed to be in the War Department;) from which it will be seen that the Cherokee delegation in this city during the last session of Congress soon after its adjournment furnished to the Creek chiefs copies of all the proceedings and correspondence had last winter, and which were laid before Congress; that this led to one or two councils of the Creek chiefs, in which they came to the determination to cede no more lands, and published a manifesto to that effect in the Alabama papers. It appears that this document was in the handwriting of the sub-agent, Captain Walker, (who is married to a daughter of the Creek chief Big Warrior); that this proceeding was known to the principal agent; and that he made no communication thereof to the War Department, or to the commissioners, until they procured it by a peremptory order, (to be found on their journal,) to be produced by the sub-agent.

From conversations held by Colonel Campbell with some of the undersigned, there can be no doubt that Colonel Campbell was under the belief that the sub-agent had actively interfered to prevent a treaty; that this interference was known to the principal agent; and that he gave no information thereof to the Government, nor to the commissioners, until it was dragged out by their order above described.

From like conversations with Colonel Campbell, and from other sources of information, it appears that several brothers, relations, and connexions of the principal agent, have trading establishments in the nation, in which many believe he is more or less interested. Whether this be the fact, we cannot state. Colonel Campbell stated that all the conductors of these establishments were inimical to a treaty. He gave to one of the undersigned one remarkable case. He states that the commissioners determined to make the effort to enlist one of these (Mr. Henry Crowell, a brother of the agent,) in the cause. Mr. Crowell appeared at first not disinclined; but, subsequently, after consultation with his friends, (it is not remembered whether Colonel Campbell stated the agent was one whom he had consulted,) he returned, and said he had determined to do nothing; but insinuating, at the same time, that, were he to try, he could succeed in inclining the Indians to cede lands, but that, so long as the affairs of the State of Georgia were in the present hands, he would not do any thing to aid in establishing their popularity; and, finally, declined interfering on that account.

In relating these conversations, it is not pretended that more than their substance is given.

Colonel Campbell is distinctly under the belief that the Creek Indians within the limits of Georgia, over whom the chief McIntosh has influence, are inclined to cede their lands, and remove beyond the Mississippi; they form about one-half of the nation. The principal object of Colonel Campbell's visit here was to procure authority to treat with these separately. It has been withheld, as we understand. Colonel Campbell thinks McIntosh and his party in great danger. A quarrel is existing between him and the Big Warrior, and no good understanding exists between him and the agent. Unless sustained by the Government, McIntosh will be deprived of his power in the nation, and probably of his life. This is greatly to be regretted, as he enters fully into the views of the Government upon the removal of the Indians over the Mississippi. Colonel Campbell has been furnished with new instructions, (the tenor of which can be procured from the War Department,) and has gone to make another effort to procure a cession of land. Success is hardly probable, inasmuch as all the Alabama Indians are opposed to it, and as the commissioners will again have to encounter the intrigues of those who have heretofore interposed their influence to prevent it. It is true the sub-agent has been removed, and, as is said, the principal agent reprimanded; but the sub-agent is yet in the nation, with all the connexions and friends of the agent, who have trading establishments there, and whose opposition is well known. It is also doubtful whether the reprimand of the agent is calculated to excite in him any zeal, inducing him earnestly to co-operate with the commissioners in the object of their mission. Any explanations upon the matters contained in the foregoing communication, the undersigned will be happy to make, on the request of the committee.

We have the honor to be, &c.

General JOHN COCKE,
Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN SPRINGS, February 7, 1825.

On this day the commissioners met at this place, pursuant to appointment; but few chiefs having arrived, no business was done. The following letter was received from the agent, Colonel Crowell:

GENTLEMEN:

INDIAN SPRINGS, February 7, 1825.

Having been informed by the War Department of the renewal of the negotiation with the Creek Indians for a cession of land, and being instructed to obey your orders in relation to the negotiation, I now have the honor to inform you that I will, in compliance with my instructions, obey such directions as I may receive from you in the fulfilment of your duties under the instructions of the War Department, and cheerfully co-operate with you in bringing to a successful termination the present negotiation.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN CROWELL, Agent Indian Affairs.

Messrs. MERRIWETHER and CAMPBELL.

The following reply was returned the next morning:

SIR:

INDIAN SPRINGS, February 8, 1825.

We have received your note of yesterday, informing us of the instructions which have been communicated to you by the Department of War upon the subject of the negotiation now pending with the Creek Indians. A successful termination of the business in which we are engaged is every way desirable and important, whether viewed in relation to the policy and wishes of the General Government, the rights and interests of the State of Georgia, or the permanent advantage and prosperity of the Indians themselves. With these convictions, we enter again upon the discharge of our duties, with increased powers and enlarged instructions highly favorable to success. Regarding your co-operation as an essential auxiliary, we are happy to be informed of a "cheerfulness on your part to co-operate with us in bringing to a successful termination the present negotiation." We shall recommence our proceedings as soon as the chiefs shall have arrived, and shall expect a free and unreserved intercourse with you during their progress.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL,
JAMES MERRIWETHER.

Colonel JOHN CROWELL, Agent for Indian Affairs.

THURSDAY, 10th.

The commissioners, having discovered that the chiefs and headmen had convened to the number of near four hundred, prepared a large council room, and gave notice to the chiefs that they would meet them at twelve o'clock. The notice was answered by a message from the Tuckabatchee chiefs that they were not ready, and were not disposed to meet in the room prepared for the council, but were disposed to hold our meetings at their own camp. An order was then issued calling a meeting without delay, and at the room designated, when the chiefs were assured that all intrusions should be prevented, and that no white man should be present except the commissioners, secretary, and agent. A meeting was then had, at which the commissioners gave the chiefs a long and friendly talk; explained to them very fully the views of the Government in proposing their removal; pointed out the country which would be assigned to them in the fork of Arkansas and Canadian rivers, and explained its advantages. The late message of the President to the Congress of the United States was then translated to them and explained. They were cautioned against all other talks of interested and pretended friends, and told that they had no safe dependance but upon the President. The message was then put into their possession, and directed to be interpreted as often as was necessary. At the close of the commissioners' talk, the agent stated to the council that he was instructed by the War Department to tell them what was the wish of the Government on the subject; that what the commissioners had told them was all the talk of the President; that the President wished them to sell their lands, and go beyond the Mississippi; that it was his wish, also, because it was the President's wish; and that, if he was continued agent, he would go with them and be their friend. He stated, further, that the reason why he had not given them this advice at Broken Arrow was, because he was not instructed to do so, and did not, therefore, consider it to be his duty.

The propositions made at Broken Arrow were repeated: to exchange for the whole country, and give a difference of five hundred thousand dollars, which should be considered as a full indemnity for the loss of improvements and the expense of removal. The chiefs were then advised to consult among themselves, and give the subject a full and dispassionate consideration. The commissioners then retired. On the evening of this day, the Cowetas, Cussetas, Hitchetas, Soowagalooos, Tuladegas, New Yorkers, Sand Towns, Thlecatchkas, and Big Shoals, met in a council of their own; there was a numerous representation from the Coweta and Cusseta towns. The subject of the treaty was fully discussed, as we are informed, and have no doubt; a vote was taken, and was unanimous, with the exception of two inconsiderable chiefs, in favor of a cession. Those who attended were free in their intercourse and communications with the commissioners, and seemed to feel no restraint or hesitation in the expression of their feelings and assent upon the subject of a sale and removal.

The following communication was received from the War Department, by express from Washington, Georgia:

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 21, 1825.

In my instructions to you of the 13th of September last, there was no designation of land made to be assigned to the Creeks in the event of their removal. Since you left here, the subject has been further examined into, in reference to a general disposition of the tribes west of the Mississippi; from which examination I find that a portion of the country lying in the junction of the Arkansas and the Canadian river, one of the principal branches of the Arkansas, and which limits the Choctaw possessions in that quarter, is the best, and may accordingly be proposed. Any arrangements, however, which may be entered into in relation to it must, of course, be subject to the extinguishment of the titles to those lands, according to the tenor of my instructions aforesaid.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To Messrs. CAMPBELL and MERRIWETHER, Commissioners, &c.

FRIDAY, 11th.

The commissioners met the council at 12 o'clock. The chiefs were requested to give their reply to the talk of yesterday. The head chief from Tuckabatchee then addressed the commissioners to the following effect:

"We met you at Broken Arrow, and then told you we had no land to sell; I then heard of no claims against the nation, nor have I since. We have met you here at a very short notice, and do not think that the chiefs who are here have any authority to treat. General McIntosh knows that we are bound by our laws, and that what is not done in the public square, in general council, is not binding on the nation. I am, therefore, under the necessity of repeating the same answer as given at Broken Arrow, that we have no land to sell. I know that there are but few from the upper towns here, and many are absent from the lower towns.

"General McIntosh knows that no part of the land can be sold without a full council, and without the consent of all the nation; and, if a part of the nation choose to leave the country, they cannot sell the land they have, but it belongs to the nation. From what you told us yesterday, I am induced to believe that it may be best for us to remove, but we must have time to think of it; and, should the chiefs who are here sell the land now, it might create dissensions and ill blood among the Indians. I have received a message from my head chief, the Big Warrior, directing me to listen to what the commissioners have to say; to meet them friendly, and part in the same way, but not to sell the land. I am also instructed to invite you to meet us at Broken Arrow three months hence, when a treaty may possibly be made, and to return home. This is the only talk I have for you, and I shall return home immediately. I gave you but one talk at Broken Arrow, and I shall give you but one here: such is the message I have received from my head chief, and I am bound to obey; to-morrow I shall leave here. I have now said all I have to say; I will listen to any thing further you have to say, but shall give no further answer."

The chiefs who were in favor of cession, being vastly superior in grade and numbers, replied to this talk, and stated that the nation was fully represented—much more so than is usual at meetings without the nation; and that they were fully authorized to make a treaty; that they had come here for the purpose of making a treaty, and should do so. Finding that the subject was undergoing a discussion, the commissioners retired, for the purpose of removing the restraint which their presence might produce; and, after some further debate among themselves, the council broke up. Previous to retiring, the commissioners informed the council that they had been called together by the authority of the President, on business of importance; that the nation appeared to be fully represented; and that, if any of them thought proper to leave the place before the business was closed, they should conceive themselves fully authorized to carry on and conclude the negotiation with those who remained.

SATURDAY, 12th.

In the morning of this day, early, the commissioners were informed that, in the course of the previous night, a part of the Cussetas and Soowagalooos had broken up their encampment and started home. On inquiry, it was found that a part of the chiefs from those towns had secretly left their encampment after midnight, and retired, without giving the slightest intimation of their intentions either to the commissioners or to those chiefs of the other towns with whom they had acted in concert on Thursday evening, and in council on Friday. Being wholly at a loss to account for this sudden and mysterious movement, the commissioners instituted an inquiry into its cause. The only information obtained was derived from a half-breed Indian, who stated that the order for their departure came from Colonel Hambly, the interpreter. The following order was issued, and the messenger despatched: "The chiefs of the Cusseta towns having assembled at the Indian Springs, under the authority of the President, and then suddenly retired, under order, as is stated; the commissioners demand that they state to the bearers hereof the reasons of their leaving the treaty ground, and particularly that they state under whose order they are acting." At 2 o'clock, having prepared a treaty in conformity with the wishes of a large portion of the chiefs, the commissioners met the council, when the treaty, having been fully interpreted and explained, was signed by all the chiefs present, except the delegation from Tuckabatchee and one chief from Taladega. During the execution of the treaty, to which no objection had been made, the principal chief from Tuckabatchee, (Poyethleyohole,) addressed the council as follows: "I have received instructions from my head chief not to sign a treaty; but, perhaps, on seeing him, we may yet conclude to join you, and all be friends. I wish to part with you all in perfect friendship." The Tuckabatchee chiefs then took friendly leave of the commissioners and the council, and retired.

MONDAY, 14th.

The commissioners met the council; when an additional article to the treaty was interpreted to, and signed by, all the principal chiefs present.

Soon after the treaty was concluded, Colonel Williamson returned, and made the following report:

"Wm. W. Williamson, having been despatched, under written authority from the United States commissioners holding a treaty with the Creek Indians, for the purpose of demanding of certain chiefs the reasons of their leaving the treaty ground, and of ascertaining under whose authority they were acting, reports to the commissioners the occurrences of his jaunt, and the information which he acquired.

"The informant states that, under the order of the commissioners, he set out from the treaty ground on Saturday morning, taking with him two intelligent half-breed Indians, one of whom speaks English correctly.

"Having progressed upwards of twenty miles in pursuit, he met a Coweta Indian, who, upon being questioned, stated that he met Tuckabatchee Hajo, a Cusseta chief, who told him that they had left the treaty; that Colonel Stedham had told him to go; that Hambly said so; and, if they did not go, they would all be put in jail. (Colonel Stedham is a chief of Soowagaloo town, and Hambly is United States interpreter.) The informant then proceeded a few miles onward, and overtook the son of old Tuskenah, the head chief of Cusseta. He stated that, the over night, Colonel Stedham came to the camp, and took his father out; and that, in their absence, he fell asleep; and, when he awoke, he found that all were gone, and word left for him to follow. The young man then referred us to another Indian, who was travelling with him, who, he said, was riding Stedham's saddle. The person referred to was then examined, who stated that, in the night, a white man came to the camp and called out Stedham, and had a conversation of some length; at the close, Stedham returned to the camp and said he should be off, and would take the [examinant's] saddle, and examinant must bring on his. We then proceeded to Flint river, forty-five miles from the treaty ground. We there learned that the retiring party had crossed the river about the middle of the day, and observed that they were then out of danger, and could not be overtaken. We found that the party had stopped, and some were resting, and others amusing themselves. Search was made for Tuckabatchee Hajo, who, upon being questioned, acknowledged that he had made the statement to the young Indian as before related, and confirmed it; he added, that Hambly had told Stedham to go, and take old Tuskenah with him.

"Another old chief was next examined, (Ossa Pochee,) who stated that Stedham had come to the camp in the night, and called out old Tuskenah, and had a long talk, and told him that, if they did not all go, the white people would have them all in jail; that they must start that night, and ride all night, and get over the line, or they would be overtaken. They then broke up and set out.

"Another Indian stated that Stedham said that if old Tuskenah and his party were brought away, what were left could not make a treaty; and that was the reason they came off. These examinations were had during the course of Saturday night: next morning we sought an interview with old Tuskenah himself. He was found extremely indisposed to a full disclosure; but, upon being closely questioned, acknowledged that Stedham had come to him in the night, and told him to go; that he was one of the oldest chiefs, and that a treaty could not be made without him. Other Indians, standing by, observed to Tuskenah that he had told them a different story before. He then acknowledged that Stedham had said the orders came from Hambly, and that Stedham's information was as he had before stated. He said that he was a friend to the commissioners and the President, and had no notion of going off until Stedham gave him the talk. In the course of the examination, he implicated Poyethleyohole; and said that he had come to the camp and told them to go and break up the treaty for the present, and they would meet again, a few months hence, at Broken Arrow. Poyethleyohole is the head chief of Tuckabatchee attending the treaty.

"In our jaunt, we received certain information of the death of the Big Warrior, from different sources."

The commissioners then convened the chiefs; distributed some presents; ordered them furnished with rations to take them home; advised them to temperance and unanimity; and took friendly leave, and adjourned.

SIR:

INDIAN SPRINGS, February 13, 1825.

In compliance with instructions received from Colonel Campbell, while in Washington city, I notified the chiefs of this nation to meet the United States commissioners at this place on the 7th instant, for the purpose of treating with them for their lands.

Your letter of the 18th ult., enclosing a copy of the instructions to the commissioners, did not reach me until the 6th. On the arrival of the commissioners, I informed them that I was ready to obey their orders on all points touching the negotiation, and would cheerfully co-operate with them in effecting the object of their mission.

Yesterday a treaty was signed by McIntosh and his adherents alone. Being fully convinced that this treaty is in direct opposition to the letter and spirit of the instructions which I have a copy of, I feel it to be my bounden duty, as the agent of the Government, to apprise you of it, that you may adopt such measures as you may deem expedient as to the ratification; for, if ratified, it may produce a horrid state of things among these unfortunate Indians. It is proper to remark, that, with the exception of McIntosh, and perhaps two others, the signatures to this treaty are either chiefs of low grade, or not chiefs at all; which you can perceive by comparing them with those to other treaties, and with the receipts for the annuity; and these signers are from eight towns only, when there are fifty-six in the nation.

I beg you to be assured that I pursued strictly your instructions in relation to this negotiation; and, although the treaty has not been made in conformity with the instructions with which I have been furnished, yet I think it can be at no distant day, to the entire satisfaction of the Government. I have made these hasty remarks from a conviction of duty, to apprise you of the manner in which it was accomplished; and if it be thought necessary, I can give you all the particulars pending this negotiation. A deputation of head chiefs are desirous of visiting Washington, to have a full and fair understanding relative to —.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN CROWELL, Agent for Indian Affairs.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, (GA.) February 16, 1825.

On the 13th instant we had the honor of enclosing to you, from the Indian Springs, the copy of a treaty which had been concluded the day previously with the Creek nation of Indians. On Monday morning, the 14th, a supplemental article was added, which has exclusive relation to two reservations claimed by the Indian chief General McIntosh. I am gratified at the opportunity which I now make of transmitting to the Department, by our secretary, Major Hay, the original treaty and the commissioners' journal. On reference to this last document, you will discover under what circumstances the negotiation was renewed, and how it progressed and terminated. There is nothing of singular import in the whole proceeding, except the sudden and mysterious departure of the Cussetas, at night, after solemn assent to a treaty. The explanation given to this movement, by the report of Colonel Williamson, at the conclusion of the journal, I hope will be found satisfactory. The step was far from being voluntary. These chiefs, doubtless, were deluded by a wily and perfidious individual in the service of the Government as interpreter. His opposition to a treaty was notorious. His life and character have been too much diversified, and too strongly marked, to make him a fit officer of public trust.

The attendance of chiefs was a full one—much more so than is usual when chiefs only are invited. The opposition was feeble, and seems to have been dictated by the Big Warrior. The death of this chief, I conceive, puts the question at rest. That all opposition will now cease, and that the dissenting party will now treat and re-unite themselves with the majority, I have no doubt. To meet this expected contingency, a portion of the appropriation has been reserved.

Shortly before the notice was circulated for the meeting at the Indian Springs, the chiefs of the lower towns convened on Flint river, and adopted certain proceedings, which I now enclose. At these proceedings the Cussetas were fully represented, and the head chief actually signed them. The deputation had reached Milledgeville, on their way to the city, when I reached Georgia.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great consideration, your obedient servant,

DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 22, 1825.

The treaty of the Indian Springs, of the 12th of February last, entered into by you, as commissioners on the part and in behalf of the United States, and certain chiefs and warriors of the Creek Indians, having been ratified in due form, I am directed by the President of the United States to carry the same into effect.

By the second article of the said treaty, it is provided that the sum of $200,000 shall be paid as soon as practicable after the ratification of said treaty; and by the fifth article it is stipulated, at the particular request of the parties of the second part, that the payment and disbursements of the first sum provided, viz: two hundred thousand dollars, ($200,000,) "shall be made by the present commissioners negotiating said treaty." To carry the provision for the payment of the $200,000 into effect, a requisition has been issued in your favor for that sum, which will be transmitted to you by the Treasury. In paying and disbursing it, the President directs that it be in accordance with the following rule, viz: among all the chiefs of the tribe, heretofore acknowledged as such, and on the same scale that their annuities are distributed. The motive for this arrangement is founded in established usage, in the dictates of justice, and as furnishing the whole the means by which they may be enabled to transport themselves to the country destined for their residence. You will apply to the agent (Colonel Crowell) for a list of the chiefs, and their respective proportions of the annuities heretofore granted them, and act upon it as the basis of the distribution.

It is the wish of the President, before you distribute the money, that you should convene the chiefs, or have an interview otherwise with them, and explain to them the object of the payment; namely, that it is the first payment agreed upon in the treaty for the compensation for their lands. It is to be presumed that, when they are advised that the treaty will eventually be carried into effect, they will readily receive their respective portions: if not altogether, at least a large number; and, thereafter, those who may at first refuse, will successively acquiesce in the measure. In the disposition of the payment, you will look to this as a probable result, and retain as much money in your hands as that event may require. You will keep this Department regularly advised of your proceedings.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES BARBOUR.

To Colonel DUNCAN G. CAMPBELL and Major JAMES MERRIWETHER, Commissioners, &c.

No. 223.

[1st SESSION.]

EXPENDITURES OF THE INDIAN DEPARTMENT, AND THE STATE OF OUR RELATIONS WITH THE SEVERAL TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 6TH OF DECEMBER, 1825.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, November 30, 1825.

I have had the honor to receive your directions of the 3d ultimo, as follows:

"You will, as early as practicable, report to me an estimate of the amount which will be required to be appropriated for the current expenses of the Indian Department for the year 1826.

"You will also report, separately, the amount of money disbursed and settled in the Indian Department, from the commencement of the present year to the termination of the third quarter of it, including disbursements for the same period under the appropriation for the civilization of the Indian tribes; the number of schools, where established, by what society, the number of teachers at each, and the number of pupils, by last reports; together with the effects, as already developed, of the present system for civilizing the Indians, and its probable and ulterior consequences upon them as a race, viewed both in relation to their present situation, and that which contemplates their future and permanent residence upon lands west of the Mississippi. You will report, also, the operations of commissioners appointed to hold Indian treaties under acts of the last session of Congress, and such other remarks as you may think proper to make in relation to the administration of the Indian Department."

I had the honor, on the 14th ultimo, to furnish the estimate of the amount ($153,000) required to be appropriated for the current expenses of the year 1826.

The accompanying statement, which I have the honor now to submit, (marked A,) shows the amount of money that has been drawn from the treasury, on account of the Indian Department, for the first, second, and third quarters of the present year; how much of that amount has been settled; and how much remains to be accounted for. It appears from this statement that $781,827 14 has been drawn from the treasury; that $535,017 87 has been accounted for; and that there remains to be accounted for $246,809 27. It is proper to remark, that the sum of $191,368 91, which appears from the statement to be accounted for, is the unapplied balance of the appropriation of the 3d March, 1825, of $250,000, in reference to a treaty with the Creeks; and is, though drawn from the treasury, subject, at the pleasure of the Department, to its orders. If this sum be deducted from the balance of $246,809 27, there will remain to be accounted for $55,440 36; all which, it is believed, will be fully accounted for when several returns, which are daily expected, shall be received.

Statement marked B shows the number of schools, where established, by what society, the number of teachers at each, and the number of pupils, according to the last reports. These returns show that thirty-eight schools are in operation, and that they contain eleven hundred and fifty-nine children. On comparing this with the report of last year, it will be found that four new schools have been established, and that the increase in the number of children, for this year, is two hundred and forty-three.

Measures were duly taken to carry into effect the acts of Congress of the 25th May, 1824, (I go back to this, because its provisions have but just been executed,) and of the 3d March, 1825: the former having for its object the formation of treaties beyond the Mississippi; the latter, the establishment of peace and boundaries between the various tribes of the Upper Mississippi and the lakes; also, another act of the 3d March, 1825, authorizing the President to cause a road to be marked out from the western frontier of Missouri to the confines of New Mexico, and which act also makes provision for holding treaties with the intervening Indian tribes, for the purpose of obtaining their consent to the marking of said road, and to the unmolested use thereof to the citizens of the United States and of the Mexican republic.

Advices have been received of as late date as the 21st September last, from General Atkinson and Major O'Fallon, the commissioners appointed to carry into effect the provisions of the act of the 25th May, 1824; at which period they were at Fort Atkinson, on the Missouri, to which place they had returned two days previous to the date of their letter, after having penetrated the country as far as the Two Thousand Mile creek, and fully accomplished, so far, the objects of their commission. It only remained for them to treat with a few tribes, the Mahas, Otoes, Missourias, and Pawnees, which they expected to accomplish in twelve days, when they were to descend to St. Louis, and report more in detail. It is understood that General Atkinson is on his way to this city, bringing with him the treaties; and that the entire object of the commission is accomplished.

Returns have been received from General Clark and Governor Cass, the commissioners appointed to mediate, at Prairie du Chien, between the Sioux, Sac, Fox, Ioway, Chippewa, Menomonie, and Winnebago tribes, and to establish boundaries between them. In this work of mercy the commissioners have been successful. Treaties have been entered into with those tribes, by which their long and bloody wars have been terminated, and boundaries assigned to them, as the surest guaranty against future hostilities.

Messrs. Reeves, Sibley, and Mather, the commissioners appointed to mark the road from the western frontier of Missouri to the confines of New Mexico, and to hold treaties with the intervening Indian tribes, are engaged in the performance of those duties.

With the view of adjusting certain claims of the Shawanee Indians for lands, in exchange for a tract hitherto occupied by them at Cape Girardeau, in Missouri, and for spoiliations of various kinds, and improvements left by them at Cape Girardeau, General Clark was directed, in March last, to adjust these claims, and authorized, should it be necessary, to treat with the Osage and Kansas tribes for the extinguishment of their titles to lands for those Indians. This arrangement has been accordingly made; and, in accomplishing it, and following up the views of the Executive, in providing a country for such tribes of Indians as may think proper to emigrate and join their friends in the west, but especially to secure a country for the Creeks, in pursuance of the obligations of the General Government in its compact with Georgia, the commissioner very judiciously embraced, in the negotiation for the accommodation of the Shawanees, at that meeting, an extinguishment of the Indian titles to three or four millions of acres of land in Missouri and Arkansas, and nearly one hundred millions of acres beyond the western boundaries of Missouri and Arkansas. Reservations are secured to the Osages and Kansas: to the first, a tract of fifty miles front, parallel to, and about twenty-five miles west of, the western boundary of Missouri; and to the Kansas, a tract of thirty miles front, parallel also to the western boundary of Missouri, and about fifty miles west of it; both running back to the Spanish line. A judicious arrangement as to space between those two reservations, and between the frontier of Missouri, has been effected. Thus, all the titles of Indians to lands within the limits of Missouri, except a few reservations, have been extinguished; and a country represented to be fertile, and in all respects desirable, provided, and in sufficient extent, beyond the boundaries of Missouri and Arkansas, for the accommodation of all the tribes within the States, which, should they incline to occupy it, it is the policy of the Government to guaranty to them lasting and undisturbed possession.

At the same time, treaties of peace and friendship were entered into between the Osage and Delaware, the Shawanee, Wea, Piankeshaw, and Peoria tribes of Indians; and, subsequently, a treaty has been concluded, which assigns to the Shawanees fifty miles square of lands in the southwest corner of Missouri, with the privilege of exchanging them for a like quantity of land on the Kansas river, (which, it is believed, they will prefer,) for lands of theirs hitherto occupied by them at Cape Girardeau. The same treaty provides for payment for improvements abandoned by them at Cape Girardeau, and for spoiliations committed on their property there.

From the representations of a deputation of Cherokeees of the Arkansas and the Shawanees, who accompanied them in February last, it was believed that if they could hold a council with their friends in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, they could induce them to emigrate and join them on their possessions in the west. This was the great object of their visit. Directions were issued to Governor Cass to meet them at Wapahkonetta, in Ohio; but nothing was accomplished, except that deputations of some of the tribes intend, in the following spring, to visit their brothers of the west. It is probable that the object of that meeting may, in the course of the next year, be in part, at least, realized.

The Quapaws, it is expected, will commence their removal from Arkansas to the country south of Red river on the 1st of January next, in conformity to the provisions of the treaty with them of the 15th November, 1824; and measures have been taken to fulfil the provisions of that entered into with the Choctaws on the 20th January, 1825.

Nothing suggests itself to me in the way of improvement in the administration of the Indian Department, as it is at present constituted; but under the modification which I had the honor to suggest to you in my letter of the 15th instant, benefits of a valuable description might be anticipated.

I will do myself the honor, in obedience to your instructions, to make the remaining parts of your directions of 3d October the subject of a future and special communication.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY.

Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

No. 224.

[1st Session.]

TREATIES WITH THE OSAGE, KANZAS, AND SHAWANEE TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 14, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1825.

I transmit to the Senate for their consideration and advice, with regard to their ratification, the following treaties:

1. A treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, concluded at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the 2d day of June last, by William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, commissioner on the part of the United States, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the same tribes, duly authorized and empowered by their respective tribes or nations.

2. A treaty between the United States and the Kansas nation of Indians, concluded at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the 3d day of June last, by William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, commissioner on the part of the United States, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the said nation, duly authorized and empowered by the same.

3. A convention between the United States and the Shawanee nation of Indians, residing within the State of Missouri, signed at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the 7th day of November last, by William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, and the chiefs and headmen of the said nation, duly authorized and empowered by the same.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

TREATY WITH THE GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGES.

Articles of a treaty made and concluded at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, between William Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, commissioner on the part of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, duly authorized and empowered by their respective tribes or nations.

In order more effectually to extend to said tribes that protection of the Government so much desired by them, it is agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The Great and Little Osage tribes or nations do hereby cede and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, interest, and claim to lands lying within the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, and to all lands lying west of the said State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, north and west of the Red river, south of the Kansas river, and east of a line to be drawn from the head sources of the Kansas, southwardly, through the Rock saline, with such reservations, for such considerations, and upon such terms, as are hereinafter specified, expressed, and provided for.

ART. 2. Within the limits of the country above ceded and relinquished, there shall be reserved to and for the Great and Little Osage tribes or nations aforesaid, so long as they may choose to occupy the same, the following described tract of land: Beginning at a point due east of White Hair's village, and twenty-five miles west of the western boundary line of the State of Missouri, fronting on a north and south line, so as to leave ten miles north, and forty miles south, of the point of said beginning, and extending west with the width of fifty miles, to the western boundary of the lands hereby ceded and relinquished by said tribes or nations; which said reservation shall be surveyed and marked at the expense of the United States, and upon which the agent for said tribes or nations, and all persons attached to said agency, as also such teachers and instructors as the President may think proper to authorize and permit, shall reside, and shall occupy and cultivate, without interruption or molestation, such lands as may be necessary for them. And the United States do hereby reserve to themselves, forever, the right of navigating freely all watercourses and navigable streams within, or running through, the tract of country above reserved to said tribes or nations.

ART. 3. In consideration of the cession and relinquishment aforesaid, the United States do hereby agree to pay to the said tribes or nations, yearly, and every year, for twenty years, from the date of these presents, the sum of seven thousand dollars, at their village, or at St. Louis, as the said tribes or nations may desire, either in money, merchandise, provisions, or domestic animals, at their option. And whenever the said annuity, or any part thereof, shall be paid in merchandise, the same is to be delivered to them at the first cost of the goods at St. Louis, free of transportation.

ART. 4. The United States shall, immediately upon the ratification of this convention, or as soon thereafter as may be, cause to be furnished to the tribes or nations aforesaid six hundred head of cattle, six hundred hogs, one thousand domestic fowls, ten yoke of oxen, and six carts, with such farming utensils as the superintendent of Indian affairs may think necessary; and shall employ such persons to aid them in their agricultural pursuits as to the President of the United States may seem expedient; and shall also provide, furnish, and support for them, one blacksmith, that their farming utensils, tools, and arms may be seasonably repaired; and shall build, for each of the four principal chiefs, at their respective villages, a comfortable and commodious dwelling-house.

ART. 5. From the above lands ceded and relinquished, the following reservations, for the use of the half-breeds hereafter named, shall be made, to wit: One section, of six hundred and forty acres, for Augustus Clermont, to be located and laid off so as to include Joseph Rivar's residence, on the east side of the Neosho, a short distance above the Grand Saline, and not nearer than within one mile thereof; one section for each of the following half-breeds: James, Paul, Henry, Rosalie, Anthony, and Amelia, the daughter of She-me-hunga, and Amelia, the daughter of Mi-hun-ga, to be located two miles below the Grand Saline, and extending down the Neosho, on the east side thereof; and one section for Noel Mongrain, the son of Wa-taw-nages, and for each of his ten children, Baptiste, Noel, Francis, Joseph, Mongrain, Louis, Victoria, Sophia, Julia, and Juliet; and the like quantity for each of the following named grandchildren of the said Noel Mongrain, to wit: Charles, Francis, Louisson, and Wash; to commence on the Marais des Cygnes, where the western boundary line of the State of Missouri crosses it, at the York of Mine river, and to extend up Mine river, for quantity; one section for Mary Williams, and one for Sarah Williams, to be located on the north side of the Marais des Cygnes, at the Double creek, above Harmony; one section for Francis T. Chardon; one section for Francis C. Tayon; one section for James G. Chouteau; one section for Alexander Chouteau; one section for Pelagie Antaya; one section for Celeste Antaya; one section for Joseph Antaya; one section for Baptiste St. Michelle, jr.; one section for Louis St. Michelle; one section for Victoria St. Michelle; one section for Julia St. Michelle; one section for Francis St. Michelle; one section for Joseph Perra; one section for Susan Larine; one section for Marguerite Rencau; one section for Thomas L. Balio; and one section for Terese, the daughter of Paul Louise: which said several tracts are to be located on the north side of the Marais des Cygnes, extending up the river, above the reservations in favor of Mary and Sarah Williams, in the order in which they are hereinabove named.

ART. 6. And also fifty-four other tracts, of a mile square each, to be laid off under the direction of the President of the United States, and sold, for the purpose of raising a fund, to be applied to the support of schools for the education of the Osage children, in such manner as the President may deem most advisable to the attainment of that end.

ART. 7. Forasmuch as there is a debt due from sundry individuals of the Osage tribes or nations to the United States' trading-houses of the Missouri and Osage rivers, amounting in the whole to about the sum of four thousand one hundred and five dollars and eighty cents, which the United States do hereby agree to release; in consideration thereof, the said tribes or nations do hereby release and relinquish their claim upon the United States for regular troops to be stationed for their protection in garrison at Fort Clark, and also for furnishing of a blacksmith at that place, and the delivery of merchandise at Fire Prairie, as is provided for in the first, third, and fifth articles of the treaty concluded on the tenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eight.

ART. 8. It appearing that the Delaware nation have various claims against the Osages, which the latter have not had it in their power to adjust; and the United States being desirous to settle, finally and satisfactorily, all demands and differences between the Delawares and Osages, do hereby agree to pay to the Delawares, in full satisfaction of all their claims and demands against the Osages, the sum of one thousand dollars.

ART. 9. With a view to quiet the animosities which at present exist between a portion of the citizens of Missouri and Arkansas and the Osage tribes, in consequence of the lawless depredations of the latter, the United States do furthermore agree to pay to their own citizens the full value of such property as they can legally prove to have been stolen or destroyed by the Osages since the year eighteen hundred and eight, and for which payment has not been made under former treaties: Provided, The sum to be paid by the United States does not exceed the sum of five thousand dollars.

ART. 10. It is furthermore agreed on, by and between the parties to these presents, that there shall be reserved two sections of land, to include the Harmony missionary establishment, and their mill on the Marais des Cygnes; and one section, to include the missionary establishment above the lick, on the west side of the Grand river, to be disposed of as the President of the United States shall direct, for the benefit of said missions, and to establish them at the principal villages of the Great and Little Osage nations, within the limits of the country reserved to them by this treaty, and to be kept up at said villages, so long as said missions shall be usefully employed in teaching, civilizing, and improving the said Indians.

ART. 11. To preserve and perpetuate the friendship now happily subsisting between the United States and the said tribes or nations, it is hereby agreed that the provisions contained in the ninth article of the treaty concluded and signed at Fort Clark, on the tenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eight, between the United States and the said tribes or nations, shall, in every respect, be considered as in full force, and applicable to the provisions of this treaty; and that the United States shall take and receive into their friendship and protection the aforesaid tribes or nations, and shall guaranty to them, forever, the right to navigate freely all watercourses or navigable streams within the tract of country hereby ceded, upon such terms as the same are, or may be, navigated by the citizens of the United States.

ART. 12. It is further agreed, that there shall be delivered, as soon as may be after the execution of this treaty, at the Osage villages, merchandise to the amount of four thousand dollars, first cost in St. Louis, and two thousand dollars in merchandise before their departure from this place, and horses and equipage to the value of twenty-six hundred dollars; which, together with the sum of one hundred dollars to be paid to Paul Louise, and the like sum to Baptiste Mongrain, in money, shall be in addition to the provisions and stipulations hereby above contained, in full satisfaction of the cession hereinbefore agreed on.

ART. 13. Whereas the Great and Little Osage tribes or nations are indebted to Augustus P. Chouteau, Paul Balio, and William S. Williams to a large amount, for credits given to them, which they are unable to pay, and have particularly requested to have paid or provided for in the present negotiation, it is therefore agreed on, by and between the parties to these presents, that the United States shall pay to Augustus P. Chouteau one thousand dollars, to Paul Balio two hundred and fifty dollars, and to William S. Williams two hundred and fifty dollars, towards the liquidation of their respective debts due from the said tribes or nations.

ART. 14. These articles shall take effect and become obligatory on the contracting parties so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said William Clark, commissioner as aforesaid, and the deputation, chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Great and Little Osage nations of Indians, as aforesaid, have hereunto set their hands and seals, this second day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth.

WILLIAM CLARK.

TREATY WITH THE KANZAS.

Articles of a treaty made and concluded at the city of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, between William Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, commissioner on the part of the United States of America, and the undersigned chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Kansas nation of Indians, duly authorized and empowered by said nation.

ARTICLE 1. The Kansas do hereby cede to the United States all the lands lying within the State of Missouri to which the said nation have title or claim; and do further cede and relinquish to the said United States all other lands which they now occupy, or to which they have title or claim, lying west of the said State of Missouri, and within the following boundaries: Beginning at the entrance of the Kansas river into the Missouri river; from thence, north, to the northwest corner of the State of Missouri; from thence, westwardly, to the Nodewa river, thirty miles from its entrance into the Missouri; from thence to the entrance of the Big Nemahaw river into the Missouri, and, with that river, to its source; from thence to the source of the Kansas river, leaving the old village of the Pania Republic to the west; from thence, on the ridge dividing the waters of the Kansas river from those of the Arkansas, to the western boundary of the State line of Missouri; and, with that line, thirty-miles, to the place of beginning.

ART. 2. From the cession aforesaid, the following reservation for the use of the Kansas nation of Indians shall be made of a tract of land: to begin twenty leagues up the Kansas river, and to include their village on that river; extending, west, thirty miles in width, through the lands ceded in the first article; to be surveyed and marked under the direction of the President, and to such extent as he may deem necessary, and at the expense of the United States. The agents for the Kansas, and the persons attached to the agency, and such teachers and instructors as the President shall authorize to reside near the Kansas, shall occupy, during his pleasure, such lands as may be necessary for them within this reservation.

ART. 3. In consideration of the cession of land and relinquishment of claims made in the first articles, the United States agree to pay to the Kansas nation of Indians three thousand five hundred dollars per annum, for twenty successive years, at their villages, or at the entrance of the Kansas river, either in money, merchandise, provisions, or domestic animals, at the option of the aforesaid nation; and when the said annuities, or any part thereof, is paid in merchandise, it shall be delivered to them at the first cost of the goods in Saint Louis, free of transportation.

ART. 4. The United States, immediately upon the ratification of this convention, or as soon thereafter as may be, shall cause to be furnished to the Kansas nation three hundred head of cattle, three hundred hogs, five hundred domestic fowls, three yoke of oxen, and two carts, with such implements of agriculture as the superintendent of Indian affairs may think necessary; and shall employ such persons to aid and instruct them in their agriculture as the President of the United States may deem expedient; and shall provide and support a blacksmith for them.

ART. 5. Out of the lands herein ceded by the Kansas nation to the United States, the commissioner aforesaid, in behalf of the said United States, doth further covenant and agree, that thirty-six sections of good land, on the Big Blue river, shall be laid out under the direction of the President of the United States, and sold for the purpose of raising a fund, to be applied, under the direction of the President, to the support of schools for the education of the Kansas children within their nation.

ART. 6. From the lands above ceded to the United States there shall be made the following reservations, of one mile square, for each of the half-breeds of the Kansas nation, viz: for Adel and Clement, the two children of Clement; for Josette, Julie, Pelagie, and Victoire, the four children of Louis Gonvil; for Marie and Lafleche, the two children of Baptiste Gonvil; for Laventure, the son of Francis Laventure; for Elizabeth and Pierre Carbonau, the children of Pierre Brisa; for Louis Joncas; for Basil Joncas; for James Joncas; for Elizabeth Datcherute, daughter of Baptiste Datcherute; for Joseph Butler; for William Rodgers; for Joseph Coté; for the four children of Cicili Comparé, each, one mile square; and one for Joseph James: to be located on the north side of the Kansas river, in the order above named, commencing at the line of the Kansas reservation, and extending down the Kansas river for quantity.

ART. 7. With the view of quieting all animosities which may at present exist between a part of the white citizens of Missouri and the Kansas nation, in consequence of the lawless depredations of the latter, the United States do further agree to pay to their own citizens the full value of such property as they can legally prove to have been stolen or destroyed since the year one thousand eight hundred and fifteen: Provided, The sum so to be paid by the United States shall not exceed the sum of three thousand dollars.

ART. 8. And whereas the Kansas are indebted to François G. Choteau for credits given them in trade, which they are unable to pay, and which they have particularly requested to have included and settled in the present treaty: it is therefore agreed on, by and between the parties to these presents, that the sum of five hundred dollars, towards the liquidation of said debt, shall be paid by the United States to the said François G. Choteau.

ART. 9. There shall be selected at this place such merchandise as may be desired, amounting to two thousand dollars, to be delivered at the Kansas river with as little delay as possible; and there shall be paid to the deputation now here two thousand dollars, in merchandise and horses, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged; which, together with the amount agreed on in the third and fourth articles, and the provisions made in the other articles of this treaty, shall be considered as a full compensation for the cession herein made.

ART. 10. Lest the friendship which is now established between the United States and the said Indian nation should be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, it is hereby agreed that, for injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaints shall be made by the party injured to the other; by the said nation, to the superintendent or other person appointed by the President; [and by the superintendent, or other person appointed by the President,] to the chiefs of said nation; and it shall be the duty of the said chiefs, upon complaint being made as aforesaid, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished, agreeably to the laws of the State or Territory where the offence may have been committed: and, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder shall be committed on any Indian or Indians belonging to said nation, the person or persons so offending shall be tried, and, if found guilty, shall be punished in like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is agreed, that the chiefs of the Kansas shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses or other property which may be stolen from any citizen or citizens of the United States by any individual or individuals of the nation; and the property so recovered shall be forthwith delivered to the superintendent or other person authorized to receive it, that it may be restored to its proper owner; and, in cases where the exertions of the chiefs shall be ineffectual in recovering the property stolen as aforesaid, if sufficient proof can be adduced that such property was actually stolen by any Indian or Indians belonging to the said nation, the superintendent or other officer may deduct from the annuity of the said nation a sum equal to the value of the property which has been stolen. And the United States hereby guaranty to any Indian or Indians a full indemnification for any horses or other property which may be stolen from them by any of their citizens: Provided, That the property so stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen of the United States. And the said nation of Kansas engage, on the requisition or demand of the President of the United States, or of the superintendent, to deliver up any white man resident among them.

ART. 11. It is further agreed on, by and between the parties to these presents, that the United States shall forever enjoy the right to navigate freely all watercourses or navigable streams within the limits of the tract of country herein reserved to the Kansas nation; and that the said Kansas nation shall never sell, relinquish, or in any manner dispose of the lands herein reserved, to any other nation, person, or persons whatever, without the permission of the United States for that purpose first had and obtained; and shall ever remain under the protection of the United States, and in friendship with them.

ART. 12. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall be ratified by the President, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said William Clark, commissioner as aforesaid, and the deputation, chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Kansas nation of Indians, as aforesaid, have hereunto set their hands and seals, this third day of June, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States of America the forty-ninth year.

WILLIAM CLARK.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Kansas nation of Indians.]

TREATY WITH THE SHAWANEE.

Articles of a convention made between William Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Shawanee nation of Indians, residing within the State of Missouri, duly authorized and empowered by said nation, at the city of St. Louis, on the seventh day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five.

Whereas the Shawanee Indians were in possession of a tract of land near Cape Girardeau, in the State of Missouri, settled under a permission from the Spanish Government, given to the said Shawanees, and Delawares by the Baron de Carondelet, on the fourth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, and recorded in the office of recorder of land titles at St. Louis, containing about (25) twenty-five miles square, which said tract of land was abandoned by the Delawares in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and from which the said Shawanees, under an assurance of receiving other lands in exchange, did remove, after having made valuable and lasting improvements on the same, which were taken possession of by the citizens of the United States: and it being the desire of the United States fully to indemnify said tribe for all losses and injuries sustained by them by reason of such removal, the following articles have been agreed upon, between William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, specially authorized, on the one part, and the undersigned delegates of the Shawanee tribe, residing within the State of Missouri, on the other part:

ARTICLE 1. The Shawanee tribe do hereby cede and relinquish to the United States all their claim, interest, and title to the lands on which they settled, near Cape Girardeau, under an authority of the Spanish Government as aforesaid, situate, lying, and being between the river St. Come and Cape Girardeau, and bounded on the east by the Mississippi, and westwardly by White Water.

ART. 2. It is further agreed by the contracting parties, that, in consideration of the cession aforesaid, the United States do hereby agree to give to the Shawanee tribe of Indians within the State of Missouri, for themselves and for those of the same nation, now residing in Ohio, who may hereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, a tract of land equal to (50) fifty miles square, situated west of the State of Missouri, and within the purchase lately made from the Osages, by treaty bearing date the second day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and within the following boundaries: commencing at a point (2) two miles northwest of the southwest corner of the State of Missouri; from thence, north, (25) twenty-five miles; thence, west, (100) one hundred miles; thence, south, (25) twenty-five miles; thence, east, (100) one hundred miles, to the place of beginning. But whereas the said Shawanee tribe had valuable and lasting improvements within the tract of land hereby ceded, and moreover will have to incur expenses in their removal, it is further stipulated, that, for the purpose of rendering a fair equivalent for the losses and inconveniences which said tribe will sustain by removal, and to enable them to obtain supplies in their new settlements, the United States agree to pay to the tribe emigrating from the lands herein ceded the sum of fourteen thousand dollars, which amount shall be paid to said party of the second part as soon as practicable after the ratification of this treaty; five thousand dollars of which amount shall be furnished in domestic animals, implements of husbandry, and provisions, as soon as the said tribe remove upon the lands assigned them.

ART. 3. It is further stipulated, that a deputation of the said parties of the second part may be sent to explore the lands assigned to them in the preceding article; and, if the same be not acceptable to them, upon an examination of the same, which shall be had, and made known to the superintendent of Indian affairs at Saint Louis, on or before April next; who [he] shall, in lieu thereof, assign to them an equal quantity of land, to be selected on the Kansas river, and laid off either south or north of that river, and west of the boundary of Missouri, not reserved or ceded to any other tribe.

ART. 4. It appearing that the Shawanee Indians have various claims against the citizens of the United States, to a large amount, for spoiliations of various kinds, but which they have not been able to support by the testimony of white men; the United States, in order to a final settlement of all such claims, do hereby agree to pay to the Shawanee nation the sum of ($11,000) eleven thousand dollars, to be distributed by them in such way as may be deemed equitable; and to support and keep a blacksmith, for their use, on the lands hereby assigned, for the term of five years, or as long as the President may deem advisable. And it is further stipulated, that the United States shall furnish, for the use of the Shawanees, the tools necessary for the blacksmith's shop, and (300) three hundred pounds of iron annually, to be furnished at the expense of the United States.

ART. 5. The friendship heretofore existing between the United States and the Shawanee nation is hereby renewed and perpetuated.

ART. 6. These articles shall take effect and become obligatory on the contracting parties so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, the said William Clark, and the said delegates of the Shawanee nation, have hereunto set their hands, at the city of St. Louis, the seventh day of November, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five.

WILLIAM CLARK.

[Signed, also, by the chiefs and headmen of the Shawanee nation.]

SIR:

St. Louis, June 11, 1825.

I have the honor to forward you an original triplicate of a treaty, signed at this place on the 2d instant, with the chiefs and warriors of the Great and Little Osage Indians; and another, signed on the 3d, with the chiefs and warriors of the Kansas nation.

At the negotiation of these treaties the two nations were fully represented; the chief with a party of warriors from every village being present, and fully authorized, before they left home, to act according to their discretion.

Of the country ceded to the United States, a small portion, consisting of a breadth of twenty-four miles, running south from the Missouri river, along the western boundary of the State, some distance into the Territory of Arkansas, and amounting to three or four millions of acres, lies within the limits of this State and that Territory. The acquisition of this portion of our territory has been an object ardently desired by the citizens of Missouri, and the Legislature have several times addressed memorials to Congress praying for the extinction of the Indian title; it comprises some of the richest and most beautiful land in this State, and will meet with a ready sale when it is brought into market.

But the great body of the cession lies west of Missouri and Arkansas, and is so extensive, that, after leaving the Kansas and Osages a district sufficient for their permanent residence, and after furnishing homes for the tribes whose accommodation was the immediate object of your instructions, it will still leave the Government enough to enable them to comply with the stipulations of the treaty made with the Creek Indians last winter, and also to furnish permanent residences to other tribes in different States, who may be willing to remove to the west, in pursuance of the system for the gradual removal and collocation of the Indians.

I find, from information derived from persons to be relied upon, that the country embraced in these cessions is wonderfully adapted to an Indian population in the first stages of civilization. Grass is universally abundant; and the winters, in a great portion of the cession, mild enough to winter cattle, horses, and other domestic animals, to subsist themselves without care from their owners. On all creeks and rivers there are bottoms of rich land, easily prepared for cultivation. The country is divided into woodland and prairies, (but mostly prairie,) and is well watered by springs and running streams, and is convenient to the salt plains and springs of strong salt water, from which an inexhaustible supply of salt can be obtained; and also to the great buffalo range, from which supplies can be obtained until they can be supplied from their own flocks.

In agreeing upon the amount and mode of payment, I have preferred a limited to a permanent annuity; I conceive the former to be more valuable to the Indians and to the Federal Government.

An annuity forever must of course be small; and the dividend to each individual becomes so inconsiderable, that the Government confers no favor by bestowing it, and the Indians enjoy no benefit by receiving it; it is, in fact, received with contempt instead of gratitude, and the Government is burdened with a perpetual debt, the annual payment of which is doing more harm than good. And if the tribes become extinct, as has already happened in some cases of permanent annuities, then an evil of the opposite extreme is experienced; for a few individuals receive the whole, and become pensioners on Government, without rendering any service in return. In the treaties concluded with the Kansas and Osages, the annuities are limited to twenty years; in the course of which time, the humane experiment now making by Government, to teach them to subsist themselves by the arts of civilized life, will have had a fair trial, and, if it succeeds, they will need no further aid from the Federal Government. The two annuities amount to $10,500 per annum; the payment of which, and of every other expense attendant upon the negotiation and the execution of these treaties, can be made from the sales of one-fifth of the lands ceded by them within the limits of this State, leaving nearly one hundred millions of acres west of Missouri and Arkansas to be exchanged with tribes in the different States which may be willing to remove to the west. You will perceive that a part of the consideration for these cessions is payable in domestic animals, of which the Kansas and Osages are entirely destitute. They now possess no other animals than those necessary in a hunting state, to wit, horses and dogs. By adding a stock of cattle, hogs, and fowls, their advance to the farming, or at least to the pastoral state, will be greatly facilitated. Each of the treaties contains several reservations of a mile square in favor of half-breed Indians and their children. Reserves of this kind have been heretofore made in behalf of such persons, and, in my opinion, have a good effect in promoting civilization, as their attachment is created for a fixed residence, and an idea of separate property is imparted, without which it is vain to think of improving the minds or morals of the Indians, or making any progress in the work of civilization. As a treaty with Indians should always be a complete settlement, and leave no cause of future complaint or negotiation, nor any difference unadjusted, I have, as a part of the consideration for the Osage cession, agreed to relinquish a debt of about $4,000, due from them to the United States for goods bought at the public trading-house before the abolition of the factory system, which would never have been paid; also, I have agreed that the United States should make indemnification, to a certain amount, for horses and property taken or stolen by those Indians from the frontier white people; (a measure necessary to prevent self-redress on the part of the sufferers;) and I have also agreed to pay a few small debts to the traders to whom these Indians were indebted. On the other hand, the Osages have released the United States from the stipulation of a former treaty, for keeping up a military post, blacksmith, and delivery of goods at Fire Prairie: these stipulations being now burdensome to the United States, without producing any good to the Indians; yet, by treaty, our Government was bound to keep them up.

The missionary establishments in this State and in the Arkansas Territory, for the benefit of the Osage Indians, are to be sold out and established at the principal villages occupied by these Indians. It belongs to the President, under the treaty, to give the necessary orders and to direct the mode of sale. Those missionaries may have objections to this removal; but their establishments were built upon individual and public contribution, for the special benefit of the Indians; and, to answer the purpose of their institution, they must be located amongst Indians. The mills which they have built would be serviceable at the Indian villages, in saving the squaws from the laborious process of pounding the grain into meal, and the example of the missionaries might be serviceable in teaching a knowledge of farming and of the useful arts; and, with this view, the treaty stipulates for the removal of their establishments to the principal villages of the Indians.

Experience having convinced me of the necessity of preventing a white and Indian population from remaining in immediate contact with each other, and the Indians themselves being fully sensible of the inconveniences of such neighborhood, it has been stipulated in the treaties now made that the Osage reservation shall commence twenty-five miles west of the Missouri line, and the Kansas about double that distance. This distance will be sufficient to prevent the stock of the two parties from intermixing, render the access to ardent spirits more difficult, and prevent collisions of property and persons. It may not be amiss to observe, that more than half of the reservations for individuals are out of the State and Territorial limits.

I have, &c.

WILLIAM CLARK.

No. 225.

[1st Session

INSTRUCTIONS TO, AND CORRESPONDENCE WITH, GENERALS PINCKNEY AND JACKSON, RELATING TO THE TREATY WITH THE CREEKS AT FORT JACKSON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 27, 1825.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1825.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d instant, I transmit, herewith, a report from the Secretary of War, with the correspondence between the Department of War and Generals Pinckney and Jackson, and all the instructions given to the said Generals Pinckney and Jackson, relating to the treaty with the Creek Indians, afterwards made at Fort Jackson, so far as the same can be communicated without prejudice to the public interest.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 24, 1825.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d instant, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be laid before this House the correspondence between the Department of War and Generals Pinckney and Jackson, and all the instructions given to said Generals Pinckney and Jackson relating to the treaty with the Creek Indians afterwards made at Fort Jackson, so far as the same can be communicated, in his discretion, without prejudice to the public interest," has the honor to enclose, herewith, papers marked from No. 1 to No. 11, inclusive, which contain the information required.

Respectfully submitted.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

JAMES BARBOUR.

No. 1.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1814.

The policy dictated as well by the unprovoked and ungrateful conduct of the hostile Creeks, as by a due regard to the future safety of the southwestern frontier, may be brought under the following heads, viz:

1st. An indemnification (for the expenses incurred by the United States in prosecuting the war) by such cession or cessions of land as may be deemed an equivalent for said expenses.

2d. A stipulation on their part that they will cease all intercourse with any Spanish post, garrison, or town; and that they will not admit among them any agent or trader who does not derive his authority or license from the United States.

3d. An acknowledgment of a right in the United States to open roads through their territory; to navigate all waters and streams within the same; and, also, to establish therein such military posts and trading-houses as may be deemed necessary or proper; and

4th. A surrender of the prophets or other instigators of the war, who will be held subject to the orders of the President.

With these outlines as your guide, you are authorized, in conjunction with Colonel Hawkins, to open and conclude a treaty of peace with the hostile Creeks, so soon as they shall express a desire to put an end to the war.

I have the honor, &c.

To Major General THOMAS PINCKNEY.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

No. 2.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 20, 1814.

Since the date of my last letter, it has occurred to me that the proposed treaty with the Creeks should take a form altogether military, and be in the nature of a capitulation; in which case, the whole authority of making and concluding the terms will rest in you, exclusively, as commanding general. In this transaction, should it take place, Colonel Hawkins, as agent, may be usefully employed.

I have, &c.

Major General THOMAS PINCKNEY.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

No. 3.

*Extract of a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated*FORT HAWKINS, April 8, 1814.

I have had the honor of receiving, by the mail of this day, your letters of the 20th of March, &c. Your letter of the 17th of March, containing instructions for the treaty of peace with the Creek Indians, was received on the 1st of this month, and immediately communicated to Colonel Hawkins. I greatly prefer the form of a military capitulation, and will endeavor that the business shall take that course; in which case, the quantum and location of the land to be ceded as indemnity, with other details, may be left to be settled by commissioners to be appointed by the President.

No. 4.

*Extract of a letter from General Andrew Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated*FORT WILLIAMS, April 25, 1814.

The commissioners appointed to make a treaty with the Creeks will have little to do but to assign them their proper limits. Those of the friendly party, who have associated with me, will be easily satisfied; and the remainder, or the hostile party, pleased that their lives were spared them, will thankfully accept, as a bounteous donation, any district which may be allotted them for their future settlement. Will you permit me to suggest that a line, running from some point on the Georgia line, westwardly, to New Yankee, on the Tallapoosa, and thence to the Coosa, a mile or two above this place, would leave to the north of it a district of country quite sufficient for their purposes, and perhaps the most suitable that could be assigned them? Provision might be made for the Big Warrior and his immediate adherents on the south of the line, if that should be found necessary for any reasons.

Such an arrangement, I am satisfied, would be the best for the United States, and, I believe, for the Creeks; and such an arrangement it will require but little negotiation to effect.

No. 5.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

MAY 24, 1814.

In the event of your acceptance of the appointment announced by my letter of the 22d instant, I have to suggest the wish of the President that you should proceed, without delay, to Fort Jackson, and consummate the arrangements committed to Major General Pinckney, in relation to the hostile Creeks. A copy of the instructions given to General Pinckney is enclosed.

No. 6.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Pinckney, dated

MAY 26, 1814.

General Jackson has been furnished with a copy of the instructions which were given to you in relation to the Indian treaty, and required to carry these arrangements into effect.

MAY 31, 1814.

Colonel Meigs states that the Cherokees are interested in the arrangements which you are authorized to adopt in relation to the Creeks; and it is desirable that his statement should be heard by you in their behalf.

FORT JACKSON, July 14, 1814.

I have summoned the chiefs of the Creek nation to a convention, to be holden at this post on the 1st of August next, for the purpose of terminating, if possible, pursuant to instructions, the differences between their nation and the United States. Whether all the chiefs of the hostile party will attend, cannot be ascertained until the lapse of that period; but the event shall be announced as early as possible.

No. 9.

Extract of a letter from General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated

CHARLESTON, August 26, 1814.

I have the honor of enclosing an extract of a letter addressed to me by Colonel Hawkins, and beg leave to submit to you the propriety of the promises held out by me to the friendly Indians, in my letter to Colonel Hawkins of 23d of April, being complied with. When that letter was written, I considered it to be good policy to attach to the interests of the United States the leading men of that nation who should render essential service to us; and I know of no method so cheap to the United States as to assign to them such lands as might be thought a reasonable reward for their services, within the limits of the conquered territory, which the United States might relinquish to the nation; which, with the addition of some honorary medals, &c., would probably have the desired effect.

No. 10.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Hawkins to General Pinckney, dated

CREEK AGENCY, August 16, 1814.

The following part of the terms offered by you to the Creeks, in yours of the 23d, [April,] the general [Jackson] declared he had no authority to accede to: "You may likewise inform them that the United States will not forget their fidelity; but, in the arrangements which may be made of the lands to be retained as indemnity, their claims will be respected, and such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves by their exertions and valor in the common cause will also receive a remuneration in the ceded lands, and in such manner as the Government may direct." He marked his line, and demanded their acquiescence.

HEAD-QUARTERS, SIXTH AND SEVENTH DISTRICTS,

SIR: CAMP NEAR THE CONFLUENCE OF THE COOSA AND TALLAPOOSA RIVERS, April 23, 1814.

The complete success with which it has pleased the Almighty to bless the arms of the United States in the present war with the hostile Creek Indians, having amply retaliated on their infatuated people the loss of blood sustained by the citizens of the United States, and by that part of the natives who remained faithful to them; and their insolence, ingratitude, and perfidy having been severely chastised; the Government of the United States, willing to spare the dispersed remnant of these miserable people, who may be sincerely disposed to atone for their former misdeeds by their future good conduct, you will be pleased, sir, to communicate to them the following terms upon which peace will be granted to them.

The United States will retain so much of the conquered territory as may appear to the Government thereof to be just indemnity for the expenses of the war, and as a retribution for the injuries sustained by its citizens and by the friendly Creek Indians.

The United States will retain the right to establish military posts and trading-houses, and to make and use such roads as they may think necessary, and freely to navigate all the rivers and watercourses in the Creek territory.

The enemy must, on their parts, surrender their prophets, and such other instigators of the war, as may be designated by the Government of the United States; and they must agree to such restrictions upon their trade with foreign nations as shall be established by the Government of the United States.

The hostile Indians, willing to submit to the above terms, are to come in to Fort Jackson by the northwest side of the Alabama road; or to Fort Decatur, by the federal road, on the southeast side.

You will please, sir, to communicate these terms to the friendly Indians, and to enjoin on them, in the prosecution of the war, against such as may continue hostile, to abstain carefully from injuring those who may be returning with the intention of making their submission. You may likewise inform them that the United States will not forget their fidelity; but, in the arrangements which may be made of the lands to be retained as indemnity, their claims will be respected, and such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves by their exertions and valor in the common cause will also receive a remuneration in the ceded lands, and in such manner as the Government may direct.

You will please, sir, to take such measures as you may think expedient to communicate the above terms to the hostile party, and to point out the roads whereby they may approach the posts of the United States to surrender themselves; which road you will also please to designate to the friendly party.

The calamities of the war having reduced many of the women and children of the nation to the utmost distress, for want of subsistence, the United States will furnish provision for them at the posts to which it can be most conveniently conveyed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

12. A treaty signed at Fort Atkinson, Council Bluffs, on the 6th of October, 1825, by the same commissioners on the part of the United States, and by certain chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Maha tribe of Indians, on the part of said tribe.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

TREATY WITH THE PONCARS.

For the purposes of perpetuating the friendship which has heretofore existed, as also to remove all future cause of discussion or dissension, as it respects trade and friendship, between the United States and their citizens and the Poncar tribe of Indians, the President of the United States of America, by Brigadier General Henry Atkinson, of the United States army, and Major Benjamin O'Fallon, Indian agent, with full powers and authority specially appointed and commissioned for that purpose, of the one part, and the undersigned chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Poncar tribe of Indians, on behalf of said tribe, of the other part, have made and entered into the following articles and conditions, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be binding on both parties, to witt:

ARTICLE I. It is admitted by the Poncar tribe of Indians that they reside within the territorial limits of the United States, acknowledge their supremacy, and claim their protection. The said tribe also admit the right of the United States to regulate all trade and intercourse with them.

ART. 2. The United States agree to receive the Poncar tribe of Indians into their friendship and under their protection, and to extend to them, from time to time, such benefits and acts of kindness as may be convenient, and seem just and proper to the President of the United States.

ART. 3. All trade and intercourse with the Poncar tribe shall be transacted at such place or places as may be designated and pointed out by the President of the United States, through his agents; and none but American citizens, duly authorized by the United States, shall be admitted to trade or hold intercourse with said tribe of Indians.

ART. 4. That the Poncar tribe may be accommodated with such articles of merchandise, &c. as their necessities may demand, the United States agree to admit and license traders to hold intercourse with said tribe, under mild and equitable regulations: in consideration of which, the Poncar tribe bind themselves to extend protection to the persons and the property of the traders, and the persons legally employed under them, whilst they remain within the limits of the Poncar district of country. And the said Poncar tribe further agree, that if any foreigner, or other person not legally authorized by the United States, shall come into their district of country for the purposes of trade, or other views, they will apprehend such person or persons, and deliver him or them to some United States superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or to the commandant of the nearest military post, to be dealt with according to law. And they further agree to give safe-conduct to all persons who may be legally authorized by the United States to pass through their country; and to protect, in their persons and property, all agents or other persons sent by the United States to reside temporarily among them.

ART. 5. That the friendship which is now established between the United States and the Poncar tribe should not be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, it is hereby agreed, that, for injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaints shall be made by the party injured to the superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or other person appointed by the President. And it shall be the duty of the said chiefs, upon complaint being made as aforesaid, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished agreeably to the laws of the United States: and, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder shall be committed on any Indian or Indians belonging to said tribe, the person or persons so offending shall be tried, and, if found guilty, shall be punished in like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is agreed that the chiefs of said Poncar tribe shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses or other property which may be stolen or taken from any citizen or citizens of the United States by any individual or individuals of said tribe; and the property so recovered shall be forthwith delivered to the agents, or other person authorized to receive it, that it may be restored to the proper owner. And the United States hereby guaranty to any Indian or Indians of said tribe a full indemnification for any horses or other property which may be stolen from them by any of their citizens: Provided, That the property so stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen of the United States. And the said Poncar tribe engage, on the requisition or demand of the President of the United States, or of the agents, to deliver up any white man resident among them.

ART. 6. And the chiefs and warriors as aforesaid promise and engage that their tribe will never, by sale, exchange, or as presents, supply any nation or tribe of Indians, not in amity with the United States, with guns, ammunition, or other implements of war.

Done at the Poncar village, at the mouth of White Paint creek, the first below the Qui Carre river, this ninth day of June, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth. In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, Henry Atkinson and Benjamin O'Fallon, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Poncar tribe, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

TREATY WITH THE TEETONS, YANCTONS, AND YANCTONIES.

For the purposes of perpetuating the friendship which has heretofore existed, as also to remove all future cause of discussion or dissension, as it respects trade and friendship, between the United States and their citizens and the Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands of the Sioux tribe of Indians, the President of the United States of America, by Brigadier General Henry Atkinson, of the United States army, and Major Benjamin O'Fallon, Indian agent, with full powers and authority specially appointed and commissioned for that purpose, of the one part, and the undersigned chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands of the Sioux tribe of Indians, on behalf of said bands or tribe, of the other part, have made and entered into the following articles and conditions, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be binding on both parties, to wit:

ARTICLE 1. It is admitted by the Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands of Sioux Indians that they reside within the territorial limits of the United States, acknowledge their supremacy, and claim their protection. The said bands also admit the right of the United States to regulate all trade and intercourse with them.

ART. 2. The United States agree to receive the said Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands of Sioux Indians into their friendship and under their protection, and to extend to them, from time to time, such benefits and acts of kindness as may be convenient, and seem just and proper to the President of the United States.

ART. 3. All trade and intercourse with the Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands shall be transacted at such place or places as may be designated and pointed out by the President of the United States, through his agents; and none but American citizens, duly authorized by the United States, shall be admitted to trade or hold intercourse with said bands of Indians.

ART. 4. That the Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands may be accommodated with such articles of merchandise, &c. as their necessities may demand, the United States agree to admit and license traders to hold intercourse with said tribes or bands, under mild and equitable regulations: in consideration of which, the Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands bind themselves to extend protection to the persons and the property of the traders, and the persons legally employed under them, whilst they remain within the limits of their particular district of country. And the said Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands further agree, that if any foreigner, or other person not legally authorized by the United States, shall come into their district of country for the purposes of trade, or other views, they will apprehend such person or persons, and deliver him or them to some United States superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or to the [commandant of the] nearest military post, to be dealt with according to law. And they further agree to give safe-conduct to all persons who may be legally authorized by the United States to pass through their country, and to protect, in their persons and property, all agents, or other persons sent by the United States to reside temporarily among them.

ART. 5. That the friendship which is now established between the United States and the Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands, should not be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, it is hereby agreed, that, for injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaints shall be made by the party injured to the superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or other person appointed by the President. And it shall be the duty of the said chiefs, upon complaint being made as aforesaid, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished agreeably to the laws of the United States: and, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder shall be committed on any Indian or Indians belonging to said bands, the person or persons so offending shall be tried, and, if found guilty, shall be punished in like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is agreed that the chiefs of the said Teeton, Yancton, and Yanctonies bands shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses or other property which may be stolen or taken from any citizen or citizens of the United States by any individual or individuals of said bands; and the property so recovered shall be forthwith delivered to the agents, or other person authorized to receive it, that it may be restored to the proper owner. And the United States hereby guaranty to any Indian or Indians of said bands a full indemnification for any horses or other property which may be stolen from them by any of their citizens: Provided, That the property so stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen of the United States. And the said Teeton, Yancton, and Yantconies bands engage, on the requisition or demand of the President of the United States, or of the agents, to deliver up any white man resident among them.

ART. 6. And the chiefs and warriors as aforesaid promise and engage that their band or tribe will never, by sale, exchange, or as presents, supply any nation or tribe of Indians, not in amity with the United States, with guns, ammunition, or other implements of war.

Done at Fort Lookout, near the three rivers of the Sioux pass, this twenty-second day of June, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth. In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, Henry Atkinson and Benjamin O'Fallon, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Teeton, Yancton, and Yantconies bands of the Sioux tribe, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

TREATY WITH THE RICARAS.

To put an end to an unprovoked hostility on the part of the Ricara tribe of Indians against the United States, and to restore harmony between the parties, the President of the United States, by Brigadier General Henry Atkinson, of the United States army, and Major Benjamin O'Fallon, Indian agent, commissioners duly appointed and commissioned to treat with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi river, gives peace to the said Ricara tribe; the chiefs and warriors thereof having first made suitable concessions for the offence. And for the purpose of removing all further or future cause of misunderstanding, as respects trade and friendly intercourse between the parties, the above-named commissioners, on the part of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the Ricara tribe of Indians, on the part of said tribe, have made and entered into the following articles and conditions, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be binding on both parties, to wit:

ARTICLE 1. Henceforth there shall be a firm and lasting peace between the United States and the Ricara tribe of Indians, and a friendly intercourse shall immediately take place between the parties.

ART. 2. It is admitted by the Ricara tribe of Indians that they reside within the territorial limits of the United States, acknowledge their supremacy, and claim their protection. The said tribe also admit the right of the United States to regulate all trade and intercourse with them.

ART. 3. The United States agree to receive the Ricara tribe of Indians into their friendship and under their protection, and to extend to them, from time to time, such benefits and acts of kindness as may be convenient, and seem just and proper to the President of the United States.

ART. 4. All trade and intercourse with the Ricara tribe shall be transacted at such place or places as may be designated and pointed out by the President of the United States, through his agents; and none but American citizens, duly authorized by the United States, shall be admitted to trade or hold intercourse with said tribe of Indians.

ART. 5. That the Ricara tribe may be accommodated with such articles of merchandise, &c. as their necessities may demand, the United States agree to admit and license traders to hold intercourse with said tribe, under mild and equitable regulations: in consideration of which, the Ricara tribe bind themselves to extend protection to the persons and the property of the traders, and the persons legally employed under them, while they remain within the limits of their district of country. And the said Ricara tribe further agree, that, if any foreigner, or other person not legally authorized by the United States, shall come into their district of country for the purposes of trade, or other views, they will apprehend such person or persons, and deliver him or them to some United States superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or to the commandant of the nearest military post, to be dealt with according to law. And they further agree to give safe-conduct to all persons who may be legally authorized by the United States to pass through their country, and to protect, in their persons and property, all agents or other persons sent by the United States to reside temporarily among them.

ART. 6. That the friendship which is now established between the United States and the Ricara tribe shall not be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, it is hereby agreed, that, for injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaints shall be made by the party injured to the superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or other person appointed by the President. And it shall be the duty of the said chiefs, upon complaint being made as aforesaid, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished agreeably to the laws of the United States: and, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder shall be committed on any Indian or Indians belonging to said tribe, the person or persons so offending shall be tried, and, if found guilty, shall be punished in like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is agreed that the chiefs of the said Ricara tribe shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses or other property which may be stolen or taken from any citizen or citizens of the United States by any individual or individuals of said tribe; and the property so recovered shall be forthwith delivered to the agents, or other person authorized to receive it, that it may be restored to the proper owner. And the United States hereby guaranty to any Indian or Indians of said tribe a full indemnification for any horses or other property which may be stolen from them by any of their citizens: Provided, That the property so stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen of the United States. And the said Ricara tribe engage, on the requisition or demand of the President of the United States, or of the agents, to deliver up any white man resident among them.

ART. 7. And the chiefs and warriors as aforesaid promise and engage that their tribe will never, by sale, exchange, or as presents, supply any nation, tribe, or bands of Indians, not in amity with the United States, with guns, ammunition, or other implements of war.

Done at the Ricara village, this eighteenth day of July, A. D. eighteen hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the fiftieth. In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, Henry Atkinson and Benjamin O'Fallon, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Ricara tribe of Indians, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

TREATY WITH THE MANDANS.

Whereas acts of hostility have been committed by some restless men of the Mandan tribe of Indians upon some of the citizens of the United States; therefore, to put a stop to any further outrages of the sort, and to establish a more friendly understanding between the United States and the said Mandan tribe, the President of the United States, by Henry Atkinson, brigadier general of the United States army, and Major Benjamin O'Fallon, Indian agent, commissioners duly appointed and commissioned to treat with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi river, forgive the offences which have been committed; the chiefs and warriors having first made satisfactory explanations touching the same. And for the purpose of removing all future cause of misunderstanding, as respects trade and friendly intercourse between the parties, the abovenamed commissioners, on the part of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the Mandan tribe of Indians, on the part of said tribe, have made and entered into the following articles and conditions, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be binding on both parties, to wit:

ARTICLE 1. Henceforth there shall be a firm and lasting peace between the United States and the Mandan tribe of Indians, and a friendly intercourse shall immediately take place between the parties.

ART. 2. It is admitted by the Mandan tribe of Indians that they reside within the territorial limits of the United States, acknowledge their supremacy, and claim their protection. The said tribe also admit the right of the United States to regulate all trade and intercourse with them.

ART. 3. The United States agree to receive the Mandan tribe of Indians into their friendship and under their protection, and to extend to them, from time to time, such benefits and acts of kindness as may be convenient, and seem just and proper to the President of the United States.

ART. 4. TREATY WITH THE MAHAS.

For the purpose of perpetuating the friendship which has heretofore existed, as also to remove all future cause of discussion or dissension, as it respects trade and friendship, between the United States and their citizens and the Maha tribe of Indians, the President of the United States of America, by Brigadier General Henry Atkinson, of the United States army, and Major Benjamin O'Fallon, Indian agent, with full powers and authority specially appointed and commissioned for that purpose, of the one part, and the undersigned chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the said Maha tribe of Indians, on behalf of their tribe, of the other part, have made and entered into the following articles and conditions, which, when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be binding on both parties, to wit:

ARTICLE 1. It is admitted by the Maha tribe of Indians that they reside within the territorial limits of the United States, acknowledge their supremacy, and claim their protection. The said tribe also admit the right of the United States to regulate all trade and intercourse with them.

ART. 2. The United States agree to receive the Maha tribe of Indians into their friendship, and under their protection, and to extend to them, from time to time, such benefits and acts of kindness as may be convenient, and seem just and proper to the President of the United States.

ART. 3. All trade and intercourse with the Maha tribe shall be transacted at such place or places as may be designated and pointed out by the President of the United States, through his agents; and none but American citizens, duly authorized by the United States, shall be admitted to trade or hold intercourse with said tribe of Indians.

ART. 4. That the Maha tribe may be accommodated with such articles of merchandise, &c. as their necessities may demand, the United States agree to admit and license traders to hold intercourse with said tribe, under mild and equitable regulations: in consideration of which, the Maha tribe bind themselves to extend protection to the persons and the property of the traders, and the persons legally employed under them, whilst they remain within the limits of their particular district of country. And the said Maha tribe further agree, that, if any foreigner, or other person not legally authorized by the United States, shall come into their district of country for the purposes of trade, or other views, they will apprehend such person or persons, and deliver him or them to some United States superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or to the commandant of the nearest military post, to be dealt with according to law. And they further agree to give safe-conduct to all persons who may be legally authorized by the United States to pass through their country, and to protect, in their persons and property, all agents or other persons sent by the United States to reside temporarily among them; nor will they, whilst on their distant excursions, molest or interrupt any American citizen or citizens who may be passing from the United States to New Mexico, or returning from thence to the United States.

ART. 5. That the friendship which is now established between the United States and the Maha tribe should not be interrupted by the misconduct of individuals, it is hereby agreed, that, for injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place; but, instead thereof, complaints shall be made by the party injured to the superintendent or agent of Indian affairs, or other person appointed by the President. And it shall be the duty of said chiefs, upon complaint being made as aforesaid, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished agreeably to the laws of the United States: and, in like manner, if any robbery, violence, or murder shall be committed on any Indian or Indians belonging to said tribe, the person or persons so offending shall be tried, and, if found guilty, shall be punished in like manner as if the injury had been done to a white man. And it is agreed that the chiefs of said Maha tribe shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses or other property which may be stolen or taken from any citizen or citizens of the United States by any individual or individuals of said tribe; and the property so recovered shall be forthwith delivered to the agents or other person authorized to receive it, that it may be restored to the proper owner. And the United States hereby guaranty to any Indian or Indians of said tribe a full indemnification for any horses or other property which may be stolen from them by any of their citizens: Provided, That the property stolen cannot be recovered, and that sufficient proof is produced that it was actually stolen by a citizen of the United States. And the said Maha tribe engage, on the requisition or demand of the President of the United States, or of the agents, to deliver up any white man resident among them.

ART. 6. And the chiefs and warriors as aforesaid promise and engage that their tribe will never, by sale, exchange, or as presents, supply any nation, tribe, or band of Indians, not in amity with the United States, with guns, ammunition, or other implements of war.

Done at Fort Atkinson, Council Bluffs, this sixth day of October, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the fiftieth. In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, Henry Atkinson and Benjamin O'Fallon, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Maha tribe of Indians, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

SIR:

ST. LOUIS, November 7, 1825.

The undersigned, appointed to hold treaties of trade and friendship with the Indian tribes "beyond the Mississippi," have the honor to report to you their proceedings in the execution of that duty, with such remarks as appear to them necessary to give a just view of the locality, numbers, character, and habits of the respective bands with whom they concluded treaties.

On the 1st of March, the commissioners applied themselves, at this place, in obtaining and transmitting the various articles for presents and supplies necessary to their operations. On the 17th, these preparations were completed and expedited; and a few days after, the commissioners took their departure for Council Bluffs, where they arrived on the 19th April; and on the 13th May, a boat with the last of their supplies reached the same point.

On the 16th May, the transport boats being in readiness, the full commission, with a military escort of four hundred and seventy-six men, commenced their ascent of the Missouri, from Fort Atkinson, Council Bluffs, and arrived at the Poncar village, at the mouth of White Paint creek, a distance of three hundred miles, on the 8th June; and on the succeeding day a council was held and a treaty concluded with the Poncar tribe of Indians.

On the 10th June, the commission and escort left the Poncar village, and arrived at Fort Lookout, a position occupied by the American Fur Company, twenty miles below the Grand Bend, on the right bank of the river, on the 17th. On the 21st, the Teetons, Yanctons, and Yanctonies, three distinct bands of the Sioux nation, having arrived, a council was opened; and on the 22d a treaty was concluded with them.

On the 23d June, the commission and escort left Fort Lookout, and arrived at the mouth of Teeton river on the 30th, where there is an establishment of the American Fur Company on the right bank of the river. Here the commission remained until the 5th July for the Chayennes and Siouones to come in, who were at a distance in the plains. They having arrived, a council was opened on the 6th with the Ogallala and Sioune bands of Sioux, and with the Chayennes, and treaties with each of them concluded.

On the 7th July, the commission and escort left Teeton river, and arrived at the mouth of Hidden creek on the 11th, where the Fire Hearts band of Siouones were met; and on the 12th they came into council, and signed the treaty made with the other part of that band on the 6th. On the same day, the commission and escort left Hidden creek, and arrived at the Arickara villages on the 15th. On the 16th, the commission here counselled with, and concluded a treaty with the Hunkapas, a band of the Sioux nation.

On the 18th, the Arickaras came into council, with whom a treaty was concluded. On the same day the commission and escort recommenced their ascent of the river, and reached the lower Mandan village on the 26th July; and on the 30th, a council was held and treaties concluded with the Mandans and Minatares, or Gros Ventres.

On the 3d August, the Crow tribe came in; and on the 4th, they were met in council, and a treaty concluded with them.

On the 6th August, the commission and escort left the Mandans for the mouth of the Yellow Stone, (with a view, if possible, of falling in with the Assinaboins and Blackfeet Indians,) and reached that point on the 17th August, where they remained till the 19th, when General Ashley arrived from across the Rocky Mountains, by the way of the head waters of the Yellow Stone, which he descended in skin canoes. Learning from him that the Blackfeet, from the best information he could get, were above the falls of the Missouri, and upon the heads of its branches in the mountains, the commission gave up all hope of seeing them at all; but, there being a possibility of yet finding the Assinaboins, the commission, with an escort of five transports and three hundred and fifty men, left the Yellow Stone on the morning of the 20th August, and proceeded up the Missouri one hundred and twenty miles further; but, finding no signs of Indians which were made during the present season, it was thought advisable to progress no further, as there was scarcely any probability of meeting with the Assinaboins by going higher up the river, and also for the reason that the water was becoming low, and the heavy class of our transports rendered it doubtful whether it would be practicable to return, if we continued to ascend many days longer; therefore, a retrograde movement was made on the 24th, and on the 26th we fell back to the Yellow Stone.

On the 27th of August, General Ashley and his party of twenty-five men, with one hundred packs of beaver, being taken on board of the transports, the commission and escort recommenced their descent of the river, and reached the Mandans on the 31st August; from whence they proceeded on the 1st September to descend the river, touching at the Arickara villages on the 4th, Fort Lookout on the 9th, Poncar village on the 12th, and arrived at Council Bluffs on the 19th September; and it is worthy of remark, that, during the whole expedition, although the annual rise of the Missouri was encountered, not a boat or man was lost, nor did any accident occur of any sort of consequence.

On getting back to Council Bluffs, persons were sent off to bring in the Ottos, Pawnees, and Mahas; and on the 20th of September, the Ottos were met in council at Fort Atkinson, and a treaty concluded with them. On the 30th September a treaty was made with the three bands of Pawnees; and, on the 6th October, the Mahas were counselled and treated with.

All which treaties are herewith transmitted.

On the 7th October, the commission embarked in the barge Antelope, and arrived at this place on the 20th.

The undersigned, believing that it would be acceptable to you to receive from them such information as they have been able to collect in relation to the various tribes they have treated with, proceed to give it, commencing with those residing lowest down the Missouri.

The Ottos reside on the Platte, twenty-five miles south of the Missouri, in a dirt village; consist of about one thousand four hundred souls, of whom two hundred and seventy-five are warriors; cultivate corn, pumpkins, squashes, &c. They leave their village twice a year, and go in pursuit of game—sometimes to the south, to kill buffalo; but most commonly, of latter years, hunt on the Missouri, below the Platte, for elk, deer, &c., as the Pawnees make objections to their killing buffalo on their lands. They also trap for beaver on the streams north of the Missouri, and succeed in making a few packs of the fur of that animal yearly. They are now at peace with all the tribes around them. Their nearest enemies are the Sioux. They are decidedly friendly to the whites.

The Grand Pawnees and Pawnee Loups reside on the Platte, one hundred and thirty miles south of the Missouri; and the Pawnee Republics on the Republican fork of the Kansas river, one hundred and fifty miles south of the Missouri. These bands also live in dirt villages. The Grand Pawnees consist of about five thousand five hundred souls, of which one thousand one hundred are warriors; the Pawnee Loups are estimated at three thousand five hundred souls, of which seven hundred are warriors; and the Pawnee Republics at one thousand two hundred and fifty souls, of which two hundred and fifty are warriors. These bands are well armed with fuseses, abundantly supplied with mules and horses, and hold a prominent stand among their neighbors as a warlike and brave nation. They are at peace with the surrounding tribes; enemies to the Sioux, Osages, and other distant tribes. They cultivate corn, pumpkins, squashes, &c. They leave their villages in the spring and fall, and go far into the plains to the south, west, and northwest, in pursuit of buffalo, and succeed in supplying themselves with an abundance of the flesh of that animal for food, and their skins for robes—the principal article of their comfort in dress, and almost the only article they obtain for traffic with the traders. They deport themselves in a friendly manner towards the whites; a conduct, it is believed, they will continue to observe.

The Mahas also live in a dirt village, situated on the Horn, a branch of the Platte, eighty miles southwest from Council Bluffs. They are estimated at two thousand seven hundred and fifty souls, of which five hundred and fifty are warriors; and are partially supplied with fuseses; possess horses and mules sufficient for their own purposes; cultivate corn, pumpkins, squashes, melons, &c. In the spring and fall, they leave their village for the chase, and go northwest for buffalo, and occasionally on the south of the Missouri for elk, deer, &c. They dress in buffalo robes, generally, but also use blankets and strouds, which they get in exchange from the traders for buffalo robes and deer skins: they take but little beaver. They are very friendly to the whites, and are pacific in their general character; are at peace with their immediate neighbors, but at war with the Sioux.

The Poncars are a small tribe of not more than nine hundred or one thousand souls, of which one hundred and eighty are warriors. They also live in a dirt village, at the mouth of White Paint creek, on the Missouri, three hundred miles (by the river) above Council Bluffs; are pretty well armed with fuseses, and well supplied with horses and mules. Like the tribes before mentioned, they cultivate corn, pumpkins, &c., and leave their villages in the spring and fall for the chase. They hunt in the neighboring country, to the west and northwest, for buffalo, of which they get an abundant supply both of flesh for food, and robes for clothing and traffic. They are a branch of the Mahas, speak the same language, and, like them, are very friendly to the whites. They are brave and warlike, and have for many years sustained themselves in their present position against the Sioux, their nearest neighbors to the north, and, till lately, their bitter enemies. They are now at peace with the Yanctons and all the tribes above named.

The Yanctons are a band of the Sioux, and rove in the plains north of the Missouri, from near the Great Bend, down as far as the Sioux river. They do not cultivate, but live by the chase alone, subsisting principally on buffalo. They cover themselves with leather tents or lodges, which they move about from place to place, as the buffalo may chance to range. They are pretty well supplied with fuseses, and with horses and a few mules. They are estimated at three thousand souls, of which six hundred are warriors. They are comfortably habited in frocks or shirts of dressed skins, and leggins, reaching to the waist, of the same; they use, besides, robes of buffalo skins, which are frequently beautifully wrought with porcupine quills, or painted tastefully. They take some beaver, but buffalo robes are their chief article of trade; are friendly to the whites, but make war upon almost all other tribes except those of their own nation. Their trading ground is on the river Jacques.

The Yanctonies are also a roving band of the Sioux, and range in the intermediate country between the Missouri and the river St. Peter's, embracing the head waters of the river Jacques. They also hunt the buffalo, whose flesh is their principal means of subsistence, and their skins, with those of the elk and deer, their chief raiment. They live in leather lodges, which they move at pleasure; are well armed with fuseses, and supplied with horses and a few mules. They are estimated at four thousand souls, of which eight hundred are warriors; friendly to the whites, and enemies to all Indians but the tribes of their own nation. Their trading ground is also on the river Jacques.

The Teetons are a band of the Sioux, who rove in a district of country south of the Grand Bend, and upon the waters of White river, and as far back as the Black Hills; their general rendezvous is near Fort Lookout. They depend on the chase alone for subsistence, and, like the Yanctons and Yanctonies, pursue the buffalo for meat and raiment, and have garments of similar construction; live in leather lodges; principally armed with fuseses, but use the bow and quiver, and are well supplied with horses and some mules. They are estimated at three thousand souls, of which six hundred are warriors. They take but little beaver, and their principal traffic is in buffalo robes. They are friendly to the whites, and, like the two bands above mentioned, look upon all Indians who do not speak their own language as enemies, except the Chayennes, with whom they are at peace.

The Ogallalas are a band of the Sioux, inhabiting a district of country on the Teeton river, stretching back from the Missouri to the Black Hills. Their habits and pursuits, and means of subsistence, and manner of apparel, are similar to those of the Sioux already mentioned; are armed after the same manner; have horses and mules in abundance, and are warlike in character. They are friendly to the whites, and at peace with the Chayennes, but enemies to all other tribes but those of their own nation. They are estimated at one thousand five hundred souls, of which three hundred are warriors. Their general rendezvous is at the mouth of Teeton river, where there is a trading establishment for their accommodation. They trade buffalo robes principally, taking but little beaver.

The Siounes are also Sioux, and are commonly separated into two bands. They inhabit the country on both sides of the Missouri, from the Teeton river as high up as some fifty miles above Chayenne river, but range furthest from the Missouri on the north side. Their habits, pursuits, means of subsistence, mode of apparel, &c., are similar to those of the Sioux bands already noticed. Besides the bow and quiver, they are well armed with fuseses, and are well supplied with horses and some mules. They are estimated at four thousand souls, of which eight hundred are warriors; are friendly to the whites, and at peace with the Chayennes, Arickaras, and Mandans. Their principal rendezvous is at or near the mouth of the Chayenne river, where their trading ground is pointed out. They traffic principally in robes, taking but little beaver.

The Chayennes are a tribe of Indians driven by the Sioux some years since from the Red river country across the Missouri, and now inhabit the country on the Chayenne river, from near its mouth back to the Black Hills. Their habits, pursuits, and means of subsistence, and manner of dress, are similar to those of the Sioux. Like them, they live in leather lodges, and rove at pleasure, according to the direction in which buffalo are to be found; use the bow and quiver, but are very well armed with fuseses, and have an abundance of horses and mules. They are very friendly to the whites, and at peace with the Ogallalas, Siounes, and Arickaras. They are estimated at three thousand souls, of which from five hundred and fifty to six hundred are warriors. Their principal rendezvous is towards the Black Hills, and their trading ground at the mouth of Cherry river, a branch of the Chayenne, forty miles above its mouth. They have had but little intercourse, heretofore, with traders. Their articles of traffic are robes and some beaver.

The Hunkapas are a band of the Sioux that rove in the intermediate country between the Missouri and the head waters of the St. Peter's river, and are similar in their habits and pursuits, in every respect, to the bands of Sioux already mentioned; armed with bows and quivers and fuseses, and supplied with horses. They are estimated at one thousand five hundred souls, of which three hundred are warriors. They are friendly to the whites, and are at peace with the Arickaras and Mandans. Their trading ground is also on the river Jacques, and their articles of traffic are buffalo robes and a few other skins of fur.

The Arickaras, a branch of the Pawnee nation, reside at their old dirt villages, occupied by them for the last thirty years. They cultivate corn and squashes, and a peculiar sort of indigenous tobacco, with a narrow small leaf. They hunt in the surrounding country, on the south of the Missouri, for buffalo, which are generally found in ten or twenty miles from their villages. On the flesh of this animal, and their abundant crops of corn and vegetables, they live in great plenty. They dress like the Sioux, and have leather lodges, which they use in the winter season, when they leave their dirt lodges, to occupy some convenient point for fuel, and pasturage or browsing for their horses, with which animal they are well supplied. They are armed after the manner of the Sioux, with bow and quiver and fuseses; are estimated at 2,500 souls, of which 500 are warriors.

Their late outrages committed on the whites are well known to you; and it should be remarked, that they have for many years before been treacherous and insolent to strangers. It is believed, however, that the offensive operations against them by our troops, conducted by Colonel Leavenworth, have brought them to a just sense of their misconduct, and that they feel humbled and chastened. This, with our late visit to them, on which occasion a good understanding has been established, and all former difficulties removed, we have no doubt will operate on them to remain firmly attached to the Americans. Traders are located at their villages, and they traffic in robes and beaver.

The Mandans and Minatares, who are identified as one tribe, reside in their old dirt villages, (five in number,) near the mouth of Knife river. They cultivate corn and squashes; and, like the Arickaras, kill buffalo in their immediate neighborhood, on the south side of the Missouri. They do not cross to the north side of the river to hunt, being in continual fear of the Assinaboins. They live in great ease and plenty, as the buffalo range most of the year near them; and they raise large quantities of corn and vegetables; also, the indigenous tobacco. They are apparelled like the Sioux, and are armed after the same manner; their numbers are estimated at 3,000 souls, of which 500 are warriors. Formerly they were very friendly to the whites, but for some few years past their young men have occasionally robbed some trading parties of the whites, and have committed some murders. These acts, however, it is believed, have never been sanctioned by the nation. At present, they are very friendly disposed towards Americans, and every part of their conduct justifies a belief that they will continue so. Trading-houses are established among them, and they barter robes and some beaver. They are at peace with the Arickaras, Crows, and the Hunkapas and Sioune bands of Sioux.

The Crows are a roving tribe of Indians, inhabiting an extensive district of country, stretching from the Black Hills, west, to the Rocky Mountains, embracing the Big Horn, and other southern branches of the Yellow Stone river. They, like the tribes last mentioned, have garments of dressed skins, and robes of dressed buffalo skins. They are very well armed with fuseses, and use the bow and quiver: have a great number of horses, and some mules. They live in leather lodges, and pursue the buffalo as a principal means of subsistence. They were, until within a year or two, very friendly to the whites; but, since then, have appeared restless and dissatisfied, and have committed some robberies. It is hoped that they will in future conduct themselves in a peaceable manner. It is understood that they are not at peace with any tribes but the Mandans and Minatares, and the Kioways and Arrepahas, who reside on the head waters of the Arkansas and Platte. The mouth of the Little Horn, a branch of the Big Horn, is pointed out as their trading ground.

The Blackfeet Indians (whom, as before mentioned, we did not see,) inhabit, it is believed, all the district of country from the falls of the Missouri, back into the Rocky Mountains, and around, northwardly, to the head of Maria's river. They carry their war excursions to the south, as far as the Big Horn. The intermediate country between the upper part of the Yellow Stone and the three forks of the Missouri is considered as neutral ground; both the Crows and themselves being afraid to visit it, only with war parties, owing to the deadly hostility existing between them. The Blackfeet hunting ground is, therefore, confined to the country embracing the three forks of the Missouri, west into the mountains; and below, northeastwardly, to the head of Maria's river; and, more northwardly, on the head waters of the Kaskatchewine, beyond our boundary. It is understood, of latter years they rarely come below the falls of Missouri. This tribe is broken into several bands, and wander promiscuously over the country above described. They often carry their wars across the mountains, against the Flatheads and Snakes, as well as to the east, upon the Assinaboins, and to the south, against the Crows. It is a numerous tribe, estimated (by those who have visited their neighbors lately) at 5,000 warriors.

In consequence of the hostile attitude they maintain towards both Indians and Americans, it will be a difficult matter to communicate with them. It is thought, however, that a commission, with a protecting military escort, might ascend to the falls of Missouri in one season, and, by remaining there during the winter, a friendly intercourse might be opened with them. British traders sometimes go among them, and trade, we understand, with safety; but, notwithstanding, they rob and kill those traders whenever they find them beyond the limits of their own country, or when they find them attempting to pass through on a visit to any other tribe. The Blackfeet, also, we understand, depend on the chase alone for subsistence; live in leather lodges, and dress in skins and robes. They hold the best country for beaver east of the mountains; it being, as yet, but little trapped in, either by themselves or the British traders.

The Assinaboins are a tribe of Sioux, and are broken into several bands; inhabit the country from the head of Milk river, east, on both sides of the parallel of latitude 49, back towards Lake Traverse. They frequently visit the Missouri, and push war parties across against the Mandans and Minatares. Their numbers are estimated at 2,000 warriors. They rove like the other bands of Sioux, and depend on the chase for subsistence and raiment; use the bow and quiver, and are well armed with fuseses; and their long intercourse with the Hudson Bay traders has rendered them formidable in war. Until within a few years, they have been employed by those traders to procure buffalo for their subsistence; latterly, those traders have been supplied in meat by the half-breed Cree Indians, and the Assinaboins are left without the means of trade, as the northwest traders do not barter for buffalo robes, they being too bulky an article to bear transportation by the route they carry their furs and light peltries; and those Indians take but little beaver: hence exists a great desire on their part to trade with the Americans on the Missouri; and it is believed such a trade will shortly be opened, as the sub-agent stationed at the Mandans has been instructed by the principal agent to bring about a reconciliation between them and the Mandans, for which purpose they had been sent for, and were expected at the Mandans by the middle of September. They are friendly to the Americans; and if the proposed reconciliation takes place, a valuable trade to our own countrymen will no doubt ensue.

Notwithstanding the many rumors that the northwest traders were holding intercourse and exercising an injurious influence over the Indians on the Missouri, no such fact appears to exist; nor is it believed that any of their traders have been across to the Missouri, below Milk river, for several years. Mr. McKenzie (then a British trader) visited the Mandans in 1820. If the British have traded and trapped within our limits east of the Rocky Mountains latterly, it has been above the falls of Missouri, among the Blackfeet Indians; which we understand has been, and probably is now, the case. They can have no possible interest in coming to the Missouri, lower than Milk river, to trade, as the Indians below that point have little or nothing to barter but buffalo robes—an article not trafficked in by them, for the reasons above mentioned. It is moreover believed (and the fact is not doubted) that none of the Indians residing on the Missouri ever visit the northwest establishments on Red river.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

H. ATKINSON,
Brigadier General United States Army.
 BENJ. O'FALLON,
United States Agent Indian Affairs.

A. L. LANGHAM, Secretary.

To the Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 10, 1826.

I transmit to the Senate a treaty, signed at Prairie du Chien, in the Territory of Michigan, on the 19th of August, 1825, by William Clark and Lewis Cass, commissioners on the part of the United States, and certain chiefs and warriors of the Sioux, Chippewa, Sac, Fox, Winnebago, Menominee, Ottawa, Pattawatamie, and Ioway tribes of Indians, on the part of said tribes; and I request the advice of the Senate with regard to its ratification.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The United States of America have seen, with much regret, that wars have, for many years, been carried on between the Sioux and the Chippewas, and, more recently, between the confederated tribes of Sacs and Foxes and the Sioux, and also between the Ioways and Sioux; which, if not terminated, may extend to the other tribes, and involve the Indians upon the Missouri, the Mississippi, and the lakes, in general hostilities: In order, therefore, to promote peace among these tribes, and to establish boundaries among them and the other tribes who live in their vicinity, and thereby to remove all causes of future difficulty, the United States have invited the Chippewa, Sac and Fox, Menominee, Ioway, Sioux, Winnebago, and a portion of the Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie tribes of Indians, living upon the Illinois, to assemble together, and, in a spirit of mutual conciliation, to accomplish these objects; and, to aid therein, have appointed William Clark and Lewis Cass commissioners on their part, who have met the chiefs, warriors, and representatives of the said tribes, and portion of tribes, at Prairie du Chien, in the Territory of Michigan; and, after full deliberation, the said tribes and portion of tribes have agreed with the United States, and with one another, upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and perpetual peace between the Sioux and Chippewas; between the Sioux and the confederated tribes of Sacs and Foxes; and between the Ioways and the Sioux.

ART. 2. It is agreed between the confederated tribes of the Sacs and Foxes and the Sioux, that the line between their respective countries shall be as follows: Commencing at the mouth of the upper Ioway river, on the west bank of the Mississippi, and ascending the said Ioway river to its left fork; thence, up that fork, to its source; thence, crossing the fork of Red Cedar river, in a direct line, to the second or upper fork of the Des Moines river; and thence, in a direct line, to the lower fork of the Calumet river, and down that river to its juncture with the Missouri river. But the Yancton band of the Sioux tribe, being principally interested in the establishment of the line from the forks of the Des Moines to the Missouri, and not being sufficiently represented to render the definitive establishment of that line proper, it is expressly declared, that the line from the forks of the Des Moines to the forks of the Calumet river, and down that river to the Missouri, is not to be considered as settled until the assent of the Yancton band shall be given thereto. And, if the said band should refuse their assent, the arrangement of that portion of the boundary line shall be void; and the rights of the parties to the country bounded thereby shall be the same as if no provision had been made for the extension of the line west of the forks of the Des Moines. And the Sacs and Foxes relinquish to the tribes interested therein all their claim to land on the east side of the Mississippi river.

ART. 3. The Ioways accede to the arrangement between the Sacs and Foxes and the Sioux; but it is agreed between the Ioways and the confederated tribes of the Sacs and Foxes, that the Ioways have a just claim to a portion of the country between the boundary line described in the next preceding article, and the Missouri and Mississippi; and that the said Ioways and Sacs and Foxes shall peaceably occupy the same until some satisfactory arrangement can be made between them for a division of their respective claims to country.

ART. 4. The Ottoes not being represented at this council, and the commissioners for the United States being anxious that justice should be done to all parties, and having reason to believe that the Ottoes have a just claim to a portion of the country upon the Missouri, east and south of the boundary line dividing the Sacs and Foxes and the Ioways from the Sioux, it is agreed between the parties interested therein and the United States, that the claim of the Ottoes shall not be affected by any thing herein contained, but the same shall remain as valid as if this treaty had not been formed.

ART. 5. It is agreed between the Sioux and the Chippewas that the line dividing their respective countries shall commence at the Chippewa river, half a day's march below the falls; and from thence it shall run to Red Cedar river, immediately below the falls; from thence to the St. Croix river, which it strikes at a place called the Standing Cedar, about a day's paddle in a canoe above the lake at the mouth of that river; thence, passing between two lakes, called by the Chippewas "Green Lakes," and by the Sioux "the lakes they bury the eagles in;" and from thence to the Standing Cedar that "the Sioux split;" thence to Rum river, crossing it at the mouth of a small creek, called Choking creek, a long day's march from the Mississippi; thence to a point of woods that projects into the prairie, half a day's march from the Mississippi; thence, in a straight line, to the mouth of the first river which enters the Mississippi on its west side, above the mouth of Sac river; thence, ascending the said river, (above the mouth of Sac river,) to a small lake at its source; thence, in a direct line, to a lake at the head of Prairie river, which is supposed to enter the Crow Wing river on its south side; thence to Otter Tail lake portage; thence to said Otter Tail lake, and down, through the middle thereof, to its outlet; thence, in a direct line, so as to strike Buffalo river half-way from its source to its mouth, and down the said river to Red river; thence, descending Red river, to the mouth of Outard or Goose creek. The eastern boundary of the Sioux commences opposite the mouth of Ioway river, on the Mississippi; runs back two or three miles to the bluffs; follows the bluffs, crossing Bad Axe river, to the mouth of Black river; and from Black river to half a day's march below the falls of the Chippewa river.

ART. 6. It is agreed between the Chippewas and Winnebagoes, so far as they are mutually interested therein, that the southern boundary line of the Chippewa country shall commence on the Chippewa river aforesaid, half a day's march below the falls of that river; and run thence to the source of Clear Water river, a branch of the Chippewa river; thence, south, to Black river; thence to a point where the woods project into the meadows; and thence to the Plover portage of the Ouisconsin.

ART. 7. It is agreed between the Winnebagoes and the Sioux, Sacs and Foxes, Chippewas and Ottawas, Chippewas and Pattawatamies of the Illinois, that the Winnebago country shall be bounded as follows: southeasterly, by Rock river, from its source near the Winnebago lake, to the Winnebago village, about forty miles above its mouth; westerly, by the east line of the tract lying upon the Mississippi, herein secured to the Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie Indians of the Illinois; and also by the high bluff described in the Sioux boundary, and running north to Black river. From this point, the Winnebagoes claim up Black river to a point due west from the source of the left fork of the Ouisconsin; thence to the source of the said fork, and down the same to the Ouisconsin; thence, down the Ouisconsin, to the portage, and across the portage to Fox river; thence, down Fox river, to the Winnebago lake and to the Grand Kankanlin, including, in their claim, the whole of Winnebago lake; but, for the causes stated in the next article, this line from Black river must, for the present, be left indeterminate.

ART. 8. The representatives of the Menominees, not being sufficiently acquainted with their proper boundaries to settle the same definitively, and some uncertainty existing in consequence of the cession made by that tribe upon Fox river and Green Bay to the New York Indians, it is agreed between the said Menominee tribe and the Sioux, Chippewa, Winnebago, Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie Indians of the Illinois, that the claim of the Menominees to any portion of the land within the boundaries allotted to either of the said tribes shall not be barred by any stipulation herein, but the same shall remain as valid as if this treaty had not been concluded. It is, however, understood that the general claim of the Menominees is bounded on the north by the Chippewa country, on the east by Green Bay and Lake Michigan, extending as far south as Millewaukee river, and on the west they claim to Black river.

ART. 9. The country secured to the Ottawa, Chippewa, and Pattawatamie tribes of the Illinois, is bounded as follows: Beginning at the Winnebago village, on Rock river, forty miles from its mouth; and running thence, down the Rock river, to a line which runs from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi, and with that line to the Mississippi, opposite to Rock island; thence, up that river, to the United States reservation at the mouth of the Ouisconsin; thence, with the south and east lines of the said reservation, to the Ouisconsin; thence, southerly, passing the heads of the small streams emptying into the Mississippi, to the Rock river, at the Winnebago village. The Illinois Indians have also a just claim to a portion of the country bounded south by the Indian boundary line aforesaid, running, from the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, east by Lake Michigan, north by the Menominee country, and northwest by Rock river. This claim is recognised in the treaty concluded with the said Illinois tribes at St. Louis, on the twenty-fourth of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen; but, as the Millewaukee and Manteoalk bands are not represented at this council, it cannot be now definitively adjusted.

ART. 10. All the tribes aforesaid acknowledge the general controlling power of the United States, and disclaim all dependance upon, and connexion with, any other Power. And the United States agree to and recognise the preceding boundaries, subject to the limitations and restrictions before provided. It being, however, well understood, that the reservations at Fever river, at the Ouisconsin, at St. Peter's, and the ancient settlements at Prairie du Chien and Green Bay, and the land properly thereto belonging, and the reservations made upon the Mississippi for the use of the half-breeds, in the treaty concluded with the Sacs and Foxes on the twenty-fourth of August, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, are not claimed by either of the said tribes.

ART. 11. The United States agree, whenever the President may think it necessary and proper, to convene such of the tribes, either separately or together, as are interested in the lines left unsettled herein, and to recommend to them an amicable and final adjustment of their respective claims, so that the work, now happily begun, may be consummated. It is agreed, however, that a council shall be held with the Yancton band of the Sioux during the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, to explain to them the stipulations of this treaty, and to procure their assent thereto, should they be disposed to give it; and also with the Otooes, to settle and adjust their title to any of the country claimed by the Sacs, Foxes, and Ioways.

ART. 12. The Chippewa tribe being dispersed over a great extent of country, and the chiefs of that tribe having requested that such portion of them as may be thought proper by the Government of the United States may be assembled in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six upon some part of Lake Superior, that the objects and advantages of this treaty may be fully explained to them, so that the stipulations thereof may be observed by the warriors, the commissioners of the United States assent thereto, and it is therefore agreed that a council shall accordingly be held for these purposes.

ART. 13. It is understood by all the tribes, parties hereto, that no tribe shall hunt within the acknowledged limits of any other, without their assent; but it being the sole object of this arrangement to perpetuate a peace among them, and amicable relations being now restored, the chiefs of all the tribes have expressed a determination cheerfully to allow a reciprocal right of hunting on the lands of one another, permission being first asked and obtained, as before provided for.

ART. 14. Should any causes of difficulty hereafter unhappily arise between any of the tribes, parties hereunto, it is agreed that the other tribes shall interpose their good offices to remove such difficulties; and, also, that the Government of the United States may take such measures as they may deem proper to effect the same object.

ART. 15. This treaty shall be obligatory on the tribes, parties hereto, from and after the date hereof; and on the United States, from and after its ratification by the Government thereof.

Done, and signed, and sealed at Prairie du Chien, in the Territory of Michigan, this nineteenth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the fiftieth.

TREATIES WITH THE GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE AND THE KANZAS TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 30, 1826.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1826.

I transmit, herewith, to the Senate, for their consideration and advice with regard to their ratification—

1. A treaty concluded on the 10th day of August, 1825, at Council Grove, by Benjamin H. Reeves, George C. Sibley, and Thomas Mather, commissioners on the part of the United States, and certain chiefs and headmen of the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, on the part of the said tribes.

2. A treaty concluded on the 16th day of August, 1825, at the Sora Kansas creek, by the same commissioners on the part of the United States, and certain chiefs and headmen of the Kansas tribe or nation of Indians, on the part of the said tribe.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

TREATY WITH THE KANZAS.

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America, being anxious to promote a direct, commercial, and friendly intercourse between the citizens of the United States and those of the Mexican republic, and to afford protection to the same, did, at their last session, pass an act, which was approved the 3d of March, 1825, "to authorize the President of the United States to cause a road to be marked out from the western frontier of Missouri to the confines of New Mexico," and which authorizes the President of the United States to appoint commissioners to carry said act of Congress into effect, and enjoins on the commissioners so to be appointed that they first obtain the consent of the intervening tribes of Indians, by treaty, to the marking of said road, and to the unmolested use thereof to the citizens of the United States and of the Mexican republic; and Benjamin H. Reeves, George C. Sibley, and Thomas Mather, being duly appointed commissioners as aforesaid, and being duly and fully authorized, have this day met the chiefs and headmen of the Kansas tribe of Indians, who, being all duly authorized, by the invitation of said commissioners, on the Sora Kansas creek, two hundred and thirty miles southwestwardly from Fort Osage, have, after due deliberation and consultation, agreed to the following treaty, which is to be considered binding on the said Kansas Indians from and after this day.

ARTICLE 1. The chiefs and headmen of the Kansas nation or tribe of Indians, for themselves and their nation, do consent and agree that the commissioners of the United States shall and may survey and mark out a road, in such manner as they may think proper, through any of the territory owned or claimed by the said Kansas tribe or nation of Indians.

ART. 2. The chiefs and headmen as aforesaid do further agree that the road authorized in article first shall, when marked, be forever free for the use of the citizens of the United States and of the Mexican republic, who shall at all times pass and repass thereon, without any hindrance or molestation on the part of the said Kansas Indians.

ART. 3. The chiefs and headmen as aforesaid, in consideration of the friendly relations existing between them and the United States, do further promise, for themselves and their people, that they will, on all fit occasions, render such friendly aid and assistance as may be in their power to any of the citizens of the United States or of the Mexican republic, as they may at any time happen to meet or fall in with on the road aforesaid.

ART. 4. The chiefs and headmen as aforesaid do further consent and agree that the road aforesaid shall be considered as extending to a reasonable distance on either side, so that travellers thereon may, at any time, leave the marked track for the purpose of finding subsistence and proper camping places.

ART. 5. In consideration of the privileges granted by the chiefs of the Kansas tribe in the three preceding articles, the said commissioners on the part of the United States have agreed to pay to them, (the said chiefs,) for themselves and their people, the sum of five hundred dollars; which sum is to be paid them, as soon as may be, in money or merchandise, at their option, at such place as they may desire.

ART. 6. And the said chiefs and headmen, as aforesaid, acknowledge to have received from the commissioners aforesaid, at and before the signing of this treaty, articles of merchandise to the value of three hundred dollars; which sum of three hundred dollars, and the payment stipulated to be made to the said Kansas in article five, shall be considered, and are so considered by said chiefs, as full and complete compensation for every privilege herein granted by said chiefs.

In testimony whereof, the said Benjamin H. Reeves, George C. Sibley, and Thomas Mather, commissioners as aforesaid, and the chiefs and headmen of the Kansas tribe or nation of Indians, have hereunto set their hands and seals, on the Sora Kansas creek aforesaid, this sixteenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five.

of said commissioners, at the place called the Council Grove, on the river Nee-o-zho, one hundred and sixty miles southwest from Fort Osage, have, after due deliberation and consultation, agreed to the following treaty, which is to be considered binding on the said Great and Little Osages from and after this day.

ARTICLE 1. The chiefs and headmen of the Great and Little Osages, for themselves and their nations, respectively, do consent and agree that the commissioners of the United States shall and may survey and mark out a road, in such manner as they may think proper, through any of the territory owned or claimed by the said Great and Little Osage nations.

ART. 2. The chiefs and headmen as aforesaid do further agree that the road authorized in article first shall, when marked, be forever free for the use of the citizens of the United States and of the Mexican republic, who shall at all times pass and repass thereon without any hindrance or molestation on the part of the said Great and Little Osages.

ART. 6. And the said chiefs and headmen as aforesaid acknowledge to have received from the commissioners aforesaid, at and before the signing of this treaty, articles of merchandise to the value of three hundred dollars; which sum of three hundred dollars, and the payment stipulated to be made to the said Osages in article five, shall be considered, and are so considered by said chiefs, as full and complete compensation for every privilege herein granted by said chiefs.

In testimony whereof, the said Benjamin H. Reeves, George C. Sibley, and Thomas Mather, commissioners as aforesaid, and the chiefs and headmen of the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, have hereunto set their hands and seals, at Council Grove, this tenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five.

[1st SESSION.]

TREATY WITH THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 31ST JANUARY, 1826.

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1826.

I transmit herewith to the Senate, for their consideration and advice with regard to its ratification, a treaty concluded by the Secretary of War, duly authorized thereto, with the chiefs and headmen of the Creek nation, deputed by them, and now in this city.

It has been agreed upon, and is presented to the consideration of the Senate as a substitute for the treaty signed at the Indian Springs on the 12th of February last. The circumstances under which this received, on the 3d of March last, your advice and consent to its ratification, are known to you. It was transmitted to me from the Senate on the 5th of March, and ratified in full confidence, yielded to the advice and consent of the Senate, under a firm belief, founded on the journal of the commissioners of the United States, and on the express statements in the letter of one of them (of the 16th of February) to the then Secretary of War that it had been concluded with a large majority of the chiefs of the Creek nation, and with a reasonable prospect of immediate acquiescence by the remainder. This expectation has not merely been disappointed. The first measures for carrying the treaty into execution had scarcely been taken, when the two principal chiefs who had signed it fell victims to the exasperation of the great mass of the nation; and their families and dependants, far from being able to execute the engagements on their part, fled for life, safety, and subsistence, from the territories which they had assumed to cede to our own. Yet, in this fugitive condition, and while subsisting on the bounty of the United States, they have been found advancing pretensions to receive exclusively to themselves the whole of the sums stipulated by the commissioners of the United States in payment for all the lands of the Creek nation which were ceded by the terms of the treaty. And they have claimed the stipulation of the eighth article, that the United States would "protect the emigrating party against the encroachments, hostility, and impositions of the whites and of all others," as an engagement by which the United States were bound to become the instruments of their vengeance, and to inflict upon the majority of the Creek nation the punishment of Indian retribution, to gratify the vindictive fury of an impotent and helpless minority of their own tribe.

In this state of things, the question is not whether the treaty of the 12th of February last shall or shall not be executed. So far as the United States were or could be bound by it, I have been anxiously desirous of carrying it into execution; but, like other treaties, its fulfilment depends upon the will not of one, but of both the parties to it. The parties on the face of the treaty are the United States and the Creek nation; and, however desirous one of them may be to give it effect, this wish must prove abortive while the other party refuses to perform its stipulations, and disavows its obligations. By the refusal of the Creek nation to perform their part of the treaty, the United States are absolved from all its engagements on their part; and the alternative left them is, either to resort to measures of war, to secure by force the advantages stipulated to them in the treaty, or to attempt the adjustment of the interest by a new compact. In the preference dictated by the nature of our institutions, and by the sentiments of justice and humanity which the occasion requires for measures of peace, the treaty herewith transmitted has been concluded, and is submitted to the decision of the Senate. After exhausting every effort in our power to obtain the acquiescence of the Creek nation to the treaty of the 12th of February, I entertained for some time the hope that their assent might at least have been given to a new treaty, by which all their lands within the State of Georgia should have been ceded. This has also proved impracticable; and, although the excepted portion is of comparatively small amount and importance, I have assented to its exception, so far as to place it before the Senate, only from a conviction that between it and a resort to the forcible expulsion of the Creeks from their habitations and lands within the State of Georgia there was no middle term.

The deputation with which the treaty has been concluded consists of the principal chiefs of the nation, able not only to negotiate, but to carry into effect the stipulations to which they have agreed. There is a deputation also here from the small party which undertook to contract for the whole nation at the treaty of the 12th February, but the number of which, according to the information collected by General Gaines, does not exceed four hundred. They represent themselves, indeed, to be far more numerous; but, whatever their number may be, their interests have been provided for in the treaty now submitted. Their subscriptions to it would also have been received, but for unreasonable pretensions raised by them after all the arrangements of the treaty had been agreed upon, and it was actually signed. Whatever their merits may have been, in the facility with which they ceded all the lands of their nation within the State of Georgia, their utter inability to perform the engagements which they so readily contracted, and the exorbitancy of their demands, when compared with the inefficacy of their own means of performance, leave them with no claims upon the United States other than impartial and rigorous justice.

In referring to the impressions under which I ratified the treaty of the 12th February last, I do not deem it necessary to decide upon the propriety of the manner in which it was negotiated. Deeply regretting the criminations and recriminations to which these events have given rise, I believe the public interest will best be consulted by discarding them altogether from the discussion of the subject. The great body of the Creek nation inflexibly refuse to acknowledge or to execute that treaty. Upon this ground it will be set aside, should the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of that now communicated, without looking back to the means by which the other was effected. And in the adjustment of the terms of the present treaty, I have been particularly anxious to dispense a measure of great liberality to both parties of the Creek nation, rather than to extort from them a bargain of which the advantages on our part could only be purchased by hardship on theirs.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 25, 1826.

In execution of the power which you conferred upon me to negotiate with the Creek tribe of Indians, represented in this city by their principal chiefs, clothed with full powers by the nation fully assembled in council, and, if possible, to obtain such an arrangement as would put an end to the serious difficulties growing out of the treaty of the Indian Springs of February last, I proceeded, immediately on receiving your instructions to that effect, to convene the delegation in this office, believing that a less restrained intercourse of views would thereby be effected than in a written correspondence, and the result be more propitious to your wishes. From information previously received from General Gaines, it was believed that their acquiescence in the treaty negotiated at the Indian Springs was utterly unattainable; but that their consent to the relinquishment of their lands within the State of Georgia might be effected on reasonable terms. To that end, after perceiving the entire inutility of pressing them to an acquiescence in the treaty of the Indian Springs, I directed my efforts; confidently anticipating, from the information above referred to, immediate success. To my surprise, (and certainly very much to my regret,) feeling, as I did, the utmost anxiety that such an arrangement should be made, and knowing that nothing could be more acceptable to yourself, I found them determined to surrender their lands only to the east of the Chattahoochie. Every effort was made which propriety would permit to induce them to meet your wishes. Lest, from any ignorance of their character, I should fail in approaching them in some way accessible to one familiar with their motives of action, I availed myself of the aid of a distinguished citizen, whose intercourse with the inhabitants of the forests gave him the desired qualifications; and, if success had been attainable, he must have succeeded. He entered into my views with alacrity, and pursued the object with a patience and assiduity which has entitled him to my thanks. Every effort, however, was fruitless. The Chattahoochie, as forming a natural boundary, was a sine qua non. Indeed, such a boundary seemed, with them, of more consequence than the land which was involved in the contest. They continually urged that an artificial line was no security with the untutored Indian against those trespasses which the conterminous whites perpetrated upon them; and candor has forced the acknowledgment from those experienced in the subject, that there is much of weight in their solicitude for a natural boundary. Finding them pertinacious in adhering to this line, which, if established, would still leave a small portion of land within the limits of Georgia, (to gratify whose wishes, if practicable, had been a leading motive with you, in whatever connected itself with this subject,) I had determined to put an end to the negotiation. In reflecting, however, on the posture of things in that event, and the consequences which might ensue, and believing that an amicable arrangement of this controversy was alike called for by the wishes of the American people and the interests of those unfortunate people, I proposed to them, after having obtained your consent, a line of compromise, and finally agreed to that which is inserted in the treaty which I herewith enclose; and which, according to the map on which I treated, will have acquired for Georgia some four or five hundred thousand acres of land west of the Chattahoochie, and, with the lands on the east side of the Chattahoochie, making, it is believed, nearly three millions of acres which Georgia acquires by the treaty; and leaving, within the limits of Georgia, a small fraction of land belonging to the Creeks, not equal, perhaps, to one-tenth of the part ceded. In arranging the details, great difficulty occurred. I found the delegation invincibly opposed to taking any land to the west of the Mississippi; in consequence, the pecuniary consideration was obliged to be increased; to an amount, however, comparatively small, in respect to the land which must have been given, according to the scale heretofore adopted, of acre for acre. To the intrinsic difficulty arising from the negotiation, others, of no small magnitude, were added. The delegation of the major part of the Creek nation peremptorily refused to enter into a treaty in common with the delegation of the minor or McIntosh party. To provide for the latter, on liberal principles, was an indispensable condition, from which nothing would have justified me in departing. To obviate this difficulty, I ascertained from each party what would be satisfactory, and incorporated the whole in the treaty, which was to be signed exclusively by the delegation of the majority. The treaty was prepared on these data, and signed by the delegation of the major party. Out of abundant caution, I designed to obtain the signature of the delegation of the minor party to a paper to accompany the treaty, expressing their entire satisfaction with the arrangement. After the treaty had been executed, and an intimation made to the minor party of the above wish, they declined complying therewith, unless a new provision should be made in their favor, namely, that of the value of their improvements within the territory retained by the Indians; which, being unreasonable, was refused. This, however, has no bearing on the validity of the treaty. Their number, according to a census taken by General Gaines, is very small—not above one-fortieth of the nation; they themselves stated the number at sixteen hundred, at the opening of the conference with them. They suppose, now, that three thousand may be induced to emigrate. Whatever the number may be, there is no difficulty in saying that the treaty has been made with the representatives of a vast majority of the nation; and I think, on reference to the conditions of the treaty, it will be found that ample justice has been done the smaller party.

Respectfully submitted:

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

JAMES BARBOUR.

TREATY WITH THE CREEKS.

Articles of a treaty, made at the city of Washington, this twenty-fourth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, between James Barbour, Secretary of War, thereto specially authorized by the President of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Creek nation of Indians, who have received full power from the said nation to conclude and arrange all matters herein provided for.

Whereas a treaty was concluded at the Indian Springs, on the twelfth day of February last, between commissioners on the part of the United States, and a portion of the Creek nation, by which an extensive district of country was ceded to the United States:

And whereas a great majority of the chiefs and warriors of the said nation have protested against the execution of the said treaty, and have represented that the same was signed on their part by persons having no sufficient authority to form treaties or to make cessions, and that the stipulations in said treaty are therefore wholly void:

And whereas the United States are unwilling that difficulties should exist in the said nation which may eventually lead to an intestine war, and are still more unwilling that any cessions of land should be made to them, unless with the fair understanding and full assent of the tribe making such cession, and for a just and adequate consideration; it being the policy of the United States, in all their intercourse with the Indians, to treat them justly and liberally, as becomes the relative situation of the parties:

Now, therefore, in order to remove the difficulties which have thus arisen, to satisfy the great body of the Creek nation, and to reconcile the contending parties into which it is unhappily divided, the following articles have been agreed upon and concluded, between James Barbour, Secretary of War, specially authorized as aforesaid, and the said chiefs and headmen, representing the Creek nation of Indians:

ARTICLE 1. The treaty concluded at the Indian Springs, on the twelfth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, between commissioners on the part of the United States and the said Creek nation of Indians, and ratified by the United States on the seventh day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, is hereby declared to be null and void, to every intent and purpose whatsoever; and every right and claim arising from the same is hereby cancelled and surrendered.

ART. 2. The Creek nation of Indians cede to the United States all the lands belonging to the said nation in the State of Georgia, and lying on the east side of the middle of the Chattahoochie river; and, also, another tract of land lying within the said State, and bounded as follows: Beginning at a point on the western bank of the said river, forty-seven miles below the point where the boundary line between the Creeks and the Cherokees strikes the Chattahoochie river, near the Buzzard's Roost, measuring the said distance in a direct line, and not following the meanders of the said river; and from the point of beginning, running in a direct line, to a point in the boundary line between the said Creeks and the Cherokees, thirty miles west of the said Buzzard's Roost; thence to the Buzzard's Roost; and thence, with the middle of the said river, to the place of beginning.

ART. 3. Immediately after the ratification of this treaty, the United States agree to pay to the chiefs of the said nation the sum of two hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred dollars, to be divided among the chiefs and warriors of the said nation.

ART. 4. The United States agree to pay to the said nation an additional perpetual annuity of twenty thousand dollars.

ART. 5. The difficulties which have arisen in the said nation, in consequence of the treaty of the Indian Springs, shall be amicably adjusted; and that portion of the Creek nation who signed that treaty shall be admitted to all their privileges as members of the Creek nation; it being the earnest wish of the United States, without undertaking to decide upon the complaints of the respective parties, that all causes of dissatisfaction should be removed.

ART. 6. That portion of the Creek nation known as the friends and followers of the late General William McIntosh, having intimated to the Government of the United States their wish to remove west of the Mississippi, it is hereby agreed, with their assent, that a deputation of five persons shall be sent by them, at the expense of the United States, immediately after the ratification of this treaty, to examine the Indian country west of the Mississippi, not within either of the States or Territories, and not possessed by the Choctaws or Cherokees. And the United States agree to purchase for them, if the same can be conveniently done upon reasonable terms, wherever they may select, a country, whose extent shall, in the opinion of the President, be proportioned to their numbers; and if such purchase cannot be thus made, it is then agreed that the selection shall be made where the President may think proper, just reference being had to the wishes of the emigrating party.

ART. 7. The emigrating party shall remove within twenty-four months, and the expense of their removal shall be defrayed by the United States; and such subsistence shall also be furnished them, for a term not exceeding twelve months after their arrival at their new residence, as, in the opinion of the President, their numbers and circumstances may require.

ART. 8. An agent or sub-agent and interpreter shall be appointed to accompany and reside with them; and a blacksmith and wheelwright shall be furnished by the United States. Such assistance shall also be rendered to them, in their agricultural operations, as the President may think proper.

ART. 9. In consideration of the exertions used by the friends and followers of General McIntosh to procure a cession at the Indian Springs, and of their past difficulties and contemplated removal, the United States agree to present to the chiefs of the party, to be divided among the chiefs and warriors, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, if such party shall amount to three thousand persons; and in that proportion for any smaller number. Fifteen thousand dollars of this sum to be paid immediately after the ratification of this treaty, and the residue upon their arrival in the country west of the Mississippi.

ART. 10. It is agreed by the Creek nation that an agent shall be appointed by the President to ascertain the damages sustained by the friends and followers of the late General McIntosh, in consequence of the difficulties growing out of the treaty of the Indian Springs, as set forth in an agreement entered into with General Gaines at the Broken Arrow, and which have been done contrary to the laws of the Creek nation; and such damages shall be repaired by the said nation, or the amount paid out of the annuity due to them.

ART. 11. All the improvements which add real value to any part of the land herein ceded shall be appraised by commissioners to be appointed by the President; and the amount, thus ascertained, shall be paid to the parties owning such improvements.

ART. 12. Possession of the country herein ceded shall be yielded by the Creeks on or before the first day of January next.

ART. 13. The United States agree to guaranty to the Creeks all the country not herein ceded, to which they have a just claim, and to make good to them any losses they may incur, in consequence of the illegal conduct of any citizen of the United States within the Creek country.

ART. 14. The President of the United States shall have authority to select, in some part of the Creek country, a tract of land, not exceeding two sections, where the necessary public buildings may be erected, and the persons attached to the agency may reside.

ART. 15. Whenever any stream, over which it may be necessary to establish ferries, forms the boundary of the Creek country, the Creek Indians shall have the right of ferriage from their own land, and the citizens of the United States from the land to which the Indian title is extinguished.

ART. 16. The Creek chiefs may appoint three commissioners from their own people, who shall be allowed to attend the running of the lines west of the Chattahoochie river, and whose expenses, while engaged in this duty, shall be defrayed by the United States.

ART. 17. This treaty, after the same has been ratified by the President and Senate, shall be obligatory on the United States and on the Creek nation.

In testimony whereof, the said James Barbour, Secretary of War, authorized as aforesaid, and the chiefs of the said Creek nation of Indians, have hereunto set their hands, at the city of Washington, the day and year aforesaid.

JAMES BARBOUR.

TREATY WITH THE FLORIDA INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 6, 1826.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 1, 1826.

Pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th ultimo, directing the Secretary of War "to communicate to that House the instructions to the commissioners for negotiating the treaty with the Florida Indians; the extent of the reserves made to certain chiefs; the amount of money paid under the treaty; the objects for which it was paid; the present situation of the Indians; and the complaints, if any, against the said treaty; with any other information or correspondence touching the condition of the Florida Indians at this time;" I have the honor to report, herewith, documents numbered from 1 to 48,* inclusive, which furnish all the information required, except as to the extent of the reservations, and the amount of money paid under the treaty, and the objects for which it was paid.

The reservations are four in number, and are those which are provided for by the treaty; and the amount paid under the treaty is $87,068 21. The objects for which this sum was paid are those for which the treaty stipulates, viz: for farming utensils, cattle, hogs, &c., $6,000; for annuity, $5,000; for rations, $65,700; for improvements, $4,500; for transportation, $2,000; for blacksmith and school, $2,000; and, of the sum of $5,000, appropriated for running the lines, (this work not being yet completed,) $1,868 21.

By reference to the correspondence communicated, it will be seen that a further provision, in two sums, (one of $2,000, and the other of $5,000,) has been authorized, to save these Indians from starving; but no part of this provision has been yet drawn for. When it shall be, (if at all,) the payments will be made from the contingent fund of the Indian Department.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES BARBOUR.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

No. 3.

Extract of a letter from Colonel James Gadsden to the Secretary of War, dated

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, November 14, 1823.

In reply to your communication of the 29th of October, I have to state it as my impression that the rations of bread, meat, and salt, provided for in the fifth article of the treaty with the Florida Indians, were agreeably to the intentions of the commissioners, to be limited in quantity to the bare subsistence of those individuals embraced within its provisions; and to be confined in the issues to those who might be compelled to remove, and not extending to those already residing within the limits of the country allotted. The terms bread, meat, and salt, were left indefinite, so that the issues might be controlled at the discretion of the agents, by such circumstances as could not be anticipated by the commissioners, or such instructions as might emanate from the Department of War. It was believed that this provision was not only equitable to those Indians who, by abandoning fields already cultivated for a wilderness, might be distressed the first year for the subsistence of life, but would present a strong motive for immediate concentration, and, at the same time, produce impressions on the savage favorable to American humanity. It will be distinctly recollected that the Florida tribes had been but recently embraced within our territorial boundaries; that they consisted of the most discordant materials that were to be brought into harmonious union; that a majority were refugees from the southern tribes, still hostile in their feelings, which had been irritated by repeated chastisements, and kept alive by foreign or individual instigations. To embody these materials together, to obtain a control over the savages, and conciliate their friendship, seemed to require the application (however expensive) of all such means as would produce immediate and most permanent effects. The subsisting those who would be embarrassed by the removal necessary, until they could be made as comfortable in the country to which they were assigned, appeared one of the most equitable and salutary provisions. The commissioners, in endeavoring to effect the objects the Government had in view, did not attempt to balance between necessary expenditures of money and probable Indian aggressions.

The estimate of the Indian population in Florida, accompanying the treaty and other documents, was furnished by the Indians themselves, but was always believed by me to be imperfect and exaggerated. It must ever be difficult, under any circumstances, to ascertain with minute accuracy the probable population of wandering tribes; but more so, when the information must be derived solely from the Indians themselves, having a positive interest in exaggerating their numbers. From the data, therefore, within my possession, modified in some degree by conjecture, I am able to afford you, agreeably to your request, the following imperfect estimate of the probable number of Indians for which rations may be required.

Aggregate population, agreeably to Indian statements,	-	-	-	4,800
Of this number, about 1,000 will remain on the reservations set apart on the Appalachicola, and who are entitled to no other provisions than those specified in the aforesaid article,	-	-	-	1,000
Over estimate of population, including Creeks who will prefer returning to their nation to being concentrated south,	-	-	-	1,000
Deduct for probable amount of population already within the limits allotted,	-	-	-	1,000
				3,000

Probable number, including women and children, to be provided with rations of meat and bread, - 1,800

Fresh beef may be contracted for in Florida and Georgia, deliverable at the agency, at a moderate price; and the bread stuff (corn being preferred by the Indians) can be obtained in Orleans, and shipped to the Bay of Tampa, at a very inconsiderable expense, so soon as the Mississippi begins to discharge its waters.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 24, 1823.

I enclose for your information a copy of a letter to Colonel Humphreys, who is now in Washington.

As there may be some little delay in his arrival in Florida, you will, in the mean time, take such steps as you may deem proper to prepare the Indians for a speedy execution of the treaty. It is impossible to give specific instructions here on the subject, and the agent is therefore directed to consult with Colonel Gadsden and yourself in the measures to be taken. You will, accordingly, afford him your advice, and take the course which may in your judgment be necessary and proper, having the most rigid regard to economy.

I have the honor, &c.

His Excellency WM. P. DUVAL, St. Augustine.

J. C. CALHOUN.

[Accompaniment to No. 4.]

The Secretary of War to Colonel Humphreys.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 24, 1823.

The treaty with the Florida Indians, as I understand, being ratified by the Senate, you will immediately repair to your post, to attend to its execution. It is impossible to give you full instructions on the subject, until the appropriation to carry into effect the treaty is made by Congress. In the mean time, you will make such preliminary arrangements as may be necessary for concentrating the Indians on the lands assigned to them, with as little delay as possible; and to defray the expense of which, you are authorized to draw on this Department for a sum not exceeding $6,000. But you will not draw until it is absolutely necessary, and then will accompany your bills with a statement of the expenses to which the money is to be applied. In all the measures to be taken for the execution of the treaty, you will consult with Governor Duval and Colonel Gadsden; the former of whom is advised of the ratification of the treaty, and requested to take, during your absence, such steps as he may deem proper to prepare the Indians for a speedy execution of the treaty agreeably to its provisions.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR:

PENSACOLA, January 12, 1824.

I have the honor to inform you that, since my departure from St. Augustine, I have carefully examined the interior of Florida, which is, in my opinion, the most desirable and valuable region in all the southern country. Captain Burch, no doubt, has made his report to you of his route to St. Augustine from this place, and, of course, has given in his report a description of the country, soil, &c.

I visited all the Indian towns on my route to this city, and endeavored to impress on the minds of the chiefs the importance of restraining their warriors, and preserving the friendship of the United States. I am sorry to say that the Indians under the immediate command of Neamathla have been concerned in killing the cattle, in two days after the troops at St. Mark's were removed. I have taken great pains to ascertain the real feeling of the Indians towards us, and can rely with some confidence on the friendship of all the chiefs except Neamathla. He is a man of uncommon capacity; bold, violent, and restless. He cannot submit to a superior, nor endure an equal. No reliance can be placed on him, and his men are the most lawless and vile of the Indians in Florida. I feel confident that they will not remove into the boundary given to them by the late treaty, unless there is a military force in the vicinity to overawe them. I do not believe that these Indians will dare to commence hostilities; but they steal from, and kill the cattle of, the white settlers, whenever they have an opportunity. A few men kept at St. Mark's, until the Indians are removed, I deem necessary.

I am, respectfully, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

No. 6.

Extract of a letter from His Excellency W. P. Duval, to the Honorable J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, dated

PENSACOLA, April 11, 1824.

Your letter of the 24th last December, relating to the removal of the Indians, and also a copy of your letter of the same date, on the same subject, to Colonel Humphreys, did not come to hand until three days since. It is now too late to remove the Indians until September. Time will be important, if any regard is paid to economy. Contracts must be made for the supply of the Indians, and some time must elapse before they can be executed; besides, there are other arrangements for tools, stock, &c. required by the treaty, which the Indians expect will be faithfully and punctually provided. To attempt a hasty removal of these people, before we are ready on the part of the Government to execute what we are bound by treaty to perform, would not only increase the dissatisfaction of the Indians, but greatly enhance the expense. The Indians would also lose their present crops, which are now planted, and no positive disadvantage can result from this delay. In addition to what is stated, I will add, that the boundary of the country intended for their occupation has not yet been finally settled.

Colonel Gadsden wrote to me from Charlotte Harbor that the lands in the peninsula are by no means equal to his expectation. The northern line of the Indian boundary will, I presume, be extended according to the treaty.

Colonel Humphreys met with Colonel Gadsden on his way from St. Augustine to Pensacola, and conversed with him on these subjects. I am happy to say, his opinions are decidedly with me in the views I have expressed on these subjects.

It will be less expensive to furnish the Indians with beef than pork. The beef can be driven to the several points required, for even less than the pork could be purchased for in New Orleans.

Corn and salt (or flour, if corn cannot be obtained,) will be had cheapest in New Orleans. I am satisfied that many of the Indians will leave the Seminoles, and settle among the Creeks, before the next fall. It is my opinion that not more than fifteen hundred will remove into the boundary; this opinion has been formed on my own observation, and intelligence derived from the Indians while I was with them during last winter. Whatever order you may deem proper to give, either as to the removal or manner of supplying the Indians, shall be promptly executed, should you entertain any views different from my own.

If the arrangements are left to my discretion, the most rigid economy, consistent with the fair and just execution of the treaty, will govern me in the expenditure of the funds which may be transmitted for this object.

No. 7.

From Governor Duval to the Secretary of War.

PENSACOLA, April 11, 1824.

At the moment the mail was about to be closed, I received from Colonel Humphreys a copy of a letter, the original of which he handed me at the same time, and which I transmit for your information.

Neamathla and his chiefs are fully apprized of their situation, and say they will remove whenever ordered, but beg time to gather their present crop. Under all the circumstances, I have determined to permit them to remain, (subject, however, to your order, which they perfectly understand.) I enclose to you the advertisement for supplying the Indians, which Colonel Humphreys, with my approbation, has issued; it will be immediately sent to St. Augustine for publication. Before any contracts will be made, you will have time to countermand the measure, if it should be deemed by you inexpedient; so an early answer from you will be expected.

Neamathla is a most uncommon man; he ought to be induced to remove with his people. This chief you will find, perhaps, the greatest man you have ever seen among the Indians. He can, if he chooses to do so, control his warriors with as much ease as a colonel could a regiment of regular soldiers: they love and fear him. If this man can be made (as I have no doubt he can) the firm friend of our Government, no means should be spared to induce him to go with his people, and to continue as the chief of his nation. The hospitality and manly feelings of this chief have always kept him in poverty. If Congress should allow him to sell his reservation of land, and direct the money to be laid out in cattle for him, it will awaken his gratitude to the Government, and render him of essential service in commanding the nation.

This chief should be seen by you, and then you can judge of the force and energy of his mind and character. Neamathla, and the chiefs who will go with him to the city, have never seen the interior of the United States, and have no precise knowledge of the strength and power of our country.

I am, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

[Accompaniment of No. 7.]

From Colonel Humphreys to Governor Duval.

PENSACOLA, April 7, 1824.

SIR:

In compliance with the requisition made by you in our last conversation, I have the honor to submit my views in relation to the removal of the Indians of this Territory to the new limits assigned them under the late treaty. In the examination of this subject, the following points obviously present themselves for consideration: First, whether, under existing circumstances, is it practicable to effect a removal now; and, if so, it is advisable, or would it be more proper to defer it to a future period? In answer to this, I would remark, that the measure does not appear practicable at this time, without infinite difficulty and expense, both of which might in a good degree be avoided by a few months occupied in preparation. An earlier removal than the ensuing fall does not appear essentially important to the interest of the Government or the prosperity of the Territory. The increase of its population (the grand desideratum) cannot, it is conceived, be affected by the proposed delay. The season is already so far advanced, that persons intending to become settlers, who have been deterred by the presence of the Indians, and are awaiting their departure, have ere this commenced making crops elsewhere, and will not, it is presumable, abandon them. The Indians have, also, at most of the towns, planted their corn, &c.; and, if they are allowed to remain for the harvest, it will, it is fair to calculate, in no inconsiderable degree diminish the expenses incident to the stipulated supply of provisions.

In addition to these considerations, another of great weight is suggested, which, in equity at least, appears conclusive against a hurried and unprepared removal. It has not been practicable to make sufficient arrangements for furnishing the supplies alluded to, the promise of which forms to the Indians an indispensable and important item in the treaty, and one without which they must inevitably severely suffer, and, in many instances, it is feared, perish. However eagerly some of their unfeeling white neighbors may urge a hasty expulsion of these unhappy people, humanity loudly exclaims against the idea of driving them from their present habitations before the means of subsistence are provided to carry them to, and sustain them at, their new positions. Nor would such a step well accord with the promises of friendship and protection made by the Government, or sustain its wonted character for justice; besides which, it cannot be expected that the Indians, however amicably disposed they may be, will readily, or without complaint, enter upon the performance of the contract they have made with the United States, (at the best disagreeable to them,) should they not discover a disposition on the part of the Government to comply with the terms of the treaty with promptitude and fidelity. Another reason to be offered why the removal should not take place at this time, may be found in the fact that the commissioner appointed to run the boundaries has not been able, notwithstanding his laborious and extraordinary exertions, to declare that duty executed; and it will be recollected that, by the treaty, the establishment of one of those boundaries depends, in some measure, upon the opinion of that officer as to whether there is a sufficiency of good land for the purposes of cultivation within the limits defined in that instrument. A removal, before a report is made upon this subject, would be premature and injudicious, inasmuch as it might involve the necessity of a second change of ground, and, consequently, produce embarrassment and extra expense. With respect to the mode to be adopted for the procurement of the promised supplies of provisions, in that way which shall best effect the object, having a due regard to economy, and, at the same time, insure a punctual delivery, I can only say that, so far as my experience and knowledge extend upon the subject, the plan of obtaining proposals for contracts by advertisement in the public prints has been found the most advisable, for the reason that it encourages competition, and thus affords a security against extortion. I will add, that I feel authorized to say, the opinions expressed in the foregoing, relative to the suitable period for removing the Indians, as well as to the mode proper to be adopted for furnishing their supply of provisions, are in perfect coincidence with the opinions entertained upon the same subjects by Colonel Gadsden, commissioner, whom I met at Okihumky, in my route to this place. I cannot close this communication without repeating the sentiments I gave you on a former occasion in regard to Neamathla, the principal chief of the Florida Indians. By the terms of the treaty, he is located upon a reservation very remote from the main body of the nation. The offer of this arrangement, designed to gratify and sooth the feelings of this aged and respectable man, was wise and judicious, as calculated to have a beneficial effect upon the pending negotiations; but I cannot consider the consummation of it less than unfortunate, inasmuch as it removes from the immediate government of the nation the only individual in it who possesses a perfect and undisputed authority over a people, some of whom are often troublesome to manage. The promptitude with which Neamathla has uniformly, since the war, punished the offences of his people, particularly those against the white inhabitants of the country, has excited in the Indians an awe and respect for his character, and given him unbounded influence over them, and, at the same time, furnishes the surest proof of the strength of his desire to be on terms of amity with the United States.

The immediate presence of such a man among the Indians, it is evident, would be most salutary, and afford an ample barrier against the evils which might otherwise be produced by the machinations of white men without the nation, or the turbulent spirits among the red within. I have reason to believe that, were Neamathla permitted to sell his reservation, by means of which he might procure a valuable stock, and place himself on an eligible footing in point of property, he might be induced to take up his residence within the limits assigned to the Indians in the south; an event, let me repeat, I must look upon as promising great benefit to the United States, as well as to the Indians themselves.

I have the honor, &c.

His Excellency WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

G. HUMPHREYS,
Agent for Indian Affairs, Florida.

No. 8.

From the Secretary of War to Governor Duval.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 2, 1824.

I had the honor of writing to you on the 3d ultimo, and in that letter (the season for removing the Indians being deferred) requested you to furnish me with an estimate of the cost which is likely to attend upon the emigration, upon the best data which you might be able to command. Since then, the act of Congress has passed containing the appropriation to carry into effect that object, and fixes it at sixty-five thousand seven hundred dollars.

The same act appropriates the sum of six thousand dollars for implements of husbandry, stock of cattle, and hogs; five thousand dollars annually, for twenty years, for the annuity; four thousand five hundred dollars for compensation for improvements that the Indians may abandon; two thousand dollars for transportation of the different tribes to the land assigned them; two thousand dollars annually, for twenty years, for the establishment of a school and the support of a gunsmith; and five thousand dollars for running the line of the land assigned to the Indians.

In making your estimates under the appropriation of sixty-five thousand seven hundred dollars for the expense of rations to be furnished to the Indians, agreeably to the fifth article of the treaty, you will be guided by a strict regard to economy; taking care that the sum does not go beyond the appropriation, but bringing it as much within it as may be practicable, consistent with the objects contemplated by the act. On submitting your estimates, you will notify the Department of the time when you will require the remittances to be made, and where; which will be attended to.

You will appoint a disinterested and suitable person to ascertain the value of the improvements that may be abandoned by the Indians, and will instruct him to adjudge each case separately, and accompany it with a description of it, and the reasons for its allowance. On receiving the whole of which, you will transmit them to this Department for its approval; when the amount will be remitted to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty in relation thereto.

It will be important that immediate measures be taken to secure to the Indians a gunsmith, provided for by the sixth article of the treaty. The further provision for a school will be the subject of future arrangement, under propositions which, it is presumed, will be made to the Department by some of the missionary establishments acting under regulations which have been adopted by the Government for the improvement of other tribes. Colonel Gadsden will be informed of the appropriation of five thousand dollars for running the line of the land assigned to the Indians.

You will be careful to direct the agent, in making up his accounts, to place every item of disbursement under its appropriate head; so that corresponding charges may be made on the books of the Treasury. In all letters of advice, you will, in naming the sum, add for and on account of the particular branch of the expenditure which the draft is designed to cover.

You will be careful to send in the estimates under the various heads of appropriation, in time for the remittances, respectively, to be made.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Extract of a letter from His Excellency William P. Duval, Governor of Florida, to the Hon. J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, dated

PENSACOLA, June 18, 1824.

I have this day received letters, by an express from St. Mark's and Tallahassee, from the Indian agent and other respectable gentlemen in that quarter; by which I am informed that the Indians seem very unfriendly to the settlers, and have commenced killing their cattle, and are daily becoming more and more insolent. Neamathla, who has been for more than a year past soliciting permission to visit Washington city, now refuses to go. The Indians in that neighborhood have lately procured a considerable quantity of powder and lead. Judge Robinson, who resides on the waters of the Ochlochne, and who has heretofore had great confidence in the Indians, now advises strongly that a military force should be sent there. I have, therefore, applied to the commanding officer at this post for a company to be sent to St. Mark's, where the expense of supplying them will not be greater than at this place, as the sloop Florida, which belongs to the quartermaster's department, can, without any inconvenience to the service, transport whatever may be required. I go to Tallahassee immediately; and nothing but bad health would have prevented me from being there in April last. I deem it proper to request that the officer who may command the detachment should be directed to act under my orders; otherwise, much difficulty might occur, as the captain in command might act contrary to my views and knowledge. I regret that my ill health did not permit me to meet Colonel Gadsden at Tallahassee, as I intended to have done. I have written to him, and requested that he will come to Tallahassee as soon as possible. A personal conference with him is of much importance in making the future arrangements for the removal of the Indians. I do not believe that more than fifteen hundred Indians will be entitled to rations, though the advertisement is for a much larger number. I shall contract only for the necessary supplies, with the privilege to increase or diminish the amount at pleasure, upon suitable notice. I am convinced that a respectable military force should be at Tallahassee by the 1st of October next, at which time I shall order the Indians to remove: they will not go willingly, and will refuse, unless a respectable force is present. This is the opinion of Colonel Gadsden and the agent, and has long been mine.

I shall personally attend the execution of the treaty. Economy and despatch shall govern me. I do not expect to leave Tallahassee until the Indians are removed; and my personal attention, I flatter myself, will save considerable expense to the Government.

No. 10.

SIR:

PENSACOLA, June 21, 1824.

I have been waiting for two days past for a change of wind to sail to St. Mark's. I am determined to remain in that quarter for the next four months, and see and personally make all the contracts for the fulfilment of the treaty with the Indians.

Several propositions for supplying the rations for the Indians have been received. The most favorable for the whole is eighteen cents.

I am determined not to submit to any such imposition on the Government; and I request you (should you deem it advisable to do so) to allow me to act according to my discretion, if more favorable terms are not offered by contract. I shall be enabled to purchase beef, salt, corn, or flour, with the funds of the Government, so as to insure a saving of thousands of dollars. I can employ a man to make the purchase of the beef, and to drive them to any point; and I can send the sub-agent to New Orleans for the other articles required by the treaty. Near the head of St. John's river there must be one place of deposite; and the other will be at Tampa Bay, or some other convenient point.

To allow eighteen cents for the ration (only allowing fifteen hundred rations per day) will cost the Government, for one year, ninety-eight thousand dollars. I am ready to perform any duty or service that will diminish the expense attending on this treaty.

Let some funds be deposited as early as possible at New Orleans; for, should I have to superintend the purchase of the rations, I wish to be about it in due time. Any directions you may think proper to transmit shall be strictly attended to. The six thousand dollars given by the treaty for the purchase of agricultural instruments and stocks of hogs and cattle, as well as the one thousand dollars given for the services of a black and gunsmith, and for tools, iron, steel, &c., should be placed at an early period under my control, so that these supplies might be procured; for the smiths' tools, ploughs, hoes, iron, axes, &c., by sending to the north, can be had on much better terms than in this southern country.

I have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

No. 11.

Extract of a letter from His Excellency William P. Duval, Governor of Florida, to the Hon. J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, dated

ST. MARK'S, July 12, 1824.

Last night a company of the 4th infantry, under the command of Captain Lear, arrived here. The temper of the Indians in this quarter demands the presence of some troops; and I now assure you that, unless a respectable military force is sent here by the 1st of October, the Indians will not move. They are now as busy in clearing land and building their habitations as if they were never to remove. Neamathla is assuming and insolent; he has threatened to drive off the white settlers. I must take some decided step with this chief: he is the only turbulent man in the nation. He is creating daily more and more dissatisfaction among the Indians. He has avoided me since my arrival here, although he was to meet me on a day appointed, which he promised, but failed to do. I have understood from Captain Lear that he has received orders not to move out of St. Mark's, or to send any detachment out, under any pretence. I consider these orders may prove very injurious to the public service; for, surely, as I am on the spot, something should be left to my discretion and judgment. The troops should act under my orders, or they are worse than useless at this point. Whatever step I take will be such as the soundest discretion and coolest and most mature reflection would require. But if a single chief should be fractious, or should, in a fit of rage or drunkenness, do mischief, I should certainly like to send a detachment and immediately arrest him. As to using any improper severity, that shall not be permitted. If a chief deserves punishment, I will call the other chiefs to try him. I regret that no sub-agent has yet been appointed: I shall want his services very much, and his presence will be required either at the deposite on St. John's river, or at Tampa Bay, to superintend the issues to the Indians. I am inclined to believe that many of the Indians in this region will go back to the Creeks, where they properly belong, sooner than go south.

I am, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

No. 12.

Extract of a letter from Governor William P. Duval to the Secretary of War, dated

ST. MARK'S, July 12, 1824.

The estimate you require I herewith transmit to you. It is impossible to say whether there will be more or less than fifteen hundred Indians to feed daily. I am inclined to the opinion that there are not more and not many under that number. Many of the Indians in this section of Florida are from the Creek nation, and have removed into this country in the last three or four years. As they of right belong to the Creek nation, I shall encourage as many of them as I can persuade to return to their own country. I have drawn on you in favor of F. H. Nesbit for one thousand dollars, which you will of course deduct from the estimate. I shall contract for the cattle and hogs to be delivered at Tampa Bay in October, and I have ordered the tools of husbandry, to be brought from the north, to be distributed at the same time. I was anxious to pay Neamathla his five hundred dollars, which, by the last article of the treaty, you will see was to be paid to him. I have the money in silver for him. I should be much pleased if Colonel Gadsden would value the improvements under the treaty. He could do better than any one I can obtain, and would give more satisfaction to the Indians than any person known to them. All the chiefs have the highest respect for him, and unbounded confidence in his justice and impartiality. I shall write to the colonel immediately on the subject, and request you will aid me by your influence in this matter.

The Indians on the Appalachicola river behave very well; they seem anxious to follow all my directions, and are rapidly improving in their building fences and mode of cultivation. I have great expectations that they will improve in civilization even faster than was expected by those the most sanguine in their calculations on this subject. I cannot, before closing this letter, forbear to urge the appointment of a sub-agent, and that he be directed to report himself directly and without delay to me at Tallahassee. You may rest assured that all possible attention will be given by me to the execution of the Indian treaty, and that economy shall govern all my movements.

Extract of so much of the estimate of Governor Duval, referred to in his letter to the Secretary of War of July 12, 1824, as relates to rations.

To 500 rations, furnished daily at some point near Lake George, on the St. John's river, East Florida, at 12½ cents per ration, as the lowest estimate, commencing the 1st of October next, - - -	$22,817 50
To 1,000 rations, furnished daily at Tampa Bay, for the period of ten months, at the same price, -	38,030 00
To 1,000 rations, to be furnished for two months, at St. Mark's, preparatory to the removal of the Indians from their lands, at the same price, - - -	7,605 50

I shall be compelled to feed many Indians at this point [St. Mark's] until they start, and then all will draw provisions here for their journey.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 17, 1824.

Your letter of the 21st ultimo has been received. The proposals for furnishing rations to the Indians at eighteen cents, which you state are the most favorable that have been offered, are considered entirely too high, and should by no means be accepted.

The removal of the Indians having been deferred, at your suggestion, until the fall, sufficient time is afforded to obtain the supplies on better terms; and I would, therefore, advise you to publish the advertisement for them in the New Orleans, Milledgeville, and Charleston newspapers. Should there be no proposals made, after allowing a reasonable time for them to be sent in, offering more advantageous terms than those you have received, you will then adopt the plan which you propose, exercising your discretion as to the arrangements necessary to carry them into effect; which should, however, be so made as to keep the whole expense for provisions within the sum of $65,000, the amount of the appropriation for that object.

On examining your printed proposals, I find they are not sufficiently explicit on some points, and enclose you a form. The time of the first and subsequent deliveries is left blank, which, of course, you will fill up as may be required. I fix upon Tampa Bay as the place of delivery, from the belief that provisions will be required only at that point. If they should, in your opinion, be required elsewhere, you will add such places specifically, so as to avoid the possibility of dispute with the contractor, by leaving the place of delivery at large. Three months' supplies have been required at the first delivery, so that there may be one month's supply on hand to meet contingencies. At the subsequent deliveries, (except the last,) two months' provisions will be required, which will always leave one month's supply on hand when such subsequent delivery is made. It is believed that the daily rations cannot possibly exceed two thousand five hundred, particularly as you will issue only half rations to children. It is thought they will fall far below it; consequently, I have fixed one thousand two hundred and fifty as a minimum. Should you see cause to vary their numbers, you may alter either extreme. By advertising in New Orleans, Mobile, Milledgeville, and Charleston, as suggested, ample competition for the contract will be secured.

It is necessary to be very particular, in issuing the rations to the Indians, and taking an account of them, so as to procure the necessary vouchers for settlement with the proper accounting officer of the Government. A descriptive roll should be kept of the number of Indians who may receive rations, distinguishing them by tribes, and the number of men, women, and children in each tribe, to whom rations may issue. None will be entitled to rations who do not remove. This roll should be duly certified by the agent to be correct. There being no sub-agent, you are authorized to employ a person to assist the agent in making issues, whose salary will be at the rate of $500 per annum. In making the daily issues, the same forms in issuing and certifying should be observed by the agent as are used in the army. Any of the assistant commissaries will, if applied to, give you the necessary information for your guidance on this subject. The amount daily issued will be certified by the agent, and approved of by you, in consolidated quarterly returns.

It will not be necessary to purchase the implements of husbandry until the Indians have moved on the lands assigned them. As soon as this is done, the means for carrying into effect the treaty, in this respect, and for payment of the annuity for which it stipulates, will be placed at your disposal. Funds will also be placed at your disposal for the purchase of rations, as soon as you shall have transmitted to this Department an estimate of the probable amount that will be required for that purpose.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from Governor Duval to the Secretary of War, dated

TALLAHASSEE, July 22, 1824.

I have the honor to inform you that I have this day made a contract with Benjamin Chaires, Esq., of St. Augustine, to furnish one thousand rations to the Indians under the late treaty—six hundred rations daily at Tampa Bay, and four hundred daily on St. John's river, at or near the mouth of the Okelawaha; the ration to be furnished at eleven and a half cents. Governor Clarke was present, and several other gentlemen, who offered proposals, but none so favorable to the United States were offered as those proposed by Mr. Chaires. I know the securities that he offers to be ample. As to the few rations which must be furnished at St. Mark's for the Indians who will quit their present possessions, and go to their reserves which are now unimproved, (to wit: Neamathla and his connexions, and the chief Emathlochee, who is to remove to the Appalachicola,) I have contracted for these rations at ten and a half cents. Captain M. Crupper has taken the contract, and offers good security. I have no doubt that the utmost reliance may be placed on the gentlemen who have taken the contracts. As soon as the securities shall sign the bonds, copies shall be transmitted to you. I beg, sir, you will direct the sub-agent to report to me as early as possible. The agent and sub-agent must attend at Tampa Bay, to receive the rations from the contractors, and to give them vouchers. Unless they do attend at the several points of delivery, it will be impossible for me to know how much is furnished daily to the Indians. If one thousand rations are not sufficient, daily, by the contract, on giving thirty days' notice, I can demand one thousand five hundred rations daily, if I find they should be required. Neamathla has conducted himself very strangely for some time past; he has threatened strongly to take up arms. He will not come near; he has ordered off some of the settlers, and certainly has created no small alarm among the people. I have ordered a meeting of all the chiefs at St. Mark's on the 25th instant, and will, in addition to the troops at St. Mark's, have sixty or seventy of the militia at the talk. I must take some decisive step with this chief immediately, or he will become, perhaps, troublesome, if not dangerous. I shall act with prudence, but I shall do whatever may be necessary to give security to our inhabitants quickly.

I again assure you that I am fully convinced, unless a respectable force is ordered here by the last of September, or first of October next, that the Indians will not leave this country. As the troops are to work on the road in this region, it would be good policy to have them at Tallahassee by the last day of September next.

Extract of a letter from Governor William P. Duval to the Secretary of War, dated

POST ST. MARK'S, July 29, 1824.

I have had some difficulty with the Indians in this quarter. They did not make an attack on our citizens, but they were extremely insolent, and made many threats. Their chiefs had, in some instances, killed our cattle and hogs. They also had gone with their men to several of our settlers, and ordered them off; they threatened to drive the people out of the country, and to make war on me. In short, the whole of their conduct was such, that I saw immediate hostilities must ensue, if they did not receive a timely check. The military sent to this post, not being under my command, (as I think they should have been,) were of no use to me in stopping the Indians in their course. I determined at once to call out the few men that reside in this quarter. They came as volunteers to the new seat of Government, well armed. In the mean time, I called the chiefs and warriors of the Appalachicola, to meet me at Judge Robinson's, about thirty miles from their towns. They all promptly attended, and were ready to act as I might order. This sudden movement so surprised the Tallahassee and Mickasuky Indians, that they hurried to meet me, and promised to obey my orders and to respect my authority. The chiefs were greatly alarmed, and I think they will be more circumspect in future; but I have but little confidence in them. The next day I took the interpreter with me, and went to Neamathla's town. I found there about three hundred warriors, and I saw many of them armed. I immediately went into their square yard, (which is their forum,) and gave them a talk, and ordered them all to meet me on the 26th instant at St. Mark's; and assured them that their ruin and destruction was certain unless they obeyed my orders. On the day appointed, about six hundred Indians attended at this place, and I delivered to them a talk that made considerable impression on them. I then appointed John Hicks, their head chief, to lead them south, to their land; and I selected the eldest son of King Hijah as his chief counsellor: these appointments the warriors confirmed. These chiefs are men of sense, and will execute my orders. I hope now no further difficulty will shortly occur with these people.

I have directed the Indians to prepare to move, and to be on their land by the first day of October next; at which time they will receive their rations.

The want of funds has impeded my operations; but, from your last letter, I trust soon to be relieved from that difficulty. I cannot omit to impress on you the importance of having a respectable force in this quarter by the 15th of September next. The Indians are restless, and much dissatisfied with the treaty. If the Big Swamp, near the north line, were given up to them, it would completely satisfy them. The chiefs insist that they have sent men to examine the country, and that their report is, the good land within their present boundary is insufficient. This is, in fact, the only obstacle on the part of the Indians; and as there are Spanish grants (newly made, I have no doubt) that cover this swamp, perhaps it would be best to let them have it.

I can now venture to say that the expense of carrying the treaty into effect will not exceed my estimate transmitted to you, and I hope to make it even less. I have not heard a word from the agent since May last, or about the first of June. The whole trouble of attending to the Indians in this quarter, and of issuing their rations, has been performed by me; the agent is, no doubt, engaged in discharging his duties about Tampa Bay. I will repeat to you that it is important for the public interests that the sub-agent should report to me as early as possible. He will have to repair either to St. John's river or to Tampa Bay, to attend to the rations to be issued to the Indians.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, August 17, 1824.

SIR:

I have received your letters of the 12th ultimo, accompanied by an estimate of the expense of the rations to be furnished to the emigrant Indians in Florida, according to the late treaty. The estimate for the rations exceeds the appropriation; but the expense on that account must, by no means, be permitted to exceed the sum appropriated by Congress. I am decidedly of the impression that that sum will be found sufficient, as I cannot doubt, from all I can learn, that the estimate of the number of Indians in Florida is greatly exaggerated; and must believe that the meat and bread part of the ration will not cost twelve and a half cents, as you have estimated: a price exceeding the average rate of the complete ration throughout the United States. With those impressions, and the fact that children will receive but half rations, I cannot doubt but that the sum appropriated will be ample. I have, however, entire confidence in your judgment and zeal to serve the public, and that you will take such measures so to conduct the concentration of the Indians in Florida as will be most effectual and economical.

A requisition will issue, as requested by you, for ($13,500) thirteen thousand five hundred dollars; that is to say, six thousand dollars, as provided for by the third article of the treaty; five thousand dollars, as provided for by the third article; two thousand dollars, as provided for by the fifth article; and five hundred dollars, being a balance due under the sixth article. This sum will be placed to your credit in the Bank of New Orleans.

You state that you have paid to Neamathla five hundred dollars under the treaty. On inquiring of the agent, I understood from him, verbally, that the same amount had been expended by his direction to purchase cattle, at the request of this chief. I directed the agent to make a report of this case; which, however, he has neglected. I fear there will be some embarrassment in the disbursement, as the appropriation provides only for five hundred dollars, and it will be impossible that both of you can receive a credit. This subject ought to be immediately attended to.

I cannot believe that the Indians can be so infatuated as to make any decided objection to the removal, and that the hostile disposition which they now show is intended to produce some relaxation in the terms of the treaty; but, when they find the Government is resolved to carry its provisions into effect, they will acquiesce without trouble, particularly as they are eminently beneficial to the Indians. It will be impossible to augment the number of troops now in Florida, unless it should become necessary to apply force to a much greater extent than I now anticipate. The officer commanding at St. Mark's has received instructions to consult with you, and to act under your directions.

Your draft in favor of Colonel Nesbit, for one thousand dollars, has been paid. The accounts and estimates of the agent will be rendered through you, and will be specifically approved by you. Punctuality in their rendition will be required. You are authorized to appoint a sub-agent for one year, at five hundred dollars per annum, payable quarter-yearly; you will report his appointment to the Department for confirmation. It is believed the services of a sub-agent will not be required after the Indians shall have been concentrated on their reservation. The agent has rendered a statement of his accounts, by which it appears he has advanced, under your orders, on a contract made by you with Mr. Chaires, the sum of three thousand dollars. It is proper you should be apprized that, under existing laws, no advances should be made; and that neither yourself nor the agent can obtain payment for the sum advanced, till the cattle are delivered under the contract and received for.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To His Excellency WM. P. DUVAL, St. Mark's.No. 17.—Extract.

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, August 31, 1824.

I had the honor, on the 29th day of July last, to inform you of the difficulties which had arisen with the Indians in this Territory, and the measures I had taken to enforce their submission. I received your letter of the 17th ultimo, by express, last evening, from Pensacola; and you will find by my former letters, which must have reached you before this time, that I have closed the contracts for supplying the Indians on terms highly advantageous to the United States. I enclose to you a copy of the contract entered into with Benjamin Chaires, Esq., a gentleman of high standing and character, who has the means of certainly complying, and will, I am confident, fulfil his contract. Some disagreement existed between Mr. Chaires and myself at the time the contract was made; but I determined to make the contract as you see it, and to submit to you the circumstances fairly, so that you might, if you deem it just, make the change in his favor which he believes he is entitled to expect. The person who made the lowest proposals was General Clarke, of Georgia, who offered to furnish the ration at Tampa Bay and the St. John's river at fourteen cents. A Mr. Parham offered the following proposals, (see the enclosed copy.) These last proposals only extended to St. Mark's and Tampa Bay; the security was not sufficient, even if the terms had been lower. I also enclose you a copy of Mr. Chaires's proposal, so you may at once judge of his claim.

Mr. Chaires admits that, at Tampa Bay, he is bound to furnish the ration at eleven and a half cents, which was offered by Mr. Parham; but as his (Parham's) offer did not extend to St. John's river, Mr. Chaires contends he should be allowed fourteen cents for the ration at that point—that being the offer made by General Clarke, and the lowest of all the proposals for the whole nation. I told Mr. Chaires I could not, nor would not, enter into any but the contract as it is written, but would submit the point in dispute to you. To this he at length agreed. Mr. Chaires returned to St. Augustine the day after the contract was signed by him, in order to get the securities to sign also. I know them personally; they are ample. I learn that Mr. Chaires will be here in a few days. Since, I have reflected more on this subject; perhaps, in strict justice, he should be allowed fourteen cents for the rations issued on St. John's river; certain I am he would not have made a contract for less than fifteen cents per ration, but for the reasons he has assigned in his letter of proposals on this subject. I can do nothing, however, but submit the matter to you; and by your determination Mr. Chaires will abide. Captain M. Crupper contracted to deliver the rations at ten and a half cents which I might want at St. Mark's, until the removal of that portion of the Indians who will go south. There are two chiefs and their followers (Emathlochee and Neamathla) who will have to remove from their present residence to their reserves of lands: these chiefs and their followers will be justly entitled to rations, as they will have to commence new settlements entirely. I do not believe that there will be more than one hundred and twenty in this section of the Territory who will be entitled to draw rations, and they will be furnished at St. Mark's. The whole number of rations daily to be issued, I now believe, will not much exceed one thousand one hundred. The Indians in this quarter have some violent quarrels among themselves; and, lately, two towns fought with clubs and knives, and several of them are maimed and severely beaten. I have interposed my authority to prevent open and deadly war among them, and expect to make them settle their dispute, and abide by the opinion of their steady old chiefs. Between the settlers and the Indians I have been constantly engaged in preserving order, whenever my health would permit. The duties which I have performed, and the exposure to the hot sun and rain in a wilderness such as this, have seriously injured my constitution. I have, for several weeks, been wholly unable to quit my cabin, and much of the time confined to my bed. I mention this as my apology for not writing more fully to you on the subject of the contracts I have made.

Since my arrival at St. Mark's, I have continued to issue rations partially to the Indians. I purchased pork, flour, and salt, and had their rations issued under my own eye; but, finding that the little pork, flour, and salt which I had purchased for this purpose cost too much, I made an agreement with Captain M. Crupper to furnish, from time to time, the rations which I might want at twelve and a half cents, until the 1st day of August, when I expected to issue rations regularly to the Indians entitled to draw until their removal. This was done, also, under my own view, until the 1st of the present month, when the ration, by contract, was to be furnished at ten and a half cents; and they have been regularly issued at that price, under my inspection. The want of the services of the agent, or any one to assist me, has imposed heavy duties on me, and engrossed the whole of my time. The $6,000 which, by the treaty, was to be laid out in purchase of stock, cattle, &c., as well as the $1,000 for a gunsmith and his tools, $2,000 for transportation, and the $4,500 to be given for compensation for Indian improvements, will be wanted as early as possible; the $6,000 for the purchase of stock cattle is not a part of the annuity, as I understand the treaty. It will be time enough to remit the annuity some time hence.

I have the honor, &c.

WM. P. DUVAL.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

[Accompaniments of No. 17.]

SIR:

JULY 20, 1824.

In pursuance to your notification to receive proposals for furnishing the Florida Indians with rations for one year, I beg leave again to offer to contract for supplying them. I will furnish the entire rations, as required, of beef, corn or flour, and salt, for fifteen cents per ration; or, under the peculiar situation in which I am placed, (having, as I believed, obtained the contract from the Indian agent, and having, with his advice, made extensive purchases of provisions for the fulfilment of said supposed contract, which must inevitably perish on my hands, and considerable loss and injury be sustained by me,) should the contract now be refused me, under all these circumstances, I will further offer to furnish said rations as low, or for the same price which may be offered by any other person or persons, for each and all the component parts of said rations; or, should your excellency be of opinion that my situation entitles me to no preference, I will further offer to furnish the said rations for one-twentieth part of a cent less than any other person or persons who may offer, and who may offer good and sufficient security for the fulfilment of the contract.

From the observation which you made, of your intention to divide or sever the contract, permit me to say, that my proposal is intended only for Indians who are to be located in East Florida, or on the eastern side of the Suwanee river.

I heretofore offered as my securities John Bellamy, Edward R. Gibson, John Y. Garey, and Francis I. Ross, who were by the agent considered sufficient, and who are again offered; but should your excellency be of opinion that the abovenamed persons are not sufficient, you may rest assured that any other or further security will be given which may be by you required.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

BENJAMIN CHAIRES.

His Excellency WM. P. DUVAL,

Governor of Florida and Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

Know all men by these presents, that we, Benjamin Chaires, John Bellamy, Edward R. Gibson, John Y. Garey, and Francis I. Ross, all of St. John's and Duval counties, in the Territory of Florida, are held and firmly bound unto the United States of America in the penal sum of one hundred thousand dollars, which, well and truly to be paid to the United States of America, we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally; as witness our hands and seals, this 22d day of July, 1824.

The condition of the above obligation is such, that the said Benjamin Chaires has contracted to deliver to the Indian agent or sub-agent of the Florida Indians, or such other person as the Governor of Florida may appoint, six hundred rations, for the use of the Florida Indians, daily, at or near the military post at Tampa Bay, in the said Territory; each ration to be one pound and a quarter of fresh beef, or three-quarters of a pound of good salt pork, one quart of corn, or one pound of good flour, and one quart of salt for every hundred rations. And the said Chaires is also to select the most convenient high ground which can be travelled to from the interior of the country above, at, or near the mouth of Okelawaha river, a branch of the St. John's river, as the point where he will issue four hundred rations daily, or in such manner as the agent or person acting may consent to, under the direction of the Governor of Florida, (a ration to be composed of the proportions as before mentioned,) for the use of the emigrant Florida Indians in that quarter. The said Chaires, at either of the aforesaid points, is never to have less than thirty days' provisions on hand, nor more corn or flour than sixty days' rations, (except at his own risk.) The said Chaires is bound to put up such buildings as will secure the said provisions from the weather and depreciations, at each of the aforesaid points. The issues of the said rations may be increased in number to fifteen hundred per day, at the option of the superintendent, or on the order of the Secretary of War, by giving to the said Chaires thirty days' notice. The United States, on their part, by their agent, William P. Duval, bind themselves to pay to the said Chaires eleven and a half cents for each ration as aforesaid issued and delivered to the agent authorized to receive the same, provided no more rations are issued per day than are agreed for by this contract. And the agent is authorized to give to the said Chaires vouchers for all such rations.

The said Chaires shall commence the issue of the rations at Tampa Bay, and on the St. John's river, at the point aforesaid, from the 10th day of next October; the issues on the St. John's to continue one year, and those at Tampa Bay ten months, from the 10th day of next October, and no longer. William P. Duval, as the superintendent of Indian affairs, will, at the end of every sixty days, as the rations are issued, upon proper vouchers, pay to the said Chaires the amount that may be due to him for rations up to that time. But in the event of a failure on the part of the said Chaires to comply with this contract, either in the whole or in part, then, and in that case, the said Duval shall procure the rations on the best terms he can obtain them.

When these conditions are complied with, then this obligation is to be void; otherwise, it shall remain in full force and virtue.

BENJAMIN CHAIRES.

SIR:

FORT ST. MARK'S, July 18, 1824.

I will furnish and deliver, at this place and Tampa Bay, as many rations as you may require for the use of the Indians, at eleven and a half cents per ration. The ration to consist of fresh beef or salt pork, corn or flour, and salt.

I offer Jesse Bird and Martin Hardin for my security.

R. PARHAM.

No. 18.

From the Secretary of War to Governor Duval.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, September 11, 1824.

You have been informed, by my letter of the 17th ultimo, that a requisition for $13,500 had issued in your favor for the objects specified in your letter of the 12th July preceding. On examining your estimate for rations, of the same date, it was found to exceed the sum appropriated by Congress, $3,453. It was not possible, therefore, to make the remittances as requested by you, under that estimate. Moreover, if the estimates had not exceeded the appropriation, the regulations of the Department requiring that the remittances should be upon quarterly estimates, and no such estimates having been received, no remittances, for the want of the proper information, have been, because they could not (consistently with those regulations) be made. I have been waiting till now, in the expectation of receiving such estimates; which having not yet come to hand, and apprehending that inconvenience might result from any further delay, I have this day issued a requisition in your favor for $12,650 50; $5,000 payable at Charleston, and $7,650 50 at New Orleans.

No further remittances can be made but upon quarterly estimates furnished by you, agreeably to the regulations; and these it will be essential to keep within the sum appropriated by Congress.

Colonel Gadsden is appointed commissioner to value the property which may be abandoned by the Indians, under the fifth article of the treaty. His commission and letter of instructions are herewith enclosed.

I have the honor, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To His Excellency WM. P. DUVAL, Pensacola.

No. 19.

TALLAHASSEE, October 1, 1824.

SIR:

On yesterday I had the honor to receive your letter of the 17th of last August, and confess that some remarks in it surprised me greatly. In the first place, I assure you the agent did not pay one cent, either in money or cattle, to the chief Neamatla, although he informed me he had funds in his hands. (I believe he said you had authorized him to draw for $6,000.)

I did order the agent to pay this chief, and was much disappointed when I found, on my arrival here, that it had been neglected. You state, "The agent has rendered a statement of his accounts; by which it appears he has advanced, under your orders, on a contract made by you with Mr. Chaires, the sum of $3,000." There must be, surely, some great mistake in this matter; for I never made a contract with Mr. Chaires, (except for the rations, which was long since the agent left this part of the country, and on which I did not advance him a cent, or agree to do so;) nor have I ever heard from the agent that he paid the sum of $3,000 to Mr. Chaires, or that he had made any contract with him or any other person for the purchase of stock cattle. Long since the agent left this part of the country, I was informed, by a letter from Mr. Chaires, that he had made a contract with the agent (Colonel Humphreys) for stock cattle; but he never informed me that the agent had paid him one dollar in advance. Nothing more is known to me of the contract, nor has the agent made any report to me of the fact, although he wrote to me on the 26th July from St. Augustine. A copy of his letter I enclose to you. The agent has never, as I now recollect, presented any of his accounts to me for examination or approval. I have been always ready to attend to my duty in this respect. The agent received from me written instructions on the subject of receiving proposals, on the 23d of May last, for furnishing of the rations to the Indians, as well as on the subject of contracting for stock cattle. My instructions directed him only to receive proposals, and to transmit them to me; and if any of the proposals should be approved of by the proper authorities, the party would be duly informed, &c.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter from the agent, dated St. Mark's, 1st June, 1824; and, also, a copy of a letter dated Tallahassee, 31st May, 1824, from Mr. Chaires to the agent. Mr. Chaires's proposals I would not accept at eighteen and one-quarter cents, as I informed you. I also enclose to you an extract of that part of my instructions to the agent on the subject of purchasing stock cattle. My reason for allowing the agent, at his discretion, (if it was necessary to do so,) to advance $3,000 for the stock cattle, was, that few men could purchase and incur the expense of driving a large herd of cattle so far into the interior; and those who had the means to make, would not, perhaps, engage in the contract. It is very important to act promptly with the Indians, in paying up what they claim under the treaty, without delay. The very circumstance of the Indians learning that their agent was purchasing stock cattle for them, to be driven within their boundary, would induce many of them to remove cheerfully, who at the time were much dissatisfied. Besides, I was confident, if the contract was made for cows and calves in the spring, to be delivered this fall, that a very considerable advantage would accrue to the Indians, as the cattle would be growing for six or seven months at the risk and expense of the contractor. Under this view, I gave the instruction just in the words written, which is all that was given on this part of the subject. If the five chiefs had gone with the agent to Washington, and which I desired, it would have answered a good purpose. You well know that, during the absence of the chiefs, the Indians would not have acted the least improper; the chiefs would be, by the nation, considered as hostages in our hands for their good behavior—until their return, at least. Hence I wished the leading chiefs to visit you. It would have allowed me time to make, in peace and quietness, all my contracts for their removal, and at the same time you would have made an impression on the chiefs that would have confirmed them forever as our decided friends; but as the chiefs failed to go, and as the Indians were ready to take up arms, the agent should never have left the Territory without permission, under such circumstances.

I believe you will be perfectly satisfied with my arrangement and economy in executing the treaty; and whatever I do shall be performed with a single eye to the public interest.

I am, respectfully, &c.

WM. P. DUVAL.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

[Accompaniment to No. 19.]

An extract from the written instructions delivered by the Governor of Florida, on the 16th of May, 1824, to Colonel G. Humphreys, Indian Agent of the Territory of Florida.

If you find it necessary, to enable the person whom you may contract with to furnish the stock cattle to the Indians, according to the late treaty, you may advance to him such sum as you may have at your disposal, (not exceeding $3,000,) on his giving bond and ample security for the faithful performance of his contract.

[Accompaniment to No. 19.]

Colonel G. Humphreys to His Excellency William P. Duval, Governor of Florida, &c. dated

DEAR SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 26, 1824.

After waiting at Tampa Bay until the 17th instant for an answer to my application to you for a short leave of absence, without receiving one, I was led to the conclusion that your messenger had failed on the way; and believing your letter, if received, would favor my wishes; and believing, also, that the indulgence (although, in some degree, conditional) contained in your letter of instructions of the 16th of May, might, in the exigency of my case, be embraced without impropriety or injury to the public service, I am induced to proceed, without further delay, to the north; where, by recent letters, I learn that my presence is much required in a business matter of considerable importance to me. I shall, however, go by the way of Washington city, and be governed by such information or instructions as I may there receive from the Secretary of War. I have not now time to make a detailed report of my tour into the Indian country from the bay. I can only say, that the land, throughout where I visited, is wretchedly bad; and, in my opinion, cannot long sustain the Indians, should any considerable number come from the west.

I am truly sorry to differ so widely in opinion from Colonel Gadsden, for whom I have the highest respect; but I conceive, to withhold the expression of my sentiments on this subject (although they are unasked) would be to fail in my official obligations, and might possibly hereafter subject me to unmerited censure. I am further urged to the avowal from an interview I had a few days since with Miconopy, Jumper, and other chiefs, near Okihumky. It seems evident that that article in the treaty providing for an extension of the northern boundary will be insisted upon by the Indians; and I feel 't a duty to state, a failure in this particular on the part of the Government will produce much dissatisfaction among them, and may lead to serious difficulty. It is due to the Indians, however, to say, that, as far as can be ascertained, they are perfectly pacific in disposition, and appear to place great reliance on the justice and fidelity of the United States.*

I cannot close this letter without doing an act of justice to Colonel Gadsden, in declaring my belief that the story told me by Neamathla, of the colonel having advised him against the journey to Washington, is destitute of foundation in truth, and that it is a tale fabricated by the old man to justify his own discrepancy; this I judge, from discovering on the subject a sort of concert between him and the chiefs south. This is evident, though each avows ignorance of the other's sentiments, and says he cannot act in the case without a meeting; thus clearly manifesting a wish to avoid the measure. But whether this proceeds from aversion to extend their acquaintance with the whites, or a fear of being entrapped, (as has been intimated to me,) I am unable to say; the latter is very possible, as they have still fresh in recollection the treachery practised on their nation, on a somewhat similar occasion, by the Spanish Government, at St. Augustine; and they are not thoroughly capable of making a proper distinction between that Government and the one under which they now live. I will write again from Washington.

I am, with the highest respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

G. HUMPHREYS, Indian Agent.

His Excellency WILLIAM P. DUVAL, Governor, &c. of Florida.

[Accompaniment to No. 19.]

From G. Humphreys to Governor Duval.

SIR:

ST. MARK'S, June 1, 1824.

Enclosed, herewith, I have the honor to transmit to you all the proposals made for supplying the Indians, according to the treaty, with beef, flour, corn, and salt.

Those of Major B. Chaires, of St. Augustine, taking into view the amplexness of his security, in connexion with the lowness of the price at which he offers to furnish the supplies, I could not hesitate to consider "the best," and have, therefore, under your instructions of the 16th ultimo, advised him that his proposal for the entire ration will be accepted, should this mode of supplying be approved by the proper authority. Accompanying this, you will receive a copy of his letter in reply. The proposal of Mr. Robert Mitchell, of Pensacola, for the salt and flour part of the ration, would have been accepted as the lowest, had it not been saddled with provisos and conditions foreign to my advertisement, and had the requisites of that advertisement, in relation to security, (which Mr. Mitchell was well aware of,) been complied with. As it is, however, whatever confidence I might have in his declaration of ability to guaranty the performance of an engagement of such magnitude, I could not feel myself authorized or warranted to jeopardize the interests of the country, or the comfort of the Indians, by leaving the supplying of provisions to depend upon a contingency so precarious and unpromising, particularly as an opportunity presented to place the contract for the whole ration upon terms which appear highly advantageous to the Government, in the hands of an individual whose responsibility and qualifications are unquestionable and without exception.

With respect, &c.

G. HUMPHREYS, Agent for Indian Affairs.

His Excellency W. P. DUVAL, Governor of Florida.

I have never had an opportunity of writing or communicating with Colonel Humphreys since the date of this letter.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

[Accompanying No. 19.]

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, May 31, 1824.

I have just received your note, informing me that my proposal for furnishing the entire ration for the Indians was the lowest, and accepted.

I presume neither the Governor nor yourself will doubt that my best exertions will be used to comply fully with the contract. Permit me to remark, however, that this contract, in the way which it has to be filled, is unwieldy, and no time ought to be lost. I hope the Governor will say, as soon as convenient, to whom the bond shall be given for the fulfilment of it; until that is done, and the contract formally entered into, it will be hazardous for me to purchase cattle, which must be brought from Georgia, or to make the necessary arrangement for the purchase and shipping of corn and salt. I shall, nevertheless, risk the consequences, and commence making the arrangements necessary to be made, and continue so doing until advised to the contrary.

Houses for the reception of the corn and salt must be prepared, which, I presume, will be done under your direction, at the expense of the United States. You will oblige me by stating whether my impressions are correct or not on that point. Should that be considered my duty, please let me know where they must be fixed.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

BENJAMIN CHAIRES.

Col. GAD HUMPHREYS, Agent Florida Indians.

No. 20.

Extract of a letter from His Excellency W. P. Duval, Governor of Florida, to the Honorable J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, dated

TALLAHASSEE, October 2, 1824.

The object of this letter is to explain to you my objects and views in relation to the removal of the Indians, as well as the reasons for their immediate payment, under the treaty, of such sums as can be paid with justice and propriety before their removal. You have long since been apprized that the Seminoles were very much dissatisfied with the treaty. I therefore deem it prudent, before their removal, to pay them for their improvements according to the treaty, valued as you have directed. I intend to call the Indians to St. Mark's, and to pay them, and furnish as many rations at that point as will serve them on their march to the country assigned them. I have held out, as an inducement for the Indians to go in canoes by water, and thus provide for their own transportation, a certain sum of from five to ten dollars for each canoe they should make for this purpose, which should be paid by me to the individuals who made them, after the acting sub-agent should see these canoes, and report the size and number of them to me. I expect perhaps forty or fifty canoes will be ready in three weeks. I find it very difficult to purchase a horse of any kind here; and, as some must be had, I shall send a man to procure a few in Georgia. The stock cattle intended for the Indians south, will be driven there as soon as I can ascertain any contract has been made for them. The gunsmith (who should also be a blacksmith) I will procure, if the agent does not. The ploughs, hoes, axes, &c. will be sent to Tampa Bay, as soon after the removal of the Indians as a vessel can be had to transport them from Pensacola, where these articles have just arrived according to my order. The Appalachian Indians, being stationary, ought to have their part of the $6,000 paid to them immediately, and, also, their share of the annuity. I have, therefore, made engagements to have them furnished with cattle and some sheep, as many of them now spin, and several of them weave; and also ploughs, &c., amounting to $800, which was the sum allowed to them out of the $6,000, and was much less than it should have been. Of the annuity, the Appalachian Indians should be allowed $1,500 per year; for, on the reserves, there are 249 men, besides their women and children, and they are at least one-fourth of the whole population. Besides, these people will receive no benefit from the school, or the gun and blacksmith. I hope, therefore, as the power is with the President to say what proportion of annuity shall be given to them, that the facts above stated will have their due weight.

You will see by the contract which I made with Mr. Chaires for the delivery of the rations, that he was to issue only for ten months at Tampa Bay: my reason for this was, that, by furnishing the Indians in this quarter with rations, it would induce them to sell out their crops, and add to the inducements for them to remove; besides, the ration is furnished by Captain Crupper one cent cheaper than those furnished by Mr. Chaires.

This step, I feel confident, was as judicious as prudent, and I daily see the effects anticipated. I have not, as yet, paid Captain Crupper, who has furnished all the rations at St. Mark's up to this time, one cent. On referring to your letter of the 20th of last April, you acknowledge the receipt of my letter of the 25th March, enclosing the estimate of expenses on account of Indian affairs under my superintendency, for the first two quarters of the present year, which you say is admitted.

I have sent to New Orleans for the money mentioned in your last letter, intended for the objects mentioned therein, and amounting altogether to $13,500. This was absolutely necessary, as paper money will not be received by the Indians, and the silver could not be had short of New Orleans. The moment I receive the specie, it shall be paid over to the Indians, and they forthwith shall march to their future residence. This will be about the last of this month. You may rest perfectly satisfied that the appropriation, under no state of things, shall be exceeded; but every attention shall be given to the reduction of the expenses, consistent with justice and good faith to the Indians.

From the Secretary of War to Governor Duval.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 8, 1824.

I have received your letter from Tallahassee of the 31st of August last.

It would have been better if Mr. Chaires, the contractor, and yourself, had agreed definitively upon the price of the ration, instead of referring it to the decision of the Department. You have, however, so unequivocally expressed your recommendation that an increase upon the delivery at St. John's river, to fourteen cents, be allowed; and the offer by General Clarke being for that price, and no person having offered for less, I have concluded to approve of your recommendation to allow fourteen cents the ration, for the number which may be delivered under the contract at St. John's, deducting the one-twentieth part of a cent, according to Mr. Chaires's own offer. The delivery at Tampa Bay and St. Mark's will be at the contract price, to wit, eleven and a half cents per ration. You will forward to the Department the original contract, certifying to the solvency of the securities, and retaining for yourself a copy.

I received two letters from you, each dated the 12th July. In one, you say "you will appoint a disinterested and suitable person to ascertain the value of the improvements that may be abandoned by the Indians, &c.;" in the other, you "should be much pleased if Colonel Gadsden would value the improvements under the treaty. He could do better than any one I can obtain, and would give more satisfaction to the Indians, &c." On this recommendation, I accordingly appointed Colonel Gadsden, as per letter of instructions and commission forwarded to him through you, as per my letter bearing date the 11th ultimo.

I have no objection, however, to your appointment of Mr. Bellamy, provided you can make the proper arrangements with Colonel Gadsden; in which case, the allowance to Mr. Bellamy will be the same as that proposed to be made to Colonel Gadsden. Your instructions under your letter of appointment are approved.

I have issued requisitions in your favor, under the several heads of appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with the Florida Indians, for $26,105 50; $12,604 50 of which being on account of the expense of rations. On the receipt of your quarterly estimates, further remittance will be made, according to the information conveyed in my letter of the 11th ultimo. The remittance for Indian improvements will be made when the report of the commissioner is received and approved.

All remittances on account of the Indian Department are required to be made on estimates of the superintendent. You will attend to this in future.

I have issued my requisition in your favor, on account of expenses of your superintendency, for $2,000, to be accounted for in your returns.

I have the honor, &c.

To His Excellency WILLIAM P. DUVAL, Tallahassee.

J. C. CALHOUN.

No. 22.

Extract of a letter from Governor William P. Duval to the Secretary of War, dated at

TALLAHASSEE, October 26, 1824.

The requisition for $13,500, mentioned in your letter of [11th ultimo,] and the draft for the same on the Branch Bank of the United States at New Orleans, were received, and duly acknowledged.

I had long since applied to Colonel James Gadsden to value the Indian improvements; but the death of his venerable father, and his private affairs, induced him to decline acting. I therefore appointed John Bellamy, Esq., a gentleman of known reputation and standing, who has performed this disagreeable duty. The difficulty of reconciling the Indians to the late treaty, and to restrain them from outrage, has not been inconsiderable; but to persuade and threaten them into a peaceable removal from this truly delightful country required the exercise of uncommon patience, time, and prudence. I now believe, confidently, they will go without force, but evidently with reluctance. I hesitate not to aver that, even now, were I to leave this country, not one would move. When it is recollected that the Florida Indians never were controlled until the United States took possession of this country, and that, even since, they have not, for the greater part of the time, had either an agent or sub-agent with them to inform and reduce them to order, it must be obvious that my duties have been as arduous as they are unpleasant. Many of the Indians speak of joining the Creek nation; and my opinion is, that several hundred will go north. I have not dissuaded them from this step, or encouraged them to leave the Territory. That portion of the annuity which is to be distributed among the Indians who are to remove south, to the lands allotted to them under the treaty, will not be given to them until their removal. This will be an inducement to hasten their march, as they are informed by me that, until they are located, no such distribution will be made.

I consider it would, however, be just and proper to pay them for their improvements on the eve of their departure. These people are extremely poor—more so than any Indians in all the southern country. The money distributed to them for their improvements will furnish them with blankets, and such things as will render them comfortable, in some degree, on their march, and will give them a stronger desire to share the annuity. I have, therefore, sent to New Orleans for the specie, to meet this object, and to provide them transportation, (for they will not receive any paper money,) and it is expected in eight or ten days.

In my letter of the 2d day of October last, the reasons were assigned for my not contracting for the delivery of rations at Tampa Bay for a longer period than ten months. The Indians, by receiving rations at St. Mark's, have been induced to sell their crops, and, whenever the issues are stopped, they will be compelled to remove.

The commission and instructions to Colonel Gadsden are received, as well as the drafts for $12,650 50; $5,000 payable at Charleston, and $7,650 50 at New Orleans.

The certified returns of the rations that have been, and will be, delivered at St. Mark's, will, as soon as the final meeting with the Indians is over, be transmitted to you.

I have, according to the power given to me by your letter of the 17th day of August last, appointed Owen Marsh, Esq. acting sub-agent for one year, from the 1st day of September last; and he immediately entered on the duties of his office, and has continued to act much to my satisfaction.

I have but lately returned from the Appalachicola river, where I was compelled to attend to receive some stock, cattle, and sheep, for the Indians residing there; and on the 10th of November next the residue of the stock will be delivered to them: for all that I contracted for were not delivered on the 15th of this month, as I had expected.

These Indians are more civilized than any others in Florida. The sheep were purchased at their own solicitation, in lieu of hogs, of which they have large stocks. The houses and fields of these people are equal to the best of the improvements among the white people in this section of Florida.

While writing this letter, I received one from Colonel Gadsden, in which he informs me that he has resigned his seat in our council, and would not be in this quarter shortly, as he intended to complete the survey of the land allotted south to the Indians. I therefore took the liberty of opening your letters of instruction to him, relating to the valuation of the Indian improvements, and find that my instructions to Mr. Bellamy differed from yours so far only as the naming of the individuals that are to receive compensation. I directed the valuation to be made of each town. I was influenced in giving this direction, by knowing that many of the southern Indians have no name. The chiefs are named, but common men, generally, must perform some serviceable act before they receive any name. It is, with them, a mark of honor: hence it will be impossible, in many instances, to obtain the name of the Indians.

I intend to pay them off by towns, and will require each chief of a town to sign the receipt for the money paid to the Indians of his town for improvements: this is the only way that this business can be satisfactorily performed. After the number of houses and the improvements are ascertained and valued, the chiefs can then point out the men who are entitled to compensation, so that he cannot impose on me more than the number I have had valued; and it will be to his interest to give satisfaction to those men who are alone entitled to compensation, by personally calling them up before all the town to receive payment.

From Governor Duval to the Secretary of War.

TALLAHASSEE, November 2, 1824.

I have been obliged to hire an express to carry some instructions to St. Augustine and Hamley's old store relative to the issue of rations on the St. John's river to the Indians, and send by the same conveyance my several communications herewith enclosed. Not having received any report from the agent of his return to Florida, and understanding that he is confined in New York by ill health, I have appointed Samuel Garey, Esq., of St. Augustine, to attend at Hamley's old store, on St. John's river, to the issue of rations to the emigrant Indians who may be most convenient to that point. I send you a copy of my letter and instructions to Mr. Garey. I hope in a few days to have all the Indians on their march south, who intend to go in that quarter.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of War.

[Accompanying No. 23.]

From Governor Duval to Samuel Garey.

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, November 2, 1824.

Having understood that the agent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Florida is confined by sickness in the State of New York, and it being uncertain when the state of his health will permit him to return, I have therefore determined to obtain your services to superintend the issue of rations at Hamley's old store, on the St. John's river. I enclose to you an extract of a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, to which I beg leave to call your particular attention.

You will be able to procure the forms mentioned in his letter by application to the proper officer now stationed at St. Augustine, and the utmost exactness and attention in making out your returns will be required. In addition, I also transmit you instructions intended for your government in the discharge of your duties, as also for the acting sub-agent at Tampa Bay; and it will be proper for you to communicate with him frequently, which you may, no doubt, readily do through Mr. Chaires, who will be often passing between the two places.

Your compensation is not fixed; and all I can say at present on the subject is, that no doubt is entertained but that the Secretary of War will allow you what is reasonable. He will be immediately made acquainted with your appointment. I hope that nothing on your part will be wanting to give satisfaction to the War Department and to the Indians concerned.

I am, respectfully, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

SAMUEL GAREY, Esq.

If you accept, and will discharge the duties required, you must not lose a day in repairing to your station on the St. John's river, at Hamley's old store.

W. P. D.

[Accompanying No. 23.]

Instructions to regulate the issues of rations at Tampa Bay and Hamley's old store, on the St. John's river.

1st. You are to issue no rations to any but to emigrant Indians, and those only who have removed and continue to reside within their boundary. Children are to have only half rations.

2d. According to the instructions herewith enclosed to you from the Secretary of War, you will keep a regular roll of all the emigrant Indians, according to the form used in the army, which you will certify once in two months, and deliver them over to Mr. Chaires, taking care to keep duplicate copies, (at least two,) which at different times you will transmit to me, or the acting Governor in my absence. The utmost care must be taken to prevent any Indian from drawing more than his rations, and never issue but to those who are present, unless the chief of the town himself attends; in that case, you will then issue for the number of his town. But, in all cases, you must first ascertain the number of each town or tribe; and you will direct them all to attend at once, so that you may count them yourself, and prevent fraud or imposition. You are, under no pretence whatever, to issue more than four hundred rations daily at Hamley's old store, on the St. John's river, and six hundred rations daily at Tampa Bay. At the first place, the rations will issue for twelve months from the 10th day of October last. At Tampa Bay, the rations will issue on the same day, but continue only ten months.

3d. If less rations should daily issue at either place than are contracted for, and more should be required at the other, the supernumerary Indians at one point should be sent to draw rations at the other. After understanding what number draw rations, if in the whole they exceed 1,000, I must be informed as early as practicable of the number who are justly entitled to draw.

4th. As the rations have been due at both points since the 10th of October, 1824, the back rations will supply all the Indians who may be entitled to draw for a considerable time, even if there should be 1,500.

It will be prudent not to issue all the back rations until you can ascertain the whole number who claim rations at each point of deposite; and, according to circumstances, you will act as may seem best in the distribution of these back rations.

5th. Whenever you ascertain the whole number of any town or tribe entitled to draw rations, you will issue to the town so much beef, on foot, as they will receive of their rations, not exceeding sixty days, if they will take it; and as much salt, and corn, or flour; but the Indians must not be forced to receive more of either at one time than they are willing to take, and never more than sixty days' rations must be issued at any one time, and no more should then be issued until the expiration of the sixty days.

These people are so careless and improvident, that it will be improper to make any issues for more than sixty days, and none must be allowed for a longer period.

In order to ascertain the weight of the beef, you will kill one of the smallest and one of the largest, and take the average weight.

It will not answer to keep the Indians on the ground to draw their rations daily; for they would, in that event, make no fields, and their idle habits would be too much encouraged and confirmed.

With the contractor, Mr. Chaires, you may make any arrangement as to the issues, not inconsistent with these instructions or his contract; and if, by experience, any change for the mutual benefit of all parties can be made, you will, from time to time, inform me or the agent, Colonel Humphreys, so that he may in his discretion act as he may think prudent.

You are not to permit any spirituous liquors to be sold at the place where the rations are issued; and it will be considered as a part of your duty strictly to guard against the sale of liquors to the Indians in your vicinity, and, where the law is violated, to inform the agent of the facts.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 3, 1824.

Your two letters of the 1st and 2d of October last, together with an extract from yours of the 16th May to Colonel Humphreys, the agent, authorizing him, in his discretion, to contract for stock cattle, and to advance, if necessary, on account thereof, a sum not exceeding $3,000, together with copies of correspondence between you and Colonel Humphreys and Major Chaires, are received.

I am satisfied that, in authorizing Colonel Humphreys to make the advance above referred to, you consulted the public interests; and I would have no hesitation in approving it, were it not that the act of Congress, approved 31st January, 1823, provides that "no advance of public money shall be made in any case whatever," which puts it wholly out of my power to sanction it. The adjustment of this advance, therefore, will be an affair between yourself and the agent, in which I take for granted there will be no difficulty. You will receive a credit for it when your accounts show that the cattle for which this sum was paid have been delivered. I have directed the agent to report himself forthwith to you.

Confiding in your discretion, and in compliance with your request, I have issued a requisition in your favor for $4,500, the amount appropriated to pay for the improvements which the Indians may abandon. You will be particular in its application, upon the returns of the commissioner appointed to value the improvements.

Your plan of providing canoes for the transportation of the Indians appears judicious. It is, no doubt, more convenient than would be the cost of horses. It is approved.

You will apportion the annuity among the Indians according to their numbers, giving to the Appalachicolas whatever may, upon this basis, fall to their share.

Since the remittance of the 17th August of $13,500, I have issued a requisition, on the 11th September, for $12,605 50, of which you were informed, and which has, I presume, been transmitted by the Treasurer: thus anticipating your demand for funds for the expenses of the Indian Department, and for other purposes.

I have this moment received your letters of 26th October and 2d of November, together with the estimates for rations for the first and second quarters. Your appointment of Mr. Bellamy to value the property, and that of Mr. Garey to issue the rations in the absence of the agent, are approved; and you will pay Mr. Garey at the rate of $500 per annum (the salary of a sub-agent) during the time for which he may be employed, and enter it as an item in the expense of issuing the rations.

Your report of your proceedings, so far, is satisfactory.

I am, &c.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

I have the honor to inform you that a requisition was issued in your favor on the 3d instant for $7,000, which, it is presumed, has been remitted to you from the Treasury.

Of this sum, $5,000 is to be applied to the payment of the annuity to the Florida Indians, and $2,000 to carry into effect the provision of the treaty relative to a school and a gunsmith for the present year.

The press of business in the office has prevented you from being earlier apprized of the remittance.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 11, 1825.

I have the honor to lay before you a letter from Benjamin Chaires, Esq., a gentleman of reputation and intelligence, residing in Florida, describing the country laid off for the concentration of the Florida Indians. I feel considerable interest for these unfortunate people; and, from the best information that I can obtain, I do believe they have not good land sufficient to support them. I hope the President will alter the northern line of the Indian boundary, so far as to give them the Big Swamp, near which the present line passes. This alteration will give entire satisfaction to the Indians, and justice and humanity require they should possess it.

I have informed the chiefs that they might repose with confidence on the justice of the Government. It was this assurance that reconciled them to the treaty.

TALLAHASSEE, January 13, 1825.

Having been called on to state my views of the country laid out for the future residence of the Florida Indians, I can only say that my knowledge of the country from observation is limited, having only travelled through it two or three times; but, sir, so far as I have seen it, it is the poorest part of Florida, and a large portion of it generally inundated. There are interspersed through the country small light sandy hammocks, which will bear cultivation a few years; but I know of no one spot of good land sufficiently large for one of the several tribes or towns of Indians. My opinion is therefore clear that the said Indians cannot possibly subsist on their present location, and that an extension of the line so far as to include the Big Swamp, (which is a hammock, containing about five or six thousand acres of pretty good land,) ought to be granted to them, which is all that is asked by them, so far as I have heard.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, a copy of the President's approval of the extension of the northern boundary line, as defined in the Florida treaty, and as recommended by you. You can now direct Colonel Humphreys, the agent, in regard to a selection of a location for his agency, about which it appears (owing to a want of a salubrious spot within the hitherto ceded limits) he found some difficulty.

SIR:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, TERRITORY OF FLORIDA, TALLAHASSEE, May 26, 1825.

I regret to be compelled to report that a murder has been committed by a Seminole Indian on the person of a Mr. Swearingen, and that, owing to causes beyond my control as superintendent, some depredations have been committed by the Indians on the property of the whites residing in their immediate vicinity. No time was lost in calling the attention of the agent to the subject, and requiring the aid of the military force at Tampa Bay; which measures, I trust, will put a speedy end to these irregularities, and restore tranquillity to the settlements on the Indian boundary. I am by no means of the opinion that these depredations, or even the murder, have been committed with the remotest idea of settled hostilities, but that they have arisen from causes inseparable from the difficulty which must always be met with in transferring a nation of Indians from one location to another, especially when such change is more one of necessity than of choice, and that, too, leaving a country highly desirable, from its situation, for lands where they have ever declared they could not live. There are no people more attached to their native soil than Indians, or who are more averse to emigration, even under the most favorable and advantageous circumstances for them. These causes have operated so forcibly, that one hundred and twenty Indians are yet reported to be west of the Suwanee river.

It has now become indispensably necessary to request your attention to the subject of subsisting these Indians; for, unless some provision be speedily made for that object, they must inevitably be plunged into the most deplorable condition, both from their new location and their well known improvident character. In a state of starvation, they will be driven to commit acts of depredation highly injurious to the interests of the Territory, which ought to be provided against by all means in our power; besides, humanity, as well as a sense of justice, dictates that their women and children should not be left to perish. The issues on the St. John's, in Tampa Bay, and on the Appalachicola, (including the Indians not yet within their boundaries,) have been, hitherto, 1,800 rations per day. Having positive instructions not to exceed the appropriation, on any account whatever, I have been compelled to restrict the issues in future at St. John's and Tampa Bay to 1,000 rations, and on the Appalachicola to 150 rations per day, affording to the emigrant Indians, for the rest of the year specified in the treaty and the contract, not quite half rations; which, however, will be somewhat augmented in quantity by the distribution of the back rations on hand at the St. John's, for October and November, agreeably to my orders. I have, however, directed that no more back rations be given to Indians coming within the limits, but that they shall receive rations from the time they arrive, up to the date the contract terminates; although I believe that they are justly entitled to their year's subsistence, let them apply when they may. I am perfectly aware of the difficulties and distress which must ensue upon this order; but I am constrained to this course from the knowledge that even these issues will exhaust the appropriation. The issues on the St. John's cease on the 10th October; at Tampa Bay, on the 10th August; and on the Appalachicola river, on the 30th June: after which dates the emigrant Indians have no possible means of obtaining subsistence but through the bounty of the United States, until the crops come in. But even that resource must fail these Indians, as they cannot have, as yet, cleared and planted new land; consequently, they will be equally dependant for the next year's support as they are during the present. I request that you will be pleased to take this subject into consideration, in all its bearings, and instruct me as to the course proper to be adopted. I will, however, take the liberty to suggest (if it can be done) that funds be placed in my hands, with authority to cause to be furnished, from time to time, at convenient places, such supplies of provisions as are found to be necessary, after the contract now in existence shall have been completed. I suggest this mode, because the contractor or agent will be more immediately under my control, and the issues will be confined to the quantity absolutely necessary. I have found, by experience, that the contract system for issuing regular rations to Indians cannot be relied on, and is productive of great inconvenience to them. It has been thus far attended with continual causes of dissatisfaction and complaint.

The orders in relation to runaway negro slaves residing in the nation, the order for the extension of the Indian boundary line, and the order in relation to persons selling spirituous liquors to Indians, have been attended to. Receipts for the funds transmitted to me have been regularly forwarded. My accounts and vouchers for disbursements in the Indian Department will be duly forwarded on the 30th June, by which date there will be a balance on hand equal to the payment of the debts which will then be due.

I enclose, herewith, documents numbered from 1 to 11, to which I beg leave to refer you, as being connected with the discharge of my duty as superintendent, and the subjects spoken of in this communication.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE WALTON.

Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS FOR FLORIDA,

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, February 24, 1825.

It has been reported to me that the emigrating Indians are still in Alachua, and at the Natural Bridge of St. Fe, committing depredations upon the property of the citizens. There are some of them located upon the east side of the Ansilta. You will forthwith send out runners, and take other measures to have them assembled within their proper territorial limits, from whence they must not be allowed to roam through the country at pleasure, giving constant cause of dissatisfaction and complaint. It is expected that every party of Indians leaving their towns to enter the territory of the white inhabitants will have a written pass or order from you or the sub-agent.

The Indians themselves complain that they are put to great inconvenience by reason of the distance they are compelled to go after their rations on the St. John's river, inasmuch that it is almost impossible for them to obtain them. When the contract was entered into, it was believed that a proper point had been designated for the delivery of these rations. You are required to give immediate attention, personally, to this subject; and, if the rations be not delivered according to the contract, notify the contractor forthwith that none will be received, excepting at the proper places, for which he will be held strictly responsible on his bond. Touching these matters, you will make special reports to me in writing as soon as possible, addressed to me at this place.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE WALTON.

Colonel G. HUMPHREYS,
Agent of Indian Affairs for Florida.

SIR:

FLORIDA AGENCY, April 6, 1825.

I regret to be obliged to report that a murder in the neighborhood of Hamley's old store, on St. John's, has recently been committed upon a white man by an Indian living near the Okelawaha river. The cause which led to the outrage, or whether there was any provocation, I have not yet learned, though there is much reason to believe that the deed was wanton and unprovoked. On being informed of the offence, I sent for some of the principal chiefs, who promptly attended, and declared their unqualified disapprobation of the act. Indeed, so exasperated were they by it, particularly the emigrants who have settled on the Big Swamp, that much difficulty was experienced in restraining them, and preventing the infliction of summary justice, according to the Indian mode. But as the murderer is of the Seminole tribe, between which and the tribes from the west there unfortunately does not appear to exist a perfect cordiality, I deemed it advisable, in order to harmonize, and check, if possible, an increase of unkindly feelings, to stop proceedings in the matter, until measures could be entered into to bring the different tribes to act in concert. The occasion (though a melancholy one) seemed favorable for commencing a union among them, so essential to their welfare and the interest of the United States; and I accordingly detained some of the headmen from the west, and sent for Miconopy and Jumper, who were understood to be absent in the first instance, but who, it was said, had now returned from the hunting grounds. Jumper was still out, and Miconopy confined to his lodge by severe sickness; of course, neither attended. Under these circumstances, I concluded to send Tuskehenaha (whom you know) to Miconopy, to ascertain his sentiments in relation to the murder, and whether he was disposed to join in bringing the perpetrator to justice. His conduct upon the occasion (as reported to me by Tuskehenaha) was correct, and such as I had a right to expect. He said the murderer deserved death by their own laws; and, although he was unable to go himself to aid in carrying the law into execution, he should give his voice in favor of immediate punishment, and would sanction whatever the other chiefs thought it right to do. And it was resolved by the chiefs that the offender should expiate his offence by death; and a party, headed by Tuskehenaha, proceeded to enforce the sentence. At the request of the Indians, I sent a young man named Breeton (who has been some time employed by me to herd the public cattle) as a witness; they desired this, (they said,) in order to satisfy the whites, some of whom might otherwise doubt them. I strongly urged that the murderer should be given up, to be tried by the laws of the white people; but to this the Indians as strongly objected, as being contrary to their custom: they never attempted to take a murderer alive; it would be attended with danger, and might cause the death of one or more of their party; and, on the whole, although I should have been willing to see them pursue a course more in consonance with the received notions of civilization, yet I could not believe it to be a point of sufficient importance to authorize me to press it, at the risk of a total failure of justice. I therefore told them to pursue their own method. The party went, but did not entirely succeed, though there is reason to believe the object in view was in part effected; the fugitive was seen and fired on, but succeeded in reaching a deep swamp, wounded, as was evident from the blood found where he ran. I was yesterday informed, likewise, that all search of the friends of the fugitive (which has been constant since the day he was fired on) has proved unavailing; and the conjecture is, that, in attempting to swim the Okelawaha, (which is now very full,) in his wounded condition, he has been drowned; and such is probably the fact. I have conceived it a duty to be thus explicit in stating what I know of this unpleasant affair, in order to correct the erroneous impression which unwarranted and unauthenticated statements that may be made in relation to it might otherwise produce; and that the fact may be known that there does not exist any thing like a national feeling, on the part of the Indians, justifying this outrage, but that a general sentiment of a decidedly opposite character prevails.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, &c.

GEORGE WALTON, Esq.,
Acting Governor of Florida.

G. HUMPHREYS, Agent for Florida Indians.

P. S. I have this moment received information that the body of Mr. Swearingen's murderer has been found in the swamp to which he fled when fired upon; and, from circumstances detailed to me, I can entertain no doubt of his death.

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS FOR FLORIDA,

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, April 14, 1825.

I had occasion to address you on the 24th of February last on the subject of having immediately removed within their limits the Indians in Alachua and west of the Suwanee, who were committing depredations on the property of the inhabitants. I have just received information, to be relied on, that the Indians have committed a murder in Alachua, and are destroying the property of the inhabitants and threatening their lives; preventing the surveyors of the United States from the execution of their duty, and destroying their landmarks. I had hoped you would have taken efficient measures, on the receipt of my letter above alluded to, and have had the Indians concentrated and regularly supplied with rations; but I am informed they are literally starving, and say that there are no rations to furnish them.

That such a state of things exists, is painful in the extreme, and requires measures on your part of the most prompt and efficient character, to effect their concentration, and relieve the inhabitants of this Territory from such painful apprehensions. I have written to Colonel Brooke on the subject of furnishing you with such aid as may, under any circumstances, secure the accomplishment of this desirable object. The inhabitants must be protected; and your situation as agent, with the means which Colonel Brooke will furnish, if necessary, renders it imperious on your part to secure them that protection from the Indians. I expect that you will not lose one moment in restoring order, and having the guilty apprehended, who have committed this murder and otherwise depredated on the inhabitants.

The preservation of the lives of these people will only be effected by teaching them a proper obedience and submission to the authorities placed over them; and, unless this is done, they will continue to outrage the settlements, until their doom will be sealed by extermination.

Enclosed you have a copy of the President's approval of the extension of the Indian limits, which will be satisfactory to them, and enable you to select a spot for the location of the agency the most desirable.

You will acknowledge the receipt of this communication on its reaching you, and accompany a report of all and every circumstance relating to these subjects, that have come to your knowledge, together with such measures as you may have adopted, or contemplate adopting, to relieve the Territory from such embarrassing and much-to-be-lamented circumstances.

I am, with the highest respect, your obedient servant,

GEORGE WALTON.

To Colonel G. HUMPHREYS, Indian Agent.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, TERRITORY OF FLORIDA,

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, April 14, 1825.

Information of a painful nature has been received from Alachua, purporting that the Seminole Indians have murdered a man by the name of Swearingen, and threatened the lives of other citizens, and are daily committing depredations on the stock of the inhabitants, and preventing the United States' surveyors from executing their duties, and destroying their landmarks. I had contemplated that a concentration of this tribe within the limits assigned them would have been effected long since; but it seems that many are still west of the Suwanee, and others in Alachua.

The Department of War authorized the Executive of this Territory to use the troops stationed at St. Mark's for the effectual removal of the Indians to their limits under the treaty; but it was believed it could be effected without their aid. They have subsequently been removed; and, were they here, the distance is too great to where the Indians are, to have them employed in this duty. I have this day communicated to Colonel Humphreys, Indian agent, requiring the immediate and effectual concentration of these Indians within their limits, and informed him that I should request you to furnish, if necessary, a force sufficient to accomplish that object, and relieve the inhabitants of this Territory from the painful apprehensions under which they at present labor. The citizens of the Territory must be efficiently protected; and I therefore call on you, in the exercise of your military command, to aid the agent to bring to punishment the perpetrators of the murder of Mr. Swearingen, together with others who have threatened the lives and destroyed the property of our citizens, by a detachment of United States troops competent to that end, and to effect their immediate removal within the boundary assigned them, which has been enlarged recently by the President of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

To Colonel G. M. BROOKE,
Commanding United States troops at Cantonment Clinch.

GEORGE WALTON.

SIR:

AGENCY, May 1, 1825.

At your request, I give a statement of what I know with regard to the suffering condition of the Indians, as stated in the report of the United States surveyor, which you have recently received from the superintendent at Tallahassee. About the 1st of March, I issued to the Indians, at Hamley's old store, on the St. John's river, between six and seven hundred bushels, [of corn,] which, in conjunction with former issues, amounted to upwards of forty thousand rations that had been issued to the emigrant Indians after their arrival to that period; and there never has been a period, since November last, (at which time I arrived at Hamley's, to superintend the issues,) that there has not been a sufficiency of corn of good quality on hand, and which has been as regularly issued, when applied for by those entitled to draw, (with the exception of three or four weeks in March and April, which was occasioned by the loss of two cargoes at sea destined for supplies;) but even those losses very slightly affected the issues I was instructed to make. The sickness and mortality adverted to by the above report is not attributed to the right cause; but, from a conversation I had with Hicks, one of the principal chiefs of the Mickasuky town, in February, I am induced to believe it was owing to the irregularity of their young women previous to their emigrating, as Hicks and Tuskehenaha both told me several of them had died on their journey to the Big Swamp.

Respectfully, your humble servant,

SAMUEL Y. GAREY.

Colonel HUMPHREYS.

(No. 6.)

[Accompaniment to No. 28.]

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, May 13, 1825.

I have the honor to enclose, herewith, my account of disbursements during the quarter ending the 31st of March, and also the abstracts of Mr. Marsh and Mr. Garey, of the issues of provisions made at their respective posts. Descriptive rolls are likewise sent, by which it will be seen that the number of Indians who have received and are entitled to rations greatly exceeds the calculation heretofore made upon that subject. I was aware that there would be an excess, but was unable to determine how great, until I received the descriptive roll above mentioned; for which reason, an earlier report has not been made. Independently of the number borne on the rolls, there is one entire town (Chefirsico's) to be included, for which, probably, about one hundred and twenty daily rations will be required. I take the liberty of suggesting the propriety of having all the surplus rations delivered at the issuing store on St. John's, as being much the most convenient point for those who are to receive them; and I am informed that the contractor is willing to deliver them there at the same price which he is allowed at Tampa Bay, reserving to himself, however, the right to make a question of equity whether he is not entitled to receive, for a fair proportion of the extra rations, the St. John's price.

I am, &c.

G. HUMPHREYS, Agent Florida Indians.

GEORGE WALTON, Esq.

Acting Governor of Florida, Tallahassee.

(No. 7.)

[Accompaniment to No. 28.]

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, May 14, 1825.

Your letters of the 14th and 17th of April, by the hands of Tennelle, I had the honor to receive about the 1st instant, as I was on the point of commencing my journey hither to see you, partly in relation to the matters of which your letters treat, and also in regard to others connected with my agency; and, as there appeared no necessity for postponing the journey, but, on the contrary, additional reasons for prosecuting it, I concluded to defer answering your communications until my arrival here.

You state in your letter of the 14th April that you had occasion to address me on the 24th of February last, on the subject of having immediately removed the Indians in Alachua and west of the Suwanee, who were committing depredations on the property of the inhabitants. Your letter, from causes to me unknown, did not reach me; its failure, however, if I am fully apprized of its contents, has not been the cause of public injury. I was sufficiently aware of my duty, as respects the removal and concentration of the Indians within the limits of the territory reserved by them, to know that it was obligatory on me to make use of all the means placed within my reach to effect this desirable object with the utmost practicable despatch; and, under this conviction, my efforts have been steady and unceasing. That they have fallen short of entire success, is true, and to be regretted; but I venture to aver, that there cannot, in consequence, be any censure fairly applicable to me; nor does it, indeed, appear to me that blame can be attached to any one. The inconveniences (greatly exaggerated by reports, various and extravagant, according to the fears or dispositions of the reporters,) that the inhabitants of the country through which the Indians had to pass have been subjected to, were, in a great degree, unavoidable, and inseparable from the removal of the Indians; with them, as with all other people, the vicious and unprincipled amongst them are only restrained in their evil propensities by the law, and the fear of a summary and prompt enforcement of its penalties; a restraint which must necessarily, in a measure, cease to operate during their march, detached as they were, for convenience, in small parties, sometimes without a chief to govern or control them. These considerations, it is true, do not present a justification of the Indians for any depredations they have committed; neither do they furnish to the inhabitants any remuneration for the losses they have sustained; but they would seem to offer a reason why unnecessary clamor upon the subject should not be raised, and unwarrantable aspersions thrown upon the Government and its officers. That the inhabitants of Alachua have, in some instances, suffered by the Indians in their property, particularly their cattle, there is little reason to doubt; and, in one or two cases, it is said, that menace has been offered, but evidently to create alarm, without intention to injure; and it is a fact, to be lamented, but cannot be denied, that, in the latter procedure, they have the authority of example from the whites. But one instance of outrage was ever reported to me by the injured party, (and that by R. Charles, Esq.) until my arrival at Alachua, about the first of the present month, which place I visited for the settlement of his difficulty with the Indians, which was easily effected. On this occasion, I heard that depredations had been committed upon the stock of several of the settlers, but heard no complaint from the inhabitants themselves, who were said to be the losers; and I venture to predict that, upon investigation, the loudest complaints will be found to have come from those who have either not suffered at all, or but slightly. Of the motive of the authors, I have nothing to say.

Of the murder of Mr. Swearingen I was not informed by any white person, until long after it had been communicated to me by Hicks, and the murderer pursued. For a report of the steps adopted in relation to that affair, I refer you to my letter of the 6th of April, herewith sent, prepared at the time of its date, but withheld, in consequence of my determination to see you in person, which, on many accounts, appeared absolutely necessary.

With regard to the failure of the supplies for the Indians, I take the liberty to refer you to a communication from Mr. Garey, the issuing officer on St. John's, as containing the information on that subject most entitled to be relied upon. From his letter, it appears that a deficiency of rations existed during a part of the months of March and April; but this deficiency was occasioned, in part, as he stated to me verbally, by his having been compelled to issue at his post more than double the number of rations provided for and contemplated in his first instructions: this became indispensable. The Indians wholly declined going to Tampa Bay, at which place, it is proper to state, there was an adequate supply of flour, which they were repeatedly told would be issued to them, on application to Mr. Marsh, the sub-agent. Their objections to that point of delivery were strong and reasonable; the distance is so great for those residing upon the Big Swamp, and the road so excessively bad, that the small loads which they would only be able to start with, would be nearly, if not entirely consumed, before they could reach home; and thus their whole time would be taken up in transporting rations for present use, and no provision made for future subsistence. Under the present arrangement, by which they get their corn in two or three days' journey, they have leisure for other purposes, and have made considerable progress in opening fields at their positions, where they will this year make crops; though so small, that there is reason to fear the yield will fall short of furnishing a sufficiency for their support. The importance, however, of their diligent exertions in planting, and providing for future wants, has been repeatedly and fully urged upon their consideration. That a portion of the emigrants have not, at one time since their removal, been fully supplied with provisions, Mr. Garey's letter evidences; but had they been in that extreme distress, that state of want which is represented, it is fair to presume they would not have neglected the certain and entire relief which they knew awaited them at Tampa. The truth is, that, as it relates to provisions, the condition of the emigrants is infinitely preferable to that of the old settlers; amongst the latter, there is not, at this time, in one family in ten, a kernel of corn to be found; and it is a fact well known to those who have been much with them, that, from about the first of April of each year, until the coming in of green corn, almost their sole dependence for the vegetable or bread portion of subsistence is upon centee and briar root, with which their swamps and thick woods greatly abound. Had Mr. May (a copy of whose report you forwarded me) penetrated into the nation, he would have found that the Mickasuky people, distressed as he viewed them, were much better off than their neighbors, the old inhabitants. The truth is, that his imagination, aided by his sympathies, has largely magnified their distresses; and, taking it for granted, because he did not see profusion, that famine raged, where, in truth, disease preyed, he reports that a large number had actually died of starvation. Had he taken much pains to arrive at the facts, he would have found that not a single death had occurred, which could, in any degree, be attributed to the cause he alleges; and that, on the contrary, the true cause of the mortality which prevailed was a venercal, said by the Indians to have been contracted at St. Mark's, previous to their emigration. Upon the subject of the interruption which Mr. May reports he met with from the Indians, I can only say that his statement is, in its material points, positively contradicted by those of Hicks and other Indians who were examined after the receipt of your letter. Hicks asserts that he did not, at any time, refuse to give the letters which Mr. May had conveyed to me, but that he repeatedly offered to send a guide to conduct Mr. May to the agency, provided he would leave his party behind; and even Mr. May's own letter admits that such an offer was made to him, but, as he says, when he was about to leave the country; and on this account (as it is presumed) he declined it.

It may with propriety be suggested that, had Mr. May felt any strong desire to prosecute his undertaking, he would have availed himself of Hicks's tender (late as he states it was made) to have visited me, (which he could have done in a twenty miles' ride,) sooner than abandon his job, however arduous and profitless he may have found it, upon slight or doubtful grounds. Had he delivered his letters, his difficulties would have been either wholly removed, or more fully confirmed: in the first case, he would have been enabled to proceed with his labors; and in the latter event, would have been furnished with a well-established reason for the abandonment of his enterprise. I take occasion here to state, that, if Mr. May wishes to resume his surveys, he can do it with perfect safety, as it regards danger from the Indians; and if he deems it necessary for his more perfect security, he can be furnished with an Indian escort.

Aside from the obstacles Mr. May says he has met with, I am apprized of no interruptions experienced by the surveyors from the Indians. Captain Stone, who is spoken of by Mr. May, I saw at Suwanee, on my way here; he mentioned having seen, recently, several small parties of Indians in his route, but said nothing of their having disturbed him; from which I am led to conclude Mr. May has not rightly understood him. I am of opinion that a speedy and entire removal within the lines of Chefixico, and the few straggling parties who yet neglect to remove, cannot be effected without the employment of force, as they have hitherto disregarded the repeated orders sent them upon the subject. It would have been very easy for the militia of the Alachua, (without bloodshed,) long ere this, to have driven in those east of Suwanee, had their colonel been disposed to undertake it. If I am correctly informed, the services of some of the inhabitants have been proffered to him for this duty. I sent out two chiefs the day before I left the agency: the one to Chefixico, who is reported to have halted at Suwanee Old Fields, and the other to scour the country about the Alachua settlements, with orders to say to all parties or individuals found without the boundaries, that, unless they forthwith proceeded within the lines, a military force would be sent to drive them in at the point of the bayonet, or destroy them. What effect this message will have, I cannot say; but, unless it produces the desired one, I conceive the employment of force will be unavoidable. You have now before you, sir, as far as I am able to furnish it, a compliance with your instructions of the 14th ultimo. The report adverted to in your letter of the 17th of the same month came to hand; but the duplicate of your former communication, spoken of as accompanying it, did not reach me; and I am still without possessing a letter which I find I am injuriously supposed to have treated with neglect.

Before closing, I take the liberty to suggest that a copy of Mr. Chaires's contract, which I have not yet been furnished with, and instructions as to the course I am to pursue in the event of his non-performance and the failure of his supplies, might be useful guides to me in my future proceedings. It may not be out of place to state here, that the beef which has thus far been furnished has been averaged and received on foot, and issued in the same way: this course was adopted in relation to the first gang of cattle delivered by the contractor, inasmuch as no emigrants had arrived; so that, had I resorted to the method of killing and weighing, to ascertain the average, the Government must have sustained the loss of such as were killed, as they must have been thrown away. I therefore thought it better to pursue the other course, and accordingly appointed Mr. Garey, on the part of the United States, to make the average; the same course was subsequently pursued in relation to another drove, because it was found that the Indians decidedly preferred receiving the beef on the foot to having it killed. I should be glad to know if the arrangement meets your approbation, and whether it should be continued in future.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. HUMPHREYS, Agent Florida Indians.

[Accompaniment to No. 28.]

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, May 19, 1825.

Your letters of the 13th and 14th instant are received. No rations can be issued on the St. John's river at a price exceeding the minimum rate fixed by the contract with Major Chaires, excepting the four hundred daily rations; but if he is willing to furnish them at that price, no objection can arise to receive them there, provided it is equally convenient with Tampa Bay for the Indians to receive them. No back rations will, in future, be allowed to emigrant Indians now out of the boundaries; and no more than one thousand rations per day are to be issued hereafter, on any account whatever, until further advised.

In your future issues, however, you can distribute the back rations on hand for the first two months returned for, apportioning them properly among the Indians.

You will return to the agency forthwith, as the present situation of the Indians and of the settlements in the vicinity requires immediate attention.

Your accounts are returned approved.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. WALTON.

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, May 20, 1825.

SIR:

The enclosed acts of Congress will govern you in suppressing the sale of spirituous liquors to Indians, and you are more particularly referred to the second article thereof.

It is expected that your presence in the country will enable you to dispense with the services of Mr. Garey; he will, therefore, be discharged immediately after the issuing of provisions terminates, or sooner, if you find it to be practicable.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

GEO. WALTON.

Colonel G. HUMPHREYS, Agent for Florida Indians, Tallahassee.

[Accompaniment to No. 28.]

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, May 22, 1825.

I enclose, herewith, for your information and government, an order from the War Department on the subject of runaway negro slaves residing among the Florida Indians, claimed by citizens of the United States; also, letters from individual claimants.

You will take all measures within your power to enable these claimants, as well as all others who may apply, to identify their property; and in all cases where the validity of the claim is clearly established, and no other obstacle arises to prevent it, the restoration of such slave or slaves to their proper owner or owners must immediately follow. Let the chiefs distinctly understand that they are not to harbor runaway negroes, and that they will be required to give up such negroes as are now residing within their limits.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

GEO. WALTON.

Colonel G. HUMPHREYS, Agent for Florida Indians, at Tallahassee.

(No. 11.)

[Accompaniment to No. 28.]

TALLAHASSEE, May 25, 1825.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters of the 19th, 20th, and 22d instant, and deem it an imperious duty to state, in reply to that of the 19th, which directs a limitation of the number of rations hereafter to be issued to one thousand daily, that the effect of such an abridgment of the stipulated supply of provisions will be, at the least, loud murmuring and discontent; and that suffering among the Indians from hunger, which has hitherto scarcely existed, except in imagination, will shortly become a distressing reality. That these people can have but scanty, and, indeed, no certain means of subsistence, independent of the sustenance promised by the United States, until the opening of the fields and growing of corn at their new locations, will be readily supposed; and the entire inadequacy of one thousand rations to the support of something more than one thousand six hundred people, is too obvious to require comment. And I feel constrained to add my belief, that the emigrant Indians, conceiving themselves entitled by the treaty of the 18th of September, 1823, to punctual allowance of provisions for the specified time, at the rate of one ration per day to each individual, will not quietly submit to a non-performance (on the part of Government) of this stipulation of the compact.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. HUMPHREYS.

GEO. WALTON, Esq., Acting Governor, &c. of Florida.

No. 29.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, June 20, 1825.

SIR:

Your letter of the 26th ultimo, accompanied by your correspondence with the agent, marked from No. 1 to No. 11, to the Secretary of War, is received. The subjects presented by you, to wit: the murder of Mr. Swearingen; the alleged depredations of the Indians upon the property of the citizens whose settlements lay in the route of their emigration; and the distress which you apprehend will be felt by the emigrant Indians, by the obligation you are under (to bring the disbursements within the appropriation) to lessen the number of rations, have been (in the absence of the Secretary of War, on a tour of inspection to the North) submitted to, and duly considered by, the President, who directs the following reply to be made.

It appears from the statement of the agent, Colonel Humphreys, that the death of Mr. Swearingen was an act of a personal nature, and that it indicates no hostility on the part of the Indians against the whites; of which sufficient proof is furnished in their having pursued the murderer and executed upon him their own punishment, and made him atone, with his life, for his outrage. No steps, under such circumstances, are deemed to be necessary in regard to that act.

The spoliations committed on the inhabitants by the emigrant Indians (if those who may have suffered conceive such a step to be necessary) can be provided for only by an act of Congress for their relief. Every attention will, no doubt, be paid by that body to any representation of their losses which they may think proper to make. The President very much regrets that they should have suffered the slightest inconvenience.

The appropriation by the act of Congress to carry into effect the treaty with the Florida Indians, it was hoped, would be sufficient to sustain the expenses of the emigrants. It is a subject of regret that appearances indicate its inadequacy, and especially as the means for that object (expense of rations) are limited to $65,700, and beyond which the Executive has no power to afford relief, except by a resort to the Indian Department fund; which is, itself, so adapted annually to the necessary demands upon it, as to admit of but a slight diversion of its means to other objects than such as are estimated for. It is still hoped the distress will not be so great as you apprehend it will; and especially as the agent, who is personally present, and has the means, it may be presumed, of judging with greater accuracy, thinks it will not. The President, however, with the view of guarding against the contingency apprehended by you, directs that the sum of $2,000 be placed at your disposal to meet it; but, as it is believed it can be ill spared from the Indian Department, he directs that no part of it be called for until it is clearly ascertained that the sum appropriated will have fallen short of the object; and not then, except to save these people from the suffering to which you apprehend they will be subject without it. The back rations may come in timely aid of the emergency; and it will be but just to pay the contractor an equitable additional allowance for transporting the provisions to any other point than the one which he contracted for, and in proportion to the additional expense which he may incur by the change. There is no objection, in the event of your having to resort to the extra allowance of $2,000, to your purchasing the provisions in the manner you suggest. You will take care, however, to provide, in all cases, the necessary vouchers for the expenditures, and exercise the utmost economy in the disbursement.

To meet the contingency of any excitement which the agent may not be able to quiet, the commanding officer at Cantonment Brooke is directed to aid, on your requisition upon him for that purpose, in putting it down.

I have the honor, &c.

THOS. L. MCKENNEY.

PENSACOLA, July 14, 1825.

SIR:

I left Tallahassee on the 2d ultimo to visit my family here, and on business, intending to return immediately, fearful that difficulties might arise on account of the Indians; but have been detained by a severe attack of bilious fever, occasioned by exposure in travelling, from which I am slowly recovering.

I have thought proper to cause purchases to be made, at once, of Indian presents, for the whole amount estimated for the present year. These articles are always necessary, and looked for by the Indians; and, in their present dissatisfied state, are more than usually so.

The contract for issues to the emigrant Indians at the Appalachian river ceased on the 30th of June, and they are now thrown upon their own resources for subsistence, without the means of supplying their wants. For the condition of the emigrant Indians on their southern location, I refer you for information to the enclosed copy of a letter from the agent, and to the letter which I had the honor to address to you lately from Tallahassee.

So soon as my health will permit, I shall cause my accounts to the 30th of June to be forwarded to the Department, and shall then return to Tallahassee.

I have the honor, &c.

GEORGE WALTON.

Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

SIR:

CAMP NEAR TAMPA, June 13, 1825.

I reached this place on the 12th instant, after a passage of fourteen days. I learn with regret, since my arrival, that the drought in this section of country, and, indeed, through to the Big Swamp, has been so severe that the crops of the Indians are, in some instances, almost wholly destroyed. The emigrants particularly, it is to be feared, will make little or no corn, owing to their having had new fields to open, and the consequent lateness of their planting. I am greatly apprehensive that the failure of crops will produce extreme distress among these people, unless arrangements are adopted to continue to them the issues of rations beyond the period stipulated in the treaty. It may not, and, I trust, it will not, be necessary to make extensive, regular, and stated issues; but humanity seems to require that some provision should be made to meet cases of actual want.

I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the Logan to give you the earliest possible information upon this subject.

Very respectfully, &c.

GEORGE WALTON, Esq., Acting Governor of Florida.

Extract of a letter from George Walton, Esq., Acting Governor of Florida, to Colonel Thomas L. McKenney dated

JULY 27, 1825.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo. I regret extremely that circumstances have occurred, since the date of the letter to which yours replied, which tend to strengthen the opinion advanced by me, that much suffering, and consequently serious disturbances, may be apprehended among the Indians upon the discontinuance of the issues of rations to them. Copies of letters have been shown to me from Colonel Humphreys to the commanding officer at Cantonment Brooke, and from him to the commanding officer here, by which it appears that a detachment of one hundred troops have marched, upon the requisition of the agent, into the Indian country; and that he deems their presence necessary to insure tranquillity. The agent has always expressed to me the opinions that were communicated by my letter of the 26th May to the Department; that letter was founded, in some degree, upon his personal communications to me at Tallahassee, where he was present at the date of that letter, and was perfectly aware of its tenor; it is, therefore, inconceivable to me how a different impression could have been received from his communications.

If it should be necessary to transport provisions for the Indians to any other place than the one contracted for, the superintendent would certainly be inclined to compensate the contractor for any loss he might sustain by the change. But no such necessity has yet happened, nor is any apprehended; the changes having been, hitherto, highly favorable to the contractor, and, of course, adopted by him willingly.

I am extremely anxious to return to Tallahassee, but am not yet sufficiently recovered to endure the fatigue of the journey; but hope in a few days to be able to set out, when I shall ascertain the nature and cause of the recent disturbances, by a visit to the Indian country, if it shall be necessary.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, August 10, 1825.

Your two letters of the 14th ultimo, (one directed to the Secretary of War, and the other to me,) together with a copy of Colonel Humphreys's letter to you of the 13th June, are received.

No doubt, the policy of purchasing the presents for the whole year, to the amount estimated for that period, was correct, especially in the present dissatisfied state of feeling among the emigrant Indians, whose condition, it is hoped, will be rendered at least tolerable by the permission granted in my letter of the 20th June, to expend two thousand dollars for the relief of those who may actually need help, since the 30th June last, when their supplies, as stipulated for by the treaty, ceased. It might be well to husband these resources, and only apply them at such points as necessity requires: as the Indians, should they learn that additional provision was made in a general way, might relax their exertions, and by that means render the aid which is contemplated to be extended to them of but little practical value.

The steps you have taken to cut off the intercourse which the Indians are stated to hold with Cuba are judicious. If the reports in relation to that intercourse be correct, it ought to be stopped, as it can only be fruitful in evil consequences.

I have the honor, &c.

Extract of a letter from Thomas L. McKenney to George Walton, Esq., Secretary and Acting Governor of Florida, dated

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, August 19, 1825.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th ultimo.

The excitement among the emigrant Indians, as indicated by the employment of the military, it is hoped will subside, should it have been occasioned by their wants, when you contribute to their relief, by means of the allowance of $2,000 over and above the amount of the appropriation to carry the treaty into effect, as authorized by the President; information of which I had the honor to convey to you on the 20th June last.

As early as you can do so, you will inform the Department of the causes and extent of the dissatisfaction among the Indians, and any information connected therewith which you may esteem it important to communicate.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, September 15, 1825.

The Secretary of War directs that the extension of the northern line of the Indian territory in Florida be made, by running and marking the same with as little delay as possible; it being represented by the agent, Colonel Humphreys, that settlers are already appropriating lands near to, if not south of, where the line will run, which, if not checked by some visible demarcation, may involve difficulties in their removal.

The extension of the north line will be made so as that a line, when drawn from its extreme western point, will strike somewhere about that point on Gadsden's survey which is denominated "flat lands filled with ponds;" the object being to take in the Big Hammock.

You will communicate with Colonel Gadsden, to whom the Secretary directs me to refer the execution of this survey; and, in the event of his being unable, from any causes, to undertake it, you will employ Major Joshua A. Coffee, who is recommended by Colonel Humphreys. In the event of your employing Major Coffee, it is understood that his compensation will be at the same rates as those allowed to Colonel Gadsden, and in all respects.

I have the honor, &c.

His Excellency WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS FOR FLORIDA,

SIR: TALLAHASSEE, October 6, 1825.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th of August last, by the way of Pensacola.

I have not as yet made any extra provision for the emigrant Indians of this Territory out of the $2,000 allotted for that purpose, intending to husband it with the utmost economy, as a dernier resort, to be used in cases of absolute necessity; the sum is in itself so small, as to be of no utility if expended in a general manner.

Many of these Indians, resident in the reserve east of the Suwanee river, have recently abandoned their country; and I have received information, upon which reliance is to be placed, that most, if not all, of those who formerly resided between the rivers Suwanee and Appalachicola are on their return hither. They state to me, as a reason for their return, that they have always been furnished with a scanty supply of provisions only, and which has some time since ceased altogether; that they have no means of subsistence within themselves; that there is no game in their country; that it is, moreover, exceedingly unhealthy, exposing them to sickness and inevitable death; and, in fine, that no part of the country allotted to them for a residence is of such a description as to afford them comfortable settlements, or of such a quality as will enable them to have stocks or to raise corn. I have, myself, never been in that part of Florida; but, from information that I can rely upon, I am inclined to believe that all that the Indians represent respecting its unhealthiness and want of fertility of soil is strictly correct, and requires, in justice to them, to be thoroughly investigated. Many complaints from the Indians, respecting their rations, had reached me early in the spring; and when the agent was here, in May last, I informed him of the reports and complaints that had been made to me; all of which, he assured me, were utterly false and without foundation. I then pressed earnestly upon him the absolute necessity of his paying an immediate and particular attention to tranquillizing the Indians; of endeavoring to dispose them to form permanent settlements on the best lands within their reserve, and of seeing that they were supplied with provisions, according to the means at his disposal; and ended by directing him to return to the agency forthwith, to carry these objects into effect, trusting that his personal presence and efforts with the Indians would operate favorably in disposing them to acquiesce in the views of the Government, and relieve their distresses. I regret, however, that I am compelled to state that these complaints and reports still continue in an increased degree, and are urged by the Indians in justification of their abandoning their new country, and returning to the vicinity of their late settlements.

This district of country (formerly in the occupancy of the Indians) has been surveyed, in part sold, and is rapidly populating; and if the Indians cannot be restrained within their limits, occurrences of an unpleasant nature between them and the white inhabitants must infallibly ensue; complaints against them having already been made for depredations committed upon the stocks of cattle and fields of corn belonging to the whites. But as Governor Duval is daily expected to arrive in the Territory, to resume the government thereof, I do not think it either proper or decorous for me to enter at length upon the present situation of the Indians and their causes of dissatisfaction and complaint, which are both of a local and permanent character, and will, in my opinion, to be thoroughly removed, require a total change in the measures hitherto pursued towards them. So soon as the Governor arrives, I shall make him fully acquainted with their actual situation, and with my views in relation thereto, leaving it to his experience and better judgment to decide what measures it will be most proper to pursue towards them; and you may therefore confidently calculate upon being early addressed by him on this subject. I shall, however, in the meanwhile, do all in my power to restrain their mischievous propensities, and compel them to return to their lands.

I am, sir, &c.

GEORGE WALTON.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT INDIAN AFFAIRS FOR FLORIDA,

TALLAHASSEE, October 18, 1825.

SIR:

Your letter of the 15th ultimo, directing the extension of the Indian boundary lines of their southern reserve in this Territory, was received yesterday.

In regard to the extension of these lines, I have to state, that the agent is under a misapprehension as to the place granted to the Indians; in consequence of which, some of the Indians have, as I understand, been improperly located; and which has given rise to his report, alluded to in your letter, that settlements of whites were forming within the Indian limits. In the Alachua (a district of country so denominated) there are two places which, from a partial similarity of names, have been frequently confounded with each other: the one is called the Big Swamp, and lies north of, but near to, the Indian northern boundary line; the other is called the Big Hammock, and lies near to and west of the Indian lands. The agent contends for the occupation of the former, under the President's order; but an extension of the lines according to that order cannot be made so as to embrace it, and will, when made, include only the latter. This was fully explained to the agent while at this place in May last; and Colonel Gadsden, who was then also present, demonstrated, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that it was so intended by the President, who, it is evident, by comparing his order with the map of Colonel Gadsden's survey, thoroughly understood the subject; and yet it seems, from your letter, that the agent (for he has never thought proper to address me on the subject, nor to inform me of intrusions by white settlers on the Indian lands) still persists in his erroneous construction of the order in question; the only ground that can be assumed for which is, that in the President's order the term Big Hammock, or Swamp, is used; (in your letter of the 15th ult. it is more definite, being called the Big Hammock only;) but then the slightest reference to the manner in which the lines are ordered to be extended leaves not the shadow of doubt as to which of the two is meant. It is, however, proper at the same time to state, that the Indians themselves have always contended for the grant of the Big Swamp; and this fact, no doubt, has measurably contributed to continue the agent in his error as to the place actually designated for the occupancy of the Indians; and until I had conversed with Colonel Gadsden, and examined his map, I was myself under an impression that the Big Swamp was the place intended to have been granted.

As the matter now stands, the inhabitants of Alachua (some of whom are settled near to the Indian northern boundary line) complain loudly that the Indians are suffered to locate on lands without the limits of the reserve; which is, and must continue to be the fact, unless the President shall be pleased to extend the Indian boundaries so as to include the Big Swamp.

Colonel Gadsden is expected to arrive by the first proximo; and, from his having run out these lines, added to his perfect knowledge of the topography of the country, I deem it important that he should now be appointed to extend them, and shall accordingly endeavor to prevail upon him to accept the appointment under the order of the Secretary of War.

I have the honor, &c.

Colonel THOMAS L. MCKENNEY.

GEORGE WALTON.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT INDIAN AFFAIRS FOR FLORIDA,

TALLAHASSEE, October 21, 1825.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose for your information a report made to me by Mr. Doyle, respecting the Indians in Florida. This gentleman has resided for many years previous to and since the cession of Florida to the United States amongst the Indians recently inhabiting this section of the Territory, and is, therefore, not only acquainted with the Indian character and disposition in general, but is known personally to these Indians and their chiefs. It had become necessary for me to employ a confidential person to endeavor to collect the fugitive Indians at some point where my message and orders could be communicated to them, and also to ascertain, as far as practicable, directly from themselves, their immediate causes of complaint, and their own views in regard to the future. From his personal good character, added to these reasons, I deemed Mr. Doyle to be the most suitable agent I could engage in this business; and he was accordingly employed by me, and will be continued in employment, if necessary, until I am relieved in the exercise of the government of the Territory by Governor Duval, or am instructed by the Department as to the measures proper to be pursued, which I shall anxiously expect. In the mean time, I have determined, as the only course left to save these Indians from starvation, and the settlements from exposure to depredations from them, caused only by their necessitous condition, to place Mr. Doyle at or near the Suwanee river, with the double object of preventing the Indians from entering the settlements of the whites, and to furnish them with some supplies of corn for their wives and children.

I am convinced they cannot be concentrated within their limits without the aid of military force, unless some means of subsistence be there provided for them; in which case, I believe they would comply with whatever might be required of them. From representations made to me, on which I can rely, the situation of these unfortunate human beings is miserable in the extreme, and requires prompt and effectual relief from the humanity, if not the justice of the Government, and which, I trust, will be extended to them.

If the President shall deem it expedient, I consider the present moment as one favorable for holding a treaty with the Florida Indians, having for its object their immediate removal to lands west of the Mississippi river, either in a body, as a nation by themselves, or to be incorporated with the Creek nation in their contemplated removal. So far as it regards obtaining the consent of the Indians, (not only those in the southern reserve, but of those on the Appalachian river,) I believe either of the proposed plans to be feasible. Such a measure would be productive of the most important advantages to themselves, by fixing their location permanently in a healthy and productive district of country, and by ameliorating their present distressed and dissatisfied condition, and likewise be of incalculable advantage to the interests of the Territory itself. In suggesting and recommending this measure to the Government, I am confident in the expression of the opinion that I speak the views and sentiments of Governor Duval; and not only his, but those of the most enlightened and intelligent men in the Territory.

Believing that this measure, if properly pursued, will arrive at the happiest results in effecting a more favorable location for these Indians than their present one, I deem it important that, in the event of a treaty being held, it should be conducted by persons having no private interests or feelings to consult, and who are acquainted with the Indian character, and known personally to the chiefs.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE WALTON.

To Colonel T. L. McKENNEY, Washington, D. C.

[Accompanying No. 37.]

TALLAHASSEE, October 20, 1825.

SIR:

In compliance with your excellency's instructions, I have to inform you that, on Monday last, I had all the scattering Indians in this vicinity collected at the Ansilla creek, at a point thirty miles distant from this place, about thirty in number, men, women, and children. Some days previous to this meeting, I despatched runners to other parties of Indians, on or near the Suwanee, desiring them to hold themselves in readiness to march with this party to their own lands in Florida. As these Indians had not presented themselves at the agency, I told them they would be furnished with rations here, to enable them to go there, and that, on their arrival, their maintenance would be allowed them for some time; under this assurance, all the Indians I saw were willing to go.

On the day of receiving your instructions to collect those Indians, I had an opportunity, by a trusty fellow, to inform Chefixico Hadjo, the chief of Tallahassee, who has been encamped at the Suwanee river since his departure from this place, last fall, that it was your positive orders to move immediately into his own land. He made the movement accordingly, and proceeded with his party, consisting of one hundred persons, men, women, and children, within a day and a half's journey of Tampa Bay. From this place he sent for a supply of provisions, in order to enable him to pursue his route to the agency. His messengers were furnished by Hicks, the principal chief of the Seminoles, with one beef and a small quantity of corn, (about two days' rations,) with a message that that supply was all he could expect there; in consequence of which, one-half of his party instantly quit him, and recrossed the Suwanee to their old camping ground. A few days previous to this event, about sixty others returned from the neighborhood of Tampa, and also crossed this river. Those Indians are scattered in different directions, from sixty to seventy miles east of this place, and, no doubt, many of them will shortly make their appearance in this vicinity.

I have, agreeably to your instructions, particularly examined several Indians, to ascertain the cause of the universal discontent that seems to prevail amongst them, and their reasons for not occupying the lands allotted them by Government. From the uniform reports of those people, and from many white men, I think it my duty to state fully their objections, for your excellency's government:

- 1st. That the land allotted to them by the treaty is too poor to make their bread on.
- 2d. That there is no running water in the country; and, from their knowledge of pond water, in hunting excursions, disease and sickness must ensue.
- 3d. That a sufficient maintenance has not been issued at the agency for those Indians that did present themselves there, many of whom have returned from thence.
- 4th. That a fair distribution of the funds allowed them by Government has not been attended to by either their own chiefs or the white men.
- 5th. That many, who have for several years resided within the vicinity of the reserve, have not as yet moved into it, and still object to do so.
- 6th. That the land allowed them by the treaty was partly forced on the chiefs, and that the Indians never agreed to give up the land.

I now very much fear it will be difficult to induce them to go on this reserve; nothing will do it but a supply of provisions; and, in their present distressed state, it would have a good effect. The Indians now collected at the Ansilla wish to go on to the Chattahoochie; and they say all the others that have lately crossed the Suwanee river intend to go there.

I found all those Indians humble, and I believe would be willing to go to any place where they could find good land and water. It would be a most favorable moment to press on them the idea of crossing the Mississippi.

I have the honor to be, &c.

His Excellency GEORGE WALTON,
Acting Governor of the Floridas.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, October 31, 1825.

I am directed by the Secretary of War to call your attention to the subject-matter of a letter addressed to me by acting Governor Walton, on the subject of the complaints made to him by the Florida Indians, in regard to their rations, and their return upon the borders of the territory ceded by them, and from which it was expected they had finally emigrated.

The Secretary directs that you take measures, also, to ascertain the capacity of the territory allotted to them for their support, and report, as early as possible, the result of your investigations upon all those points to the Department.

I have, &c.

To His Excellency WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

THO. L. MCKENNEY.

No. 39.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS FOR FLORIDA,

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, November 18, 1825.

I have lately received from the issuing officers at Tampa Bay and the St. John's river the abstracts of issues of rations to the emigrant Florida Indians; by which it appears that the amount of issues during the last six months at the St. John's, and four months at Tampa Bay, has amounted to $25,212 57; and Mr. Chaires, the contractor, has produced to me the receipt of the agent, specifying the delivery of a further quantity, which remains on hand, making the whole sum amount to $31,025 82.

It will be perceived, by the instructions to the agent and the issuing officers, (copies of which have been transmitted to the Department, and a duplicate of the latter of which is herewith enclosed,) that the issue of rations has greatly exceeded the number which, in the extremest case, was calculated upon by the Department or the superintendent; the average amounting to one thousand four hundred and eighty per diem, instead of one thousand. At the former settlement with the contractor, the excess above a thousand per diem was paid for; but, at the same time, the instructions of the 19th May were shown to him, as an assurance that at no future settlement would such an indulgence be granted. It further appears to me very extraordinary, under the circumstances, that there should have been permitted (as is the fact) a large amount of rations to accumulate and remain on hand at Tampa Bay, while, at the same time, there were daily issues at the St. John's of nearly six hundred rations beyond the number stipulated in the contract.

I have also lately received a letter from Mr. Charles Pindar, a gentleman now residing in Tallahassee, (a copy of which, together with its enclosure, is also herewith enclosed,) which seems to charge unfairness in the manner of procuring the contract, and to promise further disclosures, if demanded. This communication being addressed to me officially, I have considered it my duty at least to communicate it to the Department, suspending, in the mean time, the settlement with the contractor, in order that the Department, being possessed of all the circumstances, may instruct me particularly as to my future conduct, as well as to put me in funds to complete such settlement as may be directed to be made.

I enclose copies of letters from the agent to the superintendent and to the contractor, on the subject of the issues of rations.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, your very obedient servant,

GEO. WALTON.

Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

[Accompanying No. 39.]

SIR:

ST. AUGUSTINE, August 10, 1825.

In answer to your letter inquiring what amount of provisions is necessary to complete the issues to the emigrant Indians, I have to state that there are still due as follows: (to wit)

Of bread stuffs and salt,	-	-	-	-	37,080 rations.
And beef,	-	-	-	-	105,066 "

This amount does not appear to be required to complete the one thousand rations per day specifically called for in your contract; but owing to the great excess of provisions necessarily issued, and sanctioned by the superintendent, over and above what was originally contemplated, there exists the deficiency above stated to carry the issues to the end of the year, which, although I am not instructed on the subject, I presume it is expected by the Government you will furnish.

Your humble servant,

G. HUMPHREYS, *Agent Florida Indians.*BENJAMIN CHAIRES, Esq., Indian Contractor.

[Accompaniment to No. 39.]

SIR:

FLORIDA AGENCY, October, 1825.

I have the honor to enclose, herewith, the abstracts of issues of provisions to the emigrant Florida Indians up to the 10th of the present month; completing the period specified in the treaty, as well as that limited by the orders of the superintendent. You will perceive, by the abstracts of Mr. Marsh, that his issues for the last two months have exceeded the per diem number (six hundred) directed to be given out at his station at Tampa Bay. This was essentially necessary, owing, as he states, to the increased number of applicants who were entitled to draw; and as his previous issues have fallen far short of the number authorized by the Governor's instructions, this small excess does not, as I conceive, amount to what appears a departure from the spirit of those instructions.

There is still at that post a surplus of provisions on hand, which must await your directions. Chefixico Hadjo has not yet arrived; I have, however, received a message from him, saying that he will be here in the course of four or five days; he is on the way, but is obliged to travel slow, on account of his stock. He will expect provisions when he arrives; but, according to your instructions of the 19th May last, they cannot be given to him, as the period for making the last issue will have passed.

This exclusion of his town from the benefit (which other emigrants have enjoyed) of rations, however just it may be, will nevertheless, I am constrained to believe, produce dissatisfaction, particularly as it is known to the Indians that provisions sent for their use, as they understand it, remain unissued at Tampa. I take the liberty to suggest, as a means of preserving that contentment which now pretty generally prevails in the nation, and as a measure of humanity, that the provisions on hand at Tampa may be given out to Chefixico's people, and to such others as appear to stand most in need. It can be no object to the Government to retain them, and they may be of considerable service to the Indians; besides which, if they are kept much longer in store, they will become damaged and of no value to any one.

It was too late when I reached here from Tallahassee for me to be able to apprise Mr. Garey of your instructions limiting the number of rations in season for him to confine his issues for the two months, commencing June 10, within the limit; the excess, however, is not very great, and his aggregate for that period falls greatly below his former issues. His subsequent issues are conformable to instructions.

Since writing the above, Chefixico Hadjo and his people have arrived, and in so destitute a condition, as it regards provisions, that I have deemed it a duty to direct an issue to them for the two months commencing the 10th instant, without waiting your answer to my foregoing suggestions on the subject, not doubting that the steps, under the circumstances, must be fully approbated.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. HUMPHREYS, Agent.

GEORGE WALTON, Esq., Acting Governor of Florida, Tallahassee.

SIR:

TALLAHASSEE, November 12, 1825.

I have the honor to enclose to you a document, in return for which I gave a receipt for five thousand dollars, and which I offer to you as an entering wedge into an investigation of peculiar importance to the interests of the United States in your Department, and which, after having taken a copy, I beg you will do me the favor to return to me by the bearer.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient, humble servant,

I promise to pay to Mr. Charles Pindar, or order, the sum of five hundred dollars, on my obtaining and completing the contract for furnishing the Indians with beef, &c., as per proposals requested by Colonel Gad Humphreys, Indian agent, published in the Pensacola Gazette under date of 22d May, 1824, in consideration of the said Charles Pindar withdrawing his proposal.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, November 28, 1825.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 18th ultimo, on the subject of the limits which are assigned to the emigrant Florida Indians, and the doubts in relation to them. To remove all difficulty on this subject, I have the honor to enclose a copy from the map. The first extension of the northern line northwardly from the survey by Colonel Gadsden limits, I presume, your views and his of the case; but you will see that this extension of the northern line north has been subsequently ordered to be run in a westerly direction, to a point as indicated in the black lines, far enough west as that, when an angle made from a line to run from thence to the "flat lands filled with ponds," it will embrace the Big Hammock.

Will not this extension furnish lands fit to be inhabited, and of sufficient productiveness and salubrity to support the Indians? It was Governor Duval's opinion that it would.

I have submitted your letter of the 21st ultimo to the Secretary of War, with the enclosed copy of one to you from Mr. Doyle. You will be replied to soon.

I have the honor, &c.

To GEORGE WALTON, Esq., Acting Governor of Florida.

No. 41.

Extract of a letter from His Excellency William P. Duval, Governor of Florida, to Colonel Thomas L. McKenney, dated TALLAHASSEE, December 2, 1825.

Your letter of October 31 was received by the last mail. The situation of the Indians on my return from Kentucky (where I have been for my family) has produced much surprise and painful regret.

The Indians had removed and were satisfied when I left Florida; no complaint existed on their part against the Government, and none on the part of the white inhabitants against the Indians.

The arrangements which I had made for supplying the emigrant Indians with rations were ample. Near three months back, rations were due to them before they reached the country assigned to them by treaty. With the back rations, and one thousand daily rations to be issued, (four hundred at Hamley's old store, on the St. John's river, and six hundred at Tampa Bay,) I was impressed, strongly and confidently, that no want of provisions would be felt by the Indians entitled under the treaty to draw rations.

Long before their removal, under my own direction, rations had been furnished abundantly to the emigrant Indians. No complaint was heard from any quarter; and if you will examine the amount of rations returned personally by me last winter at Washington, you may easily make the fair estimate of what amount of rations ought to issue, taking into your calculation the back rations due daily on the contract with Mr. Chaires.

My instructions to the agent have not been attended to. I directed him, in my instructions, not to exceed four hundred rations daily at Hamley's old store, on the St. John's river, because the price of the ration was greater at that point than at Tampa Bay.

Under no pretence was the agent to issue more rations than had been specifically contracted for, unless by the order of the superintendent. By referring to Colonel Walton's letter of the 18th November to the Secretary of War, you will see how greatly the agent has exceeded my instructions as to the issues at that point.

You will recollect, last winter, when we were about to have the Indian boundary extended, which I considered necessary for their support, that the map of their land assigned to them by the late treaty, as surveyed by Colonel Gadsden and transmitted to the War Department, could not be found; hence arose some doubt as to the name of the place intended to be given to the Indians by extending their northern line. Enclosed is a sketch of the Indian boundary as surveyed by Colonel Gadsden. The black dotted lines, from the western extremity of Colonel Gadsden's northern line to A, (see sketch,) and from thence south, will include the Big Hammock, as contemplated by my recommendation. The red dotted line, from the western extremity of Colonel Gadsden's northern line, running north, and from thence east to the Okelawaha river, will embrace the Big Swamp, should the Executive decide to leave the Indians in possession of it. The line to be surveyed, as lately ordered by the Department of War, will embrace the Big Hammock, the country intended and designed for the Indians, and lying west of their present boundaries. The Big Hammock has, however, by the agent been confounded with the Big Swamp, lying north of the Indian limits; and as an agent of Government, known to the Indians as such, he has placed them in possession of that country. Here the agency has been established; here the Indians have constructed their new habitations, and commenced their permanent improvements. The difficulty, therefore, of a removal must be apparent, and, it is apprehended, cannot be done without the exercise of authority. Distrust will be excited on the part of the Indians, impressing strongly on their minds something like double dealing and deception on the part of the General Government. The location, however, is extremely objectionable, and never contemplated by me in any of my recommendations; on the contrary, I have uniformly endeavored to prevent it. The Big Swamp borders on the Alachua, a fine district of country rapidly populating; and its vicinity to a white population will engender, as it has already, difficulties between the citizens and Indians. To prevent this, their removal as far south as possible was always contemplated by the General Government; and it was deemed important by the commissioners at the treaty, as well as myself, that the northern line should not extend to the Big Swamp.

The Indians have been placed, however, in the possession of it, and it is now left with the President to decide whether they shall be permitted to remain, and a new line run accordingly, so as to embrace it; or whether the line contemplated by your last letter, (conformable to my recommendation,) so as to embrace the Big Hammock only, shall be surveyed, and the Indians ordered within their limits; the Government being prepared, at the same time, to enforce obedience. As a preparatory measure in execution of this, or as a prudential one, under any determination of the General Government, I cannot too strongly recommend the establishment, immediately, of a military post on the south frontier of Alachua: such an arrangement would give confidence to the emigrant inhabitants of Alachua, and prevent any disturbances between the citizens and the Indians, if they should be permitted to remain in possession of the Big Swamp; but, should the Government order the Indians within the limits designated by the late treaty, and recommended by me, the troops will be on the spot to enforce obedience if resistance is made by the Indians. I trust my views on this subject will meet the approbation of the Secretary of War; for the peace and essential interests of this Territory strongly require the adoption of this measure, and that quickly. The investigation that I am directed to make on the complaints of the Indians, in regard to their rations, will be commenced and conducted in conformity to the instructions I shall receive from the Department, although I would prefer that some other person should make the examination. At present, the Legislative Council is in session, and it will be some weeks before I can leave Tallahassee. Whatever the Department may direct, my presence will have great influence with the Indians in effecting its execution. The two companies of artillery stationed at St. Augustine might be ordered to Alachua, for there can be no reason for continuing them at St. Augustine, and perhaps there is not a point in all the southern country where they would not be more useful. I am directed by your letter of the 31st of October last to ascertain the capacity of the territory allotted to the Indians for their support, and report as early as possible to the War Department. The measure directed by the Secretary was attended to particularly by me before I visited Washington last winter. From the reports of several agents whom I sent to examine the Indian territory, as originally surveyed, to ascertain whether there were sufficient good lands for cultivation within their limits, (for I had doubts on this subject,) I recommended the extension of the northern line, as you will see by the sketch, to A; thence running south, so as to embrace the Big Hammock. I was then, as I am now, completely satisfied that this addition will afford good land sufficient for the support of the whole of the Seminole nation. If this is not satisfactory to the Department, and if it should be requested, I will go myself and make the examination, and report as directed. My feelings towards the Indians are kind and liberal, and my conduct towards them has always procured me their confidence and respect. I would not withhold from them that justice and humanity which their unfortunate situation demands, and which the policy and honor of my Government have so liberally extended to this suffering people. If ample powers are given to me, and such means provided as I have recommended in this letter, I feel persuaded that, in a short time, all difficulties with the Indians will be settled to the satisfaction of the War Department. Energy, promptly called into action, tempered by prudence, and a knowledge of the Indian character, will almost invariably prevent bloodshed, and produce order and obedience.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, December 7, 1825.

Your letters of the 18th and 21st of October last, enclosing one from Mr. Edmund Doyle to you, were duly received. The President, to whom the Secretary referred the subject presented by them, has, under the impulse of humanity, ordered that these unfortunate people (the Florida Indian emigrants) be supplied in their emergency with necessary food, but upon a scale of the strictest economy, and to be accounted for by ration abstracts in your returns. For expenditures thus made, not to exceed $5,000, you are authorized to draw bills, from time to time, on the Secretary of War; which, there being no appropriation for such an object, will have to be paid out of the contingencies of the Indian Department.

It is hoped, however, that my letter of the 28th of November, written by direction of the Secretary of War, and conveying the information that the Big Hammock, as well as the Big Swamp, is included in the limits assigned to those Indians, will make any further expenditure unnecessary. But should you ascertain, beyond doubt, that it will not, and that these people will yet keep falling back upon the settlements, you will inform the Department without delay, that such measures as may appear to be necessary may be taken to meet such an exigency.

I have the honor, &c.

THOS. L. MCKENNEY.

SIR:

MIDDLE FLORIDA, TALLAHASSEE, December 12, 1825.

To Colonel McKenney, who is charged with the Indian affairs in your Department, I have written a particular account of the Indian affairs in this Territory.

The responsibility which the agent, Colonel Humphreys, has thrown upon me, by not conforming to my instructions, (copies of which have been transmitted to Colonel McKenney,) has not only surprised me, but has seriously deranged my whole plan for the government of the Indians in this quarter. I am not informed by the agent why my instructions were not pursued, or why the Indians were not brought within their limits, although they went to the borders. I am convinced a military force is necessary to bring these people to order and obedience, and I have recommended the establishment of a post on the south frontier of Alachua. My personal influence will very much contribute to effect any order which your Department may require to be executed.

Permit me to suggest that, if Congress should make any arrangements with the Creek nation, so as to remove them entirely, the Seminole Indians would be willing to go with them, and that a treaty might be made with the Florida Indians highly advantageous to the United States. Should such a measure be authorized by the Government, I cannot too strongly urge the appointment of Colonel James Gadsden as one of the commissioners; he is not only personally acquainted with all the chiefs, but understands the Indian character perfectly. The Indians on the Appalachicola, whose lands were reserved to them by the late treaty, would, no doubt, be willing also to emigrate.

I have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, December 15, 1825.

I have the honor, by direction of the Secretary of War, to state to you, that information has been received at the Department, implicating the methods resorted to by you to procure the consent of the Florida Indians to the treaty of 18th of September, 1823; and that those methods were of a description calculated to terrify the Indians into a compliance; without which, owing to their settled objection to give up their lands and emigrate, the treaty would not, in all probability, have been concluded.

The Secretary directs that you will, with as little delay as possible, report to him the facts in this case, and state, explicitly, whether any resort was had to means, and of any kind, tending to force upon those Indians a compliance with the terms of said treaty.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY.

*From Governor Duval to the Secretary of War.*TALLAHASSEE, December 16, 1825.

I regret to state that about three hundred Indians have returned from the country assigned to them, and have crossed the Suwanee river. Complaints are daily made to me by the citizens against the Indians. They continue to kill cattle and steal corn from the settlers, who are now ready to take up arms, and repel the intrusion and outrages of these unfortunate people. I have sent orders to Alachua, to the commanding officer of the militia, not to permit any attack to be made on the Indians for killing cattle; and I hope you will recommend to Congress to make some provision to indemnify the citizens for their losses. I have every reason to believe that many of the Indians are in a starving condition. I have not heard from the agent on the subject of the withdrawal of the Indians from his agency. I fear he has lost all influence over them, and now nothing short of force can restrain them.

If I had the command of two hundred regulars, and were permitted to employ two of the Appalachicola chiefs, who were once under General Jackson, with a few of their men, I feel confident I could, without the danger of bloodshed, make all the Indians return to their boundary. These people have great confidence in me, yet they fear me as they should; with this force, I pledge myself that the treaty should be carried into complete execution, in peace, and to your satisfaction.

The Indians who have recrossed the Suwanee I have ordered to be furnished with twenty days' rations, and directed them immediately to return back to their lands.

If the Indians are removed from the Big Swamp, Congress must make some provision to feed them until some time in July next, or they will certainly starve.

I must again urge the necessity of establishing a military post on the south frontier of Alachua.

I wait for such orders and directions as you may please to forward.

I am, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

No. 46.

From Thomas L. McKenney to Governor Duval.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, December 26, 1825.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your several communications of the 2d and 12th instant, accompanied by an explanatory map of the country ceded to the Florida Indians, and a letter to you from J. Beloure, complaining of depredations upon his property by a party of the emigrant Indians; also, certain copies of letters and instructions to the agent, Colonel Humphreys: all which have been submitted to the Secretary of War.

I am directed by the Secretary, in reply, to state, that he had received from the late acting Governor Walton certain communications relating to the issuing of rations, &c., and a copy of one from Charles Pindar to Colonel Walton; the complexion of which, taken altogether, was not satisfactory. No reply has been made to Colonel Walton. It was delayed in the expectation that something further might happen in regard to these communications; or at least that the aid extended to the Indians, on the representations which had been made of their starving condition, might produce quiet and a state of permanent harmony, when the instructions conveyed in that correspondence, implicating some of the parties, would have formed the subject of a special inquiry.

The points of difficulty appear to be two:

1st. The location of the Indians by the agent upon lands (called the Big Swamp) not included in the extension of the northern boundary.

2d. The overissue of rations by the agent, in violation of positive instructions.

In regard to the first, the Secretary of War directs, however exceptionable he esteems the location, under all the circumstances of the case, to be, that the Indians be permitted to occupy both the Big Swamp and the Big Hammock: the Big Hammock of right, and by virtue of a formal and legal extension of the northern and western line; the other by courtesy, and for the time being, subject to the future directions of the President. You will explain this to them fully; and give them the option to accept of this right of temporary occupancy, or go at once and locate permanently within the limits assigned to them; or, if they would prefer it, to lands which the Government is willing to assign them west of the Mississippi.

The subject of your recommendation for the establishment of a military post on the south frontier of Alachua will be considered by the Secretary.

The Secretary directs that you proceed with the examination of the complaints in regard to the rations. This subject having been intrusted to you, under instructions from the Department, no one, it is presumed, can so well determine upon the abuse which is implied in the several communications before me, or a violation of your instructions by the agents.

The Secretary of War directs that you make a thorough examination into every branch of the subject connected with the procuring and issuing of the rations, and especially into that referred to by Colonel Walton, on Mr. Pindar's letter to him; and report the same, with your own opinions, to the Department.

You will order the sub-agent to such point on the Appalachianicola as you may esteem to be best.

The answers to your queries are these:

1st. If, in the examination now ordered, you shall find the delivery of rations by Mr. Chaires was indispensable to the Indians, and that they could not have been sustained without them, you will pay for them.

2d. The excess is to be allowed on the same principle.

3d. All the accounts of the agent are to be submitted to your examination; on which you will make such decisions, as well in regard to numbers as other things, as you may esteem it proper to make, to be submitted to the Department for its final determination.

It will be proper to ascertain the loss complained of by Mr. Belloure, and report it to the Department, with your own opinion of its fairness. The Indians, under the act of 1802, will be held responsible for such acts; and so you will inform them.

Your views in regard to the mode of paying the Indians their annuities are in strict accordance with my own. There can be no doubt of the evils which result to these unfortunate people from the application, by themselves, of their annuities; nor that the amount goes directly to the venders of spirituous liquors, who beset the annuity grounds. Annuities are a curse to the Indians rather than a blessing, unless their application be made for them. Humanity requires that you take measures to obtain their consent to allow the annuity to be paid to them in goods suited to their wants; but, if they insist on having the money, we have no right to refuse it.

Very respectfully, &c.

THOMAS L. MCKENNEY.

To His Excellency Wm. P. DUVAL, Governor of Florida.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, December 27, 1825.

Your letter to the Secretary of War of the 12th instant is received. You will receive, with this, his reply to your several communications; also, to those previously forwarded by Colonel Walton.

The subject of a further emigration of the Florida Indians you were authorized to propose to them in the letter of yesterday. As a preliminary, you will ascertain their dispositions in regard to this step, and report them, together with an estimate of the cost of emigration. It is not necessary to make their removal turn on the contingency of that of the Creeks.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. L. MCKENNEY.

No. 48.

SIR: TALLAHASSEE, January 2, 1826.

I have the honor to transmit to you the petition of the Seminole chiefs, drawn up at their special request, and delivered in General Council. This contains strong evidence that the agent must have discharged his duty, as far as he had the power and means, as a faithful guardian of these unfortunate children of the wilderness.

Understanding that some remonstrance or petition has been forwarded to your Department, calculated to injure the character of the agent, Colonel Humphreys, which certain individuals have secretly promoted by art and intrigue, and who are frequently advising the Indians contrary to talks of the agent; these clandestine attempts will, I feel assured, have no influence in your Department. I flatter myself that, when the causes of complaint shall be strictly examined, it will be found that the agent has incurred the enmity of many who abuse him for discharging only his duty.

Much of dissatisfaction has arisen from the Indians leaving their location, and roaming over the country; but the Seminole nation is composed of many lawless Indians from the Creeks and other tribes, and they cannot be restrained within the limits assigned them by treaty, unless a post is established on the south frontier of Alachua. You may rest assured that the Indians must, in many instances, actually starve, or steal from the white people, unless the Government shall make some provision for their support until the next crop can be gathered.

The Appalachianicola Indians, who are industrious, and have excellent lands, are also in the most deplorable condition: this is owing to the river overflowing its banks late last summer, by which their entire crops were destroyed. Gentlemen of high respectability, who saw their fields before the inundation, have assured me the crops were in fine order, and as promising as any in Florida. The Appalichicola Indians have good houses and fences, and bid fair to advance in civilization. They have had less assistance from the Government than any other Indians, for they did not need it. I earnestly recommend them to the Government for some relief in their present distress; and I will, during the present year, often attend at their towns, and see that they cultivate their fields well. I hope the humanity of Mr. Barbour will be exerted in behalf of these suffering people, and that he will apply to the President to recommend to Congress to make such provision as they may consider adequate to their actual existence.

I am, &c.

WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

Colonel THOMAS L. MCKENNEY, Office of Indian Affairs.

[Accompanying No. 48.]

We, the undersigned chiefs and headmen of the Florida or Seminole nation of Indians, in behalf of ourselves and people, all of whom are now present, wishing to evince our satisfaction with the manner in which the kindness of the Government of the United States has been manifested towards our nation since we placed ourselves under its protection, by the treaty concluded at Moultrie creek, September 18, 1823; and being desirous, at the same time, to acknowledge the fidelity and punctuality with which that treaty has been fulfilled on the part of the United States, embrace the opportunity of this first general meeting in council since the treaty aforesaid to declare freely, voluntarily, and in perfect sincerity, that we feel bound by every principle of right and justice to observe and perform, with exactness and integrity, the obligations assumed by us in the treaty.

The first year's annuity promised us by that treaty we have received; the rations promised have been regularly furnished, plentifully, and to our entire satisfaction; the stock cattle have also been received; the smith's shop, and other conveniences guaranteed, have been duly provided; and, in fact, every thing we had a right to expect from the Government of the United States we have enjoyed. Under these circumstances, did not a desire which we ardently entertain to continue on terms of perfect friendship with the white inhabitants of the Territory prompt us to such a course of conduct as will conduce to preserve the good understanding which we now have with those inhabitants, we are urged to it by a regard for good faith and a proper sense of the obligations we owe.

Induced by the foregoing considerations, as well as by the conviction that it will tend to sustain and promote the prosperity of our nation, we hereby pledge ourselves to use our utmost and constant exertions to discountenance and check any thing on the part of our people calculated to cause a breach of the amicable relations at this time existing between ourselves and our white brethren, or to withdraw from us the protection and friendship, which we fully appreciate, of the Government of the United States.

Much, however, as we have reason to be, and are, satisfied with the justness and kindness thus far practised towards us, we cannot, nevertheless, witness without extreme pain and apprehension the prospect before us, that our people must necessarily, owing to the almost entire failure of our present year's crops, greatly suffer from hunger, unless the hand of relief is extended by our great father the President of the United States, on whose benevolence and parental regard we place the most assured reliance. We hereby solicit our father the Governor of the Territory, whose kindness we have always experienced, to procure for us that relief which our case requires; without which we must inevitably feel from want.

We are aware that we may not claim, as a right under the treaty, that issues of provisions should be continued to us beyond the period therein specified, and, therefore, as such, we do not ask it; we only hope, as by a severe drought which generally prevailed the past season throughout our own territory, and by other circumstances, we are deprived of the usual products of our labor, that provision to supply the deficiency thus created (until another summer) may be made by the munificence of the Government of the United States. Should it be thought too much to continue to us the whole ration as given by the treaty, we shall be entirely contented and eminently benefited by the corn part of the ration alone; the expense of which, we are certain, will be considered trifling, when compared with its importance to us.

In making this petition to our great father, we feel a perfect confidence that we are addressing one whose ears are never closed against the appeals of distress or the calls of humanity.

[Signed by eighteen chiefs and headmen.]

[1st SESSION.]

CLAIM OF THE STATE OF ALABAMA UNDER THE TREATY MADE WITH THE CREEKS
AT THE INDIAN SPRINGS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 7, 1826.

Resolutions instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to procure for this State the immediate right to the lands acquired by the recent treaty at the Indian Springs.

The select committee, to whom was referred his excellency's communication concerning the interest which this State has in the lands acquired by the recent treaty with the Creek Indians at the Indian Springs, and concerning the provision that ought to be made for, and the disposition that ought to be made of, the Indians residing thereon, beg leave to report:

That they fully accord in the views of his excellency, as expressed in the enlightened and humane communication aforesaid, believing, as this committee does, that a due and proper attention to our interest in relation to that subject is not inconsistent with a humane and liberal policy towards the native Indians; and that they recommend to Congress an adoption of such measures in providing for said Indians, not adverse to the interests of this State, as may most conduce to their comfort, and their moral and social condition. In relation to the other object referred to in said communication, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama in General Assembly convened, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their best efforts to procure for this State the immediate right to that part of the land acquired by said treaty lying within the chartered limits of this State.

Resolved further, That his excellency be requested to transmit to our Senators and Representatives in Congress one copy of the executive communication and the foregoing resolution.

WM. KELLY, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved, January 14, 1826.

JOHN MURPHY.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, CAHAWBA, January 16, 1826.

I certify the foregoing to be a correct copy of the original roll deposited in my office.

JAMES I. THORNTON, Secretary of State.

To the honorable the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives.

GENTLEMEN:

The present communication I make reluctantly, but from a sense of duty. I have, for some time past, during your present session, revolved in my mind the propriety of bringing to your view the concern which we have in the proceedings on the late Indian treaty, by which the State of Georgia and this State acquired territory from the Creek nation of Indians: the State of Georgia, the property and jurisdiction of the soil; this State, the jurisdiction only. I have been fully sensible that it would require peculiar moderation, magnanimity, and reflection, either to assert or prosecute our rights, so as to avoid any unjust animadversions on the one hand, or charges of undue regard to self-interest on the other. The excitement which has elsewhere been felt, and which gave so much concern to the friends of the peace and harmony of the Union, and an unwillingness to appear upon the same troubled scene, gave monitions, not lightly to be disregarded, that the subject should not be touched without very justifiable necessity. The treaty, however, has been, and still is, before the public; and should we prosecute the concern which we have in it with moderation and liberality, becoming an enlightened and generous people, we shall acquit ourselves to the satisfaction of those in whose service we are, and stand justified and respected in the opinion of the other members of the confederation. This treaty is alleged not to have been negotiated in good faith, and, although duly ratified by the competent authorities, to be avoidable, on account of fraud in the means by which it was obtained. With this question, we have, of course, very little to do; we were not parties in the transaction, and are not constituted the judges of it. This is left to other powers, in which our high confidence may remain unimpaired; but should the treaty have been negotiated in such a manner as to entitle it to the ordinary force and obligation of such compacts, this State has acquired rights under it, which neither the people of this State nor our brethren of the United States would expect or wish us to abandon. Should this treaty have been entered into in such manner as other Indian treaties which have been sanctioned and continued of force, no refinements, hitherto unpractised, ought to operate to our prejudice, and deprive us of the right of our chartered limits, guaranteed by the confederation; a right which, in fact, involves population, revenue, strength, and respectability in the scale of the Union. We have every reason to confide that nothing will be done derogatory to the justice and magnanimity of the United States, or injurious to the interests of this or any other State, which can be avoided by much careful deliberation, or which lies beyond the reach of urgent necessity. There are, however, a combination of circumstances, a calculation of policy, an adjustment of beneficent purposes, a reconciliation of principles which may seem to conflict, which give to this question a novel character, and present it in an aspect altogether peculiar. It involves the rights and interests of States, the justice due to the aboriginal population, and the measures by which the munificence of the General Government may be most effectually and beneficially extended to them. We are rapidly approaching to a crisis in our affairs with a portion of the natives of the country, and it is high time to devise and to reduce to system a just and well-judging humanity, by which the future conduct of the United States towards them will be regulated.

When chartered limits were assigned to the several States having Indian population, it does not seem to have entered into the contemplation of any one that they would remain there fixed and permanent. Such had not been the constant experience; they had continually retired from our settlements, or had wasted away in the midst of us, without any valuable improvement in mind or morals. The Indians of the North and South (many nations of renown in their time) either became extinct, or wandered in scattered remnants, to take shelter with tribes which we had not yet approached, losing their name and the tradition of their former pride and power. Under this experience, the States have been led to expect the speedy possession of their limits, and have gone on to make their local arrangements with reference to this desired consummation. What, then, can be done to justify the aspiring expectation of the States, and deliver the Indians from the consequences (hitherto fatal) which have resulted from a proximity to our population? Or, are we to suppose that the results in future will be different from the past? Or, is it established that any beneficent purpose, which does honor to the General Government, may be carried into effect, in such a situation, to a greater extent, or with more facility, than in others which it is convenient to provide? These questions deserve a careful solution; and, with this view, it will be necessary to ascertain from what cause it has always been that their numbers rapidly decrease in the vicinity of civilized society. It is, no doubt, by the introduction of our vices, which are soon embraced, and have a strong and irresistible attraction, because the slow progress of morals and civilization among them is unable to oppose any effectual restraint. To civilize a people from a rude and barbarous condition, they should be removed from the influence of the vices and luxuries which prevail in civilized life, and subjected to that discipline and instruction by which a change of life, manners, and mental improvement, is gradually produced. The virtues must first be cultivated, and the mind strengthened against the seductions of vicious gratification. Such is the natural order of things; and experience only confirms what theory might justly predicate on a correct knowledge of human nature. Such has been the evidence of history; for the provinces farther removed from the vices, refinements, and luxuries of Rome, but subjected to its laws, and instructed by its arts, made the most solid, if not the most immediate, progress in civilization. This necessary course cannot be pursued with the Indians whilst they remain within our limits; they have continual access to whatever tends to corrupt them; they have constant testimony that their condition is regarded as inferior to others, than which nothing is more destructive to virtuous pride and generous emulation; and the abandoned part of our people (who alone can mingle freely with the nation, as a body, without losing their standing in society,) will introduce our vices, and prevent the introduction of our virtues, by which alone the deleterious effects of vice might be mitigated. We may therefore expect (as has been the case in all other instances) to see the rapid progress of the nation to extinction; destroyed by our bad example, (which they will soonest imitate,) and preyed upon by those among themselves who attain to greater improvement of mind, and, especially, learn to better effect the arts and the cunning by which self-interest, unrestrained by the correct influences of a higher order of society, appropriates to itself the rights and benefits to which others are entitled. What, then, is to be done for this people, who had priority of us in the occupation of this favored land? Must, then, the increase of our population, and the progress of improvement among us, continue to blot out their names from the catalogue of nations, and leave only faint traces of history that they ever had an existence? We should provide living monuments to show the liberality of our institutions towards the natives, and proudly boast of nations rescued from barbarism by our means, and exalted from so low an estate to the high standing and happiness of enlightened communities. This, it would seem, can only be done, subdivided and circumscribed as the Indian nations among us now are, by establishing them within limits of their own, guaranteed by the General Government; and by extending to them the protection of our arms, the patronage of our power, the benefits of learning, the knowledge of agriculture and the arts, and the humane influences of religion. In such a situation, they might become gradually subject to our laws; and, indeed, a change of their civil institutions may be absolutely necessary to their speedy civilization, or, at least, to facilitate its progress. In limits of their own, they would be freed from the restlessness, agitation, and uncertainty which attend their present condition. They must suppose they are at the mercy of superior power; that they oppose obstacles to the wishes of their neighbors; and that their situation is quite different, in point of right and stability, from that of the white population around them. It would be well to remove these impressions, (which must operate to their prejudice,) and place them on a footing, in that respect, with the people of the United States. I agree entirely with the just and liberal views of my predecessor in office on this subject, that the United States should assume a parental guardianship over them, and thus extend their beneficence in such manner as best to promote the welfare of the Indians. The United States can lose nothing by the exercise of this care and humanity towards them; they themselves will furnish the means, according to the liberal policy which recognises their right to the lands they occupy. The lands which they will relinquish within the chartered limits of the States will sell for an amount which will reimburse the treasury, and afford an excess which ought to satisfy any reasonable expectation from the national domain. To continue them where they are, to the great detriment of the several States, until they become extinguished, and thus surrender the whole of their lands, (which, in effect, it is believed would be the final result of such a measure,) would neither comport with the justice, generosity, nor humanity of a liberal and Christian people. The vast unoccupied regions within the limits of the United States afford every desirable facility for the present accomplishment of this purpose. The Indians should not be located within the limits of any State or Territory, if it can be avoided; so that the recurrence of similar difficulty may be prevented in future. Let the Indians (a wandering and hitherto unsettled portion of our species) acquire, under the auspices of the United States, a fixed and permanent habitation. This obvious policy has not been overlooked in our national councils; and it would seem that the present moment is very propitious for the commencement of the systems which may hereafter be predicated upon it. The United States can lose nothing by us, even should we ask that a just provision, if practicable, be made for the Indians, which will lead to the extinguishment of their title within our limits, at least to the extent of the treaty; and, if the Indians received too little consideration under it for the lands which they relinquished, that the consideration be made ample and sufficient; and that the treaty be sustained, if this be the ground of complaint. We ask no violation of justice or humanity due to the Indians; we sincerely wish, and would be glad to contribute to, their improvement and happiness. But we have interests too; and if there may be, by a well-matured system, a due attention to our interests and theirs, we have a claim which will not be denied. I have only hastily touched upon the outlines of this subject, being engaged in other duties, and especially waiting for more precise information; and yet must claim your indulgence for the length as well as imperfection of the present communication. My main object, however, will be easily seen; which is, to invite your attention to make such representation to the Government of the United States as this subject, in all its various bearings, may seem to your wisdom to require. The temperate expression of our opinions and views will be kindly received by the national authorities, of whose justice and liberality we have had constant experience.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient, &c.

JOHN MURPHY.

[1st SESSION.]

PRESERVATION AND CIVILIZATION OF THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 21, 1826.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 3, 1826.

The duty assigned me by your letter of —, enclosing “a bill for the preservation and civilization of the Indian tribes within the United States,” is one both delicate and important. I have discharged it to the best of my judgment, by preparing, and herewith sending you, the project of a bill for your consideration, and a report in elucidation of its purposes. I seek shelter from what otherwise would be a painful responsibility, under the superior wisdom of those to whose judgment it is committed.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES BARBOUR.

Hon. JOHN COCKE, Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 3, 1826.

The condition of the aborigines of this country, and their future destiny, have long engaged the attention of the philosopher and statesman, inspiring an interest correspondent to the high importance of the subject. The history of the past presents but little on which the recollection lingers with satisfaction. The future is not more cheering, unless resort be speedily had to other counsels than those by which we have heretofore been governed. From the first discovery of America to the present time, one master passion, common to all mankind—that of acquiring land—has driven, in ceaseless succession, the white man on the Indian. The latter, reluctantly yielding to a force he could not resist, has retired from the ocean to the mountains, and from the mountains to more inhospitable recesses, wasting away by sufferings and by wars, foreign and intestine, till a wretched fragment only survives of the numerous hordes once inhabiting this country, whose portion is to brood in grief over their past misfortunes, or to look in despair on the approaching catastrophe of their impending doom.*

It were now an unprofitable task to inquire on what principle the nations of Europe were justified in disposing the original proprietor of his birthright. They brought with them their own maxims, which recognised power as the only standard of right, and fraud and force as perfectly legitimate in the acquisition of territory. It has been done, and time has confirmed the act.

In the contest for dominion, the milder qualities of justice and clemency were disregarded. But that contest has long since ceased, especially in the United States; where, on the one side, are seen a great people, familiar with arts and arms, whose energies are increased by union, and directed by an efficient Government; on the other, a few ignorant and divided tribes of barbarians. It is necessary only for the former to express its will, to receive or enforce immediate submission from the latter. The suggestions of policy or necessity should no longer stifle the claims of justice and humanity. It is now, therefore, that a most solemn question addresses itself to the American people, and whose answer is full of responsibility. Shall we go on quietly in a course, which, judging from the past, threatens their extinction, while their past sufferings and future prospects so pathetically appeal to our compassion? The responsibility to which I refer is what a nation owes to itself, to its future character in all time to come; for, next to the means of self-defence and the blessings of free government, stands, in point of importance, the character of a nation. Its distinguishing characteristics should be justice and moderation. To spare the weak is its brightest ornament. It is, therefore, a source of the highest gratification that an opportunity is now offered the United States to practise these maxims, and to give an example of the triumph of liberal principles over that sordid selfishness which has been the fruitful spring of human calamity.

It is the province of history to commit to its pages the transactions of nations. Posterity look to this depository with the most intense interest. The fair fame of their ancestors, a most precious inheritance, is to them equally a source of pride and a motive of continued good actions. But she performs her province with impartiality. The authority she exercises in the absence of others is a check on bad rule. The tyrant and the oppressor see, in the character of their prototypes, the sentence posterity is preparing for them. Which side of the picture shall we elect? for the decision is left to ourselves. Shall her record transmit the present race to future generations as standing by, insensible to the progress of the desolation which threatens the remnant of this people? or shall these unfriendly characters give place to a generous effort which shall have been made to save them from destruction? While deliberating on this solemn question, I would appeal to that high Providence, whose delight is justice and mercy, and take counsel from the oracles of his will, revealed to man, in his terrible denunciations against the oppressor.

In reviewing the past, justice requires that the humane attempts of the Federal Government, coeval with its origin, should receive an honorable notice. That they have essentially failed, the sad experience of every day but too strongly testifies. If the original plan, conceived in the spirit of benevolence, had not been fated to encounter that as yet unabated desire to bereave them of their lands, it would, perhaps, have realized much of the hopes of its friends. So long, however, as that desire continues to direct our councils, every attempt must fail. A cursory review is all that is necessary to show the incongruity of the measures we have pursued, and the cause of their failure.

Missionaries are sent among them to enlighten their minds, by imbuing them with religious impressions. Schools have been established, by the aid of private as well as public donations, for the instruction of their youths. They have been persuaded to abandon the chase, to locate themselves, and become cultivators of the soil; implements of husbandry and domestic animals have been presented them; and all these things have been done, accompanied with professions of a disinterested solicitude for their happiness. Yielding to these temptations, some of them have reclaimed the forest, planted their orchards, and erected houses, not only for their abode, but for the administration of justice and for religious worship; and when they have so done, you send your agent to tell them they must surrender their country to the white man, and recommit themselves to some new desert, and substitute, as the means of their subsistence, the precarious chase for the certainty of cultivation. The love of our native land is implanted in every human bosom, whether he roams the wilderness, or is found in the highest state of civilization. This attachment increases with the comforts of our country, and is strongest when these comforts are the fruits of our own exertions. We have imparted this feeling to many of the tribes by our own measures. Can it be matter of surprise that they hear, with unmixed indignation, of what seems to them our ruthless purpose of expelling them from their country, thus endeared? They see that our professions are insincere; that our promises have been broken; that the happiness of the Indian is a cheap sacrifice to the acquisition of new lands; and when attempted to be soothed by an assurance that the country to which we propose to send them is desirable, they emphatically ask us, What new pledges can you give us that we shall not again be exiled when it is your wish to possess these lands? It is easier to state than to answer this question. A regard to consistency, apart from every other consideration, requires a change of measures. Either let him retain and enjoy his home; or, if he is to be driven from it, abstain from cherishing illusions we mean to disappoint, and thereby make him to feel more sensibly the extent of his loss.

Having pointed out the incongruities of this system, so unhappily organized that it contains within itself the causes of its own abortion, I proceed to review the more modern plans of removing the different tribes from the east to the west of the Mississippi. That this plan originated in that benevolence for which its author is so distinguished, is cheerfully admitted; but that it, too, is obnoxious to many objections, I fear is no less true. The first objection is the impracticability of its execution, if that is to depend on treaties alone. Some of the tribes in whose removal we are most deeply concerned have peremptorily refused to abandon their native land. Those who may be persuaded to emigrate will carry with them the same internal feuds which are so destructive to their kind, and for which no remedy is proposed. Different tribes are to be placed in juxtaposition, without a controlling power, between which hereditary and implacable hostilities have raged, and which are not likely to be appeased till the one or the other is exterminated. But, these difficulties surmounted, in what relation are they to stand to the United States? The history of every age teaches us how difficult it has been to maintain tranquillity between continuous and independent States, though civilized. How must that difficulty be increased, when one of the parties is savage? Thefts, and murders, and numberless causes of discord, must inevitably precipitate collisions, which cannot but prove fatal to the weaker party; and the same propensity which has conducted the white population to the remote regions they now occupy, will continue to propel the tide, till it is arrested only by the distant shores of the Pacific. Before this resistless current the Indian must retire, till his name will be no more. It would be, however, worse than useless to waste your time in multiplying objections to existing plans; I have, therefore, supposing it to be within the duty assigned me by the committee, submitted the project of a bill, with such provisions as I think, under all the circumstances, are best calculated to effect the desired object.

In performing the service assigned by the committee, whose wishes alone would have been a sufficient inducement on my part to render a cheerful compliance, I have a further reason—a desire to comply with the requests of the people of the United States residing in the neighborhood of Indian settlements. The Department is continually pressed with applications, from New York to Arkansas, to adopt measures to extinguish the Indian titles to their lands, and to remove the Indians. An unavailing attempt to obtain a cession of their lands is sometimes ascribed by the disappointed to ignorance, or a want of zeal, or some worse motive, on the part of agents employed; and new attempts to negotiate are solicited with unabated importunity. The obstinacy of the Indians, arising from their partial civilization, whose removal we most wish, fully equals the zeal of those who wish to procure their lands; and hence an insuperable difficulty presents itself to effect, by treaties, the object which is so desirable—of putting an end to this fruitful source of collision.

I am not arrogant enough to suppose that it is free from all objections; for I am aware that no plan which human ingenuity could suggest would be altogether exempt, as the subject is encompassed on every side with difficulties. The utmost reach of my hopes is limited to a diminution of these difficulties, both in number and extent. It is only by comparison, I am satisfied, that my scheme can solicit a preference. I submit the outlines of the bill, the principles of which are the following:

1st. The country west of the Mississippi, and beyond the States and Territories, and so much on the east of the Mississippi as lies west of Lakes Huron and Michigan, is to be set apart for their exclusive abode.

2dly. Their removal by individuals, in contradistinction to tribes.

3dly. A Territorial Government to be maintained by the United States.

4thly. If circumstances shall eventually justify it, the extinction of tribes, and their amalgamation into one mass, and a distribution of property among the individuals.

5thly. It leaves the condition of those that remain unaltered.

In offering a few remarks upon these different heads, I beg to call the attention of the committee to the leading principle of the bill, namely: that nothing is proposed to be done, in reference to the Indians, without their own consent. In making this a preliminary to our acting, I have been influenced rather by a desire to relieve the proposed plan from objections, than from any settled conviction of its necessity. The relations between the United States and the Indians are so entirely peculiar, that it is extremely difficult to refer to any well settled principles by which to ascertain the extent of our authority over them. Our ancestors, as well as every European nation that seized upon their country, denounced them as heathens, utterly out of the pale of civil society, and, as a consequence, disposed of them according to their will and pleasure. From the adoption of the Federal Government, however, they were regarded, to some extent, as an independent people. Hence, treaties were made with them for a surrender of the usufruct of their lands. On the other hand, they were denied the exercise of this right as it respects other nations, and were even restrained from selling their lands to our own citizens. And, besides regulating their trade, Congress went so far as to punish, by the decisions of our own courts, for offences committed within or without their own territories. In forbearing to go further, it is left to conjecture whether it arose from a want of authority, or the expediency of exercising it. To avoid, therefore, any difficulty which different opinions might produce on this point, their consent has been made necessary by the bill, as a requisite, to its operation.

The first provision looks to the procurement of a country for their future residence beyond the settlements of the whites. Fortunately, that object can be easily effected. In adopting the limits prescribed in the bill, I have pursued the plan heretofore proposed. In including the lands as a part lying between Lakes Michigan and Huron, and the river Mississippi, I have been governed as well by the above consideration, as the fact that it is now in the occupancy of the Indians, and, from its natural features, is not desirable at present for the habitation of our citizens.

The principal recommendation of this plan, next to the advantages to be gained by ourselves, is, that the future residence of these people will be forever undisturbed; that there, at least, they will find a home and a resting-place; and being exclusively under the control of the United States, and, consequently, free from the rival claims of any of the States, the former may plight its most solemn faith that it shall be theirs forever: and this guaranty is therefore given.

The second provision referred to is that of effecting their removal by portions less than whole tribes, when the latter is impracticable. Some of the tribes, in whose immediate removal we are particularly interested, have expressed a fixed determination against an exchange of their lands. This difficulty is said to arise from the influence of their chiefs, who have appropriated the most fertile lands to themselves, and have become wealthy. Their consent to remove cannot be obtained; but the majority, or large portions of the tribe who have no such inducement to remain, it is asserted by those who know, or pretend to know their wishes, may be persuaded to emigrate. By the proposed plan, the fact can be ascertained; and whatever portion may be willing to go, will, under this provision, be removed.

The third object of the bill is the establishment of a Territorial Government by the United States for their protection and their civilization. The bill proposes a governor, three judges, and a secretary, to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and such modifications in detail as the President shall ordain, subject to the approbation of Congress.

I have already intimated, in a former part of this report, the consequences of sending the Indians to the country destined for their final abode, without some controlling authority. Without this, they will be exposed to endless mischiefs. It is not necessary to prescribe particularly in the bill their government. Its organization may safely be deposited in the hands of the President, subject to the control of Congress. I will, nevertheless, suggest that, as soon as the civilization of the Indians would admit of it, I would give them a legislative body, composed of Indians, (to be selected in the early stages by the President, and eventually to be elected by themselves,) as well for the purpose of enacting such laws as would be agreeable to themselves, as for the purpose of exciting their ambition. Distinction being the object of universal pursuit with man, whether barbarous or civilized, it is presented to the Indians in this scheme. They will be taught that there is another road to it than through blood and slaughter. The objection, on the part of the most intelligent, to an amalgamation with the whites, is, that they can never rise to offices of trust and profit. Here, this difficulty will be removed. Let us indulge the hope that, in time, they will be competent to self-government, when they may be left entirely to themselves, and when, in consequence, their ambition will find its proper theatre, and be gratified; then, none will have any adequate motive to remain among the whites.

A fourth object of the bill is, the division of their lands in such manner, and at such times, as the President may think proper. The object of this provision is to give the power to the President (when, in his judgment, circumstances will justify it) to distribute the land among the individuals by metes and bounds, in contradistinction to its being held in common by a tribe. Nothing, it is believed, has had a more injurious influence on our efforts to improve the condition of the Indians, than holding their land in common. Whether such a system may succeed on a very limited scale, when under a beneficent patriarchal authority, is yet to be ascertained. Past experience has left the strongest evidence against its practicability under less favorable auspices. The attempt of that kind in the first settlement of Virginia, and, I believe, in the early settlements elsewhere, conducted the colonists to the very brink of ruin, from which they were rescued only by abandoning it. The distribution of the soil, and the individuality imparted to the avails of its cultivation, history informs us, instantly gave a new and favorable aspect to their condition. How far the strong motives of human action may be modified by education and habit, may be left in the hands of speculative philanthropists. The only safe rule for Government is, to act on human nature as it is, and conform its changes of policy to new but well-ascertained developments. If, therefore, the position be a just one, that every attempt at a community of property has eventuated unsuccessfully, even with civilized man, it is no matter of wonder that it should have been equally so with the savage. To the lands thus granted, add liberally all that is necessary to enable them effectually to succeed in their new condition—implements of husbandry, mechanics for repairing them, domestic animals, and supplies of food. By directing a part of the funds at present paid for annuities, judiciously, under proper agents to be appointed by the United States, and as long as necessity required it, the Indian might be brought, by degrees, to a love of civilized life, and be reconciled to the performance of its duties. And although the difficulty of inducing him to labor is duly appreciated, yet, when its benefits are once realized in the individuality of its productions, and by increasing his comforts, the hope can scarcely be deemed desperate which places him under the same influences as the white man. I refer to the document B, as disclosing interesting information on this branch of the subject. The principle fixed, the time of its application to different tribes might be left to the discretion of the President, who, in its exercise, would conform to circumstances, commencing with those most convenient and most civilized, and cautiously extending its application till the whole be embraced. The money we annually expend on our Indian relations, and frequently not very profitably to them, from the manner of their appropriating it, would furnish an ample fund to meet any probable expense arising from the execution of this plan. By reference to document A, it will be seen that this year we have had to pay for this object $781,827 14.

To those advantages may be added the consideration, that, after an individual distribution, the effort of the whites to dispossess them of their lands thus held must cease. The individual appropriation of land gives a sanctity to the title which inspires respect in nations the most barbarous. It would repress, with us, any thought of disturbing it. When this is effected, their distinction of tribes may easily be abolished, and the whole consolidated into one great family. And, lastly, the bill leaves those that remain to the wisdom and justice of posterity. If, as is believed, the number disposed to emigrate is comparatively great, those that remain will be so few that their condition may be regulated without committing violence on their wishes or their interests, and yet reconciling their residence with the prosperity of the whites. It is obvious, from causes that need not be enumerated, that they must soon surrender their distinction of race for the resemblance of the white man, and accept, as an equivalent, the blessings which that resemblance cannot fail to bring with it—a peaceful but sure remedy, which may be safely left to time alone to produce.

I will add, that the end proposed is the happiness of the Indians; the instrument of its accomplishment, their progressive, and, finally, their complete civilization. The obstacles to success are their ignorance, their prejudices, their repugnance to labor, their wandering propensities, and the uncertainty of the future. I would endeavor to overcome these by schools; by a distribution of land in individual right; by a permanent social establishment, which should require the performance of social duties, by assigning them a country of which they are never to be bereaved, and cherishing them with parental kindness.

In looking to the possible results of this plan, I am cheered with the hope that much good may be effected with comparatively little injury. Our difficulties, in their present form, will be diminished, or entirely removed. The desire to acquire Indian lands will cease, and no longer produce collisions. The Indians will at last know their lot with certainty. That many will avail themselves of this arrangement, so as to arrive at the blessings of civilization, I think there can be no reasonable doubt; that all will not, I readily admit. The imprudent of our own people are equally beyond the reach of legislative protection.

To this may be added the consolation furnished by the recollection that, in the efforts we had made, we had acquitted ourselves of a debt of justice and humanity; and if they should even fail, by the overruling influence of an inscrutable destiny whose fulfilment requires their extinction, however it may fill us with sorrow, we shall be relieved from remorse.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES BARBOUR.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, December 13, 1825.

I now proceed to report upon the remaining parts of your directions of the 3d October last, to wit: "The effects, as already developed, of the present system for civilizing the Indians, and its probable and ulterior consequences upon them as a race, viewed both in relation to their present situation, and that which contemplates their future and permanent residence upon lands west of the Mississippi."

The effects of the present system for civilizing the Indians are everywhere, within the limits of its operation, salutary. The reports from the schools all testify to its excellence. Its superiority over all other plans for their improvement, and its exact adaptation to the end for which it was devised, will appear by comparing it with other efforts heretofore made for the accomplishment of the same benevolent object, and by a more detailed exposition of the consequences which are flowing from those now making.

The wise and good have never ceased, from the earliest periods of our intercourse with the aborigines of this country, to attempt, in one form or other, their rescue from barbarism, and to introduce among them the conveniences and the blessings of civilized life. But those kind designs were limited in their operations, and partial in their effects; so much so, indeed, as to confirm in many, and even in some who were reluctant to admit a conclusion involving such distressing consequences, the belief that the aborigines of America were incapable of receiving and of practising the lessons of civilization! But this problem has since been solved; and these failures are now known to have been occasioned by existing and long established habits, (and which are no less difficult to subdue, where they strike deep, in the white man than in the Indian;) to the game which everywhere abounded in their native forests; to the interminable war which avarice has waged against them; and to the defects in the plans which were resorted to for their enlightening and reformation. The most that was accomplished by the missionaries of those earlier and interesting periods was to reform, comparatively, a few Indians, and control, in some degree, the savage ferocity of others; to maintain and keep alive the spirit of kindness towards them; and to secure to themselves, as laborers in a cause so holy, an enviable immortality.

It is now easy to see at least some of the causes of their want of more abundant success. I will notice but one: that, however, next to the want of means and of teachers, is a principal one, and upon which all the rest, in a great degree, depended. Instead of instructing the Indians in a knowledge of the language of the country, and, by means of that mighty instrument, making avenues for their direct approach to, and intercourse with, the whites, and for their immediate acquaintance with the arts and conveniences of cultivated life, the missionaries adopted the plan of first learning the Indian language, and, by means of it, conveyed their instructions to them. They, moreover, confined themselves chiefly to lessons of morality and virtue. It is true that, without the practice of these, no people, whether civilized or savage, can attain to the excellencies of which our nature is capable; yet it is equally true that the savage man must be instructed also in the arts and conveniences of cultivated life, and made to feel the superior benefits which are to be derived from an ownership in and cultivation of the soil, and from the social virtues, over the uncertain and isolated and homeless condition of the mere hunter state. It was reserved for later times, if not to discover, at least to practise, this more practical and certain method of civilizing the Indians: hence the present system, whilst it maintains the dignity and purity of moral and religious instruction, keeps also in constant operation the means which are now leading so many Indians to an acquaintance with the domestic arts, with mechanics, and with agriculture. It has been by the union of these, aided, it is true, by the absence of game, that the present system for civilizing the Indians has, in the course of a very few years, produced such a striking change in the habits and practices of several of the tribes among whom it has been put in operation. Upwards of eleven hundred children, as has been shown in my report of the 30th ultimo, are now having imparted to them, and successfully too, the blessings of civilized and Christian life; whilst the older Indians, struck with its transforming effects, are themselves practising, to a very great extent, the lessons which they receive from their more fortunate offspring; and, in proof of their admiration of it, have, in many instances, contributed from their own scanty resources to its support. Several tribes have placed at the disposal of the superintendents of the schools, under the direction of the General Government, large annuities. The Choctaws have allotted twelve thousand dollars of their means per annum, for nearly twenty years, towards the support of this system; and the Chickasaws have given one year's annuity, amounting to upwards of thirty thousand dollars, as a fund for the same object.

The Cherokees on this side of the Mississippi are in advance of all other tribes. They may be considered as a civilized people. Their march has been rapid. Less than thirty years ago they were so insensible to the conveniences of roads, as to have grown jealous of the missionary who had entitled himself to their confidence, (and justly too), for recommending them to open a wagon road from one of their villages, for the advantage of an easier intercourse with another. Something, it is true, had been accomplished in the instruction of a few Cherokees in letters, and in the domestic arts, by the aged and venerable Moravian missionary who yet resides in the Cherokee nation; but the first school established there, under the present system, was in 1817. I cannot better illustrate the results of this system than by introducing here a statement of the present condition of the Cherokees, from the pen of a young man, a native Cherokee, who is indebted to this system for his improvement, and who was eight years ago, as he told me himself, "a savage," without any knowledge of our language, or the principles of that sublime religion, to the cause of which he has devoted himself for the benefit of his countrymen. I shall not only be excused, but justified, I am sure, in introducing the following extracts from his letter, addressed to the editor of the Family Visitor, at Richmond, in September last. It is truth we are in quest of, and facts are the best instruments for its development. Theory, and all previously conceived opinions, which are adverse to Indian capacity and Indian improvement, must give way to the stubborn demonstration of such facts as David Brown discloses, even if there were no others; but there are many such.

"WILLSTOWN, (CHEROKEE NATION,) September 2, 1825.

"In my last letter from Creek Path to you, I stated that there was some probability of my returning to Arkansas, &c.; and referred to the improved condition of the Cherokees on this side of the Mississippi, in a moral, intellectual, and religious point of view, &c.; to the slow progress I make in translating the New Testament, in consequence of the non-existence of a dictionary or complete grammar in Cherokee; and to the philological researches of one in the nation, whose system of education had met with universal approbation, &c.

"Allow me, dear sir, now the pleasure to fulfil the promise I made you, that I would pick up and send you what I had omitted. Recently I have been travelling a good deal in the nation, in order to regain my impaired health. My heavenly Sovereign permitting, I expect to return to Arkansas in the month of October next. I have made a hasty translation of the four gospels, which will require a close criticism. On my arrival at Dwight, I shall pursue the delightful work; and I hope the day is not far distant when the Cherokees, my brethren and kindred according to the flesh, shall read the words of eternal life in their own tongue. I will here give you a faint picture of the Cherokee nation and its inhabitants; in the mean time, however, it must be borne in mind that it is the mass and common people that form the character of a nation, and not officers of government, nor the lowest grade of peasantry.

"The Cherokee nation, you know, is in about thirty-five degrees north latitude; bounded on the north and west by the State of Tennessee, on the south by Alabama, and on the east by Georgia and North Carolina. This country is well watered; abundant springs of pure water are found in every part; a range of majestic and lofty mountains stretch themselves across the nation. The northern part of the nation is hilly and mountainous; in the southern and western parts there are extensive and fertile plains, covered partly with tall trees, through which beautiful streams of water glide. These plains furnish immense pasturage, and numberless herds of cattle are dispersed over them; horses are plenty, and are used for servile purposes; numerous flocks of sheep, goats, and swine cover the valleys and hills. On Tennessee, Ustanala, and Canasagi rivers, Cherokee commerce floats. The climate is delicious and healthy; the winters are mild; the spring clothes the ground with its richest scenery; Cherokee flowers, of exquisite beauty and variegated hues, meet and fascinate the eye in every direction. In the plains and valleys the soil is generally rich, producing Indian corn, cotton, tobacco, wheat, oats, indigo, and sweet and Irish potatoes. The natives carry on considerable trade with the adjoining States; and some of them export cotton, in boats, down the Tennessee to the Mississippi, and down that river to New Orleans. Apple and peach orchards are quite common, and gardens are cultivated, and much attention paid to them; butter and cheese are seen on Cherokee tables. There are many public roads in the nation, and houses of entertainment kept by natives. Numerous and flourishing villages are seen in every section of the country. Cotton and woollen cloths are manufactured here; blankets, of various dimensions, manufactured by Cherokee hands, are very common; almost every family in the nation grows cotton for its own consumption. Industry and commercial enterprise are extending themselves in every part; nearly all the merchants in the nation are native Cherokees; agricultural pursuits (the most solid foundation of our nationa prosperity) engage the chief attention of the people. Different branches in mechanics are pursued. The population is rapidly increasing; in the year 1819, an estimate was made of all the Cherokees: those on the west were estimated at five thousand, and those on the east of the Mississippi at ten thousand souls. The census of this division of the Cherokees has again been taken within the current year, and the returns are thus made: native citizens, thirteen thousand five hundred and sixty-three; white men, married in the nation, one hundred and forty-seven; white women, married in the nation, seventy-three; African slaves, one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven. If this summary of Cherokee population from the census is correct, to say nothing of those of foreign extract, we find that, in six years, the increase has been three thousand five hundred and sixty-three souls. If we judge the future by the past, to what number will the Cherokee population swell in 1856?

"White men in the nation enjoy all the immunities and privileges of the Cherokee people, except that they are not eligible to public offices. In the above computation of the present year, you perceive that there are some African slaves among us; they have been, from time to time, brought in and sold by white men; they are, however, generally well treated, and they much prefer living in the nation to a residence in the United States. There is hardly any intermixture of Cherokee and African blood. The presumption is, that the Cherokees will, at no distant day, co-operate with the humane efforts of those who are liberating and sending this proscribed race to the land of their fathers. National pride, patriotism, and a spirit of independence mark the Cherokee character.

"The Christian religion is the religion of the nation; Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, and Moravians are the most numerous sects. Some of the most influential characters are members of the church, and live consistently with their professions. The whole nation is penetrated with gratitude for the aid it has received from the United States Government and from different religious societies. Schools are increasing every year; learning is encouraged and rewarded; the young class acquire the English, and those of mature age the Cherokee system of learning. The female character is elevated and duly respected. Indolence is discountenanced. Our native language, in its philosophy, genius, and symphony, is inferior to few, if any, in the world. Our relations with all nations, savage or civilized, are of the most friendly character. We are out of debt, and our public revenue is in a flourishing condition; besides the amount arising from imposts, a perpetual annuity is due from the United States, in consideration of lands ceded in former periods. Our system of government, founded on republican principles, by which justice is equally distributed, secures the respect of the people. New Town, pleasantly situated in the centre of the nation, and at the junction of Canasagi and Gusuwati, two beautiful streams, is the seat of Government. The legislative power is vested in what is denominated, in native dialect, Tsalagi TiniLawige, consisting of a national committee and council. Members of both branches are chosen by and from the people, for a limited period. In New Town a printing press is soon to be established; also, a national library and a museum. An immense concourse of people frequent the seat of Government when the Tsalagi TiniLawige is in session, which takes place once a year."

The success which has attended the philological researches of "one in the nation," and whose system of education has met, among the Cherokees, with universal approbation, certainly entitles him to great consideration, and to rank with the benefactors of man. His name is Guess, and he is a native and unlettered Cherokee. Like Cadmus, he has given to his people the alphabet of their language. It is composed of eighty-six characters, by which, in a few days, the older Indians, who had despaired of deriving an education by means of the schools, and who are not included in the existing school system as participators of its benefits, may read and correspond! I have the honor to accompany herewith, in paper marked C, this alphabet, together with an example in the word "friend," and also the sound of each character, numbered from 1 to 86.

The probable and ulterior consequences upon the Indians, as a race, of the system for their civilization, whether viewed in relation to their present situation, or that which contemplates their future and permanent residence upon lands west of the Mississippi, will partake, it is reasonable to presume, more or less, and according as circumstances may be favorable or otherwise, of those which have already been developed. This is the necessary conclusion, if any regard be had to the effects which have already been produced. But the system, to be universally operative, and speedy in accomplishing the objects designed by it, should be so enlarged as to embrace the entire body of Indian children to whose tribes it may be extended. Without this, they will have to contend with opposing influences, and their progress will be less rapid. The examples of those not embraced by it will be necessarily felt. It is in the nature of man to imitate; and it being easier to imitate bad habits than good, the former will predominate, and especially among a people where the checks arising out of public opinion, and which apply to social and moral actions, are less regarded than are those which demand the exercise of self-denial and the sterner virtues. Whether, therefore, the Indians maintain their present location, or emigrate west of the Mississippi, and there settle under some congenial and paternal Government, as was proposed by our late venerable Chief Magistrate, it cannot be otherwise, if the present system for their civilization be sustained, than that they will continue to derive from it effects similar to those which have been disclosed. It is, however, in my opinion, very certain that, should they retain their present location, they will, in the course of a few years, be lost as a race. The very improvement which is now making, the refinements which it creates, and the conceptions which it inspires, cannot, whilst they retain their present relation to us, but produce in them feelings of deep humiliation. It is true the Cherokees have a government of their own; and they aspire, among themselves, to places of honor and trust. But the more enlightened of them feel that these honors, when attained, suffer in the comparison with those which are bestowed in the States; or, however gratifying their attainment may be, that they are never free from the terrible apprehensions which arise out of the uncertainty of their continuing where they are. Indeed, those of them who have thought most upon this subject, and who feel, with the return of every year, the swell of the same ocean that has swept off so many of their tribes breaking at their feet, have no objection to pass at once under the laws of the States, and into permanent repose, except that which arises out of their apprehension that a portion of their people are not yet prepared for it. But this portion are receiving, in their turn, the enlightening influences of the system of education; and a little time only will be required (so far, at least, as it regards the Cherokees,) to destroy this fear, when the whole tribe will, no doubt, seek to place themselves under the laws of the States, and, by that act, prepare the process for their extinction as a race. The same may be said of the other tribes, as they shall, in succession, advance to the same state of improvement. But a different result may be anticipated in regard to the question of their extinction or preservation as a race, were the entire Indian population now within the limits of our States and Territories (and which does not exceed one hundred and thirty thousand) collected and placed under the kind of government which has been referred to, and upon lands west of the Mississippi. They would be thus embodied as a separate people. The humiliating feelings arising out of their present relation to the whites and to our Government would be changed and elevated by the connexion which would be formed between them; and they would be secured, as well by their separate state as by the power of the Government under which they would live, and of which they would form part, from all further encroachments and insults, and freed from the apprehension, which is so paralyzing to them, of any future removal. Under such circumstances, it is reasonable to suppose that they would give full scope to those feelings which characterize them as a people, and which lead them to struggle so for their preservation as a race. To this day, the fragments of tribes within the States in the north and east cling to the exterior characteristics in their leggins and belts of wampum; thus demonstrating their devotion to their race. They are not ashamed of their origin nor of their complexion. They glory in both. Remove the existing causes that operate to humiliate them in their own eyes, and to depress their energies; give them, under our laws, an assurance of protection in that western home, and a share in the Government and in the public honors; make them, in a word, part of ourselves; and their improvement, in such a state, under the existing system for their civilization, so far from producing their extinction as a people, would tend to their preservation as a race.

The question of policy, as to which of those measures would conduce most to the public welfare and the happiness and prosperity of the Indians, and which now presents itself, is left for discussion to those who are more competent to it. But the age, I may be permitted to add, in which it is our happiness to live, has, by its enlightening and humanizing influences, decided that mercy shall rule, and liberality and kindness minister to these unfortunate people, in whatever relation it may be determined they are to stand to us.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THOS. L. MCKENNEY.

To the Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, March 1, 1826.

I have just read the printed copy of a letter from you to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and have also seen and examined the bill reported by that committee for the preservation and civilization of the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States; and, in obedience to your request, will now submit to you my ideas with respect to the interesting subject to which they relate.

The view which is taken in the letter, of the relative condition of the United States on the one side, and the Indian tribes on the other, is, in my opinion, perfectly correct; and the obligation which is imposed upon this Government to save them from extinction, as the letter suggests, and to make persevering exertions to improve their condition, is equally the dictate of magnanimity and justice. The events of the last two or three wars, from General Wayne's campaign, in 1794, to the end of the operations against the southern tribes, in 1818, have entirely changed our position with regard to the Indians. Before those events, the tribes nearest our settlements were a formidable and terrible enemy; since then, their power has been broken, their warlike spirit subdued, and themselves sunk into objects of pity and commiseration. While strong and hostile, it has been our obvious policy to weaken them; now that they are weak and harmless, and most of their lands fallen into our hands, justice and humanity require us to cherish and befriend them. To teach them to live in houses, to raise grain and stock, to plant orchards, to set up landmarks, to divide their possessions, to establish laws for their government, to get the rudiments of common learning, such as reading, writing, and ciphering, are the first steps towards improving their condition. But, to take these steps with effect, it is necessary that previous measures of great magnitude should be accomplished; that is, that the tribes now within the limits of the States and Territories should be removed to a country beyond those limits, where they could rest in peace, and enjoy in reality the perpetuity of the lands on which their buildings and improvements would be made.

This great measure is proposed in the bill to which I have referred; and the country west of Missouri and Arkansas, and west of the Mississippi river, north of Missouri, is the one destined to receive them. From all accounts, this country will be well adapted to their residence; it is well watered with numerous small streams and some large rivers; abounds with grass, which will make it easy to raise stock; has many salt springs, from which a supply of the necessary article of salt can be obtained; contains much prairie land, which will make the opening of farms easy; and affords a temporary supply of game.

I would recommend the following measures to be pursued:

1st. Employ commissioners, who are acquainted with the Indians themselves, and who are zealous in the business, to negotiate for their removal, and to impress upon their minds the conviction of the truth, that it is impossible for them to remain as independent nations within the limits of these States and Territories.

2d. Lay off suitable portions of country for the different tribes to remove to, and facilitate their removal by placing agents at suitable points where they will cross the Mississippi, and at other points on the line of march, to supply them with provisions, ammunition, &c. Nor should they be required to move in a body, but singly, or in families, as they pleased. In this way, a constant tide of Indian emigration is now going on from the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to the west of the Mississippi. They cross at St. Louis and St. Genevieve, under my superintendency; and my annual accounts with the Government show the aid which is given to them. Many leading chiefs are zealous in this work, and are laboring hard to collect their dispersed and broken tribes at their new and permanent homes.

3d. To assist them in commencing an agricultural life, by enclosing with fences an adequate portion of ground near to each village, and have it broken up with the plough, and divided into parcels for each family, and have it planted with all the common and most useful fruit-trees; also, furnish them with stock animals, and the different kinds of fowls, and assist them in the erection of permanent houses.

The condition of many tribes west of the Mississippi is the most pitiable that can be imagined. During several seasons in every year they are distressed by famine, in which many die for want of food, and during which the living child is often buried with the dead mother, because no one can spare it as much food as would sustain it through its helpless infancy. This description applies to the Sioux, Osages, and many others; but I mention those because they are powerful tribes, and live near our borders, and my official station enables me to know the exact truth. It is in vain to talk to people in this condition about learning and religion. They want a regular supply of food, and, until that is obtained, the operations of the mind must take the instinct of mere animals, and be confined to warding off hunger and cold. The nations which I have mentioned, and many others west of the Mississippi, have neither hogs nor cows, and do not want them, because they would eat up their little patches of corn, which are without fences, and because, as the whole nation have to go out to hunt twice a year, and at that period have nothing to eat at home, hogs and cows could neither go with them, nor be left at home in safety. They want nothing but horses and dogs, which accompany them in their hunts; and in these expeditions the aged and infirm, when unable to keep up, are frequently left to die. To stop all these evils, fences, stock, and grain are the first things to be given them.

4th. Establish common schools in the villages, to teach all the children to read, write, and cipher, &c. A college education for a few, while the body of the nation is left in ignorance, has been proved, by the experience of more than two hundred years, to be a most unprofitable experiment; and besides, (because there is no other way of dividing equally the large fund for education which is now accumulating in many tribes, except by establishing common schools in every village,) the fund for this purpose is too great to be given up to a few who choose to administer upon it. I presume that it is equal, at present, to more than two hundred thousand dollars, and is constantly increasing. Charities, among white people, are liable to be abused; and, among ignorant and careless Indians, much more so. A plan of education and accountability should be established by law. The superintendents and agents should be charged with its execution. Frequent rigorous and personal examinations should be had over the scholars and teachers, regular reports made to the Government, liberal pay given to the teachers at the end of each quarter, and after each examination; but large sums ought not to be put in their hands, to be used at discretion.

5th. Give to the tribes the idea of submission to the authority of a civil government. For this purpose, as many of the tribes or of the scattering bands as possible, understanding one language, should be collected near each other, over which a competent agent should be placed, with full power of conducting the executive part of a government, to be submitted to and adopted by the Indians, subject to such changes as may be recommended and approved by the President. It is believed that the executive agent, by his authority, will prevent the Indians from killing one another for the chief place, and keep the inferior officers (who should be Indians) within the bounds of their duty, and decide those differences by his influence or authority which are now decided by the rifle and tomahawk.

Some of the chiefs who wish to be headmen themselves might object to this, but the body of the tribes would approve it when they understood it; and there would be stations enough under the agent to try the abilities and satisfy the ambition of the different contending chiefs. A general government over the whole might be necessary and proper.

6th. The presence of agents, clothed with the authority of the United States, would probably be sufficient to prevent the chiefs from killing one another, and to prevent different tribes from attacking each other, or committing depredations upon the white people; but, to make sure of this, a show of troops is necessary, and some military posts ought to be established along the frontier of white settlements; and all the nation should be made responsible, out of their annuities, for the depredations which any one of its people should commit either on the whites or on Indians of other tribes.

7th. The permanent annuities ought to be commuted for limited ones; such a change would be beneficial to both the United States and the Indians. It would free the Treasury from what would otherwise remain an everlasting charge upon it, and which, in the lapse of a century, would amount to an enormous sum, as might readily be shown by looking to the annually increasing amount for the Indian Department, which exceeds seven hundred thousand dollars for the present year, of which about one-fourth is paid in annuities. In a century, the aggregate paid in annuities may be equal to one-fourth of the present national debt, without counting the probable increase. It would be better for the Indians to receive a large sum in a short time, than to be receiving a small one forever. The largest annuity which we pay affords but a few dollars per head, when divided among a tribe, and contributes nothing of much importance to the amount of their property; and it is property alone that can keep up the pride of an Indian, and make him ashamed of drunkenness, begging, lying, and stealing. It is property which has raised the character of the southern tribes. Roads and travellers through their country, large annuities, and large sums for land from the United States, and large presents to chiefs, have enabled them to acquire slaves, cattle, hogs, and horses; and these have enabled them to live independently, and to cultivate their minds and keep up their pride; while those even of the southern Indians who have no property, as I am informed, are in the lowest state of moral and mental degradation. An Indian will not work while in his uncultivated state; that is considered a disgrace. The period of danger to him is that in which he ceases to be a hunter, from the extinction of game, and before he gets the means of living from the produce of flocks and agriculture. In this transit from the hunter to the farming state, he degenerates from a proud and independent savage to the condition of a beggar, drunkard, and thief; neglecting his family, suffering for food and clothes, and living the life of a mere animal. To counteract the dangers of this transit, property in cattle, hogs, and horses is indispensable; and, to furnish these, the permanent annuities should be commuted into a gross sum, payable in equal annual parts, for a moderate term of years; and the women and children, upon whom the labor of cultivating the ground devolves, should be assisted in making fences, to which their own means and strength are inadequate; also, in planting orchards, and instructed in raising cotton, and in spinning and weaving it into cloth, and making it up into garments. Small mills should be built, and a miller provided, to save the women from the labor of pounding the corn; useful mechanics employed to make their ploughs, carts, wheels, hoes, axes, &c., and for the purpose of teaching the young Indians how to use and make them.

Most of these provisions I have found incorporated in your letter to the committee; and the adoption of others, herein suggested, I now recommend; and, if enacted into a law, I anticipate the commencement of a new era of prosperity in the condition of a people who have strong claims upon the justice and generosity of this Government.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

WILLIAM CLARK, Superintendent Indian Affairs.

CONDITION OF THE FLORIDA INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 1ST MARCH, 1826.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, March 1, 1826.

I communicate to Congress a letter from the Secretary of War, together with a representation from Colonel Brooke, relating to the present condition of the Indians in Florida, and which I recommend to the favorable consideration of Congress.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 14, 1826.

I have the honor to enclose herewith an extract of a letter from Colonel Brooke, of Florida, to Colonel Gibson, of this city, on the present suffering condition of the Florida Indians. The correspondence with the Department for some time past confirms the truth of Colonel Brooke's statement; and it was in consequence of those representations that partial relief was authorized by you from the contingencies of the Indian Department. Being convinced that the country to which those Indians have emigrated is not suited, either in soil or salubrity, to their preservation, instructions were, some weeks ago, forwarded to Governor Duval to ascertain their dispositions in regard to a removal to lands west of the Mississippi. It is hoped they may accede to the proposition. Meanwhile, however, humanity demands that they should be kept from starving. They are where they are by our seeking, and their country was exchanged, as is usually the case, by treaty; doubtless, with an ignorance on their part of the nature of that to which they consented to emigrate, and erroneous information on ours as to its fitness.

I respectfully recommend that the subject of the sufferings of these people be referred to the Congress, that such relief may be afforded as in the wisdom of that body may seem proper.

Connecting the object of the removal of those Indians with that of their immediate relief, I would suggest that the sum of fifty thousand dollars be appropriated, with a view to both.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

JAMES BARBOUR.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Extract of a letter from Colonel George M. Brooke to Colonel George Gibson, dated CANTONMENT BROOKE, December 20, 1825.

You will perceive by the ration returns for this month that more rations have been issued to the Indians than usual. This has been occasioned by a number of Indians (say from six to seven hundred) who were obliged to come to the sub-agency, near the cantonment, for the purpose of receiving their presents from the Government, agreeably to the treaty; most of them had travelled from eighty to one hundred miles, and were entirely without subsistence. The issuing of rations to the Indians under the treaty expired on the 10th of October. The major part of the nation are, and have been, suffering for some time in extreme want. Some have died from starvation, and many have lived upon the roots of the sweet-briar, as a substitute for bread. This is owing to several causes: 1st. The continued droughts, for two months, whilst their corn was tasseling. 2d. Those who removed within the new boundary line had to cultivate new lands, which will not produce the first year of planting; and, 3d. Many did not come in till it was too late to plant.

I can assure you they are in the most miserable situation; and, unless the Government assists them, many of them must starve, and others will depredate on the property of the whites in the Alachua and St. John's settlements. It is impossible for me, or any other officer who possesses the smallest feelings of humanity, to resist affording some relief to men, women, and children, who are actually dying from the want of something to eat.

I therefore wish that an additional allowance of rations may be made for the post; and I trust that, on your representation to the Secretary of War, partial rations may be given generally, through the Indian agent.

G. M. BROOKE, Lieut. Colonel.

DESCRIPTION OF THE INDIANS RESIDING ON THE MISSOURI RIVER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 6, 1826.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 4, 1826.

Pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st instant, directing the Secretary of War to lay before the House "such information as he may have received respecting the movements of the expedition which lately ascended the Missouri river, under the command of General Henry Atkinson; and, also, such account as may have been communicated to him of the situation, number, and strength of the different Indian tribes inhabiting that part of the territory of the United States," I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a report of Major General Brown, with the accompanying documents, which furnishes the information required.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES BARBOUR.

The Hon. JOHN W. TAYLOR, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR:

HEAD-QUARTERS, WASHINGTON, February 3, 1826.

Agreeably to your instructions, attached to a copy of a resolution of the House of Representatives, calling for such information as may have been received respecting the movements of the expedition which lately ascended the Missouri river, under the command of General Henry Atkinson, I have the honor to enclose, herewith, the general's report, comprehending, in full, the information required.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAC. BROWN.

Hon. JAMES BARBOUR, Secretary of War.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, WESTERN DEPARTMENT,

SIR:

HEAD-QUARTERS, LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, November 23, 1825.

I have the honor to submit to you a copy of the report of Major O'Fallon and myself to the honorable Secretary of War, giving a detail of our operations as commissioners appointed to treat with the Indian tribes "beyond the Mississippi." It comprises both the movements of the military escort, and a description of the localities, habits, pursuits, and numbers of the several Indian tribes with which we have made treaties, including the Blackfeet and Assinaboin tribes, whom we did not see. As the detail is full, and contains the best information I can give upon these points, I beg leave to offer it as a part of my official report; adding, in conclusion, other remarks applicable to subjects that did not fall under our notice as commissioners. [For this report, see No. 226, p. 605.]

With respect to the river and bordering country, from Council Bluffs to the extreme point the expedition reached in its ascent, both may be compared to that below the Bluffs, until we arrive at the mouth of Poncar river, a distance of three hundred miles by water; the river thus high being as difficult of navigation as it is below, and the bottom lands equally fertile and productive.

The timber, however, which is chiefly cotton-wood, interspersed with ash, elm, and some oak and hickory, decreases somewhat in quantity and size in the bottoms, and of which there is an entire absence on the uplands. Immediately on reaching Poncar river, the face of the country materially changes. The bottom lands become narrow and less fertile, with but little timber; and the bluffs are more elevated, and approach nearer the river. The navigation is easier, the current being more gentle, and the banks affording better grounds for cordelling. The country maintains this character as far up as the Arickara villages, a distance of four hundred miles. Here the country has a much more favorable aspect: the bottoms resume their usual width, of from three to five or six miles, with a considerable quantity of cotton-wood, interspersed with ash and elm, skirting the river. The soil is fertile, but less so than it is below Poncar river; and the plains are clothed with a short and nutritive grass. The face of the country changes but little from hence to the mouth of Yellow Stone river, and above, on the Missouri, for one hundred and twenty miles, (the point from whence the expedition retrograded,) except that the soil becomes more thin and less fertile, and the Missouri being but little more than half the width above the Yellow Stone that it maintains below its junction with that river. It is understood, however, to be navigable for large keel-boats to the falls, a distance of seven hundred and fifty miles above the confluence of these rivers.

With regard to the propriety of establishing a military post near the Mandans, as suggested by your communication of the 21st July, it will be seen, by reference to the report of the commissioners, that no circumstances, either relating to the conduct of the British traders in a supposed intercourse with our Indians in that quarter, or as relates to the Indians themselves, would call for such a measure. The British traders, as stated in the report, never, of latter years, visit the Indians residing on the Missouri below the falls of that river, nor do those Indians visit the British establishments on Red river; and as all the tribes east of the mountains, except the Blackfeet, are friendly disposed towards Americans, our traders can go among them in great safety, without the protection of a military force. If, however, it should be thought advisable by Government to establish a military post in the upper country, as a point of rest to our traders, I would recommend the mouth of Yellow Stone river as the most eligible position; for here is the diverging point whence our traders must approach the mountains to the west and northwest. But, to give a practical protection to our people who seek for furs, (as this article is only to be profitably found upon the head waters of our rivers in the mountains,) a military force should be located near the three forks of the Missouri. Still, this is a point so remote, that a garrison could not be sustained there without vast expense; for it would be highly imprudent to depend on the game of the country for subsistence, as it is well known that buffalo quit any neighborhood occupied by white men; and, besides the expense, it would be difficult to send up supplies from the interior. From these considerations, I am of opinion that it is inexpedient, at this time, to extend our military post above Council Bluffs. I should rather recommend that, once in three or four years, a military force of from three to four hundred men should ascend the Missouri, as high as the falls of that river. By leaving Council Bluffs as early as the 1st of April, in a suitable class of transports, that point might be reached by the 1st of July; this would allow the detachment July, August, and part of September to open a communication with the Blackfeet Indians, which would result, I have no doubt, in a friendly understanding with that nation, and open a profitable intercourse for our traders. An occasional show of an imposing military force in an Indian country produces, in my opinion, a better effect than a permanent location of troops among them.

A Mr. Smith, an intelligent young man, who was employed by General Ashley beyond the Rocky Mountains for two years, and who visited a British trading-house on the north fork of Lewis's river last winter, informs me that British traders often visit the Blackfeet Indians, on the head waters of the Missouri, within our limits; trade with them, and trap for beaver; that on Lewis's river the British traders have three trading-houses—two occupied permanently, and the other during the winter. A fourth establishment, their principal depot, is called Fort George, (formerly Astoria,) a strongly fortified position on Columbia river, near its mouth, where they receive their goods, by ships navigating the Pacific, and whence they distribute supplies to their upper establishments and to their moving parties. The number of trappers and hunters employed by the British Trading Company beyond the mountains is estimated at six hundred men, chiefly half-breed Cree and Iriquoï Indians. The furs, which they take in great quantity, are carried down to Fort George, and thence shipped on the Pacific.

I learn from General Ashley that there is an easy passage across the Rocky Mountains, by approaching them due west from the head waters of the river Platte; indeed, so gentle in ascent, as to admit of wagons being taken over. This point is in about latitude forty-two—perhaps a little more south. In going west from this pass, you come to the head waters of a river which is believed to empty itself into the Pacific, some distance south of the mouth of Columbia river. The general is now preparing for me a topographical sketch of this section of country, which shall be forwarded to you as soon as received.

In answer to your inquiries respecting the propriety of establishing a military post on the Arkansas river, where the caravans usually cross in going to New Mexico from Missouri, I have to observe, that, being unacquainted with the country myself, I have made inquiry of those best informed on the subject, and refer you to the accompanying letter of Captain Gamble, an intelligent gentleman, who accompanied, as secretary, the commission appointed to mark out a road from Missouri to New Mexico. From this information, the contemplated road to Santa Fé (which seems to be the route already taken by the caravans) will strike the Arkansas at the north bend of that river, distant upwards of three hundred miles from our frontier, and an equal or greater distance from Cantonment Gibson, by land. If a military post is to be established for the protection of the caravans, this point would seem to be the most proper one, as it is about mid-way of the route to Santa Fé, and the only place where water and a scanty supply of fuel can be obtained. The benefits to be derived by the caravans from the protection of a military force, thus located, could only be limited and circumscribed, unless horses were provided and kept in readiness to mount eighty or one hundred men, to escort the caravans, and make fresh pursuit of depredating parties of Indians. Sustaining a garrison at this position must, of course, be expensive, as the means of subsistence, clothing, munitions, and other supplies, must be carried over land; the Arkansas river not being navigable, for even small craft, so high up. If the post should be contemplated as only a point to rest the caravans, I presume one company would be sufficient for that object; but if it should be intended that the caravans shall be protected on their journey, a garrison of four or five companies will be necessary, with horses to mount one hundred men. It would seem, however, from Captain Gamble's statement, that the caravans, when amounting to thirty or forty men, feel themselves free from insult by the Indians; and when we take into view the limited number of troops scattered along our extensive frontier, and which appear necessary for the protection of our frontier settlements, I could hardly recommend that any of them should be withdrawn from that service to establish the contemplated post. I nevertheless feel sensibly the claim which that enterprising class of our citizens who trade to Santa Fé have upon our Government for protection; but the means of affording it is a subject for higher authority to determine.

If, as it is contemplated by Government, the Indian tribes residing in the interior of the country are to be removed, and located on the borders of Missouri and Arkansas, it will require a cordon of posts along that whole extent of country to preserve peace among the multiplied number of tribes, and to give protection to our frontier.

With very great respect, sir, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

No. 234.

[1st SESSION.]

FUR TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 8, 1826.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill "for the better regulation of the fur trade," and laid on the table the following documents in relation thereto:

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 15, 1826.

I have the honor to enclose, herewith, copies of a letter and report to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, which embrace the reference of the same subject made by you to me in yours of the 7th instant.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES BARBOUR.

The Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON,

Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 15, 1826.

In reply to your letter of the 10th February, I have the honor to state, that as my attention had been previously called to the subject referred to, (viz: the operations of the fourth section,) by Messrs. Stuart and Pratte, engaged in the Indian trade, with a view to collect all the information within my reach, I referred the communication of these gentlemen to Governor Cass and the officer in charge of the Indian Bureau, connected with this Department. Their reports I herewith enclose, and to which I respectfully refer the committee. I beg leave to invite the attention of the committee to the other amendments suggested by Governor Cass, as being necessary to the successful operation of the policy of the United States in respect to the Indians.

I have not the bill before me, and therefore am less able to say precisely what the additional provision should be, whose necessity is suggested, in reference to the protection of the emigrants; yet, I venture to submit one which can be modified by the committee, who will give it its place in the bill.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

JAMES BARBOUR.

To the Hon. JOHN COCKE,

Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

And, upon a declaration being made by any Indian or Indians to a United States commissioner or commissioners, or to the Indian agent residing near or with the tribe or nation to which such Indian or Indians may belong, of a willingness to remove, he, she, or they, upon enrolling their names for that object, shall be considered by that act to be under the protection of the United States; and any injury done, thereafter, to the person or property of such Indian or Indians, shall subject the offender or offenders committing the same to be prosecuted and punished in the same manner, and to the same extent, as though the offence had been perpetrated on the person or property of a citizen within the territory of the United States.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 28, 1826.

We are extensively engaged in the Indian trade, and our experience has shown us some prominent and practicable defects in the present system.

The fourth section of the act of Congress, approved 25th May, 1824, makes it the duty of "Indian agents, from time to time, to designate certain convenient and suitable places for carrying on trade with the different tribes; and to require all traders to transact their business at the places thus designated, and at no other place or places."

The evils resulting, both to the traders and Indians, from the operation under this section, are apparent to all those who are practically informed on the subject; and we will take the liberty to point out some of them.

1st. The traders being bound to hold no intercourse with the Indians but at the designated houses of trade, causes a very considerable portion of the furs of the Upper Missouri, and those along our northern boundary line, to fall into the hands of the British traders, who, being aware of our circumscribed locations, will make all possible diligence to find out our Indian debtors, and secure the whole advantage of the result of their hunt; and thereby take from us a commercial resource, which was contemplated by our Government to be secured to its citizens.

2d. When the Indians are supplied with necessaries by their traders, they go off to a great distance from the trading stand, to make their hunt; and when it is completed, they have not the means, if they had the inclination, to transport the proceeds to the trading establishment: the consequence generally is, that the hunt is prosecuted with little energy; but, should it prove abundant, the first lawless itinerant who roams the country, regardless of the laws and regulations, will profit by the opportunity thus afforded, and obtain for little consideration a part, if not all the furs, to the great injury of the Indians, as well as the honest trader, who furnished the means of making the hunt.

3d. The Indians usually divide their country into different districts; they will hunt in one this season, and in another the next; and the location made this year will not suit the trader the year following. Nor can he be informed sufficiently soon each season in what quarter the Indians will pursue the next fall hunt, to enable him to apply for a change of his trading location, and obtain the sanction of the proper authorities in time to meet the trade.

4th. By this system, the trader can seldom know what supply of goods, clerks, and boatmen to take into the Indian country, not knowing the exact number of locations; and if to each tribe a location is assigned, the number of clerks and men must be adequate, and, consequently, the profit of the trader becomes extremely doubtful. But were he permitted, as formerly, to locate himself in the vicinity of the hunting ground, so as to be enabled to supply the casual wants of the Indians, and receive and carry home their peltries, it would enable him to make an accurate calculation of what men and other means should be required.

5th. Different establishments must, at present, be made, to secure the whole trade of any one band, who, for hunting purposes, are divided into small parties; and it is impossible to say what means may be necessary at any one point, either for protection or the purposes of trade. A large supply may be sent to one location, and but few Indians may hunt in that quarter, while additional men and means are required at another point.

6th. By the present system, it is rendered very unsafe for the trader to accord to the Indians the usual credits; without which, their sufferings must be great, and their wants will press them to commit depredations to obtain those necessaries, without which they are miserable.

We are firmly of opinion that no evil can possibly result by permitting free intercourse between the traders and the Indians, and that it would tend greatly to their mutual benefit and accommodation; because the Indians would then be securely trusted with the necessary articles for the winter, which is very important for the happiness of themselves and families; and the trader would be enabled to make the most judicious disposition of his men and goods, and have an opportunity of receiving his payment in furs and peltries, and of carrying them to watercourses; thereby saving the Indians the excessive labor of transportation.

Should you, sir, concur with us in this belief, we respectfully solicit the influence of your judgment in procuring a repeal of the fourth section above alluded to, and thereby give to this valuable branch of trade an additional and much desired facility for promoting its prosperity.

Sir, we are, most respectfully, your most obedient servants,

BERN. PRATTE,
ROBERT STUART.

HON. JAMES BARBOUR.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1826.

I have examined the letter addressed by Messrs. Stuart and Pratte to the War Department; and although in some of the details I may dissent from them in opinion, yet I agree in the general conclusion at which they arrive. I believe the system of establishing stationary posts for the traders in the Indian country has produced little advantage, while it has been attended with serious inconvenience to the traders and the Indians. I think it may be abolished with safety.

There are some defects in the existing laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, which I will take the liberty of suggesting to you, in the hope that the subject may be brought before the proper committee.

The act of Congress of March 30th, 1802, to regulate trade and intercourse among the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, contains several general provisions, prohibiting all white persons from going into the Indian country, for certain objects enumerated in the act. These provisions will be found in the second, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections. They are, generally, to hunt or destroy game, to commit certain specific offences, to make settlements and surveys, and to trade.

In the third section, however, there is a provision wholly general in its operation, which renders it penal for any citizen to go into any part of the Indian country south of the Ohio, without a passport from some officer or agent authorized to grant it. Why this provision was limited to the Indian country south of the Ohio, it is difficult to discover. It is certainly as necessary elsewhere as there. It is frequently impossible to ascertain with what intention a person enters the Indian country. As the law now stands, he is not liable to any penalty north of the Ohio, unless his intentions are disclosed by some other act; consequently, he has full time to mature and execute his plans, before the proper agent can take measures to prevent or secure him. Foreign emissaries may likewise enter any part of our Indian territories, and acquire and exercise an influence equally injurious to the Government and the Indians.

The ninth section of the same act prohibits any citizen from purchasing or receiving of an Indian a gun, or any other article commonly used in hunting, any instrument of husbandry or cooking utensil, or any article of clothing.

In the efforts now making to civilize and improve the Indians, it is important that they should learn the value of cattle, and direct their attention to raising them. Oxen have frequently been given to them, at their own request, to promote their agricultural operations; but, the first time they become intoxicated, it is easy to prevail upon them to exchange their cattle for whiskey. It is, therefore, important that this prohibition should be extended to cattle.

In the second section of the act of May 6, 1822, Indian agents are authorized to cause the stores and packages of all traders to be searched, upon suspicion or information that ardent spirits are carried into the Indian country by said traders. The expression "Indian traders," used in this act, is not sufficiently definite. It may be doubted whether it means the country to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, or the country where they live, and which they occupy. The objects of the law would require the latter construction; and such has been the decision of the district court of Indiana. But the question has already occasioned much doubt and difficulty, and it is important that it should be settled. The section is also defective in another particular: it contains no directions respecting the disposition which shall be made of the property between the time of seizure and the time of trial. The agent is consequently exposed, in the performance of this duty, to much pecuniary responsibility.

It is very desirable that a law should be passed prohibiting the giving or selling whiskey to Indians, in any place, or under any circumstances. There are, generally, local laws upon this subject, but they are not enforced. There is reason to believe that an act of Congress would be carried more fully into effect, and would produce a beneficial operation.
