CONTESTED ELECTION OF WILLIAM SMITH, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 18, 1789.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to report a proper mode of deciding on the petition of David Ramsay, of South Carolina, suggesting that William Smith, returned a member of this House, as elected within that State, was, at the time of his being elected, ineligible, made the following report:

THAT in this case it will be sufficient, in the first instance, that a committee take such proofs as can be obtained in this city respecting the facts stated in the petition, and report the same to the House. That Mr. Smith be permitted to be present from time to time when such proofs are taken, to examine the witnesses, and to offer counter-proofs, which shall also be received by the committee and reported to the House. That, if the proofs so to be reported shall be declared by the House insufficient to verify the material facts stated in the petition, or such other facts as the House shall deem proper to be inquired into, it will then be necessary for the House to direct a further inquiry, especially the procuring whatever additional testimony may be supposed to be in South Carolina, as the case may require. That all questions arising on the proofs be decided by this House, without any previous opinion thereon reported by a committee.

RETURN OF THE MESSENGER APPOINTED TO DELIVER TO GEORGE WASHINGTON THE CERTIFICATE OF HIS ELECTION TO THE OFFICE OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 25, 1789.

SIR:

NEW YORK, April 24, 1789.

In pursuance of the orders I received from the Senate, I left New York on Tuesday, the 7th of the present month; and though much impeded by tempestuous weather, bad roads, and the many large rivers I had to cross, yet, by unremitting diligence I reached Mount Vernon, the seat of his excellency General Washington, on Tuesday, the 14th, about 12 o'clock. I found his excellency at home; and after communicating to him the object of my mission and the substance of my instructions, I took an opportunity, on the day of my arrival, to address him as follows:

“Sir, the President of the Senate, chosen for the special occasion, having opened and counted the votes of the electors in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, I was honored with the commands of the Senate to wait upon your excellency with the information of your being elected to the office of President of the United States of America. This commission was intrusted to me on account of my having been long in the confidence of the late Congress, and charged with the duties of one of the principal civil departments of Government.

"I have now, sir, to inform you, that the proofs you have given of your patriotism, and of your readiness to sacrifice domestic ease and private enjoyment to preserve the liberty and promote the happiness of your country, did not permit the two Houses to harbor a doubt of your undertaking this great, this important office, to which you are called not only by the unanimous votes of the electors but by the voice of America; I have it therefore in command to accompany you to New York, where the Senate and the House of Representatives are convened for the despatch of public business. In executing this part of my commission, where personal gratification coincides with duty, I shall wait your time, and be wholly governed by your convenience."

To this his excellency was pleased to make the following reply:

"Sir, I have been long accustomed to entertain so great a respect for the opinion of my fellow-citizens, that the knowledge of their unanimous suffrages having been given in my favor, scarcely leaves me the alternative for an option. Whatever may have been my private feelings and sentiments, I believe I cannot give a greater evidence of my sensibility for the honor they have done me, than by accepting the appointment.

"I am so much affected by this fresh proof of my country's esteem and confidence, that silence can best explain my gratitude—while I realize the arduous nature of the task which is conferred on me, and feel my inability to perform it, I wish there may not be reason for regretting the choice. All I can promise is, only that which can be accomplished by an honest zeal.

"Upon considering how long time some of the gentlemen of both Houses of Congress have been at New York, how anxiously desirous they must be to proceed to business, and how deeply the public mind appears to be impressed with the necessity of doing it immediately, I cannot find myself at liberty to delay my journey. I shall therefore be in readiness to set out the day after to-morrow, and shall be happy in the pleasure of your company; for you will permit me to say that it was a peculiar gratification to have received the communication from you."

His excellency set out accordingly on Thursday, the 16th. His progress was retarded by the tender and affectionate leave which his neighbors and friends took of him; by the congratulatory addresses which he was obliged to receive by the way; and by the testimonies of public esteem and joy, to which it was necessary for him to pay attention, in the several States through which he passed; but that this might occasion as little delay as possible, he commenced his journey every morning at sun-rise, continued it incessantly throughout the day, and supported the fatigues of it, eight days successively, till he reached this place.

His happy and safe arrival here yesterday having terminated my commission, I submit my conduct in the execution of it to the judgment of the Senate, and have the honor to be, with great esteem and respect,

Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

CHARLES THOMSON.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate.

TITLES OF THE PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 5, 1789.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed to consider and report what style and titles it will be proper to annex to the office of President and Vice President of the United States, if any other than those given in the constitution, and to confer with a committee of the Senate appointed for the same purpose, made the following report:

That it is not proper to annex any style or title to the respective styles and titles of the office expressed in the constitution.

APPLICATION OF VIRGINIA FOR A CONVENTION OF THE SEVERAL STATES TO REPORT AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 5, 1789.

VIRGINIA, to wit:

IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, November 14, 1788.

Resolved, That an application be made, in the name and on behalf of the Legislature of this Commonwealth, to the Congress of the United States, in the words following, to wit:

The good people of this Commonwealth, in convention assembled, having ratified the constitution submitted to their consideration, this Legislature has, in conformity to that act, and the resolutions of the United States in Congress assembled, to them transmitted, thought proper to make the arrangements that were necessary for carrying it into effect. Having thus shown themselves obedient to the voice of their constituents, all America will find that, so far as it depended on them, that plan of Government will be carried into immediate operation.

But the sense of the people of Virginia would be but in part complied with, and but little regarded, if we went no further. In the very moment of adoption, and coeval with the ratification of the new plan of Government, the general voice of the convention of this State pointed to objects no less interesting to the people we represent, and equally entitled to our attention. At the same time that, from motives of affection to our sister States, the Convention yielded their assent to the ratification, they gave the most unequivocal proofs that they dreaded its operation under the present form.

In acceding to the Government under this impression, painful must have been the prospect, had they not derived consolation from a full expectation of its imperfections being speedily amended. In this resource, therefore, they placed their confidence—a confidence that will continue to support them whilst they have reason to believe that they have not calculated upon it in vain.

In making known to you the objections of the people of this Commonwealth to the new plan of Government, we deem it unnecessary to enter into a particular detail of its defects, which they consider as involving all the great and unalienable rights of freemen. For their sense on this subject we beg leave to refer you to the proceedings of their late convention, and the sense of the House of Delegates, as expressed in their resolutions of the 30th day of October, 1788.

We think proper, however, to declare that, in our opinion, as those objections were not founded in speculative theory, but deduced from principles which have been established by the melancholy example of other nations in different ages, so they will never be removed until the cause itself shall cease to exist. The sooner, therefore, the public apprehensions are quieted, and the Government is possessed of the confidence of the people, the more salutary will be its operations, and the longer its duration.

The cause of amendments we consider as a common cause; and, since concessions have been made from political motives which we conceive may endanger the republic, we trust that a commendable zeal will be shown for obtaining those provisions which experience has taught us are necessary to secure from danger the unalienable rights of human nature.

The anxiety with which our countrymen press for the accomplishment of this important end will ill admit of delay. The slow forms of Congressional discussion and recommendation, if indeed they should ever agree to any change, would, we fear, be less certain of success. Happily for their wishes, the constitution has presented an alternative, by admitting the submission to a convention of the States. To this, therefore, we resort, as the source from whence they are to derive relief from their present apprehensions.

We do, therefore, in behalf of our constituents, in the most earnest and solemn manner, make this application to Congress, that a convention be immediately called, of deputies from the several States, with full power to take into their consideration the defects of this constitution that have been suggested by the State conventions, and report such amendments thereto as they shall find best suited to promote our common interests and secure to ourselves and our latest posterity the great and unalienable rights of mankind.

APPLICATION OF NEW YORK FOR A CONVENTION OF THE SEVERAL STATES TO REPORT AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 6, 1789.

STATE OF NEW YORK:

IN ASSEMBLY, February 5, 1789.

Resolved, If the honorable the Senate concur therein, that an application be made to the Congress of the United States of America, in the name and behalf of the Legislature of this State, in the words following, to wit:

The people of the State of New York, having ratified the constitution agreed to on the seventeenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, by the convention then assembled at Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, as explained by the said ratification, in the fullest confidence of obtaining a revision of the said constitution by a general convention, and in confidence that certain powers in and by the said constitution granted would not be exercised until a convention should have been called and convened for proposing amendments to the said constitution: In compliance, therefore, with the unanimous sense of the convention of this State, who all united in opinion that such a revision was necessary to recommend the said constitution to the approbation and support of a numerous body of their constituents, and a majority of the members of which conceived several articles of the constitution so exceptionable, that nothing but such confidence, and an invincible reluctance to separate from our sister States, could have prevailed upon a sufficient number to assent to it, without stipulating for previous amendments. And from a conviction that the apprehensions and discontents which those articles occasion cannot be removed or allayed unless an act to revise the said constitution be among the first that shall be passed by the new Congress, we, the Legislature of the State of New York, do, in behalf of our constituents, in the most earnest and solemn manner, make the application to the Congress, that a convention of deputies from the several States be called as early as possible, with full powers to take the said constitution into their consideration, and to propose such amendments thereto as they shall find best calculated to promote our common interests, and secure to ourselves and our latest posterity the great and unalienable rights of mankind.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 12, 1789.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to take proofs of the facts stated in the petition of David Ramsay, suggesting that William Smith, elected a member of this House within the State of South Carolina, was, at the time when he was elected, ineligible, by reason that he had not been seven years a citizen of the United States, reported as followeth:

That Mr. Smith appeared before them, and admitted that he had subscribed, and had caused to be printed, in the State Gazette of South Carolina of the 24th of November last, the publication which accompanies this report, and to which the petitioner doth refer as proof of the facts stated in his petition. That Mr. Smith also admitted that his father departed this life in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy, about five months after he sent him to Great Britain. That his mother departed this life about the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, and that he was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court in South Carolina in the month of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four.

The committee also report the following counter-proofs, produced by Mr. Smith, viz: Printed copies of the following acts of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, viz: An act entitled "An act to oblige every free male inhabitant of this State, above a certain age, to give assurance of fidelity and allegiance to the same, and for other purposes therein mentioned," passed the twenty-eighth of March, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight. An act entitled "An act disposing of certain estates, and banishing certain persons therein mentioned," passed the twenty-sixth of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two. An act entitled "An act to alter and amend an act entitled an act for disposing of certain estates and banishing certain persons, passed at Jacksonburgh, in the State of South Carolina, on the twenty-sixth day of February, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two," passed in March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three. An act entitled "An act to confer the right of citizenship on aliens," passed the twenty-sixth of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four. Also, an ordinance of the Legislature of the said State, entitled "An ordinance to encourage subjects of foreign states to lend money at interest on real estates within this State," passed the twenty-sixth of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four. A certified copy of an extract from an act of the Legislature of that State, entitled "An act for raising and paying into the public Treasury of this State, a tax, for the uses therein mentioned," passed the ninth of September, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine; and a printed copy of the constitution of South Carolina. Also, a certificate from John Edwards and William Hort, Commissioners of the Treasury of that State, under their seal of office.

ILLEGALITY OF THE ELECTIONS OF THE REPRESENTATIVES FROM NEW JERSEY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 21, 1789.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to report a proper mode of investigation and decision on the petitions of a number of the citizens of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members holding seats in this House, as elected within that State, made the following report:

That it will be proper to appoint a committee before whom the petitioners are to appear, and who shall receive such proofs and allegations as the petitioners shall judge proper to offer, in support of their said petition, and who shall, in like manner, receive all proofs and allegations from persons who may be desirous to appear, and be heard in opposition to the said petition; and to report to the House all such facts as shall arise from the proofs and allegations of the respective parties.

Resolved, That this House doth agree with the committee in the said report; and that it be an instruction to the said Committee of Elections to proceed accordingly.

ILLEGALITY OF THE ELECTIONS OF THE REPRESENTATIVES FROM NEW JERSEY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AUGUST 18, 1789.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee of Elections, reported that the committee, pursuant to the instruction to them contained in the resolution of the twenty-fifth of May, relative to the petition of a number of citizens of the State of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members of this House, as elected within that State, do ascertain the following facts, as arising from the proofs, to wit:

1st. That the elections for members of this House held within that State, in consequence of an act of the Legislature thereof, entitled “An act for carrying into effect, on the part of the State of New Jersey, the constitution of the United States, assented to, ratified, and confirmed by this State on the eighteenth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven,” passed the twenty-first of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, were closed in the several counties of Bergen, Morris, Monmouth, Hunterdon, Somerset, Middlesex, Sussex, Salem, Cape May, Cumberland, Burlington, and Gloucester; and the lists of the several persons voted for, and the number of votes taken for each, were received by the Governor at the respective times appearing from the said lists and the endorsements thereon, which lists accompany this report.

2d. That the election in the county of Essex, the remaining county in the State, closed on the 27th of April, and the list was received by the Governor on the 3d of May.

3d. That in consequence of a summons from the Governor, (a copy whereof accompanies this report,) dated the 27th of February, to four members of the Council, a privy council, consisting of the Governor and the four members so summoned, did assemble at Elizabethtown on the 3d of March, and, being so assembled, Mr. Haring, another member of the Council, received a note from the Governor, (a copy whereof accompanies this report,) in consequence whereof Mr. Haring did then also attend the privy council, as a member thereof.

4th. That the Governor then appointed another meeting of the privy council, to be held on the 18th of March, at which day the Governor and eleven members of the Council did assemble, and did then determine, from the lists of the twelve counties specified in the first fact above stated, the four members now holding seats in this House the four persons elected members of this House within that State; against which determination of the Council three of the members then present did protest; and a protest (a copy whereof accompanies this report) was, with the consent of the Council, delivered into the Council in form, on the subsequent day.

5th. That there was no determination of the Governor and privy council in the premises until the 18th of March.

6th. That the Governor did, on the 19th of March, issue a proclamation, (a copy whereof accompanies this report.)

RHODE ISLAND DESIRES TO MAINTAIN FRIENDLY RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, SEPTEMBER 26, 1789.

UNITED STATES, September 26, 1789.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Having yesterday received a letter written in this month by the Governor of Rhode Island, at the request and in behalf of the General Assembly of that State, addressed to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the eleven United States of America in Congress assembled, I take the earliest opportunity of laying a copy of it before you.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS.

IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, September session, 1789.To the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the eleven United States of America in Congress assembled.

The critical situation in which the people of this State are placed, engage us to make these assurances, on their behalf, of their attachment and friendship to their sister States, and of their disposition to cultivate mutual harmony and friendly intercourse. They know themselves to be a handful, comparatively viewed; and although they now stand, as it were alone, they have not separated themselves, or departed from the principles of that confederation, which was formed by the sister States in their struggle for freedom and in the hour of danger; they seek, by this memorial, to call to your remembrance the hazards which we have run, the hardships we have endured, the treasure we have spent, and the blood we have lost together, in one common cause, and especially the object we had in view—the preservation of our liberty. Wherein, ability considered, they may truly say they were equal in exertions with the foremost, the effects whereof, in great embarrassments and other distresses consequent thereon, we have since experienced with severity; which common sufferings, and common danger, we hope and trust, yet form a bond of union and friendship not easily to be broken.

Our not having acceded to or adopted the new system of Government, formed and adopted by most of our sister States, we doubt not, have given uneasiness to them. That we have not seen our way clear to do it, consistent with our idea of the principles upon which we all embarked together, has also given pain to us; we have not doubted but we might thereby avoid present difficulties, but we have apprehended future mischief. The people of this State, from its first settlement, have been accustomed and strongly attached to a democratical form of Government. They have viewed in the constitution an approach, though, perhaps, but small, towards that form of Government from which we have lately dissolved our connexion, at so much hazard and expense of life and treasure; they have seen with pleasure the administration thereof, from the most important trust downwards, committed to men who have highly merited, and in whom the people of the United States place, unbounded confidence: yet even in this circumstance, in itself so fortunate, they have apprehended danger, by way of precedent. Can it be thought strange, then, that with these impressions they should wait to see the proposed system organized and in operation? to see what further checks and securities would be agreed to and established, by way of amendments, before they could adopt it as a constitution of Government for themselves and their posterity? These amendments, we believe, have already afforded some relief and satisfaction to the minds of the people of this State; and we earnestly look for the time when they may, with clearness and safety, be again united with their sister States, under a constitution and form of Government so well poised, as neither to need alteration, or be liable thereto, by a majority only of nine states out of thirteen—a circumstance which may possibly take place against the sense of a majority of the people of the United States. We are sensible of the extremes to which democratical Government is sometimes liable, something of which we have lately experienced; but we esteem them temporary and partial evils compared with the loss of liberty and the rights of a free people; neither do we apprehend they will be marked with severity by our sister States, when it is considered that during the late trouble, the whole United States, notwithstanding their joint wisdom and efforts, fell into the like misfortune; that from our extraordinary exertions this State was left in a situation nearly as embarrassing as that during the war; that in the measures which were adopted Government unfortunately had not that aid and support from the moneyed interest which our sister States of New York and the Carolinas experienced under similar circumstances, and especially when it is considered that, upon some abatement of that fermentation in the minds of the people, which is so common in the collision of sentiments and of parties, a disposition appears to provide a remedy for the difficulties we have labored under on that account. We are induced to hope that we shall not be altogether considered as foreigners, having no particular affinity or connexion with the United States; but that trade and commerce, upon which the prosperity of this State much depends, will be preserved as free and open between this and the United States, as our different situations, at present, can possibly admit; earnestly desiring and proposing to adopt such commercial regulations on our part, as shall not tend to defeat the collection of the revenue of the United States, but rather to act in conformity to, or co-operate therewith; and desiring also to give the strongest assurances that we shall, during our present situation, use our utmost endeavors to be in preparation, from time to time, to answer our proportion of such part of the interest or principal of the foreign and domestic debt as the United States shall judge expedient to pay and discharge.

We feel ourselves attached, by the strongest ties of friendship, kindred, and of interest, with our sister States; and we cannot, without the greatest reluctance, look to any other quarter for those advantages of commercial intercourse which we conceive to be more natural and reciprocal between them and us.

I am, at the request, and in behalf of the General Assembly, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN COLLINS, Governor.

DEATH OF THE DAUPHIN OF FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, SEPTEMBER 29, 1789.

UNITED STATES, September 29, 1789.Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

His Most Christian Majesty, by a letter dated the 7th of June last, addressed to the President and members of the General Congress of the United States of North America, announces the much lamented death of his son, the Dauphin. The generous conduct of the French monarch and nation towards this country renders every event that may affect his or their prosperity interesting to us; and I shall take care to assure him of the sensibility with which the United States participate in the affliction which a loss so much to be regretted must have occasioned both to him and to them.

ROBERT MORRIS SOLICITS AN INQUIRY INTO HIS OFFICIAL CONDUCT AS SUPERINTENDENT OF THE FINANCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 8, 1790.

NEW YORK, February 8, 1790.

To the President, the Senate, and House of Representatives of the United States of America: The memorial of Robert Morris, late Superintendent of the Finances of the said United States, humbly sheweth:

That on the twentieth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and subsequent to your memorialist's resignation of his office of Superintendent, the Congress passed a resolution in the words following: "Resolved, That three commissioners be appointed to inquire into the receipts and expenditures of public moneys during the administration of the late Superintendent of the Finance, and to examine and adjust the accounts of the United States with that Department during his administration, and to report a state thereof to Congress;" which resolution, to persons unacquainted with the nature of the office, and the mode of conducting the business of the Department, gave occasion to the supposition that your memorialist had accounts both difficult and important to settle with the United States in respect to his official transactions. That though your memorialist foresaw the disagreeable consequences which might result to himself from the diffusion of such an opinion, he, notwithstanding, not only forbore any representation on the subject, but scrupulously avoided every species of interference, direct or indirect, lest it should be imagined either that he was actuated by the desire of obtaining from Congress those marks of approbation which had in repeated instances been bestowed on the servants of the public, or that he feared to meet the proposed investigation. Respect for the sovereign of the United States, concurring with motives of delicacy to forbid even the appearance of asking what, if merited, it was to be presumed would be conferred, (as being the proper reward of services not of solicitation,) and a firm confidence on the rectitude of his conduct, leaving your memorialist no inducement to evade any inquiry into it which it might be thought fit to institute.

That your memorialist, taking it for granted that the reasons which had produced a determination to establish a mode of inquiry into the transactions of the most important office under the Government, would have ensured a prosecution of the object, till it had been carried into effect, long remained in silent expectation of the appointment of commissioners, according to the resolution which had been entered into for that purpose; but it has so happened, from what cause your memorialist will not undertake to explain, that no further step has ever been taken in relation to it; and your memorialist has remained exposed to the surmises which the appearance of an intention to inquire into his conduct had a tendency to excite, without having been afforded an opportunity of obviating them. That the unsettled condition of certain accounts of a commercial nature between the United States and the late house of Willing, Morris, & Co., and your memorialist, prior to his appointment as Superintendent of the Finances, having been confounded with his transactions in that capacity, your memorialist has in various ways been subjected to injurious imputations on his official conduct, the only fruits of services which, at the time they were rendered, he trusts he may, without incurring the charge of presumption, affirm were generally esteemed both important and meritorious, and were at least rendered with ardor and zeal, with unremitting attention, and unweary application.

That your memorialist, desirous of rescuing his reputation from the aspersions thrown upon it, came, in the month of October, 1788, to the city of New York, as well for the purpose of urging the appointment of commissioners to inspect his official transactions, as for that of procuring an adjustment of the accounts which existed previous to his administration. But the first object was frustrated by the want of a sufficient number of members to make a Congress; and the last was unavoidably delayed, by the preliminary investigations requisite on the part of the commissioner named by the late Board of Treasury towards a competent knowledge of the business. That in the month of February, 1789, your memorialist returned to New York for the same purposes; but the obstacles which he had before experienced still operated to put it out of his power to present the memorial which had been prepared by him in October, praying for an appointment of commissioners. That he was, therefore, obliged to confine himself to measures for the settlement of his accounts respecting the transactions antecedent to his appointment as Superintendent, which he entered upon accordingly, with the commissioner appointed by the Board of Treasury, and in which as much progress as time and circumstances would permit was made, until the 4th of March last, when that commissioner, conceiving his authority by the organization of the new Government to have ceased, declined further proceedings; and, of course, your memorialist was obliged to wait the establishment of the new Treasury Department for the further prosecution of that settlement, which has been accordingly resumed, and he hopes will speedily be accomplished. But inasmuch as no mode of inquiry into his official conduct has hitherto been put into operation, and as doubts of its propriety have been raised by an act of the Government, your memorialist conceives himself to have a claim upon the public justice for some method of vindicating himself, which will be unequivocal and definitive. Wherefore, and encouraged by a consciousness of the integrity of his administration, your memorialist is desirous that a strict examination should be had into his conduct while in office, in order that, if he has been guilty of mal-administration, it may be detected and punished; if otherwise, that his innocence may be manifested and acknowledged. Unwilling, from this motive, that longer delay should attend the object of the resolution which has been recited, your memorialist humbly prays that an appointment of commissioners may take place to carry the said resolution into effect.

And your memorialist, as in duty bound, will pray, &c.

ROBERT MORRIS.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 5, 1790.

Mr. FOSTER, from the committee to whom were referred the petitions of the people called Quakers, and of the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, made the following report:

That, from the nature of the matters contained in those memorials, they were induced to examine the powers vested in Congress, under the present constitution, relating to the abolition of slavery, and are clearly of opinion—

1st. That the General Government is expressly restrained from prohibiting the importation of such persons "as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, until the year 1808."

2d. That Congress, by a fair construction of the constitution, are equally restrained from interfering in the emancipation of slaves who already are, or who may, within the period mentioned, be imported into or born within any of the said States.

3d. That Congress have no authority to interfere in the internal regulations of particular States, relative to the instruction of slaves in the principles of morality and religion; to their comfortable clothing, accommodations, and subsistence; to the regulation of their marriages, and the prevention of the violation of the rights thereof, or to the separation of children from their parents; to a comfortable provision in cases of sickness, age, or infirmity; or to the seizure, transportation, or sale of free negroes; but have the fullest confidence in the wisdom and humanity of the Legislatures of the several States, that they will revise their laws, from time to time, when necessary, and promote the objects mentioned in the memorials, and every other measure that may tend to the happiness of slaves.

4th. That, nevertheless, Congress have authority, if they shall think it necessary, to lay at any time a tax or duty, not exceeding ten dollars for each person of any description, the importation of whom shall be by any of the States admitted as aforesaid.

5th. That Congress have authority to interdict, or (so far as it is or may be carried on by citizens of the United States for supplying foreigners) to regulate the African trade, and to make provision for the humane treatment of slaves, in all cases, while on their passage to the United States or to foreign ports, as far as it respects the citizens of the United States.

6th. That Congress have also authority to prohibit foreigners from fitting out vessels, in any port of the United States, for transporting persons from Africa to any foreign port.

7th. That the memorialists be informed that, in all cases to which the authority of Congress extends, they will exercise it for the humane objects of the memorialists, so far as they can be promoted on the principles of justice, humanity, and good policy.

APPLICATION OF STEAM TO NAVIGATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JULY 2, 1790.

NEW YORK, June 22, 1790.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States of America: the petition of John Fitch, now of the city of Philadelphia, humbly sheweth:

That your petitioner, in the spring of the year 1785, conceived the idea of applying steam to the purposes of propelling boats or vessels through the water; that fully satisfied, in his own mind, of the practicability of such a scheme, of its great immediate utility, and the important advantages which would in future result therefrom, not only to America, but to the world at large, if the scheme should be carried into effectual operation, he divested himself of every other occupation, and undertook the arduous task, not doubting that, when perfected, he should be amply rewarded. In his first attempts to procure assistance from Congress, and the Legislatures of many of the States, from the peculiar situation of their finances, and the seeming improbability of the success of his scheme, he met with no relief. Not entirely discouraged by those disappointments, he continued his application to his project, and prayed several of the States for an exclusive right to the use of fire and steam to navigation. That New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia granted him an exclusive right, agreeably to the prayer of his petition, for fourteen years.

That the impracticability of procuring experienced workmen in America, your petitioner's total ignorance of the construction of a steam engine, together with the necessary deviation from the form described in the books, in order to accommodate its weight and bulk to the narrow limits of a vessel, have caused him not only to expend about eight thousand dollars in successive experiments, but nearly four years of some of his grants have expired, before he has been able to bring his engine to such perfection as to be carried into use. That, having at length fully succeeded in his scheme, (proofs of which he is prepared to offer to this honorable House,) he trusts he now comes forward, not as an imaginary projector, but as a man who, contrary to the popular opinion, has really accomplished a design, which, on examination, will clearly evince the many and important advantages which must result therefrom to the United States; some of which your petitioner begs leave to enumerate: The Western waters, which have hitherto been navigated with great difficulty and expense, may now be ascended with safety, convenience, and great velocity; consequently, by these means, an immediately increased value will be given to the Western territory; all the internal waters of the United States will be rendered much more convenient and safe, and the carriage on them more expeditious. That from these advantages will result a great saving in the labor of men and horses, as well as in the expenses of the traveller.

Your petitioner also conceives that the introduction of a complete steam engine, formed upon the newest and best principles, into such a country as America, where labor is high, would entitle him to public countenance and encouragement, independent of its use in navigation. He begs leave to acquaint the honorable House, that the great length of time and vast sum of money expended in bringing the scheme to perfection, have been wholly occasioned by his total ignorance of the improved state of steam engines, a perfect knowledge of which has not been acquired without an infinite number of fruitless experiments; for not a person could be found who was acquainted with the minutiae of Bolton & Watt's new engine; and whether your petitioner's engine is similar or not to those in England he is to this moment totally ignorant, but is happy to inform Congress that he is now able to make a complete steam engine, which, in its effects, he believes is equal to the best in Europe; the construction of which he has never kept a secret. That, on his first undertaking the scheme, he knew there were a great variety of modes of applying the power of steam to the propelling of boats through the water, perhaps all equally effective; but this formed no part of his consideration, knowing that, if he could bring his steam engine to work in a boat, he would be under no difficulty in applying its force; therefore he trusts no interference with him in propelling boats by the power of steam, under any pretence of a different mode of application, will be permitted; for, should that be the case, the employment of his time and the amazing expense attending the perfecting his scheme, would, whilst they gave to the world at large a valuable discovery, and to America peculiar and important advantages, eventuate in the total ruin of your petitioner; for a thousand different modes may be applied by subsequent navigators, all of them benefiting by the expense and persevering labor of your petitioner, and thus sharing with him those profits which they never earned; such a consequence he is confident will not be permitted by that body whom he has now the honor to address.

Your petitioner, therefore, prays that your honorable House will take the subject of his petition into consideration, and, by granting him an exclusive right to the use of steam to navigation in the United States for a limited time, do him that justice which he conceives he merits, and which he trusts will redound to the honor and add to the true interests of America.

Your petitioner begs leave to refer the honorable House to the 31st act of the 10th of William the Third, to show that the Parliament of Great Britain, notwithstanding their existing patent law, have granted special acts for particular valuable discoveries, without confining the grantee to any specified mode. This act is entitled "An act for the encouragement of a new invention, by Thomas Savory, for raising water and occasioning motion to all sorts of mill work by the impellant force of fire."

Bolton & Watt having taken out a patent for their improvement in steam engines, wasted several years (as your petitioner has done) in experiments, and then Parliament, by act of George III., 1775, granted a prolongation.—(See Doctor Price on Mining, page 313, folio.)

Sir Thomas Lombe had a patent for his famous silk mill, obtained from Italy, and erected at Derby, in England, in 1734; after which Parliament granted not only a prolongation of fourteen years, but a sum of £14,000 sterling, in consideration of the very great hazard he ran and the expense he had incurred by introducing it into England.—(See England Illustrated, vol. 1, page 152, quarto.)

The foregoing precedents your petitioner conceives sufficient to justify his application to Congress for a law in his favor, independent of the general one now in force. All which he prays they will take into their serious consideration, and afford him such relief as they, in their wisdom, shall deem expedient.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

JOHN FITCH.

[2d SESSION.

PLAN FOR ESTABLISHING UNIFORMITY IN THE COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES, OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JULY 13, 1790.

SIR:

NEW YORK, July 4, 1790.

In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of January 15th, I have now the honor to enclose you a report on the subject of measures, weights, and coins. The length of time which intervened between the date of the order and my arrival in this city, prevented my receiving it till the 15th of April; and an illness which followed soon after added, unavoidably, some weeks to the delay; so that it was not till about the 20th May that I was able to finish the report. A desire to lessen the number of its imperfections induced me still to withhold it awhile, till, on the 15th of June, came to my hands, from Paris, a printed copy of a proposition made by the Bishop of Autun, to the National Assembly of France, on the subject of weights and measures; and three days afterwards I received, through the channel of the public papers, the speech of Sir John Riggs Miller, of April 13th, in the British House of Commons, on the same subject. In the report which I had prepared, and was then about to give in, I had proposed the latitude of 38°, as that which should fix our standard, because it was the medium latitude of the United States; but the proposition before the National Assembly of France, to take that of 45° as being a middle term between the equator and both poles, and a term which might consequently unite the nations of both hemispheres, appeared to me so well chosen, and so just, that I did not hesitate a moment to prefer it to that of 38°. It became necessary, of course, to conform all my calculations to that standard—an operation which has been retarded by my other occupations.

These circumstances will, I hope, apologize for the delay which has attended the execution of the order of the House; and, perhaps, a disposition on their part to have due regard for the proceedings of other nations, engaged on the same subject, may induce them still to defer deciding ultimately on it till their next session. Should this be the case, and should any new matter occur in the mean time, I shall think it my duty to communicate it to the House, as supplemental to the present report.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most profound respect,

Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred, by the House of Representatives, to prepare and report a proper plan or plans for establishing uniformity in the currency, weights, and measures of the United States, in obedience thereto, makes the following report:

To obtain uniformity in measures, weights, and coins, it is necessary to find some measure of invariable length, with which, as a standard, they may be compared.

There exists not in nature, as far as has been hitherto observed, a single subject or species of subject, accessible to man, which presents one constant and uniform dimension.

The globe of the earth itself, indeed, might be considered as invariable in all its dimensions, and that its circumference would furnish an invariable measure; but no one of its circles, great or small, is accessible to admeasurement through all its parts, and the various trials to measure definite portions of them have been of such various result as to show there is no dependence on that operation for certainty.

Matter, then, by its mere extension, furnishing nothing invariable, its motion is the only remaining resource.

The motion of the earth round its axis, though not absolutely uniform and invariable, may be considered as such for every human purpose. It is measured obviously, but unequally, by the departure of a given meridian from the sun, and its return to it, constituting a solar day. Throwing together the inequalities of solar days, a mean interval, or day, has been found, and divided, by very general consent, into 86,400 equal parts.

A pendulum, vibrating freely, in small and equal arcs, may be so adjusted in its length, as, by its vibrations, to make this division of the earth's motion into 86,400 equal parts, called seconds of mean time.

Such a pendulum, then, becomes itself a measure of determinate length, to which all others may be referred as to a standard.

But even the pendulum is not without its uncertainties.

1. The difficulty of ascertaining, in practice, its centre of oscillation, as depending on the form of the bob, and its distance from the point of suspension; the effect of the weight of the suspending wire towards displacing the centre of oscillation; that centre being seated within the body of the bob, and therefore inaccessible to the measure, are sources of considerable uncertainty.

2. Both theory and experience prove that, to preserve its isochronism, it must be shorter towards the equator, and longer towards the poles.

3. The height of the situation above the common level, as being an increment to the radius of the earth, diminishes the length of the pendulum.

4. The pendulum being made of metal, as is best, it varies its length with the variations in the temperature of the atmosphere.

5. To continue small and equal vibrations, through a sufficient length of time, and to count these vibrations, machinery and a power are necessary, which may exert a small but constant effort to renew the waste of motion; and the difficulty is so to apply these, as that they shall neither retard nor accelerate the vibrations.

1. In order to avoid the uncertainties which respect the centre of oscillation, it has been proposed by Mr. Leslie, an ingenious artist of Philadelphia, to substitute, for the pendulum, a uniform cylindrical rod, without a bob.

Could the diameter of such a rod be infinitely small, the centre of oscillation would be exactly at two-thirds of the whole length, measured from the point of suspension. Giving it a diameter which shall render it sufficiently inflexible, the centre will be displaced, indeed; but, in a second rod not the (1) six hundred thousandth part of its length, and not the hundredth part as much as in a second pendulum with a spherical bob of proper diameter. This displacement is so infinitely minute, then, that we may consider the centre of oscillation, for all practical purposes, as residing at two-thirds of the length from the centre of suspension. The distance between these two centres might be easily and accurately ascertained in practice. But the whole rod is better for a standard than any portion of it, because sensibly defined at both its extremities.

2. The uncertainty arising from the difference of length requisite for the second pendulum, or the second rod, in different latitudes, may be avoided by fixing on some one latitude, to which our standard shall refer. That of 38°, as being the middle latitude of the United States, might seem the most convenient, were we to consider ourselves alone; but connected with other nations by commerce and science, it is better to fix on that parallel which bids fairest to be adopted by them also. The 45th, as being the middle term between the equator and pole, has been heretofore proposed in Europe, and the proposition has been lately renewed there under circumstances which may very possibly give it some effect. This parallel is distinguished with us also as forming our principal northern boundary. Let the completion of the 45th degree, then, give the standard for our union, with the hope that it may become a line of union with the rest of the world.

The difference between the second rod for 45° of latitude, and that for 31°, our other extreme, is to be examined.

The second pendulum for 45° of latitude, according to Sir Isaac Newton's computation, must be of (2) 39.14912 inches English measure; and a rod, to vibrate in the same time, must be of the same length between the centres of suspension and oscillation; and, consequently, its whole length 58.7 (or, more exactly, 58.72368) inches. This is longer than the rod which shall vibrate seconds in 31° of latitude, by about  $\frac{1}{648}$  part of its whole length; a difference so minute, that it might be neglected, as insensible, for the common purposes of life, but, in cases requiring perfect exactness, the second rod, found by trial of its vibrations in any part of the United States, may be corrected by computation for the (3) latitude of the place, and so brought exactly to the standard of 45°.

3. By making the experiment in the level of the ocean, the difference will be avoided, which a higher position might occasion.

4. The expansion and contraction of the rod with the change of temperature, is the fourth source of uncertainty before mentioned. According to the high authority, so often quoted, an iron rod, of given length, may vary, between summer and winter, in temperate latitudes, and in the common exposure of house clocks, from  $\frac{1}{728}$  to  $\frac{1}{2532}$  of its whole length, which, in a rod of 58.7 inches, will be from about two to three hundredths of an inch. This may be avoided by adjusting and preserving the standard in a cellar, or other place, the temperature of which never varies. Iron is named for this purpose, because the least expandible of the metals.

5. The practical difficulty resulting from the effect of the machinery and moving power is very inconsiderable in the present state of the arts; and, in their progress towards perfection, will become less and less. To estimate and obviate this, will be the artist's province. It is as nothing when compared with the sources of inaccuracy hitherto attending measures.

Before quitting the subject of the inconveniences, some of which attend the pendulum alone, others both the pendulum and rod, it must be added that the rod would have an accidental but very precious advantage over the pendulum in this country, in the event of our fixing the foot at the nearest aliquot part of either; for the difference between the common foot, and those so to be deduced, would be three times greater in the case of the pendulum than in that of the rod.

Let the standard of measure, then, be a uniform cylindrical rod of iron, of such length, as, in latitude  $45^{\circ}$ , in the level of the ocean, and in a cellar, or other place, the temperature of which does not vary through the year, shall perform its vibrations, in small and equal arcs, in one second of mean time.

A standard of invariable length being thus obtained, we may proceed to identify, by that, the measures, weights, and coins of the United States: but here a doubt presents itself, as to the extent of the reformation meditated by the House of Representatives. The experiment made by Congress in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, by declaring that there should be one money of account and payment through the United States, and that its parts and multiples should be in a decimal ratio, has obtained such general approbation, both at home and abroad, that nothing seems wanting, but the actual coinage, to banish the discordant pounds, shillings, pence, and farthings of the different States, and to establish in their stead the new denominations. Is it in contemplation with the House of Representatives to extend a like improvement to our measures and weights, and to arrange them also in a decimal ratio? The facility which this would introduce into the vulgar arithmetic would, unquestionably, be soon and sensibly felt by the whole mass of the people, who would thereby be enabled to compute for themselves whatever they should have occasion to buy, to sell, or to measure, which the present complicated and difficult ratios place beyond their computation, for the most part. Or, is it the opinion of the Representatives that the difficulty of changing the established habits of a whole nation opposes an insuperable bar to this improvement? Under this uncertainty, the Secretary of State thinks it his duty to submit alternative plans, that the House may, at their will, adopt either the one or the other, exclusively, or the one for the present, and the other for a future time, when the public mind may be supposed to have become familiarized to it.

I.—And first, on the supposition that the present measures and weights are to be retained but to be rendered uniform and invariable, by bringing them to the same invariable standard.

The first settlers of these States, having come chiefly from England, brought with them the measures and weights of that country. These alone are generally established among us, either by law or usage; and these, therefore, are alone to be retained and fixed. We must resort to that country for information of what they are, or ought to be.

This rests, principally, on the evidence of certain standard measures and weights, which have been preserved, of long time, in different depositories. But differences among these having been known to exist, the House of Commons, in the years 1757 and 1758, appointed committees to inquire into the original standards of their weights and measures. These committees, assisted by able mathematicians and artists, examined and compared with each other the several standard measures and weights, and made reports on them in the years 1758 and 1759. The circumstances under which these reports were made entitle them to be considered, as far as they go, as the best written testimony existing of the standard measures and weights of England; and as such, they will be relied on in the progress of this report.

MEASURES OF LENGTH.

The measures of length in use among us, are:

The league of 3 miles,
The mile of 8 furlongs,
The furlong of 40 poles or perches,
The pole or perch of  $5\frac{1}{2}$  yards,
The fathom of 2 yards,

The ell of a yard and quarter,
The yard of 3 feet,
The foot of 12 inches, and
The inch of 10 lines.

On this branch of their subject, the committee of 1757-1758, says that the standard measures of length at the receipt of the exchequer, are a yard, supposed to be of the time of Henry VII, and a yard and ell supposed to have been made about the year 1601; that they are brass rods, very coarsely made, their divisions not exact, and the rods bent: and that in the year 1742, some members of the Royal Society had been at great pains in taking an exact measure of these standards, by very curious instruments, prepared by the ingenious Mr. Graham; that the Royal Society had had a brass rod made pursuant to their experiments, which was made so accurately, and by persons so skilful and exact, that it was thought not easy to obtain a more exact one; and the committee, in fact, found it to agree with the standards at the exchequer, as near as it was possible. They furnish no means, to persons at a distance, of knowing what this standard is. This, however, is supplied by the evidence of the second pendulum, which, according to the authority before quoted, is, at London, 39.1682 English inches, and, consequently, the second rod there is of 58.7523 of the same inches. When we shall have found, then, by actual trial, the second rod for  $45^{\circ}$  by adding the difference of their computed length, to wit,  $\frac{2.87}{100000}$  of an inch, or rather  $\frac{3}{10}$  of a line (which in practice will endanger less error, than an attempt at so minute a fraction as the ten thousandth parts of an inch) we shall have the second rod of London, or a true measure of  $58\frac{3}{4}$  English inches. Or, to shorten the operation, without varying the result,

Let the standard rod of  $45^{\circ}$  be divided into  $587\frac{1}{2}$  equal parts, and let each of these parts be declared a line.

10 Lines an inch,
12 Inches a foot,
3 Feet a yard,
3 Feet 9 inches an ell,
6 Feet a fathom,

$5\frac{1}{2}$  Yards a perch or pole,
40 Poles or perches a furlong,
8 Furlongs a mile,
3 Miles a league.

SUPERFICIAL MEASURES.

Our measures of surface are, the acre of 4 roods, and the rood of 40 square poles; so established by a statute of 33 Edw. I. Let them remain the same.

MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

The measures of capacity in use among us, are of the following names and proportions:

The gill, four of which make a pint.

Two pints make a quart.

Two quarts a pottle.

Two pottles a gallon.

Two gallons a peck, dry measure.

Eight gallons make a measure called a firkin, in liquid substances, and a bushel, dry.

Two firkins, or bushels, make a measure called a rundlet or kilderkin, liquid, and a strike, dry.

Two kilderkins, or strikes, make a measure called a barrel, liquid, and a coomb, dry; this last term being ancient and little used.

Two barrels, or coombs, make a measure called a hogshead, liquid, or a quarter, dry; each being the quarter of a ton.

A hogshead and a third make a tierce, or third of a ton.

Two hogsheads make a pipe, butt, or puncheon; and

Two pipes make a ton.

But no one of these measures is of a determinate capacity. The report of the committee of 1757, -'8, shows that the gallon is of very various content; and that being the unit, all the others must vary with it.

The gallon and bushel contain—

224 and 1792 cubic inches, according to the standard wine gallon preserved at Guildhall.

231 and 1848, according to the statute of 5th of Anne.

264.8 and 2118.4, according to the ancient Rumford quart, of 1228, examined by the committee.

265.5 and 2124, according to three standard bushels preserved in the Exchequer, to wit, one of Henry VII., without a rim; one dated 1091, supposed for 1591, or 1601, and one dated 1601.

266.25 and 2130, according to the ancient Rumford gallon of 1228, examined by the committee.

268.75 and 2150, according to the Winchester bushel, as declared by statute 13, 14, William III. which has been the model for some of the grain states.

271, less 2 spoonfuls, and 2168, less 16 spoonfuls, according to a standard gallon of Henry VII., and another dated 1601, marked E. E., both in the Exchequer.

271 and 2168, according to a standard gallon in the Exchequer, dated 1601, marked E., and called the corn gallon.

272 and 2176, according to the three standard corn gallons last mentioned, as measured in 1688, by an artist for the Commissioners of the Excise, generally used in the seaport towns, and by mercantile people, and thence introduced into some of the grain states.

277.18 and 2217.44, as established for the measure of coal by the statute 12 Anne.

278 and 2224, according to the standard bushel of Henry VII. with a copper rim, in the Exchequer.

278.4 and 2227.2, according to two standard pints of 1601, and 1602, in the Exchequer.

280 and 2240, according to the standard quart of 1601, in the Exchequer.

282 and 2256, according to the standard gallon for beer and ale, in the Treasury.

There are, moreover, varieties on these varieties, from the barrel to the ton, inclusive: for, if the barrel be of herrings, it must contain 28 gallons by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 11. If of wine, it must contain  $31\frac{1}{2}$  gallons by the statute 2 Henry VI. c. 11. and 1st Rich. III. c. 15. If of beer or ale, it must contain 34 gallons by the statute 1 William and Mary, c. 24., and the higher measures in proportion.

In those of the United States which have not adopted the statutes of William and Mary, and of Anne before cited, nor their substance, the wine gallon of 231 cubic inches rests on the authority of very long usage, before the 5th of Anne, the origin and foundation of which are unknown; the bushel is the Winchester bushel, by the 11 Henry VII. undefined; and the barrel of ale 32 gallons, and of beer 36 gallons, by the statute 23 Henry VIII. c. 4.

The Secretary of State is not informed whether there have been any, and what, alterations of these measures, by the laws of the particular States.

It is proposed to retain this series of measures, but to fix the gallon to one determinate capacity, as the unit of measure, both wet and dry; for convenience is in favor of abolishing the distinction between wet and dry measures.

The wine gallon, whether of 224 or 231 cubic inches, may be altogether disregarded, as concerning, principally, the mercantile and the wealthy, the least numerous part of the society, and the most capable of reducing one measure to another by calculation. This gallon is little used among the mass of farmers, whose chief habits and interests are in the size of the corn bushel.

Of the standard measures before stated, two are principally distinguished in authority and practice. The statute bushel of 2150 cubic inches, which gives a gallon of 268.75 cubic inches, and the standard gallon of 1601, called the corn gallon of 271, or 272 cubic inches, which has introduced the mercantile bushel of 2176 inches. The former of these is most used in some of the grain States, the latter in others. The middle term of 270 cubic inches may be taken as a mutual compromise of convenience, and as offering this general advantage: that the bushel being of 2160 cubic inches, is exactly a cubic foot and a quarter, and so facilitates the conversion of wet and dry measures into solid contents and tonnage, and simplifies the connexion of measures and weights, as will be shown hereafter. It may be added, in favor of this, as a medium measure, that eight of the standard, or statute measures before enumerated, are below this term, and nine above it.

The measures to be made for use, being four-sided, with rectangular sides and bottom.

The pint will be 3 inches square, and  $3\frac{3}{4}$  inches deep;

The quart 3 inches square, and  $7\frac{1}{2}$  inches deep;

The pottle 3 inches square, and 15 inches deep, or  $4\frac{1}{2}$ , 5, and 6 inches;

The gallon 6 inches square, and  $7\frac{1}{2}$  inches deep, or 5, 6, and 9 inches;

The peck 6, 9, and 10 inches;

The half-bushel 12 inches square, and  $7\frac{1}{2}$  inches deep; and

The bushel 12 inches square, and 15 inches deep; or 9, 15, and 16 inches.

Cylindrical measures have the advantage of superior strength; but square ones have the greater advantage of enabling every one, who has a rule in his pocket, to verify their contents by measuring them. Moreover, till the circle can be squared, the cylinder cannot be cubed, nor its contents exactly expressed in figures.

Let the measures of capacity, then, for the United States be—

A gallon of 270 cubic inches;
The gallon to contain 2 pottles;
The pottle 2 quarts;
The quart 2 pints;
The pint 4 gills;
Two gallons to make a peck;
Eight gallons a bushel or firkin;

Two bushels, or firkin, a strike or kilderkin;
Two strikes, or kilderkins, a coomb or barrel;
Two coombs, or barrels, a quarter or hoghead;
A hoghead and a third one tierce;
Two hogheads a pipe, butt, or puncheon; and
Two pipes a ton.

And let all measures of capacity of dry subjects be stricken with a straight strike.

WEIGHTS.

There are two series of weights in use among us; the one called avoirdupois, the other troy.

In the Avoirdupois series:

The pound is divided into 16 ounces;
The ounce into 16 drachms;
The drachm into 4 quarters.

In the Troy series:

The pound is divided into 12 ounces;
The ounce (according to the subdivision of the apothecaries) into 8 drachms;
The drachm into 3 scruples;
The scruple into 20 grains.

According to the subdivision for gold and silver, the ounce is divided into twenty pennyweights, and the pennyweight into twenty-four grains.

So that the pound troy contains 5760 grains, of which 7000 are requisite to make the pound avoirdupois; of course the weight of the pound troy is to that of the pound avoirdupois as 5760 to 7000, or as 144 to 175.

It is remarkable that this is exactly the proportion of the ancient liquid gallon of Guildhall of 224 cubic inches, to the corn gallon of 272; for 224 are to 272 as 144 to 175. (4.)

It is further remarkable still, that this is also the exact proportion between the specific weight of any measure of wheat, and of the same measure of water: for the statute bushel is of 64 pounds of wheat. Now as 144 to 175, so are 64 pounds to 77.7 pounds; but 77.7 pounds is known to be the weight of (5.) 2150.4 cubic inches of pure water, which is exactly the content of the Winchester bushel, as declared by the statute 13, 14, Will. 3. That statute determined the bushel to be a cylinder of 18½ inches diameter, and 8 inches depth. Such a cylinder, as nearly as it can be cubed, and expressed in figures, contains 2150.425 cubic inches; a result which reflects authority on the declaration of Parliament, and induces a favorable opinion of the care with which they investigated the contents of the ancient bushel, and also a belief that there might exist evidence of it at that day, unknown to the committees of 1758 and 1759.

We find, then, in a continued proportion 64 to 77.7 as 224 to 272, and as 144 to 175; that is to say, the specific weight of a measure of wheat, to that of the same measure of water, as the cubic contents of the wet gallon, to those of the dry; and as the weight of a pound troy to that of a pound avoirdupois.

This seems to have been so combined as to render it indifferent whether a thing were dealt out by weight or measure; for the dry gallon of wheat, and the liquid one of wine, were of the same weight; and the avoirdupois pound of wheat, and the troy pound of wine, were of the same measure. Water and the vinous liquors, which enter most into commerce, are so nearly of a weight, that the difference, in moderate quantities, would be neglected by both buyer and seller; some of the wines being a little heavier, and some a little lighter, than water.

Another remarkable correspondence is that between weights and measures. For 1000 ounces avoirdupois of pure water fill a cubic foot, with mathematical exactness.

What circumstances of the times, or purposes of barter or commerce, called for this combination of weights and measures, with the subjects to be exchanged or purchased, are not now to be ascertained. But a triple set of exact proportionals representing weights, measures, and the things to be weighed and measured, and a relation so integral between weights and solid measures, must have been the result of design and scientific calculation, and not a mere coincidence of hazard. It proves that the dry and wet measures, the heavy and light weights, must have been original parts of the system they compose—contrary to the opinion of the committee of 1757, 1758, who thought that the avoirdupois weight was not an ancient weight of the kingdom, nor ever even a legal weight, but during a single year of the reign of Henry VIII.; and, therefore, concluded, otherwise than will be here proposed, to suppress it altogether. Their opinion was founded chiefly on the silence of the laws as to this weight. But the harmony here developed in the system of weights and measures, of which the avoirdupois makes an essential member, corroborated by a general use, from very high antiquity, of that, or of a nearly similar weight under another (6.) name, seem stronger proofs that this is legal weight, than the mere silence of the written laws is of the contrary.

Be this as it may, it is in such general use with us, that, on the principle of popular convenience, its higher denominations, at least, must be preserved. It is by the avoirdupois pound and ounce that our citizens have been used to buy and sell. But the smaller subdivisions of drachms and quarters are not in use with them. On the other hand, they have been used to weigh their money and medicine with the pennyweights and grains troy weight, and are not in the habit of using the pounds and ounces of that series. It would be for their convenience, then, to suppress the pound and ounce troy, and the drachm and quarter avoirdupois; and to form into one series the avoirdupois pound and ounce, and the troy pennyweight and grain. The avoirdupois ounce contains 18 pennyweights 5½ grains troy weight. Divide it, then, into 18 pennyweights, and the pennyweight, as heretofore, into 24 grains, and the new pennyweight will contain between a third and a quarter of a grain more than the present troy pennyweight; or, more accurately, it will be to that as 875 to 864—a difference not to be noticed, either in money or medicine, below the denomination of an ounce.

But it will be necessary to refer these weights to a determinate mass of some substance, the specific gravity of which is invariable. Rain water is such a substance, and may be referred to every where, and through all time. It has been found by accurate experiments that a cubic foot of rain water weighs 1000 ounces avoirdupois, standard weights of the Exchequer. It is true that among these standard weights the committee report small variations; but this experiment must decide in favor of those particular weights, between which, and an integral mass of water, so remarkable a coincidence has been found. To render this standard more exact, the water should be weighed always in the same temperature of air; as heat, by increasing its volume, lessens its specific gravity. The cellar of uniform temperature is best for this also.

Let it, then, be established that an ounce is of the weight of a cube of rain water, of one-tenth of a foot; or, rather, that it is the thousandth part of the weight of a cubic foot of rain water, weighed in the standard temperature; that the series of weights of the United States shall consist of pounds, ounces, pennyweights, and grains; whereof

18 pennyweights one ounce;
16 ounces one pound.

COINS.

Congress, in 1786, established the money unit at 375.64 troy grains of pure silver. It is proposed to enlarge this by about the third of a grain in weight, or a mill in value; that is to say, to establish it at 376 (or, more exactly, 375.989343) instead of 375.64 grains; because it will be shown that this, as the unit of coin, will link in system with the units of length, surface, capacity, and weight, whenever it shall be thought proper to extend the decimal ratio through all these branches. It is to preserve the possibility of doing this, that this very minute alteration is proposed.

We have this proportion, then, 875 to 864, as 375.989343 grains troy to 371.2626277; the expression of the unit in the new grains.

Let it be declared, therefore, that the money unit, or dollar of the United States, shall contain 371.262 American grains of pure silver.

If nothing more, then, is proposed, than to render uniform and stable the system we already possess, this may be effected on the plan herein detailed; the sum of which is: 1st, That the present measures of length be retained, and fixed by an invariable standard. 2d, That the measures of surface remain as they are, and be invariable also as the measures of length to which they are to refer. 3d, That the unit of capacity, now so equivocal, be settled at a medium and convenient term, and defined by the same invariable measures of length. 4th, That the more known terms in the two kinds of weights be retained, and reduced to one series, and that they be referred to a definite mass of some substance, the specific gravity of which never changes. And 5th, That the quantity of pure silver in the money unit be expressed in parts of the weights so defined.

In the whole of this no change is proposed, except an insensible one in the troy grain and pennyweight, and the very minute one in the money unit.

II. But if it be thought that, either now, or at any future time, the citizens of the United States may be induced to undertake a thorough reformation of their whole system of measures, weights and coins, reducing every branch to the same decimal ratio already established in their coins, and thus bringing the calculation of the principal affairs of life within the arithmetic of every man who can multiply and divide plain numbers, greater changes will be necessary.

The unit of measure is still that which must give law through the whole system; and from whatever unit we set out, the coincidences between the old and new ratios will be rare. All that can be done, will be to choose such a unit as will produce the most of these. In this respect the second rod has been found, on trial, to be far preferable to the second pendulum.

MEASURES OF LENGTH.

Let the second rod, then, as before described, be the standard of measure; and let it be divided into five equal parts, each of which shall be called a foot; for, perhaps, it may be better generally to retain the name of the nearest present measure, where there is one tolerably near. It will be about one quarter of an inch shorter than the present foot.

Let the foot be divided into 10 inches;
The inch into 10 lines;
The line into 10 points;
Let 10 feet make a decad;
10 decads one rood;
10 roods a furlong;
10 furlongs a mile.

SUPERFICIAL MEASURES.

Superficial measures have been estimated, and so may continue to be, in squares of the measures of length, except in the case of lands, which have been estimated by squares, called roods and acres. Let the rood be equal to a square, every side of which is 100 feet. This will be 6.483 English feet less than the English (7) rood every way, and 1311 square feet less in its whole contents; that is to say, about one-eighth; in which proportion, also, 4 roods will be less than the present acre.

MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

Let the unit of capacity be the cubic foot, to be called a bushel. It will contain 1620.05506862 cubic inches, English; be about one-fourth less than that before proposed to be adopted as a medium; one-tenth less than the bushel made from 8 of the Guildhall gallons; and one-fourteenth less than the bushel made from 8 Irish gallons of 217.6 cubic inches.

Let the bushel be divided into 10 pottles;
Each pottle into 10 demi-pints;
Each demi-pint into 10 metres, which will be of a cubic inch each.
Let 10 bushels be a quarter, and 10 quarters a last, or double ton.

The measures for use being four sided, and the sides and bottoms rectangular, the bushel will be a foot cube.

The pottle 5 inches square and four inches deep;
The demi-pint 2 inches square, and  $2\frac{1}{2}$  inches deep;
The metre, an inch cube.

WEIGHTS.

Let the weight of a cubic inch of rain water, or the thousandth part of a cubic foot, be called an ounce; and let the ounce be divided into 10 double scruples:

The double scruple into 10 carats;
The carat into 10 minims or demi-grains;
The minim into 10 mites.

Let 10 ounces make a pound;
 10 pounds a stone;
 16 stones a kental;
 10 kentals a hoghead.

COINS.

Let the money unit, or dollar, contain eleven-twelfths of an ounce of pure silver. This will be 376 troy grains, (or more exactly, 375.989343 troy grains,) which will be about a third of a grain, (or more exactly, .349343 of a grain, more than the present unit. This, with the twelfth of alloy already established, will make the dollar or unit, of the weight of an ounce, or of a cubic inch of rain water, exactly. The series of mills, cents, dimes, dollars, and eagles, to remain as already established (8.)

The second rod, or the second pendulum, expressed in the measures of other countries, will give the proportion between their measures and those of the United States.

Measures, weights and coins, thus referred to standards unchangeable in their nature, (as is the length of a rod vibrating seconds, and the weight of a definite mass of rain water,) will themselves be unchangeable. These standards, too, are such as to be accessible to all persons, in all times and places. The measures and weights derived from them fall in so nearly with some of those now in use, as to facilitate their introduction; and, being arranged in decimal ratio, they are within the calculation of every one who possesses the first elements of arithmetic, and of easy comparison, both for foreigners and citizens, with the measures, weights, and coins of other countries.

A gradual introduction would lessen the inconveniences which might attend too sudden a substitution, even of an easier for a more difficult system. After a given term, for instance, it might begin in the custom-houses, where the merchants would become familiarised to it. After a further term, it might be introduced into all legal proceedings, and merchants and traders in foreign commodities might be required to use it in their dealings with one another. After a still further term, all other descriptions of people might receive it into common use. Too long a postponement, on the other hand, would increase the difficulties of its reception with the increase of our population.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Secretary of State.

Appendix, containing illustrations and developments of some passages of the preceding report.

(1.) In the second pendulum with a spherical bob, call the distance between the centres of suspension and of the bob,  $2 \times 19.575$ , or  $2d$ , and the radius of the bob  $= r$ ; then  $2d : r :: r : \frac{\pi}{54}$  and  $\frac{\pi}{54}$  of this last proportional expresses the displacement of the centre of oscillation, to wit:  $\frac{2r}{5 \times 2d} = \frac{\pi}{54}$ . Two inches have been proposed as a proper diameter for such a bob. In that case  $r$  will be  $= 1$  inch, and  $\frac{\pi}{54} = \frac{1}{9787}$  inches.

In the cylindrical second rod, call the length of the rod,  $3 \times 19.575$ , or  $3d$ , and its radius  $= r$ . and  $\frac{\pi}{2 \times 3d} = \frac{\pi}{6d}$  will express the displacement of the centre of oscillation. If it is thought the rod will be sufficiently inflexible if it be  $\frac{1}{5}$  of an inch in diameter. Then  $r$  will be  $= .1$  inch, and  $\frac{\pi}{6d} = \frac{1}{11745}$  inches, which is but the 120th part of the displacement in the case of the pendulum with a spherical bob, and but the 689,710th part of the whole length of the rod. If the rod be even of half an inch diameter, the displacement will be but  $\frac{1}{1879}$  of an inch, or  $\frac{1}{110356}$  of the length of the rod.

(2.) Sir Isaac Newton computes the pendulum for  $45^\circ$  to be 36 pouces 8.428 lignes. Picard made the English foot 11 pouces 2.6 lignes, and Dr. Maskelyne 11 pouces 3.11 lignes. D'Alembert states it at 11 pouces 3 lignes, which has been used in these calculations as a middle term, and gives us 36 pouces 8.428 lignes  $= 39.1491$  inches. This length for the pendulum of  $45^\circ$  had been adopted in this report before the Bishop of Autun's proposition was known here. He relies on Mairan's ratio for the length of the pendulum in the latitude of Paris, to wit:  $504 : 257 :: 72$  pouces to a 4th proportional, which will be 36.71428 pouces  $= 39.1619$  inches, the length of the pendulum for latitude  $48^\circ 50'$ . The difference between this and the pendulum for  $45^\circ$  is .0113 of an inch: so that the pendulum for  $45^\circ$  would be estimated, according to Mairan, at  $39.1619 - .0113 = 39.1506$  inches, almost precisely the same with Newton's computation herein adopted.

(3.) Sir Isaac Newton's computations for the different degrees of latitude, from  $30^\circ$  to  $45^\circ$ , are as follows;

	Pieds.	Lignes.		Pieds.	Lignes.
30°	3	- 7.948		42°	3 - 8.327
35	3	- 8.099		43	3 - 8.361
40	3	- 8.261		44	3 - 8.394
41	3	- 8.294		45	3 - 8.428

(4.) Or, more exactly,  $144 : 175 :: 224 : 272.2$ .

(5.) Or, more exactly,  $62.5 : 1728 :: 77.7 : 2150.39$ .

(6.) The merchant's weight.

(7.) The English rood contains 10,890 square feet  $= 104.355$  feet square.

DELETERIOUS EFFECTS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS ON THE HUMAN SYSTEM.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 29, 1790.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: the memorial of the College of Physicians of the city of Philadelphia respectfully sheweth:

That they have seen, with great pleasure, the operation of a National Government, which has established order in the United States.

They rejoice to find, amongst the powers which belong to this Government that of restraining, by certain duties, the consumption of distilled spirits in our country.

It belongs more peculiarly to men of other professions to enumerate the pernicious effects of these liquors upon morals and manners. Your memorialists will only remark that a great proportion of the most obstinate, painful, and mortal disorders which affect the human body are produced by distilled spirits; that they are not only destructive to health and life, but that they impair the faculties of the mind, and thereby tend equally to dishonor our character as a nation, and to degrade our species as intelligent beings.

Your memorialists have no doubt that the rumor of a plague or any other pestilential disorder, which might sweep away thousands of their fellow-citizens, would produce the most vigorous and effectual measures in our Government to prevent or subdue it.

Your memorialists can see no just cause why the more certain and extensive ravages of distilled spirits upon human life should not be guarded against with corresponding vigilance and exertions by the present rulers of the United States.

Your memorialists beg leave to add further, that the habitual use of distilled spirits, in any case whatever, is wholly unnecessary; that they neither fortify the body against the morbid effects of heat or cold, nor render labor more easy nor more productive; and that there are many articles of diet and drink, which are not only safe and perfectly salutary, but preferable to distilled spirits, for the above-mentioned purposes.

Your memorialists have beheld with regret the feeble influence of reason and religion in restraining the evils which they have enumerated. They centre their hopes, therefore, of an efficient remedy for them, in the wisdom and power of the Legislature of the United States; and in behalf of the interests of humanity, to which their profession is closely allied, they thus publicly entreat the Congress, by their obligations to protect the lives of their constituents, and by their regard to the character of our nation, and to the rank of our species in the scale of beings, to impose such heavy duties upon all distilled spirits as shall be effectual to restrain their intemperate use in our country.

Signed by order of the College: JOHN REDMAN, President.
Attest: SAMUEL POWELL GRIFFITHS, Secretary.

[3d SESSION.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 31, 1790.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, December 27, 1790.

The order of the House of Representatives, requiring me to report on the judiciary system of the United States, has prescribed a task of no common difficulty.

I doubt whether any one man could answer for the accuracy of such a work; and even for more than one, a greater portion of time would be necessary to insure precision, than the interval between the last and present session.

But these are not my only embarrassments. I am called upon to revise a plan approved by legislative wisdom; and, although I have examined it with a deference most respectful and sincere, yet have I been compelled to question the fitness of some of its leading features.

I submit, therefore, to the candor and indulgence of the House, the enclosed report. The first part contains an enumeration of what I conceive to be the principal defects. Those of the smaller kind would have been treated in the same form, but for the opportunity which a bill affords, to avoid too much minuteness of comment, and to express my ideas more definitely.

A bill is prepared, in the second part, in which a large share of the former matter is preserved. But the language and arrangement of the judicial law have not been implicitly pursued, it being almost impracticable to incorporate the proposed amendments by references to pages and lines. Where the changes or additions are essential, I have endeavored to justify them by explanatory remarks.

After all, however, I am persuaded that time and practice can alone mature the judicial system. If, in this attempt to put it into the train of improvement, I have maintained errors in doctrine, it is a consolation to me to reflect that my opinions have nothing of authority in them.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL, to whom were referred, by the order of the House of Representatives, "such matters relative to the administration of justice under the authority of the United States, as may require to be remedied, and such provisions in the respective cases as he should deem advisable," in obedience thereto, makes the following report:

FIRST PART.

1. The first object of this duty is to suggest any defects existing in the judiciary system.

The courts of the United States demand an organization, of which we have no apposite example in the history of foreign jurisprudence, and our own scheme has not received the full light of experience. The following observations must, therefore, depend for their chief support on reasoning, unaccompanied by precedent.

1. From which of the judicial powers enumerated in the constitution the State courts may be rightfully excluded, is an inquiry, to which an early part of the judiciary law gives birth.

The aggregate of these powers relate—

1. To cases arising in law or equity under the constitution.
2. Under the laws of the United States.
3. Under treaties made, or to be made, by their authority.
4. To cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls.
5. To cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.
6. To controversies to which the United States shall be a party.
7. To controversies between a State and citizens of another State.
8. To controversies between citizens of different States.
9. To controversies between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States: and,
10. To controversies between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

Of these ten classes of jurisdiction, some are vested in the federal, concurrently with the State tribunals; others in the federal, exclusively of the State tribunals.

It is not expressly forbidden to the States to assume the cognizance of any one or all of them. For the judicial power of the United States is only to extend to the recited cases: and to extend the authority of one court to a description of persons or things, which would of course be embraced by another, had no such extension been made, cannot, of itself, deprive that other of its pre-existing rights.

The nature, however, of some of these subjects, shuts out the jurisdiction of the State courts, as such, on the vital principles of the Union.

1. The first among these are cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; terms, which, when thus applied, are nearly synonymous. They bear a technical meaning, well known throughout the United States, and uniform; being expressive of courts, copied from the same original. It belongs to them to decide all causes arising wholly on the sea, and not within the precincts of any county, and to condemn all lawful prizes in time of war.

(a) The open sea is a great highway to all mankind, who have not surrendered, by an acquiescence or a positive act, the privilege of navigating particular parts of it. In general, every nation ranks the cognizance of causes wholly arising there among the attributes of independence; and to none is it denied, where the litigants or the litigated property is within its territory. If, therefore, it were supposed that any one of the now United States had never entered into the Union, to it would this prerogative have appertained. But being a party to the federal compact, each State has resigned it to the Federal Government. It has been thus resigned:

1. Because that Government only, as possessing the rights of remonstrance, marque, reprisal, and war, can protect the citizens of the United States from hostilities, in their daily intercourse with rival adventurers on that element.

2. Because a concurrence of jurisdiction might either involve the confederacy in war, contrary to its will, or subject it to a grievous reparation of some injury.

3. Because the power given to Congress by the constitution to define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations, comprehends the whole of criminal sea law, and warrants that body to assign to the federal courts alone an exclusive jurisdiction therein: and, lastly,

4. Because under the foregoing powers, and the power of Congress to regulate commerce, and to make rules concerning captures on water, the pure marine law, properly so called, can be dispensed by those courts only which derive an authority over it from the United States.

(b) For the same reason is the cognizance of prizes in time of war lodged in the federal courts exclusively. But it is not pretended, from hence, that the United States are absolved from the obligations of neutrality.

(c) Two other denominations of cases have been added to the admiralty and maritime courts, to wit: offences on water against the revenue laws; and claims for specific satisfaction on the body of a vessel, as for mariners' wages, &c. But neither of these is of necessity appropriated to the admiralty. It is true that a jurisdiction over the former must be deduced from Congress, and that they will doubtless deposit it in their own tribunals, and most probably in the admiralty. In the latter, the State Legislatures may establish a jurisdiction reaching the vessel itself.

2. If the United States, as far as they can be a party defendant, should happen to be so, their own courts can alone judge them. To drag a confederacy before the courts of one of its members, would reverse the plain dictates of order; hazard the most critical interests of the Union upon the pleasure of a single State; and enable every individual State, under the pretext of a forensic sentence, to arrogate the general sovereignty.

3. In like manner, as far as a particular State can be a party defendant, a sister State cannot be her judge. Were the States of America unconfederated, they would be as free from mutual control as other disjointed nations. Nor does the federal compact narrow this exemption, but confirms it, by establishing a common arbiter in the federal judiciary, whose constitutional authority may administer redress.

It deserves, however, to be remarked in this place, that these ideas are not inconsistent with the right of the States separately, or of the United States collectively, to resort to the State courts as plaintiffs; nor yet with the right of the States separately to open their own courts for suits against themselves.

4. In disputes arising upon the grants of land by different States, the contest must turn upon one of two questions: in which State the land lies; or whether lands confessedly within one State may not, by virtue of some act, be claimed by the grantee of another. It would be the extreme of presumption for a sister State to affect a jurisdiction in this case; and more especially ought the granting and claiming States to keep aloof from the decision; it being the cause of both.

5. If crimes and offences be punishable by that authority alone against which they are committed, those created by the constitution or by Congress result to the federal judiciary only. If, on the other hand, it were allowed that Congress might transfer the cognizance of these cases to the State courts, until that transfer it cannot be theirs.

6. Rights, too, created by Congress may have a special remedy given to them in the federal courts; and to them ought, therefore, to be restricted.

We are then led to conclude that the judiciary of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction in the following cases:

1. In those of strict admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.
2. Where the United States are a party defendant.
3. Where a particular State is a party defendant.
4. Where lands are claimed under grants of different States.
5. In treason, as described by the constitution, and other crimes and offences created by the laws of the United States, but not consigned to the State tribunals.
6. In rights created by a law of the United States, and having a special remedy given to them in the federal courts.

In all the other cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends, a concurrent jurisdiction is presumed; provided they be not mingled with others coming within any of the six foregoing descriptions. By this standard, which, if found, may, by its adoption, maintain the harmony of the federal and State judiciaries, the Attorney General has tried the jurisdictions marked out by law. But with a reluctance and distrust of his own judgment, which nothing less than a sense of duty could overcome, he begs leave to ask—

1st. How far the State courts ought to be prohibited, as they now are, from a jurisdiction in suits against consuls or vice-consuls, as such, or against a State sued with its own permission in its own courts, or in suits where a State is plaintiff? And,

2d. Whether the restrictions on the State courts ought not to be increased, so as to bind all the six cases above mentioned?

On a further prosecution of the cases acknowledged to be of concurrent jurisdiction, it appears that a writ of error may issue from the Supreme Court of the United States to a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit by the highest State court of law or equity in the nine following cases:

Where is drawn in question—

1. The validity of a treaty of the United States;

2. Or of a statute of the United States;
3. Or of an authority exercised under the United States: and the decision is against their validity.

Or where is drawn in question—

1. The validity of a statute of any State, on the ground of being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States;
2. Or of an authority exercised under any State, upon like grounds: and the decision is in favor of such their validity.

Or where is drawn in question—

1. The construction of any clause of the constitution of the United States;
2. Or of a treaty of the United States;
3. Or of a statute of the United States;
4. Or of a commission held under the United States: and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption, specially set up or claimed by either party under such clause of the said constitution, treaty, statute, or commission.

That the avenue to the federal courts ought, in these instances, to be unobstructed, is manifest. But in what stage, and by what form, shall their interposition be prayed? There are, perhaps, but two modes: one of which is to convert the Supreme Court of the United States into an appellate tribunal over the Supreme Courts of the several States; the other to permit a removal by certiorari before trial.

The Attorney General will not decide how far the arguments of those who do not assent to the first merit attention. But he is constrained to lay them before the House.

It has been conceded that, when the constitution delegates to the Supreme Court "appellate jurisdiction," it uses a very broad expression, which, if understood in its literal latitude, tolerates the first expedient. But, on the other hand, it has been asserted—

1st. That this phrase must be pressed close to the matter of the third article of the constitution, which is the judicial power of the United States, without blending State courts.

2d. That this species of construction is not unfrequent; nay, in another part of the article it is drawn into action. For, without it the direction that all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be tried by a jury, might intrude further into the police of a State than has been ever yet contended.

3d. That as the State courts did not rely for their concurrent jurisdiction upon any cession in the constitution, the special provision that the Supreme Court should have original jurisdiction in four cases was designed to prevent the inferior courts of the United States from having the sole original jurisdiction in those cases; and that original and appellate being correlative in their signification, the latter must also bespeak some relation between the supreme and inferior courts of the United States alone.

4th. That, in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and some others, with which a State cannot intermeddle, the appellate jurisdiction must operate on the decrees of the inferior federal courts only; and that the interpretation of one passage in the article being thus far clear, furnishes a key by which to expound the others: and,

5th. That a concurrence of jurisdiction so strongly implies co-equality, that nothing ought to arraign it, except a very explicit declaration, or, at least, a violent necessity to the contrary.

But let these arguments be passed over without further notice.

Does justice entitle a plaintiff to the first mode? When he institutes his suit, he has the choice of the State and federal courts. He elects the former, and to that election he ought to adhere.

Does justice entitle a defendant to it? Certainly not. Should he be free to withdraw the cause by a certiorari at any time before trial from the State court? For if, with this privilege, he proceeds without a murmur through the whole length of the State courts, ought he to catch a new chance from the federal courts? Have not both plaintiff and defendant, thus acquiescing, virtually chosen their own judges?

Again: let supposition itself be tortured; let the highest State courts, although sworn to support the constitution, invalidate a treaty, a statute, or an authority of the United States.

1st. Such a decree could not invalidate them, nor impair the right of the lowest federal court to ratify them.

2d. It would not disturb the tranquillity of the United States. For if even aliens were the parties, the remonstrances of their prince might be repelled by showing that they favored the State jurisdiction, by waiving the privilege of going into the federal courts.

3d. Nor yet would the honor of the United States be sullied. For if it has not occurred, it may be conceived that courts, whose jurisdiction is straitened in value, but whose decrees up to that value are final, may be refractory against a law, without diminishing the real dignity of Government. Judicial uniformity is surely a public good, but its price may be too great if it can be purchased only by cherishing a power, which, to say no more, cannot be incontestably proved.

4th. At any rate, unless a party shall forsake the ordinary maxims of prudence, the hostility of the supreme State courts (if hostility be possible) will be displayed but once. For the remembrance of an adverse decision or an adverse temper in those courts will inevitably proclaim the federal courts as the asylum to federal interests.

From these considerations, the second mode, by certiorari, is, perhaps, eligible. But it may be said that even this process argues something more than a concurrence of jurisdiction in the federal courts; and that, if it be improper to tie a defendant to a State court against his will, it is equally so to force a plaintiff to a federal court against his will. To this let it be answered:

1st. That the judicial power of the United States was established to prevent suitors, in certain cases, from being obliged to submit entirely to the State courts; and that a material objection to the re-examination of a final decree is founded upon both parties voluntarily and cheerfully devoting themselves to the State courts; and

2d. That a concurrent jurisdiction would be a heavy oppression to a defendant, if he cannot depart from a State court, while the plaintiff may arrest him by a State or federal writ.

A third alteration, which the Attorney General cannot forbear to suggest, is, that the judges of the Supreme Court shall cease to be judges of the circuit courts.

It is obvious that the inferior courts ought to be distinct bodies from the supreme courts. But how far it may confound these two species of courts to suffer the judges of the supreme to hold seats on the circuit bench, he declines the discussion, and circumscribes his reflections within the pale of expediency only.

1. Those who pronounce the law of the land without appeal, ought to be pre-eminent in most endowments of the mind. Survey the functions of a judge of the Supreme Court. He must be a master of the common law in all its divisions, a chancellor, a civilian, a federal jurist, and skilled in the laws of each State. To expect that in future times this assemblage of talents will be ready, without further study, for the national service, is to confide too largely in the public fortune. Most vacancies on the bench will be supplied by professional men, who, perhaps, have been too much animated by the contentions of the bar deliberately to explore this extensive range of science.

In a great measure, then, the supreme judges will form themselves after their nomination. But what leisure remains from their itinerant dispensation of justice? Sum up all the fragments of their time, hold their fatigue at naught, and let them bid adieu to all domestic concerns, still the average term of a life, already advanced, will be too short for any important proficiency.

2. The detaching of the judges to different circuits defeats the benefit of an unprejudiced consultation. The delivery of a solemn opinion in court commits them; and should a judgment rendered by two be erroneous, will they meet their four brethren unbiassed? May not human nature, thus trammelled, struggle too long against conviction? And how few would erect a monument to their candor, at the expense of their reputation for firmness and discernment?

3. Jealousy among the members of a court is always an evil; and its malignity would be double, should it creep into the Supreme Court, obscure the discovery of right, and weaken that respect which the public welfare seeks for their decrees. But this cannot be affirmed to be beyond the compass of events to men agitated by the constant scanning of the judicial conduct of each other.

If this should not happen, there is fresh danger on the other side, lest they should be restrained by delicacy and mutual tenderness from probing, without scruple, what had been done in the circuit courts. A schism of sentiment before a decision, and after a free conference, is not esteemed harsh; but it is very painful to undertake to satisfy another that, in a public opinion already uttered, he has been in the wrong.

4. Situated as the United States are, many of the most weighty judiciary questions will be perfectly novel. These must be hurried off on the circuits, where necessary books are not to be had; or relinquished for argument before the next set of judges, who, on their part, may want books, and a calmer season for thought. So that a cause may be suspended until every judge shall have heard it.

5. To this separation of the supreme judges from the circuit service, some objections may be anticipated.

It may be urged:

1st. That it will tend to impress the citizens of the United States favorably towards the General Government, should the most distinguished judges visit every State: and

2d. That in one country, assizes are held with applause by the very men who afterwards sit collectively to review what may have been there transacted, and who are also consulted in the dernier resort.

1. The first objection is too vague. In its extent, it impugns all subordinate departments whatever; and ought, therefore, to be regarded no otherwise than as it may be unopposed by inconveniences. Let it then be inquired if none of the preceding do oppose.

Again: Will not the judges of the circuit courts be adequate to their stations?

The supreme judges themselves, who ride the circuits, will (if, indeed, such a circumstance can be of much avail) be soon graduated in the public mind, in relation to the circuits; will soon be considered as circuit judges; and will not be often appreciated as supreme judges. When a discomfited party looks up to the highest tribunal for redress, he is told, by the report of the world, that in it every quality is centred necessary to justice. But how would his sanguine hopes be frustrated, if, among six judges, two are most probably to repeat their former suffrages, or to vindicate them with strenuous ability; or, if to avoid this, the wisdom of a third of the number must be laid aside?

2. The assize scheme will not be confronted by any impeachment of its merit; on the contrary, its merit is admitted, although, perhaps, it cannot safely be the groundwork of our reasoning on the judiciary of the United States, until we are assured that we have penetrated all the arcana of its operations. But there is a court of final jurisdiction, which, by being ready to correct, incessantly admonishes all the subordinate courts to be circumspect. Equity itself, too, being in different hands from the common law, is watchful over every departure from what is right.

When the judges of assize assist with their counsels in the last resort, they are not authoritative. Such of them as are members of the body, are so small in number, as to be compelled to rely on the strength and solidity of their judgments only, instead of their influence. Besides, the judges are enrolled in distinct corps; and this alone would be a kind of hostage for exertions in behalf of truth.

Where, then, is the similitude to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Should the judges of the Supreme Court become stationary, they will be able to execute reports of their own decisions, and thus promote uniformity through the whole judiciary of the United States.

Reports may be traced up to a venerable antiquity. In England they were composed for centuries by protonotaries of the court, at the charges of the Crown. And ever since the patronage of Government has retired, their utility has been universally avowed. In our own country, too, labors like these have diffused a knowledge of the laws of particular States. And how valuable, in point of authenticity and instruction, must reports be from the Supreme Court.

But these are not the only advantages: they announce the talents of the judges.

If the judge, whose reputation has raised him to office, shall be in the habit of delivering feeble opinions, these reports will first excite surprise, and afterwards a suspicion, which will terminate in a vigilance over his actions.

In a word, when, by means of these reports, the sense of the Supreme Court shall be ascertained and followed in the inferior tribunals, much time and money will be saved to dissatisfied suitors who might otherwise appeal.

A diversity of opinion has prevailed on the forms and modes to be observed in causes of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction—whether they are to be according to the mere civil law, unqualified by the usages of any modern nation, or under limitations.

If the untempered severity of the Roman law is to predominate, the rights of property and of personal liberty are in jeopardy. Without exhibiting a tedious list of what are termed the substantial and accidental parts of a civil cause, let a few of the most obnoxious forms of the civil law be selected.

1. In scarcely any case, unless in that of a ne exeat, is an arrest upon citation or subpena, at the first institution of a chancery suit known in the United States. In the civil law it is otherwise.

2. One mode of executing a sentence is by putting the plaintiff into possession of all the defendant's estate, in order that he may pay himself; and the same may be the punishment of contumacy.

3. It is true that, by practice, a sequestration has grown into a chancery process in the last stage of contempt. But, by the civil law, the property in debate may be wrested from its possessor, when he has been guilty of no contempt, and may continue with the sequestrator, be the suit depending for any number of years whatsoever.

4. To what a height of insult and delay may not a dilatory exception to a judge be carried.

5. The oaths have not less singularity in them.

The suppletory oath is given by the judge to the plaintiff or defendant, upon half proof being already made, which, being joined with the half proof, supplies a sufficient quantum of proof.

The decisive oath is, where one of the litigants, not being able to prove his accusation, offers to stand or fall by the oath of his adversary; and the adversary is bound to accept it, or make the same proposal back again, under the penalty of condemnation.

The oath of calumny is, where the plaintiff or defendant is required to swear that he believes himself to be engaged in a just cause.

To these specimens, others might be added, equally exceptionable. But as they indicate the general spirit of the civil law, in its forms and modes, limitations of them ought to be searched for.

It cannot be denied that the nation, whose jurisprudence is the source of our own, presents the best limitations, and that they ought to be adopted until better shall be devised. And better may certainly be prepared under the auspices of Congress.

Congress evinced their anxiety that the administration of justice should be as convenient as possible to the citizens of the United States when they allotted alternate places for the sessions of the district and circuit courts. Although it may be doubted whether it would not be more agreeable to the public to be summoned to some central spot, yet, to reduce these places to one in each district, without cogent reasons, might awaken discontent. But such a risk may be encountered with safety, as it is defended by a fair prediction of the mischiefs which await the old plan.

1. Either the records, or copies of them, must travel with the courts. By the former step they would be always liable to loss or injury; by the latter, the expense to clients would be greatly increased. It will not be enough to make up a scanty nisi prius roll only; because the court which tries the cause will enter judgment, and must therefore have the documents entire.

2. Generally speaking, two sets of lawyers will be retained. The same practitioners will not desert the more profitable business of the State courts, to attend two federal courts, widely distant from each other, and very probably interfering with the terms of the State courts: and if they do not ride with the judges, the prospect is equal, that a cause, the original writ of which is returnable in one place, may be ultimately heard at the other.

3. The original writs of suits will most commonly be returnable to the place nearest to the residence of the witnesses. But if they are to go to the more remote place, costs will be multiplied, and themselves put to additional trouble.

4. If a culprit should not be tried at the first session, and the judges cannot hold a special intermediate session, he must be transported in irons to the next place of session, or languish in gaol, until the court shall meet at the place of his confinement. And it will be very rare that a special session can be held by the judges of the Supreme Court at least, as their duty will hasten them to some other circuit, and from thence to the seat of Government.

1. It is conjectured that the common law was omitted among the rules of decision, as having been already the law of the United States. Most probably this will be seldom, if ever, controverted. But in one aspect the existence of the common law, as the law of the United States, is equivocal. For if the doctrines of the common law can be introduced into the federal courts only by recurring to them for the explanation of the language used in the laws of the United States and of particular States, or by the connexion which the common law will have with most of the suits in the federal courts, as arising within some particular State, some parts of the common law which do not fall within either of these characters will be estranged from our system.

To cut off, then, such altercation, is not unworthy the care of Congress.

2. But the common law, not being totally without blemish, has been occasionally improved by statute. Is the wisdom of these improvements to be discarded? It is true, indeed, that there ought to be a repugnance to naturalize the statute book of a foreign nation, even for a moment. But the fact is, that the United States have not yet had sufficient leisure to disengage themselves from it, by enacting a code for themselves. The time will come (perhaps it has already come) when such a work will be indispensable. But until it shall be completed, it will be far less disgraceful to accept, under proper restrictions, some part of our law from an alien volume, with which every State is well acquainted, and to which the people have been accustomed from their infant settlements, than abruptly to unhinge ancient legal tenets. And here the Attorney General begs leave to conjecture, that if the two clauses, concerning the forfeiture of the penalty annexed to articles, &c., and concerning abatements, both of which have originated from statutes, should alone be inserted, every other part of the statutes would be excluded by construction, except where they are the laws of a particular State, and in cases belonging to that State.

These appear to be the capital desiderata. Other alterations will be proposed in the draught which is now offered, in obedience to the second part of the order; namely, that a report be made of such provisions as may seem advisable.

SECOND PART.

This bill, although not formally divided into cardinal parts, is yet divisible into four. The first contains all that is peculiar to the organization of the district courts; the second, to that of the circuit courts; the third, to that of the Supreme Court; and the fourth, what is common to two or the whole of them.

The constitution, the common law, and equity, have shortened the detail. But in the progress of the draught, the alternative was always in view, either to make it immensely prolix, by re-enacting the necessary statutes, or to consider that those of a certain general nature would be specially adopted. For the Attorney General repeats, that the chasm will be found distressing in practice without such adoption. The latter, then, was preferred, as being incapable of any fatal error. In the former, too, much might have been omitted without longer premeditation; and the very changes of language might generate confusion.

He therefore requests, that whensoever, on the perusal, any thing seems to be too slightly touched, or unnoticed, it should be inquired in what manner the constitution of the United States, equity, the common and statute law, have provided for the case, and whether they have not provided sufficiently.

A bill for amending the several acts concerning the Judicial Courts of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States shall be, and they are hereby, divided into fifteen districts, to be limited and called as follows, to wit: One to consist of that part of the State of Massachusetts which lies easterly of the State of New Hampshire, and to be called Maine district; one to consist of the State of New Hampshire, and to be called New Hampshire district; one to consist of the remaining part of the State of Massachusetts, and to be called Massachusetts district; one to consist of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, and to be called the district of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations; one to consist of the State of Connecticut, and to be called Connecticut district; one to consist of the State of New York, and to be called New York district; one to consist of the State of New Jersey, and to be called New Jersey district; one to consist of the State of Pennsylvania, and to be called Pennsylvania district; one to consist of the State of Delaware, and to be called Delaware district; one to consist of the State of Maryland, and to be called Maryland district; one to consist of the State of Virginia, except that part called the district of Kentucky, and to be called Virginia district; one to consist of the district of Kentucky, and to be called Kentucky district; one to consist of the State of North Carolina, and to be called North Carolina district; one to consist of the State of South Carolina, and to be called South Carolina district; and one to consist of the State of Georgia, and to be called Georgia district. [Note 1.]

And be it further enacted, That there be a court called a district court in each of the aforesaid districts; that it shall consist of one judge, who shall reside in the district for the court of which he is or shall be appointed, and shall be called a district judge; and that before he proceeds to execute the duties of his said office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation, to wit: "I, A. B. do solemnly swear, or affirm, that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent on me as judge of the district of ———, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the constitution and laws of the United States: So help me God." Which oath or affirmation shall be administered by any one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; any district judge of the United States; any judge or justice of the peace for the State forming the district, or the clerk of the district court; and a certificate thereof shall be recorded in the district court.

And be it further enacted, That each district court shall hold two stated sessions in every year, at the times and places, and for the terms following, that is to say: [Note 2.]

That each district court shall also hold special sessions for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, at such times as the judge thereof shall appoint, and at the places following, that is to say:

Provided always, That the said courts shall be holden in some public court-house, where the same can be obtained; and that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in vacation, or to the respective courts, if it shall be rendered necessary by any infectious disorder or other cause, to direct the sessions of the said courts, whether stated or special, to be holden at some more fit place within the said districts respectively, until the said cause shall be removed. [Note 3.]

And be it further enacted, That no State court shall take cognizance of, or exercise jurisdiction in, any of the following cases, to wit:

1. Cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.
2. Controversies to which the United States shall be a party defendant.
3. Controversies to which a particular State shall be a party defendant, except where a State may have authorized a suit to be brought against itself in its own courts.
4. Controversies for lands claimed under grants of different States.
5. Treason against the United States, and crimes and offences created by Congress, unless the cognizance thereof shall be vested by law in the said State courts, or State magistrates: and,
6. Rights created by Congress, and having a special remedy given to them in the federal courts. [Note 4.]

And be it further enacted, That each district court shall, under the regulations and restrictions hereinafter mentioned, have original jurisdiction of all cases in law and equity arising—

1. Under the constitution of the United States.
2. The laws of the United States; and,
3. Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.
4. Of all cases affecting ambassadors, and other public ministers, being plaintiffs; or consuls, or vice-consuls, being plaintiffs or defendants. [Note 5.]
5. Of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.
6. Of piracies and felonies on the high seas.
7. Of crimes and offences created by Congress, arising within its proper district.
8. Of controversies upon rights created by Congress, and having a special remedy given thereto in the federal courts.
9. Of all controversies to which the United States shall be a party plaintiff.
10. Of all controversies between a State being plaintiff, and the citizens of another State.
11. Of all controversies between citizens of different States not claiming lands under the grants of different States.
12. And of all controversies between a State, being plaintiff, and foreign citizens or subjects; or between the citizens of a State, and foreign citizens or subjects.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the aforesaid jurisdiction of the district courts shall be under the regulations and restrictions following, that is to say:

1. No person shall sue out any original process, or commence any original suit, in a district court, for the trial of any matter or thing of less value than ——— dollars, on pain of having the same dismissed with costs; except in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and in offences against the revenue laws. [Note 6.]

2. No suit shall be brought or sustained in equity, in the said district courts, except in cases of fraud, accident, trust, and unconscionable hardship; or where the mode of proof, or the mode of relief, at common law, be incompetent to the case of the complainant; or where persons not resident in the United States, and having any estate or debts in the hands of another, resident within the district for which such court is held, shall, together with that other person, be made defendant; and, in the last-mentioned case, the decree may subject such estate and debts to the demand of the complainant. [Note 7.]

3. The judge of a district court may issue writs of ne exeat, returnable to the said court, against any person who is about to depart from any district, and who may be liable to be sued in equity in the said district courts; the writs of ne exeat shall command the defendant to find sufficient security, in a sum to be expressed therein by the direction of the judge, that he will not depart the district without the leave of the court; and the plaintiff, or some responsible person in his behalf, shall, at the time of obtaining the writ, enter into bond, with sufficient security, in the clerk's office of the district court, to answer all damages which may accrue to the defendant from the said writ.

4. Writs of injunction in equity may be granted by the judge of a district court to judgments of the said court at common law; but the plaintiff, or some responsible person in his behalf, shall, at the time of obtaining the said writ, enter into bond, with sufficient security, in the clerk's office of the district court, to answer damages, at the rate of ten per centum, in case such injunction shall be dissolved; and no injunction in equity shall be granted by a district court to a judgment at law of a State court. [Note 8.]

5. The jurisdiction hereinbefore given to the district courts over cases arising under the constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States, shall not be construed to comprehend such cases in which the United States, or a particular State, shall be defendant. [Note 9.]

6. In all crimes and offences tried by any district court, the punishment for which, if consisting of stripes, imprisonment, or a fine, is left to the discretion of a jury or the court, the stripes shall not exceed thirty, nor the imprisonment six calendar months, nor the fine one hundred dollars; and wheresoever, in any crime or offence cognizable under the authority of the United States, the punishment by stripes, imprisonment, or fine, be expressly defined by law, and be greater than the number, the time, and the sum aforesaid; or wheresoever the punishment shall affect life or limb, no district court shall exercise jurisdiction therein, unless the offender, being actually in prison, shall, by petition to the said court, request it; and thereupon, if it shall appear to the said court that due notice and sufficient time have been given to the officers of the United States concerned to prepare for the hearing, and that the circuit courts hereinafter mentioned have not already had possession of the case, and that it would tend to expedite its decision if the said district court should take cognizance of it, it shall be lawful for the said district court to hear and determine the same; but this restriction of the jurisdiction by this act given to the district courts shall not be construed to extend to the district courts in the districts of Kentucky or Maine. [Note 10.]

7. No civil suit, being of a transitory nature only, shall be brought against an inhabitant of the United States, in any district court other than that of the district to which he belongs, unless process for the same cause shall have been first returned in the said district court, that he was not found, or he shall be absconding from his said district, at the time of such suit being brought, or he shall be privy or a party in interest with a person resident within the district of the first-mentioned court; and all suits brought contrary hereto may be dismissed on motion.

8. No district court shall have cognizance of any suit, to recover the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action, in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange.

9. No person whatsoever shall, in any civil action or suit brought in a district court, be arrested or summoned in one district for trial in another, unless he be privy or a party in interest as aforesaid; in which case, he may be summoned. [Note 11.]

10. Local actions shall be brought in the court of the district in which they arise.

11. No special session of a district court shall be held, but for civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as aforesaid, and for seizures under the laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States; and no such cause shall be heard at any stated session of the said court. [Note 12.]

And be it further enacted, That the judges of the district courts shall be conservators of the peace of the United States throughout their respective districts. [Note 13.]

And be it further enacted, That each district court, or the judge, in vacation, shall have power to appoint the clerk thereof, who, before he enters upon the execution of his office, shall take the following oath, or affirmation, to be administered by the said judge: "I, A. B., being appointed clerk of the district of _____, do solemnly swear, or affirm, that I will truly and faithfully enter and record all the orders, decrees, judgments, and proceedings of the said court; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties of my said office, according to the best of my abilities and understanding: So help me God." But the words "So help me God," shall be omitted in all cases of affirmation. And the said clerk shall give bond to the United States, in a reasonable penalty, with one surety at least, to be approved by the said district judge, conditioned faithfully to discharge the duties of his office, and seasonably to record the decrees, judgments, and orders of the said court; which bond shall be recorded in the said district court, and shall not be void upon the first recovery, but may be put in suit, and prosecuted, from time to time, at the costs and charges of any party or parties injured, until the whole sum of the penalty expressed in such bond shall be recovered thereon.

And be it further enacted, That a marshal shall be appointed in and for each district for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure. That, before he enters on the duties of his office, he shall become bound to the United States, before the judge of the said district, jointly and severally with two good and sufficient sureties, inhabitants and freeholders in the said district, to be approved by the said district judge, in the penal sum of twenty thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the said office by himself and his deputies hereinafter mentioned; and shall moreover take before the said judge the following oath, or affirmation, omitting, in the case of affirmation, the words "So help me God." "I, A. B., do solemnly swear, or affirm, that I will faithfully execute all lawful precepts directed to the marshal of the district of _____, under the authority of the United States, and true returns make, and in all things well and truly, and without malice or partiality, perform the duties of the marshal of the said district of _____, during my continuance in the said office, and take only my lawful fees: So help me God." That the said marshal shall be adjudged to be an officer of the court of the district for which he shall be so appointed; shall attend the same accordingly; shall execute, throughout the district, all writs, precepts, summonses, and process, issued under the authority of the United States, and directed to him; and shall have power to command all necessary assistance in the execution of his duty.

That it shall be also lawful for each marshal to appoint, as he shall see occasion, one or more deputies, who shall be removable from office by the district judge; and, before they enter on the duties of their office, shall take before the district judge the oath, or affirmation, aforesaid, prescribed to be taken by the marshal, changing the word "marshal," where it occurs in the second place in the said oath or affirmation, to the words "the marshal's deputy;" that in case of the death of any marshal, his deputy or deputies shall continue in office, unless specially removed as aforesaid, and shall execute the same in the name of the deceased, until another marshal shall be duly qualified; that the executor or administrator of any deceased marshal shall have like remedy for the faults and misfeasances in office of his deputy or deputies, which shall happen after the said marshal's death, as for those which may have happened in his lifetime.

That every marshal, and a deputy or deputies, when removed from office, or when the term for which the marshal was appointed shall expire, shall have power, notwithstanding, to execute all such writs, precepts, summonses, and process as may be in their hands, respectively, at the time of such removal or expiration of office, unless the judge of the district court shall otherwise direct. [Note 14.]

That the marshal, or, in case of his death, his estate, shall be answerable for the delivery to his successor of all prisoners who may be in his custody at the time of his death, or removal, or the expiration of the term of his appointment; and for that purpose the marshal, when living, or his deputies in case of his death, may retain such prisoners in custody until a successor shall be duly qualified, unless the judge of the district court shall otherwise direct. But nothing herein contained shall subject a marshal for any omission or misfeasance of the keepers of the State jails.

That in all cases wherein the marshal or his deputy shall be interested, or shall not be an indifferent person, the writs, precepts, summonses, and process shall be directed to such disinterested or indifferent person as the district judge may appoint; and the person so appointed is hereby authorized to execute and return the same.

That the bond so to be given as aforesaid by each marshal shall be forfeited not only by the defaults and misfeasances in office of himself, or his deputy or deputies, in his lifetime, but also for the defaults and misfeasances of a deputy or deputies after his death, in the cases aforesaid; shall be recorded in the said district court; and shall not be void upon the first recovery, but may be put in suit, and prosecuted from time to time, by and at the costs and charges of any party or parties injured, until the whole sum of the penalty expressed in such bond shall be recovered thereon.

And that the said marshal shall be liable, on motion, after ten days' previous notice, to judgment in his district court, and execution, for moneys received by himself, or his deputies, by virtue of their offices, and not duly paid to the person entitled thereto, upon application for the same.

And be it further enacted, That until it shall be otherwise provided by law, the rates of fees (except the fees to judges,) and the allowances to witnesses, shall be the same in the district courts, as in similar cases in the Supreme Court in the last resort of the State of which the district consists; and for the services of the clerks and marshals in cases which are unlike to those in the said Supreme Court, a reasonable compensation shall be paid by the parties, to be determined by the district courts, according to equity and the nature of the case; that all the said fees and compensations not received in cash shall be collected by the marshal or his deputies, according to the laws of the State for collecting such fees, and shall be accounted for to the said district courts at every session; when an entry shall be made of the sums appearing to have accrued, a copy of which shall be transmitted by the judge to the circuit courts, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be no discontinuance of any suit, process, matter or thing returnable to, or depending in, any district court, although a judge shall not have been appointed to a vacancy, or the judge shall fail to attend at the commencement, or any other day of a session; but the judge may, at the commencement of a session, by a written order, direct the marshal of the district to adjourn the court from day to day, for three days successively; and if he shall not attend on the fourth, or, having attended one day, shall fail to attend on a subsequent day of a session, the court shall stand adjourned to the court in course.

And be it further enacted, That such writs, summonses, and other process, shall be issued from the several district courts for the commencement and prosecution of any civil action, suit, or matter therein; and that the forms and modes of proceeding in conducting the same to a trial or hearing shall be such as the Supreme Court, according to the regulations hereinafter provided, shall direct. But until directions shall be so given by the Supreme Court, and in cases not herein otherwise provided for, the writs, summonses, process, forms, and modes aforesaid, shall be in cases at common law, as nearly as may be, according to the practice of the highest State court of common law in each district, having original and general jurisdiction; and in cases in equity, according to the practice of the highest State court of equity in each district, having original and general jurisdiction; and where no such court of equity exists in any State, the district court shall proceed in equity, according to the forms, modes, rules, and usages which belong to a court of equity, as contra-distinguished from a court of common law; and, in cases of admiralty, the district courts shall proceed according to the practice of the admiralty, properly so called; and every district judge shall moreover have the same power to issue writs of habeas corpus, returnable in vacation before himself, as in session returnable to the court.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for each district judge, for good cause shown, to direct appearance bail to be required, and for every district court, upon like cause, to require special bail; that a plaintiff, issuing a capias, may also obtain an endorsement thereon from the clerk requiring appearance bail, upon lodging with the said clerk an affidavit that the defendant, from whom bail is so required, is, as far as the plaintiff knows or believes, not a resident within the United States, or that a writ has been returned in the same case to the court of the district in which he resides, and that the defendant was not found there, and that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff to the amount of ———, or detains personal property from him to a like amount; and shall moreover give, in the clerk's office, bond, with sufficient surety to the defendant, in a reasonable penalty, conditioned to answer all damages which may accrue to the defendant, if it should thereafter appear that bail has been thus required for the sake of vexation.

That the several district courts may appoint proper persons for taking special bail; who shall, without delay, transmit the recognizances of bail to the clerks of the said courts.

That the several marshals and their deputies shall take bail bonds for appearances, and shall transmit them without delay to the clerks of their respective courts.

That, if the sufficiency of bail be objected to, reasonable notice of such objection shall be given to the marshal or the deputy taking such bail, before a motion shall be made concerning it; that if, upon a motion before the court, the bail be adjudged insufficient, the marshal shall be answerable therefor: Provided, always, That it shall be a justification of the marshal if an affidavit shall have been made previous to the acceptance of the bail, verifying the sufficiency thereof; unless it can be proved that the said marshal, or the deputy who took the same, had good reason to suspect such sufficiency.

And that the special bail may surrender the principal, either before or after judgment, to the marshal or his deputies belonging to the court in which the suit shall be brought, and may thereby discharge himself; and, if the principal cannot give other special bail, he shall be committed. [Note 15.]

And be it further enacted, That the executions to be issued from the district courts of the United States shall be elegit, capias ad satisfaciendum, feri facias, and levari facias; that the return days thereof shall be appointed by the district courts, respectively; that there shall be the space of ——— between the date of the executions and the return days: Provided, always, That when judgment shall be entered in any district court in a civil action, it shall be lawful for the said court to stay the execution for forty-two days from the time of entering the judgment. [Note 16.]

And be it further enacted, That, from every final decree rendered by any district court, (except those of Kentucky and Maine,) in the exercise of its admiralty and maritime and equity jurisdiction, and in cases of seizure under the laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, an appeal shall be allowed to the court of the circuit in which the district lies; and on all other final judgments rendered by the said district courts, a writ of error may be instituted in the said circuit court; and appeals and writs of error may, in like manner, be instituted in the Supreme Court of the United States on the final decrees or judgments of the district courts of Kentucky and Maine. But all such appeals and writs of error shall be subject to the rules and regulations hereinafter provided; and it shall be also the duty of the said district courts, in suits in equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, to cause the facts on which they found their sentence or decree fully to appear upon the record, by inserting the depositions of the witnesses sworn in the cause, and the exhibits therein, at large. [Note 17.]

And be it further enacted, That the districts aforesaid, except those of Kentucky and Maine, shall be divided into three circuits, and shall be called the Eastern, the Middle, and the Southern circuits; that the Eastern circuit shall consist of the districts of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, and New York; that the Middle circuit shall consist of the districts of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia; and that the Southern circuit shall consist of the districts of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be a court, called a circuit court, in each of the aforementioned circuits, which shall be holden in each district of the said circuits twice in every year, on the following days, to wit:

That the said circuit courts shall also have power to hold sessions for the trial of criminal causes at any other time, at their discretion, or the discretion of the Supreme Court; and that the terms during which the said circuit courts shall continue to sit, at their two stated sessions aforesaid, shall be — juridical days, unless the business ready for trial shall be sooner despatched; in which case, the court shall be adjourned to the court in course. [Note 18.]

And be it further enacted, That the places for holding the said circuit courts, in the districts of the several circuits aforesaid, shall be as follows:

Provided, always, That the said circuit courts shall be holden in some public court-house where the same can be obtained; and that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in vacation, or to the respective courts, if it shall be rendered necessary by any infectious disorder or other cause, to direct the sessions of the said courts to be holden at some more fit place within the said districts respectively, until the said cause shall be removed.

And be it further enacted, That the circuit courts aforesaid shall consist of the judges of the district courts comprehended within the said circuits respectively; that, before they proceed to execute the duties of this office, they shall take, as judges of the circuit courts, the oath or affirmation, mutatis mutandis, hereinbefore prescribed to them as district judges, to be administered by any justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, any district judge of the United States, within his proper district, or any judge or justice of the peace for the State belonging to the circuit; that a certificate thereof shall be recorded in the circuit court; and that any three of the district judges in the Eastern and Middle circuits, and any two of the district judges in the Southern circuit, shall constitute a quorum: Provided, That no district judge shall give a vote in any appeal or writ of error, brought to reverse his own decision; but he may assign the reasons of such decision. [Note 19.]

And be it further enacted, That the circuit courts aforesaid shall, under the regulations and restrictions herein-after mentioned, have original jurisdiction in all cases of law and equity arising—

1. Under the constitution of the United States.
2. The laws of the United States.
3. And treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.
4. Of all cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers, being plaintiffs; or consuls or vice consuls being plaintiffs or defendants.
5. Of all controversies in which the United States shall be a party.
6. Of all controversies between a State, being plaintiff, and the citizens of another State. [Note 20.]
7. Of all controversies between citizens of different States.
8. Of all controversies between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States.
9. Of all controversies between a State, being plaintiff, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.
10. Of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas.
11. Of crimes and offences created by Congress, arising within their respective circuits; and
12. Of controversies arising upon rights created by Congress, and having a special remedy given thereto in the federal courts.

That the said circuit courts shall also have appellate jurisdiction over the district courts, under the regulations and restrictions hereinafter provided, and may issue writs of prohibition to the circuit courts, when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as well as writs of consultation; writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, and under the authority of the United States; and also writs of certiorari to the district or State courts, according to the rules hereinafter prescribed.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the aforesaid jurisdiction of the circuit courts shall be under the regulations and restrictions following, that is to say:

1. No person shall sue out any original process, or commence any original suit, in a circuit court, for the trial of any matter or thing of less value than — dollars, on pain of having the same dismissed, with costs.

2. No suit shall be brought or sustained in equity in the said circuit courts, except in cases of fraud, accident, trust, or unconscionable hardship; or where the mode of proof, or the mode of relief at common law, be incompetent to the case of the complainant; or where persons not resident in the United States, and having any estate or debts in the hands of another person resident within the district in which such circuit court is held, shall, together with that other person, be made defendant; and, in the last-mentioned case, the decree may subject such estate and debts to the demand of the complainant.

3. The several circuit courts, or any judge thereof, may issue writs of ne exeat, returnable to the said courts, against any person who is about to depart from the district, and who may be liable to be sued in equity in the said circuit courts, respectively. The writs of ne exeat shall command the defendant to give sufficient security, in a sum to be expressed therein by the direction of the court or judge, that he will not go out of the said district without leave of the said court; and the plaintiff, or some responsible person in his behalf, shall, at the time of obtaining the writ, enter into bond, with sufficient security, in the clerk's office of the circuit court, to answer all damages which may accrue to the defendant from the said writ.

4. Writs of injunction in equity may be granted by the several circuit courts, or any judge thereof, to judgments of the said courts, respectively, at common law, or to judgments at common law of any district court within their respective circuits; but the plaintiff, or some responsible person in his behalf, shall, at the time of obtaining the said writ, enter into bond, with sufficient security, in the clerk's office of the circuit court, to answer damages at the rate of ten per centum, in case such injunction shall be dissolved; and no injunction in equity shall be granted by a circuit court to a judgment at law of a State court.

5. The jurisdiction hereinbefore given to the circuit courts over cases arising under the constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States, shall not be construed to comprehend such cases in which a particular State shall be defendant. [Note 20.]

6. No civil suit, being of a transitory nature only, shall be brought against an inhabitant of the United States in any circuit court other than that which shall be holden in the district to which he belongs, unless process for the same cause shall have been first returned in the said circuit court, so to be holden, that he was not found, or he shall be absconding from his said district at the time of such suit being brought, or he shall be privy or a party in interest with a person resident in a district within the circuit; and all suits brought contrary hereto may be dismissed on motion.

7. No circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange, and on a change of the venue hereinafter mentioned.

8. No person whatsoever shall, in any civil action or suit brought in a circuit court, be arrested or summoned in one district for trial in another, unless he be privy or party in interest as aforesaid, or the venue be changed, as is hereinafter mentioned; in which case he may be summoned.

9. Local actions shall be brought in the circuit court to be holden in the district in which they arise.

And be it further enacted, That the judges of the circuit courts shall be conservators of the peace of the United States, throughout their respective circuits.

And be it further enacted, That the clerks of the district courts shall be also clerks of the circuit courts appointed to be holden in their respective districts; that they shall take, as clerks of the circuit courts, an oath or affirmation of office similar to that prescribed to them as district clerks, which oath or affirmation shall be administered by any justice or judge of the United States, and a certificate of the taking of which shall be recorded in the circuit court; and that the bond and surety given by them as clerks of the district courts, respectively, shall stand and enure for their good conduct as clerks of the circuit courts.

And be it further enacted, That the marshals of the districts aforesaid shall be adjudged to be officers of the circuit courts appointed to be holden in their respective districts, and shall attend the same accordingly; that the said deputies shall be removable from office by the circuit courts, while sitting in the districts to which the deputy or deputies so removed belong; and that the said marshals and their deputies shall be bound to perform, throughout their respective districts, the same duties in relation to the business of the circuit courts sitting in their districts, as they ought, by virtue of this act, to perform in relation to the business of their district courts.

And be it further enacted, That, until it shall be otherwise provided by law, the fees and compensations to the clerks and marshals, and the allowances to witnesses, shall be the same in the circuit as in the district courts; that they shall be collected and accounted for to the circuit courts respectively, in the same manner as is prescribed in the case of the district courts; that the circuit courts shall, once in every year, determine upon some reasonable satisfaction to be made to the clerks and marshals within their circuits in consideration of their offices; that they shall thereupon enter upon record what sum, not exceeding _____ dollars to a clerk, nor _____ dollars to a marshal, in addition to the emoluments arising from the district and circuit business aforesaid they ought to receive; and the same shall be paid accordingly at the Treasury of the United States. [Note 21.]

And be it further enacted, That there shall be no discontinuance of any suit, process, matter, or thing returnable to or depending in any circuit court, although a quorum of judges shall fail to attend at the commencement or any other day of any session; but if a majority of them shall fail to attend at the commencement of any session, the marshal of the district may adjourn the court from day to day, for three days successively; and if a quorum shall not attend on the fourth, or, having attended one day, shall fail to attend on a subsequent day of a session, the court shall stand adjourned to the court in course.

And be it further enacted, That such writs, summonses, and other process, shall be issued from the several circuit courts for the commencement and prosecution of any civil action, suit, or matter therein; and that the forms and modes of proceeding in conducting the same to a trial or hearing shall be such as the Supreme Court, according to the regulations hereinafter provided, shall direct. But until directions shall be so given by the Supreme Court, the Attorney General shall be summoned where the United States are defendant; and in other cases not herein otherwise provided for, the writs, summonses, process, forms, and modes aforesaid shall be in cases at common law, as nearly as may be, according to the practice of the highest State court of common law in each district where the circuit courts shall sit, having original and general jurisdiction; and in cases in equity, according to the highest State court of equity in such district, having original and general jurisdiction; and where no court of equity exists in any State, the circuit court in such State shall proceed in equity, according to the forms, modes, rules, and usages which belong to a court of equity, as contra-distinguished from a court of common law; and in cases of admiralty, the district court shall proceed according to the practice of the admiralty, properly so called; and every circuit judge shall moreover have the same power to issue writs of habeas corpus, returnable in vacation before himself as a circuit judge, or before any other judge of his circuit, who shall happen to be within the district, as the circuit court has to issue such writs returnable to the court.

And be it further enacted, That the power of the circuit judges as to appearance bail, and of the circuit courts as to special bail, and the appointment of persons for taking the same, and the right of the plaintiff to require bail, and all other matters and things concerning bail, shall be the same, and shall be governed by the same rules as are hereinbefore prescribed concerning bail in the district courts.

And be it further enacted, That the executions to be issued from the circuit courts shall be the same as those to be issued from the district courts; that the return days shall be appointed by the circuit courts in like manner; and execution may be stayed for the same time as in the district courts. But it shall be lawful for a circuit court, for good cause, to direct executions to be issued on judgments obtained in a district court within its circuit to any other district within the same.

And be it further enacted, That, upon any final decree or judgment rendered by a circuit court, an appeal or writ of error may be brought in the Supreme Court of the United States as hereinafter is provided; and, that it shall be the duty of the circuit court, in causes of equity, to cause the facts on which they found their decree fully to appear upon the record, by inserting the depositions of the witnesses sworn in the cause, and the exhibits therein at large.

And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court of the United States shall consist, as at present, of a chief justice and five associate justices, any four of whom shall be a quorum; that the associate justices shall have precedence according to the date of their commissions, or when the commissions of two or more of them bear date on the same day, according to their respective ages.

And be it further enacted, That the justices of the Supreme Court, before they proceed to execute the duties of their respective offices, shall take the following oath, or affirmation, to wit: "I, A. B., do solemnly swear, or affirm, that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent on me as _____, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the constitution and laws of the United States: So help me God;" omitting, in the case of an affirmation, the words "So help me God;" which oath or affirmation shall be administered by any justice or judge of the United States, or any clerk of the district or circuit court; and a certificate of the taking of which shall be recorded in the Supreme Court.

And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court shall sit at the seat of Government four times in every year, to wit, on the first Monday in the months of _____; that each term shall continue for the space of _____ juridical days, unless the business depending before the said court shall be sooner despatched; but the said court shall have power to prolong their session beyond the term for expediting the business depending before them, if they shall see cause.

And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction—

- 1st. In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls: And,
2d. In those in which a State shall be a party.

That, in the cases of which the circuit courts aforesaid, and the district courts of Kentucky and Maine, have cognizance, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, under the regulations of appeals and writs of error hereinafter mentioned; that the Supreme Court shall have power to issue writs of mandamus according to law, and writs of certiorari to the circuit and State courts, according to the rules hereinafter mentioned, to direct the writs, summonses, process, forms, and mode of proceeding to be issued, observed, and pursued by the said Supreme Court and the district and circuit courts, taking care that a letter missive, signed by the chief justice, shall be addressed, where a State is defendant, to the Executive thereof; and that the Attorney General of the United States, where the United States are defendant, shall be summoned, and for good cause shown to change the venue in any suit depending in a circuit court, so as to cause the same to be tried in any other circuit court in the same circuit. [Note 22.]

And be it further enacted, That the justices of the Supreme Court shall be conservators of the peace of the United States throughout the same.

And be it further enacted, That the justices of the Supreme Court shall, on the conclusion of any appeal or writ of error, state the whole merits of the case, the questions arising therefrom, the opinions of the court thereupon, and a summary of the reasons in support of those opinions; all which shall, at the end of each term, be entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, and copies shall be transmitted by the clerk to each district and circuit court; that it shall be the duty of each justice of the Supreme Court, present at the hearing of any appeal or writ of error, and differing from a majority of the court, to deliver his opinion, in writing, to be entered as aforesaid; and that each judge shall deliver his opinion in open court.

And be it further enacted, That as soon as the justices of the Supreme Court shall have established a system of practice as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to prepare and report to Congress a table of fees and costs.

And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court, or any four justices thereof, in vacation, shall have power to appoint a clerk for the said court, who shall, before he enters upon the execution of his office, give bond, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the court, or the justices appointing him, to the United States, in the sum of two thousand dollars, conditioned faithfully to discharge the duties of his office, and seasonably to record the decrees, judgments, and orders of the said court; which bond shall be recorded in the said court, and shall not be void upon the first recovery, but may be put in suit and prosecuted from time to time, at the costs and charges of any party or parties injured, until the whole sum of the penalty expressed in such bond shall be recovered thereon. And the said clerk shall also take an oath or affirmation of office, similar to that prescribed in the case of a district clerk, mutatis mutandis; which oath or affirmation shall be administered by any judge of the Supreme Court, and a certificate of the taking of which shall be recorded in the said court. And for his services, the clerk of the Supreme Court shall receive such allowance as the said court shall adjudge, not exceeding — dollars per annum, to be paid at the Treasury of the United States.

And be it further enacted, That the marshal of the district in which the Supreme Court shall sit shall be adjudged to be an officer of the said court, and shall attend the same accordingly; that all the said marshals and their deputies shall be bound to perform, throughout their district, the same duties, in relation to the business of the Supreme Court, as they ought, by virtue of this act, to perform in relation to the business of their district courts; and the marshal attending the said court shall receive a reasonable allowance per day for such attendance, to be adjudged and certified by the said court.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be no discontinuance of any suit, process, matter or thing returnable to, or depending in, the Supreme Court, although a quorum of justices shall fail to attend at the commencement, or any other day of any session; but if a majority of them shall fail to attend at the commencement of any session, the marshal of the district may adjourn the court, from day to day, for three days successively; and if a quorum shall not attend on the fourth, or, having attended one day, shall fail to attend on a subsequent day of a session, the court shall stand adjourned to the court in course.

And be it further enacted, That no bail shall be required in any case depending before the Supreme Court, without the special order of the court. [Note 23.]

And be it further enacted, That the executions to be issued from the Supreme Court shall be the same as those to be issued from the circuit and district courts; that the return days shall be appointed by the Supreme Court in like manner; and that the Supreme Court may, for good cause, direct executions to be issued on judgments obtained in a district or circuit court, to any other district or circuit.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for either party, in any action or suit, in law or equity, depending in any district court, to petition a judge of the circuit court of the circuit in which such district lies, to remove the same to the said circuit court to be holden in the said district; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said judge that there is good cause for a removal, and that the circuit court hath jurisdiction thereof, the said judge may direct the clerk to issue a certiorari for that purpose. But the said judge shall, if he see cause, require notice to be given of the said petition to the adverse party, his agent or attorney, before he decides thereon; and shall be first satisfied, where the plaintiff petitions for a removal, that the cause assigned for removal has arisen since the suit was brought, or was unknown to him at the time of bringing the same; and that said circuit court may at any time, for good cause, remand the said suit or controversy to the district court, by procedendo, that the justices of the Supreme Court shall have like power to direct a certiorari to the circuit court, and the Supreme Court to remand by procedendo, in all cases in which, by the constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction; that a certiorari may also issue from any circuit court of the United States, for the removal of any suit in law or equity depending in any State court within the circuit, to the circuit court, under the following regulations:

1. The said suit shall be cognizable by the circuit courts, with respect to value, and to the party or parties, or to the subject.

2. The defendant may, at any time before trial, obtain a certiorari from the clerk of the circuit court for the removal, upon filing with the clerk of the circuit court an affidavit that he believes the said suit to be of a nature cognizable in the said court.

3. The circuit court shall, at the commencement of every term, direct the suits thus removed to be first called, when the defendant shall justify such removal by satisfactory proofs, on the pain of having the cause remitted by procedendo.

4. If, on the trial, the court shall be of opinion that the cause alleged for the removal was groundless, the defendant shall pay the costs of the suit, let the event thereof be what it will.

5. To prevent removals merely for the sake of delay, it shall be the duty of the circuit courts to expedite the trial of a suit thus removed by the most effectual means consistent with a full defence.

6. The bail given in a State court shall stand bound in the circuit courts.

7. A plaintiff in a State court may, in like manner, and under a like penalty of costs, obtain a certiorari for the removal of a suit from the State court to the circuit court, upon filing with the clerk of the circuit court an affidavit, as is above directed in the case of a defendant; and also declaring in that affidavit that the cause alleged for the removal did not exist, or, having existed, was not known to him at any time before the commencement of the term of the circuit court next preceding the application of the certiorari.

And be it further enacted, That in appeals and writs of error, the following rules shall be observed:

1. No appeal shall be granted from the judgment or decree of any court of the United States to any other court of the United States, unless such judgment or decree be final, as aforesaid, and amount to the value hereinafter expressed for a writ of error.

2. Every appeal shall be prayed, at the time of rendering the judgment, sentence, or decree; but in cases of admiralty or equity, the circuit or Supreme court, or any judge thereof, may, upon cause shown, direct such appeal in six months thereafter.

3. The person appealing shall, by himself, or a responsible person in his behalf, in the office of the clerk of the court, from whose judgment, sentence, or decree, the appeal is prayed give bond and sufficient security, to be approved by the court, and within a time to be fixed by the court, to the appellee for the due prosecution of his appeal.

4. The penalty of the said bond shall be in a reasonable sum, in the discretion of the court.

5. It shall be the duty of the appellant to lodge an authenticated copy of the record, before the expiration of the second term after the appeal shall be entered in the clerk's office of the superior court; or else it shall stand dismissed, unless further time shall be granted by the court, before the end of such second term, for lodging the same.

6. The plaintiff in error shall assign errors upon matter of law only arising on the face of the proceedings. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect a writ of error brought upon the grounds of a writ of error coram vobis. [Note 24.]

7. If the judgment or decree be affirmed in the whole, the appellant shall pay to the appellee ten per centum on the sum due thereby, besides the costs on the original suit and appeal.

8. If the judgment or decree be reversed in the whole, the appellee shall pay to the appellant such costs as the court in their discretion shall award.

9. Where the judgment or decree shall be reversed in part, and affirmed in part, the costs of the original suit and appeal shall be apportioned between the appellant and appellee, in the discretion of the court.

10. The circuit and supreme courts shall, in case of a partial reversal, give such judgment or decree as the district or circuit courts, as the case may be, ought to have given.

11. On appeals of writs of error, it shall be lawful for the Supreme Court, or the circuit courts respectively, to issue execution, or remit the cause to the circuit or district courts, as the case may be, in order that execution may be there issued, or that other proceedings may be had thereupon.

12. Writs of error shall be issued ex debito justitiae; except in capital offences, provided that the judgment, exclusive of costs, shall amount to ——— dollars, in a district court, or ——— dollars, in a circuit court, or relate to a franchise or freehold of the value of ——— dollars, in a district court, or ——— dollars, in a circuit court; and no writ of error shall issue in a capital offence; nor shall a writ of error be a supersedeas, unless some judge of the circuit or supreme courts, as the case may be, after inspecting a copy of the record, and being of opinion that there is sufficient error therein for reversing the judgment in whole or in part, shall certify the same; in which case, the clerk issuing the said writ shall endorse on the said writ of error that it shall be a supersedeas, and it shall be obeyed as such accordingly.

13. And it shall be also necessary, before a writ of error shall operate as a supersedeas, that bond, with security, to be approved by the clerk of the court issuing the said writ, shall be given in the same manner, under a like penalty; and the plaintiff in error shall lodge an authenticated copy of the record, under the same regulations, and the parties in error shall be subject to the same judgment and mode of execution, as is already directed in the case of appeals.

14. A writ of error shall not be brought after the expiration of five years from the passing of the judgment complained of; but where a person thinking himself aggrieved by such judgment shall be an infant, feme covert, non compos mentis, or imprisoned, when the same was passed, the time of such disability shall be excluded from the computation of the said five years.

15. Whenever the court before which an appeal or writ of error is heard shall be divided in opinion on such hearing, the judgment, sentence, or decree shall be affirmed. [Note 25.]

And be it further enacted, That all the said courts of the United States shall have power to grant new trials, according to the principles of law; to impose and administer all necessary oaths or affirmations; to punish, by fine or imprisonment, all contempts of authority in any cause or examination before the same; to establish all necessary rules, (subject, in the case of the district and circuit courts, to the Supreme Court as aforesaid,) in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States; and that the proceedings of every day, during a term, shall be drawn at full length by the clerks of the several courts against the next sitting thereof; and such corrections as may be necessary being first made therein, they shall be signed by the presiding justice, or, in the case of a district court, by the district judge of the district; that when any cause shall be finally determined, the clerks of the several courts shall make a complete record thereof; and that all writs, precepts, and summonses, issuing from any court, shall be under the seal, and signed by the clerk of the same, and shall bear test in the name of the chief justice for the time being.

And be it further enacted, That juries shall be sworn and impanelled in all cases prescribed by the constitution of the United States and the common law; that issues of fact, arising in any cause in chancery, may, under the direction of the court, be tried at the bar of the courts of the United States, by a jury there impanelled; that in other cases of equity, and in civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the court alone shall decide; that juries shall be summoned by writs of venire facias, to be directed to the marshal or his deputy, or any other person to be appointed by the court, in case neither the said marshal nor his deputies be indifferent persons, or they be interested in the event of the cause; that challenges shall be according to the course of the common law; that the qualifications of jurors shall be the same as those of jurors allowed to be sworn upon questions of freehold in the State wherein the court sits; that the district and circuit courts shall, at every term, direct the number of jurors to be summoned for the succeeding term; and the juries for each suit shall be determined by ballot; that when, from any cause, juries shall not be previously summoned, or, being previously summoned, shall fail to attend, bystanders may be summoned to complete the pannel, and the court may impose such fine on every delinquent who has been summoned, as the laws of the State impose in such cases: Provided, always, that, in criminal cases, juries of the vicinage shall be summoned, according to the course of the common law.

That twenty-four freeholders shall, in like manner, be summoned to each term of a district and circuit court, to compose a grand jury, on whom, or any of whom, failing to attend, the court may impose such fine as the laws of the State impose in such cases; and that if a sufficient number of those summoned do not meet, to compose a grand jury, at the time appointed; or if, having met, any of them should absent himself without permission, so as to leave the number too small for a grand jury, the court may direct an adequate number of bystanders to be summoned to supply the places of the absent.

That all jurors, grand or petit, attending any court of the United States, shall be allowed ——— for every day's attendance thereon, and ——— for every twenty miles of travelling, and their ferriages; that the allowances to the grand jurors shall be paid by the Treasury of the United States; that, in the bill of costs in every jury cause, ——— shall be taxed and accounted for to the said Treasury; and the allowances to the petit jurors shall also be paid by the said Treasury. And jurors coming to, attending on, or returning from, any court of the United States, shall be privileged from arrests in civil cases, one day being allowed for every twenty miles from their places of abode; and all arrests contrary hereto shall be void.

And be it further enacted, That in all the courts of the United States, the rules of evidence, so far as they relate to competency and credibility, shall be the same as at common law; that for good cause, the courts of the United States, or any judge, may grant commissions for the examination of witnesses; and that the clerks of the several courts, when any witness shall be about to depart from the district in which a suit is to be tried, or shall, by age, sickness, or otherwise, be unable to attend the court; or where the claim or defence of any party, or a material point thereof, shall depend on a single witness, may, upon affidavit thereof, issue a commission for taking the deposition of such witness de bene esse, to be read as evidence at the trial, in case the witness shall then be unable to attend; but the party obtaining such commission shall give reasonable notice to the other party of the time and place of taking the deposition. And all witnesses duly summoned to any court of the United States shall be privileged from arrests in civil cases, while coming to, attending on, or returning from, the same; one day being allowed for every twenty miles from their places of abode; and all arrests contrary hereto shall be void.

That summonses shall be issued by the respective courts for witnesses in any suits depending in the courts of the United States; that if any person summoned as a witness, and attending the court, or attending the commissioners appointed to take his deposition, shall refuse to give evidence, upon oath or affirmation, as the case may be, he shall be committed to prison, either by the court or the commissioners, there to remain until he shall give evidence; that any person summoned as a witness, and failing to attend accordingly, shall be liable to the action of the party injured by such failure; and that, in a bill of costs, the charge of more than three witnesses, for the proof of any particular fact, shall not be allowed.

And be it further enacted, That whosoever any person shall be duly charged before any judge or justice of the United States, or justice of peace of a State, upon oath or affirmation, with any crime or offence against the United States, the punishment whereof is fine, imprisonment, or corporal suffering, not extending to death, it shall be lawful for the said judge, justice, or justice of the peace, to issue his warrant, and demand bail of such person for his appearance at the next court, whether a district or circuit court, to be held at the district for the United States having jurisdiction in the case, or else he shall be committed; that, upon the giving of such bail, the recognizance shall be forthwith transmitted to the clerk of the said court; that the witnesses shall be bound by recognizance to appear and testify against the said offender, which shall be forthwith transmitted in like manner; that if, for the want or refusal of bail, the said offender shall be committed to close custody, and it shall appear that the offence is to be tried in another district, it shall be the duty of the judge of such district in which he is confined to issue a warrant to the marshal thereof, commanding him to remove the offender, at the expense of the United States, to the district where the trial is to be had; and that bail may be given in the cases aforesaid, even after commitment. That whosoever any person shall be so charged as aforesaid with any crime or offence against the United States, the punishment whereof is death, it shall be lawful for the said judge, justice, or justice of the peace, to issue his warrant for arresting him; that the said offender may, at any time before trial, be admitted to bail by some justice of the Supreme Court or judge of the district court of the United States, and by no other; but the judge or justice shall not admit to bail without having due regard to the nature and circumstances of the crime or offence, and of the evidence, and the usages of law; that the witnesses shall be bound by recognizance, as aforesaid, which recognizance, as well as that of bail, shall be transmitted as aforesaid. That, in all criminal cases not otherwise provided for by some statute of the United States, the process and modes of proceedings shall be the same in the district and circuit courts, respectively, with those observed in criminal cases in the State included within the district or circuit; but that no information shall be filed without the express approbation of the court, on good cause shown; and that every court, rendering judgment in any criminal case, may award execution thereupon.

And be it further enacted, That, until it shall be otherwise provided by law, the several courts of the United States shall be the judges of costs; and it shall be discretionary in the courts to divide costs between the parties, or, for good cause, to compel either party to pay the same, without respect to the event of the suit in which the said costs shall have arisen, except where it is hereinbefore otherwise directed.

And whereas the constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States, are the supreme law of the land:

Be it further enacted, That the laws of the several States, so far as the claim of a plaintiff or the defence of a defendant may depend thereon, in respect to its merits, evidence, or limitation of time, shall, subject to the supreme law aforesaid, be rules of decision; that in all pleadings except in limitations of time, and in all trials except in matters of evidence and in the regulations of the executions aforesaid, such statutes as were made before the fourth day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, for the amendment of the law in those cases generally, shall also be rules of decision; and, moreover, that the common law, so far as the same be not altered by the supreme law, by the laws of particular States, or by statutes, shall also be a rule of decision.

[Note 26.]

And be it further enacted, That, in all the courts of the United States, the parties may plead and manage their own causes personally, or by the assistance of such counsel or attorneys-at-law as by the rules of said courts respectively shall be permitted to manage and conduct causes therein. And there shall be appointed in each district a meet person, learned in the law, to act as attorney for the United States in such district, who shall be sworn or affirmed to the faithful execution of his office, whose duty it shall be to prosecute in such district all delinquents for crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, and all civil actions in which the United States shall be concerned, except before the Supreme Court in the district in which that court shall be holden. And he shall receive, as a compensation for his services, such fees as shall be taxed therefor in the respective courts before which the suits or prosecutions shall be. And there shall also be appointed a meet person, learned in the law, to act as Attorney General for the United States, who shall be sworn or affirmed to a faithful execution of his office, whose duty it shall be to prosecute and conduct all suits in the Supreme Court in which the United States shall be concerned, and to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law, when required by the President of the United States; or, when requested by the heads of any of the Departments, touching any matters that may concern their Departments; and shall receive such compensation for his services as shall by law be provided.

And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts of the United States, coming within the purview of this act, shall be, and the same are, hereby repealed; saving and confirming, however, all things under the said acts or parts of acts already done, or which may be done before the commencement of this act.

And be it further enacted, That this act shall commence and be in force on the _____ day of _____.

THIRD PART.

NOTES.

(1.) Had it been practicable, the laws respecting the judiciary of the United States would have been declared to operate in States hereafter admitted into the Union, without the formality of a special act. But it was not attempted, because it cannot be now foreseen at what time or place the district court of the new State ought to meet; to what circuit it shall be attached; at what time or place the circuit court shall be held within it; nor what salary will be commensurate with the labors of the judge.

(2.) The stated sessions are reduced from four to two, partly to accommodate the district judges, under the proposed augmentation of their trouble. It is probable that two of these sessions will exhaust the civil business for a long time, if not forever, especially when we combine the kindred jurisdiction of the circuit courts. With regard to offences cognizable in the district courts, most of them will be prosecuted without an arrest before judgment, (except on non-appearance after summons,) or will be bailable with cases. Hence would any possible procrastination be light in the scale.

To those who are acquainted with judicial proceedings, it is almost needless to observe, that it contributes to regularity, the convenience of suitors, and, perhaps, fairness to limit the continuance of sessions.

(3.) It may seem superfluous even to hint to courts, that public court-houses, where attainable, ought to be their forum. That every confidence may be safely reposed in the judges, is a fact undeniable at the present day. But in a judiciary system, which looks beyond the existence of those whose integrity is now justly revered, the eye of the world ought to be one of the sentinels of justice.

Emergencies, which may compel the removal of courts from fixed places of session, are familiar to our memory. A writ of adjournment is the instrument of removal in the country from which we borrow most of our jurisprudence. Here the power of adjourning is divided between the President and the courts; the President may order it in vacation, when the courts cannot assemble for the purpose; and the courts themselves may adjourn, when the exigency breaks forth during their session.

(4.) Some exclusions of the State courts are delineated in the original law. It is an honorable evidence of candor explicitly to announce the rights of the federal judiciary. Dissensions, if not crushed in the beginning, will be more quickly terminated by such a measure. For, by ascertaining the ultimatum of those exclusions, and of the federal jurisdiction, every contest of this kind may be brought to an immediate test.

(5.) According to the law of nations, the diplomatic representatives of sovereigns cannot be sued in the courts of a foreign potentate; but consuls, except when they are sheltered from their jurisdiction by actual convention, possess no such immunity.

(6.) How, it may be asked, can any debt, having a federal quality, but below a particular sum, be banished from the federal jurisdiction?—The following reply is offered:

1. The constitution has undertaken to describe only the kind of persons and things which should have access to the federal courts, not to estimate the value in debate.

2. The Supreme Court, though inherent in the constitution, was to receive the first motion from Congress; the inferior courts must have slept forever without the pleasure of Congress. Can the sphere of authority over value be more enlarged?

3. Without this construction, courts must be ordained for the recovery of every trifling sum, which the unavoidable expenses attending it might exceed tenfold. This, therefore, never could have been intended by the federal convention.

Further: without a clause against absent debtors, great injustice may be done to resident citizens. Under the name of absent debtors are included as well those who have never been inhabitants of the United States, as those who, having been inhabitants, expatriate themselves or abandon a State. An equal partition of the debtor's property among his creditors, being more equitable than that any one should seize the whole, a common attachment is not recommended. But Congress will perceive that this subject must remain mutilated, until they establish, if not uniform laws of bankruptcy throughout the United States, at least an act of insolvency.

(7.) It is the direct sense of the constitution that there should be a chancery. A proper plan, then, must be devised for it. That upon which most of the States have practised for years, and whose theory wants no explanation, challenges our acceptance. If it were ever liable to the imputation of having usurped on the common law, its effects are now very salutary, and itself a friendly auxiliary to the common law. Upon these ideas the federal jurisdiction in equity is moulded. Indeed, unless the lenient properties of equity were to be lodged by law somewhere, the courts of common law would be continually inventing subtleties or fictions by which to engross them.

(8.) This clause will debar the district court from interfering with the judgments at law in the State courts; for if the plaintiff and defendant rely upon the State courts, as far as the judgment, they ought to continue there as they have begun. It is enough to split the same suit into one at law, and another in equity, without adding a further separation, by throwing the common law side of the question into the State courts, and the equity side into the federal courts.

(9.) This restriction assumes, for its foundation, that cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, between any persons or bodies whatsoever, not specially protected by the law of nations, are not without the reach of the judiciary power of the United States. For the subsequent descriptions of persons and bodies spread, instead of contracting the jurisdiction. But the dignity of the United States, and of a particular State, ought to exempt them from the cognizance of a single judge. But can the United States, or a particular State, be defendant? To be a party, as is the phrase of the constitution, is to be a plaintiff or defendant. Do the rights of sovereignty forbid the latter? They do not, where the sovereign becomes defendant with his own consent. The constitution is such an act of consent, done by the United States and the individual States, unless it be interpreted that the individual States may be a party now only as they were before, to wit, as sovereigns, and that the United States should be on the same footing. To this may be opposed the facility with which the constitution might have suppressed any ambiguity, by using the word "plaintiff," instead of "party:"—the propriety of informing public bodies, that though they are political agents, they are not absolved from moral obligation; and the license which is sometimes given by a sovereign to scrutinize his pretensions before his own courts. But the stumblingblock is, that neither the United States nor the individual States can be compelled to be just, if inclined to be obstinate in injustice. Let it rather be believed, that a judgment passed against them by a constitutional tribunal, would be unreluctantly obeyed. If, in defiance of its duty, as a member of the Union, a State should refuse compliance, the General Government will doubtless add its earnest remonstrances. What remedy lies beyond these bounds is a serious intricacy. But, without an effectual one, the constitution would be unnerved, where it ought to be strong.

If, in legal analogy, an execution were to be sought, a distringas corresponds more aptly than any other. If, as a distringas would operate upon public property, in which every individual has an interest, it were better immediately to apply to individuals pro rata, the collection may be made in the usual form. It is the province of policy, however, to discern the delicate path; and, as such, it is left without other remarks to the House.

(10.) This clause supposes that the district courts will hold their stated sessions at the same place with the circuit courts; that a criminal may be tried by the first district court which sits, if he desires it, unless a bill shall have been found, or an arraignment made, or some similar step taken in the circuit court. The discretion with which the attorney of the district is indulged, is not more than is due to his office. He will naturally aim at the highest satisfaction for the violated laws of the United States which the testimony will, in his opinion, permit, and will therefore indict, when necessary, in the circuit court. And the cases themselves, thus undefined, will not often, if ever, be of a very atrocious cast.

(11.) The following are examples of the cases in Nos. 7, 8, and 9:

An action of assault and battery shall not be brought against an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, in any district court but that of Pennsylvania, unless, &c.

An action on a bond given by an inhabitant of Pennsylvania to another person, shall not be brought in the district court of Pennsylvania, although it may have been assigned to another inhabitant of Pennsylvania, except, &c.

A defendant shall not be arrested or summoned in Pennsylvania, in a suit to be tried in the district court of New Jersey, except in the next example.

An inhabitant of Pennsylvania connected in interest with an inhabitant of New Jersey may, with respect to that interest, be sued in Jersey.

(12.) A special session must generally be held for admiralty cases and seizures, because they spring up very irregularly, and will not suffer delay; they are also of considerable length, and would disturb the whole circle of business, unless interdicted to be tried then.

(13.) With this power, every justice of the peace is clothed as a guardian of the public quiet.

(14.) The misbehavior of the deputies may be so gross, as to stifle every tenderness for the character of the officer; and, therefore, the judge is armed with authority to stop his improper career.

(15.) The personal liberty of a citizen is a subject of precious moment; and as in Government unjustly to abridge it, would be denominated tyranny, so not to wrest from individuals an opportunity of cramping it, where a veto can be imposed by law, would be almost a traitorous neglect. With this view, bail has been thus regulated. If every plaintiff may exact bail, it will be exacted in all cases. If no plaintiff may, or if a judge is first to be petitioned, justice will be eluded in many. There is then no choice, but to vest the clerk with discretionary powers on this head, (which would be unusual, and perhaps unsafe,) or to prescribe some rules like the foregoing.

(16.) These four forms of execution are intimately known to every lawyer in the United States, being among the elements of his science, and having their essence settled by adjudications. Perhaps, at a day not far remote, it may be thought an accession to freedom and to commerce to emancipate the person of a debtor from the grasp of his creditor, and to substitute laws, under due caution against frauds and oppressions, for the payment of debts accruing after a certain time. The respite of execution is to afford an opportunity to obtain a writ of error, or, indeed, an appeal.

(17.) The requisition that the decree or judgment shall be final, will abolish a variety of appeals or writs of error on the same subject. For if every interlocutory matter would bear an appeal or writ of error, a suit would not be finished in an age. Besides, a mistake in one part of a cause is frequently rectified in another. Nay, the party whom the mistake has prejudiced may still be victorious at last. Nor will the discontented party be disabled from reaping the same advantages after final judgment as before.

Let it be here remarked, that appeals and writs of error have some different consequences; appeals arresting the judgment immediately, and writs of error after some delays and formalities. Appeals are allowed only in admiralty, and revenue, and equity causes. In them the merits are exhibited entire to the revisionary tribunal. But the real merits have most frequently been decided against the plaintiff in error. He flies to the higher court with the facts of the case found against him, and without a chance of having them re-examined, unless on the face of the proceedings a capital blunder appears. The appellant and plaintiff in error, therefore, stand not on the same line of favor.

The mode of giving testimony in equity is by depositions; it is also practised in the admiralty, to examine witnesses viva voce, and commit their evidence to writing. In our intercourse with foreign nations, an exposition of the conduct of our admiralty may be frequently decent and useful. Perhaps, therefore, the original law is exceptional in allowing the judge, whose opinion is to be canvassed, the privilege of placing the cause in any attitude which squares best with that opinion.

(18.) This power is granted in behalf of persons confined on suspicion of crimes. The circuit courts may, of their own motion, have a jail delivery earlier than the returns of the stated sessions; or the Supreme Court may command it, should they be urged by any imminent circumstance.

(19.) On the supposition that the increased compensation to the district judges would be a per diem allowance according to their attendance, the sum would not be an obstacle of consequence; and the admiralty business originating while they are from home may be so adjusted by their own regulations, as not to suffer by their absence.

(20.) The United States are permitted to be sued in a circuit court, while particular States are suable only in the Supreme Court. This difference is made, because the constitution demonstrates a peculiar care of suits against a State, by giving original jurisdiction in them to the Supreme Court. Consuls and vice consuls, being coupled with States in this particular, ought also to be confined to the Supreme Court, were it not for the inconvenience of such institution.

(21.) Clerks and marshals are indispensable and confidential officers. They ought to have talents and emoluments equal to a livelihood. Their posts now produce mere trifles. But being bound to be always in the way, and at call, they are precluded from any gainful employment at a distance abroad. The allowances which the circuit courts would make to them would be abundantly replaced by the public share of fines and forfeitures. But this fund was not designated, because it rests the remuneration of public servants upon the delinquencies of its citizens. Additional duties may, from time to time, be thrown upon them, which will balance this stipend.

(22.) The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is expressed nearly in the words of the constitution. It was wished, that where the United States were sued, the cause could be confined to the Supreme Court, as is the case with a particular State. But it is doubtful whether this, being one of the instances in which the Supreme Court is declared to have appellate jurisdiction, it can have original jurisdiction also, under the words of the constitution.

The formation of writs is a branch of judicial duty. Rules of practice belong to the authority of every court, and their other incidental powers add to that authority. The transition from these to the superintending of the whole course of proceedings will not, therefore, be considered as too great. But it is advisable, that every system of practice throughout the States should be consulted, in order that the general proceeding should be accommodated to the habits of the different States, as nearly as may be. The judges of the Supreme Court have already had some experience on this head, and can, therefore, better execute the work than any other persons. It would not be difficult for an individual to offer a scheme apparently good. But he would probably feel too great a bias to the practice to which he had been accustomed; and the House would also be under some perplexity how to reconcile the usages of the States.

(23.) Bail is not needful, except in cases of original jurisdiction. Of these, the number in the Supreme Court is small, and they will scarcely ever be of such vehemence, as that the postponement of a question of bail, until the court can be moved, should be injurious.

(24.) The plaintiff in error is limited to errors in law. This is agreeable to the practice which has so much influence on our judicial proceedings. For, after a jury have pronounced the facts in issue, and a new trial has either not been solicited, or has been rejected, on the principles of the common law, no court or jury ought to agitate the same facts, unless the judgment should be reversed by a superior court. On the other hand, in equity and admiralty cases every fact, as has been already observed, is before the superior court, in the same manner as it was before the inferior, and may therefore be submitted with propriety to the superior court.

New facts, and new proofs on appeals, are here discarded, on account of the numberless frauds which may be covered under the admission of them.

(25.) Upon an equal division of an appellate court, it is presumable that the inferior court was right. Without this rule, an appeal or writ of error may be hung up in the Supreme Court for many years.

(26.) The constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, are the supreme law; that is, they will control, on federal subjects, every other law.

They will particularly control the laws of the several States; whether consisting of their own original legislation, the common law, or the statute law, expressly or tacitly adopted.

Such is the extent of mere power. But it may be affirmed, that it will not be exercised, because it ought not, where the claim of a plaintiff, or the defence of a defendant, rests upon a valid law of a State.

This may happen—1. In personal rights; 2. Rights of property; 3. Torts; and 4. Sometimes even in offences, upon the merits, the evidence, or a limitation of time.

But, besides these, are three other points, not tinged by the particular cases, but governed only by the class of actions, to which the individual case belongs: pleadings, with the exception of limitation; trial, with the exception of evidence; and executions.

The common law is confessedly incompetent on these topics. The alternative, then, is between the State laws and the statutes.

The latter have the advantage in uniformity, which the judiciary of the United States ought to cultivate; and, without it, a citizen who is a debtor in one State, may, although a creditor to an equal amount in another, possibly be ruined.

But some cases will not be influenced by State laws; to wit, those of a foreign and transitory nature, as a bond executed in Europe. The supreme law may also be silent. The lex loci will then be admitted in its customary degree; and, where it ends, the common law and statutes aforesaid will enter into the question.

But the Attorney General considers these expedients as merely temporary; because he trusts that the necessity of a federal code is too striking to escape the attention of the House. That it must be a work of time and difficulty is an exhortation immediately to commence it.

Upon so grand an undertaking, the practice of nations has been variant; some having directed the materials of a code to be reported in the first instance, and others a complete digest. As too much leisure and reflection cannot be bestowed on such a composition, the former mode is preferable, especially since the freedom of correcting the matter may be fettered by the solemnity of a law, when connected with a great whole.

But arduous as this effort must be, it is not boundless. It would probably be pointed to the following leading objects: 1. The provisions which already exist by the constitution and the federal laws: 2. Such laws as may still be necessary for the further execution of the constitution, and the completion of federal policy: 3. The common law and statutes: and, 4. The laws of the several States, as involved in questions arising therein.

These preliminaries having obtained the sanction of Congress, the reducing of them into laws will become more easy and accurate.

COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 18, 1791.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, January 17, 1791.

I have the honor to enclose you a postscript to the report on measures, weights, and coins, now before your House. This has been rendered necessary by a small arithmetical error detected in the estimate of the cubic foot proposed in that report. The head of superficial measures is also therein somewhat more developed.

Nothing is known, since the last session of Congress, of any further proceedings in Europe on this subject.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most profound respect, sir,

Your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH: JEFFERSON.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate.

POSTSCRIPT.

It is scarcely necessary to observe, that the measures, weights, and coins, proposed in the preceding report, will be derived altogether from mechanical operations, viz: a rod, vibrating seconds, divided into five equal parts; one of these subdivided, and multiplied, decimally, for every measure of length, surface and capacity, and these last filled with water, to determine the weights and coins. The arithmetical estimates in the report were intended only to give an idea of what the new measures, weights, and coins would be nearly, when compared with the old. The length of the standard or second rod, therefore, was assumed, from that of the pendulum; and as there have been small differences in the estimates of the pendulum by different persons, that of Sir Isaac Newton was taken, the highest authority the world has yet known. But if even he has erred, the measures, weights, and coins proposed will not be an atom the more or less. In cubing the new foot, which was estimated at .978728 of an English foot, or 11.744736 English inches, an arithmetical error of a unit happened in the fourth column of decimals, and was repeated in another line in the sixth column, so as to make the result one ten-thousandth, and one-millionth of a foot too much. The thousandth part of this error (about one ten millionth of a foot) consequently fell on the metre of measure, the ounce weight, and the unit of money. In the last it made a difference of about the twenty-fifth part of a grain troy, in weight, or the ninety-third of a cent in value. As it happened, this error was on the favorable side, so that the detection of it approximates our estimate of the new unit exactly that much nearer to the old, and reduces the difference between them to thirty-four instead of thirty-eight hundredths of a grain troy; that is to say, the money unit, instead of 375.64 troy grains of pure silver, as established heretofore, will now be 375.98934306 grains, as far as our knowledge of the length of the second pendulum enables us to judge; and the current of authorities since Sir Isaac Newton's time gives reason to believe that his estimate is more probably above than below the truth; consequently, future corrections of it will bring the estimate of the new unit still nearer to the old.

The numbers in which the arithmetical error before mentioned showed itself in the table, at the end of the report, have been rectified, and the table reprinted.

The head of superficial measures, in the last part of the report, is thought to be not sufficiently developed. It is proposed that the rood of land, being one hundred feet square (and nearly a quarter of the present acre,) shall be the unit of land measure. This will naturally be divided into tenths and hundredths, the latter of which will be a square decad. Its multiples will also, of course, be tens, which may be called double acres, and hundreds, which will be equal to a square furlong each. The surveyor's chain should be composed of one hundred links of one foot each.

MANNER OF AUTHENTICATING PRINTED EDITIONS OF THE LAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 7, 1791.

FEBRUARY 5, 1791.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred the memorial of Andrew Brown, printer of Philadelphia, has had the same under his consideration, and thereupon makes the following report:

The memorialist states that he has in contemplation to publish a correct edition of the laws, treaties, and resolutions of the United States, and prays that such measures may be adopted for giving a public authentication to his work, as may ensure its reception throughout the United States.

The Secretary of State observes, that there exists, at present, but a single edition of the laws of the United States, to wit, the one printed by Childs and Swaine; that this edition is authentic, the proof sheets thereof having been carefully collated by sworn clerks with the original rolls in his office, and rendered literally conformable therewith; that the first volume of this edition can now rarely be found, the copies originally printed being mostly disposed of.

That it is desirable that copies of the laws should be so multiplied throughout the States, and in such cheap forms, as that every citizen of the United States may be able to procure them; that it is important, also, that such publications be rendered authentic, by a collation of the proof sheets with the original rolls by sworn clerks, when they are printed at the seat of Government, or in its neighborhood, and by a collation of the whole work, when printed at a distance, and a certified correction of its typographical errors annexed to each volume.

That this, however, if done at the public expense, would occasion an inconvenient augmentation of the number of clerks, as the act of collation requires the presence of three clerks, one to hold the roll, a second a printed copy already authenticated, and a third the proof sheet.

That it would be more reasonable that persons of confidence should be employed at the expense of the editor, to be named and sworn as clerks for the special occasion.

That, in this way, he is of opinion it will be advantageous to the public to permit that the laws to be printed by the memorialist be collated with and corrected by the original rolls, and that a certificate thereof by the Secretary of State be annexed to the edition.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE FINANCES UNDER THE LATE SUPERINTENDENT, ROBERT MORRIS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 16, 1791.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed to inquire into the administration of the late Superintendent of Finance, (Robert Morris,) made the following report:

That it being evidently impossible for the committee to examine, in detail, the public accounts under the administration, and unnecessary, as the same have been examined and passed in the proper offices, they have thought their duty would be best discharged by obtaining from the register the statements of the receipts and expenditures, and other extracts from the public records herewith submitted, along with a more particular statement of the public accounts during the same period, made out, in the year 1784, in such a number of printed copies of both as will furnish to each member of Congress the best practical means of appreciating the services of the Superintendent, and the utility of his administration.

That, from these documents, it will be found that the receipts of public moneys in the Treasury of the United States, during the said administration, amounted to	-	-	-	-	$8,177,431 72
And the expenditures, settled as above mentioned, to	-	-	-	-	8,155,445 00

Leaving, at the close of the administration, in the Treasury of the United States, a balance of	-				$21,986 72

The authorities under which the Superintendent acted, in the course of his administration, are referred to in the first mentioned document.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 1, 1791.

Mr. IZARD, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State, on the subject of weights, measures, and coins, reported:

That, as a proposition has been made to the National Assembly of France for obtaining a standard of measure, which shall be invariable and communicable to all nations, and at all times; as a similar proposition has been submitted to the British Parliament, in their last session; as the avowed object of these is to introduce a uniformity in the measures and weights of the commercial nations as a coincidence of regulation, by the Government of the United States, on so interesting a subject would be desirable, your committee are of opinion that it would not be eligible, at present, to introduce any alteration in the measures and weights which are now used in the United States.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 27TH OF OCTOBER, 1791.

UNITED STATES, October 27, 1791.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a copy of a letter and of sundry documents which I have received from the Governor of Pennsylvania, respecting certain persons who are said to have fled from justice out of the State of Pennsylvania into that of Virginia, together with a report of the Attorney General of the United States upon the same subject.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, July 18, 1791.

I think it proper to lay before you copies of the various documents, respecting an application which I have recently made to the Governor of Virginia, requiring, agreeably to the provision contained in the second section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States, that he would take proper measures for apprehending Francis McGuire, Absalom Wells, and Baldwin Parsons, as fugitives from justice, in order that they might be delivered up to this State, having jurisdiction of their crime. The opinion which the Attorney General of Virginia has given upon this subject, as far as it respects the nature of the offence, is, I conceive, inaccurate; and could not have been given with a previous knowledge of the law of Pennsylvania on the subject; for, by an act of Assembly, passed on the 29th day of March, 1788, the offence charged in the several indictments is rendered highly criminal, and the perpetrators, on conviction in any court of quarter sessions, (a court of criminal jurisdiction exclusively,) are not only condemned to forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds, but are subject, likewise, to be confined at hard labor for any time not less than six months, nor more than twelve months. The fact charged, therefore, is a crime, made such by the laws of Pennsylvania; partaking of the nature of a felony, it is certainly included in the constitutional description of "treason, felony, or other crime;" and, although an action of trespass might be maintained in Virginia by the injured individual to recover damages for his personal wrongs, yet it is obvious that no indictment, no trial, no conviction, no punishment in the public name, could take place, according to the provisions of our Legislature, but under the authority of Pennsylvania, within her jurisdiction, and in the county where the offence was committed. It is equally certain that the laws of the State in which the act is committed must furnish the rule to determine its criminality, and not the laws of the State in which the fugitive from justice happens to be discovered.

I mean not, however, sir, to enter into any further controversy on this point; it is sufficient to explain it. But as the Attorney General of Virginia has suggested another difficulty with respect to the mode of arresting persons demanded as fugitives from justice, I have thought the present a proper occasion to bring the subject into your view, that, by the interposition of the Federal Legislature, (to whose consideration you may be pleased to submit it,) such regulations may be established as will, in future, obviate all doubt and embarrassment upon a constitutional question so delicate and important.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, Esq., President of the United States.

No. 1.

To THOMAS MIFFLIN, Governor of Pennsylvania: The memorial of the Pennsylvania Society for promoting the abolition of slavery, the relief of free negroes unlawfully held in bondage, and for improving the condition of the African race, respectfully sheweth:

That John, a free negro man, residing at Washington, in the county of Washington, in this commonwealth, entitled to and enjoying the peace and protection of the laws of this State, was, on or about the 10th day of May, in the year 1788, with force, and arms, and a strong hand, assaulted, seized, imprisoned, bound, and carried without the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, by certain persons in disguise, and at that time unknown. And that, at a court of Oyer and Terminer and general jail delivery, held in and for the said county, before William Augustus Atlee and George Bryan, Esquires, justices of the same court, on the 10th day of November, in the year aforesaid, bills of indictment were presented, and found to be true, by the grand inquest for the body of the said county of Washington, against Francis McGuire, Baldwin Parsons, and Absalom Wells, for imprisoning, binding, and carrying the said free negro John out of this State, with intent to cause him to be sold as a slave, contrary to the act of the General Assembly in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth; as by the records and proceedings of the said court, true copies whereof from the office of Edward Bird, Esq., prothonotary of the Supreme Court, and clerk of the court of Oyer and Terminer for the said county, herewith laid before the Governor, fully appears.

The memorialists further show that the said Francis McGuire, Baldwin Parsons, and Absalom Wells precipitately fled from justice, taking with them the negro John, and have taken shelter in the State of Virginia, or, perhaps, within that part thereof which has been lately erected into a new State, by the name of Kentucky; and the said negro John is said now to be held in a state of slavery by Nicholas Casey, near Romney, on the south branch of the Potomac, in Virginia.

That, by the second paragraph of the second section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States, it is provided, that "a person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime."

The memorialists apprehend that a crime of deeper die is not to be found in the criminal code of this State, than that of taking off a freeman and carrying off with intent to sell him, and actually selling him as a slave; and inasmuch as the grand inquest for the body of the county of Washington have, upon their oaths or affirmations, found this crime to be truly charged against the persons above named, they respectfully request that the Governor will be pleased to demand from the Executive authority of Virginia or Kentucky, that the said Francis McGuire, Baldwin Parsons, and Absalom Wells be apprehended if to be found within their jurisdiction, and delivered to the Executive authority of this commonwealth, to be proceeded with according to law; and that the said negro John be also sent into this State, to the end that he may be restored to his freedom.

[SEAL.] Sealed with the common seal of the said society, at a special meeting held in the city of Philadelphia, the thirteenth day of the fifth month, called May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; and signed by order of the meeting.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, June 4, 1791.

I am under the necessity of troubling your excellency with authenticated copies of a representation which has been made to me, by the incorporated society for the gradual abolition of slavery, &c. respecting the illegal and forcible seizure and carrying away from the county of Washington, in this commonwealth, a certain free negro man named John, with an intention to sell him as a slave in another State and of transcripts from the records of a Court of Oyer and Terminer, held in and for the said county of Washington, from which it appears that indictments have been duly found charging this violence to have been committed by Baldwin Parsons, Absalom Wells, and Francis McGuire, who fled from justice into the State of Virginia. Permit me, therefore, to request that your excellency will be pleased to take the proper measures to cause the said Baldwin Parsons, Absalom Wells, and Francis McGuire, to be delivered up to this State, having jurisdiction of their crime, agreeably to the provisions contained in the second section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States. And I am persuaded that your excellency's regard for justice and humanity will prompt you to extend your interference on this occasion as far as it may be expedient to restore the negro to his freedom.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient and most humble servant,

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

To His Excellency BEVERLY RANDOLPH, Esq.

SIR:

COUNCIL CHAMBER, RICHMOND, July 8, 1791.

I now do myself the honor to enclose you a copy of the opinion of the Attorney General of this State upon the subject of your letter of the 4th ultimo, demanding the delivery of Baldwin Parsons, Francis McGuire, and Absalom Wells, charged with forcibly seizing and carrying from the county of Washington, in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, a certain free negro man named John, with an intention of selling him. Your excellency will readily perceive that this opinion of the first law officer of the State must preclude the Executive from taking any measures for apprehending and delivering the persons demanded by you.

It is to be lamented that no means have been provided for carrying into effect so important an article of the constitution of the United States.

This case will, however, we hope, be the means of calling the attention of the Legislature to a subject of such consequence.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

His Excellency the GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The above letter was received from his excellency Beverly Randolph, Governor of Virginia, but, through some neglect, he omitted to sign it.

A. J. DALLAS, Secretary.

No. 7.

RICHMOND, June 20, 1791.

SIR:

The question you have stated for my advice seems to be confined to the manner of delivery and removal of persons charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State.

The constitution requires that there should be a person or persons charged with a crime; that that crime should be one comprised within the second section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States; and that such offender or offenders should be within the limits of this commonwealth before a demand can be authorized. A charge, in the sense here used, must be such an accusation as of itself furnishes a sufficient evidence of guilt to put the accused upon his trial, or to justify his immediate punishment.

It cannot be an accusation founded on a mere suspicion; it must be founded on some judicial act. In this respect, the demand sent on by the Governor of Pennsylvania may be proper, if the crime stated in the bills of indictment are sufficient to fall within the provision of the General Government. It is not either treason or felony, (for the indictments state the taking away of the negro to have been done violently, and not feloniously,) and other crimes must be confined to such as the State making the demand possesses an exclusive jurisdiction over. For, if either the federal court, or the courts of the State into which the offenders may take refuge, are authorized to punish the offenders, there is no danger of an escape from justice, and no reason for a demand. The delivery and removal are only to be made for the sake of a proper jurisdiction; and therefore neither can be required from a jurisdiction that is proper. There must be a defect in the jurisdiction of which the demand is made, and an exclusive jurisdiction in the State making the demand.

The case stated in the indictments transmitted by Governor Mifflin would amount but to a trespass by our laws, as between the parties; as between the offenders and the commonwealth, but to a breach of the peace. In the first instance, the remedy follows the persons of the offenders into our State, and there is no defect of jurisdiction here. In the latter case, the offenders may appear by attorney to the indictment. If they should be acquitted, there can be no occasion for the demand. If found guilty, and their personal presence should be necessary for their punishment, it will be then time enough to make a demand of them. I presume, in these respects, the laws of Pennsylvania are assimilated to our own. If they are, then the offences stated do not appear to me to come within the description of crimes contained in the above-cited section of the federal constitution. As it is necessary that adequate proof to fix the residence of offenders against the laws of one State, to be within the limits of the State of which the demand is made, should precede such demand (for without that evidence no right to demand can exist,) so it becomes necessary that some proof of that fact ought to accompany the demand; otherwise, the State of which the demand is made will be forced to ascertain a fact after the demand, which should have been the precedent basis on which any demand could rightfully be made. In Governor Mifflin's letter, and its enclosures, no evidence is contained of this fact, and the demand might as well be made of Georgia as Virginia. Let it be conceded, however, that the constitution of the United States hath in all these requisites been satisfied. It is then required that the offenders should be delivered up to be removed to the State of Pennsylvania, possessing an exclusive jurisdiction over their crimes. In what manner are they to be arrested for delivery? How are they to be removed? Every free man in Virginia is entitled to the unmolested enjoyment of his liberty, unless it be taken away by the constitution or laws of the United States, or by the constitution or laws of Virginia. No molestation, seizure, or removal of his person, can take place, but under the authority of these or some of them.

The constitution and laws of the General Government, as well as those of this State, are silent on these important subjects. If the delivery and removal in question can be effected, it must be under authority only of the constitution of the United States. By that, the delivery is required, and the removal authorized. But the manner in which either shall be effected is not prescribed. There must be a legal control over the persons demanded, before they can be delivered or removed. That control ought not to be acquired by any force not specified and delegated by positive law. Neither the constitution of this, or of the United States, nor the laws made under them, direct the mode, or delegate an authority, by which the magistracy of this State can acquire such a control.

It therefore can only be acquired by force. And that such an exercise of undelegated power over the liberties of freemen would not be justifiable, I am sure I need not add.

It is therefore my opinion, that the directions of the General Government, under which the Governor of Pennsylvania has made a demand for the delivery and removal of the persons mentioned in his letter, cannot be complied with by the Government of this State without some additional provisions by law to enable it to do so.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES INNIS.

SAMUEL COLMAN, A. C. C.

A true copy. Attest:

No. 8.

PHILADELPHIA, July 20, 1791.

SIR:

The Secretary of State yesterday submitted to me, by your instruction, copies of the letter from the Governor of Pennsylvania to you, and of his correspondence with the Governor of Virginia on the demand of Francis McGuire, Baldwin Parsons, and Absalom Wells, as fugitives from justice.

This demand is founded on that article of the federal constitution which directs that "A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime."

He must be charged. This term is sufficiently technical to exclude any wanton or unauthorized accusation from becoming the basis of the demand. It would, in the language of mere legal entries, be applicable where a bill had been found by a grand jury. It must be interpreted under the constitution, as at least requiring some sanction to be given to the suspicion of guilt by a previous investigation. In the present instance, a grand jury convened before two of the justices of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, have made it, and thus have furnished a ground for bringing the foregoing persons to a formal trial. Should such a procedure as this be declared to be incompetent as a charge, the object of this article in the constitution must be either defeated or be truly oppressive. For, between an indictment and an actual trial there is no intermediate examination of the fact; and, to wait for the condemnation of an absent culprit before a demand, would compel a judgment to be rendered behind his back. Outlawry, indeed, may be practised sometimes, but it cannot be always pursued; and even where it is pursued, it stamps the offence with no higher appearance of truth than a true bill received from the grand jury.

The person charged must be also charged with a crime. That the supposed conduct of McGuire and others is a crime under the laws of Pennsylvania, the very respectable Attorney General of Virginia has not been informed. It is punishable by a fine and hard labor. The first process is a capias: outlawry is inadmissible on it, and the offender cannot appear by his attorney. Some doubt may, perhaps, be entertained, whether, according to a known rule of construction, the words "or other crime" being associated with treason and felony, ought not to be confined to crimes having some quality common to them, and treason, and felony. Such a common quality does not exist, unless it be that of felony itself. Why, then, are the words "or other crime" added, if felonies alone were contemplated? In the penal code of almost every State, the catalogue of felonies is undergoing a daily diminution. But it is not by the class of punishment that the malignity of an offence is always to be determined. Crimes, going deep into the public peace, may bear a milder name and consequence; and yet it would be singular to shelter those who were guilty of them, because they were not called and punished as felonies.

The person charged with a crime must also flee from justice. Some species of proof is indispensable; otherwise, the most innocent citizen may be carried in chains from his own to another State. It cannot be denied that every assertion of a Governor ought to produce assent. But, upon a judicial subject, testimony, according to the judicial course, is alone adequate; and the demand is the only thing which is referred to an Executive absolutely. The Governor of Virginia is responsible for the just use of his discretion; and if he should yield to informal evidence, he must yield at his peril. With every respectful deference, therefore, for the communications of the Governor of Pennsylvania, he ought to exact the return of a public officer on some process, or an affidavit, before he takes measures for apprehending McGuire and others. On this occasion, however, the Governor of Pennsylvania builds his demand on the documents transmitted to the Governor of Virginia, not one of which has the semblance of proof that they do flee from justice. Permit me, too, to observe, sir, that the Governor of Pennsylvania is perhaps not apprized of a fact, which the prothonotary of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has at this moment stated to me in writing, to wit: That, in the spring of 1790, he issued writs of capias against them; that it was returned that McGuire and Parsons were not found, and that Wells was taken and committed; and that nothing was done at the last session in these cases. Now this is no complete proof that even McGuire and Parsons have fled from justice; it manifests that Wells has not fled; and it evinces the necessity of caution in branding a man as a deserter of a fair trial.

The person charged with a crime must not only flee from justice, but he must be found in another State. At first it may seem unimportant whether he be so found or not; because if he be not there, he can sustain no injury from an arrest. I will not decide how far his character may suffer, if he be proclaimed throughout a State as a fugitive, when he may never have entered it; nor yet what other inconveniences he may undergo. But if the probability of these be striking, he ought not to be hunted for by public authority at random. The expense, although afterwards repaid, and the trouble, which cannot be avoided in the pursuit, ought not to be causelessly thrown on a sister State. Hence, is it made a pre-requisite to a demand, that the culprit shall be found in the State; that is, that some satisfaction be given that Government will not be put upon a frivolous search. In this case, no legal exhibit is shown to this effect; may, it is presumable, that Wells remains in the custody of Pennsylvania.

The person charged with a crime, fleeing from justice, and found in another State, is to be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction. In this place, I am compelled to differ from the Attorney General of Virginia in two points: he is pleased to affirm that, to support the demand, "there must be a defect in the jurisdiction of the State from which the demand is made, and an exclusive jurisdiction in the State making the demand; and that the Executive of Virginia cannot comply with such a demand, until some additional provisions by law shall enable them to deliver up the offenders."

It is notorious, that the crime is cognizable in Pennsylvania only; for crimes are peculiarly of a local nature. Therefore, his two conditions are here fulfilled, namely, a defect of jurisdiction in Virginia, and an exclusive jurisdiction in Pennsylvania. But if it were conceived, that Virginia might chastise offences against Pennsylvania, or, that an action might be maintained in Virginia for what is a crime in Pennsylvania, it would not follow that the latter could not demand a malefactor from the former; for the clause in the constitution was obviously dictated by a wish to prevent that distrust which one State would certainly harbor against another, in situations so capable of abuse. Besides, it corresponds with the words of the constitution, if the State demanding has a jurisdiction, although it might not be an exclusive one. And these observations would have equal weight if the federal courts in Virginia could animadvert on crimes arising within the limits of Pennsylvania. But the constitution directs that trials "shall be held in the State where crimes shall have been committed."

I differ further in not discovering the disability of Virginia to deliver up the offenders. It has been sometimes fancied that, by delivering up, is meant only that the State from which the demand is made should express an approbation that they may be apprehended within its territories. But as a State cannot be said to deliver up without being active, and it might disturb the tranquillity of one State if the officers of another were at liberty to seize a criminal within its limits, the natural and safe interpretation is, that the delivery must come from Virginia.

To this duty the Executive of that State offer no objection; but they contend that her own constitution and laws, and those of the United States, being silent as to the manner and particulars of arrest and delivery, they cannot, as yet, move in the affair.

To deliver up is an acknowledged federal duty; and the law couples with it the right of using all incidental means in order to discharge it. I will not inquire here how far these incidental means, if opposed to the constitution and laws of Virginia, ought, notwithstanding, to be exercised; because McGuire and his associates may be surrendered without calling upon any public officer of that State. Private persons may be employed, and clothed with a special authority. The Attorney General agrees that a law of the United States might so ordain; and wherein does a genuine distinction consist between a power deducible from the constitution, as incidental to a duty imposed by that constitution, and a power given by Congress as auxiliary to the execution of such a duty? Money, indeed, must be expended; and a State may suspend its exertions until the preliminary proofs are adduced. I cannot undertake to foresee whether the expending State will be reimbursed. If the constitution will uphold such a claim, it will, doubtless, be enforced. If it will not, it must be remembered that that instrument was adopted with perfect free will.

From these premises I must conclude that it would have been more precise in the Governor of Pennsylvania to transmit to the Governor of Virginia an authenticated copy of the law declaring the offence; that it was essential that he should transmit sufficient evidence of McGuire and others having fled from the justice of the former, and being found in the latter; that, without that evidence, the Executive of Virginia ought not to have delivered them up; that, with it, they ought not to refuse.

The Governor of Pennsylvania, however, appears to be anxious that this matter should be laid before Congress; and, perhaps, such a step might content all scruples.

But, at any rate, I can find no obligation or propriety which can warrant the interposition of the President at this stage of the business. A single letter has gone from the Governor of Pennsylvania to the Governor of Virginia. A compliance has been denied; and the denial has proceeded from a deficiency of proof in two instances, from a misapprehension of fact in another, and probably untenable reasoning in some others. This deficiency, then, ought to be supplied by the Governor of Pennsylvania; and the fact, which has been mistaken, placed on its true footing. As to any inaccuracy of reasoning, the President can do no more than show to the Governor of Virginia where it lies; he cannot be authoritative; nor would he, I presume, even if he had power, choose to exert it until every hope should be lost of convincing the judgment of the State. But this argumentative intercourse belongs to the Governor of Pennsylvania, and ought to be managed by him until the prospect of satisfaction shall disappear. At such a period it may, perhaps, be seasonable for you to interfere. But now to interfere would establish a precedent for assuming the agency in every embryo dispute between States; whereas your mediation would be better reserved until the interchange of their sentiments and pretensions shall fail in an accommodation.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, August 2, 1791.

I find, on referring to the records of the Supreme Court of this commonwealth, in the case of McGuire, Parsons, and Wells, which I lately submitted to your consideration, that the last of these persons was apprehended. I have, therefore, in addition to the other documents, enclosed to you a transcript of the record, a copy of which I shall likewise transmit to the Governor of Virginia, together with the necessary evidence, as soon as it can be procured, to prove that McGuire and Parsons have actually fled from the justice of Pennsylvania into that State, agreeably to the form suggested in the opinion of the Attorney General, which you have been pleased to communicate.

I am, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

THOMAS MIFFLIN.

To GEORGE WASHINGTON, Esq.

No. 10.

I certify, that at a court of Oyer and Terminer and general jail delivery, held at Washington, for the county of Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, the tenth of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, Francis McGuire, Absalom Wells, and Baldwin Parsons, late of the said county, yeomen, were severally indicted of having, on the tenth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, at Washington county aforesaid, with force and arms, &c. taken and carried away from the county of Washington aforesaid a free negro man named John, to other parts without the said State, with a design and intention of selling and disposing of the said negro man as a slave, contrary to the act of Assembly in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania. I further certify, that writs of capias were issued on the said indictments, bearing test the twenty-fifth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and that the returns of David Williamson, Esq., late sheriff of the county, to the said court were, that he had taken the said Absalom Wells, and that he had the said Absalom Wells in his custody, ready to answer to the said indictment against him, as aforesaid, but that he could not find either the said Francis McGuire or the said Baldwin Parsons within his bailiwick.

Witness my hand, the twenty-fifth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF ANTHONY WAYNE, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM GEORGIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 18, 1791.

Mr. AMES, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of James Jackson, complaining of an undue election and return of Anthony Wayne, a member returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the first Monday of February next be assigned for the trial of the articles alleged in the said petition, against the said return.

Resolved, That the evidence which may be offered, on the part of the petitioner, shall be confined to the proof of the articles of charge exhibited in the said petition against the validity of the return of the said election.

Resolved, That, on the trial, the deposition of a witness shall be received, which shall have been taken more than twenty-five days prior to the day assigned for the trial, before any justice or judge of the courts of the United States, or before any chancellor, justice, or judge of a supreme or superior court, mayor, or chief magistrate of a city, or judge of a county court, or court of common pleas of any of the United States, not being of counsel or attorney to either the said Anthony Wayne or the petitioner: Provided, That a notification from the magistrate, before whom the deposition is to be taken, to the adverse party, to be present at the taking the same, and to put interrogatories, if he think fit, shall have been first made out and served on the adverse party, or his attorney especially authorized for the purpose, as either may be nearest, if either is within one hundred miles of the place of such caption, allowing time for their attendance, after notified, not less than at the rate of one day, Sundays exclusive, for every twenty miles travel. And every person deposing shall be carefully examined and cautioned, and sworn or affirmed to testify the whole truth, and shall subscribe the testimony by him or her given, after the same shall be reduced to writing, which shall be done only by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by the deponent in his presence. And the depositions so taken, together with a certificate of the notice, if any, given to the adverse party, or his attorney, shall be sealed up by the said magistrate, and directed to the Speaker: Provided, nevertheless, That no ex-parte deposition shall be used on the trial of the said petition, which shall have been taken at any time before the twenty-sixth day of December next: Provided, also, That evidence taken in any other manner than is herein before directed, and not objected to by the parties, may, with the approbation of the House, be produced on the trial."

PLAN FOR CONVERTING SALT WATER INTO FRESH.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 22, 1791.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred, by the House of Representatives of the United States, the petition of Jacob Isaacks, of Newport, in Rhode Island, has examined into the truth and importance of the allegations therein set forth, and makes thereon the following report:

The petitioner sets forth that, by various experiments, with considerable labor and expense, he has discovered a method of converting salt water into fresh, in the proportion of eight pints out of ten, by a process so simple that it may be performed on board of vessels at sea by the common iron cabouse, with small alterations, by the same fire, and in the same time, which is used for cooking the ship's provisions; and offers to convey to the Government of the United States a faithful account of his art or secret, to be used by or within the United States, on their giving to him a reward suitable to the importance of the discovery, and, in the opinion of Government, adequate to his expenses and the time he has devoted to the bringing it into effect.

In order to ascertain the merit of the petitioner's discovery, it becomes necessary to examine the advances already made in the art of converting salt water into fresh.

Lord Bacon, to whom the world is indebted for the first germs of so many branches of science, had observed that, with a heat sufficient for distillation, salt will not rise in vapor, and that salt water distilled is fresh. And it would seem that all mankind might have observed that the earth is supplied with fresh water chiefly by exhalation from the sea, which is, in fact, an insensible distillation effected by the heat of the sun. Yet this, though the most obvious was not the first idea in the essays for converting salt water into fresh. Filtration was tried in vain; and congelation could be resorted to only in the coldest regions and seasons. In all the earlier trials by distillation, some mixture was thought necessary to aid the operation by a partial precipitation of the salt and other foreign matters contained in sea water. Of this kind were the methods of Sir Richard Hawkins, in the sixteenth century; of Glauber, Hauton, and Lister, in the seventeenth; and of Hales, Appleby, Butler, Chapman, Hoffman, and Dove, in the eighteenth; nor was there any thing in these methods worthy noting on the present occasion except the very simple still contrived extempore by Captain Chapman, and made from such materials as are to be found on board every ship, great or small. This was a common pot, with a wooden lid of the usual form, in the centre of which a hole was bored to receive perpendicularly a short wooden tube, made with an inch and a half auger; which perpendicular tube received at its top, and at an acute angle, another tube of wood also, which descended till it joined a third of pewter, made by rolling up a dish, and passing it obliquely through a cask of cold water. With this simple machine he obtained two quarts of fresh water an hour; and observed, that the expense of fuel would be very trifling if the still was contrived to stand on the fire along with the ship's boiler.

In 1762, Dr. Lind, proposing to make experiments of several different mixtures, first distilled rain water, which he supposed would be the purest, and then sea water without any mixture, which he expected would be the least pure, in order to arrange between these two supposed extremes the degree of merit of the several ingredients he meant to try. "To his great surprise," as he confesses, "the sea water distilled, without any mixture, was as pure as the rain water." He pursued the discovery, and established the fact, that a pure and potable fresh water may be obtained from salt water by simple distillation, without the aid of any mixture for fining or precipitating its foreign contents. In 1767, he proposed an extempore still, which, in fact, was Chapman's, only substituting a gun barrel instead of Chapman's pewter tube, and the hand pump of the ship to be cut in two, obliquely, and joined again at an acute angle, instead of Chapman's wooden tubes bored express; or, instead of the wooden lid and upright tube, he proposed a tea kettle (without its lid or handle) to be turned bottom upwards over the mouth of the pot, by way of still-head, and a wooden tube leading from the spout to a gun barrel passing through a cask of water; the whole luted with equal parts of chalk and meal, moistened with salt water.

With this apparatus of a pot, tea kettle, and gun barrel, the Dolphin, a 20 gun ship, in her voyage round the world in 1768, from 56 gallons of sea water, and with 9 pounds of wood, and 69 pounds of pit coal, made 42 gallons of good fresh water, at the rate of 8 gallons an hour. The Dorsetshire, in her passage from Gibraltar to Mahon, in 1769, made 19 quarts of pure water in four hours with 10 pounds of wood. And the Slambal, in 1773, between Bombay and Bengal, with a hand pump, gun barrel, and a pot, of 6 gallons of sea water made 10 quarts of fresh water in three hours.

In 1771, Dr. Irvin, putting together Lind's idea of distilling without a mixture, Chapman's still, and Dr. Franklin's method of cooling by evaporation, obtained a premium of £5000 from the British Parliament. He wetted his tube constantly with a mop instead of passing it through a cask of water; he enlarged its bore, also, in order to give a freer passage to the vapor, and thereby increased its quantity, by lessening the resistance or pressure on the evaporating surface. This last improvement was his own; it doubtless contributed to the success of its models; and we may suppose the enlargement of the tube to be useful to that point at which the central parts of the vapor passing through it would begin to escape condensation. Lord Mulgrave used his method in his voyage towards the north pole in 1773, making from 34 to 40 gallons of fresh water a day, without any great addition of fuel, as he says.

M. de Bougainville, in his voyage round the world, used very successully a still which had been contrived in 1763, by Poyssonier, so as to guard against the water being thrown over from the boiler into the pipe by the agitation of the ship. In this one singularity was, that the furnace or fire-box was in the middle of the boiler, so that the water surrounded it in contact. This still, however, was expensive, and occupied much room.

Such were the advances already made in the art of obtaining fresh from salt water, when Mr. Isaacks, the petitioner, suggested his discovery.

As the merit of this could be ascertained by experiment only, the Secretary of State asked the favor of Mr. Rittenhouse, President of the American Philosophical Society; of Dr. Wistar, professor of chemistry in the college of Philadelphia; and Dr. Hutchinson, professor of chemistry in the university of Pennsylvania, to be present at the experiments. Mr. Isaacks fixed the pot of a small caboose, with a tin cap and straight tube of tin passing obliquely through a cask of cold water; he made use of a mixture, the composition of which he did not explain, and from twenty-four pints of sea water, taken up about three miles out of the capes of Delaware, at flood-tide, he distilled twenty-two pints of fresh water in four hours, with twenty pounds of seasoned pine, which was a little wetted by having lain in the rain.

In a second experiment of the twenty-first of March, performed in a furnace and five gallon still, at the college, from thirty-two pints of sea water he drew thirty-one pints of fresh water in seven hours and twenty-four minutes, with fifty-one pounds of hickory, which had been cut about six months. In order to decide whether Mr. Isaacks's mixture contributed in any and what degree to the success of the operation, it was thought proper to repeat his experiment under the same circumstances exactly, except the omission of the mixture. Accordingly, on the next day the same quantity of sea water was put into the same still, the same furnace was used, and fuel from the same parcel. It yielded, as his had done, thirty-one pints of fresh water in eleven minutes more of time, and with ten pounds less of wood.

On the twenty-fourth of March, Mr. Isaacks performed a third experiment. For this a common iron pot of three and a half gallons was fixed in brick work, and the flue from the hearth wound once around the pot spirally, and then passed off up a chimney. The cap was of tin, and a straight tin tube of about two inches diameter, passing obliquely through a barrel of water, served instead of a worm. From sixteen pints of sea water he drew off fifteen pints of fresh water in two hours fifty-five minutes, with three pounds of dry hickory and eight pounds of seasoned pine. This experiment was also repeated the next day, with the same apparatus and fuel from the same parcel, but without the mixture. Sixteen pints of sea water yielded in like manner fifteen pints of fresh, in one minute more of time and with half a pound less of wood. On the whole, it was evident Mr. Isaacks's mixture produced no advantage, either in the process or result of the distillation.

The distilled water in all these instances was found, on experiment, to be as pure as the best pump water of the city. Its taste, indeed, was not as agreeable, but it was not such as to produce any disgust. In fact, we drink in common life, in many places, and under many circumstances, and almost always at sea, a worse tasted, and probably a less wholesome water.

The obtaining fresh from salt water was for ages considered as an important desideratum for the use of navigators. The process for doing this by simple distillation is so efficacious, the erecting an extempore still with such utensils as are found on board of every ship is so practicable, as to authorize the assertion that this desideratum is satisfied to a very useful degree. But though this has been done for upwards of thirty years, though its reality has been established by the actual experience of several vessels which have had recourse to it, yet neither the fact nor the process is known to the mass of seamen, to whom it would be the most useful, and for whom it was principally wanted. The Secretary of State is therefore of opinion, that since the subject has now been brought under observation, it should be made the occasion of disseminating its knowledge generally and effectually among the seafaring citizens of the United States. The following is one of the many methods which might be proposed for doing this: Let the clearance for every vessel sailing from the ports of the United States be printed on a paper, on the back whereof shall be a printed account of the assays which have been made for obtaining fresh from salt water, mentioning shortly those which have been unsuccessful, and more fully those which have succeeded, describing the methods which have been found to answer for constructing extempore stills of such implements as are generally on board of every vessel, with a recommendation, in all cases where they shall have occasion to resort to this expedient for obtaining water, to publish the result of their trial in some gazette on their return to the United States, or to communicate it for publication to the office of the Secretary of State, in order that others may, by their success, be encouraged to make similar trials, and be benefited by any improvements or new ideas which may occur to them in practice.

ATTORNEY GENERAL AND DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 28, 1791.

UNITED STATES, December 28, 1791.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, for your consideration, the copy of a letter which I have received from the Attorney General of the United States.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, December 26, 1791.

The office, which I have the honor of holding under the United States has presented, in the course of its execution, some defects which, I trust, will not be deemed unworthy of a remedy. If, however, they were only personally inconvenient, I should certainly forbear to trouble you with a recital of them; but while I consider them as injurious to the public service, I cannot satisfy myself of the propriety of withholding them from you.

Many instances have occurred in which the heads of the Departments have requested that suits should be prosecuted in different States under my direction. It has been always my inclination to conform to their wishes; but the want of a fixed relation between the attorneys of the districts and the Attorney General, has rendered it impossible for me to take charge of matters on which I was not authorized to give instructions.

From the same source it may frequently arise that the United States may be deeply affected by various proceedings in the inferior courts, which no appeal can rectify. The peculiar duty of the Attorney General calls upon him to watch over these cases; and being, in the eye of the world, responsible for the final issue, to offer his advice at the earliest stage of any business; and indeed, until repeated adjudications shall have settled a clear line of partition between the federal and State courts, his best exertions cannot be too often repeated, to oppose the danger of a schism. For this purpose the attorneys of the districts ought, I conceive, to be under an obligation to transmit to him a state of every case in which the harmony of the two judiciaries may be hazarded, and to communicate to him those topics on which the subjects of foreign nations may complain in the administration of justice.

Perhaps, too, in the review which the President takes of the affairs of the Union at the opening of each session of Congress, the judicial department will be comprehended. But the Attorney General, who ought to be able to represent the true situation of it, must be forever incompetent to the task, until he may officially, and with the right of expecting an answer, propound his inquiries to the district attorneys.

I might extend this enumeration much further; but I will only add, that the opinions which the Attorney General gives are many in number, and often lengthy. From this consideration, united with the foregoing, the reasonableness of allowing him a transcribing clerk will, I hope, be obvious.

Permit me, sir, to request you to forward to Congress the subject of this letter, in the manner most agreeable to yourself. I have taken the liberty of addressing it to you, not with an idea of thus obtaining your sanction, but from an impression that the application of an executive officer for the reform of his office ought not, of his own accord, to be laid before the Legislature.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with the most respectful attachment, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 18, 1792.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the committee to whom was referred the written message from the President of the United States, covering the copy of a letter to him from the Attorney General, made the following report:

That it would be proper to make it the duty of the attorneys in the several districts to pursue the instructions which, from time to time, shall be given them, respectively, by the Attorney General of the United States, in all matters touching their respective offices, and to correspond with him on any matter relative to the judicial business which shall arise within their respective districts, and upon which he shall request information from them; and that it would be proper to make it the duty of the Attorney General to give his advice to the attorneys of the several districts, upon any matter relative to judicial business which shall arise within their respective districts, and upon which they shall request such advice, or he shall think it proper for him to interfere; and to make it lawful for the Attorney General, in any suit in which the United States shall be a party, or shall be interested, and in any court whatsoever, to advocate the United States, although such suit shall not have been originally instituted by him, or under his direction; and that, for the purpose of assisting him in the execution, as well of the duties herein assigned him, as of those heretofore assigned him by law, he may appoint a clerk, who, for his services, shall be allowed at the rate of _____ dollars by the year.

ALTERATIONS IN THE TREASURY AND WAR DEPARTMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 29, 1792.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, from the committee appointed to examine whether any, and what, alterations are necessary to be made in the acts establishing the Treasury and War Departments, made the following report:

The committee submit to the House the following resolutions:

1st. In relation to the War Department. That there be an accountant to the Department of War, who shall be charged with the settlement of all accounts relative to the pay of the army, the subsistence of officers, bounties to soldiers, the expenses of the recruiting service, the incidental and contingent expenses of the Department; and who shall report, from time to time, all such settlements as have been made by him for the inspection and revision of the accounting officers of the Treasury.

The compensation of the said accountant shall be a yearly salary of _____ dollars.

2d. That there be a commissary to the Department of War, whose duty it shall be to receive and safely keep all quartermaster's and military stores, clothing, Indian goods, and all such other articles for the use of the Department as shall be committed to him by the Secretary thereof, and the same to issue according to the orders of the said Secretary; and further, to call to account all persons to whom any of the said stores, clothing, goods, or articles whatsoever shall have been issued, touching the [due apportionments of the same to the purposes for which they shall be issued. That the said commissary shall keep regular and exact accounts of all articles which shall have been received and issued by him, and of the application thereof, and once in every three months shall make a report thereof to the Secretary of War, showing, among other things, the articles which remain unexpended, the persons in whose custody they are, and the places where they are deposited. That the compensation to the said commissary shall be _____ dollars per annum.

3d. That the Treasurer of the United States shall perform the duty of paymaster general to the Department of War, and in that capacity shall disburse all such moneys as shall have been previously advanced for the use of that Department upon warrants from the Treasury, which disbursements shall be made pursuant to warrants from the Secretary of War, countersigned by the accountant. That, in consideration of this additional service, the said Treasurer be allowed, besides his present salary, the yearly sum of _____ dollars; and that the salary of his head clerk be increased to the sum of _____ dollars.

4th. That all purchases and contracts for supplying the army with provisions, clothing, supplies in the quartermaster's department, military stores, Indian goods, and all other supplies or articles for the use of the Department of War, be made by or under the direction of the Treasury Department.

5th. In relation to the Treasury Department. That it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Treasury to superintend, under the head of the Department, the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage.

6th. That the present office of assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury be abolished, and that instead thereof there be an officer in the Department of the Treasury to be denominated Commissioner of the Revenue, who shall be charged with superintending, under the direction of the head of the Department, the collection of the other revenues of the United States; and shall execute such other services, being conformable to the constitution of the Department, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury. That the compensation of the said commissioner shall be a salary of _____ dollars per annum.

7th. That in every case of a claim against the United States not finally adjusted, upon which the present Comptroller of the Treasury, as Auditor, may have decided, and in which his decision is not controverted by the claimant, the said Comptroller be empowered and directed finally to adjust the same; and that in every such case in which the decision of the said Comptroller, as Auditor, is controverted, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, on behalf of the United States, to submit the points in controversy to referees, who shall be three in number; one of whom to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, one by the claimant, and the third to be agreed upon between the Secretary and the claimant; or, in case of disagreement, to be chosen by the two referees who shall have been appointed as aforesaid; and the decision of the said referees, or a majority of them, shall have the like force and effect with an award of arbitrators between individuals. But if any claimant shall refuse to join in a reference, then it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Treasury to proceed to an adjustment of the claim as in other cases. That each of the said referees be allowed _____ dollars per day while actually employed in the reference.

8th. That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury, whereby he cannot perform the duties of his office, the Comptroller of the Treasury may perform the said duties until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease; and all warrants which shall be signed by the said Comptroller in place of the said Secretary shall be countersigned by the Commissioner of the Revenue.

9th. That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Comptroller of the Treasury, whereby he cannot perform the duties of his office, the Commissioner of the Revenue may perform the said duties until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

10th. That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Auditor of the Treasury, whereby he cannot perform the duties of his office, the first clerk of the said Auditor may perform the said duties until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

11th. That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Register of the Treasury, whereby he cannot perform the duties of his office, the first clerk of the said Register may perform the said duties until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

12th. That the forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts whatsoever shall be prescribed by the Department of the Treasury.

13th. That, in addition to the compensations allowed to the Comptroller, Auditor, and Register of the Treasury, by the act "for establishing the salaries of the executive officers of Government, their assistants and clerks," the said officers, respectively, shall be allowed the following yearly sums, viz: the Comptroller _____ dollars; the Auditor _____ dollars; the Register _____ dollars.

14th. That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to have two principal clerks, each of whom to have a salary of _____ dollars per annum.

15th. That the restriction on the clerks of the Department of the Treasury, so far as respects the carrying on of any trade or business, be abolished.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 4, 1792.

Mr. IZARD, from the committee to whom the subject of weights and measures was referred, made the following report: That it is their opinion—

1. That the standard for the measures and weights of the United States be a uniform cylindrical rod of iron, of such length as, in latitude  $45^{\circ}$  in the level of the ocean, and in a cellar of uniform natural temperature, shall perform its vibrations in small and equal arcs, in one second of mean time.

2. That the President of the United States be requested to have such a standard rod provided; that it be prepared with all the accuracy which the importance of the object merits, and circumstances admit; that this be done either by actual experiments, under the parallel of  $45^{\circ}$  of latitude complete, or by actual experiments, rectified by due allowances under any other parallel, where a superiority of means for accurate experiment may promise, on the whole, greater truth in the result.

3. That the expenses of the measures he shall adopt for this purpose, not exceeding ——— dollars, be defrayed by the public.

4. That the standard rod so to be provided shall be divided into five equal parts, one of which, to be called a foot, shall be the unit of measures of length for the United States.

That the foot shall be divided into ten inches;

The inch into ten lines;

The line into ten points;

And that ten feet make a decad;

Ten decads a rood;

Ten roods a furlong;

And ten furlongs a mile.

5. That measures of surface in the United States be made by squares of the measures of length; and that in the case of lands the unit shall be a square, whereof every side shall be one hundred feet, to be called a rood:

That each rood be divided into tenths and hundredths;

That ten roods make a double acre;

And ten double acres a square furlong.

6. That the unit of measures of capacity in the United States be a cubic foot, to be called a bushel;

That each bushel be divided into ten pottles;

Each pottle into ten demi-pints;

Each demi-pint into ten metres;

That ten bushels be a quarter;

And ten quarters a last, or double ton.

7. That the unit of weights of the United States be a cubic inch of rain water, to be called an ounce, and to be measured and weighed in a cellar of uniform natural temperature:

That the ounce be divided into ten double scruples;

The double scruple into ten carats;

The carat into ten minims or demi-grains;

The minim into ten mites;

That ten ounces make a pound;

Ten pounds a stone;

Ten stones a kental;

Ten kentals a hogshead.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON'S OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL "FOR AN APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES AMONG THE SEVERAL STATES, ACCORDING TO THE FIRST ENUMERATION."

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 5, 1792.

UNITED STATES, April 5, 1792.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I have maturely considered the act passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act for an apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first enumeration;" and I return it to your House, wherein it originated, with the following objections:

First. The constitution has prescribed that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers; and there is no one proportion or divisor which, applied to the respective numbers of the States, will yield the number and allotment of Representatives proposed by the bill.

Second. The constitution has also provided that the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand; which restriction is, by the context, and by fair and obvious construction, to be applied to the separate and respective numbers of the States: and the bill has allotted to eight of the States more than one for every thirty thousand.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

“AN ACT for an apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first enumeration.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the third day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, the House of Representatives shall be composed of one hundred and twenty members, elected within the several States according to the following apportionment; that is to say: Within the State of New Hampshire, five; within the State of Massachusetts, sixteen; within the State of Vermont, three; within the State of Rhode Island, two; within the State of Connecticut, eight; within the State of New York, eleven; within the State of New Jersey, six; within the State of Pennsylvania, fourteen; within the State of Delaware, two; within the State of Maryland, nine; within the State of Virginia, twenty-one; within the State of Kentucky, two; within the State of North Carolina, twelve; within the State of South Carolina, seven; and within the State of Georgia, two.

JONATHAN TRUMBULL, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

[1st SESSION.]

OPINION OF THE CIRCUIT JUDGES FOR THE NEW YORK DISTRICT, RELATIVE TO CERTAIN DUTIES ASSIGNED TO THEM BY ACT OF CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, APRIL 16, 1792.

UNITED STATES, April 16, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a copy of a letter from the judges of the circuit court of the United States, held for the New York district, and of their opinion and agreement respecting the “Act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions.”

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR:

NEW YORK, April 10, 1792.

As we could not, in our opinion, convey the enclosed extracts from the minutes of the circuit court now sitting here to the Congress of the United States in so respectful and proper a manner as through the President, we take the liberty to transmit them to you, and to request the favor of you to communicate them to that honorable body.

We have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servants,

JOHN JAY,
WM. CUSHING,
JAS. DUANE.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

At a stated circuit court of the United States held for the district of New York, at the city of New York, on Thursday, the fifth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, at ten of the clock, ante meridian.

Present: The Honorable JOHN JAY, Esq., Chief Justice of the United States; the Honorable William Cushing, Esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; the Honorable James Duane, Esq., judge of the district of New York.

The court proceeded to take into consideration the following act of the Congress of the United States, viz:

AN ACT to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the operation of the resolutions of the late Congress of the United States, passed on the second day of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and the twenty-third day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, so far as they have barred, or may be construed to bar, the claims of the widow or orphans of any officer of the late army to the seven years' half-pay of such officer, shall, from and after the passing of this act, be suspended for and during the term of two years.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any commissioned officer, not having received the commutation on half-pay, and any non-commissioned officer, soldier, or seaman, disabled in the actual service of the United States, during the late war, by wounds or other known cause, who did not desert from the said service, shall be entitled to be placed on the pension list of the United States, during life, or the continuance of such disability; and shall also be allowed such further sum for the arrears of pension, from the time of such disability, not exceeding the rate of the annual allowance in consequence of his disability, as the circuit court of the district in which they respectively reside may think just: Provided, That in every such case, the rules and regulations following shall be complied with, that is to say, First, Every applicant shall attend the court in person, except where it shall be certified by two magistrates that he is unable to do so, and shall produce to the circuit court the following proofs, to wit: A certificate from the commanding officer of the ship, regiment, corps, or company in which he served, setting forth his disability, and that he was thus disabled while in the service of the United States; or the affidavits of two credible witnesses to the same effect. The affidavits of three reputable freeholders of the city, town, or county in which he resides, ascertaining, of their own knowledge, the mode of life, employment, labor, or means of support of such applicant for the last twelve months. Secondly, The circuit court, upon receipt of the proofs aforesaid, shall forthwith proceed to examine into the nature of the wound, or other cause of disability of such applicant, and, having ascertained the degree thereof, shall certify the same, and transmit the result of their inquiry, in case, in their opinion, the applicant should be put on the pension list, to the Secretary of War, together with their opinion, in writing, what proportion of the monthly pay of such applicant will be equivalent to the degree of disability ascertained in manner aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the district court in each district shall publish this act in such manner as the judge of the district court shall think effectual to give general information thereof to the people of the district, and shall give like information of the times and places of holding the circuit courts in such district. And in districts wherein a circuit court is not directed by law to be holden, the judge of the district court shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to exercise all the powers given by this act to the respective circuit courts. And it shall be the duty of the judges of the circuit courts, respectively, during the term of two years from the passing of this act, to remain at the places where the said courts shall be holden, five days, at the least, from the time of opening the sessions thereof, that persons disabled as aforesaid may have full opportunity to make their application for the relief proposed by this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War, upon receipt of the proofs, certificate, and opinion aforesaid, shall cause the same to be duly filed in his office, and place the name of such applicant on the pension list of the United States in conformity thereto: Provided, always, That in any case where the said Secretary shall have cause to suspect imposition or mistake, he shall have power to withhold the name of such applicant from the pension list, and make report of the same to Congress at their next session.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all non-commissioned officers, soldiers, and seamen, disabled in the actual service of the United States during the late war, whose disability and rate of allowance have been ascertained, pursuant to the regulations prescribed by the late Congress, and have not applied to be placed on the pension list until after the time limited by the act of Congress for that purpose was expired, shall now be placed on the pension list, and be entitled to demand and receive their respective pensions, according to the allowances ascertained as aforesaid, any thing in this act, or any act of the late Congress, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act, no sale, transfer, or mortgage of the whole, or any part, of the pension, or arrearages of pension, payable to any non-commissioned officer, soldier, or seaman, before the same shall become due shall be valid. And every person claiming such pension, or arrears of pension, or any part thereof, under power of attorney or substitution, shall, before the same is paid, make oath, or affirmation, before some justice of the peace of the place where the same is payable, that such power or substitution is not given by reason of any transfer of such pension, or arrears of pension; and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely in the premises, and be thereof convicted, shall suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury.

The court were thereupon unanimously of opinion, and agreed—

That, by the constitution of the United States, the Government thereof is divided into three distinct and independent branches; and that it is the duty of each to abstain from and to oppose encroachments on either.

That neither the legislative nor the executive branch can constitutionally assign to the judicial any duties but such as are properly judicial, and to be performed in a judicial manner.

That the duties assigned to the circuit courts by this act are not of that description, and that the act itself does not appear to contemplate them as such, inasmuch as it subjects the decisions of these courts made pursuant to those duties, first to the consideration and suspension of the Secretary of War, and then to the revision of the Legislature; whereas, by the constitution, neither the Secretary of War, nor any other executive officer, nor even the Legislature, are authorized to sit as a court of errors on the judicial acts or opinions of this court.

As, therefore, the business assigned to this court by the act is not judicial, nor directed to be performed judicially, the act can only be considered as appointing commissioners for the purposes mentioned in it by official instead of personal descriptions.

That the judges of this court regard themselves as being the commissioners designated by this act, and therefore as being at liberty to accept or to decline that office.

That as the objects of this act are exceedingly benevolent, and do real honor to the humanity and justice of Congress; and as the judges desire to manifest, on all proper occasions, and in every proper manner, their high respect for the National Legislature, they will execute this act in the capacity of commissioners.

That as the Legislature have a right to extend the session of this court for any term which they may think proper by law to assign, the term of five days, as directed by this act, ought to be punctually observed.

That the judges of this court will, as usual, during the session thereof, adjourn the court from day to day, or other short periods, as circumstances may render proper; and that they will regularly between the adjournments proceed as commissioners to execute the business of this act, in the same court room or chamber.

OPINION OF THE CIRCUIT JUDGES FOR THE PENNSYLVANIA DISTRICT, RELATIVE TO CERTAIN DUTIES ASSIGNED TO THEM BY ACT OF CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, APRIL 21, 1792.

UNITED STATES, April 21, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the copy of a letter which I have received from the judges of the circuit court of the United States held for the Pennsylvania district, relative to the "act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, April 18, 1792.

To you it officially belongs to "take care that the laws" of the United States "be faithfully executed." Before you, therefore, we think it our duty to lay the sentiments which, on a late painful occasion, governed us with regard to an act passed by the Legislature of the Union.

The people of the United States have vested in Congress all legislative powers "granted in the constitution." They have vested in one Supreme Court, and in such other inferior courts as the Congress shall establish, "the judicial power of the United States."

It is worthy of remark, that, in Congress, the whole legislative power of the United States is not vested. An important part of that power was exercised by the people themselves when they "ordained and established the constitution."

"This constitution" is "the supreme law of the land."

This supreme law "all judicial officers of the United States are bound by oath, or affirmation, to support."

It is a principle important to freedom, that, in Government, the judicial should be distinct from and independent of the legislative department.

To this important principle the people of the United States, in forming their constitution, have manifested the highest regard.

They have placed their judicial power not in Congress, but in "courts." They have ordained that the "judges" of those courts "shall hold their offices during good behavior," and that "during their continuance in office, their salaries shall not be diminished."

Congress have lately passed an act "to regulate," among other things, "the claims to invalid pensions."

Upon due consideration, we have been unanimously of opinion, that under this act the circuit court held for Pennsylvania district could not proceed.

1. Because the business directed by this act is not of a judicial nature. It forms no part of the power vested by the constitution in the courts of the United States. The circuit court must, consequently, have proceeded without constitutional authority.

2. Because, if upon that business the court had proceeded, its judgments (for its opinions are its judgments) might, under the same act, have been revised and controlled by the Legislature and by an officer in the executive department. Such revision and control we deemed radically inconsistent with the independence of that judicial power which is vested in the courts, and, consequently, with that important principle which is so strictly observed by the constitution of the United States.

These, sir, are the reasons of our conduct. Be assured, that, though it became necessary, it was far from being pleasant. To be obliged to act contrary either to the obvious directions of Congress, or to a constitutional principle, in our judgment equally obvious, excited feelings in us which we hope never to experience again.

We have the honor to be, with the most perfect consideration and respect, sir,

Your most obedient and very humble servants,

JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
RICHARD PETERS.

[2d SESSION.]

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE SUPREME COURT, AND THE OPINION OF THE CIRCUIT JUDGES FOR THE NORTH CAROLINA DISTRICT, RELATIVE TO CERTAIN DUTIES ASSIGNED TO THEM BY ACT OF CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 7, 1792.

UNITED STATES, November 7, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a copy of a letter and representation from the chief justice and associate judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, stating the difficulties and inconveniences which attend the discharge of their duties according to the present judiciary system;

A copy of a letter from the judges attending the circuit court of the United States for the North Carolina district, in June last, containing their observations on an act passed during the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, August 9, 1792.

Your official connexion with the Legislature, and the consideration that applications from us to them cannot be made in any manner so respectful to Government as through the President, induce us to request your attention to the enclosed representation, and that you will be pleased to lay it before the Congress.

We really, sir, find the burdens laid upon us so excessive that we cannot forbear representing them in strong and explicit terms.

On extraordinary occasions we shall always be ready, as good citizens, to make extraordinary exertions; but while our country enjoys prosperity, and nothing occurs to require or justify such severities, we cannot reconcile ourselves to the idea of existing in exile from our families, and of being subjected to a kind of life on which we cannot reflect without experiencing sensations and emotions more easy to conceive than proper for us to express.

With the most perfect respect, esteem, and attachment,

We have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servants,

JOHN JAY,
WILLIAM CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
JAMES IREDELL,
THOMAS JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Chief Justice and the Associate Judges of the Supreme Court respectfully represent to the Congress of the United States:

That when the present judicial arrangements took place, it appeared to be a general and well-founded opinion, that the act then passed was to be considered rather as introducing a temporary expedient than a permanent system, and that it would be revised as soon as a period of greater leisure should arrive.

The subject was new, and was rendered intricate and embarrassing by local as well as other difficulties; and there was reason to presume that others, not at that time apparent, would be discovered by experience.

The ensuing sessions of Congress were so occupied by other affairs of great and pressing importance, that the judges thought it improper to interrupt the attention of Congress by any application on the subject.

That, as it would not become them to suggest what alterations or system ought in their opinion to be formed and adopted, they omit making any remarks on that head; but they feel most sensibly the necessity which presses them to represent—

That the task of holding twenty-seven circuit courts a year, in the different States, from New Hampshire to Georgia, besides two sessions of the Supreme Court at Philadelphia, in the two most severe seasons of the year, is a task which, considering the extent of the United States, and the small number of judges, is too burdensome.

That to require of the judges to pass the greater part of their days on the road, and at inns, and at a distance from their families, is a requisition which, in their opinion, should not be made unless in cases of necessity.

That some of the present judges do not enjoy health and strength of body sufficient to enable them to undergo the toilsome journeys through different climates and seasons, which they are called upon to undertake; nor is it probable that any set of judges, however robust, would be able to support, and punctually execute, such severe duties for any length of time.

That the distinction made between the Supreme Court and its judges, and appointing the same men finally to correct in one capacity the errors which they themselves may have committed in another, is a distinction unfriendly to impartial justice, and to that confidence in the Supreme Court which it is so essential to the public interest should be reposed in it.

The judges decline minute details, and purposely omit many considerations, which they are persuaded will occur whenever the subject is attentively discussed and considered.

They most earnestly request that it may meet with early attention, and that the system may be so modified as that they may be relieved from their present painful and improper situation.

JOHN JAY,
WILLIAM CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
JAMES IREDELL,
THOMAS JOHNSON.

SIR:

NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA, June 8, 1792.

We, the judges now attending at the circuit court of the United States for the district of North Carolina, conceive it our duty to lay before you some important observations which have occurred to us in the consideration of an act of Congress lately passed, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

We beg leave to premise, that it is as much an inclination as it is our duty to receive with all possible respect every act of the Legislature, and that we never can find ourselves in a more painful situation than to be obliged to object to the execution of any, more especially to the execution of one founded on the purest principles of humanity and justice, which the act in question undoubtedly is. But, however lamentable a difference in opinion really may be, or with whatever difficulty we may have formed an opinion, we are under the indispensable necessity of acting according to the best dictates of our own judgment, after duly weighing every consideration that can occur to us, which we have done on the present occasion.

The extreme importance of the case, and our desire of being explicit beyond the danger of being misunderstood, will, we hope, justify us in stating our observations in a systematic manner.

We therefore, sir, submit to you the following:

1. That the legislative, executive, and judicial departments are each formed in a separate and independent manner, and that the ultimate basis of each is the constitution only, within the limits of which each department can alone justify any act of authority.

2. That the Legislature, among other important powers, unquestionably possess that of establishing courts in such a manner as to their wisdom shall appear best, limited by the terms of the constitution only; and to whatever extent that power may be exercised, or however severe the duty they may think proper to require, the judges, when appointed in virtue of any such establishment, owe implicit and unreserved obedience to it.

3. That, at the same time, such courts cannot be warranted, as we conceive, by virtue of that part of the constitution delegating judicial power for the exercise of which any act of the Legislature is provided, in exercising (even under the authority of another act) any power not in its nature judicial, or, if judicial, not provided for upon the terms the constitution requires.

4. That whatever doubt may be suggested, whether the power in question is properly of a judicial nature, yet inasmuch as the decision of the court is not made final, but may be at least suspended in its operation by the Secretary of War, if he shall have cause to suspect imposition or mistake, this subjects the decision of the court to a mode of revision which we consider to be unwarranted by the constitution; for though Congress may certainly establish, in instances not yet provided for, courts of appellate jurisdiction, yet such courts must consist of judges appointed in the manner the constitution requires, and holding their offices by no other tenure than that of their good behavior, by which tenure the office of Secretary of War is not held: and we beg leave to add, with all due deference, that no decision of any court of the United States can, under any circumstances, in our opinion, agreeable to the constitution, be liable to a reversion, or even suspension, by the Legislature itself, in whom no judicial power of any kind appears to be vested but the important one relative to impeachments.

These, sir, are our reasons for being of opinion, as we are at present, that this circuit court cannot be justified in the execution of that part of the act which requires it to examine, and report an opinion on the unfortunate cases of officers and soldiers disabled in the service of the United States. The part of the act requiring the court to sit five days for the purpose of receiving applications from such persons, we shall deem it our duty to comply with; for whether in our opinion such purpose can or cannot be answered, it is, as we conceive, our indispensable duty to keep open any court of which we have the honor to be judges, as long as Congress shall direct.

The high respect we entertain for the Legislature, our feelings as men for persons whose situation requires the earliest as well as the most effectual relief, and our sincere desire to promote, whether officially or otherwise, the just and benevolent views of Congress so conspicuous on the present as well as on many other occasions, have induced us to reflect whether we could be justified in acting under this act personally in the character of commissioners during the session of a court; and could we be satisfied that we had authority to do so, we would cheerfully devote such part of our time as might be necessary for the performance of the service. But we confess we have great doubts on this head. The power appears to be given to the court only, and not to the judges of it; and as the Secretary of War has not a discretion in all instances, but only in those where he has cause to suspect imposition or mistake, to withhold a person recommended by the court from being named on the pension list, it would be necessary for us to be well persuaded we possessed such an authority before we exercised a power which might be a means of drawing money out of the public treasury, as effectually as an express appropriation by law. We do not mean, however, to preclude ourselves from a very deliberate consideration whether we can be warranted in executing the purposes of the act in that manner, in case an application should be made.

No application has yet been made to the court, or to ourselves individually, and therefore we have had some doubts as to the propriety of giving an opinion in a case which has not yet come regularly and judicially before us. None can be more sensible than we are of the necessity of judges being, in general, extremely cautious in not intimating an opinion in any case extra-judicially, because we well know how liable the best minds are, notwithstanding their utmost care, to a bias which may arise from a preconceived opinion, even unguardedly, much more deliberately given. But in the present instance, as many unfortunate and meritorious individuals, whom Congress have justly thought proper objects of immediate relief, may suffer very great distress even by a short delay, and may be utterly ruined by a long one, we determined at all events to make our sentiments known as early as possible, considering this as a case which must be deemed an exception to the general rule upon every principle of humanity and justice; resolving, however, that so far as we are concerned individually, in case an application should be made, we will most attentively hear it; and if we can be convinced this opinion is a wrong one, we shall not hesitate to act accordingly, being as far from the weakness of supposing that there is any reproach in having committed an error, to which the greatest and best men are sometimes liable, as we should be from so low a sense of duty as to think it would not be the highest and most deserved reproach that could be bestowed on any men (much more on judges) that they were capable, from any motive, of persevering against conviction in apparently maintaining an opinion which they really thought to be erroneous.

We take the liberty to request, sir, that you will be pleased to lay this letter before the Legislature of the United States at their next session, and have the honor to be,

With the highest respect, sir, your most obedient and most faithful servants,

JAS. IREDELL,

JNO. SITGREAVES;

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

[NOTE.—See No. 46.]

BOUNDARY BETWEEN VIRGINIA AND THE TERRITORY SOUTH OF THE OHIO.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 9, 1792.

UNITED STATES, November 9, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I now lay before you a letter from the Secretary of State, covering the copy of one from the Governor of Virginia, with the several papers therein referred to, on the subject of the boundary between that State and the territory of the United States south of the Ohio. It will remain with the Legislature to take such measures as it shall think best for settling the said boundary with that State, and, at the same time, if it thinks proper, for extending the settlement to the State of Kentucky, between which and the same territory the boundary is as yet undetermined.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, November 2, 1792.

I have the honor to enclose you copies of a letter I have received from the Governor of Virginia, and of sundry papers which it covered, on the subject of that part of the boundary between that State and the territory of the United States south of the Ohio, which has never yet been authoritatively settled, and to observe that an extension of the same line will form the boundary between the same territory and the State of Kentucky. There being then three parties interested in the establishment of this line, it will rest with the wisdom of the Legislature to take such measures as they shall think best for establishing it by common consent or otherwise for instituting judiciary proceedings for its establishment, according to the provision made in the constitution. As the papers herewith transmitted will fully explain the case in question, I need not recapitulate their contents.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most perfect respect and attachment,
Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH: JEFFERSON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: RICHMOND, October 24, 1792.

For many sessions past has the General Assembly of this Commonwealth turned their attention towards the establishment of the boundary line between North Carolina and this State.

In the course of last year the Executive received from the Governor of North Carolina the enclosed proceedings of the Legislature of that State, and communicated the same to the General Assembly.

In consequence whereof an act was passed, entitled "An act concerning the southern boundary of this State," and duly promulgated, a copy of which I herewith forward.

This Commonwealth was governed, on this occasion, solely by a proper solicitude to prevent the possibility of subsequent difficulties which might arise from the want of an acknowledged boundary between the two States.

The acquisition in territory or people was too small an object to engage the attention of a community whose conduct, as a member of the American confederacy, has been signally marked by her gifts and her cessions.

We could never conceive, on the present occasion, opposition from any quarter to the complete execution of a law deemed essential to the peace and quiet of two States.

But the copy of Governor Blount's letter, herewith transmitted, shows that he considers himself bound, by his duty as an officer of the United States, to disregard the law establishing Walker's line as the southern boundary of this Commonwealth.

Thus, sir, not only is the object of the General Assembly defeated, but the citizens living between the real line and the pretended line are subjected to unmerited sufferings, of which they justly complain.

You will find among the papers a copy of a letter from Mr. Martin, whose information on this subject I believe to be worthy of full credit, and which goes to do away the ground of the opinion entertained by Governor Blount.

I would enter more particularly into the explanation of this business, but really I conceive it by no means necessary, as the transaction speaks for itself, and the accompanying papers declare the sense of Virginia and North Carolina on the subject, and manifest the opposition made to the law of this Commonwealth, as well as the reasons for such opposition.

Let me entreat you to lay the same before the President of the United States, and to favor me with the President's decision as soon as may be convenient.

I have the honor to be, sir, with sentiments of the highest respect, your obedient, humble servant,

HENRY LEE.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, Philadelphia.

SIR: Agreeably to your request I have made every inquiry respecting the lines called Walker's and Henderson's, which are the subject of dispute between this State and North Carolina, lest my own knowledge of that country might not be sufficient to lead to accurate information; but I can find no person that can render me any assistance. As far as my own knowledge serves, I can inform you that from the steep rock to Cumberland mountain, where Henderson stopped, is one hundred miles. Walker proceeded as far as the Mississippi. The width between the two lines, as far as Henderson proceeded, is between two and three miles. I think there are about one hundred families living between the lines, the greater part of whom are desirous of continuing in Virginia. About one-fourth are content to remain in statu quo, as thereby they are exempt from paying tax.

The lower station, in Powell's Valley, is between the two lines; they consider themselves under the protection of Virginia. The Virginia law is adhered to there; and all titles to lands are from the Government of Virginia.

You will find that when the cession was made from North Carolina to Congress, reference was had to General Smith, without mentioning who General Smith was. At the time the line was run, he was esteemed the best mathematician, and therefore appointed to assist in the extension of the line. At the passage of the bill in North Carolina for the cession he was a member of Assembly, and called on for information. I was also a member at that time. The decision respecting the lines, as I understood the matter, being one of the committee, took place at the passage, or rising of the Assembly.

The cession to Congress was on certain stipulations, which could not take place before the pleasure of Congress was known, which was some months after.

I have business in Powell's Valley, which will call me there in February next. If necessary, after that time I can give you a full account of the families, their names, militia, &c.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

JOSEPH MARTIN.

DEAR SIR:

AUGUST 8, 1792.

I have received a few lines from you, wherein you request a copy of Governor _____'s orders to me, respecting the jurisdiction and claims we have to the lands and people between the lines.

Some time ago I wrote to you, in full, my sentiments on the subject, agreeable to the cession act; at which time I had no special order respecting the people between the lines, and I wrote to the Governor to know how I should act. He sent me orders in these words: "That I was to pay no respect to the claims or to the jurisdiction that Virginia had to the land between the lines, but to punish offenders against our laws, so residing, as elsewhere."

From your friend,

GILBERT CHRISTIAN.

To Colonel ARTHUR CAMPBELL.

August 4, 1792.

Received of Charles Wolf four shillings cost for serving one warrant on said Wolf for a fine laid on him for not attending at a general muster at the court-house of Sullivan county, in the Southwestern territory, south of the river Ohio, and said Wolf lives between the lines. I say received by me.

EDWARD DEVISE,
Constable for said county of Sullivan.

SULLIVAN COUNTY,

Whereas it has appeared to the court-martial the 16th June, 1792, that Can Baily, Charles Wolf, James Anderson, and James Campbell, of Captain Boshers's company, failed to appear at the last general muster held for this county, the said court-martial ordered they be fined. You are hereby to consider this my warrant to you to cause the above-mentioned persons to appear before me, or some justice of this county, to show cause why they failed, and why they do not pay the fine of twenty shillings each.

The deposition of Charles Wolf, living on Reedy creek, between the boundary line, commonly called Walker's line, and the line known by the name of Henderson's line, saith:

That, some time after the 15th day of June last past, there was a warrant, signed Gilbert Christian, a justice of the peace for Sullivan county, and territory south of the river Ohio, served on him, the said deponent, for his not attending a general muster held for the said county of Sullivan on the aforementioned 15th day of June; and that, some short time after, an execution issued against him, the said deponent, for four shillings, which the deponent paid, being the costs of the suit, (for the fine could not be lawfully levied of the deponent as he had not got legal notification,) and took a receipt for the same from Edward Devise, constable for the said county of Sullivan, which receipt is dated the 4th day of August, 1792, and signed "Edward Devise, constable for said county of Sullivan."

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, }
Washington county, ss. } Jame Campbell's deposition.

The deposition of James Campbell, living between what is called Walker's boundary line and what is called Henderson's boundary line, and on Reedy Creek, saith:

That, some time after the 15th day of June last past, there was a warrant from Colonel Gilbert Christian, a justice of the peace for Sullivan county, and territory of the United States, south of the river Ohio, served on him, the said deponent, for his not attending a general muster held for the said county of Sullivan on the aforementioned 15th day of June; and that, some short time after, there was an execution issued against him, the deponent, for twenty shillings and costs, which execution was levied on the said deponent's goods; and that he, the said deponent, paid twenty-four shillings, and took a particular receipt for the same, signed Edward Devise, constable, which receipt he delivered to Colonel Arthur Campbell, of Washington county, and is dated the 18th day of July last past.

JAMES CAMPBELL.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, a justice appointed to keep the peace in the county of Washington aforesaid, this 6th day of September, 1792.

ROBERT PRESTON.

Extract of a letter from Governor Blount to the Governor of Virginia, dated

SEPTEMBER 2, 1792.

I have also to acknowledge the receipt of your letter on the subject of the boundary line between the Commonwealth of Virginia and this territory, enclosing an act concerning the same, and your proclamation for the promulgation thereof.

Whether Henderson's line is right in preference to Walker's, or the contrary, or whether either is right, I conceive is yet to be determined; but North Carolina having exercised jurisdiction to Henderson's line from the time it was run, without any objection on the part of the State of Virginia, to the time the State of North Carolina passed the act of cession, and after, to the dissolution of the Government of North Carolina, as to the part ceded, and the organization of the territorial Government thereon, (a term of more than ten years,) I conceived it my duty as Governor also to extend the jurisdiction of the territorial Government to Henderson's line; and still believing it to be my duty, the law of Virginia and your proclamation notwithstanding, I shall continue to exercise jurisdiction to that line until I shall receive instructions to the contrary from the federal Government.

It is observable that the act of Virginia, declaring Walker's line to be the southern boundary, is founded upon a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, establishing that line as the boundary between Virginia and that State, and not upon the principle that that line is precisely where it ought to be; and no doubt that resolution and your act effectually fix that as the line between North Carolina and Virginia; but it is equally clear that, on no resolution or act of North Carolina, passed after Congress had accepted the cession of that State, which is unquestionably the case with the resolution on which your act is founded, can be so construed as to bind the United States to consider that line as the boundary between Virginia and this territory.

I have stated the circumstances respecting the boundary between Virginia and this territory in the clearest terms I am capable of to the Secretary of State. I have my hopes that some measures will shortly be taken to terminate the dispute, and I assure you that I heartily lament that any cause of controversy should have arisen which may disturb the harmony which I ardently wish ever to exist between the Commonwealth of Virginia and this territory, and that

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient, humble servant,

WM. BLOUNT.

Mr. PERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the letter from his excellency the Governor of Virginia on the subject of establishing the boundaries between this State and Virginia, reported:

That it is proposed, on the part of Virginia, that the line, commonly called Walker's line, be established as the boundary between us. Should this proposal be not acceptable to this State, they will then appoint commissioners to meet any persons who may be appointed on the part of North Carolina, empowered to confer on the propriety of establishing Walker's or Henderson's line, and to report to the Legislatures of their respective States their proceedings.

On examining the manner in which those lines were run by the commissioners in the year 1780, they find that the commissioners began and extended the line together about forty miles, when some difference took place, and the commissioners on the part of this State run a parallel line two miles north of the other line, for about half the distance, and extended the line no further. Mr. Walker, and the other commissioners from Virginia, extended the line to Tennessee river, and marked its termination on the Mississippi by observations, leaving the line from Tennessee to that place unsurveyed.

As the difference between the said lines would only be two miles, running most of the distance through a mountainous, barren country, and as they have great reason to believe, from the information of General Smith, that the line commonly called Walker's line is the true line, your committee are of opinion that the object is not worth the expense of sending commissioners to confer on the propriety of establishing Henderson's line in preference to that of any other, and do recommend that a law be passed confirming and establishing the line usually called Walker's line, as the boundary between this State and the State of Virginia, with a reservation in favor of the oldest grants for either State in deciding the rights of individual claimants in the tract between the two lines commonly called Walker's and Henderson's lines.

All which is submitted:

THOMAS PERSON, Chairman.

NORTH CAROLINA:

IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, December 11, 1790.

The committee, to whom the letter from the Governor of Virginia on the boundary line between this and the State of Virginia was referred, report:

That it is the opinion of your committee that the boundary line between the State of North Carolina and Virginia be confirmed, agreeably to a report of a committee concurred with by both Houses last session of Assembly; and that a law be passed confirming the line commonly called Walker's line as the boundary between the States of North Carolina and Virginia, reserving the rights of the oldest patents, grants, or entries made in either of the States.

All which is submitted.

AN ACT concerning the southern boundary of this State, passed December 7, 1791.

Whereas official information hath been received by the General Assembly that the Legislature of the State of North Carolina have resolved to establish the line commonly called Walker's line as the boundary between North Carolina and this Commonwealth, and it is judged expedient to confirm and establish the said line on the part of this State:

Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly, That the line commonly called and known by the name of Walker's line shall be, and the same is hereby declared to be, the boundary line of this State.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in all courts of law and equity within this Commonwealth, the claims for lands lying between the line commonly called Walker's line and the line commonly called Henderson's line, shall be decided in favor of the oldest title, whether derived from this Commonwealth or from the State of North Carolina.

ERRORS IN PRINTING CONGRESSIONAL DOCUMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 27, 1793.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 25, 1793.

I beg leave, through you, to observe to the House of Representatives, that the statements communicated by my first and second letters in answer to their resolutions of the 23d of January last, which were printed by order of the House, have been printed in an incorrect and very confused manner.

In page 4 of my last letter, a sum of $605,883 08 is expressed in $605,83 08.

The mercantile form of debtor and creditor sides, which was observed in the accounts transmitted, and which is material to perspicuity, has been dropped; and a statement in succession of the opposite sides of the account substituted. In addition to this, headings have been introduced which are not in the original, and these headings have been, in one important case, inverted.

In statement A, transmitted with my first letter, receipts have been put for expenditures, and expenditures for receipts. Other inaccuracies less material might be noticed.

The effect of relinquishing the mercantile form of an account current will be perceived at once upon an inspection of either of the statements, but it will be particularly striking in statement No. 2 of my second letter, (page 19,) showing half-yearly the application of the fund for reducing the public debt constituted by the act of the 8th of May last.

It was the practice till the present session, to send to the Treasury proof sheets of the reports from the Department, which were printed by direction of the House, in order to their being examined and corrected before they were finally struck off. This useful practice, however, has been discontinued during the present session.

The House will be at no loss to perceive that their own satisfaction on any point of inquiry, the due information of the public, and the reputation of the Department from which any report or statement proceeds, are alike concerned in the accuracy of the form under which it is presented.

With a particular eye to the last consideration, I take the liberty to express a wish to the House that some regulations may be adopted to enable the head of this Department to secure the fidelity and correctness of the printed copies of the reports which shall hereafter be made to the House, and shall be committed to the press by their order.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

ERRORS IN PRINTING CONGRESSIONAL DOCUMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 2, 1793.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating certain inaccuracies in printing certain statements made by him on the subject of foreign loans, and expressing a wish that some regulation may be adopted to enable the head of the Treasury Department to secure the fidelity and correctness of the printed copies of the reports which shall hereafter be made to the House, and shall be committed to the press by their order, made the following report:

That they have examined into the circumstances stated in the letter, and find—

That the standing order of the clerk of this House to the printer is, to send the proof sheets of all reports and statements to the Department from whence they were made, and that this practice has been generally followed.

That it has been discontinued during the present session (so far as respects the Secretary of the Treasury) from an opinion of the printer, that the delay, which the examination would occasion, might interfere with the intention of the House of having the business speedily accomplished.

It did not appear to the committee that any unnecessary delay had taken place at the office of the Comptroller, by reason of the examination of the proof sheets, nor in the printer in the transaction of his business.

The committee are of opinion, that it is not necessary for them to recommend any new regulation for the future execution of this business; but, in order to rectify the errors which have taken place in the printed reports and statements, the committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, three hundred copies of the reports and statements made by him during the present session; and that the same be delivered to the clerk of this House.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF JOHN E. VAN ALLEN, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM NEW YORK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 9, 1793.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the standing Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Henry K. Van Rensselaer, of the State of New York, complaining of an undue election and return of John E. Van Allen to serve as a member of this House for the said State, made the following report:

That it appears from the said petition, that the election of the said John E. Van Allen is impeached by the petitioner on the following grounds, viz:

1st. That in Stepentown, which is comprehended within the election district from which the said John E. Van Allen is returned, there were more votes actually given for the petitioner than appear, from the return of the committee who were appointed by law to canvass and estimate the votes, to have been canvassed and counted.

2dly. That in the town of Hoosack, also included in the said district, the ballot-box was not locked agreeably to law, but was only tied with tape.

3dly. That, at the time of the election, the said John E. Van Allen, who was not an inspector of the election, had in his possession the ballot box of the town of Rensselaerwick, which is also comprehended in the said district.

That the facts above set forth being contested by the said John E. Van Allen, the sitting member, your committee request the direction of the House with respect to the mode of investigating the same.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 16, 1793.

SIR: TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 16, 1793.

It is known that in the last session certain questions were raised respecting my conduct in office, which, though decided in a manner the most satisfactory to me, were, nevertheless, unavoidably, from the lateness of the period when they were set on foot, so accelerated in their issue as to have given occasion to a suggestion that there was not time for due examination. Unwilling to leave the matter upon such a footing, I have concluded to request of the House of Representatives, as I now do, that a new inquiry may be without delay instituted, in some mode most effectual for an accurate and thorough investigation. And I will add, that the more comprehensive it is, the more agreeable it will be to me.

I cannot but take the liberty of observing to the House, that a like plan to that which was pursued in the last session can never answer the purpose of a full and complete inquiry; while it would lay on me a burden with which neither the proper discharge of the current duties of my office, nor the present state of my health, is compatible. The unfavorable effect upon the business of the Department of the very considerable portion of my time which was engrossed by the inquiry of last session, has not yet entirely ceased.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

RELIEF TO GENERAL LA FAYETTE WHILE A PRISONER AT THE CASTLE OF OLMUTZ.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 31, 1793.

UNITED STATES, December 30, 1793.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, for your consideration, a letter from the Secretary of State relative to certain advances of money which have been made on public accounts. Should you think proper to sanction what has been done, or be of opinion that any thing more shall be done in the same way, you will judge whether there are not circumstances which would render secrecy expedient.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, December 30, 1793.

Certain proceedings of the ministers of the United States abroad, on behalf of M. de la Fayette, rendering it necessary that I should do myself the honor of addressing you on that subject, in order that the proper sanction may be obtained for what is done, I shall be justified by the interest which yourself and our fellow-citizens generally feel in the fortunes and sufferings of that gentleman, in suggesting something more for his future aid.

Soon after his captivity and imprisonment, and before the ministers had received our instructions to endeavor to obtain his liberation, they were apprized that his personal restraint, and the peculiar situation of his fortune, disabled him from drawing resources from that, and would leave him liable to suffer for subsistence and the common necessities of life. After a consultation by letter, therefore, between our ministers at Paris, London, and the Hague, they concurred in opinion that they ought not, in such a case, to wait for instructions from hence, but that his necessities should be provided for until they could receive such instructions. Different sums have been therefore either placed at his disposal or answered on his draughts, amounting, as far as we hitherto know, to about twelve or thirteen hundred guineas. This has been taken from a fund not applicable by law to this purpose, nor able to spare it; and the question is, whether and how it is to be made good? To do this, nothing more is requisite than that the United States should not avail themselves of the liberalities of M. de la Fayette, yielded at a moment when neither he nor we could foresee the time when they would become his only resource for subsistence. It appears by a statement from the War Office, hereto annexed, that his pay and commutation as a major general in the service of the United States, to the 3d of November, 1783, amounted to $24,100 13, exclusive of ten years' interest elapsed since that time, to the payment of which the following obstacle has occurred at the foot of the original engagement by Mr. Deane, a copy of which is hereto annexed, that a certain roll of officers there named, and of which M. de la Fayette was one, should be taken into the American service in the grades there specified; M. de la Fayette alone has subjoined for himself a declaration that he would serve without any particular allowance or pension. It may be doubted whether the words in the original French do strictly include the general allowance of pay and commutation; and, if they do, there is no evidence of any act of acceptance by Congress. Yet, under all the circumstances of the case, it is thought that the Legislature alone is competent to decide it. If they decline availing the United States of the declaration of M. de la Fayette, it leaves a fund which not only covers the advances which have been made, but will enable you to take measures for his future relief. It does it, too, in a way which can give offence to nobody, since none have a right to complain of the payment of a debt, that being a moral duty from which we cannot be discharged by any relation in which the creditor may be placed as to them. I therefore take the liberty of proposing that this matter may be submitted to the consideration of the Legislature, who will determine, in their wisdom, whether the supplies already furnished, or any others in future, shall be sanctioned by them, and made good in the way here suggested, or in any other which they shall deem more proper.

I have the honor to be, with the most perfect respect and attachment, sir,

Your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH: JEFFERSON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

List of officers of infantry and light troops destined to serve in the armies of the States General of North America, viz:

Monsieur le Marquis de la Fayette, major general, from the	-	-	7th of December, 1776.

Monsieur de Vrigny, captain,	-	-	1st of December, 1776.
Monsieur Bedaulx, captain,	-	-	1st of December, 1776.
Monsieur de la Calombe, lieutenant,	-	-	1st of December, 1776.
Monsieur Candon, lieutenant,	-	-	7th of November, 1776.

The mentioned ranks, and the pay which the most honorable Congress shall affix to them, to commence at the periods marked in the present list, have been agreed to by us the undersigned. Silas Deane, in quality of deputy of the American States General, on the one part, the Marquis de la Fayette and the Baron de Kalb on the other part.

Signed double, at Paris, this 7th day of December, 1776.

DE KALB,
LE MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE,
SILAS DEANE.

Le désir que Monsieur le Marquis de la Fayette marque de servir dans les troupes des Etats Unis de l'Amérique Septentrionale, et l'intérêt qu'il prend à la justice de leur cause, lui faisant souhaiter des occasions de se distinguer à la guerre, et de s'y rendre utile autant qu'il sera en lui, mais ne pouvant se flatter d'obtenir l'agrément de sa famille pour servir en pays étranger, et passer les mers, qu'autant qu'il y iroit comme officier général, j'ai cru ne pouvoir mieux servir mon pays et mes commettants qu'en lui accordant, au nom du très honorable Congrès, le grade de major général, que je supplie les Etats de lui confirmer, ratifier, et en faire expedier la commission, pour tenir et prendre rang, à compter de ce jour, avec les officiers généraux du même grade. Sa haute naissance, ses alliances, les grandes dignités que sa famille possède à cette cour, ses biens considérables en ce royaume, son mérite personnel, sa réputation, son désintéressement, et surtout son zèle pour la liberté de nos provinces, m'ont seul pu engager à lui faire la promesse du grade de major général, au nom des Etats Unis. En foi de quoi j'ai signé le présent. Fait à Paris, ce sept Decembre, mil sept cent soixante-seize.

SILAS DEANE,

Aux conditions ci-dessus, je m'offre et promets de partir quand et comme Monsieur Deane le jugera à propos pour servir les Etats avec tout le zèle possible, sans aucune pension ni traitement particulier; me réservant seulement la liberté de revenir en Europe, lorsque ma famille ou mon Roi me rappelleront.

Fait à Paris, ce 7 Decembre, 1776.

LE MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE.

[TRANSLATION.]

The desire which M. the Marquis de la Fayette shows of serving among the troops of the United States of North America, and the interest which he takes in the justice of their cause, making him wish to distinguish himself in this war, and to render himself as useful as he possibly can; but not thinking that he can obtain leave of his family to pass the seas, and serve in a foreign country till he can go as a general officer, I have thought I could not better serve my country, and those who have intrusted me, than by granting to him, in the name of the very honorable Congress, the rank of major general, which I beg the States to confirm to him, to ratify and deliver to him the commission to hold and take rank, to count from this day, with the general officers of the same degree. His high birth, his alliances, the great dignities which his family hold at this court, his considerable estates in this realm, his personal merit, his reputation, his disinterestedness, and, above all, his zeal for the liberty of our provinces, have only been able to engage me to promise him the rank of major general in the name of the United States.

In witness of which, I have signed the present, 7th of December, 1776.

SILAS DEANE,

Agent for the United States of North America.

On the conditions here explained, I offer myself and promise to depart when and how Mr. Deane shall judge proper, to serve the United States with all possible zeal, without any pension or particular allowance, reserving to myself the liberty of returning to Europe when my family or my King shall recall me.

Done at Paris, this 7th of December, 1776.

LE MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE, February 18, 1794.

Upon an examination of the Treasury books of the United States, it does not appear that the Marquis de la Fayette received any moneys from the United States on his own personal account, either for pay, compensation, or otherwise; he is charged with four hundred dollars, continental money, paid upon his order the 3d February, 1778, to Lieutenant Colonel Duplessis, and which appears to have been for an army service; the Marquis is debited in a suspense account for six thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight dollars and eighty cents in specie on the 28th May, 1782, for moneys advanced to the marquis by sundry gentlemen in Baltimore, on his bond given them. This bond the United States have discharged; and the marquis was considered accountable no further than the rendering an account of the distribution of the same to the staff officers of the army with him on his expedition to Virginia in 1781.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF ALBERT GALLATIN, A SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 31, 1793.

Mr. RUTHERFORD, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, stating that the Hon. Albert Gallatin, at the time he was elected a Senator of the United States, had not been nine years a citizen of the said United States, as required by the constitution, reported:

That the committee have conferred with Mr. Michael Schmyser, agent for the petitioners, and with Mr. Gallatin; that Mr. Schmyser has declared that the petitioners are ready to adduce proofs in support of the petition, at such time as the Senate may think proper to appoint; that Mr. Gallatin states no objection to the trial's commencing at an early day.

The committee, therefore, recommend that the Senate agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That ——— next be assigned for hearing the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting Mr. Gallatin's right to a seat in the Senate; and that Messrs. Gallatin and Schmyser be furnished with a copy of this resolution.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF ALBERT GALLATIN, A SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 10, 1794.

Mr. BRADLEY made the following report:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others against the election of the Hon. Albert Gallatin as a Senator of the United States for the State of Pennsylvania, report:

That they have had the same under consideration, and, having given due notice, as well the petitioners, by their agent, Michael Schmyser, as the said Mr. Gallatin, appeared before them, and on the part of the petitioners the following evidence was produced, viz:

Robert Morris, Esq., being duly sworn, deposes, that, during the late war, two of his sons went to Geneva for their education, and at that place they became acquainted with some of the friends of Mr. Albert Gallatin, who had gone for America, and they, being solicitous to hear of his safety, desired Mr. Morris's sons to write to their father, to make inquiry, and give the information he should obtain; that frequently afterwards he received letters from Mr. Gallatin from Europe, which he always supposed to come from the friends of Mr. Gallatin in Geneva. He supplied Mr. Gallatin with money for a bill upon London, and there supposed the funds to pay the same were remitted from Geneva. Mr. Morris paid Mr. Gallatin about one thousand guineas, by order of Messrs. ——— & Co., bankers in Paris, believing always that they were reimbursed from Geneva. Mr. Morris does not recollect dates, not having for a long while seen any of the letters that passed on the subject. He does not know the place of Mr. Gallatin's nativity, but, from the general course of the circumstances which came under his observation, he always did suppose he was born in Geneva.

Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794.

Nathaniel Cabot Higginson, Esq., being duly sworn, deposes, that he does not know directly any thing of Mr. Gallatin's being a foreigner or native; that he recollects knowing him by reputation and sight, at Boston, in one of the years 1781, '82, or '83, and that he was generally reputed to be a foreigner. This deponent believes that Mr. Gallatin then taught the French language, and did not speak the English with facility; and further recollects that Mr. Gallatin was resident there or thereabouts a considerable time. This deponent further says that he never had any conversation with Mr. Gallatin, but founds his belief with respect to Mr. Gallatin's not speaking the English with facility on the information received from others.

Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794.

Mr. John Breakbill, being duly sworn, testifies, that, last winter, being a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, previous to the election of Senator for the State of Pennsylvania, I heard Mr. Gallatin say his want of citizenship would not admit his being a Senator. What were his reasons for making the declaration I cannot say. I took it he did not wish to be elected. This declaration by Mr. Gallatin was made at a meeting of a number of members of the Pennsylvania Legislature, held for the purpose of agreeing who should be set up as a candidate. The deponent further says he does not recollect Mr. Gallatin's assigning any other reason for his backwardness to serve as Senator than the want of citizenship.

Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794.

Henry Kammerer, Esq., being duly sworn, testifies, that, last winter, being a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and previous to the election of Senator for the said State, at a meeting of a number of the members of the State Legislature to agree upon a candidate to fill said office, I heard Mr. Gallatin say, when his name was proposed, "As for my name, it is out of the question; I have not been a citizen long enough to entitle me to serve in that station." That, at a second meeting for the same purpose, Mr. Gallatin was again proposed as a proper person for a candidate, and then the deponent understood, (not from Mr. Gallatin, but from some of the members of Assembly then present,) that the doubt about his citizenship was then put to rights, and then it was almost unanimously agreed to put up Mr. Gallatin's name; that, on the morning succeeding Mr. Gallatin's election, the deponent heard it observed that, notwithstanding Mr. Gallatin's election, he could not take his seat, in consequence of his declaration that he had not been long enough a citizen; that he, the same day, mentioned this to Mr. Gallatin, who said that he had made this declaration under a mistaken idea that it was necessary for him to have been nine years a citizen of Pennsylvania; but, upon examining the constitution, he had found that to have been nine years a citizen of the United States was sufficient, and that he had been above nine years a citizen of the United States, or words to that effect.

Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794.

Pelatah Webster, being duly qualified, testifies, that, eleven years ago last summer, I let my house in Philadelphia to Mary Lynn, who proposed to take lodgers. I reserved apartments for myself, and boarded with her. Soon after, Mr. Savery and Mr. Gallatin took lodgings of her, and continued a number of months there. Mr. Savery spoke no English. Mr. Gallatin spoke good English, and served as interpreter for him. They appeared to be well-bred gentlemen, and their conduct was agreeable and conciliating, and they soon gained the esteem and respect of the family. I do not know that they ever declared their country, but we all supposed they were French, and, of course, the people, customs, and country of France often made the topic of fireside chat. In one of these transient conversations, Mr. Gallatin took occasion to say that his knowledge of French affairs was not very perfect, for he was not a native of France, nor had ever resided long in that country, but was from Geneva. No one interesting circumstance made any further inquiry necessary; nor do I recollect that he made any more explication of the subject.

N. B. Mr. Gallatin once said that his original name was not Gallatin, but I think he said it was Sydney; but this conversation was in drollery, and not in earnest, as I conceived at the time of speaking, from the manner and air of his speaking thereon.

Sworn to and subscribed, January 28, 1794.

Mr. John Smiley, member of the House of Representatives of the United States, being sworn, saith, that, at a meeting of sundry members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, previous to Mr. Gallatin's election as a Senator of the United States, that gentleman was mentioned as a proper person to fill the said office; at which time Mr. Gallatin started some doubt respecting his being qualified, but in what words the deponent does not recollect; that the deponent did not understand upon what the doubt was founded, though he thinks, from something said by Mr. Gallatin, that it related to Mr. Gallatin's citizenship; for, as the deponent conceived the conversation proceeded from that kind of modesty which gentlemen usually feel upon having their names proposed upon such occasions, he did not pay much attention to it; and that his reason for forming this opinion was his having frequently observed gentlemen to make excuses in similar situations, and from his knowledge of Mr. Gallatin's modesty of disposition. Upon being asked whether he ever heard Mr. Gallatin say that he had not been a citizen of the United States nine years previous to his election, the deponent replies he never did. Upon being asked by Mr. Lewis, counsel for the petitioners, what he had ever heard Mr. Gallatin say touching his citizenship, the deponent replies, that a considerable time subsequent to Mr. Gallatin's election, Mr. Gallatin, in conversation with the deponent, expressed an opinion that he was qualified with respect to citizenship. What else did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say with respect to his citizenship? The deponent answers that he recollects having heard him say something with respect to the laws of Massachusetts not requiring an oath of allegiance at the time of his giving his opinion as aforesaid. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say he was born in Europe? The deponent replies that he does not recollect Mr. Gallatin's saying that he was born in Europe, but that he has heard Mr. Gallatin speak of himself as a Genevan, mention his family in Geneva, and, in conversations with him, has always understood him to be of Geneva. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin mention the time of his coming into America? He replies, that he thinks Mr. Gallatin, about a year past, mentioned that he had been then thirteen years in this country, and that he was nineteen years old when he came. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say when or where he took the oath of allegiance? He replies, he heard Mr. Gallatin say that he took the oath of allegiance in Virginia, but as to the time the deponent cannot be precise; but he thinks, if he can recollect, that Mr. Gallatin did mention to him, though he cannot be certain, that it was not nine years before he was elected. That the deponent thinks Mr. Gallatin's doubts respecting his citizenship were founded on this ground, (the witness referring, in this part of his testimony, to the meeting before mentioned when these doubts were expressed;) but he cannot specify the time of Mr. Gallatin's having mentioned to him the circumstance of his having taken the oath of allegiance.

Sworn to and subscribed, January 28, 1794.

Mr. Thomas Stokely, being sworn, deposes and saith, that, some few days before a Senator was chosen for the State of Pennsylvania, a meeting was had to fix on a proper person to represent the State in that office; sundry persons were stated as candidates, among whom was Mr. Gallatin, who, upon his being named, observed that there were many other persons more proper to fill that office; and also observed that there might be doubts as to his citizenship, though the deponent, from the length of time, and not expecting to have been called upon, retains too slight an impression of what then passed to be able to recollect the words with precision; that, at a subsequent meeting for the same purpose, Mr. Gallatin was finally agreed to be nominated, and the deponent heard no objection started thereto, either by Mr. Gallatin (who was present) or any other person.

Sworn to and subscribed, February 1, 1794.

The before-recited evidence being introduced and closed on the part of the petitioners, Mr. Gallatin was asked whether he had any testimony to produce on his part; to which he gave the following answer, in writing, to wit:

The committee to whom the petition of Conrad Laub, &c. was referred having informed me that the petitioners had closed their evidence, and asked me whether I had any testimony to produce on my side, I answer, that it appears to me that there is not sufficient matter charged in the petition, and proved by the testimony, to vacate my seat; that, by the resolution appointing the committee, the petition is referred to them "to state the facts," without prejudice as to any questions "which may, upon the hearing, be raised by the sitting member as to the sufficiency of the parties, and the matter charged in the petition;" that, upon the hearing, and in the present stage of the same, the question as to the sufficiency of matter, as above stated, is raised by me; that I conceive, from the evident construction of the resolution, I have a right to have that question decided by the Senate; that, until the same shall have been decided, I do not wish to be at the trouble and expense of collecting evidence at a great distance; and, therefore, that, at present, I do not mean to produce any testimony; reserving, however, to myself the right, which I conceive I have, to produce any testimony in my favor, after the said question shall have been decided by the Senate, in case it is decided against me.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Which being duly read and considered, the committee came to the following resolution, to wit:

Whereas, the evidence on the part of the petitioners having been closed, and it appearing that Mr. Gallatin was an alien in the year 1780, and his answer, in writing, assigning reasons why he should not adduce evidence on his part in the present stage of the inquiry, not being, in the opinion of the committee, sufficient:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the committee, it is now incumbent on Mr. Gallatin to show that he has become a citizen of the United States, and when.

Which resolution being read to Mr. Gallatin, he informed the committee he should rely on the answer he had before given.

All which is respectfully submitted to the honorable Senate by the committee.

The following statement of facts agreed to by Mr. Gallatin and the counsel for the petitioners, was communicated to the Senate on the 20th February, 1794 by Mr. Gallatin,

ALBERT GALLATIN was born at Geneva, on the 29th day of January, 1761. He left that place for the United States in April or May, 1780; arrived in Boston (Massachusetts,) on the 14th or 15th July of the same year, and has ever since resided within the United States. In October, 1780, he removed from Boston to Machias, in the province of Maine, in which place and its neighborhood he resided one year, and commenced a settlement on a tract of vacant land. During that time he furnished, out of his own funds, supplies (amounting in value to more than sixty pounds Massachusetts currency,) to Colonel John Allan, (who was the commanding officer stationed there, and also Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the eastern department,) for the use of the American troops; and on several occasions acted as a volunteer under the same officer's command. For the said supplies he received, one year after, a warrant on the Treasury of the State of Massachusetts, which he sold at a considerable depreciation. In October, 1781, he returned to Boston; and in the spring of 1782 was, by a vote of the corporation of the university of Cambridge, (otherwise called Harvard College,) chosen instructor of the French language of the said university. By the same vote he was allowed a room in the college, the privilege of the commons at the tutors' table, the use of the library, and also the right of having his pay (which depended on the voluntary subscription and attendance of the students) collected by the steward of the institution, together with the other charges against the students for board and education. Those terms he accepted, and remained in that station for the term of one year. In July, 1783, he removed to Pennsylvania, and in November of the same year proceeded to Virginia, in which State he had purchased more than one thousand acres of land, (and amounting to more than one hundred pounds Virginia currency in value,) some time between July and November 1783. Between this last-mentioned period and the month of October, 1785, he purchased other lands in the said State to a very large amount, and in the said last-mentioned month he took an oath of allegiance to the said State. In December, 1785, he purchased the plantation in Fayette county, Pennsylvania, on which he has lived ever since. In October, 1789, he was elected member of the convention to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania, and in October, 1790, 1791, and 1792, he was elected member of the Legislature of the same State. On the 28th February 1793, he was chosen Senator, to represent the said State in the Senate of the United States, and took his seat in December following.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF JOHN PATTEN, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM DELAWARE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 10, 1794.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the standing Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Latimer, of the State of Delaware, complaining of an undue election and return of John Patten, to serve as a member of this House for the said State, made the following report:

That the said Henry Latimer complains of the illegality of the said election, on the following grounds, to wit: That the Legislature of the State of Delaware, in pursuance of the constitution of the United States, passed an act on the 26th October, 1790, directing the election of a representative for the said State in the Congress of the United States, by which it is enacted, that every person coming to vote for a representative, agreeable to the directions of the said act, shall deliver, in writing, on one ticket or piece of paper, the names of two persons, inhabitants of the State, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same county with himself, to be voted for as representative.

That at the said election, in Newcastle county, a number of votes or tickets containing the names of the said Henry Latimer and Solomon Maxwell, both inhabitants of the same county, were, by the judges of the said election, deemed illegal and rejected.

That at the said election in Kent county, from votes or tickets, containing names of the said Henry Latimer and George Truit, both inhabitants of Newcastle county, were, by the judges of the election, rejected as illegal.

That at the said election in Sussex county, a number of votes or tickets, not less than fifty, containing the name of John Patten only, as the representative of the said State, were received by the judges of the election, polled, counted, and included in the return of the said election.

That in consequence of the rejection of the said votes in Kent county, and the reception of the votes before mentioned, in Sussex county, the said John Patten was returned as exceeding the said Henry Latimer thirty in number of votes.

The committee find that the law of the State of Delaware for regulating the election of a member to this House, contains the regulation stated in the petition; and that the said John Patten was returned to the President of the State of Delaware as having 2,273 votes, and the said Henry Latimer as having 2,243 votes.

On examining the evidence taken in this case, the committee find the following facts in relation to the election in Newcastle county, to wit:

That a considerable number of votes or tickets containing the names of Henry Latimer and Solomon Maxwell were rejected as illegal, as being both inhabitants of Newcastle county. The precise number of the said votes is not ascertained. One witness, Robert Hamilton, who acted as an inspector or judge of the election, declaring that he kept a list of such rejected votes till he was fatigued; that, when he discontinued, they amounted to upwards of seventy. Another witness, James Eves, who likewise acted as an inspector at the said election, declaring that he first began to keep such list of rejected votes, and counted upwards of thirty, when he changed seats with Hamilton, who continued to keep the said list, as above mentioned; and that he was informed by Hamilton, some hours before the reading of the votes was concluded, that the number of the said rejected votes then amounted to upwards of fifty.

It appears, by a reference to official documents, that the amount of votes polled and counted at the election in the said county, for Governor of the State, was 1,202, and the number polled and counted for a member of this House was only 1,138, constituting a difference of sixty-four votes.

The committee find the following facts in relation to Kent county: That from votes or tickets having the names of Henry Latimer and George Truit, both inhabitants of Newcastle county, were on that account rejected as illegal; and that twenty-two votes or tickets containing the names of John Patten and some other inhabitants of Kent county, were likewise rejected as illegal.

The following facts appear in relation to Sussex county:

That at the commencement of the election in the said county, a question arose respecting the legality of votes or tickets containing only one name; and that, after some contest, it was resolved by the managers of the election to receive all such votes, and to leave the determination of the legality to the House of Representatives of the United States. It further appears by the evidence, that on a late examination of the votes or tickets which had been polled and counted at the said election, there were sixty-eight single votes received and counted for John Patten, and nine single votes for Henry Latimer.

From the above state of facts, the following conclusion appears to the committee to result:

That John Patten was returned, as duly elected, by a majority of thirty votes.

That agreeably to the election law of Delaware, the four votes in Kent county, containing the names of Henry Latimer and George Truit, which were rejected, ought to have been received and counted for the said Henry Latimer; and the sixty-eight single votes in Sussex county, which were received and counted for the said John Patten, ought to have been rejected; that if the aforesaid four votes in Kent county had been received, and the aforesaid sixty-eight votes in Sussex county had been rejected, as was required by law, the said Henry Latimer would have had, after deducting the nine single votes received and counted for him in Sussex county, a majority of thirty-three votes.

The committee are therefore of the opinion, that John Patten is not entitled to a seat in this House. They are also of opinion that Henry Latimer is entitled to a seat in this House, as the representative of the State of Delaware.

SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 11, 1794.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the committee to whom were referred the memorials of the people called Quakers, at their yearly meeting, held in Rhode Island, in the year 1793; of the delegates of the several Societies for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, in convention assembled at Philadelphia on the 1st day of January last; and of the Providence Society for abolishing the Slave Trade, made the following report:

That the petitioners, who have met your committee on this occasion, have, for themselves, in very explicit terms, disclaimed any request or desire of legislative interference for the purpose of a general emancipation of the slaves already in the United States; and they have declared to your committee that they believe this to be the general sense of their societies. They further profess that the only object of their petitions is to obtain an act of Congress prohibiting the trade carried on by citizens of the United States, for the purpose of supplying slaves to foreign nations, and to prevent foreigners from fitting out vessels for the slave trade in the ports of the United States.

The petitioners suggest to the committee that practices of the kind which they now seek to prevent, have, in many instances, been attempted and carried on from some of the States, and they have good reason to apprehend are still contemplated in future. Your committee having duly attended to their several petitions and suggestions, do submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to prohibit the fitting out any ship or vessel in any port of the United States, either by citizens of the United States or foreigners, for the purpose of procuring from any kingdom or country the inhabitants of such kingdom or country, to be transported to any foreign parts or places of the world, to be sold or disposed of as slaves.

INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS BY FIRE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 12, 1794.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Frederick Ast, made the following report:

That the petitioner has presented to the committee a general plan of insurance against accidents by fire, upon the following principles:

That offices of insurance against accidents by fire be opened in every State in the Union, under the authority of the Government of the United States, in which all persons may insure all their houses, with the furniture and wearing apparel contained therein, their barns with the straw, grain, and hay contained therein.

That all persons insuring pay a premium to the Government proportioned to the value of the property insured; and that Government guaranty a reimbursement of all losses of the insured which may accidentally be occasioned by fire.

The suggested advantages from this plan are:

That it will afford an opportunity to all persons insuring their most valuable and necessary property, at a rate of insurance lower than is offered in any existing insurance company; and that this rate will decrease in proportion to the increase of the quantum and value of property insured.

That all losses accidentally occasioned by fire will thus be transferred through the whole of the insured, instead of concentrating in the individual who may happen to be the owner of the destroyed property.

That the premiums proposed to be demanded of the insured will not only indemnify the Government for the reimbursement of losses which may be sustained by any individual, but might produce a considerable revenue.

That this revenue might at all times be applied to governmental purposes, and the inconvenience of drawing out of employment that portion of capital which would be necessary for reimbursing accidental losses, upon any other principle than the guarantee of Government, would be avoided.

That all the specie sent abroad for insurances, in the present state of that business, would, by the proposed plan, remain in the United States.

That an additional tie or attachment would thereby be created from every individual whose property may be insured, to the Government.

For particular information respecting the details of the plan, and the expenses of effectuating the same, the committee refer to several papers presented to them by the petitioner, and which accompany this report.

The committee are of opinion that it would not be advisable for Congress at this time to adopt the proposed plan of insurance.

DEFECTS IN THE JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 19, 1794.

UNITED STATES, February 19, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the copy of a letter which I have received from the chief justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, at their desire, the representation mentioned in the said letter, pointing out certain defects in the judiciary system.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, February 18, 1794.

Impressed with an opinion that the most proper method of conveying the enclosed representation to Congress is through the President of the United States, we take the liberty of transmitting it to you, and to request that you will be pleased to lay it before them.

We have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servants,

JOHN JAY,
WM. CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
WM. PATERSON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The chief justice and the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States respectfully represent to the Congress of the United States—

That their representation, communicated last year through the President to both Houses of Congress, and to which they refer, comprehended few other remarks than such as were suggested by the personal difficulties to which the judges were subjected.

They acknowledge, with sensibility and gratitude, that the act which thereupon passed, and whereby the attendance of one judge only was made indispensable to the holding of a circuit court, afforded them great relief, and enabled them to pass more time at home and in studies made necessary by their official duties.

They think it incumbent on them to submit to the consideration of Congress, whether the sessions of the several courts, comprehended in any of the three circuits, ought to depend entirely on the health of the judge to whom either of them may be assigned; for in case, by accident or illness, his attendance should be prevented, the inconveniences and useless expenses to all the parties would certainly be great as well as obvious.

It has already happened, in more than one instance, that different judges, sitting at different times in the same court, but in similar causes, have decided in direct opposition to each other, and that in cases in which the parties could not, as the law now stands, have the benefit of writs of error. They therefore also submit to the consideration of Congress, whether this evil, naturally tending to render the law unsettled and uncertain, and thereby to create apprehension and diffidence in the public mind, does not require the interposition of Congress.

They fear it would not become them to take a minute view of the whole system, and to suggest the alterations which to them appear requisite; and their hesitation is increased by the reflection that some of those alterations would, from the nature of them, be capable of being ascribed to personal considerations.

DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT ON THE VALIDITY OF CERTAIN CLAIMS FOR INVALID PENSIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 21, 1794.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 21, 1794.

The SECRETARY OF WAR respectfully reports to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States,

That, by the act passed the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," it was made the duty of the Secretary of War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, "to take such measures as might be necessary, to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States on the validity of the rights claimed by invalids under the act entitled An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions by the determination of certain persons styling themselves commissioners."

That, in obedience to the said act, an unsuccessful attempt was made in August last, to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court upon the claims of the said invalids, as will appear by the report of the Attorney General, herewith submitted, No. 1.

That such adjudication has been recently obtained, and that the determinations of the commissioners were held to convey no legal rights to the invalids claiming under them, as will appear by the report of the Attorney General hereunto annexed, No. 2.

All which is humbly submitted to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Copy of a letter from the Attorney General of the United States to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, August 9, 1793.

In consequence of our arrangement I moved the Supreme Court of the United States on Tuesday last for a mandamus to be directed to you, as Secretary of War, commanding you to put on the pension list one of those who had been approved by the judges acting in the character of commissioners. The decision of one case would have involved every other. But two of the judges having expressed their disinclination to hear a motion in behalf of a man who had not employed me for that purpose, and I being unwilling to embarrass a great question with little intrusions, it seemed best to waive the motion until some of the invalids themselves should speak to counsel. To this end I beg leave to suggest the propriety of a letter from your office to such of the invalids as have been certified to be proper for pensions, and perhaps it may be well to intimate the turn which the affair has taken and I have just mentioned. It was very unlucky that, although one of the invalids was in court when I made the motion, and heard the difficulty, he omitted to notify himself to me until the court had risen and it was too late.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Report of the Attorney General of the United States to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, February 17, 1794.

I have to report, that, in consequence of measures taken "to obtain a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the validity of the adjudications of certain persons styling themselves commissioners under the act of the 23d of March 1792," that court has this day determined (in the case of Yale Todd) that such adjudications are not valid.

I have the honor to be, with great regard, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. BRADFORD.

REMONSTRANCE OF THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE AGAINST CERTAIN POWERS EXERCISED BY THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES.*

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 10, 1794.

SIR:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, EXETER, February 21, 1794.

Agreeably to the directions of the Legislature of this State, I have the honor to enclose and transmit an authenticated copy of a memorial or remonstrance of the Legislature to Congress, together with other papers that will serve to authenticate and elucidate the matter complained of. And I have to request that they may be laid before Congress as soon as conveniently may be for their consideration.

And am, with great respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

JOSIAH BARTLETT.

To the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the United States.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: The remonstrance of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, sheweth:

That the citizens of the State of New Hampshire adopted the federal constitution of the United States under the full conviction that more extensive general powers were necessary to be vested in Congress than they ever possessed or pretended that they possessed, when they were entirely dependent on the good-will or the resolves of the several States. But by this adoption they did not then intend, nor does their Legislature now choose to admit, that the confederation was in force prior to March, 1781, or that the federal constitution existed with respect to New Hampshire before June, 1788.

That a question respecting the powers of Congress, and the powers of the several States previous to the constitution or the confederation, has been determined in the circuit court for the district of New Hampshire, held at Exeter, on the 24th day of October, 1793, in which the foundation of the action was, whether this State, prior to an express grant to Congress, had a right to pass a law final in every way concerning the capture of vessels by this State or citizens thereof from the British, the enemy we were then engaged with in war. That the determination of this circuit court was, that the State of New Hampshire had no such power; but that Congress, or a court commissioned by them, could nullify the laws of any particular State; could control their several courts; and that, in fact, the constitution of 1789 was unnecessary to be adopted, as it contained no new grant of powers, but only a confirmation of old ones.

The memorial of the citizens of this State immediately interested to the Legislature of New Hampshire, a copy of which is herewith exhibited, the laws of this State which have been so declared to be of no force, the determination of the circuit court, and the pleas on which it was founded, copies of which are also herewith transmitted, will inform the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of the grievances of which this State and individual citizens thereof complain against the exercise of the judicial authority of the United States; notwithstanding, many other documents may be produced with other and more cogent arguments, should the nature of the case hereafter require any further representation.

Were two independent states, like England and Scotland, to connect themselves in Government, the single Legislature or their courts might have the power to make every act void transacted in the separate Governments. But this would be a mere act of power, unacknowledged by any good constitution, and certainly reprobated by almost every constitution of the several States. The States are forbidden by the federal constitution to make any retrospective laws. The Legislature conceived that Congress were under the same obligations; and that their courts could not rejudge causes that were finally adjudged by courts existing prior to its adoption. In fact, the Legislature conceive, and feel no inclination to relinquish the idea, that Congress, in its origin, was merely an advisory body, chosen by the several States to consult upon measures for the general good of the whole; that the adoption of measures recommended by them was entirely in the breast of the several States or their Legislatures; that no measure could be carried into effect in any State without its agreement thereto; that the subsequent powers of Congress entirely depended upon the express grants of the State Legislatures; that the Legislature of this State, so far from agreeing to the exercise of the power by Congress or its courts, now determined by the circuit court to have belonged to them, on request from Congress, did not grant, but denied it; that the declaration of independence received effect from its being acceded to by the Legislatures of the several States; and that the confederation was the first act binding upon the States which was not expressly agreed to by them individually; that a declaration by any body whatever contrary thereto is subversive of the principles of the revolution; unsettling all the proceedings of the State Governments prior to the existence of the constitution; and will inevitably involve the States, and this State in particular, in confusion, and will weaken, if not perhaps destroy, the National Government; the true principles of which the State of New Hampshire has, and will always endeavor to maintain.

The Legislature of New Hampshire, therefore, again protest and remonstrate against the exercise of any such powers by Congress, or any court or body of men appointed by them, and request that measures may be taken to prevent and annihilate such illegal acts of power.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 20, 1794.

The foregoing remonstrance having been fully considered and agreed to, voted, that his excellency the Governor be requested to forward the same, together with the copies to which it alludes, to the Legislature of the United States.

Sent up for concurrence:

NATH. PEABODY, Speaker.

In Senate the same day read and concurred:

ABIEL FOSTER, President of the Senate.
JOSEPH PEARSON, Secretary.

ILLEGALITY OF THE APPOINTMENT OF KENSEY JOHNS, A SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 26, 1794.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of an appointment by the Governor of the State of Delaware of Kensey Johns, as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration made the following report:

That George Read, a Senator for the State of Delaware, resigned his seat upon the 18th day of September, 1793, and during the recess of the Legislature of said State.

That the Legislature of the said State met in January, and adjourned in February, 1794.

That, upon the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said Legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed by the Governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid.

Whereupon, the committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the Governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States; a session of the Legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.

A statement of facts.

George Read, Esquire, a Senator of the United States for the State of Delaware, resigned during the recess of the Legislature of the said State, on the 18th day of September last.

The first meeting of the Legislature of the said State thereafter happened on the — day of January last.

The Senate and House of Representatives of the said State met on the 14th day of January last, for the purpose of choosing a Senator to supply the said vacancy, and George Mitchell, Kensey Johns, and Alexander Porter, inhabitants of the said State, were nominated to be voted for; whereupon, the members then present, that is to say, eight Senators and twenty members of the House of Representatives, proceeded by ballot to vote for a Senator of the United States; and fourteen of the said electors voted for George Mitchell and fourteen for Kensey Johns. The Speaker of the Senate, apprehending that he had the right of giving an additional casting vote, expressed his preference for Kensey Johns; and said that, as he had voted for Mr. Johns, he should be consistent with himself and vote for Mr. Johns; at which time he was interrupted by a motion made by Mr. Perry, seconded by Mr. McKennan, that the Senate and House of Representatives should separate for the present; which motion passing in the affirmative, the Senate and House of Representatives then separated.

On the 15th of January last, certain resolutions passed the House of Representatives of the said State, of the tenor and effect following, to wit: 1st. That elections for Senators of the United States should be held in the Senate chamber; that the members of the Senate and House of Representatives should vote by ballot, jointly; that the Speaker of the Senate should preside; and if two or more persons should be equal and highest in vote, that the Speaker of the Senate, in that case, and no other, should give his vote. 2d. That the election of a Senator to supply the place of George Read, Esquire, should be held in the Senate chamber on the — day next, and conducted in the manner directed by the foregoing resolutions. 3d. That the person to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid be chosen out of the persons put in nomination in the Senate chamber at the meeting of the Legislature before mentioned; which resolutions on the same day were disagreed to by the Senate.

On the 31st day of January last certain other resolutions passed the Senate of the said State, of the tenor and effect following, to wit: That elections for Senators of the United States should be held in the Senate chamber; that the Speaker of the Senate should preside, and that the members of the Senate and House of Representatives should vote by ballot, jointly; and if two or more persons should be equal and highest in vote, in such case that the Speaker of the Senate should have an additional casting vote; 2d. That the Senate and House of Representatives should meet on Saturday then next ensuing, to nominate persons to supply the vacancy aforesaid; which resolutions were read in the House of Representatives on the same day, and deferred for consideration until Tuesday then next ensuing, and a verbal message delivered to the Senate that the same were postponed as aforesaid; and that the House of Representatives disagreed to that part of the said resolutions which proposed a meeting of the two Houses on Saturday.

On the 4th day of February last, the House of Representatives took into consideration the last-mentioned resolutions, and passed the same with four amendments, one of which was to alter the mode of voting by the Speaker of the Senate in such a manner that he should have no vote except in the case of an equal division; which said resolutions and the proposed amendments were sent to the Senate for concurrence, and on the 6th day of the same month the said amendments were disagreed to by the Senate.

On the 7th day of February last the Senate of the said State adjourned to the first Tuesday in January next; and on the 8th day of February last the House of Representatives of the said State adjourned without day.

On the 19th of March instant, during the recess of the Legislature of the said State, Kensey Johns, a citizen of the said State, having the qualifications prescribed by the constitution of the United States, was appointed, by the Executive of the State of Delaware, a Senator of the United States to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid of George Read, and the non-appointment of the Legislature.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 1, 1794.

Mr. PRESTON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of a number of Germans residing in the State of Virginia, made the following report:

REMONSTRANCE OF THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE AGAINST CERTAIN POWERS EXERCISED BY THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 5, 1794.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the remonstrance of the Legislature of New Hampshire, respecting a decree of the circuit court of the United States in a cause there pending between David Stodard Greenough, and others, libellants, and John Penhallow and others, respondents, made the following report:

That the State of New Hampshire being a free, sovereign, and independent State, long before the confederation of the United States, made a law for the purpose of privateering against the common enemy, and to establish courts for the legal trial and condemnation of prizes. That, in pursuance of said law, the said brig Susanna, mentioned in said remonstrance, was captured, tried, and condemned according to law, and distributed by order of the court among the captors and owners of the privateer. The committee further report, that the said brig and her cargo were insured in London against all risk and dangers of the sea and all American privateers; and that after the capture and condemnation aforesaid, the owners of said brig Susanna and cargo were paid for the loss by the underwriters. And further, that the said State of New Hampshire never gave an appellate jurisdiction in this cause to any foreign court or power whatsoever; and that all interference therein by any other than the courts of New Hampshire is, in the opinion of this committee, a violation of the freedom, sovereignty, and independence of said State.

All which is humbly submitted.

RESERVATIONS IN THE CESSIONS OF LAND FOR LIGHT-HOUSES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 23, 1794.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom were referred the motion of the 12th instant, for the acceptance of a cession from the State of New York of a piece of land at Montock Point for the site of a light-house, also the exemplification of an act of the Legislature of the said State, transmitted by a written message from the President of the United States, of the 27th of February, 1793, made the following report:

That the cession of the State of New York of the land for the site of a light-house, above referred to, has the following reservation, "Provided, nevertheless, that such jurisdiction, so ceded, as aforesaid, shall not extend, or be construed to extend, so as to impede or prevent, the execution of any process at law under the authority of this State, except so far forth as such process may affect any the real or personal property of the United States within the said tract."

The committee are informed that other States have made like reservations; and being of opinion that cessions, under such limitations, will be fully sufficient for the purpose for which said cessions are required, recommend the following resolution:

That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to authorize the President of the United States to receive cessions of land from any State to the United States, for the purpose of erecting light-houses or beacons, notwithstanding the jurisdiction of the State may be reserved, except so far as respects the real or personal property of the United States.

LAW S OF THE NORTH WESTERN TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 24, 1794.

Mr. FINDLAY, from the committee to whom were referred laws of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, of the following titles, viz:

"An act for granting licenses to merchants, traders, and tavern keepers;"

"An act creating the offices of Treasurer General of the Territory, and Treasurers for the counties;"

"An act directing the manner in which money shall be raised and levied to defray the charges which may arise within the several counties in the territory;"

"An act for opening and regulating highways;"

"An act directing the building and establishment of a court-house, county jail, pillory, whipping post, and stocks, in every county."

"An act for the better regulating of prisons;"

"An act for the disposition of strays;"

"An act to repeal certain parts of An act, entitled An act creating the office of clerk of the Legislature;"

"An act supplementary to a law entitled A law regulating marriages;"

"An act to regulate the admission of attorneys;"

"An act empowering the judge of probate to appoint guardians to minors and others;"

"An act prescribing forms of writs in civil cases, and directing the mode of proceeding therein;"

"An act establishing and regulating the fees of the several officers, and other persons therein mentioned;"

All passed at Cincinnati, in the county of Hamilton, on the 1st day of August, 1792, by Winthrop Sargent, Secretary, then vested with powers of Governor, and John Cleeves Symmes, and Rufus Putnam, Judges of the said Territory, made the following report:

That on examination of the said laws, they find many of the provisions contained in them are objectionable, but the committee conceive that it would be immaterial for them to detail the particular objections which have occurred to them, as there is one applying to the whole of the said laws, and which, in the opinion of the committee, affords a sufficient reason for disapproving the whole of them. All the legislative power which the committee find vested in the Governor and judges of the Territory, is given in the ordinance of Congress, passed on the thirteenth day of July, 1787, by which it is declared, "That the Governor and judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district, and report them to Congress from time to time; which laws shall be in force in the district unless disapproved of by Congress." These laws appear to have been passed by the Secretary and judges on the idea that they were possessed generally of legislative power, and have not, either in whole or in part, been adopted from laws of the original States.

The committee therefore submit the following resolve: Resolved, That all the laws passed by the Secretary and judges of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, on the 1st day of August, 1792, be disapproved, excepting a law entitled "An act creating the office of clerk of the Legislature."

FEES OF COURTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 27, 1794.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Attorney General of the 21st instant, accompanying a table of costs and fees, for the courts of the United States, * made the following report:

That in order to equalize the fees to be received in the courts of the United States, and to form a bill as perfect as possible, the committee are of opinion that it is necessary to obtain complete tables of the fees at present taxable in the supreme and superior courts in the several States in the Union. That it appears that the Attorney General could not obtain the same for want of a law authorizing him to call upon the different officers for that purpose, and that the table of fees reported by him has been formed without that aid which a comparison of the fees in the different States would have furnished. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolutions to be adopted by the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to continue the act to ascertain the fees in admiralty proceedings, in the courts of the United States and for other purposes, until the end of the next session of Congress.

Resolved, That a clause be inserted in the said bill, making it the duty of the clerks of the several districts of the United States, severally to return true copies of the tables of fees payable by law or custom in the supreme or superior courts of the State in which such clerk resides to the Attorney General of the United States, on or before the 1st day of December next.

Resolved, That the table of fees reported by the Attorney General be referred back to him with directions that he do report to, this House, during the next session of Congress, such table of fees and regulations relative to the same, as, on a comparative view of fees taxable in the several States, shall, in his opinion, be proper to be established for the courts of the United States.

ELECTION OF THE DELEGATE FROM THE SOUTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 14, 1794.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred the letter from James White, enclosing the credentials of his appointment as a Representative of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, made the following report:

That, by the ordinance for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, section 9, it is provided that, "so soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants of full age in the district, upon giving proof thereof to the Governor, they shall receive authority to elect representatives to represent them in a General Assembly." And, by the 12th section of the ordinance, "so soon as a Legislature shall be formed in the district, the Council and House, assembled in one room, shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress with a right of debating, but not of voting, during this temporary Government."

Full effect is given to this ordinance by act of Congress, August 7, 1789, that, by deed of cession of the territory south of the river Ohio to the United States, in the fourth article it is also provided, "that the inhabitants of the said Territory shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the Western Territory; that is to say, the Congress shall assume the Government of the said Territory, which they shall execute in a manner similar to that which they support in the Territory west of the Ohio, and shall never bar nor deprive them of any privilege which the people in the Territory west of the Ohio enjoy."

The cession, on these conditions, was accepted by act of Congress, on the 2d of April, 1790.

By an act passed the 26th May, 1790, for the government of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, it is enacted, that the inhabitants shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of the late Congress, for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio. And the government of the said Territory south of the Ohio shall be similar to that which is now exercised in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, except so far as is otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress of the present session, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claim of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of Western Territory."

The committee are of opinion that James White has been duly elected as delegate from the Territory of the United States south of the Ohio, on the terms of the foregoing acts; they, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That James White be admitted to a seat in this House as a delegate from the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, with a right of debating, but not of voting.

OPPOSITION TO THE EXCISE LAW IN PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, NOVEMBER 20, 1794.

And referred to in his speech to the two Houses on the 19th, of which the following is an extract:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

When we call to mind the gracious indulgence of Heaven, by which the American people became a nation; when we survey the general prosperity of our country, and look forward to the riches, power, and happiness, to which it seems destined; with the deepest regret do I announce to you that, during your recess, some of the citizens of the United States have been found capable of an insurrection. It is due, however, to the character of our Government, and to its stability, which cannot be shaken by the enemies of order, freely to unfold the course of this event.

During the session of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, it was expedient to exercise the legislative power, granted by the constitution of the United States "to lay and collect excises." In a majority of the States, scarcely an objection was heard to this mode of taxation. In some, indeed, alarms were at first conceived, until they were banished by reason and patriotism. In the four western counties of Pennsylvania, a prejudice, fostered and imbibed by the artifice of men, who labored for an ascendancy over the will of others, by the guidance of their passions, produced symptoms of riot and violence. It is well known that Congress did not hesitate to examine the complaints which were presented; and to relieve them, as far as justice dictated, or general convenience would permit. But the impression which this moderation made on the discontented did not correspond with what it deserved. The arts of delusion were no longer confined to the efforts of designing individuals. The very forbearance to press prosecutions was misinterpreted into a fear of urging the execution of the laws, and associations of men began to denounce threats against the officers employed. From a belief that, by a more formal concert, their operation might be defeated, certain self-created societies assumed the tone of condemnation. Hence, while the greater part of Pennsylvania itself were conforming themselves to the acts of excise, a few counties were resolved to frustrate them. It was now perceived, that every expectation from the tenderness which had been hitherto pursued was unavailing, and that further delay could only create an opinion of impotency or irresolution in the Government. Legal process was therefore delivered to the marshal against the rioters and delinquent distillers.

No sooner was he understood to be engaged in this duty, than the vengeance of armed men was aimed at his person, and the person and property of the inspector of the revenue. They fired upon the marshal, arrested him, and detained him, for some time, as a prisoner. He was obliged, by the jeopardy of his life, to renounce the service of other process, on the west side of the Allegany mountain; and a deputation was afterwards sent to him to demand a surrender of that which he had served. A numerous body repeatedly attacked the house of the inspector, seized his papers of office, and finally destroyed by fire his buildings and whatsoever they contained. Both of these officers, from a just regard to their safety, fled to the seat of Government—it being avowed, that the motives to such outrages were to compel the resignation of the inspectors; to withstand by force of arms the authority of the United States; and thereby to extort a repeal of the laws of excise, and an alteration in the conduct of Government.

Upon the testimony of these facts, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States notified to me that, “in the counties of Washington and Allegany, in Pennsylvania, laws of the United States were opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal of that district.” On this call, momentous in the extreme, I sought and weighed what might best subdue the crisis. On the one hand, the judiciary was pronounced to be stripped of its capacity to enforce the laws; crimes, which reached the very existence of social order, were perpetrated without control; the friends of Government were insulted, abused, and overawed into silence, or an apparent acquiescence; and, to yield to the treasonable fury of so small a portion of the United States, would be to violate the fundamental principle of our constitution, which enjoins that the will of the majority shall prevail. On the other, to array citizen against citizen, to publish the dishonor of such excesses, to encounter the expense, and other embarrassments, of so distant an expedition, were steps too delicate, too closely interwoven with many affecting considerations, to be lightly adopted. I postponed, therefore, the summoning of the militia immediately into the field; but I required them to be held in readiness, that, if my anxious endeavors to reclaim the deluded, and to convince the malignant of their danger, should be fruitless, military force might be prepared to act before the season should be too far advanced.

My proclamation of the 7th of August last was accordingly issued, and accompanied by the appointment of commissioners, who were charged to repair to the scene of insurrection. They were authorized to confer with any bodies of men or individuals. They were instructed to be candid and explicit in stating the sensations which had been excited in the Executive, and his earnest wish to avoid a resort to coercion; to represent, however, that, without submission, coercion must be the resort; but to invite them, at the same time, to return to the demeanor of faithful citizens, by such accommodations as lay within the sphere of Executive power. Pardon, too, was tendered to them by the Government of the United States, and that of Pennsylvania, upon no other condition than a satisfactory assurance of obedience to the laws.

Although the report of the commissioners marks their firmness and abilities, and must unite all virtuous men, by showing that the means of conciliation have been exhausted, all of those who had committed or abetted the tumults did not subscribe the mild form which was proposed as the atonement; and the indications of a peaceable temper were neither sufficiently general nor conclusive to recommend or warrant the further suspension of the march of the militia.

Thus, the painful alternative could not be discarded. I ordered the militia to march, after once more admonishing the insurgents, in my proclamation of the 25th of September last.

It was a task too difficult to ascertain, with precision, the lowest degree of force competent to the quelling of the insurrection. From a respect, indeed, to economy, and the ease of my fellow-citizens belonging to the militia, it would have gratified me to accomplish such an estimate. My very reluctance to ascribe too much importance to the opposition, had its extent been accurately seen, would have been a decided inducement to the smallest efficient numbers. In this uncertainty, therefore, I put in motion fifteen thousand men, as being an army which, according to all human calculation, would be prompt and adequate in every view, and might, perhaps, by rendering resistance desperate, prevent the effusion of blood. Quotas had been assigned to the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia; the Governor of Pennsylvania having declared, on this occasion, an opinion which justified a requisition to the other States.

As commander-in-chief of the militia, when called into the actual service of the United States, I have visited the places of general rendezvous, to obtain more exact information, and to direct a plan for ulterior movements. Had there been room for persuasion that the laws were secure from obstruction; that the civil magistrate was able to bring to justice such of the most culpable as have not embraced the proffered terms of amnesty, and may be deemed fit objects of example; that the friends to peace and good government were not in need of that aid and countenance which they ought always to receive, and, I trust, ever will receive, against the vicious and turbulent; I should have caught with avidity the opportunity of restoring the militia to their families and home. But, succeeding intelligence has tended to manifest the necessity of what has been done; it being now confessed by those who were not inclined to exaggerate the ill conduct of the insurgents, that their malevolence was not pointed merely to a particular law, but that a spirit, inimical to all order, has actuated many of the offenders. If the state of things had afforded reason for the continuance of my presence with the army, it would not have been withheld. But every appearance assuring such an issue as will redound to the reputation and strength of the United States, I have judged it most proper to resume my duties at the seat of Government, leaving the chief command with the Governor of Virginia.

Still, however, as it is probable that, in a commotion like the present, whatsoever may be the pretence, the purposes of mischiefs and revenge may not be laid aside, the stationing of a small force, for a certain period, in the four western counties of Pennsylvania, will be indispensable, whether we contemplate the situation of those who are connected with the execution of the laws, or of others, who may have exposed themselves by an honorable attachment to them. Thirty days from the commencement of this session being the legal limitation of the employment of the militia, Congress cannot be too early occupied with this subject.

Among the discussions which may arise from this aspect of our affairs, and from the documents which will be submitted to Congress, it will not escape their observation, that not only the inspector of the revenue, but other officers of the United States, in Pennsylvania, have, from their fidelity in the discharge of their functions, sustained material injuries to their property. The obligation and policy of indemnifying them are strong and obvious. It may also merit attention, whether policy will not enlarge this provision to the retribution of other citizens, who, though not under the ties of office, may have suffered damage by their generous exertions for upholding the constitution and the laws. The amount, even if all the injured were included, would not be great; and, on future emergencies, the Government would be amply repaid by the influence of an example, that he, who incurs a loss in its defence, shall find a recompense in its liberality.

While there is cause to lament that occurrences of this nature should have disgraced the name or interrupted the tranquillity of any part of our community, or should have diverted, to a new application, any portion of the public resources, there are not wanting real and substantial consolations for the misfortune. It has demonstrated that our prosperity rests on solid foundations, by furnishing an additional proof that my fellow-citizens understand the true principles of Government and liberty; that they feel their inseparable union; that, notwithstanding all the devices which have been used to sway them from their interest and duty, they are now as ready to maintain the authority of the laws against licentious invasions, as they were to defend their rights against usurpation. It has been a spectacle, displaying to the highest advantage the value of republican Government, to behold the most and the least wealthy of our citizens standing in the same ranks as private soldiers, pre-eminently distinguished by being the army of the constitution; undeterred by a march of three hundred miles over rugged mountains, by the approach of an inclement season, or by any other discouragement. Nor ought I to omit to acknowledge the efficacious and patriotic co-operation which I have experienced from the Chief Magistrates of the States to which my requisitions have been addressed.

To every description, indeed, of citizens let praise be given. But let them persevere in their affectionate vigilance over that precious depository of American happiness, the constitution of the United States. Let them cherish it, too, for the sake of those who, from every clime, are daily seeking a dwelling in our land. And when, in the calm moments of reflection, they shall have retraced the origin and progress of the insurrection, let them determine whether it has not been fomented by combinations of men, who, careless of consequences, and disregarding the unerring truth, that those who rouse cannot always appease a civil convulsion, have disseminated, from an ignorance or perversion of facts, suspicions, jealousies, and accusations, of the whole Government.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, August 4, 1794.

From evidence which has been laid before me, I hereby notify to you that, in the counties of Washington and Allegany, in Pennsylvania, laws of the United States are opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal of that district.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration and respect, sir,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,

JAMES WILSON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, combinations to defeat the execution of the laws laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills, have, from the time of the commencement of those laws, existed in some of the western parts of Pennsylvania: And whereas, the said combinations, proceeding in a manner subversive equally of the just authority of Government, and of the rights of individuals, have hitherto effected their dangerous and criminal purpose, by the influence of certain irregular meetings, whose proceedings have tended to encourage and uphold the spirit of opposition, by misrepresentations of the laws, calculated to render them odious by endeavors to deter those who might be so disposed from accepting offices under them, through fear of public resentment, and of injury to person and property, and to compel those who had accepted such offices, by actual violence to surrender or forbear the execution of them; by circulating vindictive menaces against all those who should otherwise directly or indirectly aid in the execution of the said laws, or who, yielding to the dictates of conscience and to a sense of obligation, should themselves comply therewith, by actually injuring and destroying the property of persons who were understood to have so complied; by inflicting cruel and humiliating punishments upon private citizens, for no other cause than that of appearing to be the friends of the laws; by intercepting the public officers on the highways, abusing, assaulting, and otherwise ill-treating them; by going to their houses in the night, gaining admittance by force, taking away their papers, and committing other outrages; employing, for these unwarrantable purposes, the agency of armed banditti, disguised in such manner as for the most part to escape discovery: And whereas, the endeavors of the Legislature to obviate objections to the said laws, by lowering the duties and by other alterations conducive to the convenience of those whom they immediately affect, (though they have given satisfaction in other quarters,) and the endeavors of the executive officers to conciliate a compliance with the laws, by explanations, by forbearance, and even by particular accommodations, founded on the suggestion of local considerations, have been disappointed of their effect by the machinations of persons, whose industry to excite resistance has increased with every appearance of a disposition among the people to relax in their opposition, and to acquiesce in the laws, insomuch that many persons in the said western parts of Pennsylvania have at length been hardy enough to perpetrate acts which I am advised amount to treason, being overt acts of levying war against the United States; the said persons having, on the 16th and 17th of July last past, proceeded in arms (on the second day amounting to several hundreds) to the house of John Neville, inspector of the revenue for the fourth survey of the district of Pennsylvania, having repeatedly attacked the said house, with the persons therein, wounding some of them; having seized David Lenox, marshal of the district of Pennsylvania, who previous thereto had been fired upon while in the execution of his duty by a party of armed men, detaining him for some time prisoner, till, for the preservation of his life, and the obtaining of his liberty, he found it necessary to enter into stipulations to forbear the execution of certain official duties touching processes issuing out of a court of the United States; and having finally obliged the said inspector of the said revenue and the said marshal, from considerations of personal safety, to fly from that part of the country, in order, by a circuitous route, to proceed to the seat of Government; avowing, as the motives of these outrageous proceedings, an intention to prevent by force of arms the execution of the said laws; to oblige the said inspector of the revenue to renounce his said office; to withstand, by open violence, the lawful authority of the Government of the United States; and to compel thereby an alteration in the measures of the Legislature, and a repeal of the laws aforesaid: And whereas, by a law of the United States, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," it is enacted, "that, whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by that act, the same being notified by an associate justice or the district judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed. And if the militia of a State where such combinations may happen shall refuse, or be insufficient, to suppress the same, it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States shall not be in session, to call forth and employ such numbers of the militia of any other State or States most convenient thereto, as may be necessary; and the use of the militia, so to be called forth, may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session: Provided, always, That, whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, and previous thereto, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time:" And whereas, James Wilson, an associate justice, on the 4th instant, by writing under his hand, did, from evidence which had been laid before him, notify to me that, "in the counties of Washington and Allegany, in Pennsylvania, laws of the United States are opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal of that district:" And whereas, it is in my judgment necessary, under the circumstances of the case, to take measures for calling forth the militia in order to suppress the combinations aforesaid, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and I have accordingly determined so to do, feeling the deepest regret for the occasion, but withal the most solemn conviction that the essential interests of the Union demand it, that the very existence of Government and the fundamental principles of social order are materially involved in the issue, and that the patriotism and firmness of all good citizens are seriously called upon, as occasions may require, to aid in the effectual suppression of so fatal a spirit:

Wherefore, and in pursuance of the proviso above recited, I, George Washington, President of the United States, do hereby command all persons, being insurgents as aforesaid, and all others whom it may concern, on or before the 1st day of September next, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes. And I do moreover warn all persons whomsoever, against aiding, abetting, or comforting the perpetrators of the aforesaid treasonable acts; and do require all officers and other citizens, according to their respective duties, and the laws of the land, to exert their utmost endeavors to prevent and suppress such dangerous proceedings.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the seventh day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

By the President:

GENTLEMEN:

AUGUST 5, 1794.

The recent events in the neighborhood of Pittsburg have called the attention of the President to the formation of some plan by which the insurrection may be suppressed.

The intelligence which has been transmitted having been laid before Judge Wilson, he has granted a certificate, declaring that the opposition to the laws of the United States, in the counties of Washington and Allegany, cannot be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or the power of the marshal. (A copy of that certificate is enclosed, No 1.)

You, or any one or more of you, are, therefore, authorized and appointed forthwith to proceed to the scene of the insurrection, and to confer with any bodies of men or individuals with whom you shall think proper to confer, in order to quiet and extinguish it. There is reason to believe that a collection of discontented individuals will be found at Mingo creek on the fourteenth instant, and, as the object of their assembling is undoubtedly to concert measures relative to this very subject, it is indispensably necessary that you should press thither with the utmost expedition. It is uncertain whether they will remain together for a long or short time; therefore, the being on the ground on the day first named for their meeting is necessary to prevent a miscarriage.

These are the outlines of your communication:

1st. To state the serious impressions which their conduct has excited in the mind of the Executive, and to dilate upon the dangers attending every Government where laws are obstructed in their execution.

2d. To inform them that the evidence of the late transactions has been submitted to a judge of the Supreme Court, and that he has granted the above-mentioned certificate, whence a power has arisen to the President to call out the militia to suppress the insurrection. (See the act of May 2, 1792.)

3d. To represent to them how painful an idea it is to exercise such a power, and that it is the earnest wish of the President to render it unnecessary by those endeavors which humanity, a love of peace and tranquillity, and the happiness of his fellow-citizens dictate.

4th. You will then explain your appointment as Commissioners, in a language and with sentiments most conciliatory, but reconcileable to the self-respect which this Government ought to observe.

5th. Whether you are to proceed further, and in what manner, must depend upon your judgment and discretion at the moment, after an estimate of the characters with whom you are conversing, their views, their influence, &c.

6th. Whensoever you shall come to the point at which it may be necessary to be explicit, you are to declare that, with respect to the excise law, the President is bound to consider it as much among the laws which he is to see executed as any other. That, as to the repeal of it, he cannot undertake to make any stipulation, that being a subject consigned by the constitution to the Legislature, from whom alone a change of legislative measures can be obtained. That he is willing to grant an amnesty and perpetual oblivion for every thing which has past; and cannot doubt, that any penalty to which the late transactions may have given birth, under the laws and within the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania, may be also wiped away—but upon the following conditions:

That satisfactory assurances be given that the laws be no longer obstructed in their execution by any combinations, directly or indirectly; and that the offenders against whom process shall issue for a violation of or an opposition to the laws, shall not be protected from the free operation of the law. Nothing will be enforced concerning the duties of former years if they will fairly comply for the present year.

7th. If they speak of the hardship of being drawn to the federal courts at a distance, to that no other reply can be made than this: that the inconvenience, whatsoever it may be, was the act of their own representatives, and is continued as being still their sense; that, however, on all occasions which will permit the State courts to be used without inconvenience to the United States, or danger of their being frustrated in the object of the suits and prosecutions, the State courts will be resorted to; but the choice of jurisdictions must always depend upon the discretion of the United States, and therefore nothing more specific can be said at present.

8th. Whensoever you shall choose to speak of the ulterior measures of the Government, you will say that orders have already issued for the proper militia to hold themselves in readiness, and that every thing is prepared for their movement, (as will be seen by the proclamation No. 3.) and is known to yourselves from the communications of the Government; but that these movements will be suspended until your return.

9th. These are said to be the outlines; you will fill them up, and modify them so as most effectually to prevent, if possible, the last dreadful necessity which the President so much deprecates; and you may, in particular, assure any individuals of pardon who will expiate their offence by a compliance with the law.

10th. You will keep the Executive minutely and constantly informed of all your proceedings, and will use expresses whensoever you think proper, at the public expense.

11th. You will be allowed eight dollars per day and your expenses, and may employ a proper person to act as your clerk, who shall be paid whatsoever you may certify him to deserve. The sum of one thousand dollars is advanced to you on account.

12th. William Bradford is empowered to add the name of Thomas Smith, or any other proper person, if either J. Ross or J. Yeates shall refuse or be unable to attend.

EDMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

TO JAMES ROSS, JASPER YEATES, WILLIAM BRADFORD.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 8, 1794.

In pursuance of instructions from the President of the United States, you, or any one or more of you are hereby authorized and empowered forthwith to repair to the counties on the western side of the Allegany mountain, in the State of Pennsylvania, there to confer with such bodies or individuals as you may approve concerning the commotions, which are referred to in the proclamation of the President of the United States, bearing date the 7th day of August instant; and whatsoever promise or engagement you shall make in behalf of the Executive of the United States, the same will be ratified in the most ample manner.

[L. s.] Given under my hand, and the seal of office of the Department of State, the eighth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

EDMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, September 24, 1794.

The commissioners, appointed to confer with the citizens in the western counties of Pennsylvania, in order to induce them to submit peaceably to the laws, and to prevent the necessity of using coercion to enforce their execution, respectfully report to the President of the United States:

That, in pursuance of their instructions, they repaired to the western counties; and, on their arrival there, found that the spirit of disaffection had pervaded other parts of the fourth survey of Pennsylvania, besides those counties declared to be in a state of insurrection; that all the offices of inspection established therein had lately been violently suppressed; and that a meeting of persons, chosen by most of the townships, was assembled at Parkinson's ferry, for the purpose of taking into consideration the situation of the western country. This assembly, composed of citizens coming from every part of the fourth survey, would have furnished a favorable opportunity for a conference and mutual explanation; but as they met in the open fields, and were exposed to the impressions of a number of rash and violent men (some of them armed) who surrounded them, an immediate communication with the whole body would have been inconvenient and hazardous. The meeting was probably of that opinion also; for, soon after the appointment of commissioners was announced to them, they resolved that a committee, to consist of three persons from each county, should be appointed to meet any commissioners that might have been or might be appointed by the Government; and that they should report the result of their conference to the standing committee, which was to be composed of one person from each township. As soon as this committee of conference were nominated, they agreed to meet at Pittsburg, on the 20th of the same month.

The underwritten accordingly repaired to that place, and were soon after joined by the Honorable Thomas McKean and William Irvine, Esquires, who had been appointed commissioners on the part of the Executive of Pennsylvania. A full and free communication was immediately had with those gentlemen, as to the powers delegated, and the measures proper to be pursued at the expected conference.

On the day appointed a sub-committee of the conferees waited on the commissioners, and arranged with them the time, place, and manner of conference. It was agreed that it should be had the next morning at the house of John McMasters, in Pittsburg, and should be private.

On the 21st, all the commissioners met the conferees at the place appointed. Of the latter there were present John Kirkpatrick, George Smith, and John Powers, from Westmoreland county; David Bradford, James Marshall, and James Edgar, from Washington county; Edward Cook, Albert Gallatin, and James Lang, from Fayette county; Thomas Morton, John Lucas, H. H. Brackenridge, from Allegany county; together with William McKimley, William Sutherland, and Robert Stevenson, who were inhabitants of Ohio county, in Virginia.

The conference was begun by the underwritten, who expressed the concern they felt at the events which had occasioned that meeting, but declared their intention to avoid any unnecessary observations upon them, since it was their business to endeavor to compose the disturbances which prevailed, and to restore the authority of the laws by measures wholly of a conciliatory nature.

It was then stated, that the formal resistance which had lately been given to the laws of the United States violated the great principle on which republican Government is founded; that every such Government must, at all hazards, enforce obedience to the general will; and that, so long as they admitted themselves to be a part of the nation, it was manifestly absurd to oppose the national authority.

The underwritten then proceeded to state the obligations which lay on the President of the United States to cause the laws to be executed; the measures he had taken for that purpose; his desire to avoid the necessity of coercion; and the general nature of the powers he had vested in them; and, finally, requested to know whether the conferees could give any assurances of a disposition in the people to submit to the laws, or would recommend such submission to them.

The commissioners, on the part of the State of Pennsylvania, then addressed the conferees on the subject of the late disturbances in that country; forcibly represented the mischievous consequences of such conduct; explained the nature of their mission; and declared they were ready to promise, in behalf of the Executive authority of the State, a full pardon and indemnity for all that was past, on condition of an entire submission to the laws.

On the part of the conferees a narrative was given of those causes of discontent and uneasiness which very generally prevailed in the minds of the people in the western counties, and which had discovered themselves in the late transactions. Many of these, they said, had long existed, and some of them from the settlement of that country. Among other causes of discontent, they complained of the decisions of the State courts, which discountenanced improvement titles, and gave the preference to paper titles; of the war which had so long vexed the frontiers; and of the manner in which that war had been conducted. They complained that they had been continually harassed by militia duty, in being called out by the State Government to repel incursions, &c.; that the General Government had been inattentive to the execution of the treaty of peace respecting the western posts, and remiss in asserting the claim to the navigation of the Mississippi; that the acts for raising a revenue on distilled spirits were unequal and oppressive, in consequence of their local circumstances; that Congress had neglected their remonstrances and petitions; and that there was great hardship in being summoned to answer for penalties in the courts of the United States at a distance from the vicinage. They also mentioned the suspension of the settlement at Presqu'isle, the engrossing of large quantities of land in the State by individuals, the killing of certain persons at General Neville's house, and the sending of soldiers from the garrison at Pittsburg to defend his house, as causes of irritation among the people. To these they added the appointment of General Neville as inspector of the survey, whose former popularity had made his acceptance of that office particularly offensive.

They said they were persuaded that the persons who were the actors in the late disturbances had not originally intended to have gone so far as they had gone, but were led to it from the obstinacy of those who refused to do what was demanded of them; that the forcible opposition which had been made to the law was owing to the pressure of the grievance; but, if there was any prospect of redress, no people would be more willing to show themselves good citizens.

The commissioners expressed their surprise at the extent of these complaints, and intimated that if all these matters were really causes of uneasiness and disaffection in the minds of the people, it would be impossible for any Government to satisfy them. But as some of these complaints were of a nature more serious than others, though they could not speak officially, they stated what was generally understood as to the conduct, measures, and expectations of Government respecting the Mississippi navigation; the treaty of peace; the suspension of the settlement at Presqu'isle, &c.; that, as to the acts of Congress which had been forcibly opposed, if it were proper they should be repealed, Congress alone could do it; but that while they were laws, they must be carried into execution; that the petitions of the western counties had not been neglected, nor their interests overlooked; that, in fact, the local interests of those counties were better represented than those of any other part of the State; they having no less than three gentlemen in the House of Representatives, when it appeared by the census that their numbers would not entitle them to two; that the acts in question had been often under the consideration of Congress; that they had always been supported by a considerable majority, in which they would find the names of several gentlemen, considered, in those counties, as the firmest friends of their country; that, although the general interests of the Union did not admit of a repeal, modifications had been made in the law, and some favorable alterations, in consequence of their representations; and, that at the last session, the State courts had been vested with a jurisdiction over offences against those acts, which would enable the President to remove one of their principal complaints; that the convenience of the people had been, and would always be, consulted by the Government; and the conferees were desired to say if there was any thing in the power of the Executive that yet remained to be done to make the execution of the acts convenient and agreeable to the people.

One of the conferees then inquired whether the President could not suspend the execution of the excise acts until the meeting of Congress; but he was interrupted by others, who declared that they considered such a measure as impracticable. The commissioners expressed the same opinion; and the conversation then became more particular, respecting the powers the commissioners possessed; the propriety and necessity of the conferees expressing their sense upon the proposals to be made, and of their calling the standing committee together before the 1st of September. But as it was agreed that the propositions and answers should be reduced to writing, the result is contained in the documents annexed, and it appears unnecessary to detail the conference further.

The underwritten accordingly presented to the conferees a letter, (of which a copy, marked No. 1, is annexed;) and the following day they received an answer from them, in which they declare that they are satisfied that the Executive had, in its proposals, gone as far as could be expected; that, in their opinion, it was the interest of the country to accede to the law; and that they would endeavor to conciliate not only the committee to whom they were to report, but the public mind in general, to their sense of the subject. (A copy of this letter also is annexed, No. 2.)

The underwritten then proceeded to state, in writing, what assurances of submission would be deemed full and satisfactory, and to detail more particularly the engagements they had power to make. This detail was submitted to the inspection of a sub-committee of the conferees, who candidly suggested such alterations as appeared to them necessary to render the proposals acceptable. From a desire to accommodate, most of the alterations suggested by those gentlemen were adopted; and though some of them were rejected, the reasons given appeared to be satisfactory, and no further objections remained. (A copy of this detail is marked No. 3.)

The conferees, on the following day, explicitly approved of the detail thus settled, engaged to recommend the proposals to the people, and added, that however it might be received, they were persuaded nothing more could be done by the commissioners, or them, to bring the business to an accommodation. (No. 4 is a copy of their letter.)

So far as this letter respects the gentlemen from Ohio county, in Virginia, a reply was made, and some arrangements entered into with them, the nature and extent of which appear by the correspondence. (Copies of which are annexed, numbered 5, 6, 7, and 8.)

The hopes excited by the favorable issue of this conference were not realized by a correspondent conduct in the citizens who composed what was called "the standing committee." They assembled at Brownsville (Redstone Old Fort) on the 28th August, and broke up on the 29th, and, on the following day, a letter was received from Edward Cook, their chairman, announcing, that difficulties had arisen, and that a new committee of conference was appointed; and although the resolve which is annexed was passed, it did not appear that the assurances of submission which had been demanded had been given. (Copies of this letter and resolve are marked Nos. 9 and 10.)

The underwritten were informed by several of the members of that meeting, as well as other citizens who were present at it, that the report of the committee of conference, and the proposals of the commissioners, were unfavorably received; that rebellion and hostile resistance against the United States were publicly recommended by some of the members; and that so excessive a spirit prevailed, that it was not thought prudent or safe to urge a compliance with the terms and preliminaries prescribed by the underwritten, or the commissioners from the Governor of Pennsylvania. All that could be obtained was the resolve already mentioned, the question upon it being decided by ballot; by which means each member had an opportunity of concealing his opinion and of sheltering himself from the resentment of those from whom violence was apprehended. But notwithstanding this caution, the opinion was so far from being unanimous, that out of fifty-seven votes, there were twenty-three nays, leaving a majority of only eleven: and the underwritten have been repeatedly assured, by different members of that meeting, that if the question had been publicly put, it would have been carried in the negative by a considerable majority.

With a view of counteracting the arts and influence of the violent, the underwritten, on the 27th August, addressed a letter to the late conferees, authorizing them to assure the friends of order, who might be disposed to exert themselves to restore the authority of the laws, that they might rely on the protection of Government, and that measures would be taken to suppress and punish the violence of those individuals who might dissent from the general sentiment. This letter (a copy of which is marked No. 11) was delivered to one of the conferees going to Brownsville; but he afterwards informed the underwritten that the gentlemen to whom it was addressed did not "think it prudent to make any use of it, as the temper which prevailed was such that it would probably have done more harm than good."

The conduct of the meeting at Brownsville, notwithstanding the thin veil thrown over it by the resolve already mentioned, was said to be considered by many, and especially by the violent party, as a rejection of the terms. It was certainly a partial rejection of those proposed by the underwritten, and a total one of the preliminaries prescribed by the State commissioners, who had required assurances from the members of that meeting only, and not from the people themselves.

Having, therefore, no longer any hopes of a universal, or even general submission, it was deemed necessary, by a solemn appeal to the people, to ascertain as clearly as possible the determination of every individual; to encourage and oblige the friends of order to declare themselves; to recall as many of the disaffected as possible to their duty, by assurances of pardon dependent on their individual conduct; and to learn with certainty what opposition Government might expect if military coercion should be finally unavoidable.

To secure these advantages, the underwritten were of opinion that the assurances of submission required of the people ought not only to be publicly given, but ought also to be reduced to writing; and that the state of each county should be certified by those who were to superintend the meetings at which the disposition of the people was to be ascertained.

On the 1st instant, nine of the gentlemen appointed by the meeting at Brownsville assembled at Pittsburg, and in the afternoon requested a conference with the commissioners, which was agreed to. They produced the resolves by which they were appointed, and entered into some explanation of the nature of their visit; but being desired to communicate it in writing, they withdrew, and soon after sent a letter addressed to the commissioners of the United States and of the State of Pennsylvania; to which an answer was immediately written. (Copies of these letters are annexed, Nos. 12 and 13.)

As no part of their letter, although addressed to the commissioners from Pennsylvania, related to the preliminaries prescribed by them, they made no answer in writing; but in a conference held the next morning with those nine gentlemen, they verbally declared to them their entire concurrence in the sentiments contained in the letter from the underwritten; and they expressed, at some length, their surprise and regret at the conduct of the meeting at Brownsville. The conferees declared themselves satisfied with the answer they had received; avowed an entire conviction of the necessity and propriety of an early submission in the manner proposed, and offered immediately to enter into the detail for settling the time, place, and manner of taking the sense of the people. (A copy of their letter, which also expresses these sentiments, is annexed, No. 14.)

It was accordingly agreed between the commissioners on the one part, and these gentlemen on the other, that the people should assemble for the purpose of expressing their determination, and giving the assurances required, on the 11th instant; and the mode of ascertaining the public sentiments of the citizens resident in the fourth survey of Pennsylvania was clearly and definitely prescribed by the unanimous consent of all who were present at the conference. It was evident that circumstances might arise to prevent the real disposition of the citizens from being fully ascertained at these meetings, and that even arts might be used to procure such an expression of the public mind, that, while it held up an appearance of submission, might be in reality a false and delusive representation of it. It was therefore necessary that persons of character from every township or district (who might be able, from their own knowledge or the comparison of all circumstances, justly to appreciate the public opinion) should assemble and jointly certify their opinion whether there was such a general submission in their respective counties, or not, that the laws could be peaceably carried into execution. For the same purpose it was agreed to be proper that the number of those who openly refused, as well as of those who promised to submit, in their respective townships or districts, should be reported to the commissioners. (A copy of this agreement, marked No. 15, is annexed.)

It appears that meetings were held in the several counties in pursuance of this agreement; but the underwritten, with extreme regret, find themselves obliged to report, that in the returns made to them no opinions are certified that there is so general a submission in any one of the counties that an office of inspection can be immediately and safely established therein; on the contrary, the report of those who superintended the meeting in Westmoreland, states their opinion to be that such a measure would not be safe.

From Alleghany county no report whatever has been received; and although it is understood that a very great majority of those assembled in the Pittsburg district actually subscribed the declarations required, yet there is no reason to believe that there was a favorable issue in any other district. Information has been received that great violence prevailed in one of them, and that in another the majority declared their determination not to submit to the laws of the United States.

From Washington county a general return was duly transmitted to one of the commissioners at Uniontown, signed by twenty-eight of the superintendents of the meeting; they do not, however, state the number of the yeas and nays on the question for submission; they decline giving any opinion whether there is such a general submission that an office of inspection may be established therein, but certify their opinion and belief "that a large majority of the inhabitants will acquiesce and submit to the said law, under a hope and firm belief that the Congress of the United States will repeal the law."

The report from the superintendents in Westmoreland county, is equally defective, in not stating the numbers as required; but it certifies their opinion that as ill disposed lawless persons could suddenly assemble and offer violence, it would not be safe immediately to establish an office of inspection in that county.

The county of Fayette rejected the mode of ascertaining the sense of the people, which had been settled between the underwritten and the last committee of conference at Pittsburg. The standing committee of that county directed those qualified by the laws of the State for voting at elections, to assemble in their election districts, and vote by ballot whether they would accede to the proposals made by the commissioners of the United States, on the 22d of August, or not. The superintendents of these election districts report, that five hundred and sixty of the people thus convened had voted for submission, and that one hundred and sixty-one had voted against it; that no judge or member of their committee had attended from the fourth district of the county, to report the state of the votes there, and that they are of opinion that a great majority of the citizens who did not attend are disposed to behave peaceably and with due submission to the laws. But it is proper to mention, that credible and certain information has been received, that in the fourth district of that county (composed of the townships of Tyrone and Bullskin,) of which the standing committee have given no account, six-sevenths of those who voted were for resistance. (Copies of the reports stated are annexed, and numbered 16, 17, 18.)

From that part of Bedford county which is comprehended within the fourth survey of Pennsylvania, no report or returns have been sent forward, nor has any information been received that the citizens assembled there for the purpose of declaring their opinions upon questions proposed.

The written assurances of submission which have been received by the commissioners are not numerous, nor were they given by all those who expressed a willingness to obey the laws. In Fayette county, a different plan being pursued, no written assurances were given in the manner required. In the three other counties, which, from the census taken under the laws of the State, appear to contain above eleven thousand taxable inhabitants (in which none under the age of twenty-one are included) the names subscribed to the papers received barely exceed two thousand seven hundred, and of these a very considerable part have not been subscribed in the mode agreed on; being either signed at a different day, unattested by any person, or wilfully varied from the settled form.

From credible information received, it appears to the underwritten, that in some townships, the majority, and, in one of them, the whole of the persons assembled, publicly declared themselves for resistance; in some, although the sense of the majority was not known, yet the party for resistance was sufficiently strong to prevent any declarations of submission being openly made; and in others, the majority were intimidated or opposed by a violent minority. But notwithstanding these circumstances, the underwritten firmly believe that there is a considerable majority of the inhabitants of the fourth survey who are now disposed to submit to the execution of the laws; at the same time, they conceive it their duty explicitly to declare their opinion that such is the state of things in that survey, that there is no probability that the act for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills can at present be enforced by the usual course of civil authority; and that some more competent force is necessary to cause the laws to be duly executed, and to ensure to the officers and well-disposed citizens that protection which it is the duty of Government to afford.

This opinion is founded on the facts already stated; and it is confirmed by that which is entertained by many intelligent and influential persons, officers of justice and others, resident in the western counties, who have lately informed one of the commissioners, that whatever assurances might be given, it was, in their judgment, absolutely necessary that the civil authority should be aided by a military force, in order to secure a due execution of the laws.

No. 1.

From the commissioners on the part of the Union to the Committee of Conference, assembled at Pittsburg.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, August 21, 1794.

Having had a conference with you on the important subject that calls us into this part of Pennsylvania, we shall now state to you in writing, agreeably to your request, the nature and object of our mission hither. Considering this as a crisis infinitely interesting to our fellow-citizens who have authorized you to confer with us, we shall explain ourselves to you with that frankness and sincerity which the solemnity of the occasion demands.

You well know that the President of the United States is charged with the execution of the laws. Obedience to the national will being indispensable in a republican Government, the people of the United States have strictly enjoined it as his duty "to see that the laws are faithfully executed;" and when the ordinary authorities of the Government are incompetent for that end, he is bound to exert those high powers with which the nation has invested him for so extraordinary an occasion.

It is but too evident that the insurrections which have lately prevailed in some of these western counties have suppressed the usual exercise of the civil authority; and it has been formally notified to the President, by one of the associate judges, in the manner the law prescribes, "that in the counties of Washington and Allegany, in Pennsylvania, laws of the United States are opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or the powers vested in the marshal of that district." He therefore perceives, with the deepest regret, the necessity to which he may be reduced, of calling forth the national force in order to support the national authority, and to cause the laws to be executed; but he has determined, previously, to address himself to the patriotism and reason of the people of the western counties, and to try the moderation of Government, in hopes that he may not be compelled to resort to its strength. But we must not conceal from you that it is also his fixed determination, if these hopes should be disappointed, to employ the force and, if it be necessary, the whole force of the Union, to secure the execution of the laws. He has, therefore, authorized us to repair hither, and by free conferences and the powers vested in us, to endeavor to put an end to the present disturbances, and to the opposition to the execution of the laws, in a manner that may be finally satisfactory to all our fellow-citizens.

We hope that this moderation in the Government will not be misconstrued by the citizens to whom we are sent. The President, who feels a paternal solicitude for their welfare, wishes to prevent the calamities that are impending over them; to state to them clearly the inevitable consequences of further resistance; to recall them to their duty; and to prove to the whole world, that if military coercion must be employed, it is their choice and not his.

The powers vested in us will enable us so to arrange the execution of the acts for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills, that little inconvenience will arise therefrom to the people; to prevent, as far as is consistent with the public interests, the commencing prosecutions under those acts at a distance from the places where the delinquents reside; to suspend prosecutions for the late offences against the United States; and even to engage for a general pardon and oblivion of them.

But, gentlemen, we explicitly declare to you, that the exercise of these powers must be preceded by full and satisfactory assurances of a sincere determination in the people to obey the laws of the United States, and their eventual operation must depend upon a correspondent acquiescence in the execution of the acts which have been opposed. We have not, and, coming from the Executive, you well know that we cannot have, any authority to suspend the laws, or to offer the most distant hopes that the acts, the execution of which has been obstructed, will be repealed. On the contrary, we are free to declare to you our private opinions, that the national councils, while they consult the general interests of the republic, and endeavor to conciliate every part by local accommodations to citizens who respect the laws, will sternly refuse every indulgence to men who accompany their requests with threats, and resist by force the public authority.

Upon these principles we are ready to enter with you into the detail necessary for the exercise of our powers; to learn what local accommodations are yet wanting to render the execution of the laws convenient to the people; to concert with you measures for restoring harmony and order, and for burying the past in oblivion; and to unite our endeavors with yours to secure the peace and happiness of our common country.

It is necessary, however, to apprise you thus early that, at present, we do not consider ourselves as authorized to enter into any conferences on this subject [after the 1st of September ensuing. We therefore hope the business will be so conducted that some definitive answer may be given to us before that day.

We cannot believe that, in so great a crisis, any attempts to temporize and procrastinate will be made by those who sincerely love their country, and wish to secure its tranquillity.

We also declare to you, that no indulgence will be given to any future offence against the United States, and that they who shall hereafter directly or indirectly oppose the execution of the laws must abide the consequences of their conduct.

JAMES ROSS,
J. YEATES,
WM. BRADFORD.

No. 2.

The following is the answer of the committee.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, August 22, 1794.

Having, in our conference, at considerable length stated to you the grounds of that discontent which exists in the minds of the people of this country, and which has lately shown itself in acts of opposition to the excise law, you will consider us as waiving any question with regard to the nature of those acts, whether reasonable, or amounting only to riot and breach of the peace; of course, as waiving the question of the constitutional power of the President to call upon the force of the Union to suppress them. It is our object, as it is yours, to compose the disturbance.

We are satisfied that, in substance, you have gone as far as we could expect the Executive to go. It only remains to ascertain your propositions more in detail, and to say what arrangements it may be in your power to make with regard to convenience in collecting the revenue under the excise laws; how far it may be consistent with the public interest to prevent commencing prosecutions under those laws at a distance from the places where the delinquents reside; on what condition or circumstance prosecutions for the late violations of the laws shall be suspended; that is to say, whether on the individual keeping the peace, or on its being kept by the country in general; and also with regard to the general amnesty, whether the claiming the benefit of it by an individual shall depend on his own future conduct or that of the whole community.

We have already stated to you, in conference, that we are empowered to give you no definitive answer with regard to the sense of the people on the great question of acceding to the law, but that, in our opinion, it is the interest of the country to accede; and that we shall make this report to the committee to whom we are to report, and state to them the reasons of our opinion, that so far as they may appear to have weight they may be regarded by them. It will be our endeavor to conciliate not only them, but the public mind in general, to our sense on this subject; for this purpose, we hope to be assisted by you in giving all that extent and precision, clearness and certainty to your propositions, as may satisfy the understandings and engage the acquiescence of the people.

It is to be understood that, in acceding to the law, no inference is to be drawn, or construction made, that we will relinquish a constitutional opposition; but that we will invariably, undeviatingly, and constantly pursue every legal means and measure of obtaining a repeal of the law in question.

As we are disposed with you to have the sense of the people taken on the subject of our conference as speedily as may be, with that view we have resolved to call the committee to whom our report is to be made at an earlier day than had been appointed, to wit, to meet on Thursday, the 28th instant, but have not thought ourselves justifiable in changing the place, to wit, at Redstone, (Old Fort,) on the Monongahela.

By order of the committee:

No. 3.

The commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, to confer with the citizens in the western parts of Pennsylvania, having been assured by the committee of conference of their determination to approve the proposals made, and to recommend to the general committee, appointed by the meeting at Parkinson's ferry, a submission to the acts of Congress, do now proceed to declare what assurances of submission will be deemed full and satisfactory, and to detail the engagements which they have power to make.

1st. It is expected and required by the said commissioners, that the citizens composing the said general committee do, on or before the 1st day of September, explicitly declare their determination to submit to the laws of the United States; and that they will not, directly or indirectly, oppose the execution of the acts for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills.

2d. That they do explicitly recommend a perfect and entire acquiescence under the execution of the said acts.

3d. That they do, in like manner, recommend that no violence, injuries, or threats be offered to the person or against the property of any officer of the United States, or citizens complying with the laws, and do declare their determination to support (as far as the laws require) the civil authority, in affording the protection due to all officers and citizens.

4th. That measures be taken to ascertain, by meetings in election districts or otherwise, the determination of the citizens in the fourth survey of Pennsylvania to submit to the said laws; and that satisfactory assurances be given to the said commissioners that the people have so determined to submit, on or before the 14th of September next.

The said commissioners, if a full and perfect compliance with the above requisitions shall take place, have power to promise and engage in manner following, to wit:

1st. No prosecution for any treason or other indictable offence against the United States, committed in the fourth survey of Pennsylvania before this day, shall be commenced or proceeded on until the 10th of July next.

2d. If there shall be a general and sincere acquiescence in the execution of the said laws until the said 10th day of July next, a general pardon and oblivion of all such offences shall be granted; excepting therefrom, nevertheless, every person who shall in the mean time wilfully obstruct, or attempt to obstruct, the execution of any of the laws of the United States, or be in anywise aiding or abetting therein.

3d. Congress having, by an act passed on the 5th day of June last, authorized the State courts to take cognizance of offences against the said acts for raising a revenue upon distilled spirits and stills, the President has determined that he will direct suits against such delinquents to be prosecuted therein, if, upon experiment, it be found that local prejudices or other causes do not obstruct the faithful administration of justice; but it is to be understood that of this he must be the judge, and that he does not mean by this determination to impair any power vested in the Executive of the United States.

4th. Certain beneficial arrangements for adjusting delinquencies and prosecutions for penalties now depending shall be made, and communicated by the officers appointed to carry the said acts into execution.

Given under our hands, at Pittsburg, this 22d day of August, 1794.

JAMES ROSS,
J. YEATES,
WM. BRADFORD.

To the Committee of Conference.

No. 4.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, August 23, 1794.

We presume it has been understood by you that the conference on our part consists of members not only from the counties of Pennsylvania west of the Allegany mountains, but also from Ohio county, in Virginia, and your propositions made in general by your first letter being addressed to this conference, the Ohio county was considered as included; yet in your propositions, made in detail your by last, you confine them to the survey within Pennsylvania. We would request an explanation on this particular.

We have only further to say, we shall make a faithful report of your propositions, which we approve of, and will recommend to the people; and however they may be received, we are persuaded nothing more could have been done by you or us to bring this business to an accommodation.

Signed by order of the committee:

To the Commissioners on the part of the Union.

No. 5.

To which the following answer was returned.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, August 23, 1794.

Having received assurances of your approbation of the propositions made by us, and of your determination to recommend them to the people, we have nothing further to add, except to reply to that part of your letter which relates to the gentlemen from Ohio county.

The whole tenor of our letter of the 21st instant shows that we had come among you in consequence of the disturbances which had prevailed in the western parts of Pennsylvania, to prevent the actual employment of military coercion there, as contemplated in the President's proclamation, and that the late offences referred to were the insurrections which had prevailed in some of the western counties. We therefore cannot extend our propositions.

In addition to this, we are well assured that the people of Ohio county have not generally authorized these gentlemen to represent them, and we cannot at present undertake to make any definite arrangement with them.

We are, however, willing to converse with these gentlemen on this subject, and we have no doubt that, on satisfactory proofs of their determination to support the laws of their country, and of an entire submission to them by those from whom they come being given, the President will, upon our recommendation, extend a similar pardon to any late offences committed against the United States, if such there be committed. We are willing, on receiving such assurances from them, to recommend such application accordingly.

JAMES ROSS,
J. YEATES,
WM. BRADFORD.

The following communication was made to the commissioners by the persons said to have been sent from Ohio county, in Virginia.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, August 23, 1794.

We have seen, by your letter of this day, that you have been well assured that the people of Ohio county did not generally authorise us to represent them. All we have to say on that subject is, that we were authorised fully and generally by such persons as met on that occasion. Whether any of the inhabitants were dissatisfied with our being appointed for that purpose, or whether there were any who did not wish an appointment to take place at all, we know not; but we pretend to have no other disine than that of representing such of the citizens of Ohio county as sent us here.

Waving, however, the near personal subject, we think it a duty we owe our fellow-citizens, to wish (and we know it to have been the opinion of the whole committee of conference) that no distinction should be made between offences committed upon the same occasion, arising from the same source, and perpetrated at the same time, whether they happened in Pennsylvania or in Virginia; and we therefore hope you will conceive it, upon full examination, to be part of your present pacific mission to satisfy the minds of the people of Virginia as well as those of Pennsylvania; and that you will give assurances that the same proofs which you require from the people of Pennsylvania of their determination to submit to the laws shall be deemed sufficient, when given by the people of Ohio county, to induce you to recommend to the President to extend a similar pardon to any offences committed there against the United States; and that, whatever objects you may have to consider us in the same point of view with the other members of the committee of conference, you will not require different conditions from, or propose different terms to, the citizens of the two States, &c.*

We have the honor to be, with respect, gentlemen, your most obedient and very humble servants,

ROBT. STEPHENSON,
WILLIAM SUTHERLAND,
WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

To the Commissioners for the United States.

GENTLEMEN:

Having conversed with you on the subject of your letter of this date, we declare to you that, if the same declarations and assurances are made by you, which it is required should be made by the citizens to be assembled at Redstone, and if satisfactory assurances are also given to us of a sincere determination of those individuals in Ohio county, who sent you hither, to submit to the laws for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills, on or before the 14th September next, in such case we will recommend to the President of the United States your petition, requesting that a pardon may be granted for any indictable offence against the United States, committed in Ohio county since the 15th day of July last, and before the present day, on the same terms offered to the inhabitants of the fourth survey of Pennsylvania. But, as certain bonds have been lately taken by force from Zaccheus Biggs, the collector of the said revenue in Ohio county, it is to be clearly understood that said pardon shall not extend to prevent any civil remedy against those who have destroyed the said bonds, or are parties to them.

Given under our hands, August 23, 1794.

GENTLEMEN:

BROWNSVILLE, August 29, 1794.

Difficulties having arisen with us, we have thought it necessary to appoint a committee to confer with you, in order to procure, if possible, some further time, in order that the people may have leisure to reflect on their true situation.

I am, gentlemen, your most obedient humble servant,

EDWARD COOK.

P. S. Enclosed you have a copy of the resolution on that subject.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, August 27, 1794.

Since your departure from Pittsburg, we have transmitted information of our proceedings to the Secretary of State; and it being evident from them, that the satisfactory proofs of a sincere submission to the laws cannot be obtained before the 1st September, we may undertake to assure you that the movement of the militia will be suspended until further information is received from us.

We also authorize you to assure the friends of order, who may be disposed to exert themselves to restore the authority of the laws, that they may rely upon all the protection the Government can give; and that every measure necessary to suppress and punish the violence of ill-disposed individuals who may dissent from the general sentiment (if there should be any such) will be promptly taken in the manner the laws direct.

We are, gentlemen, your most humble servants,

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, September 1, 1794.

The committee appointed by the Committee of Safety, at Redstone, the 28th August last, to confer with the commissioners of the United States and State of Pennsylvania, and agreeable to the resolution of said committee, do request:

1st. That the said commissioners give an assurance, on the part of the General Government, to an indemnity to all persons as to the arrearage of excise that have not entered their stills to this date.

2d. Will the commissioners aforesaid give to the eleventh day of October next, to take the sense of the people at large of the four counties west of Pennsylvania, and that part of Bedford west of the Allegany mountains, and the Ohio county in Virginia, whether they will accede to the resolution of the said commissioners as stated at large in the conference with the Committee of Conference met at Pittsburg the 21st day of August last?

By order of the committee:

JOHN M'CLELLAND.

No. 13.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, September 1, 1794.

We have received your letter of this date, and, as time presses, have determined to give it an immediate answer, although we shall be prevented thereby from making so full and correct a reply as the importance of the subject requires.

In our correspondence with the late Committee of Conference, we detailed those assurances of submission to the laws, which would have been deemed full and satisfactory, and which were necessary to the exercise of the powers vested in us. This detail was minutely settled in a conference with a sub-committee of that body. From a desire on our part to accommodate and to render the proposals as unexceptionable as possible, they were altered and modified at their request, till, being superior to all exception, they received the unanimous approbation of those gentlemen.

The detail, thus settled, required from the standing committee assurances of their explicit determination to submit to the laws of the United States; that they would not, directly or indirectly, oppose the execution of the acts for raising a revenue upon distilled spirits and upon stills; and that they would support, as far as the laws require, the civil authority, in affording the protection due to all officers and other citizens. These assurances have not been given. On the contrary, we learn, with emotions difficult to be repressed, that in the meeting of the committee at Redstone, resistance to the laws and open rebellion against the United States were publicly advocated; and that two-fifths of that body, representing twenty-three townships, totally disapprove the proposals, and preferred the convulsions of a civil contest to the indulgence offered them by their country. Even the members composing the majority, although by a secret and undistinguishing vote, they expressed an opinion that it was the interest of the people to accede to the proposals, did not themselves accede to them, nor give the assurances, nor make the recommendations explicitly required of them. They have adjourned without day, and the terms are broken on their part.

We had reason for requiring these declarations and recommendations from that body. They were a representation (in fact) of the different townships of the western counties; they were a body in whom the people had chosen to place confidence; there were among them men, whose advice and example have had influence in misleading the people, and it was proper they should be instrumental in recalling them to their duty; and an avowed determination to support the civil authority, in protecting the officers, would have assisted in repressing the violence of turbulent individuals.

Our expectations have been unfortunately disappointed; the terms required have not been acceded to. You have been sent hither to demand new terms; and it is now necessary for us to decide, whether we will return home or enter into other arrangements.

Upon reflection, we are satisfied that the President of the United States, while he demands satisfactory proofs that there will be in future a perfect submission to the laws, does not wish the great body of the people should be finally concluded by the conduct or proceedings of that committee; and if the people themselves will make the declarations required of the standing committee, and give satisfactory proofs of a general and sincere determination to obey the laws, the benefits offered may still be obtained by those individuals who shall explicitly avow their submission, as hereinafter mentioned.

It is difficult to decide in what manner the said declarations and determinations of the people to submit peaceably should be taken and ascertained. We have thought much on this subject, and are fully satisfied that a decision by ballot will be wholly unsatisfactory, and that it will be easy to produce by these means an apparent but delusive unanimity. It is, therefore, necessary that the determination of every individual be publicly announced. In a crisis, and on a question like this, it is dishonorable to temporize. Every man ought to declare himself openly, and give his assurances of submission in a manner that cannot be questioned hereafter. If a civil contest must finally take place, the Government ought to know not only the numbers, but the names of the faithful citizens, who may otherwise be in danger of being confounded with the guilty. It therefore remains with you to say, whether you will recommend such a mode of procedure, and will immediately arrange with us the manner in which the sense of the people may be publicly taken, and written assurances of submission obtained, within the time already limited. We desire an explicit and speedy answer in writing.

You request us to "give assurances, on the part of the United States, that an indemnity shall be granted as to the arrears of excise, to all persons that have not entered their stills to this date." If it were proper to remit all arrears of duty, we cannot conceive why those who have entered their stills should not receive a similar indulgence with those who have refused to do so; nor why you demand peculiar favors for the opposers of the acts, while you abandon those who have complied to the strictness of the laws. We have gone on that subject as far as we think advisable. The clause was introduced at the request of the late Committee of Conference; and even the style of expressing it was settled with them. We, therefore, have nothing more to add to that subject.

You require also that time be given until the 11th day of October, in order to ascertain the sense of the people. That is wholly inadmissible. On the day of the conference, the time allowed was deemed sufficiently long; and we are sorry to perceive that delay only tends to produce an indisposition to decide. There are strong reasons, obvious to a reflecting mind, against prolonging the time a single hour. Nothing is required but a declaration of that duty which every man owes to his country, and every man before this day must have made up his mind on the subject. Six weeks have already elapsed since the ordinary exercise of civil authority has been forcibly suppressed, the officers of Government expelled, and the persons and property of well-disposed citizens exposed to the outrages of popular violence. The protection which is due to peaceable citizens; the respect which every Government owes itself, and the great interests of the United States, demand that the authority of the laws be quickly restored. To this we may add, that the militia (which, by late orders from the President, have been increased to 15,000 men, including 1,500 riflemen from Virginia, under the command of Major General Morgan,) have received orders to assemble; and we cannot undertake to promise that their march will be long suspended. All possible means to inform, to conciliate, and to recall our fellow-citizens to their duty have been used. That their infatuation still continues, we regret, but are persuaded that further moderation and forbearance will but increase it.

If the whole country shall declare its determination peaceably to submit, the hopes of the Executive will be fulfilled; but if a part of the inhabitants of the survey shall persist in their unjustifiable resistance to the lawful authority of the United States, it is not the intention of the Government to confound the innocent with the guilty; you may, therefore, assure the friends of order and the laws that they may rely upon promptly receiving all the protection the Government can give, and that effectual measures will be taken to suppress and punish the violence of those individuals who may endeavor to obstruct the execution of the laws, and to involve their country in a scene of calamity, the extent and seriousness of which it is impossible to calculate.

It is easy to perceive, from the whole scope of this letter, that no part of it is addressed to the gentlemen of Ohio county, in Virginia.

GENTLEMEN:

PITTSBURG, September 2, 1794.

We have received your letter of yesterday, and, after having duly considered its contents, we are all of opinion that it is the interest and duty of the people in the western counties of Pennsylvania to submit to the execution of the laws of the United States and of the State of Pennsylvania, upon the principles and terms stated by the commissioners; and we will heartily recommend this measure to them. We are also ready to enter into the detail with you of fixing and ascertaining the time, place, and manner of collecting the sense of the people upon this very momentous subject.

Signed by the unanimous order of the committee:

JOHN McCLELLAND.

No. 15.

At a conference between the commissioners from the United States and the State of Pennsylvania, on the one part, and Messrs. Probst, Dickey, Nesbit, Marshel, Philips, McClelland, Wallace, and Wilson, conferees appointed by the standing committee at Brownsville, (Redstone Old Fort,) on the 28th and 29th days of August, 1794, it was agreed that the assurances required from the citizens in the fourth survey of Pennsylvania should be given in writing, and their sense ascertained in the following manner:

That the citizens of the said survey, (Allegany county excepted,) of the age of eighteen years and upwards, be required to assemble, on Thursday, the 11th instant, in their respective townships, at the usual place for holding township meetings; and that between the hours of twelve and seven in the afternoon of the same day, any two or more members of the meeting who assembled at Parkinson's ferry on the 14th ultimo, resident in the township, or a justice of the peace of said township, do openly propose to the people assembled the following questions: "Do you now engage to submit to the laws of the United States, and that you will not hereafter, directly or indirectly, oppose the execution of the acts for raising a revenue upon distilled spirits and stills? And do you also undertake to support, as far as the laws require, the civil authority, in affording the protection due to all officers and other citizens?" Yea or Nay.

That the said citizens, resident in Allegany county, shall meet in their respective election districts on the said day, and proceed in the same manner as if they were assembled in townships.

That a minute of the number of the yeas and nays be made immediately after ascertaining the same.

That a written or printed declaration of such engagements be signed by all those who vote in the affirmative, of the following tenor, to wit:

"I do solemnly promise henceforth* to submit to the laws of the United States; that I will not directly nor indirectly oppose the execution of the acts for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills; and that I will support, as far as the law requires, the civil authority in affording the protection due to all officers and other citizens."

This shall be signed in the presence of the said members or justices, attested by him or them, and lodged in his or their hands.

That the said persons, so proposing the question stated as aforesaid, do assemble at the respective county court-houses on the 13th instant, and do ascertain and make report of the number of those who voted in the affirmative in the respective townships or districts, and of the number of those who voted in the negative; together with their opinion whether there be such a general submission of the people in their respective counties, that an office of inspection may be immediately and safely established therein.

That the said report, opinion, and written or printed declarations be transmitted to the commissioners, or any one of them, at Uniontown, on or before the 16th instant.

If the said assurances shall be bona fide given in the manner prescribed, the commissioners on the part of the United States do promise and engage in manner following, to wit:

1. No prosecution for any treason or other indictable offence against the United States, committed within the fourth survey of Pennsylvania, before the 22d day of August last, shall be commenced or prosecuted before the 10th day of July next, against any person who shall, within the time limited, subscribe such assurance and engagement as aforesaid, and perform the same.

2. On the said 10th day of July next there shall be granted a general pardon and oblivion of all the said offences, excluding therefrom, nevertheless, every person who shall refuse or neglect to subscribe such assurance and en-agement in manner aforesaid, or shall, after such subscription, violate the same, or wilfully obstruct, or attempt to obstruct, the execution of the said acts, or be aiding or abetting therein.

3. Congress having, by an act passed on the 5th day of June last, authorized the State courts to take cognizance of offences against the said acts for raising a revenue upon distilled spirits and stills, the President has determined that he will direct suits against such delinquents to be prosecuted therein, if, upon experiment, it be found that local prejudices or other causes do not obstruct the faithful administration of justice; but it is to be understood that of this he must be the judge, and that he does not mean by this determination to impair any power vested in the Executive of the United States.

4. Certain beneficial arrangements for adjusting delinquencies and prosecutions for penalties now depending shall be made and communicated by the officers appointed to carry the said acts into execution.

We, the underwritten, do also promise, in behalf of the State of Pennsylvania, that in case the assurances now proposed shall be bona fide given and performed, until the 10th day of July next, an act of free and general pardon and oblivion of all treasons, insurrections, arsons, riots, and other offences inferior to riots, committed, counselled, or suffered, by any person or persons within the four western counties of Pennsylvania, since the 14th day of July last past, so far as the same concerns the said State, or the Government thereof, shall be then granted; excluding therefrom every person who shall refuse or neglect to subscribe such assurance, or who shall, after such subscription, wilfully violate or obstruct the laws of the State or of the United States.

We, the subscribers, members of the committee who met at Parkinson's ferry on the 14th August last, and justices of the peace of the different townships in Washington county, met this 13th day of September, 1794, do find ourselves under great embarrassment to express our sentiments and opinions whether there be such a general submission of the people as that an office of inspection may be immediately and safely established in this county; yet we are free to declare that no opposition shall arise from us, the undersigned, to the excise law, or to any officer appointed under it; and we believe and are of opinion that a large majority of the inhabitants of the respective townships in this county will acquiesce and submit to the said law, under a hope and firm belief that the Congress of the United States will repeal said law.

We, the subscribers, judges of a general election, held in the several townships of the county of Westmoreland, for the purpose of ascertaining certain assurances required of the citizens by the commissioners on the part of the Government, and agreed to on the part of the delegates, having met this day, and taken into consideration the returns from said townships, (true copies of which have been returned to one of the commissioners,) and finding that some gave only general assurances of their submission and disposition for peace, without individually signing the same, and others, in number according to the returns by them respectively made, do certify, that, in our opinion, as ill-disposed lawless persons could suddenly assemble and offer violence, it would not be safe in immediately establishing an office of inspection therein.

We, the subscribers, having, according to resolutions of the committee of townships for the county of Fayette, acted as judges, on the 11th instant, at the meetings of the people of the said county, respectively convened at the places, in the first, second, and third election districts, where the general elections are usually held, (no judge or member of the committee attending from the fourth and last district, which consists of the townships of Tyrone and Bullskin,) do hereby certify that five hundred and sixty of the people, thus convened on the day aforesaid, did then and there declare their determination to submit to the laws of the United States in the manner expressed by the commissioners on the part of the Union, in their letter dated the 22d day of August last; the total number of those who attended on that occasion being only seven hundred and twenty-one, that is to say, something less than one-third of the number of citizens of the said three districts. And we do further certify, that, from our previous knowledge of the disposition of the general body of the people, and from the anxiety since discovered by many, (who, either from not having had notice, or from not having understood the importance of the question, did not attend,) to give similar assurances of submission, we are of opinion that the great majority of those citizens who did not attend are disposed to behave peaceably and with due submission to the laws.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, from a hope that the combinations against the constitution and laws of the United States, in certain of the western counties of Pennsylvania, would yield to time and reflection, I thought it sufficient, in the first instance, rather to take measures for calling forth the militia than immediately to embody them; but the moment is now come when the overtures of forgiveness, with no other condition than a submission to law, have been only partially accepted; when every form of conciliation, not inconsistent with the being of Government, has been adopted without effect; when the well-disposed in those counties are unable by their influence and example to reclaim the wicked from their fury, and are compelled to associate in their own defence; when the proffered lenity has been perversely misinterpreted into an apprehension that the citizens will march with reluctance; when the opportunity of examining the serious consequences of a treasonable opposition has been employed in propagating principles of anarchy, endeavoring, through emissaries, to alienate the friends of order from its support, and inviting its enemies to perpetrate similar acts of insurrection; when it is manifest that violence would continue to be exercised upon every attempt to enforce the laws; when, therefore, Government is set at defiance, the contest being whether a small portion of the United States shall dictate to the whole Union, and, at the expense of those who desire peace, indulge a desperate ambition: Now, therefore, I, George Washington, President of the United States, in obedience to that high and irresistible duty consigned to me by the constitution, "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," deploring that the American name should be sullied by the outrages of citizens on their own Government; commiserating such as remain obstinate from delusion; but resolved, in perfect reliance on that gracious Providence which so signally displays its goodness towards this country, to reduce the refractory to a due subordination to the law, do hereby declare and make known that, with a satisfaction which can be equalled only by the merits of the militia summoned into service from the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, I have received intelligence of their patriotic alacrity in obeying the call of the present, though painful, yet commanding necessity; that a force, which according to every reasonable expectation is adequate to the exigency, is already in motion to the scene of disaffection; that those who have confided, or shall confide, in the protection of Government shall meet full succor under the standard and from the arms of the United States; that those who, having offended against the law, have since entitled themselves to indemnity, will be treated with the most liberal good faith, if they shall not have forfeited their claim by any subsequent conduct, and that instructions are given accordingly. And I do moreover exhort all individuals, officers, and bodies of men, to contemplate with abhorrence the measures leading directly or indirectly to those crimes which produce this resort to military coercion; to check, in their respective spheres, the efforts of misguided or designing men to substitute their misrepresentations in the place of truth, and their discontents in the place of stable Government; and to call to mind, that, as the people of the United States have been permitted, under the Divine favor, in perfect freedom, after solemn deliberation, and in an enlightened age, to elect their own Government, so will their gratitude for this inestimable blessing be best distinguished by firm exertions to maintain the constitution and the laws. And, lastly, I again warn all persons whomsoever and wheresoever not to abet, aid, or comfort the insurgents aforesaid, as they will answer the contrary at their peril; and I do also require all officers and other citizens, according to their several duties, as far as may be in their power, to bring under the cognizance of the law all offenders in the premises.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the twenty-fifth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

By the President:

G. WASHINGTON.
EDM. RANDOLPH.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, August 5, 1794.

The important subject which led to our conference on Saturday last, and the interesting discussion that then took place, having since engaged my whole attention, I am prepared, in compliance with your request, to state with candor the measures which, in my opinion, ought to be pursued by the commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The circumstances of the case evidently require a firm and energetic conduct on our part, as well as on the part of the General Government; but as they do not preclude the exercise of a prudent and humane policy, I enjoy a sincere gratification in recollecting the sentiment of regret with which you contemplated the possible necessity of an appeal to arms; for I confess that in manifesting a zealous disposition to secure obedience to the constitution and laws of our country, I too shall ever prefer the instruments of conciliation to those of coercion, and never, but in the last resort, countenance a dereliction of judiciary authority for the exertion of military force.

Under the influence of this general sentiment, I shall proceed, sir, to deliver my opinion relatively to the recent riots in the county of Allegany, recapitulating, in the first place, the actual state of the information which I have received. It appears, then, that the marshal of the district having, without molestation, served certain process that issued from a federal court on various citizens who reside in the county of Fayette, thought it proper to prosecute a similar duty in the county of Allegany, with the assistance and in the company of General Neville, the inspector of the excise for the western district of Pennsylvania; that, while thus accompanied, he suffered some insults and encountered some opposition: that considerable bodies of armed men, having at several times demanded the surrender of General Neville's commission and papers, attacked and ultimately destroyed his house: that these rioters, (of whom a few were killed and many wounded) having taken the marshal and others prisoners, released that officer in consideration of a promise that he would serve no more process on the western side of the Allegany mountain: that, under the apprehension of violence, General Neville, before his house was destroyed, applied to the judges of Allegany county for the protection of his property; but the judges, on the 17th day of July, the day on which his house was destroyed, declared that they could not, in the present circumstances, afford the protection that was requested, though they offered to institute prosecutions against the offenders: and that General Neville and the marshal, menaced with further outrage by the rioters, had been under the necessity of withdrawing from the county. To this outline of the actual information respecting the riots, the stoppage of the mail may be added as matter of aggravation, and the proposed convention of the inhabitants of the neighboring counties of Pennsylvania and Virginia as matter of alarm.

Whatever construction may be given, on the part of the United States, to the facts that have been recited, I cannot hesitate to declare, on the part of Pennsylvania, that the incompetency of the judiciary department of her Government to vindicate the violated laws has not at this period been made sufficiently apparent; and that the military power of the Government ought not to be employed until its judiciary authority, after a fair experiment, has proved incompetent to enforce obedience or to punish infractions of the law.

The law having established a tribunal, and prescribed the mode for investigating every charge, has likewise attached to every offence its proper punishment. If an opponent of the excise system refuses or omits to perform the duty which that system prescribes to him in common with his fellow-citizens, his refusal or omission exposes him to the penalty of the law; but the payment of the penalty expiates the legal offence. If a riot is committed in the course of a resistance to the execution of any law, the rioters expose themselves to prosecution and punishment; but the sufferance of their sentence extinguishes their crime. In either instance, however, if the strength and audacity of a lawless combination shall baffle and destroy the efforts of the judiciary authority to recover a penalty or to inflict a punishment, that authority may constitutionally claim the auxiliary intervention of a military power; but still the intervention cannot commence till the impotency of the judicial authority has been proved by experiment, nor continue a moment longer than the occasion for which it was expressly required. That the laws of the Union are the laws of the State, is a constitutional axiom that will never be controverted. That the authority of the State ought to be exerted in maintaining the authority of the Union, is a patriotic position which I have uniformly inculcated; but in executing the laws, or maintaining the authority of the Union, the Government of Pennsylvania can only employ the same means by which the more peculiarly municipal laws and authority of the State are executed and maintained. Till the riot was committed, no offence had occurred which required the aid of the State Government. When it was committed, it became the duty of the State Government to prosecute the offenders as for a breach of the public peace and the laws of the commonwealth; and if the measures shall be precisely what would have been pursued had the riot been unconnected with the system of federal policy, all, I presume, will be done which good faith and justice can require. Had the riot been unconnected with the system of federal policy, the vindication of our laws would be left to the ordinary course of justice; and only in the last resort, at the requisition, and as an auxiliary of the civil authority, would the military force of the State be called forth.

Experience furnishes the strongest inducements to my mind for persevering in this lenient course. Riots have heretofore been committed in opposition to the laws of Pennsylvania; but the rioters have invariably been punished by our courts of justice. In opposition to the laws of the United States, in opposition to the very laws now opposed, and in the very counties supposed to be combined in the present opposition, riots have likewise formerly occurred; but in every instance, supported by legal proof, the offenders have been indicted, convicted, and punished, before the tribunals of the State. This result does not announce a defect of jurisdiction, a want of judicial power or disposition to punish infractions of the law, or a necessity for an appeal from the political to the physical strength of the nation.

But another principle of policy deserves some consideration. In a free country it must be expedient to convince the citizens of the necessity that shall at any time induce the Government to employ the coercive authority with which it is invested. To convince them that it is necessary to call forth the military power for the purpose of executing the laws, it must be shown that the judicial power has in vain attempted to punish those who violate them; and, therefore, thinking as I do that the incompetency of the judicial power of Pennsylvania has not yet been sufficiently ascertained, I remarked, in the course of our late conference, that I did not think it would be an easy task to embody the militia on the present occasion. The citizens of Pennsylvania (however a part of them may for a while be deluded) are the friends of law and order; but when the inhabitants of one district shall be required to take arms against the inhabitants of another, their general character does not authorize me to promise a passive obedience to the mandates of Government. I believe that, as freemen, they would inquire into the cause and nature of the service proposed to them; and I believe that their alacrity in performing, as well as in accepting it, would essentially depend on their opinion of its justice and necessity.

Upon great political emergencies, the effect of every measure should be deliberately weighed. If it shall be doubted, whether saying that the judiciary power is yet untried is enough to deter us from the immediate use of military force, an anticipation of the probable consequences of that awful appeal will enable us, perhaps, satisfactorily to remove or overlook the doubt. Will not the resort to force inflame and cement the existing opposition? Will it not associate, in a common resistance, those who have hitherto peaceably, as well as those who have riotously, expressed their abhorrence of the excise? Will it not collect and combine every latent principle of discontent, arising from the supposed oppressive operations of the federal judiciary, the obstruction of the western navigation, and a variety of other local sources? May not the magnitude of the opposition, on the part of the ill-disposed, or the dissatisfaction at a premature resort to arms, on the part of the well-disposed citizens of this State, eventually involve the necessity of employing the militia of other States? And the accumulation of discontent, which the jealousy engendered by that movement may produce, who can calculate, or who will be able to avert? Nor, in this view of the subject, ought we to omit paying some regard to the ground for suspecting that the British Government has already, insidiously and unjustly, attempted to seduce the citizens on our western frontier from their duty; and, we know that, in a moment of desperation or disgust, men may be led to accept that as an asylum, which, under different impressions, they would shun as a snare. It will not, I am persuaded, sir, be presumed, from the expression of these sentiments, that I am insensible to the indignation which the late outrages ought to excite in the mind of a magistrate intrusted with the execution of the laws. My object, at present, is to demonstrate that, on the principles of policy as well as of law, it would be improper in me to employ the military power of the State, while its judiciary authority is competent to punish the offenders. But should the judiciary authority prove insufficient, be assured of the most vigorous co-operation of the whole force which the constitution and laws of the State intrust to me, for the purpose of compelling a due obedience to the Government; and, in that unfortunate event, convinced that every other expedient has been resorted to in vain, the public opinion will sanctify our measures, and every honest citizen will willingly lend his aid to strengthen and promote them.

The steps which, under my instructions, were taken as soon as the intelligence respecting the riots was received, will clearly, indeed, manifest the sense that I entertain upon the subject. To every judge, justice, sheriff, brigade, inspector—in short, to every public officer residing in the western counties, a letter was addressed, expressing my indignation and regret, and requiring an exertion of their influence and authority to suppress the tumults and punish the offenders. The Attorney General of the State was, likewise, desired to investigate the circumstances of the riot, to ascertain the names of the rioters, and to institute the regular process of the law for bringing the leaders to justice. In addition to these preliminary measures, I propose issuing a proclamation, in order to declare (as far as I can declare them) the sentiments of the Government; to announce a determination to prosecute and punish the offenders; and to exhort the citizens at large to pursue a peaceable and patriotic conduct. I propose engaging three respectable citizens to act as commissioners for addressing those who have embarked in the present combination, upon the lawless nature and ruinous tendency of their proceedings; for inculcating the necessity of an immediate return to the duty which they owe their country; and for promising (as far as the State is concerned) a forgiveness of their past transgressions, upon receiving a satisfactory assurance that, in future, they will submit to the laws; and I propose, if all these expedients should be abortive, to convene the Legislature, that the ultimate means of subduing the spirit of insurrection, and of restoring tranquillity and order, may be prescribed by their wisdom and authority.

You will perceive, sir, that throughout my observations I have cautiously avoided any reference to the nature of the evidence from which the facts that relate to the riots are collected, or to the conduct which the Government of the United States may pursue on this important occasion. I have hitherto, indeed, only spoken as the Executive Magistrate of Pennsylvania, charged with a general superintendence and care that the laws of the commonwealth be faithfully executed, leaving it, as I ought, implicitly to your judgment to choose on such evidence as you approve, the measures for discharging the analogous trust which is confided to you in relation to the laws of the Union. But before I conclude, it is proper, under the impression of my federal obligations, to add a full and unequivocal assurance, that whatever requisition you may make, whatever duty you may impose, in pursuance of your constitutional and legal powers, will on my part be promptly undertaken and faithfully discharged.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

THO. MIFFLIN.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 7, 1794.

The President of the United States has directed me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, and to communicate to you the following reply:

In requesting an interview with you on the subject of the recent disturbances in the western parts of Pennsylvania, the President, besides the desire of manifesting a respectful attention to the Chief Magistrate of a State immediately affected, was influenced by the hopes that a free conference, guided by a united and comprehensive view of the constitutions of the United States and of Pennsylvania, and of the respective institutions, authorities, rights, and duties of the two Governments, would have assisted him in forming more precise ideas of the nature of the co-operation which could be established between them, and a better judgment of the plan which it might be advisable for him to pursue, in the execution of his trust in so important and delicate a conjuncture. This having been his object, it is matter of some regret that the course which has been suggested by you as proper to be pursued, seems to have contemplated Pennsylvania in a light too separate and unconnected. The propriety of that course in most, if not in all respects, would be susceptible of little question, if there were no Federal Government, federal laws, federal judiciary, or federal officers; if important laws of the United States, by a series of violent, as well as of artful expedients, had not been frustrated in their execution for more than three years; if officers immediately charged with that execution, after suffering much and repeated insult, abuse, personal ill-treatment, and the destruction of property, had not been compelled for safety to fly the places of their residence and the scenes of their official duties; if the service of the processes of a court of the United States had not been resisted, the marshal of the district made and detained for some time prisoner, and compelled for safety also to abandon the performance of his duty, and return, by a circuitous route, to the seat of Government; if, in fine, a judge of the United States had not, in due form of law, notified to the President "that, in the counties of Washington and Allegany, in Pennsylvania, laws of the United States are opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal of that district." It is true your excellency has remarked that, in the plan suggested, you have only spoken as the Executive Magistrate of Pennsylvania, charged with a general superintendence and care that the laws of the commonwealth be fully executed, leaving it implicitly to the judgment of the President to choose, on such evidence as he approves, the measures for discharging the analogous trust which is confided to him in relation to the laws of the Union. But it is impossible not to think that the current of the observations in your letter, especially as to the consequences which may result from the employment of coercive measures previous to the preliminary course which is indicated in it, may be construed to imply a virtual disapprobation of that plan of conduct on the part of the General Government in the actual stage of its affairs, which you acknowledge would be proper on the part of the Government of Pennsylvania if arrived at a similar stage. Let it be assumed here, (to be more particularly shown hereafter,) that the Government of the United States is now at that point where it is admitted, if the Government of Pennsylvania was, the employment of force, by its authority, would be justifiable. And let the following extracts be consulted for the truth of the inference which has been just expressed: "Will not the resort to force inflame and cement the existing opposition? Will it not associate in a common resistance those who have hitherto peaceably, as well as those who have riotously, expressed their abhorrence of the excise? Will it not collect and combine every latent principle of discontent arising from the supposed oppressive operations of the federal judiciary, the obstruction of the western navigation, and a variety of other local sources? May not the magnitude of the opposition on the part of the ill-disposed, or the dissatisfaction of a premature resort to arms on the part of the well-disposed citizens of the State, eventually involve the necessity of employing the militia of other States? And the accumulation of discontent, which the jealousy engendered by that moment may produce, who can calculate, or who will be able to avert?"

These important questions naturally give birth to the following serious reflections—the issue of human affairs are in the hands of Providence. Those intrusted with them in society have no other sure guide than the sincere and faithful discharge of their duty, according to the best of their judgment. In emergencies great and difficult, not to act with an energy proportioned to their magnitude and pressure is as dangerous as any other conceivable course. In the present case, not to exert the means which the laws prescribe for effectuating their own execution, would be to sacrifice those laws, and with them the constitution, the Government, the principles of social order, and the bulwarks of private right and security. What worse can happen from the execution of those means?

If, as cannot be doubted, the great body of the citizens of the United States are attached to the constitution which they have established for the management of their common concerns; if they are resolved to support their own authority, in that of the constitutional laws, against disorderly and violent combinations of comparatively small portions of the community; if they are determined to protect each other in the enjoyment of security to person and property; if they are decided to preserve the character of republican government, by evincing that it has adequate resources for maintaining the public order; if they are persuaded that their safety and their welfare are materially connected with the preservation of the Union, and, consequently, of a Government adequate to its exigencies; in fine, if they are disposed to continue that state of respectability and prosperity which is now deservedly the admiration of mankind, the enterprise to be accomplished, should a resort to force prove inevitable, though disagreeable and painful, cannot be arduous or alarming.

If, in addition to these dispositions in the community at large, the officers of the Governments of the respective States, feeling it to be not only a patriotic, but a constitutional duty (inculcated by the oath enjoined upon all the officers of a State, legislative, executive, and judicial) to support, in their several stations, the constitution of the United States, shall be disposed, as occasion may require, (a thing as little to be doubted as the former,) with sincerity and good faith to co-operate with the Government of the United States, to second, with all their influence and weight, its legal and necessary measures by a real and substantial concert, then the enterprise to be accomplished can hardly ever be deemed difficult.

But if, contrary to the anticipations which are entertained of these favorable dispositions, the great body of the people should be found indifferent to the preservation of the Government of the Union, or insensible to the necessity of vigorous exertions to repel the danger with threatens their most important interests; or if an unwillingness to encounter partial inconveniences should interfere with the discharge of what they owe to their permanent welfare; or if either yielding to the suggestions of particular prejudices, or misled by the arts which may be employed to infuse jealousy and discontent, they should suffer their zeal for the support of public order to be relaxed by an unfavorable opinion of the merits and tendency of the measures which may be adopted; if, above all, it were possible that any of the State Governments should, instead of prompting the exertions of the citizens, assist directly or indirectly in damping their ardor, by giving a wrong bias to their judgment, or by disseminating dissatisfaction with the proceedings of the General Government, or should counteract the success of those proceedings by any sinister influence whatever; then, indeed, no one can calculate, or may be able to avert, the fatal evils with which such a state of things would be pregnant. Then, indeed, the foundations of our political happiness may be deeply shaken, if not altogether overturned.

The President, however, can suppose none of these things. He cherishes an unqualified confidence in the virtue and good sense of the people, in the integrity and patriotism of the officers of the State Governments; and he counts absolutely on the same affectionate support which he has experienced upon all former occasions, and which he is conscious that the goodness of his intentions now, not less than heretofore, merits.

It has been promised to show more particularly hereafter that the Government of the United States is now at that point where it is confessed, if the State Government was, the employment of force on its part would be justifiable. This promise remains to be fulfilled.

The facts already noted establish the conclusion; but to render it palpable, it will be of use to apply them to the positions which your excellency has been pleased to lay down.

You admit that, as the offences committed respect the State, the military power of the Government ought to be employed where its judiciary authority, after a fair experiment, had proved incompetent to enforce obedience, or to punish infractions of the law; that if the strength and audacity of a lawless combination shall baffle and destroy the efforts of the judiciary authority to recover a penalty or inflict a punishment, that authority may constitutionally claim the auxiliary intervention of the military power; that, in the last resort, at the requisition, and as an auxiliary of the civil authority, the military force of the State would be called forth. And you declare that the circumstances of the case evidently require a firm and energetic conduct on the part both of State and General Governments.

For more than three years, as already observed, certain laws of the United States have been obstructed in their execution by disorderly combinations. Not only officers, whose immediate duty it was to carry them into effect, have suffered violent personal outrage and injury, and destruction of property, at different times, but similar persecution has been extended to private citizens, who have aided, countenanced, or only complied with the laws. The violences committed have been so frequent, and such, in their degree, as to have been matter of general notoriety and alarm; and it may be added, that they have been abundantly within the knowledge and under the notice of the judges and marshals of Pennsylvania, of superior as well as of inferior jurisdiction. If, in particular instances, they have been punished by the exertions of the magistrates, it is at least certain that their effects have been, in the main, ineffectual. The spirit has continued, and, with some intervals of relaxation, has been progressive, manifesting itself in reiterated excesses. The judiciary authority of the United States has, also, prior to the attempt which preceded the late crisis, made some fruitless efforts under a former marshal; an officer sent to execute process, was deterred from it by the manifest danger of proceeding. These particulars serve to explain the extent, obstinacy, and inveteracy of the evil.

But the facts which immediately decide the complexion of the existing crisis are these—numerous delinquencies existed with regard to a compliance with the laws laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills. An armed banditti, in disguise, had recently gone to the house of an officer of the revenue in the night, attacked it, broke open the doors, and, by menaces of instant death, enforced by pistols presented at him, had compelled a surrender of his commission and books of office. Contemporary acts of violence had been perpetrated in other quarters. Processes issued out of a court of the United States to recover the penalties incident to non-compliance with the laws, and to bring to punishment the violent infractors of them in the above-mentioned case, against two of whom indictments had been found. The marshal of the district went in person to execute these processes. In the course of his duty he was actually fired upon on the high road by a body of armed men. Shortly after, other bodies of armed men (in the last instance amounting to several hundred persons) repeatedly attacked the house of the inspector of the revenue, with the declared intention of compelling him to renounce his office, and of obstructing the execution of the laws. One of these bodies of armed men made prisoner the marshal of the district, put him in jeopardy of his life, and did not release him till, for safety, and to obtain his liberty, he engaged to forbear the execution of the processes with which he was charged. In consequence of further requisitions and menaces of the insurgents, the marshal, together with the inspector of the revenue, have been since under the necessity of flying secretly, and by a circuitous route, from the scene of these transactions towards the seat of Government.

An associate justice, pursuant to the provisions of the laws for that purpose, has, in the manner already stated, officially notified the President of the existence of combinations in two of the counties of this State to obstruct the execution of the laws, too powerful to be suppressed by the judiciary authority, or by the powers of the marshal.

Thus, then, is it unequivocally, and in due form, ascertained, in reference to the Government of the United States, that the judiciary authority, after a fair and full experiment, has proved incompetent to enforce obedience to or to punish infractions of the laws; that the strength and audacity of certain lawless combinations have baffled and destroyed the efforts of the judiciary authority to recover penalties or inflict punishment; and that this authority, by a regular notification of this state of things, has, in the last resort, as an auxiliary of the civil authority, claimed the intervention of the military power of the United States. It results, from these facts, that the case exists, when, according to the positions advanced by your excellency in reference to the State Government, the military power may, with due regard to all the requisite cautions, be rightfully interposed. And that the interposition of this power is called for not only by principles of a firm and energetic conduct on the part of the General Government, but by the indispensable duty which the constitution and the laws prescribe to the Executive of the United States.

In this conclusion, your excellency's discernment, on mature reflection, cannot, it is presumed, fail to acquiesce; nor can it refuse its concurrence in the opinion which the President entertains, that he may reasonably expect, when called for, the zealous co-operation of the militia of Pennsylvania; that, as citizens, friends to law and order, they may comply with the call without any thing that can properly be denominated "a passive obedience to the mandates of Government;" and that, as freemen, judging rightly of the cause and nature of the service proposed to them, they will feel themselves under the most sacred of obligations to accept and to perform it with alacrity. The theory of our political institutions knows no difference between the obligations of our citizens in such a case, whether it relate to the Government of the Union or of a State; and it is hoped and confided that a difference will be as little known to their affections or opinions.

Your excellency, it is also presumed, will as little doubt, on the like mature reflection, that in such a case the President could not, without an abdication of the undoubted rights and authorities of the United States and of his duty, postpone the measures for which the laws of the United States provide, to a previous experiment of the plan which is delineated in your letter.

The people of the United States have established a Government for the management of their general interests. They have instituted executive organs for administering that Government; and their representatives have established the rules by which those organs are to act. When their authority, in that of their Government, is attacked by lawless combinations of the citizens of part of a State, they could never be expected to approve that the care of vindicating their authority, of enforcing their laws, should be transferred from the officers of their own Government to those of a State; and this to wait the issue of a process so undeterminate in its duration as that which it is proposed to pursue; comprehending a further and full experiment of the judiciary authority of the State, a proclamation "to declare the sentiments of its Government, announce a determination to prosecute and punish offenders, and to exhort the citizens at large to pursue a peaceable and patriotic conduct;" the sending of commissioners "to address those who have embarked in the present combinations upon the lawless nature and ruinous tendency of their proceedings, to inculcate the necessity of an immediate return to the duty which they owe their country, and to promise, as far as the State is concerned, forgiveness of their past transactions, upon receiving a satisfactory assurance that in future they will submit to the laws;" and, finally, a call of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, "that the ultimate means of subduing the spirit of insurrection, and of restoring tranquillity and order, may be prescribed by their wisdom and authority."

If there were no other objection to a transfer of this kind, the very important difference which is supposed to exist in the nature and consequences of the offences that have been committed in the contemplation of the laws of the United States and of those of Pennsylvania, would alone be a very serious obstacle.

The paramount considerations which forbid an acquiescence in this course of proceeding, render it unnecessary to discuss the probability of its success; else it might have been proper to test the considerations which have been mentioned as a ground of hope, by the inquiry what was the precise extent of the success of past experiments, and especially whether the execution of the revenue laws of Pennsylvania, within the scene in question, was truly and effectually accomplished by them; or, whether they did not rather terminate in a tacit compromise, by which appearances only were saved.

You are already, sir, advised that the President, yielding to the impressions which have been stated, has determined to take measures for calling forth the militia, and that these measures contemplate the assembling a body of between twelve and thirteen thousand men from Pennsylvania, and the neighboring States of Virginia, Maryland, and New Jersey. The recourse thus early to the militia of the neighboring States proceeds from a probability of the insufficiency of that of Pennsylvania alone to accomplish the object; your excellency having, in your conference with the President, confirmed the conclusion, which was deducible from the known local and other circumstances of the State, by the frank and express declaration which you made of your conviction of that insufficiency in reference to the number which could be expected to be drawn forth for the purpose.

But while the President has conceived himself to be under an indispensable obligation to prepare for that eventual resort, he has still consulted the sentiment of regret which he expressed to you at the possible necessity of an appeal to arms; and to avert it, if practicable, as well as to manifest his attention to the principle that "a firm and energetic conduct does not preclude the exercise of a prudent and humane policy," he has (as you have been also advised) concluded upon the measure of sending himself commissioners to the discontented counties, to make one more experiment of a conciliatory appeal to the reason, virtue, and patriotism of their inhabitants; and has also signified to you how agreeable would be to him your co-operation in the same expedient, which you have been pleased to afford. It can scarcely be requisite to add, that there is nothing he has more at heart than that the issue of this experiment, by establishing the authority of the laws, may preclude the always calamitous necessity of an appeal to arms. It would plant a thorn in the remainder of his path through life to have been obliged to employ force against fellow-citizens, for giving solidity and permanency to blessings which it has been his greatest happiness to co-operate with them in procuring for a much loved country.

The President receives with much pleasure the assurance you have repeated to him, that whatever requisition he may make, whatever duty he may impose, in pursuance of his constitutional and legal powers, will on your part be promptly undertaken and faithfully discharged; and acknowledging, as an earnest of this, and even more, the measures of co-operation which you are pursuing, he assures you, in return, that he relies fully on the most cordial aid and support from you in every way which the constitutions of the United States and of Pennsylvania shall authorize and present, or future exigencies may require.

And he requests that you will construe, with a reference to this assurance of his confidence, whatever remarks may have been made in the course of this reply to your letter, if it shall have happened that any of them have erred, through a misconception of the sentiments and views which you may have meant to communicate.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

His Excellency Governor MIFFLIN.

PHILADELPHIA, August 12, 1794.

SIR:

The Secretary of State has transmitted to me, in a letter dated the 7th of August, (but only received yesterday,) your reply to my letter of the 5th instant.

For a variety of reasons, it might be desirable at this time to avoid an extension of our correspondence upon the subject to which those letters particularly relate; but the nature of the remarks contained in your reply, and the sincerity of my desire to merit, on the clearest principles, the confidence which you are pleased to repose in me, will justify, even under the present circumstances of the case, an attempt to explain any ambiguity and to remove any prejudices that may have arisen, either from an inaccurate expression or an accidental misconception of the sentiments and views which I meant to communicate.

That the course which I have suggested as proper to be pursued in relation to the recent disturbances in the western parts of Pennsylvania contemplates the State in a light too separate and unconnected, is a position that I certainly did not intend to sanction in any degree that could wound your mind with a sentiment of regret. In submitting the construction of the facts which must regulate the operations of the General Government implicitly to your judgment; in cautiously avoiding any reference to the nature of the evidence from which those facts are collected, or to the conduct which the Government of the United States might pursue; in declaring that I spoke only as the Executive Magistrate of the State, charged with a general superintendence and care that its laws be faithfully executed; and, above all, in giving a full and unequivocal assurance that whatever requisition you may make, whatever duty you may impose, in pursuance of your constitutional and legal powers, would on my part be promptly undertaken and faithfully discharged—I thought that I had manifested the strongest sense of my federal obligations; and that, so far from regarding the State in a separate and unconnected light, I had expressly recognised the subjection of her individual authority to the national jurisdiction of the Union.

It is true, however, sir, that I have only spoken as the Executive Magistrate of the State; but, in that character, it is a high gratification to find that, according to your opinion likewise, “the propriety of the course which I suggested would, in most if not in all respects, be susceptible of little question.” Permit me then to ask, in what other character could I have spoken, or what other language did the occasion require to be employed? If the co-operation of the Government of Pennsylvania was the object of our conference, your constitutional requisition as the Executive of the Union, and my official compliance as the Executive of the State, would indubitably insure it; but if a preliminary, a separate, an unconnected conduct was expected to be pursued by the Executive Magistrate of Pennsylvania, his separate and unconnected power and discretion must furnish the rule of proceeding; and by that rule, agreeably to the admission which I have cited, “the propriety of my course would, in most if not in all respects, be susceptible of little question.” It must, therefore, in justice be remembered, that a principal point in our conference related to the expediency of my adopting, independent of the General Government, a preliminary measure, (as it was then termed,) under the authority of an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which was passed on the 22d of September, 1783, and which the Attorney General of the United States thought to be in force, but which had in fact been repealed on the 11th of April, 1793.

Upon the strictest idea of co-operative measures, however, I do not conceive, sir, that any other plan could have been suggested consistently with the powers of the Executive Magistrate of Pennsylvania, or with a reasonable attention, on my part, to a systematic and energetic course of proceeding. The complicated nature of the outrage which was committed upon the public peace gave a jurisdiction to both Governments; but in the mode of prosecuting, or in the degree of punishing the offenders, that circumstance could not, I apprehend, alter or enlarge the powers of either. The State (as I observed in my last letter) could only exert itself in executing the laws or maintaining the authority of the Union by the same means which she employed to execute and maintain her more peculiarly municipal laws and authority; and hence I inferred, and still venture to infer, that if the course which I have suggested is the same that would have been pursued had the riot been unconnected with the system of federal policy, its propriety cannot be rendered questionable merely by taking into our view (what I never have ceased to contemplate) the existence of a federal Government, federal laws, federal judiciary, and federal officers. But would it have been thought more consonant with the principle of co-operation, had I issued orders for an immediate, a separate, and an unconnected call of the militia, under the special authority which was supposed to be given by a law, or under the general authority which may be presumed to result from the constitution? Let it be considered that you had already determined to exercise your legal powers in draughting a competent force of the militia, and it will be allowed that if I had undertaken not only to comply promptly with your requisition, but to embody a distinct corps for the same service, a useless expense would have been incurred by the State, an unnecessary burden would have been imposed on the citizens, and embarrassment and confusion would probably have been introduced instead of system and co-operation. Regarding it in this point of light, indeed, it may be natural to think that, in the judiciary as well as the military department, the subject should be left entirely to the management either of the State or of the General Government; for “the very important difference which is supposed to exist in the nature and consequences of the offences that have been committed, in the contemplation of the laws of the United States and those of Pennsylvania,” must otherwise destroy that uniformity in the distinction of crimes, and the apportionment of punishments, which has always been deemed essential to a due administration of justice.

But let me not, sir, be again misunderstood: I do not mean by these observations to intimate an opinion, or to express a wish, that “the care of vindicating the authority or of enforcing the laws of the Union should be transferred from the officers of the General Government to those of the State;” nor, after expressly avowing that I had cautiously avoided any reference to the conduct which the Government of the United States might pursue on this important occasion, did I think an opportunity could be found to infer that I was desirous of imposing a suspension of your proceedings, for the purpose of waiting the issue of the process which I designed to pursue. If, indeed, “the Government of the United States was at that point, where, it was admitted, if the Government of Pennsylvania was, the employment of force by its authority would be justifiable,” I am persuaded that, on mature consideration, you will do more credit to my candor than to suppose that I meant to condemn or to prevent the adoption of those measures on the part of the General Government which in the same circumstances I should have approved and promoted on the part of Pennsylvania. The extracts that are introduced into the letter of the Secretary of State, in order to support that inference, can only be justly applied to the case which was immediately in contemplation—the case of the State of Pennsylvania, whose judiciary authority had not then, in my opinion, been sufficiently tried. They ought not surely be applied to a case which I had cautiously excluded from my view—the case of the United States, whose judiciary authority had, in your opinion, proved inadequate to the execution of the laws and the preservation of order. And if they shall be thus limited to their proper object, the justice and force of the argument which flows from them can never be successfully controverted or denied. While you, sir, were treading in the plain path designated by a positive law with no other care than to preserve the forms which the Legislature had prescribed, and relieved from a weight of responsibility by the legal operation of a judge’s certificate,

I was called upon to act, not in conformity to a positive law, but in compliance with the duty which is supposed to result from the nature and constitution of the Executive office.

The Legislature had prescribed no forms to regulate my course; no certificate to inform my judgment; every step must be directed by my own discretion; and every error of construction or conduct would be charged on my own character. Hence arose an essential difference in our official situations; and I am confident that on this ground alone you will perceive a sufficient motive for my considering the objection, in point of law, to forbear the use of military force, until the judiciary authority had been tried, as well as the probable effects, in point of policy, which that awful appeal might produce.

For, sir, it is certain that at the time of our conference there was no satisfactory evidence of the incompetency of the judicial authority of Pennsylvania to vindicate the violated laws; I, therefore, could not, as Executive Magistrate, proceed upon a military plan; but actuated by the genuine spirit of co-operation, not by a desire to sully the dignity or to alienate the powers of the General Government; I still hoped and expected to be able on this, as on former occasions, to support the laws of the Union, or to punish the violators of them, by an exertion of the civil authority of the State Government, the State judiciary, and the State officers. This hope prompted the conciliatory course which I determined to pursue, and which, so far as respects the appointment of commissioners, you have been pleased to incorporate with your plan. And if, after all, the purposes of justice could be attained, obedience to the laws could be restored, and the horrors of a civil war could be averted, by the auxiliary intervention of the State Government, I am persuaded you will join me in thinking that the idea of placing the State in a separate and unconnected point of view, and the idea of making a transfer of the powers of the General Government, are not sufficiently clear or cogent to supersede such momentous considerations.

Having thus generally explained the principles contained in my letter of the 5th instant, permit me (without advertent to the material change that has since occurred in the state of our information, relative to the riots, and which is calculated to produce a corresponding change of sentiments and conduct) to remark, that many of the facts that are mentioned by the Secretary of State, in order to show that the judiciary authority of the Union, after a fair and full experiment, had proved incompetent to enforce obedience, or to punish infractions of the laws, were, before that communication, totally unknown to me. But still, if it shall not be deemed a deviation from the restriction that I have determined to impose upon my correspondence, I would offer some doubts which, in that respect, occurred to my mind on the evidence, as it appeared at the time of our conference. When I found that the marshal had, without molestation, executed his office in the county of Fayette, that he never was insulted or opposed until he acted in company with General Neville, and that the virulence of the rioters was directly manifested against the person and property of the latter gentleman, and only incidentally against the person of the former, I thought there was ground yet to suppose (and as long as it was reasonable I wished to suppose) that a spirit of opposition to the officers employed under the excise law, and not a spirit of opposition to the officers employed in the administration of justice, was the immediate source of the outrages which we deprecate. It is true that these sources of opposition are equally reprehensible, and that their effects are alike unlawful; but on a question respecting the power of the judiciary authority to enforce obedience, or to punish infractions of the law, it seemed to be material to discriminate between the cases alluded to, and to ascertain with precision the motives and the object of the rioters. Again: as the associate judge had not, at that time, issued his certificate, it was proper to scrutinize with strict attention the nature of the evidence on which an act of Government was to be founded. The constitution of the Union, as well as of the State, had cautiously provided, even in the case of an individual, that "no warrant should issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." And a much higher degree of caution might reasonably be exercised in a case that involved a numerous body of citizens in the imputation of treason or felony, and required a substitution of the military for the judicial instruments of coercion. The only affidavits that I recollect to have appeared at the time of our conference were those containing the hearsay of Colonel Mentges, and the vague narrative of the post rider. The letters that had been received from a variety of respectable citizens, not being written under the sanction of an oath or affirmation, could not acquire the legal force and validity of evidence, from a mere authentication of the signatures of the respective writers. Under such circumstances, doubts arose, not whether the means which the laws prescribe for effectuating their own execution should be exerted, but whether the existence of a specific case, to which specific means of redress were appropriated by the laws, had been legally established; not whether the laws, the constitution, the Government, the principles of social order, and the bulwarks of private right and security should be sacrificed, but whether the plan proposed was the best calculated to preserve those inestimable blessings. And, recollecting a declaration which was made in your presence, "that it would not be enough for a military force to disperse the insurgents, and to restore matters to the situation in which they were, two or three weeks before the riots were committed, but that the force must be continued for the purpose of protecting the officers of the revenue, and securing a perfect acquiescence in the obnoxious law," I confess, sir, the motives to caution and deliberation strike my mind with accumulated force. I hope, however, that it will never be seriously contended that a military force ought now to be raised with any view but to suppress the rioters; or that, if raised with that view, it ought to be employed for any other. The dispersion of the insurgents is, indeed, obviously the sole object for which the act of Congress has authorized the use of military force, on occasions like the present, for, with a generous and laudable precaution, it expressly provides that even before that force may be called forth a proclamation shall be issued, commanding the insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time.

But the force of these topics I again refer implicitly to your decision; convinced, sir, that the goodness of your intentions now, not less than heretofore, merits an affectionate support from every description of your fellow-citizens. For my own part, I derive a confidence from the heartfelt integrity of my views, and the sincerity of my professions, which renders me invulnerable by any insinuation of practising a sinister or deceitful policy.

I pretend not to infallibility in the exercise of my private judgment, or in the discharge of my public functions; but in the ardor of my attachment, and in the fidelity of my services to our common country, I feel no limitation: and your excellency, therefore, may justly be assured, that in every way which the Constitutions of the United States and of Pennsylvania shall authorize and present, or future exigencies may require, you will receive my most cordial aid and support.

I am, with perfect respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

THOS. MIFFLIN.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, August 30, 1794.

I am directed by the President to acknowledge the receipt, on the 17th, of your excellency's letter dated the 12th instant.

The President feels with you the force of the motives which render undesirable an extension of correspondence on the subject in question. But the case being truly one of great importance and delicacy, these motives must yield, in a degree, to the propriety and utility of giving precision to every part of the transaction, and guarding effectually against ultimate misapprehension.

To this end, it is deemed advisable, in the first place, to state some facts which either do not appear, or are conceived not to have assumed an accurate shape in your excellency's letter. They are these:

1. You were informed at the conference that all the information which had been received had been laid before an associate justice, in order that he might consider and determine whether such a case as is contemplated by the second section of the act, which provides for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, had occurred; that is, whether combinations existed too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal by that act; in which case, the President is authorized to call forth the militia to suppress the combinations and to cause the laws to be duly executed.

2. The idea of a preliminary proceeding by you was pointed to an eventual co-operation with the Executive of the United States, in such plan as, upon mature deliberation, should be deemed advisable, in conformity with the laws of the Union. The inquiry was particularly directed towards the possibility of some previous accessory step in relation to the militia, to expedite the calling them forth if an acceleration should be judged expedient and proper, and if any delay on the score of evidence should attend the notification from a judge, which the laws make the condition of the power of the President to require the aid of the militia, and turned more especially upon the point, whether the law of Pennsylvania of the 22d of September, 1783, was or was not still in force. The question emphatically was: Has the Executive of Pennsylvania power to put the militia in motion, previous to a requisition from the President, under the laws of the Union, if it shall be thought advisable so to do? Indeed, it seems to be admitted by one part of your letter, that the preliminary measure contemplated did turn on this question, and with a particular eye to the authority and existence of the act just mentioned.

3. The information contained in the papers read at the conference, besides the violence offered to the marshal, while in company with the inspector of the revenue, established that the marshal had been afterwards made prisoner by the insurgents, put in jeopardy of his life, had been obliged to obtain safety and liberty by a promise guaranteed by Colonel Presby Neville that he would serve no other process on the west side of the Allegany mountain; that in addition to this, a deputation of the insurgents had gone to Pittsburg to demand of the marshal a surrender of the processes in his possession, under the intimation that it would satisfy the people and add to his safety; which necessarily implied that he would be in danger of further violence without such a surrender. That under the influence of this menace, he had found it necessary to seek security by taking, secretly, and in the night, a circuitous route.

This recapitulation is not made to invalidate the explanation offered in your last letter of the view of the subject, which you assert to have led to the suggestions contained in your first, and of the sense which you wish to be received as that of the observations accompanying those suggestions. It is intended solely to manifest that it was natural for the President to regard your communication of the 5th instant in the light under which it is presented in the reply to it.

For, having informed you that the matter was before an associate justice, with a view to the law of the United States which has been mentioned, and having pointed out what was said respecting a preliminary proceeding on your part to a call of the militia under the authority of a State law, by anticipation of a requisition from the General Government, and in co-operation with an eventual plan to be founded upon the laws of the Union, it was not natural to expect that you would have presented a plan of conduct entirely on the basis of the State Government, even to the extent of resorting to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, after its judiciary had proved incompetent "to prescribe by their wisdom and authority the means of subduing the spirit of insurrection and of restoring tranquility and order;" a plan which, being incompatible with the course marked out in the laws of the United States, evidently could not have been acceded to without a suspension, for a long and indefinite period, of the movements of the Federal Executive pursuant to those laws. The repugnancy and incompatibility of the two modes of proceeding at the same time cannot, it is presumed, be made a question.

Was it extraordinary, then, that the plan suggested should have been unexpected, and that it should even have been thought liable to the observation of having contemplated Pennsylvania in a light too separate and unconnected?

The propriety of the remark, "that it was impossible not to think that the current of the observations in your letter might be construed to imply a virtual disapprobation of that plan of conduct on the part of the General Government, in the actual stage of its affairs, which you acknowledged would be proper on the part of the Government of Pennsylvania, if arrived at a similar stage," must be referred to the general tenor and complexion of those observations, and to the inference they were naturally calculated to inculcate. If this inference was, that under the known circumstances of the case, the employment of force to suppress the insurrection was improper, without a long train of preparatory expedients; and if, in fact, the Government of the United States (which has not been controverted) was at that point where it was admitted that the Government of Pennsylvania being arrived the resort to force on its part would be proper, the impression which was made could not have been effaced by the consideration that the forms of referring what concerned the Government of the Union to the judgment of its own Executive were carefully observed. There was no difficulty in reconciling the intimation of an opinion unfavorable to a particular course of proceeding with an explicit reference of the subject (officially speaking) to the judgment of the officer charged by the constitution to decide, and with a sincere recognition of the subjection of the individual authority of the State to the national jurisdiction of the Union.

The disavowal by your excellency of an intention to sanction the inference, which was drawn, renders what has been said a mere explanation of the cause of that inference, and of the impression which it at first made.

It would be foreign to the object of this letter to discuss the various observations, which have been adduced to obviate a misapprehension of your views, and to maintain the propriety of the course pursued in your first communication. It is far more pleasing to the President to understand you in the sense you desire, and to conclude that no opinion has been indicated by you inconsistent with that which he has entertained of the state of things and of his duty in relation to it. And he remarks, with satisfaction, the effect which subsequent information is supposed to be calculated to produce favoring an approximation of sentiments.

But there are a few miscellaneous points, which, more effectually to prevent misconception any where, seem to demand a cursory notice.

You observe that the President had already determined to exercise his legal powers in draughting a competent force of the militia. At the point of time to which you are understood to refer, namely, that of the conference, the President had no legal power to call forth the militia. No judge had yet pronounced that a case justifying the exercise of that power existed. You must be sensible, sir, that all idea of your calling out the militia by your authority was referred to a state of things antecedent to the lawful capacity of the President to do it by his own authority; and when he had once determined upon the call, pursuant to his legal powers, it were absurd to have proposed to you a separate and unconnected call. How, too, it might be asked, could such a determination, if it had been made, and was known to you, have comported with the plan suggested in your letter, which pre-supposes that the employment of force had not already been determined upon?

This passage of your letter is, therefore, construed to mean only that the President had manifested an opinion predicated upon the event of such a notification from a judge as the law prescribes, that the nature of the case was such as would probably require the employment of force. You will, also, it is believed, recollect that he had not at the time finally determined upon any thing, and that the conference ended with referring the whole subject to further consideration.

You say, that if you had undertaken not only to comply promptly with the President's requisition, but to embody a distinct corps for the same service, a useless expense would have been incurred by the State, an unnecessary burden would have been imposed on the citizens, and embarrassment and confusion would probably have been introduced instead of system and co-operation. But both were never expected. Your embodying the militia independent of a requisition from the President was never thought of, except as a preliminary and auxiliary step. Had it taken place when the requisition came, the corps embodied would have been ready towards a compliance with it, and no one of the inconveniences suggested could possibly have arisen.

You say, in another place, that you "were called upon to act, not in conformity to a positive law, but in compliance with the duty which is supposed to result from the nature and constitution of the executive office." It is conceived that it would have been more correct to have said "you were called upon to be consulted whether you had power in the given case to call forth the militia, without a previous requisition from the General Government." The supposition that you might possess this power was referred to a law of Pennsylvania, which appeared, on examination, to have been repealed. A gentleman who accompanied you thought that the power, after a due notification of the incompetency of the judiciary, might be deduced from the nature and constitution of the executive office.

It has appeared to your excellency fit and expedient to animadvert upon the nature of the evidence produced at the conference, and to express some doubts which had occurred to your mind concerning it.

As the laws of the United States have referred the evidence in such cases to the judgment of a district judge or associate justice, and, foreseeing that circumstances so peculiar might arise as to render rules relating to the ordinary and peaceable state of society inapplicable, have forborne to prescribe any, leaving it to the understanding and conscience of the judge, upon his responsibility, to pronounce what kind and degree of evidence should suffice, the President would not sanction a discussion of the standard or measure by which evidence in those cases ought to be governed. He would restrain himself by the reflection that this appertains to the province of another, and that he might rely as a guide upon the decision which should be made by the proper organ of the laws for that purpose.

But it may be no deviation from this rule to notice to you that the facts stated in the beginning of this letter, under the third head, appear to have been overlooked in your survey of the evidence, while they seem to be far from immaterial to a just estimate of it.

You remark that "when you found that the marshal had without molestation executed his office in the county of Fayette, that he never was insulted or opposed till he acted in company with General Neville, and that the virulence of the rioters was directly manifested against the person and property of the latter gentleman, and only incidentally against the person of the former, you thought there was ground yet to suppose that a spirit of opposition to the officers employed under the excise law, and not a spirit of opposition to the officers employed in the administration of justice, was the immediate source of the outrages which are deprecated."

It is natural to inquire how this supposition could consist with the additional facts which appeared by the same evidence, namely, that the marshal, having been afterwards made prisoner by the rioters, had been compelled, for obtaining safety and liberty, to promise to execute no more processes within the discontented scene; and that subsequently again to this, in consequence of a deputation of the rioters deliberately sent to demand a surrender of the processes in his possession, enforced by a threat, he had found it necessary to seek security in withdrawing by a secret and circuitous route—did not these circumstances unequivocally denote that officers employed in the administration of justice were as much objects of opposition as those employed in the execution of the particular laws, and that the rioters were at least consistent in their plan?

It must needs be that these facts escaped your excellency's attention, else they are too material to have been omitted in your review of the evidence, and too conclusive not to have set aside the supposition which you entertained, and which seems to have had so great a share in your general view of the subject.

There remains only one point on which your excellency will be longer detained—a point, indeed, of great importance, and consequently demands serious and careful reflection. It is the opinion you so emphatically express, that the mere dispersion of the insurgents is the sole object for which the militia can be lawfully called out, or kept in service after they may have been called out.

The President reserves to the last moment the consideration and decision of this point.

But there are arguments weighing heavily against the opinion you have expressed, which, in the mean time, are offered to your candid consideration.

The constitution of the United States (article 1, section 8) empowers Congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions:" evidently, from the wording and distribution of the sentence, contemplating the execution of the laws of the Union as a thing distinct from the suppression of insurrections.

The act of May 2, 1792, for carrying this provision of the constitution into effect, adopts for its title the very words of the constitution, being "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions"—continuing the constitutional distinction.

The first section of the act provides for the cases of invasion and of insurrection, confining the latter to the case of insurrection against the Government of a State. The second section provides for the case of the execution of the laws being obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals.

The words are these: "Whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, the same being notified to the President of the United States by an associate justice or the district judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed." Then follows a provision for calling forth the militia of the other States.

The terms of this section appear to contemplate and describe something that may be less than insurrection. "The combinations" mentioned may indeed amount to insurrections, but it is conceivable that they may stop at associations not to comply with the law, supported by riots, assassinations, and murders, and by a general spirit in a part of the community which may baffle the ordinary judiciary means, with no other aid than the posse comitatus, and may even require the stationing of military force for a time, to awe the spirit of riot and countenance the magistrates and officers in the execution of their duty. And the objects for which the militia are to be called are expressly not only to suppress these combinations, (whether amounting to insurrections or not,) but to cause the laws to be duly executed.

It is therefore plainly contrary to the manifest general intent of the constitution and of this act, and to the positive and express terms of the second section of the act, to say that the militia called forth are not to be continued in service for the purpose of causing the laws to be duly executed, and, of course, till they are so executed.

What is the main and ultimate object of calling forth the militia? "To cause the laws to be executed." Which are the laws to be executed? Those which are opposed and obstructed in their execution by the combinations described in the present case—the laws laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills; and, incidentally, those which uphold the judiciary functions. When are the laws executed? Clearly, when the opposition is subdued; when penalties for disobedience can be enforced; when a compliance is effectuated.

Would the mere dispersion of insurgents, and their retiring to their respective homes, do this? Would it satisfy either member of the provision—the suppression of the combinations or the execution of the laws? Might not the former, notwithstanding the dispersion, continue in full vigor, ready at any moment to break out into new acts of resistance to the laws? Are the militia to be kept perpetually marching and countermarching towards the insurgents while they are embodied, and from them when they have separated and retired? Suppose the insurgents hardy enough to wait the experiment of a battle, are vanquished, and then disperse and retire home, are the militia immediately to retire also, to give them an opportunity to reassemble, recruit, and prepare for another battle? And is this to go on and be repeated without limit?

Such a construction of the law, if true, were certainly a very unfortunate one, rendering its provisions essentially nugatory, and leading to endless expense and as endless disappointment. It could hardly be advisable to vex the militia by marching them to a distant point, where they might scarcely be arrived before it would be legally necessary for them to return, not in consequence of having effected their object—of having "caused the laws to be executed"—but in consequence of the mere stratagem of a deceitful dispersion and retiring.

Thus far the spirit as well as the positive letter of the law combats the construction which you have adopted. It remains to see if there be any other part of it which compels to a renunciation both of the letter and spirit of the antecedent provisions.

The part which seems to be relied upon for this effect is the third section, which, by way of proviso, enjoins "That whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force by that act directed to be called forth, he shall forthwith, and previous thereto, by proclamation, command the insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within a limited time." But does this affirm, does it even necessarily imply, that the militia, after the dispersion and retiring, are not to be used for the purpose for which they are authorized to be called forth, that is, "to cause the laws to be duly executed;" to countenance by their presence, and, in case of further resistance, to protect and support, by their strength, the respective civil officers in the execution of their several duties, whether for bringing delinquents to punishment, or otherwise for giving effect to the laws? May not the injunction of this section be regarded as a merely humane and prudent precaution, to distinguish, previous to the actual application of force, a hasty tumult from a deliberate insurrection? To give an opportunity for those who may be accidentally or inadvertently mingled in a tumult or disorderly rising, to separate and withdraw from those who are designedly and deliberately actors? To prevent, if possible, bloodshed in a conflict of arms; and, if this cannot be done, to render the necessity of it palpable, by a premonition to the insurgents to disperse and go home? And are not all these objects compatible with the further employment of the militia for the ulterior purpose of causing the laws to be executed in the way which has been mentioned? If they present a rational end for the proviso, without defeating the main design of the antecedent provision, it is clear they ought to limit the sense of the former, and exclude a construction which must make the principal provision nugatory.

Do not the rules of law and reason unite in declaring that the different parts of a statute shall be so construed as, if possible, to consist with each other; that a proviso ought not to be understood or allowed to operate in a sense tending to defeat the principal clause; and that an implication (if, indeed, there be any such implication as is supposed in the present case) ought not to overrule an express provision, especially at the sacrifice of the manifest general intent of a law, which, in the present case, undoubtedly is, that the militia shall be called forth "to cause the laws to be duly executed?"

Though not very material to the merit of the argument, it may be remarked that the proviso which forms the third section contemplates merely the case of insurrection. If the combinations described in the second section may be less than insurrection, then the proviso is not commensurate with the whole case contained in the second section, which would be an additional circumstance to prove that it cannot work an effect which shall be a substitute for the main purpose of the first section.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

His Excellency Governor MIFFLIN.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 5, 1794.

The disagreeable crisis at which matters have lately arrived in some of the western counties of Pennsylvania, with regard to the laws laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, seems to render proper a review of the circumstances which have attended those laws in that scene, from their commencement to the present time, and of the conduct which has hitherto been observed on the part of the Government, its motives and effect, in order to a better judgment of the measures necessary to be pursued in the existing emergency.

The opposition to those laws in the four most western counties of Pennsylvania, (Alleghany, Washington, Fayette, and Westmoreland,) commenced as early as they were known to have been passed. It has continued, with different degrees of violence, in the different counties and at different periods; but Washington has uniformly distinguished its resistance by a more excessive spirit than has appeared in the other counties, and seems to have been chiefly instrumental in kindling and keeping alive the flame.

The opposition first manifested itself in the milder shape of the circulation of opinions unfavorable to the law, and calculated, by the influence of public disesteem, to discourage the accepting or holding of offices under it, or the complying with it by those who might be so disposed; to which was added a show of the discontinuance of the business of distilling.

These expedients were shortly after succeeded by private associations to forbear compliances with the law. But it was not long before these mere negative modes of opposition were perceived to be likely to prove ineffectual. And in proportion as this was the case, and as the means of introducing the laws into operation were put into execution, the disposition to resistance became more turbulent, and more inclined to adopt and practise violent expedients; the officers now began to experience marks of contempt and insult; threats against them became more frequent and loud; and, after some time, these threats were ripened into acts of ill-treatment and outrage.

These acts of violence were preceded by certain meetings of malcontent persons, who entered into resolutions calculated at once to confirm, inflame, and systematize the spirit of opposition.

The first of these meetings was holden at a place called Redstone (Old Fort) on the 27th of July, 1791, where it was concerted that county committees should be convened in the four counties, at the respective seats of justice therein. On the 23d of August following one of these committees assembled in the county of Washington.

This meeting passed some intemperate resolutions, which were afterwards printed in the Pittsburg Gazette, containing a strong censure on the law, declaring that any person who had accepted or might accept an office under Congress, in order to carry it into effect, should be considered as inimical to the interests of the country; and recommending to the citizens of Washington county to treat every person who had accepted, or might thereafter accept, any such office, with contempt, and absolutely to refuse all kind of communication or intercourse with the officers, and to withhold from them all aid, support, or comfort.

Not content with this vindictive proscription of those who might esteem it their duty, in the capacity of officers, to aid in the execution of the constitutional laws of the land, the meeting proceeded to accumulate topics of crimination of the Government, though foreign to each other; authorizing by this zeal for censure a suspicion that they were actuated not merely by the dislike of a particular law, but by a disposition to render the Government itself unpopular and odious.

This meeting, in further prosecution of their plan, deputed three of their members to meet delegates from the counties of Westmoreland, Fayette, and Allegany, on the first Tuesday of September following, for the purpose of expressing the sense of the people of those counties in an address to the Legislature of the United States upon the subject of the excise law and other grievances.

Another meeting accordingly took place on the 7th of September, 1791, at Pittsburg, in the county of Allegany, at which there appeared persons in character of delegates from the four western counties.

This meeting entered into resolutions more comprehensive in their objects, and not less inflammatory in their tendency, than those which had before passed the meeting in Washington. Their resolutions contained severe censures not only on the law which was the immediate subject of objection, but upon what they termed the exorbitant salaries of officers; the unreasonable interest of the public debt; the want of discrimination between original holders and transferees, and the institution of a national bank. The same unfriendly temper towards the Government of the United States, which seemed to have led out of their way the meeting at Washington, appears to have produced a similar wandering in that at Pittsburg.

A representation to Congress, and a remonstrance to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, against the law more particularly complained of, were prepared by this meeting, published, together with their other proceedings, in the Pittsburg Gazette, and afterwards presented to the respective bodies to whom they were addressed.

These meetings, composed of very influential individuals, and conducted without moderation or prudence, are justly chargeable with the excesses which have been from time to time committed; serving to give consistency to an opposition which has at length matured to a point that threatens the foundations of the Government and of the Union, unless speedily and effectually subdued.

On the 6th of the same month of September, the opposition broke out in an act of violence upon the person and property of Robert Johnson, collector of the revenue for the counties of Allegany and Washington.

A party of men, armed and disguised, waylaid him at a place on Pigeon creek, in Washington county, seized, tarred and feathered him, cut off his hair, and deprived him of his horse, obliging him to travel on foot a considerable distance in that mortifying and painful situation.

The case was brought before the district court of Pennsylvania, out of which processes issued against John Robertson, John Hamilton, and Thomas McComb, three of the persons concerned in the outrage.

The serving of these processes was confided by the then marshal, Clement Biddle, to his deputy, Joseph Fox, who, in the month of October, went into Allegany county for the purpose of serving them.

The appearances and circumstances which Mr. Fox observed himself in the course of his journey, and learned afterwards upon his arrival at Pittsburg, had the effect of deterring him from the service of the processes, and unfortunately led to adopt the injudicious and fruitless expedient of sending them to the parties by a private messenger, under cover.

The deputy's report to the marshal states a number of particulars, evincing a considerable fermentation in the part of the country to which he was sent, and inducing a belief, on his part, that he could not with safety have executed the processes. The marshal, transmitting this report to the district attorney, makes the following observations upon it: "I am sorry to add that he (the deputy) found the people, in general, in the western part of the State, and particularly beyond the Allegany mountains, in such a ferment on account of the act of Congress for laying a duty on distilled spirits, and so much opposed to the execution of the said act, and from a variety of threats to himself personally, (although he took the utmost precaution to conceal his errand,) that he was not only convinced of the impossibility of serving the process, but that any attempt to effect it would have occasioned the most violent opposition from the greater part of the inhabitants; and he declares that, if he had attempted it, he believes he should not have returned alive.

"I spared no expense nor pains to have the process of the court executed, and have not the least doubt that my deputy would have accomplished it, if it could have been done."

The reality of the danger to the deputy was countenanced by the opinion of General Neville, the inspector of the revenue, a man who before had given, and since has given, numerous proofs of a steady and firm temper; and what followed is a further confirmation of it.

The person who had been sent with the processes was seized, whipped, tarred, and feathered; and, after having his money and horse taken from him, was blindfolded and tied in the woods; in which condition he remained for five hours.

Very serious reflections naturally occurred upon this occasion. It seemed highly probable, from the issue of the experiment which had been made, that the ordinary course of civil process would be ineffectual for enforcing the execution of the law in the scene in question, and that a perseverance in this course might lead to a serious concussion. The law itself was still in the infancy of its operation, and far from established in other important portions of the Union. Prejudices against it had been industriously disseminated, misrepresentations diffused, misconceptions fostered. The Legislature of the United States had not yet organized the means by which the Executive could come in aid of the Judiciary, when found incompetent to the execution of the laws. If neither of these impediments to a decisive exertion had existed, it was desirable, especially in a republican Government, to avoid what is in such cases the ultimate resort, till all the milder means had been tried without success.

Under the united influence of these considerations, it appeared advisable to forbear urging coercive measures until the laws had gone into more extensive operation; till further time for reflection and experience of its operation had served to correct false impressions, and inspire greater moderation; and till the Legislature had had an opportunity, by a revision of the law, to remove as far as possible objections, and to reinforce the provisions for securing its execution.

Other incidents occurred, from time to time, which are further proofs of the very improper temper that prevailed among the inhabitants of the refractory counties.

Mr. Johnson was not the only officer who, about the same period, experienced outrage. Mr. Wells, collector of the revenue for Westmoreland and Fayette, was also ill-treated at Greensburg and Uniontown. Nor were the outrages perpetrated confined to the officers; they extended to private citizens, who only dared to show their respect for the laws of their country.

Some time in October, 1791, an unhappy man, of the name of Wilson, a stranger in the county, and manifestly disordered in his intellects, imagining himself to be a collector of the revenue, or invested with some trust in relation to it, was so unlucky as to make inquiries concerning distillers who had entered their stills, giving out that he was to travel through the United States, to ascertain and report to Congress the number of stills, &c. This man was pursued by a party in disguise; taken out of his bed; carried about five miles back, to a smith's shop; stripped of his clothes, which were afterwards burnt; and, having been himself inhumanly burnt in several places with a heated iron, was tarred and feathered, and about day-light dismissed, naked, wounded, and otherwise in a very suffering condition. These particulars are communicated in a letter from the inspector of the revenue, of the 17th of November, who declares that he had then himself seen the unfortunate maniac, the abuse of whom, as he expresses it, exceeded description, and was sufficient to make human nature shudder. The affair is the more extraordinary, as persons of weight and consideration in that county are understood to have been actors in it, and as the symptoms of insanity were, during the whole time of inflicting the punishment, apparent; the unhappy sufferer displaying the heroic fortitude of a man who conceived himself to be a martyr to the discharge of some important duty.

Not long after, a person of the name of Roseberry underwent the humiliating punishment of tarring and feathering with some aggravations, for having in conversation hazarded the very natural and just, but unpalatable remark, that the inhabitants of that county could not reasonably expect protection from a Government whose laws they so strenuously opposed.

The audacity of the perpetrators of these excesses was so great, that an armed banditti ventured to seize and carry off two persons who were witnesses against the rioters in the case of Wilson, in order to prevent their giving testimony of the riot to a court then sitting, or about to sit.

Designs of personal violence against the inspector of the revenue himself, to force him to a resignation, were repeatedly attempted to be put in execution by armed parties, but, by different circumstances, were frustrated.

In the session of Congress, which commenced in October, 1791, the law laying a duty on distilled spirits and stills came under the revision of Congress, as had been anticipated. By an act passed May 8, 1792, during that session, material alterations were made in it; among these, the duty was reduced to a rate so moderate, as to have silenced complaint on that head; and a new and very favorable alternative was given to the distiller—that of paying a monthly instead of a yearly rate, according to the capacity of his still, with liberty to take a license for the precise term which he should intend to work it, and to renew that licence for a further term or terms.

This amending act, in its progress through the Legislature, engaged the particular attention of members, who themselves were interested in distilleries, and of others who represented parts of the county in which the business of distilling was extensively carried on.

Objections were well considered, and great pains taken to obviate all such as had the semblance of reasonableness.

The effect has, in a great measure, corresponded with the views of the Legislature. Opposition has subsided in several districts where it before prevailed, and it was natural to entertain, and not easy to abandon a hope, that the same thing would by degrees have taken place in the four western counties of this State.

But notwithstanding some flattering appearances at particular junctures, and infinite pains, by various expedients, to produce the desirable issue, the hope entertained has never been realized, and is now at an end, as far as the ordinary means of executing laws are concerned.

The first law had left the number and positions of the offices of inspection, which were to be established in each district for receiving entries of stills, to the discretion of the supervisor. The second, to secure a due accommodation to distillers, provides, peremptorily, that there shall be one in each county.

The idea was immediately embraced that it was a very important point in the scheme of opposition to the law, to prevent the establishment of offices in the respective counties.

For this purpose, the intimidation of well-disposed inhabitants was added to the plan of molesting and obstructing the officers, by force or otherwise, as might be necessary. So effectually was the first point carried, (the certain destruction of property and the peril of life being involved,) that it became almost impracticable to obtain suitable places for offices in some of the counties; and, when obtained, it was found a matter of necessity, in almost every instance, to abandon them.

After much effort, the inspector of revenue succeeded in procuring the house of William Faulkner, a captain in the army, for an office of inspection in the county of Washington. This took place in August, 1792. The office was attended by the inspector of the revenue in person, till prevented by the following incidents:

Captain Faulkner, being in pursuit of some deserters from the troops, was encountered by a number of people, in the same neighborhood where Mr. Johnson had been ill-treated the preceding year, who reproached him with letting his house for an office of inspection, drew a knife upon him, threatened to scalp him, tar and feather him, and reduce his house and property to ashes, if he did not solemnly promise to prevent the further use of his house for an office. Captain Faulkner was induced to make the promise exacted; and, in consequence of the circumstance, wrote a letter to the inspector, dated the 20th of August, countermanding the permission for using his house; and the day following gave a public notice in the Pittsburg Gazette that the office of inspector should be no longer kept there.

At the same time another engine of opposition was in operation. Agreeable to a previous notification, there met at Pittsburg, on the 21st of August, a number of persons, styling themselves "A meeting of sundry inhabitants of the western counties of Pennsylvania."

This meeting entered into resolutions not less exceptionable than those of its predecessors. The preamble suggests that a tax on spirituous liquors is unjust in itself and oppressive upon the poor; that internal taxes upon consumption must, in the end, destroy the liberties of every country in which they are introduced; that the law in question, from certain local circumstances, which are specified, would bring immediate distress and ruin upon the western country; and concludes with the sentiment, that they think it their duty to persist in remonstrances to Congress, and in every other legal measure that may obstruct the operation of the law.

The resolutions then proceed, first, to appoint a committee to prepare and cause to be presented to Congress an address stating objections to the law, and praying for its repeal; secondly, to appoint committees of correspondence for Washington, Fayette, and Allegany, charged to correspond together, and with such committees as should be appointed for the same purpose in the county of Westmoreland, or with any committees of a similar nature that might be appointed in other parts of the United States; and, also, if found necessary, to call together either general meetings of the people in their respective counties, or conferences of the several committees; and lastly, to declare that they will in future consider those who hold offices for the collection of the duty as unworthy of their friendship; that they will have no intercourse nor dealings with them, will withdraw from them every assistance, withhold all the comforts of life which depend upon those duties that as men and fellow-citizens we owe to each other, and will upon all occasions treat them with contempt; earnestly recommending it to the people at large to follow the same line of conduct towards them.

The idea of pursuing legal measures to obstruct the operation of a law needs little comment. Legal measures may be pursued to procure the repeal of a law, but to obstruct its operation presents a contradiction in terms. The operation (or, what is the same thing, the execution) of a law cannot be obstructed after it has been constitutionally enacted, without illegality and crime. The expression quoted is one of those phrases which can only be used to conceal a disorderly and culpable intention under forms that may escape the hold of the law.

Neither was it difficult to perceive that the anathema pronounced against the officers of the revenue placed them in a state of virtual outlawry, and operated as a signal to all those who were bold enough to encounter the guilt, and the danger to violate both their lives and their properties.

The foregoing proceedings, as soon as known, were reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the President. The President, on the 15th of September, 1792, issued a proclamation "earnestly admonishing and exhorting all persons whom it might concern to refrain and desist from all unlawful combinations and proceedings whatsoever, having for object, or tending, to obstruct the operation of the laws aforesaid, inasmuch as all lawful ways and means would be put in execution for bringing to justice the infractors thereof, and securing obedience thereto: and, moreover, charging and requiring all courts, magistrates, and officers, whom it might concern, according to the duties of their several offices, to exert the powers in them respectively vested by law for the purposes aforesaid; thereby, also, enjoining and requiring all persons whomsoever, as they tendered the welfare of their country, the just and due authority of Government, and the preservation of the public peace, to be aiding and assisting therein, according to law; and likewise directed that prosecutions might be instituted against the offenders, in the cases in which the laws would support, and the requisite evidence could be obtained.

Pursuant to these instructions, the attorney general, in co-operation with the attorney of the district, attended a circuit court, which was holden at Yorktown, in October, 1792, for the purpose of bringing forward prosecutions in the proper cases.

Collateral measures were taken to procure for this purpose the necessary evidence.

The supervisor of the revenue was sent into the opposing survey, to ascertain the real state of that survey, to obtain evidence of the persons who were concerned in the riot in Faulkner's case, and of those who composed the meeting at Pittsburg, to uphold the confidence and encourage the perseverance of the officers acting under the law; and to induce, if possible, the inhabitants of that part of the survey, which appeared least disinclined to come voluntarily into the law, by arguments addressed to their sense of duty, and exhibiting the eventual dangers and mischiefs of resistance.

The mission of the supervisor had no other fruit than that of obtaining evidence of the persons who composed the meeting at Pittsburg, and of two who were understood to be concerned in the riot; and a confirmation of the enmity which certain active and designing leaders had industriously infused into a large proportion of the inhabitants, not against the particular laws in question only, but of a more ancient date, against the Government of the United States itself.

The then attorney general being of opinion that it was at best a doubtful point, whether the proceedings of the meeting at Pittsburg contained indictable matter, no prosecution was attempted against those who composed it; though, if the ground for proceeding against them had appeared to be firm, it is presumed that the truest policy would have dictated that course.

Indictments were preferred to the circuit court, and found against the two persons understood to have been concerned in the riot; and the usual measures were taken for carrying them into effect.

But it appearing afterwards, from various representations supported by satisfactory testimony, that there had been some mistake as to the persons accused, justice and policy demanded that the prosecution should be discontinued, which was accordingly done.

This issue of the business unavoidably defeated the attempt to establish examples of the punishment of persons who engaged in a violent resistance to the laws, and left the officers to struggle against the stream of resistance, without the advantage of such examples.

The following plan, afterwards successively put in execution, was about this time digested, for carrying, if possible, the laws into effect, without the necessity of recurring to force.

1st. To prosecute delinquents in the cases in which it could be clearly done for non-compliance with the laws. 2d. To intercept the markets for the surplus produce of the distilleries of the non-complying counties, by seizing the spirits in their way to those markets, in places where it could be effected without opposition. 3d. By purchases, through agents, for the use of the army, (instead of deriving the supply through contractors, as formerly,) confining them to spirits, in respect to which there had been a compliance with the laws.

The motives to this plan speak for themselves. It aimed, besides the influence of penalties on delinquents, at making it the general interest of the distillers to comply with the laws, by interrupting the market for a very considerable surplus, and by at the same time confining the benefit of the large demand for public service to those who did their duty to the public; and furnishing, through the means of payments in cash, that medium for paying the duties, the want of which was alleged to be a great difficulty in the way of compliance.

But two circumstances conspired to counteract the success of the plan: one, the necessity, towards incurring the penalties of non-compliance, of there being an office of inspection in each county, which was prevented in some of the counties by means of the intimidation practised for that purpose: another, the non-extension of the law to the territory northwest of the Ohio, into which a large proportion of the surplus before mentioned was sent.

A cure for these defects could only come from the Legislature; accordingly, in the session which began in November, 1792, measures were taken for procuring a further revision of the laws. A bill containing amendments of those and other defects was brought in; but it so happened that this object, by reason of more urgent business, was deferred till towards the close of the session, and finally went off, through the usual hurry of that period.

The continuance of the embarrassment incident to this state of things naturally tended to diminish much of the efficacy of the plan which had been devised; yet it was resolved, as far as legal provisions would bear out the officers, to pursue it with perseverance. There was ground to entertain hopes of its good effect, and it was certainly the most likely course which could have been adopted towards attaining the object of the laws by means short of force; evincing, unequivocally, the sincere disposition to avoid this painful resort, and the steady moderation, which has characterized the measures of the Government.

In pursuance of this plan, prosecutions were occasionally instituted in the mildest forms; seizures were made as opportunities occurred; and purchases on public account were carried on.

It may be incidentally remarked, that these purchases were extended to other places, where, though the same disorders did not exist, it appeared advisable to facilitate the payment of the duties by this species of accommodation.

Nor was this plan, notwithstanding the deficiency of legal provision, which impeded its full execution, without corresponding effects.

Symptoms, from time to time, appeared, which authorized expectation that, with the aid, at another session, of the desired supplementary provisions, it was capable of accomplishing its end, if no extraordinary events occurred.

The opponents of the laws, not insensible of the tendency of that plan, nor of the defects in the laws which interfered with it, did not fail, from time to time, to pursue analogous modes of counteraction. The effort to frustrate the establishment of officers of inspection in particular was persisted in, and even increased; means of intimidating officers and others continued to be exerted.

In April, 1793, a party of armed men in disguise made an attack in the night upon the house of a collector of the revenue, who resided in Fayette county; but he happening to be from home, they contented themselves with breaking open his house, threatening, terrifying, and abusing his family.

Warrants were issued for apprehending some of the rioters upon this occasion by Isaac Mason and James Findley, assistant judges of Fayette county, which were delivered to the sheriff of that county, who, it seems, refused to execute them; for which he has since been indicted.

This is at once an example of a disposition to support the laws of the Union, and of an opposite one in the local officers of Pennsylvania within the non-complying scene.

But it is a truth too important not to be noticed, and too injurious not to be lamented, that the prevailing spirit of those officers has been either hostile or lukewarm to the execution of those laws; and that the weight of an unfriendly official influence has been one of the most serious obstacles with which they have had to struggle.

In June following, the inspector of the revenue was burnt in effigy in Allegany county, at a place and on a day of some public election, with much display, in the presence of, and without interruption from, magistrates and other public officers.

On the night of the 22d of November another party of men, some of them armed, and all in disguise, went to the house of the same collector of Fayette, which had been visited in April, broke and entered it, and demanded a surrender of the officer's commission and official books; upon his refusing to deliver them up, they presented pistols at him, and swore that if he did not comply they would instantly put him to death. At length a surrender of the commission and books was enforced; but, not content with this, the rioters, before they departed, required of the officer that he should, within two weeks, publish his resignation, on pain of another visit, and the destruction of his house.

Notwithstanding these excesses, the laws appeared, during the latter periods of this year, (1793,) to be rather gaining ground. Several principal distillers, who had formerly held out, complied; and others discovered a disposition to comply, which was only restrained by the fear of violence.

But these favorable circumstances served to beget alarm among those who were determined, at all events, to prevent the quiet establishment of the laws. It soon appeared that they meditated, by fresh and greater excesses, to aim a still more effectual blow at them, to subdue the growing spirit of compliance, and to destroy entirely the organs of the laws within that part of the country, by compelling all the officers to renounce their offices.

The last proceeding, in the case of the collector of Fayette, was in this spirit. In January, of the present year, further violences appear to have been perpetrated. William Richmond, who had given information against some of the rioters, in the affair of Wilson, had his barn burnt, with all the grain and hay which it contained; and the same thing happened to Robert Shawhan, a distiller, who had been among the first to comply with the law, and who had always spoken favorably of it; but in neither of these instances, (which happened in the county of Alleghany) though the presumptions were violent, was any positive proof obtained.

The inspector of the revenue, in a letter of the 27th of February, writes that he had received information that persons, living near the dividing line of Alleghany and Washington, had thrown out threats of tarring and feathering one William Cochran, a complying distiller, and of burning his distillery; and that it had also been given out that in three weeks there would not be a house standing in Alleghany county of any person who had complied with the laws; in consequence of which, he had been induced to pay a visit to several leading individuals in that quarter, as well to ascertain the truth of the information as to endeavor to avert the attempt to execute such threats.

It appeared afterwards, that, on his return home, he had been pursued by a collection of disorderly persons, threatening, as they went along, vengeance against him. On their way, these men called at the house of James Kiddoe, who had recently complied with the laws, broke into his still-house, fired several balls under his still, and scattered fire over and about the house.

Letters from the inspector, in March, announce an increased activity in promoting opposition to the laws; frequent meetings to cement and extend the combinations against it; and, among other means for this purpose, a plan of collecting a force to seize him, compel him to resign his commission, and detain him prisoner—probably as a hostage.

In May and June new violences were committed. James Kiddoe, the person above mentioned, and William Cochran, another complying distiller, met with repeated injury to their property. Kiddoe had parts of his grist-mill at different times carried away; and Cochran suffered more material injuries. His still was destroyed; his saw-mill was rendered useless, by the taking away of the saw; and his grist-mill so injured as to require to be repaired, at considerable expense.

At the last visit a note in writing was left, requiring him to publish what he had suffered in the Pittsburg Gazette, on pain of another visit, in which he is threatened, in figurative but intelligible terms, with the destruction of his property by fire. Thus adding to the profligacy of doing wanton injuries to a fellow-citizen the tyranny of compelling him to be the publisher of his wrongs.

June being the month for receiving annual entries of stills, endeavors were used to open offices in Westmoreland and Washington, where it had been hitherto found impracticable. With much pains and difficulty, places were procured for the purpose. That in Westmoreland was repeatedly attacked in the night by armed men, who frequently fired upon it; but, according to a report which has been made to this Department, it was defended with so much courage and perseverance by John Wells, an auxiliary officer, and Philip Ragan, the owner of the house, as to have been maintained during the remainder of the month.

That in Washington, after repeated attempts, was suppressed. The first attempt was confined to pulling down the sign of the office, and threats of future destruction; the second effected the object in the following mode: About twelve persons, armed and painted black, in the night of the 6th of June, broke into the house of John Lynn, where the office was kept, and, after having treacherously seduced him to come down stairs, and put himself in their power, by a promise of safety to himself and his house, they seized and tied him; threatened to hang him; took him to a retired spot in the neighboring wood, and there, after cutting off his hair, tarring and feathering him, swore him never again to allow the use of his house for an office, never to disclose their names, and never again to have any sort of agency in aid of the excise: having done which, they bound him naked to a tree, and left him in that situation till morning, when he succeeded in extricating himself. Not content with this, the malcontents, some days after, made him another visit, pulled down part of his house, and put him in a situation to be obliged to become an exile from his own home, and to find an asylum elsewhere.

During this time several of the distillers, who had made entries and benefited by them, refused the payment of the duties; actuated, no doubt, by various motives.

Indications of a plan to proceed against the inspector of the revenue, in the manner which has been before mentioned, continued. In a letter from him of the 10th of July, he observed that the threatened visit had not yet been made, though he had still reason to expect it.

In the session of Congress which began in December, 1793, a bill for making the amendments in the laws, which had been for some time desired, was brought in, and on the 5th of June last became a law.

It is not to be doubted that the different stages of this business were regularly notified to the malcontents, and that a conviction of the tendency of the amendments contemplated to effectuate the execution of the law had matured the resolution to bring matters to a violent crisis.

The increasing energy of the opposition rendered it indispensable to meet the evil with proportionable decision. The idea of giving time for the law to extend itself, in scenes where the dissatisfaction with it was the effect, not of an improper spirit, but of causes which were of a nature to yield to reason, reflection, and experience, (which had constantly weighed in the estimate of the measures proper to be pursued,) had had its effect, in an extensive degree. The experiment, too, had been long enough tried to ascertain that, where resistance continued, the root of the evil lay deep, and required measures of greater efficacy than had been pursued. The laws had undergone repeated revisions of the legislative representatives of the Union, and had virtually received their repeated sanction, without even an attempt, as far as is now recollected or can be traced, to effect their repeal; affording an evidence of the general sense of the community in their favor. Complaints began to be loud, from complying quarters, against the impropriety and injustice of suffering the laws to remain unexecuted in others.

Under the united influence of these considerations, there was no choice but to try the efficiency of the laws in prosecuting with vigor delinquents and offenders.

Process issued against a number of non-complying distillers in the counties of Fayette and Alleghany; and indictments having been found at a circuit court holden at Philadelphia in July last, against Robert Smilie and John McCulloch, two of the rioters in the attack which, in November preceding, had been made upon the house of a collector of the revenue in Fayette county, processes issued against them also, to bring them to trial, and, if guilty, to punishment.

The marshal of the district went in person to serve these processes. He executed his trust without-interruption, though under many discouraging circumstances, in Fayette county; but while he was in the execution of it in Alleghany county, being then accompanied by the inspector of the revenue, to wit, on the 15th of July last, he was beset on the road by a party of from thirty to forty armed men, who, after much previous irregularity of conduct, finally fired upon him, but, as it happened, without injury either to him or to the inspector.

This attempt on the marshal was but the prelude of greater excesses.

About break of day, the 16th of July, in conformity with a plan which seems to have been for some time entertained, and which probably was only accelerated by the coming of the marshal into the survey, an attack, by about one hundred persons armed with guns and other weapons, was made upon the house of the inspector, in the vicinity of Pittsburg. The inspector, though alone, vigorously defended himself against the assailants, and obliged them to retreat without accomplishing their purpose.

Apprehending that the business would not terminate here, he made application by letter to the judges, generals of militia, and sheriff of the county, for protection. A reply to his application, from John Wilkins, Jun. and John Gibson, magistrates and militia officers, informed him that the laws could not be executed, so as to afford him the protection to which he was entitled, owing to the too general combination of the people in that part of Pennsylvania to oppose the revenue law; adding, that they would take every step in their power to bring the rioters to justice, and would be glad to receive information of the individuals concerned in the attack upon his house, that prosecutions might be commenced against them; and expressing their sorrow that should the posse comitatus of the county be ordered out in support of the civil authority, very few could be gotten that were not of the party of the rioters.

The day following the insurgents reassembled with a considerable augmentation of numbers, amounting, as has been computed, to at least five hundred; and on the 17th of July renewed their attack upon the house of the inspector, who, in the interval, had taken the precaution of calling to his aid a small detachment from the garrison of Fort Pitt, which, at the time of the attack, consisted of eleven men, who had been joined by Major Abraham Kirkpatrick, a friend and connexion of the inspector.

There being scarcely a prospect of effectual defence against so large a body as then appeared, and as the inspector had every thing to apprehend for his person, if taken, it was judged advisable that he should withdraw from the house to a place of concealment; Major Kirkpatrick generously agreeing to remain with the eleven men, in the intention, if practicable, to make a capitulation in favor of the property; if not, to defend it as long as possible.

A parley took place under cover of a flag, which was sent by the insurgents to the house to demand that the inspector should come forth, renounce his office, and stipulate never again to accept an office under the same laws. To this it was replied that the inspector had left the house upon their first approach, and that the place to which he had retired was unknown. They then declared that they must have whatever related to his office. They were answered that they might send persons, not exceeding six, to search the house, and take away whatever papers they could find appertaining to the office. But not satisfied with this, they insisted, unconditionally, that the armed men who were in the house for its defence should march out and ground their arms, which Major Kirkpatrick peremptorily refused; considering it and representing it to them as a proof of a design to destroy the property. This refusal put an end to the parley.

A brisk firing then ensued between the insurgents and those in the house, which, it is said, lasted for near an hour, till the assailants, having set fire to the neighboring and adjacent buildings, eight in number, the intensesness of the heat, and the danger of an immediate communication of the fire to the house, obliged Major Kirkpatrick and his small party to come out and surrender themselves. In the course of the firing one of the insurgents was killed and several wounded, and three of the persons in the house were also wounded. The person killed is understood to have been the leader of the party, of the name of James McFarlane, then a major in the militia, formerly a lieutenant in the Pennsylvania line. The dwelling-house, after the surrender, shared the fate of the other buildings, the whole of which were consumed to the ground. The loss of property to the inspector, upon this occasion, is estimated, and as it is believed with great moderation, at not less than three thousand pounds.

The marshal, Colonel Presley Neville, and several others, were taken by the insurgents going to the inspector's house. All, except the marshal and Colonel Neville, soon made their escape; but these were carried off some distance from the place where the affray had happened, and detained till one or two o'clock the next morning. In the course of their detention, the marshal in particular suffered very severe and humiliating treatment, and was frequently in imminent danger of his life. Several of the party repeatedly presented their pieces at him with every appearance of a design to assassinate, from which they were with difficulty restrained by the efforts of a few more humane and more prudent.

Nor could he obtain safety or liberty, but upon the condition of a promise, guaranteed by Colonel Neville, that he would serve no other process on the west side of the Alleghany mountain. The alternative being immediate death, extorted from the marshal a compliance with this condition, notwithstanding the just sense of official dignity, and the firmness of character which were witnessed by his conduct throughout the trying scenes he had experienced.

The insurgents, on the 18th, sent a deputation of two of their number (one a justice of the peace) to Pittsburg, to require of the marshal a surrender of the processes in his possession, intimating that his compliance would satisfy the people, and add to his safety; and also to demand of General Neville, in peremptory terms, the resignation of his office; threatening, in case of refusal, to attack the place and take him by force: demands which both these officers did not hesitate to reject, as alike incompatible with their honor and their duty.

As it was well ascertained that no protection was to be expected from the magistrates or inhabitants of Pittsburg, it became necessary to the safety, both of the inspector and the marshal, to quit that place; and, as it was known that all the usual routes to Philadelphia were beset by the insurgents, they concluded to descend the Ohio, and proceed, by a circuitous route, to the seat of Government; which they began to put in execution on the night of the 19th of July.

Information has also been received of a meeting of a considerable number of persons at a place called Mingo Creek meeting-house, in the county of Washington, to consult about the further measures which it might be advisable to pursue: that, at this meeting, a motion was made to approve and agree to support the proceedings which had taken place, until the excise law was repealed, and an act of oblivion passed. But that, instead of this, it had been agreed that the four western counties of Pennsylvania, and the neighboring counties of Virginia, should be invited to meet in a convention of delegates, on the 14th of the present month, at Parkinson's, on Mingo creek, in the county of Washington, to take into consideration the situation of the western country, and concert such measures as should appear suited to the occasion.

It appears, moreover, that, on the 25th of July last, the mail of the United States, on the road from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, was stopped by two armed men, who cut it open, and took out all the letters, except those contained in one packet; these armed men, from all the circumstances which occurred, were manifestly acting on the part of the insurgents.

The declared object of the foregoing proceedings is to obstruct the execution and compel a repeal of the laws laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills. There is just cause to believe that this is connected with an indisposition, too general in that quarter, to share in the common burdens of the community, and with a wish, among some persons of influence, to embarrass the Government. It is affirmed, by well-informed persons, to be a fact of notoriety, that the revenue laws of the State itself have always been either resisted or very defectively complied with in the same quarter.

With the most perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,
ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

BEDFORD, October 20, 1794.

I have it in special instruction from the President of the United States, now at this place, to convey to you, on his behalf, the following instructions for the general direction of your conduct in the command of the militia army, with which you are charged.

The objects for which the militia have been called forth are—

1st. To suppress the combinations which exist in some of the western counties of Pennsylvania in opposition to the laws laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills.

2d. To cause the laws to be executed.

These objects are to be effected in two ways—

1. By military force.
2. By judiciary process, and other civil proceedings.

The objects of the military force are two-fold—

1. To overcome any armed opposition which may exist.
2. To countenance and support the civil officers in the means of executing the laws.

With a view to the first of these two objects, you will proceed, as speedily as may be, with the army under your command, into the insurgent counties, to attack, and, as far as shall be in your power, subdue, all persons whom you may find in arms, in opposition to the laws above mentioned. You will march your army in two columns, from the places where they are now assembled, by the most convenient routes, having regard to the nature of the roads, the convenience of supply, and the facility of co-operation and union; and bearing in mind that you ought to act, till the contrary shall be fully developed, on the general principle of having to contend with the whole force of the counties of Fayette, Westmoreland, Washington, and Allegany, and of that part of Bedford which lies west of the town of Bedford; and that you are to put as little as possible to hazard. The approximation, therefore, of your columns, is to be sought, and the subdivision of them, so as to place the parts out of mutual supporting distance, to be avoided as far as local circumstances will permit. Parkinson's ferry appears to be a proper point towards which to direct the march of the columns for the purpose of ulterior measures.

When arrived within the insurgent country, if an armed opposition appear, it may be proper to publish a proclamation, inviting all good citizens, friends of the constitution and laws, to join the standard of the United States. If no armed opposition exist, it may still be proper to publish a proclamation, exhorting to a peaceable and dutiful demeanor, and giving assurances of performing, with good faith and liberality, whatsoever may have been promised by the commissioners to those who have complied with the conditions prescribed by them, and who have not forfeited their title by subsequent misconduct.

Of those persons in arms, if any, whom you may make prisoners, leaders, including all persons in command, are to be delivered up to the civil magistrate; the rest to be disarmed, admonished, and sent home, (except such as may have been particularly violent and also influential,) causing their own recognizances for their good behavior to be taken, in the cases in which it may be deemed expedient.

With a view to the second point, namely, "the countenance and support of the civil officers in the means of executing the laws," you will make such dispositions as shall appear proper to countenance and protect, and, if necessary, and required by them, to support and aid the civil officers in the execution of their respective duties; for bringing offenders and delinquents to justice; for seizing the stills of delinquent distillers, as far as the same shall be deemed eligible by the supervisor of the revenue, or chief officer of inspection; and also for conveying to places of safe custody such persons as may be apprehended and not admitted to bail.

The objects of judiciary process, and other civil proceedings, will be—

1. To bring offenders to justice.
2. To enforce penalties on delinquent distillers by suit.
3. To enforce the penalty of forfeiture on the same persons by the seizure of their stills and spirits.

The better to effect these purposes, the judge of the district, Richard Peters, esquire, and the attorney of the district, William Rawle, esquire, accompany the army.

You are aware that the judge cannot be controlled in his functions; but I count on his disposition to co-operate in such a general plan as shall appear to you consistent with the policy of the case. But your method of giving a direction to legal proceedings, according to your general plan, will be by instruction to the district attorney.

He ought particularly to be instructed, (with due regard to time and circumstance,) 1st. To procure to be arrested all influential actors in riots and unlawful assemblies relating to the insurrection, and combinations to resist the laws, or having for object to abet that insurrection and those combinations, and who shall not have complied with the terms offered by the commissioners, or manifested their repentance in some other way, which you may deem satisfactory. 2d. To cause process to issue for enforcing penalties upon delinquent distillers. 3d. To cause offenders, who may be arrested, to be conveyed to jails where there will be no danger of rescue; those for misdemeanors, to the jails of York and Lancaster; those for capital offences, to the jail of Philadelphia, as more secure than the others. 4th. To prosecute indictable offences in the courts of the United States: those for penalties on delinquents, under the laws before mentioned, in the courts of Pennsylvania.

As a guide in the case, the district attorney has with him a list of the persons who have availed themselves of the offers of the commissioners on the day appointed.

The seizure of stills is the province of the supervisor and other officers of inspection. It is difficult to chalk out the precise line concerning it. There are opposite considerations, which will require to be nicely balanced, and which must be judged of by those officers on the spot. It may be found useful to confine the seizures to stills of the most leading and refractory distillers. It may be advisable to extend them far in the most refractory county.

When the insurrection is subdued, and the requisite means have been put in execution to secure obedience to the laws, so as to render it proper for the army to retire, (an event which you will accelerate as much as shall be consistent with the object,) you will endeavor to make an arrangement for detaching such a force as you deem adequate, to be stationed within the disaffected country, in such manner as best to afford protection to well-disposed citizens and to the officers of the revenue, and to repress, by their presence, the spirit of riot and opposition to the laws.

But before you withdraw the army, you will promise, on behalf of the President, a general pardon to all such as shall not have been arrested, with such exceptions as you shall deem proper. The promise must be so guarded as not to affect pecuniary claims under the revenue laws. In this measure, it is advisable there should be a co-operation with the Governor of Pennsylvania.

On the return of the army you will adopt some convenient and certain arrangement for restoring to the public magazines the arms, accoutrements, military stores, tents, and other articles of camp equipage and entrenching tools, which have been furnished, and shall not have been consumed or lost.

You are to exert yourself by all possible means to preserve discipline among the troops, particularly a scrupulous regard to the rights of persons and property, and a respect for the authority of the civil magistrate; taking especial care to inculcate and cause to be observed this principle: that the duties of the army are confined to the attacking and subduing of armed opponents of the laws, and to the supporting and aiding of the civil officers in the execution of their functions.

It has been settled that the Governor of Pennsylvania will be second, the Governor of New Jersey third in command; and that the troops of the several States in line, on the march and upon detachment, are to be posted according to the rule which prevailed in the army during the late war; namely, in moving towards the sea-board, the most southern troops will take the right; in moving westward, the most northern will take the right.

These general instructions, however, are to be considered as liable to such alterations and deviations in the detail, as from local and other causes may be found necessary, the better to effect the main object upon the general principles which have been indicated.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

3d CONGRESS.]

No. 57.

[2d SESSION.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN VIRGINIA AND THE TERRITORY SOUTH OF THE RIVER OHIO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 8, 1794.

Mr. PRESTON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of the United States residing between the lines commonly called Walker's and Henderson's lines, praying the former may be established as the dividing line between the State of Virginia and the territory south of the river Ohio, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That a law should pass establishing Walker's line as the southern boundary between the State of Virginia and the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, reserving to the said inhabitants their claims to lands lying between the said lines, according to the laws of the State under which they claim.

CONCURRENT JURISDICTION GRANTED TO THOSE STATES THAT HAVE CEDED LANDS FOR LIGHT-HOUSES WITHOUT RESERVATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 17, 1794.

Mr. CORR, from the committee to whom it was referred to consider and report on the expediency of making any alterations in the laws relative to the cession of jurisdiction by particular States in lands where have been erected, or may by law be provided to be erected, light-houses, beacons, &c., made the following report:

That the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, have, in their cessions of jurisdiction, made in pursuance of the law of the United States providing for the support of light-houses, beacons, &c., reserved a concurrent jurisdiction so far as that all civil and criminal process, issued under the authority of said States, respectively, may be executed within the ceded territory; the other States in which light-houses were situated before the passing the said law having ceded the jurisdiction without such reservation.

That, in pursuance of a law providing for the building a light-house on Montock Point, in the State of New York, wherein it is provided that the State of New York cede the jurisdiction of the place where, before it shall be built, the said State have made a cession of jurisdiction of the place designated by the President of the United States for the site of the light-house, with a proviso that such cession shall not extend or be construed to impede or prevent the execution of any process within the ceded territory, under the authority of that State, except so far as the said process may affect the real or personal property of the United States; but this not having been deemed by the President a cession comporting with the requisition of the act providing for the building of the said light-house, the same has not been built.

In the act providing for the erection of a light-house on the island of Seguin, in the State of Massachusetts, it is declared that the said State had ceded the land on which the same was to be erected, and no condition for cession of jurisdiction is provided; the cession of this land contains the same reservation of jurisdiction as is contained in the cession of that State, made in pursuance of the law providing for the support of light-houses, &c.

That the provision made by law for the supporting, by the United States, of light-houses, &c. without the cession of jurisdiction by the States in which the same may be, ceases on the first day of July next.

The committee are of opinion, that the reservation of concurrent jurisdiction by the States in their cessions, cannot in any degree obstruct the purposes for which cessions of jurisdiction are required; that it would be expedient to provide for the accepting of cessions containing such reservations; and as uniformity of proceeding would be desirable, and inconveniences may arise from the United States retaining an exclusive jurisdiction, that a concurrence of jurisdiction should be restored to those States who have made their cessions absolute; and thereupon submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill declaring that cessions of jurisdiction made by any State, in lands where have been erected, or may by law be provided to be erected and placed light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, with a reservation of concurrent jurisdiction to such State, shall be deemed sufficient cessions of jurisdiction in pursuance of the laws providing for the maintenance and erection of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; and that where absolute cessions for such purposes have been made, the States which have made the same shall, notwithstanding, be entitled to exercise and retain a concurrent jurisdiction.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 23, 1794.

Mr. MOORE, from the committee appointed to report what further provisions are necessary for the more general promulgation of the laws, made the following report:

That the provision heretofore made has been entirely inadequate to the purpose of a due promulgation of the laws; that it is become expedient to extend the provision on this subject to the commencement of the Government under the present constitution. That for the accommodation of such Germans, citizens of the United States, as do not understand the English language, it will be necessary that the laws be translated, and printed in the German language. Your committee therefore submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That three thousand complete sets of the laws of the Congress, to the close of the present session, be printed, and distributed among the different States, in proportion to their numbers. That the number of sets allotted to each State be distributed throughout the counties within the State in the same proportion, and be deposited in fixed and convenient places in each county, under the direction of the court of such county.

Resolved, That a like number of the laws passed at each succeeding session be printed and distributed as above directed.

Resolved, That such proportion of the above number of copies shall be printed in the German language as the representatives from the districts within which such German citizens reside, shall certify to the Secretary of State to be necessary.

Resolved, That each printer of a newspaper within the United States, who, as soon as may be, after the close of each session, shall print in his newspaper all the laws passed at each session, continuing them in each succeeding number, until the whole are finished, shall, on making it appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State, be entitled to receive _____ dollars: provided the same shall not be allowed to more than two printers in any one town.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—DEFECTS IN THE JUDICIARY SYSTEM IN THE NORTH-WESTERN TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 8, 1795,

By message from the President of the United States, of which the following is an extract:

“The minister of the French republic having communicated to the Secretary of State certain proceedings of the Committee of Public Safety, respecting weights and measures, I lay them before Congress.”

“The letter from the Governor of the Western Territory, copies of which are now transmitted, refers to a defect in the judicial system of that Territory deserving the attention of Congress.”

Jos. ph Fauchet, minister plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

[TRANSLATION.]

PHILADELPHIA, 15th Thermidor, (August 2, 1794,) old style.

SIR:

2d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

You have doubtless been informed of the tedious and constant efforts which have been made in Europe, and particularly in France, for some years past, in order to substitute for the uncertainty which reigns in the instruments employed in comparing or measuring physical quantities, a certain system taken from nature, and of course as immutable as nature itself. The learned alone were long occupied with it as mere matter of speculation. France was the first to place those researches among the cares of Government. America, if I mistake not, has since followed the example; for I think I have heard that the present Government were engaged in the same changes, and even waited the result of the operation made in France on this subject, for the purpose of commencing the reform. The national assemblies have given great activity to those researches. The convention, which is constantly occupied in invigorating the arts, has caused them to make a rapid progress, and, at length, has lately adopted the methods resulting therefrom.

The Committee of Public Safety of the National Convention, convinced that an enlightened and free people would receive with pleasure one of the discoveries of the human mind, the most beautiful in theory, and the most useful in application, had expressly charged the citizen Dombey, a learned natural philosopher, to come and communicate to you the first types of the new mode of mensuration which has been adopted. You will observe, by the decree of which I enclose you a copy, the motives and express order for this mission. Dombey had likewise received from the Board of Weights and Measures the instruction of which I also send you a copy. The American vessel in which he had embarked put into Montserrat, where he died. His papers, and the models which he had received in order to deliver to the Government, have luckily come to my hands. I hasten, sir, to forward the whole to you, regretting that the patriot Dombey could not enjoy the honor of fulfilling his mission, and of communicating perhaps some instructions in detail interesting to the learned to whom you may consign the examination of the new system.

To you, sir, I shall not dissemble that, as to myself, I see in the adoption of the new measures by America a mean of cementing the political and commercial connexions of the two nations. I see, moreover, therein, a great step towards the destruction of those customs, more or less absurd and arbitrary, which shackle the relations of nations with each other. Persuaded that the Government takes an equal interest itself in both these objects, I cannot entertain a doubt of its sanctioning with its authority the introduction of the new method.

If you desire, sir, to avail yourself of the instructions about to be prepared by order of the National Convention, in order to facilitate in practice the use of the new instruments and the understanding of their relation to the old, I shall with pleasure undertake to make an express application for them in France.

Accept, sir, my esteem.

JH. FAUCHET.

Decree of the Committee of Public Safety of the National Convention, on the 21st day of the month Frimaire, (December 11, 1793,) 2d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

The Committee of Public Safety, considering that it may be important to make known to the people with whom the republic may have relations, the new system of weights and measures which it has adopted, decrees, that the Board of Weights and Measures cause to be sent to citizen Dombey, who departs for North America, a measure in copper, and a weight divided in the form decreed for the standards, the expense of which shall be defrayed out of the funds allotted to this work.

Done at Paris, the 21st Frimaire, 2d year of the French republic one and indivisible.

Signed, in original, Robespierre, Carnot, C. A. Prieur, Barrère, Billaud Varennes, and R. Lindet.

Extract signed C. A. Prieur, Carnot, R. Lindet, and Billaud Varennes.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Board of Weights and Measures, in execution of a decree of the Committee of Public Safety, has transmitted to Citizen Dombey a measure in copper, and a weight decimally divided, both being conformable to standards which will soon be in use throughout the republic.

According to the decrees of the National Convention, our measure ought to be equal to the ten millionth part of the 4th part of a terrestrial meridian, which is the unit taken in nature, to which all our measures are referred; and our weight ought to be equal to the weight of a cubic measure of distilled water, having for its side the tenth part of the measure, (this water being supposed to be weighed in the open air, and in the temperature of melting ice.)

We already know very nearly the length of the fourth part of a meridian from the measures of several terrestrial arcs made in the last and present century by different astronomers. It results, from these measures, that the 45th degree of latitude contains 57.027 toises of France. Now, in supposing the earth to be an elliptical spheroid of small eccentricity, the 45th degree is very nearly the mean term between all the other degrees,\* it will hence follow that, by multiplying 57.027 toises by 90, we shall have the length of the fourth part of a meridian, which will be found equal to 5,132,430 toises, and, consequently, its ten millionth part, in which the measure will be equal to 3 French feet  $11 \frac{44}{100}$  lignes. It is thought that the error of this determination does not exceed the tenth of a ligne.

The standard of the measure has been regulated by this precise length of 3 French feet  $11 \frac{44}{100}$  lignes to the temperature marked by  $10^{\circ}$  of the thermometer of Reaumur or by  $54\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$  of that of Fahrenheit, which is the constant temperature observed either in summer or winter in the cellars of the observatory of Paris.

The standard of weight has been determined from experiments on the weight of distilled water made by the Board of Weights and Measures, and referring the volume of the body, which was used in the experiments, to the cubic measure, which has for its side the tenth part of the measure.

Although the determination of these two models be already of more than sufficient exactness for the ordinary necessities of commerce, still, however, it is regarded as provisory only, and the investigation will not be definitively decreed until the measure of the terrestrial arc, which is now making, shall be entirely accomplished. It is hoped that this measure, which comprehends  $9\frac{1}{2}$  degrees of the meridian, and which is the greatest operation of the kind that has been undertaken, will be completed by the end of this year; then the length of the measure being fixed, as well as the weight of the unit of weights, the provisory models will be corrected if they require it, and shall be executed in platina, a single model of each kind, which shall be deposited in the place of residence of the National Assembly, and will serve to verify, from time to time, at fixed periods, those which shall be scattered throughout the republic.

It is thought that the National Convention will, in like manner, cause to be executed in platina other models, which will be sent to the nations with whom France may be connected in commerce; these models shall be absolutely similar to those which are to be preserved in the place of residence of the National Assembly, and the identity such as that each nation may regard those she possesses as the prototypes of all the others.

The standard of measure and that of weight are divided into decimal parts. This system of division, which is uniform and similar to that of our arithmetical scale, will be established generally in all kinds of measures; in those of length, superficies, and of capacity, as well as in weights and money, and, in short, in astronomical, geographical, and nautical measures.

Already our livre tournois, or numerical livre, is divided into dimes and cents; and the public accounts will immediately be kept conformably to this new division. The small moneys which are coined are equally subject to this system, and are decimal parts of the weight.

As to measures which interest the sciences, the decimal division has been executed in the instruments which are used to measure the terrestrial arc contained between Dunkirk and Barcelona. In these instruments the fourth of the circle is divided into 100 degrees, the degree into 100 minutes, and the minute into 100 seconds. It is also attempted to reduce all the astronomical tables to the new division.

In like manner, astronomical clocks divided into decimals have been made. The whole length of the day, from one midnight to the other, is divided into 10 hours; the hour into 100 minutes, and the minute into 100 seconds, which make each day to consist of one hundred thousand seconds instead of 86,400 as formerly computed; so that the new second will be but about  $\frac{2}{3}$  of the ancient, and the length of the new pendulum for seconds will be equal to 2 pi. 3 po. 7 li. instead of 3 pi. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  li.

Several pocket watches have been made according to the decimal division, and, in short, the division of the year decreed by the National Convention adheres as nearly as possible to this new system.

NOTE.—The standards of measures of capacity have not been added, because it is sufficient to say that our elementary unit of capacity, or our pint, will be equal to a cubic measure having for its side the tenth part of the measure; hence it will be seen that the unit of weight is the weight of a pint of distilled water.

MARIETTA, December 15, 1794.

SIR:

By the ordinance of Congress establishing the Government of the Western Territory, the supreme judicial authority is vested in three judges, two of whom were necessary to form a court, with power to decide in all matters, without appeal; and, by a law of Congress, one of those judges is made competent, also without appeal. Many representations, sir, have been made to me on this subject; the people, very generally, think it an unsafe situation which they are in; and, indeed, taking the matter abstractedly, it cannot be thought very eligible that the whole property of a country which may be the subject of legal dispute should be governed by the determination of a single judge, without the possibility of having that determination revised. But circumstances exist at present that render it dangerous for them. The principal settlements have been made on tracts of land purchased by certain companies or associations of persons. The first of these is the Ohio Company, and the next that of the Miami. In both those associations, the management of the directors and agents is thought to have laid the foundation of endless disputes. General Putnam has been the active director in the first association, and Mr. Symmes the principal if not the sole agent in the second; and they are both judges of the supreme court. Every land dispute will be traced to some transaction of one or other of those gentlemen in those capacities, and they are to sit in judgment upon them. It must be acknowledged that this is not a groundless cause of apprehension; for, though they are both of very fair character, and delicacy would prevent their judging in any case where they are themselves parties, interest hangs an insensible bias on the minds of the most upright men; and, in the matters that are most likely to be litigated, in whichever of the associations they happen, there must necessarily be so great a similarity, that deciding in one by a judge who has no direct interest in the cause, may, nevertheless, have as direct and certain an effect in another wherein he is interested as if he had determined in his own cause. I believe, sir, it would therefore be well if the law empowering one judge to hold the court could be repealed, and that some

* In like manner, if we measure an arc of the meridian, divided into equal parts by the 45th degree, we shall have the fourth of a meridian by multiplying the given length of this arc by 90, and dividing the product by the number of degrees measured.

The terrestrial arc contained between Dunkirk and Barcelona, which the Board of Weights and Measures is instructed to measure in order to ascertain the length of the meridian, is found to be divided into two parts by the 45th degree; in fact, the two parts are not equal, but they differ so little that the ratio of the arcs to which our attention is called in the calculation will not be sensibly influenced by the result.

mode were prescribed for bringing the decisions of the supreme court here before the federal court, either by direct appeal or by writ of error, or both, as cases may require. It appears to me, sir, to be necessary for rendering the people easy and safe. And there are also political ends that would clearly be served by it; for there is perhaps nothing that contributes more to induce an affectionate submission to any power, than the habit of looking up to that power as the depository and dispenser of justice in the last resort. I have thought it my duty to make you acquainted with the fears and wishes of the people upon this subject;

And have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

The Honorable EDMUND RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

FEES OF COURTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 12, 1795.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, January 8, 1795.

In obedience to the resolve passed on the 5th of last June, I have the honor to report to the House of Representatives of the United States "such tables of fees and regulations relative to the same, as, on a comparative view of the fees taxable in the several States, are, in my opinion, proper to be established for the courts of the United States;" and I have thrown the whole into the form of a bill, as the most convenient method of making a report on this subject.

It may, however, be proper to observe, that the comparative view which I have taken of the tables transmitted to me by the clerks of the district courts, did not in general furnish a standard to ascertain the amount of the fees proper to be reported. Whenever it appeared that many of the States prescribed the same, or nearly the same fee, for any specific service, that has been adopted; but, in most instances, the tables transmitted differ so widely from each other, that no common measure could be collected from them. Attention has, therefore, been principally paid to the fees heretofore established by Congress; to the nature of the suit; to the stage of the cause in which the service is to be performed, and to the frequency with which it may occur; and in some instances to a mean sum between the highest and lowest of the State fees. After all, sir, as the price of labor, the quantum of business, and the course of practice, are very different in different districts, I am apprehensive that those fees, which in one part of the Union may be a bare compensation to the officer for his trouble, may, in another, be deemed excessive. This inequality might, perhaps, be removed, by adopting a method established in some places, of directing the fees to be paid into the Treasury, and allowing the officer a stated compensation, proportioned to the nature and extent of his duties, and to the price of labor in the district.

May I be allowed, sir, to suggest, that such a mode of compensation appears to be peculiarly proper for the marshal and attorney of the district? The former of these officers is frequently obliged to perform services exceedingly expensive to himself, for which no adequate fee can be established without rendering the costs of a suit burdensome to the parties; and from the representations made to me, it is apparent that, in several of the districts, even very liberal fees would not afford to men properly qualified a sufficient compensation for the trouble, hazard, and expense to which they are exposed. As to the attorney of the district, his duties are not merely those of an attorney. He is the counsel and advocate of the United States in all criminal and civil suits in the circuit or district court, in which the United States are concerned. It has also been in practice for the officers of the customs, and other officers of the United States, in the several districts, when they could not have recourse in time to the head of the department, to call on the attorney of the district for his opinion on points of real difficulty and importance. For services like these, which necessarily require men of talents, a stated compensation, beyond the mere attorney fee, is usual in almost every State in the Union; and is perhaps a more economical method of making compensation than that of paying counsel fees in every cause that occurs.

I have thought it my duty, sir, to hazard these few observations on this subject; but as the resolve of your honorable House does not appear to warrant a report of any compensation for these officers but by fees, I have endeavored to mark out a method in which it may (for one of them at least) be secured.

I have only to add, that the 4th of next March is reported as proper for the commencement of a new act, because that of the 1st of March, 1793, will expire, by its own limitation, with the present session of Congress. If a further day should be deemed proper, or if Congress should not continue in session till that day, a clause to continue that act will be necessary.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. BRADFORD.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

A draught of an act to establish fees and compensations for the officers of the courts of the United States and others.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the third day of March next, the fees and compensations of the several officers and persons hereinafter mentioned, for the services to be done and performed by them, respectively, shall be as follows; that is to say:

To the clerk of the district and circuit courts in any civil suit at law.

For administering the oath or affirmation to persons admitted attorneys or counsellors at law, recording the same, and making out certificates	-	-	5 00
For drawing, or examining, and allowing a bill of costs and copy	-	-	25

To the same officer for his services in any criminal suit or prosecution.

For calling and swearing a grand jury, for each person against whom a bill is presented	-	-	10
For filing and entering a recognizance taken out of court	-	-	8
For taking and entering every recognizance in court	-	-	10
For filing and entering an indictment on the minutes	-	-	25
For entering an award of process	-	-	8
For a warrant, for every ninety words	-	-	10
For calling any recognizance, and entering appearance or default	-	-	10
For entering a respite of every recognizance	-	-	10
For arraigning a person indicted	-	-	25
For entering every plea, demurrer, replication, or other pleading	-	-	10
For every subpœna in a criminal cause, including seal	-	-	25
For every name therein, more than one, and not exceeding four	-	-	8
For affixing the seal to any writ or paper in any criminal cause	-	-	20
For all other services in any criminal prosecution, the same fees are allowed for the same or similar services in any civil cause.	-	-

To the same officer in any suit in equity in the circuit court, (who is hereby authorized to do and perform the duties usually assigned to a master, register, or examiner in chancery,) the following fees; that is to say:

For drawing every subpoena, attachment, ne exeat, summons, injunction, dedimus potestatem, commission, or other writ, for each sheet containing ninety words	-	-	-	-	$ 20
For engrossing the same, each sheet	-	-	-	-	10
For affixing the seal to any writ	-	-	-	-	60
For entering defendant's appearance, or an appearance in contempt	-	-	-	-	20
For filing every bill, plea, answer, demurrer, replication, and other pleading, report, affidavit, deposition, or other paper	-	-	-	-	15
Drawing every recognizance or security in any cause, or on any writ or order, every affidavit, decree, or other part of the proceedings in the cause, (where he does it) for each sheet, as aforesaid	-	-	-	-	15
For engrossing the same, for each sheet	-	-	-	-	10
For entering the same on the minutes (where necessary) for each sheet	-	-	-	-	10
For all copies and exemplifications, for each sheet	-	-	-	-	15
For every term the cause is continued	-	-	-	-	40
For signing every report by him made pursuant to order	-	-	-	-	1 00
For drawing and engrossing the same, for each sheet	-	-	-	-	15
For administering every oath or affirmation	-	-	-	-	12
For entering a cause for hearing	-	-	-	-	15
For reading in court all the papers and exhibits in a suit	-	-	-	-	1 00
For entering every americiament, attachment, proclamation, or default	-	-	-	-	20
For every supersedeas	-	-	-	-	75
For every dismissal	-	-	-	-	30
For attending at the judge's chamber on any motion or other necessary business	-	-	-	-	50
For taking the examination of every witness, and making a fair copy for the witness to sign, for every sheet as aforesaid	-	-	-	-	20
For certifying every exhibit shown to a witness on his examination	-	-	-	-	30
For making up a record on a writ of error, for every sheet	-	-	-	-	15
For a bill of costs and copy	-	-	-	-	40
For a notification to insert in a gazette and attendance on the printer	-	-	-	-	50
And for all other services done in any suit in equity the same fees as are allowed for the same or similar services in a suit at law.

To the same officer, in any cause of admiralty, or maritime jurisdiction.

For drawing every stipulation, bond, process, monition, subpoena, warrant, commission, deposition, decree, or decretal order, record, and every writing or proceeding in the cause, for every sheet containing ninety words	-	-	-	-	15
For engrossing each sheet	-	-	-	-	10
For entering a record in the register, for each sheet	-	-	-	-	10

And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the supreme court, for all other services in any cause, and his attendance in the Supreme Court, and all officers and persons (except marshals and witnesses) doing service in or attending the same court, shall be entitled to and shall receive double the fees or allowance which are hereby established for the same or similar service or attendance in the circuit or district courts.

And be it further enacted, That in every prosecution for any fine or forfeiture incurred under any statute of the United States, if judgment is rendered against the defendant, he shall be subject to the payment of costs; and on every conviction for any other offence (not capital) the court may, in their discretion, award that the defendant shall pay the costs of prosecution; and if any informer or plaintiff, on a penal statute, to whose benefit the penalty, or any part thereof, if recovered, is directed by law to accrue, shall discontinue his suit or prosecution, or shall be non-suit in the same, or if upon trial a verdict shall pass for the defendant, the court shall award to the defendant his costs, unless such informer or plaintiff be an officer of the United States, specially authorized to commence such prosecution, and the court before whom the action or information shall be tried shall at the trial, in open court, certify upon record that there was reasonable cause for commencing the same; in which case, no costs shall be adjudged to the defendant.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and taxed in the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, in favor of the parties obtaining judgments therein, such compensation for their travel and attendance, as are allowed in the supreme or superior courts of the respective States.

And be it further enacted, That the fees and compensation to the several officers and persons hereinbefore mentioned, other than those which are above directed to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be recovered, in like manner as the fees of the officers of the States, respectively, for like services are recovered.

And be it further enacted, That the court in which any civil suit is depending, may, in their discretion, or on the application of the clerk or marshal, direct the plaintiff or plaintiffs to give security for the payment of such fees as the services done or to be done and rendered by them in the cause shall entitle the said officers to demand and have from him or them.

And be it further enacted, That the personal and real property of any person indicted, and capitally convicted, or sentenced to pay the costs of his or her prosecution, shall be liable to be taken in execution, and sold to satisfy the same, by writ of fieri facias, or other proper writ of execution. And it shall be the duty of the marshal to recover and collect all such fees, where the person so convicted or sentenced hath sufficient ability or property to pay the same, and to account therefor in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid to the marshal the amount of the expense for fuel, candles, and other reasonable contingencies that may accrue in holding the courts within his district, and providing the books necessary to record the proceedings thereof; and such amount, as also the compensations aforesaid to the grand jurors; to the petit jurors on every trial in a criminal cause, and bailiffs attending them; to the witnesses summoned on the part of the United States; to the clerk of the supreme court for his attendance; to the clerks of the district and circuit courts for their attendance and travel; to the attorney of the district for his attendance and travel; to the marshal for his attendance at court; for summoning grand juries and witnesses in behalf of any person to be tried for a capital offence; and also of the legal fees due to the clerk, attorney of the district, marshal, and bailiff, on any criminal prosecution, and the compensation certified to be due to the said attorney for his services in all civil actions in which the United States shall have been concerned, shall be included in the marshal's account; which being examined and certified by the court, or one of the judges of it, in which the services shall have been rendered, shall be presented once at least in every year, and passed in the usual manner at, and the amount thereof paid out of the Treasury of the United States to the marshal, and by him shall be paid over to the persons entitled to the same, except such part thereof as he hath advanced to the grand or petit jurors, or the witnesses on behalf of the United States; and the marshal shall be allowed two and a half per centum on the amount by him so advanced or paid over, to be charged in his future account. Provided always, That the marshal shall in such his account give credit to the United States for all fees which he shall receive from any person convicted of a criminal offence.

And be it further enacted, That if any officer hereinbefore mentioned, or his deputy, shall, by reason or color of his office, wilfully and corruptly demand and receive any greater fees than those allowed by this act, he shall, on conviction thereof, in any court of the United States, forfeit and pay a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court before whom such conviction shall be.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person to refuse payment of fees to any officer who will not make out and deliver a bill of particulars signed by him if required, and also a receipt or discharge signed by him of the fees paid.

And be it further enacted, That the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of an act, entitled "An act for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," and so much of any other act or acts of Congress, as is hereby altered and supplied, shall, from and after the said third day of March next, stand and be repealed.

And be it further enacted, That this act shall be and continue in force from and after the said third day of March next, for and during the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

All which is respectfully submitted:

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 29, 1795.

Mr. BALDWIN made the following report:

The committee to whom was recommitted the report of the committee appointed to report what further provisions are necessary for the more general promulgation of the laws, have had the subject referred to them under consideration, and submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of State, a complete edition of five thousand copies of the laws to the close of the present session of Congress, to include only the public acts which are now in force, and that they be divided among the respective States, and the territories northwest and south of the river Ohio, according to the rule for apportioning representatives: that the number allotted to each State or Territory be transmitted to the Governor or supreme Executive Magistrate thereof, in order to be deposited in fixed and convenient places in each county or subordinate civil division, as the Executive or Legislature of such State or Territory may judge most conducive to the general information of the people.

Resolved, That a like number of the laws passed at each succeeding session be printed and distributed as above directed.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State shall, as soon as may be after the close of each session, cause to be printed, in two newspapers in each State, all the laws passed at such session, continuing them in each succeeding number of such paper, until the whole are finished.

FEES OF COURTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 14, 1795.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the attorney general of such tables of fees and regulations as are proper to be established for the courts of the United States, made the following report:

That they have carefully examined the same, and are of opinion that the fees payable in the several States are properly averaged therein, from a comparative view of the same, and brought to one uniform standard, to the particular charges of which the committee have no solid objection; yet they cannot but observe to the House the great impropriety (in the opinion of the committee) of one universal rule of charges for all the States in the Union, whose circumstances are so different, that those which in one State might be very reasonable, in another would be complained of as highly extravagant.

The difficulties attending this important business are greatly increased by the particular organization of the federal courts, which requires a speedy revision. Your committee are of opinion, that either salaries must be given to the several officers of the courts, and the fees be paid into the Treasury of the United States, or that a sum in gross applied to the different stages of a suit be paid to the several officers in each suit that may be brought, in full for all services performed therein.

But as the full examination and consideration of this interesting subject will require more time than can be devoted to it in so late a stage of the session, and it being necessary that the table of fees reported should be clearly understood, the committee are of opinion that the same should be printed for consideration, and referred to the determination of the next Congress. In the mean time, it is indispensable that the present law relative to fees to be taken in the several courts which will expire at the end of this session, should be continued. They, therefore, recommend the following resolutions:

1st. Resolved, That the table of fees reported by the attorney general be printed for the use of the members and the consideration thereof be referred to the next session of Congress.

2d. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to continue the act entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in admiralty proceedings in the district courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

REPORTERS TO CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 23, 1795.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Edmund Hogan, made the following report:

That, in their opinion, an impartial publication of the debates of the House would be of great public utility, and, for that purpose, that it would be proper to appoint one or more persons competent to the task of faithfully reporting public debates as officers of this House; they, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to receive proposals from any person or persons skilled in the art of stenography, or capable of reporting debates with accuracy, and to report the same to this House at the commencement of the next session, with his observations and opinion respecting the qualifications of the said person or persons for the said duty; to the end that this House may be enabled to appoint one or more persons, as officers of the House, for the valuable purpose above mentioned.

REMONSTRANCE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE AGAINST THE EXERCISE OF CERTAIN POWERS BY THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 27, 1795.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial and remonstrance of the Legislature of New Hampshire, praying the interference and support of Congress in favor of the judicial power of the State court against an encroachment of the judiciary of the United States, in revising a decree of the supreme judicial court of said State, made the following report:

That the subject of the said memorial being of a nature wholly judicial, and having undergone a course of judicial investigation and of final decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, the committee have conceived themselves precluded from all inquiry into the particular merits of the case; nor can perceive any ground on which legislative interference could be proper.

The committee for draughting a remonstrance to Congress reported the following:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: The memorial of the Legislature of New Hampshire, sheweth:

That, impelled by a firm attachment to the first principles of a free Government, and the accumulated distresses of a number of their citizens, they again remonstrate to Congress against a violation of State independence, and an unwarrantable encroachment in the courts of the United States.

That, soon after the commencement of the late war with Great Britain, a number of the citizens of this State, under a sanction of a law of the Legislature, fitted out a privateer called the McClary, and captured a vessel called the Susannah, bound to a port of our enemies, and carrying supplies to them; that this vessel and cargo, regularly libelled in the State courts, was claimed by Elisha Doane and others, inhabitants of a neighboring State, and was condemned according to the laws of New Hampshire; that an appeal was claimed to Congress by said Doane, and repelled by the supreme judicial court of the State; this not being one of the cases where an appeal was allowed to Congress by the law for fitting out privateers and trying of captures; that, notwithstanding this refusal of appeal, a complaint was entered before a committee of Congress, and from thence transferred to the court of appeals, (so called,) who, without authority, decreed that the judgment of the courts of New Hampshire be reversed; that, during the pendency of the action before the committee or court of appeals, application was made by Congress to the Legislature for a grant of the right of appeal, which was refused.

That, after the establishment of the present constitution, it was so transacted that the circuit court for the district of New Hampshire, upon complaint to them, decreed that the judgment of the aforesaid court of appeals should be carried into execution, and that the original captors should be liable to pay the amount of vessel and cargo claimed by said Doane, with interest.

That the former Congress of the United States, by their courts, interfered in determining causes respecting captures against the express will of the State, and without the intervention of a jury; that this was prior to any formal agreement of the States, except in the act of independence; and that the courts of the United States, under the present constitution, have resolved to put those determinations into effect.

That this State had a right to oppose the British usurpation in the way it thought best; could make laws as it chose, with respect to every transaction where it had not explicitly granted the power to Congress; that the formation of courts for carrying those laws into execution belonged only to the several States; that Congress might advise and recommend, but the States only could enact and carry into execution; and that the attempts repeatedly made to render the laws of the State in this respect null and void is a flagrant insult to the principles of the revolution; is establishing a Government they hoped to be a blessing on the uniform plea of arbitrary power, on an implication of grants of jurisdiction not intended to be included, nor even in contemplation.

Can the rage for annihilating all the power of the States, and reducing this extensive and flourishing country to one domination, make the administrators blind to the danger of violating all the principles of our former Government; to the hazard of convulsions in endeavoring to eradicate every trace of State power, except in the resentment of the people? Can the constitutional exercise of the power of Congress in future be in no other way established than by the belief that the former Congress always possessed the same? Can the remembrance of the manner of our opposition to tyranny, and the gradual adoption of federal ideas, be so painful as to exclude (unless forced into view) the knowledge that Congress, in its origin, was merely an advisory body; that it entirely depended upon the will of the several Legislatures to enforce any measures they might recommend; that the inconveniences of this principle produced the confederation; and, even at that late day, it was declared that powers not expressly delegated to Congress, are reserved by the States, or the people, respectively; that the experience of years, of the inefficacy of thirteen Legislatures to provide for the wants and to procure the happiness of the American people, caused the adoption of the present constitution—an adoption totally unnecessary, in point of principle, if the claims of former Congressional power are established.

Forced by events, the Legislature of New Hampshire have made the foregoing statements; and while they cheerfully acknowledge the power of Congress in cases arising under this constitution, they equally resolve not to submit the laws, made before the existence of the present Government by this (then independent State) to the adjudication of any power on earth, while the freedom of the Federal Government shall afford any constitutional means of redress.

Impressed with the singular merits of the present case, and deprecating the many and complicated evils which must be the necessary consequence of establishing the power claimed by the courts of the United States, and its tendency to produce disaffection to our Government, the Legislature of New Hampshire rest assured that a speedy and just decision will be had, and that the rights of State Governments and the interests of their citizens will be secured against the exercise of a power in the courts, or any body of men under Congress, of carrying into effect an unconstitutional decree of a court instituted by a former Congress, and which, in its effects, would unsettle property and tear up the laws of the several States.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 14, 1795.

The foregoing report having been several times read and duly considered, Resolved, That it be received and accepted; and that his excellency the Governor be, and hereby is, requested to transmit said remonstrance to the Congress of the United States; and that the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress be desired to attend to and enforce the same.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES IN THE CASE OF RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

MONDAY, December 28, 1795.

Information being given to the House by the following members, in their places, to wit: Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, Mr. Murray, of Maryland, and Mr. Giles, of Virginia, that a person of the name of Robert Randall had made, or communicated to them, respectively, certain overtures to obtain their several support in this House to a memorial intended to be presented by the said Robert Randall, on behalf of himself and others, for the grant of a tract of land, containing eighteen or twenty millions of acres, bordering on lakes Erie, Michigan, and Huron, and lying within the limits of the United States; for which support, the said members, respectively, were promised to receive of the said Robert Randall and his associates a consideration or emolument in lands or money; and this House regarding the said information as sufficient evidence of a contempt to and breach of the privileges of this House, in an unwarrantable attempt to corrupt the integrity of its members:

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the sergeant-at-arms attending this House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of the said Robert Randall, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of the House.

A warrant, pursuant to the said resolution, was accordingly prepared, signed by Mr. Speaker, under his seal, attested by the clerk, and delivered to the sergeant, with order forthwith to execute the same, and make due return thereof to the House.

Information being also given to the House, by Mr. Buck, one of the members from Vermont, of an application to him by a person of the name of Charles Whitney, by which there is good reason to believe that the said Whitney is a partner and associate of the beforenamed Randall, and equally concerned in the business and overtures of the said Randall, a similar warrant was ordered, signed, and delivered to the sergeant, as aforesaid, for taking into his custody the body of the said Charles Whitney, subject, in like manner, to the further order and direction of the House.

TUESDAY, December 29, 1795.

The sergeant-at-arms having returned on the warrants issued to him yesterday that he had executed the same on the bodies of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney, the persons therein named, and that he now held them in his custody, subject to the further order and direction of the House; it was, on motion,

Resolved, That a Committee of Privileges, to consist of seven members, be appointed, and that the said committee be instructed to report a mode of proceeding in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney, who were taken into custody yesterday, by order of the House, and that the said committee have leave to sit immediately.

Ordered, That Mr. Baldwin, Mr. William Smith, Mr. Giles, Mr. Murray, Mr. Livingston, Mr. Coit, and Mr. Goodhue, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. Baldwin, from the Committee of Privileges, to whom it was referred to report a mode of proceeding in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney, made a report, which was read, considered, and agreed to by the House, as followeth:

Resolved, That the said Robert Randall and Charles Whitney be brought to the bar of the House, and interrogated by the Speaker, touching the information given against them, on written interrogatories, which, with the answers thereto, shall be entered on the minutes of the House. And that every question proposed by a member be reduced to writing, and a motion made that the same may be put by the Speaker. That, after such interrogatories are answered, if the House deem it necessary to make any further inquiry on the subject, the same be conducted by a committee to be appointed for that purpose.

The said Robert Randall was accordingly brought to the bar of the House in custody of the sergeant; and the charge against him, as stated in the journal of yesterday, being read, he was interrogated by Mr. Speaker, "whether he did admit or deny the truth of the said charge?" To which interrogatory he answered, that he was not prepared to admit or deny the same; but requested that time might be allowed him to make answer and offer a vindication of his conduct, until the day after to-morrow. Whereupon,

It was ordered, That the said Robert Randall do now withdraw, in custody, until the House shall presently decide on his request.

The said Robert Randall accordingly withdrew, in custody; and after debate,

It was resolved by the House, That time be allowed him until to-morrow, twelve o'clock, to make answer in conformity to his request.

Resolved, also, That it be an addition to the charge against the said Robert Randall, "that he informed a member of this House that a number of the members of this House, not less than thirty, had engaged, or were engaged, to support his memorial and application, or words to that effect."

The said Robert Randall was then returned to the bar, in custody, and notified by Mr. Speaker of the indulgence and further proceeding of the House respecting him. After which,

It was ordered, That the said Robert Randall be detained in custody of the sergeant, and brought up again to the bar of the House to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

Charles Whitney, the other person named in the warrant of Mr. Speaker, was then brought to the bar, in custody of the sergeant, and the charge against him, as stated in the journal of the proceedings of yesterday, being read, the following interrogatories were propounded to him by Mr. Speaker; to which he gave the respective answers thereto subjoined:

Question. What is your name?

Answer. Charles Whitney.

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In the State of Vermont.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. I am a farmer.

Question. When did you come to this city?

Answer. About the first of this month.

Question. Where is your usual abode whilst in this city?

Answer. At the Green Tree tavern, in Fourth street.

Question. Are you, or are you not, guilty of the charge which has been read to you of being a partner and associate of Robert Randall, and equally concerned in the business and overtures of the said Randall?

Answer. I am not guilty. I am equally concerned with Mr. Randall in the present land business, but am ignorant of any improper motives or improper conduct of the said Randall therein; and can only answer for myself.

Question. Are any other persons associated with Mr. Randall and yourself in this business, and what appropriations or disposition of the said lands did you design to make?

Answer. Colonel Pepune, and Mr. Jones, of Massachusetts, and Colonel Ebenezer Allen, of Vermont, agreed to associate with us in this business; and it was our intention to divide it into forty-one shares, and associate with us such other influential characters as we could engage, in order to divide with us the great expense and trouble of the undertaking.

Question. Are any persons within the British lines associated with you in this business?

Answer. Yes. Mr. Askins, senior, Mr. Askins, junior, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Innes, a Mr. Pattenson, merchants and traders residing at Detroit, and its vicinity, are concerned with us.

Question. Are any of the persons you have named at Detroit, as concerned with you, in civil or military commission under the British Government?

Answer. Yes. Mr. Askins the elder is said to be in civil commission, as a judge.

Question. Have you any instrument of association between yourself and partners?

Answer. I have: it is signed by the persons last named, and is, I believe, now at my lodgings.

Question. Have you any objection to produce the said instrument?

Answer. I do not know that I have; but being without counsel, I wish for time to reflect upon it.

Question. Are you acquainted with a person of the name of John Gove, and did you make application to him to become an associate with you?

Answer. I am acquainted with Mr. Gove, and did apply to him to become an associate; to which I understood him to have agreed.

Question. Where does Mr. Gove lodge?

Answer. At the Green Tree tavern, in Fourth street.

Question. Was Mr. Gove authorized by you to apply to any members of Congress in favor of your proposal?

Answer. I did mention to Mr. Gove that he might apply to the members in favor of our proposal.

Question. Were there any shares of the said land to be left open or unappropriated between you and your associates?

Answer. There were shares left open, to be filled at my pleasure.

Question. Did you make any, and what, application to Mr. Buck, one of the members of this House, from the State of Vermont, to support your application?

Answer. I did apply to Mr. Buck, at his house in Vermont, and represented to him, generally, the nature and advantages of our plan; but I made no proposal to him of benefit or advantage to himself, or of other improper inducement.

Mr. Buck then informed the House, that the said Charles Whitney had made overtures to him in Vermont, offering a share in land, or an equivalent in money, or words to that effect: Whereupon,

It was moved and seconded that the said Charles Whitney do now withdraw, in custody, and that all further proceedings respecting him be adjourned until to-morrow, twelve o'clock.

And on a question taken, the same was ordered accordingly; with an instruction to the sergeant to keep him separate and apart from Robert Randolph.

WEDNESDAY, December 30, 1795.

A petition of Robert Randall, in custody of the sergeant-at-arms, was presented to the House and read, praying that he may be indulged with the assistance of counsel, and a reasonable time to prepare for his defence, on the charges now depending against him before the House: Whereupon,

It was resolved, That the prayer of the said petition be granted.

The said Robert Randall was then brought to the bar, in custody of the sergeant, and it being demanded of him by Mr. Speaker, "what further time he required to prepare for his defence?" he answered until Friday next.

Resolved, That further time be allowed the said Robert Randall, until Friday next, to prepare for his defence; and that, in the mean time, he be remanded in the custody of the sergeant, until further order.

The Speaker laid before the House an instrument of writing, purporting to be "articles of agreement entered into and concluded at Detroit, the twenty-sixth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, for the purpose of obtaining the pre-emption right from the United States of America, and extinguishing the right of the native Indians to a certain territory therein defined, containing by computation eighteen or twenty millions of acres, and lying on lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, between Ebenezer Allen and Charles Whitney, of the State of Vermont, and Robert Randall, of the city of Philadelphia, on the one part; and John Askin, Jonathan Schieffelin, William Robertson, John Askin, junior, David Robertson, Robert Innes, and Richard Pattenson, all of Detroit, of the other part;" which instrument of writing had been given up by Charles Whitney to the sergeant-at-arms and by the sergeant delivered to the Speaker.

The said instrument of writing was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Charles Whitney was then brought to the bar, in custody of the sergeant, and the further information against him, by Mr. Buck, one of the members from Vermont, as stated in the journal of the proceedings of yesterday, being read to him, he was interrogated by Mr. Speaker, "whether he did admit or deny the same?" To which he answered, that he did wholly deny the same: Whereupon,

It was ordered, That he be remanded to the custody of the sergeant, until further order of the House: and on motion,

It was resolved, That the Committee of Privileges be instructed to consider and report to this House the proper mode of conducting the further inquiry, and the trial in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney.

THURSDAY, December 31, 1795.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from Robert Randall, in custody of the sergeant, "stating that the engagements of the gentlemen of the bar of this city will prevent them from assisting him as counsel, until Saturday evening; and praying a further postponement of the proceedings respecting him, until the earliest part of next week," which was read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That further time be allowed the said Robert Randall, until Monday next, in conformity to his request.

Mr. Baldwin, from the Committee of Privileges, to whom it was referred to consider and report on the proper mode of conducting the further inquiry, and the trial in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney, made a report, which was read, and debate arising thereon, an adjournment was called for.

FRIDAY, January 1, 1796.

The House resumed the consideration of the report from the Committee of Privileges, to whom it was referred to consider and report the proper mode of conducting the further inquiry, and the trial in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney; and the said report being again read, and amended at the clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House as followeth:

That the proper mode of conducting the further inquiry and the trial in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney, will be, to proceed, first, with a further hearing of Robert Randall, at the bar of the House.

That the information that has been given against the said Robert Randall and Charles Whitney be reduced to writing, and signed by the informants themselves, respectively, and entered at large on the journal. That the said information be read to the prisoners, and that they be called upon by the Speaker to declare what they have to say in their defence.

That if the said prisoners shall offer any parole evidence, in their exculpation, the same shall be heard at the bar of the House; excepting the members of the House, who may give their testimony on oath in their places; and no question shall be put to any member, on the part of the prisoner, by way of cross-examination, except leave be first given by the House, and every such question shall be put by the Speaker; and that the judge of the district of Pennsylvania be requested to attend, for the purpose of administering an oath or affirmation, to all witnesses. That all questions on the part of the House, to be asked of the said witnesses, shall be put by the Speaker.

That, on every debate, the prisoners and their counsel shall be directed to withdraw; and that, when they shall have concluded their defence, and are withdrawn, the sense of the House shall be taken on the guilt or innocence of the prisoners, respectively.

MONDAY, January 4, 1796.

Pursuant to the proceedings of the House on Friday last, Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, Mr. Murray, of Maryland, Mr. Giles, of Virginia, and Mr. Buck, of Vermont, delivered in at the clerk's table their several informations, in writing, subscribed with their names, respectively, in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney—which are as follows:

William Smith, one of the representatives of the State of South Carolina in the Congress of the United States, declares: That on Tuesday last, the 22d instant, a person who called himself—— Randall, and who is said to be from the State of Maryland, applied to him at his lodgings, in the city of Philadelphia, and requested a private and confidential conversation of an hour, which the informant agreed to; and at the time appointed, which was the same evening, the said Randall being alone with the informant, communicated to him a proposal for procuring from the Legislature of the United States a grant of about eighteen or twenty millions of acres in the Northwestern Territory, between lakes Michigan, Huron, and Erie. That the said Randall observed that the grant he proposed would be of great service to the United States, from the persons who would be interested therein, (to wit, certain Canada merchants at or near Detroit, whose names he did not mention,) having great influence over the Indians, who were not pacified by the late treaty concluded with General Wayne; and that the said persons would extinguish the Indian claims at their own expense; and after setting forth the saving of expense, by the cessation of the Indian war, and other reasons to induce a belief that the proposed grant would be of public utility, he proceeded to inform the informant that the intention was to divide the land into about forty shares, twenty-four of which would be allowed to, or distributed among, such persons (meaning, as this informant understood him, from the whole purport of his conversation, members of Congress,) as would favor the measure. That, of these twenty-four shares, he had the management or distribution of twelve, for the southern part, (meaning, as the informant understood, the southern members of Congress;) and another person, whose name he did not mention, had the disposition of the other twelve, for the eastern part, (still, as the informant understood and believes, meaning as aforesaid.) That he, the said Randall, proposed subdividing the said shares into so many portions as to have a sufficiency to obtain a majority, (meaning, as the informant understood him, a majority of Congress;) and that gentlemen, after the session was over, or when they returned to private life, might then have such parts of shares, as the said twenty-four shares would be reserved for such of them as would favor the business, on the same terms as the original associators. That the view of him, the said Randall, and of those concerned with him, was to present a memorial, on the following Monday, to Congress, to obtain the said grant for a small price, mentioning half a million of dollars; and that he supposed the land was worth more than two shillings an acre. On taking leave, he pressed the informant for an early and decisive answer to the foregoing proposals; to which the informant replied, that he would not wish to see him again before Friday morning, and requested him to call on him at Congress, and not at his lodgings; but the House did not sit on Friday, and the informant has not seen him since. The informant further says, that the foregoing is the substance and purport of the communication to him made by the said Randall, on the subject above set forth; and that the impression clearly made on the mind of the informant, by the overtures, was, that, under a pretext of public utility, the object of the application was to secure the informant's influence as a member of Congress, by a temptation of great personal advantage. That the informant, the next morning, communicated the substance of the foregoing to Mr. Murray, one of the members from Maryland, and consulted him on the most proper mode of proceeding on so delicate an occasion; that Mr. Murray advised a consultation with Mr. Henry, of the Senate; and that, in consequence of such consultation with Mr. Murray and Mr. Henry, on the following day (Thursday) it was resolved that the informant should immediately communicate the whole transaction to the President of the United States; which he accordingly did.

WILLIAM SMITH.

DECEMBER 28, 1795.

Mr. Murray declares that, on Wednesday last, the 23d instant, Mr. Smith, member of Congress, of South Carolina, informed him that a man of the name of Randall, of Maryland, had, the evening before, attempted to bribe him in western lands, on condition of his supporting an application which Randall told him he should soon make to Congress, the object of which application was a grant from Congress of from eighteen to twenty millions of acres of land, between Erie, Huron, and Michigan. That Mr. Smith was extremely solicitous that some other gentleman should immediately be informed of the infamous proposal, and that he said he would mention it to Mr. Henry, of the Senate, and advise with him upon proper measures for the detecting of the full extent of the scheme, and crushing it. That he had no opportunity of talking to Mr. Henry on that day, but early on the morning of the 24th instant communicated the intelligence to Mr. Henry, who recommended that Mr. Smith should immediately inform the President. That on the said day Mr. Randall, of Maryland, was introduced to him, the informant, and requested a confidential interview at his, the informant's, lodgings, which the informant readily promised him, to be at five, for the purpose of developing his scheme. That Randall came at or near five, that day last named, to wit, on Thursday, and communicated to Mr. Henry and himself, in general terms, the outline of a plan by which he, Randall, and his Canadian friends, would extinguish the Indian title to all the lands between lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, as marked on a map which Randall then showed, containing from eighteen to twenty millions of acres. That he, the informant, then asked Randall into his apartment, where they were alone. That Randall expatiated at first upon the public utility of his scheme, which was, that Congress should grant to him and his company all the land aforesaid mentioned, for five hundred thousand, or, at most, one million of dollars; and that he would undertake, in four months, that the harmony of the Indians should be secured to the Union; or, if Congress thought proper, that the Indian tribes now on said land should be removed to the British side, or down Lake Michigan, reserving to some aged chiefs a few miles square; that his company and himself had determined to divide the lands aforesaid into forty (or forty-one) shares. That, of these shares, twenty-four were to be reserved for the disposal of himself and his partner, now in town, for such members of Congress as assisted them, by their abilities and votes, in obtaining the grant aforesaid. That, of these twenty-four shares, his partner had twelve under his management, for the eastern members of Congress, and that he, Randall, had the other twelve shares under his management, for the southern members of Congress. That these shares were to be so divided as to accomplish the object, by securing a majority of Congress. That the informant started an objection to land speculation, as troublesome, and that he, Randall, said, if you (meaning the informant) do not choose to accept your share of the land, you shall have cash in hand for your share. That the informant appointed Randall to meet him in the lobby of the House, on Monday, the 28th instant. That Randall told him a memorial was to be handed in, upon this subject, on said Monday, but refused to inform the informant what member was to present it. That Randall told him that he, Randall, mentioned his plan to some members in the general way only—meaning thereby, as he understood him, a view of the sounder part of the plan, as being conducive to public utility. That, in the early part of the confidential and secret conversation, Randall said that the members of Congress who would behave handsomely should come into their shares on the same terms upon which the company obtained the grant; but soon after made proposals more openly seductive and corrupt, closing them with the offer of cash in hand, as aforesaid. That the informant on that evening, when Randall went away, told Mr. Henry of the whole of Randall's offers aforesaid; then called on the Secretary of State, and communicated the same to him; and next morning, early, informed the President of the transaction.

W. V. MURRAY.

DECEMBER 29, 1795.

William B. Giles, a member of the House of Representatives, in the Congress of the United States, declares: That in the evening of Thursday, the 17th of December, 1795, as well as this informant recollects, a person called upon this informant, at his lodgings, under the name of Robert Randall, with an introductory note from Mr. Gabriel Christie, in the usual form, dated the 15th of the same month.

That the said Robert Randall informed this informant that he had some business of importance to communicate to this informant, which would probably come before Congress; that it respected the fur trade, at present carried on by the British traders with the Indians, through the lakes. He observed that it would be important to change the course of that trade into some channel through the United States; that he believed he could put Congress upon some plan of effecting that object; that the plan was of a secret nature; that he was not then prepared to disclose it, and requested a private interview with this informant, for that purpose, at some other time. Upon which request, this informant appointed the next Saturday, at twelve o'clock, (being the 19th of December,) to receive the communication.

That, about the time appointed, the said Robert Randall called on this informant, and, after some general conversation, informed this informant that an association had been formed by himself and others, with some of the most influential traders at Detroit, for the purpose of purchasing all the lands contained in the peninsula formed by the lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, and the waters connecting those lakes, amounting, in the whole, to twenty or thirty millions of acres, if the consent of Congress could be obtained for the extinguishment of the Indian claims thereto. The said Randall then produced a map of the peninsula and lakes.

That this tract of country was to be divided into shares, and that a number of shares was to be left unappropriated, until the necessary law of Congress should pass, authorizing the extinguishment of the Indian claims; and might then be filled up by those who might think proper to concur in the plan, and should give their aid for procuring the passage of such law. Upon this intimation, this informant observed that he hoped the said Randall did not intend to address the information of the unappropriated shares particularly to this informant.

To which the said Randall replied that he did not: that he only meant it as general information; but he could see no impropriety in the members of Congress being concerned in the scheme, if the public good was to be promoted by it; and that thirty or forty members were already engaged in its support, or words to that effect.

After some further conversation of a general nature respecting the present state of the fur trade, the value of the lands contained in the peninsula, and the probable effect of the late treaty upon that trade and country, the said Randall inquired of this informant "whether he deemed his plan advisable, and whether it would meet with the support of this informant in Congress." To which this informant replied, that, if the said Randall should bring his proposals before Congress, this informant would give them the consideration which his duty required, and should give such vote as he deemed right, or words to the same effect. Very shortly after this observation, Mr. Edward Livingston, a member of Congress from New York, entered the room, and the said Randall left it, without further observation, as well as this informant recollects. This informant immediately communicated the contents of this conversation to Mr. Livingston, and declared that he considered the proffer of the unappropriated shares to the members of Congress a direct attempt at corruption.

This informant, on the same day, communicated the substance of the conversation to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to Messrs. Blount and Macon of North Carolina, and to Messrs. Madison and Venable of Virginia. It was deemed advisable by all these gentlemen, as well as by this informant, to permit the plan to be brought before Congress, in the usual way, by memorial, and to cause a detection, by means of a committee, to whom the said memorial should be referred; and, in the mean time, if the said Randall should again call on this informant, he should proceed to make further discovery of the real state and nature of the transaction.

That, on the next day, the said Randall did again call on this informant, and informed him that he, the said Randall, then proposed to disclose his plan more particularly; and after some general remarks upon the public utility, as well as individual benefit of the plan, he said that it was in substance as follows:

The tract of country before described was to be divided into forty-one shares; five of which were to be reserved to the Indian traders at Detroit; the other thirty-six were to be divided into two departments—eighteen to the eastern, and eighteen to the southern department; that six out of the eighteen shares were to be reserved to his eastern partner and associates, and six out of the remaining eighteen to himself and his associates; that the remaining twenty-four shares were to be left unappropriated for the use of such members of Congress as should support the measure. That the names of those members were not to be made known until after the law for the extinguishment of the Indian claims had passed; and then requested this informant to prepare some writing which would compel the ostensible persons to surrender the unappropriated shares to the real supporters of the measure, after it should be effected. That one million of dollars were spoken of as the price for the lands; but that he deemed that sum by far too much; and as Congress would have to fix the price, they might make the terms such as to ensure considerable emoluments to the purchasers; that a majority of the Senate had consented to give the plan their support, and within three of a majority of the House of Representatives. After much further conversation on the subject, which this informant thinks unnecessary to particularize, the said Randall promised to wait again on this informant, at his lodgings, on Tuesday evening, at seven o'clock, and introduce to this informant his eastern associate.

The said Randall did not call at the appointed hour, and this informant did not see him again until Friday, the 25th of December, when the said Randall again called on this informant, and, after making an apology for not calling at the appointed hour of the preceding Tuesday, informed him, at the door of his apartment, that his memorial to Congress would be ready to be presented on the next Monday; but as several gentlemen were in this informant's room, at that time, the said Randall did not enter, and no further conversation was then had; since which time this informant has not seen the said Randall until he was brought to the bar of the House of Representatives in custody.

This informant further saith, that he communicated the substance of every material conversation with the said Randall to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the several gentlemen before mentioned.

WILLIAM B. GILES.

JANUARY 1, 1796.

I, Daniel Buck, inform and say, that, about ten days previous to my setting out on my journey to Congress, (which was on the 30th day of November last,) a stranger, whom I now know to be Charles Whitney, in custody of the serjeant-at-arms, called at my office in Norwich, in the State of Vermont, introduced himself by the name of Whitney, and informed me that he had some business of importance which he wished to converse with me upon. I asked if he wished to be in private; he signified that he did; upon which my clerk withdrew, and the said Whitney proceeded to inform me that the business of which he wished to converse was of great importance to the public, as well as to the individuals immediately concerned; that it would come before Congress, but was so circumstanced as to render it necessary to make a previous statement to some of the members, that they might be able to explain to others, and the whole thereby be better prepared to judge upon the business; he declared he wished for nothing improper, and that he did not want that I should favor the plan, unless I saw it to be consistent; for he said he wanted nothing but what was perfectly just and honorable, and was confident that, if the matter could be understood, it would appear to be of great public utility. He then stated that he and his associates had discovered a large and immensely valuable tract of land between, or contiguous to, lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, (if I mistake not the names,) which he said might be purchased of the Indians, at a low rate; that this purchase would conciliate the affections, and secure the friendship of the hostile tribes; that he, the said Whitney, together with Ebenezer Allen, Doctor Randall, and a number of Canadian merchants at Detroit, had formed an association for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian title, and petitioning Congress for the pre-emption right to those lands; that, if they succeeded, it was their intention immediately to make settlement on them; that those merchants had such influence with and control over the Indians, that there would be no difficulty with them; and that such a settlement would be a barrier against the savages, and effectually secure peace to the United States; that those merchants were then employed in the business among the Indians; and that his partner, Doctor Randall, and his other associates, had such connexions, that there was a fair prospect of success; that it was not their intention, however, to engross all this property to themselves, but that it was to be divided into a number of shares, and that he and the said Randall had the disposal of them; that he, the said Whitney, was then directly from Philadelphia, and that it was agreed that Randall should dispose of a part amongst his friends, and the influential characters in the Southern States; that he, the said Whitney, was to distribute the other part amongst his, the said Whitney's, friends, and the influential characters in the Eastern and Northern States; that they had already got a number engaged, but that the subscription was not full, and that I might become an adventurer, if I wished for it; and as he conceived that I could make myself acquainted with the facts, they, the said associates, would be able so clearly to demonstrate the public utility of the measure, that there could be no impropriety in my being concerned in the business, as I should thereby only connect my private interest with the public good, and while I was advancing the greatest interest of my country, might put two or three thousand dollars in my own pocket. Upon my suggesting that, by a late treaty, a peace was already concluded with the Indians, and that this was a business that might involve in it an important national question, as, by the treaty, the right of purchasing lands of the Indians was reserved to the United States, the said Whitney replied and said that the Indians were greatly dissatisfied with the treaty, and would not keep it, and that another war would be the certain consequence, unless other measures were adopted. He then renewed the protestations of the purity of his intentions, and said that he conceived that they (meaning himself and associates, as I understood him) should so clearly evince the utility of the plan, as that there could be no doubt of its propriety in the mind of any well-wisher to his country; and said that he thought it would be hard to suppose that members of Congress were, in consequence of their appointment, to be deprived of those advantages to acquire property which might be taken by others. The said Whitney showed me a plan of the country, and the articles of agreement between the associates, which appear to be the same as have been read in Congress; he also said much upon the magnitude of the object, in respect to the subscribers and partners; and though I cannot now repeat his expressions, yet I can truly assert that I then clearly understood him, that if I would subscribe as a partner, my name might be kept secret, and after the grant was obtained, if I chose to relinquish my share in the lands, I might receive money in lieu of it; though no specified sum was mentioned other than has already been stated; and the conversation finally broke off, upon my declaring that I would make no engagement in the business until I was better informed as to the merits of the question.

DANIEL BUCK.

JANUARY 2, 1796.

The House then proceeded to a further hearing in the case of Robert Randall; and the said Robert Randall being brought to the bar, in the custody of the sergeant, and attended by his counsel, the informations, in writing, of Mr. Smith of South Carolina, Mr. Murray of Maryland, and Mr. Giles of Virginia, were read to him.

It was then demanded of him, by Mr. Speaker, "what he had to say in his defence?" to which he answered, that he was not guilty.

It was further demanded of him, by Mr. Speaker, "whether he had any witnesses that he wished to be examined in proof of his innocence?" To which he answered that he had not.

Application was then made to the House, by the prisoner's counsel, that the informations which had been delivered in against him may be attested by the oaths of the informant members, and that he may be permitted to examine them, on oath, touching the same, subject to the order of the House; whereupon,

The prisoner, with his counsel, having withdrawn from the bar, it was, after debate,

Resolved, That the prisoner be informed that if he has any questions to propose to the informants, or other members of the House, he is at liberty to put them in the mode already prescribed; that the said informant members be sworn to the declarations just read, and, also, to answer such questions as shall be asked of them, touching the same.

The prisoner, with his counsel, having then returned to the bar, and being informed of the further proceeding respecting him the informant members were respectively sworn to the truth of the written informations which they had severally delivered in against him; and also true answer to make to such questions as should be asked of them, touching the same; the said oaths being administered to them, by the judge of the district of Pennsylvania, who attended for that purpose.

The House then resumed the hearing of the said trial, and having made some progress therein,

It was, on motion, Resolved, That further proceeding be adjourned until to-morrow, twelve o'clock.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1796.

The House resumed the adjourned hearing in the case of Robert Randall; and the prisoner, by his counsel, being fully heard at the bar of the House, and his defence closed; it was, on motion,

Resolved, That this House will, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, proceed to a final decision on the said case.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1796.

On motion of Mr. Christie, of Maryland, and Mr. Sedgwick, of Massachusetts, the several informations heretofore given by them, on oath, in the case of Robert Randall, and now delivered in, in writing, at the clerk's table, subscribed with their names, respectively, were read, and ordered to be inserted in the journal, as follows:

The declaration of Gabriel Christie is, that some time in the month of October or November last, this informant was in Philadelphia, when he saw Robert Randall, who had, as he informed this informant, just returned from Canada, where he had been disappointed in the business he went to that country on; but he, Randall, informed this informant, that on his way home he had called at Detroit, where he had spent some time; and had, he believed, entered into an association, to which, if he got the consent of the Government of the United States, would be of considerable advantage to him, and those who chose to associate with him; and informed this informant that he might be concerned with him, provided he liked the speculation: he then informed this informant that he had associated with a number of influential persons at Detroit, for the purpose of obtaining the pre-emption right to a large tract of country within the territory of the United States, and produced to this informant the original association. After this informant had heard all that Randall had to communicate to him, this informant told Randall that he considered his scheme as a wildgoose one, and that this informant would not have any concern in it. Randall then requested this informant to give him his opinion in what manner he, Randall, ought to proceed. This informant told him that the most proper person to apply to was Mr. Randolph, the late Secretary of State; and if he, Randall, thought proper, this informant would inform Mr. Randolph of it, and get his advice; which Randall agreed to. This informant then went to Mr. Randolph, and gave him all the information that the informant had received from Randall. After considering the business some time, Mr. Randolph advised that an application should be made to the President of the United States; which advice the informant gave to Randall, who seemed, at that time, fully satisfied with the proposal, and requested the informant to introduce him to the President for that purpose; but as this informant was going out of town in a day or two, he told Randall that he would introduce him to the President on his return to Congress. When the informant came to Philadelphia, in December, he found Randall in the city; and after asking Randall what he had done in his business, and whether he still meant to apply to the President, Randall then informed the informant that his friend and associate, Mr. Whitney, had arrived in Philadelphia, and that, upon consulting with him, they came to a determination not to apply to the President, as he heretofore had agreed, but had determined to present a memorial to the Legislature for a grant of the said land. This informant told Randall that he disapproved of this mode, and asked Randall who had advised him to it. Randall then informed the informant that this said Mr. Whitney had informed him that he had consulted with a number of the eastern members of Congress, and in particular with Mr. Sedgwick, who had advised this mode of proceeding. Randall also informed this informant that Mr. Sedgwick had agreed to draw up and present his memorial. This informant then informed Randall that, by this mode of proceeding, he had put it out of this informant's power to be concerned with him, if he thought ever so well of it. Randall asked the informant the reason; the informant answered, that it would be improper in any member of Congress to be concerned in any thing that he was to vote on. This informant was not able to impress Randall with the propriety of his remark. The informant never understood that Mr. Sedgwick was, in any manner, concerned with Randall or his associates; but that he, Mr. Sedgwick, thought the thing a public benefit, and would support it: that Randall never informed this informant that any of the members of Congress were concerned, but that a majority of them thought favorably of the plan, and would support it. In all the conversation the informant had with Randall, this informant told him that he could not expect this informant's assistance, as the informant would never agree to sell any of the lands of the United States for less than a dollar per acre. Randall then informed the informant, before a witness, that it was strange that the informant was the only person in Congress that he had applied to but what seemed to think favorably of his plan. The informant told Randall that his opinion was fixed, and still advised his application to the President; which Randall declined.

G. CHRISTIE.

JANUARY 5, 1796.

The informant, Theodore Sedgwick, a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, declares, that some time before he left the place of his residence in Massachusetts, one Israel Jones, Esq., of Adams, in that State, waited on him, and introduced to him a man, whom he now knows by the name of Charles Whitney, of the State of Vermont: that Mr. Jones is a man of respectable character, a magistrate, a member of the State Legislature, (as the informant believes,) and a trustee of the corporation of William's college: that Mr. Jones informed the informant that he, with others, had in contemplation an application to Congress for a grant of a tract of country lying between the lakes Huron, Michigan, and Erie. Considerations of a public nature having been stated and enlarged upon, the opinion of the informant was requested relative to the propriety and success of the proposed application. He answered, in substance, that he believed it was to be doubted whether the Legislature would undertake actually to contract for any of the vacant public lands, and that the doubt was still stronger respecting these lands, the Indian claim to which had not been previously extinguished. He stated to Mr. Jones that, by reason of sickness in his family, it was not probable he should attend the next session of Congress; at all events, however, he advised Mr. Jones not to make an early application, as it was probable the subject of disposing of the public lands would occupy the attention of Congress during the then ensuing session; and that, by the delay, Mr. Jones could form a more correct judgment of the course which it would be most eligible for him to pursue relative to this subject. That while the informant was waiting on Mr. Jones to the door, at his departure, Mr. Jones asked him if there would be any impropriety in a member of Congress being concerned in an application for a grant of lands? The informant answered that it would depend on the circumstances under which the application was made; proper, if the application was made to a land office, but otherwise if to the Legislature; because, in the latter case, it would be for a man to contract with himself. To this answer Mr. Jones gave an explicit assent. That the informant never, at any time before or afterwards, to his remembrance, saw the said Whitney, until he saw him in this city, during the present session: that the informant came from his own home to New York, in company with Colonel Pepune, stated by the said Whitney as one of his associates: that the informant hath been informed, and believes, that the said Pepune is now in this city, but that he had never spoken to the informant on the subject of the said land speculation: that, not long after the arrival of the informant in this city, the said Whitney one morning waited on him, and stated to him an intended memorial respecting the tract of land aforesaid, and urged on the consideration of the informant the motives of a public nature for a grant thereof: that the informant inquired of the said Whitney to what State he belonged; and being answered to Vermont, he recommended to him to request the representatives of that State to present his memorial: that the said Whitney requested the informant to peruse his memorial when it should be prepared, which he understood was not then the case: that he answered, according to his best recollection, that whenever he had leisure he should be willing to do it; or to that effect: that the whole time of the interview he believes did not exceed six, he is very confident could not exceed ten minutes: that twice afterwards the informant's servant informed him that the said Whitney wished to see him, and that he caused himself to be denied; and the informant is very confident he never undertook either to draught or to present any memorial for the said Whitney.

On the morning of the 28th of December, Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, informed the informant of what he afterwards stated in evidence to the House respecting Robert Randall. The informant advised Mr. Smith, as soon as possible, to make the same known to the House of Representatives, (which Mr. Smith informed the informant he had determined to do,) and the informant having previously advised the said Whitney to apply to the representatives of Vermont, he thought it his duty, and he accordingly took the earliest opportunity, to request Mr. Smith, of that State, to avoid presenting any memorial with which he might be intrusted for a grant of land, and desired him to make the same request to Mr. Buck, the other member from the same State.

The informant further declares that he never, to his remembrance, saw Robert Randall, till he saw him at the bar of the House.

THEODORE SEDGWICK.

JANUARY 5, 1796.

The House, then, according to the order of the day, proceeded to a final decision in the case of Robert Randall; and,

A motion being made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Whereas any attempt to influence the conduct of this House, or its members, on subjects appertaining to their legislative functions, by motives other than the public advantage, is a high contempt of this House, and a breach of its privileges: and whereas it does appear to this House, by the information, on oath, of sundry members, and by the proceedings thereon had before the House, that Robert Randall did attempt to influence the conduct of the said members, in a matter relating to their legislative functions, to wit, the sale of a large portion of the public property, by motives of private emolument to the said members, other than, and distinct from, the public advantage; therefore,

Resolved, That the said Robert Randall has thereby committed a high contempt of this House, and a breach of its privileges:—

The previous question thereon was called for by five members, to wit:—Shall the main question, to agree to the said resolution, be now put?

And on the question—Shall the said main question be now put? It passed in the negative.

A motion was then made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it appears to this House that Robert Randall has been guilty of a contempt to, and a breach of the privileges of, this House, by attempting to corrupt the integrity of its members, in the manner laid to his charge.

And on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 17.

The yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present—

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 8, 1796.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you a memorial of the commissioners appointed by virtue of an act entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," on the subject of the public buildings under their direction.

Since locating a district for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States, as heretofore announced to both Houses of Congress, I have accepted the grants of money and of land stated in the memorial of the commissioners. I have directed the buildings therein mentioned to be commenced on plans which I deemed consistent with the liberality of the grants, and proper for the purposes intended.

I have not been inattentive to this important business intrusted by the Legislature to my care. I have viewed the resources placed in my hands, and observed the manner in which they have been applied; the progress is pretty fully detailed in the memorial from the commissioners; and one of them attends, to give further information, if required. In a case new and arduous, like the present, difficulties might naturally be expected; some have occurred; but they are, in a great degree, surmounted; and I have no doubt, if the remaining resources are properly cherished, so as to prevent the loss of property by hasty and numerous sales, that all the buildings required for the accommodation of the Government of the United States may be completed in season, without aid from the Federal Treasury. The subject is, therefore, recommended to the consideration of Congress, and the result will determine the measures which I shall cause to be pursued with respect to the property remaining unsold.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

To the Honorable the Congress of the United States of America: The memorial of the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, by virtue of an act entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of Government of the United States," respectfully sheweth:

That the President of the United States, by virtue of the act above mentioned, appointed three commissioners for the purposes declared in the said act, and in an act to amend the same, passed at Philadelphia, in the year 1791, who, under his direction, did cause to be surveyed, and, by proper metes and bounds defined and limited, a district of territory ten miles square, on both sides of the Potomac river, including the towns of Alexandria, in Virginia, and Georgetown, in Maryland, for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States. That the proprietors of all the lands within the following bounds, that is to say: beginning on the east side of Rock Creek, at a stone standing in the middle of the road leading from Georgetown to Bladensburg; thence, along the middle of the said road to a stone standing on the east side of Reedy branch of Goose Creek; thence, southeasterly, making an angle of 61° 20' with the meridian to a stone standing in the road leading from Bladensburg to the Eastern Branch Ferry; thence, south, to a stone eighty poles north of the east and west line drawn from the mouth of Goose Creek to the Eastern Branch; thence, with the waters of the Eastern Branch, Potomac river, and Rock Creek to the beginning; have conveyed the same to trustees for a federal city, to be laid out with such streets, squares, parcels, and lots as the President of the United States should approve; the streets and squares to be the property of the United States solely, and the lots to be equally divided between the grantors and the United States. That the State of Virginia has paid one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, which had been previously offered by an act of the Legislature, on condition that Congress would establish the permanent seat of Government on the banks of the Potomac, to be applied, under the direction of the President of the United States, towards erecting the necessary buildings for the Federal Government; and that the State of Maryland hath paid seventy-two thousand dollars for the same purpose. That the commissioners, in order to secure proper materials for the public buildings, directed by the act above mentioned, at reasonable rates, and to facilitate the carriage thereof, proceeded to purchase quarries of freestone, to build wharves and bridges, and to open such roads and canals as were deemed necessary for these purposes; which having accomplished, they commenced the building of the Capitol and the President's house, and have made considerable progress therein. The commissioners, considering that an increase of houses would induce settlers in the city, and thereby contribute much to the accommodation of Congress and the advancement of trade and manufactures, did, in the month of December, 1793, enter into a contract with two gentlemen for the sale of six thousand lots, at the low rate of eighty dollars per lot, payable in seven equal annual instalments; the purchasers obliging themselves to erect one hundred and forty convenient brick dwelling-houses, each covering one thousand two hundred square feet, before the year 1800; and engaging further, that all sales made by them previous to the year 1796 should be on condition that the purchasers should erect one such house for every three lots purchased. The commissioners have, from time to time, sold lots in small numbers, or singly, to various persons, to the amount of ninety-five thousand six hundred and fifty-two dollars, and there still remain unsold about four thousand seven hundred lots; which, valued at the average price of those sold as last above mentioned, are worth near one million and a half of dollars. With these resources in their hands, your memorialists entertain no doubt of completing such buildings as will be absolutely necessary for the reception of Congress before the time appointed for their removal to the permanent seat of Government; but as the punctual compliance with the contracts of individuals cannot be relied on with that certainty which is necessary to the carrying on of public works to advantage, and as the bringing into market so large a portion of the city property as would raise money sufficient for that purpose would greatly depreciate its value, your memorialists conceive that the loan of a sum of money, secured on the city property, would be highly advantageous, as it would enable them to proceed with more celerity in completing the public buildings than a dependence on the collection of debts and sale of property will admit. The rapid progress of the buildings would, in itself, be an encouragement to private improvements, and have an immediate tendency to enhance the price of lots; but could the lots be generally retained until the seat of Government shall be removed, they will rise so far beyond their present value, that not only all sums now borrowed on that foundation may be repaid, but much property reserved for the disposal of the United States; yet, as the laws of Maryland, which are still in force in the federal district, do not permit the receiving of more than an interest of six per centum per annum, which, on this occasion, it will probably be necessary to exceed, and as money-lenders in foreign countries at least may be unacquainted with the value of the security offered, your memorialists beg leave to submit to the consideration of your honorable body the propriety of giving your sanction to a loan on the principle above stated, so far as to guaranty the payment of such sums as may be deemed adequate to the purpose of erecting the federal buildings, or to such an amount as Congress may be satisfied is clearly within the value of the property pledged, if it shall be judged inexpedient either to advance money, or at this time to subject the revenues of the United States to the eventual payment of moneys in future for the above mentioned purposes, and to authorize the payment of such interest as the President of the United States may judge reasonable. Should Congress adopt the proposed measure, your memorialists have no hesitation in expressing their confidence that not only all the buildings required by the acts aforesaid will be erected in a convenient and elegant style, and in due time, and (what is, perhaps, unparalleled among nations) at private expense, but that private buildings will progress in such a degree as to afford sufficient accommodation for Congress and all their attendants, and render their situation perfectly agreeable. Your memorialists, in contemplating a measure which to them appears mutually advantageous to the city and to the United States, have considered what objections, if any, could be raised against it; they discover none; they have heard none suggested; and they cannot believe that Congress will refuse their aid to render valuable property granted by individuals for public purposes on the faith of Government, pledged by repeated acts of the Legislature, more especially when, by giving that aid, no expense will be incurred; but, on the contrary, much property will be saved to the United States. Your memorialists, therefore, pray your honorable body to pass an act, authorizing the President of the United States to borrow such sums as on consideration of the premises shall appear reasonable, to be secured on the lots ceded for the use of the federal city (now called the city of Washington) as above stated, at such rate of interest as he may judge expedient, and payable at such time or times as he may judge proper after the expiration of the year 1800; and to guaranty to the money-lenders that, in case the property so pledged shall prove inadequate to the purpose of re-payment, the United States will make good the deficiency.

[1st SESSION.

CLAIM OF JOHN RICHARDS TO A SEAT IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AS A REPRESENTATIVE FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 13, 1796.

Mr. VENABLE made the following report:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was recommitted, on the eighteenth of last month, their report on the memorial of John Richards, stating his claim to a seat in this House as one of the representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, for the district composed of the counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, have proceeded to reconsider the same, and submit the following statement and resolution thereupon, to wit:

It appears to your committee that an election was held on the second Tuesday in October, in the year 1794, in the counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, in the State of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of electing a member to this House.

That on the same day an election was held by the militia that had marched from the before-mentioned counties, on the western expedition, for the same purpose.

That the law of Pennsylvania, made for that special case, directs that the county judges of elections, instead of meeting on the third Tuesday of October, as formerly, should meet on the tenth day of November. That the army election returns should be sent by the said tenth of November to the prothonotaries of the respective counties, and that the prothonotaries should on that day deliver them over to the county judges, to enable them to make their returns. That the district judges should meet on the fifteenth day of November, to examine the county returns, to make an estimate of all the votes, and to return the person having the highest number the representative for the district.

That the county judges, as the law directs, met on the tenth day of November, at which time no army returns had been received, except from the militia of the county of Northampton.

That after the tenth, and before the fifteenth, the returns of the county of Montgomery were received by the prothonotary of that county and delivered over to some of the county judges; two of whom made up a return, and certified it, on the fourteenth, to be a true return of the votes that had come to their hands.

That, on the fifteenth, the judges of the district met, according to law, at which time were laid before them the last-mentioned return, together with the returns of the elections held in the counties, respectively, and the return of the election held by the militia of Northampton. Upon which the judges reported, that by the general return of the county elections, together with the return of the Northampton militia, James Morris had the highest number of votes, to wit, sixteen hundred and forty-eight.

That, by the Montgomery army return, which had been put into their hands in the manner before stated, it appeared that John Richards had one hundred and fifty-six votes, and James Morris fifty-eight; which number, together with all the votes in favor of John Richards on the other returns, amounted to seventeen hundred and ninety-one, and in favor of James Morris seventeen hundred and six; and that no returns had at that time come to hand from the Bucks county militia.

That after the before-mentioned report was made to the Governor of Pennsylvania, to wit, on the 18th day of January, 1795, certain papers were lodged with the Secretary of the State, purporting to be a regimental return made by Lieutenant Colonel James Hanna, of the Bucks county militia, and sundry tally-papers, unaccompanied by any list of the persons' names who had voted at the said election, or any certificate of its having been examined by the county judges; on which return it is stated that James Morris had ninety-one votes.

Whereupon the petitioner states,

1st. That he is entitled to a seat in this House, because, upon an estimate of all the votes that appeared by the returns which were produced before the district judges on the fifteenth day of November, including the return of the Montgomery militia, which was defective in form only, and not insubstance, he will be found to have the highest number of votes, to wit, seventeen hundred and ninety-one; and James Morris seventeen hundred and six.

2dly. That if both the army returns for the counties of Montgomery and Bucks are rejected, by deducting from the army returns of the county of Northampton sixteen votes, which were given by persons unqualified to vote, and two votes for so many given by proxy, he would still have the highest number, to wit, sixteen hundred and thirty-five; and James Morris sixteen hundred and thirty.

And, 3dly. That by admitting both the returns of Bucks and Montgomery, and rejecting the number of votes given for James Morris, by persons unqualified to vote, and the two given by proxy, on the Northampton return, he would then also have the highest number, to wit, seventeen hundred and ninety-one; and James Morris seventeen hundred and seventy-nine.

Upon which statement, and the evidence adduced by the petitioner in support thereof, your committee are of opinion—

1st. That the Montgomery return ought to have been received by the district judges, and estimated with the other returns; it having come to the hands of the county judges, and having been acted on by them, before the fifteenth day of November, the time prescribed for the district judges to meet.

2dly. That the Bucks county return ought to be rejected, as being substantially defective; having never been examined by the county judges, and being unaccompanied by a list of the names of the persons who voted; and,

3dly. That sixteen votes were given at the election held by the Northampton militia, for James Morris, by persons who do not appear to stand on the tax lists of that county, and who are not within the description of such electors' sons as are permitted to vote by law, without being on the tax lists; also, that two votes were given by proxy.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Richards is duly elected as one of the representatives for the district composed of the counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, in the State of Pennsylvania, and that the said John Richards be permitted to take his seat in this House.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF JOHN CLOPTON, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VIRGINIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 18, 1796.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Burwell Bassett, of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election and return of John Clopton, to serve as a member of this House for the said State, made the following report:

It appears that an election was held on the 16th day of March, 1795, in the district composed of the counties of Henrico, Hanover, New Kent, Charles City, and James City, in the State of Virginia, to elect a member to this House.

That, upon an estimate of all the polls taken at the several elections, John Clopton had four hundred and thirty-two votes, and Burwell Bassett four hundred and twenty-two.

That, out of the number of persons who voted for John Clopton, thirty-seven were unqualified to vote; and of those who voted for Burwell Basset, thirty-three were also unqualified to vote.

Whereupon, your committee are of opinion that John Clopton, who has the highest number of votes after deducting the before-mentioned defective votes from the respective polls, is entitled to a seat in this House.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 25, 1796.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the message from the President of the United States, of the 8th of January instant,* enclosing a memorial of the commissioners appointed by virtue of the "act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of Government of the United States," made the following report:

That, having carefully perused the memorial and documents furnished by the commissioners, and having been attended by one of them in person, as the result of their inquiries, they beg leave to state for the consideration of the House:

That considerable progress has been made towards fulfilling the object of the afore-mentioned act; the difficulties incidental to an undertaking of this nature are chiefly surmounted.

Though much remains to be done, yet almost every branch of the business has been commenced, and many of the materials necessary for erecting the buildings are provided. The house for the accommodation of the President is in considerable forwardness, and the foundation of the Capitol is laid, and the walls begun; wharves and bridges have also been built, and the necessary roads opened.

The funds for defraying the expense of procuring the lands and erecting the buildings necessary for the accommodation of Congress, of the President, and for the public offices, are the lands ceded to the commissioners as stated in the memorial, together with one hundred and twenty thousand dollars granted by the State of Virginia, and seventy-two thousand dollars by the State of Maryland. It is the opinion of the committee that these funds, if properly managed, are fully adequate to the completing of all the buildings required for the accommodation of the Government, in season, without any aid from the Treasury of the United States.

The commissioners, soon after the laying out of the federal city, sold six thousand of the public lots at eighty dollars each; the purchasers stipulating to build one hundred and forty convenient large brick dwelling houses in the federal city before the year 1800; and the said purchasers further stipulating that all sales made by them previous to 1796 should be on condition that, for every three lots so sold, one such dwelling house should be erected.

The committee are informed that, under this condition, upwards of six hundred lots have been sold.

The commissioners have, at different periods, sold to sundry persons upwards of two hundred other lots, together with a small number of water lots, for the sum of ninety-six thousand six hundred and fifty-two dollars. The payment of the six thousand lots was to be in seven equal annual instalments.

The whole amount of donations and sale of lots is seven hundred and sixty-eight thousand six hundred and fifty-two dollars.

The commissioners state to the committee that, of this sum, three hundred and seventy-four thousand two hundred and fifty dollars are already expended.

From this statement, which is apprehended to be sufficiently accurate for general purposes, it is easy to form an estimate of the resources remaining in the hands of the commissioners. They are, the money due on contracts for lots sold, being three hundred and ninety-four thousand four hundred and two dollars, payable in the present and four succeeding years, in sums nearly equal, that is, about eighty thousand dollars annually; and the lots unsold, being four thousand six hundred and ninety-four, exclusive of the water lots, which occupy three thousand five hundred feet on the water, and extend back from sixty to a hundred feet.

It is difficult to say, with any degree of precision, what this property will realize, as much will depend on the time and manner of the sale.

It is stated by the commissioners that, estimating these lots according to the average price of the lots sold, exclusive of the great sale of six thousand in 1793, they are worth one million three hundred and ninety-three thousand seven hundred and ninety dollars; and that, from the progress made in the public buildings, and from the improvements made and contemplated by private persons, the value of this property must rapidly increase.

The commissioners also state that, in their opinion, it would be unsafe to calculate on strict punctuality in the payment of the instalments as they become due from their debtors, though they assure the committee that there will eventually be no loss.

The committee have endeavored to state, as correctly as possible, the resources now in the hands of the commissioners, that these may be compared with the objects yet to be accomplished. The principal of these are the completing of the President's house; the Capitol, at least as far as may be necessary for the accommodation of the two Houses of Congress and their officers; a building for the Judiciary, and another for the several Departments of State, of the Treasury, in all its branches, the Department of War, and the General Post Office; and such improvements in the streets as may be essentially requisite for public convenience.

The committee have availed themselves of the best means of information which the shortness of the time they have had the subject under consideration would allow, to form an estimate of the sums necessary for these several purposes; and, though certainty cannot be expected, and much must after all be left to conjecture, they apprehend they may with safety be estimated at seven hundred thousand dollars for completing the whole.

The committee conceive that it will be necessary to expend, till the year 1800, in completing the several objects enumerated, at least the annual sum of one hundred and forty thousand dollars.

The committee have already observed that firm reliance cannot be placed on the punctuality of the debtors of the public. If forty thousand dollars be taken as the sum that shall be annually received from this source, there will be an annual deficiency of the sum of one hundred thousand dollars.

If this deficiency be not supplied in some way, it will result that the public buildings will not be in readiness for the reception of Congress at the time proposed.

This deficiency must be supplied by the sale of the lots belonging to the public, if no better mode can be devised.

The committee conceive that the real interest, as well as the good faith of the Government, forbid the relinquishment of the objects contemplated by the act establishing the permanent seat of Government. It is stated by the commissioners that this property, if sold under the most unfavorable circumstances, would still be adequate to the purpose; but as this property may justly be considered as that of the public, it would, in the opinion of the committee, be a wanton sacrifice of the public interest, and justified only by the most urgent necessity, which the committee conceive does not exist, to raise the money wanted in this way. It is, in the opinion of the committee, the duty of Congress, founded on the truest principles of economy, to cherish these funds so as to make them productive of the greatest public utility.

But two other modes of accomplishing the objects contemplated have presented themselves to the view of the committee, namely, that of annual advances from the federal Treasury of the requisite sums, and that of raising the same by a loan.

If the state of the public finances would admit of it, the former mode would, in every view, be the most eligible, as it would be the most economical and the most certain. The public would, in that case, derive all the advantage resulting from the rapid increase of the value of property in this infant city, and might reimburse the sums so advanced by sales, at such times, and in such manner, as would be most advantageous. But, conceiving that the existing objects of expenditure will equal, if not exceed, the revenues already provided, and that it would not be advisable to impose new taxes for this object, the committee are induced to believe that the only mode which can with propriety be adopted, at this time, for supplying the deficiency stated, will be that of a loan secured on the city property, and negotiated under the direction of the President; and that it would conduce to the real interest of the public that the United States should guaranty the payment of the sums so borrowed, in case the property pledged should prove insufficient.

The committee also conceive that it would be proper, in order that Congress may be enabled to judge of the application of the moneys so borrowed, that it be made the duty of the said commissioners, semi-annually, to render to the Secretary of the Treasury a particular account of their receipts and expenditures, and also of the progress and state of the business intrusted to their care, and the state of the funds in their hands; and that the same be laid before Congress by the said Secretary at every session.

The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to borrow such sums as, in his judgment, may be necessary (not exceeding the sum of five hundred thousand dollars in the whole, and not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars in any one year) for completing the buildings requisite for the accommodation of the Government of the United States at the city of Washington; the said loan to be secured on the public property in the said city, and at such rate of interest as he may judge expedient, and payable at such time or times as he may judge proper after the year 1800; and that the United States guaranty to the money-lenders that, in case the property so pledged shall prove inadequate, the United States will make good the deficiency.

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the commissioners appointed by virtue of the act entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," every six months to render to the Secretary of the Treasury a particular account of the receipts and expenditures of all moneys intrusted to them, and also the progress and state of the business, and the state of the funds in their hands, and, generally, an account of their administration; and that the said Secretary lay the same before Congress, at the next session after the same shall be received; and that a bill or bills be brought in accordingly.

APPLICATION FOR A DISCHARGE FROM IMPRISONMENT AT THE SUIT OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 26, 1796.

JANUARY 23, 1796.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL respectfully reports to the House of Representatives, that the petition of James Mackey to him referred, together with a statement of legal proceedings in the suit mentioned in the petition, signed by John Cadwallader, acting for the district attorney in the county of Huntingdon, transmitted to him by William Rawle, attorney for the district of Pennsylvania, have been maturely considered.

The statute entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," passed on the 5th May, 1792, will remain in force till the end of the session of Congress next ensuing the 30th day of May, in the year 1796; it having been continued in May, 1794, till that period. But the operation of this statute is confined to "persons imprisoned on executions, issuing from any court of the United States, for satisfaction of judgments in any civil actions." If the petitioner was prosecuted in a court of the United States for the cause stated in the petition, he might be discharged as insolvent under the said statute, after judgment and execution; and supposing the suit to be maintainable, which seems to be admitted by the petitioner, it would be in his power to hasten his liberation from jail, by confessing judgment in order that he might be charged in execution, and thereby placed in a condition to avail himself of that law.

In the interpretation of this statute, it may be observed that it is remedial, and in favor of personal liberty, and on both principles is entitled to the most liberal construction. A person imprisoned on execution from a court of the United States, for satisfaction of a judgment, for taxes, imposts, excises, or duties, may claim the benefit of it, in like manner as if the debt were due to an individual citizen. And it is right that the law should be so; for the object of revenue laws being to obtain money where it may be had, it would not be promoted by the imprisonment of persons, unable to pay, for a long space of time, or forever; and, therefore, such severity would be inconsistent with wise legislation. The words any civil actions, which are used in the act, cannot, upon any sound principles of construction, be interpreted to exclude an action of debt for excise due upon the capacity of a still; for the declaration, pleadings, and judgment all demonstrate it to be a civil and not a criminal action.

Further it may be remarked, that these words "any civil actions" comprehended all suits for pecuniary penalties belonging to the United States wholly, or partly to them and partly to individuals, which latter most frequently occur; and the form of the action, whether debt, information, or case, will create no difference. In cases where the penalty belongs partly to an individual, that part cannot be constitutionally remitted or discharged, either by a pardon of the Executive authority, or any act of the Legislature to be passed subsequent to a right thereto being vested in the individual; and if such a case were not within a general insolvent law, antecedent to the offence, perpetual imprisonment might, in certain cases, be the consequence of the poverty of citizens. Such a system would be unreasonable, cruel, and oppressive, and ought not to be supposed to exist, if the words of the law in question can be otherwise understood. It is believed the words any civil actions may, without difficulty or violence, be understood to include actions for pecuniary penalties, as well from the forms used in legal proceedings, as from the effect desired, which is a recovery of money. In confirmation of this opinion, the case of Atcheson against Everett, reported in Cowper, 382; and Gilbert's Law of Evidence, revised by Loft, 264, may be mentioned as in-point, although no adjudication in a foreign court, since the independence of America, is conceived as an authority obligatory on the courts of the United States. This was an action of debt upon the statute against bribery to recover the penalty, and by all the judges it was decided to be a civil and not a criminal action.

This act of Congress leaves in full force the various laws of the several States, relative to suits brought or judgments recovered in the State courts; and perhaps this variety is attended with injustice where taxes of any kind, or penalties in which the United States are interested, are the objects of suit in the State courts. By uniformity in cases of this kind, citizens would receive the same measure of justice in similar prosecutions, in whatever State they should be carried on. In the present instance, James Mackey, being sued for a debt, claimed in behalf of the United States, in a court of the State of Pennsylvania, is entitled to the benefit of the laws of the said State relative to insolvent debtors, and, upon complying therewith, may be personally discharged. Consequently, it is not necessary for his liberation for Congress to pass a particular act for the purpose; neither does he appear to be a fit object of the grace of the Legislature, when he is believed to have conducted himself uncandidly, if not unfairly, before the State court, relative to this business, as is represented in the statement of John Cadwallader hereinbefore referred unto, and herewith transmitted.

All which is humbly submitted to the consideration of the House of Representatives.

CHARLES LEE, Attorney General.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, January 13, 1796.

I have been prevented, by a disorder in my eyes, from doing myself the pleasure of waiting upon you.

Having observed in the minutes of the House of Representatives that the petition of one James Mackey, praying to be discharged from imprisonment, has been referred to you, I have thought proper to transmit to you the enclosed statement from the gentleman prosecuting for the United States in the county of Huntingdon, as containing a fuller explanation of his case than his petition does.

Any further information in my power will be readily communicated.

I am, sir, with much respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

W. RAWLE.

CHARLES LEE, Esq., Attorney General.

JAMES MACKEY, a distiller in Franklin township, in the county of Huntingdon,

Capias debt in the Common Pleas for about four hundred dollars excise due upon capacity of his still.—
Sheriff returned: C. C. & C.

The prisoner petitioned for the benefit of the acts for the relief of insolvent debtors.

At an adjourned court on the 1st of December, 1795, the following objections were made, on the part of the plaintiff, to the discharge of prisoner:

1st. The prisoner did not make a return of property, or any disclosure whatever, whereby the demand could be satisfied, alleging that his stills were disposed of, and refused to give information of the purchaser, or whose land they were worked on.

Whereas it was alleged that, during his confinement, he had offered donation lands for sale, which had been by himself some years ago conveyed to some of his relatives.

It was likewise urged, on the part of the plaintiff, that the prisoner should give information where the stills were, and whose land whereon they were worked, in order that the duty might be recovered therefrom.

This he evaded, and denied having any knowledge of the owner or owners of the land.

2d. It was further alleged, on part of the plaintiff, that an objection would exist to a discharge of the prisoner, even if his surrender had been bona fide, arising from his being confined for a demand which does not accrue from contract, this being in the case of mesne process; and that he had not, at the time of filing his petition, been in custody six months.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF ISRAEL SMITH, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VERMONT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 27, 1796.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Matthew Lyon, of the State of Vermont, complaining of an undue election and return of Israel Smith, as one of the representatives for the said State, made the following report:

That, by the law which directs the time and manner of holding elections for the purpose of choosing representatives, it was provided: That the first constables in all the towns having a right to elect, and, in their absence, the select-men, should warn the freemen of their respective towns to meet on the last Tuesday in December, 1794, for the purpose of holding an election; that, after holding such election, the presiding officers should, within six days, deliver to the respective county clerks the ballots, sealed up, together with a certificate of their number, and superscribed by them respectively.

That the several county clerks in each district should meet on the second Thursday in January, and proceed to sort and count the votes, and to declare the person having a majority of all the votes one of the representatives for the said State; that if it should be found, upon examination, that no one of the candidates had a majority of the votes, the said clerks should immediately notify the same to the Chief Magistrate of the State, who is thereupon directed to issue his warrant to all the first constables, and, in their absence, to the select-men, of all the towns in any district where there had been a failure of choice, directing them to hold another election on the second Thursday in February, and to return the votes in the manner before directed; that, upon such second election, the person that should be found to have the highest number of votes should be declared the representative.

That, in conformity to the before-recited provisions and directions, an election was held on the last Tuesday in December, 1794, in the several towns in the district, composed of the counties of Bennington, Rutland, Addison, and a part of Chittenden.

That, upon an estimate of all the votes, it was found that a majority had not been given for any one of the candidates, and it was so notified to the Chief Magistrate; who, thereupon, issued his warrant to all the towns in the district, directing a second meeting for the purposes, and in the manner prescribed by law.

That the sheriff of the county of Addison failed to deliver the said warrant to two of the towns in that county, to wit, Kingston and Hancock, both of which had a right of suffrage, and had given their votes at the first election, amounting to twelve in the town of Kingston for Israel Smith, and three in the town of Hancock for Matthew Lyon; by which failure of the sheriff, those two towns were deprived of an opportunity of voting at the second election.

That, upon an estimate of all the votes which were returned on the second election, it was found that Israel Smith had eighteen hundred and four, and Matthew Lyon seventeen hundred and eighty-three.

That, as it does not appear to the satisfaction of the committee that there were a sufficient number of freemen in those two towns to have altered the state of the election, fifteen only having voted on the first occasion, they are of opinion that Israel Smith is entitled to take a seat in this House.

REPORTERS TO CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 29, 1796.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to receive proposals from persons skilled in the art of stenography, who may wish to be employed by this House during the present session, made the following report:

That they have received from David Robertson, of Petersburg, in Virginia, the following proposals, viz:

He engages to prepare for publication an accurate report of the debates and proceedings of this House, on condition that he be allowed, as a compensation for the services, and for the payment of clerk-hire, stationary, and all incidental expenses, the sum of four thousand dollars for each session.

The committee being satisfied with Mr. Robertson's skill in the art of stenography, and ability to perform the service above mentioned, and being strongly impressed with the expediency of disseminating throughout the United States the most accurate information of the debates and proceedings of this House, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That David Robertson be, and he is hereby, appointed stenographer to this House, for the purpose of reporting the debates and proceedings of this House; and that before he enter on the duties of his office, he take an oath to perform the same with fidelity and impartiality.

The committee further report, that Andrew Brown, printer of the Philadelphia Gazette, being desirous of publishing in his paper the debates and proceedings of this House, from Mr. Robertson's manuscript, has engaged to pay him the sum of eleven hundred dollars each session for the said manuscript; which sum is to be deducted out of the four thousand dollars before mentioned. The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of two thousand nine hundred dollars be allowed the said David Robertson for his services each session; the same to be paid, on the certificate of the Speaker, out of the moneys which may be appropriated for the contingent expenses of this House.

ENCOURAGEMENT FOR USEFUL INVENTIONS AND DISCOVERIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 3, 1796.

Mr. PAGE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Frederick Guyer, made the following report:

That it is their opinion that application to Congress for pecuniary encouragement of important discoveries, or of useful arts, cannot be complied with, as the constitution of the United States appears to have limited the powers of Congress to granting patents only, intending thereby, as they humbly conceive, to secure to authors and inventors, for a limited time, a right to an undisturbed or unrivalled use of their respective writings and discoveries, to a full and fair chance of deriving every advantage from the approbation of individuals at large, which, upon mature consideration and examination of such writings and discoveries, they may be found to deserve. That such applications to Congress, if encouraged, might be too frequent to admit of a proper attention thereto, and to their peculiar duty as legislators; that as to the supposed discovery of the petitioner, they think it does not improve the method of ascertaining the longitude by lunar observations, as set forth in the said petition; and that for this, and the foregoing reason, the prayer of the same is unreasonable, and ought to be rejected.

MINERALOGY AND METALLURGY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 12, 1796.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Nicholas Roosevelt and Jacob Mark, and their associates, made the following report:

That the said memorialists having procured from the mining countries in Europe a number of men well skilled in the arts of mineralogy and metallurgy, have them now in the United States, either connected with or employed by them.

That, by their means, they offer to explore the territory of the United States for mines of metals, semi-metals, and all other minerals, provided a reasonable time be allowed them to make the search, and the right of working the mines when discovered, be exclusively vested in them for a sufficient period, they rendering a proper proportion of the gross product to the United States.

The committee are of opinion that their offers merit the attention and encouragement of Congress; the general use of all metals, and of most minerals, rendering it a very desirable object to possess them within our own limits. Appearances, too, as your committee are informed, justify the opinion that many valuable mines do exist within the territory of the United States, which can only be rendered useful by that skill and knowledge of the subject which the peculiar circumstances of Europe enable the memorialists to offer. Your committee, therefore, recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a right be granted to Nicholas Roosevelt and Jacob Mark, and their associates, during the term of ——— years, to enter upon any of the waste lands in the territory of the United States, the Indian title whereof is extinguished, to search and explore the same for mines of metals, semi-metals, and all other minerals.

Resolved, That the right of working all such mines as shall be discovered by the said Nicholas Roosevelt and Jacob Mark, and their associates, shall be vested in them for the term of ——— years, they rendering an equitable proportion of the gross product of such mines to the United States.

CHARGES AGAINST HUMPHREY MARSHALL, A SENATOR FROM KENTUCKY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 26, 1796.

FRANKFORT, December 21, 1795.

To the Senate of the United States:

The representatives of the freemen of Kentucky in General Assembly met, feel themselves bound, by every tie of honor and patriotism, to represent to you the following facts and reflections:

In the month of February, 1795, not long after the election of Humphrey Marshall, one of the Senators of this State in the Congress of the United States, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, two of the judges of the court of appeals of this State, in which they say that "Humphrey Marshall had a suit in chancery, in the court of appeals, in which it appearing manifest, from the oath of the complainant, from disinterested testimony, from records, from documents furnished by himself, and from the contradiction contained in his own answer, that he had committed a gross fraud, the court gave a decree against him; and though, in the course of investigation, he was publicly charged of being guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury, in order to screen himself from the consequence of his fraud, yet so conscious was he of his guilt, that he had never since dared, by way of suit, or any other mode, to bring forward an examination into the truth of the charge; indeed, callous as he is, he appeared at the time to be so fully convicted, that he had scarcely effrontery enough to deny it."

Though this passage evidently contains in effect a charge that Humphrey Marshall was guilty not only of fraud but perjury, yet he appears in his pamphlet published at Philadelphia, as also in a publication in the Kentucky Gazette, to think the expression too vague, and calls for a specification of the charge. To this demand George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian reply, that he was guilty of perjury in his answer to the bill in chancery exhibited against him by James Wilkinson, and pledge themselves that they will plead justification to any suit brought against them therefor; no such suit, as we believe, or that we can learn, has been brought; our duty, under these circumstances, strongly and unequivocally requires that we should request your serious attention to the consideration which this case suggests. Important, indeed, it is to society, that those intrusted with the exercise of the power of Government should be men of unshaken virtue and integrity; without these qualities, in vain shall they expect the confidence of the people, when the basis on which alone that confidence can be founded is wanting.

We mean not to give an opinion on the justice of the charge which has been made against Humphrey Marshall; it has been made, and is of such a nature as must render him unworthy, if true, of any, still more so of the highest trust; while it is untried, unexamined, and undecided upon, doubts will exist; those doubts cannot but have the worst effects on the public mind.

The character of the Senator may involve the reputation of the State which he represents; it is also highly interesting to the honor and dignity of the House of which he is a member. We, therefore, conclude with requesting that an investigation may immediately take place relative to the charges stated; and if Humphrey Marshall can evince his innocence, that such exculpation may be promulgated throughout the United States, that himself, as well as our State, may be exonerated from the imputation of such a crime; but if the charges can be fixed upon him, that he may be expelled from a seat in your House.

EDM. BULLOCK,
*Speaker of the House of Representatives.*ALEX. SKULLETT,
Speaker of the Senate.

SIR:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, December 23, 1795.

A resolution of the Legislature of this State, passed on the 21st instant, directs "that the Governor shall transmit to the Senate of the United States a memorial respecting Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from this State in the Congress of the United States." I now have the honor of complying with that resolution, by enclosing the said memorial, together with those numbers of the Kentucky Gazette, which contain the publications therein alluded to, and of requesting that they may be laid before the Senate for their consideration.

With every sentiment of respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

ISAAC SHELBY.

CREDENTIALS OF DAVID BARD, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 9, 1796.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of David Bard, returned to serve in this House as a member for the State of Pennsylvania, made the following report:

That the elections appear to have been regularly held in the several counties composing the district, and that the judges of the several districts, in the respective counties, made up a return for each of the said counties in the manner and at the time prescribed by law.

That the general election law directs that one of the judges of each of the counties composing the district should meet at a place called the Burnt Cabins, in the county of Bedford, on the third Tuesday in October ensuing the election, to estimate the votes given in the several counties, and to return the person having the highest number of votes in the entire district as their representative; except there should be, at the time of holding the said elections, any of the militia of any of the said counties in the service of the United States; and, in that case, that the judges should meet on the 15th of November ensuing the election.

That, at the time of holding the elections, Bedford and Huntingdon, two of the counties in the said district, had no part of their militia in the service of the United States; and the judges of these two counties met at the Burnt Cabins on the third Tuesday in October, in order to make their district return.

That the county of Franklin had a part of their militia in the service of the United States at that time, and the judge from that county did not meet the other judges; in consequence of which, no return was made on that day.

That, on the 15th of November, the judges of Bedford and Franklin met for the purpose of making a return; but the judge of Huntingdon, as it is suggested, not being informed of the alteration of the law in that respect, failed to attend; by which they were again prevented from making a return.

That, on the 1st day of May last, all the judges met at the Burnt Cabins, and returned David Bard as having the highest number of votes.

That in consequence of the informality of the said return, it being the 1st of May instead of the 15th of November, the committee have called for and obtained the several county returns, on which the district return was founded, and have made an estimate of the votes as they appear from those returns; which estimate is as follows:

David Bard	-	-	-	-	1808
James McClain	-	-	-	-	1090
James Chambers	-	-	-	-	519

Whereupon, your committee are of opinion that David Bard is entitled to a seat in this House.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 11, 1796.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill authorizing a loan for the use of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes therein mentioned, with instructions to inquire whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the plans of the buildings intended for public use at the said city; and, also, to inquire into the state of the public buildings, the expenses already incurred in erecting, and the probable expenses of completing the same, made the following report:

That, in their opinion, no alteration can with propriety now be made in the plans of the public buildings; for information as to the state of the public buildings, the expenses incurred in erecting, and the probable expenses of completing them, the committee can only refer to the original report* and the papers accompanying, which have been read in the House.

Alexander White, one of the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, by virtue of an act entitled "An act to establish the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," respectfully states to the committee, to whom the memorial of the said commissioners and the President's message respecting the same were referred:

That, on the 1st day of December, 1795, the wall of the President's house, in the city of Washington, was raised within six feet of the eave; that the sashes, sash-frames, doors, window shutters, and trimmings for doors and windows for the basement story, were made and ready to be put together; and the sashes and sash-frames for the principal story were expected to be finished by March, with the labor of two hands. The work of all the doors of the principal story was cut out, and in a state of forwardness. There was mahogany laid in sufficient to complete the House, as sashes, doors, hand-rails, stairs, balusters, &c. for the two principal stories; flooring plank nearly sufficient to finish the two principal stories, was procured and preparing. The principal timbers were prepared ready to be put up together, and the roof considered as half done.

The expense of finishing the house in an elegant style is estimated at £33,259, Maryland currency, or $83,690 66.

There were freestone, bricks, lime, and timber on hand; but A. White does not know the quantities.

The foundation of the Capitol is laid; the foundation wall under ground and above is of different thicknesses, and is computed to average fourteen feet high and nine feet thick. The freestone work is commenced on the north wing; it is of different heights, but may average three feet and a half; the interior walls are carried up the same height. The estimate to finish the north wing is, for brick and stone work, £22,308 3s. 3d. Maryland currency; for carpenters' work and materials £5,870, Maryland currency, making $75,141 45. The materials on hand are, freestone prepared 1,994 superficial feet; freestone prepared 3,826 feet, running; good freestone in the rough 440 tons; inferior freestone 200 tons; bricks 267,618; lime 4,750 bushels; timber prepared for use 7,000 feet, running; timber not prepared 11,000 feet, running.

A. White has no estimate of the remainder of the building, but would observe, that as the south wing is to be occupied by one large room only, the expense must be much less than that of the north wing, which is considered as sufficient to accommodate both Houses of Congress during the present state of representation. The main body, too, will be finished in the same way; and the grand vestibule may or may not be covered with a dome; architects differ in opinion with regard to covering it. If it should not be covered, it will consist only of an arcade, twenty feet high and ten feet wide; and over that a colonnade sixteen feet high, affording a communication from the grand staircase to all the other parts of the building. Upon the whole, A. White thinks he goes beyond the necessary sum, when he estimates $400,000 for finishing the whole building.

He considers the estimate for finishing the President's house as much to be relied on, yet would allow for that purpose $100,000.

Two buildings may be erected on the President's square, at the expense of $100,000, sufficient to accommodate, in a handsome manner, the Departments of State, Treasury, and War, and the General Post Office; and $100,000 he conceives sufficient to erect a Judiciary.

Deduct money due the original proprietors, for squares appropriated	-	-	-	-	12,000

Of the last mentioned sum, $378,191 are not yet due, but will become due in the following proportions, viz:

In the year 1797	-	-	-	-	80,719 09
In the year 1798	-	-	-	-	75,789 93

And they are indebted	-	-	-	-	42,000

The real property of the city consists in 4,694 lots, exclusive of water lots, averaging 5,265 square feet; 1,694 of these are choice lots, from which Morris & Greenleaf were excluded in their selection. The average value of these lots, taking the prices at which they have been sold from the commencement of the city, is $285 per lot, amounting to

Water property, 3,500 feet front, at $16 per foot	-	-	-	-	56,000
					$1,393,790

Lots no doubt vary in their value; those from which Morris & Greenleaf were excluded far exceed the above average price; others may fall considerably below. A. White has no doubt but the whole may be sold if the public buildings can be carried on without immediate sales for $1,000,000, even before the Government removes.

The city has, likewise, an island of freestone of immense value, and some other property of less note.

A. White is of opinion, that filling up some gulleys or ravines near the Capitol, and paving the Pennsylvania Avenue from thence to the President's house, is all that is necessary to be done to the streets, except clearing of stumps and grubs, and perhaps, in a few instances, levelling previous to the removal of Government; the ground in general being hard and gravelly, will afford an easy passage till the city becomes populous. He can form no estimate of the expenses, being unacquainted with such business, and not having it in contemplation while on the spot; he believes, however, the necessary materials are convenient.

CHARGES AGAINST HUMPHREY MARSHALL, A SENATOR FROM KENTUCKY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 11, 1796.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom were referred the letter of the Governor and the memorial of the representatives of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, made the following report:

That the representatives of the freemen of Kentucky state, in their memorial, that, in February, 1795, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, (who were two judges of the court of appeals,) in which they say that Humphrey Marshall had a suit in chancery in the said court of appeals, in which it appearing manifest, from the oath of the complainant, from disinterested testimony, from records, from documents furnished by himself, and from the contradictions contained in his own answer, that he had committed a gross fraud, the court gave a decree against him; and that in the course of the investigation, he was publicly charged with perjury. That Mr. Marshall, in a publication in the Kentucky Gazette, called for a specification of the charge; to which the said George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, in a like publication, replied, that he was guilty of perjury in his answer to the bill in chancery exhibited against him by James Wilkinson; and that they would plead justification to any suit brought against them therefor. That no such suit, as the said representatives could learn, had been brought. The said representatives further say that they do not mean to give an opinion on the justice of the said charge, but request that an investigation may immediately take place relative thereto.

Your committee observe, that the said suit was tried eighteen months before Mr. Marshall was chosen a member of the Senate; and that, previous to his election, mutual accusations had taken place between him and the judges of the said court, relating to the same suit.

The representatives of Kentucky have not furnished any copy of Mr. Marshall's answer, on oath, nor have they stated any part of the testimony, or produced any of the said records or documents, or the copy of any paper in the cause; nor have they intimated a design to bring forward these or any other proofs.

Your committee are informed by the other Senator, and the two Representatives in Congress, from Kentucky, that they have been requested by the Legislature of that State to prosecute this inquiry; and that they are not possessed of any evidence in the case; and that they believe no person is authorized to appear on behalf of the Legislature.

Mr. Marshall is solicitous that a full investigation of the subject should take place in the Senate, and urges the principle, that consent takes away error, as applying, on this occasion, to give the Senate jurisdiction. But as no person appears to prosecute, and there is no evidence adduced to the Senate, nor even a specific charge, the committee think any further inquiry by the Senate would be improper. If there were no objections of this sort, the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained. They think that, in a case of this kind, no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury; and that, in all such prosecutions, the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If, in the present case, the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged by the memorialists why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offence. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare that, in their opinion, this presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by recriminating publications which manifest strong resentment against him. And they are also of opinion that, as the constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate, the consent of the party cannot give it; and that, therefore, the said memorial ought to be dismissed.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF JOSEPH B. VARNUM, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM MASSACHUSETTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 15, 1796.

Mr. VENABLE made the following report:

The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the petitions of sundry persons of the second middle district of the State of Massachusetts, complaining of an undue election and return of Joseph Bradley Varnum as a member of this House, have, according to order, proceeded to examine the petitions, and the documents that accompany them. They have also received from Aaron Brown, a petitioner, a paper purporting to be a specification of the facts relied on to support the charge, and praying for a general power to take evidence in support thereof, which is as follows:

"A statement of facts to be proved by the petitioners.

"1st. That one hundred and eighty-five votes were returned by the selectmen of Dracutt, and counted by the Governor and Council.

"2d. That, of those, sixty were illegal or bad; fifty-five ballots or votes being received and certified by the select-men or presiding officers, of whom Joseph Bradley Varnum, Esquire, was one, which were given by proxy, that is, votes from persons who were not present at the meeting, but from other persons who pretended to act for them; and five votes were received and certified by the said presiding officers, which were given by persons by law not qualified to vote at said meeting.

"3d. If Mr. Varnum does propose to examine the proceedings at the meetings of any other towns in the district the petitioners wish to reserve liberty of showing that votes given for Mr. Varnum in any other town in the district were illegal.

"AARON BROWN, for the petitioners."

On the 12th of March, 1796, the said Aaron Brown subjoined the following explanation of the above specification:

"The petitioners expect to prove that the above sixty illegal votes were received by the select-men, by showing that the whole number of legal voters were not more than two hundred and twenty-five, of which number one hundred did not attend the meeting on the 23d day of March last, and a part of those that did attend and vote were not legally qualified to vote.

"AARON BROWN."

Also the objections of the sitting member, and a requisition that the petitioners be held to a specification of the names of the persons objected to, and the objections to each, a notification thereof to the sitting member, before he should be compelled to take evidence concerning the matters alleged, or make any answer thereto.

Upon all which, as well from the difficulty of the case, as from a desire to have uniformity in proceedings of this kind, your committee have been induced to pray the instructions of the House as to the kind of specification that shall be demanded of the petitioners, and the manner in which the evidence shall be taken.

FERRIES IN THE NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 1, 1796.

Mr. BROWN made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer Zane, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That the petitioner sets forth that he hath, at considerable trouble and expense, explored, and in part opened, a road northwest of the river Ohio, between Wheeling and Limestone, which, when completed, will greatly contribute to the accommodation of the public as well as of individuals; but that several rivers intervening, the road proposed cannot be used with safety until ferries shall be established thereon. That the petitioner will engage to have such ferries erected, provided he can obtain a right to the land, which is now the property of the United States; and thereupon prays that he may be authorized to locate and survey, at his own expense, military bounty warrants upon as much land at Muskingum, Hockhocking, and Scioto rivers, as may be sufficient to support the necessary establishments; and that the same be granted to him by the United States.

That the committee, having received satisfactory information in support of the above statement, are of opinion that the proposed road will be of general utility; that the petitioner merits encouragement; and that his petition, being reasonable, ought to be granted. The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petition of Ebenezer Zane is reasonable; that he be authorized to locate warrants, granted by the United States for military services, upon three tracts of land, not exceeding one mile square each, at Muskingum, Hockhocking, and Scioto, where the proposed road shall cross those rivers, for the purpose of establishing ferries thereon; and that leave be given to bring in a bill for that purpose.

STATE OF TENNESSEE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, APRIL 8, 1796.

SIR:

KNOXVILLE, February 9, 1796.

As Governor it is my duty, and as President of the Convention I am instructed, by a resolution of that body, to forward to you, express, a copy of the constitution formed for the permanent government of the State of Tennessee, which you will herewith receive by the hands of Major Joseph McMin, of Hawkins county, who was himself a member of the convention.

The sixth section of the first article will inform you that the first General Assembly to be held under this constitution is to commence on the last Monday in March next. The object of the convention, in determining on this early day, is a representation in the Congress of the United States before the termination of the present session. And the third section of the schedule will inform you how long it is contemplated the temporary form of Government shall continue.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq., Secretary of State, Philadelphia.

WILLIAM BLOUNT, Governor in and over the Territory of the United States of America south of the river Ohio, to the people thereof.

Whereas, by an act passed on the 11th day of July last, entitled "An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the territory of the United States of America south of the river Ohio," it is enacted, "that if upon taking the enumeration of the people in the said territory as by that directed, it shall appear that there are 60,000 inhabitants therein, counting the whole of the free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, and adding three-fifths of all other persons, the Governor be authorized and requested to recommend to the people of the respective counties to elect five persons for each county, to represent them in convention, to meet at Knoxville, at such time as he shall judge proper, for the purpose of forming a constitution or permanent form of Government."

And whereas, upon taking the enumeration of the inhabitants of the said territory, as by the act directed, it does appear that there are 60,000 free inhabitants therein, and more, besides other persons: Now I, the said William Blount, Governor, &c. do recommend to the people of the respective counties to elect five persons for each county, on the 18th and 19th days of December next, to represent them in a convention to meet at Knoxville, on the 11th day of January next, for the purpose of forming a constitution or permanent form of Government.

And to the end that a perfect uniformity in the election of the members of convention may take place in the respective counties, I, the said William Blount, Governor, &c. do further recommend to the sheriffs or their deputies, respectively, to open and hold polls of election for members of convention, on the 18th and 19th days of December, as aforesaid, in the same manner as polls of election have heretofore been held for members of the General Assembly; and that all free males, twenty-one years of age and upwards, be considered as entitled to vote by ballot for five persons for members of convention; and that the sheriffs or their deputies, holding such polls of election, give certificates to the five persons in each county, having the greatest number of votes, of their being duly elected members of convention.

And I, the said William Blount, Governor, &c. think proper here to declare, that this recommendation is not intended to have, nor ought to have, any effect whatever upon the present temporary form of Government; and that the present temporary form will continue to be exercised in the same manner as if it never had been issued, until the convention shall have formed and published a constitution or permanent form of Government.

Done at Knoxville, November twenty-eight, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

WM. BLOUNT.

By the Governor:

WILLIE BLOUNT, pro Secretary.

SIR:

KNOXVILLE, November 28, 1795.

Herewith you will receive an aggregate schedule of the enumeration of the inhabitants of the territory south of the Ohio, taken agreeably to an act passed on the 11th July last, entitled "An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the territory of the United States of America south of the river Ohio," together with a copy of my recommendation to the people of the said territory, of this date, to elect members of convention to form a constitution, or permanent form of Government, made in pursuance to the power in me vested by that act, upon the event of there being "sixty thousand inhabitants therein, counting the whole of the free persons, including those bound to serve for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, and adding three-fifths of all other persons." A copy of the act above cited has been forwarded to and received at your office.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM BLOUNT.

The SECRETARY OF STATE of the United States.

P. S. The newspaper contains the recommendation to the people.

NOTE.—The yeas and nays are unimportant, as there proves to be upwards of sixty thousand free inhabitants, as will appear by reading the act providing for the enumeration.

UNITED STATES, April 8, 1796.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

By an act of Congress passed on the 26th of May, 1790, it was declared that the inhabitants of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio should enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of Congress for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and that the Government of the said territory south of the Ohio should be similar to that which was then exercised in the territory northwest of the Ohio, except so far as was otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress passed the 2d of April, 1790, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of Western territory."

Among the privileges, benefits, and advantages thus secured to the inhabitants of the territory south of the river Ohio, appear to be the right of forming a permanent constitution and State Government, and of admission, as a State, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, when it should have therein sixty thousand free inhabitants: provided the constitution and Government so to be formed should be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in the articles of the said ordinance.

As proofs of the several requisites to entitle the territory south of the river Ohio to be admitted, as a State, into the Union, Governor Blount has transmitted a return of the enumeration of its inhabitants, and a printed copy of the constitution* and form of Government on which they have agreed, which, with his letters accompanying the same, are herewith laid before Congress.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 12, 1796.

Mr. HARRISON, from the committee to whom were referred the report of the Secretary of State, made the 13th of July, 1790, and so much of the message of the President of the United States of the 8th of January, 1795, as relates to weights and measures,* made the following report:

That they have examined into the subject referred to them, and are of opinion that the following principles ought to be assumed in regulating the standards of weights and measures in the United States:

1. That all measures of surface, capacity, and weight, ought to be regulated by measures in length.
2. That the unit of measures in length, and the unit of weights to be adopted as standards, ought not to vary in any very sensible degree from the present foot now in use, and the present pound avoirdupois.
3. That the objections against assumed standards, on account of their being arbitrary, and always liable to be injured or lost, make it a matter worthy the attention of an enlightened Legislature to refer to some certain measure in length, derived from a uniform principle in nature, more especially if it can be made to appear that reference may be had to such a measure with sufficient certainty of uniformity, in the result of different experiments, and without much time, trouble, or expense, in making them.

In order to carry into effect the first and second of these principles, reference need only to be had to a very remarkable correspondence which is said to exist between the avoirdupois pound and the English standard foot; it having been ascertained that one thousand ounces avoirdupois of rain water will fill a cubic foot, of English standard measure, with great exactness; and, for carrying into effect the third principle, little doubt can be entertained but that recourse ought to be had to the pendulum rod, vibrating seconds of mean time in any given place, and in any known temperature of the atmosphere, because this will, without doubt, furnish a standard, derived from a uniform principle in nature, more certain and easy to be obtained than any that hath hitherto been discovered; by which a measure in length may be ascertained, differing very insensibly in the result of different experiments, and by which the unit in measures of length, to be adopted as a standard in the United States, may, therefore, at all times be regulated. The committee are, therefore, of opinion that one or more experiments ought to be made in the city of Philadelphia, to ascertain the length of the pendulum rod, vibrating seconds of mean time, and that, after such length shall be obtained, the present foot ought to be compared with it; and if it appears not to bear any even proportion to it, then such a standard foot ought to be assumed as shall bear an even proportion to it, and which will not vary, in any sensible degree, from the length of the foot now in use; and that, after such a standard foot shall be obtained, one or more experiments ought to be made to ascertain the weight of a cube of rain water, which shall be equal to the one-thousandth part of a cube whose side shall be the aforesaid standard foot; and that sixteen times the weight of such a cube of water ought to be the unit of weights, or pound avoirdupois; and that after this unit of weights or pound shall be so obtained, experiments ought to be made to ascertain the weights of such divisions of this unit or pound as shall be most convenient for the purpose of weighing all substances that require exactness in the weight, such as the precious metals, and the like; and, in making these, the four following methods of dividing the pound have been contemplated by the committee:

1. The division of the pound in a decimal ratio, until it shall be divided into one thousand parts, and the division of each of these into seven parts, which will divide the pound into seven thousand parts.
2. The division of the pound in a decimal ratio; the smallest weight in common use to be the one ten-thousandth part.
3. The division of the ounce into eighteen parts, and each of these again into twenty-four, which will divide the pound into six thousand nine hundred and twelve parts.
4. The division of the ounce in a decimal ratio; the least weight in common use to be the one-thousandth part, which will divide the pound into sixteen thousand parts.

The least weight in the first of these divisions will be the present troy grain, and the remaining will bear the following proportions to it: that is, the second will be to the present troy grain as seven is to ten; the third as seven thousand to six thousand nine hundred and twelve; the fourth as seven to sixteen. Of these respective divisions, the committee are of opinion that the second and last are preferable, because they may be more easily introduced, will better accommodate themselves to decimal arithmetic, and, in the least divisions before mentioned, will produce weights less than the present troy grain, and which must, therefore, be sufficiently exact for most purposes. The committee have conceived it unnecessary to come to any particular determination about the divisions of the feet, or respecting the contents of the gallon and bushel, until it shall be determined whether experiments shall be made relative to this subject; and they would, therefore, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States shall be authorized to employ such persons, of sufficient mathematical and philosophical skill, as he shall think most proper for the purpose of making the following experiments, the result of which shall be reported to Congress at their next session:

1. To ascertain the length of a pendulum rod of iron, of a cylindrical form, whose diameter shall not exceed the one hundred and twentieth part of its length, which shall perform its vibrations in one second of mean time, in an arc not exceeding four degrees, and in the latitude of the city of Philadelphia, at any place between the rivers Delaware and Schuylkill, and at a known height above the level of common high water in the river Delaware, and in a known temperature of the atmosphere, according to Fahrenheit's thermometer, both to be ascertained when the experiment shall be made; and, after its length shall be ascertained by one or more experiments for that purpose, a standard foot, to be the unit of all measures in length for the United States, shall be derived from it, which shall be equal to, or shall not sensibly vary from, the present foot now in use, and which shall bear an even proportion to the length of such pendulum rod.

To ascertain the weight of a cube of rain water, of a known degree of heat, according to Fahrenheit's thermometer, to be ascertained at the time when the experiment shall be made, which shall be equal in quantity to the one-thousandth part of a cube whose side shall be equal to the standard foot ascertained by the pendulum rod, in manner as above directed; which weight of water, when so obtained, shall be the standard ounce avoirdupois, sixteen of which shall make the pound avoirdupois; and the pound, when so determined on, shall be the unit of weights for the United States.

3. To ascertain the respective weights of the following divisions of the pound and the ounce:

First. The division of the pound, in a decimal ratio, into one thousand parts, and the least of these again into seven parts.

Second. The division of the pound, in a decimal ratio, into ten thousand parts.

Third. The division of the ounce into eighteen parts, and each of these into twenty-four parts.

Fourth. The division of the ounce, in a decimal ratio, into one thousand parts.

Resolved, That a sum, not exceeding one thousand dollars, ought to be appropriated for the purpose of defraying the expenses that may arise in making the foregoing experiments.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 26, 1796.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee appointed to inquire into the truth of the information that a son of General Lafayette is now within the United States, and also what measures it will be proper to take, if the same be true, to evince the grateful sense entertained by this country for the services of his father, made the following report:

That, pursuant to order, they made the inquiry directed by the House, and find that the son of General Lafayette arrived some time in the last autumn in the United States, and is now with the President of the United States in the city of Philadelphia; and they further report that no measures are necessary to be taken relative to the other object of their inquiry, as will appear from the letter, hereunto annexed, addressed to the chairman of your committee, in answer to one written by him, enclosing a copy of the resolutions of the House on this subject.

[TRANSLATION.]

Sir:

RAMAPAGE, NEW JERSEY, March 28, 1796.

I have just received the honorable resolution which the merits of my father have procured for me. Deign to express to the representatives of the people of America his gratitude—my youth forbids me yet to speak of mine. Every day recalls to me what he taught me, at every period of his life, so full of vicissitude, and what he has repeated in a letter, written from the depth of his prison: "I am convinced," he says, "that the goodness of the United States, and the tenderness of my paternal friend, will need nothing to excite them."

Arrived in America some months since, I live in the country, in New Jersey, occupied in the pursuits of my education. I have no wants; if I had felt any, I should have answered to the paternal solicitude of the President of the United States, either by confiding them to him, or by accepting his offers. I shall hereafter consider it a duty to impart them to the House of Representatives, which deigns to inquire into my situation.

I am as happy as a continual inquietude, relative to the object of my first affections, will permit. I have found benevolence wherever I have been known, and have often had the satisfaction of hearing those who were ignorant of my connexions, speak of their interest in the fate of my father, express their admiration of, and partake the gratitude I feel for, the generous Doctor Bollman, who has done so much to break his chains.

It is amid all these motives of emulation that I shall continue my studies; every day more convinced of the duties which are imposed by the goodness of Congress, and the names I have the honor to bear.

STATE OF TENNESSEE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 5, 1796.

Mr. KING, from the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 8th of April, 1796,* relative to the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, made the following report:

By the deed of cession of the State of Virginia, the United States are bound to lay off the territory northwest of the river Ohio into States, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square. And by the ordinance of the 13th day of July, 1787, Congress resolved that so soon as Virginia should by law consent to the laying off the said territory so as to form three States, the same should be bounded in the manner therein specified. By the same ordinance, the whole of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio is made one district for the purpose of temporary government; and it is therein declared that so soon as any one of the said States, so to be laid out as aforesaid, should contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, the same should be admitted by their delegates into Congress on an equal footing with the original States.

On the 9th July, 1787, the State of South Carolina ceded, without any condition whatever, their claims to all lands lying between the Mississippi and the ridge of mountains, which divides the western from the eastern waters; the same being south of, and contiguous to, the territory ceded by North Carolina, and uninhabited except by Indians.

By the deed of cession of the State of North Carolina of the lands therein described, it is made a condition that the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into a State or States, containing a suitable extent of territory; the inhabitants of which shall enjoy all the privileges set forth in the ordinance for the Government of the Western Territory of the United States. By the act for the government of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, the whole of the said territory, for the purpose of temporary government, is made one district; and it is declared that the inhabitants thereof shall enjoy all the privileges set forth in the ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio; as in the territory northwest of the Ohio, it is necessary that the same shall by Congress be laid out into States according to the conditions of the act of cession, or to the provisions expressed in the ordinance of Congress, and that such States shall each contain 60,000 free inhabitants before they are entitled to be admitted into the Union, so in the territory south of the Ohio, Congress are obliged by the act of cession of North Carolina to lay out the territory thereby ceded into one or more States, the inhabitants of which, so soon as they shall amount to 60,000 free persons, will be entitled to be admitted into the Union.

Congress have declared that the whole of the territory northwest of the Ohio shall, for the purpose of temporary government, compose one district; and likewise that the whole of the territory south of the Ohio shall, for the like purpose, compose one district; but they have not definitively laid out the territory northwest of the Ohio into States, nor have they decided whether the territory of the Ohio shall be laid out into one or more States. If the district northwest of the Ohio contained more than 60,000 free inhabitants, it would not from thence follow that the district could demand admission as a new State into the Union, because the district must, by the terms of its cession, be previously divided into a number of States, the free inhabitants of each of which must amount to 60,000, before such State would have a right of admission into the Union; in like manner, although the district south of the Ohio should contain 60,000 free inhabitants, it cannot from thence be inferred that the district, or that portion thereof ceded by North Carolina, would have a right to be admitted as a new State into the Union, because Congress have not decided whether the same shall compose a single State, or be laid out into two or more States. The number of inhabitants which establishes a claim of admission must be the number of inhabitants of a State previously laid out, and defined in its boundaries by Congress, and not the number of inhabitants of a territory which, for the purpose of temporary government, composes a district which may be divided by Congress into several States.

Hence results this conclusion: that Congress must have previously enacted that the whole of the territory ceded by North Carolina, and which is only a part of the territory of the United States south of the Ohio, should be laid out into one State, before the inhabitants thereof (admitting them to amount to 60,000 free persons) could claim to be admitted as a new State into the Union.

Had the territory south of the Ohio, which, for the purpose of temporary government, composes one district, been laid out by Congress into one State, the enumeration of the inhabitants, in order to ascertain whether such State was entitled to be received into the Union, ought to have been made under the authority of Congress; for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the original States for the purpose of apportioning the Representatives, and ascertaining a rule for the apportionment of direct taxes, must, by the constitution, be made by Congress, and cannot be made by the individual States; and as the rights of the original States, as members of the Union, are affected by the admission of new States, the same principle which enjoins the census of their inhabitants to be taken under the authority of Congress requires the enumeration of the inhabitants of any new State laid out by Congress, in like manner, to be made under their authority. Did not the principles of the constitution seem to leave Congress without discretion on this point, yet the propriety of the enumeration being made under their authority will be manifest on comparing the fifth section of the law, for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, with the law under which the census has lately been taken in the territory south of the Ohio. By this comparison it will be perceived that the guards against error, provided in the former law, are omitted in the latter; and that instead of confining the enumeration to the free inhabitants of the territory south of the Ohio, the law authorizes and requires the enumeration of all the people within the said territory, at any time within the term allowed to complete the same, including as well the persons casually within or passing through the said territory as the inhabitants thereof.

From the preceding view of the subject, the committee are of opinion that the inhabitants of that part of the territory south of the Ohio, ceded by North Carolina, are not, at this time, entitled to be received as a new State into the Union.

But as the said territory ceded by North Carolina may by Congress be laid out into one State, although from the distance between its extreme parts the inhabitants thereof may thereby be exposed to some inconvenience, and as it appears to be the desire of a majority of the inhabitants of the said territory to be received as a new State into the Union, the committee recommend that leave be given to bring in a bill laying out the whole of the said territory ceded by North Carolina into one State, and providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof in the manner prescribed in the act entitled "An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, passed on the 1st of March, 1790."

INQUIRY INTO THE OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF A JUDGE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 10, 1796.

PHILADELPHIA, May 9, 1796.

SIR:

I do myself the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives of the United States a report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of St. Clair, in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, against George Turner, one of the judges of that Territory.

With the most perfect respect, I remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES LEE, Attorney General.

To the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

MAY 9, 1796.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL, in obedience to their resolution bearing date the 5th of this month, referring to him the petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of St. Clair, in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, relative to the conduct of George Turner, one of the judges of the supreme court in that Territory, most respectfully reports:

That the charges exhibited in the petition against Judge Turner, and especially the first, second, and fifth, are of so serious a nature as to require that a regular and fair examination into the truth of them should be made, in some judicial course of proceeding; and if he be convicted thereof, a removal from office may and ought to be a part of the punishment. His official tenure is during good behavior: and, consequently, he cannot be removed until he be lawfully convicted of some malversation in office. A judge may be prosecuted in three modes, for official misdemeanors or crimes: by information, or by indictment before an ordinary court, or by impeachment before the Senate of the United States. The last mode, being the most solemn, seems, in general cases, to be best suited to the trial of so high and important an officer; but, in the present instance, it will be found very inconvenient, if not entirely impracticable, on account of the immense distance of the residence of the witnesses from this city. In the prosecution of an impeachment, such rules must be observed as are essential to justice; and, if not exactly the same as those which are practised in ordinary courts, they must be analogous, and as nearly similar to them as forms will permit. Thus, before an impeachment is sent to the Senate, witnesses must be examined, in solemn form, respecting the charges, before a committee of the House of Representatives, to be appointed for that purpose, as in a case of indictment witnesses are examined by a grand jury. Upon the trial, the witnesses must give their testimony before the Senate, as in a case of indictment they do before the ordinary court and petit jury; so also, perhaps, it would be proper that some responsible person or persons should undertake to answer the costs of trial to the accused, in the event of his acquittal. It ought to be remarked that, if the mode of impeachment be deemed preferable, the aforesaid petition, subscribed by forty-nine citizens, may be regarded as sufficient inducement to the House to appoint a committee of inquiry, with authority to examine witnesses and report the substance of their testimony respecting the charges therein set forth, at the present or next session; and, if the report of the testimony will warrant an impeachment, articles are to be directed to be drawn and presented to the Senate, who will appoint a time of trial, giving reasonable notice thereof to the accused and to the accusers, &c.

However, the Attorney General is of opinion that it will be more advisable, on account of the expense, the delay, the certain difficulty, if not impossibility, of obtaining the attendance here of the witnesses who reside in the Territory northwest of the Ohio, about the distance of one thousand five hundred miles, that the prosecution should not be carried on by impeachment, but by information or indictment before the supreme court of that Territory, which is competent to the trial; and he prays leave to inform the House that, in consequence of affidavits stating complaints against Judge Turner, of oppressions and gross violations of private property, under color of his office, which have been lately transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State has been by him instructed to give orders to Governor St. Clair to take the necessary measures for bringing that officer to a fair trial, respecting those charges, before the court of that Territory, according to the laws of the land; which course is also recommended to be pursued relative to the matters charged in said petition.

All which is humbly submitted.

CHARLES LEE, Attorney General.

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled: the humble petition of the inhabitants of the county of St. Clair, in the Territory northwest of the Ohio, humbly sheweth:

That your petitioners find themselves heavily aggrieved by the unexampled tyranny and oppressions used in this county by the honorable George Turner, one of the judges in and over this Territory, whilst on his circuit.

First, by holding a court unknown to and contrary to the laws of this Territory, and at the extremity of the population of the county, and compelling a great number of the good people of this county to attend thereat, as well suitors as jurors and civil officers of the county, thereby absenting themselves from their abodes, and exposing many families to the ravages of the hostile Indians, and to the great loss and damage of the good people by heavy charges that attended the majority travelling sixty-six miles to attend that court.

By heavy fines set and levied by the said court; by forfeitures incurred of the property of citizens quietly travelling on the Ohio; and the people grieved in various other ways, by suits and prosecutions in the same court, attended with very heavy charges.

By compelling the register to transport the office to the extremity of the population of the county, thereby rendering it unsafe, as well as inconvenient for the people to have recourse to the office.

By denying us, as we conceive, the rights reserved to us by the constitution of the Territory, to wit, the laws and customs heretofore used in regard to the descent and conveyance of property, in which the French and Canadian inhabitants conceive the language an essential.

By taking possession of intestate estates, converting part thereof into ready money, to the great damage of the heirs and creditors, and carrying the same money away with him; the remaining goods left in a loose manner, without any account whatever to satisfy those who have claims.

We therefore pray that your honorable House will take into consideration the injuries we have sustained by the conduct of the honorable George Turner, in this county, and provide us such remedy as you, in your wisdom, may judge expedient; and we shall, as in duty bound, ever pray.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF ISRAEL SMITH, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VERMONT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 13, 1796.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was recommitted the petition of Matthew Lyon, complaining of an undue election and return of Israel Smith, made the following statement, in addition to their former report:

That it appears, by the deposition of the town clerk of Hancock, that there were seventeen persons in the said town who were entitled to vote; twelve of whom are stated to have been admitted in that town, and five in other towns.

That, by a like deposition of the clerk of Kingston, it appears that there were in that town nineteen persons; seventeen of whom had been qualified in that town, and two in other towns.

That it does not appear that the warrants were withheld from the said towns by the sheriff from any fraudulent intention; but the failure was accidental as to the town of Kingston, and the warrant was not sent to the town of Hancock, because the sheriff believed they had not voted at the first meeting.

COMPENSATION TO DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 25, 1796.

Mr. KITTERA, from the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States transmitting a letter from the Attorney General, relative to compensation to the attorneys of the United States, in the several districts, made the following report:

That it appears to your committee that those attorneys are men of the first reputation for talents and integrity, employed in a lucrative profession, who are always consulted by the officers of the revenue, in every difficult case that arises in the discharge of their duty; for which services no compensation is allowed by law.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be allowed to the district attorneys of the United States, in addition to the fees to which they are by law entitled, the following yearly salaries, to wit: to the district attorneys of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, respectively. To the district attorneys of New Hampshire, Maine, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Georgia, and Kentucky, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, respectively; and to the district attorney of Vermont, the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 21, 1796.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom was committed the memorial of the commissioners appointed under the "Act establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," and to whom also was referred that part of the President's speech relating to a national university, reported the following resolution:

That it is expedient, at present, that authority should be given, as prayed for by the said memorial, to proper persons to receive and hold in trust pecuniary donations, in aid of the appropriations already made, towards the establishment of a university within the District of Columbia.

To the honorable the Congress of the United States of America: The commissioners appointed under the act entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," respectfully represent:

That the institution of a national university within the United States has been the subject of much conversation; that all men seem to agree in the utility of the measure, but that no effectual means have hitherto been proposed to accomplish it; that recent transactions seem to call upon them, in a more particular manner than on their fellow-citizens at large, to promote this desirable object: they therefore take the liberty to state that, after the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States was located by the President, agreeably to the act of Congress above mentioned, the proprietors of the lands adjacent to, and including the sites designated for the public buildings, ceded a large territory for the purpose of a federal city, and by their deeds of cession authorized the President of the United States for the time being to appropriate such portions thereof as he should judge necessary to public use. In virtue of this power the President has appropriated nineteen acres one rood and twenty-one perches, part of the land so ceded, for the site of a national university. That he has likewise declared to them his intention to grant, in perpetuity, fifty shares in the navigation of the Potomac river, as soon as the system assumes a shape which will enable him to do it with effect; and that they have no doubt, when that event shall take place, but many other liberal donations will be made, as well in Europe as in America; that the money actually paid on those fifty shares is five thousand pounds sterling; that the navigation is now nearly completed; and that all who are acquainted with the river Potomac and the adjacent country are sensible that the produce of those shares will be very great. They do not think it necessary to dilate on a subject, in respect to which there seems to be but one voice. The preservation of the morals and of the political principles of our youth; the saving of the expense of foreign education; the drawing to our shores the youth of other countries, particularly those attached to republican government; and the proportionate accession of wealth, the removal, or at least the diminution, of those local prejudices which at present exist in the several States, by the uniformity of education and the opportunity of a free interchange of sentiments and information among the youth from all the various parts of the Union, which would consequently take place, may, with certainty, be accounted among the benefits resulting from such an institution. We flatter ourselves it is only necessary to bring this subject within the view of the Federal Legislature. We think you will eagerly seize the occasion to extend to it your patronage, to give birth to an institution which may perpetuate and endear your names to the latest posterity.

How far it would be proper to go, at the present moment, we presume not to determine; but would beg leave to observe that, although the ultimate organization of the institution may be postponed to a future period, when the means of establishing and supporting it shall be more fully ascertained, yet much good will arise from a law authorizing proper persons to receive pecuniary donations and to hold estates, real and personal, which may be granted by deed, or devised by last will and testament, for the use of the intended establishment, with proper regulations for securing the due application of the moneys paid. Without some provisions of that kind (to the establishing of which we consider the Federal Legislature alone competent) the benevolent wishes of the virtuous and well-disposed will be rendered abortive.

Having performed what a sense of duty strongly impressed upon us to perform, we, with great respect, submit the consideration of the premises to your honorable body, with this further observation: that the relative state of Europe and America seems to render this a favorable era for the commencement of such a work. Whether the flames of war shall long continue to rage within the bounds of the former, or whether they shall be extinguished by a speedy peace, the learned and the wealthy in those unfortunate regions will seek an asylum from future oppressions in our more happy country; many of whom will, no doubt, be among the foremost to promote those useful arts, the benefits of which they so well understand.

PROMOTION OF AGRICULTURE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 11, 1797.

Mr. SWIFT, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's speech which relates to the promotion of agriculture, made the following report:

That the encouragement of agriculture is an object highly worthy the public attention, as it constitutes the most useful employment of our citizens, is the basis of manufactures and commerce, and is the richest source of national wealth and prosperity. The present situation of the United States opens the fairest prospect to agricultural improvements, and invites the attention of the Legislature to so interesting and important an object. The lands are usually divided among the citizens into farms of an extent convenient and suitable for cultivation; and the cultivators are generally absolute proprietors of the soil, free from the heavy burden of tithes, and the slavish appendages of the feudal tenure, which, in many countries, have operated as a great discouragement to agriculture. The exclusive right to enjoy the advantages resulting from agricultural improvements will be the strongest inducement to introduce and adopt them. These peculiar privileges, superior to any other nation, render it probable that, by proper attention from the Government, agriculture in America will improve with greater celerity, and arrive to higher perfection, than has yet been known in any other country.

On a view of the state of agriculture in the United States, it will be found that, though it has made very considerable progress in some parts, yet there are many important principles and valuable improvements, known and practised in other countries, to which most of the American farmers and planters are utter strangers. It may, also, with propriety be remarked, that the science of agriculture is in its infancy, and is susceptible of much greater improvement than it has yet received in any country. These circumstances, while they claim the attention of Government, open to the Legislature a new field for the exercise of the power intrusted to them, in which they have the fairest prospect of promoting the public good. To introduce into our own the improvements of other countries, and to lay the foundation for discoveries which shall essentially contribute to the happiness of mankind, is an object worthy the attention of the Legislature of a free people.

The only method which a Government can with propriety adopt, to promote agricultural improvement, is to furnish the cultivators of the soil with the easiest means of acquiring the best information respecting the culture and management of their farms, and to excite a general spirit of inquiry, industry, and experiment. This object can be best attained by the institution of societies for the encouragement of agriculture and internal improvement; a practice which has been already sanctioned by the experience of other countries.

Societies have been established in many parts of the United States, but are on too limited a scale to answer the great national purpose of agricultural improvement throughout the United States; it is, therefore, necessary that a society should be established, under the patronage of the General Government, which should extend its influence through the whole country, and comprehend the extensive object of national improvement.

It is believed that very essential advantages would be derived from such an institution. While it excites a general spirit of inquiry, it will awaken the attention and animate the exertions of the State societies, as well as encourage new associations, by extending the means of increasing their knowledge. It will be a common centre to unite all the institutions in the United States, and will strengthen the bond of union; it will be a deposite to receive and preserve all the discoveries and improvements which shall be made by the experiments of individuals or societies in every part of the world; whence the result of the whole, after it has been digested by the society, may be disseminated throughout the United States, and every part of the country become acquainted with the best mode of husbandry. Hence, all improvements of a superior nature introduced into any part of the Union might, in a short time, become common to the whole; while, by the ordinary course of things, ages would be requisite to extend agricultural improvements from one end of the continent to the other.

By the instrumentality of such a society, the different parts of the Union might become better acquainted with each other, and the culture of such productions might be introduced as would best suit the different climates, and be best calculated for exchange, whereby the progress of that domestic commerce might be greatly accelerated, which, at no distant period, will, in all probability, be far more valuable than foreign commerce. In the United States is found that variety of soil and climate which will furnish to the citizens all the necessaries and most of the luxuries of life, independent of foreign countries; and the interchange of them will be a permanent source of national wealth and prosperity.

Such a society, by proposing honorary rewards or pecuniary premiums for valuable discoveries and experiments, might excite a general spirit of improvement in the country, and, by the exhibition of specimens of culture, might promote and extend their adoption. Gentlemen of science and fortune, concerned in farming, would be ambitious to make experiments when there was a society to which they might communicate their discoveries, and by the instrumentality of which they might be rendered a public advantage. Their example would be imitated and their improvements adopted by those in their vicinity who wanted the pecuniary means or the enterprising spirit necessary for a course of experiments, and in this way all valuable improvements might easily be spread through the country.

Through the medium of such a society there might be obtained, from time to time, a complete statistical survey of the United States, which would furnish to the Legislature that minute information respecting the state of every part of the country, which would enable them to pass laws most conducive to the public good.

In the present state of the finances, it is necessary to adopt such principles in the institution of the society as will not create an inconvenient expense. It is believed that no provision from the public Treasury need be made, excepting for the salary of a secretary and for stationary, which will not be sufficient to constitute any objection to the institution. But if the state of the Treasury should render this unadvisable, it is beyond a doubt that the institution might be supported without any public pecuniary aid.

The committee have thought proper to present to the House the outlines of such an institution, to explain its principles and object.

That a society for the promotion of agriculture be established at the seat of the Government of the United States, to be denominated

The American Society of Agriculture.

1. That the society shall be composed of the members of the Legislature of the United States, of the judges of the Supreme Court; of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and War, and the Attorney General; and of such members as shall be appointed in the manner hereafter provided, not exceeding —.

2. That there shall be an annual meeting of the society at the seat of Government, on the — day of —; and the society may, by a major vote, adjourn from time to time, as they shall see proper.

3. That the society, at their annual meeting, shall have power to choose a president, a secretary, and a treasurer, and also a board of thirty members belonging to the society, to be called the Board of Agriculture.

4. That the society shall be a body corporate, capable of holding property, not exceeding the annual value of —, and shall have power to establish such by-laws and regulations as may be necessary for the well ordering and government of the same, and to do all acts proper and necessary to be done, to promote the object of the institution; they may encourage experiments and discoveries, by honorary rewards; they may take the necessary measures to obtain a statistical survey of the United States; they shall have power to elect members, and supply vacancies; they may elect honorary members, residing in foreign countries, not exceeding —.

5. That the Board of Agriculture shall be chosen annually by the society, not to exceed thirty, and the president of the society shall be president of the board. There shall be an annual meeting of the board on the — day of —, and ten members shall constitute a sufficient number to transact business. The board may adjourn from time to time, and may hold special meetings, on notice from the president. It shall be the duty of the board to perform such services as shall be assigned to them by the society pursuant to the powers vested in them; they shall take proper measures to obtain information of the state of agriculture in the United States; they may correspond with and receive communications from similar institutions in foreign countries, and in the United States, as well as from private associations and individuals; and for that purpose, they may appoint a committee of their own board. They shall cause to be published the result of all the information, experiments, and discoveries, which shall be communicated to them; and shall distribute the same throughout the United States, in such manner as they shall judge best calculated to promote the public good.

6. The president, at each annual meeting, shall lay before the society the state thereof, with an account of all important discoveries and improvements that may have been made in the course of the year, and of the measures that shall have been taken to promote the object of the institution.

7. The secretary shall record the doings of the society and board, and shall perform such other duty as may be assigned to him by the board, relative to the selecting, digesting, and preparing for publication any papers that may be communicated to the society.

8. That all communications to the society or board, or from them, on the subject of agriculture, shall be free from postage.

The committee submit to the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That a society, for the promotion of agriculture, ought to be established at the seat of the Government of the United States.

KIDNAPPING.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 18, 1797.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the report made by the said committee, on the subject of kidnapping negroes and mulattoes, made the following report:

That having taken into consideration the propriety of this House interfering as to the business of kidnapping negroes and mulattoes, they are of opinion that it will be best to leave any provisions to be made on this subject to the Legislatures of the several States, apprehending considerable inconveniences from any general regulations being adopted on this subject, the local circumstances of several of the States being considered; they therefore recommend to the House to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient for this House to interfere with any existing laws of the States on this subject.

SUABILITY OF STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 21, 1797.

Mr. HARPER made the following report:

The committee to whom was recommitted their report on a resolution from the Senate, providing "that the President be requested to adopt some speedy and effectual means of obtaining information from the States of Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and South Carolina, whether they have ratified the amendment proposed by Congress to the constitution respecting the suability of States; if they have, to obtain the proper evidences thereof;" having taken the matter of the said resolution into consideration, beg leave to report:

That on the 4th day of March, 1789, the United States then being thirteen in number, twelve amendments to the constitution were proposed by Congress to the several States.

That from authentic documents laid before Congress, the last ten of those amendments appear to have been ratified, in the course of the years 1789 and 1790, by nine States out of the then thirteen, viz: New Jersey, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Delaware, New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island; which number not being three-fourths of the then existing States, those ten amendments, or any of them, did not then become parts of the constitution.

That on the 4th of March, 1791, the State of Vermont was admitted into the Union; whereby the number of States was augmented to fourteen.

That after this augmentation, and in the course of the year 1791, the said ten amendments were ratified by Virginia and Vermont, which raised the number of ratifying States to eleven. In the opinion of the committee a doubt may arise whether this ought to be considered as three-fourths of fourteen, the number of States at that time; and, consequently, whether those ten amendments then became part of the constitution. They do not appear to have been ratified, as yet, by any other State.

The committee further find that by virtue of a law of Congress, passed February 4th, 1791, the State of Kentucky was admitted into the Union on the 1st of June, 1792; and the whole number of States having since that time been augmented to sixteen, by the admission of Tennessee, on the 1st of June, 1796, the ratification of one State more is necessary, and would be sufficient to remove all doubts on the subject of the ten amendments now under consideration. The States by which none of them appear to have been ratified are, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Georgia, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

It further appears, from the documents above referred to, that the first of the above-mentioned twelve amendments was ratified before the admission of Vermont, by seven States—New Jersey, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, New Hampshire, New York, and Rhode Island; which being less than three-fourths of the then number of States, this amendment did not then become part of the constitution. After the admission of Vermont, and before that of Kentucky, it was ratified by the three States of Pennsylvania, Vermont, and Virginia. This brings the number of ratifying States to ten; which being less than three-fourths of fourteen, the whole number of States at that time, the amendment in question did not then become part of the constitution. It does not appear to have been since ratified by any State; and as the whole number is now sixteen, the ratification of two is still necessary. Those by which it does not appear to have been ratified are, Massachusetts, Delaware, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Georgia.

From the documents already cited, it appears that the second of the above-mentioned twelve amendments was ratified in the course of the years 1789 and 1790, by five States only, viz: New Jersey, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Delaware. In the year 1791, (but subsequently to the admission of Vermont,) this amendment was ratified by two States, Virginia and Vermont. It does not appear to have been ratified since by any other State, so that it has not yet become a part of the constitution; the ratification of five States being still wanting for that purpose. The States by which it does not appear to have been ratified are, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Georgia.

The committee think it proper to state, that six States, New Jersey, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and Vermont, have ratified the whole twelve amendments in question: that New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania have ratified all except the second; that Delaware has ratified all except the first; and that none of them appear, by the documents laid before Congress, to have been ratified by Massachusetts, Connecticut, Tennessee, or Georgia.

That in the month of June, 1794, the amendment respecting the suability of States was proposed to the States, which, as appears by authentic documents laid before Congress, has been ratified in the years 1794 and 1795 by eight States, viz: Rhode Island, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Delaware, North Carolina, and Georgia. This being four less than three-fourths of the States now composing the Union, this amendment does not appear, from any documents heretofore transmitted, to have become a part of the constitution. The committee, however, find strong reasons to believe that some States have ratified the amendment in question, from whom no official or authentic notification of the fact has yet been received.

As to the resolution proposed by the Senate on this subject, the committee conceive it to be perfectly proper as far as it goes; but it is confined to one amendment only; and as it is possible that some, if not all of the others, may have been ratified by States which have as yet furnished no authentic information of the matter, they apprehend that the measure should be extended to all the amendments which have been proposed: they therefore recommend that the resolution sent from the Senate be rejected, and that which follows be adopted in its stead, viz:

Resolved, That the President be requested to apply, as speedily as may be, to all those States by which, as far as can be known from the official documents heretofore transmitted, all or any of the amendments at any time proposed by Congress still remain to be ratified; and to obtain from them authentic information of the proceedings had by them, respectively, on the subject of those amendments, or any of them.

INQUIRY INTO THE OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF A JUDGE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 27, 1797.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of George Turner, together with the petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of St. Clair, in the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and the report of the Attorney General thereon,* made the following report:

That the petition of the said inhabitants, charging the said George Turner with divers illegal and oppressive acts in the execution of his office, as one of the judges of the said territory, was referred last session to the Attorney General, who then reported to the House that most of those charges were of so serious a nature as to require a regular and fair examination in some judicial course of proceeding, and that if Judge Turner should be convicted thereof, a removal from office might and ought to be part of the punishment; and gave it as his opinion, for the reasons set forth in his report, that a prosecution therefor should not be carried on by way of impeachment, but by way of information and indictment before the supreme court of that territory, which he conceived to be competent to the trial; and therein further informed the House that, in consequence of affidavits stating complaints against Judge Turner of oppressions and gross violations of private property, under color of his office, then lately transmitted to the President, the Secretary of State had been by him instructed to give orders to Governor St. Clair to take the necessary measures to bring that officer to a fair trial respecting those charges before the court of that territory, according to the law of the land; which course the Attorney General also recommended to the House to be pursued relative to the matters charged in the said petition.

Your committee are of opinion that the mode of prosecution recommended by the Attorney General will afford Judge Turner a fair opportunity of defending himself against said charges, and will be for the mutual ease and convenience of both parties, and, for the reasons given in the Attorney General's report, is preferable to a prosecution by way of impeachment. And as your committee have been assured by the Secretary of State that orders should be forthwith transmitted to Governor St. Clair for taking the measures aforesaid, they are of opinion that it is not expedient to take any further order respecting the petition of the said inhabitants, and the memorial of the said Judge Turner, praying to be heard upon the subject thereof, till the effect of such measures shall be known.

APPLICATION FOR A DISCHARGE FROM IMPRISONMENT, AT THE SUIT OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 3, 1797.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Rittenhouse, made the following report:

That the petitioner states that he is confined in prison for a debt due to the United States, under process from the district courts of Pennsylvania; that he has surrendered all his estate to the generality of his creditors, and obtained a certificate of insolvency, and is unable to pay said debt; that he has applied to the district judge of Pennsylvania, pursuant to the act entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," who was of opinion that, as he was a debtor to the United States, and confined under mesne process, and not under execution, the law did not extend to him.

The committee find that said Rittenhouse, about the time said suit was brought against him in favor of the United States, transferred all his estate to his father; and, after having made a fallacious return of outstanding debts to assignees, none of which were recoverable, he obtained a discharge, under the insolvent laws of the State of Pennsylvania, from his private creditors. The committee are of opinion that the transference of the whole of his estate by said Rittenhouse to his father was an act of injustice, not only to his private creditors but to the United States, and was calculated to defeat the United States of that priority of payment to which they are entitled; and that the granting of relief in this case would establish a principle that would wholly destroy the law of the United States, which directs that, in all cases of insolvency, the debts due to the United States shall be first satisfied. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petition of Joseph Rittenhouse ought not to be granted.

CONTESTED ELECTION OF DANIEL MORGAN, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM VIRGINIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 4, 1797.

Mr. CORT, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred, on the 29th ultimo, the memorial of Robert Rutherford, of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election and return of Daniel Morgan to serve in this House, as a member for the said State, made the following report:

That the committee have examined the proofs adduced by the memorialist, and are of opinion that they are wholly insufficient to support the allegations contained in the said memorial.

1. That the evidence to be taken in the case of the contested election for the district of Frederick and Berkeley counties, in the State of Virginia, on the memorial of Robert Rutherford, shall be taken in Frederick county, before Meredith Nelm, Abraham Neil, Hugh Holmes, Thomas Massey, Robert Page, Thomas Parker, William Hickman, Solomon Vanmeter, and Hezekiah Turner, Esquires, or either of them; and in Berkely county before Robert Stephens, Joseph Swearingen, John Turner, Abraham Shepherd, George Cunningham, Andrew Waggener, William Henshaw, Elisha Boyd, and William Leman, Esquires, or either of them.
2. That the said commissioners give a notice of at least ten days of the times and places, in each county, at which evidence shall be taken as aforesaid; that the parties or their attorneys may attend with their witnesses, at the appointed times and places; that they may put cross interrogatories, if they think fit; and that when the evidence shall be completed, the commissioner or commissioners who shall attend transmit the several depositions, or other written evidence or documents sealed up by him or them, and directed to the Committee of Elections.
3. Every person deposing shall be sworn or affirmed to testify the whole truth, and shall subscribe the testimony given, after the same shall be reduced to writing, which shall be done only by the commissioner or commissioners taking the deposition, or by the deponent in his or their presence.
4. That no written evidence shall be admitted, which shall be taken prior to the first day of September, or subsequent to the twentieth day of October next.
5. That notice shall be given by the petitioner to the sitting member, at least ten days before the taking of any testimony of the names of the several persons, against the legality of whose votes he means to object; and in like manner, notice shall be given by the sitting member, if he means to take evidence against the legality of any of the votes given for the petitioner.
6. The testimony to be taken by the petitioner is to be confined to the facts stated in the specification by him handed to the committee, which is in the words following, viz:

PHILADELPHIA, May 22, 1797.

"Robert Rutherford, of the State of Virginia, having presented his memorial to Congress on Friday, the 19th day of May, 1797, complaining of an undue election in the return of General Morgan, which memorial was referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections; and the committee requiring that the several objections in the memorial should be more specifically pointed out, the said Robert Rutherford therefore states:

"That great numbers of illegal and improper votes were given in favor of General Morgan, at Winchester, in the State of Virginia, on Monday, the 20th day of March, 1797; many of these unlawful votes were given by persons resident in adjacent counties, and who had not the right of suffrage, in Frederick county, one of the two counties composing the district; namely, William Palmer, and other inhabitants of the county of Loudoun.

"That the illegal and improper votes, thus given at Winchester aforesaid, in favor of General Morgan, were more in number than the majority by which he was returned as a member to represent the district composed of the counties of Frederick and Berkely, in the said State of Virginia.

"That money was given or promised by General Morgan, or his friends, for meat, drink, wagon-hire, and other acts of bribery and corruption.

"That the friends of Robert Rutherford, who came to the election with intention to vote for the said Rutherford, did, nevertheless, return to their respective homes, without giving their suffrages, discouraged or disheartened as they were by the great number of unlawful votes in favor of General Morgan, or reluctant to enter into a crowd of men heated by feasting and carousals.

"That in one of the counties composing the district, and where order and regularity were observed, the suffrages were decidedly in favor of Robert Rutherford, well nigh or quite double the number of votes in favor of General Morgan.

"That the election law of Virginia was violated by treats, &c. Robert Rutherford, therefore, prays that the committee may not narrow or circumscribe the powers of the commissioners to be appointed so as to prevent an investigation of facts, in support of justice and truth, as the case may appear to them necessary and right."

DEBATES OF CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 6, 1797.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Carpenter, made the following report:

The memorialist states that he, some time ago, undertook the publication of a work entitled "The American Senator," and containing an account of the debates and proceedings of Congress; but that the number of subscribers has not been sufficient to enable him to carry it on. He therefore prays the patronage of the House, and proposes that it should order each member to be furnished, at public expense, with three copies, which, calculating the session at eighteen weeks, he supposes would not amount to more than $2,350 annually.

It appears that, about two years ago, a subject analogous to the present was brought under the consideration of Congress, and in a form the committee conceives to have been far more advisable. It was then proposed to engage a stenographer, a person of known and considerable abilities, who, assisted by proper clerks, and aided by all the papers of the House, should report the debates and proceedings, and publish them from day to day in the newspapers. In this way the House and its members would have had a more complete control over the publication, better and more early opportunities would have been afforded for correcting any errors, and the reports appearing in the newspapers from day to day would have been far more useful and satisfactory than in the mode now suggested. The publication of these reports in a volume, at the end of the session, would have answered equally the purpose of preserving them; and the expense proposed, even if expense in a case of this kind were a more important consideration than the committee take it to be, would have been nearly the same. This plan, however, after mature discussion, was discountenanced and finally dropped. The committee can perceive no reason why it should be more eligible now than it then was; and, were it proper for the House to adopt any measure of this nature, they are of opinion that the one proposed by the memorialist is wholly inadmissible; since by it the House, at a very considerable expense, would give its sanction to a publication not under its control, and which, appearing in the first instance in the form of a volume, could answer little purpose of general information, and would be little susceptible of correction.

The committee are therefore of opinion that the plan proposed by the memorialist ought not to be agreed to; and they beg leave, accordingly, to submit to the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the said Thomas Carpenter have leave to withdraw his memorial.

EVIDENCE IN CASES OF CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 15, 1797.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee to whom were recommitted certain resolutions respecting the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections, with instructions to take the matter of those resolutions generally into their consideration, and report their opinion thereon to the House, having carefully examined the subject, made the following report:

The subject contemplated by these resolutions naturally presents itself under two points of view: the inconveniences resulting from the want of permanent regulations, and the difficulties which stand in the way of their establishment.

These inconveniences have been felt and complained of, from the commencement of the Government till the present day; and they must continually augment with the natural increase of those causes which give rise to contests in elections, while their pressure will become more and more heavy as the progress of population on the frontiers shall add new and more remote districts to the Union. They have been so frequently experienced, and are so universally admitted, that a particular enumeration of them does not appear necessary.

These inconveniences, the committee suppose, may, in a very considerable degree, be avoided by the establishment of some permanent regulations respecting evidence in cases of contested elections. As to the difficulties which oppose themselves to the adoption of such regulations, they have been considered by the committee under a two-fold point of view: first, as respects the powers of one House of Representatives to establish rules binding upon future Houses; and, secondly, as respects the propriety of permitting the other branches of the Legislature to interfere, even in the most indirect manner, in the trial of contested elections for the House of Representatives, to which the sole decision, in such cases, is referred by the constitution.

It is said that if resolutions merely are adopted, they can last no longer than the House which made them, and, consequently, cannot be permanent. It is said that such resolutions, even could they be permanent, could confer no power to compel the attendance of witnesses before the persons authorized to take examinations, without which the whole process would be imperfect and ineffectual; and that this object cannot be accomplished without a law. It is said that to pass a law, by the consequences of which the decision of contested elections might be effected, would be to give the other branches of the Legislature a control over objects which the principles of the constitution, no less than its express directions, require to be confined exclusively to the House itself. It is said, in fine, that such a law, even if permitted by the constitution, would be ineffectual, because it could enact no sanctions under which the admission of testimony, taken pursuant to its directions, could be enforced on any future House of Representatives.

Upon a careful review of these various objections, it has appeared to the committee that the most proper and most effectual method of establishing permanent regulations on this subject, if not the only practicable method, would be to pass a law for that purpose; nor do they consider as well founded the objections which are urged against that measure.

The constitution does, indeed, provide that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." But the committee conceive that to pass a law for the object in question, far from admitting the other branches of the Legislature to a participation in the peculiar powers of the House, would be, in effect, to call in the aid of the whole Legislature for enabling the House to exercise those powers in a manner more complete and effectual.

As to the objection that such a law could enact no sanctions by which the admission of testimony, taken in pursuance of its provisions, could be enforced on any future House of Representatives, the committee do not consider it as of sufficient weight to prevent the adoption of the measure, even the utility of which they do not suppose would be in any considerable degree diminished by this objection.

The proper and the only necessary functions of such a law would be to prescribe the mode in which testimony should be taken, and to grant powers for compelling the attendance of witnesses. Whether testimony thus obtained should be admitted in any particular case, or whether further testimony should be required, must depend on the decision of that House before which such case should come for discussion; and it would be in the power of each House, at the commencement of its first session, to adopt a rule declaring that, in all cases of contested elections to come before it, testimony taken pursuant to such law should be received. This, it is presumable, would be done, and would gradually grow into a constant and well known regulation, to which all persons engaged in contested elections might with safety conform. It would still be in the power of each House to refrain from passing such a resolution, and to reject the testimony; but it ought not to be presumed that, when the mode should have been perfected by experience, and become generally known, testimony fairly taken in conformity to it would be rejected. On the contrary, there would be a strong and well-founded presumption that such testimony would be received; and this presumption, joined to the aid which the law would afford in compelling witnesses to attend, would enable persons concerned in contested elections to come at first duly prepared for the trial, while the constitutional rights of each House would be saved by its power to adopt or reject the rule for the admission of the testimony.

To adopt this rule at the beginning of each Congress, before it should be known to what particular cases it was to apply, would, moreover, preclude those inconveniences which result from the discussion of general principles in connexion with particular cases.

Conformably to these ideas, the committee recommend that a law be passed prescribing the mode in which, and the persons before whom, testimony in cases of contested elections for this House shall be taken, and giving power to compel the attendance of witnesses for that purpose. The details of this law, they apprehend, will appear best in a bill; but, not being authorized to report in that form, they forbear at present to enter into those details, and confine themselves to the following resolutions, which they present for the consideration of the House, to wit:

Resolved, That it is expedient to make provision, by law, for taking evidence in contested elections for the House of Representatives, and for compelling the attendance of witnesses in such cases.

Resolved, That the committee have leave to bring in a bill pursuant to the foregoing resolution.

APPLICATION FOR A DISCHARGE FROM IMPRISONMENT AT THE SUIT OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 4, 1798.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of William Bell, made the following report:

That he is confined in the jail of the city and county of Philadelphia, at the suit of the United States, on a custom-house bond executed by him for duties on goods imported by one Joseph Rittenhouse, who, as he says, induced him to become principal in the bond, contrary to his intentions. This circumstance, (on which, together with his poverty and good character, the petitioner relies for relief,) is not a sufficient ground for the interposition of legislative aid; for the committee believe that, whether principal or surety only, he is equally bound to pay the debt.

But having been well informed that the petitioner was extremely poor, they directed their inquiries to the operation of the act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, passed the 28th May, 1796, supposing the provisions of that law were competent to the petitioner's relief. On inquiry, however, they found that various opinions were entertained, by different judicial officers of the United States, on the subject; some of them construing the law to extend to debtors of the United States, others confining it solely to the case of individuals. In order to obtain the most precise information on this point, the committee directed a letter to be written to the Attorney General of the United States, which, with his answer, are annexed to this report.

Upon consideration of all the circumstances stated in this report, your committee think it would not be advisable to pass any law explanatory of the act before cited, until a judicial decision of the Supreme Court shall make it necessary; nor can they recommend any special interference in a law of individual insolvency.

They are therefore of opinion that the petitioner cannot obtain the relief he desires, and that he have leave to withdraw his petition.

Sir:

I am directed, by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to request your opinion on the construction of the act of Congress "for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," passed the 28th of May, 1796. The point they wish to have determined, is, whether the relief contemplated by this act can be extended to persons imprisoned in civil causes, at the suit of the United States. You will much oblige the committee by giving your opinion of the true construction of the law, and also by mentioning such decisions thereon as have come to your knowledge; it having been intimated to the committee that different determinations have taken place on this subject, by the judges of different districts.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

EDWARD LIVINGSTON.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, December 21, 1797.

SIR:

I have considered the question proposed in the letter which I had the honor to receive from you as chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, bearing date the 29th of November.

It is my opinion that the act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, passed on the 28th day of May, 1796, extends as to persons imprisoned in civil causes, at the suit of the United States, as to other prisoners in civil causes.

In Great Britain, the King in some instances is not bound by the general words of a statute, unless he be expressly named. These instances are where his prerogative would be impaired or divested by the general words; and the correct rule is, that general words, in an act of Parliament, bind the King, though not expressly named, unless his prerogative is touched, and all his other rights are to be no more favored than the rights of his subjects. For this let me refer you to 8 Mod. 8, King vs. Bishop of Armagh; Dyer, 250; Cro. Eliz. 500; 2 Inst. 191.

Every statute for the advancement of justice, &c. shall bind the ordinary right of the King, by general words, as well as the right of the subject.—2 Inst. 681; 5 Rep. 14; 11 Rep. 66. The right of the King to arrest the body of his debtor, till his debt is paid, is of the ordinary kind; the like right is possessed by the subject also. The same reason exists, in both cases, for this proceeding. But the King is entitled to a priority of payment, which is a part of his prerogative, and founded on the preference due to the public treasury before any private interest; yet, to discharge a debtor from jail, who has no sort of property, cannot interfere with this prerogative. In such a case there can be no priority in payment, because there is nothing to be paid. Thus, if this reasoning be just, an act of Parliament, similar to the act of May 28, 1796, would bind the King, though not expressly named. It is true the bankrupt laws of England, though the words are general, do not bind the King, and for this reason—that the debtor's estates, after assignment, are to be applied to all creditors alike, which distribution would interfere with the King's prerogative right of priority; and his prerogatives, as I have before remarked, cannot be abridged but by express words. This is not like our insolvent law, which can operate in no case where the debtor has any property of greater value than thirty dollars, or sufficient to pay the debt for which he is imprisoned.

Again, it may be observed that a statute in some cases binds the King, though not named.—2 Inst. 142, 169. And, if in any case, surely the general words of a statute in favor of personal liberty ought to bind the King, though not named.

The statute 32 Hen. VIII. ch. 28, binds the King, though not named, because its object is to suppress wrong, and to give a speedier remedy.—2 Inst. 681. A fortiori, a statute in favor of releasing from perpetual imprisonment an insolvent citizen ought to bind, by its general words, the sovereign as well as the subject.

These arguments, if used on a question of this sort in Great Britain, would in my judgment be decisive there; and they seem to me to have even more weight when applied in this country, where a priority of payment has been established by law, and not considered as a right belonging to the United States as a sovereign prerogative. If the sovereign power of the United States possess certain rights different from the rights of individual citizens, they must be of a nature essential to the care or promotion of the public good. Surely it will not be contended that the right to imprison forever an insolvent debtor is of this kind. Our law gives to the United States a priority of payment before other creditors; but, construing the act of the 28th May, 1796, to include the United States as well as individuals within its general words, does not interfere with their right of priority, as has been already shown; nor does it interfere with any right of sovereignty vested in the United States, or any right essential or contributory to the national good, which they should possess.

I have been the more full on this subject, because I have heard of one instance where an adjudication contrary to this opinion has been given. I have been told that Judge Peters, in the case of one Rittenhouse, who was a prisoner in a civil cause at the suit of the United States, refused to administer the oath of an insolvent to him, on the ground that the act did not bind the United States, they not being expressly named in it. It is probable the subject was not investigated at that time. However that may be, for the reasons before stated, I cannot concur in opinion with the learned judge.

I beg leave to refer the committee to a report of the Attorney General on Mackey's petition to Congress, in the winter of 1796, which suggested the act of 28th May, 1796, as containing some observations connected with the subject now under consideration.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES LEE.

To EDWARD LIVINGSTON, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

P. S. The foregoing I submitted to the district attorney for Pennsylvania, whose opinion deserves much respect; and it becomes my duty to mention that we do not concur. By mandamus the law may be settled in February.

REVISION OF THE ACT FOR THE RELIEF OF PERSONS IMPRISONED FOR DEBT.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 18, 1798.

UNITED STATES, January 18, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

A representation has been made to me by the judge of the Pennsylvania district of the United States, of certain inconveniences and disagreeable circumstances which have occurred in the execution of the law passed on the twenty-eighth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," as well as of certain doubts which have been raised concerning its construction. This representation, together with the report of the Attorney General on the same subject, I now transmit to Congress for their consideration, that if any amendments or explanations of that law should be thought advisable, they may be adopted.

JOHN ADAMS.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, January 8, 1798.

From motives of humanity towards the objects of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," I have, under several disagreeable circumstances, endeavored to carry that law into effect; but I find it deficient in many essential provisions. It is doubtful whether the district judge is vested with judicial powers, or those of a bankrupt commissioner. It should seem that judicial authority was not intended, as I can hardly suppose Congress meant to commit any part of the judiciary authority of the United States into a situation so inefficient and degrading. The proceedings are to be had within the walls of a prison, and the judge is to certify them to the jailer. In this district, where contracts are numerous, complicated, and extensive, it is impracticable to do business with propriety and effect in a jail. No record of the transactions is directed when the judge himself acts, though the law requires the commissioners appointed by him to return their doings to the district court. The judge has no authority to order the prisoner to be brought into a more fit and convenient place, nor to punish contempts or enforce orders; and if it be, as it appears, an extrajudicial transaction, it is doubtful whether persons, other than the debtor, taking false oaths, before either the judge or commissioners, can be punished for perjury. These are not all the defects of this law, but they are sufficient to show that it wants revision and correction.

There are some persons in the debtors' apartment of the city and county of Philadelphia, confined under process of the district court, for debts to the United States. I have been (after due investigation at the time, as the liberty of a citizen was in question) and am now of opinion, that debtors to the United States are not relievable under the act before mentioned. These debtors have been a long time confined. One of them before the last winter session of Congress. A learned law officer conceives that I ought to consider them as objects of the law; but another, whose opinion he is reminded by his duty to mention as deserving respect, does not concur with him. He proposes, instead of legislative explanations, that the question should be examined by mandamus. In the mean time these unhappy prisoners are the victims to a delay, which a few words in law would long ago have remedied, and will now further prevent. I mention this barely to show that the law is at least doubtful on this point. In my motives for executing this law, I choose to forget all questions about constitutional authority to compel a judge to perform extrajudicial duty.

The marshal of the district represents to me that there is no provision made for fuel and other necessaries for poor debtors confined by process of the courts of the United States. Witnesses are also confined in jail, to insure their appearance to give testimony, and suffer for want of provision adequate to their support.

I have deemed myself bound to make this representation to you, that no imputation may lie on me, if persons confined under the process of the courts of the United States suffer and continue in prison for want of provision for their release or support.

I have the honor to be, with sincere respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD PETERS,

Judge of the Pennsylvania district of the United States.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, January 10, 1798.

I have attentively considered the letter of the judge of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, dated the 8th instant, relative to the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," which he thinks deficient in many particulars.

1st. He states it as doubtful whether the act vested judicial power in the judge relative to the discharge of insolvents, and assigns for the reason of the doubt that the law requires the proceedings to be had in the jail, and certified to the jailer. This reason creates no doubt in my mind, for judicial authority may be exercised in any place appointed by law, and the certificate to the jailer is requisite to inform him whether the prisoner may be discharged as an insolvent, or is to remain in custody.

2d. The complaint against the law in requiring the judge to go to the jail, and there to execute the business, is well founded. It is unnecessarily degrading and troublesome, and must be very disagreeable. The act should be amended, by authorizing the judge to issue his warrant commanding the jailer to bring the prisoner before him, at some certain time and place to be named in the warrant, and authorizing any parties interested to obtain subpoenas for witnesses from the clerk of the court, requiring their attendance to give testimony then and there. Also in the great cities of Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Baltimore, and Charleston, the judge of the district should have power to appoint two commissioners to do this kind of business, when it shall be inconvenient to the district judge, by reason of other judicial occupations, absence, sickness, or other inability, to act.

3d. It is objected that the act does not require a record of the transactions when the judge himself acts. Certainly the proceedings ought to be recorded in the district court by the clerk of that court, whether done before the judge of the district court or commissioners, and so I understand the law as it now is; for though it does not expressly direct the judge, when he acts, to return his doings to the district court, yet it is implied, from the nature of a court of record, that whatever is judicially done by the court shall be recorded. However, this may be made plainer by an amendment.

4th. It is doubted whether witnesses taking false oaths before the commissioners are punishable for perjury; and considering the expressions of the act of Congress respecting perjury, there seems good cause for this doubt.

5th. It is represented that no provision is made for supplying necessaries to poor persons confined under execution as debtors, or confined as witnesses, to insure their appearance to testify. This defect should be supplied.

6th. A difference of opinion is entertained whether the act before mentioned comprehends debtors to the United States or not. On this question, and on this alone, a committee of Congress applied lately to me for my opinion, which I sent, and of which I take the liberty to transmit the enclosed copy. As I think the fewer the laws the better, if competent to the purpose of society, I deem it advisable to avoid every unnecessary multiplication of legislative acts. If this was the only objection or doubt in the law now under consideration, it might wait for a judicial decision in the Supreme Court; but, as in other respects the law is capable of essential amendments, it will be best that the attention of Congress be called to the whole subject.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to remain, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

CHARLES LEE.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 102.

[2d SESSION.]

LAWS OF NORTH CAROLINA RELATIVE TO FREE NEGROES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 29, 1798.

Mr. SITGREAVES, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial and address of the people called Quakers, from their yearly meeting, held in Philadelphia, in the month of September last, made the following report:

That, inasmuch as the said memorial and address present, in general terms only, certain subjects to the consideration of the Legislature, without containing any definite state of facts, or any specific application for its interposition, the memorialists were desired to exhibit a particular view of the grievances of which they complained, in order that the attention of the House might be directed to precise objects, and that it might be better discerned whether the complaints of the memorialists were of a nature to justify legislative interference:

That, in consequence of this request, the memorialists laid before the committee the representation and documents which accompany this report:

That, on the subject of this representation, the memorialists were invited to confer with the committee, and were solicited to suggest the remedy which they conceived it to be in the power of Congress to apply to the case as stated by them:

That the committee, after several conferences with the memorialists, and an attentive consideration of the subject, are very clearly of opinion that the facts disclosed in the said representation are exclusively of judicial cognizance; and that it is not competent to the legislative authority of Congress to do any act in relation to the matter thereof.

Wherefore, the committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorialists have leave to withdraw the said memorial and address.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled: The memorial and address of the people called Quakers, from their yearly meeting, held in Philadelphia, by adjournment, from the 25th of the 9th month, to the 29th of the same, inclusive, 1797, respectfully sheweth:

That being convened, at our annual solemnity, for the promotion of the cause of truth and righteousness, we have been favored to experience religious weight to attend our minds, and an anxious desire to follow after those things which make for peace. Among other investigations, the oppressed state of our brethren of the African race has been brought into view, and particularly the circumstances of one hundred and thirty-four in North Carolina, and many others whose cases have not so fully come to our knowledge, who were set free by members of our religious society, and again reduced into cruel bondage, under the authority of existing or retrospective laws; husbands, and wives, and children, separated one from another, which we apprehend to be an abominable tragedy; and, with other acts of a similar nature, practised in other States, has a tendency to bring down the judgments of a righteous God upon our land.

This city and neighborhood, and some other parts, have been visited with an awful calamity, which ought to excite an inquiry into the cause and endeavor to do away those things which occasion the heavy clouds that hang over us. It is easy with the Almighty to bring down the loftiness of men, by diversified judgments, and make them fear the rod, and him that hath appointed it.

We wish to revive in your view the solemn engagement of Congress, made in the year 1774, as follows:

“And therefore we do for ourselves, and the inhabitants of the several colonies, whom we represent, firmly agree and associate, under the sacred ties of virtue, honor, and love of our country, as follows:

“ART. 2. We will neither import nor purchase any slaves imported after the 1st day of December next; after which time we will wholly discontinue the slave trade; and will neither be concerned in it ourselves, nor will we hire our vessels, nor sell our commodities or manufactures to those who are concerned in it.”

“ART. 8. And will discountenance and discourage every species of extravagance and dissipation, especially all horse-racing, and all kinds of gaming, cock-fighting, exhibitions of shows, plays, and other expensive diversions and entertainments.”

This was a solemn league and covenant made with the Almighty in an hour of distress, and he is now calling upon you to perform and fulfil it. But how has this solemn covenant been contravened by the wrongs and cruelties practised upon the poor African race; the increase of dissipation and luxury, the countenance and encouragement given to play-houses, and other vain amusements! And how grossly is the Almighty affronted on the day of the celebration of independence! What rioting and drunkenness, chambering and wantonness! to the great grief of sober inhabitants, and the disgrace of our national character.

National evils produce national judgments; we therefore fervently pray the Governor of the universe may enlighten your understandings and influence your minds, so as to engage you to use every exertion in your power to have these things redressed.

With sincere desires for your happiness here and hereafter, and that when you come to close this life you may individually be able to appeal as a ruler did formerly—"Remember now, O Lord, I beseech thee, how I have walked before thee, in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight:"

We remain your friends and fellow-citizens.

Signed in and on behalf of the said meeting, by

JONATHAN EVANS,

Clerk to the meeting this year.

To the committee of Congress to whom was referred the memorial of the people called Quakers.

In the latter part of the year 1776, several of the people called Quakers, residing within the counties of Perquimons and Pasquotank, in the State of North Carolina, liberated their negroes; as it was then clear there was no existing law to prevent their so doing, for the law of 1741 could not, at that time, be carried into effect; and they were suffered to remain free until a law was passed in the spring of 1777, under which they were taken up and sold, contrary to the bill of rights recognised in the constitution of that State as a part thereof, and to which it was annexed.

In the spring of 1777, when the General Assembly met for the first time, a law was enacted to prevent slaves from being manumitted, except for meritorious services, &c., to be judged of by the county courts or the General Assembly; and ordering that, if any shall be manumitted in any other manner, they be taken up, and the county courts, within whose jurisdiction they are apprehended, order them to be sold. Under this law, the county courts of Perquimons and Pasquotank, in the year 1777, ordered a large number of persons to be sold who were free at the time the law was made. In the year 1778, several of those cases were, by certiorari, brought before the superior court for the district of Edenton, where the decisions of the county courts were reversed, the superior court declaring "that the said county courts, in such their proceedings, have exceeded their jurisdiction, violated the rights of the subjects, and acted in direct opposition to the bill of rights of this State, considered justly as part of the constitution thereof, by giving a law, not intended to affect this case, a retrospective operation; thereby to deprive free men of this State of their liberty contrary to the laws of the land."

In consequence of this decree, several of the negroes were again set at liberty, but the next General Assembly, early in 1779, passed a law, wherein they mention that doubts have arisen whether the purchasers of such slaves have a good and legal title thereto, and confirm the same, under which they were again taken up by the purchaser and reduced to slavery.

Being much affected with this enormity, we believed it right to spread it before you. We wish not to give unnecessary trouble, but being persuaded that righteousness exalteth a nation, and promotes the peace and happiness of the people, it is the fervent concern of our minds that it may more and more prevail; and having discharged our duty in this matter at this time, we leave the subject with you, and the event to Him who hath the hearts of all men in his hands; and are,

Respectfully, your friends,

Signed, on behalf of the committee of our yearly meeting:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA:

At a superior court of law, begun and held at the court-house in Edenton, for the district of Edenton, the first day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, before the honorable Samuel Ashe, Samuel Spence, and James Iredell, esquires, justices.

On motion of William Hooper, esquire, attorney at law, in behalf of the following negroes, viz: Glasgow, Tom, Susanna, Jack, Cudgo, Patience, Hannah, Silla, James, Ned, Langa, Phoebe, Jacob, Will, Sibb, Cuff, Rose, Hannah, Peter, Rose, Dick, Jane, Richard, Jane, Pompey, David, Zilpha, Violet, Fanny, Dick, Abraham, Judy, Rose, Hannah, David, Charles, Toby, Nero, Priscilla, Rose, Judith, Jane, Samuel, Hagar, Ann, Sarah, on a suggestion that the said persons, though free subjects of the State, were sold and enslaved, by order of the county courts of Perquimons and Pasquotank, in express violation of the constitution of this State, and contrary to natural justice, and that there are manifest errors and irregularities in the said proceedings: Ordered, That a certiorari issue, unless sufficient cause to the contrary be shown within the three first days of the next term.

And at the superior court of law, begun and held at Edenton court-house, for the district of Edenton, on the second day of November, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, before the honorable Samuel Spence, esquire, one of the justices of the said court:

On motion that the rule to show cause, granted last term, why a writ of certiorari should not issue, directed to the justices of Perquimons county, to remove all the orders and proceedings of the court of the said county, relating to the sale and enslaving of the following negroes, to wit: Glasgow, Tom, Susanna, Jack, Cudgo, Patience, Hannah, Silla, James, Ned, Langa, Phoebe, Jacob, Will, Sibb, Peter, Cuff, Rose, Hannah, Rose, Dick, Jane, Richard, James, Pompey, David, Zilpha, Violet, Fanny, Dick, Abraham, Judy, Rose, might be made absolute, affidavit having been made of the due service of the said rule upon the said justices in open court, and they failing to show cause; and it is further ordered, that a writ of certiorari issue, instanter, directed to the clerk of the said county court, commanding him to certify a transcript of the said orders and proceedings immediately: Ordered, That such a writ of certiorari issue to the said clerk accordingly.

On motion that a writ of certiorari should issue to the justices of Pasquotank county, to remove all the orders and proceedings of the court of the said county relating to the sale and enslaving of the following persons, or either of them, viz: Hannah, David, Charles, Toby, Pritchard, Nero, and Priscilla, Rose, Judith, Jane, Albertson, Samuel, Hagar, Ann, and Sarah, on a suggestion that the said persons, though free subjects of the State, were sold and enslaved by order of the said court, in express violation of the constitution of this State, and contrary to natural justice, and that there are manifest errors and irregularities in the said proceedings: Ordered, That a certiorari issue accordingly, unless sufficient cause to the contrary be shown within the three first days of the next term.

On motion that a writ of certiorari should issue to the justices of Perquimons county, to remove all the orders and proceedings of the court of the said county, relating to the sale and enslaving of the following persons, or either of them, viz: Dinah, Robin, Luke, and Nancy, on a suggestion that the said persons, though free subjects of the State, were sold and enslaved by order of the said court, in express violation of the constitution of this State, and contrary to natural justice, and that there are manifest errors and irregularities in the said proceedings:

In obedience to a certiorari issued from this court, by order thereof, to the clerk of the county of Perquimons, directing him to certify certain proceedings had in the said court of Perquimons, relative to the sale of certain negroes manumitted by divers persons of the sect called Quakers, the said proceedings being duly returned and certified, and arguments having been offered and fully heard, the court, for divers and manifest irregularities in the face of the record certified, and because it appears to them that the said county court in such their proceedings have exceeded their jurisdiction, violated the rights of the subjects, and acted in direct opposition to the bill of rights of this State, considered justly as part of the constitution thereof, by giving a law, not intended to affect this case, a retrospective operation, thereby to deprive free men of this state of their liberty, contrary to the law of the land.*

I, William Blair, clerk of the superior court of law for the district of Edenton, do hereby certify the above and subjoined to be a true copy from the records of the said court. Given under my hand and seal of office, at Edenton, the fourteenth day of October, A. D. 1796.

I, Spruce Macay, esquire, senior judge attending the superior court of law for the district of Edenton, do hereby certify that the above attestation of William Blair, clerk of the said court, is in due form. Given under my hand, at Edenton, the fourteenth day of October, A. D. 1796.

2d SESSION.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 2, 1798.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Privileges, to whom was referred a resolution of the 30th January, charging Matthew Lyon with disorderly behavior, with instructions to inquire into the whole matter thereof, and to report the same, with their opinion thereon, to the House, having examined several witnesses on oath, touching the subject, reported:

That, during the sitting of the House of Representatives, on the 30th day of January, 1798, the tellers of the House being engaged in counting the ballots for managers of the impeachment against William Blount, the Speaker had left his chair, and many members their seats, as is usual on such occasions; the Speaker was sitting in one of the members' seats, next to the bar of the House, and several members near him, of whom Mr. Griswold was one.

Mr. Lyon was standing without the bar of the House, leaning on the same, and holding a conversation with the Speaker; he spoke loud enough to be heard by all those who were near him, as if he intended to be heard by them. The subject of his conversation was the conduct of the Representatives of the State of Connecticut, (of whom Mr. Griswold was one.) Mr. Lyon declared that they acted in opposition to the interest and opinions of nine-tenths of their constituents; that they were pursuing their own private views, without regarding the interests of the people of that State; that they were seeking offices, which they were willing to accept, whether yielding nine thousand or one thousand dollars. He further observed that the people of that State were blinded and deceived by those Representatives; that they were permitted to see but one side of the question in politics, being lulled asleep by the opiates which the members from that State administered to them; with other expressions, equally tending to derogate from the political integrity of the Representatives of the State of Connecticut.

On Mr. Lyon's observing, that if he should go into Connecticut, and manage a press there six months, although the people of that State were not fond of revolutionary principles, he could effect a revolution, and turn out the present Representatives. Mr. Griswold replied to these remarks, and, among other things, said, "If you go into Connecticut, you had better wear your wooden sword," or words to that effect, alluding to Mr. Lyon's having been cashiered in the army.

Mr. Lyon did not notice this allusion at this time, but continued the conversation on the same subject. Mr. Griswold then left his seat, and stood next to Mr. Lyon, leaning on the bar, being outside of the same.

On Mr. Lyon's saying that he knew the people of Connecticut well, having lived among them many years, that he had frequently had occasion to fight them in his own district, and that he never failed to convince them, Mr. Griswold asked if he fought them with his wooden sword; on which Mr. Lyon spat in his face.

The committee, having attentively considered the foregoing state of facts, and having heard Mr. Lyon in his defence, are of opinion that his conduct in this transaction was highly indecorous, and unworthy of a member of this House.

They therefore recommend the adoption of the resolution submitted to their consideration by the House, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That Matthew Lyon, a member of this House, for a violent attack and gross indecency committed upon the person of Roger Griswold, another member, in the presence of this House, while sitting, be, for this disorderly behavior, expelled therefrom.

[During the consideration of this report, in Committee of the Whole, the following testimony was taken and reported to the House of Representatives, February 12, 1798.]

The Speaker, JONATHAN DAYTON, Esq. one of the Representatives from the State of New Jersey, being duly sworn, this fifth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, before the Committee of the whole House, to whom was committed the report of the Committee of Privileges of the second instant, proposing the following resolution for the adoption of the House, to wit: "Resolved, That Matthew Lyon, a member of this House, for a violent attack and gross indecency committed upon the person of Roger Griswold, another member, in the presence of this House, while sitting, be, for this disorderly behavior, expelled therefrom," by the Honorable Richard Peters, Esq., judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, to declare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, touching the subject-matter of the report so referred to the said committee, deposed as follows:

When the ballots of the House for managers of the impeachment against Mr. Blount were brought to the table to be counted, and the committee who were named as tellers were actually engaged in that business, I walked forth from the chair, without adjourning the House, in order to take a little exercise about the room, as had not unfrequently been the case in reading lengthy communications. I placed myself by the side of a member from New York, and in the chair, usually occupied by Mr. Dana, when I soon heard some expressions rather warmer than usual at the fire, behind me, and, turning, observed that they passed between Mr. Lyon of Vermont, and Mr. Dana of Connecticut. I addressed myself immediately to them, and said, "Gentlemen, keep yourselves cool;" and afterwards added, "if you proceed much further you will want seconds." Upon this, Mr. Lyon addressed himself to me, and said, among other things, that he had, in his own mind, designated the embassy to Cayenne for Mr. Dana; upon which, in order to give a turn of pleasantry to the conversation, I asked Mr. Lyon whether he had reserved for himself the mission to Kamschatka among the furred tribes. Upon my asking whether he was meant by the "Lyon of Fairhaven," charged in the public papers with being active to incite the people in his district to hold meetings, and to clamor against the stamp act, he replied that he supposed he was the person meant, but that this charge, as well as many others of a like nature made against him, was unfounded. After a few other remarks, Mr. Lyon began some animadversions upon the temper of the people of Connecticut, and the conduct of their Representatives in Congress. He said he had good reason to know and declare that the members of that State were acting in direct opposition to the opinions of nine-tenths of their constituents; that, regardless of the public good, they were seeking their own private interests; that their object was to obtain offices for themselves; that if they could not obtain the most lucrative, they would not refuse those which were less so, (mentioning two sums, which I think were nine thousand dollars and one thousand dollars;) that he, Mr. Lyon, had a good right to know the people of Connecticut, for he had to fight with them in his own district. Upon this Mr. Griswold, who was sitting in Mr. Harper's seat, asked whether he had fought them with a wooden sword, or with his wooden sword. Mr. Lyon, either not hearing this question, or affecting not to have heard it, continued his remarks to me, and added, that when the Connecticut people came into his district on visits to their relations, they came with strong prejudices against him and his politics; but after conversing with them freely, he had always succeeded in bringing them over to his side; that if he should go into that State and talk with the people, he could open their eyes, and effect an entire change there. Upon which Mr. Griswold, laying his hand gently upon Mr. Lyon's arm, in order to attract his attention, said, "If you were to enter into Connecticut, for the purpose you mention, you could not alter the opinion of the meanest hostler." Mr. Lyon replied that he knew better, he knew the people of Connecticut well; that he had no doubt that, if he were to remove thither, and establish or direct a press there for six, nine, or twelve months, he could effect a revolution there, and induce them to turn out all their present members. Upon my observing that this afforded another instance of the influence which men's wishes had over their belief, and upon my asking, if this were true, how he could account for the people of Connecticut having uniformly selected for their Representatives, ever since the commencement of the present Government, gentlemen of the same political principles, he answered that they (the Representatives) had blinded the eyes of their constituents, were constantly administering opiates to them, and would only permit one side of the question to be made known. Mr. Lyon further added that he thought, upon the whole, that there was one, and only one, of the delegation which he might spare, and allow to come again; that he had serious thoughts of moving into the State, and fighting them on their own ground. Upon which Mr. Griswold repeated the substance of a former question, and asked whether, when he should come, he would take with him his wooden sword? Upon which followed the indecency which has given rise to this reference.

The said deponent being interrogated by Matthew Lyon, Esq., and other members of the House, further deposed as follows:

As Mr. Lyon leaned on the bar, near me, and spoke louder than was necessary for me to hear, I concluded it was intended by him to be heard by those who were near.

The conversation was carried on with good humor; Mr. Griswold, when he spoke, certainly had a smile on his countenance.

At the first conversation between Mr. Dana and Mr. Lyon, something had been said on the opposition to the stamp act in Vermont, and a meeting therein, on that subject.

I believe the words spoken by Mr. Lyon did not allude to any vote of the members of Connecticut on any particular question, but generally to their political conduct.

Mr. Lyon said that the people of Connecticut were deceived by their Representatives, who were constantly administering opiates to them; and it was only afterwards, on my asking why those persons were sent as Representatives, that he replied, the people were permitted to hear but on one side.

I take it that Mr. Lyon, although not in warmth, intended that his assertions should be believed by those who heard him.

After Mr. Griswold had received the insult, I saw him draw back his arm, and expected a blow would be given; afterwards, I saw from his countenance that he had changed his mind, and he then wiped his face.

The conversation appeared to be conducted in good humor.

The conversation respecting Connecticut came voluntarily from Mr. Lyon, and unsuggested by any body else.

Mr. Lyon received my question as to the mission to Kamschatka in a pleasant way. In another part of the conversation, Mr. Lyon was comparing the information of the people of his district with that of the people of Connecticut, alluding to the light he had conveyed among them. Mr. Brooks observed, that the extraordinary light appeared from the extraordinary luminary they sent to represent them.

I did not hear a syllable from any member of Connecticut of insult or remark on the conduct of the people of Vermont.

Mr. Griswold, in laying his hand on Mr. Lyon, did it gently, and apparently for the purpose of calling his attention merely.

The Speaker, at the time of the conversation, knew that the wooden sword had relation to Mr. Lyon's having been cashiered in the army. I knew it from a previous conversation with Mr. Lyon, and my having been in the army at Canada at the time. The only reason for my supposing that Mr. Lyon did not hear what Mr. Griswold said was, that it produced no change in Mr. Lyon's countenance, though spoken loud enough for him to hear; and I heard the words distinctly. Mr. Lyon and myself were at equal distance from Mr. Griswold. I did not observe the cause of Mr. Griswold's leaving his chair and going to Mr. Lyon; but on turning round I perceived him then listening to Mr. Lyon. During the conversation between Mr. Griswold and Mr. Lyon, I did not observe any collection of members round the fire. Mr. Dana was passing and repassing before the fire.

Mr. Lyon seemed to insinuate that there was somebody influencing the printers, who permitted them to publish only one side.

I had a conversation with Mr. Lyon some days before, at the fire in the House. A gentleman from New York being present, with others, (Mr. Cochran, Mr. Hosmer, and Mr. Harper,) asked him what was the meaning of a newspaper paragraph, viz: "that he had outgrown two things?" He said it alluded to his having been cashiered at Ticonderoga. I asked if he was one of those who had been cashiered with infamy, for deserting an advanced post? He said he was; but attempted to show he was not so culpable as the rest. Said I, "did you know you were execrated by the whole army?" He said he did. I then asked whether he was in company with the officer who came to General Gates's head-quarters, and reported the desertion of the men, and whom the general called a d—d scoundrel and coward, and ordered to be put under guard; upon which Mr. Lyon replied, that he himself was the very officer, but that he told General Gates that, being an officer, he might be arrested, but was not to be put under guard. In the same conversation I observed, that application had been made to the commander-in-chief for leave to turn out the drums and fifes of the army, to beat a certain disgraceful march upon the departure of those officers from the garrison, who, it was said, had persuaded their men to desert; and that I recollected their beating the march upon the heights of Ticonderoga.

Upon being questioned by one of the gentlemen standing in the circle, whether it was a part of the sentence of the court-martial that the cashiered should wear wooden swords, I answered that I had not heard it to be a part of the sentence in this case, nor ever in any other.

Mr. Lyon appeared always to me to be willing to attend to inquiries respecting this business, and to give a calm reply.

The paymasters, although only staff officers, ranked as captains in the line. It was only that in case of insults from any of the men they might put them under arrest; but when they went into action they placed themselves in the ranks. They would take command in case all the officers of a garrison were killed, in preference to a sergeant, but not of any commissioned officer. A person under disgrace as a coward would not be associated with by the officers of the army, or permitted to hold a staff commission for any length of time. I never heard in the army that Mr. Lyon had received any new appointment after his disgrace, but only since, from him, and also then heard he was not allowed long to remain in it. But I did not stay in the army until the retreat.

Mr. Lyon, when cashiered, was in the rank of a subaltern, as I understood.

The said deponent, being further interrogated on the 8th day of February, 1798, on his oath aforesaid, answered to the several interrogatories so put to him, as follows, to wit:

Question. Did you observe Mr. Griswold in Mr. Harper's chair, when the conversation commenced between Mr. Lyon and yourself?

Answer. I do not recollect to have seen him at the first instant, but did see him there during the earlier part of the conversation.

Question. Did you see Mr. Griswold until about the time he put the first question to Mr. Lyon about the wooden sword?

Answer. About the time.

Question. Can you say with certainty what part of the conversation with Mr. Lyon Mr. Griswold heard?

Answer. I cannot.

Question. Was it the first time when Mr. Griswold made the observation of the wooden sword, that he laid his hand on Mr. Lyon's arm?

Answer. It was not, but at the second time; and I recollect his first laying his hand there when he made the observation as to Mr. Lyon's not being able to change the opinion of the meanest hostler.

SAMUEL SMITH, Esq. one of the Representatives from the State of Maryland, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 5th day of February, 1798, deposed as follows:

On the day on which the ballot was taken for the choice of managers, on the part of this House, to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, the Speaker being out of the chair, the members out of their places, engaged in common conversation, and the committee counting the ballots; having taken my letters from the box, returning to my seat, I passed Mr. Lyon, who was engaged in a jesting conversation with other members, such as gentlemen frequently amuse themselves with when the House is not in actual business. While reading my letters, that kind of amusing conversation continued, and I think I heard some person, but whom I know not, mention an expected opposition to the stamp act in the State of Vermont, tell Mr. Lyon, (one of its Representatives,) that petitions against it were expected, and ask him, jestingly, whether he brought any such with him. Not thinking the conversation interesting, my attention was particularly directed to my letters, when I heard Mr. Lyon directing his conversation to the Speaker, who sat in the next seat behind me, generally occupied by Mr. Dana; Mr. Griswold in that of Mr. Harper; there being between them only two chairs, occupied by Mr. Hosmer and Mr. Brooks. Mr. Lyon, leaning on the outside of the bar, seemed to be giving the Speaker an account of the political sentiments of the people of Connecticut, nine-tenths of whom he declared were of different sentiments from their Representatives; that they only wanted their eyes to be opened, and they would change the whole delegation. The Speaker said, jestingly, you would spare one? To which Mr. Lyon, in the same style, answered, yes, for he goes nearest the sentiments of the people of any of them. He said he had to fight with the Connecticut men when they came into his district to see their relations, and although they censured his politics at first, yet they always were convinced on hearing his reasons. Mr. Griswold then said something which created a loud laugh, which I did not hear, but which I have since understood related to the wooden sword. I turned, and observed that Mr. Lyon still continued his conversation, directed to the Speaker, and in the same style of jocularly; indeed, all the gentlemen appeared to be in perfect good humor, and to consider the conversation as amusing; in the course of which, Mr. Lyon remarking on what had been said in debate by two or three gentlemen from Connecticut, respecting the nine thousand dollars paid to ministers plenipotentiary being such an insignificant thing as to be scarcely worth accepting, said that he knew better; that whether the salary was one thousand or nine thousand dollars, it would always be acceptable; private interest being more their view than public good: observing that he knew the people of Connecticut well, having lived there formerly, and having lately passed through that State. Mr. Brooks, of New York, then asked, if he had passed through his district? Mr. Lyon said he had passed through certain towns. Mr. Brooks remarked, you were in the back ground there, as you frequently are. Mr. Lyon having remarked that, for want of proper information being received in Connecticut, he considered the knowledge of the people of his own district as superior. To which Mr. Brooks jestingly replied, that they had shown it by the great luminary they had sent. Which stroke of wit was received pleasantly by Mr. Lyon, as it appears to have been intended.

Mr. Griswold had removed outside of the bar to where Mr. Lyon stood. At this time, having left my seat with the intention to leave the House, I leaned on the bar next to Mr. Lyon, and fronting Mr. Griswold. Mr. Lyon having observed, (still directing himself to the Speaker,) that could he have the same opportunity of explanation that he had in his own district, he did not doubt he could change the opinion of the people in Connecticut. Mr. Griswold then said, "If you, Mr. Lyon, should go into Connecticut, you could not change the opinion of the meanest hostler in the State." To which Mr. Lyon then said, that may be your opinion, but I think differently; and if I was to go into Connecticut, I am sure I could produce the effect I have mentioned. Mr. Griswold then said, Colonel Lyon, when you do go into Connecticut, you had better take with you the wooden sword that was attached to you at the camp at ——. On which, Mr. Lyon spat in Mr. Griswold's face, who coolly took his handkerchief out of his pocket and wiped his face. Believing that the quarrel would go no further, I left the House.

DAVID BROOKS, Esq. one of the Representatives from the State of New York, being duly sworn as aforesaid, on the fifth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, deposed as follows, to wit:

At the time which has been mentioned, I was sitting in my seat, and the Speaker in Mr. Dana's. I had heard a part of the conversation which passed between Mr. Lyon and Mr. Dana. The subject of the conversation, as well as I recollect, was the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, to the bill for regulating foreign intercourse. The conversation was loud, and the Speaker spoke to them as he has stated. Mr. Dana then broke off the conversation, and went away, and walked backwards and forwards in the passage. The Speaker then entered into conversation with Mr. Lyon. About this time Mr. Griswold came and set himself in Mr. Harper's seat. Mr. Lyon, speaking of the conduct of the members from Connecticut, stated, that on his passage home or back, he passed through part of the State, and heard the opinion of the people. Said that nine-tenths of the people of Connecticut differed in sentiments with their Representatives in the House; that the members from the State did not fairly represent the sentiments of their constituents; that they were seeking their own interest; they were looking for offices; it was immaterial what salaries were annexed, whether nine thousand or one thousand dollars, they thought either worthy of their attention; he had lived many years in the State of Connecticut, and was well acquainted with the disposition of the people. He had occasion, frequently, in his own district, to contend with them, when they came there upon visits to their relations, and had often convinced them they were wrong. He had no doubt that, if he were to set up a press in Connecticut, he could turn out all the present Representatives. I did not hear the exception of one, as mentioned by others: it appeared to be all done in a bragging bantering manner. I then asked if he had not been in my district? He said he had, but there was nothing to be done there; meaning they were incorrigible, and not to be convinced. He then compared the situation of the people of the two States, as to information, and said the people in his district were far the most enlightened. I then made the observation stated by the gentleman examined before me.

When he talked of contending or fighting with the people of Connecticut, Mr. Griswold asked if he had not better take his wooden sword. I thought he did not hear it, as I looked at him, thinking it a pressing question, and he did not change countenance, but continued his conversation with the Speaker. Mr. Griswold then said, he does not hear me, or I said he does not hear you, I do not recollect which. Mr. Griswold afterwards went on the outside of the bar, and standing by Mr. Lyon, laid his hand on his arm and said, you could not change the opinion of a single hostler in the State of Connecticut. Mr. Lyon then talked of setting up a press in Connecticut, and fighting them on their own ground. Mr. Griswold then said, you will fight them with your wooden sword. Mr. Lyon then spat in his face. Upon this, Mr. Griswold stepped back with his right foot, looked steadfastly at Mr. Lyon, and stiffened his arm, as if going to strike. Mr. Dana then observed, they would consider this matter; and I said, this is not the place, there is a time and place for every thing. Mr. Griswold then wiped his face with his handkerchief, and went out with his colleague. I think the Speaker immediately arose from the chair he had been in, as, on looking round, I saw the chair empty.

I have not been so particular as I might have been, if Mr. Speaker had not stated the facts so fully and correctly in his testimony, from which mine only differs as a part differs from the whole.

The said deponent being interrogated by several members, answered to the interrogatories so put to him as follows, to wit:

Question. Did Mr. Lyon say that the printers deceived the people?

Answer. He said the Representatives deceived the people, blinded or hoodwinked them, and administered opiates to them; that in Connecticut, it was permitted to publish only one side of the question.

Question. Did Mr. Griswold appear to be angry, or in good humor in this conversation?

Answer. Mr. Griswold spoke with his usual easiness and good humor.

Question. Do you suppose the publications about the wooden sword were calculated to throw disgrace on the member from Vermont?

Answer. I cannot consider them in any favorable light; they must certainly be reckoned disgraceful.

The said deponent being further interrogated by the said Matthew Lyon and other members, on the eighth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, answered to the several interrogatories so put to him as follows, to wit:

Question. Had not Mr. Griswold joined the groupe and taken the seat of Mr. Harper, next to the seat occupied by you, before Mr. Lyon made the observations relative to the Representatives from the State of Connecticut, mentioned in your deposition?

Answer. I think he had. I recollect, perfectly, that it was in an early stage of the conversation that Mr. Griswold took that seat, and he must have heard a principal part of the conversation. I believe Mr. Griswold took the seat of Mr. Harper, immediately after Mr. Dana left off conversing with Mr. Lyon.

Question. Did he take this seat time enough to hear the observations of Mr. Lyon, with respect to the Representatives from Connecticut seeking offices, and pursuing their own interests, regardless of the public good?

Answer. It appears to me he did. I have no doubt he did.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that Mr. Lyon saw Mr. Griswold in Mr. Harper's seat, previous to his observation respecting the wooden sword?

Answer. I do not know that he did. When I directed my discourse to Mr. Lyon, he turned to me, and Mr. Griswold was sitting at my left hand.

Question. Have you any particular recollection of Mr. Griswold's being in your seat, till about the time when he made the first observation respecting the wooden sword?

Answer. He was in the seat some time before that observation was made by him. I cannot possibly say how long.

Question. Was it not apparent to you, from the course of the conversation, that the sarcasm used by Mr. Griswold, respecting the wooden sword, was by way of retort to Mr. Lyon's observation with respect to the Representatives of the people of Connecticut?

Answer. It appears to me that it was. Mr. Lyon, in speaking of the people of Connecticut, said he would fight them on their own ground, and I think what was said of the wooden sword was a retort to the observation.

HEZEKIAH HOSMER, Esq., one of the Representatives from the State of New York, being duly sworn as aforesaid, on the sixth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, deposed as follows:

During the canvassing of the votes for managers, the Speaker left the chair, and seated himself by my side, in the seat usually occupied by Mr. Dana, of Connecticut. We heard a conversation carried on with some warmth between Mr. Dana, of Connecticut, and Mr. Lyon, of Vermont. The Speaker spoke to them, and checked them, and they immediately separated. Mr. Lyon then came to the bar, leaned on it, and a conversation took place between him and the Speaker. It commenced, as nearly as I can recollect, with something relative to the stamp act, but I cannot recollect what. Mr. Lyon mentioned that, in the course of his journey hither or home, he had passed through part of Connecticut, and conversed with some of the people, and found their sentiments opposite to those of their Representatives in this House. Some general conversation then took place, in which we all took a part, but it was of little consequence, and it is not forcibly impressed on my mind. Mr. Lyon then addressing himself to the Speaker, and speaking of the conduct of the members of Connecticut, said that he believed nine-tenths of the people of Connecticut differed from the sentiments advanced by the Representatives of that State on this floor; they were pursuing their own interest; that they were influenced by a desire to obtain offices, and it was immaterial how lucrative those offices were; that they would be equally influenced by an office of one thousand dollars as one of nine thousand dollars. On the Speaker's asking him how the people came to send such Representatives as they had from the establishment of the constitution, he said that the Representatives blinded the eyes of their constituents, and it was only necessary for the people to be informed to induce them to oppose them. If he were to remove into Connecticut, and set on foot a printing press, he had no doubt he could bring about a revolution in the sentiments of the people. He was well acquainted with the people of Connecticut, as the first part of his life in this country had been passed in that State. Several persons from Connecticut had been in Vermont to visit their friends; that he had attacked them in that quarter, and convinced them their opinions were erroneous. At this time Mr. Griswold was sitting in the seat usually occupied by Mr. Harper, and Mr. Griswold said something, which I cannot precisely recollect, about his fighting them with his wooden sword: Mr. Lyon appeared to pay no attention to the remark, and I thought at the time did not hear it. Immediately after this, Mr. Griswold quitted his seat, and went behind the bar. I left mine nearly at the same time, and did not see the insult which is said to have been offered. This is generally all that I know relative to this affair. I was present at the commencement only of the dispute, and they are only general facts which have impressed themselves on my mind. I attended to the examination of the Speaker yesterday, and could agree generally with him in the statement, though my recollection is not so particular.

The said deponent being interrogated by Matthew Lyon, and other members of the House, further deposed as follows, to wit:

I did not hear any observations from the members from Connecticut respecting the people of Vermont.

The conversation from Mr. Lyon respecting the members of Connecticut was not connected; questions were asked, and some observations were made by the Speaker, which, perhaps, induced Mr. Lyon to say more than he originally intended.

I did not suppose there was any thing said which would provoke Mr. Lyon, and he appeared to be desirous of impressing the observations with respect to the members from Connecticut, as true, upon all who heard him.

The said deponent being further interrogated, on his oath aforesaid, on the 8th day of February, 1798, answered to the several interrogatories so put to him, as follows, to wit:

Question. Do you recollect the time when Mr. Griswold moved from his own seat to that of Mr. Harper?

Answer. I do not recollect the time when Mr. Griswold came to Mr. Harper's seat. It was, however, soon after Mr. Lyon took his station behind the bar, and during the general conversation which had taken place between us all.

Question. Have you any certain recollection of Mr. Griswold's being present until about the time he made the observation respecting the wooden sword?

Answer. I recollect having seen Mr. Griswold in the seat before that time; how long I cannot say, as I do not recollect seeing him seat himself there.

Question. Did you see Mr. Griswold in the seat soon enough for him to have heard the observations of Mr. Lyon respecting the conduct of the members of Connecticut?

Answer. I believe I did. I recollect looking round two or three times to see what effect Mr. Lyon's observations had upon Mr. Griswold.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that Mr. Lyon noticed Mr. Griswold to be in Mr. Harper's seat previous to what Mr. Griswold said about the wooden sword?

Answer. I never heard any thing till this morning to raise a doubt of it in my mind. I have no recollection of any particular conversation between Mr. Griswold and Mr. Lyon, previous to the question of Mr. Griswold.

Question. Do you doubt it now?

Answer. I cannot say I do.

SAMUEL W. DANA, one of the Representatives from the State of Connecticut, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 6th day of February, 1798, deposed as follows, to wit:

On Tuesday of last week, during the examination of the ballots for managers of the impeachment against William Blount, I had left my seat, and was standing before the fire, near the eastern door of the hall, when Mr. Williams, of the State of New York, entered into conversation with me, and mentioned that Mr. Lyon, who had lately returned from Vermont, had been saying "that the Representatives of Connecticut would all be turned out if they voted against Mr. Nicholas's amendment." Very soon after this, the member from Vermont came to the place where we were, and, in Mr. Williams's presence, I asked him if he had said what had been mentioned to me. His answer, as precisely as I can recollect, was in these words: "I did not say so; but that you would all be turned out if you carried the point you wished to carry." I then asked, what that point was; and his answer represented it as being "that the President should appoint to offices where no such appointments were authorized by law." I told him, "that was not the question on Mr. Nicholas's amendment." He answered, "it is;" and I replied, "it is not." There was a variety of further conversation, all of which I do not particularly recollect. I think that I remarked on the improbability of his being acquainted with the people of Connecticut better than their Representatives. I remember that, in the course of this conversation, he spoke of the disagreeable reception which we might expect on returning to Connecticut; and made other observations of an irritating nature. I felt some disdain at what he said; and, as his conversation was by no means pleasing to me, I believe that my irritation was manifested from the manner in which I answered him. The Speaker being near, and addressing us with an air of civility, interposed the caution which he has mentioned. After this nothing further passed between myself and the member from Vermont. My reflection told me to have no more conversation with him. As we separated from each other, I walked from the place, and took no further part in any of his conversation.

Not long after, as I passed within the bar, by the seat which Mr. Harper usually occupies, I observed my colleague, Mr. Griswold, sitting in that seat. I mentioned to him the substance of my conversation with the member from Vermont, and observed that I had felt some irritation, although, on reflection, I was rather ashamed of myself for being irritated at what that member could say.

Afterwards, walking without the bar, I saw the member from Vermont leaning on the bar, in conversation with the Speaker and other gentlemen in their seats. Mr. Griswold was then standing near him. I heard the member from Vermont speaking of the Representatives from Connecticut as being in pursuit of their own interest, without regarding that of the public. I also heard him mention a particular mission as proper for one of them. To this, however, I gave but little attention, and made no reply; for the observations were addressed to others, and I desired no further acquaintance with the member from Vermont.

A very short time before the commission of the outrage now under consideration, I stepped within the bar, and stood near the end of the desk which is in front of the seat usually occupied by myself, the Speaker being then in that seat. From the tenor of the conversation, I judged that the member from Vermont had been speaking of his ability to effect some great object in Connecticut, when Mr. Griswold replied, according to my present recollection, to this effect: "You could not, if you should go into Connecticut, with your wooden sword and candle," alluding, as I then apprehended, to a report in circulation, which, as also that of the sword, I knew to have been heard by Mr. Griswold and by the member from Vermont. On this, the member from Vermont spat in Mr. Griswold's face.

Considering the observations of some gentlemen of the committee, perhaps, in justice to the member from Vermont, I ought to mention that, while Mr. Griswold was in Mr. Harper's seat, I was in the passage leading from the eastern door of the hall to the Speaker's table, and conversed for a short time with Mr. Griswold and Mr. Brooks, when I was informed that Mr. Griswold had spoken to the member from Vermont, and alluded to the report of the wooden sword. On inquiring what answer was made to this by the member from Vermont, Mr. Griswold observed, that he believed it was not heard by the member from Vermont, as he made no answer to it. This was before the conversation which immediately preceded the personal outrage offered to Mr. Griswold, and, I think, at a different time from any which I have before mentioned.

At the present time, nothing further occurs to my recollection as material to the inquiry before the committee.

On his being asked, what was the conduct of Mr. Griswold after the outrage committed by the member from Vermont?

The said deponent answered: I was then standing where I could look my colleague, Mr. Griswold, fully in the face. I marked him particularly: for I then felt particularly interested in his conduct, and determining how I should conduct myself. Mr. Griswold turned towards the member from Vermont, fixed his eye upon him, and was slowly drawing back his right arm in a constrained manner, when, from his change of countenance and the cast of his eye, I apprehended that my colleague recollected where he was; he then took out his handkerchief and wiped his face. I stepped to him, touched his arm, and said, "This must be considered of." I also heard the caution mentioned by Mr. Brooks. Mr. Griswold made no reply. I proposed to him to walk out of the hall; he assented, and we both immediately left the hall.

The said deponent, upon a further examination of the 7th February, 1798, further deposed, on his oath aforesaid, as follows: There has been published an incorrect account of part of the testimony which I delivered yesterday before the Committee of the Whole; I, therefore, owe it to myself to observe, that on Tuesday of last week, in his conversation with me, the member from Vermont made various observations relative to the conduct in Congress of the Representatives from Connecticut, and, among other observations respecting them, spoke to the following import: that they would vote their own damnation; that they would be spurned at on their return home; and that he would be damned if he wanted to talk with me. Such language provoked from me an answer, which, I presume, attracted the notice of the Speaker.

In my testimony yesterday, I used some general expressions referring to this part of the conversation; but I did not mention the particulars, because I did not consider them material to the inquiry, and I did not wish to repeat, in public, such improper language as having been spoken by a member of this House.

I arose to state these particulars in my own vindication; but, since a gentleman from Massachusetts, on hearing the present statement, has said that he considers these circumstances as of some importance, they are now testified before the present committee.

JOSHUA COIT, Esq., one of the Representatives from the State of Connecticut, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 6th day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, deposed as follows, to wit:

I was not present when the incident which is the subject of inquiry before the committee took place, and do not know that any thing within my knowledge can throw any light upon it. A few moments before, I was passing from my seat out of the bar where Mr. Lyon was standing; he was addressing a kind of ranting braggart conversation to the Speaker, respecting the State of Connecticut. Whether I had noticed this conversation before I left my seat, I do not recollect; my recollection is probably the more imperfect on the subject, from the circumstance that I had heard a similar conversation from Mr. Lyon a little while before, at one of the fireplaces, before the House formed. As I was passing, or before I left my seat, I cannot with certainty tell which, some observation was addressed particularly to me, with allusion to the subject of the conversation, either by the Speaker or Mr. Lyon. Mr. Lyon, at the time, was stating a comparative view of the number of votes given for a Representative in the State of Connecticut, with the number of votes given for himself in the State of Vermont; and I put some questions to him respecting his knowledge of the mode of voting in Connecticut. The answer not leading to any thing interesting, I passed on to the south part of the House; I recollect, as I passed, my colleague, Mr. Griswold, was sitting in the seat occupied by Mr. Harper, or standing behind it.

Being interrogated by one of the members of the House, he further deposed, in answer to the said interrogatory, as follows, to wit:

Question. What was the tenor, and what were the particulars of the conversation which the witness heard from the member from Vermont respecting the Connecticut representation, in the morning, before the House was formed?

Answer. I mentioned the terms ranting and braggart, as relative to the conversation I heard. I used these terms not with a view of saying any thing which should appear to bear uncomfortably on the member from Vermont. Were I disposed to say any thing uncivil to him, this would be a very improper time and place. I used the terms only for my own justification—my justification, in not remembering more of the conversation than other gentlemen present appear to have done; although, from the subject, it should seem that I should have paid attention, have felt it, and remembered it. Had I heard such conversation from any other person, it is probable I should; but I had been used to pay very little attention to any thing I heard from Mr. Lyon. As to the conversation in the morning, I can recollect no particulars. It was generally to the effect that the sentiments of the people in Connecticut were different from what they were represented here. I do not recollect that any thing particular in that conversation was applied to the conduct of the members of Connecticut.

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, Esq., one of the Representatives from the State of Connecticut, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 6th day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, deposed as follows, to wit:

The only information I have on the subject relates to a conversation with Mr. Lyon, relative to his having been cashiered in the army. I came from New York to this place, this session, in a stage taken by Mr. Champlin, together with him, Mr. Otis, and Mr. Lyon. We were the only persons in the stage for a considerable part of the way. I had had but little personal acquaintance with Mr. Lyon before this time. Mr. Lyon, on the way, seemed to be disposed to give us the history of his life. It was filled up, according to the account he gave us, with many singular and ludicrous anecdotes. The ludicrous anecdotes that he told of himself, in a jocular manner, produced from the gentlemen with him a kind of pleasantry, if not something more, towards Mr. Lyon. I mention these circumstances for the purpose of introducing, in a proper manner, to the committee, the account he gave us with respect to his being cashiered. How it was introduced, whether entirely voluntary on his part, or induced by remarks from some one of the company, I have not a perfect recollection. I think, however, either immediately, or some time before Mr. Lyon adverted to the subject, something was said of Mr. Lyon's having been in the army. I cannot be very minute in the account he gave. I recollect his saying that allusions to his being cashiered had been in the public papers; that it was a matter of great mortification; that he could not bear to hear of the affair; that it happened when he was young. He said that he was a subaltern officer of a corps stationed on the frontier, at a great distance from the main army, and without support; that the officers and men were uneasy, and discontented with their situation; that they considered it as being too exposed; that he, at a certain time, was out with a party of the men; that, when he returned, he found the corps to which he belonged either had abandoned, or were abandoning, (I cannot say certainly which,) their post; that they went to some distance, where they made a halt; that he endeavored to persuade them to return; they refused; the officers insisted that he should go to head-quarters to General Gates, and make a representation of their situation. He went; upon being introduced to General Gates, and introducing the subject, General Gates damned him for a coward, and ordered that he should go into the custody of a guard; that he, Mr. Lyon, insisted on his rights as an officer not to be put under guard. That the adjutant general, or an aid of General Gates, said something on the subject, and Mr. Lyon was finally arrested, tried with the rest of the officers by a court-martial, and sentenced to be cashiered from the army. He said the charge was, that the officers, as they themselves could not without disgrace and punishment abandon the post, had excited the men to run away. He further said, as it respected himself, that the charge and the sentence were unjust. I think Mr. Otis asked him if he had worn a wooden sword. He said not. Mr. Champlin, if I am not mistaken, made this remark, that if he saw it in poetry he should consider it as being a figurative expression for being cashiered. Mr. Lyon told us he had wiped off this stain; that he had held an office in the army, if I do not misrecollect, of a paymaster. I think he mentioned, however, that he did not continue long as a paymaster, owing to some other person having been appointed, with whom he had a dispute about it; yet in that dispute, while in the army, the circumstance of his being cashiered had not been mentioned to his dishonor; that he had been appointed, and for many years commanded as colonel, a regiment of militia in Vermont. I recollect nothing further of importance to the present inquiry. I have had little or no conversation with Mr. Lyon since that time.

On being interrogated by one of the members, he further deposed as follows, to wit:

I do not recollect having mentioned this conversation to Mr. Grisvold, my colleague, though I have to others, not considering it as confidential.

CHRISTOPHER G. CHAMPLIN, Esq., one of the Representatives from the State of Rhode Island, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 6th day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, deposed as follows, to wit:

I have attentively considered the evidence given to the Committee of the Whole by Mr. Goodrich, and, to the best of my recollection, it is correct.

NATHANIEL CHIPMAN, Esq., one of the members of the Senate of the United States, from the State of Vermont, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 6th day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, deposed as follows, to wit:

I do not know that I ever heard any conversation, in presence of Mr. Lyon, relative to his having been cashiered, until the last summer. I had before heard it, as a subject of conversation in Vermont. Soon after Mr. Lyon returned from the last session of Congress, he was at Rutland; about that time there appeared in the Weekly Museum, a parody on his speech, in the last session of Congress, on the subject of waiting on the President with the address. I was in company with Mr. Lyon and two or three others, and I asked him whether he did not, at the time, expect that what he had said would bring up the subject of the wooden sword. He replied that nothing was there said, which could give any one a right to bring up that business, for he had expressed himself guardedly, on purpose to avoid any thing of that kind; that he had not mentioned any thing of his having fought or been a soldier; but that he had been at his post, or stood firm at his post during the war. I replied, that amounted to the same thing; to say a man stood firm at his post, was saying he was a soldier. He immediately observed, with seeming anxiety, that he was not to blame in the affair for which he had been cashiered. I then repeated to him how the circumstances of the affair had been related by a person who belonged to the corps; who had said that, in the summer of one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, being stationed somewhere near Onion river, at Jericho, I believe, the officers thought themselves in a very dangerous situation, and first suggested it to the soldiers under their command; they suggested that they (the officers) could not desert the post, without subjecting themselves to disgrace or punishment, but that the soldiers might mutiny and march off. In that case the officers would not be obliged to tarry without men. That the soldiers marched off, and that the officers followed them. Mr. Lyon observed that it was true so far as it related to the commanding officer, and one or more of the others; and that he had himself opposed, as soon as he learned what was intended, any such proceeding; but that he was overruled, and finally went off with the rest. Mr. Lyon related this matter more particularly than I have done; but I suppose it is not necessary to enter into a minute detail. He then mentioned the circumstances of his arrest on his arrival at Ticonderoga, and some circumstances relating to the trial. He did not mention the particulars of the sentence of the court-martial, nor did I ask him. He further said that the next year, (in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven,) General St. Clair, who commanded in the Northern Department, had reversed the sentence of the court-martial. The circumstance relative to the business I had before heard, and therefore made no inquiry of Mr. Lyon respecting it, that I recollect. The conversation above mentioned, with other similar conversations, passed between Colonel Lyon, myself, and two other judges of the Supreme Court, (a session of which was, at the time, held at Rutland,) and some gentlemen of the bar, at our private quarters, in the course of the two or three days which Colonel Lyon then spent at Rutland. One evening there were a number of people together; a Mr. Smith, if I recollect right, was conversing upon the subject with Mr. Lyon. What occasioned the observation I cannot say, but Colonel Lyon observed that he should take no notice of any thing that should be said upon that subject (referring to the former subject of conversation) in that part of the country; but that if any one at Philadelphia, or if any member of Congress, (I cannot recollect the precise expression he made use of,) should insult him with it, or pretend to mention it to him, it should not pass with impunity, or expressions conveying the same idea.

On being interrogated by Matthew Lyon, Esquire, and other members of the House, he further deposed:

Mr. Lyon, I take it, has had a colonel's commission in the militia; I think in 1781. It was during the time of a dispute between Vermont and New York, as to their jurisdiction. The neighborhood of Colonel Lyon's regiment at that time, which was Abingdon, where he then lived, was about seventy miles from where he was cashiered. He now lives, and ever since 1783 or 1784 has lived, about twenty-five or thirty miles from that place, (Ticonderoga.) Militia field-officers in Vermont, I believe, at that time were appointed by the militia of the several regiments.

I did not discover that my question with respect to the wooden sword was taken by Mr. Lyon as an affront, but Mr. Lyon discovered an anxiety to clear himself of censure.

In the conversation I mentioned above, between Mr. Lyon and myself, my expression was, if he did not expect that his ridiculous speech in Congress relative to the address would bring up the wooden sword. The first time I saw him was in 1775. I did not then reside in that country. In 1779 I went to reside there, and soon became acquainted with Mr. Lyon.

I cannot say what reasons Mr. Lyon gave for not resenting a mentioning of the wooden sword in Vermont.

I cannot say whether the story of the wooden sword arose from a figurative expression, or was literally true. I first heard the story previous to 1779, and before my acquaintance with Mr. Lyon.

Mr. Lyon and I have never been much in habits of political friendship. If I remember rightly, I mentioned in Philadelphia the conversation with Mr. Lyon as above related, in a company one evening; I cannot say with certainty, but I believe Mr. Griswold was present. I think it probable I have also related the conversation which I had with Mr. Lyon at Rutland more than once in this city, but not out of the house where I reside, to my present recollection.

THOMAS SUMTER, Esq. one of the Representatives from the State of South Carolina, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 6th day of February, 1798, and interrogated by several members of the House, answered, upon his said oath, to the interrogatories so put to him as follows, to wit:

Question. Did Mr. Lyon come across the House to where you were at the fire, immediately after the dispute, and say that he had twice heard Mr. Griswold use the expression respecting the wooden sword?

Answer. Mr. Lyon did come to the fire, on the right of the Speaker's chair where I was, and say that he heard Mr. Griswold use the expression; but that he did not then attend to it, but turned from him and took no notice of it; and that Mr. Griswold touched him on the arm and repeated it.

Question. Do you know the precise length of time between the termination of the dispute and Mr. Lyon's so coming to you and making the observations as before stated?

Answer. I do not know the precise time, but suppose it to have been but a short time, from the state of agitation in which Mr. Lyon appeared.

Question. Do you know that he might not have spoken to some member before he so came to you at the fire?

Answer. I do not know that Mr. Lyon had spoken to any member between the termination of the dispute and his coming to the fire.

Question. Do you know the precise time when the dispute took place?

Answer. I do not know any thing of it till Mr. Lyon came to me.

JOSEPH B. VARNUM, Esq. one of the Representatives from the State of Massachusetts, being duly sworn, as aforesaid, on the 7th day of February, 1798, deposed as follows:

I do not know the precise time when the fracas took place, and cannot, therefore, exactly tell how long it was before I saw Mr. Lyon. On the day on which the House were balloting for managers of the impeachment of William Blount, the ballots being collected, and the tellers counting them, I was standing at the fire in the west part of the House in company with other gentlemen; the Speaker having left his chair, and the members generally their seats. Mr. Lyon came up to the exterior of the circle round the fire, and observed that he imagined there would be a bustle; that he had spit in Griswold's face. I observed to him that I was exceedingly sorry for it; and asked him how a thing of the kind could possibly take place. Mr. Lyon then told me the circumstances which he said provoked him to do the act.

On being interrogated by Matthew Lyon, Esq., and other members of the House, the said deponent answered to the interrogatories so put to him as follows, to wit:

Question. Were there any circumstances which induced you to believe that Mr. Lyon came to you at the fire immediately after the affray took place?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Did you not hear Mr. Thatcher mention the dispute before you heard it elsewhere?

Answer. No.

Question. What were the circumstances which induced you to believe that Mr. Lyon came to you at the fire immediately after the affray?

Answer. When Mr. Lyon came up to the fire he appeared to be in a considerable agitation of mind. The information I first received of the affray having taken place was from Mr. Lyon. Pretty soon after Mr. Lyon and I had ceased conversation on the subject, some other gentlemen observed that Mr. Griswold had armed himself, or had gone out to arm himself; and shortly after, I saw Mr. Griswold come in with a stick. These, with the observations which Mr. Lyon made to me at that time, and which the Committee of the Whole have not thought proper for me to relate, were the circumstances which induced me to believe that Mr. Lyon came to me at the fire immediately after the affray took place.

Question. Did Mr. Lyon tell you that he heard Mr. Griswold twice use the expression respecting the wooden sword?

Answer. Yes.

[2d SESSION.]

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 20, 1798.

Mr. VENABLE made the following report:

The Committee of Privileges, to whom was referred a resolution in the following words, to wit:

"Resolved, That Roger Griswold and Matthew Lyon, members of this House, for riotous and disorderly behavior committed in the House, be expelled therefrom," with instructions to report the evidence, in writing, have, according to the order of the House, proceeded to take the evidence which they herewith report; and they report, further, that it is their opinion that the said resolution be disagreed to.

Mr. Sitgreaves's testimony.

Having been requested by the Committee of Privileges to communicate my recollection of the affair which occurred between Mr. Griswold and Mr. Lyon, on Thursday last, I depose as follows:

I do not recollect to have observed at what time either Mr. Griswold or Mr. Lyon came into the House, nor did I see the commencement of the fracas. I was in my seat, engaged in writing, when my attention was excited by the sound or report of a heavy blow. I looked to the quarter from whence the sound seemed to proceed, and saw Mr. Lyon, on his feet, in the place where he usually sits, and Mr. Griswold in the area in front of him, beating him over the head and shoulders with a cane or walking stick. Mr. Lyon appeared to be endeavoring at once to evade the blows, and to extricate himself from the chairs and desks of the row in which he stood. He soon was in the area, and Mr. Griswold continued to beat him, keeping him at such a distance that the blows could take effect, until Mr. Lyon turned and fled behind the partition in the rear of the Speaker's chair, whither he was pursued by Mr. Griswold, still beating him. As I remained in my place, they were for a moment out of my sight, which was intercepted by the partition; but they almost immediately appeared again. Mr. Lyon holding in his hand the tongs, which he grasped by one leg. Mr. Griswold seized with his left hand the arm by which Mr. Lyon held the tongs, and closed in with him; and shortly afterwards I saw them come to the ground together, Mr. Lyon falling under Mr. Griswold; I then left my place; the members gathered round them, and they continued on the floor for a few moments. Mr. Lyon being still under Mr. Griswold, until they were parted by one member separating their arms and shoulders, while two others seized each one of Mr. Griswold's legs, and in that manner dragged him off. When they were separated, I went to Mr. Griswold, and observing that he had not his cane, advised him to get it again, lest he should be assailed by Mr. Lyon, who was now on his feet. Mr. Griswold desired the assistant doorkeeper to find his cane, and then went, at my instance, to take a draught of water; my attention was then diverted from them for a short time, until it was again excited by a new alarm in the lobby at the south end of the Hall; on looking towards that quarter, I saw both Mr. Griswold and Mr. Lyon in the lobby, but at the distance of six or eight feet from each other. Mr. Lyon held a cane in his hand; and as I hastened towards that end of the room, I was met by the assistant doorkeeper, who handed me Mr. Griswold's cane, and, appearing unwilling to interpose, requested me to give it to him; I did so, and Mr. Griswold immediately advanced apparently to renew the attack on Mr. Lyon, when the Speaker called the House to order; upon which Mr. Griswold directly relinquished his design, turned round, and went to his seat, as I did to mine.

S. SITGREAVES.

Sworn and subscribed the 17th of February, 1798, coram REYNOLD KEEN.Mr. Sprague's testimony.

I, Peleg Sprague, depose, that on Thursday morning, February 15, 1798, I was in Congress Hall before the usual hour of meeting: that after prayers were read, I saw Roger Griswold come into the Hall with a hickory-stick in his hand; he came near to the fire-place, behind the Speaker's chair, hung up his cloak, and (I think) set his stick by it, and placed himself in the seat usually occupied by Mr. Dennis, or Mr. Evans, and employed himself in reading some letters: soon after, I saw Matthew Lyon come into the Hall, with a stick or cane in his hand; he went directly to his place, put his stick behind his chair, and sat down; after sitting a short time, I observed him to cast his eyes earnestly at Mr. Griswold; then he directed his attention to some papers before him, on his table, and seemed to be revising and folding them; I looked at both alternately, and thought that Mr. Griswold eyed Lyon, but did not intend any person should observe it. While Mr. Lyon was examining his papers, as aforesaid, I saw Mr. Griswold rise from his seat, and advance towards Lyon with his usual pace, having his stick in his hand: I believe that Lyon did not see Mr. Griswold until he was within reach of him: Griswold immediately struck Lyon over the shoulders, with the little end of the cane or hickory aforesaid: it seemed to me that when Griswold first struck, Lyon was partly raised, or in the attitude of rising hastily; Griswold repeated the blows, until Lyon got clear of the seats. Then Lyon advanced towards Griswold as if to close in with him, Griswold retreated as if to avoid it, still repeating the blows, until they got to the fire-place behind the Speaker's chair: then Lyon took up the tongs, and they both closed; Griswold threw Lyon on the floor, and fell upon him; I then went away, and saw no more of the affray: I do not recollect that I heard one word pass between them during the whole time. And further the deponent saith not.

SATURDAY, February 17.

On Thursday last, after prayers had been delivered, the Speaker, I believe, in his chair, but the House not called to order, I was standing near to the letter-box, and, I think, reading of a letter, when my attention was taken off by a loud cry of "part them." Upon changing my position, I saw Mr. Griswold and Mr. Lyon engaged near to the clerk's seat, the former with a large walking-stick, which he apparently used with all his force, and the latter making his defence, by holding up his arms, (without any weapon at that period) and endeavoring to close in with his antagonist. Soon afterwards the combatants fell upon the floor, near the stove, to the left of the Speaker's chair; when I ran forward and assisted in parting them. I remember seeing a member of the House take from Mr. Lyon a pair of fire-tongs, after he had fallen on the floor.

I did not observe the commencement of the fracas, nor did I notice the attack which is said afterwards to have been made by Mr. Lyon on Mr. Griswold outside of the bar.

Mr. Imlay's testimony.

James H. Imlay, being requested by the Committee of Privileges to communicate his recollection of the affair between Mr. Lyon and Mr. Griswold, says, that he came to the hall on Thursday morning, the 15th instant, a few minutes after 11 o'clock; found Mr. Griswold in the hall, sitting in the chair usually occupied by Mr. Hindman, apparently engaged in reading a letter. Mr. Lyon came into the hall about three minutes after this deponent, with a cane in his hand, and took the seat he usually occupies, or the one next to it, on the north side. After casting his eyes around the hall for a few seconds, he appeared to be employed in looking over some papers lying on his desk. During this time, which perhaps might have been the space of between three and four minutes, Mr. Griswold continued reading his letter. At length he appeared to have finished the reading, and was about folding it up, when he discovered Mr. Lyon. At this time this deponent was standing within a yard, or thereabouts, of Mr. Griswold, who immediately, on observing Mr. Lyon, walked to the recess under the window on the north side of the Speaker's chair, where he had placed his cane; taking this in his hand, he walked to the opposite side of the hall, directly in front of the Speaker's seat, to the place where the member from Vermont was sitting, and when in front of Mr. Lyon struck him with his cane. Mr. Lyon appeared to discover Mr. Griswold about the instant his arm was raised to strike, and at the utterance of some expression by Mr. Griswold, which this deponent did not distinctly hear, but supposed to be "you rascal." Mr. Lyon, when he received the blow, appeared to be in the act of rising. Mr. Griswold repeated his blow. Mr. Lyon rose, came out from his seat without his cane, advanced towards Mr. Griswold, as if with an endeavor to close in with him, which Mr. G. avoided by striking him, or pushing him off with his left hand, and repeated his blows with his cane, as often as ten or eleven times, sometimes striking on the head, and sometimes over the shoulders. Mr. Lyon appeared now to desist from attempting to close in with Mr. Griswold, and endeavored to gain the northwest side or corner of the Speaker's seat. This he did, Mr. Griswold repeating his blows. Mr. Lyon being now near the stove, on the same side of the chair as just mentioned, seized the tongs standing by the stove. Mr. Griswold then immediately closed with him, and, after a short scuffle or contest, Mr. Lyon was thrown by Mr. Griswold, who fell with him, and with one hand endeavored to prevent Mr. Lyon from using the tongs to his injury, and with the other struck him once or twice in the face. They were then separated by the interference of several members. What happened without the bar, at the west end of the hall, this deponent did not see.

Mr. James Gillespie's testimony.

James Gillespie, being sworn, saith, that, on Thursday morning, the 15th instant, he came into the House of Representatives after prayers, and the Speaker had taken the chair; that, whilst he was warming himself at the fire next on the right of the door, he saw Matthew Lyon, the member from Vermont, come to the letter-bag, and was putting in some letters as he, this deponent, passed him going into the House; that he also saw Roger Griswold sitting in a chair, a small distance from the Speaker's seat, with a large walking-stick standing near him; that I went immediately to the alphabet and made search for my letters, and, as I turned to my seat to read them, I heard a noise of blows, &c.; on looking that way, I saw Roger Griswold strike Matthew Lyon, who was in his place near the centre of the front desk opposite to the Speaker's seat, where he was then sitting; that, as Mr. Lyon was getting round the desk, he received two or three blows, and, on attempting to close in with Mr. Griswold, he, Mr. Lyon, received several severe strokes with the stick from Mr. Griswold; that the deponent conceiving, from the complexion of the affair, that it was a preconcerted plan, did not interfere, but asked the Speaker to call to order, which he declined, although the call was loud from different parts of the House; that, as Mr. Lyon advanced on Mr. Griswold, he retreated back towards the window near the Speaker's seat, by which Mr. Lyon became possessed of a pair of tongs, and struck at Mr. Griswold; on which Mr. Griswold closed with him, and they fell, and in a little time were parted; that Mr. Lyon expressed a disapprobation at being parted, and said, as he was rising, I wish I had been let alone awhile; that the deponent recollects that, as he turned to his seat, he saw Mr. Sewall, from Massachusetts, and on he, the deponent, expressing his disapprobation of such conduct, Mr. Sewall replied it was right, for we ought to have done them justice, and expelled Mr. Lyon; to which I answered, take to yourselves all the justice and credit that appertains to it, and went and read my letters, and heard no more for some time, when, looking up, I saw Mr. Sitgreaves going out of the south passage with a walkingstick, I believe, for Mr. Griswold; and then, and not before, the House was called to order, when this deponent thinks it was more than half-past eleven o'clock.

Questions by Mr. Sewall.

Question. Did not the conversation you suppose to have happened with me take place when you were, and I appeared to be, agitated with the confusion of the scene?

Answer. It did. I returned to my desk to read my letters from the first scene, and I presume somewhat agitated.

Question. Are you in any degree positive of the words you state to have heard from me?

Answer. To the best of my recollection these were the words used, or they were words to the same effect.

Mr. Shepard's testimony.

On Thursday morning last I went into the Hall a little before eleven o'clock. After prayers were over, Mr. Griswold came into the hall, with a cane in his hand; he went and set his cane up near the window, by the northwest part of the hall, and sat down near the end of the seat next the floor, and took out a letter (as I supposed) and went to reading it; whilst he was reading it, soon after Mr. Lyon came into the house with a cane in his hand, went and took his seat, and went to writing, setting his cane beside him. I looked at Mr. Griswold, and thought that he did not see or observe Mr. Lyon; I then turned my eye off from them, and spoke to a gentleman who was a stranger to them both, and said that they were both now in the House; turned my face towards them, and saw Mr. Griswold, then with his cane up, right before Mr. Lyon, and he struck him a blow across his (Mr. Lyon's) shoulder; Mr. Lyon appeared to be about half-way between sitting and standing; Mr. Griswold repeated the blow; Mr. Lyon soon got out on the floor of the hall, and made several attempts to get hold of Mr. Griswold, but he failed in his attempts, as Mr. Griswold kept out of his reach, and continued the blows until Mr. Lyon retreated behind the Speaker's chair; the members then huddled round them so thick that I saw no more of the transaction until they were separated; after which Mr. Griswold came across the floor of the hall, and went through the passage by the door at which we enter the hall, and went without the bar to the southeast end of the hall, and drank some water. When standing near the place where the water is kept, without any thing in his hand, Mr. Lyon came through the floor of the hall, with his cane in his hand, and came without the bar; I thought Mr. Griswold did not see him, until Mr. Lyon had his hand up to strike him, when he sprang, as I thought, to get out of the reach of his stick, but Mr. Lyon struck Mr. Griswold on his arm and shoulder, as I thought, slightly; Mr. Griswold then turned upon Mr. Lyon, when the doorkeeper sprang in between them. The Speaker then called the House to order, Mr. Griswold turned and went into his seat, and Mr. Lyon took a chair, and sat by the water and washed himself, and remained there until after the House was adjourned.

WILLIAM SHEPARD.

Mr. Haven's testimony concerning the assault which Mr. Griswold made upon Mr. Lyon in the House of Representatives, on the morning of the 15th day of February, 1798.

The hour at which the House were to meet, according to their adjournment on the preceding day, was eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and I went into the hall a little before this hour; some short time after eleven o'clock, the House attended on prayer; after this was over, I was walking in the south end of the hall, without the bar, and saw Mr. Lyon come in, with his cloak on, and go to his seat, which is the fourth from the end of that front row of seats which is on the left side of the passage leading up to the Speaker's chair; I saw him pull off his cloak, and take his seat, and perceived that he had a small cane in his hand, which he either put between his legs, or leaned against a chair beside him, in such manner that the end of it was under the long desk that was before him; after he sat down, he appeared to be engaged either in writing, or in reading the papers that were before him; it was then about one-half after eleven, and the Speaker was sitting in his chair, but had not called the House to order, and I then saw Mr. Griswold coming from the north end of the hall, across the area in front of the Speaker's chair, with a large yellow hickory cane in his hand. Although I was looking that way, as I was walking, I did not notice him much until he came within about six or eight feet of Mr. Lyon; he was then walking across the floor in a sidelong manner towards Mr. Lyon, and Mr. Lyon was sitting with his face down, looking on his papers, and, as I presume, did not perceive the approach of Mr. Griswold, and, if my memory serves me right, I think he was sitting with his hat on. As soon as Mr. Griswold had come in front of Mr. Lyon, he struck him with all his force over his head and shoulders with the smallest end of his hickory cane, repeating his blows as fast as possible; Mr. Lyon, I think, received three blows in this posture, before he rose to disengage himself from the desk that was before him, and the chairs that were on each side of him; he appeared to be then trying to recover his cane, which was under his desk, but could not do it by reason of the violence of Mr. Griswold's blows over his head and shoulders; he then rose from his seat, and got out at the end of the desk, defending himself with his arms against the blows of Mr. Griswold, and then rushed towards Mr. Griswold, and Mr. Griswold retreated towards the front of the Speaker's chair, and endeavored to keep Mr. Lyon at a distance from him, that he might strike him more conveniently with his cane; there was no person sitting on the same row of seats with Mr. Lyon when this assault began; the Speaker was in his chair, and, as soon as the assault commenced, I expected he would cry out order with a loud voice, but he did not; I was induced to suppose this, because I always understood that the rule of the House gave the Speaker a right to call the members to order after the hour to which the House stood adjourned, although there might not be a sufficient number of members present to proceed to business; Mr. Lyon then retreated round the clerk's table, the right hand of the Speaker's chair, and Mr. Griswold still pursued him; they then went into the narrow passage which is between the wall of the House and the Speaker's chair, and I then heard a rattling noise as if it were made with a pair of tongs, but could not see the parties, because the Speaker's chair was in the way, and I was myself then passing in front of the chair, to come up to the parties engaged, as they might go through the passage on the left hand side of the chair; as soon as they had got through the passage, Mr. Griswold either pushed Mr. Lyon down on his back in the northwest corner of the area by his own strength, or Mr. Lyon stumbled backwards over some chairs that stood in his way; from the situation in which I stood, I could not well perceive how this happened, but I saw Mr. Lyon on the floor with Mr. Griswold's head and shoulders on his breast, and Mr. Griswold's legs were directed towards me as I came from the other end of the room; Mr. Lyon was then endeavoring to disengage himself from Mr. Griswold, and had raised himself partly up, and then I perceived that he had a black eye; I then seized hold of Mr. Griswold's left leg to pull him away from Mr. Lyon, and another member, whom I afterwards noticed to be my colleague, Mr. Elmendorf, seized, at the same time, hold of Mr. Griswold's right leg with the same view. As soon as we had done this, Mr. Speaker cried out to me, and said, "That is not a proper way to take hold of him;" I asked him why? He replied, "you ought to take hold of him by the shoulders;" I said it would not hurt him to pull him a foot or two on the carpet. We, then, in this manner, pulled Mr. Griswold from off Mr. Lyon, and, by this time, a number of other members had gathered round, and the affray appeared to be over. I then walked back to the south end of the hall, to the place where I stood when the assault began; Mr. Griswold then passed by me, and went to the easternmost shelf on which water stands for the use of the members, and was drinking, when Mr. Lyon passed by me with his small cane in his hand, and went to the same shelf to drink with Mr. Griswold; as soon as Mr. Lyon had drunk a little, he looked up, and perceiving that it was Mr. Griswold who stood close by him, he said, "Is it you?" and struck at him with his cane, and hit him on his left shoulder or cheek; I observed that Mr. Lyon's blow was but a feeble one, and Mr. Griswold then retreated from him six or eight feet, and I then noticed that Mr. Griswold had no cane in his hand; I then saw Mr. Sitgreaves run to the southeast corner of the room and get a large hickory cane, and passing by Mr. Lyon, with a good deal of animation in his countenance, he put the cane in Mr. Griswold's hand Mr. Lyon then put himself in a posture of defence, and said "Come on!" I then cried out "order," and Mr. Thompson, from New Jersey, then stepping up, and looking me full in the face, said, "What is the matter?" I replied I would have no more fighting here. Mr. Griswold then retired, and Mr. Speaker called the House to order; and so the affray ended.

I, William Gordon, do testify and say, that, on the morning of the 15th of February instant, about the hour of 11, I went to the hall of the House of Representatives. Very soon after I had entered, I observed Mr. Griswold come in with a cane in his hand. In the course of a few minutes afterwards Mr. Lyon also came into the House, and immediately went and placed himself in the seat which he has usually occupied, nearly opposite to the chair of the Speaker. He had in his hand a cane which, as he seated himself, he placed behind him. On seeing him, I immediately threw my eyes upon Mr. Griswold, but could not discover that he saw or took notice of him. At this time the Speaker was in his chair and writing, as is usually the case at that hour of the day, but the House had not come nor had it been called to order. Few members, comparatively speaking, were within the bar. In the course of a very few minutes after Mr. Lyon had seated himself, I saw Mr. Griswold, with his cane in his hand, advancing from the floor to the left of the chair of the Speaker, with a very quick and strong step towards Mr. Lyon. As he advanced he raised his cane, and uttered an exclamation of rascal, or scoundrel, or of the like import. Before Mr. Griswold reached him, Mr. Lyon, according to the best of my recollection, had partly risen up, from which I conclude he had discovered Mr. Griswold approaching him. As soon as Mr. Griswold was within such a distance from Mr. Lyon as to reach him with effect, he instantly applied his cane with great force to his back and shoulders. As soon as Mr. Lyon was able to effect it, he made his way from the seats into the floor, on the inner side of the seats, then quickly advanced towards Mr. Griswold, apparently with intent either to catch hold of his cane, or to close with him. Mr. Griswold seemed to be aware of his intentions, stepping backwards in such a manner as to keep Mr. Lyon at a proper distance for the use of his cane, rapidly applied it to his back and shoulders. As soon as Mr. Lyon had got to the line of the passage, behind the Speaker's chair, he instantly attempted to escape that way to the opposite side of the house. Mr. Griswold pursuing him, gave him three or four blows across the back. At this time I observed Mr. Lyon turning, it appearing to me that he was prevented from passing any further in that direction by the crowd that was advancing towards the scene of action. After he turned, he seized the tongs by the fire-side, and Mr. Griswold then being very near to him, struck him with them. Mr. Griswold laid hold of them, and immediately they closed in with each other. After a short struggle, Mr. Griswold threw Mr. Lyon on the floor, and fell upon him. They lay some little time in this situation, Mr. Griswold attempting to disentangle himself from the grasp of Mr. Lyon, in order to pursue his chastisement further, and had nearly effected it, and placed himself in a situation proper for that purpose, when two or three persons laid hold of him, and drew him off from Mr. Lyon. While down, he gave Mr. Lyon one blow in the face, and wrested the tongs from his hands. When separated, I saw Mr. Griswold go towards the outside of the bar, I suppose with a view to take some water. Shortly afterwards I saw Mr. Lyon making towards that part of the house where Mr. Griswold was. He approached Mr. Griswold, who was standing at the entrance of the bar, and struck him with a cane. Mr. Griswold's cane was instantly handed him, and he was making again towards Mr. Lyon, when there was a loud call to order for the first time; this was instantly repeated by the Speaker. I laid hold of Mr. Griswold; sundry persons threw themselves between him and Mr. Lyon; and Mr. Griswold instantly retired and took his seat.

On Thursday morning last, having been engaged in writing in my room until I thought it very late, I entered the House of Representatives with some surprise at not finding it engaged in business. The Speaker sat, I think, writing in his chair, as I crossed the floor to the letter-box; and, on returning to my seat, I saw Mr. Lyon in his seat, in the posture of writing, or reading papers lying on his desk before him, having his hat on, and not appearing to perceive me to pass him, although very near him. From my seat, which is the second in the third row, almost directly behind his, which is the middle seat in the front row, I observed him in the same posture immediately before I heard the first blow of a cane; upon hearing which, I observed him still sitting, with one arm in the position of covering his head and warding off blows, and the other in feeling, as I thought, for a cane on the floor, beside or before him. I saw Mr. Griswold at this time on the open floor, directly before him, beating him with all the strength and dexterity apparently in his power, with a cane of the stoutest kind of American made hickory, and repeating his blows as fast as I thought he could make them. Under this pressure, Mr. Lyon, in a defenceless state, made out of his seat side-way, being hemmed in before and behind by the desks and seats, so that it was wholly out of his power to escape a single blow, or to interrupt Mr. Griswold in the act of beating him. Immediately I, myself, for one, rose in my seat, and loudly and repeatedly called out to the Chair for order. I heard the same call from different parts of the House; but I did not observe or hear any effort from the Speaker to restore it, or any personal attempt by any one near to interfere and prevent the attack. On the contrary, I think I distinctly heard the Speaker reply, that the House had not yet been called to order, as a reason for not interfering at all. As soon as Mr. Lyon had got out of the row of seats, he made towards Mr. Griswold, and made every effort to close with him (as it appeared to me;) Mr. Griswold, on his part, avoided this, by holding him off with his left arm, stepping back, and continuing to beat Mr. Lyon with his cane, as before, until in this way they both got to the fire-place, to the left of the Speaker's chair. I then heard the noise of the tongs, and immediately after saw them have hold of each other, and Mr. Griswold's cane falling out of his hand. Soon after they both fell, having hold of each other, Mr. Griswold partly upon Mr. Lyon. At this time I got to the place where they were engaged, and called out to part them. I heard the same cry from behind the chair, and I also heard the opposite cry from others, not to part them. Mr. Havens and myself each took hold of Mr. Griswold's legs, and, I think, together drew him off from Mr. Lyon. At the same time, I think, I saw others having hold of Mr. Lyon. When the Speaker observed Mr. Havens and myself taking hold of Mr. Griswold, he, with apparent warmth, as if thereby to prevent our interfering, called out, in substance, as nearly as I can recollect, What! take hold of a man by the legs! that is no way to take hold of him. Notwithstanding, I persevered, and, I think, Mr. Havens assisted me, in drawing Mr. Griswold apart from Mr. Lyon. Mr. Lyon went direct from that place to his seat, where he got a small cane, and went from thence south of the bar, where I saw him and Mr. Griswold soon after meeting, and Mr. Lyon making up to him; Mr. Griswold retiring from Mr. Lyon, and Mr. Lyon making a blow at him with his cane, which Mr. Griswold, I think, received on his arm or shoulder.

The loud cry of "order" from all parts of the House, and from the Chair, here put an end to the affray. Mr. Griswold's cane was delivered to him by Mr. Sitgreaves, I think, just as he stepped within the bar, which he took from thence, I think, direct to his seat. Mr. Lyon remained without the bar, and thus the affray ended, and the House proceeded to business.

When the riot commenced in the hall of Congress, on the morning of the 15th instant, between Mr. Griswold and Mr. Lyon, it was about twenty or thirty minutes after 11 o'clock. Prayers were over, but the House not called to order. Sitting in my chair, I was attentively reading some letters I had just received. In an instant the sudden bustle arrested my notice. Not having observed either of the parties enter the hall, I then saw Mr. Griswold on the area of the floor, with an apparently heavy stick, making a blow (perhaps not the first) at Mr. Lyon, who was between his desk and chair, in a half-rising position. This blow, I think, he received on his left arm and shoulder, and a second as he was disengaging himself from among the desks and chairs. Once possessing the floor, he essayed to join Mr. Griswold, who evaded him by a retrograde step, and a third blow, which fell upon Mr. Lyon's head, his hat being off. Then beating back a little to the left of the Speaker's desk, as Mr. Griswold approached, repeating his strokes, Mr. Lyon again attempted to close in with him, but failed, and made suddenly behind the Speaker's desk, which, with the crowding members, for a moment, intercepted my view. Then instantly again I saw Mr. Lyon with a pair of tongs elevated for a stroke at Mr. Griswold, which seemed to be somehow parried, so as not to be fully made. A collision, I think, of the stick, tongs, and persons, now took place; Mr. Griswold about this time lost his stick; thus clung, they came down both together; the fall, I rather think, I did not see, from the intervening members; but when down they appeared to be grappled about the head and shoulders, and Mr. Griswold rather uppermost. The confusion of the House was great, and the cry "part them" pretty general. Thus, while some gentlemen were disentangling their hands, others had Mr. Griswold by the legs, and were pulling him away, which was effected. The Speaker, standing on the steps of his desk, said that it was either unfair or ungentlemanly to take a man thus by the legs. General McDowel then observed, that he (the Speaker) had acted his part in the business; and the Speaker asking what he said, General McDowel repeated his observation, and the Speaker answered, what could he do? the House was not called to order; he could not help the event. The general replied, he supposed he could not.

The parties having been separated, and left at large, they casually met again, after a small space, at the south water-stand, without the bar, when Mr. Lyon, as soon as he appeared to discover who it was, raised his stick, which he had got hold of in the interval, and struck Mr. Griswold on the shoulder or arm. The stroke was quite light, being hastily made, and with a stick not very large. Mr. Griswold then beat back to the entrance of the bar, where some one, I think Mr. Sitgreaves, ran, and met him with a similar or the same stick which he had lost in the first rencounter. Mr. Lyon, also, after striking, stepped back from the water-stand, elevated his stick, and stood in an attitude of defence. Now it was that the Speaker called to order, and no other conflict ensued. Mr. Griswold presently returned to his seat, and Mr. Lyon remained at the water-stand. The above detail is as correct, as my memory serves me, to give of so unexpected a fracas within the walls of the House.

BOUNDARIES OF GEORGIA AND WEST FLORIDA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 23, 1798.

Mr. Ross made the following report:

The committee, to whom was referred the motion of the 17th of January last, respecting the territory of the United States southward and westward of the State of Georgia, together with the message of the President of the 23d of January, transmitting the report of the Secretary of State, respecting affairs in the territories situate on the Mississippi river, and also the representation and remonstrance of the State of Georgia, beg leave to report a bill, authorizing the establishment of a Government in part of the territory westward of Georgia, and to adjust amicably the interposing territorial claims of the United States and that State: They also lay before the Senate a copy of the commission of Governor Wright, dated 20th of January, 1764, and a copy of the instructions given to Governor Chester, on the 2d of March, 1770; which documents are believed to be genuine, and have a tendency to explain the boundaries of Georgia and West Florida.

GEORGE THE THIRD, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. to our trusty and well-beloved James Wright, Esquire, greeting:

Whereas we did, by our letters patent, under our great seal of Great Britain, bearing date at Westminster, the fourth day of May, in the first year of our reign, constitute and appoint you, the said James Wright, esquire, to be our Captain-general and Governor-in-chief in and over our colony of Georgia, in America, lying from the most northern stream of a river commonly called Savannah, all along the sea-coast to the southward, unto the most southern stream of a certain other great water or river called Altamaha, and westward, from the heads of the said rivers, respectively, in direct line, to the South Seas; and of all that space, circuit, and precinct of lands lying within the said boundaries, with the islands in the sea lying opposite to the eastern coast of the said lands, within twenty leagues of the same, for and during our pleasure; as by the said recited letters patent, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear: Now know you, That we have revoked and determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine, such part and so much of the said recited letters patent, and every clause, article, and thing therein contained, which doth any way relate to or concern the limits and bounds of our said province as above described: And further know you, That we, reposing especial trust and confidence, courage and loyalty, of you, the said James Wright, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint, and by these presents do constitute and appoint you, the said James Wright, to be our Captain-general and Governor-in-chief, in and over our colony of Georgia, in America, bounded on the north by the most northern stream of a river there commonly called Savannah river, as far as the head of the said river, and from thence, westward, as far as our territories extend on the east of the sea-coast from the said river Savannah, to the most southern stream of a certain other river called Saint Mary, including all islands within twenty leagues of the coast, lying between the said rivers Savannah and Saint Mary; and on the south by the said river Saint Mary, as far as the head thereof; and from thence, westward, as far as our territories extend by the north boundary line of our province of East and West Florida: And we do hereby declare, ordain, and appoint, that you, the said James Wright, shall and may hold, execute, and enjoy the office and place of our Captain-general and Governor-in-chief, in and over our colony of Georgia, limited and bounded as above described; together with all and singular the powers and authorities contained in our said recited letters patent, under our great seal of Great Britain, bearing date at Westminster, the fourth day of May, in the first year of our reign, except as are herein excepted, for and during our will and pleasure.

In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent: Witness our seal, at Westminster, the twentieth day of January, in the fourth year of our reign.

HORATIO MARBURY, for JOHN MILTON, Secretary.

GEORGE R.

Instructions to our trusty and well-beloved Peter Chester, esquire, our Captain-general and Commander-in-chief in and over our province of West Florida, in America, and all other our territories dependent thereupon. Given at our court at Saint James's, the 2d day of March, 1770, in the tenth year of our reign.

With these our instructions you will receive our commission under our great seal of Great Britain, constituting you our Captain-general and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of West Florida, in America, bounded to the southward by the Gulf of Mexico, including all islands within six leagues of the coast, from the river Apalachicola to Lake Pontchartrain; to the westward by the said lake, the Lake Maurepas, and the river Mississippi; to the northward by a line drawn due east from the mouth of the river Yazoo, where it unites with the Mississippi, due east, to the river Apalachicola.

You are therefore to fit yourself with all convenient speed, and repair to your said Government; and, being arrived at Pensacola, which we do for the present appoint to be the place of your residence, and the principal seat of Government, you are to take upon you the execution of the office and trust we have reposed in you, and the administration of Government: and to do and execute all things in due manner that shall belong to your command, according to the several powers and authorities of our said commission under our great seal of Great Britain, and these our instructions to you; or according to such further powers and instructions as shall, at any time hereafter, be granted or appointed you under our signet and sign-manual, or by our order in our privy council.

REVISION OF THE ACT FOR THE RELIEF OF PERSONS IMPRISONED FOR DEBT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 26, 1798.

Mr. NATHANIEL SMITH from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of making alterations in the act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, made the following report:

That, in their opinion, the said act ought to be so amended, as to extend its provisions, in express terms, to persons imprisoned in civil causes at the suit of the United States; also that the several district judges ought to be authorized to issue their warrants, commanding the jailers to bring the prisoners before them at such time and place as they shall think proper to appoint, for the purpose of executing the business assigned them by the said act; and in case of prisoners confined in the cities of Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Baltimore, and Charleston, the judges ought to be empowered to appoint two commissioners to do the business under the said act, when it shall be inconvenient for the judges to attend on the said business, by reason of other judicial duties, absence, sickness, or inability. Your committee are also of opinion that provision ought to be made, by law, for the support of poor prisoners during their confinement, previous to taking the oath provided for them by the said act.

REVISION OF THE ACTS "FOR THE RELIEF OF PERSONS IMPRISONED FOR DEBT," AND "FOR MITIGATING OR REMITTING THE FORFEITURES, PENALTIES, AND DISABILITIES, ACCRUING IN CERTAIN CASES."

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 25, 1798.

Mr. OTIS, from the committee, to whom were referred two resolutions of the 27th of March last, to consider if any, and what, alterations ought to be made in an act entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt;" and also in an act entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," made the following report:

That, in the opinion of the committee, the relief afforded by law to persons imprisoned for debt, at the suit of individuals, should be extended to those who may be imprisoned for debts due to the United States; and, accordingly, submit the bill accompanying this report.

Upon the second resolution, the committee are of opinion that no debtor to the United States should be discharged from imprisonment upon any judgment, but with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury; and they have inserted in the aforesaid bill a provision for this object.

This bill, if adopted, will embrace all the private petitions that were submitted to the committee, except that of James Greenleaf; this petitioner is confined upon mesne process, and prays that the benefit of the act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt may be extended to such persons prior to the recovery of final judgment; but the committee are of opinion that an innovation of this nature cannot be made with propriety or convenience, unless by means of a uniform system of bankruptcy; they therefore recommend that said Greenleaf have leave to withdraw his petition.

REVISION OF THE NATURALIZATION ACT, AND PRESCRIBING REGULATIONS RE-SPECTING ALIENS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 1, 1798.

Mr. SEWALL, from the committee appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject;" and further, to consider and report upon the expediency of establishing, by law, regulations respecting aliens arriving or residing within the United States, made the following report:

That, by force of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject," aliens are permitted to become citizens of the United States, when, in the opinion of this committee, there is not sufficient evidence of their attachment to the laws and welfare of this country to entitle them to such privilege; and that, for this purpose, a longer residence within the United States, before admission, than the act provides, is essential and ought to be required. The committee are also of opinion that some precautions against the promiscuous reception and residence of aliens, which may be thought, at all times, advisable, are, at this time, more apparently necessary and important, especially for the securing or removal of those who may be suspected of hostile intentions.

On these subjects, respectively, the committee beg leave to recommend the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, to prolong the term of residence within the United States, which shall be proved by an alien, before he shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, or of any State.

2. Resolved, That provision be made, by law, for a report and registry of all aliens who shall continue residents, or shall hereafter arrive within the United States, with suitable descriptions of their places of birth and citizenship, and places of arrival and residence within the United States.

3. Resolved, That provision be made, by law, for the apprehending, securing, or removal, as the case may require, of all aliens, being males, of the age of fourteen years and upwards, who shall continue to reside, or shall arrive within the United States, being natives, citizens, or subjects of any country, the Government whereof shall declare war against the United States, or shall threaten, attempt, or perpetrate any invasion or predatory incursions upon their territory, as soon as may be, after the President of the United States shall make proclamation of such event. Providing, in all cases where such aliens are not chargeable with actual hostility, that the period settled by any treaty with such hostile nation, or other reasonable period, according to the usage of nations, and the duties of humanity, shall be allowed for the departure of such aliens, with all their effects, from the territory of the United States; and excepting all cases of such aliens to whom passports, or licenses of residents may be granted, consistently with the public safety.

GENERAL WASHINGTON'S ACCEPTANCE OF THE COMMAND OF THE ARMY IN 1798.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JULY 18, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

UNITED STATES, July 17, 1798.

Believing that the letter received this morning from General Washington will give high satisfaction to the Senate, I transmit them a copy of it, and congratulate them and the public on this great event, the general's acceptance of his appointment as lieutenant general and commander-in-chief of the army.

JOHN ADAMS.

DEAR SIR:

MOUNT VERNON, July 13, 1798.

I had the honor, on the evening of the 11th instant, to receive from the hands of the Secretary of War, your favor of the 7th, announcing that you had, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed me "lieutenant general and commander-in-chief of all the armies raised or to be raised for the service of the United States."

I cannot express how greatly affected I am at this new proof of public confidence, and the highly flattering manner in which you have been pleased to make the communication; at the same time I must not conceal from you my earnest wish that the choice had fallen upon a man less declined in years, and better qualified to encounter the usual vicissitudes of war.

You know, sir, what calculation I had made relative to the probable course of events on my retiring from office, and the determination I had consoled myself with, of closing the remnant of my days in my present peaceful abode: you will therefore be at no loss to conceive and appreciate the sensations I must have experienced to bring my mind to any conclusion that would pledge me, at so late a period of life, to leave scenes I sincerely love to enter upon the boundless field of public action, incessant trouble, and high responsibility.

It was not possible for me to remain ignorant of, or indifferent to, recent transactions. The conduct of the Directory of France towards our country; their insidious hostility to its Government; their various practices to withdraw the affections of the people from it; the evident tendency of their acts and those of their agents to countenance and invigorate opposition; their disregard of solemn treaties and the laws of nations; their war upon our defenceless commerce; their treatment of our ministers of peace; and their demands, amounting to tribute, could not fail to excite in me corresponding sentiments with those my countrymen have so generally expressed in their affectionate addresses to you. Believe me, sir, no one can more cordially approve of the wise and prudent measures of your administration. They ought to inspire universal confidence; and will, no doubt, combined with the state of things, call from Congress such laws and means as will enable you to meet the full force and extent of the crisis.

Satisfied, therefore, that you have sincerely wished and endeavored to avert war, and exhausted, to the last drop, the cup of reconciliation, we can with pure hearts appeal to Heaven for the justice of our cause; and may confidently trust the final result to that kind Providence who has heretofore, and so often, signally favored the people of these United States.

Thinking in this manner, and feeling how incumbent it is upon every person, of every description, to contribute at all times to his country's welfare, and especially in a moment like the present, when every thing we hold dear and sacred is so seriously threatened, I have finally determined to accept the commission of commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, with the reserve, only, that I shall not be called into the field until the army is in a situation to require my presence, or it becomes indispensable by the urgency of circumstances.

In making this reservation, I beg it to be understood that I do not mean to withhold any assistance to arrange and organize the army, which you may think I can afford. I take the liberty also to mention, that I must decline having my acceptance considered as drawing after it any immediate charge upon the public, or that I can receive any emoluments annexed to the appointment before entering into a situation to incur expense.

The Secretary of War being anxious to return to the seat of Government, I have detained him no longer than was necessary to a full communication upon the several points he had in charge.

With very great respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

GEO. WASHINGTON.

JOHN ADAMS, President of the United States.

REPEAL OF THE ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 21, 1799.

The committee to whom were referred the memorials of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Suffolk and Queen, in the State of New York; of Essex county, in New Jersey; of the counties of Philadelphia, York, Northampton, Mifflin, Dauphin, Washington, and Cumberland, in Pennsylvania; and of the county of Amelia, in Virginia, complaining of the act entitled "An act concerning aliens," and other late acts of Congress, submit the following report:

It is the professed object of these petitions to solicit a repeal of two acts passed during the last session of Congress, the one "An act concerning aliens," the other "An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," on the ground of their being unconstitutional, oppressive, and impolitic.

The committee cannot, however, forbear to notice that the principal measures hitherto adopted for repelling the aggressions and insults of France have not escaped animadversion.

Complaints are particularly directed against the laws providing for a navy; for augmenting the army; authorizing a provisional army and corps of volunteers; for laying a duty on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper; assessing and collecting direct taxes; and authorizing loans for the public service.

With these topics of complaint, in some of the petitions, are intermingled invectives against the policy of the Government from an early period, and insinuations derogatory to the character of the Legislature and of the administration.

While the committee regret that the public councils should ever be invited to listen to other than expressions of respect; they trust that they have impartially considered the questions referred to their examination, and formed their opinions on a just appreciation of their merits, with a due regard to the authority of Government and the dispassionate judgment of the American people.

The act concerning aliens, and the act in addition to the act entitled an act for the punishment of certain crimes, shall be first considered.

Their constitutionality is impeached. It is contended that Congress have no power to pass a law for removing aliens.

To this it is answered, that the asylum given by a nation to foreigners is mere matter of favor, resumable at the public will. On this point abundant authorities might be adduced, but the common practice of nations attests the principle.

The right of removing aliens, as an incident to the power of war and peace, according to the theory of the constitution, belongs to the Government of the United States. By the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution, Congress is required to protect each State from invasion; and is vested by the eighth section of the fifth article with power to make all laws which shall be proper to carry into effect all powers vested by the constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof; and to remove from the country, in times of hostility, dangerous aliens, who may be employed in preparing the way for invasion, is a measure necessary for the purpose of preventing invasion, and, of course, a measure that Congress is empowered to adopt.

The act is said to be unconstitutional, because to remove aliens is a direct breach of the constitution, which provides, "by the ninth section of the first article, that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808."

To this it is answered, first, that this section in the constitution was enacted solely in order to prevent Congress from prohibiting, until after a fit period, the importation of slaves, which appears from two considerations: First, that the restriction is confined to the States which were in existence at the time of establishing the constitution; and, secondly, that it is to continue only twenty years; for neither of which modifications could there have been the least reason, had the restriction been intended to apply, not to slaves particularly, but to all emigrants in general.

Secondly, It is answered, that to prevent emigration in general, is a very different thing from sending off, after their arrival, such emigrants as might abuse the indulgence, by rendering themselves dangerous to the peace or safety of the country; and that if the constitution in this particular should be so construed, it would prevent Congress from driving a body of armed men from the country, who might land with views evidently hostile.

Thirdly, that as the constitution has given to the States no power to remove aliens during the period of their limitation under consideration, in the mean time, on the construction assumed, there would be no authority in the country empowered to send away dangerous aliens, which cannot be admitted; and that on a supposition that the aforesaid restrictive clause included every description of emigrants, the different sections must receive such a construction as shall reconcile them with each other; and, according to a fair interpretation of the different parts of the constitution, the section cannot be considered as restrictive on the power of Congress to send away dangerous foreigners in times of threatened or actual hostility. And though the United States, at the time of passing this act, were not in a state of declared war, they were in a state of partial hostility, and had the power, by law, to provide, as by this act they have done, for removing dangerous aliens.

This law is said to violate that part of the constitution which provides that the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; whereas, this act invests the President with power to send away aliens on his own suspicion, and thus to inflict punishment without trial by jury.

It is answered, in the first place, that the constitution was made for citizens, not for aliens, who of consequence have no rights under it, but remain in the country, and enjoy the benefit of the laws, not as matter of right, but merely as matter of favor and permission; which favor and permission may be withdrawn, whenever the Government charged with the general welfare shall judge their further continuance dangerous.

It is answered, in the second place, that the provisions in the constitution relative to presentment and trial of offences by juries, do not apply to the revocation of an asylum given to aliens. Those provisions solely respect crimes, and the alien may be removed without having committed any offence, merely from motives of policy or security. The citizen, being a member of society, has a right to remain in the country, of which he cannot be disfranchised, except for offences first ascertained, on presentment and trial by jury.

It is answered, thirdly, that the removal of aliens, though it may be inconvenient to them, cannot be considered as a punishment inflicted for an offence, but, as before remarked, merely the removal from motives of general safety, of an indulgence which there is danger of their abusing, and which we are in no manner bound to grant or continue.

The "Act in addition to an act entitled an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," commonly called the "sedition act," contains provisions of a two-fold nature: first, against seditious acts; and, second, against libellous and seditious writings. The first have never been complained of, nor has any objection been made to its validity. The objection applies solely to the second; and on the ground, in the first place, that Congress have no power by the constitution to pass any act for punishing libels, no such power being expressly given; and all powers not given to Congress being reserved to the States, respectively, or the people thereof.

To this objection it is answered, that a law to punish false, scandalous, and malicious writings against the Government, with intent to stir up sedition, is a law necessary for carrying into effect the power vested by the constitution in the Government of the United States and in the Departments and officers thereof, and, consequently, such a law as Congress may pass; because the direct tendency of such writings is to obstruct the acts of the Government by exciting opposition to them, to endanger its existence, by rendering it odious and contemptible in the eyes of the people, and to produce seditious combinations against the laws, the power to punish which has never been questioned; because it would be manifestly absurd to suppose that a Government might punish sedition, and yet be void of power to prevent it by punishing those acts which plainly and necessarily lead to it; and because, under the general power to make all laws proper and necessary for carrying into effect the powers vested by the constitution in the Government of the United States, Congress has passed many laws for which no express provision can be found in the constitution, and the constitutionality of which has never been questioned; such as the first section of the act now under consideration, for punishing seditious combinations; the act passed during the present session for punishing persons who, without authority from the Government, shall carry on any correspondence relative to foreign affairs with any foreign Government; the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, which defines and punishes misprision of treason; the tenth and twelfth sections, which declare the punishment of accessaries to piracy, and of persons who shall confederate to become pirates themselves, or to induce others to become so; the fifteenth section, which inflicts a penalty on those who steal or falsify the record of any court of the United States; the eighteenth and twenty-first sections, which provide for the punishment of persons committing perjury in any court of the United States, or attempting to bribe any of their judges; the twenty-second section, which punishes those who obstruct or resist the process of any court of the United States; and the twenty-third, against rescuing offenders who have been convicted of any capital offence before those courts; provisions, none of which are expressly authorized, but which have been considered as constitutional, because they are necessary and proper for carrying into effect certain powers expressly given to Congress.

It is objected to this act, in the second place, that it is expressly contrary to that part of the constitution which declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the liberty of the press." The act in question is said to be an abridgment of the liberty of the press, and therefore unconstitutional.

To this it is answered, in the first place, that the liberty of the press consists, not in a license for every man to publish what he pleases, without being liable to punishment if he should abuse this license to the injury of others, but in a permission to publish, without previous restraint, whatever he may think proper, being answerable to the public and individuals for any abuse of this permission to their prejudice; in like manner as the liberty of speech does not authorize a man to speak malicious slanders against his neighbor, nor the liberty of action justify him in going by violence into another man's house, or in assaulting any person whom he may meet in the streets. In the several States the liberty of the press has always been understood in this manner, and no other; and the constitution of every State, which has been framed and adopted since the declaration of independence, asserts "the liberty of the press;" while in several, if not all, their laws provide for the punishment of libellous publications, which would be a manifest absurdity and contradiction, if the liberty of the press meant to publish any and every thing, without being amenable to the laws for the abuse of this license. According to this just, legal, and universally admitted definition of "the liberty of the press," a law to restrain its licentiousness, in publishing false, scandalous, and malicious libels against the Government, cannot be considered as an "abridgment" of its "liberty."

It is answered, in the second place, that the liberty of the press did never extend, according to the laws of any State, or of the United States, or of England, from whence our laws are derived, to the publication of false, scandalous, and malicious writings against the Government, written or published with intent to do mischief, such publications being unlawful and punishable in every State; from whence it follows, undeniably, that a law to punish seditious and malicious publications is not an abridgment of the "liberty of the press;" for it would be a manifest absurdity to say that a man's liberty was abridged by punishing him for doing that which he never had a liberty to do.

It is answered, thirdly, that the act in question cannot be unconstitutional, because it makes nothing penal that was not penal before, and gives no new powers to the court, but is merely declaratory of the common law, and useful for rendering that law more generally known and more easily understood. This cannot be denied, if it be admitted, as it must be, that false, scandalous, and malicious libels against the Government of the country, published with intent to do mischief, are punishable by the common law; for, by the second section of the third article of the constitution, the judicial power of the United States is expressly extended to all offences arising under the constitution. By the constitution, the Government of the United States is established, for many important objects, as the Government of the country; and libels against that Government, therefore, are offences arising under the constitution, and consequently are punishable at common law by the courts of the United States. The act, indeed, is so far from having extended the law, and the power of the court, that it has abridged both, and has enlarged instead of abridging the "liberty of the press;" for, at common law, libels against the Government might be punished with fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court, whereas the act limits the fine to two thousand dollars, and the imprisonment to two years; and it also allows the party accused to give the truth in evidence for his justification, which, by the common law, was expressly forbidden.

And lastly, it is answered, that had the constitution intended to prohibit Congress from legislating at all on the subject of the press, which is the construction whereon the objections to this law are founded, it would have used the same expressions as in that part of the clause which relates to religion and religious tests; whereas the words are wholly different: "Congress," says the constitution, amendment 3rd, "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or the press." Here it is manifest that the constitution intended to prohibit Congress from legislating at all on the subject of religious establishments, and the prohibition is made in the most express terms. Had the same intention prevailed respecting the press, the same expressions would have been used, and Congress would have been "prohibited from passing any law respecting the press." They are not, however, "prohibited" from legislating at all on the subject, but merely from abridging the liberty of the press. It is evident they may legislate respecting the press, may pass laws for its regulation, and to punish those who pervert it into an engine of mischief, provided those laws do not "abridge" its "liberty." Its liberty, according to the well-known and universally admitted definition, consists in permission to publish, without previous restraint upon the press, but subject to punishment afterwards for improper publications. A law, therefore, to impose previous restraint upon the press, and not one to inflict punishment on wicked and malicious publications, would be a law to abridge the liberty of the press, and, as such, unconstitutional.

The foregoing reasoning is submitted as vindicating the validity of the laws in question.

Although the committee believe that each of the measures adopted by Congress during the last session is susceptible of an analytical justification on the principles of the constitution, and national policy, yet they prefer to rest their vindication on the true ground of considering them as parts of a general system of defence, adapted to a crisis of extraordinary difficulty and danger.

It cannot be denied that the power to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and also the power to defray the necessary expense by loans or taxes, is vested in Congress. Unfortunately for the present generation of mankind, a contest has arisen, and rages with unabated ferocity, which has desolated the fairest portions of Europe, and shaken the fabric of society through the civilized world. From the nature and effects of this contest, as developed in the experience of nations, melancholy inferences must be drawn, that it is unsusceptible of the restraints which have either designated the objects, limited the duration, or mitigated the horrors of national contentions. In the internal history of France, and in the conduct of her forces and partisans in the countries which have fallen under her power, the public councils of our country were required to discern the dangers which threatened the United States, and to guard not only against the usual consequences of war, but also against the effects of an unprecedented combination to establish new principles of social action, on the subversion of religion, morality, law, and government. Will it be said, that the raising of a small army, and an eventual provision for drawing into the public service a considerable proportion of the whole force of the country was, in such a crisis, unwise or improvident?

If such should be the assertion, let it be candidly considered whether some of our fertile and flourishing States did not, six months since, present as alluring objects for the gratification of ambition or cupidity as the inhospitable climate of Egypt. What then appeared to be the comparative difficulties between invading America and subverting the British power in the East Indies? If this was a professed, not real object of the enterprise, let it be asked, if the Sultan of the Ottoman empire was not really the friend of France, at the time when his unsuspecting dependencies were invaded; and whether the United States were not, at the same time, loaded with insults and assailed with hostility? If, however, it be asserted that the system of France is hostile only to despotic or monarchical Governments, and that our security arises from the form of our constitution, let Switzerland, first divided and disarmed by perfidious seductions, now agonized by relentless power, illustrate the consequences of similar credulity. Is it necessary at this time to vindicate the naval armament? Rather may not the inquiry be boldly made, whether the guardians of the public weal would not have deserved and received the reproaches of every patriotic American, if a contemptible naval force had been longer permitted to intercept our necessary supplies, destroy our principal source of revenue, and seize, at the entrance of our harbors and rivers, the products of our industry destined to our foreign markets? If such injuries were at all to be repelled, is not the restriction which confined captures by our ships solely to armed vessels of France a sufficient proof of our moderation?

If, therefore, naval and military preparations were necessary, a provision of funds to defray the consequent expenses was of course indispensable; a review of all the measures that have been adopted since the establishment of the Government will prove that Congress have not been unmindful of the wishes of the American people, to avoid an accumulation of the public debt; and the success which has attended these measures affords conclusive evidence of the sincerity of their intentions. But to purchase sufficient quantities of military supplies to establish a navy, and provide for all the contingencies of an army, without recourse to new taxes and loans, was impracticable; both measures were, in fact, adopted. In devising a mode of taxation, the convenience and ease of the least wealthy class of the people were consulted as much as possible; and, although the expenses of assessment have furnished a topic of complaint, it is found that the allowances are barely sufficient to ensure the execution of the law, even aided as they are by the disinterested and patriotic exertions of worthy citizens; besides, it ought to be remembered that the expenses of organizing a new system should not, on any principle, be regarded as a permanent burden on the public.

In authorizing a loan of money, Congress have not been inattentive to prevent a permanent debt; in this particular, also, the public opinion and interest have been consulted. On considering the law, as well as the manner in which it is proposed to be carried into execution, the committee are well satisfied in finding any excess in the immediate charge upon the revenue is likely to be compensated by the facility of redemption which is secured to the Government.

The alien and sedition acts, so called, form a part, and in the opinion of the committee an essential part, in these precautionary and protective measures adopted for our security.

France appears to have an organized system of conduct towards foreign nations, to bring them within the sphere and under the dominion of her influence and control. It has been unremittingly pursued under all the changes of her internal polity. Her means are in wonderful coincidence with her ends: among these, and not least successful, is the direction and employment of the active and versatile talents of her citizens abroad as emissaries and spies. With a numerous body of French citizens and other foreigners, and admonished by the passing scenes in other countries, as well as by aspects in our own, knowing they had the power, and believing it to be their duty, Congress passed the law respecting aliens, directing the dangerous and suspected to be removed, and leaving to the inoffensive and peaceable a safe asylum.

The principles of the sedition law, so called, are among the most ancient principles of our Governments. They have been ingrafted into statutes, or practised upon as maxims of the common law, according as occasion required. They were often and justly applied in the revolutionary war. Is it not strange that now they should first be denounced as oppressive, when they have long been recognised in the jurisprudence of these States?

The necessity that dictated these acts, in the opinion of the committee, still exists.

So eccentric are the movements of the French Government, that we can form no opinion of their future designs towards our country. They may recede from the tone of menace and insolence to employ the arts of seduction, before they astonish us with their ultimate designs. Our safety consists in the wisdom of the public councils, a co-operation on the part of the people with the Government, by supporting the measures provided for repelling aggressions, and an obedience to the social laws.

After a particular and general review of the whole subject referred to their consideration, the committee see no ground for rescinding these acts of the Legislature. The complaints preferred by some of the petitioners may be fairly attributed to a diversity of sentiment naturally to be expected among a people of various habits and education, widely dispersed over an extensive country; the innocent misconceptions of the American people will, however, yield to reflection and argument, and from them no danger is to be apprehended.

In such of the petitions as are conceived in a style of vehement and acrimonious remonstrance, the committee perceive too plain indications of the principles of that exotic system which convulses the civilized world. With this system, however organized, the public councils cannot safely parley or temporize, whether it assumes the guise of patriotism to mislead the affections of the people; whether it be employed in forming projects of local and eccentric ambition, or shall appear in the more generous form of open hostility, it ought to be regarded as the bane of public as well as private tranquillity and order.

Those to whom the management of public affairs is now confided, cannot be justified in yielding any established principles of law or government to the suggestions of modern theory; their duty requires them to respect the lessons of experience, and transmit to posterity the civil and religious privileges which are the birthright of our country, and which it was the great object of our happy constitution to secure and perpetuate.

Impressed with these sentiments, the committee beg leave to report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to repeal the act passed the last session, entitled "An act concerning aliens."

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to repeal the act passed the last session, entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.'"

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to repeal any of the laws respecting the navy, military establishment, or revenue of the United States.

REPRINT OF THE JOURNALS OF CONGRESS UNDER THE CONFEDERATION, AND OF OTHER PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 26, 1799.

Mr. RUTLEDGE, from the committee to whom was referred a motion relative to the printing of the journals of Congress under the confederation, together with such reports of heads of Departments, and of committees of both Houses of Congress under the present constitution, as are out of print, or are of importance for explaining and understanding the acts of Government, made the following report, in part:

That, upon inquiry, they find the journals of Congress under the confederation are out of print, and that a subscription has been opened in this city for the publication of them. In the opinion of your committee the reprinting of so valuable a record is highly desirable, and, as it will be greatly facilitated by some legislative aid, they therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and directed to subscribe, on such terms as they may deem eligible, for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives, for four hundred copies of the journals of Congress, which are proposed to be published by Richard Folwell.

INSURRECTION IN PENNSYLVANIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DEC. 5, 1799, BY MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Letter from the District Judge of Pennsylvania.

Sir:

PHILADELPHIA, March 11, 1799.

I cannot longer omit transmitting to you some documents which are enclosed, showing that a daring combination, and treasonable opposition to the laws of the United States, has recently been brought to a crisis, in Northampton county, in this district. I had some time ago issued my warrants against sundry offenders in that county who had been charged, on oath, with misdemeanors in entering into unlawful combinations to resist the law commonly called the house-tax law, and rendering it unsafe for the officers appointed under that act to perform their duties. The marshal endeavored to execute my warrants, and had proceeded in the business as far as is related in the papers enclosed. The result may be gathered from these papers. But I have directed the marshal to make a more accurate statement, which, with other proofs I daily expect, I will transmit. I shall proceed, when furnished with the necessary testimony, to issue warrants against those who took up arms and rescued the prisoners. But I fear the process cannot be executed without a military force: this, at least, seems to be probable from the opinions given in the enclosed papers, and from the facts therein stated. The same spirit exists in some parts of Montgomery and Bucks counties, though it has not yet arrived to the violent extreme exhibited in Northampton. I shall issue a number of warrants against offenders in those latter counties forthwith; and if any resistance should there happen, I will duly inform you, that you may lay the information before the President, to whom, I pray you, to transmit that herein given.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RICHARD PETERS,

*Judge of the Pennsylvania district of the United States.*Colonel TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.Report of the Marshal of the district of Pennsylvania.

Sir:

PHILADELPHIA, March 11, 1799.

On the 20th of February last the honorable Richard Peters, Esq. issued warrants against sundry persons residing in the county of Northampton, who had given opposition to the execution of the law of the United States laying a tax on lands and houses, and a number of subpoenas for witnesses there and in the county of Montgomery. The writs were put into my hands on the 23d; on the 26th I set out, and got to Norristown that night; on the next morning (the 27th) I set out from thence, and on that day served all my subpoenas in Montgomery, and on the 28th got to Emaus in Northampton county. I was informed there that an express had arrived from Philadelphia with despatches informing them of my business, which created some alarm amongst the people in opposition in Millerstown and its vicinity. A meeting of a troop of horse was called there, of which a Mr. Jarret, a justice of the peace, was the captain. Messengers were sent to sundry places for purposes of which I was unacquainted. Next day I proceeded to Nazareth, saw Judge Henry and Mr. Eyerly, and on Saturday morning, the 2d instant, Mr. Eyerly and I rode into Lehigh township, where I arrested eleven persons, and on the next day took security from them that they would appear at Bethlehem, at the public inn, on Thursday morning, the 7th instant, to march with me to the city of Philadelphia, there to enter into recognizance to appear at the next circuit court to answer, &c. Five others came in and signed the obligation. This being accomplished, we came to Bethlehem, set out for Macungy township in company with Colonel Stephen Balliot. We lodged that night at Emaus; next morning, the 5th instant, we set out for Millerstown; on our way I stopped at the house of George Seider to serve a subpoena on him as a witness on the part of the United States. His wife came to the door; on being asked for her husband, she abused me and the gentlemen with me. He came to the door, (with a club in his hand of green oak, which seemed to have been procured for the occasion,) and called us every abusive name the German language can afford, refusing at the same time the subpoena. I gave it into the hands of a person present, who afterwards gave it to him, and rode on. When we got near Millerstown, we observed people assembling from all quarters; in some instances two men riding on one horse. This, from the conduct of Seider, led to a belief that an opposition was intended to be made to the arresting of any of the offenders against the laws of the United States in that place. We left our horses at Mr. Buskirk's, (a German clergyman near the town,) and walked in. We went first to the house of George Schaffer, one of the worst offenders. We were there informed that he had gone the day before to Philadelphia. We then went to the house of Henry Shankweiler, where we found upwards of fifty men (chiefly armed with clubs) prepared to prevent the execution of the law. Shankweiler was shown to me; as I advanced towards him, he retreated into the midst of the crowd. I, however, arrested him; he refused to submit to the arrest; the mob swore that, before he should be taken, they would, to a man, fight till they died; that he should not submit; he swore he never would; he would die first. I explained to them the consequence of resisting; he swore he did not care if it cost him his life and all his property, even to the destruction of his family, he would not. Upon which Jacob and Daniel Schaffer, brothers of the aforementioned Henry Schaffer, a young man of the name of Schwartz, who tore the cockade from Colonel Balliot's hat, and many others whom I did not know, nor could find any person who would furnish me with their names, rushed on in the most violent torrent of abuse, threatening vengeance, particularly against Eyerly and Balliot, calling to each other "strike, strike," all desirous that some one might begin the affray. I desired Shankweiler to quiet those people, to keep them off. He desired them not to hurt the marshal; but Eyerly and Balliot, he said, were damned rascals. I informed him and his people that those gentlemen were under my protection; that I would protect them; and showed some little resolution, which seemed to strike terror into them; upon which they gave way, and the gentlemen got out of the house. It is my opinion that if one single blow had been struck the whole of the rascals would have fallen on, and we three should have been killed. Shankweiler, however, before I left him, promised to meet me on Thursday morning at Bethlehem, but without a promise of a submission. We went from thence to Jeremiah Trexlers, lodged there that night. Next morning I hired a constable to go with and show me the persons of Daniel Harvey, Adam Stephen, and Herman Hortman, whom I arrested, and obtained their promise to meet me on the morning after at Bethlehem. Hortman was insolent, disputed my authority, but submitted. I returned to Trexlers; was there informed that a rescue of the prisoners, as soon as I had them assembled, was intended. Mr. Eyerly, Mr. Balliot, and I, returned to Bethlehem, where Judge Henry gave us the same information. I then called a posse comitatus of about fourteen men to my aid in support of the authority of the United States, who attended unarmed. About 11 o'clock in the forenoon of Thursday, two men came into the yard of the public inn. One had a large duck gun, and the other a rifle. After some conversation with them I disarmed and confined them, concluding that if all the rescuers came in that scattered and unmilitary manner, a good account might be given of them.

After some time, up came Shankweiler, of Millerstown, with William Desh, Jacob Cline, and David Scheffer, three of Captain Jarrett's troop of horse; I asked him if he had come to surrender himself to me, and submit to the laws of the United States? He impertinently answered, no, and kept rather behind the horsemen. I asked him for what purpose he came? He answered, to see his partner, (meaning his accuser.) I commanded him to submit; he refused in the most positive manner. After some time a person came up, informing us that, a large body of men, horse and foot, were assembled, armed with guns, swords, and pistols, at the Lehigh bridge, in a hostile manner; on which information, I sent down John Mulhallon, Esq., Major William Burnet, Isaac Hartzell, and Christian Rhodt, two of whom were supposed to be in the confidence of the people in arms, to ask of them their object, whether it was a rescue, and to warn them of the danger of such an attempt. They went down, spoke with them, and returned with reports unfavorable, which were that a rescue was intended, that I must submit to their will, and release the prisoners, or the consequences would be such as they would not be answerable for. I absolutely refused, and showed them the writs. They then offered to give bail to me to attend the court. I informed them that I was an executive officer only, that I must strictly obey the commands of the writs, that I could not take bail, desired them to go back and state this to their people in arms, that if they attempted a rescue, it would be punished severely. This they treated with contempt, and boasted of their strength. I asked them if they knew the power and strength of the United States, and the danger of resisting the authority thereof; that punishment would most assuredly follow any indignity offered to them. They went off, and returned with three of the insurgents, who came to demand of me a surrender of the prisoners, but who were too ignorant to inform me of the object they had in view. I informed them of my determination; then the whole body of them marched up immediately, the horsemen and officers of the infantry with swords drawn; the infantry marched with trailed arms and surrounded the house; the horse were drawn up in front of the house, and seemed to be without an officer of their own corps to command them. The whole troops seemed to be under the command of a Captain Fries, of Bucks county. Fries made himself conspicuous on the occasion; he said he was the commanding officer, the oldest captain; he insisted on all the prisoners being set at large. This I refused, and continued to refuse, notwithstanding their threats, till I was informed that their resentment against Judge Henry, Colonel Balliot, and Mr. Eyerly, was great, that their lives were in danger unless an immediate surrender was made; I then informed the prisoners that I could not resist longer the force against me, but that I dared not give up the prisoners. I desired the prisoners to march with me for Philadelphia; and added, that if those people chose to rescue them, they might, and take the consequence. The prisoners of Lehigh township refused to march, declaring that, if I would suffer them to go home for the present, they would meet me at Philadelphia, on the Monday and Tuesday next following, and submit to the laws. Previous to this, I had entreated Captain Jarrett, who was present and armed with pistols, to use his influence to prevent their doing a thing so improper and dangerous to themselves. He answered, that he could do nothing with them, till he saw all the prisoners were given up to them. He then said, Now I will take away my people, which he did in perfect order. Fries prepared his, returned and asked for Eyerly, the priest; he said he must be given up, that his people would not march without him. I assured him, he had been surrendered with the other prisoners; on which assurance he went out, found the priest, and then marched. By this time night was fast approaching. I feared that these ungovernable men might do things in the dark which they would avoid in the light; therefore agreed, for the safety of the gentlemen, to give the prisoners up. Upon the whole of my observations, I am well satisfied, in my own mind, that the laws of the United States cannot be executed by the officers of the Government throughout the county of Northampton, without military aid; the people are determined to resist; they calculate largely on their strength in this State, and the aid they will have from the neighboring States, and particularly that of Virginia.

I have the honor, sir, to be your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM NICHOLS.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq., Secretary of State.

*Deposition of Valentine Führer.*STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, Northampton county, ss:

Before me, Joseph Horsfield, Esq., one of the justices of the peace, personally appeared, Valentine Führer, of Bethlehem, in the said county, toll receiver of the bridge across Lehigh, who, on his solemn affirmation, duly administered according to law, doth declare and say, that on the 7th day of March, about noon, a number of men, unknown to affirmant, came to the bridge gate and told affirmant, that a party of armed men would come soon; that they were much enraged; that they advised him to leave the bridge gate open, otherwise they would break through. Affirmant, on seeing the armed horse and footmen, opened the gate, and left the passage free till evening. Affirmant thinks about eighty horsemen, some armed and some unarmed, passed over the bridge; and about eighty footmen all armed either with guns or clubs, also passed across; that after all the horse and foot had passed the bridge, Mr. Henry Jarrett also crossed. In about four or five hours all the horse and foot returned, without paying any toll, except Mr. Henry Jarrett, who offered to pay for himself and the red coats, which were about ten or twelve horsemen, and paid three quarters of a dollar to affirmant; and further he saith not.

VALENTINE FUHRER, his X mark.

Affirmed before me, on the 9th March, 1799.

JOSEPH HORSFIELD.

*Deposition of Jacob Eyerly and Stephen Balliot.*PENNSYLVANIA, Northampton County, ss:

Before the subscriber, one of the judges of the court of common pleas, in and for said county, on the 8th day of March, A. D., 1799, personally came Jacob Eyerly, Esq., one of the commissioners of the direct tax, and Stephen Balliot, Esq., collector of the revenue, &c; the said Jacob Eyerly having made solemn affirmation according to law, and the said Stephen Balliot having made solemn oath according to law, do depose, declare, and say, that they set out from Bethlehem on the 5th instant, in company with Colonel William Nichols, marshal of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, who intended to serve several subpoenas and warrants issued by the judge of the district court; that the marshal, upon the road to Millerstown, served a subpoena upon a certain George Seider, who, when he was called upon, came to the door with a club, and called the marshal and these deponents highway robbers, thieves, rascals, and scoundrels, and spoke other very abusive language, and would not receive the copy of the subpoena; that the marshal handed the copy to a certain Daniel Schwartz, who was present with the said Seider; that we rode on from there to Millerstown, where the marshal and these deponents entered the house of Henry Shankweiller to serve a warrant upon him; here we found at least fifty men collected in his bar-room, among others the abovenamed George Seider, with a club; that, upon the arrestation of said Shankweiller, Jacob Shaeffer and David Shaeffer, with others whom the deponents do not know, came in the most violent and threatening manner close up to the deponents and the marshal, and in a most violent manner threatened to beat and otherwise did abuse the deponents, and declared, that if the marshal dared to take off said Shankweiller, they would fight to the last. And further, that said Shankweiller did declare he would not submit; but, upon the marshal's representing to him the consequences, he said that whatever Jarrett (meaning Henry Jarrett) did he would do; that the marshal endeavored to get a man from the neighborhood who should know the persons so collected, but could procure nobody else to accompany him; that the people of the neighborhood consider themselves in imminent danger of their lives by appearing in favor of the Government; that previous to the return of the deponents with the marshal to Bethlehem, they had received information which induced them to believe there would some attempts be made to rescue the prisoners either at Bethlehem or on the road.

That yesterday, the 7th day of March, the marshal having collected about eighteen of the prisoners in a quiet and peaceable manner at the house of Abraham Levering, tavern keeper, in the town of Bethlehem, during morning of said day, a number of men, partly horsemen and foot, collected at the said house; the first few that came within reach were disarmed, but the prisoners who had been arrested in and about Millerstown, in Macungy township, came up to the said house in company with a number of horsemen, armed with pistols and swords; that, in a short time after, a number of other horsemen, well armed, partly in uniform, came up; about half an hour after came up also to the said house two parties of men on foot, well armed upon the whole; we suppose, to the amount of about or between eighty and one hundred; that there were various and numerous threats made that if the prisoners were not released they would proceed to violence. And further, that your deponents are fully assured that the laws of the United States cannot be executed under the present circumstances, as it is every day becoming more and more dangerous throughout all that part of the county of Northampton called Macungy, and Upper Milford, and several other places. And further saith not.

JACOB EYERLY,
STEPHEN BALLIOT.

Affirmed by the said Jacob Eyerly, and sworn by said Stephen Balliot, and subscribed before me,

WILLIAM HENRY.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, combinations to defeat the execution of the laws for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, within the United States, have existed in the counties of Northampton, Montgomery, and Bucks, in the State of Pennsylvania, and have proceeded in a manner subversive of the just authority of the Government, by misrepresentations to render the laws odious by deterring the public officers of the United States to forbear the execution of their functions, and by openly threatening their lives: And whereas, the endeavors of the well-affected citizens, as well as of the executive officers, to conciliate a compliance with those laws have failed of success; and certain persons in the county of Northampton aforesaid have been hardy enough to perpetrate certain acts, which I am advised amount to treason, being overt acts of levying war against the United States, the said persons exceeding one hundred in number, and armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, having, on the 7th day of this present month of March, proceeded to the house of Abraham Levering, in the town of Bethlehem, and there compelled William

Nichols, marshal of the United States in and for the district of Pennsylvania, to desist from the execution of certain legal process in his hands to be executed, and having compelled him to discharge and set at liberty certain persons whom he had arrested by virtue of criminal process, duly issued for offences against the United States, and having impeded and prevented the commissioner and the assessors, appointed in conformity with the laws aforesaid, in the county of Northampton aforesaid, by threats and personal injury, from executing the said laws; avowing, as the motives of these illegal and treasonable proceedings, an intention to prevent, by force of arms, the execution of the said laws, and to withstand, by open violence, the lawful authority of the Government of the United States: And whereas, by the constitution and laws of the United States, I am authorized, whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals, to call forth military force to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed: And whereas, it is, in my judgment, necessary to call forth military force, in order to suppress the combinations aforesaid, and to cause the laws aforesaid to be duly executed; and I have accordingly determined so to do, under the solemn conviction that the essential interests of the United States demand it: Wherefore, I, John Adams, President of the United States, do hereby command all persons, being insurgents as aforesaid, and all others whom it may concern, on or before Monday next, being the 18th day of this present month, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes; and I do moreover warn all persons whomsoever against aiding, abetting, or comforting the perpetrators of the aforesaid treasonable acts; and I do require all officers and others, good and faithful citizens, according to their respective duties and the laws of the land, to exert their utmost endeavors to prevent and suppress such dangerous and unlawful proceedings.

[L. s.] In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the 12th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1799, and of the independence of the said United States of America the twenty-third.

By the President:

JOHN ADAMS.
TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

Letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Pennsylvania.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 20, 1799.

To suppress the insurrection now existing in the counties of Northampton, Bucks, and Montgomery, in the State of Pennsylvania, in opposition to the laws of the United States, the President has thought it necessary to employ a military force, to be composed, in part, of such of the militia of Pennsylvania, whose situation and state of preparation will enable them to march with promptitude. The corps of militia first desired on this occasion are the troops of cavalry belonging to this city, and one troop from each of the counties of Philadelphia, Bucks, Chester, Montgomery, and Lancaster. These troops I have the honor to request your excellency will order to hold themselves in readiness to march on or before the 28th instant, under the command of Brigadier General McPherson.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES McHENRY.

His Excellency GOVERNOR MIFFLIN.

Instructions to General McPherson.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 21, 1799.

In pursuance of the President's proclamation, bearing date the 12th day of this month, it has become indispensable to determine upon and put in motion the military force proper to be employed for suppressing the insurrection in the counties of Northampton, Montgomery, and Bucks, in this State.

You will therefore be pleased to form a detachment from the volunteers, who have associated in the State of Pennsylvania, and been accepted by the President, as a part of the provisional army, to consist of the two volunteer companies of cavalry of the city of Philadelphia, to which you will add two or more of the troops of militia cavalry of the same city, now under orders to hold themselves in readiness to march, so as to compose a body of two hundred and forty horse, including non-commissioned officers, and proceed with the detachment, without delay, to the theatre of insurrection.

You will forthwith make returns of such articles as may yet be wanted for this detachment, that the necessary orders may be given for their delivery.

A paymaster for the volunteers and militia that may be employed ought to be appointed. You will please to name one who will be advanced a sum, on account, equal to one month's pay, for the companies now called into service.

You will cause correct muster and pay-rolls for the volunteers and militia called into actual service, in the usual forms, to be made out, with the view of rendering the settlement of the accounts for their services prompt and easy.

The quartermaster of the detachment, who will be appointed by the quartermaster general, will receive in advance from the quartermaster general a sum on account, which may be conceived adequate to the expenditure that may be incurred in this particular department.

Rations will be furnished by the contractor for supplying the same to the military within the State of Pennsylvania. It is presumed he will employ a proper agent or agents, and execute your orders with precision respecting provisions.

Doctor Joseph Strong will attend the expedition, in quality of surgeon, furnished with a competent supply of medicines and instruments.

As one object of the expedition is to assist the marshal of the district to make prisoners of, and hold amenable to justice, persons who have either resisted the service of legal process, or been concerned in rescuing from him those who were in his lawful custody, or for whom he may have process on other charges, and to conduct the prisoners to Philadelphia, you will perceive the propriety of applying your cavalry, in the manner best calculated, consistently with the safety of the detachment, to secure as many of the offenders at the same moment as possible.

You will inform the quartermaster general and the contractor of the precise time you design to put the detachment in motion, and make them acquainted with whatever it may be necessary for them to know, previously, in order to insure, as much as possible, no failure in your operations, from the want of means in either of their departments.

The marshal of the district of Pennsylvania will move with you, and give you the names of the offenders, their descriptions, and respective places of abode, who are to be made prisoners under criminal process. You will be particularly careful that the most criminal, or the ringleaders, be attended to, and in preference secured, and to prevent, by the most pointed orders, any insults to the inhabitants, or unnecessary rigor towards the prisoners taken.

It is left entirely to your discretion to determine upon your place or places of rendezvous, which should be such as are best calculated to enable the troops that may be stationary to defend themselves in case of attack, and also to aid as effectually as possible your parties of horse in their transit to and from their points of departure.

You will have observed that it is designed to give to the volunteer and militia cavalry selected by you a principal agency in suppressing the existing combinations against the laws, and of quelling an insurrection and rebellion against the Government and rightful authority of their country, at a time when its sovereignty and liberties are threatened by a powerful, implacable, and insidious nation, who have been accustomed to divide and conquer other nations. It is not doubted, therefore, but that they will exhibit a useful example upon this service of military promptitude, spirit, vigilance, discipline, and obedience of orders.

To be prepared for adverse contingencies, it will be proper that you continue the orders for holding themselves in readiness to march, at the shortest notice, to the volunteer companies and militia not immediately called into actual service.

To cover the active operations of the volunteer and militia cavalry, a company of infantry, under Captain Shoemaker, and a company of artillerists under Captain Irwin, from Carlisle, Pennsylvania, have been ordered to march and rendezvous at Reading; and a company of artillerists at Fort Mifflin, intended to rendezvous at the same place, is under orders to march at the shortest notice. Two companies of artillerists, from New York, and a party of infantry, recruits under Lieutenant Boote, supposed about thirty from New Brunswick, New Jersey, have been ordered to march to Newtown, Pennsylvania: these latter troops are on the establishment of the United States; expected to arrive at their first places of rendezvous on or about the 23d instant, and subject to your orders, to be stationed where their presence can produce the best effects, and employed in case circumstances should require their actual co-operation with the volunteers and militia.

If rebellion should acquire a strength demanding further force, you are, using a sound discretion, and keeping economy in view, fully authorized by the President to call into actual service the whole or any part of the volunteer and militia companies that have been ordered to be held in readiness in the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

It is expected that the detachment of volunteers and militia will be pushed forward, as rapidly as the season and roads will permit, to the point or points you may think proper to occupy with the regular troops, and to which your capturing parties may be instructed to conduct their prisoners.

You are earnestly requested to employ every moment of your time in accomplishing the objects of your command, conformably to these orders, and to keep constantly in mind that, if the offenders against the laws can be suddenly and unexpectedly secured, before they have time to prepare general resistance, it may extinguish the insurrection, without further expense to the United States, or call upon the patriotism or fortitude of our fellow-citizens. That you may have sufficient assistance in your own family to meet the eventual business the service may impose upon you, it is permitted to you to appoint a volunteer aid-de-camp, (should you conceive one to be necessary,) in addition to the aid allowed you by law, and to draw for him and his servant rations and forage.

You will be able to judge accurately upon the spot when opposition to the laws, and the spirit of revolt and insurrection, are so far suppressed in the disaffected counties as to admit the whole or part of the volunteers and militia to return to their homes and civil occupations. This will be ascertained when the inhabitants shall quietly permit the commissioners and assessors of the tax on land and houses to perform their respective duties according to law. Until this shall be the state of those counties, it will be proper to continue the military force there in convenient positions to produce a perfect submission to the authority of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES MCHENRY.

DEATH OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 19, 1799.

UNITED STATES, December 19, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The letter herewith transmitted will inform you that it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life our excellent fellow-citizen George Washington, by the purity of his character, and a long series of services to his country, rendered illustrious through the world. It remains for an affectionate and grateful people, in whose hearts he can never die, to pay suitable honors to his memory.

JOHN ADAMS.

SIR:

MOUNT VERNON, December 15, 1799.

It is with inexpressible grief that I have to announce to you the death of the great and the good General Washington. He died last evening, between ten and eleven o'clock, after a short illness of about twenty hours. His disorder was an inflammatory sore throat, which proceeded from a cold, of which he made but little complaint on Friday. On Saturday morning, about three o'clock, he became ill. Doctor Craik attended him in the morning, and Doctor Dick, of Alexandria, and Doctor Brown, of Port Tobacco, were soon after called in. Every medical assistance was offered, but without the desired effect. His last scene corresponded with the whole tenor of his life; not a groan, nor a complaint, escaped him in extreme distress. With perfect resignation, and in full possession of his reason, he closed his well-spent life.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,
TOBIAS LEAR.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Speaker, attended by the House of Representatives, withdrew to the house of the President of the United States; when Mr. Speaker addressed the President as follows:

SIR:

The House of Representatives, penetrated with a sense of the irreparable loss sustained by the nation in the death of that great and good man, the illustrious and beloved Washington, wait on you, sir, to express their condolence on this melancholy and distressing event.

To which the President replied as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I receive, with great respect and affection, the condolence of the House of Representatives on the melancholy and affecting event, in the death of the most illustrious and beloved personage which this country ever produced. I sympathize with you, with the nation, and with good men through the world, in this irreparable loss sustained by us all.

DEATH OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 23, 1799.

Mr. DEXTER, from the committee appointed for the purpose on the 18th instant, reported the draught of an address to the President of the United States, on the death of General George Washington, as follows:

To the President of the United States:

The Senate of the United States respectfully take leave, sir, to express to you their deep regret for the loss their country sustains in the death of General George Washington. This event, so distressing to all our fellow-citizens, must be peculiarly heavy to you, who have long been associated with him in deeds of patriotism. Permit us, sir, to mingle our tears with yours: on this occasion it is manly to weep. To lose such a man at such a crisis is no common calamity to the world. Our country mourns her father. The Almighty Disposer of human events has taken from us our greatest benefactor and ornament. It becomes us to submit with reverence to Him who "maketh darkness his pavilion."

With patriotic pride we review the life of our Washington, and compare him with those of other countries who have been pre-eminent in fame. Ancient and modern names are diminished before him. Greatness and guilt have too often been allied; but his fame is whiter than it is brilliant. The destroyers of nations stood abashed at the majesty of his virtue. It reproveth the intemperance of their ambition, and darkened the splendor of victory. The scene is closed, and we are no longer anxious lest misfortune should sully his glory; he has travelled on to the end of his journey, and carried with him an increasing weight of honor; he has deposited it safely, where misfortune cannot tarnish it, where malice cannot blast it. Favored of Heaven, he departed without exhibiting the weakness of humanity: magnanimous in death, the darkness of the grave could not obscure his brightness.

Such was the man whom we deplore. Thanks to God, his glory is consummated: Washington yet lives—on earth in his spotless example—his spirit is in heaven. Let his countrymen consecrate the memory of the heroic general, the patriotic statesman, and the virtuous sage. Let them teach their children never to forget that the fruit of his labors and his example are their inheritance.

[The Senate having agreed to the address, as reported by the committee, it was signed by "SAMUEL LIVERMORE, President of the Senate, pro tempore," and delivered by Mr. DEXTER to the President of the United States, to which the President made the following reply:]

Gentlemen of the Senate:

UNITED STATES, December 23, 1799.

I receive with the most respectful and affectionate sentiments, in this impressive address, the obliging expressions of your regret for the loss our country has sustained in the death of her most esteemed, beloved, and admired citizen.

In the multitude of my thoughts and recollections on this melancholy event, you will permit me only to say that I have seen him in the days of adversity, in some of the scenes of his deepest distress and most trying perplexities; I have also attended him in his highest elevation and most prosperous felicity, with uniform admiration of his wisdom, moderation, and constancy.

Among all our original associates in that memorable league of the continent in 1774, which first expressed the sovereign will of a free nation in America, he was the only one remaining in the General Government. Although with a constitution more enfeebled than his, at an age when he thought it necessary to prepare for retirement, I feel myself alone, bereaved of my last brother; yet I derive a strong consolation from the unanimous disposition which appears, in all ages and classes, to mingle their sorrows with mine on this common calamity to the world.

The life of our Washington cannot suffer by a comparison with those of other countries who have been most celebrated and exalted by fame. The attributes and decorations of royalty could have only served to eclipse the majesty of those virtues which made him, from being a modest citizen, a more resplendent luminary. Misfortune, had he lived, could hereafter have sullied his glory only with those superficial minds who, believing that characters and actions are marked by success alone, rarely deserve to enjoy it. Malice could never blast his honor, and envy made him a singular exception to her universal rule. For himself, he had lived enough to life and to glory. For his fellow-citizens, if their prayers could have been answered, he would have been immortal. For me, his departure is at a most unfortunate moment. Trusting, however, in the wise and righteous dominion of Providence over the passions of men, and the results of their counsels and actions, as well as over their lives, nothing remains for me but humble resignation.

His example is now complete, and it will teach wisdom and virtue to magistrates, citizens, and men, not only in the present age, but in future generations, as long as our history shall be read. If a Trajan found a Pliny, a Marcus Aurelius can never want biographers, eulogists, or historians.

OBSEQUIES OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 23, 1799.

Mr. DAYTON, from the joint committee appointed by the two Houses, on the 19th instant, to report measures suitable to the occasion, and expressive of the profound sorrow with which Congress is penetrated on the loss of their highly esteemed fellow-citizen, George Washington, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a marble monument be erected by the United States in the Capitol, at the city of Washington; and that the family of General Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it; and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life.

And be it further resolved, That there be a funeral procession from Congress Hall to the German Lutheran church, in honor of the memory of General George Washington, on Thursday the 26th instant, and that an oration be prepared, at the request of Congress, to be delivered before both Houses on that day; and that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be desired to request one of the members of Congress to prepare and deliver the same.

And be it further resolved, That it be recommended to the people of the United States to wear crape on the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct a copy of these resolutions to be transmitted to Mrs. Washington, assuring her of the profound respect Congress will ever bear to her person and character; of their condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, and entreating her assent to the interment of the remains of General George Washington, in the manner expressed in the first resolution.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to issue a proclamation, notifying to the people throughout the United States the recommendation contained in the third resolution.

FRENCH OFFICERS IMPRISONED AT BURLINGTON, NEW JERSEY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 27, 1799.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 24, 1799.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY has the honor to report, on the reference made to him on the 18th instant, by the House of Representatives of the United States, of the petition of sundry French officers, prisoners at Burlington:

That the person to whose charge the said prisoners were committed has been instructed, and has long since obeyed the instructions, to admit to the privileges of parole, within reasonable limits, such of them as could produce satisfactory evidence of being commissioned officers, and that in no instance where application has been made under proper circumstances, has permission to depart from the United States been refused to prisoners of this description.

That no specific provision having been made by law for the sustenance of French prisoners, they have been allowed, in some instances, more, but never less than one pound of bread, half a pound of meat, and one pound of vegetables each per day. That, deeming this allowance sufficient, no discrimination has been made between the officers and privates, except that the former have been permitted to draw either the provisions, or the value in money; and that, besides provisions, the prisoners have been furnished with coarse but comfortable clothing and blankets; and, when the season required it, with fuel.

The Secretary begs leave further to report, that it is a fact not to be doubted, that the American citizens, who have fallen into the hands of the agents of the French Government in the West Indies, have experienced treatment less indulgent than that of which the prisoners at Burlington complain; and that, in his opinion, neither humanity nor policy requires any change in the conduct heretofore observed towards French prisoners.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ORATION ON THE DEATH OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 30, 1799.

DEAR SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, December 27, 1799.

The enclosed resolutions, which unanimously passed the House of Representatives this day, will make known to you how highly they have been gratified with the manner in which you have performed the service assigned to you, in preparing and delivering a funeral oration on the death of General Washington. That our constituents may participate in the gratification we have received, from your having so well expressed those sentiments of respect for the character, of gratitude for the services, and of grief for the death of that illustrious personage, I flatter myself you will not hesitate to comply with the request of the House, by furnishing a copy of your oration, to be taken for publication.

Allow me, while performing this pleasing task of official duty, in communicating an act of the Representatives of the people, so just to you and so honorable to themselves, to embrace the opportunity to declare that

I am, personally, with great esteem and sincere regard,

Dear sir, your friend and obedient servant,

THEODORE SEDGWICK.

The Honorable Major Gen. LEE.

DEAR SIR:

FRANKLIN COURT, December 28, 1799.

I owe to the goodness of the House of Representatives the honor which their resolutions confer on my humble efforts to execute their wish.

I can never disobey their will, and therefore will furnish a copy of the oration delivered on the late afflicting occasion, much as I had flattered myself with a different disposition of it.

Sincerely reciprocating the personal considerations with which you honor me,

I am, very respectfully, sir, your friend and obedient servant,

HENRY LEE.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

In obedience to your* will, I rise your humble organ, with the hope of executing a part of the system of public mourning which you have been pleased to adopt, commemorative of the death of the most illustrious and most beloved personage this country has ever produced; and which, while it transmits to posterity your sense of the awful event, faintly represents your knowledge of the consummate excellence you so cordially honor.

Desperate indeed is any attempt on earth to meet correspondently this dispensation of Heaven; for, while with pious resignation we submit to the will of an all-gracious Providence, we can never cease lamenting in our finite view of Omnipotent Wisdom, the heart-rending privation for which our nation weeps. When the civilized world shakes to its centre; when every moment gives birth to strange and momentous changes; when our peaceful quarter of the globe, exempt as it happily has been from any share in the slaughter of the human race, may yet be compelled to abandon her pacific policy, and to risk the doleful casualties of war, what limit is there to the extent of our loss? None within the reach of my words to express; none which your feelings will not disavow.

The founder of our federate republic, our bulwark in war, our guide in peace, is no more. Oh that this was but questionable! Hope, the comforter of the wretched, would pour into our agonized hearts its balmy dew. But, alas! there is no hope for us: our Washington is removed forever. Possessing the stoutest frame, and purest mind, he had passed nearly to his sixty-eighth year, in the enjoyment of high health; when, habituated by his care of us to neglect himself, a slight cold, disregarded, became inconvenient on Friday, oppressive on Saturday, and, defying every medical interposition, before the morning of Sunday put an end to the best of men. An end did I say?—his fame survives! bounded only by the limits of the earth, and by the extent of the human mind. He survives in our hearts, in the growing knowledge of our children, in the affection of the good throughout the world; and when our monuments shall be done away, when nations now existing shall be no more, when even our young and far-spreading empire shall have perished, still will our Washington's glory unfaded shine, and die not, until love of virtue cease on earth, or earth itself sink into chaos.

* The two Houses of Congress.

How, my fellow-citizens, shall I single to your grateful hearts his pre-eminent worth! Where shall I begin in opening to your view a character throughout sublime? Shall I speak of his warlike achievements, all springing from obedience to his country's will—all directed to his country's good?

Will you go with me to the banks of the Monongahela, to see your youthful Washington, supporting, in the dismal hour of Indian victory, the ill-fated Braddock, and saving, by his judgment and by his valor, the remains of a defeated army, pressed by the conquering savage foe? Or, when oppressed America, nobly resolving to risk her all in defence of her violated rights, he was elevated by the unanimous voice of Congress to the command of her armies? Will you follow him to the high grounds of Boston, where to an undisciplined, courageous, and virtuous yeomanry, his presence gave the stability of system, and infused the invincibility of love of country? Or shall I carry you to the painful scenes of Long Island, York Island, and New Jersey; when, combating superior and gallant armies, aided by powerful fleets, and led by chiefs high in the roll of fame, he stood the bulwark of our safety; undismayed by disaster; unchanged by change of fortune? Or will you view him in the precarious fields of Trenton, where deep gloom unnerving every arm, reigned triumphant through our thinned, worn down, unaided ranks, himself unmoved? Dreadful was the night—it was about this time of winter—the storm raged—the Delaware, rolling furiously with floating ice, forbade the approach of man. Washington, self-collected, viewed the tremendous scene; his country called; unappalled by surrounding dangers, he passed to the hostile shore: he fought; he conquered. The morning sun cheered the American world. Our country rose on the event; and her dauntless chief, pursuing his blow, completed in the lawns of Princeton what his vast soul had conceived on the shores of Delaware.

Thence to the strong ground of Morristown he led his small but gallant band; and through an eventful winter, by the high efforts of his genius, whose matchless force was measurable only by the growth of difficulties, he held in check formidable hostile legions, conducted by a chief experienced in the art of war, and famed for his valor on the ever-memorable Heights of Abraham, where fell Wolfe, Montcalm, and since our much-lamented Montgomery, all covered with glory. In this fortunate interval, produced by his masterly conduct, our fathers, ourselves, animated by his resistless example, rallied around our country's standard, and continued to follow her beloved chief through the various and trying scenes to which the destinies of our Union led.

Who is there that has forgotten the vales of Brandywine, the fields of Germantown, or the plains of Monmouth? Every where present, wants of every kind obstructing, numerous and valiant armies encountering, himself a host, he assuaged our sufferings, limited our privations, and upheld our tottering republic. Shall I display to you the spread of the fire of his soul, by rehearsing the praises of the hero of Saratoga, and his much-loved compeer of the Carolinas? No; our Washington wears not borrowed glory. To Gates—to Green—he gave without reserve the applause due to their eminent merit; and long may the chiefs of Saratoga and of Eutaw receive the grateful respect of a grateful people.

Moving in his own orbit, he imparted heat and light to his most distant satellites; and combining the physical and moral force of all within his sphere; with irresistible weight he took his course, commiserating folly, disdaining vice, dismaying treason, and invigorating despondency, until the auspicious hour arrived; when, united with the intrepid forces of a potent and magnanimous ally, he brought to submission the since conqueror of India; thus finishing his long career of military glory with a lustre corresponding to his great name, and in this his last act of war affixing the seal of fate to our nation's birth.

To the horrid din of battle sweet peace succeeded; and our virtuous chief, mindful only of the common good, in a moment tempting personal aggrandizement, hushed the discontents of growing sedition, and surrendering his power into the hands from which he had received it, converted his sword into a ploughshare, teaching an admiring world that to be truly great you must be truly good.

Were I to stop here, the picture would be incomplete, and the task imposed unfinished. Great as was our Washington in war, and much as did that greatness contribute to produce the American republic, it is not in war alone his pre-eminence stands conspicuous: his various talents combining all the capacities of the statesman with those of the soldier, fitted him alike to guide the councils and the armies of our nation. Scarcely had he rested from his martial toils, while his invaluable parental advice was still sounding in our ears, when he who had been our shield and our sword was called forth to act a less splendid but a more important part.

Possessing a clear and penetrating mind, a strong and a sound judgment, calmness and temper for deliberation, with invincible firmness and perseverance in resolutions maturely formed, drawing information from all, acting from himself, with incorruptible integrity and unvarying patriotism; his own superiority and the public confidence alike marked him as the man designed by Heaven to lead in the great political as well as military events which have distinguished the era of his life.

The finger of an overruling Providence, pointing at Washington, was neither mistaken nor unobserved; when, to realize the vast hopes to which our revolution had given birth, a change of political system became indispensable.

How novel—how grand the spectacle! independent States stretched over an immense territory, and known only by common difficulty, clinging to their Union as the rock of their safety, deciding by frank comparison of their relative condition, to rear on that rock, under the guidance of reason, a common Government, through whose commanding protection, liberty and order, with their long train of blessings, should be safe to themselves, and the sure inheritance of their posterity.

This arduous task devolved on citizens selected by the people, from knowledge of their wisdom and confidence in their virtue. In this august assembly of sages and of patriots, Washington of course was found; and, as if acknowledged to be most wise, where all were wise, with one voice he was declared their chief. How well he merited this rare distinction, how faithful were the labors of himself and his compatriots, the work of their hands and our Union, strength and prosperity, the fruits of that work, best attest.

But to have essentially aided in presenting to his country this consummation of her hopes, neither satisfied the claims of his fellow-citizens on his talents, nor those duties which the possession of those talents imposed. Heaven had not infused into his mind such an uncommon share of its ethereal spirit to remain unemployed, nor bestowed on him his genius unaccompanied with the corresponding duty of devoting it to the common good. To have framed a constitution, was showing only, without realizing, the general happiness. This great work remained to be done, and America, steadfast in her preference, with one voice summoned her beloved Washington, unpractised as he was in the duties of civil administration, to execute this last act in the completion of the national felicity. Obedient to her call, he assumed the high office with that self-distrust peculiar to his innate modesty, the constant attendant of pre-eminent virtue. What was the burst of joy through our anxious land on this exhilarating event is known to us all. The aged, the young, the brave, the fair, rivalled each other in demonstrations of their gratitude; and this high-wrought delightful scene was heightened in its effect, by the singular contest between the zeal of the bestowers, and the avoidance of the receiver of the honors bestowed. Commencing his administration, what heart is not charmed with the recollection of the pure and wise principles announced by himself, as the basis of his political life. He best understood the indissoluble union between virtue and happiness, between duty and advantage, between the genuine maxims of an honest and magnanimous policy, and the solid rewards of public prosperity and individual felicity: watching with an equal and comprehensive eye over this great assemblage of communities and interests, he laid the foundation of our national policy in the unerring immutable principles of morality, based on religion, exemplifying the pre-eminence of free Government, by all the attributes which win the affections of its citizens, or command the respect of the world.

“ O fortunatos nimium, sua si bona norint! ”

Leading through the complicated difficulties produced by previous obligations and conflicting interests, seconded by succeeding Houses of Congress, enlightened and patriotic, he surmounted all original obstructions, and brightened the path of our national felicity.

The Presidential term expiring, his solicitude to exchange exaltation for humility returned with a force increased with increase of age, and he had prepared his farewell address to his countrymen, proclaiming his intention, when the united interposition of all around him, enforced by the eventful prospects of the epoch, produced a further sacrifice of inclination to duty. The election of President followed; and Washington, by the unanimous vote of the nation, was called to resume the Chief Magistracy. What a wonderful fixture of confidence! Which attracts most our admiration—a people so correct, or a citizen combining an assemblage of talents forbidding rivalry, and stifling even envy itself? Such a nation ought to be happy; such a chief must be forever revered.

War, long menaced by the Indian tribes, now broke out; and the terrible conflict, deluging Europe with blood, began to shed its baneful influence over our happy land. To the first, outstretching his invincible arm, under the orders of the gallant Wayne, the American eagle soared triumphant through distant forests. Peace followed victory, and the melioration of the condition of the enemy followed peace. Godlike virtue, which uplifts even the subdued savage.

To the second he opposed himself. New and delicate was the conjuncture, and great was the stake. Soon did his penetrating mind discern and seize the only course; continuing to us all the felicity enjoyed. He issued his proclamation of neutrality. This index to his whole subsequent conduct was sanctioned by the approbation of both Houses of Congress, and by the approving voice of the people.

To this sublime policy he inviolably adhered, unmoved by foreign intrusion, unshaken by domestic turbulence.

“ Justum et tenacem propositi virum
 “ Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
 “ Non vultus instantis tyranni
 “ Mente quatit solida.”

Maintaining his pacific system at the expense of no duty, America, faithful to herself and unstained in her honor, continued to enjoy the delights of peace, while afflicted Europe mourns in every quarter, under the accumulated miseries of an unexampled war; miseries in which our happy country must have shared, had not our pre-eminent Washington been as firm in council as he was brave in the field.

Pursuing steadfastly his course, he held safe the public happiness, preventing foreign war, and quelling internal discord, till the revolving period of a third election approached, when he executed his interrupted but inextinguishable desire of returning to the humble walks of private life.

The promulgation of his fixed resolution stopped the anxious wishes of an affectionate people from adding a third unanimous testimonial of their unabated confidence in the man so long enthroned in their hearts. When, before, was affection like this exhibited on earth? Turn over the records of ancient Greece—review the annals of mighty Rome—examine the volumes of modern Europe—you search in vain. America and her Washington only afford the dignified exemplification.

The illustrious personage called by the national voice in succession to the arduous office of guiding a free people, had new difficulties to encounter; the amicable effort of settling our difficulties with France, begun by Washington, and pursued by his successor in virtue as in station, proving abortive, America took measures of self-defence. No sooner was the public mind roused by prospect of danger, than every eye was turned to the friend of all, though secluded from public view, and grey in public service; the virtuous veteran, following his plough,* received the unexpected summons with mingled emotions of indignation at the unmerited ill-treatment of his country, and of a determination once more to risk his all in her defence.

The annunciation of these feelings, in his affecting letter to the President accepting the command of the army, concludes his official conduct.

First in war—first in peace—and first in the hearts of his countrymen, he was second to none in the humble and endearing scenes of private life; pious, just, humane, temperate, and sincere; uniform, dignified, and commanding; his example was as edifying to all around him, as were the effects of that example lasting.

To his equals he was condescending, to his inferiors kind, and to the dear object of his affections exemplarily tender; correct throughout, vice shuddered in his presence, and virtue always felt his fostering hand; the purity of his private character gave effulgence to his public virtues.

His last scene comported with the whole tenor of his life. Although in extreme pain, not a sigh, not a groan escaped him; and with undisturbed serenity he closed his well-spent life. Such was the man America has lost—such was the man for whom our nation mourns.

Methinks I see his august image, and hear falling from his venerable lips these deep sinking words:

“ Cease, sons of America, lamenting our separation: go on, and confirm by your wisdom the fruits of our joint councils, joint efforts, and common dangers; reverence religion, diffuse knowledge throughout your land, patronize the arts and sciences; let liberty and order be inseparable companions; control party spirit, the bane of free Governments; observe good faith to, and cultivate peace with, all nations; shut up every avenue to foreign influence; contract rather than extend national connexion; rely on yourselves only; be American in thought, word, and deed: thus will you give immortality to that Union, which was the constant object of my terrestrial labors; thus will you preserve, undisturbed, to the latest posterity, the felicity of a people to me most dear; and thus will you supply (if my happiness is now aught to you) the only vacancy in the round of pure bliss high Heaven bestows.”

REMOVAL OF THE REMAINS OF GENERAL GEORGE WASHINGTON TO THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 8, 1800.

UNITED STATES, January 6, 1800.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request in one of the resolutions of Congress, of the 21st of December last, I transmitted a copy of those resolutions by my Secretary, Mr. Shaw, to Mrs. Washington, assuring her of the profound respect Congress will ever bear to her person and character; of their condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, and entreating her assent to the interment of the remains of General George Washington, in the manner expressed in the first resolution. As the sentiments of that virtuous lady, not less beloved by this nation than she is at present greatly afflicted, can never be so well expressed as in her own words, I transmit to Congress her original letter.

It would be an attempt of too much delicacy to make any comments upon it; but there can be no doubt that the nation at large, as well as all the branches of the Government, will be highly gratified by any arrangement which may diminish the sacrifice she makes of her individual feelings.

JOHN ADAMS.

SIR:

MOUNT VERNON, December 31, 1799.

While I feel with keenest anguish the late dispensation of Divine Providence, I cannot be insensible to the mournful tributes of respect and veneration which are paid to the memory of my dear deceased husband; and as his best services and most anxious wishes were always devoted to the welfare and happiness of his country, to know that they were truly appreciated and gratefully remembered affords no inconsiderable consolation.

Taught by the great example which I have so long had before me, never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I must consent to the request made by Congress, which you have had the goodness to transmit to me; and in doing this, I need not, I cannot, say what a sacrifice of individual feeling I make to a sense of public duty.

With grateful acknowledgments, and unfeigned thanks for the personal respect and evidences of condolence expressed by Congress and yourself,

I remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

MARTHA WASHINGTON.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 14, 1800.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

UNITED STATES, January 14, 1800.

As the enclosed letter, from a member of your House, received by me on the night of Saturday, the 11th instant, relates to the privileges of the House, which, in my opinion, ought to be inquired into in the House itself, if any where, I have thought proper to submit the whole letter and its tendencies to your consideration, without any other comment on its matter or style.

But as no gross impropriety of conduct on the part of persons holding commissions in the army or navy of the United States ought to pass without due animadversion, I have directed the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the conduct complained of, and to report to me, without delay, such a statement of facts as will enable me to decide on the course which duty and justice shall appear to prescribe.

JOHN ADAMS.

CHAMBER OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE U. S.

SIR:

11th January, 24th of Independence.

Known to you only as holding, in common with yourself, the honorable station of servant to the same sovereign people, and disclaiming all pretensions to make to you any application which, in the general estimation of men, requires the preface of apology, I shall, without the circumlocution of compliment, proceed to state the cause which induces this address.

For words of a general nature, uttered on the floor of this House, and addressed, in my official capacity, to the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and urged with a view to effect the reduction of a military establishment, I have been grossly and publicly insulted, by two officers of the army or navy, I know not which, with evident intention to provoke me to a conduct which, in some sort, might justify the hostile designs which they manifestly entertained towards me, and from the execution of which, I believe, they were only deterred by the presence of several of my friends, (members of this House,) who felt themselves implicated in an insult, which, although more particularly offered to one, was certainly levelled at all.

I am acquainted with the name of one only of these unfortunate young men, who appear to have made so false an estimate of true dignity of character, who seem to have mistaken brutality for spirit, and an armed combination against the person of an individual for an indication of courage. He was called, I think, McKnight; rank unknown; and, to my best recollection, of the navy. Mr. Christie, a member of this House, appeared to know him; and that gentleman, with Captain Campbell Smith, who, as I understood, endeavored to deter those rash youths from their scheme, and whose conduct would evince, if indeed there were any need of proof, that the character of the man and the citizen is not incompatible with the profession of the soldier, can give an account of the various instances of misconduct which were exhibited by the parties. Mr. Van Rensselaer, the Lieutenant Governor of New York, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Glen, and Mr. Macon, of the House of Representatives, were likewise present at these transactions.

Having stated the fact, it would be derogatory to your character, sir, for me to point out the remedy, which it is your province to provide; nor shall I descend from the respect which I owe myself to declare what are not the considerations which govern my conduct on this occasion. So far as they relate to this application addressed to you in a public capacity, they can only be supposed by you to be of a public nature; and it is enough for me to state that the independence of the Legislature has been attacked; the majesty of the people, of which you are the principal representative, insulted; and your authority contemned. In their name, I demand that a provision commensurate with the evil be made, and which will be calculated to deter others from any future attempt to introduce the reign of terror into our country. In addressing you in the plain language of man, I give you, sir, the best proof that I can afford of the estimation in which I hold your office and your understanding; and I assure you, with truth, that I am, with respect,

Your fellow-citizen,

JOHN RANDOLPH, JUN.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 20, 1800.

Mr. CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, from the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 14th instant, together with a letter from John Randolph, Jun., a member of the House, accompanying the same, made the following report:

In executing the task assigned to them, it is with peculiar satisfaction your committee notice the respect shown in his message by the President of the United States to the rights and privileges of the House.

On the style of the letter to the President referred to the consideration of the committee, they forbear any other remark than to express their regret that a member of this House has conceived himself justified in deviating from the forms of decorum customary in official communications to the Chief Magistrate of the United States, justly due to his office and character, and essential to that harmony between the different branches of the Government which should be circumspectly cherished by their respective members.

In Mr. Randolph's letter he states, that for words of a general nature, uttered in debate, in the House of Representatives, on a proposition for reducing the army, he had been publicly and grossly insulted by several persons, officers of the army or navy, and demands of the Executive authority redress for an attack on his independence and rights as a legislator.

Your committee being of opinion that the matter of complaint respects the privileges of the House, inherent in its own body and there exclusively cognizable, cannot but consider the appeal in this instance to the Executive authority, however otherwise intended, as derogating from those rights of the House with which are intimately connected both its honor and independence, and the inviolability of its members.

Your committee further report that, on inquiry, they found James McKnight, captain, and Michael Reynolds, lieutenant of marines, to be the persons implicated in Mr. Randolph's charge. They, on notice, appeared before the committee, and denied the truth of the allegations. The committee have collected all the evidence they could find to be material in the case, and heard the parties accused with their witnesses; and although they believe a series of circumstances to have taken place at the theatre on the evening of Friday, the 10th instant, which appeared to Mr. Randolph and others present to evince premeditated insult towards him, yet as some of those circumstances have been satisfactorily explained, and others are of a nature too equivocal to justify reprehension and punishment, your committee are of opinion that sufficient cause does not appear for the interference of the House on the ground of a breach of their privileges.

Your committee have taken the evidence in writing, which they submit to the consideration of the House, with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House entertain a respectful sense of the regard which the President of the United States has shown to its rights and privileges in his message of the 14th instant, accompanied by a letter addressed to him by John Randolph, Jun., a member of this House.

Resolved, That in respect to the charge alleged by John Randolph, Jun., a member of the House, in his letter addressed to the President of the United States on the 11th instant, and by him submitted to the consideration of the House, that sufficient cause does not appear for the interposition of this House on the ground of a breach of its privileges.

Mr. Randolph, Junior's, statement to the committee.

SIR:

JANUARY 18, 1800, 24th year of independence.

A mature consideration of the subject induces me to suspect that a refusal on my part to communicate the information requested by you a few days ago could only have originated in a false delicacy, under the impulse of which I am determined never to act. I shall, therefore, proceed to state some instances of the misconduct of Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds, on the night of Friday, the 10th instant.

Exclusive of repeated allusions to what passed in the House of Representatives during the debate of the preceding day, and a frequent repetition of some words which fell from me during that discussion, in a manner so marked as to leave no doubt on my mind or that of Messrs. Van Rensselaer, Christie, or Macon, of their intention to insult me personally; finding me determined to take no notice of their words, they adopted a conduct which placed their designs beyond every possibility of doubt, and which they probably conceived to be calculated to force me into their measures. Mr. Christie had left his seat between me and the partition of the box; after which Mr. Van Rensselaer, who sat on the other side of me, lay down, so as to occupy a more than ordinary portion of room, and occasioned my removal to a part of Mr. Christie's former seat, leaving a very small vacancy between myself and the partition; into this Lieutenant Reynolds suddenly, and without requesting or giving time for room to be made for him, dropped with such violence as to bring our hips into contact; the shock was sufficient to occasion a slight degree of pain on my part, and for which it is probable he would in some degree have apologized had not the act been intentional.

Just before I left the box, one of them, I believe McKnight, gave me a sudden and violent pull by the cape of my coat; upon my demanding who it was, (this was the first instance in which I noticed their proceedings,) no answer was given; I then added, that I had long perceived an intention to insult me, and that the person offering it was a puppy. No reply that I heard was given.

It will be impossible for me, sir, to specify the various minute actions of these persons and their associates which tended to the same point. Suffice it to say that their whole deportment exhibited an insolence, and their every act betokened a bold defiance, which can neither be defined nor mistaken; and which, according to the general received opinions of the world, would not only have justified but *demand*ed chastisement.

Referring the committee to the numerous and authentic accounts of this transaction, which the gentlemen present are so well calculated to give, I remain, with respect, sir, your fellow-citizen,

JOHN RANDOLPH, JUN.

*The chairman of the committee to whom was referred the President's letter,

Mr. Christie's affidavit.

On the 17th January, 1800, came the subscriber before the Hon. C. Goodrich, chairman of a committee of Congress, and being sworn, deposed and saith, that, on Friday evening, the 10th of January, I was sitting in a box of the theatre; I was shortly after joined by Mr. Randolph, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Macon, Mr. Baer, Mr. Glen, General Van Cortlandt, and Mr. Van Rensselaer, of New York; they all took seats near me; shortly after Mr. Baer went out of the box; the others remained; after the play was over, and about the time that the farce was beginning, I discovered in an adjoining box Captain McKnight and a gentleman, whose name I have since found to be Reynolds, both officers of the navy; I saw also in company with them Captain George Taylor, of this city; I saw them repeatedly look towards our box, and whispering to each other. When the procession came forward on the stage, Captain McKnight called out that they were well-looking mercenaries; I then began to discover, what I had before suspected, that some of these gentlemen intended to offer Mr. Randolph or some of us an insult, on account of the part we took in the House of Representatives respecting the army. It was my intention to have left the theatre early, but I remained, fearing a disturbance would take place between Mr. Randolph and these gentlemen, who manifestly evinced an intention of insulting him; Mr. Randolph took no notice of any thing that was said; and I overheard a person (who it was I know not) say to Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds, "He does not hear you, go nearer to him;" Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds then left the box they were in, and came round into that in which we were, and got as close to Mr. Randolph as they could; so near as to touch him; Captain Taylor did not leave the box at the time they did, but remained behind; Captain McKnight called out to Captain Taylor, what do you think of these ragamuffins—these ragamuffins are not Pennsylvanians, they are black Virginia ragamuffins; Captain Taylor laughed, but made no reply; Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds afterwards repeated the words mercenaries and ragamuffins, and said that they were not well drilled, but would be better at the next session of Congress. Finding that none of us took any notice of what was said, Mr. Reynolds stepped with his feet on the seat on which Mr. Randolph was sitting, and sat down, although there was little or no room for a seat; he crowded Mr. Randolph in sitting down, and I believe sat upon his thigh; Mr. Randolph moved, to give as much room as he could. Mr. Reynolds remained for about fifteen minutes, and stepped back, upon which Captain McKnight came forward and took his place, observing the same conduct as Mr. Reynolds had done in sitting down. Captain McKnight spoke to me, and I gave him my hand; Captain George Taylor then came round to our box, and took his place at the back of Captain McKnight, and used once or twice the word mercenaries, and appeared to me to understand fully the intentions of Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds, and appeared to be desirous of forwarding their views; they all three remained in the box until the farce was over, and as Mr. Randolph got up to go out, I heard him call out "who was that that pulled me by the coat?" I looked, and saw Captain McKnight, Mr. Reynolds, and Captain Taylor, at his back; I got before them, and walked with Mr. Randolph; in going out of the lobby, a gentleman, whose name I do not know, told me not to leave that gentleman, (meaning Mr. Randolph,) for it was the intention of these persons to use him ill; I therefore walked with him to the head of the stairs, and in going down was pressed on so closely by Captain McKnight and others, that it was with difficulty I could keep on my feet; I looked back and called out to them not to crowd me, and they desisted; in going out of the house, Captain Taylor and Captain McKnight came arm in arm and pushed by us, and would hardly get out of our way, but walked slowly before us to the corner of Fifth street, when we turned off; Captain McKnight called to me and wished me good night, which compliment I returned. From the whole of the conduct, it appeared to me evidently the intention of the whole three to provoke Mr. Randolph to reply to their observations, so as to bring on a quarrel; that Captain McKnight and Mr. Reynolds did jostle Mr. Randolph on his seat, and used many expressions that fell from Mr. Randolph in the House of Representatives in the debate on the reduction of the army; and it appeared to me that they had taken offence at these expressions, and were determined to provoke him to a quarrel.

G. CHRISTIE.

Sworn to, on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1800, before me,

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH,

On the evening of Friday, the 10th instant, I went to the theatre, in company with Mr. Nicholas, Mr. Stone, Mr. Macon, and Mr. Randolph. When we reached the theatre, our company accidentally separated; Mr. Macon, Mr. Randolph, and myself going into one box. After remaining there some time, we were joined by Mr. Van Rensselaer, the Lieutenant Governor of New York, and General Cortlandt, of the House of Representatives. General Cortlandt and myself were seated on one of the front benches, and, as I was attending to the play, I did not hear the remarks which are said to have been made with the view of insulting Mr. Randolph. During the performance of the afterpiece, I was called out by Captain Campbell Smith, who informed me that he had understood Mr. Randolph had been insulted by some officers, and inquired if I had heard any thing of it; at the same time stating the cause to be Mr. Randolph's observations of that day or the day before in Congress. I told Captain Smith I had heard nothing of it, and asked him about the kind of insult which had been offered; he answered that he was not present himself, but from what he had heard he was apprehensive of some disagreeable consequences. I remained in the upper part of the box, where I could see every thing passing in front, and observed with attention the two officers who had been pointed out to me; they were in conversation, but I was not near enough to hear it distinctly. Their names, I am told, are McKnight and Reynolds; the one dressed in plain clothes, or perhaps his coat might have been trimmed with a light edging of buff cloth; the other in a blue and red uniform, with a sword. At the conclusion of the entertainment, I stepped forward, with the intention of protecting Mr. Randolph from any injury, and at the same time called to him to know if he would walk. He, with Mr. Macon and a number of others, had risen from their seats, and were going out of the box. As one, if not both, of the officers remained behind, I suffered Mr. Randolph to pass me, designing to follow closely after him. At that time I saw Mr. McKnight throw himself forward, with one arm extended, and at the same moment heard Mr. Randolph call out "who was that that jerked my coat!"—Mr. McKnight passing by him just then. Mr. Randolph made the same exclamation a second time, and added that the person was a damned puppy, let him be who he might. Upon reaching the large passage, Mr. Macon, Mr. Christie, with several others, surrounded Mr. Randolph, and, in going down stairs, I felt myself pushed with great violence, as I thought for the purpose of throwing me upon Mr. Randolph. I found it necessary to resist the pressure, which I believe would have been impossible if I had not been a very heavy man. Whether Mr. McKnight was the person who jerked Mr. Randolph's coat, or whether those two officers were concerned in attempting to push him down stairs, I will not pretend to say. I have stated the facts as nearly as I can recollect them, and from those facts the committee will draw their own inferences.

It is necessary to add, that when Mr. McKnight threw himself forward in the box, as above stated, there were two persons passing between him and me, which prevented me from seeing whether he took hold of Mr. Randolph or not. The staircase was darker than usual, owing, I believe, to the lamps having burnt out, the hour being later than common; and this prevented me from seeing those persons who were passing forward with so much violence.

JOSEPH H. NICHOLSON.

Sworn to, on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1800, before me,

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH,

Chairman of a committee of House of Rep's U. S.

I was at the play last Friday night, and in the same box with Mr. Randolph and others. Some time after the play had been begun, the door of the box in which we were was opened so often that I turned towards the door to see who opened it, and what it could be for, but did not then discover any one going out or coming in, though I saw several people who had come into the box and taken seats behind us. Still looking towards the door, I saw a young man, with a blue coat, go out. Soon afterwards the door was opened again; I looked back, and saw him behind us, in company with a man who had on a uniform coat; others were also behind us. These men were frequently going out of the box, and, after a little time, returning again. I do not recollect to have heard either of them say a single word until the farce was begun, when the man dressed in blue said, these ragamuffins march very well, (the players were then marching.) At this time, I think, a third person was with them, who had on a great coat; if he was not, he was with them very soon after. The same words were quickly repeated by the same person standing near Mr. Randolph, who was sitting. Mr. Van Rensselaer, who sat by Mr. Randolph, and nearly behind me, then said to me, these men intend to insult Mr. Randolph; I answered, it appeared much like it. The word ragamuffin was afterwards used, though I do not know by which of the three. After this, when some of the players appeared in a different dress, words were spoken by one of these three men, which I do not know, nor could I hear them plain enough to understand clearly what they said. At another time, when the players were marching, one of these men, I know not which, said, these ragamuffins march badly; they want drilling, and will do better by another session. The man with the great coat did not, I think, stay long in the box, nor am I certain that he was there when these last words were spoken. The one with the uniform coat staid more in the box after the farce was begun than either of the others. The one with the blue coat continued to go out and to return. Both these men were in the box, I think, at the time we got up to go out. During the farce, and when the scenery was changing, Mr. Randolph stood up before his seat; as soon as he rose, the man who had on the uniform coat (and at this time I saw that he had a sword) stepped on his seat, and stood on it, until Mr. Randolph sat down; he then stepped off the seat, and immediately crowded in between Mr. Randolph and the side of the box, where there did not appear to be room for him to sit either with pleasure or ease. Mr. Randolph instantly made what room he could for him; he did not continue long in his new seat, but got up again, and stood behind us, where he had room either to stand or sit.

As we were going out of the box, about the time the farce was finishing, Mr. Randolph being near the door and before me, I heard him ask who had taken hold of him, and said that whoever he was must be a puppy. I got to him as quick as I could, and before he went out of the box; several people were near him when I got to him; he went out of the box; we followed him; as soon as we had got clear of the box, a man said to Mr. Christie, keep near to that man, meaning, as I understood, Mr. Randolph; we walked to the stairs; Mr. Randolph went down before me; as I stepped on the stairs, I took hold of the hand of the man next to me, (I think it was General Van Cortlandt,) and supported myself with the other as well as I could, and it was with great difficulty that I was able to prevent being pushed down; some person behind me (I think it was Mr. Christie) said to those behind him, do not push so hard. Messrs. Van Rensselaer, Glen, and Christie were nearer these men than myself, and may have heard their expressions more distinctly than I did.

Sir:

The above is a statement of the facts you asked for. I have endeavored to keep it clear of the impressions that were made on me at the time.

NATHANIEL MACON.

Mr. CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, Chairman of the committee.

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH,
Chairman of a committee of House of Rep's U. S.

PHILADELPHIA, January 14, 1800.

HENRY GLEN, a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, saith:

That in the evening of Friday, the 10th of this month, he went, in company with the Hon. Stephen Van Rensselaer, Lieutenant Governor of the State of New York, to the theatre in this city. Finding vacant seats, we placed ourselves in a front box, where were Mr. Macon and Mr. Randolph, both members of the House of Representatives. I seated myself by the side of Mr. Macon, and the Lieutenant Governor took a seat by the side of Mr. Randolph. Looking round, I found Messrs. Baer, Christie, and Nicholson, all members of the House, were behind, not far from us.

After a very short time, two gentlemen in uniform, whom I took to be marine officers, came near, and were with us in the same box. In course of the entertainments nothing happened, to my knowledge, to interrupt the cheerfulness and good-humor which prevailed amongst us.

When the afterpiece was performing, a number of men, with a drum, pikes, &c., appeared on the stage; upon a view of this scene, one of the gentlemen in uniform, addressing himself, as I supposed, to his companion, said, "I think our ragamuffins would make a better appearance than those men," or words to that effect. No particular notice appeared to be taken of the expression, and, as soon as the curtain was dropped, the officers back of us went out; so did the other gentlemen who were with us.

The Lieutenant Governor and I remained a little time in the box till the crowd had passed, and I saw none of the gentlemen before mentioned afterwards. This statement is made according to my best recollection.

HENRY GLEN.

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH,
Chairman of a committee of House of Reps. U. S.

PHILADELPHIA, January 15, 1800.

In obedience to the request of the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, with the letter of Mr. Randolph, a member of your House, complaining of his having been insulted by two officers of the army or navy, as signified in the note of the honorable Mr. Goodrich to me of this day, I have only to state that I was not present or within hearing when the abuse, as alleged, took place; that I went into the theatre at a late period of the exhibition, and but a very little time before the first part was completed, and was sitting, in company with Colonel Butler, in one of the lower boxes, when a gentleman of our acquaintance came and informed me of what had happened above, relative to Mr. Randolph and the officers, but whose expressions I do not now recollect; that immediately, aware in my own mind of the imprudence of such conduct in such a place, and apprehensive that some of my military acquaintances might be there, I went up stairs to the door of the box in which Mr. Randolph and some other members of Congress were sitting; at the door of the box, I met a gentleman of this city whom I knew, and of whom I asked the question, "Who is that gentleman in uniform?" looking at an officer in the box, and received for answer that he did not know, but if I wished to be acquainted with him, he would introduce me to Captain McKnight who was there, and who would introduce him to me; this, however, did not take place at this time. I afterwards discovered a member from Maryland, of my acquaintance, in the adjoining box, of whom I inquired if he knew what had happened? He answered in the negative; I told him what I had heard, and that I was apprehensive a fracas might ensue; in moving through the house, I met an officer of the army, to whom I mentioned my information and apprehensions; he accorded with me in opinion, and we went to the door of the box in which Mr. Randolph was. Here a tender was again made to me, by the same gentleman, of an introduction to Captain McKnight, which did not, however, occur; we went to another part of the house, and returned some little time afterwards, when, something being said which I do not now remember, the gentleman before alluded to called out Captain McKnight, and introduced me to him; the captain called out the gentleman in uniform, whose name I had inquired, and introduced him to me as Lieutenant Reynolds. Just after the usual salutes had occurred, our attention was called to the stage, and the captain and lieutenant returned (as I supposed) to their seats in the box, and I went to an opposite quarter of the house.

When the entertainments closed, I went out amongst the first, and stood on the pavement above the theatre, till I saw Mr. Randolph come out with several members of Congress; in their rear were the captain and lieutenant. They all moved down Chestnut street, I followed them to the corner of Sixth, and turned up and retired to my quarters.

The next evening I was in company with Mr. Randolph and several other members of Congress, when the occurrence at the theatre on the night before was talked of; from which company, as I retired, Mr. Randolph followed me into the entry of the house, and observed to me that he had taken the liberty to mention my name in a letter which he had that morning written to the President of the United States, requiring an investigation into what had happened the night before at the theatre; to which I replied that I had no objection to attest what I knew, and we parted.

CAMPBELL SMITH.

Question. Did you observe any acts or expressions of Captain McKnight, or of any other person, which you apprehended designed to insult Mr. Randolph?

Answer. I did not.

Question. Were you present at any time when Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds were in the box with Mr. Randolph?

Answer. I was several times at the door of the box in which those gentlemen were.

Question. Did you at any of those times observe any exceptionable conduct on the part of those gentlemen?

Answer. I did not; they were sitting perfectly quiet.

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH,

Chairman of a committee of House of Reps. U. S.

Captain James McKnight's statement.

On Thursday, the 9th instant, I returned to Philadelphia after having guarded fifty-four French prisoners to Fredericktown, Md.; on the evening of my arrival I obtained permission to be absent until the day following; the night I spent with my family at Captain Decatur's seat, fourteen miles from the city, and I did not return until twelve o'clock on Friday, at which hour I was ordered on a court-martial, which did not adjourn until three o'clock; I did not quit my quarters until six o'clock, at which hour I went to the theatre alone, in an undress, and without arms; after remaining in the theatre for some time, I was joined by several acquaintances. On my return to the theatre, I went by accident into the box, where the person sat that I now know as Mr. Randolph; on the appearance of a number of persons in the garb of Turks, I remarked that our ragamuffins would make a better appearance, and, several times during the evening, I repeated the words ragamuffins and mercenaries. A very interesting piece of scenery being introduced, most of the persons in the box rose up; finding my view obstructed, I stepped on a vacant bench; a person soon after sat on my feet; I desired him to rise, which he did, without any appearance or expression of anger; I soon after stepped behind, where (except for eight or ten minutes) I remained during the performance, but I am positive I never sat beside Mr. Randolph during the evening. At the time of quitting the box I had hold of Captain Taylor's right arm; the crowd was great; at the box door Captain Taylor was jostled, and I put out my arm (but without any violence,) to make room; Captain Taylor and myself then went out before Mr. Randolph and his friends. We walked down Chestnut to Fifth street, at which place I wished Major Christie good night, and he returned the compliment, and I am certain that I never mentioned Mr. Randolph's name during the evening, nor did I know Mr. Randolph was to be at the theatre, or do I ever recollect seeing him previous to Friday evening, and, from his youthful appearance and dress, I had no idea of his being a member of the House of Representatives; and I trust it will not be supposed I would do an act that would be an infringement of the privileges of Congress, for whom I have the highest respect.

JAMES MCKNIGHT, Captain of Marines.

PHILADELPHIA, January 16, 1800.

On Friday evening, the 10th instant, Lieutenant Thompson and myself went to the theatre, and, after some time being seated, were joined by Captain McKnight; during the performance of Blue Beard, there appeared on the stage a number of strange figures, when some one of the gentlemen present made use of the expression that the ragamuffins would make a much better appearance; to which I replied, that could not be doubted; but as to my knowing of Mr. Randolph's being in the adjoining box, I did not, until I heard some one behind me mention it; and as to our having any previous conversation relative to our going to the play to insult him, or any other gentleman, never entered my head; I went to the playhouse in uniform and with my side-arms, and am confident that none of the other gentlemen in the box with us had either uniform or side-arms.

James Thompson's statement.

On Friday, the 10th instant, Lieutenant Reynolds and myself attended the theatre, and, after being some time in the house, were joined by Captain McKnight; I neither knew nor expected to meet Mr. Randolph, although it so happened that we got into a box adjoining (without design) the one in which he, with other members of the House of Representatives, was seated; soon after Captain McKnight's coming over to us, which was not until long after our having been in the house, some remarks were made on the performance and performers, in which the words ragamuffins and mercenaries were used; although Captain McKnight was in the same box behind Mr. Randolph, yet I neither saw nor heard him address himself to that gentleman; and, while I was present, nothing like a personal insult appeared to me to be offered, unless his repeating the words above can be so construed.

JAMES THOMPSON, Lieut. Marines.

Questions by Captain McKnight.

Question. Did you see me seat myself by Mr. Randolph in the course of the evening?

Answer. I did not; but it might have happened without my observing it.

Question. Were we constantly together during the performance of the farce?

Answer. We were either in the adjoining boxes, or, it may be, for a little time, in the same box; but in full view of each other, and within speaking distance the whole time.

Question. Was I not in an undress and without any weapon that evening?

Answer. You were in an undress, and without any weapon which I knew of.

Question. Did you leave the theatre with Lieutenant Reynolds, and when?

Answer. I stayed in the box, and Lieutenant Reynolds was with me there, after Mr. Randolph left it; and we came away together, and did not see Mr. Randolph after he left the box. Captain McKnight left the box before Mr. Randolph, and I did not see him afterwards that evening.

Question. Did you hear me mention Mr. Randolph's name that evening at the playhouse?

Answer. I did not, that I recollect.

Questions by the committee. Did Captain McKnight use the expressions mentioned by you of ragamuffins and mercenaries, or by whom were those expressions used?

Answer. I think by Captain McKnight. He asked Lieutenant Reynolds if he did not think the ragamuffins would perform better than those on the stage; alluding, as I understood, to a procession in the farce; to which Lieutenant Reynolds answered he thought they would.

Question. Did you know of any particular application those expressions were intended to have?

Answer. I do not know Captain McKnight's intention; nothing was ever said by him, or any other person, in my presence, of any intention of insulting Mr. Randolph or any other person.

Question. Did you hear any person say to Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds, he does not hear you, go nearer to him?

Answer. I did not.

Question. When did Captain McKnight leave the box where he first came to you, and in what manner?

Answer. I do not recollect whether Captain McKnight left that box before the conclusion of the play, but, in the interval between that and the farce, Captain McKnight, with several other gentlemen and myself, went together to a public-house in the neighborhood of the playhouse and supped together, and on our return to the playhouse Captain McKnight went into the box where Mr. Randolph was, and remained there during the farce, or was there the most of the time.

Question. Did you see any person take hold of Mr. Randolph, or pull his coat?

Answer. I did not; but I heard Mr. Randolph, as he left the box, say that some person had taken him by the shoulder, evidently to insult him, or words to that effect.

Question. Have you any knowledge where Captain McKnight was at the time Mr. Randolph made that observation?

Answer. At the time Mr. Randolph made the observation I have mentioned, Captain McKnight had left the box and was forward of Mr. Randolph.

Question. Did Captain McKnight, in going out of the box, pass Mr. Randolph, and in what manner?

Answer. We passed Mr. Randolph immediately before he made the observation I have mentioned; but I did not see Captain McKnight touch Mr. Randolph.

William W. Burrows's affidavit.

PHILADELPHIA, January 18, 1800.

I, WILLIAM W. BURROWS, do solemnly swear, on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that I ordered Captain James McKnight to march on the 18th December last, with a detachment of marines, to guard some French prisoners to Fredericktown, in Maryland.

On Thursday, 9th January, at three o'clock in the afternoon, he arrived here, after a fatiguing march; and after reporting his arrival to me, he asked leave to go that evening to see his family, about eight miles from the city. He accordingly went, and returned about twelve o'clock the next day, when he was immediately ordered to sit on a court-martial, which did not break up till near three o'clock. He then went to his dinner, and, as I have understood since, from thence to the theatre.

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH,

Chairman of a committee of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Jonathan H. Hurst's deposition.

JONATHAN H. HURST, of the city of Philadelphia, maketh oath that, on the evening of the 10th instant, he was present at the theatre, and for some time in a box adjoining that in which was seated Mr. Randolph, member of the House of Representatives of the United States, from the State of Virginia; that he saw in the same box Captain McKnight, of the United States' marine corps, standing immediately behind Mr. Randolph; that he heard the chief part of the conversation which passed between Captain McKnight and several gentlemen who were near him during the performance of the opera or entertainment of Blue Beard; that he (J. H. Hurst) looked frequently to that part of the box where Captain McKnight stood; that he did not see any violence offered to Mr. Randolph by Captain McKnight, nor did he see Captain McKnight at any time crowd, jostle, or touch Mr. Randolph; nor did he (the said J. H. Hurst) hear Captain McKnight utter any word or words insulting or disrespectful to Mr. Randolph. And he further saith that Captain McKnight was not in uniform, nor was he armed, nor was there any visible or audible interference on the part of any person near Mr. Randolph to deter Captain McKnight or his acquaintance present from any apprehended ill treatment to Mr. Randolph.

JONATHAN H. HURST.

Question by the committee. Did you hear Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds use the expressions "mercenaries, ragamuffins," and in what manner?

Answer. I heard Captain McKnight ask of one of his acquaintances present, of whom I do not recollect, whether he thought that band, alluding to some of the performers in the farce then acting, as I understood it, could stand against our ragamuffins, alluding, as I understood, to the army of the United States. There was no pointed answer given, as I recollect, and the question appeared to me to be a matter of common conversation; and though at first I was not sensible of its being intended for Mr. Randolph, yet, looking upon him soon after, I thought he smiled as if he had heard it.

Question by Captain McKnight. Did you, in the course of the evening, hear me or Lieutenant Reynolds speak of Mr. Randolph, or mention his name?

Answer. I heard some gentlemen in the box speak of Mr. Randolph, as pointing him out to others, but I cannot say that this was to or by Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds.

JONATHAN H. HURST.

The foregoing deposition was sworn to on the 18th day of January, Anno Domini, 1800.

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH,

Chairman of a committee of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Some time during the performance on Friday evening, the 10th instant, at the theatre, I was called by Captain McKnight, to inform me of the marriage of an officer who had been on a detachment under his command, and from which he had that day returned. After some time we were joined by other persons, when a general conversation took place respecting the ragamuffins on the stage. There were a number of comparisons made, but they were general, and no names were mentioned. Of the persons in the box with myself there was but one in uniform, or with side-arms. In a part of Blue Beard, interesting as to scenery, the persons in the same box with me generally rose. I was on the right of Captain McKnight, and saw that those before him were taller than himself. It appears to me that he stepped on the seat before him to have a fair view of the scenery or stage. My attention was, for an instant, taken from the performance by hearing Captain McKnight say to some one, "Sir, you are sitting on my feet;" that person rose, and made a slight inclination of his head. Captain McKnight resumed his former situation, as did the one before him. After what is above related, Lieutenant Campbell Smith, from the door of the box, called me, and asked the name of an officer, then sitting in the box, the only one in uniform, except himself, there present, to whom I had never been introduced, or, to my knowledge, seen before that night. From my knowledge of Mr. Smith I did not feel myself disposed to satisfy his mere curiosity, or mention a name I had heard accidentally, and scarcely recollected; I therefore asked him if he had any reason or particular object for knowing it. His reply was, that he saw a great many strange faces in uniform, and, wearing one himself, he wished to know the names of others who did. I then told him I would make him known to Captain McKnight, who would introduce him. Mr. Smith then used an expression which I considered as in nowise averse to the introduction of himself to Captain McKnight, which was done in the lobby. After some slight commonplace observations I saw no more of Lieutenant Smith. I had accepted an invitation from Captain McKnight to go home with him after the performance of the theatre. We were anxious to get out before the crowd from the upper part of the house would fill the lobby. To accomplish this, we passed a number of persons, one of whom, not known to me, caught my left arm; I took it for granted that it was to assist himself either to rise from the floor to the seat, or to prevent him from falling.

Captain McKnight had hold of my right arm. The tug I received from the left must have affected him, I think; at any rate it separated us. I am inclined to believe Captain McKnight put his hand on the shoulder of some person and passed on. I did not overtake him until he was out of the box, when we, by his request, looked for some gentlemen to be of our party to his house, which we did, there and in the street, but could not find them.

GEORGE TAYLOR.

Question by Captain McKnight. During the performance of the farce, were we not so near each other, and to Lieutenant Reynolds, that if any violence had been offered by him or me to Mr. Randolph, you must have observed it?

Answer. I think I was near Captain McKnight and Lieutenant Reynolds the whole time, and must have observed any unusual conduct by them.

Questions by the committee. Did you, in the evening in question, either before you went to the theatre, there, or at any time afterwards, know of any intention on the part of Captain McKnight or Lieutenant Reynolds to affront Mr. Randolph?

Answer. I did not.

Question. Did you observe Mr. Randolph at the time of your leaving the box, or hear any words from him respecting his being insulted?

Answer. I did not observe Mr. Randolph at that time, nor hear any words from him. Captain McKnight and I were going out of the box together, and I was separated from him by some person giving me a pull by the arm with some violence; but we joined again soon after in the lobby.

CENSUS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 23, 1800.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: The memorial of the American Philosophical Society respectfully sheweth:

That this society, instituted for the promotion of useful knowledge, understanding that the Legislature of the Union have under their consideration a bill for taking a new census of the inhabitants of the United States, consider it as offering an occasion of great value, and not otherwise to be obtained, of ascertaining sundry facts highly interesting and important to society. Under this impression, they beg leave respectfully to submit to the wisdom of the Legislature the expediency of requiring from their officers, in addition to the table in the former act for the same purpose, others presenting a more detailed view of the inhabitants of the United States, under several different aspects.

They consider it as important to determine the effect of the soil and climate of the United States on the inhabitants thereof; and, for this purpose, dividing life into certain epochs, to ascertain the existing numbers within each epoch, from whence may be calculated the ordinary duration of life in these States, the chances of life for every epoch thereof, and the ratio of the increase of their population; firmly believing that the result will be sensibly different from what is presented by the tables of other countries, by which we are, from necessity, in the habit of estimating the probabilities of life here. And they humbly suggest, as proper for these purposes, the intervals between the following epochs, to wit: births, two, five, ten, sixteen, twenty-one, and twenty-five years of age, and every term of five years from thence to one hundred.

For the purpose also of more exactly distinguishing the increase of population by birth and by emigration, they propose that another table shall present, in separate columns, the respective numbers of native citizens, citizens of foreign birth, and of aliens.

In order to ascertain more completely the causes which influence life and health, and to furnish a curious and useful document of the distribution of society in these States, and of the conditions and vocations of our fellow-citizens, they propose that still another table shall be formed, specifying, in different columns, the number of free male inhabitants, of all ages, engaged in business, under the following, or such other descriptions, as the greater wisdom of the Legislature shall approve, to wit: 1. Men of the learned professions, including clergymen, lawyers, physicians, those employed in the fine arts, teachers, and scribes, in general; 2. Merchants and traders, including bankers, insurers, brokers, and dealers of every kind; 3. Mariners; 4. Handicraftsmen; 5. Laborers in agriculture; 6. Laborers of other descriptions; 7. Domestic servants; 8. Paupers; 9. Persons of no particular calling living on their income: care being taken that every person be noted but once in this table, and that under the description to which he principally belongs.

They flatter themselves, that, from these data, truth will result very satisfactory to our citizens; that under the joint influence of soil, climate, and occupation, the duration of human life, in this portion of the earth, will be found at least equal to what it is in any other; and that its population increases with a rapidity unequalled in all others.

What other views may be advantageously taken, they submit, with those above suggested, to the superior wisdom of Congress, in whose decision they will acquiesce with unqualified respect.

By order of the society:

THOMAS JEFFERSON, President.

[1st SESSION.

APPLICATION FOR ALTERATIONS IN THE POLITICAL SYSTEM ESTABLISHED FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 18, 1800.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee, to whom was referred the petition of Cato West and others, styling themselves "a committee, regularly chosen by the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, for the purpose of petitioning for a redress of grievances," made, in part, the following report:

The petitioners state, that, from the vast interval which separates the Territory from the seat of the General Government, a knowledge of their interest and wishes being difficult to be ascertained, impartial and inaccurate statements were too apt to acquire credit, and that of this stamp were the representations which have been made, in the name of the people, soliciting a Government similar to the one which had been established in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio.

That the Government which Congress had enacted for the Mississippi Territory was bad in theory and still worse in practice; that executive, legislative and judicial authorities, so carefully separated and limited by the constitutions of the elder States, are here mingled together in the hands of three or four individuals, who have but a partial interest in common with the people; and further, that the immense power thus conceded had neither been exercised with liberality nor beneficence, and that in some instances the provisions of the ordinance had been unattended to, and the constitution of the United States violated.

To remedy these inconveniences, and to extend the fundamental principles of civil liberty, the petitioners solicit an amelioration of their present political system, and that Congress will enact that the ordinance of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven may immediately operate in its second grade in the Mississippi Territory, meaning that the people thereof may be allowed a Legislative Assembly.

Upon mature consideration of the premises, the committee are of opinion that an amelioration of the present existing Government is dictated by justice and policy.

That the political maxim so generally practised upon in the United States, "that the citizen should have a voice by himself, or his representative, in the framing of laws, and imposing of taxes," ought to be extended to the Mississippi Territory.

The committee find that, by an act of Congress, passed on the seventh of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory," the boundaries of the said Territory were defined, and the President of the United States authorized to establish therein a Government in all respects similar to that now exercised in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, excepting and excluding the last article of the ordinance made for the Government thereof, by the late Congress, on the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven.

That the President, soon after the passage of the act aforesaid, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, appointed a Governor, Secretary, and three judges for the Mississippi district, who have entered upon the duties of their respective offices, and proceeded to the organization of the Government.

That in the ordinance referred to, in the before-mentioned act of Congress, the committee find the following provisions:

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, That there shall be appointed, from time to time, by Congress, a Governor, whose commission shall continue in force for the term of three years, unless sooner revoked by Congress; he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein, in one thousand acres of land, while in the exercise of his office.

There shall be appointed, from time to time, by Congress, a Secretary, whose commission shall continue in force for four years, unless sooner revoked; he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein, in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of his office; it shall be his duty to keep and preserve the acts and laws passed by the Legislature and the public records of the district, and the proceedings of the Governor in his executive department, and transmit authentic copies of such acts and proceedings, every six months, to the Secretary of Congress. There shall also be appointed a court, to consist of three judges, any two of whom to form a court, who shall have a common law jurisdiction, and reside in the district, and have each therein a freehold estate in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of their offices; and their commissions shall continue in force during good behavior. The Governor and judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the district, and report them to Congress, from time to time; which laws shall be in force in the district, until the organization of the General Assembly therein, unless disapproved of by Congress, but afterwards the Legislature shall have authority to alter them, as they shall think fit. The Governor for the time being shall be commander-in-chief of the militia, appoint and commission all officers in the same, below the rank of general officers; all general officers shall be appointed and commissioned by Congress, previous to the organization of the General Assembly; the Governor shall appoint such magistrates and other civil officers, in each county or township, as he shall find necessary for the preservation of the peace and good order in the same; after the General Assembly shall be organized, the powers and duties of magistrates and other civil officers shall be regulated and defined by the said Assembly, but all magistrates and other civil officers not herein otherwise directed shall, during the continuance of this temporary Government, be appointed by the Governor. For the prevention of crimes and injuries, the laws to be adopted or made shall have force in all parts of the district; and for the execution of process, criminal and civil, the Governor shall make proper divisions thereof; and he shall proceed from time to time, as circumstances may require, to lay out the parts of the district in which the Indian titles shall have been extinguished, into counties and townships; subject, however, to such alterations as may thereafter be made by the Legislature.

So soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants of full age in the district, upon giving proof thereof to the Governor, they shall receive authority, with time and place, to elect representatives from their counties or townships, to represent them in the General Assembly, provided that for every five hundred free male inhabitants there shall be one representative, and so on progressively with the number of free male inhabitants, shall the right of representation increase, until the number of representatives shall amount to twenty-five; after which the number and proportion of representatives shall be regulated by the Legislature: Provided, That no person be eligible or qualified to act as a representative unless he shall have been a citizen of one of the United States three years, and be a resident in the district, or unless he shall have resided in the district three years; and in either case, shall likewise hold in his own right in fee simple, two hundred acres of land within the same: Provided, also, That a freehold in fifty acres of land in the district, having been a citizen of one of the States, and being resident in the district or the like freehold, and two years' residence in the district, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector of a representative.

The representatives thus elected shall serve for the term of two years; and in case of the death of a representative, or removal from office, the Governor shall issue a writ to the county or township for which he was a member, to elect another in his stead, to serve for the residue of the term.

The General Assembly, or Legislature, shall consist of the Governor, Legislative Council, and a House of Representatives. The Legislative Council shall consist of five members, to continue in office five years, unless sooner removed by Congress; any three of whom to be a quorum; and the members of the council shall be nominated and appointed in the following manner, to wit: As soon as representatives shall be elected, the Governor shall appoint a time and place for them to meet together, and, when met, they shall nominate ten persons, resident in the district, and each possessed of a freehold in five hundred acres of land, and return their names to Congress, five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as aforesaid; and whenever a vacancy shall happen in the Council, by death or removal from office, the House of Representatives shall nominate two persons qualified as aforesaid for each vacancy, and return their names to Congress, one of whom Congress shall appoint and commission for the residue of the term. And every five years, four months at least before the expiration of the time of service of the members of Council, the said House shall nominate ten persons, qualified as aforesaid, and return their names to Congress; five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as members of the Council five years, unless sooner removed. And the Governor, Legislative Council, and House of Representatives, shall have authority to make laws, in all cases, for the good government of the district, not repugnant to the principles and articles in this ordinance established and declared. And all bills having passed by a majority in the House, and by a majority in the Council, shall be referred to the Governor for his assent; but no bill or legislative act whatever shall be of any force without his assent. The Governor shall have power to convene, prorogue, and dissolve the General Assembly, when in his opinion it shall be expedient.

The committee further report, that they have not been enabled to ascertain with certainty the number of citizens residing within the limits of the Mississippi district, but there are supposed to be about six thousand free people of all descriptions; that the free male inhabitants of full age, not being sufficient in number (under the ordinance) to authorize a General Assembly, the Legislative authority (subject to certain prescribed restrictions) is at this time vested in and exercised by the Governor and judges.

A Legislative Assembly organized upon the plan contemplated by the ordinance, when the number of free male inhabitants of full age amounted to five thousand, would, it is presumed, remove the principal cause of uneasiness, and be promotive of the general good.

For information as to the extent of population in the Mississippi Territory, the quality, quantity, and value of the exports, the wishes of the people for a change of Government, and their supposed ability to meet the expense incident to a General Assembly, the committee beg leave to refer the House to two letters from Mr. N. Hunter, hereto subjoined, (Nos. 1 and 2;) the petitioners prayed that Mr. Hunter might be accredited as their agent, and viewed as a character in whom entire confidence may be placed.

From a desire to attach the citizens of the Mississippi Territory permanently to the United States, to promote their political welfare and happiness, and to extend to them more ample security against political oppression, the committee submit the following resolutions:

1st. Resolved, That so much of the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States north-west of the river Ohio, as relates to the organization of a General Assembly therein, and prescribes the powers thereof, shall forthwith operate and be in force in the Mississippi Territory: Provided, That until the number of free male inhabitants of full age, in the said Territory, shall amount to five thousand, there shall not be returned to the General Assembly more than nine representatives.

2d. Resolved, That until the number of free male inhabitants of full age in the Mississippi Territory shall amount to five thousand, the county of Adams shall be entitled to choose five representatives to the General Assembly, and the county of Pickering four.

3d. Resolved, That the first election for representatives to the General Assembly shall be on the —— day of ——, and that all subsequent elections shall be regulated by the Legislature.

4th. Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Governor of the Mississippi Territory to cause the said election to be holden on the day aforesaid, at the most convenient place in the counties aforesaid, and to nominate a proper officer or officers to preside at and conduct the same, and to return to him the names of the persons who may have been duly elected.

5th. Resolved, That the representatives shall be convened by the Governor on the —— day of ——.

6th. Resolved, That so soon as the number of free male inhabitants, of full age, shall amount to or exceed five thousand, the number of representatives to the General Assembly shall be determined, and the apportionment made in the way prescribed in the ordinance.

No. 1.

DEAR SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, February 4, 1800.

In your communication of the 26th of January, you inquire—

1st. "By what authority were Cato West and others chosen a committee; if by the people, at what period, in what manner, and for what purpose?"

A meeting was held by a number of the principal inhabitants, on the 6th day of July last, in order to confer upon the unhappy situation of the country, and, if possible, to devise a remedy. The result of this meeting was a circular letter drawn up by the conference, recommending to the several districts the scheme of a committee, which was to meet with written instructions from their constituents, in order to inform the Governor of the true situation of the country, and petition for a redress of grievances. I have a copy of the circular letter, and the letters of instructions from the several districts.

2d. You inquire "what is the aggregate number of the free inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, what proportion are natives of the United States, and what the number of our militia?"

Our Governor has never taken a census of the people, nor has he been able to organize the militia, so that we are much at a loss with respect to our numbers; I think, however, that we cannot have less than six thousand free inhabitants, and about two thousand capable of bearing arms: our people are mostly natives of the United States; there is not, perhaps, one-tenth of any other description.

3d. You inquire "whether the emigration to the territory is great, and whether any of the citizens have lately removed to the Spanish dominions, and, if any, what seem to have been the inducements?"

The emigration to our country is at this time extremely limited; the impossibility of procuring lands by any other way than by purchase from individuals, and the facility with which lands are acquired in the Spanish dominions, forms an insuperable bar to the increase of our population; though men of property who have lately descended the river seem rather inclined to sacrifice a part of their property in the purchase of lands whereon to settle, than to avail themselves of the easy terms offered by the Spanish Government; but the poorer classes are impelled to go below.

An alarming depopulation took place last winter under the patronage of Doctor White; we could never learn the exact number of families, but they were sufficiently numerous to form a considerable settlement below the line of which Doctor White is commandant. A number of the inhabitants have been selling out this summer, and preparing to remove below at the end of the year. Various circumstances may have combined in producing this dereliction, but we do not hesitate to say that the morose, arbitrary contumacy of Governor Sargent are among the primary causes.

4th. You would know "the particular culture which occupies the attention of the planter of the Mississippi Territory, what are our articles of exportation, and what the supposed quantity and value?"

Cotton is at present the staple of the Territory, and is cultivated with singular advantage to the planter. We get one quarter of a dollar per pound for clean cotton, and an active planter will make from five to eight hundred pounds weight to a hand; and, as I conceive we have as many black as white inhabitants, we cannot make much less than three millions of pounds of merchantable cotton, equal to seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

We are able to raise, at a small expense, great quantities of pork; but the price, for three or four years' past, has not been more than three and a half dollars; consequently, little has been raised. Our soil and climate seems peculiarly adapted to the growth of indigo, as well as cotton; and the sugar-cane thrives well in the lower part of the Territory.

I am, dear sir, with great esteem, yours,

N. HUNTER, Agent Mississippi Territory.

No. 2.

DEAR SIR:

FEBRUARY 8, 1800.

I received your obliging note of the 3d instant; and while you have my sincere and hearty thanks for your vigilance and attention to the business of the Natchez, I shall make every exertion in my power to elucidate such parts of our petition and documents as may appear vague or ambiguous.

The estimate annexed to the petition of Cato West and others (mentioned in your note) is not "the amount of the tax laid on the county of Adams by a law of the Territory;" but it appears to be the sum which the Governor thought necessary to be raised in that county for the service of the last year; and it was sent by him to the first court of general quarter sessions in order to receive the sanction of that court. This would give it immediate currency, and necessarily operate in aid of his future projects of taxation.

But such a manifest prodigality of the public resources appeared upon the face of it, together with so marked an opposition to the public opinion, with regard to the place whereon the public buildings were to be erected, that it received the immediate disapprobation of the court; and I believe a similar instrument was never presented to the county of Pickering.

I would here beg leave to call your attention to the first address of the committee, to Governor Sargent, of the 26th of August. It is there stated that he had adopted and pursued improper measures; that he had given an exclusive confidence to a party; that his measures were calculated to give confidence to the insolence of faction, and to suffocate the germ of public virtue in the upright citizen. He was also told that most of the perplexities which had embarrassed him in his administration had undoubtedly flowed from this source; but anxious for a general accommodation, and animated with a hope of inspiring a system of measures capable of embracing that object, the committee was ready to admit that the Governor had been surprised into those measures by partial or designing statements. To this address, however, the Governor avoided to return an answer; for the fact is, the charges were too true to be denied, and his conduct too improper to be justified.

I must also solicit the attention of the committee of the House of Representatives to the address of Cato West and others, to the Governor and judges, upon the subject of the laws, and the answer to that address. The committee charges the Legislature with making laws in express contradiction to the letter of the ordinance of 1787, which authorizes them only to adopt laws already made in the original States. The Governor and judges, in their answer, confess that they have made laws which have not been derived from any one of the State codes; but they say they have been in favor of the citizen, by lessening fines and penalties. But the committee, in their reply to that answer, which concludes their correspondence, assert that the lessening of fines and penalties was not the object of their legislative efforts; and the code of laws which, it is presumed, has by this time been transmitted to Colonel Pickering's office, will, I am fully persuaded, justify the assertion.

At the time of my departure from the Territory the discontents of the people were great indeed; the whole country was influenced by an idea that the ordinance for our Government had been wantonly abused, and the constitution of the United States as wantonly violated at a time, and under circumstances, which required no such sacrifice.

But the Governor's appointments, civil and military, as they stand at present, have been a more abundant source of discontent than any that has arisen under his administration. All the principal officers that possessed the confidence of the people have uniformly resigned their appointments, and it will be impossible that the Governor can ever be able to organize the militia, notwithstanding his extraordinary fines, in order to force his appointments upon the people.

Can it be possible that an administration, which, from its earliest operations, have proved so repugnant to the public will, and so fatal to the happiness of society, can ever be able to restore harmony, attach public confidence, and promote the general good. The thing is impossible.

There is yet another source of uneasiness, excited by the conduct of our Governor, which I feel it a duty incumbent on me to suggest to the committee of the House of Representatives. He has heretofore been in the habit of exacting and receiving fees for passports granted to citizens travelling from the Territory to the United States, and also for tavern and marriage licenses. It is believed that his perquisites in these instances have not been inconsiderable; and if the practice were forbidden by a law of Congress, it is presumed that the burdens of the people would be somewhat lessened, and a great incentive to abuse entirely removed.

My state of health will now admit of my personal attendance on the committee of the House of Representatives, and I shall take much pleasure in making such further explanation as may be desired.

The people of the Mississippi Territory are extremely anxious for a Legislative Assembly; and there is no doubt existing, in my mind, as to the entire competency of their resources.

The power of making laws, through their immediate representatives, in whom they have a confidence, and who have a common interest with themselves, is a privilege which cannot but be grateful to every American, and produce the best effects in that country.

I am, dear sir, with all possible esteem, your very humble servant,

N. HUNTER, Agent Mississippi Territory.

The Hon. W. C. C. CLAIBORNE, Chairman Mississippi Committee.

DIVISION OF THE NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY INTO TWO GOVERNMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 3, 1800.

Mr. CRAIK, from the committee, to whom it was referred to consider and report, whether any, and, if any, what alteration is necessary in the judiciary establishment of the Territory northwest of the Ohio, and who were directed to report their opinion of the expediency of dividing said Territory into two distinct and separate Governments, do, in obedience to such direction, make the following report:

That parts of said Territory are subject to several serious inconveniences, which require redress from the General Government; most of the evils which they at present experience are, in the opinion of this committee, to be imputed to the very great extent of country at present comprised under their imperfect Government. The Territory northwest of the Ohio from southeast to northwest fifteen hundred miles, and the actual distance of travelling from the places of holding courts the most remote from each other is thirteen hundred miles, and in a country so sparsely peopled, and so little reclaimed from its native wildness, this distance alone seems to present barriers almost insuperable against the exercise of the functions of Government, which always presupposes a knowledge of the condition of the several parts and the practicability of seasonable communication among the several organs.

In the three western countries there has been but one court having cognizance of crimes in five years; and the immunity which offenders experience attracts, as to an asylum, the most vile and abandoned criminals, and at the same time deters useful and virtuous persons from making settlements in such society. The extreme necessity of judiciary attention and assistance is experienced in civil as well as criminal cases. The supplying to vacant places such necessary officers as may be wanted, such as clerks, recorders, and others of like kind, is, from the impossibility of correct notice and information, utterly neglected. This Territory is exposed, as a frontier, to foreign nations, whose agents can find sufficient interest in exciting or fomenting insurrection and discontent, as thereby they can more easily divert a valuable trade in furs from the United States, and also have a part thereof on which they border, which feels so little the cherishing hand of their proper Government, or so little dread of its energy, as to render their attachment perfectly uncertain and ambiguous. The committee would further suggest that the law of the 3d of March, 1791, granting land to certain persons in the western part of said Territory, and directing the laying out of the same, remains inexecuted; that great discontent, in consequence of such neglect, is excited in those who were interested in the provision of said law, and which require the immediate attention of this Legislature. To administer a remedy to these evils, it occurs to this committee that it is expedient that a division of said Territory into two distinct and separate Governments should be made; and that such division be made, by a line beginning at the mouth of the great Miami river, running directly north, until it intersects the boundary between the United States and Canada.

In which case it is conceived, that the western part may be permitted to go into the same stage of Government as is now in use in said Territory, as the same is supposed to contain at the present time fifteen thousand inhabitants.

Your committee therefore recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Territory northwest of the river Ohio be divided into two distinct and separate Governments, by a line beginning at the mouth of the Great Miami river, and running through a north course, until it intersects the boundary line between the United States and Canada.

APPLICATION FOR ALTERATIONS IN THE POLITICAL SYSTEM ESTABLISHED FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 13, 1800.

Mr. CLAIBORNE made the following report:

The committee to whom was recommitted the report upon the petition of Cato West and others, together with certain resolutions submitted to the House on the 10th instant, proposing an abridgment of the powers granted to the Governor of the Mississippi Territory, are of opinion that it would be inexpedient to adopt the said resolutions, for the following reasons:

1st. That from the infancy of the Mississippi settlements, and their remote situation from the seat of the Federal Government, it is advisable that the Government of the United States should possess a control over the proceedings of the Territorial Legislature, which can alone be effected through the medium of the territorial Governor, whose responsibility, it is presumed, will prevent an improper use of any powers granted.

2d. That the Territorial Government will only be temporary; and if, in the progress of the administration thereof, the system should prove defective, the necessary alterations will, no doubt, be made by Congress.

3d. That the petitioners solicited only the benefits of the ordinance in its second grade, which, in the report heretofore made on the petition of Cato West and others, the House was advised immediately to extend to the Mississippi Territory; this measure the committee still think is dictated by policy and justice, and again recommend the adoption of the resolutions contained in the said report.

Resolved, That from and after the organization of the Territorial Assembly of the Mississippi Territory, the Governor shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, shall appoint all officers, both civil and military, of the Territory, whose appointments are not particularly vested in Congress by the ordinance: Provided, That the Governor shall have power to fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Legislative Council, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session.

Resolved, That every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Legislative Council, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the Governor of the Territory; if he approve it, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journals, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within six days (Sundays excepted,) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner, as if he had signed it, unless the General Assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case, it shall not be a law.

Resolved, That every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the Governor of the Territory, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him; or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Resolved, That the General Assembly meet at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the — day of —, unless they shall by law appoint a different day: Provided, That the Governor shall have power, on extraordinary occasions, to convene both Houses of the General Assembly, or either of them.

Resolved, That neither House, during the session of the General Assembly, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

NATURALIZATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 14, 1800.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry aliens residing at Mount Pleasant, in the State of New York, made the following report:

That these petitioners state, that they came into the United States before the passing of the law of June, 1798, respecting the naturalization of aliens, and might have made the declarations required by the law of January, 1795, and brought themselves within the proviso of the law first mentioned, and secured the right of naturalization after a residence of five years within the United States; but having omitted to make the declaration required, they are obliged to reside fourteen years within the United States before they can become citizens thereof. They request that the Legislature will pass an act which shall secure to them the same rights which they would have received had they made the declaration required by the law of January, 1795.

The committee can see nothing in this case which can warrant a deviation from the general rule.

They believe the law of June, 1798, to be founded on fair and just principles, and that a probation of fourteen years is not generally more than sufficient to conciliate the feelings of aliens to the manners, laws, and Government of a country into which they remove as strangers; and that the attachment which every honest mind feels to the country which gave him birth, and in which he has formed his early attachments, will not, probably, in the short space of five years, be so far obliterated as to make it safe or prudent for this Government to repose that confidence in him which it must place in its own citizens. The committee are therefore of opinion that the prayer of this petition ought not to be granted.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 14, 1800.

Mr. DAYTON made the following report:

The Committee of Privileges, to whom it was referred, by a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, to consider and report what measures it will be proper to adopt in relation to a publication in the newspaper printed in the city of Philadelphia, on Wednesday morning, the 19th of February last, called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, have had the same under investigation, and have agreed to report, as the result of their deliberations, that it would be proper for the Senate to adopt the following resolutions, viz:

Whereas, on the 19th day of February, now last past, the Senate of the United States being in session, in the city of Philadelphia, the following publication was made in the newspaper printed in the said city of Philadelphia, called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, viz:

"In our paper of the 27th ultimo, we noticed the introduction of a measure into the Senate of the United States, by Mr. Ross, calculated to influence and affect the approaching Presidential election, and to frustrate in a particular manner the wishes and interests of the people of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"We this day lay before the public a copy of that bill, as it has passed the Senate. Some curious facts are connected with this measure, and the people of the Union at large are intermediately, and the people of this State immediately, interested to consider the movements, the mode of operation, and the effects.

"We noticed, a few days ago, the caucusses (or secret consultations) held in the Senate chamber. An attempt was made, in an evening paper, to give a counteraction (for these people are admirable at the system of intrigue) to the developments of the Aurora, and to call those meetings jacobinical: we most cordially assent to the jacobinism of those meetings; they were in the perfect spirit of a jacobinical conclave.

"The plain facts we stated are, however, unquestionable; but we have additional information to give on the subject of those meetings. We stated that intrigues for the Presidential election were among the objects. We now state it as a fact, that cannot be disputed upon fair ground, that the bill we this day present was discussed at the caucus on Wednesday evening last.

"It is worthy of remark how this bill grew into existence. The opponents of independence and republican government, who supported Mr. Ross in the contest against Governor McKean, are well known by the indecenty, the slander, and the falsehood of the measures they pursued; and it is well known that they are all devoted to the federal party, which we dissected on Monday. Mr. Ross proposed this bill in the federal Senate, (how consistently with the decency of his friends will be seen;) a committee of five was appointed to prepare a bill on the subject; on this committee Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, was appointed; on Thursday morning last (the caucus held the preceding evening) Mr. Ross informed Mr. Pinckney that the committee had drawn up a bill on the subject, when, in fact, Mr. Pinckney had never been consulted on the subject, though a member of the committee! The bill was introduced and passed as below.

"On this occasion it may not be impertinent to introduce an anecdote which will illustrate the nature of caucusses, and show that our popular Government may, in the hands of a faction, be as completely abused as the French constitution has been by the self-created consuls.

"In the summer session of 1798, when federal thunder and violence were belched from the pestiferous lungs of more than one despotic minion, a caucus was held at the house of Mr. Bingham, in this city. It was composed of members of the Senate, and there were present seventeen members. The Senate consisting of thirty-two members, this number was, of course, a majority, and the session was a full one.

"Prior to deliberation on the measures of war, army, navy, democratic proscriptions, &c. &c. it was proposed, and agreed to, that all the members present should solemnly pledge themselves to act firmly upon the measures to be agreed upon by the majority of the persons present at the caucus.

"The measures were perfectly in the high tone of that extraordinary session; but, upon a division of the caucus, it was found that they were divided nine against eight. This majority, however, held the minority to their engagement, and the whole seventeen voted in Senate upon all the measures discussed at the caucus.

"Thus, it is seen, that a secret, self-appointed meeting of seventeen persons dictated laws to the United States, and not only that nine of that seventeen had the full command and power over the consciences and votes of the other eight, but that nine possessed, by the turpitude of the eight, actually all the power which the constitution declares shall be invested in the majority only. In other words, a minority of nine members of the Senate ruled the other twenty-three members.

"It is easily conceivable, as in the recent changes in France, that this spirit of caucussing may be conducted in progression down to two or three persons; thus, three leading characters may agree to act upon measures approved by any two of them; these three may add two others, and they would be a majority of five; and those adding four others would be a majority of nine; and these nine possess all the power of a majority of twenty-three! Yet such is the way we are treated by those who call themselves federalists.

"The following bill is an offspring of the spirit of faction secretly working; and it will be found to be in perfect accord with the outrageous proceedings of the same party in our State Legislature, who are bent on depriving this State of its share in an election that may involve the fate of the country and posterity."

Resolved, That the said publication contains assertions and pretended information respecting the Senate, and the committee of the Senate, and their proceedings, which are false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States; and that the said publication is a daring and high-handed breach of the privileges of this House.

Resolved, That William Duane, now residing in the city of Philadelphia, the editor of the said newspaper, called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, be, and he is hereby, ordered to attend at the bar of this House on _____, the _____ day of March instant, at _____, at which time he will have opportunity to make any proper defence for his conduct in publishing the aforesaid false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious assertions and pretended information; and the Senate will then proceed to take further order on the subject; and a copy of this and the foregoing resolution, under the authentication of the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and attested as a true copy by James Mathers, sergeant-at-arms for the said Senate, and left by the said sergeant-at-arms with the said William Duane, or at the office of the Aurora, on or before the _____ day of March instant, shall be deemed sufficient notice for the said Duane to attend in obedience to this resolution.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 22, 1800.

Mr. DAYTON made the following report:

The Committee of Privileges, who were directed to prepare and lay before the Senate a form of proceedings, in the case of William Duane, having had the subject under consideration, report, in part, the following, viz:

When William Duane shall present himself at the bar of the House, in obedience to the order of the 20th instant, the President of the Senate is to address him as follows:

1. WILLIAM DUANE: You stand charged by the Senate of the United States, as editor of the newspaper called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, of having published in the same on the 19th of February now last past, false, scandalous, defamatory, and malicious assertions, and pretended information, respecting the said Senate, and committee of the Senate, and their proceedings, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States; and therein to have been guilty of a high breach of the privileges of this House.

Then the Secretary shall read the resolutions of the Senate passed the 20th instant, with the preamble;* after which the President is to proceed as follows, viz:

Have you any thing to say in excuse or extenuation for said publication?

2. If he shall make no answer, the sergeant-at-arms shall take him into custody, and retire with him from the Senate chamber, until the Senate shall be ready for a decision, at which time the sergeant-at-arms shall again set him at the bar of the House, and the President of the Senate is to pronounce to him the decision.

3. If he shall answer, he is to continue at the bar of the House until the testimony (if any be adduced) shall be closed; and then he shall retire while the Senate are deliberating on the case, and when a decision is agreed upon, the said Duane, being notified of the time, by the sergeant-at-arms, verbally, or by a written notice left at his office, shall appear at the bar of the House, and the President of the Senate is to pronounce to him the decision.

Sir: AURORA OFFICE, March 24, 1800.

A copy of the proceedings of the Senate of the United States, in relation to a publication in "the Aurora," and ascribing guilt to me in that publication, and a breach of their privileges, has been left at my office.

It is with pleasure I observe that the justice of the Senate provides, as the constitution prescribes, that I shall "have an opportunity to make any proper defence" for the conduct which has been imputed to me; and as such defence will necessarily involve points of law as well as of fact, I pray you, sir, to submit to the Senate a respectful request on my behalf, that I may be heard by counsel, and have process awarded to compel the attendance of witnesses in my behalf.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee of Privileges, who were ordered to prepare and lay before the Senate a form of proceedings in the case of William Duane, reported, in part, the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That all testimony shall be taken by a committee, to be authorized by the Senate for that purpose, with powers to send for persons, papers, and records, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, which may become requisite for the execution of their commission.

2. Resolved, That William Duane, on application to the chairman of said committee, shall be furnished with process to call before said committee his witnesses, specifying the time and place of taking the testimony, which shall be committed to writing, and subscribed by the witnesses, respectively.

3. Resolved, That said committee shall procure all testimony against said Duane which, in their opinions, may be proper, notifying said Duane, who may attend, by himself or attorney, to hear and cross-examine; which testimony shall be in writing, and subscribed by the witnesses, respectively.

4. Resolved, That all testimony taken by said committee shall be reported to the Senate, and kept on file by the secretary.

5. Resolved, That ——— be the committee to perform the services mentioned in the foregoing resolutions; and they are hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, which may become requisite for the execution of their commission.

FORFEITURES UNDER THE ACT PROHIBITING THE EXPORTATION OF ARMS AND AMMUNITION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 25, 1800.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit any forfeitures which shall occur, or may have occurred, under the law of the United States prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition, on the same principles on which the Secretary is authorized to remit forfeitures incurred under the revenue laws, made the following report:

That the power heretofore vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to mitigate or remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties, incurred under the revenue laws of the United States, was, by the express tenor thereof, limited to objects of a fiscal nature only, the management and superintendence of which were committed to that Department of which he is the head.

That the act of the United States prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, though in that act it is declared to be the duty of the custom-house officers, and of all persons employed in the collection of the revenue, to attend to the execution thereof; and though all forfeitures and penalties incurred under the said act, and not otherwise directed to be prosecuted and recovered, were to be sued for, prosecuted, adjudged, and distributed, in like manner as is provided in the act entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels," was yet essentially a political, and not a fiscal measure and regulation.

That the object contemplated by said act was of great importance, both as it related to the supplies of arms and ammunition to the United States, and as it related to the deprivation of similar supplies to those who practised hostilities against the United States.

That the power of remitting fines, forfeitures, and penalties incurred under the said act seems to be involved in the general "power of granting pardons for offences against the United States," vested by the constitution in the President of the United States, to whom alone, according to the nature of our Government, it must pertain to judge of the extent of the mischiefs flowing from the violations of such political measures and regulations, and how far considerations for the remission of fines, forfeitures, and penalties incurred by such violations may be listened to consistently with the public safety in relation to that power. If cases of unintentional violation have occurred, the inconvenience of making special application to the Executive (where, upon due representation, it is not to be doubted but that every attention would at all times be paid which reason and propriety could require) cannot justify a departure from the ordinary course to be observed on similar occasions.

Your committee are therefore of opinion that it is inexpedient "to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit any forfeitures which shall occur, or may have occurred, under the law of the United States prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition, on the same principles on which the Secretary is authorized to remit forfeitures incurred under the revenue laws."

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 26, 1800.

SIR:

AURORA OFFICE, March 26, 1800.

I beg you to lay before the Senate this acknowledgment of my having received an authenticated copy of the resolutions of Monday last in my case.

Copies of those resolutions I transmitted to Messrs. Dallas and Cooper, my intended counsel, soliciting their professional aid. A copy of my letter to each of those gentlemen is enclosed, marked A. Their answers I have also the pleasure to enclose, marked B and C.

I find myself, in consequence of these answers, deprived of all professional assistance, under the restrictions which the Senate have thought fit to adopt. I therefore think myself bound by the most sacred duties to decline any further voluntary attendance upon that body, and leave them to pursue such measures in this case as in their wisdom they may deem meet.

I am, sir, with perfect respect,

WM. DUANE.

To the PRESIDENT of the Senate.

A.

SIR:

AURORA OFFICE, March 25, 1800.

I enclose you a copy of the resolution of the Senate passed yesterday, and must request you would favor me by appearing, with Mr. Cooper,* as my counsel to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

You know that it was not from a conviction of their possessing constitutional authority to order my attendance that I appeared yesterday, but from a sense of delicacy towards a branch of the Legislature, which would not permit me to carry even an appearance of disrespect towards them, however well satisfied of their acting under error.

I fear the resolution enclosed will prevent me from deriving all the benefit from your assistance which I had a right to expect from your acknowledged abilities and the justice of my cause.

I am, sir, with respect and esteem,

WM. DUANE.

A. J. DALLAS, Esq.

B.

SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, March 25, 1800.

As it is my general rule to render professional services whenever they are required, I think it proper to state explicitly the reason of a departure from that rule in the case now depending before the Senate of the United States.

The Senate having, as I understand, charged you with the publication of a libel, proceeded, without hearing you, or notifying you of the charge, to decide that you were the editor of the publication; that the publication was false, malicious, &c.; and that it amounted to a breach of the legislative privileges of the body. Before, however, any punishment shall be inflicted, or any sentence pronounced, the Senate has been pleased to summon you to the bar, and, upon your application, to allow you the assistance of counsel, "who may be heard in denial of any facts charged against you, or in excuse or extenuation of your offence."

Though I mean not to question the wisdom and justice of the Senate in any part of the proceeding, I cannot consent to act as counsel under so limited an authority; for you will at once perceive that it excludes any inquiry into the jurisdiction of the Senate to take cognizance of offences of the nature imputed to you, as well as any justification of the obnoxious publication, by proving the truth of the facts which it contains. As to the rest, I cannot suppose that either you or your counsel would find it practicable to deny the existence of any fact which the Senate has already (doubtless, upon sufficient evidence) examined and established; and the language of excuse or extenuation must always proceed with better grace and more advantage from the penitent offender than from a professional advocate.

Under these circumstances, I do not think that I could render you any service by accompanying you to the bar of the Senate, while I confess that I should feel the situation degrading to the profession as well as to myself.

I am, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Mr. DUANE.

C.

DEAR SIR:

PHILADELPHIA, March 25, 1800.

I have every inclination to render service to you and to your cause, but I will not degrade myself by submitting to appear before the Senate with their gag in my mouth. The resolutions you have transmitted to me preclude all hope of my doing any good to you or to the public, or any credit to myself, by complying with your request.

I heard sufficient of the debate yesterday to understand (before I saw your letter) that the intent and meaning of the resolution is to preclude all argument on the jurisdiction of the Senate, and all proof that might be offered in justification of the assertions complained of. Indeed, I do not much wonder at the latter preclusion; for I cannot help thinking, from the evidences you stated to me, that, had we been allowed to have given proof of the facts in justification, the public would have been well instructed in the doctrine and practice of caucusses, from the very best and most unexceptionable authority.

But to appear before a tribunal which, in a new and most important case, has prejudged the most material questions between you; which, in the capacity of accuser, has claimed a right to dictate the mode of defence to the person accused; which has forbidden us to enter upon what I cannot but regard as the unanswerable part of your vindication, and left you no ground to take worth contending for; which, as a tribunal in this country of unknown, unprecedented, and undefined authority, will hear no objection to its jurisdiction, and admit of no proof of the facts it controverts—under such circumstances, to attend at the bar of that tribunal, an advocate interdicted from defence, a tame and manacled assistant, might serve, indeed, to excite a malignant smile among the enemies of liberty, but would certainly tend to disgrace your cause and my character.

I cannot think you will be able to procure any professional assistance on such strange and unusual terms; nor can I see of what use any professional assistance could be to you, under the restrictions which the Senate have thought fit to impose; nor do I see (if you appear before them unattended by legal friends) with what prudence or propriety you can reply one word to any question they may choose to put.

Where rights are undefined, and power is unlimited; where the freedom of the press is actually attacked, under whatever intention of curbing its licentiousness, the melancholy period cannot be far distant when the citizen will be converted into a subject.

I am, dear sir, your friend and servant,

THOMAS COOPER.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 27, 1800.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee of Privileges, to whom was referred a letter of William Duane to the President of the Senate, and communicated on the 26th day of March inst., reported the following resolutions, viz:

1. Resolved, That William Duane, editor of the General Advertiser, or Aurora, having neglected and refused to appear at the bar of this House, at 12 o'clock, on the 26th day of March instant, pursuant to the order of the 24th instant, of which order he had been duly notified, and having sent the following letter to the President of the Senate, which has been communicated to the Senate, viz:

SIR: I beg of you to lay before the Senate this acknowledgment of my having received an authenticated copy of their resolutions on Monday last in my case. Copies of those resolutions I transmitted to Messrs. Dallas and Cooper, my intended counsel, soliciting their professional aid; a copy of my letter is enclosed, marked A. Their answers I have also the pleasure to enclose, marked B and C. I find myself, in consequence of these answers, deprived of all professional assistance, under the restrictions which the Senate have thought fit to adopt. I therefore think myself bound, by the most sacred duties, to decline any further voluntary attendance upon that body, and leave them to pursue such measures, in this case, as in their wisdom they may deem meet.

I am, sir, with perfect respect,

WILLIAM DUANE.

To the PRESIDENT of the Senate:

Is guilty of a contempt of said order, and of this House; and that, for said contempt, he, the said William Duane, be taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms attending this House, to be kept subject to the further orders of the Senate.

2. Resolved, That a warrant issue, signed by the President of the Senate, in the following form, viz:

UNITED STATES, ss: the — day of March, 1800.

Whereas, the Senate of the United States, on the 18th day of March, 1800, then being in session in the city of Philadelphia, did resolve that a publication in the General Advertiser, or Aurora, a newspaper printed in the said city of Philadelphia, on Wednesday, the 19th day of February then last past, contained assertions and pretended informations, respecting the Senate, and committee of the Senate, and their proceedings, which were false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States; and that the said publication was a high breach of the privileges of the House:

And whereas the said Senate did then further resolve and order that said William Duane, resident in said city, and editor of said newspaper, should appear at the bar of the House on Monday, the 24th day of March instant, that he might then have opportunity to make any proper defence for his conduct in publishing the aforesaid false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious assertions and pretended informations:

And whereas the said William Duane did appear on said day at the bar of the House, pursuant to said order, and requested counsel, and the Senate, by their resolution of the 24th day of March instant, resolved that William Duane, having appeared at the bar of the Senate, and requested to be heard by counsel, on the charge against him for a breach of privileges of the Senate, he be allowed the assistance of counsel, while personally attending at the bar of the Senate, who might be heard in denial of any facts charged against said Duane, or in excuse and extenuation of his offence; and that said William Duane should attend at the bar of the Senate on Wednesday, then next, at 12 o'clock, of which the said Duane had due notice:

And whereas said William Duane, in contempt of the said last-mentioned order, did neglect and refuse to appear at the bar of the said Senate, at the time specified therein; and the Senate of the United States, on the 27th day of March instant, did thereupon resolve that the said William Duane was guilty of a contempt of said order and of the Senate, and that for said contempt he, the said William should be taken into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms attending the Senate, to be kept for their further orders; all which appears by the journals of the Senate of the United States, now in session in the said city of Philadelphia:

These are, therefore, to require you, James Mathers, sergeant-at-arms for the Senate of the United States, forthwith to take into your custody the body of the said William Duane, now resident in the said city of Philadelphia, and him safely to keep, subject to the further order of the Senate; and all marshals and deputy marshals, and civil officers of the United States, and every other person, are hereby required to be aiding and assisting you in the execution thereof, for which this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand this ____ day of ____.

RELIEF OF INSOLVENT DEBTORS TO THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 28, 1800.

Mr. STONE, from the committee appointed to consider whether it be expedient to make any, and, if any, what provision for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt; to which committee was also referred the petition of Lawrence Erb and Samuel Selby, made the following report:

That they were respectively appointed, and have acted for several years, as collectors of the revenue of the United States in places where their duty was considerable and profit small; that they unfortunately placed confidence in the notes of Messrs. Morris & Nicholson, who, it seems, are insolvent, and the petitioners thereby unable to pay the United States the sums collected; that suits have been brought against them by their superior officers in the revenue; that they are now confined in prison, and entirely unable to pay; that they have wives and families to whom they are prevented from being useful by their confinement. Neither of them has stated the amount of his deficit.

The committee think provision should be made for the personal enlargement of all debtors of the United States, who, without any improper conduct of their own, become defaulters, and make an honest surrender of their estates, but discover no ground for special interference in the cases submitted.

In order, therefore, that the sense of the Legislature may be generally expressed upon the subject, they respectfully submit to the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, bylaw, for the personal discharge from prison of insolvent debtors to the United States.

SLAVES FROM FOREIGN PORTS OR PLACES ADMITTED INTO THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY IN CERTAIN CASES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 1, 1800.

Mr. SEWALL, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Cato West and others, made the following report:

That the petitioners complain of the operation of the act, entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory," which prohibits the importation, from any port or place without the limits of the United States, of any slave or slaves into that Territory; that many citizens of the United States have been surprised and injured by this sudden prohibition, which took effect upon their property without any previous notice; that thereby several persons occasionally absent, or employed on plantations, which, since the establishment of the line of demarcation, are found to be within the Spanish territory, are prevented from returning within the United States, or condemned to lose their servants; and that, in some instances, slaves holden within the Spanish territory fall, by inheritance, to persons who are inhabitants within the United States, who desire to be secured in their property.

The committee are of opinion that, in the instances complained of, the said prohibition has operated injuriously, and submit the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Governor of the Mississippi Territory be authorized, by law, for the term of one year, to permit, by his special license, to be granted after examination of each case in which it shall be requested, any slave or slaves bona fide the property of a citizen of the United States, or owned by any person resident within the Mississippi Territory at the period when the Government of the United States was established over the same, to be brought by such proprietor into the said Territory.

STATUE AND MONUMENT TO THE MEMORY OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 8, 1800.

Mr. HENRY LEE, from the joint committee appointed to prepare and report measures in honor of the memory of General George Washington, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the resolution of Congress, passed in 1783, respecting an equestrian statue of General Washington, be carried into immediate execution; and that the statue be placed in the centre of an area to be formed in front of the Capitol.

Resolved, That a marble monument be erected by the United States in the Capitol at the City of Washington, in honor of General Washington, to commemorate his services, and to express the regrets of the American people for their irreparable loss.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to give such directions as may appear to him proper for carrying into effect the preceding resolutions; and that, for the present, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated for these purposes.

OBJECTIONS TO CERTAIN LAWS PASSED BY THE GOVERNOR AND JUDGES OF THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 8, 1800.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee to whom were referred the laws passed by the Governor and judges of the Mississippi Territory, made the following report:

That among the said laws are two containing provisions which, to this committee, seem highly improper; the one entitled "A law to regulate taverns and retailers of liquors, and concerning Indians," the other entitled "A law establishing and regulating the fees of the several officers and persons therein named." That, under the first act, the Governor is entitled to demand eight dollars for every tavern license he signs in his official capacity; and, by a second act, the judges are entitled to receive fees for a variety of judicial services therein enumerated.

The committee further report, that a law of Congress gives the Governor, as such, a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, and each of the judges a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum; which seems to have been intended as a full compensation for all their official services.

The committee therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That so much of the law enacted by the Governor and judges of the Mississippi Territory, entitled "A law to regulate taverns and retailers of liquors, and concerning Indians," as authorizes the Governor to demand eight dollars for every tavern license by him signed; and that so much of the law passed by the same authority, entitled "A law establishing and regulating the fees of the several officers and persons therein named," as entitle the judges of the supreme court to receive fees for certain services therein enumerated, be, and the same are, hereby disapproved of and declared to be no longer in force in the said Mississippi Territory.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 10TH OF MAY, 1800.

To the Senate of the United States: The remonstrance and petition of the undersigned, citizens of the republic of America, resident in the city and county of Philadelphia, respectfully sheweth:

That we, the undersigned citizens of the American republic, deeply impressed by the proceedings now pending before the Senate on the subject of privileges in the case of William Duane, are anxious to call the attention of this honorable House to what they deem the real and inevitable tendency of those proceedings.

We are fully persuaded that the surest safeguard of the rights and liberties of the people is the freedom of the press; and friends as we are to a republican Government, we cannot view, without strong emotions of surprise and regret, the doctrines and practices of the privileged bodies of Europe about to be adopted in this free country against that sacred bulwark of republican liberty.

Relying on the constitution, we had thought that no law could be made by Congress abridging the freedom of the press. But we find, by the proceedings of the Senate, that the privileges of one House may effect what the constitution has forbidden to the three branches of our Legislature united.

We had thought that the constitution had secured to the citizens of the United States the right of a trial by jury; but the proceedings of the Senate have convinced us that we are liable to be tried and punished for new and unknown offences, without recourse to that constitutional tribunal.

We have long viewed with silent horror the baneful progress of the sedition law; but patiently submitted to evils we could not but feel, in hopes that the juries of our country might palliate, if not cure them; but with unfeigned sorrow and surprise we observe, in the proceedings of the Senate, another sedition law rising up to appal us; a sedition law that defies the counteraction of the laws of our land or the juries of our country.

We had thought that the constitution provided against the dangerous intermixture of judicial, legislative, and executive authorities; but the proceedings of the Senate have shown us that the constitution has not yet sufficiently guarded this most important principle, which the doctrine of privilege is so well calculated to destroy.

We had thought that the three branches of our Legislature were unitedly, but not severally, competent to the enactment of those laws which bind the persons and properties of the citizens; but we now find that penal ordinances may be enacted and enforced by the Senate alone! and we contemplate a speedy and alarming extension of our criminal code, if the present example should unhappily be pursued by similar claims of representative privilege.

We had thought that the rights and authorities of the respective branches of our Federal Government had been expressly defined by the federal constitution, and that the constitution itself was drawn up and sanctioned by the public voice for this express purpose; but we now see that rights may be claimed, and privileges assumed, which we seek for in vain among the declarations and provisions of that supreme law of our land.

We had thought that the constitution had provided that, in every criminal case, an accused person should be confronted with his accusers, have process for his witnesses, and be fully heard by himself or counsel in his defence; but the proceedings in question have convinced us that these rights are very imperfectly secured, while an accusing Senate can dictate to a defendant the defence on which he must rely, and arbitrarily confine him to the weakest part of it.

We had thought that the plain and acknowledged principle of natural justice would have prevented the accusers from being also the judges, the jury, and the punishers; but the proceedings of the Senate have satisfied us that these inconsistent characters may be mingled, and this plain and acknowledged principle of natural justice be completely forgotten or boldly renounced.

We dread the introduction of rights unlimited and power unbounded, whether under the name of privilege, or prerogative, or implied authorities, or constructive powers; and we speak with solemn and profound regret that the late proceedings of the Senate have strongly excited in us this dread.

Our hearts are full upon this subject; we could accumulate our reasons of apprehension from these proceedings far beyond the common bounds of a petition and remonstrance; but we forbear. If the objections we have already assigned are unfelt and unnoticed, we must patiently contemplate the gloomy prospect before us, and calmly wait the approaching period when we shall no longer boast of being citizens of the American republic.

We reverence the constituted authorities of our country too much to dictate to them the line of their duty, or to reflect improperly on their conduct, or to occupy unnecessarily their time. But on great public occasions, when our liberties are essentially involved, we will practise and maintain our acknowledged right to petition and remonstrate for redress of grievances; and therefore we do, with sincere deference for the honorable body we now address, but at the same time anxiously impressed with the danger of the present proceedings, respectfully call upon the Senate to reconsider the resolutions by them adopted on the subject of privilege, in the case of William Duane.

MAUSOLEUM TO GENERAL WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 19, 1800.

Mr. HENRY LEE made the following report:

The committee to whom was recommended the bill, directing the erection of a mausoleum to George Washington, together with the resolve of Congress, passed the 7th of August, 1783, ordering an equestrian statue of bronze to be erected to General Washington; and also a resolution of Congress, of the 24th day of December, 1799, directing that a marble monument be erected in the Capitol, in the city of Washington, have had the same under consideration; and while they recognise with entire co-operation the highly gratifying testimonial of the national estimation of their commander-in-chief, cannot but consider it as an incomplete exemplification of the national feeling at this day, it having in view only the celebration of his military services. To connect with this the erection of an [appropriate monument in the dome of the Capitol, on a scale commensurate with the virtue and ability of the character thus held up as a model to all future generations, would fulfil the general expectation and complete the professions of Congress. But from the most accurate inquiry they have been able to make, your committee are of opinion, the expense attending the accomplishment of the two resolutions would exceed two hundred thousand dollars.

They cannot, therefore, but recommend an adherence to the plan heretofore adopted by the House, combining as it does every object, and that, too, at an expense not exceeding the sum necessary for an equestrian statue and marble monument, and to be erected by American artists out of American materials.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 6, 1801.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH made the following report:

The Committee of Privileges, to whom was referred the letter from Joseph Wheaton, sergeant-at-arms, report:

That the representation made by the sergeant-at-arms contains a correct statement of facts; and that he, in the opinion of the committee, is to be commended for the promptitude and fidelity with which he executed the order of the Speaker to apprehend the person guilty of indecent and disorderly conduct in the gallery.

The committee have reason to believe, from the best information they can obtain, that the person who committed the disorder, (and who has since absconded,) was at the time intoxicated with liquor.

The magistrate, by whose warrant the sergeant-at-arms was arrested and held in custody for discharging his duty in the premises, has explained his conduct, in a letter accompanying this report. The suggestion made to him that any one member of this House was consulted relative to the prosecution of the sergeant-at-arms, is by the committee presumed to be wholly false; as it would imply in such member not only a disregard of all sense of personal propriety, but also an inexcusable contempt for the honor and dignity of the House.

That, although the arrest and confinement of an officer of the House of Representatives, for any act by him performed in its service, and in obedience to its orders, must be deemed a high breach of its privileges; yet as the magistrate, in the present case, seems rather to have been deceived by false representations than influenced by improper views, the committee cannot consider his conduct as a subject of animadversion.

They are therefore of opinion that it is not expedient for the House to take any further order on the letter from Joseph Wheaton.

NOTE.—The letter from the sergeant-at-arms, referred to in this report, sets forth, that, in consequence of his having executed the order of the Speaker, in arresting a certain James Lane, for disorderly behavior in the gallery of the House, on the 22d December, 1800, he was apprehended and conducted before a magistrate of the city of Washington, detained for a certain length of time, and finally discharged in consequence of the non-appearance of the said James Lane to prosecute his complaint.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION IN RELATION TO THE ELECTIONS OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT, AND OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 22, 1801.

Mr. NICHOLAS made the following report:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring) The following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the constitution of the United States:

“1. That after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, the choice of electors of President and Vice President shall be made by dividing each State into a number of districts, equal to the number of electors to be chosen in such State, and by the persons in each of those districts, who shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State, choosing one elector in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe.

"2. That the election of Representatives to Congress, who are to serve after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, shall be by dividing each State into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State shall be entitled, and by the people within each of those districts who shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State choosing one Representative in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe."

The committee, to whom were referred the foregoing resolutions, have had the same under their consideration, and, as the result of that consideration, beg leave to make the following report:

It is conceived that it may be assumed as one of the most indisputable maxims of American policy, that no change in the constitution of the United States be admitted, without a well-grounded assurance of the attainment of some greater good under the proposed change than under the existing provisions of the constitution.

In relation to the object of the first of the aforesaid resolutions, the existing provisions of the constitution of the United States are expressed in the following terms:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

"The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote, by ballot, for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; and they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such a majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then, from the five highest on the list, the said House shall, in like manner, choose the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them, by ballot, the Vice President.

"The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States."

Under the latitude of expression used in the foregoing provisions, considerable variety of practice has been found to prevail, not only in the different States, but at different periods in the same States. The modes adopted may be considered as capable of designation under two general descriptions: the one an appointment of electors by popular vote; the other, an appointment of electors by legislative choice.

In each mode, considerable varieties have prevailed. Under the first general mode, the States have been sometimes divided into districts, in proportion to the number of electors to be appointed in each State respectively; and the inhabitants of each district, having the right of suffrage, have appointed, by vote, the elector for such district, respectively, nearly in the manner proposed by the first resolution referred to your committee. In other instances, the whole people of a State, having the right of suffrage, have appointed, by general vote, such number of electors as the State was respectively entitled to. The electors appointed under the latter modification have been sometimes taken from the body of the people at large, in other instances, they have been selected from certain districts or divisions of the State, in conformity with certain previous legislative requisitions. In cases of death, absence, or other disability of electors appointed by popular vote, provisions have been made by law, in the same States, to supply the vacancies which might be occasioned by such accidents, by means of a legislative choice.

Under the other general mode of appointment, the electors in some States have been appointed by a joint ballot of both Houses of the Legislature. In some instances, the electors appointed by legislative choice have been taken from the body of the people at large, without previous limitation; in other instances, from a restricted list, nominated in certain proportions by each House of the Legislature, respectively.

In the same States, one general mode of appointment has prevailed at one time, and another general mode at another time; the changes having been made as well from one general mode as from the other.

Such are the existing provisions of the constitution of the United States, and such has been the practice under these provisions. The modes thus used are presumed to have been within the legitimate construction of the constitution, since the votes of electors appointed under almost every variety of these modes have been admitted in former elections of President and Vice President of the United States. The latitude of expression used in those provisions, and the variety of modes practically adopted under them, seem to have been considered in the first of the resolutions referred to your committee as inconveniences which ought to be remedied.

Your committee are persuaded that the provisions of the constitution of the United States can, in no instance, be reasonably considered as mere pleonasm or inadvertencies; and, therefore, that the particular phraseology used on the above subject, was not adopted without due consideration. Your committee are equally persuaded that the varieties which have practically taken place under the terms used, are not beyond the contemplation of those who framed the constitution. These varieties, it is reasonable to suppose, were foreseen, and, being foreseen, were viewed not without favor, as the best means of enabling the people of the United States to combine the advantages of experience with the speculations of theory, in relation to this acknowledgedly the most difficult part of their government in the adjustment, so that they may ultimately settle down into one uniform mode within constitutional limits, not from constitutional restriction, but from the convictions of reason founded on experience.

The mode proposed to be exclusively established being clearly within the expressions of the constitution, if upon experience and comparison with other modes, equally within those expressions, it shall be found to possess superior advantages, or, possessing equal advantages, to be liable to fewer or less considerable inconveniences, your committee will not distrust the good sense of the people of the United States, in ultimately selecting this mode without constitutional restraint, as their uniform mode of electing the President and Vice President of the United States.

Your committee hold it foreign to their duty to enter into a comparative view of the merits and demerits of the various modes which have been or may be adopted under the existing provisions of the constitution of the United States; they hold it sufficient to authorize the rejection of any proposition for the exclusive establishment of any particular mode, if such mode shall, upon candid examination, be found liable to serious abuses of most dangerous consequence to the public peace; against which abuses, under such mode, no practicable means have been, or probably can be found, for prevention or remedy.

The liability of the mode proposed to such abuses cannot be made more manifest than by a brief review of the essential details of that mode.

To carry into effect the mode proposed to be exclusively established, every State must necessarily be divided into a number of districts, in proportion to the number of electors to be appointed in each State, respectively. These districts must, of necessity, be again sub-divided, for the convenient reception of the votes of the people. Authority must be delegated to one or more officers in every sub-division of every electoral district throughout the United States, for the purpose of receiving those votes.

Amidst so great a variety of officers thus to be intrusted, it would be against the calculations of all experience to suppose there would not be found some who might be reasonably suspected of a liability to the deviations of error, if not to those of a worse nature. No Government upon earth has, or can have, competent knowledge of so great a variety of individuals, as to ensure, through the cautiousness of appointment, against such deviation in all instances. Absolute prevention, then, is not to be expected.

The votes of some, possessing the right of suffrage, may be rejected; the votes of others, not possessing the right of suffrage, may be admitted; whether such rejection or admission proceed from error of judgment, or from design, it will equally lay the foundation of a contested or disputed election between the candidates for the electorship.

When the votes of the several sub-divisions of an electoral district have been taken, the polls, or lists of those votes must be brought together for addition and comparison; and a return must be made of the person appointed an elector. Whether that return be made by the officers (authorized originally to receive the votes) in a collective body, or whether it be made by some other authority, to which those officers may be directed to transmit the polls or lists of the votes taken by them, there may (amidst the conflict of passions, too likely to prevail on such occasions) too probably be found means of suppressing the polls, or lists of votes of some of the sub-divisions of a district, or of preventing or delaying the transmission thereof; so that one man might be returned in apparent conformity with law, the elector of a district, when, in reality, another may have been appointed by the people of that district.

The common experience of elective Governments evinces that cases, such as those above suggested, are by no means out of the course of probable occurrence. Instances of disputed elections, contested upon similar grounds, frequently occur in ordinary legislative bodies, notwithstanding the knowledge that a remedy exists within the scope of the power of those bodies. The protracted periods of their sessions give time for investigating and deciding upon the merits of such contested elections. The knowledge of the practicability of such remedy probably tends to discourage the greater frequency of such occurrences.

But the bodies of electors in each State, respectively, from the necessarily restricted periods of their sessions, are incapacitated to collect the necessary evidence, and to pursue such other steps as are essential to the investigation of and decision upon the merits of a contested election of one of their members, were they otherwise competent thereto. Those, therefore, who may be returned electors, whether duly and really appointed or not, will, in practice, exercise the important functions of electors of the President and Vice President of the United States. No practicable remedy against such abuses appears to exist in the present stage of the proposed system; a knowledge of the defect of such remedy, moreover, it is to be feared, might act as an additional temptation to the frequency of abuse.

The votes of the electors in the several States are next to be rendered by ballot, and, when so rendered, they are to be transmitted in the form of certificates, giving the result of the ballot to certain officers of the Government of the United States. When the period arrives for opening those certificates, and counting the votes in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, if error or abuse shall have taken place, no means exist (in case the ballot be in favor of more than two persons as President and Vice President) for discriminating between the votes of those who shall have been duly appointed and returned, and those who shall have been defectively appointed and unduly returned as electors. To set aside votes given by persons not duly appointed, and consequently wanting the competent authority of electors, no course presents itself in such case, save that of vacating the whole ballot, of which the defective vote or votes may be a component part. Thus, to deprive a State of all participation in the election of the President and Vice President of the United States, on account of the defective appointment of one or a few of its electors, would be a serious and painful duty. To vacate such ballot, and thereby to deprive those candidates for whom the sound votes of such ballot may have been given, of the aid of that ballot, in order at the same time to destroy the effect of the unsound votes, might result in giving to others a priority, to which, if effect could be given to the really sound votes, those others might not be entitled. This also presents an embarrassing consideration.

The vacation of a ballot, composed of sound and defective votes, ought to be the result of uniform principle; it ought to take place on all occasions where a discrimination cannot be made, or on none. Not to vacate such ballot, but to permit the election of a Chief Magistrate to be carried, on any occasion, by the aid of one or more defective votes, would be to hazard, in a most eminent degree, the peace of the union. It is of the last importance to the happiness of the people of the United States, that a complete conviction should prevail at all times that the person who may be elected Chief Magistrate of the Union has been really elected by electors duly and really appointed by those having competent authority for that purpose. It were painful to anticipate the consequences which would too probably attend a disputed election to the Presidency; those consequences might be more calamitous than can be foreseen.

A mode of electing the President and Vice President of the United States, which might at once combine the expression of the public sentiments of the people of the respective States, with a perfect assurance of the due appointment of the electors for that important purpose, is a discovery greatly to be desired; that such mode may be found, under the present provisions of the constitution of the United States, and will be discovered by the good sense of the American people, when aided by further experience, is confidently hoped. Under such circumstances, to adopt exclusively the mode proposed by the first resolution referred to your committee, might not only preclude the advantages of further experience and the adoption of a more eligible mode, but might tend to perpetuate, as well as to render more frequent the occurrence of those exceptional incidents which have been before suggested, and for which it is difficult, if not impracticable, to find adequate and convenient means of prevention or remedy.

These considerations induce your committee to prefer the existing provisions of the constitution of the United States to the change proposed by the first of the resolutions referred to them.

In relation to the second resolution referred to your committee, they report, that the objects directly contemplated therein are already within the limits of the legislative authority of the Government of the United States. To convert a constitutional provision for the exercise of legislative authority, to which recurrence may be had at all times, and under which such modifications may be introduced, from time to time, as the public good or convenience may require, in the ordinary forms of legislation, into a specific constitutional prescription, seems to be both superfluous and inconvenient.

The adoption of the change proposed in the second resolution would also, in the opinion of your committee, indirectly tend to withdraw from the Government of the United States its existing control over the appointment of one of its most essential branches, and to vest that authority exclusively in the State Governments. Such arrangement might produce consequences not contemplated, and too unpleasant to be anticipated. Your committee, therefore, conceive it to be inexpedient to adopt the proposed change on this subject, and submit the following resolutions to the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to change the constitution of the United States, in the manner proposed by the first of the aforesaid resolutions, in relation to the election of the President and Vice President of the United States.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to change the constitution of the United States, in the manner proposed by the second of the aforesaid resolutions, in relation to the election of members of the House of Representatives of the United States.

[2d SESSION.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 30, 1801.

UNITED STATES, January 30, 1801.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress, for their consideration, a letter from William Thornton, Alexander White, and William Cranch, Esquires, Commissioners of the City of Washington; with a representation of the affairs of the city, made by them to the President of the United States, dated 28th January, 1801, accompanied with a series of documents marked from A to H, inclusively.

JOHN ADAMS.

Sir:

COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, January 28, 1801.

We do ourselves the honor to present to you a state of the business under our care, and of the public property belonging to the federal seat, with an estimate of its value, founded, not on mere supposition, but on the average of former sales.

This report would have been made at an earlier day, had it not been delayed by the unfortunate death of Mr. Scott.

We have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest respect, sir, your most obedient servants,

WILLIAM THORNTON,
ALEXANDER WHITE,
W. CRANCH.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the President of the United States:

The commissioners appointed by virtue of the act of Congress entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," respectfully represent:

That the business committed to their charge having so far proceeded as to enable the Government to remove to its permanent seat, they have judged it expedient to lay before the President such a statement as will enable him to determine on the measures proper to be pursued in future.

By the act of Congress above mentioned, the commissioners appointed in the manner thereby prescribed, or any two of them, were authorized to purchase or accept such quantity of land on the eastern side of the river Potomac, within the District, in the said act mentioned, as the President should deem proper for the use of the United States; and according to such plans as the President should approve, prior to the first Monday in December, 1800, provide suitable buildings for the accommodation of Congress, and of the President, and of the public officers of the Government of the United States. That the President, in compliance with the act above mentioned, and of an act to amend the same, passed at Philadelphia, on the 3d of March, 1791, did, by his proclamation, dated 30th of the same month, locate a district within the limits prescribed by the above-mentioned acts, and which has now become the permanent seat of the Government of the United States. That the President, agreeably to the above-recited acts, appointed, and by supplying vacancies which have happened by resignation and death, has kept in appointment, three commissioners, for the purposes in the said acts declared. That the proprietors of the lands on which the city of Washington is laid out, by their several deeds, dated in or about the month of June, 1791, conveyed the said lands to Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, in trust, to be laid out in a federal city, with such streets, squares, parcels, and lots, as the President of the United States for the time being, should approve; and that the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, or the survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, should convey to the commissioners, for the time being, and their successors, for the use of the United States, forever, all the streets, and such of the said squares, parcels, and lots, as the President should deem proper for the use of the United States, forever; and that as to the residue of the lots, into which the said lands should be laid off, that a fair and equal division should be made of them in the manner in the said deeds of trust specified, and that the part assigned to the public should be sold at such times and in such manner, and on such terms and conditions, as the President of the United States for the time being should direct; and that the said trustees, or the survivors of them, or the heirs of such survivors, should, on the order of the President, convey all the said lots, so sold and ordered to be conveyed, to the respective purchasers, in fee simple, according to the terms and conditions of such purchases; and the produce of the sales of the said lots, when sold as aforesaid, should in the first place be applied to the payment in money to the original proprietors for all the parts of their lands which should be laid off in lots, squares, or parcels, and appropriated to the use of the United States, at the rate of £25 per acre, not accounting streets any part thereof; and the surplus, whether in money or securities of any kind, should be paid, assigned, transferred, and delivered over to the President for the time being, as a grant of money to be applied to the purposes mentioned in the aforesaid act. In which deeds of trust, it is further provided, that the said trustees should at any time, at the request of the President of the United States, convey all or any of the said lands, which shall not then have been conveyed in execution of the trusts aforesaid, to such person or persons as he shall appoint, in fee simple, subject to the trusts then remaining to be executed, and to the end that the same may be perfected, (A.) A very valuable property being thus placed at the disposal of the President, he pursued those measures which appeared most conducive to the great objects committed to his charge. He directed public sales of the property, and authorized, by a writing under his hand, dated 29th September, 1792, the commissioners, or any two of them to sell, or agree for the sale of any lot or lots in the said city at private sale, for such price and on such terms as they should think proper, (B.) But no sales took place deserving attention, until the 23d of December, 1793, when a contract was made with Robert Morris and James Greenleaf, for the sale of six thousand lots, averaging five thousand two hundred and sixty-five square feet each, at the rate of eighty dollars per lot, payable in seven equal annual instalments, without interest, commencing the 1st of May, 1794, and with condition of building twenty brick houses annually, two stories high, and covering twelve hundred square feet each; and with further condition that they should not sell any lots previous to the 1st of January, 1796, but on condition of erecting on every third lot one such house within four years from the time of sale, (C.) This contract was afterwards modified by an agreement of the 24th of April, 1794, by which the payment of 80,000 dollars, and the erecting the first-mentioned houses, should rest on the joint bond of the said Morris and Greenleaf, and of John Nicholson; and that one thousand lots should be conveyed to the said Morris and Greenleaf, (D.) which was accordingly done. It is proper to observe, that on the day on which the first-mentioned contract was executed, the Assembly of Maryland passed a law enacting, "that on all sales of lots in the said city, by the said commissioners, or any two of them, under terms or conditions of payment being made therefor, at any day or days after such contract entered into, if any sum of the purchase money or interest shall not be paid for the space of thirty days after the same ought to be paid, the said commissioners, or any two of them, may sell the same lots at public vendue, in the city of Washington, at any time after sixty days' notice of such sale, in some of the public newspapers of Georgetown and Baltimore town, and retain in their hands sufficient of the money produced by such new sale, to satisfy all principal and interest due on the first contract, together with the expenses of advertisement and sale; and the original purchaser, or his assigns, shall be entitled to receive from the said commissioners, at their treasury, on demand, the balance of the money which may have been actually received by them, or under their order, on the said second sale; and all lots so sold shall be freed and acquitted of all claim, legal and equitable, of the first purchaser, his heirs and assigns."

Notwithstanding the favorable prospect which this transaction for a time afforded, the scene soon changed. The purchasers not only failed to pay the instalment which became due in May, 1795, but early in that year discontinued the buildings which they had commenced under their contract, and in which very little progress has since been made. The President, however, did not think it prudent to offer for sale so large a portion of the public property as would be necessary to raise the sums requisite for carrying on the public buildings; believing, on grounds sufficiently solid to authorize the declaration of his opinion in a message to Congress, accompanying the memorial of the commissioners hereafter mentioned, that this property would be amply sufficient for the purpose, could it be reserved till after the removal of Government, or till it could be sold in small parcels to such as would purchase for their own use. It was therefore determined to solicit the patronage of Congress, which was done in the year 1796, by a memorial from the commissioners, stating the affairs of the federal seat in as clear a light as circumstances would then admit, and suggesting the propriety of authorizing a loan bottomed on the city property, and guarantied by Congress, if that property should prove deficient. Congress approved of the measure, and authorized a loan, under their guaranty, to the amount of $300,000. It is needless to detail the fruitless attempts which were made to fill this loan with actual specie. The only loan which could be obtained was $200,000 in United States' six per cent. stock, at par, from the State of Maryland, and for which the commissioners were obliged, in addition to the guaranty of Congress, to give bonds, in their individual capacities, agreeably to the resolutions of the Assembly of that State, passed in the years 1796 and 1797. (E.)

The moneys arising from the sales of this stock, with the interest accrued thereon previous to the respective sales, amount to $169,873 41; and the interest paid thereon, up to the 30th of September last, inclusive, amounts to $39,000; so that the nett sum of $130,873 41 remained applicable to the use of the public.

The extent of these loans being thus ascertained, and the purchasers of lots still failing to pay the amount of their purchases, it became obvious that the views of Government could not be accomplished without further aid.

The commissioners, therefore, prepared a second memorial to Congress, stating the situation of the federal seat, and the resources which remained in their hands, which memorial was transmitted by the President to Congress on the 23d February, 1793, and, in consequence, an act was passed authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to advance the sum of $100,000, at the times in the said act mentioned, which was declared to be in full of the sums previously guarantied. From the difficulty of collecting outstanding debts, as well from purchasers at public sales held by the commissioners for default of payment by the first purchasers, as from the first purchasers themselves, it became evident that the several objects considered as necessary previous to the removal of Government could not be accomplished with the means at the disposal of the commissioners; application was therefore made to the Assembly of Maryland for a loan, and a resolution of that Legislature was obtained on the 23d December, 1799, directing the trustee of the State to transfer to the commissioners of the federal buildings in the city of Washington the sum of $50,000 of the stock of the United States, bearing a present interest of six per cent. per annum, on their giving such real and personal security as the Governor and Council should approve, for the payment of the principal sum, on or before the 1st day of November, 1802, and the punctual payment of the interest quarterly. Whereupon, Gustavus Scott and William Thornton, two of the commissioners, together with Uriah Forrest and James M. Lingan, entered into bond to the State of Maryland for payment of the principal sum of $50,000 and interest thereon; and the said Uriah Forrest executed a mortgage on 420 acres of land, for the same purpose, agreeably to the said resolution; the above-mentioned commissioners having agreed, by letter dated 28th February, 1800, and directed to the said Uriah Forrest and James M. Lingan, in answer to their letter of the same date, that all the property in the city of Washington, before that time sold or contracted for, and where the payments had not been made, (except the property pledged by the act of Congress to secure the loan of $300,000,) should be held as security for the payment of the said sum of $50,000. (F.)

The trustee of the State transferred the stock accordingly, which has been sold at different times, including the interest received thereon, for the sum of $42,738 36, and interest has been paid thereon up to the 30th September last, inclusive, to the amount of $2,250, leaving the nett sum of $40,488 96 to be applied to public use. The land which has been accepted, or purchased by the commissioners for the use of the United States, and which yet remains unsold, (exclusive of lots forfeited for non-payment of the purchase money, and which for that cause are liable to be resold,) consists of 24,655,735 square feet of ground in the city of Washington, equal to 4,682 lots of 5,265 square feet each, exclusive of lots which bind on navigable water; these form fronts to the extent of 2,043 feet, and are generally sold by the foot front. It is impossible to ascertain with precision the value of this property; some idea may be formed of it by taking the average price at which similar property has heretofore been sold; in this case, a reference must be had to the different situations; 3,178½ of the city lots lie northeast of Massachusetts Avenue, in which situation only five standard lots (except 1,500, part of Morris & Greenleaf's selection of 6,000 lots) have been sold by the commissioners; but many lots (of private property) on the same side of that avenue have been sold. We have been able to ascertain the price of 355 of these, which, united with the price of the five lots sold by the commissioners, make an average of upwards of $105 per standard lot, which rate would produce, by the sale of the whole number on that side of the avenue, the sum of $333,747. The remaining 1,504 lots are situated to the southwest of Massachusetts Avenue; the average price of lots sold in that division of the city, since passing the guaranty law in May, 1796, is $343, at which rate the above-mentioned 1,504 lots would produce $515,872. The average price of lots binding on navigable water, sold during the same period, is $12 71 per foot front. The property of this description, remaining to be sold at the same rate, would produce $25,979 24. It is to be observed that most of these lots were sold at periods remote from the time when profit could be expected to arise from them, and many of them at reduced prices, in consequence of covenants to build thereon. Although it may be admitted that the lots heretofore sold are, on an average, better than those which remain for sale, yet the change of circumstances under which future sales may be made we hope will more than counterbalance the difference. In addition to this property four wharves have been built, at the expense of $3,221 88, which yet remain in a useful state.

An island in Aquia creek, in the State of Virginia, was purchased, in the year 1791, for the sum of $6,000, on account of the freestone quarries therein, which has been conveyed to the before-mentioned Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt for the use of the United States. Thus a real estate of the value of $884,819 88, according to the best estimate we are able to form, remains at the disposal of Government. (G.)

The measures to be pursued, with regard to this property, it is not for us to determine; but we think it necessary to state some other matters which require attention. The debts due, and shortly to become due, to the city fund, and which are considered as good, amount to $144,125 80; and the debts contracted on the credit of that fund, as nearly as can be ascertained, amount to $360,881 05. (G.)

Although it is believed that all the debts stated to be good may ultimately be recovered, (they being due for property sold and not conveyed, or secured by notes with sufficient endorsers,) yet the difficulty of enforcing payment is such that they cannot be relied on for the punctual payment of the interest on the several loans from the State of Maryland, of the sums due to individuals, and the expenses of the commissioners' office.

We further observe, that only three squares remain undivided, owing to the original proprietors not having agreed on their respective proportions therein; and that the division of thirty-three squares has been agreed upon, but the papers respecting them are not yet signed by the parties; and that the accounts with some of the original proprietors for land appropriated to public use have not yet been settled, owing to a difference of opinion between the commissioners and them with respect to small portions of land for which they claim payment.

Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt, the trustees before named, have, at the request of the President of the United States, conveyed the building lots in the city of Washington to Gustavus Scott, William Thornton, and Alexander White, subject to the trusts remaining to be executed. Gustavus Scott has since deceased. The said trustees have been required by the President to convey the streets and grounds appropriated to public use to the commissioners, but have not complied.

Several acts of the Legislature of Maryland have vested certain powers in the commissioners, which it may be proper to notice, particularly an act passed the 19th December, 1791, entitled "An act concerning the territory of Columbia and city of Washington," a copy whereof is enclosed, (marked H;) and an act passed in December, 1793, being a further supplement to the act above mentioned; by the first paragraph of which it is enacted, "That the certificates granted, or which may be granted by the said commissioners, or any two of them, to purchasers of lots in the said city, with acknowledgment of the payment of the whole purchase money and interest, if any shall have arisen thereon, and recorded agreeably to the directions of the act concerning the territory of Columbia and city of Washington, shall be sufficient and effectual to vest the legal estate in the purchasers, their heirs, and assigns, according to the import of such certificate, without any deed or formal conveyance."

The second paragraph of the last-mentioned act, empowering the commissioners to resell lots for default in payment of the first purchase money, has been before recited.

The commissioners, having stated all the facts and observations which appear to them necessary for the information of Government respecting the business committed to their charge, with the greatest deference and respect submit the same to the consideration of the President of the United States.

Copy of a deed of trust for land in the city of Washington.

This indenture, made this _____ day of June, in the year 1791, between Abraham Young, of the State of Maryland, of the one part, and Thomas Beall, of George, and John Mackall Gantt, of the State of Maryland, of the other part, witnesseth: That the said Abraham Young, for and in consideration of the sum of five shillings, to him in hand paid by the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, before the ensembling and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof he doth hereby acknowledge; and thereof doth, against the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, their executors and administrators, and also for and in consideration of the uses and trusts hereinafter mentioned, to be performed by the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, hath granted, bargained, sold, aliened, released, and confirmed, and by these presents doth grant, bargain, sell, alien, release, and confirm, unto the said Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, all the lands of him, the said Abraham Young, lying and being within the following limits, boundaries, and lines, to wit: Beginning on the east side of Rock creek, at a stone standing in the middle of the road leading from Georgetown to Bladensburg; thence, along the middle of the said road, to a stone standing on the east side of the Ready branch of Goose creek; thence, southeasterly, making an angle of sixty-one degrees and twenty minutes with the meridian, to a stone standing in the road leading from Bladensburg to the Eastern Branch ferry; then, south, to a stone eighty poles north of the east and west line already drawn from the mouth of Goose creek, to the Eastern Branch; thence, east, parallel to the said east and west line, to the Eastern Branch; thence, by and with the waters of the Eastern Branch, Potomac river, and Rock creek, to the beginning, with their appurtenances, except all and every lot or lots of which the said Abraham Young is seised, or to which he is entitled, lying in Carrollsburg or Hamburg; to have and to hold the hereby bargained and sold lands, with their appurtenances, to the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, forever, to and for the special trusts following, and no other, that is to say: that all the said lands hereby bargained and sold, or such part thereof as may be thought necessary and proper, to be laid out, together with other lands within the said limits, for a federal city, with such streets, squares, parcels, and lots, as the President of the United States, for the time being, shall approve; and that the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, or the survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, shall convey to the commissioners for the time being, appointed by virtue of the act of Congress entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," and their successors, for the use of the United States, forever, all the said streets, and such of the said squares, parcels, and lots as the President shall deem proper for the use of the United States; and that as to the residue of the lots, into which the lands hereby bargained and sold shall have been laid off and divided, that a fair and equal division of them shall be made; and if no other mode of division shall be agreed on by consent of the said A. Young, and the commissioners for the time being, then such residue of the said lots shall be divided, every other lot alternate to the said A. Young; and it shall, in that event, be determined by lot whether the said A. Young shall begin by the lot of the lowest number laid out on the said land, or the following number; and all the said lots which may in any manner be divided or assigned to the said Abraham Young shall thereupon, together with any part of the said bargained and sold land, if any which shall not have been laid out into the said city be conveyed by the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, or the survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, to him, the said Abraham Young, his heirs or assigns; and that the said other lots shall and may be sold at such time or times, in such manner, and on such terms and conditions, as the President of the United States for the time being shall direct: And that the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, or the survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, will, on the order or direction of the President, convey all the said lots so sold and ordered to be conveyed to the respective purchasers, in fee simple, according to the terms and conditions of such purchases; and the produce of the sales of the said lots, when sold as aforesaid, shall, in the first place, be applied to the payment in money to the said A. Young, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for all the part of the land, hereby bargained and sold, which shall have been laid off in lots, squares, or parcels, and appropriated as aforesaid to the use of the United States, at the rate of twenty-five pounds per acre, not accounting the said streets as part thereof; and the said twenty-five pounds per acre being so paid, or in any other manner satisfied, that then the produce of the same sales, or what thereof may remain as aforesaid in money, or securities of any kind, shall be paid, assigned, transferred, and delivered over to the President for the time being, as a grant of money, and to be applied for the purposes and according to the act of Congress aforesaid. But the said conveyance to the said A. Young, his heirs or assigns, as well as the conveyance to the purchasers, shall be on and subject to such terms and conditions as shall be thought reasonable by the President for the time being, for regulating the materials and manner of the buildings and improvements on the lots generally in the said city, or in particular streets or parts thereof, for common convenience, safety, and order; provided such terms and conditions be declared before the sales of any of the said lots under the direction of the President. And in trust further, and on the agreement that the said A. Young, his heirs or assigns, shall and may continue his possession and occupation of the said land hereby bargained and sold, at his and their will and pleasure, until the same shall be occupied under the said appropriations for the use of the United States as aforesaid, or by purchasers. And when any lots or parcels shall be occupied under purchase or appropriations as aforesaid, then, and not till then, shall the said A. Young relinquish his occupation thereon. And in trust, also, as to the trees, timber, and wood on the premises, that he, the said A. Young, his heirs or assigns, may freely cut down, take and use the same as his and their property, except such of the trees and wood growing, as the President or commissioners aforesaid may judge proper, and give notice, shall be left for ornament; for which the just and reasonable value shall be paid to the said A. Young, his executors, administrators, or assigns, exclusive of the twenty-five pounds per acre for the land. And in case the arrangements of the streets, lots, and the like, will conveniently admit of it, he, the said A. Young, his heirs and assigns, shall, if he so desire it, possess and retain the buildings and grave-yard, if any, on the hereby bargained and sold lands, paying to the President at the rate of twelve pounds ten shillings per acre for the lands so retained, because of such buildings and grave-yards to be applied as aforesaid; and the same shall be thereupon conveyed to the said A. Young, his heirs and assigns, with his lots; but if the arrangements of the streets, lots, and the like, will not conveniently admit of such retention, and it shall become necessary to remove such buildings, then the said A. Young, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall be paid the reasonable value thereof, in the same manner as squares or other ground appropriated for the use of the United States are to be paid for. And because it may so happen that, by the deaths or removals of the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, and from other causes, difficulties may arise in fully perfecting the said trusts by executing all the said conveyances, if no eventual provision is made; it is therefore agreed and covenanted between all the said parties, that the said Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, or either of them, or the heirs of either of them, lawfully may, and that they at any time at the request of the President of the United States for the time being, will convey all or any of the said lands hereby bargained and sold, which shall not then have been conveyed in execution of the trusts aforesaid, to such person or persons as he shall appoint, in fee simple, subject to the trusts then remaining to be executed, and to the end that the same may be perfected. And it is further granted and agreed between all the said parties, and each of the said parties doth for himself respectively, and for his heirs, covenant and grant to and with the others of them, that he and they shall and will, if required by the President of the United States for the time being, join in and execute any further deed or deeds for carrying into effect the trusts, purposes, and true intent of this present deed.

In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have interchangeably set their hands and affixed their seals, the day and year first above written.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1792.

The President of the United States doth hereby order and direct, that any lot or lots in the city of Washington may, after the public sale, to commence on the 8th day of October, be sold and agreed for by the commissioners, or any two of them, at private sale, for such price and on such terms as they may think proper.

Copy of Morris and Greenleaf's contract with the Commissioners, dated 24th December, 1793.

Articles of agreement made and indented this twenty-fourth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, between the commissioners for the federal buildings in the city of Washington of the one part, and Robert Morris, of the city of Philadelphia, and James Greenleaf, of the city of New York, Esquires, of the other part.

Whereas the said commissioners, on the twenty-third day of September last, did enter into an agreement, in writing, with the said James Greenleaf, for the sale of three thousand lots of ground in the said city of Washington, at the price of twenty-five pounds, current money of Maryland, for each lot, to be ascertained in the mode specified in the said agreement; and the sale to be made upon the terms and conditions therein also specified, as by the said agreement, reference being thereto had, will more fully appear: And whereas the said James Greenleaf is empowered by the said Robert Morris to enter into a contract in his name and on his behalf, as his agent, for the purchase of a like number of lots in the said city of Washington, for such price and on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon between him and the said commissioners; and, in pursuance of such power, the said James Greenleaf hath agreed with the said commissioners for the purchase of three thousand lots of ground in the said city of Washington, fifteen hundred of them to be designated on the southwest, and fifteen hundred of them to be designated on the northeast side of Massachusetts Avenue, at the price of thirty-five pounds, current money aforesaid, for each of the said lots, payable yearly, in seven equal payments, without interest; the first of which payments to be made on the first day of May next ensuing the date of these presents, and so on the first day of May in each year succeeding thereto, until the whole of the seven payments shall have been made: And hath further agreed, in pursuance of the said power, that the said Robert Morris should build annually, for seven years next ensuing, ten brick houses, of two stories each, and each of them covering twelve hundred square feet, making in the whole seventy houses: And that the said Robert Morris, or his heirs, should not, before the first day of January, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, sell or contract for the sale of any of the said lots, but under and upon the express condition that one such house, at the least, should be built and erected on every third lot, within four years next after such sale or contract for sale. But it is understood and hereby declared to be the meaning of the parties to these presents, that the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf may, at their pleasure, associate to them one or more persons in the whole purchase, without creating on any of them an obligation to erect on or for every third lot: And whereas it is agreed by and between the said commissioners and the said James Greenleaf, that every thing relating to a loan specified in the contract above mentioned, made between the said commissioners and the said James Greenleaf on the twenty-third day of September last, to be hereafter made by the said James Greenleaf, shall be referred to a new contract, made and entered into this day by and between the said commissioners and the said James Greenleaf, and shall have no other effect whatever than what such new contract specifies and ascertains: And whereas it is thought best, by the parties to these presents, to consolidate and join in one contract both the said agreements, and, further to prevent all disagreement concerning the size of the said lots, to fix and ascertain five thousand two hundred and sixty-five square feet as the average of the areas of the lots contracted for as aforesaid, as well as to ascertain and fix the general location of them, and to modify that part of the agreement with regard to the improvements to be made: Now, therefore, these articles witness, That the said commissioners had sold and contracted for the sale and conveyance, and do hereby, for themselves and their successors, in consideration of the covenants of the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf, hereinafter expressed, being fully executed and performed on their part, sell and contract for the sale and conveyance to them, the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf, as tenants in common, and their heirs, in fee, six thousand lots of ground in the said city of Washington, upon the average of five thousand two hundred and sixty-five square feet for each lot, so that the aggregate in lots, reckoning in the ways to the squares, as the proportion thereof to the lots to be conveyed, shall amount to thirty-one million five hundred and ninety thousand square feet, four thousand five hundred of which lots shall lie to the southwest of Massachusetts Avenue, and the remaining fifteen hundred shall lie to the northeast of the said avenue. And that, of the said four thousand five hundred lots on the southwest of the said avenue, the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf shall have the part of the city on Notley Young's land, and in that part of Daniel Carroll's land which lies in the branches of the canal, clear of Carrollsburg. And that the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf shall have a right to choose, to satisfy the residue of the said four thousand five hundred lots lying to the southwest of the Massachusetts Avenue aforesaid, on any part of the said southwest side of the avenue that they shall think proper, excepting such lots as shall lie in squares numbered as follow, to wit, &c. &c. and the lots lying in Carrollsburg; and also further excepting the water lots, including the water lots lying on the Eastern Branch, and also one-half of the lots lying in Hamburg; the lots in that part of the city, and belonging to it, other than water lots, being to be divided, by alternate choice, between the said commissioners and the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf; Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, by and between the parties to these presents, that the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf are entitled to the lots in Notley Young's land, and, of course, to the privileges of wharfing annexed thereto; and that lots adjoining the canal are not reckoned water lots; and that the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf shall have a right to choose the remaining fifteen hundred lots lying to the northeast of the said Massachusetts Avenue, or any part thereof they shall think proper, excepting one-half of the squares which shall adjoin the spot that may be appropriated for a national university, which is expected to be fixed on the northeast side of the said avenue. And the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf do hereby, in consideration of the agreement on the part of the said commissioners hereinbefore set forth, for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally agree to and with the said commissioners to pay to them or their successors thirty pounds, current money of Maryland, for each of the said six thousand lots contracted to be sold as aforesaid, amounting to one hundred and eighty thousand pounds, current money aforesaid, in seven equal annual payments, without interest, and the first payment to be made on the first day of May next ensuing the date of these presents; and that they will build and erect yearly, on some parts of the said lots, twenty brick houses, of two stories each, and each house covering twelve hundred square feet, until the number of one hundred and forty houses shall be built and erected; and that all buildings and improvements to be made on any of the said lots shall conform to the general regulations published by the President of the United States; and that neither the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf, nor their heirs, will sell or contract for the sale of any of the said lots before the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, but upon the express condition that one such house, at least, as above described, shall be built and erected on every third lot, at the least, within four years after such sale or contract for sale. But, as it will promote the interest of the city that at least some of the said houses should be larger, and that all front houses of the size of those described should be of three stories in height, it is agreed by and between the parties aforesaid, and declared by them to be the meaning of these presents, that the area of all houses exceeding twelve hundred square feet shall be reckoned accordingly, and discount in proportion as they cover more than the twelve hundred square feet; and that all houses of three proper proportioned stories shall be reckoned and discounted at the rate of one-fourth part more than their area, so that the aggregate of houses of not less than twelve hundred square feet shall cover, with the allowance of one-fourth for three story houses, one hundred and sixty-eight thousand square feet. And it is hereby declared, that the covenants and agreements, on the part of the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf, and the true and faithful performance of them, are the terms and conditions of the sale of the said six thousand lots. And it is further agreed, by and between the parties aforesaid, that, in the division that is hereafter to be made between the said commissioners and the present proprietors of the property of the said city of Washington, due regard shall be had by the said commissioners that such divisions shall take place, as far as consistently may be, for the interest of the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf. And, further, it is understood and declared, that the lots already sold or contracted for by the commissioners are not to be chosen by the said Robert Morris and James Greenleaf.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands the day and year first above written.

Copy of minute of 24th April, 1794.

The Commissioners of the Federal District and Mr. Greenleaf entered on the subject of Messrs. Morris and Greenleaf's propositions of the 7th January last, communicated by the commissioners to the Secretary of State, and, being mutually disposed to accommodate in order to effect their common view of improvement of the city, have fallen on the following mode of carrying on and settling the contract of Messrs. Morris and Greenleaf:

1st. That an account shall be raised between the commissioners and Messrs. Morris and Greenleaf, charging the lots which may from time to time be conveyed to them or their assigns, and giving credit for the payments, as made.

2d. That the commissioners will grant a certificate or deed in fee for the public lots contracted for by Morris and Greenleaf, on Mr. Notley Young's land, and supposed to be about one thousand, as soon as those lots can be ascertained, or even before, if a general description will answer the purposes of Messrs. Morris and Greenleaf, on their giving bond with Mr. John Nicholson for the amount of the same, and for performing the contract made relative to improvements.

3d. And in order that Messrs. Morris and Greenleaf may have the advantage of disposing of any of their lots, amounting to six thousand, at their will, the commissioners, on their assignment or order, will grant certificates or deeds in fee to such persons as they may from time to time require, acknowledging the payment of the consideration money, and subjoining thereto the condition of improvement, (if any is to be made,) according to the contract of Messrs. Morris and Greenleaf; the commissioners being willing to rely on the condition to be inserted in the certificate, or in the responsibility of Morris, Greenleaf, and Nicholson, as the case may require, for the improvement of every third lot sold by them before the 1st day of January, 1796, agreeable to the tenor of their contract; and the commissioners are willing to allow the amount of one thousand lots, and the improvements on the whole number of lots, to rest on the joint and several bonds of Morris, Greenleaf, and Nicholson; it being intended that a credit on their personal security may at any and at all times amount to the cost of one thousand lots, as before mentioned.

[NOTE.—The above is a copy of an entry made in the minutes of the commissioners, between the 15th and 24th April, 1794.]

Uriah Forrest and James M. Lingan's letter to the commissioners.

GENTLEMEN:

FEBRUARY 23, 1800.

We expect that if we comply with your wish, and become sureties to the State of Maryland, you will consider that all the property in the city heretofore sold or contracted for, and where payments have not been made, (excepting the property pledged by the act of Congress, to secure the loan of $300,000) will be held as a security for the repayment of this money (say the $50,000) to the State; and if you should think it advisable, you will, on reasonable notice, proceed to sell the property, or such parts as may be necessary, and pay over the notes, or the money arising therefrom, to the State, in discharge of this specific debt.

We are respectfully, gentlemen, your most obedient servants,

URIAH FORREST,
JAS. M. LINGAN.

The COMMISSIONERS OF THE FEDERAL BUILDINGS, Washington.

Answer of commissioners to Messrs. Forrest and Lingan's letter of this date.

GENTLEMEN:

FEBRUARY 28, 1800.

We are favored with your letter of this day, and think the terms asked by you perfectly just and reasonable, and have no hesitation in saying we will readily agree to them.

We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants,

GUSTAVUS SCOTT,
WILLIAM THORNTON.

Messrs. LINGAN & FORREST.

A list of balances which appear to be due to the commissioners of the city of Washington on 1st January, 1801, exclusive of interest.

From whom due.	Amount expected to be received.	Am't doubtful, and not expected to be received.	Explanatory notes.
	Dolls. Cts.	Dolls. Cts.
Matthew Brown, -	$700 00	-	Due for lots purchased.
J. Hoban and P. Purcell, -	211 86	-	Due for lots purchased.
Cornelius McD. Roe, -	85 73	-	Due for lots purchased.
Cornelius McD. Roe, -	-	75 33	Due for old materials sold to him.
Charles Minifie, -	840 00	-	Due for lots purchased.
George Washington, dec. -	178 56	-	Due for lots purchased.
Walter Stewart, dec. -	6,990 75	-	Due for lots purchased.
George Blagdin, about -	300 00	-	Due for lots purchased; his account unsettled.
Ambrose Moriarty, -	118 50	-	Due for lots purchased.
Thomas S. Lee, -	-	-	-
W. Deakins, jr. dec. and } -	5,545 59	-	Due for balance of the purchase money of a parcel of ground near the mouth of Rock creek, which was heretofore assigned to the commissioners to defray the expense of making the causeway and building a bridge over the mouth of said creek. The receipt of these three sums depends on the decree of the court of chancery of Maryland, a bill having been filed and an injunction granted and served; the debts are for lots sold.
Peter Casanave, dec. } -	-	-
James Barry, -	-	251 24	Due for lots sold to him. Mr. Walker has a claim for grounds which he thinks ought to be appropriated to public use, although omitted in the specification of public appropriations made by the late President Washington; the commissioners agreed that the payment of this sum might be postponed until the President's directions on the subject should be obtained.
James Barry, -	-	1,230 00
Samuel Blodgett, -	-	3,092 00
Nicholas Voss, -	210 00	-
John Bloor, -	152 00	-
George Walker, -	414 14	-
William Tunncliff, -	300 00	-	Due for a lot purchased. Mr. Walker is to pay this sum, and the commissioners have agreed to postpone it on the same principles as in Mr. Walker's debt above mentioned.
G. and P. Magruder, -	303 06	-	Due on a note of hand passed for the balance of an account with them as contractors to supply Indian meal; suit commenced, judgment obtained, and removed to the Court of Appeals.
William Rutherford, -	-	962 25	Balance due from him as a contractor to supply beef and pork; suit brought, referred to arbitration, no award returned.
William Prout, -	-	1,746 40	Due for lots purchased. Mr. Prout purchased square No. 883, in February, 1796, for $3,866, but has since relinquished it, by letter dated 18th September, 1799, on condition that property of equal value should be conveyed to him in lieu thereof, or, if the public had not water property which he should approve, then he to be paid the price he had given for said square, with interest, on or before the 1st of December then next; the Secretary of the Navy afterwards purchased the said square No. 883, together with square No. 884, for $4,000, for a navy yard, and the said two squares were conveyed to the United States on the 17th March, 1800; Mr. Prout has purchased, at public sales of lots originally bought by Morris and Greenleaf, and resold for default in payment, to the amount of $1,092, in part of the amount of square 883 relinquished by him as above mentioned, and is entitled to $2,575 52, for his ground appropriated to public use; so that, in the actual state of the business, he is a creditor of the commissioners to the amount of $1,383 dollars, after deducting $100 52, charged to him for ground retained by him as an original proprietor, for a graveyard and improvements, agreeably to the deeds of trust.
Joseph Boone, -	578 84	-	Due for lots purchased.
William Lovell, about -	400 00	-	Due for lots purchased; has an unsettled account with the commissioners.

Morris & Nicholson, -	115,241 43	80,000 00	Due for lots purchased by Morris and Greenleaf; see documents marked D and G—3.
Uriah Forrest, -	5,000 00	-	Due for United States' six per cent. stock sold to him.
Charles Wayman, -	537 43	-	Due for United States' six per cent. stock sold to him.
L. Harbaugh, cont'r for building public offices, -	-	2,025 66	Advanced to him more than the sum contracted for; it is however believed that, on a final settlement of accounts, Mr. Harbaugh will be a creditor of the commissioners for materials supplied, in addition to those contracted for.
John Templeman, -	440 00	-	Due for hire of the public sawyers, when not wanted at the public buildings.
Sundries, estimated at about	500 00	-	Due for old materials sold, and on sales, and for rent of temporary buildings, originally built for the public workmen.
Ruth Ann Young, -	114 40	-	} Due for ground retained by them as original proprietors, agreeably to the deeds of trust, for their graveyards and improvements.

* It is expected that Mr. Young's claim for his ground appropriated to public use will be equal to these two sums.

† These three accounts are unsettled; when they are adjusted it is probable that there will not be any thing due.

‡ Although these several sums stand charged in the books, (the parties not having accounted for their respective advances,) it is believed the services and supplies are equal to the advances.

§ Suits are now pending on the contracts in these three cases; in the two last, partial deliveries have been made of the articles contracted for, but the quantities are not known, the contractors not having rendered accounts.

ACTS PASSED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF MARYLAND CONCERNING THE TERRITORY OF COLUMBIA AND THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

An Act for the cession of ten miles square, or any less quantity of territory within this State, to the United States, in Congress assembled, for the permanent seat of the General Government.—(Passed Dec. 3, 1789.)

Whereas the equal and common benefits resulting from the administration of the General Government will be best diffused, and its operations become more prompt and certain, by establishing such a situation for the seat of the said Government as will be most central and convenient to the citizens of the United States at large, having regard as well to population, extent of territory, and a free navigation to the Atlantic Ocean, through the Chesapeake Bay, as to the most direct and ready communication with our fellow-citizens in the western frontier: And whereas it appears to this Assembly, that a situation combining all the considerations and advantages before recited may be had on the banks of the river Potomac, above tide-water, in a country rich and fertile in soil, healthy and salubrious in climate, and abounding in all the necessaries and conveniences of life, where, in a location of ten miles square, if the wisdom of Congress shall so direct, the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia may participate in such location.

Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly, That a tract of country, not exceeding ten miles square, or any less quantity, to be located within the limits of this State, and in any part thereof as Congress may by law direct, shall be, and the same is hereby forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and the Government of the United States, in full and absolute right, and exclusive jurisdiction as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of Government of the United States.

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States.

And provided, also, That the jurisdiction of the laws of this commonwealth over the persons and property of individuals residing within the limits of the cession aforesaid, shall not cease or determine, until Congress, having accepted the said cession, shall by law provide for the government thereof, under their jurisdiction, in manner provided by the article of the constitution before recited.

An act concerning the territory of Columbia, and the city of Washington.—(Passed December 19, 1791.)

Whereas the President of the United States, by virtue of several acts of Congress, and acts of the Assemblies of Virginia and Maryland, by his proclamation dated at Georgetown, on the thirtieth day of March, seventeen hundred and ninety-one, did declare and make known, that the whole of the territory of ten miles square, for the permanent seat of Government of the United States, shall be located and included within the four lines following; that is to say, beginning at Jones's Point, being the upper point of Hunting creek, in Virginia, and at an angle in the outset of forty-five degrees west of the north, and running a direct line ten miles for the first line; then beginning again at the same Jones's Point, and running another direct line at a right angle with the first, across the Potomac, ten miles for the second line; then from the terminations of the said first and second lines, running two other direct lines, ten miles each, the one crossing the Eastern Branch and the other the Potomac, and meeting each other in a point; which has since been called the territory of Columbia: and whereas Notley Young, Daniel Carroll, of Dud-dington, and many others, proprietors of the greater part of the land hereinafter mentioned to have been laid out in a city, came into an agreement, and have conveyed their lands in trust to Thomas Beall, son of George, and John Mackall Gantt, whereby they have subjected their lands to be laid out as a city, given up part to the United States, and subjected other part to be sold to raise money as a donation to be employed according to the act of Congress for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States, under and upon the terms and conditions contained in each of the said deeds; and many of the proprietors of lots in Carrolls-burg and Hamburg have also come into an agreement, subjecting their lots to be laid out anew, giving up one-half of the quantity thereof to be sold, and the money thence arising to be applied as a donation as aforesaid, and they to be reinstated in one-half the quantity of their lots in the new location, or otherwise compensated in land in a different situation within the city, by agreement between the commissioners aforesaid and them; and, in case of disagreement, that then a just and full compensation shall be made in money; yet some of the proprietors of lots in Carrollsburg and Hamburg, as well as some of the proprietors of other lands, have not, from imbecility and other causes, come into any agreement concerning their lands within the limits hereinafter mentioned, but a very great proportion of the landholders having agreed on the same terms, the President of the United States directed a city to be laid out, comprehending all the lands beginning on the east side of Rock creek, at a stone standing in the middle of the road leading from Georgetown to Bladensburg; thence along the middle of the said road, to a stone standing on the east side of the Reedy branch of Goose creek; then southeasterly, making an angle of sixty-one degrees and twenty minutes with the meridian, to a stone standing in the road leading from Bladensburg to the Eastern Branch ferry; thence south, to a stone eighty poles north of the east and west line already drawn from the mouth of Goose creek to the Eastern Branch; then east, parallel to the said east and west lines, to the Eastern Branch; then with the waters of the Eastern Branch, Potomac river, and Rock creek, to the beginning, which has since been called the City of Washington: and whereas it appears to this General Assembly highly just and expedient that all the lands within the said city should contribute, in due proportion, in the means which have already very greatly enhanced the value of the whole; that an incontrovertible title ought to be made to the purchasers, under public sanction; that allowing foreigners to hold land within the said territory will greatly contribute to the improvement and population thereof; and that many temporary provisions will be necessary, till Congress exercise the jurisdiction and government over the said territory: And whereas, in the cession of this State, heretofore made, of territory for the Government of the United States, the lines of such cession could not be particularly designated; and it being expedient and proper that the same should be recognised in the acts of this State:

2. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That all that part of the said territory, called Columbia, which lies within the limits of this State, shall be, and the same is hereby acknowledged to be forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right, and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eight section of the first article of the constitution of government of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, as to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States: And provided, also, That the jurisdiction of the laws of this State, over the persons and property of individuals residing within the limits of the cession aforesaid, shall not cease or determine until Congress shall by law provide for the government thereof, under their jurisdiction, in manner provided by the article of the constitution before recited.

3. And be it enacted, That all the lands belonging to minors, persons absent out of the State, married women, or persons non compos mentis, or lands the property of this State, within the limits of Carrollsburg and Hamburg, shall be and are hereby subjected to the terms and conditions hereinbefore recited, as to the lots where the proprietors thereof have agreed concerning the same; and all the other lands, belonging as aforesaid, within the limits of the said city of Washington, shall be and are hereby subjected to the same terms and conditions as the said Notley Young, Daniel Carroll of Duddington, and others, have, by their said agreements and deeds, subjected their lands to; and where no conveyances have been made, the legal estate and trust are hereby invested in the said Thomas Beall, son of George, and John Mackall Gantt, in the same manner as if each proprietor had been competent to make, and had made, a legal conveyance of his or her land, according to the form of those already mentioned, with proper acknowledgments of the execution thereof, and, where necessary, of release of dower; and in every case where the proprietor is an infant, a married woman, insane, absent out of this State, or shall not attend on three months' advertisement of notice in the Maryland Journal, and Baltimore Advertiser, the Maryland Herald, and in the Georgetown and Alexandria papers, so that allotment cannot take place by agreement, the commissioners aforesaid, or any two of them, may allot and assign the portion or share of such proprietor, as near the old situation as may be, in Carrollsburg and Hamburg, and to the full value of what the party might claim under the terms before recited; and as to the other lands within the said city, the commissioners, aforesaid, or any two of them, shall make such allotment and assignment, within the lands belonging to the same person, in alternate lots, determining by lot or ballot whether the party shall begin with the lowest number: Provided, That in the cases of coverture and infancy, if the husband, guardian, or next friend, will agree with the commissioners, or any two of them, then an effectual division may be made by consent; and in case of contrary claims, if the claimants will not jointly agree, the commissioners may proceed as if the proprietor was absent; and all persons, to whom allotments and assignments of lands shall be made by the commissioners, or any two of them, on consent and agreement, or pursuant to this act without consent, shall hold the same in their former estate and interest, and in lieu of their former quantity, and subject in every respect to all such limitations, conditions, and incumbrances, as their former estate and interest, and in lieu of their former quantity, and subject in every respect to all such limitations, conditions, and incumbrances, as their former estate and interest were subject to, and as if the same had been actually reconveyed pursuant to the said deed in trust.

4. And be it enacted, That where the proprietor or proprietors, possessor or possessors, of any lands within the limits of the city of Washington, or within the limits of Carrollsburg and Hamburg, who have not already, or who shall not within three months after the passage of this act, execute deeds in trust to the aforesaid Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt, of all their lands within the limits of the said city of Washington, and on the terms and conditions mentioned in the deeds already executed by Notley Young and others, and execute deeds in trust to the said Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt, of all their lots in the towns of Carrollsburg and Hamburg, on the same terms and conditions contained in the deeds already executed by the greater part of the proprietors of lots in the said towns, the said commissioners, or any two of them, shall and may, at any time or times thereafter, issue a process, directed to the sheriff of Prince George's county, commanding him, in the name of the State, to summon five good substantial freeholders, who are not of kin to any proprietor or proprietors of the lands aforesaid, and who are not proprietors themselves, to meet on a certain day, and at a certain place, within the limits of the said city, to inquire of the value of the estate of such proprietor or proprietors, possessor or possessors; on which day and place the said sheriff shall attend, with the freeholders by him summoned; which freeholders shall take the following oath or affirmation, on the land to be by them valued, to wit: "I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will, to the best of my judgment, value the lands of C. D. now to be valued, so as to do equal right and justice to the said C. D. and to the public, taking into consideration all circumstances," and shall then proceed to value the said lands; and such valuation, under their hands and seals, and under the hand and seal of the said sheriff, shall be annexed to the said process, and returned by the sheriff to the clerk appointed by virtue of this act, who shall make record of the same; and the said lands shall, on the payment of such valuation, be, and are hereby vested in the said commissioners, in trust, to be disposed of by them, or otherwise employed to the use of the said city of Washington; and the sheriff aforesaid and freeholders aforesaid shall be allowed the same fees for their trouble as are allowed to a sheriff and jurymen in executing a writ of inquiry; and in all cases where the proprietor or possessor is tenant in right of dower, or by the courtesy, the freeholders aforesaid shall ascertain the annual value of the lands and the gross value of such estate therein; and, upon paying such gross value, or securing to the possessor the payment of the annual valuation, at the option of the proprietor or possessor, the commissioners shall be, and are hereby, vested with the whole estate of such tenant, in manner and for the uses and purposes aforesaid.

5. And be it enacted, That all the squares, lots, pieces, and parcels of land, within the said city, which have been or shall be appropriated for the use of the United States, and also the streets, shall remain and be for the use of the United States; and all the lots and parcels which have been or shall be sold to raise money as a donation as aforesaid, shall remain and be to the purchasers, according to the terms and conditions of their respective purchases; and purchases and leases from private persons claiming to be proprietors, and having, or those under whom they claim having, been in possession of the lands purchased or leased, in their own right, five whole years next before the passing of this act, shall be good and effectual for the estate, and on the terms and conditions of such purchases and leases, respectively, without impeachment, and against any contrary title now existing; but if any person hath made a conveyance, or shall make a conveyance or lease, of any lands within the limits of the said city, not having right and title to do so, the person who might be entitled to recover the land under a contrary title now existing may, either by way of ejectment against the tenant, or in action for money had and received for his use against the bargainer or lessor, his heirs, executors, administrators, or devisees, as the case may require, recover all money received by him for the squares, pieces, or parcels, appropriated for the use of the United States, as well as for lots or parcels sold, and rents received, by the person not having title as aforesaid, with interest from the time of the receipt; and, on such recovery in ejectment, where the land is in lease, the tenant shall thereafter hold under, and pay the rent reserved to, the person making title to and recovering the land; but the possession bona fide acquired in none of the said cases shall be changed.

6. And be it enacted, That any foreigner may, by deed or will hereafter to be made, take and hold lands within that part of the said territory which lies within this State, in the same manner as if he was a citizen of this State, and the same lands may be conveyed by him, and transmitted to, and be inherited by, his heirs or relations, as if he and they were citizens of this State: Provided, That no foreigner shall, in virtue hereof, be entitled to any further or other privilege of a citizen.

7. And be it enacted, That the said commissioners, or any two of them, may appoint a clerk for recording deeds of lands within the said territory, who shall provide a proper book for the purpose, and therein record, in a strong legible hand, all deeds duly acknowledged, of lands in the said territory, delivered to him to be recorded, and in the same book make due entries of all divisions and allotments of lands and lots made by the commissioners in pursuance of this act, and certificates granted by them of sales, and the purchase money having been paid, with a proper alphabet in the same book of the deeds and entries aforesaid; and the same book shall carefully preserve, and deliver over to the commissioners aforesaid, or their successors, or such person or persons as Congress shall hereafter appoint; which clerk shall continue such during good behavior, and shall be removable only on conviction of misbehavior in a court of law; but before he acts as such, he shall take an oath, or affirmation, well and truly to execute his office, and he shall be entitled to the same fees as are or may be allowed to the clerks of the county courts for searches, copying, and recording.

8. And be it enacted, That acknowledgments of deeds made before a person in the manner and certified as the laws of this State direct, or made before and certified by either of the commissioners, shall be effectual; and that no deed hereafter to be made of or for lands within that part of the said territory which lies within this State, shall operate as a legal conveyance; nor shall any lease for more than seven years be effectual, unless the deed shall have been acknowledged as aforesaid, and delivered to the said clerk to be recorded within six calendar months from the date thereof.

9. And be it enacted, That the commissioners aforesaid, or some two of them, shall direct an entry to be made in the said record book of every allotment and assignment to the respective proprietors, in pursuance of this act.

10. And, for the encouragement of master builders to undertake the building and finishing houses within the said city, by securing to them a just and effectual remedy for their advances and earnings, Be it enacted, That for all sums due and owing, on written contracts, for building any house in said city, or the brick work, or carpenters' or joiners' work thereon, the undertaker, or workman, employed by the person for whose use the house shall be built, shall have a lien on the house and the ground on which the same is erected, as well as for the materials found by him; provided the said written contract shall have been acknowledged before one of the commissioners, a justice of the peace, or an alderman of the corporation of Georgetown, and recorded in the office of the clerk for recording deeds herein created, within six calendar months from the time of acknowledgment as aforesaid; and if, within two years after the last of the work is done, he proceeds in equity, he shall have remedy as upon a mortgage; or, if he proceeds at law within the same time, he may have execution against the house and land, in whose hands soever the same may be; but this remedy shall be considered as additional only, nor shall, as to the land, take place of any legal incumbrance made prior to the commencement of such claim.

11. And be it enacted, That the treasurer of the Western Shore be empowered and required to pay the seventy-two thousand dollars agreed to be advanced to the President by resolutions of the last session of Assembly, in sums as the same may come to his hands, on the appointed funds, without waiting for the day appointed for the payment thereof.

12. And be it enacted, That the commissioners aforesaid for the time being, or any two of them, shall, from time to time, until Congress shall exercise the jurisdiction and Government within the said territory, have power to license the building of wharves in the waters of the Potomac and the Eastern Branch, adjoining the said city, of the materials, in the manner, and of the extent, they may judge durable, convenient, and agreeing with general order; but no license shall be granted to one to build a wharf before the land of another, nor shall any wharf be built in the said waters without license as aforesaid; and if any wharf shall be built without such license, or different therefrom, the same is hereby declared a common nuisance; they may also, from time to time, make regulations for the discharge and laying of ballast from ships or vessels lying in Potomac river, above the lower line in said territory and Georgetown, and from ships and vessels lying in the Eastern Branch; they may also, from time to time, make regulations for landing and laying materials for building the said city, for disposing and laying earth which may be dug out of the wells, cellars, and foundations, and for ascertaining the thickness of the walls of houses, and to enforce the observance of all such regulations, by appointing penalties for a breach of any one of them, not exceeding ten pounds current money, which may be recovered in the name of the said commissioners, by warrant, before a justice of the peace, as in case of small debts, and disposed of as a donation for the purposes of the said act of Congress; and the said commissioners, or any two of them, may grant licenses for retailing distilled spirits within the limits of the said city, and suspend or declare the same void; and if any person shall retail or sell any distilled spirits, mixed or unmixed, in less quantity than ten gallons to the same person, or at the same time actually delivered, he or she shall forfeit for every such sale three pounds, to be recovered and applied as aforesaid.

13. And be it enacted, That an act of Assembly of this State, to condemn lands, if necessary, for the public buildings of the United States, be and is hereby repealed.

BOOKS AND PAPERS DESTROYED BY FIRE IN THE WAR OFFICE, IN 1800.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 17, 1801.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1801.

The acting SECRETARY FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF WAR, in obedience to the direction of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of the 2d instant, that he "communicate to the House such information as may be in his power in relation to the destruction of the books and papers in that Department by fire; designating particularly what description of books and papers has been lost thereby, and what the probable effect of such loss will be in the adjustment of the unsettled accounts of the United States," respectfully reports:

That he has very little doubt that the fire which, on the evening of the 8th of November last, entirely destroyed the house then occupied by the Department of War, was communicated from the adjoining house, as it was first discovered in the library, which was arranged against the partition wall directly behind the fire-place of that house, and at the distance of the whole width of the house (twenty-five or twenty-six feet) from the only fire-place in the apartment; in which last fire-place a fire had not been made on that day or for upwards of three weeks immediately preceding.

That the rapidity, with which a large library extended the flames, on the admission of fresh air into the room, entirely precluded the possibility of saving any books or papers that were deposited on the second or third floor; the whole of the former, and one apartment on the latter, then being occupied as the Secretary's office.

That not a book or paper of the office was saved, except one volume, in which the contracts and deeds for lands sold to the United States were recorded. This had been taken into the Accountant's apartments, on the ground floor, in the morning, for the adjustment of some accounts, and was saved, with his books and papers which were in those apartments.

That, immediately after the fire, measures were taken to secure a renewal of the most necessary and important documents in all possible cases. That the lists of invalid pensioners have already been renewed, and sundry communications of importance from the Department returned and copied. That additions to these are still making, and that the examination of the claims to land for services in the Virginia line on continental establishment, as directed by law, though now suspended, is expected soon to be in the usual state of progression.

That the library, which was entirely destroyed, was extensive, and contained many military works of celebrity, which it is scarcely expected can be replaced. In order, however, to effect so desirable an object as far as may be, the Secretary has added a proportionate sum to the estimated appropriation for the present year for the purpose.

That of the claims for continental military bounty lands, the entries of which were, by the act of 2d of March, 1799, limited to the 1st day of January, 1802, many still remain unsatisfied. That, from the manner in which the grants were made, the checks and books being all lost, a great difficulty will oppose the renewing issues of warrants for those lands. The Secretary has recommended to applicants that all claims be filed in the office before the day on which the above-mentioned limitation will take place, in order that the examination of them may thereafter be made under such regulations as may be judged most proper to secure to the claimants their lawful rights, and protect the United States as much as possible from fraud and imposition.

That it is not presumed that any consequences to affect the adjustment of unsettled accounts will follow from the loss of the papers of the Secretary's office, the original directions for expenditures being, it is supposed, to be obtained on the exhibition of the accounts growing from them; and it is not probable that any material injury will result from the losses sustained in the Accountant's office; the specification of which, with the remarks of the Accountant thereon, follows, viz:

Several cases containing muster and pay-rolls; others containing accounts and vouchers of sundry paymasters and agents for paying troops; and one case containing individual settlements made by the late paymaster general and commissioner of army accounts.

These papers could only be of use in the examination of claims for services prior to the establishment of the present Government, which, if not already settled, are all barred and foreclosed by acts of limitation. The loss will, therefore, not materially affect the unsettled accounts of the United States.

Relating to services and supplies under the present Government.

William Colfax's accounts, as contractor for the State of New York, from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1799.

Robert Ball's accounts, as contractor for North Carolina, for supplies furnished in 1799 and 1800.

These accounts had been examined, and the balances ascertained, but had not been entered on the principal books, owing to differences in the statements of the claimants and those made at this office, of which they had been informed, but had not finally removed the objections. No material inconvenience, it is thought, will arise from the loss of those accounts.

William Colfax & Co.'s accounts, as contractors for the States of New York, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Vermont, from the 1st of January to 31st of December, 1800.

This account had not been examined; the amounts are, therefore, only known from the claimants' own statements when they were rendered. It is therefore thought that no settlement can be made until a principle shall be fixed for the settlement of accounts in this situation.

Nathan Starr's accounts, as contractor for furnishing swords, belts, and scabbards, per contract in 1779.

This account had not been examined, owing to a want of vouchers. It is probable that duplicates of the accounts can be furnished, and that no inconvenience will arise in the settlement.

Part of the vouchers belonging to the paymaster general's accounts.

Some of the muster and pay-rolls of this account were lost, but they can all be replaced. No inconvenience but that of having copies made from duplicates in the possession of the paymaster general will arise.

All which is respectfully submitted.

SAMUEL DEXTER,
Acting as Secretary of War.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF THE GOVERNOR OF THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 19, 1801.

Mr. CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, from the committee appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Winthrop Sargent, Governor of the Mississippi Territory; and to whom also was referred the petition of Cato West and others, made the following report:

In the above-mentioned petition, the administration of Governor Sargent is criminated on the grounds of improper and arbitrary misbehavior; of an unconstitutional exercise of the legislative authority by the Governor and judges, and of unlawful exactions of office fees.

First. Of improper and arbitrary misbehavior.

As the particular instances and acts of improper and arbitrary misconduct imputed to Governor Sargent are not specified, nor evidence adduced whereby to verify the general charges alleged against him, your committee have not been able to investigate them. Such papers relative thereto as have come to their possession accompany this report.

Second. Of an unconstitutional exercise of legislative authority by the Governor and judges.

On this point it is alleged that the Governor and judges have made and published laws not derived from the codes of the original States.

By Governor Sargent this fact is admitted.

The President of the United States, by the act entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory," was empowered to establish there a Government, in all respects similar to that exercised in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, excepting and excluding the last article of the ordinance made for the government thereof by the late Congress, on the 13th of July, 1787.

In the ordinance referred to in the aforesaid act, are the following clauses:

"The Governor and judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the district, such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the district, and report them to Congress from time to time; which laws shall be in force in the district until the organization of the General Assembly, unless disapproved by Congress; but afterwards, the Legislature shall have authority to alter them as they shall think fit. The Governor for the time being shall be commander-in-chief of the militia; appoint and commission all officers in the same, below the rank of general officers; all general officers shall be appointed and commissioned by Congress. Previous to the organization of the General Assembly, the Governor shall appoint such magistrates and other civil officers in each county or township, as he shall find necessary for the preservation of the peace and good order in the same. After the General Assembly shall be organized, the powers and duties of magistrates and other civil officers shall be regulated and defined by the said Assembly; but all magistrates and other civil officers not herein otherwise directed, shall, during the continuance of the temporary Government, be appointed by the Governor. For the prevention of crimes and injuries, the laws to be adopted or made shall have force in all parts of the district; and for the execution of process, criminal and civil, the Governor shall make proper divisions thereof; and he shall proceed, from time to time, as circumstances may require, to lay out the parts of the district in which the Indian titles shall have been extinguished, into counties and townships; subject, however, to such alterations as may thereafter be made by the Legislature."

Your committee are of opinion that the legislative power of the Governor and judges, by virtue of the above-mentioned ordinance, is restricted to the adopting of laws from the codes of the original States, and cannot be extended to the making or enacting of laws not derived from those codes.

It appears to your committee, that the Governor and judges of the Mississippi Territory misconceived the nature and extent of their authority in this particular. Justly to appreciate their motives, it is essential to state the principles on which they have acted. By them, the ordinance appears to have been understood as vesting in the Governor and judges a plenary legislative authority. Governor Sargent justifies its exercise on the ground of construction, and of the principle being avowed and acted on by the Governor and judges, in making laws in the Northwestern Territory; and its being impliedly if not directly sanctioned by Congress. In his letter of the 15th of June, 1800, to the Secretary of State, he observes, "upon the subject of making or adopting laws, I have written you largely heretofore. It is not necessary to repeat my own opinions; many letters in your office evince my anxiety to have possessed the codes of the original States. We began by legislating, however, with the laws of the Northwestern Territory; they had been long subject to the disapprobation of the honorable Congress; and daring not to doubt their intention, we believed them good. We have uniformly continued, however, to declare our willingness to receive and respect authenticated information for the quiet and interests of this people." In another letter, of the 25th of August, 1800, to the Secretary of State, (already communicated to the House) he observes, "the honorable Mr. Davis seems to have been at much trouble to establish what the Governor and judges are very willing to admit, 'that they have made laws.' As Secretary of the Northwestern Territory, and vested with the powers of the Governor, I fully concurred with the judges that we were a complete legislative body. We never hesitated to manifest this to Congress; and the laws by Governor St. Clair, the Judges Parsons, Symmes and Varnum, enacted as early as 1788, demonstrated that such also was their opinion. I solemnly deny to have acknowledged (as Mr. Davis asserts I have) a deviation from the ordinance of Congress in the thus enacting of laws; for the ordinance, in my acceptance thereof, tolerates so doing; in strong presumptive proof of which, I shall offer, as the honorable Mr. Davis and myself seem to have so differently read the same, that the laws which were regularly transmitted to the General Government, in one solitary instance only were disapproved; thus evidencing their perfect coincidence in sentiment with us upon this very important subject. As a further proof of their will and pleasure that we should 'make laws,' they have enacted, nearly in the words following, 'that the laws of the Territory that have been, or hereafter may be enacted by the Governor and judges,' &c.; and again, that the Governor and judges shall be authorized to repeal their laws by them made, whenever the same may be found to be improper."

With respect to the practice which Governor Sargent alleges obtained with the Governor and judges of the Northwestern Territory on this point, your committee are informed, that at their first meeting in 1788, a difference of sentiment arose between the Governor and judges on this subject; they asserting, and he denying, the power of the Legislature to make laws not derived from the codes of the States. After protesting against the assumption of that power, the Governor yielded to the opinion of the judges. The subject was again resumed in 1795, when the Governor published his correspondence with the judges, showing his disapprobation of the principle of making laws; on their part, the then judges also published the reasons and grounds of their opinion and conduct in making laws.

The Governor again yielded to that opinion, and from time to time, till the second grade of Government was established, the Legislature enacted laws not derived from the codes of the States.

The laws of that Territory being voluminous, a complete set whereof is to be had for examination only, in the office of the Secretary of State, your committee have not been able, from their own inspection, to ascertain how far the practice of making laws obtained, or how constantly it was adhered to in successive periods, as the judges have succeeded to each other. They find that several of the laws passed before the year 1795 were not taken from the statutes of either of the States. Mr. Wagner, clerk in the office of the Secretary of State, who, at the request of the committee, has examined the laws of the Territory in reference to this point, certifies, "that he has examined the laws of the Northwestern Territory from the commencement of its legislation, to the 1st of August, 1792, but it does not appear, from the face of them, which, or what parts of them have been adopted from the codes of the original States, or have been originally made by the Legislature of that Territory." How far, therefore, they have been mere adoptions from those codes, can only be established by comparison. That is not the case with respect to the printed laws of the Territory, published since May, 1795, in which they are invariably stated in their titles to be adopted laws, except in the instance of repealing laws; to pass which, the Governor and judges were expressly authorized by the act of Congress of the 8th of May, 1792, and except a law in addition to a law, entitled a law ascertaining the fees of the several officers and persons therein named, published at Cincinnati on the 1st of May, 1798, by Winthrop Sargent, acting as Governor, and John Cleves Symmes, Joseph Gilman, and Return J. Meigs, judges, which is not stated to have been adopted. Your committee further find, that on the 21st day of January, 1794, the President of the United States laid before the two Houses of Congress a copy of such laws of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, as had been passed from July to December, 1792, inclusive; that on the 21st day of April, 1794, they were, by order of the House of Representatives, referred to a special committee, who, on the 24th day of May, 1794, among other things, reported, that on examination of the said laws, they found many of the provisions contained in them objectionable, but that they conceived it would be immaterial for them to detail the particular objections, as one applying to the whole of said laws afforded, in their opinion, sufficient reason for disapproving them. That those laws appeared to have been passed by the secretary and judges, on the idea, that they were possessed generally of legislative power, and have not, in whole or in part, been adopted from laws of the original States; that on the 12th of February, 1795, an engrossed resolution, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, disapproving all those laws except one, was agreed to by the House of Representatives and sent to the Senate. In the Senate, on report of a special committee, the resolution was disagreed to. The consideration of those particular laws does not appear to have been resumed.

In a letter of Governor Sargent's to the Secretary of State, dated Mississippi Territory, January 15, 1799, he writes: "the judge's arrival gives us to legislate; it was most essential, and we will set about it without delay, though with much regret on my part at the want of the laws of the several States, as we must be compelled to form our code from the volumes of the Northwestern Territory, which I by no means can be induced to believe a very good basis."

And in another letter of the 13th of March, 1799, he writes to the Secretary of State: "I have already advised you of the arrival of Judge Tilton, and, in consequence, we are at length legislating; but destitute of the laws of the several States, we necessarily make instead of adopting them; the right to do which has heretofore been a question. Very diffident of my own law knowledge, I feel extremely anxious for the presence of Judge McGuire, who, I am taught to believe is a great professional character."

Third. Of unlawful exactions of fees for official acts.

The fees alluded to are for passports granted to persons travelling from the Mississippi Territory to other parts of the United States, through the Indian country, and on marriage and tavern licenses.

Governor Sargent acknowledges his having received fees of the above description. He justifies the practice on the principle of those acts being extra from the duties of the Governor's office, and also of precedent in the Northwestern Territory, known, as he presumes, for a long time, to the General Government.

A law of the Mississippi Territory, entitled a law to regulate taverns and retailers of liquors, and concerning Indians, allows to the Governor a fee of eight dollars on a tavern license, which with a like fee on marriage licenses, Governor Sargent has received. The amount of the fee on passports is unknown to the committee.

By a law of that Territory, fees are allowed to the judges, on certain processes and official acts.

It is understood, that for a course of years, the Governor of the Northwestern Territory has been in the practice of receiving four dollars on marriage licenses, and one guinea on tavern licenses. Laws have also been there passed, allowing to the judges fees on processes and official acts, and compensation for travelling expenses; one of which was among the laws disapproved by the before-mentioned resolution of the House of Representatives, which was disagreed to by the Senate; the other purports, on the face thereof, to have been adopted from the New York and Pennsylvania codes. Both of those laws were passed by Governor Sargent, when secretary, and acting as Governor of the Territory.

The act of Congress, authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory, provides that the officers therein shall receive the same compensation for their services, to be paid in the same manner, as is by law established for similar officers in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, and the powers, duties, and emoluments of a Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the southern department to be united with those of Governor.

To the Governor of the Northwestern Territory, for discharging the duties of that office and those of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, is allowed an annual salary of two thousand dollars, and to each of the judges eight hundred dollars.

As the Governor and judges of the Territorial Governments are officers of the United States, with annual salaries fixed by the laws of Congress, their exacting and receiving fees, as before stated, cannot be otherwise considered than as an abuse which ought to be corrected.

Although the committee find cause to notice as irregularities, in Governor Sargent's administration, the making laws not derived from the codes of the original States, and also his receiving fees for certain official acts, yet it appears satisfactorily to them, from the circumstances under which they took place, that those irregularities originated from incorrect and misconceived opinions respecting the extent of his powers, and not from impure or criminal intentions.

They therefore respectfully submit to the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That there does not appear cause for further proceedings on the matters of complaint for mal-administration against Winthrop Sargent, as Governor of the Mississippi Territory.

SIR:

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY, August 25, 1800.

In consequence of proceedings in the national House of Representatives, tending to implicate the Governor and judges of this territory, unofficially communicated from the Department of State, I took leave to address the then Secretary, in a long letter, bearing date the 15th June, to exculpate, defend, and justify our aspersed conduct. Since that period there has come to my view, through the medium of the public prints, a resolution of the House of Representatives, for disapproving so much of two of our laws as authorizes certain fees to myself and their honors; with notice that the consideration thereof had been postponed by the wisdom and justice of the honorable Senate.

In a public paper styled the True American, and printed at Philadelphia upon the 15th of May, we observe an extraordinary motion, and a more extraordinary preamble, to have been made on the preceding day by the honorable Mr. T. T. Davis, and such as the most rigid justice should not have dictated, but upon fullest proof of foulest deeds. To the distinguished sympathies and candor of Messrs. Harper, Craik, Nott, and Griswold, we stand indebted for reminding gentlemen that "the accused had no opportunity of answering to the very serious charges contained in the honorable Mr. Davis's preamble; that, if the censure was just, impeachment ought to be obtained by other means," more equitable, more ingenuous, and less dishonorable, they might well have added: and for impeachment, conscious we have discharged our duties according to honor and to conscience, we stand prepared; persuaded always that the tenure of public commissions, under the American Government, rests not upon their forfeiture.

Whether we may be indulged with the privilege of being heard is yet a question. Upon most of the allegations so odiously blazoned in the preamble of the honorable Mr. Davis, I have, I fondly trust, so fully expressed myself as at least to suspend sentence of public condemnation; and, ere another session of Congress, gentlemen who may seek truth, shall find fullest conviction that we have been most barbarously abused and vilified: for my own part I have already thrown the gauntlet, and defy the most insidious as well as active malice to establish—

That I have "acted under the influence of a faction, or pursued the principles of despotism, in excluding from my confidence a majority of the well-disposed citizens."

Or, that I have "indulged an unwarrantable distrust of the great body of this people, and appointed over them, to offices civil and military, persons obnoxious for their intrigues and foreign influence." I deny that I have "practised an avarice, extortion, or any oppressive measure," as has been ascribed to me by the honorable Mr. Davis.

Fees warranted by a law predicated upon long-continued practice of the Northwestern Territory, and which had received the approbation of Congress, we have sometimes demanded, with this very essential difference, however, and as is in some measure stated in my last letter: that there the Governor and Judges have actually exacted fees for services expressly required by the ordinance under which they were appointed; whilst in this Territory (as it respects myself, this is most confidently asserted) they have been received for such only as seemed extra.

Judges in the Northwestern Territory are allowed, by law, a reimbursement of all expenses of themselves and servants in going the circuits to hold the courts. They have also fees for allowing writs of error, supersedeas, for taking bail, filing bail-pieces, and all the et ceteras for which the honorable Mr. Davis has so zealously assayed to attach odium to the judicial character within this Government. The honorable Congress could not have been un-informed thereof, for the laws and records in point had been officially transmitted by myself as secretary, consequently, long ere the practice of exacting fees could have been adopted into the United States' Mississippi Territory; granting then, sir, for a moment, the exacting of fees to be wrong, should not manly candor have dictated that the example of an older colony, so long and so strongly sanctioned by the very highest authority we under God can know, might in justice have been accepted as an apology, and we humanely spared the cruel mortification of suffering the hard, the intemperate language with which we have been assailed in the face of Congress, our friends, and the world?

The privilege of gentlemen tolerating full freedom of speech does not warrant indecorum, nor can any power, I humbly conceive, command my tacit acknowledgment of the "avarice and extortion" ascribed to me by the honorable Kentucky member. Though constrained always to rigid economy by the hard service of my country, I acknowledge not to have practised "avarice or extortion."

A soldier of the revolutionary war, I retired not from the field till the close thereof; and it may be remembered by some of the veteran comrades in those days of peril, and who have witnessed the whelming calumny so unjustifiably attached to my humble name, that bread and fame were our sole reward.

In civil life, of the ten years that the Government of the Northwestern Territory had been established, ere I was commanded to this country, the arduous and complicated duties of Governor and Secretary, with the accumulated expenses of both offices, were mine to discharge, and without further public provision than the small stipend allowed the Secretary.

By statements made to the honorable Congress in 1796, for a compensation which is yet withheld, it will appear that my expenses were necessarily very considerable, the salary small, and that there were none of the operating motives for an avaricious man to have continued in office; that reputation, a good name, must have been the grand desideratum. Offices in your Western country were long acknowledgedly the posts of danger; hence, perhaps, their tenure undisturbed: but gentlemen read in the history of the sufferings and peril of those days, a just and a grateful country, cannot hastily prostrate servants grown gray in hardihood and toil.

The honorable Mr. Davis seems to have been at much trouble to establish what the Governor and judges are very willing to admit, "that they have made laws." As Secretary to the Northwestern territory, and vested with the powers of the Governor, I fully concurred with the judges that we were a complete legislative body. We never hesitated to manifest this to Congress, and the laws by Governor St. Clair, the Judges Parsons, Symmes, and Varnum, enacted as early as 1788, demonstrated that such was their opinion also; but I solemnly deny to have acknowledged (as Mr. Davis asserts I have) a deviation from the ordinance of Congress, in the thus enacting of laws; for the ordinance, in my acceptance thereof, tolerates so doing: in strong presumptive proof of which I shall offer, (as the honorable Mr. Davis and myself seem to have so differently read the same,) that the laws which were regularly transmitted to the General Government, in one solitary instance only, were never disapproved; thus evidencing their perfect coincidence in sentiment with us upon this very important subject. As a further proof of their will and pleasure that we should "make laws," they have enacted nearly in the words following:

"That the laws of the Territory that have been or hereafter may be enacted by the Governor and judges," &c.; and again, "that the Governor and judges shall be authorized to repeal their laws by them made, whenever the same may be found to be improper."

Whence we certainly may take leave to infer our most incontestable right to the so very essential and salutary measure of enacting as well as adopting laws for common good; and further, that we shall stand exonerated, in the minds of the virtuous and the wise, from even the intention of exercising that "most dangerous assumption of power," so unadvisedly ascribed to us by the honorable Kentucky member.

Amongst the rolls in the office of the territorial secretary, we are ingenuously to acknowledge a law for the punishment of arson, that seems to have escaped the watchful eye of the honorable Mr. Davis, and which, together with the statute against treason, are, in our view, alike exceptionable. No legal decision or proceedings, however, have been had thereupon; nor will the judges, I persuade myself, ever designedly transgress the sacred rules of our more respected constitution. But so much has already been said upon this unpleasant theme, without anticipating opprobrious misconceptions of our intentions, and which appears in my address to the Legislature of the 5th of May, in your office, that no more explanation or comment can be now necessary. In any formal investigation, I hope to demonstrate that the original of the laws (our great anxiety to disseminate hastily sent to the printer) was unexceptionable in matter; but that we have been inadvertent in our signatures to the rolls cannot be denied; an act acknowledgedly hostile to the constitution, though we have the consolation to believe it has operated no evil. For my own part, however, I claim no indulgence in official transactions, and will await, in respectful submission, such censure as may be deemed proportionate to the magnitude of my transgression; but, when it shall be mercifully considered that the law for the punishment of arson in the Northwestern Territory, subject to the same constitutional objections with any of the statutes of this Government, had been ten years before Congress at the time we adopted it, (and never disapproved,) it must be received as an extenuation of our crime.

There has been transmitted to the Department of State the copy of an appeal to the justices of Adams county, made immediately upon my receiving the reports of the committee of Congress, to whom had been referred the petition of Cato West, and certain letters of Narsworthy Hunter. The only matter therein which I then deemed of consequence enough to engage my special attention, and publicly demonstrate to be false, was Mr. Hunter's so positive declaration of my usurping the powers of the court, (their duty to hold sacred,) and with most nefarious and dishonorable intention.

My appeal is annexed to the letter of the 15th of June, before mentioned, but it was not until the 4th instant that the justices were in session, which necessarily delayed their response herewith transmitted, and which I respectfully solicit may accompany the petitions of Cato West and others, "as the natural and legitimate relatives of those documents," which the honorable Mr. Davis has proposed to lay before the President.

Under any other circumstances than a base impeachment of almost all the territorial officers, I could not myself announce to Congress that the "accredited agent" of those persons, "styling themselves a committee regularly chosen by the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory," &c., stands convicted, to every man of mind, of malice, mischief, and falsehood; and, if words have meaning, that he is recorded in the honorable court of general quarter sessions of the peace of Adams county, in their August term, to the present people and posterity, as a most infamous liar.

The character of the members of this court generally is, I believe, less exceptionable than that of any other equal number of men within the Government; but they are sufficiently known to reject or confirm my estimation by the most abundant testimony.

The presiding justice is respectable for integrity, science, and wealth; with very conciliating manners, and an independence of sentiment most happily adapted to his public station. I shall take leave to enclose unto you his charge to the grand jury, in this same August term, adding my request that it may be brought to the view of Government to illustrate the reputation of accusers and accused, and for other purposes important to this Territory, whenever proceedings shall be continued under the petition of Mr. West and committee. The name of Mr. Hugh Davis in the list of magistrates will also be found in the Mississippi committee; this, and the character which I have drawn of the former, may seem incompatible. The motives for my own appointments I can explain, but not always the conduct of officers.

This Mr. Davis is the same gentleman I have quoted in my address of the 15th of June, as the "well-meaning member of the committee, obtaining a copy of a letter of the 20th of December, 1798, to the Secretary of State," and which he believed to have been by them most basely perverted. He has since communicated to me that the representations made in that letter of the sufferings of the inhabitants from the Indians, under Spanish and American government, then complained of by almost every man of my knowledge, and late presented as a grievance by the grand inquest, would have been stated to the General Government at that time as a wicked and abominable falsehood of the Governor; and that neither injury nor inconvenience from the Indians had ever been experienced by this people, but for his special opposition to the measure, made under the fullest impression of the justice and propriety of my statements, and which the committee had been constrained reluctantly to acknowledge. Facts, produced to them by Mr. Davis, had been too strong, and of too much publicity, to have escaped the notice of many of the members, and must induce a powerful presumption of more than want of candor upon the occasion.

The clerk, sheriff, and one of the justices, have transmitted to me some documents relative to the alarming depopulation said by Mr. Hunter to have taken place under Doctor White; the site of public buildings, "so marked by opposition to general opinion," and other matter, all which I take leave to submit as proper to be brought forward in future attention to the motion and preamble of the honorable Kentucky member.

My respected friend Colonel Clark, deceased, whose eulogium and worth have been so long and so well established, and whose situation as commanding the militia, and presiding in the courts of justice, rendered him more and better conversant in the administration of the Government than almost any other man within the Territory, sensibly impressed by the insults and injury offered to the Governor, and the country, devoted the last moments of a life, passed in honor, to the bearing strong testimony against that obloquy and odium which had been produced by the unprincipled clamors of malevolence.

Mr. D. Clark, a citizen of the Territory, nephew to the colonel, and inheriting his valuable possessions in this country, a gentleman long known and respected for his spirited and successful exertions in favor of our oppressed countrymen at Orleans, has obligingly committed to me his uncle's sentiments, addressed, and intended to have been directly communicated, it seems, to the honorable Mr. C. C. Claiborne, of Congress.

Testimony from characters so endowed as to command universal credibility, and so honorable to the administration of this Government, I shall certainly avail myself of. The letter, therefore, from Colonel Clark to Mr. Claiborne, and one from his nephew, (in connexion,) I respectfully solicit may be considered by the honorable Mr. Davis as true "relative documents" to the petition of Cato West, and transmitted to the President, or otherwise, as shall be deemed best for his so censorious motion and preamble.

The same reasons, sir, which induced my last long letter, have made me at this time thus immeasurably prolix, and I have again to pray your enduring patience. Once I would have deemed it an undue condescension to have brought forward voucher or collateral aid against more respectable men, than any enrolled in the list of those who are warring upon my fame; my own declaration I should have believed enough under any circumstances but formal impeachment. Wary, however, and apprehensive from late sufferings and persecution, I would guard against wiles, wickedness, and surprise.

The precedent of censure, and other uncommon proceeding upon "ex parte" evidence and statement, demand, on our part, more than ordinary circumspection. The attentions which have been bestowed upon the representations of the smallest and the least respectable part of this community I will venture to say has excited astonishment in the mind of almost every man within the Mississippi Territory. That Mr. West and signers of the petition to Congress were not even a moiety of the committee pretended to have been duly elected, is well known to themselves, and no secret within the Government.

The circular letter which Mr. Hunter states to Congress as originating this body, was an indecorous publication, dated upon the 6th of July, 1799, requesting meetings of the inhabitants in the several districts to elect members for a general convention. This letter, to use the language of respectable characters amongst us, was evidently intended to have been communicated to those only who had been loud in disaffection to the Government; "not general, but to be whispered to a few individuals only."

If the whole people of the Mississippi Territory could have been assembled, or a due proportion of character only, the late proceeding of Cato West and others would probably have been discountenanced in all its parts. This is not mere matter of opinion; for, in the January of 1799, the same was demonstrated by analogy. In a committee, who then petitioned Congress upon the subject of these lands, were some of the leading characters of Mr. West's party, assembled with the same views which they have of late accomplished; but the members who generally had been elected upon fair and honest principles, that is, after due and diffused notice, whose names are with Congress, and who probably were a representation of the will of the majority, curbed, with strong hand, the spirit of faction and intrigue.

Fourteen days only elapsed, from the notice contained in the letter before mentioned, to the time appointed for holding the election; a short period, indeed, considering the extent of our country, and the dispersed state of its inhabitants. Many respectable persons, indeed whole settlements, Tensaw and Tombigbee (now Washington county) not included, were without notice upon this important occasion; nor can I learn that in any one of the districts there was an assembly sufficient for much less interesting purposes than constituting delegates to a general convention.

In the town of Natchez, which comprehends an important part of respectable population, forty persons only assembled; a moiety of them are represented destitute of all visible property; people of any country, but never acknowledged to have been enrolled within this Territory. They chose two delegates; in the certificate of the election, however, the qualifications of the electors are candidly stated to have been problematical. One of the delegates, it is said, never attended the committee, and that the other, after in vain combating the violence of his proceedings, withdrew himself altogether. This is certain, that neither of their names are found affixed to the representations which have been published from this committee. By unquestionable authority I am informed that the principal inhabitants of the settlements of Big Black, and Bayou Pierre, in the upper county, were without notice of the district meetings; and that out of one hundred and forty free male inhabitants, who should have voted for delegates to this committee, twenty only attended; that their most weak and most abandoned characters were elected, amongst whom was one Robert Ashley, said to have fled from the justice of some of the Southern States, and who has been indicted within the Mississippi Territory for horse-stealing.

All this, and much more anecdote, as well as public history of and in relation to Mr. West's committee, was known to the respectable citizens of the Mississippi Territory; and the natural inference, "so just, so wise, and so wary a body as Congress, will not act upon such irregular, such partial proceeding," was the general sentiment, the general expression of the most worthy characters amongst us. Experience, however, has shown us, that conclusions, founded upon the intelligence of man, are too often fallacious. Abstract of all consideration merely personal, I must, sir, continue to view it as a very great misfortune that one party only should have been heard upon decisions so momentous to us all.

Information might have been had from sources disinterested, impartial, and of confidence; less intrusion and importunity upon the important time of Congress, (for the past, present, and to come,) with more tranquillity to this restive country, would probably have been the happy consequence.

General Wilkinson, it is believed, was at Philadelphia in time to have met inquiry; as an officer of rank and confidence, he was worthy to have been consulted; he had spoken and written honorably of the administration of this Government within my knowledge; he is conversant with men whom the people should have respected, and few of whose names are enrolled amongst our accusers. His testimony must have been favorable to the Mississippi territorial officers.

He could have informed Congress that we are unprepared for any accumulation of expense; that the statement of Mr. Hunter, of the wealth and numbers in this Government, is exaggerated; that we were so involved in debt as to have rendered interposition of the Spanish Government, between us and bankruptcy, absolutely indispensable; and that in Pickering county, where discontent with the present administration had originated, there were not enough of informed men to fill the present necessary offices of Government. It is my duty, however, to endeavor to conciliate all this people to the change which has been commanded, and I shall most religiously perform it.

With the sensibilities of a man wounded in his better, his immortal part—reputation, I have, sir, written much, but I feel much more.

Assailed violently by a party in this country, from motives probably most impure, and in manner and language which, I persuade myself, no gentleman shall ever cease to abhor, some unbecoming warmth of expression, some undue consideration of self may have escaped me; but that no indecorum to characters in that honorable House, so much my duty to respect, may be found on those, or any of my future pages, is the object of my most devout prayers. The honorable Mr. T. T. Davis, of Kentucky, seems to the Governor and Judges of the Mississippi Territory to have been unnecessarily severe.

Towards the former he has practised most wanton and unwarrantable cruelty. He has given publicity to one of his letters seemingly intended only for his constituents, but which has circulated in the Northwestern Territory, where my very interesting concerns, where almost all my pecuniary affairs are afloat, calculated evidently to impress the people with such sentiments as may do me irreparable injury. He has added insult to injury, by addressing to me directly a copy of this letter, from which the following is a verbatim exscript:

"A bill to authorize the Mississippi Territory to elect a Legislature of their own, and to take from their Governor the power of dissolving and proroguing them at pleasure, has passed the House of Representatives. The numbers in this Territory did not, according to the ordinance, entitle them to a Legislature, but to curb the usurpation of their Governor, to wit, Winthrop Sargent, Secretary to the Governor of the Northwestern Territory, Congress are inclined to grant them this extraordinary privilege; and much I fear this will not be sufficient to protect the people from the insolence of this Federal Governor, as he still retains the power of putting his veto on all their legislative acts."

I will conclude this long epistle, sir, in the words of a very celebrated poet—

"Durum! sed levius fit patientia, Quicquid corrigere est nefas," and subscribe myself, with every sentiment of most respectful consideration,

Your obedient and Government's faithful and zealous servant,

WINTHROP SARGENT.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF STATE of the United States.

The charge delivered to the grand jury at the opening of the court of quarter sessions for the county of Adams, on the 4th inst., by the Hon. William Dunbar, presiding justice.

GENTLEMEN OF THE GRAND JURY:

The court expresses great satisfaction at meeting a grand jury composed of such respectable persons now assembled for the discharge of its important duties towards our country.

It is with peculiar concern that this court has to lament, in the decease of its late able and worthy presiding magistrate, a loss which at this moment will be deeply felt. Gentlemen, you will undoubtedly mingle your griefs with ours in deploring a misfortune which this country was unprepared to sustain. Of all those gentlemen who have been honored with seats upon this bench, the late Col. Clark was perhaps the only person who possessed, from the experience of his earlier years, treasured up in a mind replete with native energy, a sufficient fund of knowledge to enable him to preside over this court with conscious dignity. Long will the community have cause to lament the departure of this able magistrate, whose every moment, while he resided in this place, was dedicated not merely to the discharge of his official duty, but the ardor of his mind was perpetually occupied in seeking occasions to correct vice and repress immorality, whether of a public or private nature, and with a truly paternal care sedulously watching over the peace and happiness of this vicinity. The human mind is so constituted, that, in order to discover the true value of an object, it would seem that it must first be lost; the public, therefore, will now begin to appreciate more justly the worth of this estimable character.

It has been said, with truth, that his brother associates relied on his perseverance, and would sensibly feel his loss; but, above all, this loss is most sensibly and severely felt by myself, who am now called upon with inferior talents and very limited experience to fulfil the important duties of his station in this court. If, in the infancy of our courts, this able magistrate thought it necessary to solicit the candor of his fellow-citizens, certainly I, whose education and pursuits of life have been altogether foreign to the modes of this court, have more abundant reason to entreat the indulgence of a generous public. The court is persuaded that if any deviation from technical rule should appear in the procedure of this court, it will be ascribed by our country to its true cause, and not to any deficiency in the virtuous wishes of its members to discharge with fidelity its duties in the public service.

Gentlemen, an important change has taken place in the form of our Government since the last meeting of this court. Congress, with great wisdom, considers all new colonies as in a state of infancy; and as they are insufficient for their own protection, so also they are supposed to be unqualified for their own government. Protection and obedience must always go hand in hand. Congress, therefore, sends forth her chosen and approved servants with ample powers to guide the inexperience of her younger sons, who are not permitted to have a voice in their own Government, for the same reason that the infant is not permitted to oppose the will of the parent. The peculiarity of our situation, and our great distance from the seat of the General Government, have, no doubt, induced the honorable Congress to relax from the general rule established for the government of Territories; for it is to be recollected that the settlers of a British province, older than the revolution, form the basis of the population of this Territory. It is true that accessions have been made to it by native Americans who have removed themselves during the war of the revolution, and in a time of peace since the conquest by Spain; but the mass of our population not resembling any American colony, it is probable that this Territory has been considered as an ancient settlement, entitled to earlier privileges than young colonies just emigrating from the bosom of the United States. It would seem that, with a view to facilitate the obtaining the consent of Congress, it has been stated that our population cannot be less than 6,000 free inhabitants, and that our annual revenue in cotton, at one quarter dollar per pound, amounts to 750,000 dollars. I do not know that any evil consequences can result from this exaggerated statement, excepting that, in the course of possible events, we may be called upon by Congress for a contribution towards the general defence of the Union; which probably would be demanded in the ratio of the above statement of 750,000 dollars. There are no data which have come to my knowledge, that would justify a calculation of half the above sum; and it ought therefore to be remembered that, at this early period, we refuse our assent to the above statement.

It may not be improper to say a few words upon the subject of another statement, in which it appears to me the honor of this court is implicated. This court has been called by the Governor of the Territory to declare whether it has been truly stated, that he, the Governor, did send to the first general court of quarter sessions of Adams county, for their sanction, an estimate of upwards of 10,000 dollars, which it is said the Governor thought necessary to be raised in that county. I answer, that no such statement was ever sent to this court by Governor Sargent. I have ever been astonished how such an absurd idea could get abroad. Those who affected to believe it, must have previously admitted the turpitude of this court; for certainly, as the law exists, it is not easy to conceive how the Governor could have hazarded issuing so extraordinary a mandate, unless he were well assured that this court was predisposed to be his obsequious and servile minions. I presume that I speak the general opinion, when I say that this court is composed of men possessing sound republican principles, and of independent fortunes, who court not the smiles, nor fear the frowns of any man, however exalted may be his rank in life. The more ample reply, with the statements requested by the Governor, will be referred to the consideration of my brother associates.

Let us hope, gentlemen, that, by the virtue of our citizens and the wisdom of our legislators, our new privileges will become a source of additional happiness and prosperity to this Territory. It is a pleasing presage of our improving manners and peaceful disposition, that the late elections for this county were conducted with so much order, harmony, and decency, greatly to the honor of both candidates and people; and I do most sincerely congratulate my country on this recent proof that party spirit is retreating from our land. It is a certain truth, that the interests of the citizens of this Territory, when properly understood, are one and the same, and ought to bind us to each other in a firm bond of union. It is grievous to all good men, when the demon of party spirit stalks over the land. It will be always found to originate with men of despicable talents, who despair, by other means, of raising themselves into popular estimation. Gentlemen, you cannot do a more acceptable office to your country than by carrying to your respective homes a spirit of conciliation, endeavoring to extinguish this pernicious principle which harasses the peace of society, and keeps asunder families whose mutual happiness and interest it is to live in harmony and in the exchange of good offices. Those who take a pleasure in broils, dissensions, and tumults, will counteract your virtuous endeavors, because their importance would be destroyed by your success; but if the worthy characters of the community could at length resolve to use their exertions, the fomenters of this malignant spirit would be compelled to hide their heads in the darkness of their evil designs.

Gentlemen, you are specially returned the grand inquest of the county, to inquire of all crimes and misdemeanors committed therein, and which are within the jurisdiction of this court to determine and sentence.

A crime or misdemeanor is defined to be "an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it;" and this public law that is violated may be either the written statute or the common law of the land, which prohibits all offences of a public and evil example, and contrary to good morals. The jurisdiction of this court is limited by a statute of this Territory, and extends to all crimes and misdemeanors, of

In testimony whereof, I have undersigned my name, this fifteenth day of September, one thousand eight hundred.

PETER WALKER, Clerk of the Court of General Quarter Sessions.

Presentment of a grand jury, at the October term of the Supreme Court, Mississippi Territory, A. D. 1800.

At a court of oyer and terminer, held at Natchez, for the county of Adams, on the 13th of October, 1800. The grand jury for the said county present:

1st. That it will be highly expedient to make an application to the Territorial Legislature, praying them to frame or adopt laws for the more summary trial of slaves than can at present be effected by the existing statutes of the Territory; from which may result a considerable saving in expense and time to the owners, as well as the exercise of humanity towards the slaves, by the speedy termination of the trials.

2dly. We present Hugh Davis, Esquire, a magistrate of this county, for having committed a breach of the statutes of this Territory, in defacing a record of the court of quarter sessions of this county, to wit, the certification of the court in consequence of an appeal, made by his excellency the Governor of the Territory, on the subject of certain statements made to the committee of Congress, by Narsworthy Hunter, on the 8th February, 1800, and the estimate of the probable expenses of the county of Adams, for the years of 1799 and 1800, by drawing a line through four words of said record, to wit, Hugh Davis, twice written, and ordering the printer not to insert said words, contrary to the instructions of the said court.

3dly. We present that Narsworthy Hunter has been guilty of composing and uttering a malicious, scandalous, and false libel against Winthrop Sargent, Esq., Governor of this Territory, as contained in a letter purporting to be addressed to the honorable W. C. C. Claiborne, chairman of Mississippi committee, dated 8th of February, 1800, in the words following: "The estimate annexed to the petition of Cato West and others, mentioned in your note, is not the amount of the tax laid on the county of Adams by a law of the Territory; but it appears to be the sum which the Governor thought necessary to be raised in that county, for the service of the last year, and it was sent by him to the first court of general quarter sessions, in order to receive the sanction of the court. This would give it immediate currency, and necessarily operate in aid of his future projects of taxation; but such a manifest prodigality of the public resources appeared upon the face of it, together with so marked an opposition to the public opinion, with regard to the place whereupon the public buildings were to be erected, that it received the immediate disapprobation of the court; and, I believe, a similar instrument was never presented to the county of Pickering;" and, also, a malicious and scandalous libel against the Governor and judges of this Territory, in their legislative capacity, contained in the aforesaid letter, in the words following, to wit: "The whole county were influenced by an idea that the ordinance for our Government had been wantonly abused, and the constitution of the United States as wantonly violated, at a time and under the circumstances which required no such sacrifice." Which said libels have direct tendency to expose them to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule, as also to disturb, in a violent degree, the peace and good order of society, by destroying that confidence so essential to the happiness of the people, which ought ever to subsist between them and their rulers; and by breaking down that respect which all ranks owe to those who are the guardians of our laws, may be productive of the worst of all human evils, the natural result of anarchy and unbridled licentiousness. The grand jury view, with horror, the late prevailing disorders of a most alarming nature which pervades the Territory, and which will always be the consequence of such crimes as have a manifest tendency to loosen the sacred bands that cement together the laws, the people, and their magistrates; for certainly, of all the most dreadful evils, that is the greatest which points out the means by which wicked men may resist and defeat the laws of their country, the consequences of which are too shocking to be here detailed. The grand jury expect, with confidence, that by the legal powers and influence of this honorable court, vigorous measures will be adopted to check the growing evils of our country, and, by the inflexible execution of the laws, we may be once more restored to peace, harmony, good order, and mutual confidence.

4thly. The grand jury are impressed with the fullest conviction that the second grade of Territorial Government is fraught with inconveniences which the good people of this Territory are not in a situation fully to encounter; they are persuaded, in particular, that the very considerable expense which will be occasioned by the new Legislature, superadded to the county levies, already a subject of complaint, will be beyond the ability of our limited population to support, without very sensibly feeling its detrimental effects in the diminution of their small revenues; thereby procrastinating the time of extinguishing the remains of long standing debts, and of enabling their families of enjoying, at an earlier period, a few of the comforts of life. They earnestly recommend to their fellow-citizens to reflect, whether it will not meet the general wish of the Territory, that application be made to Congress to suspend the operation of the supplemental act for establishing the second grade of Territorial Government until it shall be fairly established to be the wish and desire of the majority of our citizens, this privilege will not be denied to our citizens which has been conceded to the new Territory of Indiana, whose inhabitants, deriving wisdom from two years' experience of the second grade of government, have found it their interest to repose entire confidence in the Legislature appointed by and under the control of the General Government, the people still retaining in their hands the power, which cannot fail to have a happy influence over their government, to wit, that of assuming the second grade whenever it shall be the will of the majority of their citizens. The grand jury have strong reasons to believe that the majority of our citizens will approve of postponing the operations of the second grade, under the above stated privilege of assuming it whenever they shall find it expedient. The grand jury think it, therefore, a duty to present, as a grievance, that the sudden and unexpected alteration in the government of the Territory, has been brought about by the industry of fifteen persons, part of a committee of thirty-five, irregularly chosen, at whose election not one-half of the inhabitants are supposed to have attended; and which election was held for the express purpose, as the people were informed by a hand-bill, not to demand a change of the former Government, but to obtain a redress of grievances; and consequently this important measure has been effected with the implied consent of less than one-quarter part of the citizens; or, more properly speaking, by the unauthorized agency of fifteen persons, composing the minority of the committee. The grand jury feel themselves forcibly compelled by their duty to add, that so great an alarm exists in the minds of the people, on the subject of taxation, that they are of opinion that, if the second grade of Government is not arrested in its present stage, and postponed until the population and finances of the Territory become adequate to the increased expense of that grade, a very great depopulation will be the inevitable consequence.

The grand jury return their thanks to the court for their excellent charge; they presume to hope, that the just sentiments therein expressed will make a happy impression on the minds of the people, contributing, with other means, to attain the desirable end so much to be wished by all good men.

BOOKS AND PAPERS DESTROYED BY FIRE IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT IN 1801.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 24, 1801.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 23, 1801.

In obedience to the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 2d instant, I have the honor of transmitting herewith the best information it is in my power to obtain, in relation to the destruction of official books and papers by the fire in the building occupied by the Treasury Department. To the enclosed statements from the other officers of the Department, I have the pleasure to add, that the books and papers belonging immediately to my office, with the exception of a few official letters and documents which can be replaced, have been preserved. It is not probable that any great public inconvenience will be the consequence of the unfortunate accident which gave occasion to the inquiry.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL DEXTER.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, February 19, 1801.

In reply to your letter of the 4th instant, I have the honor to inform you, that after a careful and diligent examination, it does not appear that any records or documents appertaining to this office are missing in consequence of the late fire, from which any loss can result to the public, or to individuals. One book, in which sundry forms prescribed by this Department are recorded, has not yet appeared, though, as its destruction is highly improbable, expectations are entertained that it will eventually be found: if it should not, it can be replaced with some labor.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN STEELE.

The Hon. SAMUEL DEXTER, Esq.

A list of books and papers destroyed or lost in the Auditor's Office, in consequence of the fire which took place in the Treasury, on Tuesday, the 20th of January, 1801.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 19, 1801.

1. The books containing copies of reports on all the accounts which have been adjusted since the establishment of the present Government, excepting those on the public debt funded at the Treasury, which being entered in a distinct set of books, and kept in another room, were preserved. With the aid and expense of an extra clerk, the lost copies may be replaced, as the originals, with the statements and vouchers belonging to them, are deposited in the Register's office.

2. The books containing copies of various statements made by the Auditor and Accountants under the late Government. The originals of these are also in the Register's office, and new copies may be made from them, if necessary.

3. The ledgers and journals in which were entered the accounts settled by the late commissioner with the officers of the old quartermaster and commissary departments. The loss of these books adds to the difficulty of adjusting such of the accounts in these departments as remained open; but from the examination which had been made, the greater part were found so defective as to leave little hope of a satisfactory statement. Some of them, however, though not passed, have been stated as far as the materials would admit. It is believed that few, if any, of the papers are lost.

4. The books in which were entered the accounts of the late secret and commercial committee. The papers being safe, no great inconvenience will result from the loss of the books, as few, if any of the transactions of this committee remain unsettled.

5. A number of claims exhibited by individuals, for services or supplies during the late war. Most of these had been presented in the first instance to the State commissioners, and turned over by them to the Treasury. They had been all examined many years ago, and judged inadmissible; but as the register or list is gone with them, it is impossible to state the particular nature of each, or the names of the respective claimants.

6. An account rendered by the Bank of the United States, for the sale of 8 per cent stock, under the last act authorizing a loan. A duplicate of this may be obtained.

7. An account of Hazen Kimball for the contingent expenses of the Office of State, which had been examined and was ready for stating. The vouchers cannot be replaced, but the particulars may be had from a book in which they were regularly entered by Mr. Kimball.

8. An account of Thomas Claxton, as agent for furnishing the Capitol. The vouchers had been all examined and found right, but the statement suspended until he should also render his account for furnishing the President's house, with which it had some connexion.

9. The accounts and vouchers of Tench Francis, late purveyor of public supplies, for purchases from July 1, 1797, to the month of September, 1798, accompanied by a general account current, stated by his executors; in which they claimed a balance. The examination of these accounts was nearly completed, but the final settlement of them suspended from a wish to bring into view the balances for or against him with the Departments of War and Navy, with which his accounts were also in a course of settlement. Duplicates of the abstracts and (it is understood) of the vouchers also, can be furnished.

10. Three partial or subordinate accounts of Israel Wheelen, the present purveyor. Duplicates of all these have been already furnished.

11. The accounts of the following gentlemen, acting as agents for the commissioners of the direct tax, in their respective States:

Joseph Israel, Delaware; Nathaniel Gilman, New Hampshire; James White, Tennessee; Stephen Bayard, New York; Paul Zantinger, Pennsylvania; Thomas Davis, Massachusetts.

All these accounts, except the last, had been examined, and some of them, particularly the two first, would have been stated and passed the next day. The others were suspended, either for want of warrants, or some further explanation on particular points. As the vouchers, though much injured, are not entirely destroyed, it is probable that when they can be more thoroughly examined and properly arranged, they may be yet found sufficiently perfect to admit of settlement with at least some of the agents.

A few other accounts were also somewhat injured; but being still, however, in a state to be settled, a detail of them is deemed superfluous.

In addition to the foregoing, it is possible, and even probable, that in the course of business some other papers may be found missing, which are not recollected at this time; but none, it is believed, of much consequence.

R. HARRISON.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE, February 19, 1801.

The REGISTER OF THE TREASURY, upon the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 4th instant, transmitting a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, of Monday, the 2d of February, 1801, begs leave to report:

That upon the alarm of the late fire in the house occupied by the Treasury Department, all the books and records of the United States appertaining to his office, and which were deemed of primary importance, were removed from the fire-proof rooms occupied by the Register; and that, upon their being replaced, it does not appear, after a minute examination, that any of the books and records of the United States in his possession at the time of the late fire sustained either injury or loss, excepting statements Nos. 8,961, 10,919, and 11,349, with their respective vouchers, which were in a part of the building exposed to the fire. The official reports upon those three statements having been preserved, and the accounts thereof closed in the Treasury books, it is presumed no injury can possibly arise from the want of those destroyed documents.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register of the Treasury.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, February 19, 1801.

SIR:

In answer to your letter of the 4th instant, I can assure you that my office has not suffered any injury of the least consequence by the late fire.

I am, with respect, sir, your most humble servant,

SAMUEL MEREDITH, Treasurer of the United States.

SAMUEL DEXTER, Esq., Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REVENUE OFFICE, February 13, 1801.

Sir:

I have paid due attention to a notice from the House of Representatives, which you communicated to me on the 4th instant.

I have the satisfaction of assuring you that the books are all safe, and that I know of no paper missing from this office which can impede or in any manner affect the adjustment of the public accounts.

I am, with perfect respect, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM MILLER, Commissioner of the Revenue.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Sir:

GENERAL STAMP OFFICE, February 23, 1801.

In obedience to your request and the resolution of Congress on the 2d current, I have the honor to report, that I have been fortunate enough to reclaim all the papers belonging to the General Stamp Office, of any consideration, and that the public will sustain no material injury in this office by the unfortunate fire.

I am, with the most perfect respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

No. 145.

[2d SESSION.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 27, 1801.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the committee who were appointed to inquire into the expenditure of money made by the commissioners of the city of Washington, the disposition of public property made by them, and generally into all the transactions of the commissioners which relate to the trust confided to them by the President of the United States, made the following report:

That the short period which has elapsed since they have been possessed of the documents relating to the transactions of the commissioners, the imperfect situation of those documents in several particulars, and the complicated nature of the inquiry, will prevent the committee from presenting to the House that full view of the subject which was desired. They deem, it, however, their duty to submit the result of their inquiry, so far as the same has been made.

By a general account of receipts and expenditures, hereunto annexed, it appears that the commissioners have expended more than one million of dollars on various subjects, which are partially detailed in that statement. Whether those expenditures have been made with economy, or not, it is not necessary for the committee to decide, as the House will possess the same information which the committee possess on this point. It may, however, be proper to remark that the principal objects of expense have been the Capitol, the President's house, and the two buildings erected for the accommodation of the Executive Departments; and that the situation of those buildings, being under the eye of every member of the Legislature, cannot want a particular description.

As large as these expenditures have been, it is understood that the accounts of the commissioners have not been regularly audited by any public officer, but have rested on their own statements.

By the report made by the commissioners to the President of the United States, and by him transmitted to Congress during the present session, it appears that the site of the city of Washington was conveyed by the original proprietors to certain confidential persons, in trust, for certain uses which were defined in the deeds delivered to the trustees, a copy of which is annexed to the commissioners' report; that the trustees have conveyed to the commissioners, for the use of the United States, agreeably to the provisions of those deeds, the building lots which belonged to the public, and were laid down on the plan of the city, but that the trustees have declined to convey the streets of the city and the public squares and other grounds designed and appropriated for public uses.

The committee have thought it their duty to ascertain the causes which induced the trustees to refuse their deeds of this part of the public property; and, without pronouncing whether the trustees have conducted correctly or not, they understand that the trustees claim that they held these lands as well for the benefit of the proprietors as for the public; that the price allowed to the proprietors for those squares and public grounds being comparatively small, it was expected that these grounds should forever remain unoccupied, except by necessary public buildings; that the areas which they furnished should remain open for general convenience, and thereby increase the value of the building lots, and particularly those lots which adjoined those public grounds; that, under these impressions, and after receiving a remonstrance from some of the proprietors, they deemed it proper, in faithfulness to the parties concerned, to require that, before they made a conveyance of this property, the principle should be settled that the public grounds should not, after the same were conveyed, be converted by the commissioners into building lots; that the commissioners, however, declined establishing that principle, and claimed the right of converting such parts of the public ground into building lots as should be afterwards judged proper. The trustees further state that the plan of the city has been varied more than once, and that some of the public grounds, which are delineated upon a plan which was engraven and circulated by the commissioners as a true plan of the city, and is now in the hands of the members of the Legislature, have since been surveyed by the commissioners into building lots; that, under these circumstances, the trustees did not believe that, in justice to the proprietors, they could convey these public grounds.

The committee have likewise understood that, in consequence of the contracts entered into with Morris, Greenleaf, and Nicholson, for the sale of a large number of the building lots belonging to the public, and the failure of payment on their part, and the subsequent transactions which have grown out of that contract, some doubts have been entertained respecting the titles to a considerable part of those lots. These doubts, whether well or ill founded, must necessarily embarrass the sale of those lots, and ought, in the opinion of the committee, to be removed by a law of the National Legislature to establish titles both in law and chancery, where lands shall be re-sold, under proper regulations, to raise the purchase money which shall fall due from the first purchaser.

The commissioners undoubtedly possess much better means of judging of the value of the building lots belonging to the public than the committee; but it could not escape the observation of the committee that the actual sales which have been made for cash since the board of commissioners was established cannot, in their opinion, support the estimate which the commissioners have made of this property; and, whatever may be the product of sales hereafter, the committee believe that the Government cannot rely upon that fund for completing the objects which the Legislature may deem necessary for the accommodation of the Government.

The view which the committee have taken of this subject has been necessarily imperfect, but it has satisfied them that, as the Executive Departments of the Government are now established at the city of Washington, the expense of the board of commissioners may very well be saved; that the business of that board may with propriety be transferred to the Treasury Department; and that it will be proper to require that the commissioners account with the accounting officers of the Treasury for the moneys received and expended by them.

The committee likewise believe that a plan of the city of Washington ought to be prepared, and, at the next session of Congress, to receive the sanction of the Legislature, and means taken to obtain from the trustees a deed of the streets and public grounds, conformably to such plan, for the use of the United States; and that a law ought to pass for quieting titles in the District of Columbia, by authorizing the sale of lands contracted to be sold where the purchase money shall not be paid within the time limited for payment.

Conformably to the opinions herein expressed, the committee respectfully submit to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to abolish the board of commissioners of the city of Washington, and to direct that the business of that board be transferred to the Department of the Treasury.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury, under direction of the President of the United States, to prepare a plan of the city of Washington, delineating the streets, squares, and public grounds therein, and to report the same to Congress, in December next.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to authorize the sale of lands in the District of Columbia, under proper regulations, to raise the moneys which may at any time be due and unpaid on contracts for the sale of such lands.

Account of receipts and expenditures by the commissioners of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, from the time of their appointment to the 18th of May, 1796; since which day accounts have been rendered half yearly.

Notes to the table on the preceding page.

City of Washington—Includes commissions, discounts, recording squares in the district office, salary of a principal overseer, and all expenses of persons employed for general surveys.

Surveying department—Includes survey of the district and city, opening and ascertaining level of streets, purchasing and planting bound-stones, and registering and calculating squares, as divided into lots.

Rafting account—Expense of rafting the timber for the different buildings, and other public purposes indiscriminately.

Freestone quarries at Aquia—Six thousand dollars paid for the island containing these quarries, and balance for quarrying the stone and incidental expenses.

White Oak Swamp—The commissioners purchased the timber standing, had it cut down, and prepared for public use.

Brickmaking account—The bricks were made and used for public purposes generally, and no particular account kept of the number used on the respective buildings.

Stone bridge at the mouth of Rock creek—Deducting the sums paid and secured to the public for ground ceded for the erection of this bridge twelve hundred dollars, refunded by the contractor for defective work, the real cost to the public will be only two thousand two hundred and eleven dollars and fifty-five cents.

CAUSES OF THE LATE FIRES IN THE WAR AND TREASURY DEPARTMENTS'

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 28, 1801.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the late fires in the War and Treasury Departments, made the following report:

That they have taken the depositions of all the persons from whom they had reason to expect any information, and herewith report them: those marked A relate to the fire in the War-Office, and those marked B to the fire in the Treasury Department.

The committee having seen an assertion in a paper called the Cabinet, that, during the fire in the Treasury Department, persons were discovered in one of the rooms of that Department, in circumstances which excited suspicion, the committee called on the editor of that paper, and requested to be informed whether he could mention the names of any persons who were witnesses of that fact, or any other relating to the fires. By him they were referred to Lawson Pearson and Salem Roe; from whose depositions, and the deposition of John Woodsides, (among the papers marked B,) it appears that the persons thus discovered were clerks of the Department employed in taking care of the books and papers.

It having been mentioned in the depositions of some of the witnesses, from whom the committee were taught to expect material information, that Mr. Oliver Wolcott, late Secretary of the Treasury, was seen at one end of the Treasury Department, during the fire therein, loading a cart with boxes and papers, the committee considering it as a circumstance which might be made to excite suspicion, and believing it was due to Mr. Wolcott to investigate thoroughly a fact of this nature, which had been partially disclosed by their means, have taken several depositions on that subject, which are herewith reported, marked C. From these depositions no suspicion can remain that the boxes and cases were not Mr. Wolcott's private property.

The committee do not think it necessary to make a minute report of their opinion on the facts of these several cases, as the depositions themselves will afford more satisfactory information: they report, as the general result of their inquiries, that it is probable the fire in the War Department was communicated from the fire-place in the adjoining house, and that there is no evidence whatever on which to found a suspicion of its originating in negligence or design; that, as to the origin of the fire in the Treasury Department, they have obtained no evidence which enables them to form a conjecture satisfactory to themselves: it would only be in their power to make an abstract of the testimony; and, in doing this, they might add to or diminish its force; and therefore choose to report it only in the words of the witnesses themselves.

A.

Mr. LORING, a clerk in the War Department, states, that, on the day of the 8th of November, 1800, (the evening of which the office was burnt,) he was engaged in filing and arranging the papers of the office, (which were very much deranged in consequence of removing first from Philadelphia, and afterwards from the store, commonly known by the name of Lear's store, in the city of Washington,) a business in which he had employed all his hours which were not immediately necessary for the routine of business common in the office; that, having on that day nearly finished, he had determined to continue until he had completed the work, as he was anxious to have them arranged; that, in consequence, he remained an hour or an hour and a half after the other gentlemen of the Department had left it; that when he had finished the business he was engaged in, which was after three o'clock, he locked the door of the room, and carried the key thereof into the room of the messenger, which was in the kitchen; that the day having been uncommonly warm for the season, the fire had been reduced at about 11 o'clock in the morning; and that the door which led into the room usually occupied by the Secretary was ordered by the chief clerk to be opened in order to admit fresh air, (there having been no fire in that room on that day, or for three weeks and upwards prior to it;) that no more fire was made in the room in which he was employed that day; and that, when he left the room, he doubts whether there was fire enough on the hearth to have lighted a candle; that he went home to dine, and believed every thing was perfectly secure in the office, as he looked into the Secretary's room to see if the windows were shut, and, finding them to be so, he doubted not every thing was safe; that, in the evening, about (he believes) six o'clock, or perhaps a little after, Mr. Brown, a clerk to the accountant, came over to his lodgings and informed the gentlemen that the War Office was on fire; that Mr. Wolcott, and every other man in the house immediately ran over; that, when we approached the house, we observed the light very strong from the window over the door of the entrance of the house immediately adjoining the library, which was arranged along the partition wall of that building, and the adjoining house occupied by Mr. Jackson, and against which the chimney of Mr. Jackson's house stood; that he, with Mr. Wolcott, went immediately up stairs, and he, Mr. L., being first, opened the door of the room generally occupied by the chief clerk, (viz. the room immediately in the rear of the Secretary's, the one which was on fire;) that, when he opened the door, the force of the smoke was so great as to stagger him; he, however, recovered himself, and made a second attempt, but to no purpose; finding it impossible to save any thing on that floor, he immediately left the house and went to the Treasury office for the engine, which, with assistance, he brought to the fire; but the house being in such a state, it proved ineffectual. That, on the morning after the fire, (Sunday,) he went over before breakfast to examine the partition wall; that he ventured as near as the walls, which were then tottering, would admit, and examined particularly as to the structure of the chimney; that, in viewing the partition wall, he did not doubt the fire was communicated from the chimney of the next house, as the partition-wall was very thin, and the evident appearance of wooden blocks or bricks interspersed in it; and that it appeared to him that the wall was only the thickness of the length of a brick from the first floor to the second, and the thickness of the width of a brick from the second floor up to the roof; and knowing that a large library was extended along that wall; and upon the lower shelf of the library, about eight inches from the floor, stood a number of large volumes, behind which (for convenience) many pamphlets and loose papers were thrown; and he has no hesitation in saying, that he firmly believes it was from these causes the fire was communicated.

With respect to the Treasury Department, Mr. L. has very little to say, which can give information or throw light on it; he has only to observe, that at about five o'clock in the evening of the — January, he, agreeable to an appointment he had made with Mr. Steele, left the hotel in which he lodged, directly opposite to the Treasury, to call for Mr. Steele, who was writing in his office; that, as he crossed the street, he saw large columns of smoke issuing from the two southeast chimneys of the office; he immediately entered the east door, which led to the centre of the building, through a narrow passage; that, in passing through this passage, he observed the smoke issuing from under the two first doors on the left side of the passage; that he did not stop to open either of them, his object being to get the engine out which stood in the hall; that not more than two or three persons were with him at the time, and that with the assistance of one of them he broke open the front door and put the engine into the street. Immediately on doing this he returned into the passage, where he discovered several persons forcing the middle door (or that which led to Mr. Ferrall's room,) which they immediately succeeded in. As soon as the door was opened, the flames and smoke rushed out in a diagonal line from the back of Mr. Ferrall's room, where his cases stood, which was the part of the room opposite to his fire-place. This is all he can say respecting it, as his whole attention and exertions were to check and conquer the flames; which, with great exertions on all sides, was finally accomplished.

Sworn before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for Prince George's county, this 23d day of February, 1801.

RICHARD FORREST.

On the evening of 8th November last, about seven o'clock, P. M., I was alarmed with the cry of fire, and on inquiry it was the War Office; I immediately alarmed Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Wood, desired them to bring with them buckets, and I unhung my garden gate, that free access might be had to my pump; I gave orders to fill all the buckets and tubs that were about the house, and took with me two buckets of water; when I got to the War Office the smoke was issuing out of the front windows like a cloud; soon afterwards the flames broke out of the front window over the front door; I was then asked by Mr. Watson, a clerk, to assist him in getting a ladder, but before we could procure the ladder the fire broke out of the back side of the house. I assisted about half an hour to save the papers, but on seeing that my own house was in danger, I left the fire and went home. The next day (Sunday) I went to see Mr. Markward, to make inquiry how the fire originated, (Col. Burrows went with me;) he, Markward, could give us no satisfaction; we then went to the burnt house, and, on examining the walls, were of opinion that it had been communicated from the back of Mr. Jonathan Jackson's chimneys to the library; and on further examination we saw a number of places where wood had been let into the wall; and nearly at the back of the chimney of Mr. Jackson's house I saw a light through the wall, (and mentioned it to Col. Burrows,) which I suppose was the place that the fire got through to the library; and was further convinced, for the back part of the place is but four and a half inches thick. And further this deponent saith not.

WM. O'NEALE.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, February 25, 1800.

The above deposition was taken by the committee, this 25th February, 1801; William O'Neale being first sworn.

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman.

THOMAS Y. SPROGEL, being first sworn, deposes and saith that at about three o'clock P. M. of the day on which the War Office was consumed, he assisted in laying out the corpse of a Mr. Jackson, who died in the room adjoining to the room occupied by the Secretary of War, in which the fire appeared to originate; that at that time there was so little fire in the hearth, that he, this deponent, could with difficulty burn vinegar enough to correct the effect of the body on the air of the room. That while the house was on fire, he returned into the room where the corpse was laid, and found the fire totally extinguished to all appearance; that he was informed a fire had been kindled in the interval of his two visits to the room, and that it had been extinguished because it had a bad effect on the corpse.

The testimony of Patrick Ferrall, principal clerk in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury, relative to the fire that took place on the 20th January last.

Having received a letter by the mail of the 19th, from a mercantile house in Philadelphia, that required an answer by the return of post, not being enabled from the official duties of the office to write the answer during office hours of the 20th; on leaving the office between two and three o'clock, and not seeing Fogel, the messenger, in the hall, I mentioned to one of the other messengers to inform him when he came in to leave the key, as I should be back after dinner to write a letter. I returned between three and four o'clock, and found the key of the Auditor's room, which I opened and went into the room usually occupied by me, and wrote my letter; after which I locked the door, and went to the house occupied by the messenger, delivered him the key and the letter, desiring him to leave it at the post-office before five o'clock. At my going in, and during my stay in the office, I observed not the least appearance of fire, but what was in the fire-place of the room where I was writing, which at the time was very low, being the remainder of that made in the early part of the day. After delivering the key to the messenger, I went over to a house in the neighborhood where a billiard table is kept, where I remained, until the cry of fire was heard; when the whole of the persons that were there ran over to the office. On my entrance, finding the doors locked, I called on the messenger by name, who immediately appeared and delivered me the key of the Auditor's room, which I unlocked, and made to the door that opened into the room in which I had been writing; on opening which the smoke and flames gushed out with such violence, that I had nearly been suffocated. On which I returned into the entry and requested some persons that were there to break open the door; on this being done, I clearly perceived that the great body of the fire proceeded from three large cases, which were placed back of the fire-place in the room occupied by the Auditor. How or by what means this unfortunate accident took place, I do not deem myself competent to decide; but this I will say, I had neither hand nor deed in it.

P. FERRALL.

Sworn to before me, this 23d day of February, 1801,

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman of the Committee.

The representation of Albright Fogle, messenger to the Auditor's Office, respecting the fire which took place in the Treasury Department on the 20th January, 1801.

The Auditor left his room on that day a little before two o'clock, when the fire in his fire-place was reduced so low that the ashes covered it close up, over which I placed the fender.

Mr. P. Ferrall left his room at about half past two o'clock on the same day, when his fire was also low. I covered it immediately with the fender, and locked the doors. The key leading to Mr. Ferrall's room was then, by his request, put into a certain place where he could have access to it after dinner.

I returned to the room at about half after four o'clock, and found Mr. Ferrall writing at his desk; I inquired of him if I should put a stick on the fire, which he refused. About twenty minutes before five o'clock he called on me at my house, delivered me the key of the room and a letter, requesting me to put it in the post office; I then hastened to the office, examined the fire in the Auditor's room, raked up the remains of that in Mr. Ferrall's, covered it with the fender, and secured the windows and doors; at which time every thing appeared, as usual, very safe from fire. About dusk, and some time after my return from the post office, I heard the first cry of fire; and, on opening the door of the Auditor's room, I did not perceive any fire, but a vast quantity of smoke came out, which prevented an entry at that time; the door of Mr. Ferrall's room was then forced open, when the large cases and furniture in it, which stood close to the wall adjoining the Auditor's room, were all on fire; at that time I did not perceive any thing on fire at the other end of the room, near the fire-place.

ALBRIGHT FOGLE.

Sworn to before me, this 23d of February, 1801,

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman of the Committee.

JOHN WOODSIDE, clerk in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, upon his oath, deposes: That on the 20th day of January, 1801, having left the office about half past four, P. M., and gone to his place of lodging, about one hundred paces west of the building occupied by the Treasury Department, it being between sundown and dusk, approaching nearer the latter, when the deponent heard the cry of fire; upon which he immediately ran to the Treasury, from whence he saw smoke proceeding; and, upon his nearer approach, saw the smoke and flame issuing from the windows or window of the room occupied by the principal clerk in the office of the Auditor, which room is adjoining to the Auditor's, the latter being in the southeast part of the building.

The weather for the season had been moderate, as to cold, for a day or two preceding; but, in the afternoon of the said 20th day of January, the wind had changed, and blew, especially at the time of the fire, cold and violently from the northwest.

The deponent, finding that the apartment in which the fire had commenced was all in flames, seeing sundry persons engaged in getting the engine ready, and not doubting the immediate assistance of other citizens, considered it most for the interest of the people to endeavor to save the books and papers in the two apartments up stairs of the office to which he was more immediately attached, viz: the Comptroller's, and that of his principal clerk, the latter being immediately over the one in flames; and therefore proceeded to these apartments as soon as they could be opened.

Early in the morning of the 21st, the day after the fire, as soon as there was light, the deponent, living in the vicinity, attended at the Department with a view to collect what papers might be found in a scattered state; and, before sunrise, went to the apartment where the fire had begun, and found the fender in the fire-place, in such a state as to lead, from appearances, to the conclusion that the fire had been carefully covered; the fender being somewhat in the form of part of a circle, the one edge resting upon the hearth, the other edge touching the back of the fire-place.

Since the fire, it having been proposed to the deponent to take the superintendence of the building, so far as respects the prevention of accidents by fire, he undertook the business confided to him; and, having been of opinion that the fire might have been communicated by the mantel-pieces, the deponent had an examination of one of the fire-places, upon which, apprehension of the probability of fire being communicated to the building thereby was not lessened; but, from the blocks placed in the jambs, for nailing the surbase and wash-board, being exposed to the fire of the flues of the chimneys from below, by sparks passing through open joints one quarter of an inch in width between the bricks, and these open joints being only about three inches from the block to the inner part of the chimney, additional ground was given to apprehend danger; as likewise from the blocks placed in the walls, immediately back of the fire-places, in the rooms in the east and west ends of the building.

These apprehensions were communicated to the Register of the Treasury, upon which orders were given to have removed every block or piece of wood, with the mantel-pieces, which might possibly endanger the building. In the execution of these orders, it was found that the blocks back of the fire-places, in the apartment occupied by the Commissioner of the Revenue, have the appearance of being in a degree scorched. In the same room, that is, the one adjoining the Commissioner's, a wedge of pine wood was taken out of the chimney jamb, which had been driven into an open joint between the bricks, which led directly into the flue of the fire-place in the room below. To this wedge the wash-board was nailed. The wedge was found burnt to coal at the end next to the chimney, and was scorched on the under part, the board nailed thereto having been also touched with fire.

In the room occupied by the superintendent of stamps an open joint was found, which led to the block to which the wash-board was fastened into the chimney of the fire-place below; this block did not appear to be scorched, but a quantity of soot had made its way through this open joint to the board to which the wash-board was nailed. The whole of the circumstances, taken together, afford just ground for very serious apprehensions of the liability of the place being set on fire by sparks, especially if the chimney should have taken fire.

Similar facts occurred in breaking out the blocks in the jamb of the fire-place in the room occupied by the Secretary of the Treasury, and in another apartment belonging to said officer, adjoining to that of his principal clerk. Here the danger appeared to be much greater, as it did not arise from open joints leading eight or nine inches into the flues of the chimneys below, but from openings immediately from the blocks to the flues. In one instance, a hole an inch and a half in diameter was discovered, the block, &c. very much dried and smoked, if not scorched. In the other instance, several openings leading directly to the flue from the block to which the surbase was nailed, two pieces of bats lying between the block and the flue, which, not being close to each other, and having no mortar, caused the last mentioned openings, opposite to which the block and other wood appeared to be scorched, and the turpentine to have been extracted by the heat from the chimney.

In relation to the state of the room where the fire originated, the deponent saith that he made a particular examination, and finds that the mantel-piece, except upon the south side, appears to have been burnt or removed; that the blocks to which it was nailed appear to have been in part burnt on the outer surface next to the room, except one in a small degree scorched; that part of the mantel-piece on the south side of the fire-place, which remains standing, being burnt to coal upon the outside, which, if pulled down, the blocks to which it is nailed, it is supposed, will appear like those upon the other side of the fire-place, in some degree scorched or burnt.

In the said apartment, directly opposite to the fire-place in the Auditor's room, there had been placed two blocks of wood, the uppermost fourteen inches in length, with two others upon a line, the right hand block four feet, the one on the left hand three feet and a quarter distant; these blocks were placed in the wall for the purpose of nailing the surbase thereto. The place where a block had been placed for nailing the wash-board is also back of said fire-place, and nearly under the one already mentioned, and, like that, flanked upon the right and left with blocks, at the distances above mentioned; the block, from the opening in the wall, could not have been more than nine inches in length and five inches in width; the blocks upon the right and left of those back of the fire-place do not appear to have been burnt, except one upon the outside, next to the subbase, which appears to have been touched with fire.

The block behind the fire-place, to which the subbase was nailed, was burnt on the surface next to the room in which the fire originated, but that part of said block which was within the wall had not any appearance of being scorched; the block immediately below, to which the wash-board had been nailed, the deponent did not see, as it was missing the first or second day after the fire, he having looked for it in the cellar, where he found the upper block.

The thickness of the wall back of said fire-place is thirteen inches, by measurement; and deducting five inches, the width of the block, or rather depth of the place where it would appear a block had been, leaves eight inches brick between where the block had been and the fire in the Auditor's room; the joints between the bricks in the back of said fire-place appear to have been filled with mortar, except one joint about three-sixteenths of an inch wide, into which a piece of wood of that thickness can be inserted four inches, leaving, from the inner part of the joint, and the space which had been occupied by the block upon the opposite side, a thickness of four inches brick.

This deponent, on being asked further, saith that he can discover no way in which the fire could have communicated from the fire-place in the Auditor's room to Mr. Ferrall's room, unless it was by the lower block to which the wash-board in Mr. Ferrall's room was nailed, which block was not to be found at the time this deponent examined the place.

JOHN WOODSIDE.

Sworn to before me, this 24th February, 1801,

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman of the Committee.

On a further examination, the said John Woodside says that he was employed in the first room on the left-hand side of the passage, on the second floor of the Treasury Department, which leads to the east end, at the time the door was forced open; and that he was endeavoring to remove the books and papers into the fire-proof room adjoining; that he believes several other persons were also employed in the same way with him at the time.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, February 24, 1801.

On the evening of the 20th January, 1801, as I was going to Dr. Cunningham's, on business, I saw a great smoke arising near the President's house. I directly called fire! Mr. Cunningham was in his yard, and asked where; I answered, on the President's square. He replied that it was shavings; I said no; then we both ran. I got to the Treasury Office first, and found it on fire; (it was between sunset and dark,) and the alarm of fire was general, and the bells were ringing. I called for buckets, and to man the pump at the north end of the building, which was soon done, and water was passed as long as there was any to be had. When the pump sucked, I went to the south side, and began to form a line to Mr. Blodget's pump; this being done, I returned to the north side, and proposed to convey water into the rooms where the fire was; after some time the fire began to abate, and I went to Mr. Ferrall's room door and began to throw water where the greatest appearance of fire was; and after some time the room got dark, I got a candle to see if I could discover where the fire originated. I felt on the floor near the fire-place, and it was not burnt; I then felt several other places, and, on feeling near the jamb of the door leading from Mr. Ferrall's room to the Auditor's, in the recess of said door, I put my hand on a hickory chunk about twelve or fifteen inches long, and about three inches in diameter; it appeared to be burnt at one end to a coal; there was bark on one end. I think it was hickory; it might not have been hickory, but I think it was. I then said that the building was set on fire by some evil-disposed person. About this time it was said that the building was on fire up stairs; I ran to give my assistance, met Mr. Wolcott, and requested him to give some directions concerning the papers; Mr. Wolcott said he had nothing to do with them, that he was not the Secretary, and it was as much as he could do to take care of his own private property. I went up stairs, and Mr. Woodside gave me a quantity of books and papers to carry down stairs, which I delivered to Mr. Dawson, and told him that I was of opinion that the building was set on fire, and that I had found a chunk in the recess of the door of Mr. Ferrall's room. On my return up stairs I met Mr. Wolcott, and said, for God's sake, Mr. Wolcott, give some directions; he told me he would introduce me to Mr. Dexter, who would give the proper directions, which he did. Shortly afterwards, an alarm of fire took place in the cellar, and I got water carried down and put it out in a short time. On examination, it was found that the fire had found its way between the floor and the counter-ceiling, and it was proposed to tear up the floor, which was done, by Mr. Dexter's orders; and further this deponent saith not.

WILLIAM O'NEALE.

On being asked, the deponent saith that the floor was burnt through about the place where he found the piece of wood which he has before mentioned.

The above deposition was given by William O'Neale, before the committee; he being first sworn, this 25th February, 1801.

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman.

THOMAS Y. SPROGEL, being first sworn, deposeseth and saith, that, after the fire in the Treasury Department, he was employed by Mr. Nourse, the Register, to watch in the office; and that about twelve o'clock at night, he discovered a wooden block behind Mr. Harrison's fire-place, in Mr. Ferrall's room, to which the wash-board had been nailed, to be on fire; that he extinguished the fire with water, and that it appeared to him to be burning from Mr. Ferrall's room, and towards Mr. Harrison's fire-place; that the block appeared to be about half consumed; that soon after he understood, from the conversation of persons present, that they had taken out the block and found the end next Mr. Harrison's fire-place untouched by fire, but did not see the block himself; that the fire in Mr. Ferrall's room appeared to have been perfectly secured, and that he is very well satisfied that the fire did not proceed from that fire-place.

THOMAS Y. SPROGEL.

Sworn to before me, this 27th day of February, 1801,

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman.

I, JONATHAN FREEMAN, testify, that I was at the Treasury Department about sunrise on the day after the fire happened at that place. In the room which was the most damaged I observed the strongest marks of fire, on the side of the room opposite to the fire-place, in the wall on this side, and directly (as it appeared to me) opposite to the fire-place in the Auditor's room, near the floor, were two holes in the wall, in which had been placed wood for fastening; in the largest and lowest of those holes were some coals and ashes, and such marks of fire as induced me to suppose that the wood had been consumed there; and the strongest marks of the fire were at the end of the hole next the opposite room, from which I was led to believe that the fire was communicated from the fire-place in the Auditor's room, by means of a block or wooden brick, which appeared to have been in the lowest of the above-mentioned holes, and to which the wash-board or surbase of the room where the fire broke out had been fastened.

JONATHAN FREEMAN.

LAWSON PEARSON, being first sworn, deposeseth and saith, that, he came to the Treasury Department when the fire was at its height; that after assisting an acquaintance in emptying a room, which was in danger, of the things in it, he went up stairs, and turned into the passage running to the east, and he discovered a light through the key-hole of the door of the first room on the left hand; that, supposing the room was on fire, he forced the door open, and discovered three men with a number of papers before them; that the candle was extinguished either by the sudden opening of the door or some other cause; that, on his proposing to remove the furniture, he was advised by one of the persons to throw it out of the window, which he refused, as being likely to destroy it; that the persons in the room discovered no embarrassment on its being opened. He further saith that he laid the bricks in the east end of the Treasury Department, and that after the fire he examined the wall between the Auditor's room and the room which was on fire, and could find no reason to suppose that the fire had been communicated from the Auditor's fire-place; that there was the length of the brick between the fire-place and the wroken bricks in the opposite room, and that there was no appearance whatever on the brick or mortar of the wooden brick to which the wash-board was nailed having been burnt; that the wooden brick last mentioned had been removed when he examined, which was the day after the fire. He further saith that he assisted in the examination which has taken place of the fire-places in the Treasury Department, and that a number of blocks have been taken out which were touched by fire, but that none of them were as far from the fire-places as those behind the fire-place in the Auditor's room, and that none which were touched by fire, which he has seen taken out, were more than four inches from the fire.

SALEM ROE, being first sworn, deposeseth and saith, that he was in company with Lawson Pearson when he forced open the door mentioned in his deposition, and that he saw two or three persons sitting in the room; that they proposed to remove a case of papers, and were told they should not, unless they would throw it out of the window; that they, notwithstanding, took it up and carried it down stairs.

C.

Having been in Georgetown at the time the fire was discovered in the Treasury Department, I did not arrive there until it had made some progress; my immediate concern was to see after the papers, as from the appearance of the flame I thought it impossible the building could be saved. On my going to the west end of the Department, where the greatest number of boxes and cases of papers were placed, a carman came up and inquired for Captain Coyle, who he said had desired him to convey away a parcel of papers; not knowing what authority Coyle had to issue any directions concerning the removal of papers, my curiosity was excited to such a degree as to keep me on the spot where the records were; in a short time after Oliver Wolcott made his appearance, in company with Coyle, and began to load the cart which was there with chests of papers; being surprised at this conduct, and in order to aid any evidence which should in future be called for, I looked for and imparted my information to Mr. Kramer, who immediately repaired with me to the place, and expressed his astonishment at seeing Oliver Wolcott so extremely attentive to the carrying away of papers, when the Department appeared in imminent danger of being destroyed.

THOMAS WATERMAN.

Sworn to before me, this 23d February, 1801,

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman.

The night on which the fire was discovered at the Treasury Department, I was at Georgetown, in company with several friends, when a person came to the door of the house in which we were, and gave the alarm; on which we proceeded to the Treasury Department, and I joined the ranks to hand water. The night being somewhat cold I left said station, and went into the house to assist in getting out and securing the papers; when Mr. Waterman informed me that some persons were busy in taking from the Department a number of cases, &c. with papers. I went with him to the place and saw two carts, one of which had a number of cases loaded up, and Mr. Wolcott and Captain Coyle, a clerk to the Secretary of the Treasury, appeared to be busy in assisting to load one of the carts.

HENRY KRAMER.

Sworn to before me, the 23d February, 1801,

JOHN NICHOLAS, Chairman.

JOHN COYLE, of the city of Washington, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, doth depose and say, that on or about the 20th day of January, 1801, at about half past five o'clock, P. M. when the alarm was given that the Treasury Office was on fire, in going towards said office he overtook Oliver Wolcott, esquire, late Secretary of the Treasury, who observed to this deponent that he was very much interested in saving his private papers, as the justification of all his official transactions depended on that circumstance, and requested his assistance to effect that purpose, if possible.

That he went with Mr. Wolcott into the northwest room of the building, where Mr. W. pointed out a chest of about four feet by one foot six inches; a trunk of about three feet four inches by one foot six inches; two boxes of about two feet by thirteen inches, and a small writing desk, (already packed and locked,) as those containing his private papers: these this deponent assisted in removing out of the house. Mr. Wolcott also requested the removal of an iron chest, as he said it contained valuable public property and documents. He also requested me particularly to assist in removing Mr. Miller's books and papers generally, as they were very important; which I did, and observed Mr. Wolcott active in assisting, and appeared very anxious for their preservation.

He then observed that it was his intention to have his papers removed to his lodgings in the course of two or three days if the fire had not happened, and as they were then exposed, he wished to have them taken there.

This deponent then went to the sign of the Black Horse, where he knew carts were to be hired, and engaged one. As it did not arrive soon, he went to the front of the house and observed an empty cart, employed the owner, and brought him to where the trunks, &c. were. Mr. Wolcott then went into the house and cellar to observe the state of the fire, returned, and reported that the danger was apparently over.

Mr. O'Neale then came up and requested Mr. Wolcott's orders respecting the removal of papers. Mr. W. replied he would give no orders, but would introduce him to the Secretary of the Treasury, who was the proper person; this was done, and the orders given. Mr. O'Neale then demanded his assistance as Secretary of the Treasury; Mr. W. replied, I am not Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. O'Neale then said, you are a citizen, and I demand your assistance to save the public property; Mr. W. replied, I cannot; I must take care of my private property.

This deponent and Mr. Wolcott had previously examined the state of the fire, and concurred in opinion that the danger was all over; the fire appeared completely subdued, and any further removal we conceived to be superfluous. We then had loaded into a cart the before-mentioned chest, &c. with the addition of an iron box, which Mr. Wolcott said contained valuable public documents; and did it as a measure of safety.

The cart then drove to the house of said deponent and unloaded. The iron box was returned in safety to the Treasury Department in the course of a day or two following.

BAZIL WOOD, of the city of Washington, doth, upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, depose and say, that on the 20th of January last past, and in the evening of the same day, during the fire which commenced in the evening aforesaid in the Auditor's Office of the Treasury Department, he, this deponent, saw several chests and boxes containing books and papers belonging to Oliver Wolcott, Esq., late Secretary of the Treasury; that this deponent did not then, nor has he since seen the papers then contained in the said boxes; but for some time previous to Mr. Wolcott's resignation, he did prepare and cause to be prepared copies of various public documents and records in his office; that this deponent did several times assist the said Mr. Wolcott in removing these papers into Mr. Miller's room, which Mr. W. occupied for a few weeks, and from which the before-mentioned chests, &c. were, as before said, removed on the evening of the fire. That he verily believes there was not a single original document removed or a paper which was not recorded taken away from the office by Mr. W. This deponent asserts that the space which the papers intended to be taken away by Mr. W. could not be less than four feet square at least, and the person (to wit, Robert Jones Heath, one of the clerks, who examined the rough draughts of letters and other documents, being sick,) this deponent can only further say, that he believes the said Heath could give particular information as to the papers, &c. which he examined and delivered to Mr. Wolcott. Mr. Wolcott received from this deponent no papers, or copies of books or papers, other than the weekly state of balances, of which the records are now in this deponent's possession. The kinds of papers which Mr. W. intended, or said he intended to take were, the rough draughts of his own public letters and the copies of several reports to the various departments; printed journals of Congress; printed reports of the different Departments to the President and Congress; copies of weekly statement of balances; the annual statements of receipt and expenditures of the United States. And further this deponent saith not.

RIGHT OF THE MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY TO A DELEGATE IN CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 16, 1801.

Mr. MILLEDGE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to report on the right of the Mississippi Territory to elect a Delegate to Congress, and also to examine the credentials of Narsworthy Hunter, the Delegate from the said Territory, made the following report:

That, by an ordinance of Congress of the 13th July, 1787, for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, it is ordained, "That so soon as a Legislature shall be formed in the district, the Council and House assembled shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a Delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress, with a right of debating, but not of voting, during the temporary Government thereby erected."

That by an act of Congress passed the 7th April, 1798, entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory," it is, by the 3d section thereof, enacted that the tract of country bounded as therein described shall be constituted one district, to be called the Mississippi Territory; and the President is thereby authorized to establish a Government therein, similar to that exercised in the Territory northwest of the Ohio. And by the 6th section thereof it is further enacted, "That from and after the establishment of said Government, the people of said Territory shall be entitled to and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, in and by the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, in as full and ample a manner as the same are possessed and enjoyed by the people of the said Northwestern Territory.

That by an act of Congress, passed the 10th May, 1800, entitled "An act supplemental to the act entitled An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory," it is in the first section thereof enacted, "That so much of the ordinance of Congress of the 13th July, 1787, and of the act of Congress of the 7th August, 1789, providing for the Government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio, as relates to the organization of a General Assembly therein, and prescribes the powers thereof, shall forthwith operate and be in force in the Mississippi Territory."

From which said ordinance and acts, your committee are of opinion, and do report, that the Mississippi Territory is entitled to elect a Delegate to Congress, with the right to debate, but not to vote.

Your committee further report, that from an examination of the credentials of Narsworthy Hunter, it is the opinion of your committee that the said Narsworthy Hunter is duly elected by the General Assembly of the Mississippi Territory a Delegate to the seventh Congress of the United States.

PRINTING FOR CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 18, 1801.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, measures can be devised to expedite the printing requisite for this House, made the following report:

1. That it would tend, in a great degree, to facilitate the business of the House, if the several heads of Departments were respectively authorized and enjoined to cause to be printed, under their immediate inspection, all such documents, reports, and statements, as are directed by law to be annually laid before the House.

2. That it is expedient to appoint a printer to this House, who may be responsible to it for the faithful and prompt execution of all business which may be confided to him by order of the House.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 21, 1801.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the joint committee appointed to take into consideration the statement made by the Secretary of the Senate, respecting books and maps purchased pursuant to a late act of Congress, and to make report respecting the future arrangement of the same, made the following report:

That, in their opinion, the following resolutions contain the proper regulations upon the subject committed to them; they therefore present them for consideration.

1st. Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the books and maps purchased by directions of the act of Congress passed the 24th day of April, 1800, be placed in the Capitol, in the room which was occupied by the House of Representatives during the last session of the sixth Congress; and that the books shall be numbered, labelled, and set up in portable cases with handles to them, for the purpose of easy removal, with wire-netting doors, and locks. And that the books or libraries which have heretofore been kept separately, by each House, shall be removed and set up with those lately purchased, and be numbered and labelled with them; making one library of the whole.

2d. And it is further resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate, and the clerk of the House of Representatives for the time being, be, and they are hereby, authorized to take charge of the room, books, and maps aforesaid; and they are hereby authorized and directed to make suitable arrangements in said room for the library and maps; to procure proper furniture for the room; to procure the cases; number and label the books, and set them up in their cases; to procure for their own use, and the use of both Houses of Congress, printed catalogues of all the books, with the labelled number of each, and of the maps; to place on each book some proper mark or marks, to designate it as belonging to the Congressional library; to procure printed blank receipts for members to sign them when they take books from the room; and to arrange and hang up the maps: all to be done under the inspection and direction of the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being.

3d. And it is further resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, shall be responsible for the safe-keeping of the room, furniture, books, and maps aforesaid; and shall not permit any map to be taken out of said room by any person, nor any book, except by members of the Senate and House of Representatives for the time being; and no member shall be permitted to take any book out of said room until he shall sign a receipt for the same, the form of which follows, viz:

Received this _____ day of _____ of the keepers of the Congressional library (here the book and its number are to be described,) which I promise to return within _____ days from this date, or forfeit the sum of _____ dollars, to be paid to said keepers, or either of them, or to their successors, or either of them. Witness my hand.

4th. And it is further resolved, That no member shall have at any one time more than three books out of said library; and a folio volume shall be returned within _____ days; a quarto within _____ days; and an octavo within _____ days after the date of the receipt, respectively; and in case of such return, the receipt shall be cancelled; but in case of forfeiture, the keepers shall immediately collect the penalty.

5th. And it is further resolved, That the keepers of said library shall, one of them, attend, or shall cause some proper person for whose conduct they shall be responsible, to attend in said room, from the hour of eleven in the morning until three in the afternoon, of each day, Sundays excepted, during each session of Congress, for the purpose of delivering and receiving said books. And the keepers of said library shall receive for their services, including the safe-keeping of the room, furniture, books, and maps, delivering and receiving the books, and collecting forfeitures, — dollars annually; to be paid out of the fund annually appropriated for the contingent expenses of both Houses of Congress.

6th. And it is further resolved, That the keepers of said library shall, at the commencement of every session of Congress, exhibit a statement to each House, of the condition of said room, furniture, books, and maps, with information of the sum of forfeitures, if any, which they have collected; and of the necessary expenses for fuel, &c. in said room, during the period next preceding each statement, which then remains unsettled, that their accounts may be liquidated and approved by Congress; and the balance shall be paid out of the fund appropriated for the contingent expenses of both Houses of Congress.

7th. And it is further resolved, That the keepers of said library shall cause a printed copy of the third, fourth, and fifth of the foregoing resolutions to be pasted up in some conspicuous place in said room, which shall be there at all times for the information of the members.

And the committee further report, for the consideration of Congress, the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to make sale of the trunks in which the books lately purchased were imported; that he exhibit to both Houses of Congress an account of the proceeds, including a statement of the actual expenditures incurred under the act of the 24th of April, 1800, as well by the purchase of books and maps, and incidental expenses, as for the expenses of fitting up the room, procuring furniture, cases, &c., as mentioned in the second of the foregoing resolutions; and the residue of the five thousand dollars, appropriated by said act, shall be laid out by the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, for books and maps, or books alone, under the direction of a joint committee to be appointed for that purpose, to consist of — members from the Senate, and — members from the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That Congress, by law, annually appropriate the sum of — dollars to be laid out for books and maps, or books alone, by the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, under the direction of a joint committee to be appointed by them for that purpose.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 11, 1802.

JANUARY 11, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I now communicate to you a memorial of the commissioners for the city of Washington, together with a letter of later date, which, with their memorial of January 28, 1801, will possess the Legislature fully of the state of the public interests, and of those of the city of Washington, confided to them. The moneys now due, and soon to become due, to the State of Maryland, on the loan guarantied by the United States, call for an early attention. The lots in the city, which are chargeable with the payment of these moneys, are deemed not only equal to the indemnification of the public, but to ensure a considerable surplus to the city, to be employed for its improvement, provided they are offered for sale only in sufficient numbers to meet the existing demand: but the act of 1796 requires that they shall be positively sold in such numbers as shall be necessary for the punctual payment of the loans; 9,000 dollars of interest are lately become due; 3,000 dollars quarter-yearly will continue to become due; and 50,000 dollars, an additional loan, are reimbursable on the 1st day of November next. These sums would require sales so far beyond the actual demand of the market, that it is apprehended that the whole property may be thereby sacrificed, the public security destroyed, and the residuary interest of the city entirely lost. Under these circumstances, I have thought it my duty, before I proceed to direct a rigorous execution of the law, to submit the subject to the consideration of the Legislature. Whether the public interest will be better secured in the end, and that of the city saved, by offering sales commensurate only to the demand at market, and advancing from the Treasury, in the first instance, what these may prove deficient, to be replaced by subsequent sales, rests for the determination of the Legislature; if indulgence for the funds can be admitted, they will probably form a resource of great and permanent value; and their embarrassments have been produced only by overstrained exertions to provide accommodations for the Government of the Union.

TH: JEFFERSON.

To the President of the United States: The memorial of the commissioners appointed by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of Government of the United States," respectfully sheweth:

COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, December 4, 1801.

That, on the 28th of January last, the commissioners addressed to the late President of the United States a representation, stating such facts respecting the business committed to their charge as appeared necessary for the information of the Government; which representation was by him transmitted to Congress, and by their order referred to a committee; but no measures having taken place in consequence thereof, either by the Executive or Legislature, your memorialists deem it expedient to recapitulate the most important facts then stated, and to add such other facts and observations as may tend to enable the President to judge of the measures proper to be pursued by him, and to aid the Legislature in their deliberations, should the subject be submitted to their consideration. The act of Congress authorizing the President to locate a district for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States; the actual location of that district; the grant of lands for a federal city; the power given by the President to the commissioners to sell that part of the land so granted, which was placed at his disposal; the sale of six thousand lots to Morris & Greenleaf, by agreement, dated 23d December, 1793; the modification of that agreement by another, entered into in April, 1794; the failure of those gentlemen to fulfil their contracts, and the various measures pursued to obtain money to carry on the public buildings, are recited in the above-mentioned representation; and copies of the legislative acts, deeds, and other writings therein referred to are annexed, and the whole printed for the use of the members of Congress. The property belonging to the public is therein stated to consist of twenty-four million six hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred and thirty-five square feet of ground in the city of Washington, equal to four thousand six hundred and eighty-two lots, of five thousand two hundred and sixty-five square feet each, exclusive of lots which bind on navigable water; these form fronts to the extent of two thousand and forty-three feet, and on them are four wharves in a useful state. Of the first-mentioned lots, three thousand one hundred and seventy-eight lie northeast of Massachusetts Avenue; the remainder, being one thousand five hundred and four, are situated southwest of that avenue; also, an island, containing freestone, in Aquia Creek, in the State of Virginia. The above property your memorialists consider as worthy of public attention; its value may be estimated by the prices at which lots have been heretofore sold, the cost of the wharves, and the price of the island.

Lots on the southwest side of Massachusetts Avenue, sold by the commissioners since passing the guaranty bill in 1796, average three hundred and forty-three dollars per lot; those on the northeast side of that avenue, sold by the commissioners and proprietors, average one hundred and five dollars per lot; lots binding on navigable waters, sold within the same period, average twelve dollars and seventy-one cents the foot front; the island cost six thousand dollars, and the wharves three thousand two hundred and twenty-one dollars and eighty-eight cents; the whole amounting, at the rate lots have heretofore been sold, with the original cost of the island and wharves, to eight hundred and eighty-four thousand eight hundred and nineteen dollars eighty-eight cents. The lots sold by the commissioners since the date of the above-mentioned representation, exclusive of a square sold to the United States for the site of marine barracks, average four hundred and seventy dollars and seventy-one cents per lot.

To elucidate more fully the real value of city property, they have endeavored to ascertain the prices at which proprietors have sold lots within the last eighteen months, and, so far as they have obtained information, their sales average  $579\frac{15}{100}$  dollars for cash, and on short credit, and  $921\frac{37}{100}$  dollars on a credit of four, five, and six years per lot, and their groundrents are from one to three dollars per foot front.

Your memorialists readily admit that the public property remaining for sale is not, on an average, equal in value to that which has been sold; yet as great abatement was in many instances made in the price of lots, in consideration of building contracts, and as inducements to purchase in the city have much increased, they conceive those on hand may, in the course of a few years, be disposed of, at least to as great advantage as those already sold; but if the law authorizing a loan for the use of the city of Washington should be carried strictly into effect, your memorialists are apprehensive that this property must be, in a great degree, sacrificed. It is known that two hundred thousand dollars have been borrowed of the State of Maryland, under the sanction of that law, and that the city property above mentioned is to be sold under the direction of the President of the United States, for the repayment of that sum; an arrear of interest to the amount of nine thousand dollars is now due thereon, the accruing interest of twelve thousand dollars per annum, payable quarter-yearly, and the principal, which is payable by annual instalments of forty thousand dollars after the year 1803, are sums which, your memorialists conceive, cannot be raised without frequent sales for ready money; a measure which they consider as highly injurious, if carried to the extent necessary to answer those objects, and which they have in no instance attempted, although the difficulties they have experienced in collecting debts convince them that sales on credit cannot be relied on for the punctual payment of the above mentioned interest and instalments. They, therefore, with great deference, suggest the propriety of the Government's paying the money borrowed, and reserving the property pledged for its repayment, to be sold as advantageous offers may occur; a policy which dictated the guaranty in 1796, and which has been fully justified by the sales made since that period. By pursuing a contrary policy, the property pledged will be greatly diminished by the payment of interest only, while much larger sums than are necessary to discharge both principal and interest will probably lie dead in the Treasury. Your memorialists also beg leave to state, that the sum of fifty thousand dollars, in the United States six per cent. stock, has been borrowed from the State of Maryland, to be repaid on the 1st of November, 1802, secured by the bond of the commissioners, and real and personal security given by private persons. The only fund applicable to the payment of this sum at the disposal of the President or commissioners is, the debts contracted for city lots purchased previous to passing the guaranty law; this fund is, indeed, much more than sufficient, could those debts be called in; to accomplish which, your memorialists have never ceased their exertions. They are now pursuing a measure not before attempted; a ready money sale, in which, if they fail to sell the property for as much as is due thereon to the public, the same policy should dictate to the Government to pay the sum of fifty thousand dollars likewise; the last-mentioned debts, to a much greater amount, being ultimately secure.

The commissioners have only received fifty-three thousand two hundred and eighty-one dollars and eighty-one cents from the sales of property pledged by virtue of the guaranty law; they have paid, in conformity to that law, the sum of twenty-nine thousand six hundred and eighty-seven dollars and ninety-two cents, to the original proprietors, for property appropriated to public use, and forty-two thousand dollars interest, which has accrued on money borrowed under the sanction of the same law. Thus, the sum of eighteen thousand four hundred and six dollars and eleven cents, derived from the funds applicable to the payment of debts contracted on the personal security of the commissioners, has been applied to the purposes of the guaranty, and thereby the necessity of selling at depreciated rates the property pledged to Congress has been avoided.

Your memorialists would also observe, that the debts due, and to become due, to the city fund, and which were considered as good, were stated in the last representation to the President at one hundred and forty-four thousand one hundred and twenty dollars and eighty cents. Since which, forty-six thousand and eighty-one dollars and ninety-nine cents have been received; but it may be observed, that the sum of eighty thousand dollars, which, by the agreement of April, 1794, was to rest on the bond of Morris, Greenleaf, and Nicholson, is not included in that description, although your memorialists are advised by their counsel that certain squares in the city of Washington, containing one thousand lots, are liable to the payment of that sum; the same being designated by an agreement of the 9th July, 1794, as the lots, the payment for which was to rest on the said bond; and this point is now depending for decision in the court of chancery of the State of Maryland.

To show the progress and the present state of buildings in the city, your memorialists have had the number of dwelling houses taken, and find, by an accurate report, that, on the 15th of May, 1800, there were one hundred and nine of brick, and two hundred and sixty-three of wood; and on the 15th of last month, there was an addition of eighty-four of brick, and one hundred and fifty-one of wood, besides seventy-nine of brick, and thirty-five of wood, in an unfinished state; total amount, seven hundred and thirty-five. Their particular situations will appear from the schedule which accompanies this memorial.

The above statements of facts and observations are, with sentiments of the highest respect, submitted to the President of the United States.

WILLIAM THORNTON,
ALEXANDER WHITE,
TRISTRAM DALTON.

Sir: COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, December 19, 1801.

Agreeably to the information given in our memorial of the 4th instant, we have held a sale of lots for ready money, which we kept open ten days. It has produced, by actual sales, 4,234 dollars, and by payments made by debtors, to prevent their property from being sold, 7,613 dollars, making, together, 11,847 dollars; yet our expenditures have been such as to leave at this time no more than 5,880 dollars in our hands. During the sale, we pursued our general policy of not selling any property for less than the sum due on it to the public; thinking it improper to change that system until it should be known what measures Government will take with respect to it, although (besides the interest due to the State of Maryland) the commissioners' note for 5,000 dollars discounted at the Bank of Columbia, will become due 22d (25th) January next, and we estimate the sums due for operations on the roads and buildings, expenses of the commissioners' office, and other contingencies to the end of the year, at 1,870 dollars; demands to which our present means are very inadequate.

We are, with sentiments of the highest respect, sir, your obedient servants,

WILLIAM THORNTON,
ALEXANDER WHITE,
TRISTRAM DALTON.

DEBT OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 19, 1802.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 15, 1802.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, offering to accept six per cent. stock, in payment of a loan obtained from that State by the commissioners of the city of Washington, respectfully reports:

That by an act passed the 6th day of May, 1796, the commissioners of the city of Washington were authorized to borrow a sum, not exceeding $300,000 at an interest not exceeding six per cent. a year, and reimbursable in five annual instalments, to commence from and after the year 1803.

That by a subsequent act, passed the 18th day of April, 1798, the President of the United States was authorized to loan to the said commissioners one hundred thousand dollars, in part of the above-mentioned sum of three hundred thousand dollars; which loan of one hundred thousand dollars has been accordingly effected, and the amount paid out of the Treasury to the commissioners.

That by the said acts, all the city lots, not appropriated to public use, vested in either the commissioners or trustees, for the use of the United States, and remaining unsold at the time of passing the first-mentioned act, are made chargeable with the principal and interest of the loans; and the United States are made liable for the repayment only of the balance which may remain due on such loans after all the lots shall have been sold.

That under the first above-mentioned act, the commissioners obtained from the State of Maryland a loan of two hundred thousand dollars, (making, together with the one hundred thousand dollars loaned by the United States, the full sum of three hundred thousand dollars, authorized to be borrowed by the commissioners under the said act,) the amount of which they have received from the said State, in six per cent. stock, at par, which stock they have sold for specie, at its market price. This loan bears an interest of six per cent. a year, on its nominal amount, and is reimbursable in five equal annual instalments, of forty thousand dollars each, payable in the years 1804, 1805, 1806, 1807, and 1808. And that, in addition to the said loan, the commissioners have obtained another loan of fifty thousand dollars from the State of Maryland, reimbursable in November, 1802, for the payment of which they have given personal security, and pledged the proceeds of lots sold prior to the date of the above-mentioned act of the 6th of May 1796.

The propriety of repealing so much of the existing laws as compels a sale of the city lots, in order to meet the payments due on those loans, is a question, exclusively, of legislative discretion: nor are there any documents, or other information, in the Treasury Department, which would enable the Secretary to form (even if, which is not apprehended to be the case, it had been intended by the reference that he should give) an opinion on that subject.

The only question, therefore, which seems to arise under the reference, is, whether, if Congress shall think it expedient not to compel forced sales of the city lots, it will be most eligible for the United States to repay the State of Maryland, in specie, or in six per cent. stock; and to place that option in the power of Congress seems to have been the object of the commissioners, in their application to the Legislature of that State.

It is sincerely believed, and most respectfully submitted, that no act of Government can more effectually tend to increase the external force, or to strengthen the internal union of the United States than a prompt and complete extinguishment of the public debt; and that every measure should be avoided, which may lead to an unnecessary perpetuation or prolongation of any part of the same.

In this instance there can be no doubt that the resources of the United States are fully equal to discharge in specie the five annual instalments, of forty thousand dollars each, which may eventually be payable on that loan, without having recourse to the expedient of creating, for that purpose, an additional six per cent. stock, to that amount.

Under that impression, the Secretary, with submission, but without hesitation, reports, that although the resolution of the Legislature of Maryland was evidently adopted only with a view of accommodating the United States, it cannot, in his opinion, be their interest to avail themselves of the offer it contains.

All which is most respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

CANAL IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 11, 1802.

Mr. SPRIGG, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying that Congress will pass an act, incorporating a company for the purpose of opening a canal to unite the waters of the Potomac and the Eastern Branch, through Tyber creek and the low grounds at the foot of Capitol Hill, made the following report:

That such a canal was contemplated at a period almost as early as that at which this place was selected for the permanent seat of the General Government; and a course marked out for it, of the width of eighty feet, on a plan of the city, engraved by order of President Washington. Ground was also reserved for a street, eighty feet wide on each side, throughout its whole course, under the general power given to the President, by deed from the original proprietors of the soil, to lay out, for the use of the public, such ground as he should think necessary.

Some deviations from the course designated for it on the engraved plan have, however, been since made, with the full consent and approbation of the holders of the land, the better to accommodate it to the shape of the ground. All which will more fully appear by documents with which the committee have been favored by the commissioners of the city, and which accompany this report.

The committee find, also, that the Legislature of Maryland were so fully impressed with an idea of the utility of the intended canal, that they relaxed their usual severity on the subject of lotteries, and, by an act of November session, 1795, c. 47, authorized the persons therein named to propose and carry into effect two annual lotteries for raising the sum of fifty-two thousand five hundred dollars, to be applied to the completion of the said canal; which persons so far complied with the directions of the said act as to give bond for the faithful discharge of their trust to the commissioners of the city of Washington, a copy of which bond is also annexed to this report; but for some cause, not known to the committee, no money from this source has ever been applied to carrying on the canal.

These circumstances, combined with the present appearance of the grounds through which the canal must pass, add additional weight to the opinion of the committee, that a well-constructed and well-regulated canal would be extremely beneficial to the city of Washington, both with respect to its commerce and the health of its citizens.

They therefore think that the prayer of the petition ought to be granted, with such provisions, and under such restrictions, as while they hold out to individuals sufficient pecuniary inducements to urge the completion of the work, will guard against the inconveniences which frequently result from incorporations; and they beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to pass a law incorporating a company for the purpose of opening a navigable canal to connect the waters of Potomac river with those of the Eastern Branch thereof, through Tyber creek, and the low lands at the foot of Capitol Hill.

Sir:

COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, February 5, 1802.

We have been honored with your letter of the 1st instant. The proposed canal is not, in all its parts, designated on the plan of the city usually met with; that plan was engraved by order of President Washington, and has been generally pursued in laying out the city, as far as it was found practicable on an actual survey of the ground; but some deviations were made, which appear on a plan in this office, sanctioned by the President. The bed of the canal was changed, in part of its course, in the year 1795, by direction of the President, and with the consent of the proprietors of the adjacent lots. To render this change intelligible, we have enclosed a portion of the last-mentioned plan, with the width of the canal, and the adjacent streets noted thereon. The competency of the authority by which this disposition was made cannot be doubted; the deeds from the original proprietors having empowered the President of the United States, for the time being, to lay off all the lands within the limits of the city, into such streets, squares, parcels, and lots, as he should judge proper. A copy of one of those deeds is on the files of Congress, being part of a communication from the late President, dated 30th January, 1801. With regard to the lotteries authorized by the act of the Legislature of Maryland, we have only to say that the managers gave bond to the commissioners, agreeably to that act; a copy of which bond is enclosed: that the first lottery was drawn, and that the commissioners did every thing in their power to prevail on the managers to render an account of the proceeds, and to commence their operations on the canal, but without effect. The correspondence on this subject is voluminous; but, if required, will be transmitted for your perusal. Perhaps you will not deem this necessary, the managers being all in the city.

We are, with sentiments of great respect, sir, your most obedient servants,

WILLIAM THORNTON,
ALEXANDER WHITE,
TRISTRAM DALTON.

RICHARD SPRIGG, Esq., Chairman of a committee of Congress.

Know all men by these presents, that we, Notley Young, Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, Lewis Deblois, George Walker, William Mayne Duncanson, Thomas Law, and James Barry, are jointly and severally holden, and firmly bound unto the commissioners, appointed in virtue of the act of Congress for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States, and their successors, in the full and just sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be paid to the said commissioners, or their successors; to the which payment, well and truly to be made and done, we bind ourselves, and each of us, our and each of our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents, sealed with our seals, and dated this sixth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six.

The condition of the above obligation is such, that if the above-bound Notley Young, Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, Lewis Deblois, George Walker, William Mayne Duncanson, Thomas Law, and James Barry, shall well and truly apply the moneys arising from and in virtue of the act of Assembly, entitled "An act to authorize two lotteries in the city of Washington," within two months after the drawing of said lotteries, to the payment of the prizes drawn by the fortunate adventurers in said lotteries, and the necessary expenses incurred in the management thereof, and the residue in the opening and completing the canal in the city of Washington, and rendering the same navigable under the direction and superintendence of the said commissioners and their successors, then the said obligation to be void, else to remain in full force and virtue in law.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 12, 1802.

Mr. NICHOLSON made the following report:

The committee, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 11th ultimo, transmitting a memorial of the commissioners of the city of Washington; and to whom was likewise referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th instant, directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the offices of the said commissioners, beg leave to report the following resolutions for the consideration of the House:

1. Resolved, That from and after the 1st day of March next, the offices of two of the commissioners of the city of Washington ought to be discontinued, and thereafter the powers now vested in the board of commissioners ought to be vested in one only, who ought to discharge all the duties now required to be performed by the whole number.

2. Resolved, That prior to the 1st day of March next, the said commissioners ought to settle their accounts with the accounting officers of the Treasury; and all debts which have been contracted by them in their capacity as commissioners, and for the payment of which no particular provision is hereinafter made, ought to be discharged in the usual manner by the commissioner retained.

3. Resolved, That so many of those lots in the city of Washington which are pledged for the repayment of a loan of two hundred thousand dollars, made by the State of Maryland in the years 1796 and 1797, to the commissioners of the said city, ought to be annually sold, as may be sufficient to pay the interest and instalments of the said loan, as they may respectively become due: provided, that if, in the opinion of the President of the United States, the sale of a sufficient number of the said lots, to meet the objects aforesaid, cannot be made without an unwarrantable sacrifice of the property, then so much money as may be necessary to provide for the deficiency ought to be advanced from the Treasury of the United States.

4. Resolved, That so many of the lots in the said city which were sold prior to the 6th day of May, in the year 1796, and have reverted to the commissioners, in consequence of a failure on the part of the purchasers to comply with their contracts, ought to be sold, as will be sufficient to pay to the State of Maryland the sum of fifty thousand dollars, with the interest thereon, on or before the 1st day of November next; which sum was loaned by the said State to the commissioners aforesaid, in the year 1799: provided that, if in the opinion of the President of the United States, the sale of a sufficient number of the said lots, to meet the objects aforesaid, cannot be made without an unwarrantable sacrifice of the property, then so much money as may be necessary to provide for the deficiency ought to be advanced out of the Treasury of the United States.

5. Resolved, That all moneys advanced out of the Treasury of the United States, in pursuance of these resolutions, ought to be reimbursed as soon as possible, after the debts already contracted by the commissioners have been discharged, by applying towards the reimbursement every sum of money which may be afterwards raised out of the city funds, until the whole of the money advanced shall be repaid.

ROLL OF THE OFFICERS, CIVIL, MILITARY, AND NAVAL, OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 17, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

FEBRUARY 16, 1802.

I now transmit a statement of the expenses incurred by the United States in their transactions with the Barbary Powers,* and a roll of the persons having office or employment under the United States, as was proposed in my messages of December the 7th and 22d. Neither is as perfect as could have been wished; and the latter not so much so as further time and inquiry may enable us to make it.

The great volume of these communications, and the delay it would produce to make out a second copy, will, I trust, be deemed a sufficient reason for sending one of them to the one House, and the other to the other, with a request that they may be interchanged for mutual information, rather than to subject both to further delay.

TH: JEFFERSON.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1802.

I have the honor to enclose the list of the several officers of Government, with their salaries or emoluments, as compiled in this or received from the other Departments, and arranged in the following manner:

They may be considered as forming two general classes: one consists of all those who are employed in the collection of the public revenue, and receive their compensations by deducting the amount thereof from the moneys collected by them; the other embraces all the other officers who receive their compensations from moneys drawn out of the Treasury.

The first class is arranged under four general heads, viz: 1st. Officers employed in the collection of the external revenues; 2d. Officers employed in the collection of the internal revenues; 3d. Receivers and registers of the land offices; 4th. Deputy Postmasters.

1st. The officers employed in the collection of the external revenue are the collectors, naval officers, surveyors, masters and mates of revenue cutters, appointed by the President; and the port inspectors, measurers, weighers, and gaugers, who are appointed by the collectors, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury; to which may be added the bargemen employed by collectors.

A few of the collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, all the officers of the revenue cutters, and the port inspectors, receive a yearly, monthly, or daily allowance. The greater part of the compensations received by the collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, arises, however, from commissions paid out of the revenue, and fees paid by individuals. The measurers, weighers, and gaugers, receive certain fees or allowances, determined by the specific services rendered, and paid out of the revenue.

2d. Officers employed in the collection of the internal revenues consist of supervisors, and two inspectors, whose office still subsist, appointed by the President, collectors, and auxiliary officers, appointed by the supervisors. The pay of all those officers, which consists partly of salaries, partly of fees, and partly of commissions, is paid out of the revenue. The emoluments in the enclosed list are (for both those classes) those received during the year 1800, although the names of those officers appointed by the President, who were in office on the 31st day of December, 1801, have been inserted.

3d. Receivers and registers of the land offices are appointed by the President. The receivers receive one per cent., and the registers one-half per cent., on all moneys collected; besides which the registers receive certain fees from individuals.

4th. Deputy postmasters are appointed by the Postmaster General, and paid by commissions out of the moneys collected. It must be observed that the amount of emoluments returned is the gross sum received by them, and includes the expenses of store rent and clerks.

The second class is arranged under the four heads of civil, foreign, military, and naval departments.

1. Civil establishment includes the President and Vice President, the Legislature and officers attached to the same, the Judiciary, the departments at the seat of Government, the territorial officers, and the several general establishments of commissioners of loans, purveyor of public supplies, mint, surveying, and light-houses.

2. The foreign intercourse establishment includes the diplomatic establishment, commissioners and agents under or in relation to the British treaty, and consuls.

3. The military establishment includes the officers of the army, the agents of the quartermaster's department, the superintendents and other officers of the armories, the superintendent and storekeepers of the military stores, the superintendents and other agents of the Indian department, and the agents for fortifications.

4. The naval establishment includes the officers of the navy and of the marine corps, the navy agents, and the superintendents of the navy yards.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

GENERAL POST OFFICE, January 5, 1802

The Postmaster General, in obedience to instructions received from the President, through the Secretary of State, respectfully reports:

That the persons whose names are herein hereafter written are Deputy Postmasters at the places written against their names; and that they received, as a compensation for their services for the year 1800, the sums set against their names respectively. In those cases where the accounts have not been returned for that year, the best light has been given which the state of the office admits of.

All which is respectfully submitted.

GIDEON GRANGER.

Thomas Hewes, consul, Batavia.	John Matthew, consul, Naples.
Hans Rudolph Saabye, consul, Copenhagen.	Joseph Pulis, consul, Malta.

NOTE.—The fees and emoluments of consuls, as established by law, (excepting those in the Barbary States, who receive the salaries above mentioned,) and which of course extend to commercial agents, are as follows, viz:

For authenticating under the consular seal, every protest, declaration, deposition, or other act, which any captain, master, mariner, or other citizen of the United States may respectively choose to make, the sum of two dollars.

For the taking into possession, inventorying, selling, and finally settling and paying, or transmitting the balance due on personal estate, left by any citizen of the United States, who shall die within the limits of his consulate, five per centum on the gross amount of such estate.

For taking into possession, and otherwise proceeding on any such estate which shall be delivered over to the legal representative, before a final settlement of the same, two and a half per cent. on such part delivered over as shall not be in money, and five per cent. on the gross amount of the residue.

For administering oaths or affirmations to the principal officers of a vessel, confirming the landing of merchandise, where he shall reside, twenty-five cents for each; and for certifying the delivery of such merchandise from every such vessel, one dollar.

No. 155.

[1st Session.

LIST OF SUITS DECIDED AND DEPENDING IN THE COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 26, 1802.

FEBRUARY 26, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

Some statements have been lately received of the causes decided or depending in the courts of the Union, in certain States, supplementary or corrective of those from which was formed the general statement accompanying my message at the opening of the session; I, therefore, communicate them to Congress, with a report of the Secretary of State, noting their effect on the former statement, and correcting certain errors in it, which arose partly from inexactitude in some of the returns, and partly in analyzing, adding, and transcribing them, while hurried in preparing the other voluminous papers accompanying that message.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 25, 1802.

The SECRETARY OF STATE has the honor to lay before the President of the United States copies of the following documents, to wit:

A schedule, containing a statement of the suits in the Circuit Court for Maryland, ending with the November term last.

A similar statement of suits in the District Court for Kentucky, ending with March term last.

A certificate of the clerk of the Circuit Court for West Tennessee, (and who was the clerk of the late District Court for Tennessee,) respecting the suits in the courts of the United States within that State.

The two last-mentioned papers are intended as corrections of the document referred to in your message to Congress at the opening of the present session, as containing a statement of the suits in the courts of the United States; and the first-mentioned schedule to supply an omission in it.

This occasion being adapted to the purpose, the Secretary takes leave to mention some other imperfections of the document referred to in the message.

In Massachusetts 14 common-law suits being omitted at October term, 1797, the whole number of common law-suits should be 244, instead of 230; the aggregate of all the suits 323, instead of 320; and the number of suits decided, discontinued, dismissed, and not prosecuted, 282, instead of 283.

In Virginia, the aggregate should be 2,162, instead of 2,048; and the number decided, discontinued, dismissed, and not prosecuted, 1,831, instead of 1,717.

In North Carolina the aggregate should be 629, instead of 495; and the number decided, discontinued, dismissed, and not prosecuted, 495, instead of 361.

And in South Carolina the aggregate should be 882, instead of 1,143; and the number decided, discontinued, dismissed, and not prosecuted, 621, instead of 571.

None of the above variations affect the whole number of causes stated to be depending in either of the districts, except that of Kentucky, to which an addition of 21 is made by the second statement received; but Maryland adds to the whole 69 of such causes. That the aggregate is not materially varied is also apparent from the annexed recapitulation.

It would be unnecessary to explain with minuteness how these errors originated; it is sufficient to observe that they arose partly from inexact statements returned to this office by the clerks of the courts, and partly in analyzing and adding the numbers contained in the returns, and transcribing the result.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

PHILIP MOORE,
Clerk of the Circuit Court of Maryland.

UNITED STATES' CIRCUIT COURT, Kentucky District, ss.

I, Thomas Tunstall, clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the district aforesaid, do certify that the foregoing statement exhibits all the causes that have been instituted in the late district court, from March, 1790, to the first day of June, 1801. I do further certify that two hundred and ninety-four of those suits were in the name and for the benefit of the United States; and that forty-five were only depending on the said first day of June.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed the seal of my office, this 13th day of January, 1802, and in the twenty-sixth year of American independence.

THOMAS TUNSTALL, C. C. C. K. D.

* There is reason to suppose this number exceeds the truth, but how much is uncertain.

† This number includes eleven new suits, brought between April term, 1801, and 10th July following.

JANUARY 1, 1802.

I, Randall McGavock, heretofore clerk of the court of the United States for the district of Tennessee, and now clerk of the sixth circuit for the district of West Tennessee, do certify that, at the time the new judiciary act was known in Tennessee, there were seventy-seven causes depending and undecided in the district court for Tennessee: that at April term, 1801, of the circuit court for West Tennessee, fourteen of the before mentioned causes were decided, leaving sixty-three undecided, thirty-six of which were then adjourned into the circuit court for West, and the remaining twenty-seven into the circuit court for East Tennessee.

R. MCGAVOCK.

* Extract of a letter from the Attorney of the District of New York to the Secretary of State, dated

"JUNE 28, 1801.

"As to the causes now pending, it is impossible to procure an official return that will perfectly ascertain their number; for many suits, especially those instituted for the recovery of debts, are settled on the return of the writ. But as this settlement does not appear on the minutes, we can only judge of the probability of their being still pending, from subsequent proceedings at the ensuing term. Now, as no private suits were entered at the last term, and no further steps have been taken in any of those instituted at a preceding term, it may safely be concluded that there is no common law cause now depending in the Circuit Court of the United States for this district, except a few of the fifteen you will find entered at the last term, which are on revenue bonds, and usually prosecuted in the District Court; particular circumstances having induced me in these instances to proceed in the Circuit Court."

Notes of the attorney for the Eastern district of Penn.

* These indictments were chiefly founded on the western insurrection in 1794, and violations of the acts of Congress for preserving our neutrality.

† These indictments arose from the disturbances in Bucks and Northampton counties, and the sedition act, &c. The discontinuance which took place in holding the court at Norristown occasioned a renewal of the indictments for the same causes in April, 1800.

MARYLAND.

A part of the return from Maryland has been mislaid through accident, and the clerk of the court has been written to to supply the portion which is missing.

Statement concerning suits depending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, and such as have been decided in the late District Court thereof.

Since the establishment of the court there have been instituted, of all kinds, six hundred and seventy suits,	670
Of which have been decided four hundred and forty-five,	445
Were depending on the 15th June, 1801, two hundred and twenty-five,	225

The materials from which the above sketch is given do not afford any other particulars except the names of the parties; whence it appears that the United States are plaintiffs in one hundred and ninety-six of the suits in Kentucky, and that but twenty-one of them are decided.

APPLICATION TO ERECT THE NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY INTO A STATE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 4, 1802.

Mr. GILES made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the census of the inhabitants of the Territory northwest of the Ohio, with instructions to report "whether any, and what, measures ought at this time to be taken, for enabling the people of the said Territory to form a Government for themselves, to be admitted into the Union upon the same terms with the original States;" to whom were also referred the representations of sundry inhabitants of the said Territory, complaining of an act passed by the Legislature of the said Territory for altering the boundary lines of the States therein as established by the ordinance of Congress of the 13th of July, 1787, &c. &c.; and other representations praying that provision may be made for enabling the people of the said Territory to form for themselves a State Government, to be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States, &c.; after having bestowed on these interesting subjects all the attention their importance requires, report:

That it appears to your committee, that the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, between the original States, and the people and States within the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, contains the following stipulation: that

"Whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State Government: provided the constitution and Government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than sixty thousand." It also appears from the census of the inhabitants within the eastern division of the said Territory, taken more than twelve months since, in virtue of a law of the United States for that purpose, that there were then in the said eastern division forty-five thousand three hundred and sixty-five inhabitants, from which are to be deducted three thousand four hundred inhabitants living north and west of the line proposed for the boundary of the said eastern division.

It appears, that since the time of taking the census, the United States have sold five hundred and fifty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety-five acres of lands within the eastern division of the Territory, amounting in value to $1,147,585. It also appears, from the best information to be procured, that, in the year 1794, the number of inhabitants within the present eastern division of the Territory did not exceed six thousand. From the progressive increase of population since that period, and the sales of lands recently made by the United States, it is probable that, before all the measures necessary for the formation of a constitution, putting into operation a State Government, and its admission into the Union, can be effectuated, the number of inhabitants will amount to sixty thousand; the number requisite, according to the terms of the ordinance, for giving them an absolute right of forming a constitution and State Government for themselves; as well as the absolute right of admission into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

It also appears to your committee, that great and increasing disquietudes exist among the inhabitants within the Territory, from various occasions, and particularly in consequence of the act lately passed for altering the boundary lines of the States in the Territory, as established by the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787.

Your committee, from a due consideration of all the foregoing circumstances, are of opinion, that it is at this time expedient to make provision for enabling the people within the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form for themselves a constitution and State Government, to be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and that such admission, at this time, is consistent with the general interests of the confederacy, according to the said ordinance, although the number of inhabitants may not amount to sixty thousand. The committee therefore recommend the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That provision ought at this time to be made, by law, for enabling the inhabitants of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form for themselves a constitution and State Government, provided the same be republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, of the 13th of July, 1787, nor repugnant to the constitution of the United States; and also for the admission of such State, when the Government thereof shall be formed, into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, by the name of the State of _____.

2. Resolved, That the said State of _____ ought to consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Bounded on the east by the Pennsylvania line, running from the Territorial line in Lake Erie to the Ohio; on the south by the Ohio, to the mouth of the Great Miami; on the west by a line drawn due north, from the mouth of the Great Miami aforesaid; and on the north by an east and west line, drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east, after intersecting the due north line aforesaid, from the mouth of the Great Miami, until it shall intersect Lake Erie or the Territorial line, and thence with the same through Lake Erie, to the Pennsylvania line aforesaid, or place of beginning: provided that Congress shall, at any time hereafter, be at liberty either to attach all the territory lying east of the line to be drawn due north from the mouth of the Miami aforesaid to the territorial line, and north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east as aforesaid to Lake Erie, to the aforesaid State, or dispose of it otherwise, in conformity to the fifth article of compact between the original States and the people and States to be formed in the Territory northwest of the Ohio.

3. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for calling a convention within the eastern division of the Territory, to be composed of members to be apportioned amongst the several counties therein, in a ratio of one representative for every _____ inhabitants of the said counties, according to the last enumeration of inhabitants thereof; also for fixing the time, place, and mode of making elections of members to compose such convention, and the time and place for the meeting of the same; which convention, when met, shall first determine, by a majority of the members present (provided the number present shall be a majority of the whole number chosen) whether it be or be not expedient, at that time, to form a constitution and State Government for the people within the said Territory; and if it be determined to be expedient, then, in the next place, the convention shall be authorized to form a constitution and State Government: provided the same shall be republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, between the original States and the people and States of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, nor repugnant to the constitution of the United States.

4. Resolved, That until the next general census shall be taken, the State of _____ shall be entitled to _____ representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States.

The committee observe, in the ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the Western Territory of the 20th of May, 1785, the following section, which, so far as respects the subject of schools, remains unaltered:

"There shall be reserved for the United States out of every township, the four lots, being numbered 8, 11, 26, 29; and out of every fractional part of a township so many lots of the same numbers as shall be found thereon for future sale. There shall be reserved the lot No. 16, of every township, for the maintenance of public schools within the said township; also one-third part of all gold, silver, lead, and copper mines, to be sold, or otherwise disposed of as Congress shall hereafter direct."

The committee also observe, in the third and fourth articles of the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, the following stipulations, to wit: Article three, "Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged," &c.

Art. 4th. "The Legislatures of those districts or new States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers. No tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

The committee, taking into consideration these stipulations, viewing the lands of the United States within the said Territory as an important source of revenue; deeming it also of the highest importance to the stability and permanence of the union of the eastern and western parts of the United States, that the intercourse should, as far as possible, be facilitated, and their interests be liberally and mutually consulted and promoted, are of opinion that the provisions of the aforesaid articles may be varied for the reciprocal advantage of the United States and the State of _____ when formed, and the people thereof; they have therefore deemed it proper, in lieu of the said provisions, to offer the following propositions to the convention of the eastern State of the said Territory, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, without any condition or restraint whatever, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory upon the United States:

1st. That the section No. 16, in every township, sold, or directed to be sold by the United States, shall be granted to the inhabitants of such township for the use of schools.

2d. That the six miles reservation, including the salt springs, commonly called the Scioto salt springs, shall be granted to the State of _____ when formed, for the use of the people thereof; the same to be used under such terms, conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature of the said State shall direct: provided the said Legislature shall never sell, nor lease the same for a longer term than _____ years.

3d. That one-tenth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying in the said State, hereafter sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making turnpike or other roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, and continued afterwards through the State of _____; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass: provided that the convention of the State of _____ shall, on its part, assent that every and each tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of ten years, from and after the completion of the payment of the purchase money on such tract to the United States.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, February 13, 1802.

I have examined, in consequence of our conversation, the articles of compact which make part of the Territorial ordinance. The more I have reflected on the subject, the more forcibly have I been impressed with the importance of making some effectual provisions, which may secure to the United States the proceeds of the sales of the Western lands, so far at least as the same may be necessary to discharge the public debt, for which they are solemnly pledged.

That part of the system of taxation, adopted in the Northwestern Territory, which relates to non-resident owners, undoubtedly affects the value of the public lands, and will eventually diminish the amount of sales. Yet, upon due consideration, there is but one provision, which, in my opinion, would be inconsistent with the rights of the United States, as secured by the articles of compact. An attempt, on the part of the Legislature of the Territory or new State, to render lands, sold under the laws of Congress, but for which no patent has yet issued, liable to be sold for non-payment of taxes, would interfere with the regulations adopted by Congress for the "primary disposal of the soil," since, by these, the lands remain mortgaged to the United States until after complete payment of the purchase money, and, in case of failure thereof, are directed to be sold.

But it does not appear to me that the United States have a right to annex new conditions, not implied in the articles of compact, limiting the legislative right of taxation of the Territory or new State. The limitations which they may rightfully impose are designated by the articles themselves, and, these being unalterable, unless by common consent, all legislative powers, which of right pertain to an independent State, must be exercised at the discretion of the Legislature of the new State, unless limited either by the articles or by the constitution of the United States or of the State. Indeed, the United States have no greater right to annex new limitations than the individual State may have to infringe those of the original compact; and I cannot see that this position is, in any degree altered by the circumstance of admitting into the Union, in pursuance of an express provision of the articles, a State at an earlier period than that at which it must necessarily be admitted.

The conditions inserted in the fourth article of compact, in relation to that object, and which constitute all that Congress thought at the time necessary to reserve, in order to secure to the Union their right to the soil, are: 1st, that the Legislatures of the districts or new States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by Congress, nor with regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers; 2d, that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and 3d, that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents. Further than that Congress cannot demand, and it is on account of the second provision that the district or State Legislature has not a right to tax, or at least to sell for non-payment of taxes, the lands on which, although conditionally sold, the United States still retain a lien.

It follows, that if it be, in a high degree, as I believe it is, the interest of the United States to obtain some further security against an injurious sale, under the Territorial or State laws, of lands sold by them to individuals, justice not less than policy requires that it should be obtained by common consent. And, as it is not to be expected that the new State Legislature should assent to any alterations in their system of taxation which may affect the revenue of the State, unless an equivalent is offered which it may be their interest to accept, I would submit the propriety of inserting in the act of admission a clause or clauses to that effect, leaving it altogether optional in the State convention or Legislature to accept or reject the same.

The equivalent to be offered must be such as shall not affect the value of the pledge which the public creditors now have by the appropriation of the lands, and as shall be fully acceptable to the State, and, at the same time, prove generally beneficial, either in a political or commercial view to the Union at large. From the best view I have been able to take of the subject, the following provisions appear to me fully adequate to answer those several objects, namely:

That, provided the convention or Legislature of the State shall assent that every and each tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax, raised by or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose, for the term of ten years, from and after the completion of the payment of the purchase money on such tract to the United States, the United States shall, on their part, agree—

1st. That the section No. 16, in every township, sold, or directed to be sold by the United States, shall be granted to the inhabitants of such township for the use of schools.

2d. That the six miles reservation, including the salt springs, commonly called the "Scioto salt springs," shall be granted to the new State, for the use of the people thereof; the same to be used under such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature of the said State shall direct: provided that the said Legislature shall never sell nor lease the same for a longer time than _____ years.

3d. That one-tenth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying in said State, hereafter sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied towards laying out and making turnpike or other roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, and continued afterwards through the new State; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the same shall pass.

That such conditions, instead of diminishing, would greatly increase the value of the lands, and therefore of the pledge to the public creditors; and that they would be highly beneficial and acceptable to the people of the new State cannot be doubted. And they are particularly recommended, as amongst the most eligible which may be suggested, from the following considerations:

The provision for schools, exclusively of its intrinsic usefulness, made a part of the former ordinance of Congress for the sale of lands. The grant has actually been made in the sales to the Ohio Company, and to J. C. Symmes; and although the ordinance be no longer in force, and such a grant be no part of the articles of compact, yet it has always been at least hoped by the inhabitants of the Territory that it would be generally extended.

The grant of the Scioto salt springs will at present be considered as the most valuable, and alone would, most probably, induce a compliance, on the part of the new State, with the condition proposed by Congress; and if it be considered that at least one-half of the future population of that district will draw their salt from that source, the propriety of preventing the monopoly of that article falling into the hands of any private individual can hardly be disputed.

The tenth part of the proceeds of the lands, as it will be co-extensive with the sales, will continue to be considered as an equivalent until the sales are completed, and after the present grant might have ceased to operate on the minds of the people of the new State. The roads will be as beneficial to the parts of the Atlantic States through which they are to pass, and nearly as much so to a considerable portion of the Union, as to the Northwest Territory itself; but a due attention to the particular geographical situation of that Territory and of the adjacent western districts of the Atlantic States, will not fail to impress you strongly with the importance of that provision, in a political point of view, so far as it will contribute towards cementing the bonds of union between those parts of the United States whose local interests have been considered as most dissimilar.

I have the honor to be, with sincere respect, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. Mr. GILES, Chairman of the Committee on the admission of the Northwestern Territory into the Union.

SIR:

FEBRUARY 13, 1802.

The enclosed paper is an official document, stating the quantity and quality of lands subject to taxation in the Northwestern Territory. The present rate of taxation in the Territory is established as follows, viz: on each 100 acres of first rate land, 60 cents; second rate land, 40 cents; and third rate land, 20 cents. Agreeably to the document aforesaid, there is in the Territory,

116,128 acres of first rate land, at 60 cents per 100 acres,	-	-	-	$696	76
3,982,094 acres of second rate land, at 40 cents per 100 acres,	-	-	-	15,928	37
3,526,659 acres of third rate land, at 20 cents per 100 acres,	-	-	-	7,053	31
7,624,881 acres, in all, producing a revenue of	-	-	-	$23,678	44

The actual expense of the representative Government to the Treasury for three years, the time it has existed, has averaged about $13,000 57 per annum, which sum has been applied to the payment of the representatives of the people, the council, auditor, treasurer, attorney general, travelling expenses of the judges, printing, and other contingent expenses. The sums paid by the United States towards the support of this Government are as follows, viz:

To the Governor, (I believe,)	-	-	-	1,200	00
Three judges, $800 each,	-	-	-	2,400	00
One secretary,	-	-	-	800	00

Which, added to the annual expense of the Government, will amount to

Which would be the whole amount of the expense of the Government; and if taken from the annual revenue, will leave a balance in the Treasury of (to meet the additional expense, if any, of a State Government,) $6,277 87

To this sum may be added a sum due the Territory, in the hands of collectors, &c., agreeably to the report of a committee at last session, (page 54 of the Journals,) amounting to 8,977 75

Leaving the sum of $15,255 62

In and due the Treasury, to meet the expenses of a convention, collection of taxes, and other contingent expenses. It will appear, therefore, from the foregoing statement, that the Territory pays nearly equal to the support of a State Government, without enjoying the advantages, and that the present revenue is more than sufficient to support the whole expense of a State Government on tolerably economical principles. Under these circumstances, can it be reasonably supposed that the people in the Northwestern Territory, who have emigrated from the different States in the Union, and who possess similar feelings with their fellow-citizens, prefer the present colonial arbitrary Government to one of their own choice?

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

T. WORTHINGTON.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE, March 1, 1802.

In compliance with the request contained in your note of this morning, I send you, annexed, a statement of all the public lands sold at the Western land-offices, from the commencement of their operation to the 31st December, 1801, in which are included the pre-emption rights to lands contracted for by John Cleves Symmes, so far as deposit money may have been paid to the land-offices for land of that description.

Very respectfully, I am your obedient, humble servant,

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

Sir:

CHILICOTHE, February 12, 1802.

The committee, having received your very pleasing communication of the 26th January last, take this opportunity of rendering you their most cordial thanks for the unremitting attention you have paid to the important concern committed by them to your agency: for, although their confidence in the justice and integrity of the General Government was unshaken, it was still necessary that just representations should be made to enable them to decide with propriety. This, sir, you have done, and for this accept their sincere thanks.

The committee, having considered the request in your communication of the 24th January, relative to instructions on the subject of our assuming an independent form of Government, pleased to hear that the situation of our country is regarded by many of the members of Congress with commiseration, do therefore request and instruct you to exert your influence with that honorable body to effect so desirable an event—an event which, terminating the influence of tyranny, will meliorate the circumstances of thousands, by freeing them from the domination of a despotic chief.

We do not take upon us to prescribe any mode of procedure necessary to be adopted on the occasion. We concur with your suggestion, and, considering ourselves as in a minor state, think it proper to submit the mode of calling a convention, the purposes for which it shall be called, the time when and the place where it shall convene, to that honorable body to whom, we conceive, it of right belongs.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I subscribe myself, (by order of the committee,)

Dear sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES FINLEY, Chairman.

[1st SESSION.]

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 8, 1802.

Mr. DENNIS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 5th of February last, a motion, in the form of two resolutions, of the House, "respecting the adjustment of the existing disputes between the commissioners of the city of Washington and other persons who may conceive themselves injured by the several alterations made in the plan of the said city: also relative to a plan of the said city of Washington, conformably, as nearly as may be, to the original design thereof, with certain exceptions," &c., made the following report:

That many disputes have arisen between the commissioners and proprietors of city property, in consequence of the alterations which, from time to time, have taken place in the plan of the city of Washington. It may not, therefore, be improper for your committee concisely to state the different plans which have existed, or been supposed to exist, for the same; and to present to the view of the House certain documents, explanatory of the nature of the complaints exhibited by individuals against the commissioners for the innovations made, and of the reasons assigned by the commissioners for their own and the conduct of their predecessors. Your committee find that the plan of the city was originally designed by Mr. L'Enfant, but that it was, in many respects, rejected by the President of the United States, and a plan drawn up by Mr. Ellicott, purporting to have been made from actual survey, which recognised the alterations made therein, and which was engraved and published by the order of General Washington, in the year 1792. This plan was circulated by the Government throughout the United States, and sent to our public agents in Europe, by authority of the Government, as the plan of the city, and is the only one which has ever been engraved and published; this is generally known by the appellation of the engraved plan. It was, however, found, on actual survey, that the engraved plan was, in many respects, inaccurate; and that the actual situation of many streets and squares differed so essentially from the situation which they seemed to possess on the face of that plan, that though they appeared on paper to lie some distance from the water, they were found to be situated in the Potomac. This circumstance rendered some deviations from that plan inevitable. In some other cases, grounds originally appropriated to public use have been surveyed into building lots, and divided as such between the United States and the proprietors. In certain other cases, the angles formed by the intersection of streets and avenues, and which seem to be a kind of property which neither comes within the description of streets, public appropriations, nor building lots, (which are the only descriptions of property mentioned in the deeds of trust,) have been surveyed also into building lots, and in some instances divided between the proprietors and the public, and added to the plan of the city. The alterations made, in the instances above enumerated, have been incorporated into the plan of the city, now in the commissioner's office, and this plan has been signed by Mr. Adams; in conformity with which the trustees were directed by him to convey the public grounds to the United States, and is considered by the commissioners as the true plan of the city. This plan has never been engraved or published. In one instance, known to your committee, since the signature of the plan before mentioned by Mr. Adams, viz. in the case of a Mr. Walker, an original proprietor of certain lands within the city, certain angles, formed by the intersection of streets and avenues, have, on his application, been converted into building lots, and divided between him and the commissioners, and been inserted in the plan of the city. It is understood that the commissioners conceive themselves at liberty to proceed in the same manner in all similar cases, and that there are many other cases remaining of the same description. This subject, together with the effect and operation of these angular insertions into the plan of the city, will be fully explained by a recurrence to the protest of one of the commissioners, who, in the case of Mr. Walker, dissented from the principle, together with his letter to General Washington on the subject, and the answer thereto; all of which are subjoined to this report, and are marked C, D, E. In order to give to the House a full view of the nature of the complaints exhibited against the commissioners for the innovations made, and to possess them of the reasons assigned by the commissioners for their own, and the conduct of their predecessors, in relation thereto, your committee have thought proper to exhibit, as a part of their report, the memorial of sundry proprietors, whose names are thereto annexed, presented to Mr. Adams some time in the year 1798, stating the injuries by them respectively received, in consequence of the innovations made, and the statement of the commissioners in relation to that subject, marked A and B.

The trustees have not yet conveyed the public grounds, as directed by the before-mentioned order of Mr. Adams. The reasons by them assigned for not conveying are, that they consider themselves as the agents for the original proprietors as well as for the United States; that justice to those proprietors requires, as well as the interests of the United States, that before they convey it should be fully ascertained what is the true plan of the city, and that the disputes in relation thereto should be previously terminated. Your committee are of opinion that suffering the engraved plan, which is no longer the true plan of the city, to continue to pass as such, may be productive of great deception in purchasers, and that measures ought to be taken for its suppression; that measures ought to be taken also for obtaining from the trustees a conveyance of the streets and other public grounds; and that a plan which, as far as practicable, shall prevent all further innovations, ought to be engraved and published under the direction of the President of the United States. But as it would be improper to publish any other plan until the existing disputes be settled, and a conveyance obtained from the trustees of the public grounds, your committee are of opinion it will be proper to invest in the President the power of compromising any dispute, (if justice shall require it,) by giving to such persons as have been injured by any alteration made other public grounds in lieu of the property so affected. Your committee approve of many of the principles contained in the resolutions referred to them; but, as they think it proper to deviate from them in some respects, they would recommend that they be rejected, and beg leave to offer to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to take such measures as he may deem necessary for obtaining conveyances to the United States of the public grounds in the city of Washington; and that he be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to grant to any individual, whose property may have been injured in consequence of the alterations made in the plan of the city, where, in his opinion, justice or the interests of the United States may require it, other public grounds, in lieu of the grounds so affected; unless, in his opinion, the plan of the city may be so varied as to remove the complaints of such individuals without injury to the city, or affecting the rights of others; in which case, he may authorize a deviation for that purpose.

Resolved, That after having obtained a conveyance, as aforesaid, he cause a plan of the city to be prepared, and such number of copies thereof as he may think proper to be engraved and published, conforming, as nearly as may be, to the plan signed by Mr. Adams, except in the cases contemplated in the foregoing resolution.

A.

The undersigned, proprietors of lands in the city of Washington, beg leave to represent to your excellency certain circumstances relative to that city highly interesting to the United States, to us, and to all who may become purchasers and residents therein.

Conscious as we are of the inestimable value of your time and attention to the objects presented by the present crisis in public affairs, nothing but the most full persuasion of the absolute necessity of the measure could have induced us, at this time, to divert them to the state of the Federal city; yet, from a knowledge of your patriotism, we believe you will more readily excuse this than our omitting to present to your excellency an opportunity of averting an impending evil which threatens the prosperity of one of the most important establishments of the Union.

Surrounded by public business, and pressed by official duties, it is probable that many circumstances relative to this city may have escaped your notice, or have been obliterated by more important impressions; we, therefore, take the liberty of introducing to your notice such of them as, we flatter ourselves, you may think will require the most immediate attention.

Pursuant to the acts of Congress authorizing him thereto, the late President, with that indefatigable zeal which has always marked his attention to the interest of the public, proceeded carefully to examine the country; and, having ascertained the limits of the Federal territory, located the city of Washington agreeably to a design of Mr. L'Enfant, which, for its superior beauties and advantages, met with general approbation and applause.

The original proprietors of the lands included within the city, wishing to promote and insure an object so highly beneficial to themselves and to their country, came to the resolution of making such a donation to the United States as should enable them to erect the buildings necessary for the accommodation of the President and Congress, as also the public offices, in a style adapted to the metropolis of the United States.

By deeds of trust, which the proprietors proceeded immediately to give, the streets within the city were to be conveyed to the United States; such squares or grounds as the President should deem proper to appropriate for public purposes were also to be conveyed to the United States, upon the proprietor receiving at the rate of £25 per acre for the ground so appropriated; the remainder of the lands within the city was to be laid off into squares and lots, one moiety thereof to be subject to sale, and the money arising therefrom to be applied, in the first instance, to the payment for the lands so appropriated as above to public purposes, and the residue thereof to be a donation agreeably to the act of Congress; the other moiety of squares and lots to revert to the original proprietor.

The streets and public appropriations on the plan of the city being very large, and the latter, in addition to their great extensiveness, uniformly in the most beautiful situations, it was thought proper that the proprietors should receive a compensation for these appropriations, exclusive of streets, not considering them as building lots; that compensation was fixed at £25 per acre, and to be paid out of the proceeds of sales made by the public of lots given up by the proprietors. This was considered as securing to the United States ground enough for every public building, and to the citizens the advantages of spacious walks and areas, without too great a sacrifice on the part of the proprietor; although, had they been divided into building lots, it would have been infinitely more beneficial to him; yet, as he received some compensation for his land, and the few lots surrounding these vast areas were enhanced in value, he cheerfully complied therewith, when he considered the advantages in point of health and beauty which the city received therefrom.

Appropriations so extensive in themselves, so conducive to the beauty and health of the city, so gratifying to the public and proprietor, were deemed sacredly devoted to the purposes to which they were designated; yet, notwithstanding that public and private sales have been made on the faith of these appropriations; that those sales have been regulated by their proximity to these appropriations; that they had received every sanction which public opinion and the publication of the plan of the city, under the direction of the President and commissioners, could give; that payments have been made therefor to the proprietors, as appropriations to the sole use of the United States; notwithstanding these circumstances, innovations of the most serious, and to us of the most alarming nature, have been introduced.

The most singular of these innovations we beg leave to present to the view of your excellency, as illustrative of an infinity of cases which must necessarily arise, the right of innovation being admitted. The case we allude to is, the conveyance of a part of the President's square to the Queen of Portugal or her minister, lately made by the commissioners. This conveyance we consider as a most unfortunate circumstance, viewing it as a deviation from the plan of the city, and the intention of the parties on the execution of the deeds of trust. It was certainly never contemplated that appropriations of such great utility, so highly ornamental, so conducive to health, would have been alienated; and we rest assured that the alienation could never have obtained your excellency's sanction had the application been attended with a statement of the preceding facts.

This innovation must certainly never have been contemplated by the proprietors at the time of their executing the deeds of trust, nor since; the letter and spirit of those deeds show evidently what was the intention of the parties at that period. There is an evident distinction drawn in them between public appropriations and private building lots; the fee in the former, with the streets, was to reside and forever continue in the United States; the latter are expressly directed to be sold.

The proprietors, when they relinquished part of their ground as public appropriations, firmly believed that no more would be taken than was deemed proper for the use of the United States, and imagined that the same reasons of necessity, utility, and elegance which would dictate their location would forever prevent their being curtailed. This impression received additional confirmation by a variety of sales effected by the commissioners of lots adjacent to the grounds so appropriated to the United States; at which sales the said appropriations were always mentioned and exhibited as highly appreciating the property to be disposed of. But the official circulation of plans throughout Europe and America, on which plans those appropriations and public areas were designated, was sufficient to have removed any doubt that could possibly have existed.

When it is recollected that a number of the proprietors have, on the confidence they had in the plan of the city, made sale of lots adjacent to these appropriations and open areas, at prices high and proportionate to the supposed advantages arising from their proximity thereto, it is painful to anticipate the inconvenience, the expense, and endless litigation to which they have subjected themselves, should innovations of this nature be admitted. These evils, with additional injuries and injustice, will be extended to purchasers both from the commissioners and proprietors, as the advantages exhibited, which induced the purchase, will no longer exist.

The innovations already introduced have but too fatally tended to destroy that confidence which is inseparably combined with the growth and prosperity of the city; the continued introduction of others must necessarily endanger its very existence; as neither purchasers nor improvers will be found sufficiently adventurous to risk their property on a hope of advantage, the permanency of which is so obviously doubtful. And it is melancholy to reflect that even at this late day, when every energy should be employed in preparations for the reception of the Government of the United States, gentlemen anxious to make improvements are deterred, from an apprehension lest at some future period they be deprived of that which constitutes their present inducement.

The advantages which the United States and the proprietors (who, in that case, would be entitled to a moiety thereof) may derive from the sale or donation of these public appropriations or open areas, ought never to be placed in competition with health, beauty, and magnificence, which were singularly and amply provided for in extensive areas and public squares, adapted to a free circulation of air, elegant gardens, and spacious walks; more confined plans having unfortunately subjected our most flourishing cities to the most dreadful calamities.

We shall now proceed to solicit your excellency's attention to other subjects most intimately connected with the welfare of the city.

The deeds of trust being executed, and some alterations in Major L'Enfant's first plan and design being made at the desire of the late President, commissioners and surveyors were appointed, and the operations in the city commenced.

The President, agreeably to this improved plan of Mr. L'Enfant, declared the appropriations for the Capitol and President's house. Divisions of lots in their vicinity were made between the commissioners and proprietors, and a public sale thereof took place; a great number of persons became purchasers at this sale, and every thing spoke the ardor and sanguine hopes of those interested in the city.

Mr. L'Enfant was succeeded by Major Ellicott in the surveying department; the latter was superseded, and that department devolved on others, perhaps less qualified. It was found that much of the spirit and genius exhibited in the first plans had evaporated, and a dull uniformity, devoid of that elegance which had been so highly praised, had been introduced. An evident derangement of system and perspicuity was observable in that department, and the papers, plans, &c. under their care; which derangement is so far from being rectified, that it was become a source of errors and mistakes, affecting both the public and proprietors. It is now a labyrinth which no man can devolve.

While Mr. Ellicott was surveyor, a plan was engraved by the directions of the commissioners, and a very numerous impression taken therefrom; a number of copies were lodged in the office of the Secretary of State, others with the commissioners, and many dispersed throughout the United States and Europe for sale, and for the information of persons who might incline to become purchasers of the city property. This plan (although it differed in many respects from that by which the first sales were made, and which had been laid before Congress) was generally considered as the final plan of the city; and from that period sales have invariably been made in conformity therewith, under the idea that the sanction under which it issued was a sufficient guaranty of its stability.

By an act of the State of Maryland, the commissioners were enabled to carry the plan of the city into complete execution, and to prohibit docks, slips, buildings on wharves, and other nuisances, which have proved so injurious to other cities of this continent.

With these superlative advantages in the plan of the city, persons interested therein looked forward with hope to the removal of Congress to this place, when they would be clearly and fully displayed.

Unfortunately the plan has, in many instances, either been varied from, or not carried into execution; and, instead of having any fixed and determinate limits to our possessions, which would enable us to improve or make sale thereof, there are several mutilated, unfinished, and discordant plans, which bewilder instead of explaining, and paralyze property to a very large amount, that would otherwise be employed in improving the city.

That your excellency may have a fuller knowledge of the difficulties arising to the proprietors of lands and lots, and to the public, from this unsettled state of things, we shall endeavor to lay a few of them before you.

It has already been observed that there were several alterations made in the plan, between Mr. L'Enfant's first design, and the publishing the last engraved plan in Philadelphia, by the commissioners, and promulgated as the plan of the city. It now remains for us to observe, that, since the publication of that plan, there have been other very material innovations made therein by the surveyors; and many of them we believe without any authority. The discordant, inaccurate, and ill-executed ones, which are in the surveyor's office in this city, we shall not notice; but we cannot avoid mentioning, that the plan lately transmitted to your excellency by the commissioners, as a plan of the city of Washington, and to which your assent has been obtained, is extremely variant from the engraved one; it is incomplete; it is different from that laid off on the ground, and acted upon by the commissioners and proprietors on the division of lots and squares thereon exhibited.

It is variant from the plan published as the plan of the city, in the extent, form, and limits of almost all the public appropriations, in several streets, and in many of the squares to be laid off in building lots. By it some of the streets of the greatest magnitude and importance are allowed to be obstructed in the vicinity of the water, by laying off squares or building grounds across the same, and thereby lessening the utility of the street, preventing the free access of air, and, of course, subjecting the future inhabitants thereof to those malignant disorders which have of late ravaged other commercial towns of the United States.

It is incomplete, inasmuch as the rights and privileges of wharfing and water-lots are not ascertained. That street, which in every former plan circumscribed the city beyond any building lots, and near the channel, and which was intended to promote the intercourse with merchants, and the free conveyance of merchandise along the wharves, open a free passage for air from the water into the different streets and avenues terminating therein, is omitted; and, in many places, a distance of several hundred feet is left to be filled up and occupied by buildings and wharves, at the option of individuals. If the plan is left in this situation, no one can wharf or improve the water property, as he knows not where streets may be introduced; or if it should eventually be permitted that they wharf and build at pleasure, every advantage which the plan of this city had over others is lost, and the United States are voluntarily allowing reservoirs of contagion.

It differs from the plan, as already laid out on the ground, in the position of streets, and the figure and dimensions of squares, already laid off in lots, and divided between the proprietors and the public.

As a further elucidation of this matter, we beg leave to refer your excellency to the plans and other documents, marked No. 4, No. 5, No. 6, which are hereunto annexed.*

When the trustees, to whom the proprietors of the lands within the city of Washington had conveyed their lands, were requested to convey the public appropriations and streets for the use of the United States, had examined and compared the same with the engraved plan, and that on which they were made, very material differences were observed; so great as, in their opinion, to warrant a refusal to convey, lest by so doing they should betray that trust and confidence the proprietors had in their integrity and justice.

From this statement of facts, which the subscribers are confident they can substantiate before your excellency, or any tribunal you may be pleased for that purpose to constitute, we flatter ourselves your excellency will see the necessity of immediately having an accurate and complete plan of the city, properly authenticated and established, and from which there can be no departure, as the only means of restoring public confidence in the city, and of enabling the proprietors to sell and improve their property therein; which plan we humbly conceive may show the limits of the city, and also permanently secure the spacious streets, ample areas, and extensive public appropriations, so conducive, as heretofore frequently observed, of the grand objects we have in view, the health of the citizens, the elegance, utility, and magnificence of the city. We know your excellency will attend to the necessity of defining what water privilege or right of wharfage is attached to the lots on the Eastern Branch, the Potomac river, and Rock creek; also, all such streets as are to be left in wharfing from the shore to the channel of the said waters, and the extent to which those wharves are to be carried; and what ground, so made and filled up, shall be considered as subject to occupancy by buildings. We are equally certain that your excellency will clearly perceive the necessity of convincing the public mind that the appropriations and open areas cannot be diverted to private uses, but must remain sacred, inviolate, and forever considered the property of the United States of America.

Having unsuccessfully attempted to obtain a remedy of the many evils herein detailed from the inferior department, and deeply impressed with the highest confidence in your excellency's disposition to exert every constitutional power vested in you for the benefit, advantage, and happiness of every part of the Union committed to your care, we cheerfully submit to your decision a subject which we humbly conceive is not the least deserving of your notice, amidst the vast variety of objects which at present occupy your unwearied attention.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 10, 1798.

COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, March 23, 1802.

SIR:

We are favored with your letter of the 20th instant, and, in compliance with your request, shall state the principal facts on which you desire information.

Major L'Enfant's plan of the city was sent to the House of Representatives on the 13th December, 1791, by President Washington, for the information of the House, and afterwards withdrawn. Many alterations were made therefrom by Major Ellicott, with the approbation of the President, and under his authority; all the appropriations (except as to the Capitol and President's house) were struck out, and the plan, thus altered, sent to the engravers, intending that work, and the promulgation thereof, to give the final and regulating stamp. These changes from L'Enfant's plan took place in the year 1792, and the published plan appears to have been engraved in October of that year. It has since been pursued in all the operations of the city, under the direction of the commissioners, as far as it was practicable; but the city not having been surveyed, and this plan being made partly from L'Enfant's draughts, and partly from materials possessed by Ellicott, it was probable it would not correspond with an actual mensuration. The commissioners, therefore, on the 9th of April, 1793, made the following order:

"The head of the surveying department is to conduct the field work, and be answerable for its accuracy and despatch. As soon as any square is finished, and marked on the ground, he is to deliver into the Commissioners' Office a certificate in the following form:

"April 10, 1793.—Surveyed square No. —, bounded (enumerating the lines as the truth is.)

"This work is, from time to time, to be added to the large plat, which, being finished, is to be considered as record. It is desired that stoning the squares may keep pace with the work, and the head of the department is to give so much attention to it as to see that the stones be properly placed. In the actual execution of the work, deviations from the plan may, in some instances, be proper. The commissioners do not think there is a propriety of their ordering such, in cases of consequence, at their pleasure. Any remarks on this head will not only be attended to, but are invited, that they may be enabled to obtain the President's order."

The surveyors complied with this order, and whenever a space of ground appeared, by actual survey, to be neither in a street nor public square, it was added to the plan, and divided as building lots, without objection or animadversion, until the year 1796, when it was contemplated to obtain from the President a minute description of the public grounds, and an order for their conveyance. The subject was then brought more immediately into view of the board. The above-recited order, and many of the proceedings under it, had taken place before any of the then commissioners were in office. Some difference of opinion appeared to exist among the commissioners with respect to the appropriations. One of them thought all the spaces of ground which were not designated on the engraved plan, and which were not already under the orders of the former board, divided into building lots, ought to be appropriated to public use; the other two did not concur with him in opinion, yet they agreed to submit the subject to the President, and, accordingly, in a letter, dated 30th November, 1796, write: "The vacant spaces which appear on the plan of the city, at the intersection of the streets and avenues, and which are composed of the streets themselves, and by striking off the points which these intersections necessarily form, so as to give a degree of regularity to the adjacent buildings, we have not considered as squares appropriated to public use; but some of the proprietors now insist that they ought to be paid, not only for the points thus struck off, but for the streets themselves, so far as they pass through those vacant spaces; or that those points should be laid off into building lots. This suggested the propriety of running a street one hundred and sixty feet wide, round each of those spaces, and appropriating the centre to public use, which may be enclosed with handsome palisades, sown with grass, and ornamented with fountains, statues, &c. to the great embellishment of the city, when it becomes populous: this, however, we only suggest, but we believe some decision of the Executive is necessary to silence clamor, and perhaps to prevent litigation." To which the President, on the 26th of December thereafter, answered: "With respect to the claims of individual proprietors, to be compensated for the spaces occasioned by the intersection of streets and avenues, I should conceive that they might, with equal propriety, ask payment for the streets themselves. But the terms of the original contract or cession, if a dispute on that point should arise, must be recurred to; for I presume the opinion of the President in such a case would avail nothing; but if angles are taken off at these spaces, the case is materially altered, and, without designing it, you make a square where none was contemplated, and thereby not only lay the foundation of claim for those angles, but for the space also which is made a square by that act." This letter not containing instructions to include the spaces of ground which were the subjects of it, in the act of appropriation, the draught of an act was prepared and transmitted to the President, describing the grounds which were unanimously agreed to have been reserved for the purpose of appropriation; which draught, after being perused, and in some respects altered, by the Attorney General, received the President's signature; and the commissioners continued to divide such spaces of ground, as did not appear to be included in the streets or public appropriations, which a majority of the board considered themselves bound to do by the terms of the original cession. Those spaces were numerous, and consequently occasioned considerable deviations from the engraved plan. The actual survey had another apparent effect; it occasioned many squares to be laid in the water, being governed by the channel, and to insert other squares between the apparent water-squares and the river; but this was of necessity, or in conformity to the engraved plan. There are other variations from the engraved plan which may require explanation. Squares Nos. 728 and 729, on the engraved plan, appear to recede from 1st street east, whereas, in fact, they are brought up to it. The first form is said to have been given to them before the actual site for the Capitol was known. However that may be, the change seems to have taken place previous to the engraving of the plan, for the squares were divided 10th October, 1792, and must consequently have been laid out some time before—a circumstance which probably escaped Mr. Ellicott's attention when he prepared the plan for the engravers, as he has left those squares nearly as L'Enfant had delineated them. A space appears vacant on the engraved plan south of square No. 104; it is part of Hamburg, a town which was planned previous to the establishment of this city; part of this space was filled up with squares, designated by south of 104, east of 87, and east of 88, in order to compensate the original proprietors of that town, who were entitled to lots equal in value to those given up for public use, and as near as possible to their former possessions; whereas the proprietors of farms were only entitled to twenty-five pounds per acre for similar cessions. It seems probable that these squares were likewise laid off before the plan was engraved, and also escaped Mr. Ellicott's attention, because there were no returns of squares previous to the order of 9th April, 1793; and these squares were among the first that were returned, and by Mr. Ellicott himself, on the 15th June, 1793, forty-one days before the return of squares Nos. 728 and 729, and because the same vacancy appears also on L'Enfant's plan. There are two ranges of squares laid out south of square No. 506, on part of a space which appears vacant on the engraved plan. This was done in the year 1793, by order of the President, on the application of Mr. Notley Young, who complained that too great a portion of his land had been taken for public use; more than twenty acres yet remain to the public. The designation of the bed of one branch of the proposed canal was changed in 1795, by order of the President, and on the application of the adjacent proprietors. This was done because the course designated on the engraved plan would have carried it through high ground, and required much more labor than its present course.

The above changes (except the line of the canal and inserting squares, as before related,) took place before any member of the present board was in office; but we have no doubt of their having been made from pure motives, and by proper authority. We do not find that any individual has complained of sustaining an injury in consequence of the above deviations from the engraved plan. It is true that, in the year 1798, several city proprietors presented a memorial to President Adams, stating that innovations of the most serious and alarming kind had been made in the plan of the city; and mentioning the grant of a site for the minister of Portugal, in the President's square, as the most singular of those innovations. The intention of the memorial was to persuade the President that it was necessary to cause a complete plan of the city, including a water street, to be made and established, so that there could be no departure therefrom. It was referred to the Attorney General, who advised against making a new plan, because the plan to which the President's signature is annexed is sufficiently authenticated, and supercedes all prior plans; against making a plan unalterable, in the sense of the memorialists, because the appropriated grounds may be wanted for one purpose at this time, and for another at a future day; and against making the proposed water street in the present state of the city funds, because it was more necessary to build houses than to reclaim land out of the water. Upon this opinion the prayer of the memorial was rejected; and, as it contained a censure on the conduct of the commissioners, it was, with all the papers accompanying it, by order of the President, sent to them for such observations as they might deem proper, either with respect to themselves or the public interest. With regard to the first, they deemed it unnecessary to do more than explicitly to deny the whole: with respect to the second, considering the Government as implicated in the grant to the Queen of Portugal, they explained the transaction. The measure of granting sites for the residence of foreign ministers was warmly recommended by President Washington, and approved by President Adams, before any steps were taken by the commissioners to carry it into effect. President Washington, himself, pointed out the spot granted to the Queen of Portugal as a proper site for the residence of a foreign minister; and Mr. Adams delivered letters from the commissioners, making the offer to all the ministers of friendly Powers near the United States; and endorsed his approbation of the deed to the Queen of Portugal after it was executed. But the Attorney General, on hearing the objection, was of opinion that Congress alone were competent to make the grant—an idea which had never occurred to either of the Presidents, or to any of the commissioners. We know but one instance of a complaint of injury arising from a difference between L'Enfant's and the engraved plan; that is the case of Samuel Davidson: he alleges that L'Enfant's plan ought to be considered as the plan of the city; and that, agreeably to it, he would be entitled to additional property in the President's square. His case, as stated by himself, was transmitted to President Washington, who, in a letter to the commissioners, dated 20th February, 1797, says, "That many alterations have been made from L'Enfant's plan by Major Ellicott, with the approbation of the Executive, is not denied; that some were deemed essential, is avowed; and, had it not been for the materials which he happened to possess, it is probable that no engraving from L'Enfant's draughts ever would have been exhibited to the public; for, after the disagreement took place between him and the commissioners, his obstinacy threw every difficulty in the way of its accomplishment. To this summary may be added, that Mr. Davidson is mistaken if he supposes that the transmission of Major L'Enfant's plan of the city to Congress was the completion thereof; so far from it, it will appear, by the message which accompanied the same, that it was given as matter of information only, to show what state the business was in, and the return of it requested; that neither House of Congress passed any act consequent thereupon; that it remained, as before, under the control of the Executive; that, afterwards, several errors were discovered and corrected, many alterations made, and the appropriations, except as to the Capitol and President's house, struck out under that authority before it was sent to the engraver, intending that work, and the promulgation thereof, were to give the final and regulating stamp." Upon the receipt of this letter the commissioners rejected the application; Mr. Davidson, however, made a similar application to President Adams, without success; also to the present President, the event of which we have not heard. With respect to the refusal of the trustees to convey the public property, it is to be observed that President Washington's act directing the conveyance, in the hurry of business at the conclusion of his administration, was not annexed to the plan as the instrument expressed. The trustees made that circumstance a pretext for their refusal; one of them, Mr. Ganit, saying, if the instrument were annexed to the plan he would execute the conveyance, after giving Mr. Davidson notice of his intention in time to obtain an injunction. This he considered himself under honorary obligations to do. The plan and President Washington's act were sent to President Adams, who directed Washington's act to be annexed to the plan, and, by an act of his own, repeated the order to convey. When the trustees were notified of this, Mr. Ganit showed a letter, signed by Mr. Davidson and some other city proprietors, forbidding the trustees to convey, and promising indemnity in case of refusal. The Attorney General was then applied to for advice, who was of opinion that the property was as effectually vested in the United States as if it were formally conveyed; had he been of a different opinion, compulsory measures would have been taken to obtain a conveyance. The trustees allege that the description of the appropriations does not agree with the plan to which it refers. In this they are incorrect; it agrees with the utmost precision. From this view of the subject, it is obvious that the trustees act in some degree under the influence of the proprietors. Let us examine their object: Mr. Davidson's object, it already appears, is to obtain additional property within the President's square. Mr. Carroll's object is to obtain a declaration from Government that there never shall be any buildings erected on the Capitol square, in front of his houses; he has also claimed payment for the streets round the appropriations on his land, and for the bed of the proposed canal; and it is an opinion, generally prevalent among the proprietors, that the Government is not, or at least ought not to be, at liberty to exercise the full rights of property over the appropriated grounds, notwithstanding they have received the agreed price for them; and a declaration of this principle is included in their demand of an unalterable plan. We have now stated the principal alterations which have been made in the plans of the city, and the causes of them; also the objections of the trustees to convey the public property. If ungratified demands, which have been rejected by the President, as well as by the commissioners, are to be considered as existing disputes between the proprietors and commissioners, we believe they likewise are all stated. It may be proper, however, to mention that no dispute can arise in matters cognizable by the commissioners which the President is not competent to determine; and that the commissioners never have determined a matter of importance against an applicant without the unequivocal sanction of the Executive. If, indeed, the commissioners, whether with or without the sanction of the Executive, should refuse a matter of right, the laws of the country are open; to them we presume it would be much more proper to recur, than to establish a tribunal with undefined powers to determine the disputes of a few dissatisfied individuals.

MAY 22, 1799.

Finding that the board are disposed, on the motion of George Walker, to lay off several small squares, some of which do not contain one lot and a half, by which the intention of the late President, in keeping open the junction of large avenues, will be contravened, William Thornton moves (before they decide upon a measure which may, and he believes will, materially injure the general plan of the city, and establish a principle, which, by extending to every other similarly situated space, may do essential injury to individuals who have purchased under an impression that such spaces were meant to be left open) that the board postpone their decision till the opinion of the President of the United States can be obtained, whether it will be proper to lay out these small triangles into building lots, or, by declaring them public appropriations, shall direct payment for the same.

This motion having been made, the board declared that they would not postpone the determination unless it was by the consent of the said George Walker, who, being present, said he would not consent to such a reference, as he would never agree to take at the rate of £25 per acre (the sum the President is authorized to give for ground condemned for public appropriations) for ground that would command ten cents per square foot. In consequence of which, the board proceeded to lay out and divide the following squares or parcels of land, viz: north of 962, east of 1015, south of 1062, west of 1092, and south of 1039; to which William Thornton does now solemnly protest, thinking the board have assumed a power not delegated by the President.

N. B.—These squares were divided, but the board consented to let them remain unsigned for the present.

D.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, May 31, 1799.

Sir:

Finding that the board of commissioners were exceedingly urged by Mr. George Walker to lay off and divide certain small portions of ground within the lines of his property, between the intersection of various avenues and streets, which do not appear in the general plan of the city to have ever been designed for private occupancy, and, perceiving the board were disposed to adopt the proposal, I declared the measure expressly contrary to the intention of the late President of the United States, and accordingly wrote a formal protest, setting forth the injury that the city would sustain by admitting a principle which would induce every proprietor to make similar claims, and requested that the board would not sanction the divisions, by signature, until the opinion of the late President should be fully known; if any hesitation remained on the minds of my colleagues, after the perusal of your letters of the 26th December, 1796, and the 27th of February, 1797. Those letters explain clearly, in my opinion, the sentiments I have repeatedly heard you express; but, lest your meaning may be misconstrued, in a point so essential to the future benefit of the city, I request you will pardon me for making so free as to solicit a further declaration of your former opinions, if they can be more explicit. There is, perhaps, one point that may be considered as omitted. I mean the declaration of those portions as appropriations; for although many of them are very small, not containing a standard lot, and, if occupied by private individuals, might justly be considered as nuisances; yet, if appropriated to public use, they would not only be highly useful, but also ornamental, as they would serve for churches, temples, infirmaries, public academies, dispensaries, markets, public walks, fountains, statues, obelisks, &c.; and, if the whole were to be paid for as appropriations, they amount to only three hundred and eighty-one thousand six hundred and eighty-three square feet, or eight acres, at £25 making £200. The only doubt remaining on the minds of the commissioners relative to these portions of ground, was the power of non-insertion; but it appears to me that their not having been inserted, leaves them exactly in the same predicament as the other portions of the city intended for appropriations, but neither yet expressly designated as appropriations, nor even as reservations. They may be considered as reservations, because the points of squares have been cut off, and these latter, therefore, are rendered, by your declaration of 26th of December, 1796, subject to payment, and consequently to public appropriation. If no objection can be made to this, which, indeed, is warranted by the deeds of trust, surely less validity must be given to objections against the adoption of areas, heretofore considered only as streets which, by adoption, will be paid for and rendered highly useful and ornamental. If any objection can arise, it has been justly observed in your letter, last quoted, that they might with equal propriety ask payment for the streets, for these spaces differ in nothing from the avenues but in extent, and every avenue might, by a parity of claim, be reduced to a street, or be charged to the public.

No individual has ever contended for the insertion of these irregular portions, except Mr. George Walker; but the principle being admitted, the right will be universally claimed. Many have sold lots fronting on these open spaces; the map of the city has been published without them; and complaints of injustice will certainly be made by persons who have already purchased, if these spaces be filled up by private lots; besides, these insertions not accompanying the maps now dispersed, strangers might be liable to continual impositions, by purchasing lots apparently on open areas on the map, but in reality only fronting stables or greater nuisances; for these lots are too small to admit of houses all round and conveniences within; so that it appears not only against the plan of the city to insert them, (unless for public appropriations, which I should advocate,) but it would be highly unjust to individuals, as well those who may purchase, as those who have become proprietors; and it would materially injure the convenience of the city, by occupying, for private purposes, those places so easy of access and so necessary for the public.

I have the honor to be, sir, with sincere regard, your very respectful friend, &c.,

WILLIAM THORNTON.

General WASHINGTON.

E.

SIR:

FEDERAL CITY, June 1, 1799.

In replying to your favor of yesterday's date, I must beg leave to premise, that when I left the chair of Government, it was with a determination not to intermeddle in any public matter which did not immediately concern me; and that I have felt no disposition since to alter this determination.

But as you have requested that I would give you my ideas on a certain point which seems to have occupied the attention of the board of commissioners, and on which I presume my letters to that body (whilst I had the honor to administer the Government) have not been so clear and explicit as it was my intention to be, I have no hesitation in declaring (unless I have entirely forgotten all recollection of the fact) that it has always been my invariable opinion, and remains still to be so, that no departure from the engraved plan of the city ought to be allowed, unless imperious necessity should require it, or some great public good is to be promoted thereby.

Minor considerations contribute to this opinion; but the primary, and to my mind an unanswerable one, is, that after the original plan (with some alterations) had been adopted, ordered to be engraved and published, and was transmitted to several if not to all our public agents abroad, for the purpose of inviting purchasers, it would, for reasons too obvious and cogent to require illustration, be deceptive to lay off lots for private purposes, where none appeared in a plan which was intended to inform, aid, and direct the judgment of foreigners, and others, who could not on the premises make a choice.

It is not difficult to form an opinion of the ways of thinking and views of others by one's own, under similar circumstances; I shall declare, then, without reserve, that if I had made choice of a site for a house on an open area in the published map, occasioned by the intersection of avenues, and an angle thereof should afterwards be filled up in a manner I might not approve, I should not scruple to complain of both the deception and injury.

But I am straying from my purpose, which was no more than simply to say, (if I am not, as before mentioned, greatly forgetful,) that I have never had but one opinion on this subject, and that is, that nothing ought to justify a departure from the engraved plan, but the probability of some great public benefit, or unavoidable necessity.

With great esteem and regard, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

DISQUALIFICATION OF JOHN P. VAN NESS, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 11, 1803.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee of Elections, who were instructed, by a resolution of the House of the 29th ultimo, "to inquire whether John P. Van Ness, one of the members of this House from the State of New York, returned by said State to serve as one of its members in the seventh Congress of the United States, has not, since his election as a member of this House, and since he occupied a seat as a member, accepted of and exercised the office of a major of militia under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia, and thereby forfeited his right to a seat as a member of this House," made the following report:

That, from the free concession and agreement of the said member, it appears to your committee that he has accepted and exercised the office of a major of the militia under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia; and that a paragraph in the sixth section of the first article of the constitution, which expressly provides, that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House, during his continuance in office, does, in the opinion of your committee, render the acceptance and exercise of the office aforesaid incompatible with the holding, at the same time, of a seat in this House.

Your committee, therefore, ask leave to submit to the House the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That John P. Van Ness, one of the members of this House, having accepted and exercised the office of major of militia under the authority of the United States within the Territory of Columbia, hath thereby forfeited his right to a seat as a member of this House.

[2d SESSION.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 25, 1803.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

JANUARY 24, 1803.

I transmit a report by the superintendent of the city of Washington on the affairs of the city committed to his care. By this you will perceive that the resales of lots prescribed by an act of the last session of Congress did not produce a sufficiency to pay the debt to Maryland, to which they were appropriated; and, as it was evident that the sums necessary for the interest and instalments due to that State could not be produced by a sale of the other public lots, without an unwarrantable sacrifice of the property, the deficiencies were of necessity drawn from the treasury of the United States.

The office of surveyor for the city, created during the former establishment, being of indispensable necessity, it has been continued; and to that of the superintendent, substituted instead of the board of commissioners, at the last session of Congress, no salary was annexed by law. These offices being permanent, I have supposed it more agreeable to principle that their salaries should be fixed by the Legislature, and therefore have assigned them none. Their services to be compensated are from the 1st day of June last.

The marshal of the District of Columbia has, as directed by law, caused a jail to be built in the city of Washington. I enclose his statements of the expenses already incurred, and of what remains to be finished. The portion actually completed has rendered the situation of the persons confined much more comfortable and secure than it has been heretofore.

TH: JEFFERSON.

SIR:

SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON, December 20, 1802.

Pursuant to the sixth section of the act of Congress of last session entitled "An act to abolish the board of commissioners in the city of Washington, and for other purposes," and under your direction of the 16th of June last, I proceeded, with all possible diligence, to prepare a statement of all the lots of the description in the said section mentioned; and on the 19th of that month advertised the same for sale on the 30th day of August then next ensuing; which advertisement was published according to law; and on the day appointed the said sale commenced, and was continued, by adjournment, until the 29th day of October last; during which time the whole of the said lots were sold, and produced the sum of $26,848 10; of which I paid away, agreeably to the fourth section of the above-recited act of Congress, the sum of $2,249 03, (together with $2,563 85, which arose out of other funds of the city,) for debts which had been contracted by the late commissioners, in their capacity as such, the payment whereof was not specially provided for by the aforesaid act of Congress; and the balance, to wit, $24,599 07, was applied, as directed by the said act of Congress, towards the payment of the loan of $50,000 by the State of Maryland.

It may not be improper here to mention that very few, if any, of these lots produced, by the resale thereof, the amount of the original purchase money due thereon; that the deficiency is very considerable, and that it is not probable the debtors will be able to pay more than about $10,000 thereof. Some, however, who are deemed able to pay, contend that they cannot be compelled to make payment, because, they say, the act of the Maryland Legislature of 1793, chap. 53, which authorizes a resale in case of default in payment, does not admit of reselling more than once; and that, if the power of resale be exercised, the original purchaser is not bound for any deficiency, as the public or city agent had a choice of two remedies, to wit, a suit or release; and, having elected to resell, they have not a right to use both remedies, and to resort to a suit for the deficiency. This doctrine is particularly insisted on in the case of an endorser of the note of a deceased purchaser, at a resale; in which case a second resale has been made, and a considerable deficiency has in consequence happened. The endorser now says he is ready and willing to pay the amount due on the lots, as purchased by his principal, upon the same being conveyed for his indemnity. Before I adopt any compulsory measure on this subject, I have supposed it to be proper to submit the circumstances for the consideration and opinion of the proper law officer, and to pray the instructions of the President in the premises.

The number of lots which were thrown into the market at the public sale, directed by the act of Congress before recited, being much greater than the demand, and the positive and unconditional obligation imposed by that act of Congress to sell the whole of them within a limited time, not only subjected those lots to great sacrifices and disadvantages in the sale thereof, but has also materially injured the private sales of all the other public lots, in the sale of which the President might exercise his discretion. Of this description of lots, however, I have sold five, which have produced $1,531 43, cash.

In my accounts from 1st June last to the 1st ultimo, prepared for the Treasury Department, it appears that, in addition to the receipts and expenditures hereinbefore stated, I have received—

From the late board of commissioners, being the balance which remained in their hands when the commission ceased, 1st June last,	$ 110 59
For lots purchased prior to 6th May, 1796, voluntarily paid by the purchasers before the public sale on 30th August last,	1,274 28
For balance of purchase money for lots sold by the commissioners since 6th May, 1796,	109 93
And from sundry persons, for small balances which were due to the city on accounts other than for lots sold,	320 73
Making	$1,815 53

Which has been expended as follows, viz: $374 60 for expenses attending the aforesaid public sale of lots; and $408 51 for other expenses necessarily incurred in the execution of the duties of the office of superintendent; the balance, to wit, $1,032 42, is included in the sum of $2,563 85, hereinbefore stated to have been paid for debts contracted by the commissioners.

The receipts and expenditures since 1st ultimo amount to $36 80 only.

The debts now due to the city, and considered as good, exclusive of the deficiencies on the lots resold for default of payment, amount to upwards of $13,000. Of these deficiencies it is thought (as is before stated) the debtors will be able to pay about $10,000. The property of the city, (besides the debts,) as stated in the representations of the late commissioners to the President, on 28th January, 1801, and 4th December, 1801, estimating the lots at the average prices of those previously sold under the condition of improvement, (which were much lower than the unconditional sales by individuals,) amounted to $884,819 88, out of which lots have been since sold to the amount of $9,886 24 only, for about the prices at which they were estimated.

Besides the debts and property before mentioned, there is due to the city (including interest) upwards of $100,000; $80,000 (principal) whereof is for the one thousand lots mentioned in the commissioners' representations to have been conveyed to Messrs. Morris and Greenleaf, under the circumstances therein particularly detailed, and concerning which a bill has been filed in the high Court of Chancery of the State of Maryland. The balance, between 4 and $5,000 principal, is due for valuable water lots, originally bought by James Greenleaf, and resold in the usual manner for default of payment, and for which the second purchaser has always been ready to pay the purchase money, but has been prevented by an injunction of the Chancellor of Maryland, on a bill filed by Mr. Greenleaf's trustee. This bill, as well as that filed with regard to the one thousand lots, is still pending, and the counsel for the city are of opinion the decisions in both cases will be favorable to the public interest.

The debts due and to become due from the city (except for the advances from the Treasury of the United States, and the two loans by the State of Maryland, of $100,000 each) are very inconsiderable; and it is hoped that the large fund hereinbefore stated (by the future sales of the property being made commensurate only with the demand therefor, agreeably to the provision contained in the 5th section of the before-recited act of Congress) will not only be adequate to the indemnity of the Government for its liberal patronage, but will also yield a surplus for the use of the city.

The state of the public buildings, directed to be reported, is the same as at the last session of Congress, or not materially changed. The private buildings, then seven hundred and thirty-five in number, have since increased a few more than one hundred.

The before-mentioned representations of the commissioners in January and December, 1801, and the documents accompanying them, which were laid before Congress, being very full and minute on the affairs of the city, prior to their respective dates, I beg leave to refer to them; but if there be any thing which you, sir, deem necessary, and which those representations and the present do not embrace, it will afford me much pleasure to communicate it.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS MUNROE.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, January 21, 1803.

I now enclose you the account and copies of the contract and bill of particulars respecting the jail directed at the last session of Congress to be built in this city.

Although every effort was made to complete the plan adopted for the sum appropriated, it could not be done; it was then determined to finish only certain parts of the building, and to keep the amount for such as should be finished within the appropriation. Messrs. Huddleston and Nesmith contracted to complete all the building except the interior of the west wing and the iron grated doors, which were at first contemplated to be put in for the sum of $7,426; and Mr. George Hadfield, whose plan was adopted, was appointed to superintend the erection of the building. An estimate of the sum necessary to complete the west wing in the same manner as the east wing is herewith transmitted, which amounts to the sum of $2,577, leaving out all the iron grated doors. If a kitchen should be built, (and one is absolutely necessary,) the further sum of about $300 will be wanted.

The contractors have completed their work, except a few articles, which will be done. In the sixth article of the contract, it is stipulated, that such alterations or additions to the mode of building the jail as could not be adjusted by the parties, were to be left to reference; some alterations were considered as proper, and directed by the superintendent, and one respecting the cell doors was directed by me. The contractors claim for extra work the sum of $1,098; on this subject, however, there is a considerable difference between the superintendent and them. They claim for many things as extra work which he does not admit to be extra. There is also a difference of opinion between them on the amount of the deduction that ought to be made in the iron work. If he is correct in his opinion, there remains the sum of $449 for extra work only to be examined, which will be seen by a reference to his letter to me, a copy of which is sent. The contractors, under the sixth article of the contract, claim a right of reference upon those subjects. If all these claims should be established, and Congress determine to finish the jail and build the kitchen, the sum of $3,702 66, in addition to the sum of $272 34 of the sum appropriated, which is in hand, will be requisite.

When I appointed Mr. Hadfield the superintendent, I agreed to give him for his services the sum of $200, and this is the amount of his claim against me; but he states that he thinks this sum too small a compensation for his trouble. He has, in drawing plans, making out bills of particulars and estimates, and superintending the work, been closely engaged for seven months, so that two dollars per day for his services cannot be thought unreasonable; and I must do Mr. Hadfield the justice to say, that I think the sum of $200 is not a sufficient compensation for his trouble, and I believe he has been very attentive. If it should be thought proper to come up to Mr. Hadfield's idea, the sum of $220 more will be wanted on his account.

With sentiments of the highest respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

DANIEL C. BRENT.

The PRESIDENT.

SIR:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, January 19, 1803.

The new jail is now ready for your reception, as completed agreeable to contract, except in a few articles, which the present season has prevented being done, and which, by agreement, may be finished at any future period; for which purpose I shall note them hereafter. The building, I presume, is executed throughout with fidelity to the contract; the execution is plain, but the work is strong, substantial, and firm.

An expense for some extra articles has unavoidably accrued, either for work which has been thought greatly advantageous to the building, or other contingencies not to be foreseen but during the progress of a building; in consequence of which, and also of a clause in the contract providing for additional work, the contractors bring in an extra claim of $962; $253 of which I reject as unfounded; the remainder $709 are for iron work, and other articles ordered for reasons as above mentioned; a deduction in your favor must be made for the omission of the iron frames, which I calculate ought not to amount to less than $260; in which case the remaining sum for extras to be examined would be $449.

I presume, sir, that if you approve of the building, you might receive it, and close the contract with the undertakers, to prevent delay, leaving the business of extra claims to any time afterwards.

I remain your obedient servant,

D. C. BRENT, Esq.

GEORGE HADFIELD.

JUDGES REMOVED FROM OFFICE BY LEGISLATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 28, 1803.

Mr. MORRIS, from the committee to whom was referred the memorials of Judges Richard Basset, Egbert Benson, Benjamin Bourne, William Griffith, Samuel Hitchcock, Philip B. Key, C. Magill, Jeremiah Smith, G. K. Taylor, William Tilghman, and Oliver Wolcott, made the following report:

That the petitioners were judges of certain courts, inferior to the Supreme Court, constituted by an act of the 13th of February, 1801, and duly commissioned to hold their offices during good behavior.

That while holding and exercising their offices, an act was passed on the 8th of March last, to repeal the said act of the 13th of February, 1801, and transfer the duties of the said judges from them to others.

That a question has arisen, whether by reason of the premises, the said petitioners be deprived of their offices.

That this question, depending on the construction of the laws and constitution of the United States, is not properly cognizable by the Senate.

Your committee, therefore, conceive it improper either to give reasons or express opinions. But they consider it as a question of high and serious import, and believe that a speedy investigation and final decision is of great moment to the commonwealth.

Wherefore they submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, to be filed by the Attorney General against Richard Bassett, one of the said petitioners, for the purpose of deciding judicially on their claims.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled: The undersigned most respectfully submit the following representation and memorial:

By an act of Congress, passed on the 13th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," certain judicial offices were created, and courts established, called circuit courts of the United States.

In virtue of appointments made under the constitution of the United States, the undersigned became vested with the offices so created, and received commissions authorizing them to hold the same, with the emoluments thereunto appertaining, during their good behavior.

During the last session, an act of Congress passed, by which the above-mentioned law was declared to be repealed; since which no law has been made for assigning to your memorialists the execution of any judicial functions, nor has any provision been made for the payment of their stipulated compensations.

Under these circumstances, and finding it expressly declared in the constitution of the United States, that "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office," the undersigned, after the most deliberate consideration, are compelled to represent it as their opinion, that the rights secured to them by the constitution, as members of the judicial department, have been impaired.

With this sincere conviction, and influenced by a sense of public duty, they most respectfully request of Congress to review the existing laws which respect the offices in question; and to define the duties to be performed by the undersigned, by such provisions as shall be consistent with the constitution, and the convenient administration of justice.

The right of the undersigned to their compensations they sincerely believe to be secured by the constitution, notwithstanding any modification of the judicial department, which, in the opinion of Congress, public convenience may recommend. This right, however, involving a personal interest, will cheerfully be submitted to judicial examination and decision, in such manner as the wisdom and impartiality of Congress may prescribe.

That judges should not be deprived of their offices or compensations, without misbehavior, appears to the undersigned to be among the first and best established principles in the American constitutions; and in the various reforms they have undergone it has been preserved and guarded with increased solicitude.

On this basis the constitution of the United States has laid the foundation of the judicial department, and expressed its meaning in terms equally plain and peremptory.

This being the deliberate and solemn opinion of the undersigned, the duty of their stations requires that they should declare it to the Legislative body. They regret the necessity which compels them to make the representation; and they confide that it will be attributed to a conviction that they ought not voluntarily to surrender rights and authorities intrusted to their protection, not for their personal advantage, but for the benefit of the community.

[2d SESSION.

STATE OF OHIO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 2, 1803.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom were referred a letter from Edward Tiffin, president of the convention of the State of Ohio, and a letter from Thomas Worthington, special agent of the said State, enclosing the constitution thereof, together with sundry propositions in addition to, and in modification of, those contained in the act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," made the following report:

That the ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposing of land in the Western Territory, passed by Congress on the 20th day of May, 1785, establishes the principle of reserving one thirty-sixth part of the lands sold for the use of schools. That to this principle, equally liberal and wise, your committee believe it a sound policy to adhere, and to extend it wherever practicable. They are aware of the objection that the right of soil in the tract of country commonly called the Connecticut reserve, having been ceded by Congress without any valuable consideration, and no reservation having been made for the support of schools therein, the inhabitants of that portion of the State of Ohio have not equal claims on the bounty of Congress with those who, having purchased their lands of the United States, have contributed large sums to the public treasury. But if it be recollected that the actual settlers are not, generally, those that have been enriched by that extraordinary donation, but purchasers under them, and at prices, it is believed, not inferior to those received for the public lands, and that whilst they are burdened with their full proportion of their expense of the State Government, they are cut off from an equal participation of the benefits enjoyed by their fellow-citizens; when, moreover, it is considered that the provision for schools embraces not the emolument of individuals, but the interests of morality and learning, the committee are of opinion that Congress will perceive the propriety of acceding to a proposition, the tendency of which is to cherish and confirm our present happy political institutions and habits. This last consideration applies equally to the United States' military tract, to the military reservation of Virginia, and to lands which may hereafter be acquired from the Indian tribes.

No objection suggests itself, why the lands which are or may be appropriated for the use of schools within the State of Ohio should not be vested in the Legislature of that State, in trust for that purpose.

The appropriation offered in the third proposition of the act enabling the people within the limits of the present State of Ohio to become a co-equal member of the Union, originating in the belief that it would at once enhance the value of the public lands, and cement more strongly together the various interests of the confederacy, it is believed that these desirable objects will be equally promoted by applying a portion of the proceeds (so offered to be appropriated) to the opening and repairing roads within the State of Ohio.

The provision contained in the sixth section of the seventh article of the constitution of the State of Ohio, respecting the northern boundary of that State, depending on a fact not yet ascertained, and not being submitted in the shape of the other propositions from the convention to Congress, the committee have thought it unnecessary to take it at this time into consideration.

In relation to the grant to John Cleves Symmes and his associates, of one complete township, in trust, for the use of an academy and other seminaries of learning, the committee recommend the adoption of a plan suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter hereto subjoined, to which they beg leave generally to refer; and they respectfully submit the following resolutions, in addition to, and in modification of, the propositions contained in the act entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," passed the 30th day of April, 1802:

1. Resolved, That a donation, equal to one thirty-sixth part of the amount of the lands in the United States' military tract, within the State of Ohio, be made for the support of schools within that tract.

2. Resolved, That a donation, equal to one thirty-sixth part of the county of Trumbull, be made out of the lands within the United States' military tract, for the support of schools within the said county of Trumbull.

3. Resolved, That a donation, equal to one thirty-sixth part of the Virginia reservation, so far as the unlocated lands within that reservation (after the warrants issued by that State shall have been first satisfied) will supply the same, be made for the support of schools in the district contained between the Scioto and Miami rivers.

4. Resolved, That a like provision for the use of schools be made out of any lands which may hereafter be acquired from the Indian tribes.

5. Resolved, That the lands which now are, or hereafter may be, appropriated to the use of schools within the State of Ohio, be vested in the Legislature thereof, in trust for that object.

6. Resolved, That not less than three-fifths of the sum offered to be appropriated by Congress for the opening of roads from the western to the Atlantic waters, shall be appropriated under the direction of the State of Ohio, for the laying out of roads within that State.

7. Resolved, That in lieu of the township proposed to be granted for the use of an academy, by the act passed the 5th day of May, 1792, there be granted to the State of Ohio, for the purposes described in that act, one other entire township within the district of Cincinnati: provided that the State of Ohio shall relinquish to the United States all their claim, under the act aforesaid, against the said John C. Symmes.

8. Resolved, That these propositions shall depend on the compliance by the State of Ohio with the provisions of the third proposition and second section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," passed the 30th day of April, 1802.

SIR:

The committee to whom were referred sundry propositions submitted by the convention of the State of Ohio, to the Congress of the United States, have instructed me to request of you information on the following points:

1. The gross amount of lands comprised within the United States' military tract.

2. Whether, through default of John Cleves Symmes, the intention of the United States to endow an academy or other public school with one entire township, hath been frustrated?

3. How far the purchasers under the aforesaid Symmes are bound to make good the said township, or the value thereof.

4. Whether the United States are bound to furnish an equivalent; and, if not,

5. How far it may be a matter of policy to comply with the proposition of the convention on that subject.

And such other information touching those propositions, generally, which the Secretary of the Treasury may deem expedient to lay before the committee.

With perfect consideration, I am, sir, yours,

JOHN RANDOLPH, JUN. Chairman of the Committee.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Secretary of the Treasury.

SIR:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 13, 1803.

The gross amount of lands within the United States' military tract is computed at two million five hundred and thirty-nine thousand one hundred and ten acres; one thirty-sixth part of which, if appropriated for schools in conformity to the proposition of the convention of the State of Ohio, will amount to seventy thousand five hundred and thirty-one acres. The grants already made within that tract amount to one million eighty-one thousand two hundred and seventy acres, which, supposing the school appropriation to take place, will leave one million three hundred and eighty-seven thousand three hundred and nine acres therein for the future disposition of Congress.

If the modifications proposed by the convention shall be acceded to, it will be necessary to define the manner in which the above-mentioned seventy thousand five hundred and thirty-one acres, as well as the sections to be given for the use of schools in those fractional townships containing less than three-fourths of an entire township, and in which the section No. 16 has been disposed of, shall be located. There are but thirty-seven such fractional townships in which that section did exist, and only twelve such sections have been sold. The mode of designating an equal number of sections in lieu thereof is not, therefore, material.

The seventy thousand five hundred and thirty-one acres in the military tract may be designated by directing that as many quarter-townships (which quarters in that tract contain four thousand acres each) as will make up the whole amount, shall be selected by lot; and the same mode may be extended to the designation of the lands which Congress may assign for the use of schools in the Connecticut reserve. But if it shall be thought proper to give an agency in the selection to the State, it will be necessary to limit the time within which that agency shall be exercised, and to provide, in case of failure on their part, for another mode of designating the land.

As the request made by the convention for certain lands in lieu of the township granted to J. C. Symmes and his associates for an academy, is no part of the modifications proposed to the original propositions of Congress, an immediate decision may not be necessary; and it seems proper and just that measures should, in the first place, be taken for the recovery of that township which was granted in trust to J. C. Symmes and his associates, and which, at all events, ought not to be applied to their private use since they did not pay for it. The difficulty, in this case, arises from the following circumstances:

J. C. Symmes had originally applied for two millions of acres, and it had then been contemplated to give him a township for the use of an academy. The contract was, however, made with the Board of Treasury, (in 1787,) by his attorneys Messrs. Dayton and March, for only one million of acres, and no grant or promise of an academy or college township was inserted in it.

In 1792, Congress directed that a township for that purpose should be included in the grant of lands to be made to said Symmes and his associates; and a patent accordingly issued, under date of 30th September, 1794, for a tract containing three hundred and eleven thousand six hundred and eighty-two acres, reserving five sections in each township for certain purposes; and further declaring, "that one complete township, or tract of land of six miles square, to be located with the approbation of the Governor for the time being of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, and within the term of five years, as nearly as may be, in the centre of the tract herein granted, has been and is granted, and shall be holden in trust to and for the sole and exclusive intent and purpose of erecting and establishing therein an academy and other public schools and seminaries of learning, and endowing and supporting the same, and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatever."

At the time when the patent was granted there was, as Mr. Symmes states, but one entire township within its bounds; some sections having been sold in every other township because he had not contemplated such reservation, and that one entire township remained so, only because it had been reserved by Mr. Symmes for himself and his associates. He applied, in 1798, to Governor St. Clair, in order to obtain his approbation to the location of that township, in conformity to the words of the patent. Although there does not really appear to have existed any other unsold township at the time, the Governor refused his assent, because that offered was, in his opinion, of inferior quality, and not in the centre of the patent, and because a part of it was claimed by Elias Boudinot, one of Judge Symmes's associates. Since that time, it is understood that one half of that township has been sold under judgments obtained against Mr. Symmes; the other undivided half is said to be still claimed by Mr. Boudinot under articles of agreement, dated before the date of the contract of Mr. Symmes with the Board of Treasury; and by which the last-mentioned person agreed that he would, after he had received a title from the United States, convey to Mr. Boudinot, as his associate in the intended purchase, a part of the same.

As the patent is in the name of J. C. Symmes and his associates, it is not believed that the claim of any of the associates, as such, can affect the title of the public against them as trustees; but in what manner they shall be compelled to execute the trust is the question to be decided.

Perhaps Congress, at the same time that they shall direct legal measures to be taken for the recovery and due application of the land, might provide, that, if J. C. Symmes and his associates shall pay to the United States the original purchase money (two-thirds of a dollar per acre) for that township, with interest from the date of the patent, they shall be released from the execution of the trust, and the township confirmed to them for their own use; and they might also designate another entire township in the Cincinnati district, and as near to the Miami and Ohio as practicable, to be given in lieu of the other, in case either this should not be recovered, or J. C. Symmes and his associates should pay for it on the above-mentioned terms.

Permit me to suggest, here, the propriety of opening a land office for the sale of all the remaining lands in the military tract, and also to repeal those parts of the general land law which forbid the sales of certain sections throughout the whole extent of the lands of the United States, except so far as relates to the school sections and to the sections reserved for religious purposes in the lands sold prior to the law of the 18th May, 1796. The plan of reserving some sections in each township for the purpose of giving to the public a share in the increasing value of lands, originated at a time when lands were sold by the United States at a lower rate and in large tracts.

The present mode of disposing of the public lands, as under it none are sold until they have attained the value of two dollars per acre, effects the same object, and renders the reservation useless. No further precaution seems necessary in relation to that object, than to order a public sale of those reservations before they shall be offered on the usual terms.

The part of the military tract which shall remain for future disposition may be divided into sections and half-sections, and a land office opened at Zanesville, for the sale both of those lands and of those lying north of the Ohio Company purchase, which now belong to the Marietta district. The sales have been so inconsiderable in that district that little doubt remains that the place selected for the land office was not the most proper. It is, however, suggested that the sales would be eventually promoted in that and in all other districts, by permitting the sale of fractional sections, without being attached to the adjoining entire section.

There is another circumstance which, though of inferior importance, seems to merit some consideration.

The price at which Congress sell their lands is advantageous to the population and prosperity of the State of Ohio. It has effectually destroyed the monopoly of lands, and throws the land exclusively in the hands of actual settlers; yet it is considered as high; and, on that account, the payment of fees, in addition to the purchase money, is generally complained of. This objection should be removed, by giving to the registers a small salary or commission in lieu of their fees. About $500 a year to each, that of Marietta excepted, would be, I believe, a sufficient compensation, in addition to the half per cent. commission which they receive on moneys entered.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Hon. JOHN RANDOLPH, Esq.,

Chairman of the Committee to whom were referred the constitution and sundry propositions submitted by the State of Ohio.

HONORED SIR:

CHILICOTHE, (N. W. T.) December 4, 1802.

Enclosed you will receive an address from the convention lately convened at this place, for the purpose of forming a constitution and State Government, for the seventeenth State of United America, and which has been made my duty to enclose to you, to be communicated to the honorable body over which you preside.

With every sentiment of respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TIFFIN.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Address to the President and both Houses of Congress of the United States.

The convention of the State of Ohio, duly appreciating the importance of a free and independent State Government, and impressed with sentiments of gratitude to the Congress of the United States for the prompt and decisive measures taken at their last session, to enable the people of the Northwestern Territory to emerge from their Colonial Government, and to assume a rank among the sister States, beg leave to take the earliest opportunity of announcing to you this important event.

On this occasion, the convention cannot help expressing their unequivocal approbation of the measures pursued by the present administration of the General Government and of both Houses of Congress, in diminishing the public burdens, cultivating peace with all nations, and promoting the happiness and prosperity of our country.

Resolved, That the president of this convention do enclose to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the foregoing address.

Done in convention, at Chillicothe, the 27th day of November, 1802.

THOMAS SCOTT, Secretary.

PROPOSITIONS, &c.

We, the representatives of the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, being assembled in convention pursuant to an act of Congress, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes:" and, having had under our consideration the propositions offered by the said act, for our free acceptance or rejection, do resolve to accept of the said propositions, provided the following addition to and modification of the said propositions shall be agreed to by the Congress of the United States, viz:

That, in addition to the first proposition, securing the section No. 16, in every township within certain tracts, to the inhabitants thereof, for the use of schools, a like donation, equal to the one thirty-sixth part of the amount of the lands in the United States' military tract, shall be made for the support of schools within that tract; and that the like provision shall be made for the support of schools in the Virginia reservation, so far as the unlocated lands in that tract will supply the proportion aforesaid, after the warrants issued from said State have been satisfied; and, also, that a donation of the same kind, or such provision as Congress shall deem expedient, shall be made to the inhabitants of the Connecticut reserve.

That all the lands which may hereafter be purchased of the Indian tribes by the United States, and lying within the State of Ohio, the one thirty-sixth part shall be given, as aforesaid, for the support of public schools.

That all lands before mentioned to be appropriated by the United States for the support of schools shall be vested in the Legislature of this State, in trust, for said purpose.

That not less than three per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands of the United States lying within the limits of the State of Ohio, sold and to be sold after the 30th day of June last, shall be applied in laying out roads within the State, under the direction of the Legislature thereof.

And if the Congress of the United States shall agree to the above addition to and modification of the said propositions, it is hereby declared and ordained, that every and each tract of land sold or to be sold by Congress, from and after the 30th day of June last, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under the authority of this State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years after the day of sale, to be reckoned from the date of certificate of the first quarterly payment.

That whereas Congress, by a law entitled "An act authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates," passed the 5th day of May, 1792, did authorize the President of the United States to convey, by letters patent, unto the said John Cleves Symmes and his associates, their heirs and assigns, a certain tract of land therein described; and did further authorize the President, by the act aforesaid, to grant and convey unto the said John Cleves Symmes and his associates, their heirs and assigns, in trust, for the purpose of establishing an academy and other public schools and seminaries of learning, one complete township, to be included and located within such limits and lines of boundary as the President may judge expedient; and, in pursuance thereof, the President did convey unto the said John Cleves Symmes and his associates, their heirs and assigns, by his letters patent, the aforesaid one complete township, to be located and accepted by the Governor of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio; and, inasmuch as the township aforesaid has never been located and accepted, agreeable to the provision of the said act:

The convention recommend the following propositions to Congress, as an equivalent for the one complete township aforesaid, to wit: The lots numbered 8, 11, and 26, reserved in the several townships for the future disposition of Congress, or so many of the said lots as will amount to the number contained in the aforesaid complete township, to be vested in the Legislature, in trust, to and for the purposes for which the said township was originally intended to be designated by the Legislature of this State.

Resolved, That Thomas Worthington be appointed a special agent to lay the aforesaid resolution and propositions before Congress; and that said agent do endeavor to procure the assent of Congress thereto.

Passed in convention, at Chillicothe, the 29th day of November, 1802.

CONCENTRATION OF THE PUBLIC OFFICES IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 13, 1803.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee appointed to "inquire into the expediency of concentrating the several public offices and other public buildings belonging to the United States, in the city of Washington," reported:

That, in their opinion, no alteration ought to be made in the sites of the public offices, or other public buildings belonging to the United States, in the city of Washington.

APPLICATION FOR A SUBSCRIPTION, BY THE UNITED STATES, TO THE STOCK OF THE ALLEGANY TURNPIKE COMPANY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 28, 1803.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens on the Western waters, who have subscribed for shares in the Allegany turnpike road, praying for the aid and patronage of the United States in the completion of said road, made the following report:

That the United States have, by compact with the State of Ohio, already made provision for opening roads from the Atlantic to the Western waters; that, believing it to be a very questionable policy for the United States to become proprietors of a stock created by the laws of individual States, they respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

DESCRIPTION OF LOUISIANA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 14TH OF NOVEMBER, 1803.

NOVEMBER 14, 1803.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now communicate a digest of the information I have received relative to Louisiana, which may be useful to the Legislature in providing for the government of the country. A translation of the most important laws in force in that province, now in the press, shall be the subject of a supplementary communication, with such further and material information as may yet come to hand.

TH: JEFFERSON.

AN ACCOUNT OF LOUISIANA.

The object of the following pages is to consolidate the information respecting the present state of Louisiana, furnished to the Executive by several individuals among the best informed upon that subject.

Of the province of Louisiana no general map, sufficiently correct to be depended upon, has been published, nor has any been yet procured from a private source. It is, indeed, probable that surveys have never been made upon so extensive a scale as to afford the means of laying down the various regions of a country, which, in some of its parts, appears to have been but imperfectly explored.

BOUNDARIES.

The precise boundaries of Louisiana, westward of the Mississippi, though very extensive, are at present involved in some obscurity. Data are equally wanting to assign with precision its northern extent. From the source of the Mississippi, it is bounded eastwardly, by the middle of the channel of that river, to the thirty-first degree of latitude; thence, it is asserted upon very strong grounds, that, according to its limits when formerly possessed by France, it stretches to the east as far, at least, as the river Perdido, which runs into the bay of Mexico, eastward of the river Mobile.

It may be consistent with the view of these notes to remark, that Louisiana, including the Mobile settlements, was discovered and peopled by the French, whose monarchs made several grants of its trade, in particular to Mr. Crosat, in 1712, and some years afterwards, with his acquiescence, to the well-known company projected by Mr. Law. This company was relinquished in the year 1731. By a secret convention, on the 3d November, 1762, the French Government ceded so much of the province as lies beyond the Mississippi, as well as the island of New Orleans, to Spain; and, by the treaty of peace which followed in 1763, the whole territory of France and Spain, eastward of the middle of the Mississippi, to the Iberville, thence, through the middle of that river and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain to the sea, was ceded to Great Britain. Spain having conquered the Floridas from Great Britain, during our revolutionary war, they were confirmed to her by the treaty of peace of 1783. By the treaty of St. Ildefonso, of the 1st of October, 1800, His Catholic Majesty promises and engages on his part to cede back to the French republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations therein contained, relative to the Duke of Parma, "the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it actually has in the hands of Spain, that it had when France possessed it, and such as it ought to be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States." This treaty was confirmed and enforced by that of Madrid, of the 21st of March, 1801. From France it passed to us by the treaty of the 30th of April last, with a reference to the above clause as descriptive of the limits ceded.

DIVISIONS OF THE PROVINCE.

The province as held by Spain, including a part of West Florida, is laid off into the following principal divisions: Mobile, from Balise to the city, New Orleans, and the country on both sides of lake Pontchartrain, First and Second German Coasts, Catahanose, Fourche, Venezuela, Iberville, Galveztown, Baton Rouge, Pointe Coupée, Attakapas, Opelousas, Ouachita, Avoyelles, Rapide, Natchitoches, Arkansas, and the Illinois.

In the Illinois there are commandants at New Madrid, St. Genevieve, New Bourbon, St. Charles, and St. Andrew's, all subordinate to the commandant-general.

Baton Rouge having been made a Government subsequently to the treaty of limits, &c. with Spain, the posts of Manchac and Thompson's creek, or Feliciana, were added to it.

Chapitoulas has sometimes been regarded as a separate command, but is now included within the jurisdiction of the city. The lower part of the river has likewise had occasionally a separate commandant.

Many of the present establishments are separated from each other by immense and trackless deserts, having no communication with each other by land, except now and then a solitary instance of its being attempted by hunters, who have to swim rivers, expose themselves to the inclemency of the weather, and carry their provisions on their backs for a time, proportioned to the length of their journey. This is particularly the case on the west of the Mississippi, where the communication is kept up only by water between the capital and the distant settlements; three months being required to convey intelligence from the one to the other by the Mississippi. The usual distance accomplished by a boat in ascending is five leagues per day. The rapidity of the current, in the spring season especially, when the waters of all the rivers are high, facilitates the descent, so that the same voyage by water, which requires three or four months to perform from the capital, may be made to it in from twelve to sixteen days. The principal settlements in Louisiana are on the Mississippi, which begins to be cultivated about twenty leagues from the sea, where the plantations are yet thin, and owned by the poorest people. Ascending, you see them improve on each side till you reach the city, which is situated on the east bank, on a bend of the river, thirty-five leagues from the sea.

CHAPITOULAS, FIRST AND SECOND GERMAN COASTS, CATAHANOSE, FOURCHE, AND IBERVILLE.

The best and most improved are above the city, and comprehend what is there known by the Paroisse de Chapitoulas, Premier and Second Cote des Allemands, and extend sixteen leagues.

Above this begins the parish of Catahanose, or first Acadian settlement, extending eight leagues on the river. Adjoining it, and still ascending, is the second Acadian settlement, or parish of the Fourche, which extends about six leagues. The parish of Iberville then commences, and is bounded on the east side by the river of the same name; which, though dry a great part of the year, yet, when the Mississippi is raised, it communicates with the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, and through them with the sea, and thus form what is called the island of New Orleans. Except on the point just below the Iberville, the country from New Orleans is settled the whole way along the river, and presents a scene of uninterrupted plantations in sight of each other, whose fronts to the Mississippi are all cleared, and occupy on that river from five to twenty-five acres, with a depth of forty; so that a plantation of five acres in front contains two hundred. A few sugar plantations are formed in the parish of Catahanose, but the remainder is devoted to cotton and provisions, and the whole is an excellent soil incapable of being exhausted. The plantations are but one deep on the island of New Orleans, and on the opposite side of the river, as far as the mouth of the Iberville, which is thirty-five leagues above New Orleans.

BAYOU DE LA FOURCHE, ATTAKAPAS, AND OPELOUSAS.

About twenty-five leagues from the last-mentioned place, on the west side of the Mississippi, the creek or bayou of the Fourche, called in old maps La Rivière des Chitamaches, flows from the Mississippi, and communicates with the sea, to the west of the Balise. The entrance of the Mississippi is navigable only at high water, but will then admit of craft of from sixty to seventy tons burden. On both banks of this creek are settlements, one plantation deep, for near fifteen leagues; and they are divided into two parishes. The settlers are numerous, though poor, and the culture is universally cotton. On all creeks, making from the Mississippi, the soil is the same as on the bank of the river, and the border is the highest part of it, from whence it descends gradually to the swamp. In no place on the low lands is there depth more than suffices for one plantation before you come to the low grounds incapable of cultivation. This creek affords one of the communications to the two populous and rich settlements of Attakapas and Opelousas, formed on and near the small rivers Teche and Vermilion, which flow into the bay of Mexico. But the principal and swiftest communication is by the bayou or creek of Plaquemines, whose entrance into the Mississippi is seven leagues higher up on the same side, and thirty-two above New Orleans. These settlements abound in cattle and horses, have a large quantity of good land in their vicinity, and may be made of great importance. A part of their produce is sent by sea to New Orleans, but the greater part is carried in batteaux by the creeks above mentioned.

BATON ROUGE AND ITS DEPENDENCIES.

Immediately above the Iberville, and on both sides of the Mississippi, lies the parish of Manchac, which extends four leagues on the river, and is well cultivated. Above it commences the settlement of Baton Rouge, extending about nine leagues. It is remarkable as being the first place where the high land is contiguous to the river, and here it forms a bluff from thirty to forty feet above the greatest rise of the river. Here the settlements extend a considerable way back on the east side; and this parish has that of Thompson's creek and bayou Sara subordinate to it. The mouth of the first of these creeks is about forty-nine leagues from New Orleans, and that of the latter two or three leagues higher up. They run from northeast to southwest, and their head waters are north of the thirty-first degree of latitude. Their banks have the best soil, and the greatest number of good cotton plantations, of any part of Louisiana, and are allowed to be the garden of it.

POINTE COUPEE AND FAUSSE RIVIERE.

Above Baton Rouge, at the distance of fifty leagues from New Orleans, and on the west side of the Mississippi, is Pointe Coupée, a populous and rich settlement, extending eight leagues along the river. Its produce is cotton. Behind it, on an old bed of the river, now a lake, whose outlets are closed up, is the settlement of Fausse Rivière, which is well cultivated.

In the space now described from the sea, as high as and including the last-mentioned settlement, are contained three-fourths of the population, and seven-eighths of the riches of Louisiana.

From the settlement of Pointe Coupée, on the Mississippi, to Cape Girardeau, above the mouth of the Ohio, there is no land on the west side that is not overflowed in the spring to the distance of eight or ten leagues from the river, with from two to twelve feet of water, except a small spot near New Madrid; so that, in the whole extent, there is no possibility of forming a considerable settlement contiguous to the river on that side. The eastern bank has, in this respect, a decided advantage over the western, as there are on it many situations which effectually command the river.

RED RIVER AND ITS SETTLEMENTS.

On the west side of the Mississippi, seventy leagues from New Orleans, is the mouth of the Red river, on whose banks and vicinity are the settlements of Rapide, Avoyelles, and Natchitoches, all of them thriving and populous. The latter is situate seventy-five leagues up the Red river. On the north side of the Red river, a few leagues from its junction with the Mississippi, is the Black river; on one of whose branches, a considerable way up, is the infant settlement of Ouachita, which, from the richness of the soil, may be made a place of importance. Cotton is the chief produce of these settlements; but they have likewise a considerable Indian trade. The river Rouge, or Red river, is used to communicate with the frontiers of New Mexico.

CONCORD, ARKANSAS, ST. CHARLES, ST. ANDREW, &c.

There is no other settlement on the Mississippi, except the small one called Concord, opposite to the Natchez, till you come to the Arkansas river, whose mouth is two hundred and fifty leagues above New Orleans. Here there are but a few families, who are more attached to the Indian trade (by which chiefly they live) than to cultivation. There is no settlement from this place to New Madrid, which is itself inconsiderable. Ascending the river, you come to Cape Girardeau, St. Genevieve, and St. Louis, where, though the inhabitants are numerous, they raise little for exportation, and content themselves with trading with the Indians and working a few lead mines. This country is very fertile, especially on the banks of the Missouri, where there have been formed two settlements, called St. Charles and St. Andrew, mostly by emigrants from Kentucky. The peltry procured in the Illinois is the best sent to the Atlantic market, and the quantity is very considerable. Lead is to be had with ease, and in such quantities as to supply all Europe, if the population were sufficient to work the numerous mines to be found within two or three feet from the surface in various parts of the country. The settlements about the Illinois were first made by the Canadians, and their inhabitants still resemble them in their aversion to labor, and love of a wandering life. They contain but few negroes compared with the number of the whites; and it may be taken for a general rule, that, in proportion to the distance from the capital, the number of blacks diminishes below that of the whites; the former abounding most on the rich plantations in its vicinity.

GENERAL DESCRIPTION OF UPPER LOUISIANA.

When compared with the Indiana Territory, the face of the country in Upper Louisiana is rather more broken, though the soil is equally fertile. It is a fact, not to be contested, that the west side of the river possesses some advantages not generally incident to those regions. It is elevated and healthy, and well watered with a variety of large, rapid streams, calculated for mills and other water-works. From Cape Girardeau, above the mouth of the Ohio, to the Missouri, the land on the east side of the Mississippi is low and flat, and occasionally exposed to inundations; that on the Louisiana side, contiguous to the river, is generally much higher, and in many places very rocky on the shore. Some of the heights exhibit a scene truly picturesque. They rise to a height of at least three hundred feet, faced with perpendicular lime and free-stone, carved into various shapes and figures by the hand of nature, and afford the appearance of a multitude of antique towers. From the tops of these elevations the land gradually slopes back from the river, without gravel or rock, and is covered with valuable timber. It may be said, with truth, that for fertility of soil no part of the world exceeds the borders of the Mississippi: the land yields an abundance of all the necessaries of life, and almost spontaneously; very little labor being required in the cultivation of the earth. That part of Upper Louisiana which borders on North Mexico is one immense prairie. It produces nothing but grass. It is filled with buffalo, deer, and other kinds of game. The land is represented as too rich for the growth of forest trees.

It is pretended that Upper Louisiana contains in its bowels many silver and copper mines, and various specimens of both are exhibited. Several trials have been made to ascertain the fact; but the want of skill in the artists has hitherto left the subject undecided.

The salt works are also pretty numerous: some belong to individuals; others to the public. They already yield an abundant supply for the consumption of the country, and, if properly managed, might become an article of more general exportation. The usual price per bushel is one dollar and a half in cash at the works. The price will be still lower as soon as the manufacture of the salt is assumed by Government, or patronized by men who have large capitals to employ in the business. One extraordinary fact, relative to salt, must not be omitted. There exists, about one thousand miles up the Missouri, and not far from that river, a salt mountain. The existence of such a mountain might well be questioned, were it not for the testimony of several respectable and enterprising traders who have visited it, and who have exhibited several bushels of the salt to the curiosity of the people of St. Louis, where some of it still remains. A specimen of the same salt has been sent to Marietta. This mountain is said to be one hundred and eighty miles long, and forty-five in width, composed of solid rock salt, without any trees, or even shrubs on it. Salt springs are very numerous beneath the surface of this mountain, and they flow through the fissures and cavities of it. Caves of saltpetre are found in Upper Louisiana, though at some distance from the settlements. Four men, on a trading voyage, lately discovered one several hundred miles up the Missouri. They spent five or six weeks in the manufacture of this article, and returned to St. Louis with four hundredweight of it. It proved to be good, and they sold it for a high price.

The geography of the Mississippi and Missouri, and their contiguity for a great length of way, are but little known. The traders assert that, one hundred miles above their junction, a man may walk from one to the other in a day; and it is also asserted that, seven hundred miles still higher up, the portage may be crossed in four or five days. This portage is frequented by traders who carry on a considerable trade with some of the Missouri Indians. Their general route is through Green Bay, which is an arm of Lake Michigan; they then pass into a small lake connected with it, and which communicates with the Fox river; they then cross over a short portage into the Ouisconsin river, which unites with the Mississippi some distance below the falls of St. Anthony. It is also said that the traders communicate with the Mississippi above these falls, through Lake Superior; but their trade in that quarter is much less considerable.

CANAL OF CARONDELET.

Behind New Orleans is a canal about a mile and a half long, which communicates with a creek called the bayou St. Jean, flowing into Lake Pontchartrain. At the mouth of it, about two and a half leagues from the city, is a small fort called St. Jean, which commands the entrance from the lake. By this creek the communication is kept up through the lake and the Rigolets to Mobile and the settlements in West Florida. Craft drawing from six to eight feet water can navigate to the mouth of the creek; but, except in particular swells of the lake, cannot pass the bar without being lightened.

ST. BERNARDO.

On the east side of the Mississippi, about five leagues below New Orleans, and at the head of the English bend, is a settlement known by the name of the Poblacion de St. Bernardo, or the Terre aux Bœufs, extending on both sides of a creek or drain, whose head is contiguous to the Mississippi, and which flowing eastward, after a course of eighteen leagues, and dividing itself into two branches, falls into the sea and Lake Borgne. This settlement consists of two parishes, almost all the inhabitants of which are Spaniards from the Canaries, who content themselves with raising fowls, corn, and garden-stuff for the market at New Orleans. The lands cannot be cultivated to any great distance from the banks of the creek, on account of the vicinity of the marsh behind them, but the place is susceptible of great improvement, and of affording another communication to small craft of from eight to ten feet draught, between the sea and the Mississippi.

SETTLEMENTS BELOW THE ENGLISH TURN.

At the distance of sixteen leagues below New Orleans, the settlements on both banks of the river are of but small account. Between these and the fort of Plaquemines the country is overflowed in the spring, and, in many places, is incapable of cultivation at any time, being a morass almost impassable by man or beast. This small tongue of land extends considerably into the sea, which is visible on both sides of the Mississippi from a ship's mast.

COUNTRY FROM PLAQUEMINES TO THE SEA, AND EFFECT OF THE HURRICANES.

From Plaquemines to the sea is twelve or thirteen leagues. The country is low, swampy, chiefly covered with reeds, having little or no timber, and no settlement whatever. It may be necessary to mention here, that the whole lower part of the country, from the English Turn downward, is subject to overflowing in hurricanes, either by the recoiling of the river, or reflux from the sea on each side; and, on more than one occasion, it has been covered from the depth of two to ten feet, according to the descent of the river, whereby many lives were lost, horses and cattle swept away, and a scene of destruction laid. The last calamity of this kind happened in 1794; but, fortunately, they are not frequent. In the preceding year the engineer who superintended the erection of the fort of Plaquemines was drowned in his house near the fort, and the workmen and garrison escaped only by taking refuge on an elevated spot in the fort, on which there were, notwithstanding, two or three feet of water. These hurricanes have generally been felt in the month of August. Their greatest fury lasts about twelve hours. They commence in the southeast, veer about to all points of the compass, are felt most severely below, and seldom extend more than a few leagues above New Orleans. In their whole course they are marked with ruin and desolation. Until that of 1793, there had been none felt from the year 1780.

PASSES, OR MOUTHS OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

About eight leagues below Plaquemines the Mississippi divides itself into three channels, which are called the passes of the river, viz: the East, South, and Southwest passes. Their course is from five to six leagues to the sea. The space between is a marsh, with little or no timber on it; but, from its situation, it may hereafter be rendered of importance. The East Pass, which is on the left hand going down the river, is divided into two branches about two leagues below, viz: the Pass à la Loutre, and that known to mariners by the name of the Balise, at which there is a small block-house and some huts of the pilots, who reside only here. The first of these secondary channels contains at present but eight feet water; the latter from fourteen to sixteen, according to the seasons. The South Pass, which is directly in front of the Mississippi, has always been considered as entirely choked up, but has ten feet water. The Southwest Pass, which is on the right, is the longest and narrowest of all the passes, and a few years ago had eighteen feet water, and was that by which the large ships always entered and sailed from the Mississippi. It has now but eight feet water, and will probably remain so for some time. In speaking of the quantity of water in the passes, it must be understood of what is on the bar of each pass; for immediately after passing the bar, which is very narrow, there are from five to seven fathoms at all seasons.

COUNTRY EAST OF LAKE PONTCHARTRAIN.

The country on the east side of lake Pontchartrain to Mobile, and including the whole extent between the American line, the Mississippi above New Orleans, and the lakes, (with the exception of a tract of about thirty miles on the Mississippi, and as much square, contiguous to the line, and comprehending the waters of Thompson's creek, bayou Sara, and the Amet,) is a poor, thin soil, overgrown with pine, and contains no good land whatever, unless on the banks of a few small rivers. It would, however, afford abundant supplies of pitch, tar, and pine lumber, and would feed large herds of cattle.

THE INHABITANTS, AND THEIR ORIGIN.

The inhabitants of Louisiana are chiefly the descendants of the French and Canadians. There are a considerable number of English and Americans in New Orleans. The two German coasts are peopled by the descendants of settlers from Germany, and a few French mixed with them. The three succeeding settlements, up to Baton Rouge, contain mostly Acadians, banished from Nova Scotia by the English, and their descendants. The Government of Baton Rouge, especially the east side, which includes all the country between the Iberville and the American line, is composed partly of Acadians, a very few French, and of a great majority of Americans. On the west side they are mostly Acadians; at Pointe Coupée and Fausse Rivière they are French and Acadians. Of the population of the Attakapas and Opelousas, a considerable part is American. Natchitoches, on the Red River, contains but a few Americans, and the remainder of the inhabitants are French; but the former are more numerous in the other settlements on that river, viz: Avoyelles, Rapide, and Ouachita. At Arkansas they are mostly French, and at New Madrid Americans. At least two-fifths, if not a greater proportion of all the settlers on the Spanish side of the Mississippi, in the Illinois country, are likewise supposed to be Americans. Below New Orleans the population is altogether French and the descendants of Frenchmen.

NEW ORLEANS.

By recurring to the maps, and examining the position of Louisiana, it will appear that the lower part projects considerably into the sea. It has, in all probability, been formed by the sediment brought down by the current and deposited on the flat coast. There is, therefore, on the east side but a very narrow slip along the bank of the river, from the sea to the Iberville. The land is not generally susceptible of cultivation more than a mile in depth from the river; the rest is low and swampy to the lakes and the sea, but in general abounds with cypress timber, which is sawed by mills, which are worked by artificial streams from the Mississippi, in the time of freshets. They generally run five months in the year.

What has been said of the east equally applies to the west side of the river. The soil and situation are nearly the same. After leaving the bank of the river there is an immense swamp, intersected by creeks and lakes, extending to the high lands of Attakapas, and occupying a space of thirty or forty leagues.

The city of New Orleans, which is regularly laid out on the east side of the Mississippi, in latitude 30° north, and longitude 90° west, extends nearly a mile along the river, from the gate of France on the south, to that of Chapitoulas above, and a little more than one-third of a mile in breadth from the river to the rampart; but it has an extensive suburb on the upper side. The houses in front of the town, and for a square or two backwards, are mostly of brick, covered with slate or tile, and many of two stories. The remainder are of wood, covered with shingles. The streets cross each other at right angles, and are thirty-two French feet wide. The squares between the intersections of the streets have a front of three hundred French feet. There is in the middle of the front of the city a place d'armes, facing which the church and town-house are built. There are from twelve to fourteen hundred houses in the city and suburbs. The population may be estimated at ten thousand, including the seamen and garrison. It was fortified in 1793; but the works were originally defective, could not have been defended, and are now in ruins. The powder magazine is on the opposite bank of the river.

The public buildings, and other public property in New Orleans, are as follows:

Two very extensive brick stores, from one hundred and sixty to one hundred and eighty feet in length, and about thirty in breadth. They are one story high, and covered with shingles.

A Government house, stables, and garden, occupying a front of about two hundred and twenty feet on the river, in the middle of the town, and extending three hundred and thirty-six feet back to the next street.

A military hospital.

An ill built custom-house of wood, almost in ruins, in the upper part of the city, near the river.

An extensive barrack in the lower part of the city, fronting on the river, and calculated to lodge twelve or fourteen hundred men.

A large lot adjoining the King's stores, with a few sheds in it. It serves as a park for artillery.

A prison, town-house, market-house, assembly room, some ground rents, and the common about the town.

A public school for the rudiments of the Spanish language.

A cathedral church unfinished, and some houses belonging to it.

A charitable hospital, with some houses belonging to it, and a revenue of $1,500 annually, endowed by an individual lately deceased.

The Canal de Carondelet has been already described.

NUMBER OF INHABITANTS.

According to the annexed census, (No. 2.) of Louisiana, including Pensacola and the Natchez, as made in 1785, the whole number of inhabitants amounted to thirty-two thousand and sixty-two, of which fourteen thousand two hundred and fifteen were free whites, one thousand three hundred and three free people of color, and sixteen thousand five hundred and forty-four slaves.

The statement No. 3, from the latest documents, makes the whole number forty-two thousand three hundred and seventy-five; the free whites, twenty-one thousand two hundred and forty-four; the free people of color, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight; and the slaves, twelve thousand nine hundred and twenty.

A particular statement respecting the population, &c. of Upper Louisiana, and another containing the census of New Orleans, in this year, are numbered 4 and 5, in the appendix.

These papers certainly exhibit a smaller number than the real population of the country. From an official document, made in July last, and received from Attakapas since the statement No. 3 was formed, it appears that it contained two thousand two hundred and seventy whites, two hundred and ten free people of color, one thousand two hundred and sixty-six slaves; in all, three thousand seven hundred and forty-six souls, instead of one thousand four hundred and forty-seven, as therein stated. It is highly probable that the return for the neighboring district of Opelousas is in the same proportion underrated.

A conjectural estimation, made by a gentleman of great respectability and correct information, residing at Natchez, raises the number of whites in the island of New Orleans, on the west side of the river, and some settlements on the east side, to fifty thousand one hundred and fifty, and the number of blacks to thirty-nine thousand eight hundred and twenty. His statement is also subjoined, No. 6.

It is at all times difficult to obtain the full census of a country, and the impediments are increased in this, from its scattered population. The actual enumeration may, therefore, fall short of the true numbers.

MILITIA.

There is a militia in Louisiana. The following is the return of it, made to the court of Spain by the Baron of Carondelet.

From Balise to the city.—Volunteers of the Mississippi—4 companies of 100 men each—complete, -	400
City.—Battalion of the city, 5 companies, -	500
Artillery company, with supernumeraries, -	120
Carabineers, or privileged companies of horse, 2 companies of 70 each, incomplete, -	100
Mulattoes, 2 companies; negroes 1 do. -	300
Mixed legion of the Mississippi, comprehending Galveztown, Baton Rouge, Pointe Coupée, Attakapas and Opelousas, viz:
2 companies of grenadiers,
8 companies of fusileers,
4 companies of dragoons,
2 companies lately added from Bayou Sara,
16 companies of 100 men each, -	1,600
Avoyelles, 1 company of infantry, -	100
Ouachita, 1 company of cavalry, -	100
Natchitoches, 1 company of infantry and 1 of cavalry, -	200
Arkansas, 1 company of infantry and cavalry, -	100
Illinois, 4 companies of cavalry and 4 of infantry; these are always above the complement, -	800
Provincial regiment of Germans and Acadians, from the 1st German coast to Iberville, 10 companies, viz: 2 of grenadiers, 8 of fusileers, -	1,000
Mobile, and the country east of Lake Ponchartrain, 2 companies of horse and foot, incomplete, -	120
	5,440

The same gentleman alluded to, page 348, makes the number of the militia to amount to 10,340 men within same limits to which his estimate of the population applies. He distributes them in the several settlements as follows:

1. The island of New Orleans, with the opposite margin and the adjacent settlements, -	5,000
2. The west margin from Manchac, including Pointe Coupée, and extending to the Red River, -	800
3. Attakapas, along the coast, between the delta of the Mississippi and the river Sabine, -	350
4. Opelousas, -	750
5. Red River, including bayou Bœuf, Avoyelles, Rapides, and Natchitoches, -	1,000
6. Ouachita, -	300
7. Concord, -	40
8. Arkansas, -	150
9. New Madrid and its vicinity, -	350
10. Illinois and Missouri, -	1,000
11. The settlements on the east side of the Mississippi, from the American line to the Iberville, and some other settlements, -	600
	10,340

It is to be observed that none of these statements include the country beyond the river Sabine, nor even all those which lie eastwardly of it. Data are also wanting to give them.

FORTIFICATIONS.

St. Louis has a lieutenant colonel to command in it, and but few troops. Baton Rouge is an ill constructed fort, and has about fifty men. In describing the canal of Carondelet, the small fort of St. Jean has been mentioned, as has the block-house at the Balise, in its proper place. The fortifications of New Orleans, noticed before, consist of five ill constructed redoubts, with a covered way, palisade, and ditch. The whole is going fast to decay, and it is supposed they would be of but little service in case of an attack. Though the powder magazine is on the opposite side of the river, there is no sufficient provision made for its removal to the city in case of need.

The fort of Plaquemines, which is about twelve or thirteen leagues from the sea, is an ill constructed, irregular brick work, on the eastern side of the Mississippi, with a ditch in front of the river, and protected on the lower side by a deep creek, flowing from the river to the sea. It is, however, imperfectly closed behind, and almost without defence there; too much reliance having been placed on the swampiness of the ground which hardens daily. It might be taken, perhaps, by escalade, without difficulty. It is in a degree ruinous. The principal front is meant to defend the approach from sea, and can oppose, at most, but eight heavy guns. It is built at a turn in the river where ships in general must anchor, as the wind which brings them up so far is contrary in the next reach which they mostly work through; and they would therefore be exposed to the fire of the fort. On the opposite bank are the ruins of a small closed redoubt, called Fort Bourbon, usually garrisoned by a serjeant's command. Its fire was intended to flank that of the fort of Plaquemines, and prevent shipping and craft from ascending or descending on that side. When a vessel appears, a signal is made on one side, and answered on the other. Should she attempt to pass, without sending a boat on shore, she would be immediately fired upon.

INDIANS.

The Indian nations within the limits of Louisiana are, as far as known, as follows: and consist of the numbers hereafter specified.

On the eastern bank of the Mississippi, about twenty-five leagues above Orleans, are the remains of the nation of Houmas, or red men, which do not exceed sixty persons. There are no other Indians settled on this side of the river, either in Louisiana or West Florida, though they are at times frequented by parties of wandering Choctaws.

On the west side of the Mississippi are the remains of the Tounicas, settled near, and above Pointe Coupée, on the river, consisting of fifty or sixty persons.

In the Attakapas.—On the lower parts of the Bayou Teche, at about eleven or twelve leagues from the sea, are two villages of Chitimachas, consisting of about one hundred souls.

The Attakapas, properly so called, dispersed throughout the district, and chiefly on the bayou or creek of Vermilion, about one hundred souls.

Wanderers of the tribes of Bilexis and Choctaws, on Bayou Crocodile, which empties into the Teche, about fifty souls.

In the Opelousas, to the northwest of Attakapas.—Two villages of Alabamas in the centre of the district near the church, consisting of one hundred persons.

Conchates dispersed through the country, as far west as the river Sabina, and its neighborhood, about three hundred and fifty persons.

On the river Rouge.—At Avoyelles, nineteen leagues from the Mississippi, is a village of the Biloni nation, and another on the lake of the Avoyelles; the whole about sixty souls.

At the Rapides, twenty-six leagues from the Mississippi, is a village of Choctaws of one hundred souls, and another of Biloxes, about two leagues from it, of about one hundred more; about eight or nine leagues higher up the Red River is a village of about fifty souls. All these are occasionally employed by the settlers in their neighborhood as boatmen.

About eighty leagues above Natchitoches, on the Red River, is the nation of the Cadoquies, called by abbreviation Cados; they can raise from three to four hundred warriors; are the friends of the whites, and are esteemed the bravest and most generous of all the nations in this vast country; they are rapidly decreasing, owing to intemperance and the numbers annually destroyed by the Osages and Choctaws.

There are, besides the foregoing, at least four to five hundred families of Choctaws, who are dispersed on the west side of the Mississippi, on the Ouachita and Red rivers, as far west as Natchitoches, and the whole nation would have emigrated across the Mississippi had it not been for the opposition of the Spaniards and the Indians on that side who had suffered by their aggressions.

On the river Arkansas, &c.—Between the Red River and the Arkansas there are but a few Indians, the remains of tribes almost extinct. On this last river is the nation of the same name, consisting of about two hundred and sixty warriors; they are brave, yet peaceable and well disposed, and have always been attached to the French, and espoused their cause in their wars with the Chickasaws, whom they have always resisted with success. They live in three villages; the first is at eighteen leagues from the Mississippi, on the Arkansas river, and the others are at three and six leagues from the first. A scarcity of game on the eastern side of the Mississippi has lately induced a number of Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, &c. to frequent the neighborhood of Arkansas, where game is still in abundance; they have contracted marriages with the Arkansas, and seem inclined to make a permanent settlement, and incorporate themselves with that nation. The number is unknown, but is considerable, and is every day increasing.

On the river St. Francis, in the neighborhood of New Madrid, Cape Girardeau, Rivière à la Pomme, and the environs, are settled a number of vagabonds, emigrants from the Delawares, Shawnese, Miamis, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Piorias, and supposed to consist in all of five hundred families; they are at times troublesome to the boats descending the river, and have even plundered some of them and committed a few murders; they are attached to liquor, seldom remain long in any place; many of them speak English, all understand it, and there are some who even read and write it.

At St. Genevieve, in the settlement among the whites, are about thirty Piorias, Kaskaskias, and Illinois, who seldom hunt for fear of the other Indians; they are the remains of a nation which, fifty years ago, could bring into the field one thousand two hundred warriors.

On the Missouri.—On the Missouri and its waters are many and numerous nations, the best known of which are: The Osages, situated on the river of same name, on the right bank of the Missouri, at about eighty leagues from its confluence with it; they consist of one thousand warriors, who live in two settlements at no great distance from each other; they are of a gigantic stature and well proportioned; are enemies of the whites and of all other Indian nations, and commit depredations from the Illinois to the Arkansas. The trade of this nation is said to be under an exclusive grant. They are a cruel and ferocious race, and are hated and feared by all the other Indians. The confluence of the Osage river with the Missouri is about eighty leagues from the Mississippi.

Sixty leagues higher up the Missouri, and on the same bank, is the river Kansas, and on it the nation of the same name, but at about seventy or eighty leagues from its mouth. It consists of about two hundred and fifty warriors, who are as fierce and cruel as the Osages, and often molest and ill-treat those who go to trade among them.

Sixty leagues above the river Kansas, and at about two hundred from the mouth of the Missouri, still on the right bank, is the rivière Platte, or Shallow river, remarkable for its quicksands and bad navigation; and near its confluence with the Missouri dwells the nation of Octolactos, commonly called Otos, consisting of about two hundred warriors, among whom are twenty-five or thirty of the nation of Missouri, who took refuge among them about twenty-five years since.

Forty leagues up the river Platte you come to the nation of the Panjs, composed of about seven hundred warriors in four neighboring villages; they hunt but little, and are ill provided with fire-arms; they often make war on the Spaniards in the neighborhood of Santa Fé, from which they are not far distant.

At three hundred leagues from the Mississippi, and one hundred from the river Platte, on the same bank, are situated the villages of the Mahas. They consisted, in 1799, of five hundred warriors, but are said to have been almost cut off last year by the smallpox.

At fifty leagues above the Mahas, and on the left bank of the Missouri, dwell the Poncas, to the number of two hundred and fifty warriors, possessing, in common with the Mahas, their language, ferocity, and vices. Their trade has never been of much value, and those engaged in it are exposed to pillage and ill treatment.

At the distance of four hundred and fifty leagues from the Mississippi, and on the right bank of the Missouri, dwell the Aricaras, to the number of seven hundred warriors; and sixty leagues above them, the Mandane nation, consisting of about seven hundred warriors likewise. These two last nations are well disposed to the whites, but have been the victims of the Sioux or Nadowessies, who, being themselves well provided with fire-arms, have taken advantage of the defenceless situation of the others, and have on all occasions murdered them without mercy.

No discoveries on the Missouri, beyond the Mandane nation, have been accurately detailed, though the traders have been informed that many large navigable rivers discharge their waters into it far above it, and that there are many numerous nations settled thereon.

The Sioux, or Nadowessies, who frequent the country between the north bank of the Missouri and Mississippi, are a great impediment to trade and navigation. They endeavor to prevent all communication with the nations dwelling high up the Missouri, to deprive them of ammunition and arms, and thus keep them subservient to themselves. In the winter they are chiefly on the banks of the Missouri, and massacre all who fall into their hands.

There are a number of nations at a distance from the banks of the Missouri, to the north and south, concerning whom but little information has been received. Returning to the Mississippi, and ascending it from the Missouri, about seventy-five leagues above the mouth of the latter, the river Moingona, or rivière de Moine, enters the Mississippi on the west side, and on it are situated the Ayoas, a nation originally from the Missouri, speaking the language of the Otatachas; it consisted of two hundred warriors before the smallpox lately raged among them.

The Sacs and Renards dwell on the Mississippi, about three hundred leagues above St. Louis, and frequently trade with it; they live together, and consist of five hundred warriors; their chief trade is with Michilimakinac, and they have always been peaceable and friendly.

The other nations on the Mississippi, higher up, are but little known to us. The nations of the Missouri, though cruel, treacherous, and insolent, may doubtless be kept in order by the United States, if proper regulations are adopted with respect to them.

It is said that no treaties have been entered into by Spain with the Indian nations westward of the Mississippi, and that its treaties with the Creeks, Choctaws, &c. are in effect superseded by our treaty with that Power of the 27th October, 1795.

OF LANDS AND TITLES.

The lands are held in some instances by grants from the crown, but mostly from the colonial Government. Perhaps not one quarter part of the lands granted in Louisiana are held by complete titles; and, of the remainder, a considerable part depend upon a written permission of a commandant. Not a small proportion is held by occupancy, with a simple verbal permission of the officer last mentioned. This practice has always been countenanced by the Spanish Government, in order that poor men, when they found themselves a little at ease, might, at their own conveniency, apply for and obtain complete titles. In the mean time, such imperfect rights were suffered by the Government to descend by inheritance, and even to be transferred by private contract. When requisite, they have been seized by judicial authority, and sold for the payment of debts.
